LEDOGAR: Yes. For our original U.S. delegation in Paris members were all pulled from their Washington jobs temporarily. Nobody knew how long the wider Peace Talks were going to take. One of the guys from my office in the State Department had been pulled out and sent over there. Everyone was on loan from his Washington job without families until I went over. By January of 1969 Washington realized that this was not going to be a quick negotiation. It was a real hardship for someone who leaves his family and Washington responsibilities behind to concentrate and stick it out. It was also politically not very wise to have our people shuttling back and forth, rotating. But yes, I was in the State Department office that was backstopping the Peace Talks. I went to Honolulu for another conference on how to win the war and came back and started in the economic training course. Two or three days into it, I got a phone call saying that I was to go to Paris. The purpose was to go over there on a full-time basis to replace the guy, Jim Rosenthal, who was the first choice, but he was too important and was needed back on the Vietnam Desk. The Vietnam working group used the old bureaucratic trick that when you have a levy and you're required to contribute a person to a particular effort, the one person that you want to volunteer is the one who was transferred out and for whom you've already gotten a replacement. In other words, it was a slot out of the hide of the Foreign Service Institute at that time, not out of the Office of Vietnam Affairs. I went to Paris and was there for almost four years.

LINDSEY GRANT
Political Officer, Vietnamese Affairs
New Delhi, India (1965-1968)

National Security Council
Washington, DC (1968-1970)

Lindsey Grant was born in North Carolina in 1926. He joined the Foreign Service in 1950 and served in Hong Kong, Taipei, India, and Cyprus. He dealt with Vietnamese affairs in New Delhi (1965-1968) and the National Security Council (1968-1970). He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

GRANT: [In New Delhi 1965-1968] Also, the fact that they [the Chinese] did not move overtly in Vietnam. Over this there was a tremendous debate. I was very much a dove on Vietnam, but not because of China. It was because I didn't think we could win. I had to take the responsibility for North Vietnam when we created the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, and North Vietnam, North Korea, and Outer Mongolia became part of my watching area. I then began to inquire about what we knew about the table of organization, the basic facts of life in Hanoi, and discovered we knew nothing. I thought this was catastrophic, and I was convinced by other friends that, in fact, we were in a very bad situation.

But I did not think that the Chinese were going to come in overtly. As a matter of fact, there was a very good intelligence estimate, or war game. It had a Greek letter -- I think it was Omega -- run out of the Pentagon, but with State, CIA, a lot of other participation. They played the game through sometime in the mid-1960s, and the way they played it, the Russians and Chinese kept putting in enough to counter our efforts, but just enough, and not moving beyond that, and we kept bogging down. If we had paid attention to that war game, we'd have gotten a very good steer as to how we should have behaved in Vietnam. It would have saved us a lot of heartache later on, because that's exactly what they did. So on external policy, I think we did better.

GRANT: I came back very briefly to INR, to Intelligence and Research. That lasted a couple of months, and then I went over as a staffer in the NSC with the incoming administration, with [Henry] Kissinger.

Q: Could you describe the spirit, the feeling, the atmosphere? It was one of the most important times of power for the National Security Council.

GRANT: It was a heady time, believe me.

Q: What were you doing?

GRANT: Everything! [Laughter] It was wild. There was a tremendous sense of power, and it was not unjustified. Henry was a master politician. It was informal, extremely busy. Henry ran it, I would say, in a pretty effective way. He put his stamp on it, but by no means tried to second-guess everything. He couldn't. We were so busy producing things. For instance, the regular briefing reports to the President went through and Henry never even reviewed them. They were done by the staff, the daily briefings. You had to delegate a lot.

There was a lot done which I perceived at the time to be wrong. We were instructed we couldn't tell State about this or that, a lot of things. The degree to which the decisions were centralized was extraordinary. We sought -- I think I did, and I suspect that the other staffers did -- to bring people in informally, so we could get their knowledge, their background information, and so on, but we would prepare the briefing materials by ourselves for Presidential meetings, for the press conferences and so on. We prepared the materials that Henry saw. The briefing books from State would come over and be attached, then pulled off at the last minute, I'm sure.

We were writing for the President, and there was an extraordinary process when he had a press conference. We would all invent questions and then invent answers to them and sort of play them against each other and check them out. Henry would certainly look at it. He was, by the way, called Henry. It was very informal. Everybody was first name, except Al Haig; he always called him Dr. Kissinger. Thereby lies a lesson on being too informal.

We'd go home and turn on our radios or our television, or if we couldn't get home, we'd turn one on in the situation room, and have the President, who had a remarkable memory -- still does -- answer the questions the way we suggested. If you don't think that's a trip, you don't understand.

[Laughter]

I perceived at the time that it was terribly dangerous to be so narrowly focused -- tunnel vision -- when you had that much to do and were driving projects that you knew Henry and the President wanted, or that you were selling. The vetting to take a look at the lateral implications of what you were doing drops away very fast. As a matter of fact, since I retired, I have been writing about this issue. The word of art is "foresight."

After I left there, I wrote some memoranda to the Secretary of State about how one might make the NSC connection and the foresight process work better without derogating from the President's final authority. We needed to organize the process, because it was much too narrow. On the NSC Staff we were not clearing whole concepts with State; just floating them on our own.

One example in my area was the Nixon Doctrine, which we started by calling the Guam Doctrine. This was for the first Far Eastern trip the President took. We were doing briefing papers, and I was the one charged with doing the first run of briefing papers. I thought, "He needs a theme, an overall unifying theme." And I developed this thing which came partly from having been listening to what the President had been saying and writing before, and partly out of my own head, which he then discussed with the reporters in Guam. And he started calling it the Nixon Doctrine. This later appeared in the President's first annual Foreign Policy Report. That idea, that paper, I put in the briefing book. Kissinger took it out, said, "We don't need this." The book went up for the President's approval. The next day, Kissinger said, "Where was that general paper?" And I never knew why, but he took it and had it put back in the book. He changed one sentence, as I recall.

Nobody ever checked this with State. Nobody said, "What will happen if we make a major departure, describing our relationships with a lot of other countries in the world?" And it was major. It said, in effect, "We can't protect you from yourselves. If you can't run a good government and you lose the affection of your people, we can't help you. You've got to be able to do it. We'll help protect you from the outside, but it's your initiative first." As I say, this was enshrined in that first foreign policy paper that he did, the annual report. It got considerable attention when it came out.

Q: One that strikes immediately home is the Philippines, a place you never served. What did this mean there?

GRANT: I don't recall. I just don't recall. We undoubtedly got some reporting about this, but I do not remember it anymore. I'm sure it did lead to questioning. I'm sure there was an exchange on this.

Q: What about your relations with the State Department? Here you were, a Foreign Service officer. You say you were under instructions not to consult?

GRANT: Yes. That was very difficult, very bad.

Q: What did you do?

GRANT: I used to get over -- one of us would -- to the staff meetings, so we'd keep in touch with what they were talking about, but it was unfair, because we would sometimes know some things that were happening that we simply were under instructions not to talk about. I know that Marshall Green used to get a little bit nettled. I'm very fond of Marshall. He told me one time, "That's all right. You're going to have to come back to State some day. We'll get you then." [Laughter] But it was not the way to run a railroad, and I thought it then and I think it now.

Incidentally, there were funny things. I can remember Henry would pick up some staffer to go with him to an Under Secretary's meeting, and I can remember he'd get bored or decide he'd like to leave early, just to throw his weight around, and wave whatever flunkey he had brought to his chair. So I found myself sitting for the White House at an Under Secretary's meeting or a JCS meeting. As I say, it was exciting, and there was an enormous amount of responsibility.

I can remember -- for instance, talking about the Philippines -- a very minor thing, but it's just a little example. The Department -- the desk officer -- and the Department of Agriculture had a difference of opinion as to how much PL 480 --

Q: PL 480 being surplus money generated by agriculture.

GRANT: In this case, it was actually the grain shipments of PL 480. How much we should give the Philippines the next year. So he called up and said, "What should we do?"

I said, "Tell me what your position is, then tell the Agriculture guy to call me and tell me what his position is." They both did. Then I called them both and said, "Okay, why don't you go with such and such a number." And they did. All they needed was one of those magic cubes that come out heads or tails. We provided that function. I don't think I even bothered to report that. I don't think I told anybody about that. It was just in the course of the day. So there's a tremendous amount of authority that centers there, and it does need a more systematic vetting process.

Q: How did you feel about Henry Kissinger at the time? Did you feel he was keeping you well informed, or did you feel there was always another agenda? Did you have the feeling he was being almost puckish, playing games, or did you feel there was an agenda?

GRANT: I guess all of the above. I definitely knew there was a lot that he knew that he wasn't telling me about my area. As a matter of fact, it's very interesting. On China, John Holdridge, who I hope you've interviewed or will interview --

Q: Marshall Green has interviewed Holdridge for us.

GRANT: Good. Marshall told me that he and John had been in touch. John was the only NSC staffer, as far as I know, presumably Al Haig, because Al was handling the papers, who actually knew the details of the whole opening towards China. I was the China guy there, among other things. I handled everything in the Far East but Vietnam. But I was not in it. I knew that I was out of something, because there was enough movement. So you knew this. But Henry also gave you -- for one thing, he was unquestionably brilliant. His ability to absorb information constantly surprised me. His willingness to use his people, in the good sense, was very gratifying. We were given a lot of room to do what we thought we had to do, without even asking or checking, as long as we thought it was our judgment. So I had very considerable respect.

I always thought, thought it at the time, that Henry was more at home in the Congress of Vienna than he is in this end of this century. He had no sense, as far as I could tell, of tectonic movements, the kind of thing that I was becoming even then worried about, the whole environment, population, resources range of issues. All this kind of thing meant nothing to him. He's a balance-of-power man.

I think, in retrospect -- I couldn't judge at the time -- Henry really didn't advance Nixon's agenda very much, and I think he'll be seen as a wonderful tactician, but not a strategist, which is sort of an interesting inversion for an academic.

Q: In these interviews, one comes across a lot of places where the best thing they felt Henry Kissinger could do was stay out of it, because he saw everything in Soviet-American terms and balance and power.

GRANT: Yes. Of course, Marshall had lots of problems with Henry. [Laughter]

Q: But you catch this in other places. The people in Africa say, "The best thing he ever did was not to know where it was."

GRANT: Yes, yes. And one of the worst things he did was when I was later in Cyprus and he thought he knew how to handle that Cyprus problem. That's very true. Henry changed. He got a little confident as he stayed on. When I got back to State after a period in the War College, he was no longer Henry; he was Mr. Kissinger. I used to call him Henry, which obviously nettled him. He changed and became over-confident. But the first couple of years there, it was brilliant.

Q: You were there from when to when?

GRANT: Basically it was about a year and a half to two years. I guess it was the end of January, right at the beginning, a week into the new administration, until July a year later, at which time I had been working about 70-hour weeks, then went to the War College.

Q: How did he use Larry Eagleburger, who has always been considered his right-hand man?

GRANT: Larry was going to be his right-hand man and had a heart attack or a stroke and had to be gotten out of there, and left within days. Larry was a good guy. I can just remember his trying to help getting us set up, just the physical process. You walk into the NSC, you walk into that space after a change of administration, and there's nothing. No files, no nothing. Literally, you create things anew. I think it's improved. I'm not sure. Larry was right in there trying to figure out, arguing about space and things like that. But he was gone almost instantly, and that was when Al Haig was pressed into service.

Q: I want to ask you about Haig. On the last tape, we were talking about the NSC. You were working with General Haig at the time. He was a colonel then?

GRANT: That's right.

Q: Could you describe his method of operation and how you saw him?

GRANT: You see, at the beginning of the Nixon Administration, Nixon selected Kissinger to be his National Security Advisor and assistant. He had -- oh, hell, I can't think of his name -- who had been his campaign advisor on foreign affairs, who arrived on the scene and was sort of attached to the NSC staff. The result of this, I'm sure that's why it happened, is that very ostentatiously, nobody was made deputy, because it would have been very hard not to make -- I can't think of his name.

Q: You can add that later.

GRANT: Right. It would be very hard to appoint a deputy who was not him. So what you had was Henry at the top and a whole series of the senior most guys, all of whom had so-called equal ranking. But Al Haig was pulled in to sit at that desk outside Henry's office and to run the flow after Larry left. This obviously put him on the inside track. I can recall Henry said, "We're going to have to have staff meetings. We've got to keep informed." Well, he tried to organize one, and after about half an hour of waiting for him -- when we had thousands of things to do -- Al was called away. Then he came back, with some embarrassment, actually giggling with embarrassment, because it was sort of a delicate situation, and said that Henry had asked him to go ahead and run the meeting. As I said, there was much giggling on his part and much obvious annoyance on the part of some of the other people sitting there.

The second staff meeting, Henry called but then canceled. That was the last of the scheduled staff meetings. From that time on, Al just acted as amanuensis to Henry. The stuff did pass through Henry's hands. Henry would turn to him and say, "Get this, this, and this. I need such and such. Has somebody gotten the papers ready for such and such?" I can remember Henry shaving and getting dressed in his black tie to go out, in the men's room, Al by his side, taking notes. Henry said, "I'll be back about 11:00." This was probably about 7:30 in the evening. "I'll be back about 11:00. If you'd have these ready for me, I'd appreciate it."

So basically, the way Al operated was to hang in there, treat him with respect, and never sleep. I remember Al, when we were talking one time, his wife called up on the phone and they had to get a car. [Chuckles] His end of the conversation was, "Yeah, well, you think we really need it?" Obviously, the other end of the line said, "Yes, we've just got to." Then he said, "Well, if you like it, buy it." [Laughter] He was just wedded to that office.

Q: Did he know anything about foreign affairs?

GRANT: Al was a good, bright study. I mean, he was no clown. For one thing, he was a political colonel who had spent his life in that part of the system, just getting over to Vietnam long enough to get his ticket punched, as they say in the Army. His mind was subtle and he was familiar with foreign issues. There were times when I disagreed and got rather annoyed sometimes when I thought he was being too cavalier, but I never remember a time when I thought, "This is a dumb son of a bitch." No, he was bright.

Q: But did he understand? So often the military can be very bright, people coming out of that environment, but there is a tendency to want to get things done. Again, this is where your tunnel vision comes back at you in spades. The Oliver North case is a prime example.

GRANT: There's a lot of difference between a Marine lieutenant colonel and an Army colonel, particularly a political one. Yes, the "Can-do, gung-ho, charge!" Marine thing, I agree, and that's, I think, terribly dangerous. People who have been aides-de-camp to generals before and have played the Byzantine struggles are pretty well schooled in subtlety, and getting things done is not necessarily nearly as important as seeing that your private agenda is taken care of. No, I would not accuse Al of lack of subtlety. I think his problem later on was, regrettably -- of course with a lot of very bitter Army generals passed over -- he moved up so fast, and to be in his position, particularly in the NATO command job, can be, as it was with Henry, dangerous for one's balance. I think that Al lost his, and I think that to a degree Henry became much too confident later on.

Q: You were seeing both these people at a time when you were really working pretty much as a team.

GRANT: Right, and we were all new to the job.

Q: And also with a President who, by all accounts, knew foreign policy, was interested in it, and had a remarkable mind for it.

Q: As I say, I would fault Henry just on that point, that when all is said and done, and people learn to sort out the Jekyll-Hyde problem with Nixon, they're going to find that what Henry succeeded with was what the President had set him on to, like China.

I really think that Henry went along with a number of people who got over-confident on the Vietnam issue. I had a very definite feeling that the President was willing, in those first months -- well, actually, most of the first year -- to say, "We will cut our losses with honor." In other words, we will try to give the GVN -- the government of Vietnam, the South Vietnamese -- the material support, so that they can do it if they can hack it, but we are not in forever to fight the war for them." I think that he was in a frame of mind that would welcome this.

About that time, people began to realize that the Viet Cong -- the North Vietnamese -- had lost so much in the Tet Offensive of 1968. At first, everybody thought the Tet Offensive showed how much strength they had. Later on, it became pretty clear how many of their assets they wasted. There was a tremendous surge of over-confidence, and our people thought, "Well, we've got them on the ropes now." And as Governor Harriman used to say, "Don't escalate your goals in mid-stream." I think we did just that. I think Henry, when all is said and done, will be found to have pushed the President the wrong way on that one.

Q: You left the NSC after about a year and a half. Where did you go?

WILLIAM LLOYD STEARMAN
Psychological and Propaganda Operations, JUSPAO
Saigon (1965-1967)

Vietnam Task Force, East Asia Bureau, INR
Washington, DC (1967-1971)

Dr. William Lloyd Stearman was born in Wichita, Kansas. He attended high school in Burlingame, California. He entered the V-12 program of the Navy Air Corps after dropping out of the Colorado School of Mines. Later, he finished his education at the University of California in Berkeley and graduated with a math degree in 1943. He attended graduate school at Columbia University. He became interested in international affairs while in graduate school in Geneva, taking international studies. He has served in Austria and Germany. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 15, October 5, 1992 and February 15, June 17, 1994.

Q: Today is February 15, 1994 and this is a continuing interview with William Stearman. Bill, we got you out of Soviet Affairs and going to 1965-67 when you were in Saigon. How did you get that assignment?

STEARMAN: I got assigned to Saigon because somebody knew that I had good French and was a Soviet specialist. They wanted somebody to work on North Vietnamese affairs and to direct psychological operations against North Vietnam. I was rather chagrined when I got this assignment because I was already assigned to Hamburg as deputy principal officer, and Hamburg was bigger than most of our embassies. Coburn Kidd, the Consul General, was going to retire and I thought I might be able to replace him. I was on my way and then this came up, so I went out there. At the time, I considered it a derailment of my career.

Q: What was the situation? Did one stand up and salute when one was ordered to Vietnam?

STEARMAN: Well, you had a simple option. If you were assigned to Vietnam and didn't take it, you resigned your commission and left the Service. It was as simple as that. David Bruce, who happened to be in town when this assignment broke, weighed in personally with everyone he knew on my behalf, and he had a fair amount of clout. He knew how well I knew the Hamburg scene, because I had interpreted for him every time he went to Hamburg and he knew that I knew a lot of people there. So he thought it was insane to break the Hamburg assignment. But he couldn't budge it. So I just saluted and went. As it turned out, it almost cost me my life, but it was a very interesting assignment.

Q: In a way, many of us got to see the elephant there.

STEARMAN: That is right.

Q: What was the situation in Vietnam when you arrived in 1965?

STEARMAN: It was late in 1965 and the situation was quite bad. Our side had some severe military setbacks. The embassy had been bombed a couple of months before I got out there. A number of our people were seriously injured and I believe some embassy people were actually killed. The VC were in Saigon and all around it. You couldn't go a kilometer out of town without the chance of getting shot at. And you heard battle sounds around the clock....artillery fire, machine gun fire, etc. It looked pretty grim at the time because the other side seemed to be everywhere and winning.

Q: Where did you stay when you got there?

STEARMAN: I stayed in Saigon, in an old house that the embassy had had for a long time, with Tom Corcoran, who was the deputy head of the political section there. A wonderful person who is still around. He is very active here in DACOR and had an encyclopedic knowledge of Southeast Asia and was an extremely good officer. (Tom died several months after this interview.)

Q: He closed our consulate in Hanoi.

STEARMAN: You have a good memory, he did exactly that. He was up in Hue in 1966 at the time of the Buddhists riots and showed an enormous amount of cool and courage in a very difficult situation. He was a very impressive person who had always hid his light under a bushel. He had a couple of embassies in Africa, but I always thought he should have had an embassy in Southeast Asia. But we have all seen it happen with mediocre people getting to the top and the good people not.

Q: What was your job when you went out there?

STEARMAN: I was the head of the North Vietnamese division of what they called JUSPAO, which had people from all parts of the Foreign Service and the military service engaged in psychological and propaganda operations. I was charged with psychological operations against North Vietnam and the North Vietnamese army wherever it might be in Indochina.

Q: To get inside the psyche of the North Vietnamese soldier you are not going to get it coming from Soviet affairs, or was the feeling that somehow these were just little Soviets or something like that?

STEARMAN: Well, as it turned out, and I hate to admit this, my assignment made sense because knowledge of Soviet affairs was fairly transferable to this situation; although there were obvious cultural differences. I found that our people who were Southeast Asia experts, really didn't understand anything at all about the other side. They were seriously deficient in almost every respect. Whereas I certainly had deficiencies, I felt quite comfortable in my new role and fairly well understood what motivated the North Vietnamese and how they organized. Their whole political system was patterned after the Soviet Union. Ho Chi Minh, was, after all, trained by the Soviets, he was a Soviet agent for many years. The official North Vietnamese communist history admitted that he was a Comintern agent. A Hanoi publication listed about a dozen aliases that Ho used, and we have identified about twenty.

I didn't have Vietnamese, which would have been a great help, but I had an excellent Vietnamese assistant. Most of my Vietnamese counterparts in the government and elsewhere spoke French so I could converse easily. So it really worked out pretty well. When I got there I found our psychological warfare operations against the other side woefully inadequate because we had little understanding of the target audience. We were dropping leaflets and broadcasting messages that sometimes were counterproductive and often of little use. For example, we had been emphasizing the animosity the North Vietnamese supposedly felt against the Chinese, a theme mostly inspired by North Vietnamese who fled to South Vietnam in the mid-fifties.

Q: Many Catholics.

STEARMAN: Yes, there were a large number of them, close to a million, and there would have been two or three million if the Hanoi regime hadn't cut off the flow. These refugees all thought that they knew the North, but their knowledge was dated since they hadn't lived very long under the communists who were just taking over when they left. Since they had grown up being anti-Chinese, China being Vietnam's historical enemy for centuries, they thought the anti-Chinese theme would be a good one. But most of the young Vietnamese were looking upon China as a friend and ally because China, among other things, was instrumental in helping them defeat the French at Dien Bien Phu. They couldn't have done it without massive Chinese assistance. And China was providing a large part of their consumer goods and a large part of their weaponry. Also, they were indoctrinated to believe that China was a friend and ally, as was the Soviet Union. So the anti-Chinese theme was going nowhere.

Our people never tried the obvious which was to actually interrogate some defectors and deserters and to see how they reacted to our proposed messages. So we started that process. I tried to get to the prisoners as soon as I could, which is why I spent a good bit of time in the field, to size up enemy vulnerabilities and ascertain what was bothering them. I believe we came up with a better target information and better themes and messages, however, I am sure you have heard, they were not very vulnerable to this kind of thing, particularly the regular North Vietnamese.

The best thing that I found we could do was to give them instructions as to how to surrender. We dropped a lot of safe conduct passes.

Q: Had the Chieu Hoi program been started?

STEARMAN: The Chieu Hoi program had been started and was enormously successful, more successful than most people realize. About a quarter of a million people on the other side came over to our side mostly as a result of the Chieu Hoi program. Most of the people from the regular forces who came over had been born in the South. We didn't get very many regular army defectors. We did, however, get an extremely interesting defector from the North Vietnamese army, Colonel Tuyuan, who was a regimental commander and had also been a head of training for COSVN which was the communist headquarters in South Vietnam, actually located most of the time over in Cambodia. He defected because he had been passed over for promotion to division commander, which he felt he deserved. And secondly, he had made the mistake of getting a local girl pregnant which was a big no-no. So he was in, what we used to say, deep kimchi. He decided to come over to us and was a fascinating person. He was very intelligent and spoke good French. We used to sit up hour upon hour over cigars and good French brandy talking about all the things we were doing wrong.

He gave me an idea how we could have won the war, had we so chosen. He said the communist forces were extremely vulnerable to ambush and to ground raids on their own facilities, which we never carried out. He said he couldn't understand why we never set any ambushes, ever. The only time their lines of communications were ever threatened was by accident when we were running the search and destroy missions which happened to go through them and block them. But, he said, their side set ambushes all the time and were constantly attacking our installations, but we didn't do that to them. He thought that some of the people who had defected to our side, including some of the people he had trained as guerrillas and sappers, could be very effective in being turned back against the other side. Well, I thought this was a great idea. We had tried it on a limited scale. We had the armed propaganda teams (of defectors) which were used to some extent by the Vietnamese army; although they were seldom used the way they should have been, they worked out reasonably well. The Marines have what they call the Kit Carson Scouts, there are about 5,000 of them. They were better employed, mostly for scouting and setting occasional ambushes, but they were not used to the extent that I think they should have been.

When I finally got into the NSC and I had some clout and influence, in that I could communicate directly with generals, I tried to get both the Vietnamese generals and our own generals interested in forming teams of former guerrillas and sappers to be used against the enemy. They would be inserted into enemy territory so that they could ambush and attack the enemy troops and installations. I was sure defectors would be willing to do this, because when they were used defectors did a splendid job, they were very dedicated. The concept reminded me of our use of Indian scouts during the Indian wars. Those Indian scouts were very effective. I felt we could have done the same thing in Vietnam.

But I could never get the Vietnamese interested. I talked to their chief of staff and others and they, in effect, said, "Well, they were communists and how can you trust them?" I said, "You don't have to trust them, you are not having them guard anything, you are inserting them into enemy territory. If they redefect which, in fact, never happened, what have you lost? You have lost captured weapons, a radio that we gave them, two weeks rations, all of which adds up to nothing." But they were too limited in their vision. Our own people weren't interested in it because...I had to sound cynical about this, but I am inclined to believe part of it was that the whole program could have been run by a colonel and would have cost next to nothing. But we were spending about $2 billion a month when I was out there and we are talking 1965-66-67 dollars. This kind of operation would have cost nothing and I am convinced would have been highly effective and would have tied up enemy forces to such an extent that they would have difficulties to mounting offensive operations. As Colonel Tuyuan said, who was very savvy, "We are vulnerable as hell."

Well, that was one of my great frustrations in the whole Vietnam experience. I thought when I got to the White House that I would be able to convince somebody that this was the way to go. And I am still convinced to this day that it would have turned the tide dramatically. But there was no high tech involved and no careers could have been made out of this. We were oriented to high tech, wedded to high tech solutions, which to some extent weren't the answer in that environment. My greatest regret is that I did not press my case harder. I guess I was too much the disciplined Foreign Service officer to do so.

Another low tech system that we should have had over there was a couple of battleships on station off North Vietnam. Had we done so, we would have lost just a tiny fraction of the planes we lost. Eighty percent of all targets we struck by air in North Vietnam, at great cost to us, could have been taken out with 16 inch guns. The notorious Thanh-hoa bridge on Route 1 could have been taken out with one salvo from a 16 inch gun. Instead we lost God knows how many aircraft and air crews in the attempt. Also, we would have had far fewer prisoners of war if we had had a couple of battleships there. We did have one battleship, the New Jersey, over there for a relatively short time which did a fantastic job and everybody raved about it. The North Vietnamese were terrified of it. I suspect the aircraft carrier boys agitated against it. In any case, it was withdrawn after a short time..

Also, I read that the North Vietnamese considered this such a threat that they insisted it jeopardized negotiations. This may well have been the main reason we withdrew the New Jersey. This was a factor which I hadn't considered at the time.

So those were two fundamental mistakes that we made. One thing I learned from this experience, I think this is an original Stearmanism, if you have too many resources, you are no longer resourceful. We had seemingly limitless resources and poured an enormous amount of everything in there. We had over half a million men there but never had more than 80,000 in maneuver battalions actually fighting. So we had a Pizza Hut in Cam Ranh Bay. We had PXs in Saigon, the electronics section would have made Radio Shack look like a dime store. It was grotesque the way we were going about this war. Our whole emphasis should have been on training the Vietnamese. Instead there was a universal attitude of "stand aside you little slopes," as we called them, "and let us Americans do the job." Another was short tours. One year was ridiculous. The civilian tours were a year and a half, also ridiculous. They should have been at least two. So you had a limited amount of time in which to do your job and rather than muck around with training the Vietnamese, which complicated things, you just went out and did it yourself. This was wrong!

Most people do not realize that in the end the South Vietnamese themselves, despite the emphasis that we had placed on our own efforts and on high tech, damn near won it on the ground. In fact, by mid-September, 1972, the South Vietnamese, with our air, naval and logistics support, were winning the war hands down on the ground. I was interested that Bill Colby, retired Director of CIA, who has since become very dovish on almost any national security issue, wrote a book a few years ago called "Lost Victory," in which he said exactly what I am telling you now. That we, in effect, snatched defeat from the jaws of victory back in 1972 because the North Vietnamese were on the ropes. They had just about had it, and had run out of steam. The offensive they launched at the beginning of April, 1972 cost them about 100,000 men killed in action, and they had to scrape the bottom of their manpower barrel to launch it in the first place.

Q: Was that the Easter offensive?

STEARMAN: Yes. In fact, I predicted that offensive in November, 1971 simply from reading Hanoi press accounts of how they were starting to induct people that they had never inducted before, people who had always been excepted from induction. So I knew they were getting ready for a big offensive that would probably start in the spring.

This is a bit of a digression, but it is also germane. I think I talked about the problems within the intelligence community or have I?

Q: I am not sure.

STEARMAN: Well, anyway when I came back from Vietnam I wound up in INR as sort of their Hanoiologist and became part of the "intelligence community." At times I went up to Langley to work on NIEs, National Intelligence Estimates. I became quite disillusioned with the process. I found that the Defense Intelligence Agency often skewed intelligence to put a conservative twist, if you will, on it. Whereas the CIA analysts tended to put a liberal twist on things. So finally when I went over to the NSC, I formed my own intelligence group. (I discuss this in detail at the end of this interview.)

Q: Let's go back to Saigon. Did you have any contact with the CIA there?

STEARMAN: Well, I didn't think they knew that much about my area. I think there were people in the political section who did know a lot; therefore, I had to start being my own expert. One of the very best sources of intelligence, I have always maintained, is FBIS, the CIA's Foreign Broadcast Information Service, which puts out translations of broadcasts and articles (which are available to anyone for a fee). I got a lot of good intelligence out of that. And then the British had a consulate in Hanoi and every time the British Consul General came down to Saigon, he or she, one of the best ones was a woman, I would spend several hours with them debriefing them. They would also bring down the latest Hanoi newspapers that we hadn't been able to get through any other source.

We also captured an enormous number of documents from the other side, millions of pages of documents. We had countless interrogation reports from people who surrendered, were captured or defected, etc. To give you an idea of how much we had, Stuart, at the end of the war, DIA in an installation over in Arlington had 8 miles of microfilmed captured documents and interrogations. Can you imagine? You know how many pages you can get on an inch. I don't think there has ever been a war in history where one side had as much raw intelligence on the other side as we did and had made so little use of it. We were simply overwhelmed with it.

So I used an awful lot of this intelligence. I felt that to be any good at this job, I had to really know the other side. Much was close to what I had been working on for years. The terminology was certainly familiar; so I understood what they were saying, whereas the average person who hadn't spent a long time going through communist publications, would not. I found it fairly easy, and this is how I got into the whole business (of North Vietnamese affairs).

Q: Who was running JUSPAO?

STEARMAN: Barry Zorthian was.

Q: From your perspective, how did he operate?

STEARMAN: I was critical of the way that whole operation was run. In the first place, there was much more emphasis on how you do something than why you do it. At JUSPAO staff meetings almost the entire time would be spent on discussing technicalities or administrative problems. For example, they bought an enlarger that would blow a photo up to about 20 by 20 feet, and that sort of thing. They had the best printing plant in Southeast Asia, etc. This was one of our weaknesses. We were big on the technical side, but there was little discussion of why we were doing anything. What are the vulnerabilities? Or, is this program working? If not, why isn't it working? It was all how to do and the administrative problems related to it.

There were, however, some good people in JUSPAO. Take a chap by the name of Don Rochlen, for example. He would have been out of place in most normal organizations, but he had a real genius for psychological operations, somewhat eccentric, but extremely effective. There were some characters like that who were very good, but most of them, I am afraid, took more of a bureaucratic view of things. It wasn't the program it could have and should have been.

Q: On your side I would have thought there would have been fairly close liaison with the military? Was there or not?

STEARMAN: They had to do all of the delivery for me. I couldn't have done anything without them. Most of the messages I was trying to get across were on drop leaflets. They were dropped on the enemy forces in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Then we dropped millions of leaflets on North Vietnam. Initially, before I got there, the leaflets that were dropped warned civilians to stay away from military targets. That was a good and necessary program, but beyond, the target audience was a tougher nut to crack; therefore, I had to find out what was going on in North Vietnam, to see what vulnerabilities they had. One of the most effective leaflets was so inadvertent. In order to induce people to pick up these leaflets and read them, I had them printed with about 3/4ths of each side taken up with a very, very good copy of the one dong note, their unit of currency. The people were clipping off the message and passing these leaflets as currency. It was driving the other side crazy. Their media complained that we were trying to foul up their currency by dropping all this counterfeit money. Then I got to thinking: why don't we really drop counterfeit money. I was going to print up some very good higher denomination notes and drop them all over North Vietnam to screw up their economy. Treasury hit the ceiling when they heard about this. They went absolutely ballistic. They said no way is the United States Government going to get involved in any kind of counterfeiting, even if that is what it takes to win the war. So that was the end of that maneuver; however, everybody thought it was a great idea.

Q: Well, the Germans got into this. That was how Cicero got paid off and all that. I think it was all dumped into a lake in Switzerland, or something like that, but you had these beautiful pound notes.

STEARMAN: I think that was when the British started putting a silver thread in the pound, wasn't it?

Q: Yes, I think so.

STEARMAN: Leaflets generally have an effect only when tied into military operations. If they are not followed by military action, their effect is marginal. So, some of the things that we did were effective, and some were marginal. Some of the leaflets when we tried them out on enemies were even counterproductive.

Sometime in 1966, I went up to visit one of the squadrons which dropped the leaflets on the Ho Chi Minh Trail from these old C-47s to give a pep talk to the pilots who were dropping these things. The day before, one of their C-47s was shot down on a leaflet mission and only one person was rescued. We never knew what happened to the others. They were missing in action. So after I had given my pep talk about what a great program this was, one of the pilots stepped up to me and said, "You really believe in this program don't you?" "Indeed I do, you are doing a great job," I replied. He then said, "How about flying a mission with us tomorrow?" What could I do? It was 2:00 in the afternoon and I was all ready to go back to Saigon, but felt obliged to say, "Okay." So I spent the rest of the day being instructed in escape and evasion tactics in case we were shot down. The next morning before dawn they start suiting me up. First I put on a flak jacket, then a survival kit, a parachute, the biggest damn revolver I have ever seen, and like the knights of old, I had to be practically hoisted into the plane. I got into the old C-47 and walked up to the cockpit to introduce myself. On the way I saw a spec plate on the bulkhead which said, "US Army Air Corps," which didn't do my morale much good. This meant it was built about 1940 or 1941. It became US Air Force in about 1942!.

Q: No in 1948, US Air Force.

STEARMAN: But, I mean US Army Air Force that was in 1942, but this was US Army Air Corps. Well, that was bad enough but then I started talking to the pilot. I found out he had been a pilot in World War II and was still just a captain! This was not a good sign. Also, I expected we would fly way up high out of anti-aircraft range and drop these things, but no, we were flying low. You could look straight out both sides and see mountains, and people were shooting at us. You could see these little flashes. We were shoveling the leaflets out the chutes and I started reading some of them and said, "My God, I had these withdrawn a month ago." They weren't worth a damn and here we were all risking our lives dropping things which should have been withdrawn. The cargo doors were left open because there was a loud speaker mounted in their place. In order to go to the head you had to hold on sort of to the ribbing with your fingers, edging along with your butt hanging out over the space because the head door opened out, and when you are nervous, as I was, you have to go to the head more often. Each time was a hair raising experience. Anyway, we dropped all the leaflets and made it back. The first thing the pilot did was to get out and see where, if at all, we had been hit. We hadn't been.

This was the sort of situation you can get yourself into. I believe Foreign Service officers, on the whole, probably saw more action than most troops over there. Many of them were out in the "boonies" with the Vietnamese. As you know, since World War II, more ambassadors have been killed in action than admirals and generals. I had an FSO working for me at the NSC who led a group of militia, the popular forces, in holding off a very sizeable North Vietnamese attack all night long. He was in command of the troops. He got a medal for it. This was Al (Alvin) Adams, who was our last Ambassador in Haiti, and now is going down to Peru as Ambassador. When you join the Foreign Service, you don't count on getting into combat.

Q: No you don't at all.

STEARMAN: My ears are still ringing from having been on the receiving end of a lot of heavy Soviet ordnance during the 1972 spring offensive. Part of the time I was with my old friend, Chris Squire, who was an FSO and the senior province rep (for Pleiku Province) at the time. He was a P-40 pilot in World War II. We were heavily shelled the whole time I was up there (in II Corps), and my ears have been ringing ever since from the concussions. Here again was an FSO who was not only in the front line, but was way in front of the front line. Chris, alas, recently died of cancer.

Q: What was your impression of the embassy and how it was going about its business?

STEARMAN: There were some good people there, some very good people, particularly on the political side, for example, Martin Herz, who was the great intellectual of the Foreign Service. He wrote one of the very best things on Vietnam, a monograph entitled "The Vietnam War in Retrospect," which he produced when he was dying. It is 80 pages long and if you read that, you will have a better understanding of the Vietnam War than anything else you could read. It is brilliant. He was, I think, either the head or deputy chief of the political section. Maybe Phil Habib was the head of the political section at the time. I am trying to remember.

Q: When I was there, 1969-70, Herz was the head of the political section, but he may have been the deputy prior to that.

STEARMAN: Tom Corcoran was extremely good. Most of the officers I knew there were first rate. There were some very good junior officers who went on to become very successful, for example, John Negroponete, who just came back as our Ambassador to Mexico, as well as Frank Wisner and Dick Holbrooke who now is our Ambassador to Germany. So we had an extremely good bunch of young officers at that time. I was much impressed.

Q: Was Cabot Lodge the Ambassador?

STEARMAN: Cabot Lodge was there. I was somewhat less impressed by Cabot Lodge, than I was by Ellsworth Bunker who came towards the end of my stay. Bunker was impressive. Cabot Lodge was okay, and was reasonably knowledgeable. I wasn't negatively impressed by him, just sort of unimpressed, I suppose.

Q: What emanations were you getting from the people who knew about the Vietnamese government? Was Thieu in?

STEARMAN: No, it was Ky initially.

Q: There had been a whole series of leaders since 1963 and the killing of Diem. What was the feeling about the Vietnamese government when you were there?

STEARMAN: I think there was always the feeling that it might be overthrown by another coup. Most people felt that it was not all that stable. There was a fair amount of incompetence and corruption that everybody knew and talked about. As it turned out, most people didn't realize that there was far more corruption and incompetence in North Vietnam, but that was never published. It was more obvious and visible in the open South than in the closed North.

I blame us for that instability. Whether or not you liked Ngo Dinh Diem, he was succeeding fairly well. He might not have been the Thomas Jefferson of Southeast Asia, but he had done remarkably well in pulling the country together and leading it. When we publicly pulled the rug out from under him -- I am convinced, however, that we did not order his assassination, and did not know it was coming -- we destabilized the government (and the country), and it stayed destabilized until Thieu took over. It was pretty stable after that.

After Diem was killed, the whole thing landed on our shoulders. All the generals who made the coup then turned to us and said, "What do we do now, coach?" From then on it became our responsibility. This was the first fundamental mistake we made. That emboldened Hanoi to start launching major attacks and to begin inserting regular forces into the South. Hanoi knew the situation was shaky. Diem had built a pretty good structure in the countryside which became unraveled after the coup. So we were still feeling the reverberations of that when I got out there in 1965. In 1966 it got better and the government became somewhat more accepted by the people. You, Stu, were out there in the salad days (1969-1970).

Q: Yes, things seemed to be coming along rather nicely, thank you, at that time.

STEARMAN: When you were out there they had a bicycle race all the way from Hue down to Ca-Mau, the whole length of the country.

I was dating a young French woman who taught at the French Lycee in Dalat, and she would drive down to see me on Fridays. She had to go through two or three VC roadblocks before she got to Saigon. She spoke French, so they let her through. I sweated out every Friday night to see if she was going to make it. The last roadblock wouldn't have been too far outside of Saigon.

The whole situation, by this time, had gone to hell in a hand basket. I think initially we had to send in troops to stabilize the situation. That was essential. After that, our mission should have been to train the Vietnamese to take it from there. The Vietnamese are very impressive people. We could train a Vietnamese, who spoke English, to fly as quickly as we could train an American. The modern French nuclear-armed air force was once commanded by a Vietnamese.

And in France, some of the leading engineers, scientists and physicians are Vietnamese. They are an extremely gifted people. They had the gray matter and many of them had the guts. They mainly needed the right kind of leadership and training. As I pointed out earlier, in 1972 they were waxing the North Vietnamese. They drove them out of Quang Tri where they were only 20 miles from North Vietnam, with Route 1 the best LOC (line of communication) they could have possibly had, and with their strongest and best equipped forces. They couldn't even hold that position. That no doubt convinced them that they couldn't hold anything else. They were losing. This was later confirmed by a North Vietnamese general (Tran Van Tra) who wrote that they were on the ropes and losing. That is the tragedy of the whole war: our side literally snatched defeat from the jaws of victory.

Q: Well, you left there in 1967. What did you do?

STEARMAN: I went back to the Department and was working with the Vietnam Task group. I filled in part time to help the Voice of America broadcast to Vietnam, mostly using my knowledge of the North Vietnamese. Then I became INR's "Hanoiologist" in the Asia section of INR, replacing Dick Smyser who went to the NSC. Then I had a falling out with the head of the Asian section, Bill Gleysteen, who didn't see eye-to-eye with me. He was generally negative about my judgments and was somewhat dovish on Vietnam, which I was not. He finally gave me the sack, and I wound up, to his surprise and chagrin, in The White House on the NSC staff.

Q: While you were with INR and later with the NSC, did you find anybody of knowledge that had been focusing for a long time within the United States on Hanoi? I am talking about the academic community or anywhere else. Was there anything?

STEARMAN: Not much. That was one of our problems. I felt that those people who were, lacked objectivity. They tended to skew things one way or the other, either conservative or liberal.

But, I will tell you what most shocked me, Stu. When I finally realized that I was going out there to work on North Vietnam -- I was then in SOV in the Department -- I chased around the Department trying to get myself briefed on my new area...this was the beginning of November, 1965. We had been de facto at war with North Vietnam since February of that year, but still we did not have one person in the Department working full time on North Vietnam. We had one very competent woman who worked on North Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia and part of the China account. That was it. We had Uganda almost covered better than we had the country with which we were at war. It was grotesque. That I think was one of our main problems. The people we had covering the enemy side were Asia area specialists. It has been my experience that when it comes to understanding indigenous communist movements, area specialists are usually woefully inadequate. I, myself, might well be woefully inadequate in assessing the non-communist side of developments in certain areas. I have seen it in ARA and AF and certainly in East Asia. The people in EA had little understanding of what was going on. There were a number of people in EA, for example, who actually thought the Viet Cong were an independent group, that they had a good deal of autonomy and were only allied with Hanoi, not completely under Hanoi's control. That was subsequently disproved beyond a shadow of a doubt, principally by Hanoi, itself. Even during the war if you read carefully what the other side was putting out, it was clear that the VC had no independence. Of all the millions of pages of documents that we captured, we never captured one single NLF document which contained anything that was not essentially just propaganda. Not one contained military directives, orders or anything of substance.

Q: NLF being what we call the Viet Cong.

STEARMAN: And anyone who has worked a long time on communist affairs knows how these front organizations work. They have been doing it ever since the Comintern decided at its 7th Congress in 1935 that this was the route they were going to take, "popular front" movements. The communists in Vietnam used about four different fronts, and the NLF (or VC) was the only most recent front of those they had created. I simply could not understand how serious people could believe that these were anything but the fronts, but many did. That is just one example of where we were going wrong. It is just like those in ARA who thought the Sandinistas were not really communists, until they finally came out and said they were. The regional problem is widespread.

That, I'm afraid, was a roundabout answer to your original question. I would say that the short answer is that we had inadequate knowledge of the enemy, particularly in the government. I also didn't find that many academics who impressed me much either, one way or the other. Those people were generally too subjective. I have always thought that one of the advantages that I had over many of my colleagues is that I trained to be a geophysics engineer and my theory is that anyone with that kind of a background uses inductive reasoning as opposed to deducting reasoning in problem solving. I just say; give me the facts. I try as best I can to base my opinions on facts. I think that makes a difference. I found that most people, including many colleagues, were using a deductive approach, that is, making up their minds then trying to find the facts to support their view. This was true of both conservatives and liberals.

JAMES G. LOWENSTEIN
Staff of Senate Foreign Relations Committee
Washington, DC (1965-1974)

City Unspecified, Vietnam (1967-1974)

Ambassador James G. Lowenstein was born in New Jersey in 1927. He entered the Foreign Service in 1950. His career included posts in Paris, Ceylon, and Yugoslavia. Ambassador Lowenstein was ambassador to Luxembourg from 1977 to 1981. He was interviewed by Dennis Kux in 1994.

LOWENSTEIN: Now in those days members of the Committee staff were assigned to deal with both sides of an issue. The staff member was supposed to become an expert and be able to counsel both the opponents and proponents. And that is indeed what I did on the Consular Convention. I wrote both the majority and minority reports. The majority report for Fulbright and the minority report for Carl Mundt. I received, what I thought at that time, since I was in favor of ratifying the Consular Convention, a high complement from Mundt who felt that the minority report was a sounder document than the majority report. Not only did I have to prepare the two reports, I had to go down to the floor of the Senate and sit with the leaders of the two factions during the debate and support the arguments that they wanted to make and act as their counsel during this procedure. That is an example of how a non-partisan staff used to work in the old days.

There is an incident involving Senator Wayne Morse that I think is interesting in describing the difference between working in a structured bureaucracy, like the State Department, and Capitol Hill. The State Department issued a legal white paper justifying involvement in Vietnam. I can't remember whether it was in 1965 or 1966. At any rate, Wayne Morse wanted to attack this document which he felt was flawed and which he felt was incorrect in many respects and did not in fact justify involvement in Vietnam. Carl asked me to go over and talk to a member of his staff and find out what he wanted and do it. So I went over and talked to a very nice lady named Phyllis Rock, who was one of his legislative assistants. She said, "Well, this is what he wants you to do. He wants to attack this thing which he considers to be total nonsense. He wants to make a statement on the floor of the Senate." So I went back. I hadn't met Wayne Morse. I started going over the document and it seemed to me to be full of holes and specious reasoning. At least it could be attacked on these grounds. So I wrote a long dissertation about what was wrong...

Q: Did you contact the State Department?

LOWENSTEIN: No, absolutely not. ...a long dissertation on what I thought was wrong with this legal justification, checking a few points with the Congressional Research Service and the General Counsel of the Office of the Senate, etc. I sent it over and waited to have a meeting to discuss it. I waited two days and nothing happened. I got sort of nervous and called Phyllis Rock and said, "When are we meeting to discuss my draft on the State Department White Paper?" She said, "Well, if you will go over to the floor of the Senate right now, he started reading it 5 minutes ago, you can hear it." Which I did. Afterwards I went up to her and asked why we had not had a meeting on this. Did he consider it? Did he discuss it? After all Wayne Morse had been a dean of a law school and had been in the Senate a long time and presumably would want to check something that somebody he had never met had written. "Not at all," she said. "He went over it, made a few minor changes, thought it was fine, went over to the Senate, got up on his feet and read it." The next morning it was in the world press and in the public domain.

The lesson to be drawn here is that when you are working in a place like Capitol Hill, and indeed in a lot of other places, once you put something in the hands of someone who is going to make it public, you have no control over it. And all the fire breaks that you have and protections you have in the State Department don't exist in lots of other places, especially Capitol Hill. So, if you are going to make a mistake, you are going to make it. On the other hand, if you produce something that is very wishy-washy and that never takes a position, nobody is ever going to use it because that is not what they need. It is a very good lesson in learning how to live in the real world. At least that is how I interpret it.

Now, on the subject of mistakes, let me just give you the other side of the picture. One day

Fulbright called me down to his office and said, "I am sick and tired of these other countries supporting the war in Vietnam when politically they don't believe in it. They are supporting it because they are making a lot of money out of it. So, get the facts and give me a speech that I can deliver on the floor." So I prepared a lot of correspondence that went to the Defense Department, the State Department, asking all sorts of questions and figures on exports and all the rest of it. I called the Congressional Research Service and they did their usual superb job of a research document. I got all the facts together and wrote a speech. Fulbright went on the floor and delivered this steaming indictment of Allied behavior in Vietnam.

The next morning I got a call from the Counselor of the New Zealand embassy who asked me where I had gotten the figure that Fulbright had given for the profit that the New Zealanders had made in Vietnam. I described the complicated procedure by which I had arrived at this figure by taking various figures from various attachments and adding and subtracting and multiplying, etc. and assured him that is where the figure had come from. He said that that was what they had assumed since Fulbright had outlined the procedure in his speech and they had done the same thing. However, their figure was 20 percent of my figure. I assured him that he was wrong and said I would check.

I checked my figures and called him back and said, "Well, I am awfully sorry. You are right and I am wrong. So what do we do about this?" He said, "Well, it may interest you to know that the Prime Minister made a statement in parliament about two hours ago. The ambassador, in fact, is in the State Department right now delivering a formal protest to the Secretary of State. The only thing that my government wants is a formal apology from Fulbright on the floor of the Senate."

So I went crawling down to Fulbright's office and opened the door and said, "I am sorry, I quit, I am leaving, etc." He said, "Well, what's the matter with you?" And I said, "Well, the matter is that this happened and it is embarrassing you and I will be out of my office by 3:00 this afternoon. All I can say is I'm very sorry." And he said, "Ah, come on, don't be so silly. All right, so they are not making what you said they are making, they are still making a lot. What difference does it make?" I said, "Well, the difference it makes is that the Prime Minister has made a statement in parliament and the ambassador is protesting to the Secretary of State and they want a formal apology from you on the floor." And he said, "So, they want a formal apology. Do they really want a formal apology?" "That's what they said." "All right, I will give them a formal apology," he said.

So the next day he got on the floor and said, "We made a mistake, they didn't make "x" they made 20 percent of that and we are sorry we made that mistake. But they did make 20 percent of "x" which just proves my point that here they are. Now it is true they didn't make "x" but as I said they did make 20 percent of "x".

I thought to myself at the time that if this had happened to me in the State Department I undoubtedly would have been fired, transferred, gotten a bad efficiency report, etc., but there it was just another mistake made in the course of a day's work. This shows that contrary to his reputation, Fulbright was a tolerant, understanding person to work for.

LOWENSTEIN: We went to Vietnam and spent about ten days there. It was my first trip to Vietnam. I had asked before we left whether I could go off on my own for four or five days during the time that Senator Hart was doing the usual senatorial things in Vietnam...visiting the troops from Michigan, etc. I went off with an old friend of mine, Charles Flood, who was a journalist, to the Delta, to some contested villages. In one of them we spent two nights and we found when we woke up the second morning that three people in the house of the deputy village chief had been assassinated during the course of the evening. This had been a so-called safe village. We were dropped by helicopter and picked up 48 hours later. So I began to wonder that if this was a safe village, what was it like in the rest of the villages that weren't considered safe. In going to all the briefings with General Westmoreland and all the others, it began to look to me as though somebody wasn't telling the truth somewhere along the line. On the way out to Vietnam in the plane, Senator Hart had...

Q: This was 1967?

LOWENSTEIN: This was '66 or '67, I will have to look it up. I think it was January, 1967. ...Senator Hart had told me that he was a strong supporter of the Vietnam War. He, himself, was a combat veteran of World War II, in fact I think he had been quite badly wounded in World War II. He was a moderate to centrist hawk. After he had been in Vietnam for ten days, he was a dove. The conversion was quite dramatic. I remember one incident. We were being briefed by a general about the great military successes of the forces under his command and what their body count was and how well they had fought and what they had done, etc., and exactly how they had conducted their military operations. Senator Hart turned to me and with a wry smile said, "Makes you wonder whose sons they are?" At any rate, that was when I first began to think that...my own view was that the military was not telling the truth and were presenting a factually distorted picture of the war giving one side and not the other. And for every fact they cited as a positive accomplishment or a sign that they were winning the war, there was another fact that could be cited that proved exactly the opposite. The least that should have been done for the American decision makers and the American public was to give both sides of the issue. But both sides were not being presented.

So when I got back I wrote a long report on Vietnam. At that point Senator Hart did not want to go public with his reservations. He wanted to pick his own time and wanted to get into it gradually. So, instead of releasing the report he sent it as a confidential report to the majority leader, Senator Mansfield. That led to Senator Mansfield inviting me to come along subsequently on his trips to the Far East. I don't think it was because of what the report said, but because, I suppose, he was looking for somebody who could write reports in the way that he liked them written which was factual, understated, unemotional and without value judgments. So I began my travels with Mansfield.

....There were always people who would help us. And even people, in a lot of cases, who agreed with the policy would help us because they believed that we were entitled to get true facts and not a lot of garbage. So we always found mid-grade and junior officers very helpful. And, in fact, junior officers in the military were helpful. Journalists were very helpful and some academics were helpful. So you had a large range of people that you could turn to and that is why I think you get some perspective. You are not only dealing with the Foreign Service officer or with the particular government officials to whom his job relates

Q: That is quite a range.

LOWENSTEIN: A very wide range. And more, because we had all the security clearances that were possible so that we were getting classified briefings from everyone. So we had a much wider range than journalists, in fact.

This is how you find out what is going on if a branch of government doesn't want you to know. And why I think that senatorial investigating missions are totally ineffective. Let me just take the case of dealing with the military. The military, when they decide that they don't want someone to find something out, has a very easy technique for dealing with this and it is to keep the people in briefings and in motion. For example, in Vietnam they loved taking visitors, Senators or alleged investigators all over the country, because by the time you get from your hotel to the airport, take a helicopter ride that lasts two hours and go into the local military headquarters, have a wonderful briefing that lasts for an hour and a half, have lunch with the general that lasts another hour, get back to the airport, get back on the helicopter, go back into Saigon, get back from the airport to your hotel, a day has gone. And if you repeat that exercise with its variations, you can tie any visitor up indefinitely. Point one.

Point two. The only way that you can find out what is going on, obviously, is to use as many sources as you possibly can, and I will get back to that in a minute. Point three is that whether an investigator is a detective, a journalist, a congressman, or Foreign Service officer, trying to find out what the local government is doing to pull the wool over his eyes, the thing that always breaks open cases is happenstance. And happenstance only occurs if you have a lot of time because if you have a lot of time, accidents will happen. If you are rushed and programmed all the time, nothing happens.

Let me give you an example on the third point. The way we discovered that the United States had illegally trained some Cambodians who were alleged to be native soldiers was that we were walking along a street and ran into one of these guys. I can't remember whether it was Dick or whether it was me, but one of us said to this fellow in French something like, "Where is the hotel?" Instead of answering in French, the guy said, "Say again, sir?" Well, it didn't take a genius to know where he had learned that phrase and it wasn't in the Cambodian army because we weren't training the Cambodian army at that point. So that is an example. And then we discovered that these were the Khmer Krom, who had been in Vietnam, who had been shipped over. These were Khmers who were basically Vietnamese who were part of the South Vietnamese army who had been trained by the Americans. So that is the way you find out that kind of thing.

Q: You tell in an earlier session how you found in Phnom Penh through somebody's girlfriend who was listening to a radio...

LOWENSTEIN: Well, she wasn't somebody's girl friend, she was a well known correspondent, Sylvana Foa, who today, incidentally, as we speak is the UN High Commissioner for Refugees spokesperson. She was then a UPI correspondent. I went through that incident before.

Q: Yes, but that was by chance.

LOWENSTEIN: That's by chance. Let's take the using as many sources as possible part of it. When we were trying to find out exactly how many sorties we were flying over Laos and Cambodia, and who was flying them, the information was not given to us. I can't remember whether this was on security grounds or they didn't know, or the records aren't kept here, or it is none of your business, or we need authority from Washington, or whatever it was. But we didn't get it. When we stopped in CINCPAC, we were around there for two or three days and at some point somebody said to us, "You know, we have this fantastic computer and it logs in every single sortie in Indochina. It has an account of exactly when the pilot takes off, where he is going, what he has done and when he gets back." We said, "Well, that is interesting, we would like to see that." So they said, "Sure, sure, it is marvelous, you will be impressed." They took us into a big room and there was the computer. We said, "Well, just as a test case, what if we asked you what sorties had been flown in Laos last month." The guy said, "No problem." He punched a sheet and out came a map of Laos with every sortie listed. As I recall we went through all of the sorties in Laos and probably Cambodia as well. That is where the figures come from in the report that we did on the subject. They came from the CINCPAC computer. Now those guys who were sitting off in a room far removed from the theater of operation, knew more than anyone else in the world, except the Pentagon to which they sent their reports back. They knew much more than anybody in the theater in Vietnam or Okinawa.

Q: They didn't know that the Pentagon didn't want you to know?

LOWENSTEIN: And they didn't know that. There was another interesting incident in CINCPAC where we were trying to find out military assistance figures. We were trying to find them out without much success. We were at dinner one night with someone and he brought along a friend of his. This fellow said, "Meet Frank so-and-so from the comptroller's office in the Pentagon. Frank plays the computer the way Paderewski plays the piano." We said, "Oh, that's interesting. Since you can play the computer, can you pull up the figures on exactly how this military program works, what the funding is, the commitments were, where it came from, etc.?" Again we got the whole story. Now this fellow did know what we were supposed to be told and what we weren't to be told and that, of course, was something that we were supposed to be told because that was a congressional authorization. The fact is, nobody else knew how to do it. He also explained how this stuff was presented in order to meet various legislative restrictions on amounts, conditions, etc. So, indeed, he did know how to play the computer like Paderewski plays the piano. And the point is, that was where you get the information. It wasn't as available as easily anyplace else.

Q: One thing that puzzled me in your congressional discussions is the fact that you were later hired by Kissinger. It was my recollection that this was regarded, although you said it wasn't partisan, as a highly anti-administration effort trying to undermine the effort in Vietnam, etc. And you guys were very effective because of the things that you turned up, concrete incidences in which the administration was caught out, not telling the whole story. How come you got hired?

LOWENSTEIN: I really can't answer that question. All I know is that when I went in to see Fulbright and said that I was going to leave and that I thought I would go to a business school or something, he said, "Well, I am seeing Kissinger tomorrow, do you want me to ask him whether he would like to have you back in the Foreign Service?" I said, "Well, sure ask him, see what he thinks." And I was told that the reaction was very favorable. At that point Eagleburger was working for Kissinger and made the same check and said that Kissinger would be delighted to have me back. In fact he wanted me to work on speeches.

Q: It still surprises me.

LOWENSTEIN: Well, I like to think it's because he thought the reports were really very good and some of them weren't criticizing the administration. The first Cambodian report in fact said that we thought the Cambodians really were worth supporting and we never in any report implied that the invasion had made inevitable a Khmer Rouge victory. What we did say was that it had driven the Khmer Rouge further into Cambodia because they had to get out of where they were as the US forces went across the border. So they were geographically in a deeper penetration than they had been in some ways. They were always along the Thai border and the Vietnamese border, but there was some movement into places they hadn't been before. Our argument on the Cambodian invasion was that there hadn't been any true consultation with the Congress, which there was supposed to have been and that militarily it seemed to us that it would prolong the war in Vietnam. If you go back and look at that first Cambodian report and the press reports on that first Cambodian report, you will see that in fact the administration used it as an argument that even we had agreed with them on certain things that they were saying about it.

I was sort of surprised too, that I was welcomed back. Dick had a different relationship with Kissinger and he didn't want to go back anyway. But I don't think Kissinger liked Dick very much, so...

LOWENSTEIN: There then arose another issue during this negotiating period which was that Peter Flanagan who was in the White House and a member of Nixon's inner circle and very partisan...I had known him a long time because his wife and my then wife were roommates at boarding school together, and, as I recall, they had been at our wedding. Anyway, he got wind of this and started saying that this was politically unacceptable. At that point, as I recall, Eagleburger said to Kissinger, "If we are going to get this thing done at all, it has to be done right away." So, he said, "Okay, go ahead and do it." So, it was done very quickly. And, by the time Flanagan really got up in arms, I was already there.

MARY CHAMBLISS
Economic Research Service, Junior Economist, Department of Agriculture
Washington, DC (1965-c1977)

Mary Chambliss was born and raised in Virginia and educated at Mary Washington College, Roanoke College and the George Washington University. In 1965 she joined the United States Department of Agriculture, where she dealt primarily with commodities in the Foreign Agricultural Service of the Department. During her career Mrs. Chambliss also served briefly in the Department of State, working in the International Cooperation and Development section of the Department. Mrs. Chambliss was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: Well on the Vietnam side, this was when you switched over - ?

CHAMBLISS: Yeah and began to work on food aid.

Q: How did that affect you?

CHAMBLISS: Well, there were a group of junior professionals in USDA in fact we had – we sponsored a seminar where we had the people who opposed the war, that got our names on a list we were told in the Department, it didn't seem to make any difference, so there was a lot of tension back and forth. Now I had people that I worked with of course that went to Vietnam that did a lot of the work, I mentioned my division director, no my branch chief, was Ed Farnstead. I remember State and AID had him go to Vietnam, I worked with the Vietnam Bureau, I remember of course the building over here in Rosslyn that the Vietnam Bureau had - their own building and then when Vietnam fell apart as best I could tell they all went to work on Egypt – but I remember the Vietnam Bureau– So I remember a lot of people including some from my high school who died there. . Of course I did my job, my boss and I developed many food aid agreements with Vietnam, Cambodia – I remember when we you know, used Cambodia and got them in that whole morass, so –

Q: Did you feel particularly engaged in Vietnam; for or against it?

CHAMBLISS: I guess I felt torn. I remember we used to have an inter-agency meeting, I wanted the war over, I thought the war should never have taken place, I thought it was a mistake and that people died and suffered terrible consequences for something that was never going to happen and that we created this nightmare ourselves. And I remember walking into an inter-agency meeting that we used to have at State, AID, OMB, USDA and Treasury; it must have been the day after Saigon fell and I think I walked in young and foolish and said something like well thank goodness that's over, I thought they were going to kill me because there were a lot of different feelings. Well, no there was a lot of feeling I had back and forth but just never – most of the people I interacted with, although Jim Bullion now that I think about it, Jim was a colonel from the Army who had been in Lebanon or something but he had done I forget what you call it in the army, it's like the civilian civics what's the Army call that?

Q: Well there's civil military affairs.

CHAMBLISS: Yeah, right, well he had done that kind of thing, but now that I think about it Jim never talked one way or another about Vietnam. I mean I didn't in the office either I mean, we were there you know, we were supposed to do the agreements and I thought that food aid probably was – I objected to the war, I didn't object to the fact that we were providing food aid, maybe you know later in life I would have.

Q: In the Department of Agriculture, not necessary connected with Vietnam but it could be too, but this was still at a time sort of from the 1960s where if you were under 30 years old you had God's blessing, if you were over 30 you couldn't be trusted you know, this whole sort of youth thing. Was there any sort of gathering together of under 30's who were going to change the world?

CHAMBLISS: I don't think so. Like I was saying, there were a group of us, myself and the others, but no it wasn't that conscious or at least I wasn't because you know by then I was married, my son was born in 1969 so I working full time and taking care of a new baby. Like I said there were a group of us that got together and sponsored this one conference session whatever we called it, seminar, on the war and had people come down and speak against the war, but other than that I don't remember. And I don't particularly remember a lot of hostility although they all said that you know the Department's administration office had all our names but I think it was probably just a rumor.

ROBERT B. PETERSEN
Assistant Public Affairs Officer, USIA
Saigon (1966-1967)

Mr. Petersen was born and raised in Ohio and educated at Oberlin College. He entered the USIA Foreign Service in 1965 and served as Public and Cultural Affairs Office in Embassies or Consulates in Vietnam, Malaysia, Japan, Mauritius, Israel, Morocco and Cote d'Ivoire. He also served in several senior USIA positions in Washington, DC. Mr. Peterson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You arrived there when?

PETERSEN: In early '66. Probably the beginning of March.

Q: How did it work out? What did they have you doing?

PETERSEN: I was just describing Barry Zorthian to you. I think there were some interesting things about my arrival there, but let me move ahead for a couple days. At some point early in my first week there, like all new arrivals at JUSPAO, I was scheduled to have lunch with Barry Zorthian at his residence. I gather it was a routine, maybe a daily thing. I was notified that I would have lunch at Barry's residence. I showed up and there was an Army colonel there. He was the other new arrival that day having lunch with Barry. Just the three of us at the table, sitting outside, Barry sitting at the head of the table. I can't recall much about the lunch, but it struck me as elegant and very attractively set, very nice. Barry turned first to the colonel, "Well, tell me about yourself." This guy went on and on. He had a lot to tell. This man had a career. I remember sitting there listening and thinking, "Gee, wow, that's really impressive." Then Barry turned to me and said, "Tell me about yourself."

I'll never forget that Barry threw his fork down. It clattered on the table. A combination of dribbles of food and expletives came forth from his mouth about those "idiots back in Washington. Didn't they know there was an absolute rule prohibiting first tour officers." It seemed like an awful long time he was in a tirade about "those idiots back there." At some point, I was able to intervene and say, "Mr. Zorthian, sir, you approved it." Then that set him off again. He wanted to know when and how. I reminded him of that hallway meeting. He then said, "Well, what the hell was I thinking?"

Q: What was your impression when you hit Tan Sanh Hut Air Base?

PETERSEN: I got to Vietnam in the evening on a flight from Hong Kong. There was an incident taking place because there was a blackout. It couldn't have been that significant an incident because I was on a commercial flight and it landed. But nevertheless, it was significant enough that there was a blackout. I was hustled through whatever the formalities of arrival were and taken to downtown Saigon to the Aster Hotel. There were a number of people being housed there and I was put in a room that I shared with someone else newly arrived. I don't recall what agency he was with. But he was a civilian. It was a short walk from the hotel to JUSPAO. I don't recall how I got there the next day.

In reporting for duty, I reported to the executive officer. Unlike in the military, he wasn't the second in command. He simply was the chief administrator of JUSPAO. His name was Harold Wright, an experienced administrative person. He outlined for me what the training program would be. He was determined that I would indeed have a training program at JUSPAO and wouldn't simply be assigned or "misused" by being thrown in somewhere where a body was needed. He actually had a formal training program laid out. I took a look at it before coming here today and read the very precise "two weeks here, two weeks there, etc." It didn't turn out that way, but it was a good starting point, a good negotiating point for what I needed to cover and where I should go. I had a real positive impression of those people I met. I remember Betty Paidian was the personnel officer at JUSPAO. Wilmer Wilkie was one of the assistant administrators there; he handled finance. I met that group the first morning and was excited and pleased.

Q: What was the situation in '66 on the ground in Vietnam?

PETERSEN: Anything I say I'm reporting through the somewhat dim recollections of a newly arrived JOT. A lot of confusion about who was who, what was what, what was going on, what was underway in the countryside, outside the city. But in saying that, I realize that almost all of that confusion must have been my own. Everything I saw and heard, every acronym, organization, person I met, job title was all so fresh and new and trying to sort that out rapidly was probably what gives me the idea that there was confusion. I remember some early conversations with people about terrorism, bombings in the city. There had been an event at the chancery. In our neighborhood where JUSPAO was located and where I lived just a block or two further down the street on the river where there were floating restaurants, there was an anti-personnel mine, a bomb, that went off at one of the restaurants. All of this was happening and it just made me think, "Geez, where is the center of gravity of all this? How do you define our goals and our opponents here? Just how are we going to get out and win this thing?" not quite knowing what "win" meant or what the "thing" was. All through the time I was there, I was meeting people who had served in a number of countries in Southeast Asia and was just absorbing their experiences, their outlooks, their attitudes. I remember a lot of discussion about the Chu Hoi program, whether it was effective, and how to make it work.

Q: Chu Hoi were the Viet Cong who were welcomed back into South Vietnamese society.

PETERSEN: They gave up their allegiance to the communist goals of taking over in South Vietnam and were rehabilitated. Later in '66 for a brief period in the field, I was at Chu Hoi Center and even interviewed a few people there. Being in JUSPAO, I either showed a movie or set up an exhibit or did something there. I had some contact with the Chu Hoi effort that way and by designing leaflets and posters in connection with that. One time in '66, I was in the television studio where we were filming an interview with a returnee for broadcast. There was a lot of effort and commitment by JUSPAO to the Chu Hoi program.

But your question was, what was the outlook? What I recall is a sense of confusion but a sense of excitement, not discouragement. To a large extent, that reflects my own personality. I found a lot of job satisfaction in being there, a lot of professional satisfaction. I was excited about what I was doing, what I saw, where I went.

Q: What were you doing?

PETERSEN: My first few weeks were, frankly, quite mundane. I had some tasks in that executive office working under Harold Wright's tutelage, or under the tutelage of those he assigned me to work with. I had tasks such as, I remember being pleased that I had worked out a system to increase the speed of APO mail delivery by a full day by looking at some logjams where and where bags were picked up and delivered and making some recommendations. We got our mail a day earlier. I studied distribution systems within JUSPAO and in all the grandeur of a brand new JOT wrote my first official memo: do this, do that, I recommend this and that. Looking back on it, I enjoyed that. It's sort of like the traditional story of the guy who rises up through the ranks of some great corporation but he started in the mailroom. Maybe that was me. But the time I was spending outside of JUSPAO, my breakfasts, lunches, dinners, any free time, everything from visiting the zoo to going to performances, just talking and listening to people, sampling food on the street, looking at the architecture, I was just drinking everything in and enjoying it immensely. I found Vietnamese society fascinating. I had a rather mundane initiation in terms of the work but felt that there was great excitement outside the walls of JUSPAO. I took immediately to the tastes of Vietnam, loved Vietnamese food, enjoyed the sounds. For some reason, I saw some traditional Vietnamese operas, which I think are basically similar to Cantonese operas, and enjoyed the colors, the costumes, and the pageants.

But after the executive office, I went into the exchanges office of JUSPAO. The young Vietnamese high school students meant to go to the U.S. were interviewed in the JUSPAO exchanges office. In the time I was there, I remember interviewing about 30 of the 60 and enjoying that and making the first real use on the job of the very limited Vietnamese that I had at that stage. I worked on some Fulbright programs. I remember in the exchanges office dealing with some Vietnamese who were looking for opportunities for graduate studies in the U.S. It was a chance for me to visit some campuses and start to learn about the educational system.

One of the things that struck me was an anomaly. In a great Confucian sense, a scholar would be highly revered and held in rather high esteem and rewarded. That wasn't the case in Vietnam in 1966, where the monetary rewards were going to Vietnamese who were doing other things than being scholars and thinkers and teachers in the society. I started to see the impact that war and a massive U.S. presence had, the disjointedness that was occurring in society. It was one of the things I took note of.

In the exchanges office, the experienced officer I was working for, Bill Sayler, and his boss, Art Bardos, were facilitating appearances outside of Vietnam by some Vietnamese performing and visual artists. This was part of our effort to help portray Vietnam as a full and complete and interesting society, not simply an armed society engaged in constant warfare, but to humanize for the world the Vietnamese nation, our ally. I found that interesting. This was just a small little part of that effort, but I remember giving some thought to that.

I mentioned Art Bardos, Bill Saylor's boss. One day, I had to write a cable that was to go to Washington. I typed it up on the old green form with multi-copied yellow and pink forms. Then it would go down to the code room for transmission. I took it in to Mr. Bardos for his initialing, his approval, so that it could go out. I remember him reading it over carefully and looking up at me and saying, "You can't send it in this form. You have a mistake." I said, "Oh, Mr. Bardos, sir, what's the mistake?" He said, "Here" and he pointed out that I had split an infinitive in a cable. I'll never forget blurting out to Art, "Mr. Bardos, my God, there's a war on!" He said something about, "Well, nevertheless, correct this thing before it goes." That made a real impression on me, the fact that in the midst of all this hurly burly, rush and heavy workload and all, here was a man who, by golly, gave 100 percent and insisted that you do so. If we have a chance later on, I'll tell you of another meeting with Art where many years later, I recounted this incident to him one time at the Smithsonian. That was the exchanges office. I enjoyed that.

I went from there to the Joint Economic Section to work as part of my rotational JOT series of assignments. The Joint Economic Section was a State-USAID (United States Agency for International Development) section. I was assigned to the Civilian Manpower Committee Staff. The Civilian Manpower Committee [CMC] had been created by Ambassador Lodge that January. The members of the CMC included representatives of State, JUSPAO, USAID, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and some of the larger construction companies working in Vietnam. The Labor attaché chaired the committee. I was on the staff and the other members of the staff were two State Department economic officers, a Department of Labor person who was in Vietnam on an extended TDY (temporary duty) just to work on this committee, an Army major, and myself. We put together a report, a six-month forecast, on personnel needs in the Republic of Vietnam. I remember telling you a few minutes ago about taking note in the exchanges office of some of the anomalies in society that were occurring because of the high monetary rewards going to somebody who could operate heavy construction equipment, a bulldozer, whereas a professor of Vietnamese poetry, who in the past would have been at higher levels of society, was now just eking out a meager existence and there was a topsy turvy economic situation in the country where different skills, different training, were valued differently because of this massive war effort. I really got a look at how this was affecting the country while putting that report together, determining what wages would be necessary to fill vacancies in different sectors of the economy. One of the issues was, well, should more Koreans or Filipinos be brought in?

Q: These were called “third country nationals [TCNs].”

PETERSEN: Yes. Or could find the necessary personnel within South Vietnam? We had needs for labor among men of a certain age who would presumably also be needed in the military and what effect would recruiting such people to work in construction and other security projects have on military recruitment? Those were some of the things that we worked on there. I also, with the other staff members worked on developing a new way of coming up with weekly job listings, surveying all the major employers in the country and then making known, advertising, in different areas of the country and different sectors of the economy what the major job openings were week by week so that work planning could be done. As part of that, I worked with this fellow from the Department of Labor. We spent some time researching and putting together something that may sound very mundane, but it was an essential tool: A list of different jobs by job title that were internationally recognized so if recruitment were done outside of Vietnam to fill some of these vacant positions, apples would compare to apples and oranges would compare to oranges.

Then I worked on a project on the Civilian Manpower Committee alone, without the other staff, and one that I enjoyed because it allowed me to spend my time outside the office. I put together a security form so people could move from job location to job location. We were finding that when people were needed to be transferred from one location to another, they often couldn't get security clearance from the security authorities in the new location even though they had been cleared by the Vietnamese security authorities in the other jurisdiction. Working through MACV (Military Assistance Command, Vietnam), which set me up with some initial contacts, I went out and liaised with the Vietnamese military security services in the different jurisdictions. Then I designed a two-page form. I must have gotten my Vietnamese language tutor to help me with it because it was a bilingual Vietnamese-English two page form. It was a security form. Then I went back out to all these different Vietnamese military security service jurisdictions and got each one of them to approve the form so that we'd then have a single form that could be used anywhere and people could go from one job location to another. If they had their clearance in one area, they would be recognized in another area. It facilitated movement by needed labor. I enjoyed that. I found that exhilarating. But a lot of the fun was not being tied down but being out there meeting and traveling and working with a variety of people all around the country. On that assignment is where I first heard that revered name of Brown and Root, Morrison-Knudsen and learned of the significance of it.

Q: That is a major construction firm.

PETERSEN: For somebody who had joined USIA to be a cultural and information “type,” this and other similar assignments I found ideal. I enjoyed them immensely and felt I was learning a lot about how the country worked, certainly how our government, way beyond the Foreign Service, was working in this particular country and how the war effort was being waged.

Then I went from there into something very traditional. I went to the consular section. I imagine you have not interviewed a single person who has not paid his dues in the consular section. Looking back on it, I enjoyed that tremendously and probably could have seen myself spending a career very happily as a consular officer. In the first period in the consular section, while being undoubtedly kept on a short rein and watched closely by the consular officers and the experienced FSNs, I participated in immigrant and non-immigrant visa interviews, and did some processing of adoptions and marriages. But after doing that for a brief time, I really had an opportunity. One of the consuls had to leave. He was going off somewhere. Maybe it was just an extended R&R (rest & recreation). I don't remember. But I was told that I could step in and take over his area. He had seaman's affairs and deaths and estates.

Q: Was that in a separate office?

PETERSEN: Yes. I had my own office. It was his staff, but I had my own support staff while I substituted for him. In doing that, I had 15 different cases that I worked on, not from start to finish, but some of them were in the initial stages, some were near the end stages. I finished up a couple of them. But 15 separate cases of repatriating remains or taking charge of estates, evaluating estates, and contacting next of kin. I enjoyed that. That involved some rather somber and very sad duties, such as going to a mortuary. I remember being involved in an effort to try to identify some remains and determine whether these were the remains of someone, an American civilian, who had gone missing. I also went down to the prison and visited incarcerated people. I met a guy there. I was there to provide the full service and appropriate protection for American citizens, but, gosh, some of the people I met. One guy I visited was in prison on a murder charge. There was another guy in there for smuggling. If you have been to a prison, it's pretty spartan. Probably the aspect of that work that I enjoyed most, seaman's affairs and deaths and estates, was handling the seaman's affairs. Every American carrier that came in, the master would come in and present his papers. I would inspect them. I did a quick study on what I was supposed to be looking for. I came to respect the Foreign Affairs Manual [FAM]. I would inspect the papers and if they were in order, I would attach the consular stamps and sign. But quite frequently, it seemed like every ship (but it wasn't every ship) had problems. The master either had discipline problems and he'd bring a seaman to appear. I'd listen to the presentation and make a judgement. I had seamen who had charges against other seamen. I had masters who tried to discharge people. Some of them were bad cases and you could see why they shouldn't be on the ship. In other cases, I remember one particular seaman told me his master was giving him an unfair deal. I remember finding for the seaman that he shouldn't be put off in that port. It wasn't until then I realized that on a merchant vessel you could still be put in chains. In one case, there was a seaman who had been put in irons for trying to knife a shipmate. He was brought into port that way and brought into the consulate. I found all that rather interesting.

Q: Did you have Coast Guard officers working with you on that?

PETERSEN: I don't recall any Coast Guard officers at all.

Q: Later, they assigned a Coast Guard officer and a petty officer. It made it a lot easier. Also, later, they had a member of the Masters, Mates, and Pilots Union. So, when the Coast Guard officer and a union representative would appear on a ship, there wasn't an awful lot of crap because the whole triumvirate was right there looking down their throat. Who was the chief of the consular section?

PETERSEN: I wish I could remember his name. I vaguely remember his stature as being somewhat heavysset.

Q: I was thinking of Bob Bishton.

PETERSEN: I just can't remember the name.

Q: I was consul general there for 18 months, '69-'70. I know exactly what you're talking about. The work there was fascinating because you had everything.

PETERSEN: Yes. As I say, I remember thinking at the time that this would be a very, very rewarding way to spend a Foreign Service career, perhaps not just doing immigrant and non-immigrant visa interviews for a career, but I really liked the detective work, especially the deaths and estates and being involved so deeply in people's lives in such a significant way.

Q: It's the equivalent to being a death sergeant and a social worker.

PETERSEN: And at times being a father, professor, friend, and priest. I remember some of the tales that I was told when people would come in. Sometimes they were in real destitute situations. I could regale you with several dozen stories of individual cases, but I think that gives you enough of a flavor.

Q: Were you making any contact with young Vietnamese ladies or others there?

PETERSEN: The answer is yes -- Vietnamese men and women who were not directly related to the work I was doing. Some of them were artists. I had the opportunity, having served in the exchanges section, to find out about cultural events going on through the university and whatnot. I was aware of art exhibits and music performances. I was very fortunate. After initially staying in the Aster Hotel, a fellow asked me if I wanted to share an apartment with him. He was working at JUSPAO. He had formerly been in Thailand with Air America. Then he had worked in similar assignments in the Philippines. He was middle-aged. He had spent much of his life in East Asia and he really knew his way around in terms of how the Foreign Service bureaucracy worked. He approached me and said, "AID has just completed a new apartment building. I can get us an apartment. Would you like to share an apartment?" I said, "Yeah, that would be great." Before long, through him -- and he seemed to know a lot of people working in Saigon -- my circle of acquaintances expanded rapidly. I took advantage of the Vietnamese I was meeting to practice my Vietnamese as much as possible. I had left formal training at FSI (Foreign Service Institute) with an abysmal record in that artificial classroom setting, but in the real world, it was quite different. I was very motivated. I remember a technique I would use at a gathering or going from place to place in the course of a day or evening. Whatever my first conversation of the day or the event or the evening -- it could have been someone telling me about his family or someone explaining that she had traveled to Paris and come back -- whatever the vocabulary, the issue, the circumstances were of that first conversation, I would use that as my framework. If I had six more conversations with six different people, I would do everything I could to steer our conversation along the same pathway so that I'd hear that vocabulary over and over. I remember someone telling me about his family – his older brother, his younger brother, older sister, younger sister. Undoubtedly at FSI we had gone through the names of the different family members. An older brother or sister is not the same as a younger brother or sister. Different name. But it hadn't stuck. But in those real-life situations, I would push hard at that. It worked. Another thing I did, I went to a bookstore and got a copy of Kim van Kieu, a great epic poem that's a Vietnamese classic. It seemed to go on for a hundred and some pages with some illustrations. In reality, it's a Chinese story that was adopted by the Vietnamese and made into their own classic. But in any event, I got this and studied it and studied it. I memorized passages. I would rip off these passages from Kim van Kieu in the midst of a conversation. If I hit it right, I could tell by body language that "this person really knows our country or our language." Sometimes when I hit it wrong with not quite the right passage to quote in connection with what we were discussing, people would look at me like "Who is this fool here?" But I used that and similar techniques to really grease the wheels, to keep things moving. I probably didn't memorize more than a few dozen lines and images and references, but by throwing out a line or a word or two from the poem that someone would recognize, you could leap forward in terms of confidence in one another. If I were in the midst of interviewing someone and in response I would throw out a line of a poem instead of struggling to come up with something myself, you could just see the barriers going down. I enjoyed that. Frankly, I look back on it now and it seems significant, but it was only because it was the first time I was dealing with a foreign language. We all do that with every foreign language we study. We learn what we can in terms of the classics and the poetry and try to work that in and make use of it and learn from it.

Q: Did you get outside Saigon much?

PETERSEN: I did. In July of '66 for a week, I was assigned as an embassy control officer to Congressman Prentiss Walker, a Republican from the state of Mississippi. I saw this as a great opportunity to move around the country. I had already been going out on my own finding excuses to accompany people who were traveling in the Delta or up in the Highlands and had gone out practically every weekend or during the week if I could connect it to the work I was doing. I spent a week accompanying the Congressman. That was one example of many opportunities I had. I spent quite a bit of time in Dalat over a multi-week period working with the BTAO (Bureau of Technical Assistance Operations) in Dalat. That came near the end of my being a JOT, but the very first week I was in Vietnam, on a weekend, I found out through the fellow that I later shared an apartment with, that one of the JUSPAO airplanes was flying up to Dalat that weekend to deliver some material. I arranged to hop aboard and fly up there and start looking around Dalat. I did a lot of that, participating in whatever opportunity I could find to get out and get around.

Q: Do you have any other comments on the Prentiss Walker visit? What was his experience?

PETERSEN: One, I was either asked or told that I would be the control officer. I remember thinking, "Wow, what an honor" and someone straightened me out very quickly and said, "No, it isn't an honor. Nobody else wants to do it." It reminded me again of my status. I was an FSO-8. I was the only FSO-8 there. There were no FSO-7s. The next rank up was FSO-6. That's how low I was on the totem pole. But I enjoyed it immensely. I did a little field work, went out and checked areas that we thought that Walker should see. I took note of the fact, one, that he was Republican, and that was significant; and two, that he was planning to run for the Senate seat out of Mississippi that year and that he was on the Agriculture Committee. In reading about him, I learned he had been a poultry farmer while in Congress. He was an expert on that. He arrived and the embassy put him up at the Aster. I remember taking him around, getting him a cultural orientation to Saigon, and taking him to a restaurant and different places and introducing him to people that first day. The second day, I had arranged for him to go to the Highlands. We visited the First Air Cavalry and we went and visited the 101st Airborne Brigade, which was involved in Operation Hastings at the time. The commanding general there took us with him in his chopper and we flew around looking at some of the efforts underway. At one point, because we had the headsets on so we could hear the comms with the chopper pilot, and we had to swoop down low because we were coming into what would have been the path of some artillery rounds. We had to go below it. But it was interesting to see the Congressman in action posing with the troops for photo ops. This was my early USIA training, making sure that we had at every conceivable photo op the photographers ready. Of course, we were accompanied by a photographer throughout his visit. On the third day he was with us, a Wednesday, the whole day was dedicated to AID projects, self-help projects. And I remember the Congressman, who was a poultry farmer, in one village going into a building where there were Dalat bags filled with chicken feed. I remember him sticking his hand in a very knowledgeable way into that feed and sifting it and taking it up to his nose and whatnot and looking at it and going out and looking at those chickens in the village. I made sure there was a lot about what we were doing in Vietnamese agriculture. That was part of his visit. We saw a lot of chickens out there in the field.

The next day, we had some briefings. It was the Congressman, General Westmoreland and I sitting together as the General briefed him on the situation. I remember General Westmoreland talking about how good the American boys were who were there and how important it was that we support them properly and that Congress provide the support that DOD (Department of Defense) needed and so forth. I wasn't supposed to be in that meeting. At least that was MACV's point of view. They were a little upset. I could tell by the body language and the shocked looks on their faces when I did not respond to the nudge to get out of what was to be a one on one meeting. I wasn't going to miss that opportunity though, so I sat through it. General Westmoreland's looks at me during the meeting were quizzical. I won't say they were scolding. But it was an opportunity and I wasn't going to let it pass. It was the only time I ever saw General Westmoreland the whole time I was there.

Then we went over and met with the AID director. I remember the AID director talking about dislocated populations and the agricultural support projects and self-help projects and the importance of poultry projects. I got a real insight into something there. The Congressman said, "Well, you're doing it wrong." The AID director said, "What do you mean?" He said, "You just told me that in this one village, egg production is so important. Well, I was there and you brought in broilers. You didn't bring in layers." That congressman knew his chickens and told AID they had brought in the wrong shipment of chickens to accomplish the objectives of that particular project. I got a kick out of it because he wasn't chewing me out; he was chewing out the AID director. In a way, that's an indication of success of that visit. It wasn't just all photo

Later, we met with the assistant director of JUSPAO. For whatever reason, I don't know why, Barry Zorthian wasn't around to meet the Congressman, so he met the assistant director, briefed him about all the outreach efforts at JUSPAO. And then we went over to the ambassador's residence for lunch. Ambassador Lodge greeted Congressman Walker and said, "Well, if you think a Republican congressman from Mississippi meeting with a Lodge from Massachusetts is going to really help you, we'll have our lunch together, Congressman." I thought, "Oh, okay, it's going to be a political discussion." I was unceremoniously told by Lodge's assistant that I wasn't part of the luncheon, so I cooled my heels outside with a growling stomach while the Congressman had lunch with Ambassador Lodge. But unlike the meeting with General Westmoreland, where I made sure that I was a participant – of course, I made notes that I shared later with people, but they were rather innocuous; it was an innocuous conversation – Ambassador Lodge wasn't about to have a JOT at his table for lunch.

The next day, Friday, the only significant meeting I recall, we met with Phil Habib, who was head of the political section. What stands out there was perhaps in contrast to some of the meetings and conversations the Congressman had been having all week, Phil Habib described some of the real problems along with the successes and the hopes and the goals. He described some of the threats, shortcomings. I was very impressed by seeing that head of the political section talk to the Congressman that way.

You'd asked about getting out in the field. Later on that year, I worked in the field representative's division of JUSPAO. JUSPAO had a number of divisions. To give you an idea of what was involved there, there was a JUSPAO provincial representative in every province in the country responsible for what today we call "public diplomacy," in those days "public affairs," winning the hearts and minds. That division had some real resources. I mentioned the Twin Otter (aircraft) that we had. That wasn't the only airplane. There were other aircraft that were flown. I think the Otter was flown by the Army. But Field Division had a lot of military people assigned to it. I don't know that any of the JUSPAO province representatives were military officers. Maybe some were, but I have the impression they were all Foreign Service personnel. I went to one province and spent an extended period with one province representative going around with him. It was an extra body for him. It was a great learning experience for me, traveling around. That was the only time the whole time I was in Vietnam where I ever had bullets fired in my direction. He and I were in a jeep going down a road that we thought had been cleared. We found out later that it hadn't been. We had seen a truckload of Republic of Korea [ROK] troops on that road and he was under the impression that it was all right. He knew it had been a disputed road and one that you wouldn't use except during daylight hours, but he was under the impression it had been cleared earlier. We went down the road and somebody fired. The impression I got when I heard that "pow" from the side, I didn't realize that my head and my neck could descend down below my shoulder blades. I had a sore neck for a week just from that involuntary scrunching down. We had sandbags on the floorboard to provide some protection from hostile mines. There was nothing on the sides. It was just a jeep, sort of a military vehicle.

I traveled around to a number of provinces and interviewed province representatives. I was probably as unwelcome as one could be. Here I was, coming down from Saigon and taking time out of their busy days to interview them about their work in order to put together two documents. One of them was a guide to province facilities. I took great pride in that. I was pleased as punch with my results. It ended up being a manual in JUSPAO. We had great printing facilities, so I had a fancy cover put on it, designed to fit into a regular three ring binder. I don't remember how many pages it was, maybe 100. I typed fast after every interview. I put together a description of what each of these province representatives had available to him through the Vietnamese information service, through local liaison with U.S. or Vietnamese military, what was available commercially in terms of if you wanted to mount exhibits or get leaflets designed -- everything to do with a province representative's job. I summarized it for each of the provinces. I did not get to every province. I relied on some written questions and got written answers for those I didn't visit. But I got around to a fair number of people and saw the country. I recall thinking that I would much prefer to work up in the mountainous area, the Highlands, rather than in the Delta, which I didn't find all that attractive, a great expanse of flat land. Topographically, it wasn't as interesting as the area to the north.

Then I did another document that ended up being a nine-page document that was a guide based on interviews of what every new province rep should be aware of as they stepped off the airplane. It was set up as a guide for each new fellow, how he ought to do his job and what he ought to be aware of and what some of the pitfalls could be and how to leverage opportunities to get things done. One of the things I put in there was, "Don't go hat in hand to State or to AID or to MACV. If you can't borrow it, go out and buy it, but be careful of your stature because you are a part of the province council. Don't be the whining guy with your hand out all the time." That was in the advice column. A lot of it had to do with very practical things of how to put up a display and advice about languages and so forth. I enjoyed that. Again, the key was getting out, getting around the country.

I did have other jobs as a JOT. I was assigned to the press section. When I was in the press section, I spent almost every single day over in the political section. They had me digging through the bio files and putting together a sanitized description of either all or as many as I could do of the candidates who were candidates for the constituent assembly. On September 11, 1966, there was an election. I put together this guide to all the candidates, or as many as I could find out about. I also spent a lot of time going out and talking to some people and reading a lot of newspapers. That was my first effort to translate material from Vietnamese into English for these files. It was for use in the press section for the journalists so they would have a guide as to what was going on. That's why I say it was a sanitized version. I was allowed access to the classified bio files, but just to unclassified material for the newsmen.

Q: Did you get involved with the five o'clock follies, the daily briefing which the correspondents became very dubious about?

PETERSEN: I observed the five o'clock follies a few times. I don't recall ever having an assignment to prepare any of the material while I was in the press section that was used by the follies. I do remember one time, when I was out in the field, buttonholing a correspondent and telling him of a great project that was underway in that province and that he ought to come and look at it. It was some development project. I remember him saying, "If it doesn't have blood on it, I don't want to see it." I did not deal directly with the newsmen.

Q: You're the new boy on the block. What were you getting from the senior officers who dealt with the press? What was their feeling about the correspondents at that time?

PETERSEN: You have to remember that a lot of the people in USIA first and then in JUSPAO second and in the press section third were people who had come to their work from backgrounds in journalism. They understood it. They felt good about it. They thought it was important, significant work. But because so many of them were former journalists, they also knew what journalism was about – it was about meeting deadlines, about if you could get the scoop. They knew how to do a favor for a journalist, give him some information that others wouldn't have. They also understood very clearly the tension between the official version and what the journalists were getting. They understood perhaps in ways that others elsewhere in our embassy didn't appreciate that the journalists weren't there to be on our team. There was a real appreciation for what the journalists were there for. JUSPAO was very aggressive in getting our side of the story out. I'm starting to talk about things I really don't have firsthand knowledge about. I don't think we ever tampered with facts as we knew them. But that didn't mean that we wouldn't be very aggressive in our interpretation of the statistics. A lot of the facts were questioned – things like body counts. I never saw disdain for the journalists or animosity. There was personal and professional respect for the journalists who were there. They clearly understood what the journalists were there for and it wasn't what we were there for.

DAVID G. BROWN
Political Officer
Saigon (1966-1968)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

Q: Well, you went to Vietnam; you were there from when to when?

BROWN: It was a direct transfer sometime in the summer of 1966 for an 18-month assignment. I extended it for a couple of months and left in August of 1968. I think it was June, maybe July, because I had to get started Japanese language training.

Q: When you arrived there in '66, what was the situation in South Vietnam?

BROWN: The war was not going well, and the Americans were getting more and more heavily involved in it, not just in a military sense, but in every aspect of Vietnamese life. I got assigned to the provincial reporting unit. I came with Chinese and there was a Chinese affairs officer position in the embassy, but that slot was filled. As I did not know Vietnamese, I was assigned to cover the II Corps highlands area where you could do more with French than elsewhere. As I had studied French in Canada years earlier, the Embassy arranged brush-up classes to bring my language up to the 2+ level. The II Corps highlands was where the Montagnards lived.

Q: Was that where you spent your time?

BROWN: I lived in Saigon and traveled every week to the highlands. We traveled by plane, small one or two engine planes. You would take off, fly over the jungle, crossing yourself all the time that the engine would keep going until you get where you're going.

Q: Let's talk about. Who were the Montagnards and what was the situation there?

BROWN: The Montagnards are aboriginal people. The name Montagnards was given to them by the French because they lived in the highlands along the western border with Laos and Cambodia. No one knew exactly how many there were, perhaps one million, divided into any number of tribes. The Vietnamese traditionally despised them. The French had had a policy of keeping the ethnic Vietnamese out of the highlands. This was not a magnanimous policy but one designed to reserve the area for coffee and tea plantations run by French planters. Since the French government was gone by then, there was a Vietnamese administrative structure in the towns and some Vietnamese and ethnic Chinese merchants. But the bulk of the population in this highland area was Montagnards. In the war, they were caught between the Republic of Vietnam with the U.S. on one side and the Viet Cong on the other side. Both sides were trying to recruit Montagnards because they were tough fighters who knew the terrain. The Montagnard economy and way of life were of course being disrupted by the war. Their economy was slash and burn agriculture.

While we're on Montagnards, let me mention one highlight of my work with them. In 1967 National Geographic did an article on the Montagnards. I helped the reporter and was surprised to find myself quoted in the lead paragraph of the piece. Nothing profound, just a quote about the Montagnards being caught between the government and the Viet Cong with their way of life in jeopardy.

The U.S. government goal was to persuade the Vietnamese government to abandon their cultural prejudices and adopt an enlightened policy that would attract the Montagnards to support the South Vietnamese government. That was a large part of what the embassy was trying to do in the highlands. There was a political movement among the Montagnards called by the French acronym, FULRO, for the United Front for the Liberation of the Oppressed Races. These were Montagnards who were trying to preserve their own culture and achieve autonomy from both the Viet Cong and the government. So, much of what we tried to do in that period was to convince the Vietnamese to be sensible enough that you could then encourage this FULRO movement to cooperate with the government against the North Vietnamese. It was a lot of fun for a young guy.

Q: How did you operate?

BROWN: I would take advantage of people who had some knowledge of and contact with the Montagnards. These were sometimes anthropologists, or AID officers working in AID's program of assistance to the Montagnards or sometimes Montagnards who were working in local administrations in the highlands. The Vietnamese had a Montagnard Commissariat, something like our Indian affairs bureaus. One of the anthropologists was Gerry Hickey who had the respect of these people because of his real interest in understanding their lifestyle. Speaking in practical terms, I would arrive by plane in a provincial town, borrow a vehicle from the local USAID office or the military and drive around to see local figures. I'd listen to what the military said about where it was safe to go. I would talk to French planters, to local officials, local businessmen and religious leaders. Occasionally, I would drive to a Montagnard village to meet tribal leaders who were known to be influential in the Montagnard community or have contacts with FULRO. I'd drink fermented rice wine through a long straw from a communal wine jug, being careful to stay sober so I could get back when the meeting was over. We then used some of these contacts to send messages to FULRO which was operating secretly out in the bush.

I worked with Ted Heavner who was the Deputy in the Political Section responsible for our dealings with the Montagnards. I can very much remember one time when we had set up a negotiation with the head of FULRO. Ted and I went by helicopter to a designated clearing in the jungle where we were met by a group of Montagnards. Ted went off with them into the bush for several hours while I was told to wait with the helicopter. I never got to do anything quite as dramatic as that myself. Now, apart from what we were doing, the U.S. Special Forces had a string of bases along the Vietnamese border and they hired a lot of the Montagnards.

Q: Well, back at the embassy, in the first place you were part of the political section?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Who was the head of the political section?

BROWN: At the beginning it was Phil Habib, then later Arch Calhoun.

Q: Yes. How did you find the political section? Were they, was it a diverse group?

BROWN: Yes, it was a diverse group. Were our attitudes diverse?

Q: Yes.

BROWN: I think the lower you got in the embassy the more you encountered a belief that our policy wasn't working. Our mandate in the Provincial Reporting Unit, ten officers at that time, came from Phil Habib, who told us to get out around the country and tell the ambassador what was really happening. I think certainly my perception at the time was that the U.S. government was so deeply involved that there was no longer a sense of responsibility on the part of many Vietnamese for what was happening to their own country. I arrived as we were building up toward the peak of the American military presence there. Over time I developed a conviction that the U.S had to reduce its role and return more of the effort to the Vietnamese and make them responsible for their own future. I recall this view was widely shared. I remember Vice President Humphrey coming through and other people. Occasionally, such delegations would have an hour and a half discussion with the people in the Provincial Reporting Unit. A pretty standard message on our part was that more American troops wasn't what was going to win the war.

Q: How about the situation of the highlanders or the Montagnards? Did you find that this was a sort of a minor thing that you were reporting on or was this of concern at least from your perspective within the political section?

BROWN: Oh, yes, it was a serious concern because this was a strategically important part of Vietnam. It was not that the population was large but that the geography was strategically important. Therefore, getting the cooperation of the Montagnards was a pretty consistent goal. It wasn't just the Vietnamese who had to be persuaded to cooperate with the Montagnards. I remember at one point a new American general arrived, I can't remember his name, but he was moving his division into the highlands and wanted to burn down a section of the highlands to deny cover to the enemy. My colleagues in AID and I geared up a major effort to persuade the Embassy to persuade him not to do that.

Q: Well, I mean, as a practical matter, geographically, this is where the collapse of South Vietnam started up there in '75 I believe.

BROWN: You have a very good memory. That's exactly where it started. There was a big battle around Pleiku and the South Vietnamese were defeated. And in a matter of weeks, the north moved down the highways to the coast and from the coast all the way down into Saigon and that was the end.

Q: Yes. Did you get any feel about, granted you were pretty low on the feeding system, but about Elsworth Bunker, the ambassador?

BROWN: Well, I certainly have a sense of respect for him. How much influence did he have back in Washington? Again, my memory fails me as to what he thought. When I first arrived Henry Cabot Lodge was ambassador.

Q: Cabot Lodge. Did the sort of the changes in government in South Vietnam on the Vietnamese side have much effect in the highlands?

BROWN: I cannot remember specifics, but yes, President Thieu and Nguyen Cao Ky were in power throughout my time in Vietnam. However, there was a mix of types on the Vietnamese side in the highlands. Some officials were more enlightened and realized Vietnam had to work with these people. Then there were others who you might describe as Neanderthal hardliners whose view of the highlanders was these are primitive people, they have no future. The future is for us Vietnamese to develop the highlands and if we have any trouble with the montagnards we're just going to shoot them and burn their villages.

Q: How about the Special Forces, they'd been there, did you find them a good source, I mean what was your impression of the Special Forces?

BROWN: Are they a source, did we use them as conduits? My recollection is that there were some Montagnards working for Special Forces who we knew had connections into the FULRO organization and could be used to send messages. However, the Special Forces were not really integrated into the embassy's political approach to this. What kind of respect did I have for these guys? A lot. They worked in very tough circumstances and very exposed and were doing their best. I wasn't a military guy. I didn't try and second guess their tactics of how to interdict Viet Cong operations along the border. I did listen very carefully to their advice about where to travel.

Q: How about the regular army units? Did you find this a different breed of cat or something?

BROWN: Well, I didn't have much to do with the GIs. My contacts tended to be with the Intel people and occasionally with the senior officers. We had different jobs. The intel people were focused on the Viet Cong units. My attention was on what's going on amongst the populations in these areas and what were their attitudes. What were their attitudes about the prospects for the war? What were their attitudes about the South Vietnamese government? Despite the general I mentioned before, generally, I found what I thought were very intelligent men leading our military. There was a General Lee, I can't remember what position he was in, but I remember him wanting to talk to me about the Cultural Revolution China and what this would mean for the prosecution of the war. In fact at one point, he sent word he wanted me to come and brief him. I was flattered.

Q: Well, then were you there for Tet?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Can you tell me your experiences during Tet?

BROWN: Okay. There are two sides of this story. The first is just anecdotal. Before Tet 1968, within the Provincial Reporting Unit, we decided that one person in each corps area would be out in the field and one other would be back in Saigon. My II corps colleague, Jim Mack chose to spend Tet in Nhatrang, so I stayed in Saigon. If he had wanted to come to Saigon and I had chosen to go to someplace else, I would have gone to Ban Me Thuot. As it happened Ban Me Thuot was overrun by the Viet Cong, and local AID officers with whom I probably would have been staying were captured. Luck was with me. In Saigon, I and another officer, I think it was Allen Wendt, drew straws as to who would do duty in the embassy that night. Allen drew the duty, so I wasn't in the embassy building when it was attacked. I was living in an apartment building across the street from the embassy. It was a surreal experience. There were three of us, including Steve Johnson, Ulysses Johnson's son; living together in this apartment. Between the three of us, we had one weapon, which was my Montagnard crossbow. So, we were not inclined to go out and try to win whatever was going on outside. We called the embassy and the lines were dead. We couldn't get through to them or to Arch Calhoun or other people. We turned on the radio, Armed Forces Radio, which was running baseball games. Every now and then it got quiet, we'd poke our head out to try to see what was happening. All of a sudden there would be more staccato gunfire. Eventually it quieted down the next morning. What had happened was that about 30 Viet Cong had shot their way into the embassy compound and were in the garden area around the building having killed a couple of marines in the process. Fortunately, they did not get into the embassy building. Allen and the others inside survived. In the morning, a U.S. ranger battalion was brought into reoccupy the American Embassy. When we eventually went to work the next morning we were literally walking over dead Viet Cong bodies to get into the embassy.

The other side of the story is how to interpret Tet. Honestly, I can't remember what a report I would have written shortly after this would have said. My recollection is that I was focusing on what was going on in Vietnam. I didn't have a good understanding of what the impact of this event was back in the United States. There was sort of a division of opinion in my recollection between the people who were emphasizing what a shock this attack had represented and how close it came to succeeding and that therefore this was a harbinger for real trouble for the government and U.S. Then there were others, and I put myself in this category I will admit, were more impressed that this massive attack had been repulsed and that in large part by U.S. efforts we were able to recapture all the main cities that had been lost in about six weeks.

Q: What happened up in the highlands at Ban Me Thuot and other places?

BROWN: Not a great deal, but in Ban Me Thuot a number of people were captured, Americans because the Viet cong attacked the provincial headquarters and the AID offices and they captured some Americans, including Mike Bengue who was an AID employee and who had been with AID in the highlands for five or six years and was about as close to the Montagnard community as any AID employee. He was a prisoner until '75, broken by the experience.

Q: Did you go back to the highlands after Tet, didn't you?

BROWN: Oh, yes.

Q: Was there much effect there?

BROWN: No. You did not see this. The highlands had not been the focus of their attack. I mean they were attacking Saigon and Hue and Nhatrang and all the main cities. Tet was going to be a coup de grace, a knock out blow, and so the highlands was not a major focus.

Q: Well, you left relatively shortly thereafter, well in August, so I mean it was about six months?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: When you left Vietnam in 1968 what was your feeling, whither South Vietnam?

BROWN: Well, I will be honest, I thought a policy of gradually reducing the American presence and turning things over to the Vietnamese had a good chance of success. That proved to be wrong.

GERARD M. GERT
Psychological Operations
Saigon (1966-1968)

Gerry M. Gert was born in Danzig in 1920. He joined USIA in 1952 and served Germany, Yugoslavia, Laos, and Vietnam. He was interviewed in 1988 by Lewis Schmidt.

GERT: I had the good luck of being sent to the National War College. I was in the class of 1965-66. I did the War College African tour, which had some bearing on a later assignment. I volunteered for Vietnam which I did not have to do, having served in Laos. Since I was a reserve officer in psychological operations, I thought I could make some kind of contribution in this struggle. So I volunteered for that particular job in PsyOps, and got the job.

There was only one complaint I had against Barry Zorthian and I might as well get rid of it. Barry insisted that I get to Saigon right after I got through with the War College. If he had granted me six weeks' leave, I would have gotten a master's in international relations, because at the War College --

Q: At G.W. [George Washington University]

GERT: At G.W., right. I would have loved that. But Barry insisted he needed me right away, which was nonsense, because he had Bob Delaney on the job, and Bob wasn't leaving yet. We had a hell of a long overlap.

Q: Maybe he was just afraid you wouldn't get there at all.

GERT: You know Barry. (Laughs) I did arrive in Vietnam and moved in with Bob Delaney. We had Art Bardos and Leo LeClair living in the same house with us. But Delaney was the big guy and a delightful person. Where is Delaney?

Q: He's the only guy that I know of who ever became a rear admiral in the Naval reserve. He was up at New Jersey, but I think he's gone to Florida.

GERT: He was in Rhode Island, and he's gone to Florida. I tried to track him down just two months ago in Newport.

As you know, JUSPAO had been in business and was in full swing. Barry was the boss. I had visited Vietnam twice or three times when I was in Laos, and got there before JUSPAO existed. Under JUSPAO, you had, of course, this large organization. I'll let others describe it. Half of USIS served in that place.

I'd like to stay with the psychological operations side, where I was assigned. The top man in the PsyOps side was a general. The guy who was still there when I arrived was General Freund, with whom Barry had a sort of ambivalent relationship.

By the time I got there, Freund was about to leave, and a new man from the Pentagon, Colonel Brownfield was assigned. I had looked him up in the Pentagon. He got his star and came out to Vietnam, and I was his deputy. We had this large organization called Psychological Operations Division.

Q: Were you operating out of Saigon? You weren't up country.

GERT: No, we were in Saigon. We had a joint organization, Joint Public Affairs Office, with Army, Air Force, Navy, and Marines, AID and State and USIS personnel. In psychological operations, we had around 25 officers who were on the level of lieutenant colonel or commander, O5, as we call them in the military. We had some 60 enlisted men.

What were we doing? We had people in every province. The PsyOps advisor was on the staff of the Provincial Representative, who was usually a colonel, quite often a State Department officer, in some instances USIS officers, and they were the top Americans in the province. There were 42 provinces. The PsyOps advisor, was one of our people, and we provided supervision and support. We had a division in our organization called field operations, headed by, I believe, Maynard Ford, a very good guy. Field operations, of course, was the outfit looking at needs from food to staff to paper to leaflets, everything, and Ford was running a big shipping organization. We had our own fleet, the Otter fleet, that flew all this material and personnel to location.

Q: Did you know a man named Lou Ross over there?

GERT: Yes. Lou Ross. I do. (Laughs) Everybody chuckles at Lou Ross. A lot of weird characters. Lou was one of them. Carl Gebuhr was one of my deputies. Carl was running the production division. These were the guys who were producing leaf-lets and posters and other materials.

We're talking about the breakdown of the psychological operation division. It was in JUSPAO, and we had three divisions just within the PsyOps setup. There was the production division which I mentioned, field operations which looked after the guys' needs in the field, and there was a research shop, which came up with concepts and ideas for the production division and for anybody else. I think Doug Pike was associated with that; I'm not quite sure. He may have had a separate division. I'm a little fuzzy now. There was the North Vietnam division; that might have been Pike. He was a great expert on the Viet Cong and the Vietnamese Army and all that. I think they were part of that.

Vietnam, of course, was a great experience. Barry Zorthian being PAO was also an experience in itself. I have had a very good relationship with Barry throughout, I've had no complaints. Barry was a difficult guy, lots of people complain about him. I never had any problems. We did a lot of travel together. Barry had the habit of going out in the field every weekend. I'd pick him up and we'd have some flight laid on, a helicopter or what- ever, a small plane. I think together we must have been in every province at least once. So there was a lot of travel, lots of time in the air, and I would always admire Barry's ability to get on the damn plane. I was always nervous and afraid. Barry would get on the plane and either do his "in" box or he'd fall asleep. He was most relaxed when we got out. Of course, he was great fun and asked wonderful questions. A lot of travel, a lot of briefings, a lot of projects.

One thing comes to mind. We were talking about the leaflet division, the shop that produced the leaflets and distribution, which was done mostly by the Air Force. We think, in retrospect, and maybe others will comment on this, too, that some 85,000 Viet Cong, Viet Minh, or North Vietnamese, turned themselves in under what we called the Chieu Hoi program. "Come back to our side with just cause," and all that. If you express it in money, that's much cheaper than shooting and killing and exposing our own forces to combat. We sometimes have a tendency to brag that these were the results of psychological operations. But in fairness, we must say that if an army is winning and they're doing well, they don't believe what they're fighting for, they're starving, they have no ammunition and the morale is very, very low -- then that leaflet might be the last straw that breaks the camel's back. But otherwise, the leaflet itself will never really bring in enemy soldiers, no matter what. That's something that needs to be said, because so often psychological warriors, like myself, exaggerate their ability to bring in the enemy. That's often nonsense.

Q: I've forgotten whether it was Bob Franklin or Pat Nieburg who talked about one leaflet drop when there was a particularly tough assault by the North Vietnamese on one of the American installations. They had the whole periphery barb-wired, several layers of it, and they dropped these leaflets giving them an opportunity to come in. He said a lot of them started coming in, while waving their hands with the leaflet, then they got hung up on the barbed wire and the Vietnamese behind the wire, the South Vietnamese, mowed them all down. That just simply destroyed the effectiveness of the operation, of course.

GERT: Sure. In years to come, people will get into the jungle of Vietnam and discover millions of leaflets lying there and rotting away. I think we papered that country over many times with leaflets. We also have to appreciate the fact that our own Air Force quite often did not deliver the leaflets -- I am convinced that many a run was not performed, because you had to get down to low levels where you draw enemy fire. Some of our guys just dropped a load in the ocean. (Laughs) They never got close to the target area. Lots of strange things happened in that war.

A word about organization. The PsyOps division was taken out of JUSPAO in a later phase, before the Tet Offensive. We became part of an organization called CORDS, which was headed by Robert Komer and then by Bill Colby.

Q: Later CIA director.

GERT: Right. Bill Colby. The general left, and I was chief of PsyOps, in CORDS. I just want to recount one incident of something that stayed with me. The CORDS deputy, I believe under Colby, was a three-star general. He called me in one day and wanted to know if we had lots of television sets placed throughout the country. Television was used, by the way, as one of the media to get our messages across. We had village sets that were placed under lock and key in a village. Fascinating operation.

How did you get a TV signal out? You may remember this. We had Navy planes that were circling over Vietnam, putting out a signal for about two or three hours until they ran out of fuel. They put out the TV signal. So we had the facilities, we could put film on television, we could put it out by Navy plane. We'd get a message out and it could be received on TV sets throughout areas which we controlled.

The general wanted to know if we were making optimum use of this medium, which cost a lot of money. He said to me, "Are you putting out subliminal messages?" I had to admit to this general that I didn't even know what a subliminal message was. Like so many, he must have attended some course and he had read about Skinner and psychology and the word "subliminal," and he thought that we could develop a subliminal message which would say, "The Viet Cong are no good. Turn yourself in to our side." Since I didn't know how to handle this one, he thought we were just wasting money and wasting time, and he didn't think much of it. Everybody who had taken a course in psychology thought they could make an offering to us.

I experienced the Tet Offensive in 1968. That was quite a show, because across the street from where we lived, in a house which I shared with Leo LeClair and Bill Ayers, who was a Chinese speaker, a very nice guy who is retired and lives up in New England somewhere, was Vietnamese naval headquarters, and that was one of the targets of the Viet Cong. They attacked early on that morning of the Tet Offensive. They got very close, and fired rocket grenades into that building. It shook up our building, and we felt we were under attack all morning long. We crawled under our beds and spent a lot of time there, hugging machine pistols. Then, as you know, the attack on the Embassy in Saigon and the heroic effort by Colonel Jacobson and the MPs, who beat the Viet Cong out of there. It was quite a time.

About a month after that, I left. As I think I mentioned before, the Agency offered me Deputy PAO, with a promise of PAO, and I had a choice either in Nigeria or Zaire. Because I'd been to Africa on the War College trip, I could make a semi-intelligent choice, and I opted for Zaire over Nigeria. I'd seen Lagos and Kinshasa, and I preferred Kinshasa.

Q: I'd like to go back just briefly to your Vietnamese experience. I'm not sure I ever heard anybody on the JUSPAO staff talk extensively about whether they had any information or any feeling as to exactly how well they were doing or whether they were getting any of their objectives across. Under the conditions that existed, I suppose that was exceedingly difficult to obtain anyway. But did you have any kind of a line or feeling as to whether you were getting your messages across or what it was doing, what the reaction was of the people who were your audience?

GERT: Very hard to say, Lew. I would say, overall, as I think back, very little. We had very little feedback. We had our problems in helping to run the Vietnamese Information Service. There was, parallel to our organization the Vietnamese Information Service. They had to run the information in their own country. We tended to do too much for them. I think that goes for the military, too, but in the final analysis, it was their country. Their service wasn't very strong. We worked with them on all levels -- Saigon and the provincial level, local Vietnamese service, and they often were pretty bad. They did not have the very best personnel, they were not very ambitious, and they didn't have many resources. Whenever possible, we helped with equipment. We helped on all levels. But it was a weak effort, and we sometimes went on combined operations with American equipment, American people helping out, or local employees of ours, who were generally better than the Vietnamese staff. It was an uphill battle. I don't know how much we really accomplished.

Q: Some of the people I have interviewed have made the point that because we were doing practically the whole thing ourselves...

GERT: Too much so.

Q: Yes, too much so, we never had any idea whether the Vietnamese themselves would do it or be able to do it, if we let them do it their way. I suppose you can argue in either direction, but what is your observation from what you know?

GERT: I'd have to say that what made me so sad is I found that our guys were not as motivated as the communists were. Those damn communists were motivated. Our friends, our South Vietnamese friends and allies, didn't go at it with that motivation. Often they were on the job more for the money or position although the pay was very poor, too, I must admit. I really don't remember any outstanding people in the Vietnamese Information Service. Maybe I'm doing them an injustice, but I can only talk about memories from many years past, and nobody comes to mind that I can think of as an outstanding information specialist.

Q: I'm interested in that because as PAO in Thailand, I felt that on a much lower scale, of course, although we were in a big country program, that we had the same kind of a problem and we were constantly under pressure from Washington to turn this and that part of the program over to the Thais, none of whom wanted it.

GERT: Yes, yes.

Q: I felt that one of the things that caused [Frank] Shakespeare to decide I was not worth very much was the fact that I simply told him, "If the Thais take this over, it's going to go to pot." He kept asking me, "How long, Lew, do you think it will take the Thais to take over the motion picture program and so forth?" I guess I was a little facetious, and I said, "Frank, I think it's going to take about six or seven years." What I should have said is, "I don't think they'll ever do it." He thought I was trying to drag out the turnover to the Thais, and it didn't do me any good to have made that joke.

GERT: I would say, Lew, it would have taken the Vietnamese even longer.

Q: Well, I think the Thais never would have done it, really.

GERT: It's hard to generalize. The Vietnamese can be very effective and very efficient. I suspect they can be even sharper than the Thais, if I may generalize.

Q: I think so.

GERT: When you look back into Southeast Asia in the days of colonialism, it was the Vietnamese who were the top people working for the French, who were running Laos and Cambodia. I'm sure they were sharper than even the Thais, and I have a great opinion of the Thais. But it's different. This struggle wasn't that clear cut. There was this crosscurrent of motivation. They didn't know what side they were on. Some of them didn't like the government in power, and some had sympathies, not necessarily with the communists, but with something else of a different nature. There was all this confusion. There was no real identification with what they really stood for. It was all part of the battle.

Q: Now a more cynical approach. What did you think was the motivation of the Americans, given, as it must be, that they had to observe a good deal of this attitude on the part of the Vietnamese? Were they really dedicated, or were there some who were and some who were not?

GERT: Of course.

Q: Did they really believe in what they were doing?

GERT: I would think, like in any organization, you'll find all kinds, and we had quite a few who didn't give a damn. Some didn't like to come to Vietnam, some volunteered. I would say that by and large, among the Americans, the vast majority were motivated and believed in it. Many of us believed, rightly or wrongly -- I admit I was wrong, but I believed it at the time -- the business about the monolithic communist menace -- all the slogans, the domino effect, if you don't stop it here it will cross the rest of Asia and other nations will fall, and so on and so on. So I think that Americans, by and large, were motivated, were serious, dedicated, devoted, much more so than the Vietnamese, I'm afraid.

Q: One final question about this. You remember that fairly early on in the American intervention in Vietnam, there came the communist attempt to take over Indonesia. Of course, the Indonesians reacted very violently in the massacres of the communists, particularly the Chinese communist members of the population. A lot of people have argued that if it had not been for the show of force that the Americans were making with reference to Vietnam, the Indonesians might never have withstood that attempt to take over the government, but they felt motivated and supported to rise against that attempt largely on the strength of what the U.S. was doing in Vietnam. Do you have any feeling on that, or did any of the people with whom you associated make any remarks about it?

GERT: No. I must say this is the first I've heard of this, Lew. It seems to me from where I sat, of course, I was never in Indonesia, so I'm speaking more as an observer from far away. It seems to me that what happened in Indonesia is that the military in Indonesia, coming back to what you said about Yugoslavia, had had very good and close relations with our own military. We have had civic action programs in the Indonesian military, largely indoctrinated by Americans. I met some of these guys who served in Indonesia at the War College. I think that a lot of indoctrination took place, the military was anti-communist, and when this situation arose in Indonesia, these guys jumped in and, as you know, the blood bath ensued.

One other factor, I think, though, is also an ethnic racial struggle there. I think there were so many ethnic Chinese in Indonesia, who, rightly or wrongly, were identified with the communists. So this also became a blood bath of Indonesians killing Chinese, indiscriminately. Many of them were communists, maybe the majority, I don't really know.

So you had these two factors, the military having been indoctrinated in anti-communist matters, you had Sukarno's problems, that's something else, but you also had this ethnic struggle between the Indonesian and the Chinese. The last factor that you mentioned is news to me, but I believe that the atmosphere, most likely the military presence aided in the stance or the position that the military could take in the internal battle stance. That's quite possible, although I had not heard of this before.

Deputy Director, USAID
Saigon (1966-1968)

L. Wade Lathram received his call for duty to Vietnam while in the Senior Seminar. He has also served as economic counselor in Turkey. He was interviewed by William Knight on June 2, 1993.

LATHRAM: I was in the eighth seminar, and in May and early June we were wondering, "what's going to be our assignment?" One day I received a call from Ray Hare, who was Assistant Secretary for NEA. And he said, "At the end of your assignment in the senior seminar, how would you like to be Deputy Assistant Secretary in NEA?" And I said, "Great, fine." A week later I was asked to go see U. Alexis Johnson, who was then Under Secretary for Political Affairs. I went with much trepidation because I had a suspicion as to what the call was about. The first thing he said was, "Dave Bell [who was then administrator of AID] has been to the Secretary, and asked for you for Vietnam." Secretary Dean Rusk said he could have anybody he wanted. I said, "What does he want me for?" "Deputy Director of the AID mission in Vietnam." And I said, "But I don't want that. I've a perfectly good assignment in NEA with Ray Hare." And he said, "No you haven't, I called the Assignment Board this morning and canceled that one. You have a choice Vietnam or resigning from the Foreign Service."

Q: Really. That's hardball.

LATHRAM: That was hardball, especially for an FSO-1. The old FSO-1 before 1980. My previous assignment of Director of Personnel for AID, came about the same way. I was Economic Counselor in the Embassy in Turkey in 1963. When Bill Crockett, then Under Secretary for Administration; John Macy, head of the Civil Service Commission; and Bill Hall, Foreign Service officer on loan as Deputy Administrator for Administration, for AID, got their heads together and decided I'd make a good AID personnel director. I was at that time given the choice of resigning from the Foreign Service.

What was most annoying to me later, Bill, quite honestly, was the number of times that the public in general, and even those that should have known better, criticized those that went to Vietnam. Most of us went to Vietnam because we were ordered. In the Foreign Service, of course, we accept a global assignment as a responsibility. Certainly that's true with all those in the military.

But to digress for just a second, to show my bitterness on that subject, after I retired in '74 I decided I might like to have a brief tour with the United Nations just to see what it was like. So I contacted the Personnel Administrator for United Nations, whom I knew, and they were very interested in me and my background. I was given an application form to fill out, which you would have to do for any job. But, my friend said, "By the way, don't mention your service in Vietnam." I said, "What?" He said, "It doesn't go well to have served in Vietnam regardless of what you do for the United Nations." I tore up the application, and handed it back to him, and told him on that basis I was not interested.

I didn't want to go to Vietnam. I wasn't convinced then, I wasn't convinced later that it was a winnable war. But I'm proud of what I did there, and I wasn't interested in employment in an organization that says I should be ashamed of service there. Anyway, that's the way I went to Vietnam, as Deputy Director for the AID mission. I asked Dave why he had picked me and made it clear I was angry. He said, "We want you to go to Vietnam to save Charlie Mann who is the Director. He's under fire from the military, particularly from McNamara. We think he's a good Director." And I said, "Dave, you know there's no way I can go as Deputy Director, and save him. I'll do my best, but that's an impossible task. I don't want to go, but you fixed it so I don't have a choice.

Q: Do you know why he was in such difficulty with McNamara?

LATHRAM: That gets into a little broader area. First, Charlie's own personality was kind of abrasive. I don't know whether you know Charlie Mann or not?

Q: No.

LATHRAM: ...or knew him. He had a rather abrasive personality, he had a Germanic accent much, much stronger than Henry Kissinger's. His French was Germanic French which many in South Asia resented, but AID wanted him there because of his French. McNamara wanted him gotten rid of because he wasn't getting along with General Westmoreland very well on a personal basis. He was also in charge of the pacification program and Westmoreland felt AID was not doing a good job. This is a good point to explain what pacification meant then, and meant later.

Pacification dealt with the villages and hamlets throughout Vietnam in 44 provinces. In short, pacification was concerned with keeping the Viet Cong out of the villages, with keeping the villagers safe, prosperous and on the side of the Vietnamese government. The province chief commanding Vietnamese forces for that province was responsible for helping the villagers and the hamlets with their social development, their economic development, their political participation, and doing its best to get them to be on the government's side. Mao had said the communist revolution would be won by "little fishes swimming in the sea". The Viet Cong were those little fishes, ever since the early '50s and Dien Ben Phu and were then known as Viet Minh.

Frankly, the villagers in Vietnam, right from the beginning, wanted to be let alone. They didn't like the government. The government meant taxation, and control to the villager. But he didn't like the Viet Cong trying to persuade him to go to a different form of government, a communist regime, an authoritarian regime. And the persuasive technique used by the Viet Cong was brutal. My maid in Saigon left the Delta. Her father owned a fine farm, she said, in the Delta, but in the early days with the Viet Minh, the French government had come to him for taxes. The Viet Minh had come to him for taxes. He said, "I can't pay you both, not and live. So I won't pay any." He was taken out by the Viet Minh one night, and shot, and that left her and her mother with no hope of making a living. The Viet Minh men took over their farm, and she came to Saigon. I said the villagers wanted to be let alone. But, if he wasn't, the villagers wanted anything, if he was given a preference, it was with the government. That was demonstrated in spades in '67 with the first real general election, and with the ongoing refugee program.

But the job of pacification meant the Vietnamese had to do it, with our advice, and guidance, and help. And the prime instruments for that purpose were the AID mission, USIA at the field level, and CIA with its own activities at the field level. They were all putting pressure on helping the Vietnamese, but the Vietnamese had to do it themselves. This the American military, quite frankly, had trouble understanding. We had the main military force U.S. activities there from Westmoreland on down. In effect the latter said, "We're here to help the Vietnamese win the war, yes, but we can win it for them." You couldn't do that with a pacification program. McNamara and the Westmoreland command mutually felt that pacification was not succeeding. The villagers were not being pacified, the Viet Cong were all over the country. And why weren't they being pacified? Because the American civilians weren't doing the job.

Q: This is what they felt, what the Americans felt.

LATHRAM: This is what the U.S. military, the Pentagon and the White House felt, and therefore Charlie Mann, heading the pacification program through AID, was failing. That's the reason they wanted to get rid of Charlie.

Q: This might be a good time to describe the organization structure of the effort in regions and provinces, etc.

LATHRAM: When I laid the groundwork from what I just said, for the fact that then, and later, organization structure for the pacification program became all important. It was the thing on which the White House, the Pentagon, Westmoreland, the embassy and the Ambassador, all focused. How are we going to organize the American pacification effort? At the time I went to Vietnam it was organized in separate agencies, extending from the headquarters of each agency down through the provinces to the villages and hamlets. AID had its own staffs, with a province senior advisor in each province carrying out the AID program.

Q: And he would have a staff?

LATHRAM: He would have a staff.

Q: How big might that staff be?

LATHRAM: Oh, that might usually be fifteen or twenty civilians, sometimes more.

Q: Including secretarial.

LATHRAM: No. At the province level there were very few secretaries. It was pretty hairy, you know. Let me back up, and point out one thing. Even in '64 and '65, it was impossible for Americans to drive the highways from one spot to another. You went by air. When you were in the province the American personnel had to be very careful...everybody had his jeep...and personnel had to be very careful about what villages and hamlets they visited, because they might be ambushed on the way. You know, it's awfully easy to destroy, and very hard to build.

Let me digress to emphasize that point. The Vietnamese had what they called a revolutionary development training center at Vungtao. I think it was about 50 miles from Saigon on the coast. [looking at map] Here is Saigon, here is Vungtao. As I recall there were about twelve bridges on the highway. They were all out of operation, destroyed. When I arrived in Vietnam the only way we could get to Vungtao was by helicopter. There, with CIA's support and help, they trained revolutionary development workers, Vietnamese workers, to work in the villages and help them with their problems, and try to get them to be with the government.

At that time the Vietnamese had two battalions of ARVN troops (ARVN stands for the Army of the Republic of Vietnam), that's about a thousand men guarding that highway. But they couldn't keep it open. Every time they'd build a bridge it would get blown up. Vietnam intelligence finally caught one Viet Cong sapper. A sapper is a guy who plants explosives. They caught one sapper. ARVN rebuilt those bridges and for about three months one could drive to Vungtao. At the end of that time the Viet Cong were able to insert another sapper. A thousand armed men could not keep that road open in the face of one sapper. It's easy to destroy, and it's very hard to build. That's just an example of what the problem was all about.

Essentially, the organization structure for each of these civilian agencies, CIA, AID, USIA, was the same. They worked from their headquarters organization in Saigon to the provinces, and there were 44 of them all over. In addition, MAVC, the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, which was General Westmoreland's U.S. military organization, had military advisers in each province, and district, advising the village and hamlet protective forces, the Popular Forces and the Regional Forces.

Q: There was a regional structure also, wasn't there Wade?

LATHRAM: Yes, thank you for reminding me of that. There were four Corps areas, established by the Vietnamese, patterned after the U.S. idea of military organization. I Corps in the north, II Corps in the middle, III Corps both sides of Saigon, and IV Corps which was the Delta. And within each Corps were a number of provinces.

Q: So the provinces had to report through the regions to headquarters.

LATHRAM: Right, and that was true with the civilian organization. It was also true with the military. But the military was more cohesive. The Marines had the I Corps, and all of the Marines were in I Corps. The U.S. Army was in the other three Corps areas. The Navy had personnel relating to III Corps and IV Corps, but they were in and out. Some of them, as I recall...I'm not sure about this, because I didn't pay too much attention to the military part of it...as I recall it, they did have Navy personnel assigned to some of the Army units, but by and large they were separate too. But they were still fighting the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese military directly, and so were the ARVN fighting directly. The U.S. military also had advisory services working with the Regional Forces and Popular Forces as I said before. They provided local security against the Viet Cong. The Popular Forces were recruited from the villages and hamlets which they were protecting. The same thing was true with the Regional Forces of the province.

When I went there as Deputy Director of the AID mission that's the structure I found.

Q: And who was the Ambassador at that moment?

LATHRAM: The Ambassador was Henry Cabot Lodge. He was succeeded by Ellsworth Bunker in '67.

Q: He had Fritz Nolting in effect bounced because he wanted the job, as I recall.

LATHRAM: Yes, that's right.

Q: It was a political power play.

LATHRAM: And it was related, of course, to the elimination of the man who was the Ambassador at Diem's assassination and the CIA chief, Jock Richardson -- who, by the way, is a great guy. He's now retired and living in Mexico. I keep in touch with him. He was later station chief in Korea when I was first there. I had tremendous respect for Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker. He succeeded Lodge while I was still there. I cannot say I had the same respect for Henry Cabot Lodge. Should I tell an anecdote?

Q: By all means.

LATHRAM: When I was in the AID mission early on, Charlie Mann for some reason was called to Washington for consultation, and I was Acting Director. We had a problem then, a physical problem in Saigon with the AID mission. We were scattered in many buildings. There came an opportunity to have one office building in which we'd put all the AID personnel. Whatever happened to that, I don't know, because I went on to other things later. But anyway, there was a contractor willing to build a building if we would provide the money to be subtracted by rentals. Then after we left he would become the owner. We could get our building, and get organized, and get together. But we needed a recommendation to Washington. Washington had to approve it, of course. We needed a recommendation from the Ambassador. Normally Bill Porter, who was Deputy Ambassador, would have been the man we would go to. But he was out of town. I felt it was urgent, so I asked Ambassador Lodge for an appointment, and he said yes. I took a briefing team, you know in Vietnam everybody liked a dog and pony show with charts and graphs. So I took a team and explained the problem to the Ambassador. When we finished the Ambassador said, "I'll think it over." I said, "Fine, Mr. Ambassador, I would like to send a telegram this afternoon if it's at all possible." As I headed the crew out the door, the Ambassador said, "Wade, can you wait a minute?" So I said, "Certainly," I closed the door and turned around and the Ambassador was standing behind his desk, fists down, his face red, and he said, "Wade, why do you bring problems like this to me? You know I don't like to make decisions." I said to myself, "my, my, my." This man aspires to be president of the United States? Well, he wasn't quite reflecting his total attitude because I had seen him make decisions but generally when there was full support already existing.

Q: Not the doubtful cases.

LATHRAM: So I went back to the office and I thought about it, and sent the telegram anyway. I said in the telegram, as I recall it, "The Ambassador does not disagree." And I let it go at that.

Q: Did he call you in? Did he disagree with your telegram?

LATHRAM: No, I never heard another word about it. A little bit later on I was at a reception one night...this was in '66 when we were still having receptions, when the war started getting a little hotter there were no longer any receptions. This one was a military reception by the Vietnamese government, lots of U.S. military, and lots of U.S. civilians there. Later it became a little dangerous. There was quite a bit of bombing in Saigon, and every night, of course, mortaring. Anyway, one reception I went to, I happened to overhear two American generals, one talking to the other one saying, "Aren't we fortunate that we have an Ambassador for whom the military can do no wrong."

Well, as a matter of fact, in his book General Westmoreland does point out that there were a couple of issues, and a couple fairly important issues, where he and Ambassador Lodge disagreed, and he was finally able to persuade Ambassador Lodge to his point of view. So maybe I'm not being entirely fair.

Q: We've just had a bit of an interruption. We're starting again. Wade, go ahead.

LATHRAM: To return to the real problem for the Americans, civilian and military, it then, as it always was later, when should the Americans do the job for the Vietnamese? And when should we expect the Vietnamese to do the job? We would advise them, provide the money and material, help them as much as we could. In the pacification program we always felt that there was only one way that the Vietnamese villages all over the country, hundreds and hundreds of villages, could be protected, could be secure, only one way in which the peasants could live a peaceful life, and that was if the Vietnamese did it themselves. We could not put Americans in every village, in the first place, and again we couldn't distinguish between a Viet Cong and a non-Viet Cong in a village. They both wore black pajamas. Only the villager could tell who was a Viet Cong.

Q: In fact, could they tell? Or were some of the Viet Cong under such deep cover that...

LATHRAM: Oh, it's possible -- the latter is possible -- but after all when you've lived in a village for four generations you've got a pretty good idea of whose who.

Q: They would be a stranger, they would not be villagers.

LATHRAM: Not unless they had been converted. And if they had been converted, you would know that too. No, only the villagers could tell which in the villages were Viet Cong and which were not. But the villagers wouldn't tell the government, because armed Viet Cong would come in at night, and isolate a family, and tell the parents, "We're going to take your son tonight. And if you don't cooperate in the future, we'll kill him." They'd tell the son, "You become a good Viet Cong, and we protect your parents and help them. And if you don't, we'll hurt them." This was one of the recruiting techniques for getting a village, and the young fellows from the village to become Viet Cong. And the parents feared for their kids.

Q: Doesn't this raise a question of whether even the Vietnamese themselves could never win that way because of this kind of pressure? Even if you left it all to them to do.

LATHRAM: Well, take it the other way. I'm not sure I can answer that question. They would have to want independence, and believe the government wanted independence for them, strong enough to resist as eventually they did in South Korea. If they really were convinced by the Viet Cong that their future would be more secure, safer, and more prosperous with the Viet Cong, the Communist regime, that's the way they'd go. They'd have to be convinced that the Viet Cong government was better. The only thing I can tell you though as a measure is that long after I was there it was still true, that anytime a village was evacuated, a valley was evacuated, for whatever reason, whether they were chased down by the North Vietnamese army, or they were chased out by the Viet Cong, or they were chased out by the Americans, or the ARVN, or whether they could no longer stand the shelling and the fighting, whenever the villager left his village he went to the government camp as a refugee. There were no refugee camps by the Viet Cong, or the North Vietnamese. There were only refugee camps by the Vietnamese government with American support. And for a refugee camp we provided reenforcing bars, ten sheets of corrugated roofing, ten sacks of rice, two sacks of cement, to each family. They could build their own hut then in a refugee camp -- cut down some poles, make a structure, put a roof on it, pour concrete slabs for a floor, have rice, and start over again. At any point throughout the countryside we might have as many as several hundred thousand refugees in camps. The villagers always found succor when they went to the government. They weren't too sure about the other side.

Now, let's get back to organization structure. I arrived there in June of '66. By I'd say, September-October things had heated up in terms of the argument of how we should be organized on the pacification side. Secretary McNamara and the White House were pushing very hard on the mission. The first step that was taken was to designate Deputy Ambassador Porter as the man in charge of the pacification effort. He was supposed to coordinate and pull together these disparate civilian agencies. Let's back up for just a second. I've explained the AID structure.

The USIA presence in Saigon was through JUSPAO, a Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office. There was an early agreement that there was no point in having several spokesmen on the U.S. side. So it was agreed that all public pronouncements and news reporter briefings would be by JUSPAO, the Joint Public Affairs Office, to which military personnel were assigned. All public statements that involved the military, or military action, were cleared by the military, but there was a daily briefing by the head of JUSPAO of all U.S. and foreign reporters. "The 5:00 follies" they called them, and Barry Zorthian was the head of JUSPAO as long as I was there. He turned out to be a pretty good friend in the long run, although he and I fought a lot. JUSPAO, for USIA, had public affairs officers in each province who were also responsible for "psychological warfare" or PsyWar. This consisted mainly of preparing leaflet drops to persuade Viet Cong to defect.

Defense Secretary McNamara visited and asked for a briefing on the pacification effort. The pacification effort involved the activities that I've mentioned earlier. It also included the Central Intelligence Agency, not only gathering intelligence but helping the Vietnamese identify the Viet Cong in the villages and helping to support the training program of the Revolutionary Development Support Cadre. Ambassador Porter was coordinating all these programs. But based on Secretary McNamara's report of his briefing, Washington still wasn't convinced that pacification was improving.

So in November 1966 a major effort to reorganize was done under Ambassador Porter. He selected two young Foreign Service officers, Frank Wisner and Paul Hare who were very, very good and have since gone on to become Ambassadors in their own right. They came up with an idea of how to amalgamate these various organizations, and proposed an organization called Office of Civil Operations, OCO, in which all activities of a civilian nature outside of Saigon itself, would be organized in one organization structure.

Personnel and funds from State, CIA, AID, USIA, were all to be put into the organization if the activity was outside of Saigon. And the same thing would be true at each province, and district level. I was asked to head OCO, reporting to Deputy Ambassador Porter. This was an unusual public administration experiment, and it worked from a management viewpoint of directing American efforts.

Q: We've just finished side 1, and this is side 2 of the oral history with Wade Lathram, and Wade you have just become the head of OCO.

LATHRAM: I think I was just mentioning that one of the advisors in a province in I Corps wrote a song book -- songs about OCO. Frankly, we were rather proud of our structure.

I'd like to back up for just a second. I had many arguments with the heads of these various organizations, JUSPAO, AID, CIA, because what we were doing in OCO and later in CORDS was taking their people, and their money, and running an organization over which we had the control, while they had the backstop responsibility. So, of course, there were lots of arguments. At one point Don MacDonald, who was Director of the AID mission, in a moment of exasperation, said to me, "I'm spending 20 million dollars a year on Air America and I have to get your permission to fly." Yes, there was that.

Also, some of us had a lot of questions that we just really couldn't answer. Years later, Barry Zorthian (JUSPAO Director during my tour), wrote a letter to me. In it he says, "Our task was to take the assignment we'd been given as Foreign Service officers and convert a mandarin, intrigue filled society, into a functioning, responsive government, pushing economic and political development for a largely rural population that was honeycombed with a very effective anti-government guerrilla force...All of us from that period have gone our separate ways, keeping within us the unforgettable memories of the days we served together. Enjoy them Mary and Wade for another 50 years. And dust off so very often for private remembrance those days in Vietnam when we paid our dues in what turned out to be an impossible task."

For almost 20 years I had trouble talking about Vietnam to anybody that hadn't been there at the same time I was. I just couldn't talk about it. We were all working 14 to 16 hour days, 6 and 7 days a week -- both in Saigon and the provinces. And these weren't just another day at the office. We were civilians, but we were in a war. No place was safe. Many were killed, shot, mined, mortared. We had to be careful. We weren't like the front-line U.S. troops, but life was stressful. As Barry says, we bottled up remembrances within ourselves about a period in which we paid our dues trying to do an impossible task. OCO was one of those tasks, and we tried our best during that period that OCO was in existence to make it function, and I think we did a very good job. We had a headquarters staff put together in the structure that had been devised by Frank Wisner and Paul Hare, and approved by Ambassador Porter. I was head of the organization, reported to Bill Porter, and we worked alongside the American military structure.

This kept on from November 23rd 1966 when it was announced by the Ambassador, until almost summer of the following year, until May of 1967. However, there was considerable unhappiness still in the defense establishment, and in the White House, with what we were doing in OCO because they could see that security was not improving for the villages, that the Viet Cong were still active all over the country, in addition to the North Vietnamese forces, the main force war was being fought by American troops, as well as the Vietnamese troops. Pacification was not working. In short, I have to say, the country was not being pacified. Yes, that was true. The villages and hamlets were involved in the big war where thousands of people were killed, but many Americans were killed in trying to go among the villages. You never knew when booby traps were going to be set along the dike that you were walking on, and we had incidents of frustrated American troops shooting at water buffalo of the villagers. They couldn't tell who was a Viet Cong, and who wasn't. A friendly villager might have just planted a "bouncing Betty" mine to blow off a soldier's legs. The U.S. military talked about "winning the hearts and minds" of the people, but the U.S. soldier was there for a year, the villager for a lifetime. Yes, pacification was not working.

Q: Let me interject a question here. To what extent were the projects that you would build under the pacification program, to what extent did they survive into the later peacetime era? Or were they almost always destroyed by the Viet Cong, bridges and things?

LATHRAM: We rarely built anything. We advised the Vietnamese on how to build. Yes, they were destroyed if they were bridges and things like that. We helped village chiefs, for example. We showed them how to organize for an election. In the old days they didn't need to be shown. Each village has its own council, which was an organization developed by the village to run the village, but they lost much of the political will to organize themselves in the turmoil and chaos. We were advising them through our people in their local villages on how to organize for political strength. We were teaching them how to organize for economic development. We were providing through our agriculture people better seed, better techniques, etc. But yes, the whole purpose of the Viet Cong was to disrupt anything that the Vietnamese government was doing to help the people. And our job was to help the Vietnamese officials help the people. Sometimes we helped the people directly, but it was still advisory. That was one of the problems, of course. That was the name of the game, it always has been the name of the game that you can't do things for people, they have to do it for themselves if they're going to be permanent. But, as I said, General Westmoreland, the Pentagon and McNamara, the White House, felt that somehow, the American civilian pacification program was failing (even though village security was by Vietnamese forces being advised by U.S. military).

A conference was planned for March in Guam for the President and his staff -- the U.S. President Lyndon Johnson -- to review the situation. What was happening in Vietnam? Actually, as Westmoreland points out in his book, one of the main purposes of the conference was to review the pacification program, and its organization and structure because McNamara for some time had been proposing that the American military take over the pacification program. What that was supposed to mean was simply that the military could do a better job than the civilians had been doing on pacification, without recognizing that the problem with the pacification program was lack of security. That it wasn't a job that the Americans could do for the Vietnamese.

Anyway, I went to the Guam conference.

Q: This is '67.

LATHRAM: This was '67, March of '67. The President was there, and outside the hearing of the President, we had a meeting. Secretary McNamara, Ambassador Lodge, General Westmoreland, Bob Komer representing the White House, General Knowlton and others, including staff were there. Bob Komer, incidentally, had initially come out of CIA but was the right-hand man in the White House for Lyndon Johnson on the pacification program in Vietnam. Among other developments, he was keeping up on such things as the terrorism and atrocities that the Viet Cong were engaged in. For example, it was nothing to see a busload of children destroyed by a Viet Cong rocket, that sort of thing. Any effort to persuade the villagers that they were going to have to go with the Viet Cong was legitimate for them.

Secretary McNamara led the session, and we discussed the organization of the pacification effort.

I had come prepared, by the way, to brief Secretary McNamara on what OCO was doing with the usual graphs and charts. I told him when he got off the plane that I was prepared to give a briefing on the subject and he said he'd like to have it. After the conference, he took me aside and apologized because he had never had time to go over the briefing that I had prepared for him. Of course, I wasn't fooled. That wasn't what he wanted. He wanted to change the organization; he didn't want to be convinced that OCO was a good organization.

But to return to the pre-Presidential meeting, I was cautioned by Lodge and Komer not to upset the apple cart by arguing against any change in the structure. However, as a matter of fact, in the discussion, I did speak my piece.

Q: Was Bill Porter there too?

LATHRAM: No, Bill Porter was not there at the Guam session. He was left in charge of the mission so Ambassador Lodge could go. When the President said he was ready to receive us, we joined him. Secretary McNamara explained the problem of organization for pacification. (Actually I'd seen Secretary McNamara and President Johnson off in the corridor discussing something before then.) The President turned to me, and said, "Do you have any comment?" At that point I realized that there wasn't any purpose in fighting and arguing about a made decision, so I said, "No, I have nothing further to say." So then he turned to the rest of the group, and said, "I've got to make a decision, and I haven't made it yet. I'll let you know." Well, I was pretty sure that the decision was already made, but he wasn't ready to announce it. As a matter of fact, it turned out that he wanted to announce it with the change in ambassadors when he was ready to send Ellsworth Bunker out to replace Lodge. So the decision to put the civilian pacification effort in MACV was announced at that time.

On the plane on the way back to Saigon from Guam, General Westmoreland came and sat down with me, and we talked a little bit. And then he said, "If the President decides to give me the job of pacification, will you take it on on my staff? If you will, I'll give you a general as your deputy."

I have to digress for just a second. Sometime before that he had been concerned about how to organize the military advisory effort for pacification, and assigned General Knowlton to work on the subject. General Knowlton set up the Revolutionary Development Support Command in MACV for that purpose. MACV was the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam. All through the war, even when we had 500,000 combat troops, they were still organized under an "Assistance" Command, Vietnam. General Knowlton had the job of organizing and directing the Regional Forces and Popular Forces advisors, in Revolutionary Development Support. Westmoreland proposed that we combine OCO and the organization for which General Knowlton was responsible into one of the staff organizations of MACV, with me as its chief, and Knowlton as my deputy. He asked if I would resign from the Foreign Service, or would I stay and do that? I said I was ordered to Vietnam in the first place, I didn't come in the Service to duck responsibility, and yes, I would if that was the President's decision. I would take it over.

Q: It could have been an out of Service assignment. You would have always been able to get back into the Service when it was over, wouldn't you?

LATHRAM: No, it had to be a Foreign Service assignment, on detail. The issue was whether to leave Vietnam. I would have had to resign from the Service to do that. I was to continue to be a Foreign Service officer working in MACV, and that's the way it turned out. One of my sons asked me, "Just exactly what was your title, Dad?" I said, "Do you want my full title? It was Assistant Chief of Staff for Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support of the Military Assistance Command Vietnam."

What was involved was a typical staff and line military organization. The CORDS staff (Civil Operation Revolutionary Development Support), along with G-1, G-2, G-3, and G-4 staffs under the chief of staff of MACV, who reported then to the Deputy Commander, and the Commander MACV, General Westmoreland. While I was there General Abrams came as deputy Commander, MACV, and he eventually took over from Westmoreland.

Then at the Corps level, I, II, III, and IV Corps, there would be a CORDS Assistant Chief of Staff under the U.S. military Corps commander, and each province would be in charge of an American senior advisor. There was a complete amalgamation of four U.S. military and four civilian organizations. It would have been very difficult to organize that if OCO had not been established in the first place, because we had already amalgamated, outside of Saigon, all the civilian organizations. And General Knowlton had amalgamated the military advisory forces at the province and district levels.

Q: Did all of the OCO components flow into this new organization?

LATHRAM: Yes. Now, at the announcement of this new setup, Bob Komer came out from Washington because, as he told me, "President Johnson said, okay you've been advising me on pacification, now you get out there and do it." As you'll note from the Westmoreland memoirs, he'd already acquired the nickname of "blowtorch". He insisted on being a deputy to Westmoreland with the rank of ambassador. At first he wanted to have a general officer rank -- four stars. Well, they wouldn't give that to him because he wasn't in the military, so he designed his own logo with the help of the Chief of Staff, of four stars in a circle. But he carried the rank of Ambassador as Deputy Commander, MACV for CORDS. I was assistant chief of staff for CORDS under the chief of staff with all the Saigon organization under me. Actually, it was much more an operational organization than a staff organization, and at one point 50% of all the communication, all the mail, all the paperwork of MACV headquarters was CORDS because we had a direct relation to the Corps and province structures, which included the refugee, defector, development, public safety, psychological and Regional and Popular Force advisory programs. And, of course, CORDS had a separate Air America program for passengers and freight. The total staff of CORDS at the time I left was roughly 2400 American civilians, 1000 U.S. military, and 4000 third country nationals -- Vietnamese, Philippines, and Koreans.

After CORDS was formed Komer sponsored the development of the Hamlet Evaluation System. This was computerization of every village and hamlet in Vietnam to show whether or not it was secure, or insecure, or partly secure, what its status was. The HES staff of CORDS received a weekly report from all the district advisors as to the status of each village and hamlet. They got their information by visiting the villages and hamlets, or from Vietnamese officers, usually the latter. A lot of faith was put in that hamlet evaluation system. But, of course, as with any system of this character, the information is only as good as the basic data that's given to be put in the system. I went out to test it to a couple of places. I remember when I went to one CORDS district adviser, and I said, "Let's take a jeep and drive out to this hamlet." "No, not me." I said, "But you reported that hamlet green." He said, "That's what the ARVN commander told me. He said it was secure. But as far as I'm concerned it's not, I'm not going to drive out there." I said, "How do you know it's not secure?" He said, "The hamlet chief isn't there. He certainly doesn't sleep there." This was one of our major criteria...any village or hamlet where the chief, and they were elected by the villagers, didn't sleep there at night, was not secure. But, what was reported in the Hamlet Evaluation System was the information given to the district advisor to report to Saigon, and that's what he reported.

Q: I suppose they were under pressure to pretend that things were going well, generally speaking.

LATHRAM: We had great big maps, color maps of all the villages and hamlets, and lots and lots of green, but all that green was misleading.

Q: This was Komer's idea?

LATHRAM: I don't know whose idea it was. Komer sponsored its use, but certainly not its inaccuracy. But it was endorsed from the White House on down as a system for trying to determine...everybody was grasping for some measure, and this would be a measure of how pacification was succeeding, or not succeeding. And it was that basis that General Westmoreland had to use when he appeared before the joint session of Congress in December of 1967, to say there was light at the end of the tunnel. Of course, a month later was the Tet campaign.

At any rate, back to one of the major problems I had was Bob Komer's pride in being a blowtorch. He was a brilliant man, terrific brain, but a huge ego, and his idea of effective management was to demand, scream, and yell at the nearest subordinate. He figured the only way to get action was to burn the Americans, and tremendous pressure was put on the Americans any place where there wasn't sufficient progress (and that was everywhere). What we were supposed to achieve by putting pressure on the Americans I was never quite clear, and neither were they. But we were always constantly being chewed out by Komer. I felt one of my jobs was to try to be a buffer between him and my staff. I didn't always succeed, but it was still stressful.

Tet was a real, real surprise. For the month of January there was a lot of euphoria, a lot of good feeling among the Vietnamese leadership, and among the headquarters of MACV, which many of us felt in the CORDS program was not fully justified. There were intelligence reports coming in through the Vietnamese to the effect that something was stirring. Something was going to happen. But these reports were few and not verified. Tet was coming along, and historically all firing stopped, all fighting stopped at this Chinese/Vietnamese New Year. It was a gentlemen's agreement that nobody attack anybody during this religious celebration.

Q: Peace of God.

LATHRAM: Yes, right. But there were indications that something might happen. And so many of our province senior advisors were concerned.

Oh, I want to back up on this, our province senior advisors. There were 44 provinces, and at the time General Westmoreland was talking to me on the way back from Guam about possible organization, he said, "I've General Knowlton and he would be your Deputy." General Westmoreland had talked to him about whether or not he would be willing to be my deputy. Well, he hadn't known me but he said yes, of course, and we became very close, and very good friends. Incidentally, he went on to become Commandant at West Point, and then retired as Commandant of our U.S. forces in Europe.

General Westmoreland went on to say that, of course, the Corps Commanders would select the province senior adviser, either military or OCO civilian. He would expect 3 or 4 to be civilians. In fact, most of the selected seniors were civilians. But importantly, all the province U.S. military and civilians worked well together.

Back to Tet, 1968. There had been a couple of attacks on the 29th of January 1968, but nothing like the real thing! I was living in an apartment in town. I'd declined to have the house that was designated for the deputy director of the AID mission because we had four men living in it, and I didn't see any point in taking over that house. So I had an apartment, and across the street from the apartment building was the residence of the AID director, Donald McDonald, and next to me was the residence of the administrative officer, and his Deputy Director of the AID mission. At any rate, I was on top of the roof with everybody else in the apartment building watching the city on January 30th at midnight when the fireworks went off. And if you've never seen a Tet celebration, it's incredible. At the stroke of midnight, fireworks went off all over town. It seemed as though all of Saigon lifted a foot in the air. We enjoyed the celebration, went down and went to bed. And along about 2:30 I guess it was, I heard firing, and explosions. Fortunately I had all kinds of communication gear in my apartment and they started sounding off. My first thought, I don't know why, I thought that darn Nguyen Cao Ky, the vice president, was trying to stage a military coup and take over the government. Why that thought would enter my mind, I don't know. Very shortly came the news that the Palace was under attack and so was the Embassy. This was the night that they blew in the Embassy doors, and the Marines defended it very successfully. About 4:00 a.m. I called my good friend Colonel Jacobson, Special Assistant to the Ambassador, who was living in a house on the Embassy compound, and he said, "You wouldn't believe I'm a retired Army colonel, and I don't have a weapon in sight." Well, eventually a couple of the Marines ran across the yard, one of them threw him a .45 -- he was on the second floor -- and he got the .45 just as a Viet Cong was coming up the stairs, and he killed him. It was a rough night. At the same time the back door of McDonald's house was blown in, and there was firing all around my apartment.

That was the night that 38 of the 44 province capitals were attacked. Believe it or not, throughout the entire country it was a coordinated attack, with massive weaponry. No wonder the Vietnamese military intelligence was getting rumors that something was going to happen. Good Lord, imagine that! The Viet Cong placement of ammo, and weaponry in those 38 capitals sufficient to mount an integrated attack was quite an achievement.

Q: Well, an amazing thing is that the intelligence wouldn't have known about it.

LATHRAM: That's right. We could not understand the euphoria, and of course, our budget didn't call for that kind of support for the pacification program. Actually, we ended up supporting nearly a million refugees. Incidentally, the third day General Westmoreland called me on the phone and said, "Don't you need some air support, some help?" I said, "No, frankly General we have stockpiled rice, cement, roofing, and I have a million piasters in the hands of every province senior advisor to help with any such emergency as this. No, we're in pretty good shape."

Q: How much money in dollars?

LATHRAM: Something like $50,000. I don't remember the exchange rate right now. Lou Wisner, as head of the refugees, was disaster coordinator, and had done a terrific job in anticipating what emergency requirements might be, and all over the country had stockpiled both money, and resources. Of course, that night things were pretty tight around my apartment. I was not attacked, but the Vietnamese had found a claymore mine stuck on the side of my apartment building just shortly before Christmas. And right at Christmas time, as one of the servants was going home, she noticed a Christmas package that apparently had bounced off a bicycle, but actually was leaning against the apartment building. So she called the attention of the police outpost that was right across the street to it; they called the bomb squad, and sure enough it was explosives. My apartment building was surrounded by barbed wire.

Back to Tet evening, as I've said, the AID director's house was attacked. He called me frantically on the telephone about 4:00 in the morning. I was on the radio and the telephone all night long with my staff, and he said, "What do I do now? I want to come over to your place." I said, "Why?" And he said, "They've just blown in the back door with a rocket. I'm afraid they're going to attack." He was there by himself, and I said, "No, don't come over here Don because you would have to negotiate barb wire, and there's a police post in front. You might get shot, they don't know who you are. Call Bill Wild, right across the street from you, and run over there and get with them. They're armed, there's four or five men in the house." So that's what he did. And, of course, my driver didn't show up for a month. He was Vietnamese.

Two days later I decided to drive out to my office in MACV headquarters at Ton Son Nhut airport. But I called my Exec, Colonel Fitzpatrick to tell him I was on the way. Of course I had the windows closed, in those days we were supposed to keep the windows up and the air conditioning on because a favorite pastime was a motor bike or bicycle with two guys, one riding behind with grenades, he'd throw them through open windows. So we had to keep our windows closed and couldn't hear noise. About half way there the radio came on frantically, it was Fitzpatrick, and he said, "Where are you?" And I told him I was on the main highway, he said, "You're driving right in the middle of a firefight. Between you and MACV there's the ARVN on one side, and North Vietnamese on the other side. There's a firefight across the highway." So I turned around and went back.

The next day General Westmoreland sent two jeep loads of GIs armed to pick me up, and take me out there. Anyway that's the way I got out to MACV, and my office. I spent the month of February sleeping on a cot in my office, always fully dressed, always fully armed, and every time there was an attack getting outside to the bunker. We were all doing that, we all lived on "C" rations, and all the general officers were there. I was technically a major general at that point because that was the rank of an "Assistant Chief of Staff".

My wife and I had agreed that February 20th we would celebrate our 25th wedding anniversary in Hawaii. On the 20th of February I was at my desk dictating a tape to my wife, with my helmet, my AK-40 and my F-16 on my side. I was in fatigues, ready to hit the bunker outside if a mortar attack came. Sure enough, an attack came, and rocket shrapnel was sprayed across my ceiling and I hit the bunker outside. None of us were injured. Strangely enough General Knowlton and I counted 120 holes surrounding MACV headquarters the next morning. Not one of them hit the building. Crazy!

Of course, the American personnel, civilian and military in the provinces had a much more difficult time. Many were shot and several, especially in Hue, were captured and became POWs. I was proud of the many heroic actions performed by CORDS staff officers.

One other point I should make on CORDS organization structure. The military tour was one year, and the military assigned to CORDS were anxious to get out. We had few re-ups or returns for a second tour.

Q: Was this because they thought it wasn't useful to their career record?

LATHRAM: That's right.

Q: They wanted to be combat.

LATHRAM: That's right. If they're going to be in Vietnam, they wanted credit for being in Vietnam, and here they were in CORDS in a staff organization so one year was enough. I had to go back to Washington on consultation, and I asked my staff, "What can I do?" The Chief of Evaluation Section was a colonel. The deputy director of the program staff was a Colonel. They both said, "Try to get the military in Washington, the Pentagon, to agree that service in CORDS is command experience."

So when I was back there in Washington, I had consultations at the Executive Office building, of course, but I also made it a point to go over to the Pentagon, and I saw General Johnson who was then Chief of Staff of the Army. He said, "What can I do to help you?" I said, "There's one thing you can do. If there's any way possible to decree that military personnel assigned to CORDS will have it shown on their efficiency reports as 'command experience' it would help us." After all I said, they are exercising initiative, making decisions, commanding actions. He called in his G-1, and that order was issued. That was appreciated and the second tour request rate went up from zilch to nearly 100% overnight. The military assigned to CORDS loved the work they were doing, but it was not furthering their careers. But getting credit for command experience won. That made it possible for us to keep the best military on the job, and that was an achievement. You talk about management, this is the kind of thing you have to do.

Q: And they were checking off the right boxes.

LATHRAM: On their efficiency reports, yes. We were organized the best we could possibly be organized to do the advisory job that had to be done, but there was no way the Americans could pacify the country for the Vietnamese. That was our basic problem, and it continued to be the problem.

Q: We are just about at the end of this side. Are you going to continue on with other matters?

LATHRAM: I think this is probably enough, don't you?

Q: Well, it makes a nice unit. So you left when?

LATHRAM: To finish it up, I left the first of April of 1968. I was succeeded as Assistant Chief of Staff for CORDS by Bill Colby. He was called out by Komer to succeed me, and fortunately I had written to Bill that it would be nice if he could come. Later he moved up to replace Komer when the latter was made Ambassador to Turkey. I don't remember when Colby left to return to Washington.

Q: Later head of CIA.

LATHRAM: ...later head of CIA. Before he came to Vietnam he had unfortunately broken his ankle skiing on the canal in Washington, so he was delayed. But he was able to come out a month early, and we mutually agreed that rather than sit at my desk and break in by sitting alongside me for a month, he should take the opportunity to visit each province, meet and come to know the CORDS staff and Vietnam first hand. Thus ended my role in Vietnam.

DAVID RYBAK
Refugee Officer, USAID
Saigon (1966-1968)

Mr. Rybak was born and raised in New York and educated at LeMoyne College. He joined the Peace Corps in 1963 and was assigned to El Salvador. In 1966 he joined AID in Vietnam, serving first in Public Administration and subsequently in the Refugee Program. He returned to Washington in 1973 working in the Disaster Relief Office of AID, later being transferred to Jamaica. Mr. Rybak had a number of senior level assignments in AID headquarters in Washington, including assisting in the creation of the Center for Trade and Investment. Mr. Rybak was interviewed by Frank Pavich in 1998.

RYBAK: I happened to look in the local Syracuse newspaper and saw an AID advertisement recruiting people for Vietnam and I responded to that advertisement. I was invited to Washington and interviewed by a battery of people. I was accepted for AID's program in South Vietnam.

Q: What were they looking for in the interview?

RYBAK: AID was looking for people who had development experience or had educational background in International Relations or Community Development. I feel the two years in the Peace Corps qualified me for the job in Vietnam.

Q: How did AID prepare you for your job in Vietnam?

RYBAK: We had a three month preparatory training which included everything from living in the country to security measures. It didn't seem that we concentrated a lot on development. They were more concerned about security issues which were necessary because of the war in Vietnam. Whatever we received in development training was basically lectures from people who had experiences with development in Third World countries.

Q: Were you exposed to any new development theory at this time?

RYBAK: At that time because Vietnam was building up its programs and AID was building its mission in Vietnam, AID was anxious to get anybody that had any experience in working overseas particularly in international development. That is why the Peace Corps volunteers were picked up quickly by AID. Ex-Volunteers had toughed it out in Third World countries and most Volunteers were interested in working and traveling abroad. Also, ex-Peace Corps Volunteers were more likely to adjust quickly to the conditions in South Vietnam even with an on-going war.

Q: When did you actually arrive in Vietnam?

RYBAK: I arrived in Vietnam in June 1966.

Q: What were your major duties in Vietnam?

RYBAK: Before I left Washington I knew I was going to be working somewhere in the refugee program. Thousands of displaced persons had been created as a result of the bombing in the countryside villages and wartime conditions. I ended up being assigned to refugee headquarters in Saigon. I was working with the Vietnamese people who were displaced and migrated into the city but were living on the streets of Saigon.

Q: How was the program structured? Did you have a particular series of tasks that you had to perform?

RYBAK: It wasn't very structured at all. It was more or less finding out what needed to be done, talking to your supervisors about doing something about it. Getting out and looking at the situation, coming back with recommendations and then trying to get some real help to those people. The war did not make it easy to do too much advance planning since one never knew when the next wave of migrations to the urban areas would occur.

Q: Were there sufficient resources for the work that had to be done?

RYBAK: That was one of the things that we never hungered for in Vietnam. There were so many resources available to get community development projects going in Saigon. There was one particular area-District 8-that was a haven for refugee resettlement. AID was instrumental in getting a huge development project going to house the refugees...much better housing than they had on the streets of Saigon and Cholon.

Q: Were you exclusively working on refugees? Did you have any other assignment?

RYBAK: Basically it was with the refugee population displaced by the war. But you couldn't exclude the rest of the poor either. And that was just the first year or so because I did make some changes while I was there in terms of getting an assignment where I could focus on the poor. And I found that it wasn't through the refugee program. I transferred from the AID Refugee Program to the Office of Public Administration which at that time (1963-1966) had a huge number of AID supported programs and projects. I was assigned to the Municipal Government area and thereby started working with Vietnamese urban officers on projects to assist the poorer segments of Saigon society. These projects involved the local district officials and families living in those districts. We were building a true self-help development program.

Q: What do you feel your major successes were in working with the refugees?

RYBAK: I think the major success in working with the refugees was giving them hope there was a better life than what they had at the time. We were there to help. We were there to make their conditions better and it was demonstrated to them with new development projects being developed such as potable drinking water, housing development, and improved sanitation.

Q: What were the major problems in implementation?

RYBAK: Major problems in implementation included (1) getting people to participate in the program because sometimes they would not show up for the projects and (2) bureaucracy from headquarters by setting other priorities and giving them precedence over what you were working on. However, things pretty much came together and we had some very viable projects.

Q: And after refugees, what was your...?

RYBAK: As I mentioned, I switched out of refugees and into a program where they could focus on these displaced people because refugees was not a term that the Vietnamese government officials recognized. These were truly displaced people; the Government refused to recognize them as refugees. As a result, many of these people were not getting the attention they should have received simply because of an interpretation by the Vietnamese government that these people wandering from villages outside Saigon and fleeing to the city for protection were not considered refugees. In addition to migrants from the south moving to Saigon, the metropolitan area absorbed large numbers of refugees from the north. At least 100,000 North Vietnamese became part of the exodus to Saigon. The real term for these migrant Vietnamese was "war victims" since they fled their towns and villages because of terrorism or the dangers of war.

I went into public administration and I worked with a gentleman who was working in municipal development in Saigon. I assisted him in developing activities and projects we could feasibly support through the public administration office rather than the refugee office of AID.

Q: How long did you continue in that line?

RYBAK: I continued in that particular job for about three years. One of the noteworthy things that I remember is going into some of the urban poor areas, if you will, the ghetto areas, and listening to the people. I think that was one of the more important things that we had to do was find out the problems. The way to find out what those problems were was to go to the phuong chief. Phuongs comprise districts and there were five to six divisions within each district. We went to the local officials, to the people themselves. We looked to see where the water levels during the flooding had made marks on the walls of the dwellings. What did they want? They wanted closer sources of drinking water. They wanted better sewage. Their walkways would flood and the water would come in their houses during the rainy season. Therefore, they wanted better drainage. These were the things upon which we focused and we developed a neat little program which was truly self-help like we learned to do in the Peace Corps. The important thing was to get something started and not just talk about it. Talk must be translated into action.

Q: What were some of the political imperatives that affected your work and program?

RYBAK: In that particular program?

Q: Well, in any of your experience up to now in Vietnam.

RYBAK: The fact was if you arranged for the cement or whatever else might be needed to do the project some of it was bound to disappear. And it would disappear into the hands of the officials. You accepted it on the basis there was still enough product left to do the project. You knew they were going to skim off a few bags of cement or some rebar or whatever. Taking that into account, there was always enough product for the project. In other words, a few bags of cement or a couple rebar missing would not prevent the projects from going forward.

Q: Did you have any other activities going in Vietnam?

RYBAK: Because I stayed in municipal administration three years, I then moved on to a job at CORDS (Civil Operations Revolutionary Development Support organization). I was working in the social welfare section and particularly in child adoption. I also worked with private voluntary organizations in Vietnam. What we were trying to do was coordinate their programs and focus their assistance so that it wasn't so much a scattered shotgun approach. Actual direction and control of CORDS was directed by Robert Komer, a rather flamboyant bureaucrat who made public statements in South Vietnam by his outlandish uniforms.

Q: Anything else interesting about your experience in Vietnam that you'd like to talk about?

RYBAK: Vietnam was really a special situation because you had so many resources, you had so many people, you had so much cement-so much of everything that you could literally try and do anything you wouldn't have the opportunity to do in other countries. It was a testing ground almost, because there was so much money and physical resources available. You could literally do almost anything you wanted to do that was a decent idea. Quite a different approach than the philosophy behind the Peace Corps in which little was provided but much accomplished by using innovation and ingenuity.

Q: What about the AID bureaucracy? How did it function?

RYBAK: The AID bureaucracy in Vietnam was like the bureaucracy in Washington. The structure was set up very similar. You had your supervisors and you had to report through them and to them. Sometimes they listened to you, sometimes they didn't. But it was just like any other bureaucracy, you lived with it. And you found and learned ways to get around the bureaucracy. But you had to have the experience in dealing with some of these people to do that.

CHARLES H. TWINING
Area Development Officer, USAID
Dalat (1966-1968)

Charles H. Twining was born in Maryland in 1940. He received his BA from the University of Virginia in 1962 and an MA from the School for Advanced International Studies in 1964. After entering the Foreign Service in 1964 his assignments included Tananarive, Dalat, Abidjan, Bangkok, Cotonou, Douala, Ouagadougou, and Honolulu with ambassadorships to Cambodia and Cameroon. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Ambassador Charles H. Twining in 2004.

Q: What sort of training were you getting?

TWINING: The U.S. build-up in Vietnam – both civilian and military – was well underway during the four weeks I spent in training at the Foreign Service Institute in October – November 1966. This was not the Vietnam Training Center, which supported the more intensive, longer term training. This was purely FSI, where I was in a group of 20 or so State and AID people, many in the same “less than voluntary” category as myself. We were the only group going through this “fast track” training at the time.

The State training was an abbreviated area studies program focused solely on Vietnam, its history, culture, and present situation. Most notable among the speakers was the legendary, and somber, Bernard Fall who, having written extensively about the difficult, pre-1954 French involvement there, left us with a sense of déjà vu. Another speaker, a longtime State Department Asia hand, was also hardly encouraging. I recall him saying in particular, that “If you think the Vietnamese like us, you have another thing coming. They hate us, and you are going to find that out as soon as you get there, so remember that.” Not terribly encouraging, it was still preferable to receive these kinds of doses of reality than to see 1966 Vietnam through rose-tinted glasses. USIA officer Frank Scotten, known to have done a good job of reaching out to Vietnamese during his own assignment to that country, also came to our class to give his perspective that we were going into work where results were possible. We were encouraged at FSI to do considerable reading about insurgency, especially the recent one in Malaysia as presented by Sir Robert Thompson, and I benefited greatly from that opportunity to read. The AID training consisted of lectures regarding AID operations and procedures, particularly as tailored to Vietnam, but also about development in Asia. Note that I had specifically requested Vietnamese language training prior to leaving for Vietnam but was told there was no time. Through language, one learns about culture, the people. I often felt that my lack of opportunity for language training because there was “no time” was symptomatic of one of our major mistakes in Vietnam: we – and I include myself in that group – did not know the country and, thus, could not be especially effective, or if we were, it was only after a long time of learning things the hard way and making mistakes en route.

I left for Saigon in mid-November 1966, arriving in a grim looking city already marked by the military build-up and in the midst of seemingly non-stop rains. On the civilian side, we seemed to be building up faster than our institutional capacity could support. I was assigned to AID as an area development officer. (Soon after my arrival, AID changed its name to the Office of Civil Operations or OCO, and the following year to CORDS, as civilian and military advisory efforts were combined together). As was typical at the time, AID scheduled new arrivals to tour several provinces to get a feel for both the country and the work. Traveling with fellow FSO Robert Myers, the trip was a good experience. Both of us were particularly taken with the highlands and were subsequently assigned to that region, Bob to BanMeThuot and I to Dalat, the capital of then Tuyen Duc province, now Lam Dong. I chuckle over the recollection of Col. Jake Jacobsen, one of the well known officials at Embassy Saigon at the time, telling me when he sent me to Dalat, “we want to take care of our FSO’s.”

And, indeed, Dalat was a lovely place to be posted. Tantamount to a large village, it had been a French hill station in colonial days. At 1500 meters altitude, one was far from the climate of hot, muggy Saigon. Instead, the climate was cool and healthy. You ate wonderful strawberries and all kinds of other fruits and vegetables. I would get up in morning, go out into the brisk air and look to the north at the beautiful twin peaks of Lang Bian Mountain (which I eventually climbed and one of which became the location for a U.S. radar site to guide B-52 bombers on their raids into the North). The scene was lovely. On Sundays I would sometimes go to the old French hotel, the Dalat Palace, and order good French coffee and French bread and jelly, a very pleasant pastime.

Q: In the old Swiss village.

TWINING: Dalat was like a beautiful little Swiss village.

Q: Yes.

TWINING: It was idyllic, in many ways, had there been no insurgency there. That’s where I spent the next two years.

Q: You were there from late 1966 until?

TWINING: Until the end of 1968. I spent two full years there. I have to confess, when I got there, my attitude wasn’t the greatest. They said there was no time to learn Vietnamese. “Just get out there and win the hearts and minds.” I had heard that the Vietnamese were all corrupt and that they hated us. I had to make up my mind about where I would fit in Vietnam, as well as improve my negative attitude. So, I decided that as the province was predominately Montagnard, I would learn the Montagnard language, Koho. This is a language of the Mon-Khmer principal family of languages. I thought I would work especially with the Montagnard, not those “bad” Vietnamese. After a while, I realized I was in Vietnam, and the Montagnards were just one of its elements, with ethnic Vietnamese deserving my similar interaction, that it was important to make sure one balanced one’s efforts. If I was to do my part in winning hearts and minds, I had to work with all the people of Vietnam, and not just in my program work. Thus, once I felt I had Koho under my belt (thinks to lessons given me at night by a USAID employee named Cil Dinh using a local Christian and Missionary Alliance textbook), I attended night class to study Vietnamese, up until the Tet attacks of early 1968.

Q: What was your work situation?

TWINING: I was assigned in late 1966 to a small provincial team of AID officers as a deputy provincial advisor. The senior provincial representative through the end of 1967 had been in Vietnam since 1963. First with International Voluntary Services (a private group similar to our Peace Corps) as an agricultural worker, then with AID in the same area, Donald Wadley was a farm boy from Utah. He spoke excellent Vietnamese and did not mind getting his hands dirty working with local farmers. The second American officer was an AID employee, former PCV Bernard Salvo, who ran the self-help program. I was the third, replacing FSO Fred Ashley, with responsibility for Montagnard affairs (e.g., development), health, and refugees, as well as assisting with self-help. Our jobs were to work with our Government of Vietnam counterparts to promote development as an alternative to what the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese had to offer. AID also posted in Dalat while I was there an agricultural advisor, Ike Hatchimonji, and for shorter periods rural electrification, nursing, logistics, and public administration personnel. The unheralded ones in our AID office, those with particular courage, were the eight or so local personnel without whose knowledge and language skills we would have been helpless. What was vital for us all, was to be out and about the province with local officials, watching over projects, giving advice and support, and keeping an eye on the situation. In addition, we had to keep the regional AID headquarters in Nha Trang informed about developments. Travel was generally by road, though we received both USAID and U.S. military helicopter support in order to visit remote areas and dispatch supplies to them.

We also had in Dalat a one-man USIS operation represented by Don Soergel, then by John Keller, as well as an Agency representative who concentrated on internal security matters. There was a small U.S. military unit in Dalat to work with Vietnamese military personnel, and even smaller detachments in each of the three districts. One of their tasks was to complete with their counterparts the monthly Hamlet Evaluation Surveys, which we then reviewed in the provinces, an exercise aimed at quantifying the situation and one that few of us believed was useful.

Q: In the first place, what was the situation in Dalat between 1966 and 1968?

TWINING: Tuyen Duc province had been largely spared the war, when I got there. Indeed, there was evidence that started accumulating that Dalat was a bit of an R&R center for some of the Viet Cong. When they got tired of being out in the jungle, they would come in and relax in Dalat. With only scattered, local Viet Cong and no NVA, the province was relatively safe when I arrived. It was also somewhat special in that Don Wadley took a very firm stance that we would not spray Agent Orange on any of the forests in the province. He simply felt there was no need to do so.

In the first year I was there, the situation was good. One could easily sleep out in hamlets without fear. It was only at the end of 1967, the beginning of 1968, that something changed. In December 1967, a North Vietnamese battalion came through an isolated Montagnard area in the southern part of the province and massacred a number of innocent people. It was a bad scene. In response, the province first sent in a small team of South Vietnamese and American military personnel to investigate. As the only American official who knew the area, and spoke the language, I offered to go along, but an American Colonel Michaels (deputy CORDS provincial advisor) thought the situation too uncertain. The team was wiped out, including him. People hadn't known anything like that before. We wondered what this incident meant. In early January 1968, another North Vietnamese battalion came through. This time, they were making their way down to the coast. Again, what did it mean? Then at the end of January and beginning of February 1968, we had the famous Tet attacks throughout South Vietnam. The fighting went on longer in Dalat, than anywhere else in Vietnam, except in Hue.

During the fighting in our area, we radioed out reports, but we never heard anything back from the American Embassy, which had its hands full as well. We never heard outside news broadcasts mention the heavy fighting in our area. What we only learned months afterward, was that our reports that we sent out by radio were never received in Saigon. We were basically cut off for several weeks in Dalat. With a major reinforcement ARVN troops and considerable bombing by American planes in Dalat city itself and outside the city, order was finally restored. We would see bodies on the streets. After the Tet attacks of 1968, the province never went back to being that nice, peaceful province that we had known before.

Q: What sort of troops did you have on your side, up in Dalat?

TWINING: There weren't very many. The Vietnamese had some companies of soldiers. The Americans had only the military advisors in the province headquarters, and in the three district capitals. Only with the Tet attacks were we reinforced with Vietnamese battalions.

Q: What was happening on the fighting?

TWINING: In what way?

Q: In other words, if the North Vietnamese, or actually in this case, the Viet Cong (I don't know which were fighting)... What was the fighting over and how did it take place?

TWINING: To the best of my knowledge, the fighting was done by main force NVA units, supported and guided by local Viet Cong who came out of the woodwork, as they also did in Saigon. Why the lengthy attack on Dalat, plus the attempts to control main areas of the rest of Tuyen Duc province? I suspect the communists wanted to demonstrate that they had no problem taking control of anyplace in the country, including one that the war had basically not touched until January 31, 1968. Dalat was particularly important because of its resort status, a place that high ranking South Vietnamese officials visited for rest and relaxation, and also the location of the Vietnam Military Academy. Dalat represented a symbol of what the communist side resented most; its taking would have had a tremendous psychological impact on the country.

Q: How were you touched yourself in Dalat by the Tet attacks?

TWINING: I was invited to a Vietnamese home the evening of January 31 to celebrate the onset of the Vietnamese New Year. My host warned that there was something in the air and agreed that it would be better for me to return to my home early that evening and stay put. I did so. My house over on the western edge of town was empty; the several Montagnard students who lived in the outbuildings on my compound while they went to school had returned to their home hamlets for the holiday. I was awakened early the next morning by gunfire which seemed to be occurring all around me. I could not get out, so I decided to relax and see what happened next (though I had spotted blood coming up to my front door, from the night before, obviously a bit disconcerting). Later that day my AID colleague Bernard Salvo let a combined Vietnamese and American military unit from the eastern part of town to come and get me out.

At that point he and I and several others relocated to the home of the province senior advisor, FSO Frank Wisner, who had just recently replaced Don Wadley in the senior American position. We stayed there for the rest of the period of fighting of several weeks, taking turns standing guard on the front porch at night, for whatever that was worth.

One night we heard the sound of shovels hitting rock. We couldn't figure out what it was. At daylight, even though we stayed on the porch with our guns, we could see that Viet Cong had dug in all across the street from us. This was in early February 1968. They kept looking at us, and we looked at them. They looked at us some more. Then, a military jeep would go by, and they would start firing at it. After that, they would start looking at us again, and we would look at them. This was similar to a couple of other encounters I had with Viet Cong where I realized they weren't after me; they were after the Vietnamese soldier, who might be nearby. On this day in February, these men were local Viet Cong, as far as we could determine. An artillery strike was called in just afterward ending the situation. But, it was interesting. Either they knew who we were or they couldn't figure out who we were, or because we had been doing all of these small self-help hearts and minds projects, all over the province, all the time, perhaps we were known, and perhaps they said, "These guys are not our enemies, these guys are doing some good things." We couldn't figure it out. It was very strange.

It was just one of those interesting incidents that made you wonder about the whole business of the war.

Q: Were you involved in projects there?

TWINING: Yes, absolutely. But, our job with AID was first to push Vietnamese provincial officials to get out of their offices and go and see the people's needs, and get them to try to meet the people's needs with some of the budgetary resources we were providing them through Saigon. Secondly, we also had our own funds, as we did in Africa, to do projects, to build schools or health facilities, or undertake road improvement, or build small bridges.

Thus, it was important to go out, take a local official with you, and make decisions regarding project support, inspect projects underway, and verify their satisfactory completion. Needless to say, one tried one's best during the process to make certain that payoffs were not made to officials higher up or that local village or hamlet authorities did not rake off part of the funds or materials destined for the project. In many ways, this was a very different kind of Foreign Service experience. You were there DOING things, not just writing reports, things you thought could make a difference in people's lives and would come into play when they had to decide which side they were on. We who were doing such provincial work were convinced that development and full stomachs had much more to do with the outcome of the situation in our particular area than military offensives, though these were of course necessary, as well. While a State employee, I was also an employee of AID and expected to do what any other AID person would do. Besides project work, though, we always kept in mind the need to relate to, build up, and hopefully take our lead from, the Vietnamese official, support him when he was doing the right thing and make known our views privately when it was otherwise. If an official proved recalcitrant or incompetent, the American in charge (Wadley/Wisner) would take the problem up the ladder to the province chief or mayor, hopefully for resolution. Needless to say, in the conduct of our work we picked up information about what was happening, information we conveyed to the regional office in Nha Trang and to personnel of Embassy Saigon.

There was a particular aspect of my own duties worth noting. Because Tuyen Duc province had a majority Montagnard population (Lat, Cil, Sre, Chru, and Maa ethnic groups), it was important in a Vietnamese administration to reach out to them. This is just like one would do with ethnic Vietnamese, but there was a special angle to the Montagnards. During French days the Montagnards received special attention and sympathy from the French, leading to Montagnard belief that they could become independent or autonomous, despite the fact they were located physically in the midst of a far larger Vietnamese population. This was unrealistic. It went nowhere with the French, and it made no sense to us. If we did not give the Montagnards the attention and aid needed, incorporating them into the overall activity of the province, we would only add fuel to the incipient fire of their independence movement. Fortunately, I had several good Montagnard and Vietnamese counterparts who saw things the same way and proved to be excellent working partners, and I was well supported by my other American colleagues in Dalat and by our small but interested and active Office of Montagnard Affairs at AID/OCO/CORDS in Saigon, FSOs Robert P. Meyers and James McNaughton. Unlike some other parts of the Vietnamese highlands, I was pleased that we never had a separatist problem in Tuyen Duc province.

Q: How did you find the representatives of the Vietnamese government in Dalat?

TWINING: They were a mixed bag. Some of them just wanted money in their pockets; others just wanted to survive with as little risk to themselves as humanly possible. Others were very conscientious and took risks that would often astonish me. So, it was a mixed bag. I can't say they were all one type or another type. But, some of those who really did take chances, and slept out in hamlets, at risk to themselves, which I often did with them, too, were great. I frequently wonder what happened to them when the communists did take over in 1975.

Q: Well, you were there for two years. Did you get out and around? What did you do for social life?

TWINING: Well, that's a good question. In a small provincial town anywhere in the world, there often is not a lot of social life. But like a Peace Corps volunteer finds in a village, there are things to do, and you make the most of your situation. You interacted with people. You studied language in the evening, or read. International Voluntary Services had several people there who were good people, including a current State Department official, Richard Beaird. There were missionaries of various nationalities present in the province. I never felt that my life was lacking something. I tried in principle to sleep in a hamlet one night a week, just to get a feel for the hamlet, and the people's attitudes and the like. Often, you ended up in a bed with several other people, which didn't make for a great night's sleep. But it was a way of getting a better feel for the country and strengthening your language and diplomatic skills.

Q: Well, going out and sleeping in a hamlet, were you finding it dangerous?

TWINING: I think in our business, whether you are assigned to Saudi Arabia or Iraq or Vietnam, or Cambodia, you learn to judge what the risks are. If you're going along a small highway, and you don't see a soul, then you have to think twice about whether there is some problem up ahead. You do this on the basis of your own information. It's true, once in a while, that there would be firing nearby, so you get under the bed, or down on the floor. Those are just the realities of things. You'll also find that if you are in a village, you're putting your trust in villagers. They try to protect you. If they feel they can't protect you, or feel at too much risk themselves, they will tell you honestly that it is probably too dangerous for you to stay here. That's fine. So, that's the way it works.

Q: Did you feel the hand of our American military, at all?

TWINING: You only felt it from time to time. Again, the American military presence in the province was small. It was not oppressive. We did have to try to make sure we communicated, interacted between the two of us, to avoid frictions, or differences of perspective. That was okay. There were a couple of times where there were American military actions that you felt the hand of, and which had ramifications. Most American military personnel, just like everybody else, were well behaved. They were trying to do their job.

One negative situation involved a little zoo south of town, when some American soldiers from outside the province were driving up the road and shot the zoo's elephant. The zoo's elephant had been put there by Madame Ngu back in the early 1960s. I still have a foot from that elephant in my household effects. They thought it was funny to shoot the elephant. Well, it wasn't funny. It really made for a lot of ill feeling. We were the ones who had to try to explain it away. Another thing happened that gave me insight into the future. This was in 1968, when the province had become much more insecure. A big American military unit came up the main highway from Saigon. It was a hot day. There was a beautiful river there. The personnel stopped, took their clothes off, and jumped in the river and went swimming. This is all well and good if they're in an isolated area, but they were right next to the highway, right next to the big market. I still remember hearing all these Vietnamese women exclaiming in disgust, "Look at these people." Frankly, it was the kind of thing that did us no good. I had the feeling that when enough of these incidents built up because of actions of a few, due to cultural ignorance, one of these days we were going to get thrown out of Vietnam. Yet, it's hard to control everybody, every minute. We, of course, are finding that in Iraq.

Q: Well, then, how much French? Was your French useful?

TWINING: Yes, my French was useful with the older officials, both Vietnamese and Montagnard. As I noted, the French had a special affinity for the Montagnards, when they were in colonial power, to the point where the Montagnards were hoping the French would give them autonomy in the country, which didn't happen. It was the older Montagnards, and some of the professional Vietnamese doctors and dentists, for example, who had lovely French. Their French was useful. I used my Koho far more. The more Vietnamese I learned, the better off I was, as well.

Q: Did you develop any lasting friendships from your time in Vietnam?

TWINING: Obviously when you leave a post, you continue for a while to exchange greetings and the like with those with whom you had close ties. At this point almost 40 years later, besides Americans who were with me in Dalat there are still several lasting friendships. Two of the Montagnard students who lived in my outbuildings and helped me improve my Kohl and understanding of the cultures, Teh Krajan and Liang Krai, came later to the U.S. as refugees, and we stay in contact. Teh is now head of the accounting department at Millersville University in Pennsylvania. Two Vietnamese whom I had know in Dalat, one a teacher at the time and the other a student at the French lycee there, both found me recently in the U.S. Finally, as I have mentioned elsewhere, the first Vietnamese who courageously had me in his home when I arrived in Dalat in 1966, a professor at Dalat University, Pho Ba Long, later came to the U.S. He found me when I was office director for Indochina in the late 1980s and he was employed at Georgetown University. Our friendship continued when I was envoy to Cambodia, and he headed a business administration education program AID supported there. I will always remain an admirer of Professor Long and his wife, both of whom I saw recently at the Vietnamese Embassy in Washington. One final anecdote: a freelance journalist passed through Phnom Penh in about 1993. She told me she had been traveling just beforehand north of Dalat when an unknown Montagnard who had been a locally elected official in my day approached her out of the blue to ask her to pass along his greetings if she ever encountered me. Happening 25 years after I left Vietnam, that was touching, I confess.

Being in a war situation anywhere also binds you very much to your colleagues with whom you had worked or fought. You had common experiences that unite you. This is true for the Foreign Service personnel who did Vietnam, of course, and almost 40 years later I, like others, have kept those friendships. They include those with whom I was assigned to Dalat as well as others I knew elsewhere in the former South Vietnam, people like David G. Brown, Richard Matheron, Robert P. Myers and James McNaughton. Indeed, when one encounters someone who had the Vietnam experience but not necessarily during your timeframe, e.g., Frederick Z. Brown, John Negroponte, Robert Miller, James Rosenthal, Richard Holbrooke, there, too, the relationship is easy and generally lasting.

Q: Any lessons learned from your Vietnam experience?

TWINING: I think it is very difficult to win hearts and minds at the same time that we are waging a war. It is vital to do so if you want to have any measure of popular support, but we should not have any illusions that it will product the success for which we hope, particularly when incidents such as a mistaken bombing which kills innocent civilians undoes so much of the good that your civilian programs have accomplished. Secondly, my apprehensions before I even arrived in country about our involvement in the Vietnamese insurgency were borne out as I tried to understand during my time whether we were involved in a struggle against international communism or a civil war. History has shown that it was the latter, of course, and to my way of thinking our involvement was a mistake and a terrible, terrible waste on all sides. When I was at the Vietnamese Embassy function described above in 2004, I was standing with other old retired Vietnam hands from State as the Vietnamese Chargé d’Affaires – who would have been barely born when we were in his country – spoke of the friendship between our two countries today and the desire to enhance it. We old hands agreed that it was a shame that we had been unwilling fifty years ago to reach out and try to create a similar atmosphere then; history could have been so different. The lesson is to be very careful before we get so entrapped in the internal affairs of a country that we can extract ourselves again only with great difficulty, expense, and something less than honor. We should avoid military involvement if at all possible; diplomacy and patience should always be our principal tool.

THEODORE J. C. HEAVNER
Supervising Political Officer
Saigon (1966-1969)

Theodore Heavner was born in Canton, Ohio in 1929 and was educated at Case Western Reserve College, the State University of Iowa and Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included posts in Hue, Saigon, Medan and Georgetown, Guyana. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: You went back to Vietnam and were there how long?

HEAVNER: January, 1966 to March, 1969.

Q: By the way were you married at this point and did you have a family with you?

HEAVNER: Well, I had my family with me in Medan. I had a daughter and my first wife there. They, along with all diplomatic families, were evacuated after the coup and the families didn’t return until after I had been plucked out of Medan and sent back to Saigon. That first marriage was kind of a casualty of the Vietnam War, I think it is fair to say. So, yes, I was married but that marriage ended while I was in Vietnam.

Q: I think one of the casualties of the Foreign Service is caused by these crises which call on people to spend an inordinate amount of time in a place where the families are either under great hardship or can't be with them.

HEAVNER: I think that is so true. I think that in general we just didn't take enough into account the tensions, the stresses on family members and the cost the Foreign Service does impose on the family unit. It is really tough for children and spouses to be abroad in a hostile environment. Of course, I didn't have family with me in Vietnam during the war there, though before I left some of the senior officers had brought their spouses in, were allowed to do so. All of us who were there, however, were separated from our families for extended periods and many of them had their families in Bangkok in what I think were very unsatisfactory housing arrangements, certainly not the kind of thing to cement a relationship, to stabilize a marriage and a family unit even though those who had their families in Bangkok could get over there much more readily than those who had their families in the States.

No, I think you can't emphasize enough the kind of stresses the Foreign Service puts on families. It is a really tough profession for spouses and children. This periodic uprooting is a hazard for kids that was never acknowledged when I was in the Foreign Service. Children need stability and they don't have it in the Foreign Service. The family has to be really well put together. The wife and husband have to be very dedicated to one another and to their children to overcome that kind of periodic uprooting. I think it is a great handicap for kids who come out of that background and I am saying that not just as a Foreign Service officer but also with my other hat as a clinical psychologist. You may recall that after I left the Foreign Service I became a doctoral level licensed clinical psychologist and I had a much better appreciation in that role of the kind of penalties that are involved in the uprootings and the absences of the Foreign Service spouse who is posted without a family. So, yes, my marriage to Jean, who I don't think you ever met, was in many ways a casualty of the Vietnam war. I think that marriage might have survived otherwise.

Q: You arrived in January 1966 in Vietnam. As you saw the situation in 1966 was there a difference from when you served there in 1963?

HEAVNER: Oh, yes. There certainly was. The American presence was very big in Saigon in those days because the military was increasing by leaps and bounds and we had not as yet moved the major part of them out of Saigon. They were still bivouacking in hotels and other arrangements to a great extent in the city itself. When I arrived I did not go immediately to my housing but was in the Rex hotel. I have this memory of watching the aircraft crews leaving in the morning for their raids draped with machine gun bandoliers and elephant hide boots. It was a real wild west kind of scene in many ways.

The Tu Do, which in 1963 was ostensibly off limits to American military personnel, was a nightclub on the main street there in Saigon and had become something to see to be believed. If it was off limits there was no evidence of that.

Another big change in the physical scenery was the unbelievable number of motorbikes that jammed the streets. There were torrents of motorbikes that would jam the streets during rush hour. It was worth life and limb to try to navigate, certainly not on foot. Even in a car I remember being hit midship by one of those guys whose motorbike stopped when it hit my car but he went right on over and landed on the far curb.

Q: What about the political/military situation as you saw it when you arrived in 1966?

HEAVNER: Let me explain my own situation there first because my optic was probably distorted to some degree by my situation. I had been called back because, as I said earlier, General Ed Lansdale, of Philippine fame primarily then although he had also been in Vietnam during the early Diem years and was not stranger to that country, was back in Vietnam I think mostly under the aegis of Hubert Humphrey who was a great fan of his. Lansdale needed or thought he needed a Vietnamese language officer. Dan Ellsberg, by the way, was one of his group. The guy who subsequently leaked the Pentagon Papers. He was very hawkish in that time period, totally different from what he was later. The former French Foreign Legion officer who had been the contact with the Vietnamese military at the time of Diem's overthrow and assassination, Lou Conein, was a member of the Lansdale group. There was a guy from USIA, a very tall man who looked bizarre among the Vietnamese, and a couple of other people that Lansdale had assembled for this mission which was sometimes phrased, "To win the hearts and minds of the people." They had, as far as I could make out, absolutely no plan and no notion of what it was they were there to do. The embassy, as far as I could make out, and particularly Phil Habib, regarded them as an unattractive nuisance.

Q: This was basically a force that was put in there at the behest of a political figure in the United States, Hubert Humphrey?

HEAVNER: I think so. I was never very clear about that, but that is my impression.

Anyhow, I was detailed to that group and spent the first several months of my time back in Saigon trying to figure out what in the world it was that I was supposed to be doing. In fact, the whole group spent a lot of time talking to one another about what it was that they might be doing that would be useful.

I decided at one point that I would go back to my old stamping ground in Hue and talk to my old contacts there and see what they had to say about the situation. In the interval of having left Vietnam in 1961 and coming back there, of course, had been the whole Buddhist uproar under Diem with the "Buddhist barbecues," as Madam Nhu called the immolations, and all the subsequent Buddhist pressures which gave great impetus to our desire to get rid of Diem, as you may remember. One of the leading figures, if not the leading figure in all that was a man named Thich Tri Quang, a Buddhist monk, who nobody had ever heard of in 1961 but who was certainly there. When I went back up to Hue, the doctor in charge of the hospital, who was an old contact of mine, had become very much oriented towards the Buddhist political stance, very anti-government, and he wanted me to meet with Tri Quang. I thought that was a good idea so I said, "Sure." I did meet with Tri Quang, had a long conversation with him which I wrote up in a memo, and Phil Habib was livid. I did not know, no one had told me, that Tri Quang was off limits. We weren't having anything to do with him. We weren't talking to him and weren't going to be talking to him except that Ted Heavner went to Hue and did talk to him. Phil Habib didn't know me then. That was the first contact he had had with me. Thank God Tom Corcoran was his deputy and I had known Tom for many years. Tom was able, I think, to calm Phil down and explain to him that I had no inkling, as usual the Lansdale group was off on a tangent, and it wasn't Ted but the Lansdale group. Well, Phil didn't send me out of country although I think he had that in mind to begin with.

At that point I made a big pitch to Tom that I wanted to get the hell out of the Lansdale group and go to work for the political section which was what I was really meant for anyhow. Tom somehow persuaded Phil that that was a good idea. I think Ed Lansdale also concurred because it was pretty clear that I was not his kind of guy. So, after four or five months back in Saigon, I was put back into harness, so to speak, in something that made sense to me, i.e. the political section in Saigon.

Q: Ed Lansdale gained renown early on by a book by Bill Lederer and Usher Burdick called "The Ugly American," as sort of being the answer, a grassroots real American who can get down and solve problems, etc. And, he made a name for himself in the Philippines, particularly Magsaysay. What was your impression at this point of Lansdale, his outlook, how he operated and how clued in he was to the Vietnamese scene?

HEAVNER: Lansdale had been in Vietnam before and he had been reportedly quite close to Diem, although I am kind of skeptical about that. So, it wasn't that he was a stranger to the country, but certainly Vietnam is not the Philippines and the Philippine people, I believe, are very different. What may have been effective in the Philippines was certainly not effective in Vietnam. Part of the difficulty may have been that the mission generally was hostile. I know that the political section was not entranced by Lansdale and what they perceived as his methods. I suspect that nobody else was either. Although Lansdale had a background in CIA, I don't know how well plugged in he was with the CIA mission at that time. I never saw any evidence of it one way or the other even though I was a member of the group. That in itself may tell the story, maybe there was very little contact or virtually none. As far as I could make out Lansdale was almost completely ineffective there. I didn't see anything accomplished during my time that was of any value.

Q: Did he come in with any preconceived ideas or was he trying to push anything?

HEAVNER: I don't know, I wasn't there when he arrived, so what he came with is quite unclear to me. At the time I arrived it seemed to me the group was in complete confusion. They spent a great deal of time talking about what they should do that would be useful, what their mission ought to be and it never gelled, at least not while I was there. I don't recall when Lansdale left, although I not sure he was there much longer after I switched over to the political section. Anyhow, that was a bad beginning but a good ending in terms of my own experience.

Q: You were in the political section essentially from 1966 to 1969. When did you leave in 1969?

HEAVNER: March.

Q: What was your area of responsibility?

HEAVNER: Opposition political movements and in particular, later on, the Buddhists were my responsibility. I remained in contact with a number of Buddhist leaders and also with the major then opposition leader who subsequently became prime minister and vice president of Vietnam, Tran Van Huong. Opposition parties were never more than cliques in South Vietnam. My job was to keep tabs on the major opposition leaders and talk to them regularly. I never saw Tri Quang again, incidentally, but I certainly saw a lot of Tam Chau and Mai Tho Tien, who were important Buddhist leaders. Those people were always quite willing to talk, by the way, unlike some Vietnamese. Maintaining contact with them was not difficult. They always saw the Americans as a potential route to power so it wasn't hard to maintain contact with opposition political figures and Buddhists in South Vietnam in those days.

Q: The Buddhists were sort of well known to have a pretty good understanding of public relations, particularly with the Americans and how to play the press and all.

HEAVNER: They did up until the time of the military takeover. After that, the military was very firm with them and as far as I could make out they lost a lot of their cachet with the populace generally. Certainly they were not able to get the kind of popular support they seemed to have during the Diem regime. I am not sure what the reason for that may be but they were never an important threat to the stability of the government after the military took over or at least not when I got there in 1966. We were afraid of them. We thought they could be an important threat and that was one of the reasons that the embassy was so anxious for me to talk to them and keep tabs on them and in particular to hold hands with Tam Chau, who prospered mainly by playing a sort of cooperative game with the government. He was a northerner who had ties to Ky by the way.

Q: What was your impression of embassy reporting?

HEAVNER: Well, I did a lot of it so I guess I thought it was okay. I did a lot of reporting on my contacts with Huong. I remember vividly Ellsworth Bunker sending me to somewhere on the coast because Huong and all the opposition figures who were going to run for president in the election on which we had pegged such great hopes as at least an image of democracy, had pulled out saying it wasn't going to be a fair election and they weren't going to run. Bunker told me to go up to Huong and see if we could persuade him to get back into the race because all the others would follow suit if he did. I did talk to him and I evoked Bunker's name, which I think was a powerful incentive, and he did get back into the race and the others did follow suit. Huong, I think got something like 19 percent of the vote, a very respectable showing and subsequently, as I said earlier, he became prime minister and then the last vice president of South Vietnam before the North came in and took over.

The embassy was doing a lot of reporting, not just what was happening with the military and Nguyen Cao Ky, but also what was happening with the Buddhists and opposition figures. We had good connections with them. I guess that we were pretty well aware of what was happening in South Vietnam aside from the communists. We had intelligence on what the VC were up to. That wasn't my bailiwick, but we did have intelligence. Obviously it was less than perfect and in the case of the Tet attacks a monumental failure. I think we had pretty good information on what was happening on our side.

Q: How about out in the provinces?

HEAVNER: We had people all over in the provinces, including Foreign Service officers. In fact the provincial reporters, which we had in almost every province, reported regularly. I think we had a pretty good notion, again, of what was happening from the optics of our side.

I wanted to mention something that I did in the way of reporting. I did some of the central stuff because I drafted, initially it was every week, a report which Lodge sent directly to Johnson and then Bunker subsequently sent to Johnson. In drafting that I incorporated not just the provincial reporting and my own knowledge of the political situation, but also reports that we got from the military on the military situation and from CIA, and tried to make a picture of it. That was my central function in many ways.

Q: Did you feel you were to present a picture, were people sort of leaning on you from up above?

HEAVNER: They didn't have to. I was a hawk. I thought we were going to win that war. No, nobody leaned on me and as I say they didn't have to because I was at that point very much in support of what we were trying to do. I thought our policy was right. I was also very encouraged and exhilarated by the fact that what I was doing seemed to be so central to our foreign policy. There are a lot of LBJ stories and maybe this one was apocryphal, but I believed it then. The story was that when LBJ got this weekly report he would go around with a pair of scissors and cut out parts of it and hand it to various of his subordinates and cabinet members for action. It is said that he informed his staff that whenever that report came in he didn't care where he was, if he was in the can, he wanted it shoved under the door as he wanted to see it right away. So, it seemed to me that I was doing something that was very rewarding, and that has its own hazards. I don't think if I had been able to step back and see the picture whole, I might have had the foresight to predict the disaster that ultimately overtook us there, but certainly I might have been a little more restrained in my enthusiasm.

Q: What was making you particularly optimistic?

HEAVNER: Well, things were going quite well. As I said earlier I think we won the war several times and our opponent raised the ante on us each time. The strategic hamlet program worked pretty well for a while and then the Viet Cong started attacking in bigger units and it collapsed because the hamlet militia was no match for an organized unit with good weapons and discipline. Subsequently, in 1967, as I said, the indications were that militarily and certainly politically things were going quite well. The Tet attacks reversed all that and not just in Vietnam. Actually the Tet attacks from a military point of view were not successful, they lost a lot of their infrastructure throughout the South, lost a lot of people and while they took and held Hue for 25 days they were not able to hold anything else of consequence for any length of time. In every case they were ejected and the government remained in place, etc. It was a massive effort on their part with 75,000 troops attacking simultaneously. What they got out of it, of course, was the conviction in the U.S. that this war was never going to be won. The American public thought those people are going to go on forever. It was that, I think that turned the tide. I see the Tet attacks as a critical, pivotal point. It was at that juncture that it became evident that we were not going to be able to stay the course and at that point the whole thing started to go down hill.

But in 1967, we were thinking about a negotiated settlement in which the South Vietnamese would compete politically with the communists and in which the communists would be at a considerable disadvantage because while their preferred instruments, which were essentially military, and terror would be used to some extent, we thought it could be arranged so that that kind of political power could be minimized. Going head to head in a peaceful political confrontation, balloting, they would be at a great disadvantage because it seemed to us, and I think this was true, that in a free election the people of South Vietnam were not going to opt for a communist regime. I don't think that would have happened. We said then it wouldn't happen and I still believe that it wouldn't have happened. We thought that was where it was coming out. We were going to negotiate a settlement in which there would be a political conflict continuing but not an armed conflict.

When they had the big meeting in Honolulu in 1967 that Johnson went to, I helped Phil Habib get ready for it. We were talking about positioning ourselves for the upcoming political conflict. We were quite sanguine about how the outcome of that would be. Now, you may be right if you were to say that we were hoodwinked by our own military and their very favorable reports of the military situation. Maybe so to some extent, but I am not really persuaded that the military was lying like the press said frequently and often. I am not really persuaded that that was the case. They may have put a rosy gloss on a lot of things, but I do not believe they were consciously misleading the press, or themselves or us in the embassy.

Q: What was your impression of the reports you were getting from the CIA?

HEAVNER: To be truthful it is hard for me to remember and subtract those reports out from the reporting we got from our own people. I certainly don't remember being critical of it. I also don't remember any really crucial insights from it. But, my job was to paint a picture using everything available and I am not sure that I can in retrospect sort that out at all. I knew many of the CIA people there. I had great respect for them. Many of them were in the provinces, as you may recall, doing some very tough jobs. I knew Colby personally and had great respect for him. I think he is a very honest man. I can't believe that he, for one, would ever have sent in reports which were in anyway biased to his knowledge.

Q: Can you describe where you were and what happened during the Tet business?

HEAVNER: Oh, yes. I do remember that. My first inkling that anything was going on was very early that morning. As it happened, that was the morning when I was in the habit of going into the embassy around 4:35 a.m. to draft the weekly (by then it was biweekly) report for the President. So, I was up very early anyhow. I heard gun fire before I got up and thought that something might be amiss. I called the embassy and couldn't get any response, so I called Colonel Jacobson, whose house was right next to the embassy. He was mission coordinator and was a retired colonel. Unbeknownst to me, of course, he was in the middle of it by that time. I remember this telephone conversation and it was really bizarre, thinking back on it, because I am in my house about half a mile away and hearing a lot of gun fire and some heavy explosions and Jake picks up the phone and suddenly the gun fire is much louder. I said something to the effect, "My god, Jake, what is going on?" I don't recall what Jake said but I said, "Well, it sounds as though you don't need me to interrupt you, I think you are pretty busy." Well, he didn't want me to hang up, he wanted to talk. I told him that I was planning to come into the embassy to do my weekly report and was that all right. Jake said, "No, Ted, the report has been changed." I guess he then told me the embassy was under attack, although I don't have a clear memory of that. I was struck by how nonchalant and how unhurried he was in talking to me. We did hang up and I sat there and turned on the radio which gave no information. There was martial music if I recall correctly.

At dawn I decided I was going to find out what was going on so I got into my car. During my tour there I had acquired one of these little Triumph two seaters, which was a lovely little car, but more a toy than a car. I must have gone across Saigon pretty fast that morning because I didn't draw any attention from anybody, neither government troops nor Viet Cong. Actually it was probably a pretty risky thing to do, but I didn't know that. When I got to the embassy things were finished, but only just finished. The bodies were still in the courtyard. Our people had driven out or destroyed the few VC who were there. It was a pretty small operation as we found out subsequently. Things were still smoking. Jacobson had finished off the VC in his house. He told me, because he was still there, that they had tossed a 45 up to him on the second floor where he was ensconced and the last of the VC came up the stairs and Jake shot him two or three times before he stopped the man. That was the end of it as far as Jake was concerned and he was going on as to how this was not part of his military specialty because he was retired, now a cookie pusher, and he went to cocktail parties and was no longer in this shooting business. He was all very calm and humorous. There we are in the courtyard there with the embassy's doors blasted and three or four VC bodies. All of that and Jake is telling me how this is no longer what he should be doing, that he is supposed to go to cocktail parties and be a cookie pusher.

About 10:00 that day I was back in my office. Subsequently, whether it was the same day or a day later, my office was distinguished by being the site of the detonators for claymore mines which were put around the perimeter of the embassy in case of another attack, which never came. The wires came in at my office level and the detonators were there. They weren't activated during day hours when I was there.

Q: What was the reaction at the embassy to all this? What type of reports were you sending?

HEAVNER: Our information was pretty spotty at first. Most of what was reported initially, I think was reported by phone. We were in phone contact with Washington, of course. In fact, I think the duty officer, who was in the code room throughout the attack, was on the phone to Washington the entire time.

Q: Actually, he was. I have interviewed him, but have forgotten his name at the moment.

HEAVNER: He was a junior officer who had a terrible experience at his first post.

Q: Yes. He was an economic officer and later was ambassador to Slovenia. He said he was able to get through to Washington beautifully but when he kept calling the military, they said they were too busy. Finally the special troops arrived landing atop the embassy. The only way you could get into the embassy itself was through doors which only opened from the inside. They wanted to blast each door, but he went down with them and opened up the doors for them.

How was the embassy, particularly the political reporting, acting?

HEAVNER: I think it was the next day before we really realized the full dimensions of that attack. How literally a hundred, maybe several hundred, cities and towns and district centers had been attacked simultaneously. Hue had been taken over lock, stock and barrel. The military and our top people were pretty busy that day in making sure that we were intact there in Saigon. I can remember Bunker being furious with the military because they used aircraft in the outskirts of the town in Cholon and at one point they brought in some close air support. Bunker was very upset about that. He didn't want any bombing of the city.

My recollection of the report of what was happening? I would guess, and I haven't seen the reporting, although working in the freedom of information office these days one probably could, that it was pretty fragmented. I imagine Bunker was on the phone directly to Johnson. He used to be on the phone, God knows, to Johnson in the middle of the night because Johnson would call when it was daylight in Washington and, of course, it was the middle of the night in Saigon. Bunker having been locked in talks with Thieu and Ky trying to bend their arms to get them into the peace talks in Paris would then have to deal with LBJ on the telephone in the middle of the night. I don't know how he did it. And, I expect that was what was happening in those days immediately after Tet. Bunker would be on the phone half the night, and probably Westmoreland as well. That is how I would guess a lot of the reporting was being done. I don't know when we got back to doing our regular biweekly reports, we did. Probably it was a month or so later.

Q: As you were dealing with this, was there the feeling that this was a victory or a defeat? What was the feeling within the embassy about what was the meaning of this Tet offensive?

HEAVNER: Initially it was very unclear what it meant. I guess the first impression was "Wow! We have really been taken. There was a lot more to them than we thought and we have had a terrible intelligence failure." An almost immediately second thought was "But, hey, they have given us their Sunday punch and we are still very much in charge, plus we have knocked out a lot of their infrastructure." We spent a lot of time subsequently convincing ourselves and trying to convince the press that, in fact, Tet was a military failure for the other side, which it was. That it was a tremendous public relations political success was not lost on us. I think from the beginning, Ambassador Bunker ... well, I mentioned how angry he was at the implications of our having to bomb Saigon. That it was a political concern, a public relations concern as much as anything else. I think that part was pretty clear to him and probably to Phil Habib as well, because Phil was a very, very astute man and he would have seen clearly what that might entail. I don't remember exactly when we first came aware of that terrible picture of the police chief, Loan, executing the VC with his pistol. It was probably pretty quickly after it happened. I remember that our leaders were enormously exercised about that. For that matter, I remember subsequently, when Huong became prime minister of him saying that Loan had to go, and indeed he did.

Q: Last I heard he was running a restaurant out in Arlington. In fact I ate there one time. As a Hue person, did you get involved in what had happened in Hue and take a look?

HEAVNER: I was certainly interested and concerned by their reports and in particular by the reports of the massacres that the communists inflicted after they took over the cities. There were thousands of bodies found subsequently and that got almost no play in the U.S. press. It was totally overlooked as far as I can make out. But that black list the VC had and which they used to execute any number of people was very real. We didn't become aware of that, however, for some time. They held the city for something like 20 days and it was quite a while after the city was retaken that the dimensions of the atrocities there became clear to us. So, yes, I was very concerned and very interested. Frankly, I never went back to Hue because I didn't want to see what had happened to the old city which was very beautiful. I gather that it was essentially destroyed because that was the only way our people could get back in and they did what they had to. They had to blast the VC out of there apparently. So, I haven't seen Hue since I left in 1966.

Q: In the sort of 1966-69 period was there a change in attitude in the reporting?

HEAVNER: Oh, yes. Increasingly we were having echos of what was going on in the States and feeling the force of public opinion there. Indeed, some of the new officers coming in were of the mind that we needed to get the hell out. One of the things that I did towards the end of my time there was to informally get the political section together and talk about what kind of peace could be negotiated at that moment under the then prevailing situation where it was evident that we were not going to be able to continue that level of military support. I must say we were not able to come up with plausible scenarios and we were right. When I left Saigon I went home via Paris and Phil Habib was there by then talking to the North Vietnamese. I said to Phil that without American air support I didn't think there was any chance the Vietnamese could hack it. Maybe their ground troops could manage it if they continued to have very forceful American air support, but not without it. I don't know if this came as a surprise to Phil or not. It was always difficult to be sure what Phil was really thinking. But he acted as though he was surprised and asked why the embassy hadn't told him that. It turned out to be very true as you know.

Yes, the handwriting was on the wall. I didn't like to read it and for a good part of the time I succeeded in not letting myself read it. But, the fact that the war was lost was becoming evident by the time I left at the beginning of 1969. In fact, I had said repeatedly that the VC were never going to win politically, the only way they were going to come into power was with tanks rolling into Saigon. I said that long before it happened just that way.

Q: What about the relationship with the press before and after Tet for you and other members of the political section? Was there any change?

HEAVNER: Well, I avoided the press as much as I could. I didn't like to argue with them and I didn't like to agree with them. The press, by the time I left, was almost unanimous in its view that we were losing and what we had to do was to cut our loses in some fashion, to get out and end the bloodshed. So, I had minimal contact with press, especially the last year or so. I think that was not true of the political section in general. I remember John Negroponte had continuing friendships with some of the reporters. He was a friend of Stanley Karnow and they used to spend a lot of bull sessions talking about the situation. I am sure that John did not entirely agree with Karnow, or vice versa, but they did have a relationship. I did not have a relationship like that with anybody in the American press.

JOHN M. STEEVES
Director General of the Foreign Service
Washington, DC (1966-1969)

John M. Steeves was born in 1905 in North Dakota. He received a B.A. in 1927 from Walla Walla College and an M.A. in 1936 from the University of Washington, entering the Foreign Service in 1945. Mr. Steeves, over the course of his career, served in India, Japan, and Indonesia. In 1966 he became the Director General of the Foreign Service and served at this post until 1969. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy and Thomas Stern in 1991.

Q: We were talking about your time as Director General and there is just one thing that I would like to ask. You were there from '66 to '69, what about Vietnam? Can you tell us how this hit the Foreign Service as far as you were concerned? This was the very height of the war.

STEEVES: Let's cover the Vietnam matter both from my view of it from the Office of he Director General and also from the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. Of course the influence on our DG's Office was great-the responsibilities my job as Director General of the Foreign Service in a very specific way. In addition to the Senior officers we had to find for leadership post, we kept two hundred beginner FSOs going through Vietnam on rotation which was a real strain.

Q: The Far Eastern Bureau. You were there from '59 to 1962.

STEEVES: Yes. Now we move back to the period of my first deep involvement in that Southeast Asian fracas right from the very beginning when it was confined to Laos. That is where I really was introduced to John Kennedy.

Q: Why don't we start right there. We are going to talk now going back a bit when you were in the Far Eastern Bureau.

STEEVES: When we started having our problems with Southeast Asia it was confined to Laos and involved the Pathet Lao , the communist crowd. I went up their two or three times to confer with people on the ground.

Q: You were Deputy Assistant Secretary. What was your field?

STEEVES: My particular field was political/military affairs or Asian affairs that got me very much involved in all of that business. The insurgency had gotten very bad about the time that Kennedy came in.

Q: That would have been January, 1961.

STEEVES: Yes. The year before I had worked with President Eisenhower about it too. I went over to see him one day to brief him on what the problem was. To do it I had to give him the background of some of the chief operatives that were giving us the most trouble. Obviously I couldn't do it without giving him a pretty careful rundown on the prince that was the head of the country -- Prince Souvanna Phouma. Souvanna Phouma turned out to be a real deadbeat. He was the Prince that had played off the communist against us. He was using the Communist Pathet Lao which his brother headed, against us and trying to make us believe all the time that he was staunchly anti-communist. One of the schemes he had floated for which he had solicited AID money profiting a million or more dollars profit which he used in buying the planes and setting up the operation of Air Laos. That all came from what we paid off Souvanna Phouma for. I say that in order to give you a little idea of how much money this guy really had.

When I got through that laborious hour with President Eisenhower telling him the whole background of this, to show how much he had really understood of what I was talking , he said, "This guy has fleeced us of millions. Why don't you give the guy six thousand dollars and tell him to go away and get lost." Imagine giving Souvanna Phouma six thousand dollars and telling him to get lost! I was so discouraged that I found some convenient way to fold up my file and leave.

Kennedy became very, very interested in the Laos debacle and from that to the whole region, that I think from my long contact with him on the subject that I know more accurately what Kennedy thought about the whole Southeast Asian Issue than a lot of people who are fond of saying what Kennedy would have or would not have done about this fateful chapter in our history!

During his Presidency he certainly he was very, very worried and very willing to put in whatever it was that had to go into Southeast Asia in order to deny that area to the communists getting a foothold in that part of Asia. Kennedy said, "Tell me in very short words just how you feel about it." I said, "Mr. President, you know there is just one simple question that you have to answer in your own mind before you decide what we do and before we start thinking about how we do it. Does the communists getting a hold in this part of the world pose a danger to the United States' interests or transgress our treaty promises to that area, or doesn't it? If it does and if it is in our interests then we can center our attention on what we ought to be doing, but it if doesn't lets get out now before we put another soldier, another plane or anything in there." And he said, "That's easy. We just cannot allow them to get away with what they are attempting to do because of our treaty arrangement under SEATO, etc." That was Kennedy's orders and the reason we did all the things we did that eventually led down the trail that ended up in Vietnam. At another point I remember using the expression "you stop placating these people and you do what you got to do while you can do it, or further down the peninsula you will have something on your hands in Vietnam that will make what is happening in Laos look like a Sunday school picnic." So that was that.

Q: While we are talking about Laos, how did you find dealing with your boss, Averell Harriman?

STEEVES: Before I answer that you must remember that my dealing with Governor Harriman was a long time after the contact I had with Kennedy referred to above. I cannot say how accurately Harriman reflected Kennedy's opinion or the party by the time we got to the Conference on Laos in Geneva. That is where the Governor comes in. Harriman was interested chiefly in two things-his political stature in the United States and his personal stature built on the reputation of having dealt with Stalin. A difficult guy to deal with. When we got into the Laos conference he and I came to a parting of the ways when I simply would not knuckle under to his wishes.

Q: What was the issue?

STEEVES: Let me state the issue succinctly before I get involved in the failure. We had reached an impasse on how to achieve peace between the Communist North and the Free South in the Peninsula. The conflict between the surrogates was raging in Laos particularly. It was agreed that a conference of ALL parties concerned should meet and after observing a CEASE FIRE, terms would be agreed by all sides by which PEACE could replace conflict.

So, the conference was called; we had the fourteen nations agree to come and abide by the conditions: if no verified cease-fire NO CONFERENCE. The name: The Fourteen Nation Conference on Laos meeting in Geneva. It was to be kicked off with a great deal of fanfare. The crucial part of it came when they decided that we would go ahead and join with thirteen others, in this conference in Geneva with the parties concerned. Those of the great powers, meaning: ourselves, Canadians, British, French, Russians, Chinese. So the fourteen nations all together were represented around that table. We were on our way to a NATO conference in Oslo, Norway, which I attended with Secretary Rusk. He was going to Oslo and there the agreement was, we to were wait there until we got the verification from the United Nations observation crew made up of the Poles, Canadians and Indians, that they had arranged a cease fire on the ground the British, French and we had said we would not even go to the conference unless they could assure us that they had a cease fire. So all of the foreign ministers of all the countries involved started off for Geneva. In Oslo Rusk would get on the line with Washington every morning and would ask what the situation was on the ground, which meant what had been heard about the truce. They would say they didn't know. The Secretary said he was not going down to Geneva until they did know..

The NATO conference came to an end which eventually meant that the French, Canadians, British and ourselves, finally made the first concession and all got in their planes and went to Geneva even though they had not been given the assurance. There we sat, those high powered fellows sat in Geneva for two weeks while Rusk would not move until he thought they had the assurance that the ground was safe and could go ahead with the meeting. He never did get it. But, as it always happens in the end, we caved in. Finally they said they would go ahead with the conference anyway and try to outlast them there -- wear them down. Rusk said to me, "You know, if we have to put staff over here that we can spare, some high powered name to spare, someone we can do with out -- Averell Harriman is the best one I can think of." I said, "Thanks a lot." He said, "You can stay here and look after the meeting, be the executive officer and take care of it while Averell makes political hay."

He started, from the very moment he came over, hobnobbing with the Russians to find out what they wanted in order to make an agreement. From then on his song was, "all the Russians want is an agreement." I used to say, "Governor, sure, all they want is an agreement on their terms. If they can have that they will agree within the next hour. It all depends on what they want to agree to."

That was the sorry beginning(and the end) of the so-called Laos Agreements that were never worth the paper they were written on because they didn't pay one bit of attention to the Terms of The Agreement. It ended up in the whole Vietnam fiasco-Kissinger Negotiation where we finally were snookered out of the whole situation. We had in the over a half million troops over there before we were through with it. We lost 58,000 people.

Now come the after thoughts as to what you would have done, especially in lieu of what we have done in a campaign after learning our lesson in Vietnam. You will note that General Powell and George Schwarzkopf said over and over again that when we got into this business in the Near East we will never repeat the troubles we got into in Vietnam. To put it in terms of what we all remember, the person who came the closest to saying what should have been done in Vietnam was old Senator Goldwater. He went at it the wrong way and probably too sternly. It would have had to have been tailored a little bit differently because I am not sure we had quite the force. We certainly didn't have the consolidated authority arranged behind us like Bush did it in The Gulf, but we did have the targets and with the timing and things that were there, if we had kept the management of that out of the White House and out of the politicians' hands and if they had been taught one really good lesson the first three weeks of that campaign, that would have been the end of it. The lesson would have been to take Hanoi off the map.

Q: We are talking now about a very successful, possibly month's, campaign against Iraq. In three weeks Iraq was basically devastated by our air force and then we went in. It was a very quick thing and in a way a direct result of deciding after Vietnam to never again fight aggression by a gradual approach.

STEEVES: The one thing, in addition to everything else, that this last campaign has done is to lay to rest forever the Vietnam syndrome -- and I hope forever.

RICHARD W. DUEMLING
Special Assistant to Assistant Secretary for East Asia
Washington, DC (1966-1970)

Ambassador Richard W. Duemling was born in Michigan in 1929. He joined the Foreign Service in 1957 and served in Italy, Malaysia, Japan, Canada, Sinai Peninsula, and as ambassador to Suriname. He served as an assistant to William Bundy in the East Asian Bureau during the Vietnam War. Ambassador Duemling was interviewed by Michael Krenn in 1995.

DUEMLING: Fortunately, Bill Bundy, the Assistant Secretary, needed a new special assistant to run his office. He had spied me and knew that I was underemployed. He therefore asked if I would be willing to fill the job and I readily agreed.

This was a little bit of a curse, having been in the Secretariat at the start of my career, being a special assistant to an Ambassador soon thereafter and now returning to a special assistant to an Assistant Secretary. It tags you as a "staff guy".

Q: But it all tagged you as a "comer". It put you on a fast track for moving up.

DUEMPLING: Correct. And that was the advantage of it. After one week on the job with Bill, I went to him and pointed out that he was primarily occupied with Vietnam, although his area of responsibility covered all of East Asia. I added that he needed someone who could keep track of what else was happening in the area. It was a role that I could play. I would help somewhat on Vietnam, but essentially I would be his eyes and ears on all other matters in the area to alert him to when he should get involved in issues. Of course, much that was happening in the area was related to Vietnam, but still, there were a lot of things happening in Japan, Australia, Indonesia and China that required attention. I told him that I would focus on that and not get involved deeply in Vietnam. Bill Bundy agreed and that is the way it worked out. I worked for Bill and subsequently for Marshall Green -- a change prompted by a political change in the White House. I started working for Bill beginning in 1968 until early 1970 over a period of about two and half years.

What was interesting about it was that in those days, more importantly than now, there were inter-agency groups -- called Senior Interdepartmental Group (SIG) and Regional Interdepartmental Group (RIG) -- at differing organizational levels. They drew together the key players from the various agencies interested in foreign affairs. The chair was always the State Department's regional Assistant Secretary. In my case, Bill Bundy chaired the inter-agency group on East Asia. Ranking officers from the National Security Council (NSC), CIA, International Security Affairs (ISA-Defense), the Joint Chiefs, USIA, and AID. This was a policy coordinating group. I was the Executive Secretary of the group. I organized the meetings, the agenda and so forth.

Another thing I did when I worked for Bill was to get the academic community together about twice per year. Bundy had a scholarly bent and wanted to meet with academic experts on the Far East. It was an advisory group. We had two panels: one on China and the other on all the other parts of the Far East. They overlapped somewhat with three or four persons of a total of about twelve for each panel, sitting on both serving as a kind of hinge. These were very distinguished scholars from around the country -- people like Ed Reischauer, Lucien Pye, Bob Scalopino, Fairbanks from Harvard. Very distinguished political science experts, some historians, some economists. We would bring them together every six months for a three day period. I would produce a selection of reading materials, mostly classified -- think pieces, key telegrams, etc. I would put them into a packet, ready for the participants to read when they arrived in Washington usually one day before the conference started. We would have policy discussions, chaired by Bill, with these people. That was fascinating. We would have the inputs of these people from all over the U.S. academic world.

Q: Did the panels take an entirely different view from that of the government, particularly on Vietnam?

DUEMPLING: No. As a matter of fact, what one would see were some people with great reservations about what was happening in Vietnam; others essentially supported the government's Vietnam policy. One thing which the academics agreed upon, after Bill thanked them effusively for coming and taking time out of their busy schedules, was that it was a tremendous opportunity for them. They had an opportunity to learn from the readings and the discussions which they could not obtain in their academic environment, where they were not involved in operational policy problems. They obtained an insight into some of the gritty realities which would not have come to their attention otherwise. For the most part, they were rather diffident in their criticism of the government's policies. They were certainly some reservations expressed about the wisdom of the government's policy and about being dragged deeper and deeper into something from which we were not getting the desired results in the desired time frame.

Q: Did you have the feeling that things were being left undone in the other parts of East Asia outside of Vietnam? Or that we were being driven into doing things because of Vietnam which might have been counter-productive?

DUEMPLING: First of all, I thought that an awful lot of the Vietnam policy was "wish-think". I thought that in listening to some of the presentations -- I used to have this discussion with my friend and college classmate George Carver, who was in CIA in an extremely responsible position both on the operational and intelligence sides -- they were much rosier and optimistic than they should have been. I thought that there were an awful lot of people putting the best construction on the data. In terms of Vietnam crowding out legitimate concerns from other parts of the region, there is no question that this was the case. I can't give any specific example, but I felt that sometimes our relationships with the Japanese got somewhat skewed -- we weren't paying enough attention to how the Japanese economy was evolving through this period. We leaned pretty hard on some of our allies -- for example Johnson's efforts with Harold Holt of Australia. That was distorting our relationships with some of the Southeast Asia countries, which had their own agendas and concerns -- economic development. To see these resources being siphoned off into the military activities in Southeast Asia, specifically Vietnam, one had to ask how constructive this policy really was. In terms of paying attention, I think that Bill Bundy never lost sight of what was happening elsewhere in the region. He couldn't perhaps give it as much time as he might have wished, but Bundy was extremely able and intellectually superior and could keep an awful lot of balls in the air, even though, he was preoccupied with Vietnam.

Q: Was there a change when Marshall Green came in?

DUEMPLING: Yes, there was, because Green's arrival coincided with the Nixon Administration's and Kissinger's advent. This Administration decided to go for a negotiated settlement. The whole policy changed and Green was part of that. I am not sure to what extent Marshall was one of the architects of the policy. I think he was. He was extensively consulted by Henry Kissinger who was essentially the architect of the policy. You recall all the negotiations with the Vietnamese in Paris. So there was a change. Marshall, also, as Vietnam began to spin down a little, was able to devote a little more attention to other sides of what was happening in Asia.

JAMES F. MACK
CORD Program: Provincial Reporting Officer
Vietnam (1966-1969)

Intelligence Analyst
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Paris Peace Accords Monitor
South Vietnam (1972-1973)

Mr. Mack was born in Connecticut and raised in New York State. After graduating from Cornell University, he joined the Peace Corps and served in Honduras. In 1966 he joined the State Department and was sent to Vietnam in the CORDS program. Mr. Mack's other overseas service was primarily in Latin American where he served as Political Officer and Deputy Chief of Mission at a number of posts before being named US Ambassador to Guyana. Ambassador Mack was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy March 20th, 2004.

Q: Anyway you got assigned to Saigon. How did you feel about that?

MACK: Well, I guess I would say somewhere between stunned and thrilled. I certainly trembled a little bit when I heard I was going to Vietnam. But! I had said I was willing to go. I never thought they would send me. I figured, they would say "hey! MACK is an excellent Spanish speaker. Why not send him to some place in Latin America". But, they sent me to Vietnam. I was a excited and facing the assignment with some trepidation but I certainly was willing to do it. I went to Vietnamese language training at the same Arlington Towers for 5 months. In those days when you were a Junior Officer, the system would not send you to the full eleven-month hard language language course. So I only got five or six months, which for Vietnamese is not enough. So I arrived in Saigon not speaking very good Vietnamese. I became a very good speaker because I was there for a total of three and a half years and I worked on it all the time. But since I did not take the full course, I think I tested only at a 2/2 when I had finished the course, which is not saying much if you are a political officer. Which is what I was. So it was pretty tough at first.

Q: Did your deafness hurt. I think you tone the language?

MACK: My deafness obviously hurt but I do happen to have a fairly good musical ear even though I don't play any instrument. Mother and my sister are both musical, so I inherited that. I inherited a good ear to learn languages, even though I just can't hear very well. Hearing tones Vietnamese "tones" was not a big problem, as long as I listened hard. Some people have excellent hearing but can't "hear" the tones of a tonal language like Vietnamese. So I tested out fairly decent in my MLAT aptitude test which is why they were willing to teach me Vietnamese I guess. Whatever my score was, it was sufficient to teach me a hard language. I don't mean to say I was a genius but I like to learn languages and I like to work hard on them. I was certainly enthusiastic about learning Vietnamese. And one of the best teachers I ever had for any subject was Mr. Quang, one of our Vietnamese teachers. He lived and breathed what he did and we were all very excited about learning.

John Negroponete by the way, preceded me to Vietnam, I guess a year or two. He was still there when I arrived. John spoke French rather than Vietnamese. But there were some superb Vietnamese speakers in th political section who had gone through full the course.

One of them ended up being a translator during the Paris Peace talks. So we newcomers really looked up to these guys, the same way I looked up to the first generation of Peace Corps volunteers.

Q: When did you get there, was it '67?

MACK: I think it was December of 1966.

Q: What was the situation like there.?

MACK: The war was all over the place. I was assigned as a Provincial Reporting Officer, working out of the Embassy in Saigon but traveling frequently to the Mekong Delta where the war was very, very close at hand. And I remember deep in the Delta near the U Minh forest flying on a mission with a newly promoted Lieutenant Colonel who was a FAC, a forward air controller, a pilot who guides in air strikes. He had offered to take me up in his plane, a little single prop one, like a little Cessna, when I was on a visit. He sat in the front seat, and I sat in the back. And watching him mark the Viet Cong positions with smoke rockets was pretty exciting. Each time he fired one, the little plane jumped. I also have to admit I was very scared, In fact, the VC fired up at us too. We even took a round in the wing. But I felt it was something I ought to do since it was part of what was going on in the provinces I was covering. I did it only once, but this guy did it every day.

After two months working the Delta, a position opened up in II Corps in Central Vietnam and I was sent to live in Nha Trang, a coastal city, and cover the surrounding provinces from there. Nha Trang had been a French resort town. Nicely laid out; very beautiful scenery. The beaches, islands and mountains looked like Rio de Janeiro without the skyline. And there I worked as a political advisor to the senior US official in the region, the head of what was called "CORDS", I recall one's last name was Madison. My job was to travel regularly among the five coastal provinces of II Corps writing reports about what was really going on in the war, and meeting with local religious (Catholic and Buddhist), political, and military leaders (both US and Vietnamese) and learning and writing about their attitudes towards the war. I would write what we called "air-grams", really dispatches prepared on a manual typewriter and physically sent to the embassy. Air-Grams and things like no longer exist in the Foreign Service.

Henry Cabot Lodge was the US ambassador when I first got there, but Ambassador Bunker replaced him shortly thereafter and was there for the rest of my time. That is what I did and then.

Q: Let's talk a little bit about the Delta. Where were you located in the Delta?

MACK: When I worked the Delta, I was based of the US Embassy in Saigon. I did not live in the Delta. I traveled there, would spend a few days in a province, and then write a report on what I found. However, when I was transferred to II Corps, I actually lived in Nha Trang. In fact, all told, I lived in four cities during my 3 ½ years in Vietnam (Saigon, Nha Trang, Danang and Qui Nhon), and I think visited all 43 or so provinces. So I got to know Vietnam quite well.

Q: Did you go up in the Central Highlands too?

MACK: Yes I did go up into the Central Highlands. But, I was not the primary reporting officer there. Another officer handled that region.

Q: Who was that?

MACK: His name was David G. Brown, not to be confused with David E. Brown. who also served in Vietnam at the same time and also worked as a provincial reporting officer for the political section and covering the provinces in III Corps, the area around Saigon. In fact, for a time the two David Browns shared a house in Saigon. Both are now long retired.

Q: The South Koreans were in Vietnam too weren't they?

MACK: Yes, the Koreans were assigned to both parts of central Vietnam that I operated in, in fact to the two provinces I lived in. One division was assigned to Binh Dinh Province north of Qui Nhon city, and the other to a province just south Danang.

Q: How were they doing there?

MACK: Well, they were very, very tough guys. Very effective in Binh Dinh. They were feared by the Vietcong, and managed to clear out the area where they operated. They were quite ruthless. Very effective tactics. They would send out people who could basically dig themselves into foxholes at night all over the place. When the Vietcong would come though, these guys would pop out and blow away the Vietcong. They did this over a large area. They were fully quite successful, cutting down infiltration by the Vietcong.

Another South Korean Division was deployed was in the province that surrounded the city of Danang. By the time I was assigned to Danang to head up the branch consular office and also serve as political advisor to the US Commander of I Corps, a Marine 3 star named Lt Gen. Cushman who later become number # 2 at the CIA, the Koreans had become much less aggressive. Apparently, the Korean government was under pressure to cut casualties so the Koreans had barricaded themselves behind huge Maginot line of sandbags.

While the Vietcong did not go through their area, the Koreans did awful things to the people of the area.

Q: What was that?

MACK: It was basically a Korean My Lai where they executed a whole lot of people in a village. At the time it was not politically correct to cast aspersions on our allies. But I decided to do a little work on it. I happened to come in possession of a whole lot of photographs and interviewed people who were witnesses and wrote a report.

Q: What happened as a result of your report?

MACK: I can't tell you what happened. I know the US Embassy got my report, including the photographs. It was really up to the South Koreans. I don't recall anything happening.

Q: How was the war going? You were basically in II Corps and then I Corps?

MACK: It was both in that order. I spent 18 months in II Corps working out of Nha Trang, and a year in I Corps working out of Danang. Then I spent my last six months in Saigon.

Q: How was the war going when you were there?

MACK: Well, I was there during the huge build up of the American Forces from a relatively modest number to 500,000. Then in 1969 Nixon came into office and started the "Vietnamization" program. In February 1968, during the Tet offensive, I was living in Nha Trang when the city was overrun by two battalions of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese troops.

By then, the war had become less a guerilla war and more of an old fashion large unit type of war. A war of mobile battalions. A lot of people today believe the Tet offensive was the greatest defeat ever suffered by the U.S. It is true that Tet was a great political success for the Communists which led to the decision to start to withdraw US troops. However, it was, in fact, a huge military defeat for the Viet Cong. To carry out the attack, the Viet Cong ordered their undercover VC agents to surface and join their troops as they converged on provincial capitals all over the country. But they in fact lost over 50,000 men in a matter of weeks, including much of their "infrastructure", their secret cadre.

The security situation actually improved rather dramatically after Tet 1968 because there were not as many Vietcong running around. What North Vietnam did to compensate for the huge losses sustained by the Viet Cong was to increase the pace in which they were moving regular North Vietnamese troops to the south. They had been coming South as early as '1965, but the pace quickened. However, they did not have as many local folks to guide them around as they had before. So in one sense, things were more secure. That is not to say they were secure. I mean I still had to travel between provinces mostly by air, although within the provinces I could move by road. I also traveled by military helicopter dozens of times as well. I left Vietnam at the end of 1969.

At that point I was assigned back to the Department of State to the Bureau of Intelligence and Research as an analyst on South Vietnam. A junior officer would never be assigned to that job today after having spent 3 years in the same country. Believe me. I didn't want it, tried to fight it, but then had no choice but to take it.

But you asked about security in Vietnam. In early 1973 when I was back in Qui Nhon on 6 months TDY to report on the implementation of the Paris Peace Accords, my wife and I drove literally all over the country alone in our sometimes not so trusty International Scout. From Binh Dinh all the way up to Quang Tri on the border with North Vietnam, all through the Central Highlands, and all the way south to Saigon and Can Tho in the heart of the My Cong delta. I never would have done this during the war. That is how things had changed. But it was the lull before the storm. By that time the US Congress had pulled the plug on support. US air and logistical support had dried up. When the North Vietnamese launched their final offensive 2 years later in 1975, the South just collapsed.

Q: The first time when you were there what was your impression of the situation in villages and the central government?

MACK: Well first of all there was a speckled pattern of government control. By that I mean some villages firmly in the government camp, some were contested, and some were under Viet Cong control. Often where the Vietcong were active, a lot people left and moved into the cities. Huge numbers of refugees built their little houses along the road. The government was not particularly popular on one hand. On the other hand, I don't think the communists were popular at all. I say that as a person who traveled around unarmed, alone and very frequently.

In Nha Trang I had a Vespa motor scooter for a while and later a white jeep. I didn't drive my jeep outside of town, but I did drive my motor scooter into the countryside. And I often met people who would invite me into their homes. They would talk to me. I was a young guy, unarmed and in civilian clothes and I guess not considered hostile or threatening. I got to meet people in virtually every walk of life. It was amazing how the Vietnamese would pick you up on the street. I would be going to the Buddhist Temple or something and walking around and they would say, "Oh you speak Vietnamese." All of a sudden, I would have an invitation to dinner, it was absolutely amazing. I never, I won't say never, I almost never felt a security threat. I can remember going to some, somewhat dicey areas in the countryside and have people come up to my little motor scooter and motion with their hands with a finger like this; basically what they were saying was don't go that way and I turned around. That did happen. I felt nearly zero hostility. I had a wonderful experience with the Vietnamese people at every level of society.

There were some things that outraged me, for example, the corruption in some parts of the government. Some province chiefs were very, very corrupt. Occasionally the government would send in someone who was really clean and I would write a dispatch about him or about someone who was dirty. People were skeptical about the government but those who supported the Vietcong or Communists were definitely in a small minority.

I really traveled everywhere, to every province in the country. I have been in numerous numbers of the districts but I did not go into areas that were red on the map. I did not go there.

Q: What happen to you during the Tet Offensive in '68?

MACK: Well, I was living in Nha Trang and sharing a regular Vietnamese house with another young American civilian. It was not in an American Compound. I did not live in a compound. I didn't want to live in a compound. The night before Tet (The Chinese New Year) I went to sleep late at night because it very noisy, like the 4th of July in the US, or New Year's eve in Latin America. Both sides had agreed on a cease fire for Tet, as they had done for years. So people stayed up late having a good time and drinking, eating, shooting off fire works, shooting their weapons in the air, and generally making merry. And along about one o'clock I went to bed with my air-conditioner on. In the early morning hours I was awakened to the sound of low flying helicopters. My first reaction was to think that insensitive Americans were buzzing the town when people were trying to sober up from the previous night. "Gee, what the hell are they flying the helicopters low over town for?" That was my first reaction. So I rolled out of bed, went out my door and looked down the end of the street which is two houses away, sixty feet away, and saw a jeep, a Vietnamese police jeep with water leaking out of holes in the radiator. Standing with his foot on the fender was an American Public Safety Advisor, German born, a real character, a cop from New Jersey. I went out and asked him what the heck was going on, I said to him. He answered "what the "deleted" is going on here?". "There are two battalions of North Vietnamese troops in town and they shot out my jeep."

What happened was that when the North Vietnamese troops came into town under cover of the truce, fireworks and general merrymaking, some units became disoriented by the layout of the city and never found their targets. It so happens that Nha Trang is laid out in a checkerboard pattern except that at one point the streets of one part of the checkerboard intersect each other on an angle. So while one section of town was logically, north, south, east, west, the other section was at a slightly different orientation. And so where the roads of each section intersected the North Vietnamese got totally and hopelessly lost. So while one North Vietnamese unit was able to take over the lightly defended provincial headquarters, dig in, others were left wandering around looking for their objectives.

And they were facing limited opposition because most troops were on leave for Tet. One North Vietnamese unit, probably without realizing what they were facing, attacked a serious of houses which formed a Korean army compound that sat right next to the CORDS compound. In taking on the Koreans they made a big mistake and paid for it with their lives. Other North Vietnamese soldiers entered private houses and hunkered down. Then the local people started pointing out their locations to the Vietnamese, Korean and US special forces troops in the area. The North Vietnamese, reduced to operating in small groups, were picked off one by one, their bodies scarfed up and dumped in a central part of town. Over a period of several days, they had lost six or seven hundred people. I don't know how many got out of town alive. But, most did not. It was a disaster for them.

Later on that first day, I drove around and saw all the damage and all the blown up buildings, bodies of the North Vietnamese, and things. That evening, the CORDS leadership instructed all the Americans associated with the CORDS program, civilian and military, to come to the CORDS compound to spend the night for their own protection. Since many of these folks, including military, had not been in combat much, I really had no desire to spend the night with this them. I thought I would be better off somewhere else. So I went to spend the night at a top floor apartment in another part of town. And late that evening when I was there, I remember looking at the CORDS compound in the distance seeing what appeared to be a huge fire going on.

The next morning when I went back to the compound I learned that many of the bullets (all outgoing) had impacted half way up a tree across from the compound where someone had thought he had seen somebody. We thereafter referred the purported intruder as “the ten foot tall Vietcong.” Unfortunately, the tree sat immediately next to the Office of the Bishop of the Nha Trang Diocese. The Bishop’s personal bedroom was pierced by numerous bullets. He was not hurt, fortunately. But guess who was deputized to go over to apologize to him. Me. There was no Vietcong. Our people were nervous because after all there had been plenty of action the previous night, including right next door. But the night after Tet there were no North Vietnamese around so it fell to me to go over and apologize to the Bishop of the Diocese of Nha Trang.

But I just did not want to be a part of all these armed and nervous people. I asked myself what I could contribute to protecting the compound if I spent the night there. The answer was not much. If there had been a real threat, believe me I would have been in that compound. I thought there wasn’t. That was my sense as a political officer. I thought I had a pretty good sense of what was going on. So, I wanted to be somewhere else. There were just too many guns.

I must tell you I did not carry a weapon in my travels. Someone did give me a very nice souvenir folding stock Kalashnikov automatic rifle and several ammo clips. But I never took it out of my house, except once to test fire it. My view was this. Before I went somewhere, I ought to get an intel brief and generally try to figure out what was going on there. I did not worry about being assassinated by some guy running up to me and shooting me in the head because basically the Vietcong did not operate that way with the small fish that I was. I basically operated alone. My concern was that I might run into a Vietcong patrol crossing a road or something. On the other hand, how was I going to defend myself against and get away from twenty guys or a company of one hundred guys with just a pistol or rifle. I was going to be dead for sure. So I just made a decision not to carry a weapon. I was given one once when we were in a convoy in the Delta where we learned a Viet Cong unit had just passed. But that was about it. If I had been really accomplished with weapons, maybe I would have carried one regularly. Also I worried about losing it. A weapon is heavy. I was going to be meeting and talking with people, and I felt I couldn’t do that if I packed heat. I have nothing against weapons. I believe Americans who are properly trained and tested should be able to own weapons, but in my case, I just didn’t think that was a smart way to go.

Q: Well tell me, I thought we would finish up this Vietnam thing, tell me how did you find your dealings with the political section, your bosses in Saigon?

MACK: I had excellent bosses. Really great team of people, mentors. Officers who were far more talented in drafting than I was when I got there, and who worked with me and encouraged me. Dick Teare was one of them, Henry Dunlap was another. It was a very positive and demanding experience. I must say I had never had to write so much and so fast as I did in Vietnam. There was an insatiable appetite for information. This was particularly true my last six months in Vietnam (in 1969) when I was brought back to Saigon from Danang to work in the political section. Galen Stone was with the DCM, and the political section had 20 some odd people. It was huge. Like an Embassy. There was an external unit affairs, internal affairs unit, and a provincial reporting unit.

When I was brought back to the political section, one of my jobs was to draft what was called the “war and peace-a-gram”. It went out every week, every Monday and covered Vietnamese attitudes toward the war and the internal political situation. And it had to be huge. Remember this was before the era of the word-processor which was maybe the greatest invention since sliced bread. Particularly for someone who was a sloppy typist like me.

Q: And also a bad speller, thank god for spell-check.

MACK: In those days you would type little pieces on your typewriter and then you would literally cut and paste and that sort of thing. I had to put this thing together every week. It was due in the early afternoon each Monday. Now I knew there was no way I could produce a twenty-five page cable in six hours. So what I had to do was to come in every Sunday right after lunch start the cable. This way I had 24 hours instead of 6 to produce this report. So for six months the only time I had off was Sunday mornings. That was the only time I had off. I would work on this thing Sundays and then other people would give me more material. It’d put it all together and then pass it on to Harry Dunlap. Remember Harry! A really good guy who was head of our Internal Reporting Unit.

Q: Harry and I took Surfing lessons together.

MACK: Really! Okay. So Dick Teare was the head of the Provincial Reporting Unit for the first year and half or so that I was there. I can’t recall if he was there in my last year. But Harry Dunlap would edit it and we would get the sucker out. And then I would report on the status of the constitution the Vietnamese were drafting. This was '69. My beat was the National Assembly so I would have a lot of contact with people who had been elected to the National Assembly. And, of course, the caring and feeding of US congressional visitors like Houston Congressman George Herbert Walker Bush. We would brief them. But, I was really fully occupied. We just worked all through dinners and lunches. Richard Nixon came to that was a story in itself. May I tell you?

Q: Yes!

MACK: Richard Nixon paid a surprise visit to Saigon. I can’t tell you exactly when it was. It would have been in the Fall of '69. Early in the morning, I received a call at home before I left for the Embassy. It was Martin Hertz, the Political Counselor. He said the President of the United States is arriving in three hours and you can’t tell anybody. And we have selected you to do the consecutive interpreting for his address to the Vietnamese Press.

Think about this. I was a quite a good Vietnamese speaker at the time. But what happened was Nixon was a superb extemporaneous speaker. At the end of Nixon’s meeting with President Thieu, I was sitting in the side room of the national palace waiting for Nixon to address the huge assembled press corps, both foreign and Vietnamese. I was nervous as hell! You can imagine. There were bleachers set up for the press, the Vietnamese and Foreign Press. I was suppose to do a consecutive translation from English to Vietnamese. In theory that mean President Nixon would speak a sentence or two, and I would translate.

Well, finally the bilateral meeting with President Thieu ended and he and Nixon emerged and began to speak. Unlike President Thieu who spoke first from a written text which I had been able to read in advance, Nixon spoke extemporaneously without stopping for at least ten or fifteen minutes. Now think about this. I am not a professional interpreter. I am not a consecutive interpreter. I twenty-seven years old and I am nervous as hell. The President of the United States is there and hundreds of people are waiting. And the President doesn't stop. So I am feverishly taking notes and after about ten minutes of this was desperate. I happened to be standing next to the very professional, very experienced, very smooth Chief Press Officer for the Vietnamese Government, who spoke fluent English. At one point I turned to him and said "I can not do this." "There is no way I can make sense out my garbled notes on Nixon's fifteen minute uninterrupted extemporaneous speech and translate it into Vietnamese. I just can't do it." I was wringing my hands. To my immense relief, he said "I will take care of it". He went out there and spoke about two minutes, supposedly summarizing what the President had said. So I never did interpret for Nixon. Thank God! It was a task that I was not equipped to do.

I gained enormous respect for people who work in the interpreting business. And I learned that interpreting is a skill, not to be confused with being able to speak a foreign language well. Not to be confused in any way. And, of course, I was being set up in a sense. It was not like interpreting in a small meeting for visiting US Congressmen, which I did frequently. I could always stop a congressman who went on too long and say, "excuse me, let me translate what you just said since I can't remember a whole paragraph.". I could control the conversation. But I had absolutely no control over Nixon's monologue. I was way out of my depth. I was never more relieved in my life when this elderly Vietnamese gentleman (who was what my age is now said) said he would do it for me. He was in charge of Press Relations for the Vietnamese Presidency. He was very accomplished at it. He basically made it up. Ha! Ha! But he was speaking his own language, so he was able to wing it.

Q: When did you leave Saigon?

MACK: I left in early December of 1969. I had been there years. I arrived in December of '66 and I left in December '69.

Q: By the time you left, did you, what were you getting from your contacts. Was there a feeling of confidence or a feeling of unease? What I am talking about is the Vietnamese.

MACK: Well! There were some war worries obviously. I think there was a feeling among the Vietnamese that as long as the Americans were they were going to be able to keep going. There was always a question of whether the "Vietnamization" policy would work. But things were getting better. The things in the My Cong Delta were definitely improving. The Vietnamese Government had begun its land reform program, with US money paying for the land that was redistributed. And the land there was extremely rich. Electrification was going on there.

Particularly when I went back in '73. Things were really going well. There weren't any Vietcong running around in the Delta in '73. They really weren't. Most had been exposed during the 1968 Tet offensive and over time they had "attrited" was the word they use to use (or weeded out) and there were not many left. The Delta was quite secure in 1973. But when I left Vietnam for the first time in 1969, there were still huge numbers of American troops there. So, as long as the Americans were there, the situation would be manageable. When I returned in early 1973, the ceasefire had been in place for little over a month, and by then the US military had already drawn down most of its troops. In fact, shortly after I arrived, I personally saw off the last GIs off from II Corps out of Qui Nhon harbor. They were the last 3 US divisions in Vietnam.

So by February of '73 the Vietnamese were feeling very much alone, although the countryside was quite secure. I told you I traveled by vehicle, unarmed with my wife (my bride) through a large portion of the country. This is something I never would have thought of doing when I was there between '66 and '69. But you could see the North Vietnamese in some places building roads in the mountains. And the South Vietnamese military were short on everything. They were short on ammunition. They were short on gasoline and replacement parts. And it was a big problem. They could not fire their artillery as much as they wanted. They could not move their vehicles around as much as they could before. So they were getting worried.

We really were pulling out and they were very much alone 1973, in my last six months there. They had no US military advisors to lean on. There were only a few American civilians involved developmental type activities. I did get out into the countryside a fair amount. I remember spending the night in a fortified hamlet with my wife, being entertained by the local people. An unbelievable experience. I had been well treated the first time I was in Vietnam, but even better the second time. People obviously looked at an American with his wife differently than a single male.

But the South Vietnamese were worried at the time. They were very frank about it. The military officers that I knew were very happy to see me around. They welcomed me with opened arms. I would show up in a district mostly unannounced, driving my International Scout. But I did always check the Intelligence Reports before I would go anywhere to be sure the roads were open and there were no problems. Folks were very happy to see us. The North Vietnamese Army had not yet brought its full power to bear in most parts of the country. There was kind of a Kabuki' Theatre show. In Binh Dinh Province where I lived, the South Vietnamese military sometimes would take back some populated areas controlled by the Vietcong and the VC would react. But it was basically a waiting period. Both sides kept the fighting within bounds and limited. Clearly, the North Vietnamese were waiting, building and rebuilding roads, resupplying, waiting for the big moment. In hindsight that was what was happening. But at the time in early 1973 the environment was amazingly secure in comparison to the Vietnam that I experienced between 1966-1969.

Q: Well, when you were in Saigon up to December of '69 did you feel there was pressure from the White House to put out favorable reports?

MACK: I did not feel it at all. I understand things may have changed by the end of 1974 and early 1975, under Ambassador Martin?

Q: That was Graham Martin.

MACK: Yes, He was there and I understand some people felt that. I never did. I never, ever felt that. I felt I could say anything that I wanted. And I did. If I detected abuse, I reported it. I told you about the case of abuse by the Koreans that I reported in 1969. If I learned about corruption involving the Americans, like I did in 1968 at the US military huge supply base at Cam Ranh Bay, where a small group of American NCOs in a supply unit were selling lighter flints, batteries and other equipment to Vietcong agents, I reported it. This stuff was used by the VC to manufacture explosive devices. People concerned about these things, both Vietnamese and Americans, came to see me as someone who would get the word up to the right places but outside the chain of command when, for what ever reason, they could not. I remember an Army CID (Criminal Investigative Division) guy from Cam Ranh telling showing me photographs of what was going on. Apparently there was a Commanding General there who didn't want to accept that this was going on in his command. So the CID guy felt stonewalled. When I met with him he said, "look at this". So I asked to give me the photographs. He said, "yes, yes, I will give you the photographs." He gave them to me and I wrote a pretty graphic report like the other one with photographs to prove it. Photographs showing the sergeants handing the stuff over the barbwire, rather remarkable. Something was done about it and action was taken. I think the General may have been removed. Now we are talking almost 40 years after the event, but my recollection is that I did not feel as if I were writing under a great big censor. My biggest challenge was to write to the very high standard set by some very, very able Foreign Service Officers.

Q: Well Martin Hertz was a scary guy. He could take dictation and without changing a word.

MACK: Yes, he could take dictation and without changing a word. But that requires a extraordinary high level of intelligence and focus. So it was really inhibiting to work with somebody that good. And when you got a little complementary note from him, with his signature that looked like a tiny flower, you would put it up on the wall. Ha! Ha!

Q: Okay Jim, this is a good place to stop and we will pick this up in 1970 I guess when you are off to the Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

MACK: We will talk about the worst job I ever had and did in the Foreign Service. And how important good management is? Ha! Ha!

Q: Okay we will talk about that.

Today is the 24th of January 2005, Jim 1970 you are off to INR (Intelligence and Research) and you were there for how long?

MACK: Well I was there for almost two years.

Q: Talk about it, is this the worst job you ever had?

MACK: Yes. This was the worst job I ever had and did. After three years in Vietnam, I returned to Washington to take a job that probably would have been an illegal assignment today for a junior officer. That is to assign a Junior Officer, an untenured Junior Officer, to work on the same country on which he had been working in the field for the three previous years. I was assigned to INR to be an intelligence analyst for South Vietnam. This involved among other things preparing a daily morning brief for the Assistant Secretary of East Asia Affairs, it was Ambassador Sullivan. And also to write intelligence reports on how I saw the internal political situation in South Vietnam at the time.

Q: I am interviewing Terry Tull now.

MACK: Terry Tull is an esteemed colleague and served at the same time that I did as a matter of fact, in Vietnam. She worked in the Embassy political section. Keep in mind what I was coming from. I had been in the field. I was a Provincial Reporting Officer in Vietnam, one of the best jobs I ever had or did. So any way I come back to the Department of State after three years in Vietnam to a suffocating bureaucracy and without the freedom I had to move around and write reports and interact with people there. In the Bureau of Intelligence and Research (INR) there were six or seven layers between me and getting a paper out.

Q: Was this particularly because Vietnam was obviously hot. Was the subject a tendency to put more people on to it. As I mentioned, Iraq probably today has the same thing. I mean you throw people at the job which usually doesn't make for a better product.

MACK: Well, there is probably something to that. There were certainly quite a few people. There must have been, I don't know, four or five people working on South Vietnam at the time. Well, they were all good folks. My boss was a good guy.

Q: What was his name?

MACK: His name was Lou Sarris. But just getting something through Lou was very difficult and it was quite a culture shock coming back to Washington, frankly. I mean this in a personal sense and in a professional sense. In INR there was much more time to get reports "out", but we'd have to go through ten drafts, as opposed to Vietnam where we had to get reports out very, very, quickly. I also hungered for the contact with the local people that I had in Vietnam every day. That was the excitement of it. In INR worked in my little windowless cubical with no contact with the people whose country I was supposed to analyze.

Q: I know the feelings.

MACK: It was socially difficult and professionally not very inspiring.

Q: Well, do you recall how things were going in 70 and 71? What was happening in South Vietnam?

MACK: Well yes. In 1971 there was a major North Vietnamese Offensive into South Vietnam. The North Vietnamese Army came straight down the highway number one, right on down the coastal highway in a traditional WW II type tank attack. There was nothing “guerrilla” about it at all. And they managed to push the South Vietnamese Army totally out of Quang Tri Province, which the northern most province in South Vietnam. So the Vietnamese were quite battered. It was a difficult time for them since we had already pulled all the US troops out of that part of the country. So the Vietnamese had to do it themselves. And they did finally did halt the North Vietnamese offensive with the help of with the help of U.S. B-52’s. But it was a very, very, difficult time for the Vietnamese.

Q: Was this kind of discouraging to you that the South Vietnamese were unable to push back the North Vietnamese?

MACK: Well yes, It was discouraging and I will talk to you about that a little later about what happened because I did go back to Vietnam. But it was not an encouraging time. Obviously, Nixon clearly had realized that he had to get us out. So US military peaked out in personnel strength there somewhere in '69.

Q: I think it was.

MACK: By 1972, US force levels had wound down considerably and the North Vietnamese felt bold enough to undertake a major attack, a frontal attack on the South. The North Vietnamese were never really guerrillas anyway. The South Vietnamese Communists, the Viet Cong) were the guerillas. The North Vietnamese were a conventional army. They fought very much like most soldiers do in the world with artillery, rockets, tanks, etc.

Q: How you were working. Were you finding the material that you came up and evaluating it or was it more a cosmetic of changing of the verbiage?

MACK: Obviously some of both. There also was a lot of war gaming and devils advocating going on. Keep in mind, my reporting, my analysis, was not on the war. It was on the internal South Vietnam Political Situation. I was not a military expert. There were other people who did that.

Q: It has been said that South Vietnamese corruption and political maneuvering played a major role in the collapse of South Vietnam. At the time do you feel that this was part of the problem?

MACK: Corruption definitely was an issue. I never believed that the South Vietnamese people supported communism. My personal experience showed me otherwise. And I believed very much that the communists could not have won a free election in South Vietnam. They absolutely could not have an election. People were frustrated with the corruption and getting tired of the war. Once our military presence, along with our logistical support, wound down, we began to see a sapping of the morale of the Vietnamese. But I really have to come back to that in a later chapter. Because, there is an interlude here.

Q: Okay.

MACK: The interlude is that in late '71, I was offered an assignment as Political/Labor Officer in San Jose, Costa Rica. Since I wanted to get back to Latin-America, I welcomed that assignment. I got married just before I left. My wife Sheila and I drove from Washington to San Jose, a wonderful trip which, including stops and a visit to my old Peace Corps town in Honduras, took about 3 weeks. Costa Rica was an open, democratic country, a delightful place, and it was easy to work there as a political/labor officer. I had been a post about a year when, at the end of 1972, I think around Christmas, when the Paris Peace Accords were signed.

Just a few days later, I was called to the ambassador's office. Viron Vaky was Ambassador at the time. He said, "Jim, I just received a cable. You have been selected as part of a group of Foreign Services Officers with Vietnam experience to return to South Vietnam within a month to start a 6 month unaccompanied tour to report on the progress of implementation of the Paris Peace Accords, including the cease fire." The spouses of returning officers were supposed to remain in place at whatever post they were current at during this period, which in Sheila's case, meant San Jose, Costa Rica. According to the Peace Accords, the agreement was to be monitored by a four party International Control Commission consisting of two communist states (Poland and Hungary) and two non-communist states (Canada and I think Indonesia).

I was ready to do my duty, and frankly rather excited about the chance to go back to South Vietnam. However, as I mentioned before, my wife Sheila and I were newly married. When I broke the news to her that evening, she was not happy at all about my going without her. She told me flatly that she would be going too and was not about to be deterred by a decision by the State Department that my TDY tour was to be unaccompanied. She found my arguments that it might be dangerous unconvincing. She also very quickly persuaded me to try to obtain a waiver from Director General of the Foreign Service. So with the support of Ambassador Vaky, I sent in an appeal. As the days ticked by with no response, I decided I would try to take her no matter what. My idea was to just show up in Saigon with her.

With only a couple of days until departure, we finally got a cable from the Director General who said I could take Sheila, but would have to pay her travel costs, which were $2,500, about ¼ of my yearly pay. Furthermore, I was told that since my wife would be accompanying me, I would be required to live in a secure area. We accepted that. We also left without visas since there was no South Vietnamese Embassy in Costa Rica.

We left San Jose at the end of January for Los Angeles, and hop scotched across the Pacific -- Hawaii, where we spent a couple of days, Guam, Wake Island.

In Honolulu, the Pan Am Ground Chief did not want to let Sheila board the plane because he thought the Vietnamese would fine his company if she arrived in Saigon without a proper visa. Always persuasive, Sheila prevailed upon him to let her board. She had to convince the Pan Am representatives in Guam and Wake Island as well. When we finally arrived in Vietnam, Lo and Behold I was able to bring her into the country. Ha! Ha! We were initially going to be assigned to Can Tho to work at the Consulate General.

Q: Yes, down in the Delta region.

MACK: Right, and, this is really off the record. I met the guy who was going to be heading up the Consulate General and realized very quickly that we were not going to get along. Plus the Delta was the area with which I was least familiar. I did know the Delta somewhat, but I had really operated in Central Vietnam and not in the Delta. So I asked to be transferred to a Consulate General in Nha Trang. My wish was granted because there happened to be another fellow officer who had gone back with me who had been assigned to Nha Trang, but in fact wanted to go back to Can Tho where he had once served. So it was a perfect switch. Everybody was happy. However, when I got to Nha Trang, I quickly came to the conclusion that I did not want to be part of the huge bureaucracy there. I also knew they wanted to fill positions in the surrounding provinces and not just the Consulate General. It turned out that the Political Officer in charge of the Consulate General in Nha Trang, who also had been sent back for a 6 month TDY was an old friend of mine.

Q: Who was that?

MACK: Dick Teare, who during my first tour, had been in charge of the provincial reporting unit, and my first boss. Dick helped me get assigned to Qui Nhon city in Binh Dinh province farther up the coast. I knew the town well and was quite happy to be assigned there. I was assigned to a CORDS Office there. The provincial senior advisor, a retired US Army Major, whose name I will not mention, was clearly not happy to have new guy bringing his wife, and instead of been given space in the little prefab homes where most personnel were housed, we were given an old French Army Trailer equipped with a very narrow single bed, and a closet full of hand grenades left over from who knows when. This senior advisor was a very arbitrary person, with an explosive temper and often threatened his local Vietnamese staff, who feared him. It was clear we were not going to get along very well. However, my wife was a really good trooper. She had been a VISTA volunteer in northern Arizona on the Navajo Reservation, and determined not to complain. She also did not complain that her orders from the moment we arrived in Vietnam had been that for security reasons, she was never to travel by land out of town. It turned out we both did many times.

But returning to the provincial senior advisor, his abuse of his staff was really terrible. He was an alcoholic. It was a pretty serious situation. I called back to Dick Teare at the Consulate General in Nha Trang and said the CG really needed to take a look at the situation. Very shortly thereafter the Binh Dinh provincial senior advisor was removed. I really think I had done a good deed, but my real job was to report on the war which continued at a more restricted level during the cease-fire, and on the political situation and the morale of the people.

Q: You were at Qui Nhon?

MACK: Yes, I was at Qui Nhon which was the capital of Binh Dinh Province, a large province in Central Vietnam. And within a month or two of my arrival, I literally put the last GI on the last boat to leave.

Q: Is Qui Nhon a port?

MACK: Yes Qui Nhon is a big port. It serves as the port for the highland city of Pleiku, for example. So within a month or two all U.S. Forces, all, were gone. And the Vietnamese were very lonely with no Americans around. So since I was there with my wife, all the doors were open to us. There were only a handful of American civilians left, carrying out civilian functions.

Since, in those days, I was a Vietnamese speaker and knew the area, I was considered an old hand at the ripe old age of 30. I couldn't have had more access than I did. And Sheila and I took advantage of that access and traveled around a lot. The cease-fire had funny rules. The war took place in certain areas but not in other areas. It was fairly predictable. The result was we could get out and around. When we had a day or two off, my wife and I would drive to different place around the country. For example, we drove in our International Scout all the way from Qui Nhon the North Vietnamese border in Quang Tri Province; also from Qui Nhon up to Pleiku and Kon Tum. From Qui Nhon through the mountain vacation town of Da Lat down to Saigon and on to My Tho on the Me Cong River. I would never have attempted this during the war.

I would get intelligence reports before we would go. I never carried a weapon. My view was for what? What good would that do. And just tried to play it smart when we were on the road. We never had an incident.

Anyway for my reports on the ceasefire, politics, and attitudes, I would type out my dispatches in my messy style. We did not have word-processor in those days. My wife, who was my unpaid assistant, would then retype them nicely. A plane would come by every afternoon to pick up my "dispatch" and take it to the Consulate General in Nha Trang and the Embassy in Saigon. Just like in the old Foreign Service days, except instead of a ship it was a plane.

I reported on what I had heard and seen. Whatever skirmish had taken place. How the International Control Commission, which was set up under the Paris Peace Accords to monitor its implementation, was getting along since they had an office in the town. If the North Vietnamese were building roads in the mountains in eyesight of where I was, I could report on that. If there was a prisoner of war exchange, I could report on that. In fact, Sheila and I went to a South Vietnamese/Viet Cong prisoner of war exchange. We probably shouldn't have but did. This is how it happened. At a party, a South Vietnamese Air Force Base commander, at Sheila's prompting, offered to fly us in his Huey helo up to the headquarters of the northernmost district in Binh Dinh. We took him up on his offered and he came through. He flew us up to that town, where he commandeered a jeep, ripped off his name tags so he couldn't be identified by the VC, and drove us to the exchange site in the middle of nowhere. To get there we had to drive way west of the last outpost of the South Vietnamese Army. It was a very exciting time, probably my best ever six months in the Foreign Service.

Q: What was happening because the area where you assigned. Were the highlands part of your area?

MACK: No! I just covered Qui Nhon, I mean Binh Dinh which was a lowland province. It did contain some mountains, but I just covered the lowland areas. I did drive to other areas, including the highlands, to visit colleagues who had been assigned back to provincial teams on TDY just as I had been.

Q: Were you getting any feeling of buildup of the North Vietnamese side?

MACK: Absolutely!

Q: Was II Corps where the final North Vietnamese attack began in 1975?

MACK: Yes. Yes, the final offensive began against the highland provinces. Even in 1973 when I was in Binh Dinh the impression was that the North Vietnamese were logistically building up to do something. You could see the roads they were carving out on the mountainside, literally. And in addition, we were cutting back on our logistical support to the South Vietnamese Army. That meant, for example, that a Vietnamese Unit would have a limited amount of gasoline to use in their vehicles. So they were restricted how often they could drive. They were running short on ammunition. They couldn't fire H&I (Harassment and) Interdiction fire as they always had before. They were much more careful about how much ammo they expended. They knew their source of supply was severely reduced. While I was there in 1973, we knew the North Vietnamese were building up, but the South Vietnamese were not expending resources to counter it. It was a very strange situation. Yet in this limbo period, we could move around to many areas freely. These were areas that in my first tour I never would have gone into on the ground or without being accompanied by armed military force. It was kind of a shadow war or a phony war, a kind of a surreal situation.

Q: What were your Vietnamese contacts in your area saying? Were they all saying that when something happens will you get me out or that sort of thing?

MACK: No! No! They were not really saying that. But the Vietnamese military was plainly worried about the drop in US logistical support. When the Americans pulled out, they left their air bases and all the equipment and all the buildings, but clearly the Vietnamese did not have the resources to maintain them. They were restricted in the weapons and the munitions they had available as they were in fuel and parts for vehicles and that sort of thing. They could feel the pinch and I just have to believe that they were feeling lonely and probably wondering if the Americans would come back if the North attacked.

At the same time, they were extremely warm toward me and to my wife who was teaching English in a normal school in Qui Nhon. They were very, very happy to see Americans. I think they took some comfort in that and the fact that I would be there with my spouse.

Q: There was an major North Vietnamese offensive against the South at one point, wasn't there?

MACK: Maybe you are thinking about the 1972 North Vietnamese frontal assault, the so called "Easter Offensive" down Highway I into the South. I can tell you that Quang Tri City, the first provincial capital they came to, was reduced to rubble. My wife and I visited it in 1973. There were no buildings standing above my height. Literally the whole town was wiped out.

Q: Were American reconnaissance planes going over looking at things?

MACK: During my time, they were not flying out of South Vietnam. They may have been flying out of Thailand. Frankly, I just don't recall.

Q: What were you getting from your colleagues? I mean was this a feeling well this is fine, but?

MACK: My colleagues in the highlands were a little more nervous, I remember, and rightly so. I remember driving up to Kon Tum via Pleiku with my wife unescorted in our not so trusty International Harvester Scout. The first leg of the trip, from Qui Nhon to Pleiku, was uneventful. That stretch was at one time known as the "the highway of death". It had been made famous in Bernard Fall's book "Street without Joy" about destruction of the French Army's "Force Mobile" by the Communists during the French Indochina war in the early 50s.

Q: Street Without Joy, yeah!

MACK: But in any event, while we were on the highway from Pleiku to Kon Tum we witnessed a series of air strikes about three miles away. We just stopped the car and stood on our own hood and watched. And then that night in Kon Tum the local forces were constantly shelling with artillery North Vietnamese Army targets about ten or fifteen miles from town.. According to my colleague Richard Mueller who was there, that was not an unusual occurrence.

Q: What were these? Where these to keep people from?

MACK: They were North Vietnamese units in the jungles around Kon Tum. The area was not heavily populated.

Q. Was South Vietnamese Government corruption a big issue where you were here?

MACK: Of course. Not in every province, not all the time. Because from time to time you did have honest people who really wanted to clean house and attempted to. But you did have a tradition of corruption and you also had by virtue of the huge U.S. presence a big potential target for local corruption. Qui Nhon City in Binh Dinh Province in II Corps was a major logistical hub. Three divisions -- two U.S. and one South Korean -- were supported out of the port of Qui Nhon. The opportunity for diversion, whether of fuel, other logistical material or other things like commissary items, was huge. And, therefore, the temptation was enormous. I suppose there was a lot of the same in Europe during World War II..

Q: When I was in Vietnam I ran across someone who had files that went back to World War II that showed there was diversion of gasoline that came through France for our armies.

MACK: Right. And it was huge in Vietnam too. But while I was there in 1973, the allied forces withdrew and opportunities for graft declined. For example, the gasoline pipeline was not full anymore.

Q: But also I was wondering whether you got involved in consular activities? Because when I was Consul General in Saigon we had some problems up in Danang with American civilians.

MACK: Oh Gee! I was the head of the Branch Consulate in Da Nang in 1969 but another junior officer handled those issues, and I don't recall any specific incidents.

Q: What was the background of your wife?

MACK: Well, she comes from a small town called Pleasantville, which is near my hometown of Rye, New York in Westchester County. I didn't know her growing up. I met her in Washington actually when I was going through Foreign Service A-100 course for junior officers in 1966. She was then a Geography teacher at Langley High School in McLean, Virginia. We didn't get married until five years later in 1971. From Langley High School, Sheila had gone off to be a VISTA Volunteer on the Navajo Reservation in Arizona. I shipped out to South Vietnam. We got back together 5 years later when I heard she still wasn't married. She was the kind of gal that's good in any kind of situation, obviously.

Q: What a wonderful introduction to the Foreign Service.

MACK: Well she probably enjoyed Vietnam as much as any place we have ever been since. Never complained at all.

Q: Well you were there six months, how did you feel about the Peace Accords when you left?

MACK: You are asking me thirty-four years after the event and after all sorts of things have happened which will cloud my memory of what happened and when. I was never convinced that the Paris Peace Accords agreement would lead to elections under conditions acceptable to the North. Real free elections in the North would have been impossible in any event. In the south, the Communists would have lost. But clearly the communists never planned on getting to that point. They were simply waiting for the Americans to leave so that could take South Vietnam by military force. Which, of course they did.

Q: You left there when?

MACK: People get confused. I left there in August of 1973. South Vietnam fell in April or May of '75. There were almost two years between my departure and the fall. So, I'm not one of the guys who were plucked from the roof of the Embassy in that dramatic photograph.

Q: The end came rather quickly.

MACK: It came rather quickly but it came in context of the continued reduction of U.S. logistical support and, contrary to the North Vietnamese offensive in 1971, no US air support either. To my knowledge, we provided no air support in final battles in 1975. And by then the South Vietnamese military had been bled down and knew that the Americans were not going to help them this time around. So I think it sapped their will to fight. Some units actually fought very, very well but were simply overwhelmed. But others, particularly in Central Vietnam, crumbled. The fall of the provincial capitals in the highlands turned into rout in the coastal cities as well. People just panicked. Once it started, things collapsed like a house of cards.

THOMAS P. H. DUNLOP
Political Officer
Saigon (1966-1969)

Political Officer
Saigon (1972-1974)

Thomas P. H. Dunlop was born in Washington, DC in 1934. He graduated from Yale University in 1956 and served in the U.S. Air Force overseas from 1957 to 1960. He served in many overseas posts including Yugoslavia, Vietnam, and Korea. He also served in the State Department in Washington, DC. He was interviewed on July 12, 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Tell me how and where this training was conducted at that time, and so forth.

DUNLOP: At that time the Department was still teaching Vietnamese at the Foreign Service Institute in the small group format that developed after World War II in the 1950's. I had already experienced this kind of language training with you in the Serbo-Croatian language class. The Vietnamese language training took place in the "old" FSI building, which now has returned to its former status as a garage in an apartment complex in downtown Rosslyn, VA [Arlington Towers].

The vast expansion in Vietnamese language and area training, which took place later on, had not yet occurred when I studied Vietnamese. I can't remember if we had two or three groups studying Vietnamese at that time. There were four students in a class. There were at least two such classes, there may have been three of them. It was the traditional, audio-visual method of teaching, using the FSI methodology, with much "one on one" memorization, repetition, and the use of tapes.

The primary teacher, who was superb, was named Mr. Quang. We had a linguist who worked on the Chinese language, named Charles Sheehan. He was a legendary, happy, party guy. He left the instruction pretty much to Mr. Quang, which was probably a good thing, because Mr. Quang knew what he was doing.

Q: Could you describe some of the other officers who were going through this training at that time?

DUNLOP: You know, it's a terrible thing to admit this, but I have drawn a "blank" on that subject. I can remember every one of us in the Serbo-Croatian class, who sat around a table with you for a full year. I may remember the members of the Vietnamese class later on.

Q: What did you think that you were going to be assigned to?

DUNLOP: That is a very good question. I think that I had the good sense to know that I didn't have a clue about it. [Laughter] At least, I think that's what I told myself at the time. I remember telling myself that and I hope that I told myself that. For me the Vietnamese language class was going to be a totally new experience. A lot of things that I had done had been new experiences, but not quite so different as in this case. Asia was a totally unknown part of the world to me. I had done little study and reading about Asia. I knew only what the "Reader's Digest" and the "National Geographic," as well as what the news media were saying about the Vietnam War. I had the view that we had gone to fight in Vietnam for a good cause. I would have been hard put to define the cause in other than the broadest of terms, such as "containing communism." I thought that communism was bad. To contain it was not only a good but also a necessary thing to do. I felt that this was being done in a difficult and perhaps dangerous environment. I don't remember thinking of myself as any kind of "noble crusader," like Shane, riding into town to fix some problem. I hope I didn't think that way.

Q: From the professional side, did you feel that this was regarded as a good move by our colleagues in the Foreign Service?

DUNLOP: I think that the young Foreign Service Officers in my class who were studying the Vietnamese language, and I may remember their names soon, had very few reservations about whether this was the right thing to do for our country. Some of us may have had some reservations about whether it was a good thing for us to do, personally. However, we were all "volunteers" at this time. Any such thoughts were probably overlaid by other motives. I am sure that most of us were unmarried, at that time. That was not true with later Vietnamese language students.

So family concerns would have been minimal, although my mother didn't want me to study Vietnamese. However, this was not something that I would lay awake at night worrying about, although she probably did. I think that we all had come into the Foreign Service during the administration of President Kennedy. I believe that I mentioned earlier how motivated I was by the idealism of that time. I think that there was a strong element of that idealism in us. I think that there was also a feeling of "adventure." I remember thinking of that a little bit. This kind of assignment was going to be a very new thing for me to do. There would be challenges, and I might find out something about myself that I would hope I would like when I found out about it.

Q: How did you study Vietnamese? I took a couple of weeks of Vietnamese language training. I was horrified with the tonal aspect of the language. I couldn't tell a word with one tone from a word pronounced in the same way but with a different tone. Both words mean different things.

DUNLOP: That was certainly a problem for me, too. I had a real concern about the tonal aspect of Vietnamese, while not understanding what that actually was. I am a very "unmusical" person. I mean, I enjoy music enormously. Last night I was at a seminar on Brahms and Schoenberg and so forth, because I love to listen to them. However, playing an instrument or singing is a disaster for me. Speaking Vietnamese is really a "performance" for me. You have to get up there and do it.

After I had been in South Vietnam for a little while, I don't think that concern remained. In your case you only studied Vietnamese for a few weeks, and it's not fair to you or anybody to study it for such a short time. However, I think that, once you've studied Vietnamese for a little while, remembering the tones becomes more a matter of memorization than anything else. You have to remember what tone to use. The reproduction of the tone ceases to be a problem. The same sound means different things with different tones. The single syllable sound, "Ma," is a classic example. It means "ghost," "horse," or "mountain," depending on the tone. Does the high, rising tone mean "mountain"? No, it's probably the level tone.

We had excellent teachers. They knew how to "ease" us into Vietnamese as best we could be eased into it. There were some Foreign Service Officers who became superb Vietnamese language officers. But they would have been superb language officers in any language. I certainly was not one of them.

Q: When did you go out to Vietnam?

DUNLOP: I went out in June, 1966.

Q: You were there from June, 1966, to when?

DUNLOP: I was there from 1966 to 1969. The tours for unmarried officers were 18 months long. You had the option to ask for a second tour. Some of us did and some didn't. I did, so I served two tours, back to back, unaccompanied, 18 month tours in Vietnam. In other words, 36 months in all.

Q: So you went there in...

Q: What job did you have when you went out to the Embassy in Saigon?

DUNLOP: I was assigned, and I've always been grateful for this, to the Provincial Reporting Unit in the Political Section. There is an interesting story about that, and I think that it would be told in pretty much the same way by others. Henry Cabot Lodge was Ambassador to South Vietnam twice. He was still Ambassador when I arrived in Saigon in June, 1966. Whatever else Henry Cabot Lodge was, I think that he had some very strong qualities as Ambassador. He was certainly a man who could be fooled once, but not twice. If he was caught by surprise three times, he really didn't want to do that again. He had been in South Vietnam through coups d'etat and times when he had been briefed by the intelligence community and particularly by the military about things which were going to happen. Then he found out that they weren't going that way. He wanted a group of Vietnamese language officers who would be responsive to his direction who could report from the field, directly to him. He felt a need for such a direct channel because he did not trust the reporting from MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam], which had advisors all over the country. They reported through military channels to MACV Headquarters in Saigon. Then MACV Headquarters shared with the Embassy what it felt the Embassy needed to know.

CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] reporting, at that time, I believe, was also mainly focused on what was going on in the "big picture politics" of Saigon. However, Buddhist monks had burned themselves on the streets, the Consulate in Hue was sacked [by a Buddhist mob], and coups d'etat were springing up from nowhere in the woodwork, as it were. So Ambassador Lodge insisted on having a Provincial Reporting Unit established of Vietnamese language speaking Foreign Service Officers.

Q: Harry, who was the chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit?

DUNLOP: The Provincial Reporting Unit was headed by a wonderfully effective Foreign Service Officer, a good supervisor, and substantively very strong person named Dick Teare, Richard W. Teare. I learned an enormous amount about political reporting from Dick Teare. During my previous assignments, although I may have been in a Political Section in Belgrade, I really hadn't done so much traditional political reporting work. In Belgrade there were too many able Political Officers doing it in too confined a sphere of activity. So I really hadn't had much of an opportunity to do much political reporting. Now I had the opportunity and had a wonderful teacher.

Each officer assigned to the Provincial Reporting Unit was given a group of provinces to follow. South Vietnam was divided into 44 provinces and six of what they called "autonomous cities," like Saigon, Dalat, Da Nang, and others. Each of these provinces and cities were administered either by a Province Chief or a Mayor, under the Vietnamese system. The provincial borders were clearly marked on a map, and lines of authority usually didn't cross those provincial borders. Later on, these divisions became blurred but, at the time I arrived in South Vietnam, this was still very much a "vertical system." The Province Chief reported to the Corps Commander, and we'll talk about that in a second. And so the line went, right straight up to Saigon.

Each Provincial Reporter was usually assigned a group of seven or eight, contiguous provinces. In my case it was the provinces of the "Upper Mekong Delta" area South of Saigon. That is the upper part of the Mekong Delta, where it bulges out into a sort of circular area. I had eight provinces to follow, starting just South of Saigon, going down to the Mekong River, then stretched out along the Mekong River on both sides of it. I was supposed to get to know this "Upper Mekong Delta" area as well as I possibly could. I was expected to spend at least 40 percent of my time out in those eight provinces, getting to know people, including Province Chiefs and other Vietnamese officials and American advisors in that area. My job was to establish a friendly and, hopefully, productive relationship with these people, though this was not always easy.

Here I was, an officer coming out of Saigon, asking questions, and then going away. I suppose that, at times, I must have looked like a "spy."

Q: You were the "son of a bitch" from out of town.

DUNLOP: Well, you could be. Even though you take a couple of bottles of Scotch whisky along with you to "present" to people, it didn't overcome all of that suspicion. So that called for one side of the political reporting skills which you had to bring to bear. It wasn't just being buddy buddy with these people. It involved psyching out what approach would establish the kind of confidence that you weren't going to do him in. On the other hand, in some cases what you said was going to get back to senior officers back in Saigon, and maybe even in Washington, about the situation, which may have been different from what these senior officers were reporting. That's why we were supposed to be out there. So this was the "circle" that you had to "square."

It was not always easy, but usually there were ways to get around it. If you couldn't find one person to talk to, you would find somebody else. Later on, when the political situation evolved to the point where there were elections, both for a Constituent Assembly and then for a National Assembly, little political parties, and sometimes not so little ones, would spring up. Keeping in touch with them was one of the traditional tasks of a Political Officer. The job was to go out and find out who was doing what on the political scene. The other side of it, and perhaps it was more important, always involved your impression of the security situation as a political reporting officer. Remember, you had spent six weeks out of the last six months, in Kien Hoa Province, for example. We wanted to know how well we were doing in that area. Although this was very "intuitive" reporting, it was always thought of as very useful back in Saigon.

Q: For one thing, I think that the American military officers assigned to these provinces was sort of "graded" on his particular area as "safer" or not, or "doing better" or not. There was a tendency to "fudge" the reporting. You were going out there without any program responsibility. If things were going badly, OKAY, that's what you reported that you had seen.

DUNLOP: Well, I think that what you said about the military officers assigned in the provinces was also true of civilian "program officers" out there. For example, AID [Agency for International Development] had a program officer in these provinces. Let's take a big program, which was always important and a subject of controversy because of the corruption which inherent in the activity. Let's talk about "refugee relief." This AID officer was providing refugees with rice and housing materials to build or rebuild their homes. There was always going to be an opportunity for local officials to rip this material off and sell it on the black market. The AID program officer's job was to get the houses up and the people fed, with the cooperation of authorities who may have been taking a cut. How he reported that and what he did with that, human nature being what it was, he might not have been quite as frank in reporting how much was being ripped off than others might do who didn't have this program responsibility.

Q: When did you arrive in South Vietnam in 1966?

DUNLOP: On a hot day in June. [Laughter] I remember the heat, as you said.

Q: Well, you met my plane in February, 1969. It was hot then, too! Anyway, Harry, what was the situation in June, 1966, as you saw it, and what were you being told? Also, what was the situation in South Vietnam as a whole and then in your particular area?

DUNLOP: Well, when I stepped off the plane and onto the ground in June, 1966, I was somewhat bewildered. My knowledge of Vietnamese wasn't yet up to speed, and it took me some time to get the view that I now have. However, looking back on it and drawing on whatever else I knew or had experienced at that time, and also by drawing on hindsight, I would say that in June, 1966 the Thieu-Ky Government or, rather, the Ky-Thieu Government at that time, had been in power for some months, after another one of those seemingly endless coups d'etat. We didn't know that this process would be "endless" at that time. It happened to be the last, military coup that took place in South Vietnam before the country fell to the communists in April, 1975.

There were no attempted coups d'etat after that.

One of the objectives of the Political Section was "coup alert" reporting. We really didn't know that there was not going to be any other coup d'etat. A look at recent history in South Vietnam would have suggested to any observer that it was quite likely that there would be another coup d'etat.

This was a time when the political instability which followed the overthrow of the government of President Ngo Dinh Diem, appeared to be still very much to be expected.

Q: Diem was killed...

DUNLOP: In November, 1963. So this was three years after that, a period when there were revolving door governments in Saigon. Prior to March, 1965, the American presence in South Vietnam had been mainly in the advisory and support functions. After that point the American presence changed to an actual, combat role. By the time I arrived in Saigon in June, 1966, the American combat presence was beginning to be felt.

At the time there were still areas of very predominantly Viet Cong influence, which the American forces had yet to penetrate. There were also significant areas where American forces had begun to penetrate and where the security situation, in its broadest terms, was beginning to improve. In late 1964 and early 1965, and this is drawing on hindsight and things I learned after I arrived in Saigon, the South Vietnamese Army had essentially been defeated by the Viet Cong. North Vietnam introduced regular, combat forces into South Vietnam, mainly up in the northern part of South Vietnam closest to North Vietnam, during this period of time. The North Vietnamese thought that they were headed toward a complete victory. In my view, at least, it was the intervention of American combat forces in the spring of 1965 which prevented a communist victory from happening. However, the South Vietnamese military capability had not recovered to any significant degree. The South Vietnamese Armed Forces were still pretty feckless. There were exceptions to that in certain units, certain provinces, and certain areas. However, generally speaking, the South Vietnamese Armed Forces looked at this American military presence with a combination of "Thank God!" and, "Now let them do it." That also was not so evident to those on the ground at the time, but I think that it was true, looking back on it.

The situation which I stepped into when I arrived was one where a beaten South Vietnamese Army had been rescued by the Americans. In various places this was beginning to be significantly apparent. In other places, this was less so. What I experienced during my three years in South Vietnam was more and more of the American presence. When I left South Vietnam in late 1969, I think that the American forces were at their greatest strength, about 550,000 troops.

Certainly, the Nixon administration had announced its policy of a slow but steady "drawdown" of American forces, but it hadn't progressed very far. If you were to take a look back, as we are now doing, at the eight provinces that I had to deal with, two of them had never been subject to strong Viet Cong influence. That was just my good luck. I could always find two provinces about which I could say wonderful things regarding the security situation. Those provinces were An

Why had they been and were they to continue to be so secure? This was because they were provinces controlled by the Hoa Hao sect, a Buddhist sect. We could talk a lot about the Hoa Hao, because it was my job to learn something about them, which I did. Essentially, they were a kind of puritanical or perhaps "reformist" Buddhist sect. They emerged during the French colonial period but did not have any kind of French sponsorship. The French always looked at them as very suspect. Members of the Hoa Hao sect were Vietnamese who wanted to do things in a different way. They did not approve of the lack of political involvement of the Buddhist church, as they saw it. This would not have endeared them to the French, who would have been perfectly happy to see a quiescent Buddhist church from the political point of view.

The Hoa Hao were also unhappy with what they considered the self-serving character of the Buddhist hierarchy, which was very much involved in its own conspiratorial, bureaucratic infighting. The Hoa Hao were different people. They said, "Let's have a church where everybody can have access to God. You don't need a large hierarchy. We will have our priests and administrators out there, to the degree that is necessary, to provide a place for worship. But that's about all." A Hoa Hao Buddhist monk keeps a building intact. There is incense there to burn and an altar to direct his prayers to. He will provide good advice to people if they ask him. However, he's not an intermediary with God. The Hoa Hao "convert" who joins that church can, in effect, converse directly with his God, without any "layering" of intermediaries.

The Hoa Hao movement became quite popular in these two provinces. I'm not sure why it didn't spread further. That's a good question which scholars could investigate some day. Certainly, in these two provinces, which were heavily populated and very prosperous, the Hoa Hao hierarchy and this way of approaching religion had established itself and become very predominant.

The Vietnamese communists made a terrible mistake in dealing with the Hoa Hao. In the years immediately following 1945, they tried to "co-opt" the Hoa Hao movement. The chief "saint" of Hoa Haoism told them, "No," and they killed him. That was one of the grave errors that the communists made, because this act automatically turned the whole sect into very strong, anti-communists. If they found that somebody was a communist, they killed him. No question. So there weren't very many communists in these two provinces.

I'd be very interested in knowing what the VC [Viet Cong, Vietnamese Communists] did with the Hoa Hao areas after the collapse of the Saigon Government in 1975. I've never seen anything written about it. Of course, the North Vietnamese Government was strongly determined to "crush" any dissent in South Vietnam. How did they go about it, how successful were they, and what resistance did they find? I have seen no reporting on this subject.

Anyhow, those were two of "my" provinces. It was fun to go down there.

Q: Were you able to talk to the Hoa Hao? How receptive were they?

DUNLOP: They were very receptive. Of course, they identified us with the anti- communist side of things, naturally enough. They were very worried that the Saigon Government was going to be unable to resist the communists. So that was one aspect that made access to the Hoa Hao good for us.

Once the political situation allowed it, the Hoa Hao also became active in Saigon politics. They elected members of the National Assembly, and we had contact with them there.

Q: You have been speaking of this admirable group. At the same time there was a Buddhist hierarchy in Saigon and elsewhere, which was much more "political" and "self-serving," or however you want to describe them. I would assume that the Buddhist hierarchy would have the ear of the Embassy to some extent, because, obviously, we were trying to "reach out" to all non-communist groups. Did you find yourself sometimes serving, within the Embassy staff, as a kind of "spokesman" for the Hoa Hao? Did you find yourself saying, "Don't let these 'slick' Buddhist monks..."

DUNLOP: You mean the Buddhist monks from the An Quang pagoda. Well, that's a good question. I never thought of my role in that way. Later on I became much more involved with the "city slicker" Buddhists. I thought that the Hoa Hao had a certain "country bumpkin" character. The Hoa Hao sect was out in the country, and Thich Tri Quang [a leading Buddhist monk in the An Quang pagoda group] was in Saigon. Tri Quang was the "symbol" of the politically active Buddhists.

There are a couple of things to say about that as far as the Hoa Hao are concerned. First, the politically most active Buddhists were not in the Mekong Delta area. They were in Central Vietnam, in Hue, Da Nang, along the coast, and in Saigon. For some reason or other those who were further South were never terribly responsive to the leadership of the more prominent figures at the An Quang Pagoda. That was certainly not true in Central Vietnam.

In Central Vietnam you could find traces of the influence of the An Quang Pagoda, as I found out later on when I did some reporting in, say, Nha Trang, or Binh Dinh province. By golly, those supporters of the An Quang Pagoda were very much aware of what was going on in Saigon. They had read the latest bulletins or statements, whatever they were, issued by the An Quang Pagoda. The foreign press tended to represent the outlook of the leaders of the An Quang Pagoda as if it were the outlook of all Buddhists.

Many Buddhists in the southern part of South Vietnam were not Hoa Hao supporters and were not Cambodian Buddhists. The Cambodian Buddhists came from another, large element of the population. They followed a different discipline of Buddhism, which came from Cambodia into Vietnam. The Cambodian Buddhists were much more politically quiescent. I don't think that I ever had to represent the Hoa Hao in a way which would amount to portraying them as opposed to Buddhists sympathetic to the views of the An Quang Pagoda leaders. I think that I performed a useful role in identifying the Hoa Hao group for the senior officers of the Embassy who, perhaps, would never have gotten to know them. So these senior officers had some idea, personally, of a group which was not insignificant, but was located in a limited area of the country.

Regarding "advocacy" on behalf of this or that group of Vietnamese, there weren't any "pro An Quang Pagoda" voices inside the Embassy. [Laughter] You know, Tri Quang had been given asylum in the Embassy. He might have been killed, had he been arrested during a major confrontation with the Saigon Government.

[FYI: In fact, Tri Quang was picked up by Vietnamese Special Forces personnel acting on the order of the Saigon Government under President Diem in August or September, 1963, in an obvious attempt to bring an end to the more or less non-stop anti-government demonstrations then under way at the An Quang and certain other pagodas. President Diem, supported by his brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu, ordered the Vietnamese Special Forces to "raid" the more activist of the Buddhist pagodas and arrest everybody in them. About 20 pagodas out of the total of about 5,000 pagodas in South Vietnam, were raided, and Tri Quang, among others, was picked up. He was briefly interrogated and then released by the South Vietnamese Police, who obviously did not realize who he was. He knew that this was a mistake on the part of the police and he was afraid that the authorities would learn of their mistake, pick him up again, and, perhaps, kill him. When he arrived at the Embassy at night, he applied to the Marine Guard for asylum. The Marine Guard referred the matter to the Embassy Duty Officer, who made the first decision to give him asylum. Ambassador Lodge confirmed the decision to give him asylum on the following day and reported the matter to the Department. When this became known in Washington, it caused a considerable uproar, as the United States normally does not grant asylum to anyone, unless they are in immediate danger of death from an armed mob. Tri Quang was under no such pressure from a mob, but an "order" from Washington to release Tri Quang would have meant directly challenging the position of Ambassador Lodge. President Kennedy appreciated that it was unwise to do this, as he and Lodge had been political opponents in Massachusetts. So Tri Quang was given asylum for about six weeks or so in the office of Jim Rosenthal, one of our Vietnamese language officers, on the second floor (third floor, American style) at the Embassy. Tri Quang's presence quickly became known to the Diem Government, but he was allowed to stay in Jim's office at the Embassy for about six weeks before the Diem Government was overthrown on November 2, 1963, and Diem and Nhu were killed. Tri Quang then left the Embassy and resumed living at the An Quang Pagoda. [End FYI]

Tri Quang never seemed to show any particular gratitude to the Embassy for having saved his butt.

Q: So the Buddhist hierarchy was not on our "pampered" list.

DUNLOP: Oh, they sacked the Consulate up in Hue. There was no reason to do that. It was to demonstrate their power. They wanted to show the rest of the Vietnamese how strong they were. From that point of view, "sacking" the Consulate was probably a good thing to do. It certainly didn't endear them to the Embassy. [FYI: Incidentally, when the Buddhist mob sacked the Consulate in Hue, the building was empty. Tom Corcoran, the Consul, had anticipated this action and moved everyone to Da Nang, where he reopened the Consulate. END FYI]

I had some dealings with the An Quang people later on. We can talk about that when I get to my second tour in Saigon. I'll share my impressions of him in that context in greater detail than now. Like any group of human beings, there were people in the An Quang Pagoda group who were very "self-serving" in the sense that they were opportunistically looking for power and influence.

If kicking the American "butt" was the way to get it, fine. If, by sidling up to the Americans, they could enhance their power and influence, they would do that. There also were some earnest and decent Vietnamese who saw their country being wracked by war. They were trying to find some way to use their Buddhist affiliation to be helpful. Anyway, I never found any of them, although maybe some of them may have fooled me, who really wanted the Viet Cong to win.

Q: Sticking strictly to the Hoa Hao group, were we doing much in the way of providing them with aid or assistance?

DUNLOP: Well, because there was no large, refugee population and conditions were relatively "happy" in the Hoa Hao area, we didn't have a large aid effort. However, we did have the usual AID provincial assistance. I never saw the figures on amounts involved and never thought to look at them in comparison to other provinces. However, I hope that we were smart enough not to give them disproportionately large amounts of aid, just because it was easy to do. I hope we spent the money elsewhere, where it was needed and, perhaps, more difficult to spend effectively.

We had a very conventional provincial structure in the two provinces where there were large numbers of Hoa Hao. We had an Information Officer, whose job was basically to help the province insofar as they needed it and would accept it for "psychological warfare" efforts, although not all of it was probably, technically "psychological warfare." We certainly had an AID [Agency for International Development] officer whose job it was to dispense aid. We had our AID Public Safety Advisers who were almost totally useless there because they were not needed, although they were a part of the standard, organizational structure. We also had a CIA Base in these provinces.

Now part of the Hoa Hao area abutted the Cambodian-Vietnamese border. The Hoa Hao also straddled the Mekong River. The Mekong River was sensitive for many reasons, among which was the fact that, after the South China Sea was pretty much closed by us to waterborne infiltration of communist personnel and supplies, this was an area where the Viet Cong could and did "infiltrate" personnel and supplies from Cambodia into Vietnam. They put these supplies and personnel into sampans, which hid them very well, because the Mekong River was swarming with sampans. So the security side along that river was important, and we finally put armed river patrol boats in there to help the Vietnamese armed forces, who did not have much of a waterborne capability to monitor that traffic.

I went on two operational missions there with the river patrol boats that were being deployed there along the Mekong River. Perhaps I should explain that. It was an interesting aspect of my experience in Vietnam.

Q: Let me stop for just a second.

Q: Perhaps we could continue with your description of operations on the Mekong River in South Vietnam.

DUNLOP: I would like to comment on operations on the Mekong River, which was always of concern. First of all, it's a huge river system, composed really of two branches of the great Mekong: the Cao Tong(?) and the Bassac. Secondly, these two rivers are connected and interconnected throughout much of their length..

Q: The river is called the Mekong...

DUNLOP: By the time it reaches Vietnam it has divided into two rivers, beginning right about the Cambodian-Vietnamese border. Each of these two rivers looks like about 10 Potomac Rivers together. Much of the commerce of the area moves up and down the river, of course. It's a powerful economic factor. Because it's so big and because there's always so much traffic on it, it was one way in which the North Vietnamese communists could gain access further and further South, into Cambodia. They could bring in supplies and personnel down the "Ho Chi Minh Trail" in North Vietnam and Laos and then ship them into South Vietnam.

I can't give you the exact time but I believe that it was probably the winter of 1966-1967 or, perhaps, the spring of 1967, when the U.S. Navy was ordered to operate on the Mekong River with a newly-developed type of river patrol boat. They were called "Patrol Boat, River" or PBR. They looked something like World War II torpedo boats, but they had a different role. For one thing, they were intended for use in fresh water and therefore had a very shallow draft. Secondly, they used a newly developed water turbine engine which drew in water from near the bow and pushed it out from the stern. They developed high speeds and were highly maneuverable. They were designed for river warfare on the Mekong River and so were armored and had lots of guns on them. These guns were more or less in the category of "small arms," but they had a lot of guns on board. They had .50 caliber and .30 caliber machine guns and grenade launchers. They carried a crew of five and up.

The U.S. Navy set up a PBR base in Vinh Long province, next to the provincial capital of Chao Doc Province, which, in turn at that time, was next to An Giang province. Vinh Long province was not completely dominated by the Hoa Hao. It had some Hoa Hao supporters in it, but they were not the majority of the people. The purpose of the river boats was to assist the Vietnamese National Police. At that time the Vietnamese National Police had responsibility for security on the Mekong River. They had a few police boats, but they were really very ineffectual, and were probably subject to being "bought off" by the Vietnamese communists, anyway.

So here came the Americans, who said to themselves, "We're going to 'fix' this situation, huh?" Well, they were good guys, wonderful guys. I got to know the U.S. Navy people down there very well. They were very sensitive to the fact that this was going to be the first time that armed, American forces would be on the Mekong River, that most of the traffic on the river was totally "legitimate," and that only a fraction of the boat people were composed of communists. However, the U.S. Navy people knew that it was important to try to figure out how to tell the difference.

The U.S. Navy developed some rather sophisticated operational orders about how they would conduct their operations after the evening curfew. We decided that there was nothing that we could do during the day. There was just too much traffic on the river. However, we thought that the Navy patrols could help to enforce a curfew at night. One could argue, as I heard it argued, "Well, if you have a curfew, it will be 100% effective because the communists won't come down at night. They'll just come down during the day." Anyway, the idea was to start off with a curfew at night.

So the provincial authorities in the provinces along the Mekong River, under orders from the Vietnamese Government in Saigon, proclaimed a curfew on the river after something like 8:00 PM. Vietnamese boats were ordered off the river. Anybody who was on the river at night wasn't to be "sunk" but was subject to being stopped and subjected to a rigorous search. This meant boarding such boats. The U.S. Navy PBR's were going to help with this effort. To start off with, the U.S. Navy members of the PBR crews realized that no U.S. Navy officer or crewman spoke Vietnamese. This enormously complicated their task. Also, there was a question of Vietnamese sovereignty. It may not have been appreciated in the U.S. that the Vietnamese Government always considered itself a sovereign government. Some of the American opponents of our policies in Vietnam, such as Prof. George Kahin of Cornell University, used to say that the Republic of Vietnam "did not have the least attribute of sovereignty." This was an extremist view, of course. In fact, it had virtually every aspect of sovereignty. The South Vietnamese Government was always very sensitive to things which impinged, particularly publicly, on its sovereignty. This was about as public an infringement as you could get. This would be like having Vietnamese cops down on Ward Circle, in the District of Columbia, directing traffic, this might be seen as suggesting that we weren't capable of directing traffic on Ward Circle.

So then the idea was to put a Vietnamese policeman who could speak English on each PBR. This was a good idea. In fact, I promoted this idea to some degree, although I don't think that I was a key figure in getting it adopted. I certainly supported it and made sure that the Ambassador knew about it and that he understood why it could be important. So they did this. Then the question that came up was, "How was this working?" The U.S. Navy said that it was "wonderful." I had some doubts, so I was asked, and I would have done so, anyway and made it a part of my business in any case, to find out how well this system was working.

Well, one way to find out was to go out on some of these PBR patrols. These were "combat" missions, and we weren't supposed to go on "combat" missions. I asked a couple of "what if" questions of my boss, Dick Teare, back in the Embassy: "What if one of us went out on a PBR?" We knew what the rules were. However, I figured that I should go out on a PBR and see what happened. I should explain at this point that Brian Kirkpatrick, a very capable officer who went through Vietnamese language training with me and who spoke Vietnamese quite well, was covering other Mekong Delta provinces. We decided that for this particular operation of going on the PBR that there should be two of us, so each of us could tell his version of events. It's a little bit like going into a bordello to check on the health of the prostitutes. It's good to have somebody with you to confirm your story. That's one reason why you might want to go into the bordello. There were some funny jokes about it.

Anyway, Brian Kirkpatrick and I both went down to the PBR base in Vinh Long and asked the Lieutenant Commander in charge of these operations, whom we got to know very well, to let us go on two or three PBR operations. He said, "Do I have to tell anybody?" I said, "No." He asked again, "Are you sure?" I said, "Yes." So we went on two PBR operations. They were wonderful experiences, though a little bit scary, because the job was not just to stay on the main channel of the Mekong River but to go up some canals leading away from it. One side of the river was a lot more secure than the other, so we went up the canals on the less secure side. The PBR's did get into some firefights, and some people were wounded. However, not on the early patrols that we went on. Our job was to sit there, like a fly on a wall. So there were two extra guys on a boat that was supposed to have a crew of five or so people. Our job was to watch what happened when the PBR pulled up to a sampan on the river or canal. Maybe you might say that this was useless, because the Navy wouldn't behave improperly when we were around. I didn't think that way. I thought that they would do pretty much what they normally did, anyway.

So we went out on the river. On the first night we intercepted three boats and stopped them. Two of them were on the river and claimed that they simply had not known about the curfew. They said, "Curfew? What curfew?" Well, they seemed to be legitimate. At least, if the persons on the two sampans were not legitimate, at least their cargo was. There was nothing in their cargo of any interest to us. The third boat, interestingly enough, was carrying a badly wounded, Vietnamese woman across the river to a hospital. She was from the "bad" security side of the river. There had been some fighting over there. Her family rented a sampan and was taking her across the river to the hospital. Of course, that seemed OK.

I went back to the Embassy and said, "Look, better to have a Vietnamese policeman on the PBR than not. The U.S. Navy PBR crew seems to know what they are doing."

Q: Were you or others getting reports about Viet Cong supplies and personnel coming into South Vietnam on the Mekong River?

DUNLOP: Oh, yes. Lots of them. In fact, the Vietnamese Police would intercept some of this traffic. Usually, they did not discover this on the water. It had been "offloaded" and moved away some distance from the river bank. They had their intelligence agents, who would report something like, "If you happen to stop in such and such a hamlet and look into the third sampan on the left, you'll find some mortar shells in there."

Whether this effort had any significant effect, I don't know. It was like a lot of the things that we did. It probably had some effect.

Q: What about some of the other areas that you say were affected by communist activity?

DUNLOP: One of the areas involved was the two provinces just South of Saigon, on National Route 4, Long An and Dinh Tuong provinces. Both of these provinces were areas where the Viet Cong were conducting a lot of operations and had been of high security concern to the Vietnamese Government. This was partly because, if the communists ever "cut" Route 4, it would cut off the supply of rice to Saigon. The rivers run East-West. Route 4 ran North-South. There might have been other ways to get the rice into Saigon from the producing areas farther South, but rice is a heavy and bulky commodity to transport. Rice was the absolutely crucial food for that part of the world. There were other things as well: fish and pigs, for example. The Mekong Delta produced huge numbers of pigs and amounts of rice. The Mekong Delta was so fertile. Stu, you've flown over it, I'm sure. It's so gorgeous and so fertile. They say that, if you drop a lead pencil there, three things happen. First, a tree will grow [from the wood], a rubber tree will grow [from the eraser on the tip], and a lead tree will grow [from the lead]. [Laughter] So it was important to keep that route open. Long An and Dinh Tuong were both provinces where there were some "bad" areas, particularly to the West of Route 4, which abutted on the famous "Plain of Reeds." The Plain of Reeds was an area which the French had never gotten around to draining and turning into a fertile area to raise crops.

This area remained largely swampy. It was not heavily populated and was a significant Viet Cong "base" for operations against Route 4, the rest of the Mekong Delta, and Saigon itself. It was not all of that far from Saigon.

So I was assigned Long An and Dinh Tuong provinces. Long An had long been the subject for special projects, such as Operation "Sunrise," or the construction of strategic hamlets. All of these bright ideas had failed, not so much because they weren't any good, though some were not as good as others, but because of the way they were implemented. The South Vietnamese Government wasn't doing things the right way.

Long An province was the first place that the United States Government, in its wisdom, decided to deploy U.S. combat forces in IV Corps, other than the river patrol boats which I have mentioned and which did not involve large numbers of troops. I spent a lot of time arguing against this deployment, which I likened to "shoveling sand into a strong wind." I said this to anybody who would listen, and to many people who didn't want to listen. Well, that's not quite true. People listened politely. The U.S. military listened politely, they always listened politely. I said that it seemed to me, in my "wisdom," that the place for American combat forces was up in the highlands of Central Vietnam, up in I Corps, the five northernmost provinces of South Vietnam, up there where there were regular, North Vietnamese Army units which had been operating there since 1965. I said that another, suitable area for the operations of U.S. forces was along the "bad" coastal provinces, such as Binh Dinh and Quang Ngai, but not in the Mekong Delta. For operations in the Mekong Delta, the Vietnamese forces could handle them with our help and if they handled them in the right way.

But, no, we decided to put in our heavy military units in the Mekong Delta area. We wound up having the "atomic cannon" in Dinh Tuong province!

Q: Are you kidding?

DUNLOP: I am not kidding. This was a 280 mm cannon which could fire nuclear rounds. To me that was a supreme symbol of idiocy. We had this damn gun and wanted to deploy it. So we deployed it.

Q: What was it used for? Did it ever fire?

DUNLOP: It was deployed to fire into Kien Tuong province, where the swampy communist base areas were. But bombardment of these areas could have easily been handled by B-52 aircraft, and was bombed on various occasions.

One of the little figures that I got was that this gun had such a muzzle velocity that, when it was fired, it would tear the tin plate roofs off Vietnamese houses half a mile away.

Q: I remember nuclear artillery when I was in Germany. They had to clear the traffic to move it around. It would fire a shell, perhaps, about 25 miles away, or something like that.

DUNLOP: Those guns may have some use, particularly for firing nuclear weapons in a special, tactical situation. However, this was not one of the first things that we should have been doing. It was one of the latter idiocies that we did. And I don't think that everything that the U.S. military did in Vietnam was either useless or idiotic.

However, I lost the argument, if anybody even noticed that it had been made. Actually, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker was very much against the deployment of this nuclear artillery piece.

Q: Where did the pressure come from for bringing this equipment to South Vietnam?

DUNLOP: It was a curious situation. You know, the South Vietnamese were basically concerned about the security of Saigon. The cannon was deployed in the southern area around Saigon. Route 4 went straight through the middle of Long An and Dinh Tuong provinces. On the right hand side of Route 4, which, if you were going South, would mean to the West of the road, the security situation was "dicey." The Viet Cong had a readily accessible base area not far from the Vietnamese border with Cambodia. That was the swampy area in Kien Tuong we have mentioned previously. At that time this base area was to be the southern terminus of the "Ho Chi Minh Trail." It hadn't quite gotten that far yet, but the trail was about to be completed to that point.

This had long been an area where the Viet Cong had found refuge. They had base camps, hospitals, and so forth there. It was a threat to Saigon and to the heavily populated area along Route 4. That was it. As long as we didn't think that the 7th ARVN [Armee du Vietnam, Vietnamese Army] Division was up to defending this area, and the provincial authorities seemed to be competent or incompetent, in varying degrees, here came the Americans who said that they would solve the problem for the Vietnamese.

At one time we had two whole divisions or major elements of two whole divisions in the Mekong River Delta Area. We mainly had deployed to the Mekong Delta the U.S. 9th Infantry Division, plus one brigade from another U.S. division, probably from an Airborne Division. Imagine, deploying an Airborne Division in the Mekong Delta area! Anyway, we did it.

The First Brigade of the 9th Infantry Division was the first major unit to be deployed to the Mekong Delta area. I still had my responsibilities in Long An province. After having argued against deploying this brigade in there, I made it my business to do a really thorough job, as best I could, in reporting on the impact of this deployment. In other words, how the Vietnamese population view it, how the American troops behaved, and what impact they had on the situation, once they got in there.

I spent a lot of time during the latter half of the time that I was following developments in those seven provinces South of Saigon, worrying about the heavy American troop presence in Long An and Dinh Tuong provinces. Since these two provinces were close to Saigon, it was relatively easy for me to get down there. I probably exceeded our 40 percent "target" of travel outside of Saigon by quite a lot during those days. Nobody ever kept close track of how much time I spent down there.

Q: The main idea was to get you out of town.

DUNLOP: Right. To get out of town, and then come back to Saigon, write up my account of my trip, and talk to people in the Embassy. I would also do some shopping at the Commissary and plan the next trip. Planning the next trip was something of a problem for a while, because I had to go and "bum" rides in helicopters and so forth. Later on Air America [an air transportation company wholly owned by the CIA] developed something close to a scheduled flight system. They had regular courier flights to some places. You could even reserve space on these flights. You would go out to Saigon airport, sign a "chit," and get a ticket! However, in the early days, shortly after I arrived in Saigon, you went out to Tan Son Nhut airport and stood there at the Operations Desk until a flight going to where you wanted to go became available. Or, if there was no flight going to where you wanted to go but could get you relatively closer to your final destination, you might take the alternative and then try to fly on to your ultimate objective. So a lot of time was spent in making travel arrangements.

Long An and Dinh Tuong were a focus of a lot of my attention during the latter part of my first tour in South Vietnam, when the American forces were deployed there. I remember traveling a lot. I remember one conversation, because it was encouraging. Not all of the things that I heard about the American troops were "bad," and here is one of the more positive stories. It is rather typical of what provincial reporters did, me and others. In Long An, near the U.S. 9th division base, there was a little Vietnamese Buddhist pagoda, not a Hoa Hao or Cao Dai pagoda, off one of the roads that I often drove on. To get there, you turned East off Route 4, going toward where the U.S. Army encampment was. I had long thought about stopping off there and talking to the local bonze (Buddhist priest). On this particular day, that is what I did. I had enough time to do it.

Q: What is a "bonze"?

DUNLOP: A "bonze" is a Buddhist priest or monk. I don't know where the word comes from. [Webster's Unabridged Dictionary says that it is a French word derived from the Portuguese word, "bonzo," defined as a Japanese or Chinese Buddhist monk.] However, the chief bonze would have one or two people working with him. They had very nice, though modest living quarters. These little Buddhist pagodas were often well maintained. They would have things like carp and lily ponds, and always a bell. You were always received with exquisite courtesy. They really didn't know who the hell you were. However, Vietnamese bonzes were genuinely hospitable. You would be given a cup of tea and maybe some cake.

Anyhow, I remember the conversation on this particular occasion. This bonze was a very interesting man. I often stopped in to see him later on, because I had gotten to know him. I would bring him little presents from Saigon, and so forth. Even in our first conversation it turned out that he had been there for 25 years! He wasn't very young. I introduced myself. He nodded politely. He asked me if I wanted to speak French. I said that, if he could stand my "bad Vietnamese," why not try that. So this conversation was conducted in Vietnamese.

In due course I asked him about the American soldiers at the 9th Division encampment and what people thought about that. Without hesitating at all, he said, "Let me explain something to you. Your forces have moved into the same cantonment, the same barracks, which the Senegalese troops from the French Union forces occupied when the French were here." He said this, suggesting that this was supposed to enlighten me a lot. In fact, it began to enlighten me a little bit. The Senegalese were black African troops in the French Army. They weren't in the Foreign Legion but they served all over the French Empire. They were renowned as tough fighters. The Senegalese were rough soldiers, big and black. They include some of the tallest people in West Africa. I asked what conclusions I should draw from that comment. He said, "Your soldiers are not like the Senegalese. They are different." I thought to myself, "I'm glad of that, I think." He said, "There are a lot of blacks in your Army, aren't there?" I said, "Yes." He said, "But they're not like the Senegalese." I didn't go into any great detail on what the Senegalese who had been stationed at that encampment actually did. However, this was a favorable comparison.

I said, "Surely, the people must have some concern, since many Americans are so black and may look like the Senegalese from a distance. This must raise some apprehensions." He said, "Oh, yes, of course. However, we Vietnamese know how to distinguish people from people. There are always good people and there are always bad people. We try not to draw conclusions without knowing which is which." I believe that what he said was true, and it was one of the times when this view was articulated for me by a Vietnamese. I think that this was not an untypical point of view and attitude. This is one of the reasons why I grew to like and respect the Vietnamese as much as I did. I think that, no matter how badly we foreigners look, how badly we smell, and how clumsily we act, we're still going to be viewed as members of the human race.

Q: How well equipped and prepared do you think that the 9th Division was to fight the war in Vietnam? I'm not necessarily talking about equipment so much as attitude and so forth. You had been in Vietnam for a while, by this time.

DUNLOP: What was usually the case, when an American unit would first move into some place in Vietnam, is that they would be extremely well briefed. The commanders, the officers, and the soldiers would be well briefed. They would be made to understand as well as they could be made to understand that they were "guests" in the country, that not all "slopes" were enemies, and all that good stuff.

Q: "Slopes" is a term used for people whose eyes have a different shape and who may be Asians.

DUNLOP: The term "Gooks" comes from our experience during the Korean War. The word for Korean in the Korean language is "Hankuk." So when Koreans might tell an American, "Me Hankuk," he was a "gook." This effort to brief the troops and to sensitize, if you can, this gigantic, military machine just didn't have much staying power. The replacements for the troops initially deployed weren't briefed. That was also of interest, politically and from a security point of view.

For example, the Americans did not understand that Cambodians and Vietnamese are ethnically totally different. They look different from each other. The Cambodian and Vietnamese languages have no relationship to each other. The Cambodian variety of Buddhism, and, perhaps, the Cambodians are even more active in their religion than the Vietnamese are, is called "Hinayana" [Lesser Vehicle] or "Theravada" Buddhism. I'm not sure that I can tell you much about what the differences are between "Hinayana" and "Mahayana" [Greater Vehicle], the Buddhist faith which the Vietnamese practice. "Mahayana" Buddhism developed in China and came South with the Vietnamese. "Hinayana" Buddhism came into China from India "Mahayana" around through Tibet or somehow up North. It took a northern route. "Hinayana" Buddhism went due East from India, through Burma, Thailand, and Cambodia. There are differences between the two variants in doctrine, and Buddhist recognize these differences. However, Buddha is Buddha, and he is considered wonderful for both of the followers of these variants, but they have different ways of going about things.

For example, Tri Quang and his Vietnamese followers adopted the brownish general garb of a Mahayana or Vietnamese Buddhist. Monks' robes in Cambodia are always saffron yellow in color. That is a very superficial view. The Cambodian Buddhists do much more singing or chanting, which is wonderful to hear. The Cambodian Buddhists have choirs. There is something of that in the Mahayana Buddhist faith, but it is not such a feature of their ceremonies. It is very attractive to go into a Cambodian Buddhist temple and hear them say, "Oh, you must hear our choir." And they will trot it out. Then 10 people will sit down, of course, always men and often young, and chant beautifully, in an a cappella way. It's something like Gregorian chant.

The southern provinces of South Vietnam were entirely inhabited by Cambodians at one time, because the Cambodians were there before the Vietnamese came. The Vietnamese invaded the Mekong Delta from the North. They pushed the Cambodians out of this territory. Of course, they don't like each other. There is an ancient tradition of dislike for each other. The Cambodian Buddhists were stranded in southern Vietnam and live as if they were in an enclave. They are cut off now by a sea of Vietnamese who swept on through the Mekong Delta. The Hinayana Buddhists in southern Vietnam now have very little contact with Cambodia. At various times during the Vietnam War some Americans had some ideas about recruiting some of the Hinayana Buddhists for use as mercenaries in the fighting in Cambodia. It didn't work out very well. The terms "Khmer Serai" or "Khmer Krom" [Cambodians from the far southern area of Vietnam] were used to describe Cambodians recruited for this effort. I know very little about all of that but I don't think that it worked very well.

The Cambodians living in South Vietnam basically wanted to duck out of the way of the fighting. They considered this a Vietnamese war. It turned out that for them a Vietnamese is a Vietnamese, and the color of his politics didn't much matter. They figured that they were going to get the short end of the stick, no matter how it turned out. I don't think that the Cambodians living in South Vietnam ever gave any comfort to the Vietnamese communists. They certainly didn't cooperate more than they had to with the GVN [Government of South Vietnam]. They just wanted to cultivate their own garden. Unfortunately, life in the world didn't exactly allow them to do that. The Cambodians living in South Vietnam were always very hospitable to us. I think that it's just part of their culture. They may have been even better disposed toward us than they may have been otherwise. The Cambodians always looked at the French as their "protectors" from the Vietnamese. Maybe they felt that some day we might play that same role for them. I don't think that we ever saw ourselves in that role.

It was the French who drew the border that separated Vietnam from Cambodia. It was the French who said to the Vietnamese, "Stay on your side of the border." Of course, the Vietnamese generally did this until 1971 [the time of the Vietnamese-American "incursion" into Cambodia]. [FYI: Prince Sihanouk would never agree with this statement. During the period from 1958 to 1965 he regularly claimed that the South Vietnamese continued to "invade" Cambodia, although he made no mention of the substantial sales of rice and other resources which he made to Viet Cong and North Vietnamese installations in the border area. He and his wife, Princess Monique, personally profited from the sale of these supplies to the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese. END FYI] The Khmer say that in 1976 the Vietnamese continued their "rapacious" incursions into Khmer territory.

Q: Let's cover the period prior to the communist "Tet" offensive against South Vietnam in January, 1968. Prior to this time, what was your impression and what were you reporting back to Washington on the strength and capabilities of the Viet Cong? Was that in opposition, say, to what we were getting from our other sources?

DUNLOP: A good question. I have an anecdote to tell on this subject. I was due for home leave in January, 1968. I wanted to take my home leave, and the Department knew that I was coming back to Saigon for a second tour. I was asked to stop being a Provincial Reporter and to come back to Saigon and head the Provincial Reporting Unit. I had come up to Saigon, I guess, in about September, 1968, leaving "my" provinces to somebody else. The chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit was supposed to continue to travel a bit and "keep his hand in," as it were. However, he would go to all of the Staff Meetings and had administrative responsibilities, which were more burdensome than for the Provincial Reporters. So I began to attend the Thursday morning meetings of the Mission Council in my exalted, new capacity as chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit. I think that there was a more restricted meeting of this kind on Tuesdays.

The Mission Council was composed of the senior officers of the Mission, meeting under the direction of the Ambassador, to discuss and coordinate reporting and policy matters of general interest. We always started out with a military briefing. I was due to go on home leave on January 23, 1968. I had a plane ticket for the last flight out of Saigon on the afternoon of January 23, 1968. I had absolutely no intention of attending the Mission Council meeting on that morning. I considered myself on leave as of midnight the night before. However, lo and behold, something came up on the agenda for the Staff Meeting, and my boss asked me to be there for the Mission Council meeting. So I packed my bags and got ready so that I could leave shortly after that meeting.

So I went to the Mission Council meeting on January 23, 1968. I think that this was five days before the "Tet" offensive began. The commander of the U.S. 25th Division was present at the meeting. I've forgotten his name. Anyhow, the 25th Division was stationed due North and West of Saigon. That was the division under whose headquarters the great Viet Cong "tunnel complex" was built near Cu Chi [Binh Duong Province] which the Vietnamese communists now take great pleasure in bringing American tourists to Vietnam to see. The comic strip, "Doonesbury," by Gary Trudeau, has mentioned this during the last few weeks. The commanding general was at the Mission Council meeting and gave us a briefing. Much of the discussion was over what kind of "alert posture" we should have and what kind of "alert posture" we should urge the Vietnamese Government to adopt over the "Tet" period [Vietnamese New Year's holiday], because "Tet" was coming up in about five days, on January 28 and 29.

I remember that Mission Council meeting fairly clearly. First, a couple of general statements. There was a lot of information about something "big" coming down the pike. The question was whether it would be concentrated in one place. The intelligence dilemma at that time, as I recall it, that we had a base in western Quang Tri province near the Laotian border [Khe Sanh], concerning which we often heard reports. There was a lot of attention devoted to this base. It was being supplied by air, and a lot of people were saying that it was like the siege of Dien Bien Phu [the French base in Lai Chau province near the Laotian border which was overwhelmed and captured by the North Vietnamese in May, 1954]. The North Vietnamese Army had thrown two regular divisions against Khe Sanh. Although it was holding well, and all of that, there was always a worry about whether they would throw three divisions against it, seeking the gargantuan political victory which Dien Bien Phu had been for them.

Some people said that these indications of a "big attack" were centered on the attack on Khe Sanh. None wanted another "Dien Bien Phu" victory for the communists to boast about. Some people said that all these other reports of something "big" coming up were intended to divert our attention from Khe Sanh. Other people said that Khe Sanh could hold out anyway. The reports of attacks elsewhere had to be taken very seriously. A course of action was discussed at that meeting which was later made into a decision, following those and other discussions. It was decided that U.S. forces in I Corps, where Khe Sanh was, would go on "increased alert" over the Tet holidays. It was also decided that we would urge the South Vietnamese NOT to have their usual stand down from operations over the Tet holidays. I believe that was done, and I believe that in I Corps the South Vietnamese did not have their usual holiday stand down.

I left Saigon on the afternoon of January 23, 1968, and was not there during the Tet offensive period, which began at about midnight January 28. So I have no stories about the Tet attack on the Embassy to tell, although I learned at second hand about what had happened after I returned from home leave.

The American forces canceled their planned stand down in I Corps for the Tet period. However, I understand that the Vietnamese forces did stand down elsewhere in South Vietnam, with unfortunate results, particularly in towns like Hue. The whole town was taken by the North Vietnamese. The U.S. didn't have any military forces in Hue [Thua Thien province]. The cities of Nha Trang and Da Nang, where we had forces, were not taken by the communists, but they were attacked. In Saigon, where we had forces, the city wasn't taken, although the Embassy was attacked and there was heavy fighting on the southern edge of Cholon, the sister city to Saigon. The North Vietnamese deployed a larger military force in the southern part of South Vietnam than ever before, and their Viet Cong auxiliaries were able to do quite a lot of damage for a short period of time. So that's what I remember. I remember the Mission Council meeting at which these issues were being discussed. I remember concern being expressed and a decision to keep the U.S. forces on alert status throughout South Vietnam.

So I caught my plane and learned about the Tet offensive when I was staying in a friend's cottage in the Cascade Mountains. He came up to the cabin at about 5:00 AM, holding a transistor radio which had very poor reception. He said, "The communists have attacked and taken the Embassy in Saigon!"

Q: Of course, they hadn't. They didn't get into the main building, although they got into one of the annexes where the Consular Section was located.

DUNLOP: I'll tell you one story, which I believe is true. First of all, E. Allen Wendt was the Embassy Duty Officer on the night of the attack on the Embassy.

Q: I am interviewing him now.

DUNLOP: OK. He will tell you that the communist sapper squad didn't get into the Embassy. He was lying on the floor and had an open telephone line back to Washington. Have you talked to him about this? He was talking to Phil Habib, then Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs.

Q: He mentioned this incident, though he didn't mention talking to Phil Habib. He mentioned that he had Washington on the line.

DUNLOP: Then if it wasn't Phil Habib that he was talking to, it was somebody else. He was telling Washington that the Embassy had not been taken. AP [Associated Press] was reporting that it had been. The Department actually "patched" the AP Bureau Chief in Washington, D. C., to talk to Allen Wendt. I may have this wrong.

Q: I'll go back and ask him about this.

DUNLOP: Go ahead. I've been dining off this story since then. I understood that Phil Habib was on the phone in the Department. He got so teed off, if that's the polite word; it's probably an understatement, that the AP was getting the story wrong. He had arranged for the AP Bureau Chief in Washington to get patched into the phone to talk to Allen Wendt, the Embassy duty officer in Saigon. Wendt said that the Embassy had not been taken, although it was still under attack, and the garden surrounding it had not yet been cleared of communist sappers. Wendt said, "Well, I'm inside the Embassy, and you ought to believe me." The AP Bureau Chief said that, "My guys are outside the Embassy, and I believe them."

Q: Well, I'll check on that with Allen Wendt. What were your impression of the strength of the Viet Cong? Going back to the time just before the "Tet" offensive, when you left Saigon on home leave, by this time you were in charge of the Provincial Reporting Unit.

DUNLOP: I had a lot of experience. That's a legitimate question. I'll tell you what I felt. I was very upset, and most of the Provincial Reporting Officers were upset with General Westmoreland's claims of victory in a triumphal march through the U.S. when he went back in November, 1967. He addressed Congress. He told them all of those splendid things about the American soldiers, which I didn't object to. Mostly, they did their job and did it as well as they were allowed to do it. However, his story that we had secured a triumph of "good" over "evil" and that South Vietnam had already been "secured" just wasn't true. It hadn't been "secured." At that time none of us could say, "We're going to pay a triple price for claims like this, because the 'Tet' offensive is going to make this claim look even more feckless and stupid." We thought that this claim was feckless and stupid enough because the situation simply did not merit that kind of claim, although we could not prove it. We were still involved in fighting a very difficult fight.

It is true that some fundamentally "good things" had happened. If the war didn't have two sides, political and military, we would have won the military side a long time before. However, there was also the political side of things. One aspect was establishing the framework of a representative government. Later on it was my job to report directly on the National Assembly and on what was going on in the overall, political structure of the country. Clearly, progress had been made away from the unstable, ineffective, and heavy handed rule of President Ngo Dinh Diem and those who followed him. President Nguyen van Thieu and Vice President Nguyen Cao Ky were no angels, but they had some legitimacy in the eyes of a lot of Vietnamese, because they had subjected themselves to a reasonably open, electoral process.

We haven't talked about the elections, but we had a lot to do with observing them. This was very much a part of my job. Elections were held in September, 1966, for the Constituent Assembly, which was then to debate and adopt a new Constitution. Then, in September, 1967, elections were held to choose a new National Assembly, which would then ratify the Constitution. Although South Vietnam was no Jeffersonian democracy, we saw some significant improvement.

However, on the military side, the presence and activities of the North Vietnamese Army [PAVN, or People's Army of Vietnam] were greater than ever. They were introducing artillery, which they had never had before. There was a long way to go, militarily.

Q: What about the elections? What were your observations concerning them?

DUNLOP: I felt that they had been well conducted and were basically as portrayed by the U.S. and Vietnamese Governments as representing something that the Vietnamese wanted to do and did do, despite Viet Cong attempts to disrupt them. Over time the elections had the desired effect, although they did not have a perfect, immediate effect.

I observed both of these elections. While the elections campaigns were going on, they had the highest priority that the Political Section had, as is usually the case in most Embassies. Both the Internal Political Unit and the Provincial Reporting Unit were reporting on the campaign, from their respective viewpoints. I felt that the elections which the Provincial Reporting Officers and I observed were handled very well. There were some attempts made by the communists to disrupt them. Although the Viet Cong threatened "total disruption" of the elections, I think that they backed off because they realized that they didn't have the power to do it. A "failed" attempt to disrupt the elections, to the extent that they had probably hoped to accomplish, would be worse for them than an erratic and inconclusive effort. Making the threats, then seeing the elections held, and then saying that it didn't matter would only reflect negatively on their power. We never received any documentation of this apparent communist decision to let the elections go forward, although maybe someone has it now. I think that this is what happened.

The Constituent Assembly elections of 1966 were real elections, they were really fought, and there was determined campaigning. There were candidates in the Hoa Hao area of the southern part of South Vietnam. There were campaigns in the Hoa Hao and mixed Hoa Hao and other areas, which had every aspect of a genuine campaign for the attention of the people. The vote was essentially unfettered, and the people voted in large numbers. They were not "herded" to the polls. Maybe the people did not have huge expectations for automatic and instantaneous improvements in their daily lives, but they certainly didn't think that the elections would hurt their interests.

Q: What was your impression during the period prior to the "Tet" offensive of the rather "fancy" infrastructure on the U.S. side of "CORDS" [Civilian Operations and Revolutionary Development Support] and the "HES" program [Hamlet Evaluation System], which sought to identify which hamlets were free of communist influence and which ones were not? Particularly when Robert McNamara was Secretary of Defense, and this was later carried on by his successors. There was a very fancy attempt to develop a numerical system for determining how we were doing. In a way, the Provincial Reporting Unit was designed to take an "outsider's" view of this. How did you feel about this?

DUNLOP: Well, I'm not exactly sure about the timing here. I think that the "CORDS" and "HES" systems were developed after the Tet offensive. Some improved coordination of the civilian effort in the provinces was badly needed. So the development of the "CORDS" structure was badly needed. Until then, each of the agencies contributing funds for political, economic and social development in South Vietnam, including CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], with its Station in Saigon and its people running around the provinces; AID [Agency for International Development], with its program people moving around the provinces; USIA [United States Information Agency], with its information assistance programs and its people moving around in the provinces; and the District Advisers, who were U.S. military officers but had the key U.S. relationship with the Vietnamese District Chief, who was also a military officer, all of them reported through different channels. The District Adviser reported to MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam]; the USIA adviser reported to the head of USIS [United States Information Service] in Saigon, Barry Zorthian; the CIA people reported back to the Chief of Station in Saigon, whoever he was; and the AID people reported back to whoever was the AID Mission Director in Saigon, whoever he was, he may have been Ted Mann, although I am not sure of this.

Robert Komer [Deputy Chief of MACV for CORDS affairs], a hard-driving, bureaucratically smart, and very effective leader, was charged with putting this all together. I've just been running across this period in the FOIA program [Freedom of Information Act], our declassification of documents activity. That effort was badly needed. When you had an effective leader like John Paul Vann, whom I can also talk about from personal experience, to head the CORDS operation in III Corps, where I was stationed, that organization was badly needed and was very helpful.

I think that the other side that you are talking about was an elaborate system called HES [Hamlet Evaluation Survey]. Each U.S. District Adviser, with the assistance of other people in his area, was supposed to "rate," on a scale of 1 to 5, I think, the security situation in each hamlet in a definable, geographic area of his district. Everybody had a map, with all of the hamlets drawn on it. Some of the hamlets had virtually no people in them because they had fled and become refugees. Some of the hamlets had huge numbers of people in them. But the District Advisers had a map, and they were supposed to "color" the map and send it in to Saigon. It would then be computerized in CORDS, coordinated, and compared with the map of the previous month, because this was a monthly report. [FYI: I recall a MACV District Adviser refer to these figures as "WEG", "Wild Eyed Guesses." Obviously, their quality and reliability varied widely. END FYI]

I remember a briefing session which, I think, took place after the Tet offensive of 1968. I had come back to Saigon in March of 1968, although it could have been prior to this time. There was a man named George Carver, a Vietnam analyst from CIA, who came out to tell us about this bright idea which was going to be implemented. We had several Provincial Reporting Officers attending this briefing, myself, and lots of other people. I remember making two very disparaging remarks about this system. One of them was, "And what else is the District Adviser going to do that month? Where is he going to find time to handle this extremely time-consuming effort?" There was a list of about 40 criteria, each of which had to be applied to each hamlet. Perhaps each criterion, on its own, had some relevance.

Q: Wasn't one of them, "Can you safely sleep in the hamlet?"

DUNLOP: That criterion alone might have been enough. But, no, that wasn't it. I forget what some of the other criteria were. Sure, there were at least 25 criteria. However, if you had 200 hamlets in your District, you had to multiply, say, 25 criteria times 200 hamlets. That makes 5,000 individual decisions. Then you had to add them up, multiply them, and divide them, apply a dose of something or other, and then color a map! To me, it was foolish, from the standpoint of time consumed, if nothing else.

At the same meeting I also asked, "What is to keep this system from being subject to the same, personal bias that affects every other rating system? What is inherent in this numerical system that is different from any other system, such as simply asking the man to give you his rating of each hamlet?" I said, "Go ahead and rate each hamlet, but leave out all of this other stuff." I was given a fishy stare. It may sound self serving, but I can remember those two comments.

Later on, and I have to be honest about this, it was kind of neat to have these maps available for briefing purposes. [Laughter] However, I think that what happened was that, after the HES system was in place for a while, the Provincial Reporting Officers who were knowledgeable, and they were very knowledgeable after they had visited a given province on several occasions, could look at what a hamlet map for such a province said, and give a pretty good evaluation of it. That, in and of itself, was not bad. At least it allowed us to see whether CORDS was being pretty honest or whether they were "winging" it [guessing]. Or, worse, deliberately distorting it.

So we looked at the HES maps and, in fact, read them with great interest. We looked at them to see if there was information there that we didn't know about, and there sometimes was. Or, if there were areas which we felt that we knew pretty much about, we looked to see how well the views of the MACV District Advisers corresponded with what we knew and believed. This would then tell us that our judgment coincided with theirs, coming through totally different channels, and maybe was right. Or, the HES maps were wrong. Naturally, we would always feel that "they" were wrong, not that "we" were wrong.

Inside the Political Section we insisted on evaluating the HES system every so often. Sometimes we did that every month. I don't know whether I instituted that or whether Al Francis instituted that. I guess that we made this evaluation on a province by province basis. We would occasionally prepare a memorandum for the Ambassador, which shows how far up the line it would go, attaching the ratings for each province. I think that there were three colors in use in the HES. "Uninhabited" by either side and "uncontested," white; blue was for hamlets controlled by the government side; red was for areas controlled by the communist side; yellow was for "contested" areas. Thus, we would prepare memoranda or think pieces for given provinces.

Do I think that HES was a good system? No. Did it take up too much time for too little a result? Yes. Was it of no use at all? No, it was of some use, but not, perhaps, in the way its creators had devised it.

Q: Let's go back chronologically. You were in the U.S. during the first wave of the Tet offensive. What did you bring back to the Embassy in terms of the impact of the "Tet" offensive on U.S. public opinion?

DUNLOP: That is also interesting. I left the U.S. in 1966, following Vietnamese language training, for assignment to the Embassy in Saigon. You asked me how the Vietnamese language training had worked out. I had some "ups" and "downs" not unknown to other bachelors at that time. For a while, it impacted on my study time, but I managed to do enough to do all right in terms of learning to speak Vietnamese. This is very relevant to your question. I had a very nice girl friend in Washington, a pretty girl whom I really liked and perhaps could have gone on and married. I had met her in 1965 and made a major pitch for her attentions. She came up to Washington for a visit. We had been corresponding, and there were all kinds of hopeful things I saw in the future. I arranged to meet her and asked her for a date. She said that she had to meet some family members and was very reluctant to pin down any exact time. Finally, I arranged to see her, for breakfast, for heaven's sake.

Howard Johnson's hotel and restaurant is on Virginia Avenue, across the street from the Watergate Complex. Here I was, with all of my expectations, having breakfast with this gorgeous woman. She unloaded on me about Vietnam and called me a fascist! She then sent me packing, as they say. That was a shock for me.

When I went on home leave in early 1968, I didn't have time to do any of that stuff. However, I was not wholly unprepared for the lack of understanding and even hostility that I began to sense. On a very personal note, my mother was a very intelligent, sophisticated, college-educated woman. She made her own life, started up her own business, traveled abroad, and spoke at least one foreign language. She very much believed in American involvement abroad and in her sons' doing their duty in serving their country. She had sent off one son to the Marine Corps during the Korean War with great anguish, but he didn't wind up in Korea, thank God! She certainly approved of my serving in the Air Force and then in the Foreign Service. However, she had been totally and utterly convinced by Walter Cronkite, the CBS TV commentator, despite all of my efforts, that our policies in Vietnam were wrong. I didn't realize that I was competing with Walter Cronkite for the attention of this major figure in my life.

Q: Walter Cronkite was the most prestigious TV News commentators in the late 1960's.

DUNLOP: He is a man who happily admits and claims to be among the very first national opinion makers to conclude that the Vietnam War was unwinnable and, secondly, that it was "wrong" to pursue it.

I had taken a lot of time and trouble, it was no real burden to me, but in the course of my travels, knowing of my mother's great interest in her son, to take a lot of pictures. I thought of how I was going to convey to her some idea of this very strange place, Vietnam. Well, the Chinese say that a picture is worth 10,000 words, but I wrote little captions on them. These included pictures of old men sitting, perhaps, alongside a Buddhist temple. Or fascinating scenes in Vietnamese markets. Or American soldiers, tanks, and airplanes. I am sure that I sent her some pictures taken from helicopters. You could see an air strike going on over in the distance. I tried to give her the whole picture through little things. This was all a drop in the bucket. Walter Cronkite won this contest for the heart and mind of my beloved mother, hands down.

When I came back to Saigon, I knew that we were in trouble at home and that the war was rapidly losing the support which I felt, as a democratic American, that we needed to have. But we were going to have to stick it out over the long haul. I was very concerned about that.

Q: What was your impression of how Embassy personnel felt during this time after the Tet offensive? Actually, when you returned to the Embassy in June, 1968, was there still fighting in Saigon?

DUNLOP: Yes, we actually had something called "Tet Two" [also called the "May" offensive in Vietnamese]. When did you get to Saigon?

Q: I didn't get there until early February, 1969.

DUNLOP: So a whole year after this. Well, the first attacks in Saigon in January- February, 1968, had been very limited in scope, although the attack on the Embassy compound got all of this publicity of which we have spoken. The enemy had put together about four commando or "sapper" teams, these superbly briefed teams which had carefully prepared models of various cities.

One of these teams was sent against the Embassy; another one against the Vietnamese Prime Minister's residence, which wasn't too far away; against a radio station; and one at Tan Son Nhut, more for diversion than anything else, trying to reach the flight line. There was much heavier fighting in the rest of the country. When I returned to Saigon, in March, 1968, having left on January 23, 1968, all of the holes in the Embassy had been patched up. There was more security in the Embassy, lots more. In fact, I have an anecdote to tell about that. Saigon looked about the same. There wasn't much difference.

However, in May, 1968, the Vietnamese Communists made a great error. They attacked Saigon again, this time using "main force" units. That's when heavy fighting took place in the Saigon area. I was there for all of that. Cholon, which is a mostly Chinese district just South and East of the main center of Saigon, was heavily infiltrated, and there was fighting around the airport at Tan Son Nhut. The communists suffered huge casualties, but we inflicted a number of civilian casualties as well. The fighting was in built-up areas, and civilian casualties were just unavoidable. Then the communists began to fire rockets and shells against the city.

I don't think that anybody in the Embassy held the view that the Tet offensive was a watershed event and that the communists were unbeatable. There had been a lot of fighting, and the communists had taken a lot of casualties. We knew fairly well that the communists had taken very heavy casualties in places like Hue, and now were taking them around Saigon. I don't think that there was a big change in the Embassy's view of what was going to happen, except personally, for me, because I had just come back from the States. I had this strong, sinking feeling about domestic support for our efforts in the war in the U.S.

Regarding the anecdote about security, when I came back to the Embassy after having been away on home leave, my office in my exalted position as chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit occupied a corner office of the second floor. It had two windows, overlooking the main, vehicle gate of the Embassy. There was a tree outside, and I could look through the slotted cover of the Embassy facade to see the tree. When I came in to the Embassy, I arrived early, at about 6:30 AM, because I knew that there was a lot of work to do. Perhaps I still had "jet lag" or something like that. There was an Airborne paratrooper sitting in my office with his feet on my desk, which I didn't mind, and with his helmet down over his face. He was sort of dozing. He had been deployed to the Embassy to beef up its internal security and was still there. These troops were pulled away after a while.

I walked into my office, and he said, "Oh, my God! Sorry, sir!" I said, "Relax, everything is perfectly fine." He had a little less comfortable place to doze out in the hall. I said, "I'll just clean off my desk," and I reached for a couple of things. He said, "God, don't touch those, sir!" It turned out that they were triggers for "Claymore" anti-personnel mines and were still alive.

Q: Oh, my God! [Laughter]

DUNLOP: Because my office faced the gateway out of the Embassy property, we had about four Claymore mines just inside the gate. Nobody had defused them and picked them up as yet. [Laughter] I said, "Son, just disconnect those Claymores," or something pompous like that. I said, "That will be just fine. I'm going to get a cup of coffee and will be back in an hour."

The Embassy's morale was good all through this time. I think that we all had enough to do, and this was one of the reasons why. If you get bored, you begin to think about things, and maybe you get discouraged. We all had contact with a lot of Vietnamese who were splendid people and really were committed to keeping their country out of the clutches of this bunch of old, genocidal leaders up in Hanoi. They were grateful for American help, although they were somewhat disparaging about the way we did this and were sometimes resentful about the behavior of our troops. We didn't have any illusions about the effectiveness of the GVN provincial governments, which varied, depending on the personality of the province chief. We knew that some of them were corrupt -- that is, corrupt at a level which really impacted on the government's ability to govern. I think that there was an attitude in the Embassy that this was Asia and that we paid for things that you shouldn't have to pay for. The American view is that you shouldn't pay for things that ought to be yours because the government owes it to you to provide them, and you don't owe the government for them.

This view was acceptable up to a certain limit, and everybody had their own idea of what the "acceptable" level of payoffs should be. My own view was that about 20 percent payoffs, the people grumbled, but were not particularly upset. When 25 percent payoffs were required of the people more than grumbled, they were upset. When the payoff figure reached 40 percent -- as it did on occasion -- the people were mad as hell, and they might be prepared to do something about it. For example, they might toss a grenade against somebody else's front porch. Some province chiefs were "40 percenters." Some were "10 percenters." They got paid almost nothing for risking their butt. So "10 percent" didn't always look so unreasonable.

We had a bunch of young officers in the Embassy whom I was proud to be associated with, then and since. I think that any feeling that "This is the only war we've got, so we've got to go out and show our manhood in it" had worn off pretty quickly. It didn't wear off on everybody, but it did on most of us. We knew that we had a job to do and that it was a good job. We had responsibilities and we were listened to. We had no illusions that if we said, "Don't send the 9th U.S. Division to Long An province," we were going to "win." However, at least we had an opportunity to "say our say." I remember that I did one report on Binh Dinh province, which was in II Corps, along the coast. There was a Province Chief there who was really bad. He was, probably, about a "45 percenter," according to my own scale which I mentioned previously. The situation was worse because he was colluding with the South Korean forces stationed there, who were probably about "60 percenters." I went up there with Jim Mack, one of the Provincial Reporters, because there had been some queries as a result of a Congressional visit, or something like that.

We had no inhibitions about reporting anything. Nobody ever told us, "Oh, don't say those things. You can't do anything about them. A report like that will just be misused back in Washington."

Q: You didn't have that feeling?

DUNLOP: Not at that time. Later, the South Vietnamese Government came to detest the Paris Accords [signed on January 30, 1973]. Most South Vietnamese officials came to accept what President Thieu said, that the Paris Accords were "the first drop of poison." We can talk about that a little bit later. Embassy reports of that nature, that is, opposition by the South Vietnamese to the Paris Accords, was not welcome in Washington. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger wanted to get his Nobel Peace Prize for the Paris Accords, which he had the major role in negotiating.

Q: We've been talking pretty much about the period after the Tet offensive of January, 1968, and feelings in the Embassy at that time. How did this affect your role?

DUNLOP: The guys I dealt with in Saigon, that is, my colleagues in the Political Section, and not just the Provincial Reporting Officers, were really a great bunch of people. There was a large number of them and a chance for a lot of good ones to be there. It was really one of the very best groups of Foreign Service Officers that I ever worked with. We had great leadership.

First of all, we had Phil Habib as the Political Counselor, who was inspirational, if somewhat intimidating. Then we had his replacement who was not intimidating but very good with his troops, John Archer Calhoun, who was also Political Counselor. Embassy officers had the greatest respect and, later on, real affection for Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker. After you had been around him for a while, Bunker was so clearly a man of integrity that, if he thought that something was a good thing to do, and right and proper for the United States to spend its treasure and, to some degree, the lives of some of its young people, that was very helpful. If you had any doubts about the situation, you could express your doubts about it. We had a couple of people come out to the Embassy who didn't like to fly in helicopters and didn't like to be shot at. They left fairly quickly. I think that I'm fair in saying that most of the people assigned to the Embassy believed that the war, at least at this stage, was the "right war, in the right place, at the right time."

A lot of us had doubts about the way we went about prosecuting the war. One of my earliest doubts was about the deployment of those heavy U.S. combat units to the Mekong Delta, which I mentioned previously. I thought that this was really stupid. However, you could always express yourself. As I've said so many times here, Ambassador Bunker made a point of seeing the Provincial Reporting Officers at dinner about once a month. There would be a lovely dinner over at his residence. He would not make this a "debriefing session" but would make it an opportunity to get to know the Provincial Reporters and to let them say whatever was on their minds. This was always a very nice dinner. People could bring up anything that they wanted to. Ours was a well-run Embassy staffed with people who were well-motivated, at least at this time.

Q: Did you become involved with the press, and could you talk about the American media and its coverage of the war? For many people this was as important as American troop involvement, because the American media set the standards for what we were doing and what we...

DUNLOP: Walter Cronkite was reading what other people wrote before he made up his mind. That's for sure. Well, I came away from Vietnam with a lot of contempt for the American press. As I look back on this experience, I don't think that my attitude was all of that unjustified. Since then, as a general statement, I have somewhat modified my views, as I think I should have. In Vietnam, I ran into American journalists in increasing numbers. They weren't so much out in the provinces, although they went with American combat troops, give them credit for that. They went up where the heavy fighting was going on in the A Shau Valley [in I Corps], which was a bad scene.

The more I got to know some of them over time, and sometimes socialized with them, the less I thought of them. Some of them were personable and bright, like David Halberstam and Neil Sheehan. No flies on those guys. I think that, particularly after the Tet offensive, following which I spent another year and a half there and spent more of it in Saigon, where I was more likely to run into them and did run into them, I began to develop the feeling that they were really there to "punch their ticket" and were competing with each other to find things that buttressed the view that this was the "wrong war, in the wrong place, and at the wrong time." I was very unhappy with them collectively and, in some cases, individually.

Remember Fox Butterfield? He was one of those I saw. I remember where I saw him. This would have been after the signature of the Paris Accords in 1973.

Q: This would be a matter for comment later on.

DUNLOP: OK. As of 1968 I had not had that much contact with the American press. I had just come back to Saigon from home leave, and they were swarming in Vietnam like bees around a hive. I saw a few in the Mekong Delta area but not very many of them and not often. At this point, other than the impact that Walter Cronkite had on my mother (who revered him), I don't think that I had a particularly negative view of the American press. I developed it later, but I did develop it. I came to regard them with a lot of disdain.

Q: During this time after the Tet offensive in 1968, what was your impression of the operations and reporting of the CIA?

DUNLOP: I can say almost nothing about that. But that's also what I can say about CIA operations as they affected what I did throughout my career. I've thought about this quite a bit lately, now that my active duty career is over. I can't think of any time when what the CIA told me at any place where I served abroad or wrote about something at any place where I served abroad which made a decisive impact on how I viewed a given situation.

Q: In other words, are you saying that what the CIA was reporting was already in accord with the thrust of what you knew?

DUNLOP: Let's take the Buddhists in Saigon. The CIA Station had been all over the Buddhists during the early period of Buddhist unrest in Saigon, beginning in 1963. Later on, there was supposedly a "compact," which was signed in blood or something, in the "dark of the moon" and with knives and skulls on the table, that they would "lay off" the Buddhists in the An Quang Pagoda. So the Political Section theoretically had unfettered access to the An Quang people. This "agreement" didn't make any difference, as far as I could tell. If the CIA Station had some brilliant insights, I think that we would have been smart enough to have reported them. Certainly, this was true of the provinces. Whatever else the CIA people were doing in the provinces, they weren't competing with our Provincial Reporting Officers reporting on the security situation, on the impact of American troops on local politics, or on how politicians were trying to influence events in Saigon. They just didn't do it. I think that we would have seen it.

They did a lot on North Vietnam, which they should have been doing. They had some bright analysts. Frank Snepp was one of them who comes to mind. Their analysts were accessible to us, and we enjoyed talking to them. We were not in competition with them, and that was fine. How much they got right and how much they got wrong, I guess it worked both ways. That is true of all of us.

When I was down in the provinces, there was a CIA "Station" house in each of the province capitals there, usually called "the Embassy house," which somewhat irritated us. It would be a nice house, with a compound and walls around it, sometimes with barbed wire. You could go over there, maybe get the American Province Senior Adviser to take you over there and introduce you. You would be welcomed politely. They would open up a can of beer, talk a while, and then you would leave. I don't remember learning anything. I don't remember their being very interested in what I knew. They had something else going on which, whatever it was, didn't seem to make any difference to anybody. I didn't come into a Province Team there and find them seething with anger at the local "Station," like someone saying, "You know what those guys did yesterday?"

They must have been in touch with the Vietnamese intelligence people. We know that, later on, under the "Phoenix Program," there was a major effort made to identify or "turn" communist cadres. However, whatever effort the South Vietnamese Government was making to identify, root out, or otherwise destroy the VC infrastructure, that must have been the CIA's principal effort. How successful they were, I don't know. Later on, I heard that the "Phoenix Program" under Colby was coordinated more effectively and made some contribution to our overall effort. However, I don't have personal knowledge of that program.

Q: What were the major developments, as you saw them, during the time between when you returned to Saigon in March, 1968, and, when did you leave Saigon?

DUNLOP: I left in June, 1969.

Q: What was the major development during that tour of duty?

DUNLOP: The major development in my life is that I became engaged to be married. [Laughter]

Q: Yes, I remember. I went to your engagement party.

DUNLOP: Do you remember that a rocket hit a building about 200 meters from my engagement party at the home of Galen Stone [chief of the Political Section at the time]?

Q: That was on the first night that I was in Saigon. We were driving there. I heard this tremendous explosion but noticed that nobody seemed to be paying attention. I thought that this was like some British movie called something like, "Stiff Upper Lip." I thought that this happened all the time. I was a new boy on the block and I wasn't going to say anything. But I thought, "Good God!"

DUNLOP: Well, let me think about it that way. I never thought to compartmentalize my time in Vietnam in this fashion. Let me just think out loud a bit.

The peace talks with the North Vietnamese in Paris began during this period [March, 1968, to June, 1969].

Q: At first they were "talks about talks."

DUNLOP: Yes. Do you remember that resident Johnson made his announcement on March 31, 1968, that he would not be a candidate for re-election? This seemed to catch everybody by surprise.

Q: I was in the U.S. at the time.

DUNLOP: Shortly thereafter, we set up a specialized Mission in Paris, and "talks about talks" began, with very grudging GVN [Government of Vietnam] participation.

Where I worked in the Political Section, we were not privy to any of the traffic that came into the Embassy about negotiations with Hanoi. [FYI: I believe that at least Ambassador Bunker, Arch Calhoun, the Political Counselor, and Roger Kirk, the chief of the External Unit of the Political Section, saw most of the traffic the Embassy received on this subject. Probably, Galen Stone, the chief of the Political Section and Roger's supervisor, also saw the traffic. END FYI] I never saw any of this material, which was all in "special communications channels." "CHEROKEE" was one of the codeword compartments used for such material. There were other communications channels in addition to that.

I think that we had the best feel for how the South Vietnamese government people were reacting to what they were reading in the press about the meetings. The reactions were not good, to put it mildly. GVN representatives, of course, participated in most if not all of the meetings with the North Vietnamese, and the GVN Foreign Ministry would have known of the substance of most of the meetings. (Not the very, very secret Kissinger-Tho talks.) In my own case this GVN reaction was interacting with my own negative feelings about support for the war on the home front in the U.S. I had experienced this reaction during the Tet offensive period, when I was on home leave in the U.S. and which I had brought back with me to Saigon. You could see in the eyes of the Vietnamese a look of skepticism and internal questioning about what the Americans were going to do in the negotiations with the North Vietnamese. This questioning attitude had not yet reached any substantial proportions, but I remember it as being one of the things that struck me. I'll tell you when this attitude first began to appear in significant measure.

President Johnson had announced that he would open talks in Paris with the North Vietnamese under certain conditions. He said that he would reduce the bombing of North Vietnam, and so forth. One of the conditions he mentioned was that the shelling and rocketing of Saigon would have to stop. As you well know, this didn't stop, and Johnson didn't do anything about it. This was a very visible, audible, and personally apparent way in which the Americans were saying two things, that is, talking out of both sides of our mouths. Nobody has ever accused the South Vietnamese of being stupid in such matters, and particularly on issues of such importance to themselves. So, as this year and a half went by, I had this sense that there was a doubt in the minds of the South Vietnamese about our continuing commitment to their defense against communist aggression. Perhaps this did not make so much difference at that time. However, when I came back to the Embassy later [in September, 1972], it made a big difference.

Q: Are you describing your views in retrospect or were you reporting this?

DUNLOP: This is not totally in retrospect, particularly the views expressed by South Vietnamese who asked for my opinion on this issue.

Q: This was being relayed back to the Department in Embassy reporting?

DUNLOP: We weren't being given very good ammunition to answer such inquiries. The President had said one thing and then did another. He made a statement about the continued shelling of Saigon and then he didn't do anything about it.

Q: Did you ever raise this question with Ambassador Bunker?

DUNLOP: Oh, there was a lot of talk around the Embassy, both with him and with our supervisors. I mean, everybody felt this way. I'm sure that Ambassador Bunker felt this way.

I've read some of Ambassador Bunker's reporting from this time but I don't remember having read anything on this subject. However...

Q: Of course, this was very much a political decision made by President Lyndon Johnson.

DUNLOP: And by the Secretary of Defense at the time, Clark Clifford. I'll tell you another feeling that I had. The security situation is a generalized term which I use for the "balance of power" in any given province. Communist forces increasingly consisted of regular North Vietnamese Army units, against the combined U.S. and GVN forces.

During this time the "balance of power" began increasingly to improve in our favor.

Q: During the 18 months that I spent in Saigon from 1969 to the middle of 1970, I felt that the situation was not bad at all.

DUNLOP: Things were improving. We now know, although we knew some of this at the time, that the North Vietnamese took tremendous losses during the Tet period of 1968. However, the South Vietnamese communists, or the Viet Cong, took much heavier losses. There were always these two elements: the Viet Cong "local" battalions and the North Vietnamese Army. The North Vietnamese Army was a very effective fighting force. The Viet Cong were unpredictable. Sometimes they were much better than at other times. But the Viet Cong were "committed." The North Vietnamese leaders threw the Viet Cong into this "meat grinder" against the U.S. forces at the height of their strength and, to some degree, a GVN Army that was beginning to show some improved capabilities. It got much better later on.

One of the results of the very heavy casualties suffered by the communist forces, of which I was not so aware until later on, was that the North Vietnamese leaders couldn't find replacements in the South to make up for Viet Cong losses. So they increasingly sent North Vietnamese units down into South Vietnam. This exacerbated the deep animosity between North and South Vietnamese. For example, it made it less and less easy for the North Vietnamese sergeant in command of a battalion or company of South Vietnamese communists from the Mekong Delta area to represent himself as standing for the interests of the local people, who were southerners. This is what happened.

So the situation in South Vietnam did get better. Clearly, we in the Embassy were all teed off at the rocketing of Saigon. We were pleased, though, that you could begin to drive to Dalat [a once popular resort in the mountains North of Saigon] or to Vung Tau [formerly Cap St. Jacques, a popular beach area Southeast of Saigon]. Route 15 opened up.

Q: I remember driving down there to the beach.

DUNLOP: This was not something that you could have done a year before.

Q: Did you note a difference in the mood of Embassy personnel or anything like that, between the election of President Nixon in November, 1968, and the time you left Saigon in 1969? You arrived back in Saigon in March, 1968. [FYI: The following section should be reviewed carefully, because it seems to confuse the presidential elections of 1968, when Vice President Humphrey ran against Nixon, and the presidential elections of 1972, when Senator McGovern ran against President Nixon. Harry was in Saigon during both election campaigns, but the choices were different. I have taken the liberty of trying to "fix up" this section, to make it more coherent, but I suggest that Harry review it carefully. END FYI]

DUNLOP: Yes, we did, because one of the things that bothered us was the prospective candidacy of Senator McGovern on the Democratic ticket in the presidential elections of 1972.

Q: Who?

DUNLOP: Wasn't it McGovern who ran against Nixon in 1972?

Q: Yes.

DUNLOP: Some of the Embassy officers were Democrats, some were Republicans. However, I think that McGovern was viewed by most of us as a feckless disaster.

Q: God, I voted for Nixon.

DUNLOP: Well, I also voted for Nixon. I recall that we saw the election on TV and heard the results on the radio. Remember that there is a 13 hour difference between Saigon and Washington time. We heard the results around a swimming pool at the residence of Arch Calhoun, the Political Counselor [on Tu Xuong St.]. We all trotted over to Arch's house to listen to the results of the presidential election of 1968 on a short wave radio. Or maybe AFVN, Armed Forces Radio, Vietnam, carried it. I remember that everybody around that pool was really very pleased.

What did Nixon do, early on, which impacted on the situation? He announced a very reasonable program of "Vietnamization" of the war. I don't think that he announced this right away, and it wasn't part of his campaign. However, the actual Vietnamization program, drawing down steadily but surely the American combat presence in South Vietnam and replacing them with revitalized, rearmed, and effectively led South Vietnamese troops under South Vietnamese political leadership. This was something that we all welcomed. We all applauded this. Most of us felt that the U.S. had been too much involved in the war, although I imagine that nobody would have minded another division or two of U.S. troops right at the time of the Tet offensive in 1968!

Generally, the view of Americans bulldozing a position, where a backhoe would have been better, was a matter of concern to us. I think that there were a lot of people in the Embassy who were in favor of Nixon's policies, if not pro-Nixon himself. Of course, I left Saigon only five or six months after Nixon's first inauguration in January, 1969. Not much had been done by Nixon in this short period of time to implement the Vietnamization program. The South Vietnamese welcomed it, with this reservation. They wanted to be sure that Vietnamization was not just a cover up for our bailing out of South Vietnam. Well, four years later, in 1973, we were still there. Then we did bail out at the end of April, 1975.

Ambassador Bunker's slogan began to be, and I don't recall when he began to repeat this point, although, at the end of his time in Saigon it was very much his view, "Long haul, low cost." In other words, reduce the cost to the American taxpayer and reduce American casualties to the minimum. However, he did not believe that we could leave South Vietnam any time soon.

My own, personal, view is that had we been able to sustain that policy, South Vietnam would still be an independent country, and the North Vietnamese would still be limited to North Vietnam. Lots of people wouldn't have died in the intervening years. That's my view, it is one of the great "what ifs" of history.

DUNLOP: After 1972 I returned to Saigon. I had a telephone call in the spring of 1972 from somebody I knew in Vietnamese affairs who asked if I would be willing to return to Vietnam. I thought about that a lot. I had spent three years there, from 1966 to 1969. This was now 1972, and did I want to go back to Saigon?

In 1972 the Vietnam War was still going on. Vietnamization had largely been completed. At the time I got the phone call, there was a very large North Vietnamese offensive under way, the so-called "Easter offensive" of that year. It didn't look as if the negotiations in Paris over the next three years would be any more successful than they had been during the previous four years. However, the major consideration for me involved my family. I had gotten married since I had left Vietnam, and we had one child. But I was told that the policy allowed me to take my wife and child back to Vietnam, so I decided to go. My wife, Betty, a Foreign Service secretary whom I met in Saigon was very supportive.

The job I was offered was also a good one. It was to be in the Internal Unit of the Political Section, a job for which I felt well qualified. So with very little transition I went from Zagreb to Saigon, with some home leave in between. I arrived back in Saigon in July, 1972.

Q: You were in Saigon this time from when to when?

DUNLOP: July, 1972, to, I guess, June, 1974. That tour spanned the signing and implementation, as far as you could use that word, of the Paris Accords on Vietnam signed in January, 1973.

Q: When you returned to Saigon, could you describe first how the Embassy was, how your job was, the Ambassador, and so forth?

DUNLOP: The Ambassador was still Ellsworth Bunker. By then he was about to complete his fourth year in Vietnam.

The Political Section had been reorganized, to the degree that the Provincial Reporting Unit had been eliminated. I had been involved in this unit, both as a provincial reporter and as its head during my previous tour in Saigon. There now were Internal and External Units, as well as a very large Political-Military Unit. The Political Section was set up along the conventional lines of most Embassies.

I heard that the Provincial Reporting Unit had been abolished because Ambassador Bunker had become upset at some of the younger officers who were assigned to it in the 1970-1972 time period. These were officers who had come into the Foreign Service during the 1960's. They were full of the "piss and vinegar" of that generation. They were skeptical and even defiant of authority. I think that Ambassador Bunker thought that they were whippersnappers and "know-it-all's." Anyway, I'm not sure of everything that happened, but Ambassador Bunker had become convinced that the Provincial Reporting Unit was not worth the money that we were spending on it. So he dissolved the Provincial Reporting Unit.

Some of the former Provincial Reporting Officers were still in Saigon when I got there in 1972. Two of them, in particular, had been reassigned to the Internal Unit, where I was also assigned. I got to know them very quickly when I got there. They still had a lot of the resentful attitude which had offended Ambassador Bunker.

Q: They probably resented everything. It was an "odd" period of time. Foreign Service Officers from our generation generally accepted the fact that we were representatives of the U.S. Government and that there were limits to expressing our own views publicly on how the world was.

DUNLOP: Well, these two guys did not endear themselves to me when I heard them sneering at me as a "true believer" in our policies in Vietnam. I was not unhappy about the comment that I was a "true believer." However, the sneering tone was not so acceptable.

Q: As far as "sneering" was concerned, when I think of it, this was a tone of voice which you hear from some commentators who are still around, 20 years later.

DUNLOP: Well, I think I can say that both of these guys, and I know one of them better than the other, since our careers have been parallel to some extent, have now undergone that "transformation" that they used to talk about. You know, they say that you have no heart if you're not a rebel in your 20's and 30's and you have no brain if you're not a conservative by your 40's.

When I returned to the Embassy in Saigon in 1972, the Mission was run by some very "tough" officers. I think that Martin Herz had left...

Q: And I think that Galen Stone was chief of the Political Section.

DUNLOP: Galen Stone was there. I had known him before. Then Josiah Bennett took over as Political Counselor. He was an old-line, "China hand." Bunker was still the Ambassador. The Political Section was still doing a lot of the things that it had done in the way of provincial reporting. I must say that I was glad to see that. I would have tried to re-institute some of it, had such reporting totally disappeared. There was still a lot of travel into the provinces, although this travel was no longer institutionalized into a separate, Provincial Reporting Unit.

When I first returned to Saigon, my responsibilities involved covering the Buddhists and all other religious groups, including the Catholics, the Hoa Hao, and the Cao Dai. I also covered the Chams, insofar as they played a role, and they played a small role in a couple of provinces. I also followed developments among the "Montagnards" [ethnic peoples, especially on the high plateau of Central Vietnam]. That's when I got to go up there and drink their locally-made, fermented rice wine through a straw. I also followed National Assembly developments, beginning with the Senate, or upper house. Later on, somebody else took over following developments in the Senate. At the time the Republic of Vietnam had a bicameral legislature. So I had those responsibilities, as well as some supervisory duties.

I did the usual things that you do when you get to a post. You read what went on before. Much of it was very familiar to me. I tried not to let too much of what I had experienced before influence the way I saw things. I tried to look at everything from a fresh point of view, which is very difficult to do.

When I arrived in Saigon in July, 1972, the "Easter Offensive" by the North Vietnamese had about run its course. This was the first time that the North Vietnamese employed regular battalions with full armor and artillery support. This offensive had been defeated, without any American ground force involvement. There was a lot of American air and naval bombardment support.

However, this was war of the kind that you were familiar with from World War II or even World War I. Certain parts of the country, particularly "I Corps" [the five northernmost provinces of South Vietnam, organized into Military Region I], when you rode North from Da Nang to Hue and, even more so, from Hue to Quang Tri, which I had an opportunity to fly over not too long after I got there, was littered with recently burnt out armored vehicles. This was something that you might see in movies about German Gen Erwin Rommel in the North African campaign of World War II. I think that most Americans still don't think of this stage of the Vietnam War in that way.

This combat was the result of an effort by the North Vietnamese Army [People's Army of Vietnam -- PAVN] to "close the book" on the Vietnam War without a negotiated settlement. They wanted one more crack, using military means, before they tried to get in the back door, through a settlement which they might be able to manipulate. Perhaps we didn't fully understand that at the time, although maybe some people did.

This North Vietnamese effort failed, and they suffered terrible casualties before they gave up on it. There had also been heavy casualties on the South Vietnamese side. The South Vietnamese Army [Republic of Vietnam Armed Forces, RVNAF] had fought very creditably in some respects. In other respects, less so, although this was also true of the North Vietnamese.

There were times when North Vietnamese units did not perform at the high level that we were accustomed to, because they usually were militarily very efficient. Some North Vietnamese units had simply "broken." We had taken a lot of North Vietnamese prisoners. Some of the North Vietnamese armored troops had simply "quit." They were out there, a naval bombardment came in like holy hell, and they jumped out of their tanks and ran over to the South Vietnamese forces with their arms up. That kind of thing had happened, too.

The government led by President Nguyen van Thieu, which was much reviled in the American press, was somewhat more efficient and functioned somewhat better than it had when I was previously in Saigon. I don't think that it was any more "impressive" or any more "repressive" than it had been previously. It still had an authoritarian approach to the opposition, particularly on the Left. There was very little of this leftist opposition, but there was some. The South Vietnamese Government was still throwing people into jail for activities regarded as "subversive," which the American Left regarded as activities by "heroic, nationalist defenders of truth and justice." However, there weren't too many such cases.

Q: This was still during the "high noon" of the first Nixon administration. Kissinger was still very much involved at this point.

DUNLOP: He was still the chief negotiator in Paris as National Security Adviser, when I arrived back in Saigon in July, 1972.

Q: Was there any "tension" between the reporting that we were doing and what was happening in Vietnam and how it was received and used in Washington?

DUNLOP: Yes, there was. I'll give you a couple of examples in which I was involved, but there were certainly others as well. After the North Vietnamese "Easter Offensive" of 1972 had been repulsed, I think that President Thieu claimed that every inch of soil lost to the North Vietnamese by their offensive had been regained. This was not true, because there were parts of South Vietnam which were never regained from the North Vietnamese. However, almost all of the ground lost had been regained by September 6, 1972. The reason for relating it to that date was either that it was the anniversary of his election as President in 1967 or the anniversary of the promulgation of the constitution.

Anyway, there was a period of about three months between September and December, 1972, in any case, well into the winter, when we in the Embassy, at least at my level, were not aware of anything approaching a "breakthrough" in the Paris peace negotiations with the North Vietnamese. Then, all of a sudden, in October, 1972, I guess it was, the "word" was out that the negotiations were very close to completion in Paris.

Keep the sequence of events in mind. I'm doing this for my own sake, as much as for anything else. The Accord on Vietnam was signed after the "Christmas bombing" of Hanoi and Haiphong in December, 1972. I think that the Accord was signed on January 28, 1973. The "word" about an imminent "breakthrough" in the negotiations would have reached us on about October 28, 1972. The three month period between the end of October, 1972, and the end of January, 1973, when the Accord on Vietnam was signed, was a period of increasing apprehension on the official South Vietnamese side and, to some significant degree, on the side of South Vietnamese public opinion. It was feared that the Accord on Vietnam would deal a fatal blow to the prospects for the survival of the Republic of Vietnam.

This pessimistic opinion grew very rapidly in South Vietnam. It was reflected in the Saigon press and in what individual South Vietnamese would say to us, at a time when those of us in the Embassy at our levels did not know anything about what was going on. We could not understand what it was that these South Vietnamese contacts of ours were worried about. We certainly knew that they were getting very worried. Were they simply worried that the Americans had grown tired of the war and were going ahead with the negotiation of an accord with North Vietnam? Or did these South Vietnamese figures know something that we didn't know? I think that it was partly the latter, because President Thieu had been informed of the shape of what this final agreement was going to be. He didn't like it one bit. I think that this attitude, these concerns, and this resistance of his were leaked by Independence Palace [the residence of the President of the Republic of Vietnam] to the Vietnamese press. We were seeing that before we saw anything that gave us a clue as to why these South Vietnamese were so upset.

I'm not necessarily blaming the State Department system for not telling us what was going on in Paris. However, it made reporting difficult. I remember that. I would be puzzled at the virulence of some of the anti-Kissinger material which began to appear in the South Vietnamese press.

This is what gave rise to my first getting my wrist "slapped." We thought that it was pretty interesting when Kissinger began to be portrayed in these really wretched, sometimes scatological and very pornographic cartoons. We assembled a package of these cartoons, appropriately translated, and sent them back to the Department. We said that this kind of material doesn't reflect what everybody is thinking in Saigon but a lot of people read these newspapers, and the Department ought to know about this. We were very quickly told that this kind of material was not welcome and we were asked not to send such material in to the Department. Now, that's pretty minor, but that was evidently considered a case of "lese majeste" [something close to high treason]. It was nowhere like reporting that the South Vietnamese were happy with everything in South Vietnam, and the U.S. Government should go ahead and sign the Accord on Vietnam and saying that we would get no flack from the South Vietnamese. We were never told to do that. We were able to report this concern we had noted among the South Vietnamese. The Department just didn't want to see the cartoons about Kissinger, although I am sure that they were a source of some hilarity around the Department of State. Some of these cartoons were just incredibly bad.

There was a period of time when some of our provincial reporting on corruption involved some of President Thieu's principal supporters, and particularly Gen Dan Van Quang. You may remember that name. He became the "overlord" of the Mekong River Delta area. This area was THE most prosperous and populous part of the country. It provided enormous opportunities for taking "cuts" of rice shipments to Saigon. Gen Quang was corrupt down to his toenails. There was lots of evidence for that, although maybe not all of the evidence would have stood up in court. However, we had officers in Can Tho [Phong Dinh Province], which was the largest city in the Mekong Delta and the capital of IV Corps [Military Region 4], who reported some of these things. Through the Internal Reporting Unit we thought this was pretty interesting stuff to send on to the Department.

Josiah Bennett, the Political Counselor, became uneasy at this kind of reporting. I had a lot of fights with him about this. It was not something that was very pleasant, although he was a very pleasant man, individually. I guess that he felt that warts were not to be focused on. I don't think that we were unduly focusing on them. It was a matter of degree. I felt that there was some good reporting coming out of the Mekong Delta area and I think that we basically did what we had to do. However, to me there was an unnecessary degree of arguing which had to go on before some of these good reports could go out. I ought to add that Ambassador Bunker never stood in the way of honest political reporting

The Thieu Government was corrupt. There's no question about that. It was corrupt, but the degree to which that had an impact on events is another matter, because a certain level of corruption was very common in South Vietnam. Today the Vietnamese Communist Government is very corrupt. If you want to get something done in Saigon, or Ho Chi Minh City these days, you have to find out how to get the right people paid off. When corruption reaches a politically damaging level, this is a matter for useful debate and inquiry. We used to have a lot of that debate and inquiry. I think that it had gone over the level where it became politically damaging in the Mekong Delta area.

Q: This raises one of the standard questions that face any Foreign Service Officer. If you see corruption and criminal influence, as I saw in Naples with the Camorra [similar to the Mafia]. It was there, it was endemic to the system. However, if you report it, it can sometimes take on an overtone of suggesting, "To hell with this country. This place is corrupt or criminal, and we just won't deal with it." Or it may lead to complete dismissal of the society. This is true again and again. It's like talking about Senator Kennedy or President Kennedy coming out of the "corrupt" Massachusetts Democratic Party system. Yes, corruption was there as part of the process. However, describing it can sometimes take on an overtone that really inhibits our dealing with the practicalities of the situation.

DUNLOP: I think that's certainly true. I think that Americans tend to be a little bit hypocritical, although I'm not sure that's the word. "Sanctimonious" comes to mind, although I'm not sure that's the right word, either.

Q: It's "within the ballpark" of those words.

DUNLOP: It's a little like dealing with people like Tito of Yugoslavia, as I was saying earlier. There is the view in the Foreign Service that, if we have to deal with somebody who can be called "corrupt," for God's sake don't report anything "bad" about him because we have this conscience and we don't want to have...

Q: It's not only that. We know that we can report such matters in what we might regard as "balanced" fashion. However, the report goes back to Washington. If there's anything "juicy," it will end up on the desk of a Senator, a Congressman, or of a journalist, all of whom are either out to titillate an audience or grab attention at the time. This can have profound effects. We have this problem.

DUNLOP: That is true, and I must say that, to give the Josiah Bennett's of this world full credit, they are well aware of this. And, of course, South Vietnam was a classic case of corruption. There was a whole constituency in the United States looking for ways to say, "I told you so." They felt that the Vietnam War was the "wrong war, in the wrong place, at the wrong time." Then a provincial reporter would come back to Saigon and say, "You know, people I know and really respect down here in Can Tho are sick at heart about what's going on down there. They are really disgusted."

There was a case of a Province Chief in the Mekong Delta area who resigned from office, which was almost unheard of. He was one of the "good guys" who said, "Well, 20% corruption is all right, but 40% corruption, no. That's too much." If you report that back to Washington, it gets into Walter Cronkite's Evening News broadcast [on CBS TV], which was already a powerful influence on my mother, as I mentioned before. He was, perhaps, the dominant influence on her, as far as the Vietnam War was concerned. Yes, it is a dilemma.

I don't feel too badly about how we handled the reporting on corruption there. I think that we managed to do what was necessary. If anybody back in the policymaking world wanted to understand the degree to which the South Vietnamese Government was functioning efficiently, as well as where it was not functioning efficiently, if they were willing to do the hard work of reading all of the reporting, they would have been pretty well served.

Our main question should have been, "Is the South Vietnamese Government going to be able to function sufficiently well that it will survive?" My answer to myself to that question was always, "Yes, it is, but we will have to support it for a long time." Just as we did in South Korea. I would have to say, "Yes, we could have done that." One of the motivations of the South Vietnamese for doing that is that they just detested North Vietnam. They didn't want the North Vietnamese to come down and interfere in their affairs. Thich Tri Quang, the Buddhist thorn in everybody's side, didn't want North Vietnam to win the war. He may have contributed to North Vietnam's winning the war, but this wasn't his objective. His objective was to get a Catholic President [Ngo Dinh Diem] out of Independence Palace! He succeeded in doing that, at least in part.

Q: How did you find the "religious factor" operating during this 1972-1974 period?

DUNLOP: Personally, I had a very fortunate relationship with Monsignor Nguyen van Binh, the Catholic Archbishop of Saigon. He suffered horribly after the communists took over South Vietnam. I think that he may have been made a Cardinal "in pectore" [appointed secretly by the Pope, without a public announcement].

That was part of my job. I would go over and see him. He was a wonderful man, of compassion and erudition, gentleness, humanity, and all of the things that you would like to think that a Prince of the Church is. He would talk to me about whatever I wanted to talk about, which was how things are going, there had been such a pro-Catholic President [Ngo Dinh Diem]. I would ask, "What does this mean?" If I remember his point of view correctly, he would say, "The Vietnamese people have had sufficient experience with religious extremism so that they have discarded it. There are no longer 'extreme' Buddhists who matter. There are no longer 'extreme' Catholics who matter. There no longer are Hoa Hao or Cao Dai supporters who think that they can run everything within sight, without regard to anybody else. We have passed beyond that point. The chapter has been closed on religion as a powerful, political influence wielded by some people to the detriment of others."

I accepted his view after thinking about it and talking to other people. I would go over to the An Quang Pagoda to see Thich Tri Quang but wasn't received by him. He didn't want to see Americans at that point. However, he designated somebody to speak for the Vien Hoa Dao [Buddhist Institute], that influential portion of the Buddhist community. Those Buddhists were no longer seeking the kind of power that I think they felt was within their grasp in 1963-1966. They were certainly vocal when they didn't like something and they were going to protect their own interests, as in the case of the Buddhist University. They wanted to make sure that the government, as a secular power, didn't try to tell them how to run their university. They were no longer trying to determine who was going to be the political chief of the state, or who was not going to be chief of state. They might well have liked doing that, but they came to realize those were unrealistic goals.

Religious dissonance in that regard still existed, as well as dissidence, to some degree. However, it did not have the power, and certainly did not seem to have a potential for powerfully influencing the course of political events, during the 1972-1974 time frame, as it seemed to have had some 10 years earlier.

Q: How did you see the political-military relationship within the U.S. Mission? I mean political-military reporting and...

DUNLOP: I think that it was pretty smooth and I think that we have to credit Ambassador Bunker for that. Bunker had seen two commanders of MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] come and go. He had seen Gen Westmoreland and Gen Abrams. He was excellent at handling that relationship. If the two top people in the U.S. Mission understand where the other one is coming from and accord him the "space" that he needs to get his job done, and are willing to work together on a reasonably agreed, common purpose, then that filters down to lower levels. I was never involved directly in political-military relationships with MACV in Vietnam, as I certainly was later on in South Korea. So I can't say too much personally about this.

During my second tour of duty in Saigon, as of January 28, 1973, the American forces were given three months to leave South Vietnam. This involved all combat and operational forces. They did that. By March 28, 1973, they were all gone from South Vietnam. The people who were helping to maintain the aircraft of the Vietnamese Air Force on the flight line were all gone. The only military elements left in the U.S. Mission were the Marine Security Guards [a detachment of about 200 Marines] and a DAO [Defense Attaché Office], with about 50 military personnel assigned and attached to the Embassy. The DAO's main job was to funnel the large amounts of military assistance that we had going to the South Vietnamese.

Q: From the ripples that were coming out of Washington what was your personal feeling about the peace efforts and what we were doing in this regard?

DUNLOP: You're speaking of the period before -- during the run-up to -- the Paris Accords, and the period which followed the Accords. I was increasingly unhappy with the trend of the situation. The more I got to understand the process, which included reading the Accords on Vietnam and then reading how the U.S. interpreted them, I could see why the South Vietnamese authorities were concerned about how things were going. Of course, we were reporting, word for word, what President Thieu was saying about it. Thieu gave a major speech in December, 1972, known as the "poison cup" speech. In it he said to the South Vietnamese people, "I am in a terrible situation here. I have been offered a 'poisoned cup,' but I have been offered the opportunity to drink it, one drop at a time." That analogy seemed to make sense to me.

Of course, earlier on, during the first six months of application of the Accords on Vietnam [January-July, 1973] the true horror of the Watergate Affair had not fully manifested itself. Ambassador Bunker adopted quite a positive attitude on the Accords. Part of this was probably due to his intent, as our leader, to present a positive, confident face on the situation. We still saw Ambassador Bunker a lot, even though we were not provincial reporters. However, he always made every effort to talk to his working level staff. He always said, in those early days of the application of the accords, "This is a long haul at a low cost." He felt that President Nixon had found the right solution for the future. He said that we would be in South Vietnam for a long time and that we had reduced the cost to a tolerable level. He would use the analogy of South Korea. He would say, "What makes you think that the South Koreans were better able to run their lives in 1953-1954 than the South Vietnamese are now?" He would add, "We have to keep the bad guys out and give the South Vietnamese time."

I guess that I was willing to accept that. However, I also began to see that the fact that we had declared a peace seemed to suggest that it was necessarily going to be so. We could not criticize the Accords on Vietnam. Washington did not want to hear any criticism of them.

For example, the ICCS [International Commission of Control and Supervision] was deployed in South Vietnam. This was one of those international teams that the United States is so fond of. Look at Bosnia. These teams descend on chaotic situations with clipboards to take notes and see how things are going. The theory seems to be that people will see them standing around with their clipboards and will alter their behavior in a positive direction, because they are being watched.

The ICCS was a failure. It was a total failure, almost from the beginning. Canada was one of the four countries participating in the ICCS. Members of the ICCS included Canada, Hungary, Indonesia, and Poland. The Canadians tried to make the Accords on Vietnam work and succeeded in doing so in terms of a few pieces of it. However, the most you could say was that the Poles and the Hungarians were never functional members of the ICCS. The worst that you could say is that they deliberately set out to sabotage the Accords on Vietnam. The Canadians soon saw the futility of it all and cleared out.

The ICCS was reported to the American people as a major component of the Accords which were going to bring peace to Vietnam. The theory was that this whole thing was going to work, but nobody in Washington was facing up to how it was functioning. This was very disturbing.

Q: You know, at one time the international press was covering and talking about all of the "horrors" of the war. Had the press lost interest in what was happening in terms of the implementation of the Accords on Vietnam? Some people think that the press was at least partly responsible for how things turned out in South Vietnam. Did you find that the press did a good job of reporting on the failure of the ICCS?

DUNLOP: I'm trying to remember about press reporting on the ICCS. If we couldn't get that story back to Washington, certainly since we thought that it was a "bad" story, it would have been newsworthy, and the press would have reported this. I can't remember that. I have no recollection of what the press was saying about the ICCS or of thinking that if somebody says that, then it will be read, since the Embassy reporting on the ICCS wasn't particularly welcome in Washington. I don't recall any particularly better attitude on the part of the press toward the American effort in Vietnam as a whole. The journalists whom I came in contact with during the 1972-1974 period still dripped with contempt for the official American effort in Vietnam. They not only believed that it was the wrong war at the wrong place at the wrong time, but they seemed glad that this was so. I bitterly resented that attitude when I encountered it.

If we were going to have a failure in Vietnam, and it was always possible that we would have a failure, OK, well that's that. However, in my view, to rejoice over your country's failure was just an unacceptable personal attitude. I couldn't stand it. And, of course, at that point we hadn't totally failed, though we seemed to be on the road to failure. We hadn't gotten there yet.

Q: Did you find any change in the contribution and role of the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] and what they were doing? Did you get much from them in the way of reporting?

DUNLOP: I think that I said in discussing my earlier tour in Saigon that I never knew much about what they were doing. They didn't cross my path very much. During my second tour [1972-1974] I think that I probably had more contact with them on the analytical side. I had a slightly higher position in terms of my level in the Political Section. I'll give you an example of that.

Toward the end of my second tour in Saigon [1972-1974] and after the Accords on Vietnam had been in place for a year, we had seen the collapse of the ICCS and the resumption of this relentless buildup by the North Vietnamese. They began to pave parts of the Ho Chi Minh Trail, put steel-truss bridges on it, and installed an eight-inch pipeline or something like that to bring fuel down to South Vietnam to supply the trucks that were going to drive over the improved bridges and macadamized roads. I had a strong feeling, shared by Harry Sizer, a Political Officer in the Internal Unit of the Political Section, that North Vietnam was not going to wait very long before they brought the hammer down on South Vietnam. Remember, this was after the Accords were signed in January, 1973. The North Vietnamese saw the weaknesses in South Vietnam after the American withdrawal. They also saw that the ICCS was not going to be around to notice what they were doing in any meaningful way.

The North Vietnamese were also looking at the U.S. domestic scene. By this time the Watergate affair had begun to influence their thinking in a most important way. They saw that the Nixon administration was increasingly crippled by the Watergate controversy. There were a lot of smart guys in Hanoi.

I advocated, and finally got approval for compiling an Airgram, a "think piece" on the intentions of the North Vietnamese. I got seven people in the Mission to contribute to it, including myself, of course, as one of them. Another of the contributors was Harry Sizer, the other Political Officer in the Internal Affairs Unit. Another contributor was Frank Snapp, the chief CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] analyst on North Vietnam at the time, who later wrote the book, "Decent Interval." An officer in the DAO [Defense Attaché Office] also contributed to it. We arranged to have a couple of other people contribute who were well known in the Embassy as North Vietnam watchers. We wrote seven, separate pieces to address the question of whether we thought that North Vietnam would launch a full-scale offensive within the next six months in an attempt to end the war. This six months period we addressed ended on June 30, 1974.

The Airgram finally went out to the Department of State in January, 1974, so this analysis covered the period from January to June, 1974. I felt very strongly that somebody ought to be saying something about this. Maybe it was being said elsewhere, but I didn't know it. I was really delighted that Airgram went out. Not everybody agreed with it, but at least I had my say.

I found that Airgram last week in the documentation that we were going over as a part of the declassification program in the Department, the so-called Freedom of Information program. It was kind of fun to see it in the files of the Department and to recall what it had said. Five of the seven contributors to this Airgram said, "No, there won't be a North Vietnamese general offensive during the next six months" that is, before June 30, 1974. Two of us, Harry Sizer and I, said, "Yes, there will be a North Vietnamese general offensive within the next six months." In that sense Harry Sizer and I were wrong, (by about a month) and the other five were right. However, only two of the seven contributors said that the North Vietnamese would not conduct a general offensive at any foreseeable time. Of course, the five of us who said that the North Vietnamese would attack, but only differing on the time frame, were right in that regard. So, if it cared, Washington could have known that 5 of 7 analysts in Saigon were predicting a major NVA offensive.

Frank Snapp, who wrote the book, "Decent Interval," and who took credit for having foreseen the North Vietnamese general offensive, was one of those who said the North Vietnamese wouldn't attack. He said that they were too much involved in the reconstruction of North Vietnam, they had taken too many casualties, and all of the efforts going on along the Ho Chi Minh Trail were preparatory and contingency efforts. He felt that they were not going to attack, in any near time-frame.

That kind of analytical reporting, with the implications for policy in it, is among the hardest things that the Foreign Service has to do. This is partly because of time. You are always reporting the "here and now." We had to report on the ICCS, on what the Vietnamese Senate was saying about the Paris Accords, on President Thieu's most recent speech. That's why I remember that Airgram so well and for many years afterwards, because it was sent to the Department. I was very pleased that it was submitted, because it was not an easy thing to do.

Q: Now regarding reporting on the ICCS. Was this a "touchy" issue?

DUNLOP: Yes, it was, although a lot of great reporting was done, and I've seen some of that recently. In anticipation of the signature of the Paris Accords on Vietnam, the Department prepared a list of 100 Foreign Service Officers who had formerly served in South Vietnam and asked them to accept short assignments back to that country for periods of up to six months of TDY [Temporary Duty]. The idea was that they would go back into areas that they may have been familiar with. The purpose was to track what was going on. When this program was announced at a staff meeting, I thought that this was going to create chaos. These officers would hardly have gotten off the airplane in Saigon and unpacked their bags before it would be time for them to return to their posts of assignment. The arrangement was that they would not be replaced in their posts of assignment and would have their TDY time in Vietnam added to their tours of duty wherever they were assigned in the world. Actually, these FSO's came out and by and large did a super job. About 44 FSO's were initially assigned back to Vietnam. Of these, about 10 were assigned to the Embassy, and eight more were assigned to each of our Consulates General in Da Nang, Nha Trang, Bien Hoa, and Can Tho. There were two other groups of FSO's who returned to Vietnam later on for similar periods of TDY.

For example, Dick Teare and Jim Mack were among those who returned to Vietnam in the first group. John Helble and Steve Johnson came back to organize U.S. Mission support for the ICCS. (John Helble has commented extensively on this period in another interview in this Foreign Service Oral History.) Jim Mack was one of the officers who went back up to Nha Trang, where he had previously served. Dick Teare initially served in Bien Hoa and later in Saigon. We had a special unit in the Political Section set up under FSO Roger Kirk, a superb senior officer, now retired. He was very valuable in commenting on ICCS reporting. He ought to write a book about it. Maybe he has. These guys did wonderful reporting on the Indonesians and the Canadians in the ICCS, who were trying, at least. The Poles and Hungarians did what they could to sabotage the effort, and we learned of this, too.

Later on, the Iranians replaced the Canadians. The Canadians saw this developing chaos in the ICCS and bailed out. This made the Department of State furious, but I understand the Canadian decision. The Canadians said that this was not only a catastrophe in the making but was a catastrophe actually happening. They said that they didn't want to be part of any sham. So we persuaded the Iranians to replace the Canadians on the ICCS.

Q: What was the reaction to the developments within the ICCS? I assume that we were reporting what was coming out. Did you feel any inhibitions on reporting on this?

DUNLOP: Well, the reporting on the ICCS went to the Department. I've seen the results of it, much or even all of which I saw at the time. No, I don't think that there were any inhibitions on reporting on it. However, I don't think that anybody in Washington wanted to pay any attention to it in any policy sense, because it was on failure and Kissinger and Nixon were committed to making the Accords a success.

You would have to talk to specific people in this area. Retired Ambassador Bob Miller would be a good person to talk to on Vietnam in general. Bob, I believe, was the head of the Vietnam Task Force in the Department during this time. Bob was a very well informed, balanced guy who would have welcomed the challenge of reporting on the implementation of the Paris Accords, "warts and all." He saw these reports and probably experienced a lot of frustration in trying to get them factored into policy thinking.

However, who was making policy on Vietnam? Wasn't the whole process getting out of control in Washington? The ability of anybody in Washington to do anything about Vietnam was diminishing day by day.

Q: Did you understand what was happening in connection with the Watergate affair at that time?

DUNLOP: Well, I think not at first, at least. In the 1972 presidential elections, President Nixon [the Republican candidate] triumphed over Senator McGovern [the Democratic candidate]. A lot of us in the Embassy in Saigon were really glad about that.

Q: I think that most of us probably "leaned" toward the Democrats. However, I voted for President Nixon.

DUNLOP: Well, those were the times which made you change your outlook. Personally, I also voted for Nixon. I think that most people that I knew voted for Nixon. I think that is probably true but I really have no basis for saying that. I just believe this was the case.

The period between the presidential elections in November, 1972, to Nixon's resignation from the presidency in August, 1974, was about 21 months. Nixon resigned from the presidency after I returned to Washington. I think that the Watergate affair must have become increasingly a weight on our minds. Especially in the spring of 1974, when our support -- logistical support -- for the RVN was being slashed in Congress and Nixon was more and more helpless. We came to believe, as I've said before, that the North Vietnamese must be licking their chops, as indeed they were.

Ambassador Bunker, of course, kept a stiff upper lip. Then, of course, he was replaced during that period of time by Ambassador Graham Martin, who was going to play the role of Horatio at the bridge.

Q: Were you in Saigon when Ambassador Martin took over?

DUNLOP: Yes.

Q: Had you heard about Ambassador Martin before he arrived in Saigon? When did he arrive in Saigon?

DUNLOP: I'm pretty vague on that, but he probably arrived in the spring or summer of 1973. I think that he had been Ambassador to Vietnam for a year when I left Saigon in 1974. Then he continued for another eight months or so before the collapse of the Republic of Vietnam. I was working for a superb officer, FSO Al Francis, who had worked with Ambassador Martin in Bangkok. So my views of Martin before he arrived in Saigon were largely framed by what Al Francis told me. Al used words and terms like "formidable," "steel-trap mind," "miracle worker," a "consummate bureaucratic infighter," "ruthless with people that he felt were under-achievers," and "dedicated" to describe Martin.

Q: Yes, but he also was not "negative."

DUNLOP: No. Not "negative" in the sense of "small minded," "mean," "malicious," or "nasty." Ambassador Bunker had this old-school, Vermont, gentlemanly aura about him, which was all reflective of who he was. I'm sure that Ambassador Bunker could get mad as hell. I'm told that he could tell dirty jokes, although I can't imagine that! Somebody told me the other day, "Boy, did you ever hear Ambassador Bunker tell all those dirty jokes?"

Q: I can't imagine.

DUNLOP: I said, "No, I never heard him tell dirty jokes." My friend said, "Well, he was good at it." I said, "Well, I missed it." That's one thing that I missed in my Vietnam experience.

Graham Martin was a street smart, North Carolina guy who came up in the WPA [Works Progress Administration, a creation of President Franklin D. Roosevelt during the 1930's]. He was something like President Lyndon Johnson. Lyndon Johnson also came to Washington to serve in the WPA. Martin and Johnson had learned all of the tricks of bureaucratic street fighting.

Then Martin had gone on to have a very distinguished career. He had been Ambassador to Italy and Thailand, where Al Francis worked for him. That was when we were basing B-52 intercontinental bombers in Thailand, under agreements reached with the Thai Government. This was an unheard of concession by a Thai Government. Over the centuries it had been known for keeping foreigners out of its affairs.

Well, Martin arrived in Saigon with this reputation. Al Francis was one of the officers in the Mission whom Martin trusted. Because Al liked and trusted me, I guess he gave me a good reference to Martin because I saw Ambassador Martin quite a lot. Martin would call me up. It was always quite a jolt when I would get a phone call, saying that Ambassador Martin would like to see me. I would go up to his office. He would have some question about reporting and all of that. As I saw him, Ambassador Martin was never a mean spirited man. He never seemed to take pleasure in demeaning people, which is sometimes done by people holding great power and authority. He wasn't a "warm, fuzzy", he was a "cool, prickly" type of person. I was always glad when he called me but also kind of glad when I got back to my office and that nothing had gone wrong in my meeting with Ambassador Martin.

Ambassador Martin was very interested in the reporting of the warts. That is, bad things happening. This is not the image that he may have with many people. For example, the disastrous failure of the ICCS. The Vietnamese commander of IV Corps [that is, the area South of Saigon], as I mentioned before, was corrupt to his toenails, to a point where this situation was actually impacting on the ability of the Vietnamese Government to function in that area.

During those months FSO Ken Quinn produced a very interesting series of reports. I think that they impressed Ambassador Martin. They certainly impressed me. Quinn was a colleague of ours who has gone on to be the Director of the Executive Secretariat [S/S] of the Department. Ken was a relatively junior officer in those days down in the Mekong Delta area. Ken began to interview refugees who at that time had begun to stream over the border from Cambodia into South Vietnam. They were telling utterly horrendous tales of slaughter that were so far beyond what anybody had heard previously that he encountered a rather incredulous audience for his reports. However, Ken was meticulous. He took time to cross-check these reports.

These reports turned out to be the first accounts of Khmer Rouge slaughters. The Vietnamese had a word for them. They called these incidents pick axe murders, because pick axes were used to kill people. These murders were mainly directed against Buddhist temples and priests at that time. At least, they were one of their earliest targets. These Khmer Rouge units would come into a village and slaughter the Buddhist priests in front of the horrified eyes of the village populace, who would then think that maybe this was not a good place to live in.

Ambassador Martin was very supportive of that kind of reporting. If that was what was happening, it was what he wanted to hear about. Of course, I guess that he felt that these reports might help him back in Washington. Ambassador Martin had lost a son in South Vietnam. Whether he was his only son or not, I don't know. Martin had other children. The loss of his son was something that affected Ambassador Martin very deeply. I would expect that to be true of most people.

Some people have said that the death of his son gave Ambassador Martin an ideological commitment to success in South Vietnam. He may have thought, "My son will not have died in vain." This may have kept Ambassador Martin on that bridge which he was defending almost alone at the end [in 1975]. He is said by many people to have stayed in Saigon longer than he should have. I was not in Saigon at the end, so I simply cannot speak to that point. I knew people who would say that and I knew people who would say something else. I had left Saigon in June, 1974, some 10 months before the final collapse in April, 1975. Ambassador Martin was certainly determined to do everything that he could to keep intact the commitment to South Vietnam which the United States had made. He failed in this effort. The North Vietnamese knew it. When they became convinced of it, they came down on South Vietnam like wolves on the fold.

Q: When did you leave Saigon?

DUNLOP: I left Saigon in June, 1974. I always seemed to make June my departure or arrival month. I guess that's the way the Foreign Service works.

Q: So you left in June, 1974.

Q: Now, when you left Vietnam, from your point of view where did you think that South Vietnam was headed?

DUNLOP: I was very pessimistic. I had participated in writing this Airgram on future prospects a few months before, to which I have already referred. My contribution to it had said that North Vietnam was acutely aware of the increasing debility of the Nixon administration in the United States and showed every sign of preparing to exploit it, as soon as they had the right number of tanks and 130 mm artillery pieces in place. After September, 1973, the United States was prohibited under the Case-Church amendment to a Defense Department appropriation bill from using our armed forces in combat in Southeast Asia. Even more, we seemed unable to do something to replenish the supplies and thereby the morale of the South Vietnamese Army. By that time we had ample reports that the South Vietnamese Army was beginning to understand what was in store for them and what they had to face without what they had known before in terms of American support. At least, American support at the level of what had been provided at the time of the North Vietnamese Easter offensive in 1972. Nothing that I learned when I got back to Washington convinced me to the contrary.

FRANK N. BURNET
Political Advisor, Commander in Chief Pacific Command (CINPAC)
Washington, DC (1966-1967)

Province Advisor
Bien Hoa (1967-1969)

Intelligence Analyst, Southeast Asia, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1971-1975)

Frank N. Burnet was born in New York in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1954 and served in the Philippines, Thailand, Laos, the East Asia Bureau, Taiwan, and Washington, DC as the Department of State political advisor to CINPAC (1966-1967), and as a province senior advisor in Vietnam at Bien Hoa (1967-1969). He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You came to a really rather unusual assignment, but very pertinent to what you were doing. You were transferred to CINCPAC in Honolulu from 1966 to '67, where you were the Deputy Political Advisor. Could you explain what this meant and who were some of the personalities you were dealing with at the time?

BURNET: CINCPAC had a vast military staff. There must have been thousands. I've never been in such a place before. It was kind of a mini-Pentagon. All of the G-numbered staff, the G-1, G-2, G-3, all the way up to G-7, -8 and so on. All presided over by the Commander in Chief Pacific CINCPAC, who, at the time I was there, was Ulysses S. Grant Sharp.

I arrived there in 1966, and the air war in Vietnam was in progress. And one of Admiral Sharp's roles was to run the air war for the various staffs back in Washington. He took it very, very seriously.

Of course, I was kind of on the periphery of it, because, after all, I was the Deputy POLAD. But yet I regularly attended the briefing sessions that were held in the big briefing room daily for Admiral Sharp, so that I could see what was on his mind, what he was trying to accomplish, and perhaps finding out what we had accomplished.

You're right. It was more exposure to the counter insurgency type of conflict which I had seen on a smaller scale in Laos. But here is where it was being planned and especially the intensive air campaign in North Vietnam. And the interface, I think, between the diplomatic and the military was something to be observed here.

These briefings always included reports on the bombing of North Vietnam. U.S. planes inevitably flew up toward the China border. We had a really good Foreign Service officer, an old-timer, in Hong Kong, whose name escapes me at the moment. I'll think of it in a minute. He was Consul General.

Q: Was it Ed Rice?

BURNET: Yes, Ed Rice, an old China hand.

Q: He's a real old China hand.

BURNET: He's written a book about Mao Zedong. As a matter of fact, I saw in the recent months he's come out with another one.

In any event, he knew China. And of course he knew the whole history of Korea and what had happened there when U.S. forces wandered too close to the border. So he was, naturally and understandably, concerned that we were getting a little bit too close, too often, to the China border in our air operations over North Vietnam.

And so he would weigh-in, in his messages back to Washington, which always were tagged "CINCPAC for POLAD" or "CINCPAC," so that Admiral Sharp read a good deal of the messages coming out of that part of the world.

And one day, after several of these messages in which Consul General Rice had warned about flying too close, what might happen if there were an incident on the border involving our aircraft, and I suppose Admiral Sharp was under a good deal of pressure from Washington, he said, "God damn it, I hear about all I want to hear from Mr. Rice. You guys who are doing this briefing, now I don't want to hear any more of this stuff. Just keep it out of your briefing." He just laid down the law that he did not appreciate having to take advice from a diplomat at his own briefing. That made quite an impression on me and on members of his staff, too.

I would get a good idea from the back-and-forth between him and his staff at the briefing sessions what his role was, how he saw his role, and what he was trying to do and so on. It was a fascinating assignment.

Q: Who was the Political Advisor at that time?

BURNET: Bob Fearey.

Q: And how well did he work within this context?

BURNET: He worked very well indeed. I think Fearey enjoyed this. He saw his role as being very close to the Admiral and told me when I first arrived there that an awful lot of the work was going to be shoved off on me, because he, Bob, had to devote himself almost exclusively to the needs of the Admiral. And whenever the Admiral took these long trips through East Asia, he had to go with him, and that I would have to run the office by myself then.

There is an awful lot of staff work that goes on in a place like that. Every operation had to be planned as a staff paper, each one having at least two officers to bird-dog it. They had to get a chop from all the offices concerned. One of the chops was almost always the POLAD chop, particularly if the operation or project impinged upon an Asian country.

So many papers, and these included some of the intelligence missions that we were running in Korea, came across my desk. I would have two guys from the staff sit down in my office with their piece of paper, and their one job was to push that piece of paper through each office concerned. They had to tell me what the paper was about, what the operation was about, what it was trying to accomplish and so on. As I think about it I remember putting my chop, my OK, on the ill-fated mission of the USS Pueblo.

And I was supposed to see how it would fit as far as our foreign relations were concerned in that part of the world, whether there would be any problems with countries that we had good relations with and so on. That kept me pretty busy. There was a lot of this paperwork, beside, I was running around to meetings and attending briefings.

Q: You say Sharp was focusing on the air war. Talking about a worm's eye view, I was the equivalent to a Corporal in the Air Force in Korea during the war there. And actually my job was to listen to Soviet Air Force radio transmissions during the Korean War. But I was a college graduate, I looked at this appendage, which is Korea, with high mountains, not much forest, the American Air Force had complete dominance over the thing and yet was unable to stop some very massive Chinese armies from being resupplied. And, as a Corporal, I said, "Gee, this Air Force really doesn't work very well as an instrument." And having known about the strategic bombing survey in Germany, which showed that the Air Force with all the impression of destruction, German production went up rather than down during this period.

BURNET: And it didn't destroy morale as they hoped it would.

Q: And you saw what we were doing in Laos, and you flew over and you saw this jungle and all. Wasn't everybody saying: "You know, this isn't working."?

BURNET: You just couldn't put that down. The problem came up again and again and again as to how effective we were with our air power. These things made some very deep impressions on me.

I remember how, to go back a moment, in Laos in the early years of the air war, we heard from our Air Attaché and from people who came up from Saigon, again and again, in messages coming out of MACV in Saigon, that what we had to do was to cut a particular LOC as they called it.

Q: Line of communication.

BURNET: Line of communication, Route Number Seven, which comes right straight in from North Vietnam into Northern Laos by the Plaine of Jars. We had a beautiful choke point, they told us, by a little village called on the map, Ban Ken. If we could get permission from Souvanna to bomb that bridge, we would create a choke point. Then the Vietnamese would not be able to bring their supplies and men into Laos, as we would cut their line of supply. It sounded reasonable.

By 1964 or so the relations between the U.S. and North Vietnam had gotten to the point where we were steadily increasing the pressure. Finally, MACV got an approval to bomb this bridge in the little village of Ban Ken in neutral Laos, which was going to cut the main route from North Vietnam and got permission from Souvanna. So the mission came along.... And Yankee team, or what was it called?

Q: Yankee Station.

BURNET: No, Yankee Station was where the Navy was in the Gulf. But we had another name, this code name misses me at the moment.

Q: Something about Tiger?

BURNET: No, this was before "Tiger Hound," which was a free bombing zone along the Ho Chi Minh trail in the Laos corridor. So they bombed it. They did a pretty good job of bombing this bridge. But do you know that within 12 hours the North Vietnamese trucks were successfully going around it, and within 24 hours they had started to rebuild the bridge. And very soon that LOC was right back in commission again.

That made an indelible impression on me, that air power ain't gonna do it in this part of the world.

Q: It really doesn't do it most places.

BURNET: It didn't do it in Germany. But of course that happened again and again.

Q: But you're really talking to true believers, aren't you, when you're talking about proponents of air power.

BURNET: Absolutely. You haven't convinced them even to this day.

Q: Well then in POLAD, in the time you were there, were there any incidents that made Admiral Sharp pay more attention to the diplomatic warnings, or were there no responses from China?

BURNET: Fortunately nothing more than an endless series of "serious warnings." I think that Admiral Sharp probably got most of it when he went back to Washington. I'm afraid he didn't get much from us, from the two members of the State Department. Fearey was very, very... As a matter of fact, there was the story going around the staff at CINCPAC that the biggest hawk in the whole staff was Bob Fearey, who was a diplomat who should not have been a hawk but was. Some very responsible members of Admiral Sharp's staff told me they were greatly bothered by this.

Q: This often is the case. We had one interview with somebody who I think served under Sullivan and Godley and was quite unhappy about these... I can't think of his name, he was on the National Security Council at one time, I think.

BURNET: Not Holdridge? But Holdridge had a lot to do with the war in Laos under Kissinger on the NSC.

Q: But anyway who was really unhappy serving under these two men because he felt that they... I just looked it up and I think it was Lindsey Grant, but I'm not sure.

BURNET: He wasn't in Laos.

Q: Well, maybe it wasn't, it was somebody else in our interviews, but who really felt uncomfortable because he felt that diplomats became, and this had been noted other times, often become accessories, almost infatuated as by war, which is true often in Washington, by William Bundy and...

BURNET: You have those who are and those who are not. Those who are seem to forget they are diplomats and often defer to the military. My impression is that a good example of those who are would be somebody like U. Alexis Johnson. And somebody who is not -- Marshall Green. Marshall Green was very much his own man anyway. I remember attending Foreign Service Day several years ago which featured an address by the new chief of the NSC, Colonel Bud McFarlane. He made a strong pitch for continuing covert operations. A large part of the audience applauded. I noticed Ambassadors Green and Johnson sitting together as they are old friends. Only Ambassador Johnson applauded. But I think a strong case can be made that over the years since WW II, the State Department has not served the country well by its policy of working so closely with the military. In most cases, we would be far better off if the Department had stuck to its own diplomatic, peaceful, proposals for consideration by the White House instead of serving as the handmaiden of the military as we have done so much of the time.

Q: Is there anything else about the relations within CINCPAC? Did you find that there was a difference dealing with the Air Force and the Navy on matters you were concerned with, particularly on the war?

BURNET: Let me go back to Laos. There was a great deal of difference. Most of our difficulties were with the Navy. I don't know what the problems was. Was it training? Was it inadequate briefing? Whatever it was, we had constant problems with Navy aircraft bombing the wrong targets in Laos, and bombing, in particular, one village.

You could almost spit from this village to the Mekong River. And anybody who knows anything about Laos knows that any population living within sight of the Mekong River, certainly, and even beyond that, is in friendly territory. But the Navy planes were forever bombing this friendly town.

And we had to go down there several times to give some compensation to poor villagers who had been bombed by U.S. aircraft. The Navy, as we would say in those days, "screwed up" more often than the Air Force did. So it was a problem with the Navy. I recall that in one of his famed cables, Ambassador Sullivan wrote, "Tecumseh weeps..!" referring to several of these Navy screw-ups.

Q: How about in CINCPAC, did you see this?

BURNET: We saw an awful lot of the Navy, but I didn't have that impression. You were asking to what extent Sharp was impressed by or listened to the diplomats. I think that the visitors who came through there, and there were many, I think he gave them a good hearing, and I think he was impressed by them. And of course he read most of the diplomatic cable traffic.

He was always very friendly toward me and didn't show any impatience which he exhibited with his own staff in that one instance that we talked about. My impression is that he wasn't totally out of control as far as civilian control of the military was concerned.

Q: Well, for a Chinese language officer, your specialty... I'm talking about your next assignment. You went to Bien Hoa from 1967 to '69. Didn't you feel you'd had enough of this? Or did you have any choice in the matter?

BURNET: Well, I didn't really like the assignment, for one thing, in CINCPAC. I was there for a year, and it had its difficulties, mostly personal. And, I guess I thought that there was a contribution I could make in Vietnam. They were putting pressure on us, as you know, to go to Vietnam, and there were inducements. So the totality of it convinced me that I should go out there and have that experience. So I went and got to Saigon just a week before Tet.

Q: What happened to you during Tet? This would be Tet, January '68.

BURNET: I got there just before our new year, in December of '67.

Q: Where were you, and what was your experience during Tet?

BURNET: You know there was a holding hotel for U.S. civilian personnel there, the old Oscar Hotel on Nguyen Hue Street in Saigon. I arrived there with a group of other FSO's who had been in training with me in Washington. We were awaiting assignment. In the meantime, we were sort of getting acquainted with Saigon, going out to see friends, or out to eat, maybe, in a restaurant.

But to get back to Tet. I remember very distinctly in the days before Tet eating in the so-called mess hall, and as we went through the line, seeing notices up on a bulletin board saying: We've received intelligence that there are enemy forces trying to penetrate the area. We expect some activity over Tet, and we should all be very cautious and careful. We all read it, commented a little bit about it, then forgot about it.

Went to bed that night, and I was awakened early in the morning. I don't know whether you know this particular hotel. The Oscar had a wonderful roof on top. You could see the whole city of Saigon.

Q: Yes, I think I used to go to movies up there.

BURNET: Yes, like the Brinks had movies on the roof. I don't know, maybe they did at the Oscar.

Q: Well, maybe not. Maybe it was the Brinks.

BURNET: Well, anyway, it was a great place to see Saigon. Every night you'd see the flares hanging in the sky and an occasional burst of something or other. So we had been up there as usual the end of the evening to see the sunset, talked to one's neighbors, and then retired.

I went to bed and, realizing this was Tet, awakened about two or three in the morning to one hell of a racket. I thought, "Oh, this is just more of the same fireworks going on in celebration of Tet."

Then I heard it more and more, and it sounded more persistent. And I said, "My God, there's a coup. There's a coup."

So I put some clothes on and went up on the roof. And it seemed like a good part of Saigon was ablaze, with tracers being fired all over the place, and loud explosions -- just all hell breaking loose. And I thought to myself, "Coup. No question about it." You see in Laos we had had two full-fledged coups in three years.

Of course I didn't know until the next day what had actually happened. In the morning we watched reinforcements landing by helicopter on the Embassy roof. We were told to stay in quarters. Nevertheless, we slipped out and went up to the Embassy a few blocks away just to see what had gone on. And it was a real mess, really torn apart. I could see where the VC blew the wall and forced entry and got the gist of what had happened from some marines on guard. Were you there in then?

Q: No I wasn't. I came a year later.

BURNET: About a day or two later, I got a telephone call from somebody, I had no idea who he was. He said, "This is John Vann. I need somebody up here in my provinces. Would you like to come up and work for me?" Did you ever meet Vann?

Q: I think I met him very briefly.

BURNET: Well, he talked just like this [in a high-pitched, commanding voice]. And I said, "Sure, I'd love to. I want to get out of here and get to doing something."

He said, "Ok, I'm coming down tomorrow, and I've got an appointment or two in Saigon. I'll see you at such and such a place and we'll get together." So we met and we talked, and we went to his girlfriend's restaurant. Did you read A Bright Shining Lie?

Q: Yes, I did.

BURNET: That's quite a book.

Q: By Robert Shaplen. [NEIL SHEEHAN]

BURNET: No. This is A Bright Shining Lie by... It's a name like that, but it's not quite the name. He got the...

Q: Pulitzer Prize.

BURNET: Yes, and a national book award. In any event, his girlfriend, Lee, was running a restaurant and we went over there and had something to eat. And we agreed that I'd like to work for him and he'd like to have me work for him. So he said, "I'll send my chopper down such and such a date." So he did. Vann was then Deputy for CORDS 2 for Military Region III. CORDS stands for Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support. This was a civil-military pacification army formed in November 1966, headed by Ambassador Komer, who was officially "Deputy to COMUSMACV for CORDS."

In the midst of all the battle in Saigon going on, air-strikes and all, his chopper flew into the Free World Compound where I met Vann's pilot and, without stopping the engine or the rotors, took off with him for Bien Hoa. What did they call that place where the military headquarters was located in Saigon? Free World Compound? Something like that.

John Vann's usual procedure with a new man was to send him to the four provinces surrounding the province that he was going to be assigned to, to live with the Advisory Teams there for a few days and see what their problems were and so on.

Well, this was the period a few days after Tet. Everybody had just been hit and they were just groggy. Each province I went to was the same story. These guys had just been knocked over by the Tet attack, so they were in kind of rough shape. I heard all of their experiences and learned a lot about this kind of war in a short time. I also learned the fellows in these outposts are uncomfortable if you are not carrying a weapon. Later on, I kept an M-1 carbine in the back of my car for only this purpose. I never had to fire it.

Q: Bien Hoa, for the sake of this thing, is located where?

BURNET: It's about 20 miles northwest of Saigon. So I stayed a few days in Bien Hoa, in John Vann's headquarters, and got assigned to the province of Binh Duong, which is still further to the northwest of Bien Hoa, toward the Cambodian border.

I went to four or five provinces around Binh Duong Province, including Loc Ninh Province, which is right up against the Cambodian border.

A good friend of mine, a Foreign Service officer named Tom Barnes, was the Province Senior Advisor (PSA) there. (This is what I was being trained to become, a Province Senior Advisor.) I visited with him for several days.

Tom was an intrepid sort of guy, who was in Saigon at Tet, and he had managed to get back to his own province after Tet broke out. He was a Vietnamese-speaker and he decided that he had to get himself back where his Advisory Team was.

I think he drove. He drove through all of that fighting between Saigon and the Cambodian border. He drove by himself and managed to get back to his own province. It took him several days, but he did it.

Anyway, as I was saying, he's very intrepid. He showed me around his province, including a trip, just the two of us, up to the Michelin plantation, which is a rubber plantation on the Cambodian border. I don't know what he expected to see there, but we just went up there.

We saw absolutely nobody, but yet he had said, "Frank, whenever I take these trips, I just take all my personal I.D. off of my person. If we get captured, we will pretend we are French and not American. The chances are the VC will then let us go."

So we got into his Jeep, which I noticed had sandbags on the floor, and drove over terrible roads almost due north of the capital of his province to the Cambodian border. Just to look around.

Of course I thought, "Good God, are we going to get ambushed? Are we going to get blown up by a mine? What's going to happen?"

Well nothing happened. I don't know whether he was testing me, or what, but there was something rather scary about going up that lonely road with not a friend or foe in sight. But I wasn't going to let him get me. That was probably a dumb thing for me to do, but I did it.

I got assigned to Binh Duong and became the Deputy Province Senior Advisor to Colonel Bud Kitts who had been there a year or so. Eventually I got reassigned, after about six months there, to Bien Hoa where I became the Province Senior Advisor.

Q: Well let's talk about Binh Duong a bit. What did you do? You talk about Province Senior and Deputy Senior Advisor, what does this mean?

BURNET: Well, we were running a combined American military and civilian staff comprising an Advisory Team. What we were doing was trying to backstop the Vietnamese provincial military forces and civilian administration. The Vietnamese military's job was, of course, to protect the people of the province. All under the leadership of the Province Chief, who was a Vietnamese military man. Under the Province Chief, you also had all of the usual civil services of government: utilities, transportation, police, welfare, you name it, the whole gamut of services, which people need to survive.

So we were to backstop the provincial military forces and the local government, down to the village level in all areas: security, agriculture, home economics, information programs, even CIA. We had all these. It was a polyglot mix of personnel from various agencies. In Binh Duong I worked for the PSA who was a full Colonel. In Bien Hoa, I was the PSA and my deputy was a Lt. Colonel. This was part of Vann's idea to interlard civilian and military.

With the American input, particularly matériel input, the idea was to try to turn the situation around, provide some security in the villages and the hamlets, create a zone or area of security, and gradually push the VC out. Of course it was a losing proposition from the word go. But that was, in effect, what was going on when I arrived in Binh Duong. I soon learned that this province had been the scene of heavy fighting in the Iron Triangle, part of Michelin, and the village of Ben Suc.

It was an eye-opener for me in many, many ways. On the one hand it seemed like: Hey, there doesn't seem to be a war going on here. Then the war would suddenly erupt, somewhere in the province, usually at night. We had to get out quickly and see that the Vietnamese took care of casualties, provided sheltered, distributed food, etc.

I remember one night, about two or three weeks after Tet, the Province Chief got intelligence that we were going to be attacked that evening. We were, what, 30 miles maybe, from Saigon, and we were going to come under attack. The Province Chief, by the way, was Colonel Ly Tong Ba whom John Vann tried unsuccessfully to get to attack the VC with his APC's in the disastrous battle of Ap Bac in 1963 and who later committed suicide when surrounded by a NVN division in the final days of the war.

The intelligence was that there was a VC unit that was going to attack the Province Chief's headquarters. Word went out to all of the members of his staff and our advisory team to sort of circle the wagons. We were going to go to the Province Chief's headquarters, which was a pretty solid French-built house, and set up a perimeter defense and slug it out.

I thought, "God, how, Frank, you in the Foreign Service, a diplomat, did you get involved in a situation like this?"

We were there one whole night. And the attack did come. It didn't amount to much, but I remember in the process some heavy firing coming in our direction. It seemed like it was pretty big stuff to me. I was told it was .50-caliber.

I thought, "I'm at the receiving end of this. What does this guy want to shoot at me for?" A .50-caliber machine gun barking at you from out of the blackness of the jungle sort of concentrates your mind pretty quick.

So that was one of my early experiences as a Deputy Province Senior Advisor in Binh Duong, in a situation where we felt we were going to be broadly assaulted by the VC. Fortunately, they didn't really come very close. But they did come into other parts of town there. Well, there were a few occasions like that from then on, even in Bien Hoa. We had an assault by a large VC force right in the main streets of Bien Hoa during the time I was there.

Q: Looking at this the first time, were you concerned, because you came out of -- not just looking at this as a military problem, but a political problem -- that duplicating this, you really sound like you're describing a colonial situation. I almost can see you in your pith helmet and your swagger stick, going around and hoping the natives will do better, but you can always intercede to take care of it. And of course all sorts of things go with this. We're trying to make these people stand on their own and all this. But are we cutting them off at the knees by doing this type of thing?

BURNET: I must admit that at that time I really thought that what we were doing was the right thing and would work. I thought that if we could get all of these economic processes going, this thing might just survive by gathering its own momentum. That the VC and their effort would sort of fall by the wayside, as security improved and people began to have an investment in their homes, business, schools, etc. That this whole mechanism might just sort of slowly creak forward. But it never really worked out that way. It never did. Even when I left Vietnam in '69, I remember thinking that on the long haul it just might catch on.

Q: I came in '69, and I felt we were kind of making it. Things seemed to be jelling. It wasn't that bad.

BURNET: Well, I think it's a question of the spin you put on it. I mean, after all, there are lots of people looking at Tet: those who say that it was a terrific defeat; others who say that it was a great victory. Which was it?

Q: And you can argue it either way.

BURNET: You can argue it pretty well either way. But I would argue that it was a great defeat, because it was a watershed and a turning point. I think that they achieved a great deal in that effort, and certainly on the home front it had a tremendous impact.

I left Vietnam thinking that it was an awfully bloody way to do things and awfully expensive. And I just hated to see the civilians chewed up the way they were being chewed up. But you accept a certain amount of the inevitability of all this.

Q: How about when you went to Bien Hoa, what were you doing there, and what was the situation there?

BURNET: It was my job to run the CORDS program, the counterinsurgency program in Bien Hoa, under John Vann's overall leadership in MR III, whose headquarters was just a half a mile or so down the street from mine.

I took over a team [Advisory Team 98] of about 200 individuals, who were both military and civilian. You had AID civilians, CIA civilians, Agriculture, USIA, you name it, and U.S. military. I think I had one Foreign Service officer--a junior officer on his first assignment -- with me who was a District Senior Advisor in Nhon Trach in the south.

We all had our assignments. Most of us had Vietnamese counterparts to "advise." We had a daily military situation briefing and a team briefing; I would take over on the latter. If there were assignments for the day, or some new guidance from Vann's headquarters, I would brief them to the whole team, most of whom would attend these daily briefings if they were in town. We were running this program under the general guidance of the Assistant for CORDS (in Vann's huge headquarters) in all of these various fields. There were a lot of administrative tasks involved, and I had to do a lot of moving around the province to visit all six District headquarters under my jurisdiction or to look at projects, often with the Province chief. Sometimes we slept over night in a hamlet to "prove" how safe it was.

Q: I wonder if you could talk a bit about John Vann -- how you observed him and his operating style. He's a figure of some interest to anybody dealing with Vietnam.

BURNET: John Vann was a phenomenon, no question about it. I knew, as soon as I met him, that he was a very high-powered guy, who was very dedicated, who thought we could win this damn thing if we could just get everybody pulling in the same direction and get the Vietnamese to fight their own war. That was his prime objective.

You couldn't help but be impressed when you heard him because immediately upon hearing him speak you felt his dedication and conviction. What he said, as far as that was concerned, seemed to me to make a lot of sense.

Yet he was, let's face it, a military man -- he'd been bred into the military, he lived and breathed it -- so that he barked. He didn't have anything like a conversational tone, like you and I are conducting here. He spoke in a very high-pitched voice, and you were very clear and had no question as to what he was trying to communicate. He was then a civilian working for AID, for CORDS, and at times he was very critical of US and GVN military and the way they were fighting the war.

Every month he would have an in-gathering of Province Senior Advisors from all over III Corps, which is the center section of Vietnam down toward the Delta covering areas north and south of Saigon. How many provinces would that be? About 11 or 12, something like that.

That was a very interesting session. It usually lasted all day and into the evening. Vann was very much in the fore and very much on the podium giving us the word: What we were doing right and what we were doing wrong, what we were going to try to do in the months ahead, and how we were going to improve this and improve that. And it was all very stimulating.

We had a very good get-together in the evening. Had a buffet dinner at Vann's house, sitting out in the back yard, lots of tables and so on. Here was a mix of mostly Colonels and Lieutenant Colonels, who were Province Senior Advisors in the other provinces, other civilians, Foreign Service officers like myself, maybe half a dozen or so. So it was an interesting mix of individuals.

There was a good feeling of morale and élan, we felt we were being well led and we knew what we had to do, and all we had to do was go out and do it. We felt what we were doing was at least as important as the main force war.

Q: How did you feel about reporting from the various provinces and all? Because there was this very fancy reporting: Is the village subdued? Is it friendly? Unfriendly? and so many points in between. We got very report-conscious, and we felt that if we made the right report, the war would be won. You always had to show progress. How did you feel about that?

BURNET: It was bad. I think I approached it with a certain amount of skepticism. This numbers-counting and head-counting, and counting the number of latrines that were dug and school houses that were built, and how many medical forays were made into this village and this hamlet and so on, and trying to add it all up and put a grade on it from A through D or F, according to the HES or Hamlet Evaluation System requirements, and measuring your security that way.

I was skeptical, but yet I went ahead and did it, and did it to the best of my knowledge. Where I saw things bad, I reported it bad. And when in doubt, I settled it in the direction of my doubts.

Q: Were you getting any feeling that there was pressure from somewhere to show progress? And if there was, where was it coming from?

BURNET: There definitely was that feeling that wanted you to show progress, particularly in these monthly sessions that we had, in our oral reports. We all had to make an oral report in front of Vann and the whole crowd and then there was a general discussion. I think there was a general tendency to make things look good. And maybe I was guilty of some of that, too. Probably was. Also on the monthly HES, as we called it, the Hamlet Evaluation Survey, do you remember that instrument?

Q: Yes, I do.

BURNET: Later on, when [William] Colby was the head of CORDS, through '69, he made a big thing of that. And there was a tremendous amount of pressure to get reporting from every hamlet in Vietnam. It wasn't so blatant that we would bend things in the direction of showing how we're winning the war. I never thought it was that blatant. But it was an undertone, it was there, it was present.

Of course we were just fooling ourselves. When you get down to it, when you finally turn to the peasant and ask him which way things are going, he will tell you what you want to hear. He will take a measure of you. You want it bad, you get it bad. You want it good, he'll give it to you good. So how good is it?

Q: This is how peasants survive through the centuries.

BURNET: Yes, it's survival, of course.

Q: How did you feel things were going when you left?

BURNET: I guess I thought that we were holding our own, and if we're lucky, this thing will catch on. And the sheer natural acquisitiveness of mankind is going to prove the edge, that the free Vietnam is going to win out over the other side, just through man's natural instincts, as this economy got developing. This is what I really thought.

I remember seeing Bill Colby at MACV headquarters in Saigon. We all had to have an exit interview with him when we left. And this is the way I talked to him about it. And he sort of nodded his head: yeah, yeah, yup. I think maybe he had other more immediate concerns on his mind.

Q: Well, I think this very much reflects an American approach to things. If you try hard enough and work hard enough, you can do it.

BURNET: That's right. But we were up against something quite new for us. Still, we should have known better. The French experience for one thing. But I was feeling pretty good about it, as I look back.

BURNET: In '71, I transferred to INR [Bureau of Intelligence and Research], where they offered me a good position as Chief of the Southeast Asia branch, which I think suited me more. I could put some of these things to use that I had learned on the ground in Laos and Vietnam.

By that time, I felt that the war was really going badly for us. I was also getting exposed to a number of people in CIA and some of the people on my staff coming back from Vietnam, who by that time had even fresher experience than I had, saying that things were really going badly.

So we wanted to report this in our various products that we were putting out, intelligence briefs, etc., that things were going badly.

Q: Were you under any restrictions on your intelligence briefs, or could you report...?

BURNET: I had the feeling that we definitely were. It was mainly the spin or the slant. They couldn't argue with us too much about the nuts and bolts of something we were talking about, but we'd see our stuff edited so that the overall effect made it look better than it really was.

Q: So you would write it and then it would go up to be condensed and all to go to the Secretary.

BURNET: And sort of polished up.

Q: So-called polished up, which would usually...

BURNET: Put a better spin on it. Our cries of alarm were muffled. They weren't really turned upside down, but they were certainly muffled. I had the feeling that some of our people desperately wanted to make us look better than we were. This is getting into the early years of the Nixon Administration. So it was kind of tough sledding there for awhile, particularly with the young men working with me, who were even more convinced than I was that we were losing.

Q: These were usually people who had served there. Because at that time, when you're talking about Vietnam, you had a huge cadre of people who had Vietnamese experience.

BURNET: That's right, that's right. So I had several, all of whom had been in Vietnam.

Q: So thinking positively was not always the... It's easier to do it from the vantage point of Washington, instead of having had field experience. Were you there during the peace talks? Was this of any concern to INR as far as supplying information to...?

BURNET: We were pretty remote, it seems to me, because, don't forget, there was a Vietnam task force, which was run, as a matter of fact, by Bill Sullivan at this point. So the center of activity, the focus was on them. And they were running the show. But we would get tasked (to use that lovely phrase) to produce various pieces of paper, or bits of intelligence, or whatever, as was needed.

Q: So really you weren't as much a separate think tank as almost a staff job of supplying information for specific points.

BURNET: Yes, but we churned out an awful lot of stuff, particularly later on as Cambodia got hot and the war came to sort of a close there. There was a pretty heavy demand for information on what was going on, or what our opinions were.

Q: How much was our opening to the Peoples Republic of China coloring the way we were looking at Southeast Asia, at least from the intelligence point of view? Was this changing our attitude do you think? Were we beginning to rethink China at that point?

BURNET: I think that move was certainly afoot, but it really wasn't perceptible to us in the Southeast Asia branch of INR in those days.

Q: Were you there during the peace accords? I can't remember exactly when they...

BURNET: When Harriman went to Paris and so on, was that in '71? Yes, I was in INR then, sure. We were pretty much out of it. Although, as I say, we would, through the task force, get assignments laid on us for this or that.

Q: Well you left INR in 1975. What was the situation? Do you remember how you saw things when you left there? Had it fallen apart by that time?

BURNET: It hadn't quite, because, don't forget, this was January of '75. You see, it didn't fall apart until June. But I had an official trip back to Vietnam in February '72, when we were expecting a big offensive. Were you there then?

Q: No, no, but I...

BURNET: Well anyway, you heard about it. And so I had an extensive trip going all through I Corps and II Corps. By that time, Tom Barnes was sort of a number one assistant to John Vann in II Corps, and he took me around with him on a visit by helicopter to all of the large western provinces in II Corps, like Kontum and Pleiku. Things looked ok then. But Vann, a few months later, had command in a terrific battle in Kontum and held it together for a little while before he was killed in a helicopter crash.

But when I went out to China and left Southeast Asia branch of INR, I felt that the dominoes were falling and things were slipping out of our control. I didn't think that our Vietnamese could hack it under the conditions in which we had left it, the Vietnamization and so on. I really didn't think it would hold together. But not for lack of equipment but for lack of will and leadership.

Q: Was this feeling pretty well shared by those that you were working for?

BURNET: No, it wasn't. I think my chiefs wouldn't have shared it. But the working level shared it, and our counterparts, too, at CIA, we all felt it -- kind of an underground feeling.

LAWRENCE H. HYDLE
Consular Officer
Saigon (1966-1967)

Political Officer
Saigon (1968-1972)

Consular Officer

Bien Hoa (1973)

Ambassador Lawrence H. Hyde was born in Indiana in 1940. He went to the Occidental College and graduated in 1960. He also went to Columbia University. Before entering the Foreign Service, Hyde was a newspaper reporter in 1961, and from 1962 to 1965, he was a radio writer. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His posts include Vietnam, Ireland, Ghana, Trinidad and Tobago, and Kuwait. Ambassador Hyde was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1994.

Q: What were you doing in Vietnam?

HYDLE: Initially, I was a consular officer, Consular section but that lasted only 6 weeks or so. Then I went into a vacancy in the political section. The political section at the time was very large. I would say there were about 20 people, it must have been the largest in the world. I was the biographic officer, the full time biographic officer keeping track of all the Vietnamese personalities.

Q: '66 is the time -- what was the political situation in Vietnam?

HYDLE: We were in the midst of a big American buildup. The political situation was that Thieu and Ky, there was a military junta more or less led by Thieu, who was not only the Chief of State, and Nguyen Cao Ky was the Prime Minister. The situation was a little more stable than it had been in the period after Ngo Dinh Diem was killed. Then, as you may recall, there was a lot of turbulence but things were stabilizing at this point.

Q: At this point, how did you view the Vietnamese government?

HYDLE: I thought it was kind of a weak government, not very effective but I felt sure that it was better than anything that the communists might offer as an alternative. I wanted us to shore them up and strengthen them better.

Q: How did you feel about, you know we've talked about shoring them up and all of that, but there's the problem that the more one gets in there, the more we get involved, the weaker it makes it, the more dependent -- was that a concern at that time?

HYDLE: Yes, it was. I thought it was a dilemma, but at that time the US was encouraging the South Vietnamese government to develop its own institutions -- not only militarily. The government infrastructure in the countryside, and especially the political infrastructure, there was a push for a presidential and a congressional election which culminated in late 1967.

Thieu ran as president and Ky as vice president. They won an election but I think it was a pretty fair election. They had only 35 to 40% of the votes but they had about 7 opponents who, Vietnamese style, refused to give way to each other and split the votes. They were able to win.

There was also a lower and upper house that were freely elected toward the end of my final tour there. I felt that was good. I felt that would strengthen the government among the South Vietnamese people, and also would make the South Vietnamese government more acceptable to the American public and Congress, whose support, of course, was needed for our own continued efforts there.

Q: How'd you work as a political officer and as a biographic officer?

HYDLE: Mostly I would just gather biographic information that came up about Vietnamese figures, file it and make reports if somebody needed to know something about some individual. As time went on, when the elections were coming up for example, I made it my business to learn more about the different political parties and the different new guys that were coming up. I did an analysis of the new lower house, it was a constituent assembly, as I recall its members -- their origins, their professions, their religions -- a sort of demographic analysis of these people. We did an airgram, as it was at the time, about 130 pages because there were 130 guys and each one got his own page.

Q: Did you find yourself working closely with the CIA? Or were they doing their thing and you were doing your thing. How did this work?

HYDLE: It wasn't that close. They were doing things separately. If I saw a report of theirs that I could use, of course I would file it and draw upon it.

Q: But you didn't find that CIA was somewhat a different operation?

HYDLE: Yes, they were on separate floors of the embassy.

Q: This is in the new embassy.

HYDLE: Well, it was during that time that we moved from the old embassy into the new embassy. I started out at the old one and then I moved to the new one in 1967 along with all of the other people.

Q: How was the political section organized? Who was the head of the political section?

HYDLE: When I first got there, as I recall it was Phil Habib, but the section was so large that there was also a deputy in the political section. I'm afraid I don't remember everybody. Sorry, Phil was the political counselor and Martin Herz was political counselor, and John Calhoun followed him eventually. The deputies, or the guys who actually ran the section most of the time, Tom Reichnaveil filled that role at one time; Galen Stone later and so forth. But I'm getting the dates a little confused because I was there for 2 tours.

Q: This is during the Johnson administration. Was there a sort of, in the political section did you feel any constraints? I mean biographic was a little bit neutral but still, within the section, did you feel any constraints about reporting?

HYDLE: Yes, this was something that bothered me a lot over the years. On the one hand I thought that the embassy was basically trying to make the South Vietnamese government look as good as possible, to minimize critical reporting. On the other hand, I knew that there were opponents of the policy out there who wanted to be hypercritical of the South Vietnamese government and our effort there. The argument that the senior political section guys would make was that: "Yes, we realize how bad it is but if you write critical reports they'll be leaked and they'll be used against the policy." That was their rationale, anyway. Reports were continually massaged and changed around to make them seem less bad than they were.

Q: I can understand. This is true say in African nations and other places. For example, if you report on corruption this is part of life in many places. If one, not over-reports but just reports instances of this, it tends to get blown up and stops everything.

HYDLE: I've heard that argument before. I felt at the time, and I still feel, that it's our job to report objectively. It's the right thing to do. Also, you have to maintain some sort of reputation if everybody thinks that the embassy has gone to the tank for the local government, then eventually you disillusion everyone. So yes, I was constantly concerned about that kind of thing.

Q: What was some of the, at that time, our major concerns about the problems in Vietnam?

HYDLE: Corruption and inefficiency on the part of the South Vietnamese government and authoritarianism were some of the problems then.

I supported the main thrust of our policy. I volunteered to go there. I wanted us to win, wanted the South Vietnamese government to become better than it was. I wanted the South Vietnamese people to achieve democracy and development. I knew that the critics of the Vietnam War, for the most part, didn't care about that at all. All they wanted was either to get us out of there and just wash our hands of it; or in some cases, they were actively pro-Communist for some reason.

Q: Let's talk about this. Did you get any feel for how they operated or were they too removed?

HYDLE: I felt that Lodge had a good reputation because of his first tour there in 63, for being an independent guy, and then again in 65 to 67, but I didn't have a good feel for what he was. I think that maybe he was becoming a little disillusioned and was trying to find his way out by 1967. Things were just falling apart and he wasn't quite sure how to deal with it.

Bunker, of course, was a towering legend even before he came there. I always felt that he also wanted to emphasize the positive. The people around him also didn't want to tell him things. It's one thing if the ambassador knows what's going on and then he decides to spin it in a certain way. It's another thing when his senior staff people protect him from knowing what he needs to know.

I remember that we used to have, this is more my second tour, but the ambassador did try to keep in touch with the younger officers. He was always very nice to us, certainly, but you had the feeling that he too was sort of looking at the bright side and not ready to confront the problems.

Q: Were you getting a feel for the military situation, about how the ARVN, the army of the Republic of Vietnam, was doing?

HYDLE: At that time it seemed that they were gradually improving but I didn't know as much then as I did in my second tour about the ARVN. Generally this was a period -- things almost fell apart in 64, 65. In 66, mostly because of the enormous increase of the US presence, things were stabilizing and the ARVN was not falling apart. As I recall, it was really later that we got into a serious Vietnamization program and the capabilities of the ARVN became more important to everybody than they were at the time.

Q: Did you get out and around at all?

HYDLE: At that time I didn't get out that much but often we would have congressional CODELs or VIP delegations and I would be assigned to escort them around. So I did get out, occasionally, to different parts of the country.

Q: Here you were, a junior officer, first tour out there. There were a lot of other junior officers, many of them in CORPS and stuck out there, what were you getting from them, you know, they'd come into Saigon.

HYDLE: I think the basic difference between attitudes of the junior officers and the senior officers was that we were more focused on problems at the ground level. For example, senior officers would have counterparts who were Vietnamese officials. We would have counterparts who were Vietnamese politicians, labor union leaders, people who were more likely to tell us that things were not going well. We all would hear a lot of criticism of the course of events. We were cynical of this problem of reporting honestly. We knew the newspaper reporters that were covering, we'd hang out with them, but we weren't the same as anti-war activists in the US, although maybe the senior officers thought we were. They may have thought we were some kind of fifth column.

Q: Did you ever get that feeling that any of the senior officers were sort of, was there a real gap do you think?

HYDLE: Yes I would say that there was a significant gap along the lines that I was just describing.

Q: Do you have any examples of when they'd say that you just don't know enough, or something like that?

HYDLE: Oh yes, we would tell them how bad things were and they would say, "Hey, we read reports that you don't even read, and things are worse than you say but we can't say that because blah, blah, blah."

Q: There is this problem of understanding (1) what the mission is and how you work this, but also, how about the real cynicism? Do you think it developed a lot of cynicism, particularly among the junior officers?

HYDLE: Yes, it did.

Q: I'm just trying to get a feel for the flow of information. There must have been people coming out from Washington of all levels. Was this sort of the time to kind of unload on them?

HYDLE: We did that. I remember that in September, it was the Fall of 67, one of the people that I was assigned to escort was Roger Hilsman. Hilsman had been the director of the INR and then had resigned, more or less, or left. He was friendly with Bobby Kennedy. I believe he had already written his book, To Move a Nation, which was very critical of our Vietnam policy making.

I was assigned to escort him around. I took him to places like Bien Hoa near Saigon. John Paul Vann was the DEPCORDS as we called it, Deputy for Civil Operations and Revolutionary Developments Supports, the civilian pacification chief. Vann was a legend already because of his exploits as an army officer. Vann would brief him. Vann was a hero already to me at that time because he had been very honest about the shortcomings of the South Vietnamese. Also, he wanted not to drag down the policy and cause it to fail, but because he wanted it to succeed.

Q: How did Hilsman

HYDLE: I think he already had his views. For example, there was an election, the election that I was describing earlier, was coming up. Ambassador Bunker urged him to stay an extra day and watch the election. He didn't want to stay an extra day and watch because, I think, that would have conflicted with his agenda. He was then in the position of being basically against our policy.

Q: While you were there, the Tet business, were you there during that?

HYDLE: Not exactly. I actually left my first tour in December 67, during my first tour I had been learning Vietnamese at the embassy from a tutor that was paid for by FSI. I was doing pretty well, in fact, I picked up a lot of Vietnamese through a combination of learning that style and just listening to it all around me, talking to people whenever I could. I was going back to take more Vietnamese and to take the course, and then to come back to be an officer in the provincial reporting unit, which was a subunit of the internal unit of the political section.

So I left in December 67 and I was actually away in the US when the Tet offensive struck. I didn't really return to Vietnam until June of 68. But when I was back there, I was taking these courses and I was also speaking on Vietnam to audiences around the country.

Q: Talk a bit would you about your reception and how these -- you know, they were taking anybody who had been in Vietnam and putting him out on the speaking circuit. This was combat sometimes under very difficult conditions.

HYDLE: It was, it was tough although later it was even tougher. But around 68 the big problem was that the Tet offensive had shattered American complacency about Vietnam and the notion that things were getting better. Of course students were particularly concerned, not least that they were going to get drafted when they finished school. Since I was relatively young, I was often put out there to talk to student audiences. I did the best that I could but obviously people were very skeptical.

I felt, in a way, that this proved that I was right about the way we were reporting on Vietnam. We were overly optimistic. Therefore, when the Tet Offensive occurred, people felt that they'd been duped -- even though the Offensive failed militarily and greatly weakened the Viet Cong, who never again posed a significant military threat -- because of the over inflated expectations created by our own reporting. We were screwed. We had hoisted ourselves on our own cartage.

So I was in this same position. I had to admit that things were not going well, that it was going to be a long struggle, but I thought we had to persevere. My line was that the South Vietnamese people may be dissatisfied with their government but they still, whenever they had the chance to live in the Viet Cong or the South Vietnamese countryside, they would choose the latter or become refugees. I said that the government was an elected government, there's no chance that this would happen under the Viet Cong. I wanted us to persevere.

Of course I was more focused on what would happen to the South Vietnamese people. The American public, at this point, were far more interested in what was happening to them; what was happening to the Americans; what else was happening in the US and do forth. So this interim period was when the Tet Offensive happened. It was when Johnson, in late March, announced he would not run for reelection; it was when Martin Luther King was killed; and finally, it was when Bobby Kennedy was killed. All this was a tumultuous period back in the US as we all remember.

But it was also, as I recall, Johnson said that he would increase the troop presence in Vietnam a bit more but that it would top off at a certain level. He also replaced Westmoreland with his deputy, Abrams. That was when the program, I can't remember if it was called it then, but basically the Vietnamization Program began. I was in favor of that too, because I thought we had to have some kind of, eventually a way of strengthening the South Vietnamese so that they could defend themselves. So I still felt at that point, although it was a tough blow, that we were on the right track.

HYDLE: June '68.

Q: June '68, where you were there until how long?

HYDLE: I was there until March or April 1970.

Q: When you went out initially, what were you up to, what were you going to do?

HYDLE: For that tour?

Q: For that tour.

HYDLE: I was assigned to the provincial reporting unit. This had 8 officers, basically junior or young officers. Two of them in each of the CORPS areas. You know, there were 4 military CORPS areas that the country was divided into.

We were suppose to be reporting on the political situation on the countryside. Some of us, at least, were also supposed to be political advisers to the DEPCORPS. So we had a unique insight into the situation in the countryside. Also, we were supposed to come back and report regularly in to Saigon.

I was assigned to Bien Hoa and I was working for John Paul Vann, the DEPCORPS.

Q: Bien Hoa, it was a very large base.

HYDLE: Yes, it was. It was a huge air force base as well. It's about 18 or 20 miles area from Saigon. It was a III CORPS area. It's area included several provinces around Saigon including Long Khanh province which was to the south.

I would spend part of my time in paperwork there, part of my time in Saigon, partly in traveling around the provinces and talking. There were always a good supply of young officers in the pacification program like myself, and military officers, sometimes. The Vietnamese, of course, that we would talk to.

Also, there had been created in III CORPS, where I was and eventually it expanded, a team of Vietnamese public opinion surveyors. As I recall, there were about 3 to a province. They would write reports on situations in the province. Sometimes they were individual province by province reports. Sometimes they were survey questions that had been issued province-wide. My job was to direct them. We also had a translating unit and I also vetted the translations and rendered them into good English. These reports were circulated.

I think that what we did was quite interesting. It really sort of gave a second opinion on how the South Vietnamese government programs were, how our programs were, and how they were going down in the countryside.

Q: The pacification program -- there was this hamlet evaluation system that's come in for a lot of criticism, particularly in the hands of the military. You always, if you were an officer assigned out there, you had to show progress. Progress was not always there.

HYDLE: Everybody sort of joked about the hamlet evaluation system. It was subject to that problem of showing progress, that you point out. Since most military officers were only district or province senior advisers for 6 months or a year, there would be steady progress during their time. But then, it would fall again because they were succeeded by somebody else who had a fresh look and was creating a base for himself.

Sure there was a lot of cynicism involved but, on the other hand, people would say that what really counts is not exactly the hamlet evaluation system -- which says that we have 40% of the hamlets secure and so many percent were not so secure -- what mattered was not the actual numbers but the trends. Over time these swings from individual advisers would work themselves out. What had counted were the trends.

I basically bought that. I thought then, and I think most historians say now, that actually in that period the situation in the countryside did, in fact, improve from 1968, the Tet Offensive, the hamlet evaluation system was put into effect; and the pacification programs were coordinated in ways that they had not been initially. There was a gradual improvement in coordination on the American side and the Vietnamese side. The countryside did, in fact, become more secure. There were roads that you could travel on, during the day and even at night later on, that you couldn't have done earlier.

Now, why this is so, I don't know. Some people would say that the North Vietnamese were just laying low until we left and they would come back. But, remember, when they did come back they had to use conventional military forces. There was no general guerrilla uprising, it was an invasion.

So I think the pacification program was well conceived and on the whole it was well executed.

Q: There was a book written on John Paul Vann called A Bright Shining Lie from your observation, how did he operate? Can you tell me about the man?

HYDLE: I read the book by Neil Sheehan. Sheehan had known Vann in the early 60s, in that period when he was an army officer and he was very critical of the South Vietnamese government at the time. Sheehan was able to show that Vann wasn't actually as courageous, from a career point of view, as he led people to believe he was, because I think he was retiring anyway, or he had no chance to advance further or something.

Well, I don't know about that, that was before my time. When I knew him, that was a period that Sheehan pretty much skips over in his book because he wasn't there when I was there. That was the period when Vann was head of the pacification program III CORPS when I was working with him. Later, he was down in IV CORPS and finally he was down in II CORPS toward the end.

I thought he was brilliant. He obviously had no illusions about the South Vietnamese government. He was a great organizer, he was a charismatic leader, he was an inspiration to me and especially to a lot of other junior officers. People would tell John Paul Vann stories when they would gather, all the time. I never worked for anybody since who even was remotely as exciting and as interesting to work for.

Q: Can you give me a little flavor? Can you think of any of your John Vann stories?

HYDLE: This is a story that I used to hear, it was later but it does give the flavor.

When he went into II CORPS later, he put a young guy that he had confidence in into the position as his deputy. There were 3 or 4 officers already there, maybe civilian and military, who outranked him. So they all caucused and then they came to him and they said, "We don't really think it's right that this junior guy is the deputy over us." He said, "You're absolutely right." They were out by nightfall.

This is the kind of story that we junior guys used to love. as you can imagine.

He seemed to be interested in getting things done. He did use more junior people where I thought that they were good. They would be province or district advisers.

There were a lot of stories, of course, about his sex life. He encouraged those stories and would tell them himself, and, it was mostly that he was a very active guy.

Q: Were you able to get out? In your going around, what were your feelings? You're saying that this was a relatively progressive period.

HYDLE: Yes, I thought that things were getting better. We, in the provincial reporting unit, were controversial. We were reporting things about how the South Vietnamese government or specific officials were screwing up. We had friends in the countryside but we also had constant clashes. The same kind of reporting problems that I described to you in the earlier period.

Q: Were you getting any constraints on your reporting? You were basically sending things into Saigon and what happened to them?

HYDLE: They would adulterate them.

I remember one time, for example, that there were some elections for a province, or maybe it was village districts or village councils. The elections were less than they were cracked up to be. For example, there would be 10 seats but there would be only 12 candidates, so 10 out of 12 would be elected. In order to make sure that the communists couldn't disrupt the election, the government would keep secret the location of the elections. How do you have elections? At the last minute, the government would show up in trucks and bus the people to vote.

We would point out these shortcomings. At one point, a report that we did was, we wanted to be a telegram -- we wrote it up as a telegram. It was held up for a little while and eventually it was sent as an airgram, which meant that it went in the mail. Basically, they couldn't dispute the facts but they didn't want as many people to see the report. That's the kind of thing that would happen -- mostly not blatant lying but they would sort of downplay it and undercut.

Q: Martin Herz was the HYDLE: Martin Herz was the political counselor. The head of the provincial reporting, that I worked for, was Nick Thorn.

Q: Were you coming in and telling your piece fairly frequently?

HYDLE: Yes, especially since I was so close to Saigon.

Q: How were you received?

HYDLE: This was a period when we would have dinners, from time to time, with Ambassador Bunker, Hertz and others, the provincial reporting unit. But it was an occasion when we thought we should use the occasion to warn him about the problems that existed. But he thought that he should use the occasion to, sort of, cheer us up. I guess he said, or I heard that he had said this from somebody after one of these sessions, that he hoped that it had made us feel better and that it cheered us up about the prospects. So he didn't really see it the same way we did, kind of patronizing in a way.

Q: The American military was impacting on the Bien Hoa.

HYDLE: Very heavily, especially in the part of the Bien Hoa area. The economy tended to be oriented around the care and feeding of the military. So it distorted the economy quite a bit and it led to social problems and so on.

Q: I was there at this time. I was there from 69 to 70 in Saigon just doing consular work. Did you view the embassy as, not the enemy but at least a, almost a hostile power or something?

HYDLE: I was not fond of Martin Herz at all. I thought that he was basically a bad guy. He was the one who was suppressing the reporting and creating a rationale for doing it because he would say, "We know how bad it is but we can't report it that way." Bunker seemed like a benevolent but elderly guy who didn't know, or maybe didn't want to know, what was happening. Nick Thorn, the provincial reporting unit chief, was in the middle. He had been a province senior adviser so he knew what we were talking about but he was under pressure from the top as well. He was troubled, I think, by all the pressures that came from both sides.

Q: What about your military counterparts? Did you feel that, as a Foreign Service officer, not under the same discipline as a military person? Would be that you were sort of freer to operate and to report than they were?

HYDLE: I didn't feel that way. Also, we knew a lot of military people in these pacification teams, people in Bien Hoa, and some of those guys were barely more disciplined than we were. Like they were lawyers who somehow had to be military officers, they were graduate students who somehow were doing their time. So at times there was not such a big gap between military and civilians.

I, myself, although I never served in the military per se, I never was anti-military and never felt like I wanted to bait them or taunt them or call them baby killers or any of that stuff. I respected what they were trying to do. I thought that they should be subject to criticism like everybody else.

Q: How about the media? What was your feeling towards the reporting in the media that you were in contact with?

HYDLE: They were also a mixed bag. I don't really remember very much about them but certainly Bob Kaiser of the Washington Post was a reporter in those days. Now I think he's the managing editor. Johnny Apple was there as the New York Times correspondent and married an FSO. I think they're no longer married.

We would hang out with them. I remember one time during Joe Alsop's visit, one of his visits to Vietnam, I somehow got caught up with him. He took a bunch of us to lunch and asked us what we thought. He really already knew what we thought. Joe Alsop's wife, Susan Mary Alsop, was a cousin of Charlie Whitehouse who was the DEPCORPS succeeding John Vann, 1969 I think. When Vann went down to IV CORPS which was a bigger pacification problem and had a smaller US government presence. So, somehow, I got acquainted with her one time. Later, when I came back to Washington, they had at the time old fashioned entertainment Washington dinners, old fashioned dinners where you had equal numbers of men and women so that you could seat them at table. Sometimes I would be asked to fill in. I knew Joe, I guess I'm getting far afield.

Basically I thought the media were a mixed bag. Some of them understood the problems, others were just in there to stir things up and cause problems

Q: I did get the feeling at that time that there were, what you would call the professional people, but there were also the stringers and the ones going after a little adventure. They were, in a way, just looking for trouble but they weren't serious.

Were you getting from any of your friends or anything, because this is the period where the sort of, the Vietnam protest was really picking up. Were you getting any reflections on this through correspondence or people visiting you or anything like that?

HYDLE: We were getting reflections of it but I'm sure it wasn't nearly as intense for us as it was for people back here. People here were feeling the heat. Occasionally, I was asked by Ambassador Bunker, through Martin Herz or Calhoun, to draft letters responding to letters to them from student critics. They thought I was a young guy and I could think of some way to answer a young guy's letter, I suppose.

Q: You left there 1970. How did you find the problem of corruption and ineffectiveness of the government of Vietnam by the time you left. What was your evaluation.

HYDLE: I thought that it was still a big problem and that it was important that the US government should try to fight that problem and try to tell the South Vietnamese government to set up structures in which they would be less corrupt. You know, inspectors or whatever. But because of our support for the general policy of being there, I thought that Americans were -- the US embassy and the US mission -- was more involved in trying to downplay the talk about corruption than they were doing something about it.

There was a guy, Bill Hitchcock, I think he was the political counselor or the number two guy in the political section at one point. In 1969 I had moved from Bien Hoa up to Da Nang. I was in the consulate working for Terry McNamara, the consul general. The marines were up there in the I CORE-gram, as we called it. Hitchcock was there and I was complaining about corruption and so on. He said, "I just came from Calcutta, tell me about that, I know corruption." But he was missing the point. We didn't have half a million troops. We had to do something about it.

Q: When you were in Da Nang, Terry McNamara was quite a character.

HYDLE: Yes, he was.

Q: Actually, we probably met at that point because, purely technically, I was consul general in Saigon and I use to write Terry's efficiency reports but I didn't really have any control, who could control Terry. But anyway, it was really more of a political thing.

Could you tell me your impression of Terry and his operation.

HYDLE: I remember that as being a lot of fun. He was a smart guy, I thought he understood about pacification, our policies and so forth. But he never took himself too seriously; he never took the situation too seriously. We use to joke around a lot and we still remain good friends to this day. I was the, sort of the vice consul for political affairs. It was more or less my title. So I never really did consular work unless there was an overload of visas to be signed. I don't know if I should tell you this or not.

Q: It's all right, it's all over now.

HYDLE: One thing that happened up there that sticks in my mind, was that we were changing the status of the office from a consular office to a consulate, or something like that.

Q: Yes, that was it.

HYDLE: We wanted to make a big deal out of it and invite Ambassador Bunker and so forth. I thought there was a man up there who was a geomancer, and who was an old guy, and who was reportedly very highly regarded by the Vietnamese. I thought, you know we're just picking a day to open the consulate, let's pick an auspicious day. We called the guy in and we talked to him about it. He said that it was important that the cat, the goat and the monkey be in confluence, if memory serves.

We were reporting all this to Ambassador Bunker and we actually did get him to change his original plan to the exact date, telling him that this would be an auspicious time. Of course we let all this be known to the Vietnamese that we had paid attention to this issue.

Ambassador Bunker came up to Da Nang. At first he went out on the bay with Alex Hurfer, who was the AID guy up there. It was not a very good day for sailing, overcast weather, no wind and so forth. So he finally came back over to the consulate, it was 4:00, the clouds parted. We had a beautiful day and we got a good picture of Ambassador Bunker and the geomancer -- who told Ambassador Bunker that he hoped he'd work for 50 more years.

Terry. Not everybody in the Foreign Service would have gone along with this fanciful approach.

Q: Did you find a different situation in Da Nang than you did in Bien Hoa?

HYDLE: The main difference at that time was the marines. The marines had a different approach than the army did toward the Vietnamese. I'm sorry I just can't remember the name but they had a system in which marines and South Vietnamese troops actually were in the same squad together. I just can't think what it was called.

They were integrated at the squad level. The marines were able to provide their supplies of course, but also their military knowledge to the South Vietnamese troops. I think they were pretty successful. Although, once again, it was hard to make the transition from a mixed unit to a purely South Vietnamese unit. We had some good officers up there. The then province chief of Hue, I'm sorry I can't remember his name but later he was the I CORPS commander. It was possible to travel in most of the coastal areas although it was a bit dangerous to go inland.

Q: I remember that it was about that time that I drove from Da Nang up to Hue.

HYDLE: Oh yes, you could easily do that.

Q: It was the old "street without joy."

HYDLE: You could drive on up to Quang Trai.

Q: Did you have any problems with reporting on corruption? I recall the South Vietnamese general in I CORPS was notorious for his corruption.

HYDLE: I just don't recall. I don't remember writing, or wanting to write, about that in particular. In general, I didn't have trouble writing candid stuff. Terry McNamara certainly never would muscle us on that.

Q: Were the South Koreans in that territory?

HYDLE: No, they were more in Quang Ninh which was in II CORPS. I never dealt with them very much.

Q: When you left in 1970, whither Vietnam, as far as you were concerned.

HYDLE: For a while, I was thinking of going back for a third tour in Vietnam, and working in a sort of an evaluation unit in the pacification headquarters that was headed by Craig Johnstone, a bright young officer. But I eventually ended up going to the Vietnam working group.

But after I left in April 70 I took some accumulated comp time, as I mentioned earlier, to finish the draft of my dissertation. I had finished a draft and they had sent it back with some revisions. I worked on that. I was in California living at home with my parents.

Q: So we'll leave there. You did have this interlude over in Vietnam after the peace agreement in 73. What were you doing?

HYDLE: I was in Northern Ireland from about April, as I recall, until January 73. When the peace agreement was reached I remember hearing that Alex Johnson had said, "We need to send 100 old Vietnam hands back to monitor the success of the peace agreement." People supposedly said, "100?" He said, "Okay, 50."

It wasn't that vigorous an analysis of personnel needs but it was decided that we would go back, and we would be attached to all of our consulates there, and we would be reporting on the progress of the agreement.

So I went back and I was assigned, once again, to Bien Hoa III CORPS. The consul general at that time was Bob Walkinshaw. I was there from January to September although I squeezed in some home leave and some leave in the middle of that. They were very generous with leave provisions and other things. It was kind of silly, in a way, to take me out of Belfast where they had just added me, an additional person, and they were in the midst of trying to normalize the situation with elections and so forth. But they didn't want to make exceptions because everybody else would start coming in with requests for exceptions.

We just did reports which at first were daily reports and later tailed off, led to less. We got about 5 FSOs there. After a while, I was made sort of like the chief of this mini-reporting in Bien Hoa.

That was a very interesting time because since all of us were back there on TDY, we all knew how things were done in Vietnam before. We were not about to put up with any nonsense about reporting. We would report just whatever we'd want to report. I remember, for example, there was an election coming up for the senate. A regular election under the South Vietnamese government system. That would have been an opportunity to bring in the communists, if you were really pushing for peace and normalization, but they were excluded and the election was run on the old system. It was just a silly process. We wrote something like: Enthusiasm for the senatorial election in III CORPS is under total control.

Another thing that we did that I was involved in was a dissent message. Tony Elito and I wrote a dissent message to the Department about the impending visit of President Thieu. Thieu, now that the peace agreement had been reached in January 73, Thieu wants to visit the United States. We recalled that after Vietnamese leaders had made previous visits, they had come back and felt sort of re-strengthened vis a vis their opponents, including legitimate opposition figures. We wanted to forestall that especially since we knew that Nixon, like many other people, tended to go into hyperbole during state visits. One time Nixon had said that Thieu was one of the top, maybe 5, politicians in the world.

So we wrote a message saying that we didn't think we should go overboard in welcoming Thieu because of this past history. Tony and I sent it out. People in the embassy didn't exactly quarrel with what we said. They said, "We don't disagree with that much so why are you calling it a dissent?” But we sent it anyway.

Then we got a message back from San Clement, the western White House, I think from Ambassador Porter, then the under secretary for political affairs, he said, “Your message was received and read carefully.” It was an encouraging response. In fact, the Thieu visit did go off without the excesses that we had feared. So we were very encouraged that we had done the right thing.

Q: It had gotten up to make, hopefully, some penetration.

HYDLE: I think so. Of course that was also the period Nixon was preoccupied with Watergate, he had other things on his mind. But still we had accomplished everything that we could have hoped with that message.

Q: How did you feel this time in 73 about the situation in Vietnam. This is basically your third time, how were you seeing it?

HYDLE: I thought there was a military stalemate of course. I thought there was no progress toward peace and that the South Vietnamese were just going to have to hang in there. That proved to be right. Eventually, things fell apart.

It was the US government that was unable to come to the aid of the South Vietnamese because even though the agreement required us to stop all of our military presence there, if we had been able to bomb the North Vietnamese troop concentrations, because these were not as I said earlier, these were no longer guerrilla operations but main force North Vietnamese units with big guns and tanks and all that. If we couldn't respond to that then things were doomed.

My feeling is that because of the Watergate crisis and American fatigue with Vietnam and so on, the eventual defeat was because of that more, in my opinion, that it was the weaknesses of the South Vietnamese.

Anyway, the North Vietnamese chose to be a highly armed garrison state. The South Vietnamese tried to be more like a normal state. Why should that mean that they are not allowed to survive as a state? But at the time it just seemed like a stalemate.

FRANK PAVICH
Program Officer, USAID
Saigon (1966-1972)

Frank Pavich was born in 1933 in California. He graduated from the University of Southern California 1955 and then served in the US Marine Corps. Pavich served in the Peace Corps before joining USAID in 1966, with whom he served in Vietnam, Ethiopia, the Yemen Arab Republic, Somalia, Ghana, Pakistan, and Egypt. Pavich was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1998.

PAVICH: One morning I had an appointment in Oakland, California to interview for a job in their urban renewal office. I got two telegrams at the same time. One was from AID and one was from CARE. Rather than reading them I stuck them in my pocket and went across the bay to Oakland to do my interview. I didn't want to be distracted. It was a good interview and I got a job offer. I came out of the Oakland City Hall and walked down the street and opened up the telegrams. The one from CARE invited me to take a job in Yugoslavia or Egypt. I opened up the other one from AID and it said they were starting to recruit people for a program in Southeast Asia, Vietnam, and would I be interested.

Q: This was what year?

PAVICH: This was in 1966. I continued walking down the street and I saw a sign that said Western Union. I reached in my pocket, pulled out a quarter, flipped it, and it came up AID. I then sent two telegrams, one to AID saying yes, and one to CARE saying no thank you. That was how the decision was made.

Q: Would you have believed the quarter if it had come out the other way?

PAVICH: Well, in hind sight I think I made the right decision, but at the time I really didn't know. I had worked a little bit with CARE in Iran and I was rather intrigued with what they were doing.

I came to Washington and joined a group at FSI for preparation to go to Vietnam. We were in language training, area studies and were told to play soccer because they thought our counterparts would be playing soccer. They took us down to the Marine Corps base at Quantico and we qualified on the pistol, semi and automatic weapons and were advised to buy a small arm for ourselves.

Q: What was your understanding of what your job was?

PAVICH: Provincial Representative somewhere in Vietnam. They suggested we all have a personal weapon. I mulled that over and didn't buy one at the time. I remember a group of us went out--a mixed group of male and female. We had nurses, former Peace Corps people, people just out of law school, graduate school. I remember one night over a couple of beers we were talking about what was going to be our greatest challenge of this career we were about to set off on. We were all new to this. It was almost like the Peace Corps again. We thought about the danger there and that we might get killed or captured, as some did. Or, we might step on a land mine, or something like that. I thought our biggest problem would probably be our own bureaucracy. I don't know why that came to me at that time. However, for me, throughout all of my career, it has been a battle between myself and the bureaucracy. There has been a sort of give and take on that. I often wonder what made me think of it then. I knew Public Administration before I went into the Marine , which was my first taste of bureaucracy, and I could see the problem.

We went to Vietnam and the next thing I knew we were being interviewed by John Paul Van, who was the Provincial Coordinator at that time. We were given our assignments. I was assigned to go to Plei-Ku province in the Central Highlands. One morning at sunrise in Saigon I got on a small aircraft and headed for a place called Nha Trang, which was on the coast of Central Vietnam. I got off the plane and went to the regional headquarters and met a man named Hatcher James who was the Deputy Regional Director at that time. He was a former Green Beret and he said, "Okay, Pavich, you are going out to Plei-ku. We are going to send you out to Cheo Reo and Kontum [and one other place which I don't remember], to stay with the Special Forces B Team for a couple of nights just to let you know what you are getting into. If you have any doubts or questions about what you are getting into this will be a good test because the B Teams are small teams out on the frontier. They will have around five Americans and 70 or so militiamen who are defending the out-post." I went out there and sat around for a couple of days. We didn't go out very much because it was dangerous. We got to know the U.S. Army Green Berets who were there and talk to them about what they were doing. I looked at the fortifications and learned about the Vietcong.

Then, I got to Plei-ku and worked with a gentleman named John Rogers, who was the Provincial Representative. I was his assistant "Prov. Rep." We had programs in health, agriculture, fisheries, education and in two or three other areas. These programs were provided through a special budget that was funded by USAID. The purpose was to supplement and improve upon what the Government of Vietnam was doing.

Q: How big a population was there in this area?

PAVICH: I can't remember. Plei-Ku Province is basically a Montagnard province so the population of Vietnamese is very small and the population of Montagnards is probably not even known because they are not settled.

My job was to work with the provincial service chiefs on the implementation of the development programs in each one of these areas.

Q: What was the objective?

PAVICH: To improve the service. To provide the people in the province with the kind of services that they needed in their agricultural development and the education of their children and the health of their families. In some cases where there were refugees coming in from the jungle areas where there was a free fire zone, our goal was to house them and care for them and protect them until they could return home or be resettled.

This meant traveling out into the districts, which we did and this is where the exposure to the U.S. Special Forces was good, because in all of these areas there was a Special Forces Team and you coordinated with them before you drove down any road to make sure it was clear. All the major roads were cleared every morning at a certain hour. You would find out when they were cleared and safe and then go out there, or, you would go up to a Special Forces camp and use one of their helicopters and fly out to the district.

We were doing water projects with the Montagnards, building small dams around springs and putting plastic pipes in the wall of the dam so that you had a spill of water going onto a concrete apron in front. People used the apron for washing and bathing. It was very popular. They did the work, we provided the material. We also provided material for building schools.

Q: How many in the AID team were doing this?

PAVICH: There were two of us.

Q: So you were expert in all of these fields?

PAVICH: Yes. It was administration. We didn't have to be substance experts because the Vietnamese service chiefs were. We spoke enough Vietnamese to get by and it really wasn't a technical problem, but more of a question of resources.

Q: Were there any problems or events that you remember from that time?

PAVICH: There were attacks by the Vietcong and if you were in a district there would be problems of being cutoff from transportation out and being stuck there for a while. You flew across the plains in helicopters at about 40 feet and sometimes you were shot at. The helicopter pilots liked to fly low, they called it contour flying, because it was hard for anyone to know you were coming until you were there. If you were up high everybody would know you were there and could shoot at you.

I spent a year and a half there and then I had an opportunity to go to Saigon to work in the AID Public Administration Office. There I worked with the Director General of Reconstruction and Urban Planning and the Director General of Housing as an advisor and program manager.

Q: In the government?

PAVICH: In the government. I was physically located in the office of the Director General of Reconstruction and Urban Planning. I was the only American there. I had a staff of about 21 young Vietnamese architects. Our basic program was a Land Use Study which is an inventory of the use of land in the Saigon metropolitan area, which had a 10 million population. We had aerial photographs and maps and checked each parcel of land in that whole area, and categorized it in terms of its use. It took us two years to do this.

Q: This was for planning and laying out development of all kinds?

PAVICH: Planning for infrastructure, for utilities, etc. Almost everything you do is based on the population and the use of the land. It was also to assist them in determining a zoning program and to decide where they wanted and didn't want to put industry and things like that.

I was there for pretty much three years doing this work and other assignments. We did some housing development plans for relocating people who were burned out of their houses in the TET offensive in 1968.

Q: Were you there in the TET offensive?

PAVICH: Yes, I was there. Actually, I missed it by one day, but I was there for the rebuilding of these areas.

Q: Was there a lot of destruction?

PAVICH: In certain districts where the Vietcong had come in. They would come into areas where there were a lot of squatters. In these areas, there were no facilities like fire hydrants or water. Once a fire started there, there was no way that you could get a truck in because there were no streets, just lanes for bicycles and people, and the area just burned to the ground. There were several thousands of people who were displaced and had to be resettled somewhere else. We were doing a housing program. That pretty much kept me busy until I left Vietnam.

Q: How did you find working with the Vietnamese?

PAVICH: The professionals I worked with were very good. They knew their business. They were very cordial and welcomed what assistance I could give them on the development side. They were very friendly and always polite. I enjoyed their company very much and made some very good friends.

Q: How did you feel about your efforts to do all this development work in the environment of war?

PAVICH: I believe it was making a difference, otherwise the Viet Cong (VC) probably wouldn't have attacked Saigon the way they did. I think there was a point where the business of winning the hearts and minds, for whatever reason, was going our way. There were jobs, lots of money to be made. It might have been a false economy, but still it provided work for people and money for people. I think that was probably the reason that the VC did some of the things they did which were probably not in the guerilla warfare book of tactics. So, I think what we were doing did have an effect.

Q: Was it lasting, or was it all sort of lost when the Vietcong took over?

PAVICH: Well, I think like in the "Cold War" it is a question of who won and who lost. It was pretty clear that the Communists lost almost every place. Who won? I think that is still to be determined.

Q: What about in Vietnam?

PAVICH: I would like to go back and see.

Q: You haven't heard much about it?

PAVICH: No. My wife is Vietnamese and she has been back. My children have been back. But, I have never been back.

Q: How did they find things?

PAVICH: It is very poor. There wasn't much of an economy and the people had very little. They were not very happy with the way things were. The government was every bit as corrupt as it always had been, but I think in Asia as it is apparent these days, corruption is part of the socio-economic fabric.

Q: You saw this when you were working with the government there?

PAVICH: Yes. It was quite common.

Q: What form did it take?

PAVICH: There is always a certain amount of rake-off that happens. You know it is going on but you can't really put your finger on it. They know you know. You try to control it. You couldn't wipe it out, but it was possible to keep it to a minimum because that is the way things worked. People in countries like Vietnam and other developing countries who work in government are paid very low wages and have to have a second job. This means they don't pay much attention to their primary job, and are often taking bribes. As they say, "If you break the rice bowl (the means of livelihood), nothing is going to happen." It is a choice. You want something to happen or not.

MICHAEL E. TOLLE
Da Nang (1967)

Michael E. Tolle was born in Kansas in 1947 in Kansas and educated at Georgetown. He went to Vietnam as a Civilian in 1967 and as a member of AID in 1970. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

TOLLE: Actually I might want to step back a little bit more because what figures into this transition was an arrangement my father made when I was scheduled to return to the safe haven for my summer vacation after my sophomore year, this would have been 1967. I came back to Manila having already been in contact with my father who had sent me a letter asking if I would like to spend the summer in Vietnam. I, of course, jumped at the opportunity. My transportation, 90 percent of it, was paid by the US government and I paid the balance. Shortly after returning to Manila in the summer of 1967, I boarded a plane and landed in Saigon. I signed on, which had been previously arranged very unofficially...I don't believe my name will ever appear in any records of any organization, I was unpaid and did whatever I could. My father had made the acquaintance of a man named Peter Winacharuk, who worked for a Christian, essentially fundamentalist, evangelical organization called "World Relief Commission." He and his wife were there stationed in Da Nang at the time, as was my father. I then showed up and said, "I am here and would like to learn and help you in whatever I could do."

So, I spent the summer of 1967 in Vietnam. My primary function was to serve as an escort officer for the distribution of relief commodities. The World Relief Commission would obtain some of them from USAID. They would obtain more from various assorted congregations of an organization that was known as the "Christian and Missionary Alliance," the C&MA, which is a collection of Protestant, fundamentalist, evangelical individual churches. It is not one denomination but individual churches who put an enormous emphasis on overseas service, both in relief and in proselyting, of course. So, they would get in many cases rather useless commodities brought over there. I can recall going through bags of shoes, for example, and having to discard the hundreds of pairs of women's high heel shoes that didn't really have a great deal of usefulness over there. Because of this I found myself flying or driving all over the northern part of the country.

Q: That was known as I Corps.

TOLLE: I Corps and II Corps. Da Nang, of course, was in I Corps. Most of my travel was in I Corps but some of it was down in II Corps. I flew commodities down to Da Lat at one point and stayed with the Christian Missionary Alliance group there. It was truly one of the most fascinating evenings I have ever spent in my life, to sit with these primarily elderly people who had been there in some cases since the thirties, telling stories about Vietnam. Although little of the details remain with me, the impression has remained with me all these years.

Q: Of course, it is considered like an Alpine village.

TOLLE: Absolutely, Da Lat is one of the most beautiful places on the face of the earth. In fact, the central highlands of Vietnam are absolutely beautiful.

So, primarily I was in I Corps and my father was able to take me to a few places. We went driving up to Quang Tri and out to Cam Lo. We hitched any number of rides on military airplanes. It was quite an easy thing to do.

Q: What was the military situation in the summer of 1967?

TOLLE: At that point, while perhaps not the high point in numbers, there was intense activity, a considerable amount of fighting. Yet, at the time there was the feeling of progress. It was reasonably close to war with the massive American presence in the north, the American military had a sense of its own unity and purpose that it lacked as it began to get more spread out through the south. Communications on the roads were somewhat shaky, but I don't like to fly, I never have, and much prefer to drive. So, we would drive around a considerable amount at that time. The military presence was overwhelming, particularly in Da Nang and all the way up to Quang Tri. I managed at one point...perhaps the high point, if you will, of the summer, was a distribution of several bags of cement to a couple who were living just outside of Khe Sanh at the time.

Q: Khe Sanh being what?

TOLLE: The marine base up in the north.

Q: Yes, later it was under siege.

TOLLE: Yes, the siege, itself, had not firmly set in but the NVA were around and it was coming. At that time there was this couple who worked for the Wycliffe Bible Translators who were attempting to translate the bible into a Montagnard dialect. There was this very nice, fairly young couple living in a little house out there among the Montagnards, a few miles outside the Khe Sanh base. Of course, there was no communication with them. So, I showed up in a C-47 one day, from Air America, dropped in on the Khe Sanh airstrip and the marines looked at me. They had no idea what this young civilian was doing there. I said I was there to deliver some cement and could I get some transportation? The major there was not particularly pleased with this because the area was insecure enough that he had to roundup essentially a full squad and a couple of trucks in order to make the journey. So, I sat out on the tarmac at Khe Sanh for quite a while and at one point a truck drove up with a US green beret and some Montagnard CIDG people who spotted my cement and wanted it. They kept trying to make a bargain. What did I want, an AK-47? What kind of souvenir did I want in exchange for some of this cement? I, of course, declined, it was not my place to trade away any of these sort of things. As a postscript, when I returned, it was not long thereafter when I read in the paper where this camp had been overrun by the NVA with the first recorded use of tanks in the war. And, of course, I got to thinking I should have given them some of this cement.

Eventually I did get the transportation and we drove out with a group of young marines, basically my age or younger, who were just literally amazed. They had no idea that this couple were out there, of course. So, we drove out and delivered the cement at this little building. The wife, who was about seven months pregnant at that time, cooked for us. I can remember the little dumplings she cooked up for us as very tasty things. She pointed out the bullet holes in the building and explained that periodically she and her husband had to lie on the floor while the bullets went through. Another postscript to that, she had the baby in the Vietnamese hospital in Da Nang which occasioned a no small amount of comment among the Americans at this time.

We returned to the camp at Khe Sanh and, of course, there was a curfew fairly early in the afternoon so we had to get back. Then, I had to figure out how to get back. My journeys out were always planned, but the journeys back were whatever I could arrange. I managed to get on a CH-54 helicopter, a marine chopper, headed for Dong Ha. As we took off, because these things don't rise straight up in the air, particularly the big ones go out at an angle, we took fire from the NVA. A man sitting about three seats away from me took a bullet in his leg. The indication was that something was developing. I recall flying back to Dong Ha and being dumped off the plane for a pallet of toilet paper and eventually making my way back to Da Nang. It was almost a matter of hoboing, catching rides not on trains but on airplanes. It was a fascinating day.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese at that time? What were you picking up from people you were working with and all?

TOLLE: Here began the process of change from support to opposition. Perhaps it did not begin, but I had previously in arguing with Americans, the basis of my argument was that we really didn't know anything about the place, and here I was learning. And, as I learned, the situation began to crystallize in my mind where it became readily obvious that their side, if you will, wanted this more than our side. There began to be a quite obvious thing in that when one looked at the numbers that we supposedly were fighting for and their equipment, but their inability to get things done, such personal contact with them (which was not a great deal at that time) began to eat away at the feeling that I had had that we were doing the right thing. Another thing that impressed me at that time was the enormous impact that we were having on them simply by our presence. That the infusion of the American people, American dollars, American material culture, was having an enormous and not particularly beneficial effect on the people. Part of this I think I was preprogrammed for because my father had been there for a little while and had already formed a very negative view of the Vietnamese. In fact, the extent surprised me and he continued it all this time. I am not sure why he continued.

Q: When you say negative view, do you mean as a government, a culture or what?

TOLLE: Pretty much across the board. He referred to them as curiously benighted people and he had nothing but contempt for the GVN, the government. His problem with the Vietnamese people was what he referred to as their infinite corruptibility. He placed the blame on them. I recall at that time thinking there was more to it than just these funny little people are not as open as they should be to the American way of doing things, and I began to see because, while I don't think I had been particularly culturally sensitive or anything along that line...when you grow up in a white suburban upper middle class without even encountering Blacks, you are hardly culturally sensitive...However, after two years in Georgetown I had begun that process. So, at that time I began to look not so much as why they weren't doing what we said, but why we were saying it to them.

Q: Then, when you came back did you say, "Fellas, this is really how it is out there?"

TOLLE: To an extent I did because at the time, particularly by the time of my junior year, I would make more or less a two-year change. The two years conservatism really dominated and the voices against it were voices crying in the wilderness, whereas in the beginning of the third year and certainly by the fourth year, that changed entirely. But at that time student power was developing and we established something called the Alternative University, or something along that line. It was an attempt by students to teach students at Georgetown in areas that you felt you had knowledge, getting out of the rigid, professor-student arrangement, etc. So, I hooked up with one of the other students, who was one of the more left wing students, who wanted to talk about Vietnam. I said you know we could make a good team here because I have been there. We team-taught "Vietnam Studies," made it up ourselves. His was the polemical approach at the time. Mine was an attempt to fill in the details of fact. I actually started with geography and population and began to talk to people about the Viets and Montagnards and Khmers and some of the different aspects of it. We had something of a fairly vigorous and healthy exchange of views on this. I would like to think that I contributed something. I am actually not all together certain that I did, because as was the case then and as I am sure is the case now, people tend to make up their minds on these emotional issues without too much regard to the facts, and you merely confused them if you put facts in front of them and asked them to consider them.

ANTHONY C. ZINNI
Second Lieutenant, Marine Divisions
Vietnam (1967)

General Zinni was born and raised in Pennsylvania. After graduating from Vallanova College he joined the Marines, which became his lifelong career. His distinguish career took him to Vietnam, Okinawa, Philippines and Germany, where he served in senior level positions. Attaining the rank of General, Zinni served as Commander-in-Chief of CENTCOM, where he was deeply involved in worldwide missions including Somalia, Iraq and Afghanistan. General Zinni was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: I would like to talk to you in this interview about your foreign affairs experience, your experience with the South Vietnamese Marines. Did you know anything about Vietnam before?

ZINNI: Nothing. Until the time I joined the Marine Corps I had never really been outside the Philadelphia area, probably not more than a 50 mile radius from my home and then in the Marine Corps I went to Quantico for training and my first year I spent at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina in the second marine division, so when I went to Vietnam, I mean, this was like going to a different planet. I went to Army special warfare school before at Fort Bragg and there we had language training by Vietnamese and Vietnamese families were contracted down there to not only teach us the language, but also to expose us to the culture. And when I got there it seemed so remarkable. The fact that here as a young second lieutenant I was immersed in a totally different culture, new culture. I rarely saw other Americans and the Vietnamese had a quartering act so when we were in the populated areas we lived in the villages and of course, there were only two officers to the battalions so I worked so I didn't have any other Americans around me. I saw the war from a different perspective. When I came back, and went to Quantico to train the second lieutenants, my contemporaries were coming back from tours of duty with the first and third Marine divisions in the north near the DMZ (Demilitarized Zone) in that area. The Vietnamese Marines were their national strike force so they were the most elite of the Vietnamese military. But they moved all over the country so I saw the war from the Delta all the way up to the DMZ; in every poor area, every special zone, capital of military District 1, everywhere. When I came back I had an entirely different perspective on the war. I not only saw the war as it was being fought throughout the country, because there are many differences, I saw it from the perspective of the Vietnam people and the Vietnamese military and so I had a different sense. In many ways, this whole business of hearts and minds struck me because I began to realize we were not connecting to the hearts and minds and this is more than just war in sort of a traditional, conventional sense. I think that made an impression on me that lasted throughout my career.

Q: Let's take the first tour while you were assigned to the South Vietnamese marines. This was from when to when?

ZINNI: This was 1967.

Q: What was your impression of, in the first place, the South Vietnamese Marines?

ZINNI: The Vietnamese Marines were very small when I was there. There were really only five battalions fielded and a sixth battalion coming online. They were very elite. They had sort of the same socialization process, as in the U.S. Marine Corps, with a boot camp. They tended to be much more aggressive, courageous fighters. They were considered along with the Vietnamese airborne, as what they called the national strike force. So they were moved into hotspots all over the country where they were needed. My impression of them is they were, in terms of small unit tactics, small unit leadership, they were excellent. Obviously, they did not have the firepower or conventional capability that the U.S. military had. They didn't have the width and the logistics and things like that. Our role as advisers became to make sure that when they operated with American units, that we did the coordination, providing them with fire support, naval gunfire, air artillery, logistics requirements. But in terms of their ability to operate as small units down in battalion companies, platoon squad size, they were excellent. And I learned a lot from them in terms of jungle craft, small unit operations and how they operated in and around villages. They tended to be very tough fighters. The exposure to the Vietnamese people, especially living in the villages and everything gave me a whole sense of a culture that was very different and alien to me but it also gave me a sense of, as I said before, a perspective on the war that I don't think many Americans had.

Q: You know, as an adviser, a young second lieutenant, you weren't really bringing an awfully lot to the table. It was a great training experience.

ZINNI: I was the only second lieutenant, true second lieutenant. I think there were specialty advisers like motor transport officers and others that had been enlisted and the more senior staff NCOs were commissioned. I was the only sort of pure second lieutenant ever assigned to the advisory unit, as I was told and that was because the advisory unit had a number of casualties and sickness. We were also suffering casualties in the north. There was a shortage of officers and so where this would normally be a captain's assignment, I was picked because there was a shortage and they were down to the Z's, I guess, and sent over there.

You know, I would say in the overall scheme of things I learned a lot more than I imparted. But, you know, the Vietnamese Marines tended to look at an adviser and they wanted, first of all, to get an assessment of your courage and how you handled yourself under fire and secondly, in the things they really counted you on, your ability to deliver fire support, logistics support, transportation, you know, helicopters and that sort of thing, how you got all that. And I have to say, the American Marines in the advisory units, the captains and the majors that were in there that I sort of had to get a fast lesson and learn from, really schooled me up well, so it was a rapid learning process. I think I was able to come up one step quickly because you have to. There was no other way.

Q: How did you find this unit worked with the local population because this is often one of the key issues, when you talk about hearts and minds, I mean.

ZINNI: What I discovered in Vietnam is from region to region there were different loyalties so we operated in certain places, obviously, where there were strong loyalties to the South Vietnamese government, if you will, for one reason or another, certainly in Catholic communities they tended to be, obviously, very much more strongly oriented to the south and in communities maybe where they received some benefits from the government, which I had to say, was maybe not the most responsive to the needs of the people. There were other places we went that were traditionally going back to the years of the Viet Minh, were traditional Communist strongholds. Up in the northern part of South Vietnam where we operated, we operated in an area of Binh Dinh province where the high school diplomas and everything else had Ho Chi Minh's picture on them. These were areas where Ho Chi Minh had left behind cadres after the French Indochina War, again, to begin the insurgency. So, you ran into places where you weren't as acceptable or they weren't as receptive to you as they might have been in other areas. It was an awakening to me because the Vietnamese Marines had to go up in the northern ICOR and put down the Buddhist revolt.

Q: I was going to say you were there at the time of the Buddhist barbecue.

ZINNI: I was there right after that. The Vietnamese Marines had gone up there and actually confronted the first _____; the South Vietnamese Army division, and there was a confrontation. While I was with the South Vietnamese marines, we actually attacked another South Vietnamese unit. So, I mean, you know it was interesting because you could see the differences. Obviously, we were all over Vietnam, so not only among amongst the Vietnamese but some of the ethnically different tribal groups and all that. You found it was a mixed bag in terms of where you went. But the Vietnamese Marines were sensitive to that. They were not that oriented to what I would call hearts and minds work. They viewed themselves as combat troops. We did, while I was there, the first real work of trying to get them to do things that involved sort of reaching out to the community. We used to run these county fair operations that involved bringing medical aid and working with them.

Q: You had a program of sending out the Marines.

ZINNI: The Marines in the north did the combined action platoons where they intermixed with the people, with the local regional popular forces in the villages. We were in the process of exposing the South Vietnamese Marines to more of this sort of interaction with the local communities there. At first they were very resistant to it. They really saw their job was to fight. Then, as they began to see that it was successful and it connected to the villages and it paid off in terms of in intelligence and cooperation, they were much more amenable to it. I think bottom line is they really saw themselves as the national strike force and war fighting was their business.

Q: Looking at the situation there, particularly the corps commanders or whatever they were in the Republic of South Vietnam, they tend to be their rice bowl as far as there was a lot of corruption involved and all this. They were not as willing to go out and fight.

ZINNI: I think there were certain Army of the Republic of South Vietnam units that were a mixed bag. You found some regular army units that were fairly good and they ranged from that to terrible but I think when you looked at the more elite units like the Vietnamese South Vietnamese Rangers that were in each of the core areas and then the South Vietnamese airborne and marine corps, they were very different. They were very courageous, very willing to fight. You know, our recruits had “Kill Communists” tattooed on their arms and the Vietnamese Marine Corps, the equivalent to USMC (United States Marine Corps), and those were tattooed on their arms so that if they were ever captured, they were marked as South Vietnamese marines and it made them fight harder and not be willing to be taken prisoner. They had a lot of pride in what they did. I do think though, they were politicized a great deal because they were the ones that took down the palace at Yaminu and actually, the battalion I spent most of my time with was actually the battalion that took Yaminu and executed them. While I was there, in 1967, there was an election and we brought all the Vietnamese Marine battalions around Saigon and ringed Saigon for the election, ensuring the outcome. So the Vietnamese Marines were seen as coup makers or, you know, if you wanted to win the presidency, you had to have them on your side.

Q: Were you up against the North Vietnamese regulars or was it its first time there?

ZINNI: Because we were all over, we fought everything from what I would call the Vietcong farmer by day, guerrilla by night, to the mainline Vietcong which were, you know, full-time fighters, to South Vietnamese insurgents, to NVA (North Vietnamese Army). We had experienced all of that and usually they knew by the area they were going into what they might confront, which made them, they went in stronger with more troops into certain areas than they would go into others. What was interesting was not only experiencing all the geographic differences from the Delta to the mangrove swamps in the south, to the mountains in the north, to the villages along the coast and all that, you also experienced this difference in enemies. One of the quickest things you had to learn is, of course, there's a big difference between sort of part-time guerrillas in the south and fighting them and the North Vietnamese regulars that you tended to find more toward the north along the borders that were much more formidable. So it wasn't a consistent kind of enemy that you faced and it required, I think, the ability to adapt to that. So we faced it all when we were there.

Q: Looking at this, when you're the new boy on the block, so you have often a clearer eye, did you see an equivalency of North Vietnamese to the Marine Corps? I mean, were these fighters as dedicated or was it a mixed bag there too?

ZINNI: I think clearly in terms of courage and willingness to fight, they certainly had that. What you would expect. They were certainly not as well-trained or technically competent. They were certainly not on a scale to manage the kind of fire support and logistics in all the kinds of integration in a major way. In other ways they might have been more skilled. I mean, in terms obviously, because of their affinity to the people and when we got into the villages and all, their ability to communicate and operate in amongst the people was much better. Also, I thought some of their jungle craft and that sort of thing were much more, they were much more skilled in that area. We didn't have rations, for example, so when we operated in the jungle, for example we spent time along the Cambodian border and elsewhere, really, truly in the jungles, we would go out on patrol. We had to spend two hours a day foraging or hunting for food. So you know, you learn a lot about what you could eat in the jungle, what you can shoot and kill and how to prepare it by doing it all tactically at the same time. Those are skills you don't have in the American forces because obviously they know they're going to get resupplied. There was even reluctance on their part even if they could be resupplied, they didn't like having helicopters coming in to their position unless it was absolutely necessary, like a medical evacuation or whatever. They didn't always get priority of American helicopters and things so you know, for example, you take casualties, we took wounded and in one case where we had to keep the wounded with us for a number of days and so you now have to treat wounded over a period of time and it isn't like an automatic evacuation. So in many ways, some of those kinds of basic skills, interaction with the people, they were much better. I learned a lot from them that you wouldn't have gotten. But in terms of the mood shoot and communicating those skills, our NCOs are much better equipped to handle that. Their training is much more involved. Obviously, we had much more technical capability. I think it kind of panned out that way. I have to say the Vietnamese Marines were very courageous. They were willing to put their lives on the line, they were fighting and they viewed themselves as very elite. They were very successful and performed well, especially in the small units.

Q: When you left there after '67, at the time, wither South Vietnam? What did you think?

ZINNI: Well, I left right at the beginning of the Tet Offensive, you know, one of the first battles of the Tet Offensive we'd fought in and by then I had lost a lot of weight. I was down to about 123 pounds and I had contracted hepatitis and mononucleosis. I had dysentery and malaria so I was evacuated right after some of the first battles. We had a major battle up in Quang Tri and I left and watched the Tet Offensive you know, basically from hospital beds.

It was clear that militarily we had put a defeat on them but now we were beginning to see the erosion of the American role in this.

DAVID C. MILLER, JR.
Simulmatics (Business)
Saigon (1967-1968)

Mr. Miller was born and raised in Cleveland, Ohio and was educated at Harvard University and The University of Michigan. After work in The White House he joined Westinghouse Electric Corporation, where he held a number of high level positions dealing with a variety of social, environmental and nuclear issues. He served as United States Ambassador to Tanzania, 1981-1984 and Zimbabwe, 1984-1986, after which he worked with the South Africa Working Group in Washington. From 1989 to 1991 Mr. Miller was assigned to The National Security Council. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: As you were moving through Michigan, getting ready to get out in '67, did you know what you were pointed towards?

MILLER: Sometime or other, probably getting near the end of the second year, the war in Vietnam was getting to be bigger and bigger. I reached two or three fundamental conclusions. One was that it was dumb and mismanaged and was something I was not very enthusiastic about. That said, I had a strong sense that my country was at war and that I ought to try to do something to help. I didn't think that leaving the country was terribly helpful. Yet by the time I knew I wanted to get to Vietnam, I was convinced that killing more Vietnamese was in all probability not going to be of great use to anybody. By that time, I was married. Mollie and I got married that summer after my second year. We were expecting a child. Under the Selective Service rules of the time, I didn't have to go to Vietnam, but I wanted to go to Vietnam, so I started looking around for how to help. As fate would have it, I ultimately found out that Arthur Smithies, with whom I had worked on my college thesis and from whom I had taken courses, was going to Vietnam with a very odd little group of people, a company called Simulmatics. The gang at Simulmatics included Pat Moynihan, Ithiel de Sola Poole, Adam Yarmolinsky...and a lot of Cambridge intellectual talent, that came together to work for the Advanced Research Projects Agency at the Pentagon.

Q: Was this one of McNamara's grandchildren?

MILLER: Yes. In the ARPA compound, which was on the river very close to District 10 in Saigon, we had a remarkable collection of intellectual talent of which I was a pretty small foot soldier. There were a lot of professors. So, what happened was that virtually within a week or two of graduating from law school, I got on a plane and went over to work with Simulmatics and Arthur Smithies. We were tasked with determining (as best you could) what was happening to the economy in the middle of this war and was there a way to make the economy work in our favor. That broke down into two accounts. Having the economy work in your favor in the short run is, put directly, what intelligence can you glean from what's happening in the economy? Secondly, what works for you in the long run is, for example, the Strategic Hamlet Program of basically pulling loosely aggregated country residents into a defensible single village depended largely on the ability to make an economy run around that. It's cute to get everybody into the compound at night, but if you can't keep an economy functioning around the Strategic Hamlet it will fail. So, I launched off to Vietnam to try to do those two things.

Q: This was in the summer of '67?

MILLER: Yes. I basically stayed there through the spring of '68 and then came back to participate in the White House Fellows program. We got to spend a lot of time in the countryside. Vietnam is a long story.

Q: Vietnam is so pivotal. What was your impression of Vietnam?

MILLER: It was probably worse than I anticipated, but in keeping with the half-full glass of water thing, I went with enthusiasm and tried to figure out. There were two ways I looked at it primarily. One was IV Corps, which would have been the heart of the agricultural activity.

Q: This was down in the Mekong?

MILLER: Yes, this was down Route 4 from Saigon through the towns of My Tho, Can Tho, and Soc Trang down into the Delta, and then the areas south of the Da Nang Airfield, which was down Route 1. The northern area was primarily faced with this simple problem. What could conceivably be accomplished in an area of really severe conflict? The work in IV Corps, in the Delta, was much more normal. Life in the Delta for the Chinese rice mill owner and the rice grower was pretty normal, and of course, they were a fountain of information on what was really happening in the countryside. I just spent a lot of the week running around in the field. I would return to Saigon on the weekends.

And now to tell you a story that is really wonderful, and illustrates the crazy things that happened during the conflict. The Advanced Research Projects Agency, which was responsible for me in country, was being run by General Hap Arnold's son, a colonel in the Air Force. After the first two months, my wife was coming over from the States to visit me in Singapore, from which she planned to proceed to Indonesia, where she would use her skills to teach English. Our first pregnancy had ended in a miscarriage, so it was not a very happy time. But she was coming over to Singapore to meet me. So, I went to Colonel Arnold and said, "This weekend I would like your permission to go down to Singapore to see my wife." He said, "Well, what's she going to do?" I said, "She's a linguist. She's been studying Indonesian and she's going to teach." He said, "Well, have her come to Vietnam." I said, "How can I have her come to Vietnam?" He said, "Well, we just won't tell anybody, will we?" I said, "You've got to be kidding me." He was a colonel. He said, "Well, my wife was with me in Korea. I think a family that's together in an effort like this is a good thing." That's what he wanted to do. He said, "She could teach at the Vietnamese-American Association. She could teach English as a second language." I got down to Singapore as quick as I could. When we met, I told her "You're not going to go to Indonesia, you can come with me to Vietnam." She said, "You're crazy," but she ended up in Vietnam for three or four months, basically up to the Tet offensive. But that was really bizarre. These wonderful stories from your lifetime. Peter Kahn, now the publisher of "The Wall Street Journal" and a Pulitzer Prize winner, and I had been club mates at Harvard. Peter was in Saigon at the same time. So, when Mollie arrived I decided I would introduce her to my friends in the press corps. We went out to dinner and I said, "This is my wife, Mollie," which was greeted by loud snickers and sort of, "But she can't be your wife! How did you get this babe?" I said, "No, no, she really is my wife." That's another whole long, humorous story. She was a great partner there. Was a fine teacher of English, but suffered as we all did, from the human damage occurring around her. On a serious note, I concluded two or three things in Vietnam. One is that the war was not winnable because the premises on which we entered were not sustainable. The analytic work that was done thereafter was warped to support the premises. My worst illustration of this involves General Lansdale, of Philippines insurrection fame. I came back from IV Corps on one particular trip, and was so enthused about my observations, that it was arranged for me to meet General Lansdale in Saigon to brief him.

Q: He was a very famous General. Those best-known anti-guerilla leaders our country had produced.

MILLER: So, I met with Ed Lansdale and had a lot of observations about the hamlet evaluation system and the measures of our performance in the districts and so on. General Lansdale said, "Well, you know, young man, we've already lost this war." I said, "Gee, Sir, there are a lot of people here in country that are still fighting." He said, "Yes, but what we're doing is so nonsensical that there's no way we're going to win. It's just a question of how long it will be before we can leave." I was stunned. With that, I developed a lifelong interest in accurate intelligence and some devotion to telling the truth that proved to be very critical in my public life.

Q: We're talking about particularly the Hamlet Evaluation System, which was each person assigned to an area, an American, had to come up with positive figures.

MILLER: The basic problem with the system was the "warping of the truth" as it moved up the chain of command. If the hamlet didn't look good, then the district didn't look good, then the province didn't look good, then the Corps didn't look good, and then in Saigon, some senior general didn't look good. That was not acceptable. So each layer tended to make things just a little more favorable, until Saigon had a completely unrealistic picture of what was happening in the field.

Q: Yes.

MILLER: Most of the guys knew that they were warping the system a bit. Nobody would ever say they were lying about things. My favorite in the Delta involved the questions that we had on the HES form related largely to road transportation. In the Delta, you clearly had an option between water and road transportation. Frequently, water transportation was the more useful. So, you'd get to one of our little outposts and there would be Major Jones and his district team and we'd start talking to Jones about what was going on. Jones would say, "These are all Bs." We would say, "Why is that?" "Well, we control 90% of the roads." We'd say, "That is great, Sir. How much commerce is moving on the roads?" "Well, actually, none." "Well, why is that?" "We'll, they've got land mines and ambushes." I'd say, "Where is all the commerce going?" "Well, it's all in the canals." "And who controls that?" "Well, we don't." I said, "Oh, well, don't you think to give a sense of what's happening you might want to answer these questions a little differently?" He would reply that the question only asked about the roads. And the guy would look at you like you were dreaming. So, you ultimately came to the conclusion that you should really try very hard to get accurate data to policymakers. I don't think you should hold policymakers to rationality all the time, but those of us who are in public activity or living overseas really do owe our country our best efforts to try to decide what is true and what is not. The other thing that came out of my time in Vietnam was that war impressed me as a terrible activity. It happens. It's a terrible thing. The idea that it's a glamorous and fun pastime is just as close to insanity as anything you can imagine. That helped motivate and reinforce this idea that diplomatic work was a good thing.

Q: You're talking about the military reporting, which was essentially the hamlet evaluation and all this, which you remarked was extremely flawed. It was one of these bean-counting exercises. Did you get any feel for what the embassy was getting from its Foreign Service officers and the CIA was getting?

MILLER: Not as much. I had very little contact with FSOs. I had more contact with Agency people. I think that we were just on the cusp of the Agency giving up on trying to report honestly. I'd have to go back through the history there of the inability of the Agency to sustain its DI [the analytic function] function as an honest provider of data. There were so many careers that went up in smoke when they tried to tell people that things were not as Washington thought that sometime in '65/'66/'67, the Agency gave up on trying to tell people the truth. Nobody wanted to hear the truth. The operational side of the Agency, the Phoenix Program, the SOG [Studies and Operations Group, the covert action program in Vietnam] activities, took preeminence and the ability of good analysts to come back and say, “We’re losing the war. We don’t know what we’re doing” disappeared.

Q: In your group of intellectuals under military control, what was the spirit?

MILLER: Like MASH, the TV series in which the characters survived by developing a whole range of rather outlandish “defense mechanisms.”

Q: A popular TV program.

MILLER: You developed a bizarre sense of humor to deal with this. We drank. One of our guys got on his motorcycle to Cambodia, returning with what he assured us was the best marijuana in all of Southeast Asia. For those who used marijuana this was truly a great accomplishment. When you got assignments from Washington like “We need an analytic model to validate the body count,” reporting, that took a couple weeks worth of drinking beer late into the evening to say “If you saw 50 left feet in a rice paddy at 4:00 PM in an engagement in which we had expended 1,000 rounds, how many bodies would there be in the rice paddy?” The answer is, nobody had a clue. One way to validate the body count would be to send out Lance Corporal Jones at dusk to try to do an accurate body count. The problem is that Jones would usually get killed. So, it was better to dummy the system than to lose Lance Corporal Jones. That we knew. So, what was it like? I still have very good friends with whom I worked over there. Like all of these experiences, they last a long time. It left me convinced we were going to lose and it left me with a set of objectives for my life in terms of trying to not let things like that happen again.

Q: Did you have any feel that we were on the wrong track? Was there a right track?

MILLER: There might have been a right track, which in hindsight is much easier to discuss. The right tracks go all the way back to Ho Chi Minh, who came to us and he didn’t like the French. The first response to that is, if Vietnam had existed in a vacuum and we had been able to tell the French to forget it as allies and we weren’t concerned about anyplace else in the world, we might have been able to reach out to Ho Chi Minh at that time and say, “We don’t like colonies or empires either.” But then obviously if you took France in the global context...

Q: We were concerned about keeping France in NATO.

MILLER: Yes. We had big issues with France and Ho Chi Minh wasn’t one of them. So, you sort of missed that opportunity. Then you get into the Dien Bien Phu aftermath. Did we do the right thing? Should we have stepped in militarily or should we have encouraged a sincere effort to bring an end to the civil war. Enough is enough. These are dedicated folks so let’s press for a political solution. Then you could have moved onto, let’s have a “light” engagement. Let’s use Special Forces troops. Let’s find a viable political structure. In one of the great examples of mission creep, we went from a handful of advisors to 500,000 kids or whatever. That was insane. The problem was, there was no ability to say, “Here is the game-plan. If it doesn’t work, we’re going to figure out how to go home now.” You need to have thought out how you went home.

The problem is, we had no exit strategy once we were in that far, which makes you think of today's Middle East problem. But we got in far enough that there simply was no apparent way to back out.

Q: You were there during Tet?

MILLER: Yes.

Q: Could you tell me your experiences during Tet?

MILLER: It was one of those days that altered your life. By that time, we were sleeping with small arms in the house.

Q: Where were you located?

MILLER: On the morning of Tet, I was asleep in a bed on the road between Tan San Nhut airport and downtown, relatively closer to the embassy and the center of the city.

The good news is that we had laid in some extra food, as over the holidays, the Vietnamese house staff was not going to be there. We were awakened by very low flying helicopters over the house, much lower than usual on their approaches to Tan San Nhut. So we woke up. It was maybe 7:00 AM. We said, "Well, we're awake. We're going to drive downtown and have breakfast." So, three or four of us got into a car, a small Toyota, and we started driving downtown. We had gone four or five blocks and there was a dead VC in the street, shot in front of somebody's wall." We said, "Somebody got into town last night. That's amazing." We drove on a little bit farther toward the downtown and we ran into a couple more bodies. But this being Vietnam, we just kept on, as we were used to seeing this in the countryside. We get downtown and we were going to one of the officers' messes, probably the Brinks, which was four or five blocks from the embassy. We parked the car. When we got out we noticed everybody had sidearm on. People were carrying weapons. This was like 8:00 AM on Sunday or something. We looked at this one trooper and said, "What's going on?" He said, "They've captured the embassy." We said, "Ah, come on. Don't give us that crap. It's Sunday. We want ham an eggs." He said, "No, they've captured the embassy. See those helicopters going in there? We're in the process of recapturing the embassy." Well, that was the first we had a sense that there was something really bad going on. We skipped breakfast and turned around and went back to our little villa.

Over time, we took an extra fridge, filled it full of sand, got that in front of our door. We had a grease gun with 20 rounds of 45-caliber ammunition which would have been absolutely useless. We went up to the roof and sat there with as much as beer and canned ham as we could find for two days and we watched close air support in Saigon. Then about the third day one of our friends from the embassy arrived and said, "You've got to go get your Vietnamese and you've got to get out on the street." We had a number of Americans who were fluent in Chinese and Vietnamese, which I was not, and probably 20 good Vietnamese interpreters. This fellow arrived and said, "You've got to drive around town, find these people, and we want you to start in District 10." District 10 was the Chinese area where we had completely lost control of the situation to what turned out to be regular NVA units. So, we got in our little car, having been armed with a short barrel .38, and drove around Saigon, picked up our folks, and off we went. I spent the balance of my time in Vietnam interviewing people trying to figure out what had happened, what these troops looked like when they came into town, who fought well on our side, who did not. Then I went back through all the districts we had worked in to look at the economic impact of the attack, how people perceived what had happened.

Q: By the time you left there, was it the summer of '68?

MILLER: It was in the spring.

Q: What was your impression of the economy at that time?

MILLER: Actually, like many economies in wartime, I thought it was doing better than anyone had a right to expect. And that was particularly true of agricultural activities. More complex light manufacturing and so on was harder but we spent a lot of time with Chinese rice mill owners in the Delta, in IV Corps, interviewing them about the availability of insecticides, fertilizers, the prices of rice, how far they'd get boats out to collect rice, how far they would advance finance crops, which was a great intelligence data for us. If God has ever made a natural intelligence organization, it's a Great Overseas Chinese community. They know all. One of my partners was a Mormon who had done his missionary work in Hong Kong. He spoke reasonable Cantonese. We had an opportunity to talk to a lot of people and we concluded that the economy actually was working fairly well and that the supplements that AID was providing, the insecticides, were getting out and were maintaining a fairly healthy rice production base.

Q: Had the miracle rice appeared yet?

MILLER: I don't believe so. I don't remember any questions on that subject.

Q: When you left there in '68, what was your impression of whither Vietnam?

MILLER: I didn't know. I think one of the things that I did learn is that you have to play the hand that you're dealt. I didn't understand geopolitics at that point. I had no clue what could or could not be done. I knew we were losing on the ground and that an awful lot of our troops were walking around the countryside without a clue of what was going on around them. Every once in a while, we would end up along with Major Jones, the district advisory, trying to bring peace between an Army company protecting field artillery pieces, typically three 105's. Our classic was a company digging into the cemetery around Ba Tri district because the cemetery had headstones of poured concrete. If you were out there trying to stay alive, where would you dig? Next to the poured concrete. And I probably would have, too. Well, the Vietnamese, of course, were outraged. I've never forgotten looking at these young Americans and thinking, "They don't belong here. This is a disaster. We're going to fire harassment and interdiction fire into the bush tonight. We're going to expend 500 H and I rounds, three 105s, to drive the Vietnamese crazy and to win the war." Meanwhile, this whole district is saying, "If those Americans don't get out of our cemetery, we're going to personally go out there and strangle them."

Q: Did you get any feel for the Vietnamese government and their reach and how they operated?

MILLER: Not as much. I saw more of our people than of their people in Saigon, than the Vietnamese leadership.

JOHN E. GRAVES
Provincial Advisor
Rach Gia (1967-1968)

John E Graves was born in 1927 in Michigan. He received his Bachelor's and Master's degree from the University of Michigan, and served in the US Navy overseas from 1945 to 1946. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1962, he was assigned to Leopoldville, Bukavu, Antananarivo, Rach Gia, Lomé, Yaoundé, Tehran, Montevideo, Sidi Bou Said, and Rabat. Mr. Graves was interviewed by Richard Jackson on January 12, 1999.

Q: So, you arrived in Saigon in 1967 and then what?

GRAVES: I had several weeks of briefings and met top officials, listened to their programs and evaluations.

Q: Top officials being Henry Cabot Lodge?

GRAVES: Cabot Lodge was soon replaced by Bunker but more important in terms of my assignment were General Westmoreland and Robert Komer.

Q: Komer was the deputy responsible for the provincial...

GRAVES: Responsible for the infamous Phoenix Program, which I knew nothing about. I was selected to be the equivalent of governor of a province. The main reason I was assigned to Vietnam had to do with my experience with terrorism and guerrilla warfare. Also my French, which would enable me to easily communicate with Vietnamese officials. Spending a year or two in Vietnamese training got you almost nowhere. To learn to speak Vietnamese usefully, you have to be very gifted for language learning and very motivated. There are of course no intrinsically hard languages. But Vietnamese is far removed from English, far from European languages. For starters, the tonal system is difficult for a Westerner to cope with. For example, the act of asking a question where we use the same words as in a statement but with an intonation which indicates a question. Imagine a language where you can change the same basic word to three or four very different meanings by changing tonal relationships.

Q: Were you then with other provincial advisors designate, the Frank Wisners, Paul Hares, and Dick Holbrookes of that time?

GRAVES: Wisner was in Saigon when I got to know him. He was one of the few Americans who seemed to have some understanding of Vietnam. Most of the Americans who briefed me, especially the military, parroted the party line. Aggression from the North and the evils of Communism. I learned to avoid these people. They were of no use to me. I eventually ended up in Rach Gia, capital of Kien-giang, part of the Delta of the Mekong on the coast of the Gulf of Siam, The northern part borders on Cambodia; the southern part was in the hands of the Viet Cong. What with other enclaves, I was in a province where something like half was Viet Cong.

Q: This was the year before Tet.

GRAVES: The Tet Offensive occurred right after the end of my stay there.

Q: What did you find when you got to your province?

GRAVES: The reason I had such a singular experience was that when I was assigned to Rach Gia I had to meet with the regional chief in Can Tho, my immediate American boss. I was also advised to let Can Tho hire me a Vietnamese interpreter-advisor-counselor. The people that Can Tho proposed had never set foot in my province. None of them could really speak French. They were young. They spoke very broken, very useless English. One of the reasons Americans did so badly in Vietnam was that they had no real communication with the Vietnamese. The best possible thing would be to have Americans who really could speak Vietnamese. The next best thing would be to have people who could really speak French. The top layer in Vietnam all talked (even with each other) in French. So when Can Tho presented me with a candidate, I asked, "Why should I hire him? How would he be of any use to me?"

When I got to Rach Gia, I hired a man who had just retired from the civil service. He had been in the French civil service for perhaps 20 years and then the Vietnamese civil service until mandatory retirement. Mr. Vinh proved to be a first-rate human being and an incredible source of information once I learned to ask open-ended questions. This is very important, especially with Asians. Never give them a hint as to what the answer should be. I learned a great deal about Vietnam, the Vietnamese, and what was really going on. A big mistake insofar as my career was concerned.

Q: How did that picture you were putting together differ from what you had gotten in your Saigon briefings?

GRAVES: Probably best to begin with black humor. Our body count reports which proved we were winning. Art Buchwald had a lot of fun with that. Custer's last stand. His body count reports show he is winning the battle, but the only American left is poor Custer and he's wounded.

One of the things I soon learned was that our maps showing what territory was secure didn't have much to do with reality. We were surrounded and infiltrated by the Viet Cong. There were few really safe villages in Kien-giang. I also learned that had there been an election, as was promised, in south Vietnam, Ho Chi Minh would have won hands down. Even Vietnamese who would certainly lose everything including their lives, if the Viet Cong won out, didn't dispute the fact that Ho Chi Minh was the most popular leader in Vietnam. In any kind of election, he would have won. So it's not surprising that successive governments in Saigon had little standing, prestige, or power, and even less ability to administer and govern. We were backing what was essentially a dead horse, and it was getting more and more expensive to maintain the illusion that our horse was in the running.

I also had misgivings about Komer's Phoenix Program which began with the plausible premise that there were traitors in the South Vietnamese administration, army, and village hierarchies who should be eliminated. This sounds reasonable enough at first look, but when you bump up against the reality of how and by whom the condemned are designated, it gets uncomfortable. Rivalries, petty quarrels, family feuds, or even schemes to take over the position or land of someone. No real safeguards against mistaken or malevolent accusations. No trial, no proof, no defense. A group of black pajama types just goes in and kills the accused traitor.

Q: Americans?

GRAVES: Americans and Vietnamese together, always with the Americans leading.

Q: And you observed that at work in your own province.

GRAVES: I was called in and thoroughly briefed by Komer, who wanted each province advisor to understand what the program was and why it was and why we had to support it. We didn't have to be directly involved in it, just know that it was happening and to take advantage of it each time there was a strike.

Q: Were any of their actions based on information from provincial advisors such as you, intelligence?

GRAVES: Almost none.

Q: How did they get their information?

GRAVES: I personally think that some of it was settling accounts, vengeful Vietnamese. I have no reason to believe that accusing information was well-founded. I just don't think that our intelligence was good enough to pinpoint many important traitors, maybe the little chislers, but the really important people, I don't think so.

Q: In a province such as yours, one of maybe 30 provinces in Vietnam?

GRAVES: I've forgotten how many there were.

Q: A large number. What scale are we talking about in this?

GRAVES: Probably hundreds assassinated.

Q: You became conscious of this in your year there?

GRAVES: Right. People disappeared, were killed. Also, some torture was used. You could argue that it was justified, that we had to get information, but the information was often superficial. We were busy picking off the fringes. Obviously, it didn't work very well. The Tet offensive proved beyond doubt that South Vietnam was mined with tunnels full of Viet Cong and their stockpiles. In my province, the only areas not subject to Viet Cong influence were Catholic. The Catholics had come down from the North and settled after the 1954 settlement. They were profoundly anti-Viet Cong, anti-Communist. But they were the only group, the only villages which fought off Viet Cong infiltration. But they weren't pro-Saigon either. On the contrary, they detested the Saigon officials who were often corrupt, rapacious schemers. The Catholics listened to their priests rather than to Saigon officials or American do-gooders. They were the only group that I considered really hostile to the Viet Cong. All the rest were frightened, or didn't care or were sympathetic to the Viet Cong because they were against the foreigners.

Q: Some of your fellow provincial advisors considered their service in that role as the high point of responsibility or power in their career.

GRAVES: John Vann is a good example.

Q: How did you feel about it in those terms? What did you find there in terms of staff? What was your role and daily life?

GRAVES: Most of my staff (some 160) were American military. One of the things that really shocked me was that discipline in the Foreign Service was much better than in the military. The military were not prepared to do a lot of things. They were not prepared to take orders in the way that my Foreign Service officers were.

Q: There were senior military at the lieutenant colonel/colonel level under your authority?

GRAVES: Right. In fact, the lieutenant colonel who was my deputy became a very close and good friend.

Q: How did the military people like that take to this French-speaking academic?

GRAVES: They didn't. Worse than that, they were not prepared to do certain things or stop doing certain things. For example, our reconnaissance planes were armed with rockets. After they had done their reconnaissance, they would dump the rockets on so-called "free fire zones." I happened to be in a free fire zone when a plane dropped its load and saw what happened. So I prohibited all such gratuitous attacks and immediately found myself in a near mutiny.

Q: Casualties to Vietnamese civilians that you saw.

GRAVES: Right. I was in the midst of it and saw men, women and children maimed and killed. People I had come to talk with and try to understand. People we wanted to take a stand against Viet Cong infiltration. When I got back to Rach Gia, I was pretty angry. There was absolutely no reason to dump rockets on that village. Hard to imagine anything more counterproductive in terms of our goals. But the military had a kind of "shoot 'em up" attitude that was hard to control.

My deputy, a lieutenant colonel, was not at all in sympathy with such gratuitous attacks. We saw eye to eye but never succeeded in getting whole-hearted cooperation from the real gunslingers. My deputy even ruefully admitted that he was more sure that a Foreign Service officer would do what he was told than a military, who might protest and invoke his rights. Alas, many latter-day Foreign Service officers seem to have adopted the attitude of my military in Vietnam.

Q: I am understanding that you were then basically in charge of a group of about 160, mostly military, but including Foreign Service personnel. Nothing in the previous assignments we've been discussing had seemed to prepare you for that kind of management experience. What was it like suddenly?

GRAVES: I was confronted with problems which I had never seen before. I had to really listen to my more experienced staff. Then improvise and make mistakes. AID logistics (most of my civilians were AID), I knew nothing about. For example, tons of concrete. How to prevent it from being stolen or destroyed in leaky warehouses. How to get it distributed to villages participating in our projects. Much of it was waylaid by venal officials. A new experience for me, learning how difficult it is to give anything away effectively. Another example where I began without a clue. Our military were running patrols, but I couldn't make out what the goal or object of these "walks in the sun" was. They seemed to be "shoot 'em up" operations, revenge for all the casualties we were taking.

Q: Casualties occurring mostly on patrols?

GRAVES: Many, but all of us who traveled the roads risked land mines. I couldn't see how groups of armed Americans tramping around in rice paddies or ransacking villages was going to pacify South Vietnam and garner support for Saigon. Westmoreland's idea was that our presence be declared, repeated and emphasized. He came to Rach Gia several times to talk with us. The man was very conscientious. He even asked some good questions. In many respects he was admirable and straightforward, sort of a grown up boy scout. But he had little understanding of Vietnam and the Vietnamese. Not his cup of tea. I suppose he saw the war as a chess game rather than a problem of winning over a very foreign people to our values. In any case, I didn't see where there was much hope that he would come to see that what he was doing had little chance of promoting American interests.

Interesting question, "What was the American interest in Vietnam?" We normally define American interests in terms of security, trade, culture and family relations. In the case of Ireland or Israel, for example, American interest has to do with the fact that a great many Americans have Irish or Jewish origins. Then there is strategic interest. Oil in the Middle East, Central America's proximity. Finally, trade, which contributes to our interest in Canada or Japan. None of these criteria obtain in the case of Vietnam itself, but the domino theory had it that if Vietnam fell to the Communists, we would suffer a major strategic setback. When I was in Vietnam, I more or less accepted the idea that the domino theory was valid. But my daily experience gradually forced me to conclude that our programs and tactics were never going to pacify my province. And I began to wonder how long the American public would go along with the Westmoreland syndrome of bringing in ever more American soldiers and taking ever more casualties. Privately some of my colleagues in Saigon and in other provinces began to wonder along with me.

Q: Who were some of the others who, in your view, saw clearly?

GRAVES: One that comes to mind immediately is Frank Wisner. He was well informed and skeptical. There were a few who resigned. Most just served out their assignment and departed.

Q: As you described what you were doing, a lot of the activities under your control were in contradiction with each other: the patrols to assert presence, and then on the other hand the food distribution and the AID activities. Those contradictions, with time, seemed to become more and more apparent to you.

GRAVES: Not so much the contradictions, but I couldn't see how our programs and projects were ever going to pacify Kien-giang. I remember Westmoreland asking me point blank if we had made progress in the last month. I answered, "I don't think we're any worse off than we were six months ago, but we're no better off either."

Q: Measured in terms of area of control?

GRAVES: Security? That was what mattered. What part of Vietnam was secure and under the auspices of the Saigon government and, therefore, the Americans. I said, quite frankly, I couldn't see where we had made any progress in the last six months. Westmoreland was unhappy with my answer. I was saying that our people were being killed to no good effect.

Q: Did you have civilian congressional, other fact finders?

GRAVES: Almost every day. One of the reasons I got into trouble was that I finally decided that I just didn't have time to deal with all those visitors. A never ending succession of congressmen, senators, journalists.

Q: Harvard professors like Henry Kissinger.

GRAVES: There were professors, politicians and bureaucrats aplenty. They would turn up and think they merited my full attention for the whole day.

Q: In your province?

GRAVES: Right.

Q: But getting there, having been cleared by somebody.

GRAVES: Right.

Q: On their own military aircraft.

GRAVES: The CIA ran an airline in Vietnam. I would get a telegram saying that, for example, Joe Alsop was coming to visit tomorrow and expected me to stay with him the whole damn day.

Q: How did he take it when you didn't?

GRAVES: It was shortly after Alsop's visit when I decided that I was going to say "No" and see what happened. My superiors were unhappy that I was saying "No" to many people, "no, I don't have time to meet and greet this man." Besides, it was too dangerous. For example, we had a well-known senator from the Middle West who was prominent in the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee. He came out and I got a call from Westmoreland who said, "John, show him the war." The reason he called was that, unlike in many of the other Delta provinces, the Viet Cong controlled large areas of Kien-giang and you could be sure of getting into a fire fight if you ventured into those areas. There was an area called the "Three Sisters." Low mountains. So I foolishly took the Senator into the Three Sisters in a helicopter, escorted by two other helicopters, all heavily armed. We got shot down. This was instant worldwide news.

Q: You and he were in the helicopter?

GRAVES: Right. The other helicopters protected us but we had to establish a perimeter so one of them could land and evacuate us. I had military training. So I grabbed a machine gun to help establish the perimeter. No time to look after the Senator.

Q: When you say "military training," you had done a tour in the Navy in 1945-1946.

GRAVES: Yes, but I also had training in the Congo and in Vietnam, so I knew how to use an M-16, grenades, and machine guns.

Q: So, you were on the ground with the congressman and were eventually extracted.

GRAVES: Right. But his pants suffered greatly.

Q: Having risked lives on instruction to show him the war.

GRAVES: Stupid on my part. He was embarrassed about his messed pants and furious with me until we got to Can Tho and he realized that he was worldwide media. Then he was very pleased that he had been shot down. A war hero for the folks back home.

Q: You mentioned as the boss taking many losses in your group in this. How did that sit with you?

GRAVES: It was a chore I wasn't any good at. I let my deputy do most of it. But he was away at one point on leave in the U.S. and I had to do it all. Presiding over our ceremonies in honor of dead comrades and writing to their families to say they had not died in vain, that they had been protecting and sacrificing for our country and all of that, which I just didn't believe and couldn't easily express. I had to preside over body bags and say things that I didn't believe. Sometimes, I knew the man well, knew his views, a friend and comrade who didn't believe in what I had to say over his remains. That, I think, was one of the hardest things I had to cope with when I was in Vietnam. We had casualties and deaths and we had to deal with their families.

Q: You were yourself living in a military security cocoon of day to day existence, no?

GRAVES: No, in a pleasant villa presided over by a great Vietnamese cook. But I didn't trust the ARVN (Vietnamese army) to protect me there in the center of town, even though I was on good terms with the Vietnamese colonel commanding all ARVN troops in Kien Giang. The colonel, who enjoyed talking to an American in plain French, did not disagree with my judgment. So I hired Cambodian guards and stationed them up on my roof. I didn't want them out in front where any Viet Cong assault team coming in would immediately conclude that my house was a place to attack because it was being guarded. There was nobody in front of my house. But my armed Cambodians were behind sand bags on the roof every night.

Q: Was your office ever subject to this?

GRAVES: Our office building was shot up by rockets. I have a photo of my battered desk sitting there with the walls around it blown away. If I had been upstairs at my desk, I wouldn't be talking to you now, but I was down below participating in the shoot-out.

Q: You mentioned that Tet occurred.

GRAVES: The Tet offensive occurred after I was removed from my job. Rach Gia came under extensive attack, which was later described to me by my former deputy. (We were good friends and maintained close contact over the years.)

Q: How did the removal itself play out?

GRAVES: I was removed because I sent a highly classified message to Washington documenting my observation that we were making no progress overall in pacifying Kien Giang. I was careful to cite only my province where I could see no end to the war and no good coming from what we were doing. I ended by suggesting we reduce our aid to the level which we assumed the Viet Cong and the North were getting from the outside and that if our guys couldn't hack it, that ought to tell us we were backing a dead horse and should therefore get out of Vietnam. Or as the wags had it, declare victory and go home.

Q: That was a courageous message to send.

GRAVES: At first I was commended by Leonard Marks, Director of USIA, who had asked for a frank analysis of what I was seeing in Vietnam.

Q: In sending it, were you aware of what the consequences would be?

GRAVES: No. I was responding to a specific request from my director. A matter of doing my job, but there was also a personal calculation. What with MacNamara's radically new analysis of the war in Vietnam, I figured policy was up for grabs. My analysis and suggestion on how we could exit Vietnam would arrive at just the right moment to help Marks make a big splash in Washington. This could get me promoted. I was elated when I was congratulated for my

Q: By who?

GRAVES: I got a letter from Marks, head of USIA, expressing his gratitude for my analysis. (See attached photocopy of Marks' letter of commendation.) I assumed he was planning to use it to wade into the high-level policy debate at the White House. A gross miscalculation on my part. MacNamara lost out to the hawks. Johnson remained adamant about Vietnam. No debate, no policy change. Nonetheless it was a good analysis and I hoped that someday it would be recognized. (To facilitate finding in archives my report, see attached photocopy of the first page of the report.)

Q: Is it not now already?

GRAVES: No.

Q: Was it a normal thing for provincial advisors to take on the overall picture and offer views on grand strategy?

GRAVES: Of course not, but I sent a copy to my superior in Saigon, Barry Zorthian.

Q: While you were a USIA officer, these were in regular embassy or military channels.

GRAVES: Essentially, military channels.

Q: We lost a bit of information when I changed the tape. You were talking about how reaction to your Vietnam report changed....

GRAVES: In Washington and throughout the country there was great controversy regarding our intervention in Vietnam. MacNamara repudiated his long-standing policies and strategies and concluded the war was not winnable. For a brief moment, it looked as if people who had other ideas might get a hearing. But it turned out that Lyndon Johnson had made his decision regarding the new views of our chief strategist. MacNamara was out.

Q: So, your report played into a larger Washington setting that you had no way of gauging and then it came back down to you from the embassy that you were on your way home.

GRAVES: Right, which is the normal thing in our service, as we all know.

Q: You had a certain amount of time to wrap up your affairs?

GRAVES: Dinners and receptions organized in my honor by Vietnamese in Rach Gia. Nothing in Can Tho or Saigon. As quickly as possible, I was shuffled out of Vietnam and back to Madagascar.

Q: As you leave this section of the tape in Vietnam, you had mentioned the rapid promotion cycle of some who were there. Was it your view that the network of people there somehow perpetuated itself later in the Service? One does think of the Tarnoffs, Tony Lakes, Holbrookes, Wisners, and Hares.

GRAVES: It was a jumping off point. Vietnam certainly catapulted Barry Zorthian to fame and fortune. Others got hurt. Some left the Foreign Service. They didn't want to have anything more to do with the U.S. government. As it turned out, those who came to see that our intervention was wrong or at least not in the interest of our country were right. But the people who were essentially right suffered career setbacks and the people who were essentially wrong did very well. The cynical conclusion: officers should play the game, avoiding controversy and trying never to give offense (see "Falstaff au Viêt-nam" by John Graves, Éditions Tirésius, Paris, 1994; available Bibliothèque Nationale and in bookshops).

Q: Did you feel within USIA you were from that moment handicapped, or the other way, compensated for having gone through a tough time?

GRAVES: Once back in Washington, I found myself in quarantine, or as we call it, the corridor corps. No assignment, no prospects of an assignment, no office, and no address except the Foreign Service lounge. Director Marks was not available when I tried to get an appointment. Because it would be upsetting to our children to have a father who didn't have a job, I went off to "the office" every morning, which was mostly museums and libraries. Finally, after six months in limbo, a well-placed friend was able to quietly spirit me off to Lomé, Togo as public affairs officer.

Q: What was the reaction of your colleagues in that six month period? Were you a pariah, a hero? Did people shuffle by you in the corridors?

GRAVES: Many hardly said hello when they ran into me in the corridors. Others expressed sympathy and quickly moved on. A few invited me to lunch and assured me they were doing what they could to get me an assignment.

THOMAS F. CONLON
Head of Provincial Reporting
Saigon (1967-1968)

Thomas F. Conlon was born in Illinois in 1924 and received his BS from Georgetown University in 1948. He served overseas in the US Army from 1943-1945. Upon entering the Foreign Service, he was posted in Havana, Surabaya, Singapore, Saigon, Le Havre, Manila, Nice, Canberra, and Bangkok. In 1992 Mr. Conlon was interviewed by Arbor W. Gray.

CONLON: However, I had only spent six months in Manila when the Embassy in Saigon began to press me to return there for assignment. I felt personally that Vietnam was a very important testing place for the United States and, although I might have avoided returning there, I didn't feel that I could do this and still be consistent with my own views.

Q: So you accepted reassignment to Saigon?

CONLON: Yes, as First Secretary. Initially, I filled in as chief of the Internal Unit in the Political Section, replacing Ted Heavner, who was scheduled for reassignment elsewhere. After going on home leave Ted decided to return to Saigon, to his old position, and I was assigned as head of the "Provincial Reporting Unit." There were seven very capable young Foreign Service Officers assigned to it, most of them Vietnamese language officers, living in the provinces, working out of a central point, and reporting more or less on what they thought would be interesting and significant. My job was to keep in touch with them, review and send on their reports, and suggest other reports to them. Several senior officers from the Department told me how important this unit was, but it was apparent that few of them actually read the reports. I came to have considerable reservations about whether it was useful to have these guys risking their lives, frequently moving alone through a hazardous countryside, to produce reports that few people read. All in all, I felt that I was about 50% occupied, which was all the more disagreeable, since my family was still in the Philippines.

One incident occurred during this second tour in Saigon which made me reflect more deeply on how we should have responded to the Vietnamese generals' request for reassurance of support in 1963 in the event that they overthrew Diem. For a long time I had felt that, though it was regrettable, it was inevitable that we would reply that we would continue to support the non-communist side in South Vietnam. However, I believe that in September, 1967, presidential elections were held in South Vietnam, in which there were more than a dozen candidates. Nguyen van Thieu was elected president after a campaign which numerous American observers who came to South Vietnam for the event said was reasonably fair and democratic. Naturally, there were Vietnamese who did not accept the results and who were moving to have the National Assembly decline to certify the election outcome. At this point Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, a superb ambassador and a very perceptive but tough-minded man, called in all of the political officers and told us to pass the word to our Vietnamese contacts that if the National Assembly refused to certify the election results, the U. S. would regard this as a request for us to withdraw our military and economic support for the Republic of Vietnam and to pull our forces out of the country, leaving the non-communist Vietnamese to deal with the communists on their own. This quickly ended that kind of maneuver. I wondered what would have happened if we had taken similar action in the fall of 1963 when a group of Vietnamese generals asked for assurances of U. S. support if they overthrew Diem. Certainly, we never encountered as effective a Vietnamese Government as the one headed by President Diem.

Here, perhaps, a word or two about my long suffering but dutiful Foreign Service wife, Joan, would be appropriate. At the time I went back to Saigon in June, 1967, we had seven children, all living with us in Manila. I was able to get back to Manila from Saigon about once every six weeks or so, spending a week each time. This left Joan with all of the day to day problems of coping with a large family, handling local and U. S. bills (which I had always handled before), and having only indeterminate status in Manila. She had ordinary Filipino license plates on the car but still had access to the Embassy and Navy commissaries and the dispensary, as well as the clubs which we had joined when I was assigned to Manila. Although Joan could have returned to the U. S. or gone virtually anywhere else in the world other than Saigon, she decided to stay in Manila. We had a very pleasant house in the Bel Air suburb of Manila, a good household staff, and the children were more or less content in school. Our eldest daughter, Peggy, however, decided that she would like to return to Washington, D. C., to go to high school with one of her best friends, Kathleen Conley. Kathleen's parents agreed to have Peggy live with them in Washington. During my absence in Saigon Joan also had unstinting support from the Political Counselor, Dick Usher, and his replacement, Frank Underhill, as well as other members of the Political Section, who treated her as if she was still the wife of one of the officers in the Section.

Then, just before I left Manila for Saigon, our eldest son Paco (so we called him, as he had been born in Havana), then not quite 17, asked if he could go to sea for a year or so. U. S. registered ships were being taken out of mothballs faster than the seamen's union could provide crews. A special arrangement had been made under which young American males in good physical condition could obtain temporary Coast Guard authorization to be signed on as ordinary seamen. The union grudgingly accepted this situation. I had myself wanted to serve in the Merchant Marine during World War II, but my mother refused her permission, as she said I "would meet rough men" if I went to sea. Poor Mother! I met "rough men" in the Army Air Forces instead and suffered no permanent harm. She must have been thinking of Eugene O'Neill's novel, The Long Voyage Home, made into a movie about this time, which depicted seamen as boozing brawlers. Well, I decided that I would sign the necessary authorization for Paco to go to sea. This relieved Joan of some responsibilities, as Paco was in a rather rebellious mood at the time, and his being at sea meant that she did not have to deal directly with him.

I think that the experience did him good, and he ultimately came to take this view. In fact, at the end of his year of service, he decided to return to Manila and complete his last year of high school. However, he had done a good job on the ship, and the captain was reluctant to let him go. I prevailed on the shipping officer in the Embassy in Saigon to go up to Cam Ranh Bay, where Paco's ship then was located, and "lean" on the captain to have him released. The task was made easier than seemed likely at first, because Paco had fallen down a slippery ladder while at sea, breaking an arm. This limited his usefulness on the ship. He was duly discharged, spent a week or so with me in Saigon, and then returned to Manila to finish high school.

VERNON C. JOHNSON
Vietnam Bureau, USAID
City Unspecified (1967-1968)

Vernon C. Johnson was born in Mississippi in 1918. He graduated from Southern University in 1948 and later from the University of Wisconsin in 1954. He served overseas in the US Army from 1942 to 1946. Working for ICA and AID, he was posted to various countries including India, Nigeria, Uganda, and Tanzania. He was interviewed April 12, 1994 by W. Haven North.

Q: Where did you go from there?

JOHNSON: From the War College I went to the Vietnam Bureau. USAID had set aside funds for a separate Vietnam Bureau and I headed agriculture in the Bureau at that time. Jim Grant was the chief and our work was to back stop agriculture programs in Vietnam. I went out there twice and worked with the Mission in the field.

Q: What were we trying to do in agriculture?

JOHNSON: It was mainly security oriented; secure the villages, etc. All had a military purpose. For example, the agricultural programs were involved in the business of pig raising and pig feeding within the construct of a fortified village. We imported the first improved rice seeds that were produced in the Philippines and carried to Vietnam. I was in the Philippines when we were loading the ships. These were improved rice varieties. I understand those varieties of rice are the prominent ones in Vietnam even now.

Q: What other agricultural endeavors were you trying to promote in Vietnam?

JOHNSON: The general objective of agriculture was to improve village activity as I recall. Most of the people outside the cities were, of course, farmers and rice was the critical crop. Vegetable production was another element of activity and Taiwan was responsible for this work. You may recall that, at one time, particular countries were responsible for research in the development of particular crops. Taiwan was responsible for developing vegetable research and production; Mexico for wheat, etc. There were extension people assigned to Vietnam villages during the war. As for the Viet Cong... their feeling was that of non-interference in the production of food because they would probably get a share of it.

Q: What years were you back-stopping the work in Vietnam?

JOHNSON: This was in 1967-68. I was in that job there about a year and a half.

Q: Did you have any particular feelings or views about U.S. policy towards Vietnam at that time?

JOHNSON: Not really, I thought we should have been there and we should do what we could do. The war wasn't a pretty thing to see, however, but, I suppose, most Americans thought we should have been in Vietnam and being government employees we helped do what we could. The cold war was at its height and that was one of the main factors-with the Soviet Union supporting the North and, of course, with the Americans supporting the South. I had just left the country when the Tet attacks occurred. This was one of the main offenses from North Vietnam into the South. AID was there in great numbers trying to assist with food needs and, in general, to support the people of the South Vietnamese Government while they were trying to win the war.

Q: So it wasn't long term development?

JOHNSON: It wasn't long term development at all, no. It was, as I said, emergency work, doing whatever was needed in the villages that still were accessible day by day. A person might be assigned several villages and was expected to make his rounds. Each morning one checked with security about security in his village areas. If Viet Cong were in the area, our technicians stayed away.

Q: Do you think there has been any effect of this work in Vietnam that was lasting?

JOHNSON: The Vietnamese were very industrious people, anyway. I think this was probably be true whether it was north or south. So with minimal help for survival, they would make it. They worked assiduously. I don't think that long term institutional building was intended, but some of the improved varieties of rice and vegetables that we took in are, no doubt, still being used; I'm sure the legacy of that is still there.

Q: Are any of the philosophies or American approaches to agriculture preset there?

JOHNSON: Not as such; for one thing, the farming there is dominated by traditional Asian methods of rice production. The best thing one could do was to provide the Vietnamese with those things that improve their own performance rather than give technical advice. So it was mainly a supply program more than anything else. And this was under unique and unusual conditions, so you would have not expected the typical A.I.D. organization and A.I.D. program, although there was a food and agriculture office, a Mission Director (always a top administrator, a very well thought of person.) The Director during my time had come from Nigeria-Don MacDonald.

Saigon (1967-1969)

Charles L. Daris was born in 1938 in Massachusetts. He served in the US Navy before graduating from the San Francisco State College in 1963. He entered the Foreign Service in 1964. His overseas posts include Afghanistan, Vietnam, Western Africa, Morocco, South Africa, Tunisia and Saudi Arabia. Mr. Daris was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1998.

Q: You were in Vietnam between the Delta and the capital for a total of two years?

DARIS: Yes, I was there about two years and saw the war at both ends. And because I was between bosses at the time, I had the occasion after Tet to accompany the embassy's highlands political reporting officer on his rounds just two days after the attack, bearing witness to the bodies still on the barbed wires. The Tet attack, which occurred in January of 1968, was a turning point in the war for us. I remember arriving at the embassy and witnessing the carnage. I went up and inspected the Ambassador's office before he arrived with the idea of ensuring that no attackers were lurking in his bathroom. I'm certain this had already been done, but I remember holding my breath as I opened the door. I have pictures of me accompanying Ellsworth Bunker as he picked his way through the corpses littered around the embassy grounds. Alan Wendt had been the Embassy Duty Officer the night of the attack. He was on the phone all night with Washington and the U.S. military as the Vietcong came very close to penetrating the Embassy. Afterwards, I took him home to give him some breakfast and try to calm him down. He did a great job.

At the time I don't think there were more than a fraction of my colleagues who didn't believe what they were doing in Vietnam was worthwhile. I certainly did or I wouldn't have volunteered. However, the war had become a quagmire that our political system could not sustain and it was a lesson painfully learned for the country. I visit the Vietnam Memorial, which as you know is very near the Department, from time to time and never fail to feel sadness as I scan the 58,000 names on the Wall.

Q: At the time you were there from 1966 to 1968, is that not the period? You left in 1968?

Q: How did you feel about Tet at the time or right immediately after it happened? You certainly probably didn't see it as a turning point at that stage. Was it seen as a defeat for the Vietcong, that they had shot everything and really hadn't achieved their objectives? Do you remember how you felt about it right afterwards when you went up to the highlands?

DARIS: I think we were all stunned that they made their way into the villages and into the capital, including our own compound. It was most sobering but the statistics showed that they paid a very, very dear price for it. It was only over time that the political costs in terms of our own political processes became apparent and over the long run it was not much of a victory for us, certainly not the victory General Westmoreland attempted to portray while talking to the press in front of the bullet-shattered teak door that was probably all that kept the Vietcong commandos from violating our embassy.

I'll tell you a little story. Many of us forget that 1968 was a very, very violent year all over the world. The Paris peace talks had begun in 1968 and Ambassador Bunker and his staff made a trip back to Washington, also stopping in Paris. I didn't go with him. I can't remember whether the sequence was Paris/Washington or Washington/Paris, but in the months following Tet I recall that Saigon was frequently under rocket fire and other violent reminders of war. From this scene in Saigon you must picture the party arriving in Paris. The famous evenements [French: events] were occurring, and Charles de Gaulle was tottering. Paris was burning. So they were under escort in Paris. Meanwhile, they arrived in Washington to experience the aftermath of the Martin Luther King assassination, and areas of the Capital were burning. In the end they all were glad to get back to Saigon, which of the three was the calmest. 1968 was quite a year.

Q: We are all kind of being reminded of that this year because it is the 30th anniversary of various events: Tet, the King assassination, and soon we'll probably be talking about Robert Kennedy and the events at the Democratic convention in Chicago, and so on. To come back to Saigon for a minute, where did you live? Did you have an apartment in the embassy compound?

DARIS: No. I had an apartment in a largely AID building on the road to the airport.

Q: You were a junior officer and you were in the Ambassador's and Deputy Ambassador's offices so you certainly were at the center of things but did you feel kind of a personal sense of vulnerability with security or did that happen maybe more after you left Vietnam that you felt relieved to be out of danger so to speak?

DARIS: I never felt any great vulnerability. In the province where I was, there was some Vietcong activity but I was young and considered myself invulnerable and traveled at will. I carried a concealed automatic weapon, but I'm happy to say I never needed it. In Saigon the only real danger I felt was a wayward rocket that, fate would decide, might or might not kill me. I try not to worry about such things in life and I certainly didn't then.

Q: There wasn't much you could do about it anyway.

DARIS: No, nothing at all.

Q: Anything else we should discuss about the period in Vietnam? That was certainly a pivotal period, certainly in retrospect, while you were there.

DARIS: No. I guess the point I made was that everybody, or virtually everyone, believed that it was worth doing, worth trying and very good people were giving their all to serve their country at a time of war. Hindsight is always clearer but it wasn't evident at the time that it was going to end the way it did, not to most of those of us involved in it. That is not to say that we accepted all the official optimism, far from it. Until Tet, there were very few thinking we ought to give up the game.

Q: Did you have much experience in Saigon with the government, with Vietnam officials or was that pretty much done by others and you were pretty much working inside the mission?

DARIS: No, I had almost no contact because mine was an inside job. At other posts I was always a substantive officer out making contacts and that's what I missed most in my experience in Saigon.

Q: You were trying to make sure the memos arrived on time.

DARIS: Yes. It was an administrative job in which knowledge of substance was required, but it was a classic staff aide job.

CHARLES T. CROSS
Deputy, I Corps
Danang (1967-1969)

Ambassador Charles T. Cross was born in in China in 1922. He attended Carleton College and Yale University ,and served as a lieutenant overseas in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1942-1946. His assignments abroad included Taipei, Jakarta, Hong Kong, Kuala Lumpur, Alexandria, Nicosia, London and Danang, with an ambassadorship to Singapore. Ambassador Cross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001

Q: You were assigned to I Corps from 1967 to April 1969. Where were you stationed?

CROSS: In Danang. I was the deputy for I Corps after Barney Koren left. There were four of us - i.e., John Paul Vann, Sterling Cottrell, Charlie Whitehouse (later). We were mostly FSOs - except for the famous Vann.

Q: What was the situation in I Corps when you arrived?

CROSS: I Corps was in the middle of some of the heaviest fighting. At times we had as many as five North Vietnamese divisions on the periphery of the area we were guarding; sometimes of course they would make incursions into the area. The fighting along the DMZ was continuous. We had a very heavy military load. At the same time, the Marines had instituted some very enlightened pacification measures. For example, they had developed some ways to protect the rice crop. They held County Fairs, which they protected. They would also search villages for subversives. All of that protected the villagers against North Vietnamese and VC [Viet Cong] incursions, although there weren't many VC left in our area.

I had a very good relationship with the commanding general, General Robert Cushman. He gave us full support. We were advisors to the South Vietnamese on all matters except military operations, again with the exception of military operations in support of pacification; we did give advice on those. We had district advisors most of whom were military officers. There were 42 districts in the five provinces of I Corps. The U.S.-South Vietnam establishment in the I Corps area was huge and since we were responsible for all pacification activities - hospitals, education, police, etc - we had 500,000 regional and popular forces in the militia - a heavy workload.

Q: Where were most of the South Vietnamese forces?

CROSS: There were 2 ARVN divisions in I Corps, roughly: the First in central/north, the Second in the central/south. We had a brigade of South Korean Marines; they were not very good. In I Corps, there were three American divisions: two Marine and one Army - the "Americal." One of the Marine divisions was on the DMZ; the other was south of there, near Hue and Danang. The Americal was further south and was involved in the My Lai [atrocities].

Later on, two more Army divisions were added to the command - the 1st Cavalry division and the 101st Airborne. So most of the time we had a lot of troops in the I Corps area and lots of fighting.

Q: What was your job?

CROSS: As I said, I was the deputy to the Marine commanding general. I was in charge of the pacification program, which was one of the general's major responsibilities. My title was deputy for CORDS [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support] and I was involved in everything. I wrote about my work in great detail in Born a Foreigner (chapters 13-16).

Refugees were a major problem. About a third of the refugees were really not too far away from their homes. Many had moved just a few miles to live in the larger towns. They were not really refugees; I would call them “disrupted” people. That was a large challenge for us trying to ease the transition for these people.

We had a number of very good people working in the field; two or three were actually killed. Right at the beginning, I had a difference of views with a guy named De Haan, who was Ted Kennedy’s top assistant working on Vietnam. He came out with a group that was working on Laos, although he himself focused on the refugee problem. I told him that the refugee program was not a nation-building program as far as we were concerned; it was intended to take care of a large group of human beings who had no immediate means of support. For some reason, De Haan took my words out of context and used them as part of a Kennedy attack on the whole refugee program. I thought that was a very unfair attack, particularly since it was made in Congress where it got good coverage. I meant to say that it didn’t matter what one did for the Vietnamese refugees if they couldn’t be assisted, initially anyway, with food and shelter. Those basic necessities came first; it was a task that only we with our resources - capital and human - could do. The South Vietnamese just were not able to take care of these people. Born a Foreigner (pages 176-177) has this difference more clearly than I have just stated it.

I must admit that I changed my mind later and came to the conclusion that in the refugee program it was vital to have some South Vietnamese participation. But the philosophical difference with Ted Kennedy and his staff soured me on them.

Most of the American visitors we saw in the I Corps area who were opposed to the war did not change their minds because they saw only what they wanted to see, which would reinforce their preconceived notions. Ted Kennedy and his staff were a case in point. One time, he visited Saigon and looked at the medical services there. He was then going to come to Danang. We were instructed to make sure that every minute of his time was filled because he didn’t have time to wait. One of his staffers came first and when he saw the program that we have developed, he said that it would have to be changed entirely. He told us that Kennedy was totally booked in Saigon, visiting one hospital after another, but he was not seeing any war casualties. He wanted to see wounded civilians who had been “victims” of American gunfire. I told the staffer that perhaps Kennedy might not be able to find what he was looking for. In Danang at that moment, there may have been no more than ten people who might have been harmed by Viet Cong and North Vietnamese mines; by far the largest number of occupants in hospitals were sick from malaria or other diseases or burned by stoves. There may have been times when there was a larger number of wounded. Nor were the wounded always our fault. Many came from mines laid by the Viet Cong. This whole experience really embittered me because I thought that people like Kennedy were looking for any excuse to destroy the good work that we were doing. People who had no preconceived notions, like the British ambassador, Sir Murray McLehose, Bob Scalopino - a well known scholar - and some journalists, were willing to see the situation as it was and would go with me to visit all parts of our area. They would follow me around while I was doing my work and observe our efforts. When we were in a helicopter, I had a chance to explain to them what I saw as the situation on the ground. They got a balanced view of the situation because they were seeing the same things that I was.

These people were impressed by what they saw and heard. They heard junior military and Foreign Service officers express their desire to do more in terms of the pacification program if they only had the necessary resources; they would point out that certain programs could not be conducted for military reasons. A listener might well have come away realizing that despite the many problems, there were some solutions and that things might work out. When I left Vietnam, I was confident that we were on the right track.

Q: You were there for Tet?

CROSS: I am glad you asked about that because one of my FSO friends was captured during Tet. I had just returned from a ten-day leave in London the middle of January. There had been a couple of bomb incidents in Danang near our office. I had been briefed that the North Vietnamese were making a major move south, moving a large number of troops, many apparently targeted at Danang. At the same time, the North had asked for a truce to last over the Tet holidays. The South Vietnamese had publically agreed to that proposal. So despite the intelligence reports, the South was reluctant to take any action which might subject them to criticism for opposing or violating a truce. We tried to tell them what we thought was happening, but we couldn't convince them to take any action - even defensive as it may have been.

One day before Tet, I called all the of the senior advisors in the provinces. All the provincial capitals had been attacked in 1967, except for Hue. So when I suggested that they might be attacked again, they were prepared. Our guy in Hue was Phil Manhard, who was a good friend - I got him that assignment. He had been in Hue since Thanksgiving and I think he had good control of the situation. He also had been a Marine and therefore had some experience in warfare. Phil said that he would bring his people together, but not in the MACV compound. That was the last word I had with Phil; he was captured and remained in North Vietnamese prisons for five years and two months.

The night before Tet all of the servants had the evening off to celebrate. I was invited to the nurses' apartment as the senior civilian in the area. We shot off firecrackers in the backyard after dinner and heard similar explosions all around town - not legal, but done anyway. As the evening went on, so did the firecrackers. Somewhere along about midnight, you could begin to hear those noises interspersed with heavy machine gun fire, followed by rockets. Then the firecrackers stopped to be followed by some very large explosions. These were from rockets that the North Vietnamese were firing into the town. There was some fighting in the outskirts around the I Corps headquarters. The Marines were not attacked directly; the North concentrated on South Vietnamese troops.

By the end of the next day, it became clear that the North's offensive had only been successful in Hue, which they overran - except for the American military compounds. The rest of the city was entirely under their control. We had Marines south of the city which we moved north; but we didn't have many reports of what was going on except for those people who were in the MAC V compound, who really were not aware of what was happening in Hue itself. The North captured some 20 of our people in Hue; they killed seven of the American CORDS people. As I said, Phil was among those captured. The VC invaded his house, but couldn't find him because he had retreated to a hidden room in the house. The VC grabbed the servants who were threatened with sure death if they did not get Phil to surrender. The North Vietnamese were apparently working from a checklist and knew exactly whom they were looking for.

So Phil surrendered, but I have always assumed that the servants were killed anyway. They took Phil off somewhere near Hue, took his shoes away and tortured him for a couple of days. Then they dragged him and the other captives to the north on a journey that took several weeks. They had to be hidden often because obviously we and the South Vietnamese looked for them intently. Eventually, Phil was put in solitary confinement; behind his cell was a very small outside enclosure which held a cistern and toilet. That was also his exercise area. He was never allowed to use the area when the person in the next cell was out there. A sentry would come into the cell to make sure that Phil would not leave. One day, someone peered over the outside cell wall and whispered, "Are you an American?" Phil gave him a signal that the guard was in the cell with him. Later, the other man threw a cigarette wrapping into the enclosure which contained a tap code. Phil memorized that code and then communicated with the fellow in the next cell. They tried to remember all the names of the people they had encountered. This fellow eventually was sent to the "Hanoi Hilton" and reported to his fellow prisoners that he had met Phil, who secretly got the news home. That was the first indication that we had that he was still alive. This was 1969 or 1970.

Phil was totally incommunicado after the U.S. Army officer next door was taken away - until a German nurse was assigned to the cell next to him. She discovered a pencil-sized canal between the cells which drained water and used it to transmit messages to Phil using cigarette wrapping that she poked through the canal with a stick. He sent replies back, poking the same paper. That opened a channel of communications.

Eventually, the North Vietnamese figured out that Phil was the highest ranking American in North Vietnamese hands. They wanted to hear his views on all sorts of issues. They sent an "interrogator" who was nicknamed "Walter Cronkite." Six months after an event took place, the North Vietnamese would try to get Phil's views as if the event had just occurred. He was asked about such developments as Johnson's withdrawal from the presidential race in October 1968 when Johnson had announced his decision in April. One day in 1972, he was taken to Hanoi for treatment for a carbuncle on his back. When he was better, he was treated to a dinner before going back to the camp. His host was apparently a high ranking Vietnamese, according to his guard. This man assumed that the peace negotiations were moving along well enough in late 1972 so that the North Vietnamese could begin to think about opening an embassy in Washington. So Phil was asked a lot of questions about what that might entail logistically. By this time, of course, Phil didn't really know, having been out of contact with the world for five years. But they left Phil with the impression that the war was practically over.

Phil remembered that experience quite well. Two interesting developments came from this conversation. His interlocutor turned out eventually to be a vice foreign minister. He told Phil that the Soviet Union had been urging North Vietnam to retreat on questions of "our national interests." But the North Vietnamese responded to Soviet president Podgorny that taking such a stance would not only create great objections from the North Vietnamese people, but the whole socialist world would find it repulsive. Phil asked whether the Chinese had participated. He was told that Zhou En-lai had come and had urged the same things. But he didn't get anywhere either; the North Vietnamese were not about to do either the Soviets' or the Chinese's bidding.

Eventually, Phil was sent to the "Hanoi Hilton" himself. By this time, in early 1973, I was in the Department's Policy Planning staff. I was one of the few people who knew Phil well - our families were quite close. When it came time to bring the American prisoners home, the military sent a friend of each prisoner to bring him back. I was sent to bring Phil home. That was a real experience.

Q: What did you do after the Tet offensive?

CROSS: Our first job was to insure that those programs that we had managed to start in the rural areas were resurrected. For a while, all of South Vietnam went into a state of shock. It turned out that we were in fact in better shape than we had anticipated because the North Vietnamese, in order to attack the small cities and towns, had bypassed the villages and then attacked their main targets, most of which they did not conquer. The North Vietnamese took extremely high casualties so that when the offensive was over, there were very few traces of VC or North Vietnamese in the rural areas. So they could not impede our pacification efforts. Once these facts became clear, we really turned up the vigor of our programs. By May - or a few months after Tet - we were going full steam, even though Saigon had to withstand another attack. Hue had to be rebuilt.

The Tet offensive had some positive effects. For example, through blood drives, Danang was collecting only a few pints of blood. After Tet, they collected 300 pints in a very few days. Those province chiefs who had not performed adequately during the Tet period were replaced. There were quite a few who did very well and fought the enemy quite well once they got organized.

Q: What happened in Hue?

CROSS: Eventually, the Marines found ways to fight the North Vietnamese off. Before that happened, the North Vietnamese executed people. I think they killed about 3,000 inhabitants. It was a massacre. We had seven guys killed in our Hue CORDS programs. One was an FSR by the name of Miller. He had just graduated from Harvard and had taken a temporary commission to go to Vietnam. A wonderful guy - eager about his work with the Vietnamese. He was among those killed by the enemy.

Q: Who were the South Vietnamese who were shot in Hue?

CROSS: It was a long list which included government people, the "prosperous" ones. It was a very sizeable proportion of the population.

Q: Was this seen as an example of what would happen if the North won?

CROSS: The Vietnamese in I Corps were a tough bunch from top to bottom. In my opinion most of the Viet Cong from that province, if not all, were eliminated after Tet; they were descendants of revolutionary groups that had fought the French. They had come from Hanoi. They were a tough bunch. So we had two groups which were well matched. The South Vietnamese were from the south-east delta area - not from large cities like Saigon. I think that part of my optimism was that good province chiefs were being assigned to my area, as well as some very tough soldiers. I think we were actually winning the military war; we were able to protect the population and property. That left me with a slightly optimistic view about South Vietnam's future when I left the country.

Q: Did you get involved at all in the battle for Khe Sanh?

CROSS: Khe Sanh was the subject of many morning staff meetings. I only went to Khe Sanh when it had been secured after the battle. It was an example of Westmoreland's attrition strategy. With our air superiority we could do a lot of damage from the air. We saturated the area with bombs - day after day after day. The VC and the North Vietnamese took an awful beating, and we did as well. Eventually, both sides left the area. It was a very sad chapter. I would guess that at least 10,000 North Vietnamese and 600 of our Americans died in Khe Sanh. It had no strategic value; I think the main reason for the North Vietnamese actions was to draw American troops away from pacification.

Q: How effective were the South Korean military?

CROSS: I didn't have a chance to watch their army, but I was told it fought quite effectively. The two South Korean divisions were in II Corps. We had one brigade of Korean marines. Their officers looted the PXs [post exchanges] all the time. Furthermore, when they had to protect themselves, they were very aggressive. They held on to the territory assigned to them, but in doing so, were quite hard on the local population. I received several reports of massacres by the Korean marines. The American general would raise hell with the Korean general, but it didn't have much effect. I don't think it was clear to the Korean military why they were in Vietnam, other than they had been ordered to go there.

Q: That may have been true for a number of "allies" such as the Thai. They also looted the PXs in Saigon and would drive off in their trucks filled with the goodies.

CROSS: The PXs that were American-run did not suffer from raids by American soldiers.

Q: How was it to work with a young FSO or FSR who may have been totally unprepared for war or the pacification programs?

CROSS: It was interesting. Many had spent their academic lives studying European history or some other entirely unrelated subject. But I don't think we could have recruited a more superb bunch of guys. Many of them objected to our participation in the war, but once they got to know the Vietnamese and the American GIs who were interested in helping the Vietnamese, they really performed well and were very popular. They were all very decent and put their hearts and souls into doing a good job.

Q: Terry McNamara was the consul in Danang. I guess he was under your supervision, but he seemed to operate pretty much independently.

CROSS: He did fit his operations into those of I Corps and CORDS very well. He wanted to have another Foreign Service assignment and that is the way he viewed his job in Danang. He didn't want to be seen as being outside the "mainstream" as we were. I remember discussing this issue with him and telling him that none of us, including he himself, were doing "Foreign Service work." I pointed out that as a senior officer, I certainly was not in a regular assignment, but that it was incumbent on me and all of our FSO and FSR officers to make the CORDS program work. That called for the full cooperation of the military as well as the consulate. He performed well, but he just didn't want to be known as part of the team. That irritated me in some respects, but he ended up in Can Tho with the same kind of job I had in I Corps years later.

Q: Did you have any problems with the U.S. military officers? In the Army, they tended to spend six months with the troops and six months in a staff job before being returned to the U.S.

CROSS: These officers wanted to "punch two tickets" on the same tour. That is one of reasons why the staffs were so large and cumbersome. What were called the "maneuver" battalions were not really a big part of the American military effort and many of those officers served later with CORDS. We did have many differences with these officers, but we had some hold over them because all the senior officers received efficiency reports from us. So they at least pretended to pay attention to us. They used to be very upset unless each of their efficiency reports said that they were the "most outstanding" officers we had ever seen.

Q: Did you get involved in planning military operations?

CROSS: Yes, I did. We had the use of the military staff; I had a personal aide, a Marine first lieutenant. We could use the staff in any way we wanted; we had our own staff, which worked with the Vietnamese units in the provinces. So if we heard of a major operation that they wanted to conduct - search and destroy or to meet a potential attack from a North Vietnamese force - we would steer them away from areas where large numbers of refugees might be created by the military action. This helped both us and them.

When I was in Danang I had my own staff coordinating with military staffs so that we could support the efforts of the Marines.

Q: I think that one of our problems was that people served in their jobs for such a short time that by the time they began to become familiar with their responsibilities, it was almost time to leave. I remember being chairman of a civilian board with responsibilities similar to those of a court martial for civilians who worked in the black market or other civilian violations. I was the institutional memory having been in Saigon for nine months or so.

CROSS: The problem was not that acute for the CORDS people; they stayed longer. Furthermore, many were true experts. We had people from the Department of Agriculture who knew their stuff and had also served overseas before. They were able to assist in increasing rice production in the provinces. They established an immediate and close rapport with the Vietnamese farmers. It helped that many of the civilians were accustomed to working with foreigners, which the military was not. We advised the military on various approaches that might be made to the Vietnamese civilian society. I did, but rarely, with Cushman, the Marine commander, who had a fine touch in any case.

Q: How effective were the “popular forces” that defended the hamlets?

CROSS: They were the key to any successes. They were tremendously helpful if they were strong and “popular” - in the sense that they were from the village or hamlet - ones that wouldn’t just surrender at the first sight of a VC. We had a lot of great “popular forces.” Some were completely wiped out because the South Vietnamese forces didn’t respond on a timely basis. The Marines developed CAPS (Combined Action Platoons); they were a group a little larger than a regular squad. The leader knew the rules of engagement. They used to live in a hamlet and made friends; they protected the hamlet, trained the “popular forces” and teamed up with them. Then we had a Marine Reaction Force which was ready to support the CAPS if any gunfire began. That was a good set-up. The CAPS did a lot of good work; they played with the kids, taught them something, helped with minor construction. It was a well-conceived program. The CAPS stayed until the area had been secured.

I learned a lot about being a general because that was the level at which I operated and I had an aide and a cook, etc. I don’t think the military ever leveled with us. I got a lot of cooperation because I had been a Marine myself, but I got the straight army attitude as well. At the high level, there was a strong feeling of competition and concern for professional reputation. I don’t think that the military in general had a very high opinion of us civilians. They never showed any sign of being discourteous. They would sometimes tell me that they couldn’t do something or other; then the chief of staff would be called and he would have to take on the burden of being negative, if that was the way it had to be. That was a game they played - a very intricate game.

I must say that we in the pacification program were not very admiring of Westmoreland. Bob Komer was the father of CORDS. He had the right idea, but unfortunately the wrong personality. He was a difficult and mean guy, although I never had any problems with him. So Komer had trouble getting along, which Bill Colby did not. When General Abrams succeeded Westmoreland and with Colby in Saigon, we probably had the best military-civilian leadership team. The top team was very good. I wanted to get home to see my family; had I stayed, I think I would have been part of a major success which I think really started in 1970-71.

Q: When I was in Saigon from 1969 to 1970, I thought that progress was being made.

CROSS: I think that somewhere along the line the opposition to the war came to a head and Congress just abandoned the war effort. I have made the following point in my book - it is also very fundamental to military analysis of the war: we did not lose the war; in fact we were more than holding our own. We left Vietnam because our democratic system had elected officials who forced us to withdraw due to the strong national feelings. Therefore, the military reasoned that despite the very high stakes that our leaders had set in Vietnam, despite all the casualties, despite that we were not losing, we left. That taught the military a lesson, I think, and that was that wars like Vietnam would not have any domestic support; a military action had to have a clear beginning and a clear ending when the pre-stated objectives had been met. They believed that in this world, our military should be engaged only to protect U.S. national interests and not to advance American interests. I think that is the national consensus.

I want to mention one more thing about Vietnam. I was there during the My Lai massacre, but I didn't hear of it until I went to Singapore years later. Seymour Hersh had his story published all over the world: I was sick to my stomach when I heard about it because that hamlet was in the I Corps area. It had happened three weeks after I had taken over; I was asked to testify about this incident by a commission chaired by General Peers. But I couldn't return to Washington at the time and therefore submitted a deposition instead. I had to admit that I didn't know about the incident. Under normal circumstances, the system required that I be informed whenever any civilians were killed as result of American action. Normally, I would have heard about it through Vietnamese-CORDS channels, but in this case, I didn't hear a word. So in my deposition, I pointed the finger at several officers including the deputy province advisor who was the deputy to Jim May. That deputy just didn't pass the word up the command because he didn't want the battalion commander in trouble. The whole episode was a big disgrace. General Koster, who was the senior officer in the Corps area, was sent to West Point as commandant not long after the massacre. He was not what I consider to be a figure to be emulated; I wouldn't have left the education of young officers in his hands.

Q: What about the Montagnards in your area?

CROSS: I didn't have very much to do with them. They were in the Khe Sanh area. I think that they were essentially cheated by us; we used them too often and had them do too much. The overall Special Forces commander was an officer who was a classmate at the War College. He was a good guy, but I think they pushed those people too far.

Q: What was your impression of CIA's work in your area?

CROSS: The CIA was an integral part of our efforts. They ran the Revolutionary Development teams. The guys I worked with were first class. The senior advisor in a town just south of Danang was a CIA officer who previously had been in Mexico. He was so good that I selected him to be my deputy. He did a fantastic job. CIA had some rough types among its staff, particularly in the PRUs (Provincial Reconnaissance Units). They were doing some things they weren't supposed to do. Some of the PRU advisers were regular U.S. Army officers, some were New Zealanders and Australians. I used to worry about PRU activities because they could arrest or assassinate people and in general act outside the rules we had laid down, although I think our advisers were basically well-disciplined. The PRUs were Vietnamese operating against Vietnamese.

The Phoenix program was long overdue. It didn't really get started because the U.S. army and CIA couldn't get their acts together. It took several years even to get a program designed. We finally assigned U.S. military advisors to South Vietnam units, but the program really didn't get started until after I left and Bill Colby got control of it. Ted Shackley, the Saigon CIA chief, didn't particularly want CIA to be involved; he didn't think it was an appropriate role for agency officers.

Q: The problem as I understood it was in identifying the target and then "taking him out."

Wasn't there something akin going on while you were in Danang?

CROSS: Of course; the PRUs were doing this all the time. We had control of them - theoretically - their operations were supposed to be approved by the provincial senior advisor - or sometimes by the district advisor. They would pick a target, but sometimes their intelligence about an individual was not entirely accurate.

Q: The Vietnamese general in the I Corps area was General Hoang Xuan Lam. I have heard stories that he may not have been entirely forthright. Was that true?

CROSS: He was considered to be more honest than his subordinate with the 2nd Division. He was not a soldier at the same level as General Troung, who was the 1st Division commander and was considered to be an outstanding officer who would have been so considered in any military organization. Lam was more political; he was considered to be a Thieu supporter from the beginning. When Thieu became president, Lam rose from a lieutenant colonel to a lieutenant general almost overnight.

There was no indication that Lam was stealing warehouses full of stuff. His misdemeanors were pettier than that. He was not always quick to remove commanders and province chiefs who were known to be on the take. That was our major problem with Lam. I never saw any real proof of his profiteering. We had a lot of information about some of the province chiefs, but they all had been replaced by the time I left Vietnam. They used to play poker with each other; that was the way they paid each other off.

Q: What about the Buddhists in the area? At one point, they had been a big thorn in our side.

CROSS: They were centered in Hue. I think they really were trouble in the early 1960s, but by the time I got there, they had been pretty much brought under control, although we used to watch them warily, because as Buddhists, they really had no philosophical attachment to either side.

Q: Did Thieu interfere with our operations in the I Corps area?

CROSS: As I said, General Lam was his guy. Troung got along with Thieu because he was such a good soldier and we kept telling Thieu that. General Ky came often. He didn't trust us Americans very much. One time, Cushman and I were invited to have lunch with Ky and three or four Vietnamese generals and a couple of Vietnamese civilians. We were the only Americans. They talked Vietnamese most of the time among themselves; every once in a while, they would address a question to us in English. At the end, they all stopped talking and Ky said, "We believe that the United States will leave us. What do you have to say to that?" Cushman denied it; he said he thought that we were too deeply involved to withdraw. Ky argued that we would not stay until the end. I said that I thought we would stay as long as it appeared that the South Vietnamese seemed serious about their war efforts. That ended the conversation. I didn't report it because our embassy in Saigon hated to hear that kind of view.

Q: Did you notice any kinds of disaffection among our military?

CROSS: There were many officers at my level who criticized the way the war was being fought. At the junior level, there were quite a few who were outspokenly against the war; most had been ROTC graduates who were sent to Vietnam for their tour of duty. But in my area, I thought the command handled them quite cleverly. The young officers were told that they would be in Vietnam for a year and therefore might as well spend the time profitably. It was suggested that they seek employment with CORDS where they could help the Vietnamese directly. Many of them did that and when their tour was up, went home feeling that they had had a positive experience.

TIMOTHY MICHAEL CARNEY
Rotation Officer
Saigon (1967-1969)

Ambassador Timothy Michael Carney was born in Missouri in 1944 and graduated from MIT in 1966. Carney studied abroad in France for a year before joining the Foreign Service. In the Foreign Service Carney served abroad in Vietnam, Lesotho, Cambodia, Thailand, South Africa, Sudan, Indonesia, and as ambassador to Sudan and Haiti. Ambassador Carney also spent time working with the Cox Foundation, USUN and the NSC. Carney was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: How many of your class went to Vietnam?

CARNEY: It was about 12. But most were assigned to the CORDS program via language training. They learned Vietnamese. I was upgraded in French.

Q: So you were sent to the embassy in Saigon?

CARNEY: That's right.

Q: You served there from when to when?

CARNEY: November of '67 until June of '69.

Q: What were you doing at the embassy?

CARNEY: I did two things. I was a rotational junior officer. My first rotation was in the political section which was fascinating and confirmed that that was the kind of work I wanted to do. I wound up doing the airgram on the biography of the newly elected Vietnamese parliament, and then following youth and student affairs.

Q: Who was the ambassador and how was the political section structured?

CARNEY: There were 80-plus people on the diplomatic list in Saigon at the head of which was Ellsworth Bunker, and at the bottom of which was Timothy Carney. I felt like an FSO-9. In fact, the first time I met Bunker was in the elevator, which I was reluctant to board while he was in it. He just said, "Come on in." The political section had 22 or 23 "real" officers in it and a large number of Agency people in what was totally nominal cover.

Q: They were their own section, weren't they?

CARNEY: They were all over the town. There were a lot of Agency people there.

The head of the section was Tom Recknagle with Ted Heavner as his deputy and then Galen Stone replaced Tom. There was an external unit and there was a political-military unit and there was an internal unit and, also, a provincial reporting unit. That last was an innovation for Vietnam which had a number of officers with good language skills. I would have been part of the internal unit doing my biography.

Q: What was your impression of the national assembly's caliber, of the people in it and its effectiveness?

CARNEY: I didn't have much feel for it from the biographies I was doing. I have never been brilliant at understanding things from reading about them. It was only when I started to meet members of the Senate and the Assembly that I realized what an inadequate group it was for South Vietnam to be dealing with the threat from the North.

Q: How did you go about doing this? Where were you getting your information?

CARNEY: Files, and talking to my colleagues, and running pieces of paper through them and that sort of thing. Then, of course, I began to develop my own contacts, including teaching English to a Vietnamese Senator. More valuable to understand what was going on was my work in the area of youth and student affairs.

It was in that latter area that I came in contact with General Lansdale's staff. He had a peculiar and not very influential role at that time, in contrast to his days in the 50s in the Philippines and in Vietnam. His young staffer working on student matters was Charlie Sweet.

Q: Did you find your French useful?

CARNEY: Not until I moved from the political section to the commercial section. Then it was vital. You just had to have it.

Q: You arrived there in November of '67. What was the situation like?

CARNEY: The feeling was things were moving. There seemed to be a congealing of South Vietnamese authority, and a growing capability and competence. I was in no position to challenge that. All the information I was seeing seemed to support it up until the Tet offensive.

Q: We move to January/February of '68. Where were you?

CARNEY: I had gone to bed at the hotel. There was such a lack of housing, I was in a hotel from November until I got an apartment in April of '68. I shared that apartment with another political officer. I had gone to my Vietnamese teacher's house for a Tet party and had drunk entirely too much. Exceptionally, fireworks were permitted for the Tet celebrations. I woke up in the morning to an enormous amount of fireworks and got back to sleep and then got a call from the embassy saying, "Don't come into work."

Q: What hotel were you in?

CARNEY: The New Saigon Hotel, which was just past the palace and the Cercle Sportif.

Q: It wasn't a short distance to the embassy. It wasn't right around the corner.

CARNEY: No, it wasn't. Normally we took a bus or a shuttle.

Q: What was happening in the hotel?

CARNEY: Well, it was full of mainly USAID people due to the circumstances of my arrival and who I got hooked up with for the initial housing assignment. We were basically on the roof of the hotel looking at what was going on around town – air strikes and firefights. A helicopter crashed on the roof of the COMNAVFORCV headquarters about 3 blocks away. Bullets would go overhead, sounding just like they do in the movies. Interesting stuff.

Q: Did you feel this was what you had been paid to do as a diplomat?

CARNEY: I knew it. There wasn't any doubt. I had no doubt that any amateur status had been revoked. I was always astonished when my colleagues didn't seem to grasp that in later years.

Q: Did you have any weapons?

CARNEY: I arrived with a .32 automatic that I had bought at Interarmco in Alexandria, but only recall actually wearing it two or three times in the 18 month tour. I had been on the freshman pistol team at the university, had hunted and shot birds using a shotgun... I had respect for firearms, but certainly wasn't afraid of them.

Q: Did the Viet Cong come close to your hotel?

CARNEY: They were on the grounds of the nearby Presidential Palace or on the grounds of a hotel on the other side of the Presidential Palace, but we're talking 6 or 8 blocks.

Q: When were you able to get back to the embassy?

CARNEY: Two days later. I went up and found the windows all awry in the office. The rocket propelled grenades that had hit the embassy's attractive outer shell, which was in fact a blast screen, had caused enough pressure to wrench the window frames out of the building wall. There was a fellow in full body armor and helmet with an M-16 sitting in my office from the 101st Airborne Division. Those people were withdrawn within a day or two.

Q: Was there a feeling that the attack on the embassy was a bad thing, that it had been stopped?

CARNEY: The feeling was, it was brilliantly conceived by the Viet Cong - it was a Viet Cong operation. The NVA clearly wasn't involved – that they had done their best, and it wasn't good enough, that we had responded to the surprise with a successful defense, but that the effect in the United States was clearly what the Vietnamese communists had intended.

Q: Were you getting any feel for how this was playing in the United States?

CARNEY: We would see TV and newspapers. There was no lack of information on how America was looking at it.

Q: Was there a feeling that the media was the problem or part of the problem?

CARNEY: There was a feeling in that way which I didn't know enough to share, and wasn't going to take without knowing more about it. I met a number of journalists there, some of whom I came to know, and am in contact with to this day. It was clearly an odd time. I was a little puzzled as to why we didn't know more about what the Viet Cong were up to, considering how many people there were from the various intelligence agencies – NSA, CIA, DIA - all over the town of Saigon and upcountry as well.

Q: Did the embassy seem to be either in disarray or functioning or puzzled?

CARNEY: It was more or less business as usual – carry on, let's focus on what we're doing. Arch Calhoun was Minister for Political Affairs there, to be replaced by Martin Herz. (I don't remember when Martin Herz came in.) I only felt it at the time... This is analytical, and I only felt it at the time by its absence: There is no leadership in the Foreign Service. Foreign Service officers, most of them, do not know how to lead even if they have the basic talent for leading. This was very conspicuous by its absence. People were more or less left to cope.

Q: I think this is a failing but it's an attitude... Everyone does their job.

CARNEY: Exactly.

Q: You're lead by indirection. "It would be nice to have somebody do something about such and such" and then you're somebody who's supposed to go out and do that.

Was your bailiwick still the national assembly?

CARNEY: I moved to youth and student affairs.

Q: Were the students pretty quiet during this period?

CARNEY: I'm not sure I can remember. I was talking with student leaders. The Vietnamese in general were very good at manipulating students through their leaders. The leaders were very good at grasping when they were being manipulated and allowing themselves to be manipulated to the point that they could get their own agenda satisfied as well. The leaders that I dealt with were very smart, well connected across a range of political fronts, very active, but I didn't see what they were doing that would be effective, nor did I see what their ultimate goals were. One of those leaders ultimately made his way to the U.S. as a refugee and got in touch with me, having changed his name to Freeman to celebrate his escape from Vietnam.

Q: I noted that students were sort of against things and protesting but it was pretty hard to come to say "Let's make peace with the communists."

CARNEY: Exactly, especially after the Tet offensive.

Q: What was the attitude you were getting about how the Thieu government responded to the offensive and where it was going?

CARNEY: Bunker shortly, at Washington's urging, began a set of conversations with Thieu himself, as I recall, that Steve Johnson, who was in the political section external unit then, essentially went along as notetaker for, and wrote up the cables. This was all focused on "What do we ultimately do? How do we engage in negotiations?" It was leading up to the Paris meetings.

Q: How did you see yourself in this? Did you want to get out in the field? Was Vietnamese such a prerequisite that this was sort of...

CARNEY: Vietnamese was an absolute prerequisite. It was my introduction to that and made me understand that I couldn't be a political officer unless I had at least one of the languages of whatever country I might be in. In any case, the rotation that was coming up was into the commercial section. That was after the May offensive in '68. I went to the commercial section.

Q: You were doing that from May of '68 to when?

CARNEY: June of '68 to April or May of '69. Then I went to do a protocol related job for the ambassador's office.

Q: Let's talk about the commercial section. Who was your boss?

CARNEY: The boss was Richard C. "Dick" Devine. Above him was Bill Sharpe, an AID official. The commercial section was under the joint economic section, State and others. I can remember wondering if I was in good hands because one of the last things I did as political officer, was to be at a meeting of a delegation, possibly a Congressional Delegation, with the economic counselor at which there was talk about what all of Southeast Asia was doing. There was nothing coming back to the visitors, and I interjected, "Well, this all might be related as part of the way that this new Association of Southeast Asian Nations develops." ASEAN was founded in '67 or '68. The economic counselor didn't seem to have heard of it and didn't know anything about it. A little alarm bell went off in my head.

Q: Let's talk about commercial life at that time. In the middle of the war, one doesn't think about a commercial officer.

CARNEY: Well, this was deliberate. There was a commodity import program, a CIP program, and a major effort to get business going between American suppliers and Vietnamese buyers using U.S. government money to help fund all of this. That was the period when the Department of Commerce still did the World Trade Directory Report, the WTDR. I got actively involved in that. We were also working with the Vietnamese Directorate of Foreign Trade. Dick Devine's only rating comment that rests in my mind was that I was able to measurably improve relations with the Vietnamese official who was the director for foreign trade because I could speak French with him – in other words, wasn't insisting that he use his non-existent English or a translator. I can't remember any specific thing.

Q: Sometimes when you get two systems coming up against each other – the American commercial system and the Vietnamese commercial system, which I suppose is probably a mixture of French and Chinese bureaucracy – were we having a lot of trouble with trade disputes?

CARNEY: Relatively little, but there were lots of issues about corruption and corrupt practices and bribing officials. The commercial office also had as one of its other functions monitoring excess property sales from the military. That was a very difficult thing to do. There was a huge amount of scrap brass being generated – lots of scrap metal from vehicles that weren't maintained well or had battle damage. There were several Vietnamese firms that were dealing in melting down scrap. Very complicated set of inspections and investigations and that sort of thing.

Q: At that time we didn't have a federal law against anti-bribery, did we?

CARNEY: Not to the best of my recollection.

Q: It came later. Were the French in there using their...

CARNEY: I do not recall any specific detail of French embassy/French government commercial action. Their embassy was still in Hanoi and they had a consulate general in Saigon. I think they were much more political than they were commercial and just simply let longtime business contacts between France and Vietnam carry the trade side. I could be mistaken.

Q: Were the Chinese dominant in trade?

CARNEY: The commercial market part of Saigon, Cholon, actually means "Big Market." There was an enormous Sino-Vietnamese community, but it was Sino-Vietnamese, which is a bit more congenial than the Chinese community in Cambodia proved to be.

Q: Was there a solid commercial life at that point?

CARNEY: Very solid. Very active. Everything from importing Mercedes Benz to the sale of scrap steel and imports of textiles and cloth and cotton. Lively market activity. Electronics. Tools. Machinery. Various parts and bits and pieces for repairing their tools and machinery and consumer goods.

Q: You mentioned corruption. Were we trying to root out corruption?

CARNEY: We were more interested in where it applied to political matters – who was buying whom, who was renting whom, and what the quid pro quo was. I do remember being waved off corruption stories in the political section partly because of lack of evidence and partly because of a philosophical belief that we couldn't totally impose our standards on other cultures.

Q: Also there was the thing that comes up again and again that if there is what we call corruption, if reports go back to Washington, they get leaked and they give ammunition to the enemies of doing anything with X country. So, you can report it once, but if you continue to report it, it isn't helping at all.

CARNEY: The most complicated and difficult intersection of this problem was with our allies, the Filipinos, the Koreans in II CORPS, enormous problems of corruption, and the Thais, of course. Whenever the commissary would get a shipment of tape decks in, you would see these three elements with their people there all with the proper amount of MPC (military payment certificates in lieu of green dollars) and their ration cards in hand to buy out 200 units that would ultimately be sold to the black market.

Q: I remember watching Thai contingents marching in and all buying things they obviously needed like shampoo and feminine products and the like, all getting exactly the same thing and then coming out and piling into a truck while the provost marshal got red in the face watching this. There wasn't much you could do about it.

CARNEY: Exactly.

Q: It was very difficult. Was there talk of saying, "Well, we're trying to get goods in like this to help absorb the excess money so it doesn't move into inflation?"

CARNEY: I only remember that from my Cambodian days.

Q: I remember hearing this at one time.

In '69, you moved over to protocol?

CARNEY: Briefly, yes, and the only thing I can remember doing in that was counting up the number of general and flag officers of the United States in Vietnam, which had reached 107 for 500,000 troops.

Q: What was your impression of the leadership of Ambassador Bunker?

CARNEY: I didn't really have an impression of him. He was far too remote for me to get much of an impression. I am going to be interested to see the biography that Howard Schaffer is now doing.

Q: As far from being in Vietnam, did you belong to what might be called a coterie of junior officers there? Were you getting together with them?

CARNEY: Yes, a number of us hung out together. I used to play a lot of bridge with some of them as well. Then there was a very active social life within the younger people of various embassies and some Vietnamese as well. But there was much less of that and I had much less time for it. Certainly after the Tet offensive, things got intensively busy.

Q: Could you discern a divide that often happens when we've got a controversial policy of the junior officers wanting to get out and change the world and the more senior officers wanting to keep things the way they are?

CARNEY: No, I didn't see anything like that. The junior officers got engaged with Vietnam as Vietnam is, especially the language officers. They developed a deep interest and affection for the country as a country apart from the issues of war and policy. We generally recognized that what we were doing was not going to effect the independence of South Vietnam. We didn't know how to do it any better except that there were clearly some things - our relations with the Saigon government, our approach to enhancing the capabilities of the South Vietnamese army - that just simply weren't being properly addressed until General Creighton Abrams became MACV Commander and started to work on it after Westmoreland's unlamented departure. Those issues of how do you get Thieu and his government to govern seriously? How do you make the South Vietnamese armed forces capable? And what to do about corruption, not only of South Vietnamese entities, but also among our allies and elements within ourselves? Those three were touched on heavily. There was some discussion of the Phoenix Program, but it was more on whether it was succeeding rather than the morality of it or whether it was right.

Q: This was the elimination of the Viet Cong infrastructure using polite terms.

CARNEY: Assassination.

Q: How about the CIA? Did the CIA junior officers mix?

CARNEY: I knew one fairly well who was there under an alias as I subsequently discovered when we ran across each other elsewhere in the world. He seemed to be okay but no great shakes. That realization persisted throughout my career.

Q: Did you develop a group of people who went through the Vietnam experience who stayed with you and you kept in contact with? Was there a distinct group?

CARNEY: Not really. What I found was, people who had that experience over the years generally had better judgment on what was possible to do diplomatically, and indeed with the entire quiver of our foreign policy tools. People who didn't have the judgment notably include mainly people engaged in the Middle East, because so few people with that specialty ever went to Vietnam, plus they had their political masters here in Washington, the Israeli lobby breathing down the necks of whatever they might report or try to recommend... Basically the Vietnam hands in my experience just seemed to have their head better screwed on their shoulders.

CARNEY: June of '69.

LARRY COLBERT
CORDS Refugee Advisor, USAID
Da Nang (1967-1969)

Mr. Colbert was born in Ohio in 1940. He attended the Universities of Ohio and Missouri. After a tour in Turkey with the Peace Corps and a year as an assistant on Capital Hill, he entered the Foreign Service and was sent to Vietnam as Regional Advisor. His subsequent postings, where he served as Consular Officer include: Ankara, Turkey, Oran, Algeria, Dublin, Ireland and Manila, Philippines. At Tijuana, Mexico, Madrid, Spain, Ciudad Juarez, Mexico and Paris, France Mr. Colbert served as Consul General. Mr. Colbert was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November, 2006.

Q: How did you find the training?

COLBERT: For Vietnam?

Q: For Vietnam.

COLBERT: Probably better than the training for Diplomacy 101.

Q: When you were told you were going to CORDS what did they tell you you would do?

COLBERT: That's interesting. I knew I was going to Vietnam but Senator Ted Kennedy announced he was going to have hearings on the terrible plight of the refugees. The White House announced that they had sent refugee experts over to fix that problem and then they told six of us that we were going over. Then they said we had left and then we left. I arrived - I couldn't take any leave but must get right there, and I reported to the embassy who told me I belonged to AID (Agency for International Development), which I knew, and then I went to AID and they didn't know what to do with me. They sent me to CORDS, which had been just created.

So every day for about two weeks I would get up from my hotel I was staying in and report to CORDS and say, "What do you got for me?" Well they didn't know I was coming, they didn't know what to do with me, they didn't know they were getting any refugee experts of which I was theoretically one. So after a while they just got sick of seeing me, and I came in after several days of saying, "Well, I'm here" and they said, "Would you go to Quang Ngai?" I said, "What's that?" They said, "It's a province." I said, "Sure, I would go to Quang Ngai." So the next day I am on a DC-3 Dakota which had a bronze plate noting its construction date of 1938, so the plane was older than me, flying me via various in sundry stops to Da Nang.

Q: Air America.

COLBERT: Air America, exactly. The plane had all kinds of mechanical problems with several mechanical issues en route, but we finally arrived in Da Nang which was I Corps headquarters for CORDS and I got a briefing there. They then sent me off to be a refugee advisor in the province of Quang Ngai.

Q: Where is Quang Ngai located, vis-à-vis Da Nang?

COLBERT: It is south and west of Da Nang. It's between Da Nang and Cambodia and Laos.

Q: In the first place how did just when you hit Saigon how did it strike you?

COLBERT: Saigon? Apart from the noisy street generators and the ubiquitous military running around it was a lovely city. No, Saigon was a very nice place. But Saigon for me was a place that I rarely went to. I was there for maybe a week, ten days while they finally figured out what to do with me. Then I flew to Da Nang. I didn't even go in the Bunker's bunker, the new embassy. I was only in it once and that was when I was leaving. We in CORDS really weren't part of the State Department in the traditional sense. I lived in blue jeans and black pajama tops and combat boots. I think if I have a strong prejudice it's of the people who came up from Saigon embassy political section wearing their Abercrombie Finch outfits and their soft leather briefcases and flew in on Air America at 9:30 in the morning to find out what was going on but made sure they were on the 3:30 flight out. Although they were reporting that it was safe, they sure as hell wouldn't spend the night with us.

Q: Yeah. When...

COLBERT: Pardon me, that is a little bit of prejudice but...

Q: Well no, no I mean I think that's the normal prejudice. I mean it was the suits from the big city you are telling me.

COLBERT: They knew everything but they didn't know anything.

Q: Yeah. You were in Quang Ngai from when to when?

COLBERT: I was there for eighteen months from you know I can't remember exactly. I know maybe from November of '67 until whatever eighteen months would be. I know that after eighteen months having buried a few people doing what I was doing and having lived barely through the Tet Offensive because my town was overrun, people doing what I was doing in Da Nang were executed, I got a cable from my personnel person in the State Department saying that they had agreed that since I had done my eighteen months in up-country I can have my choice of assignments and they would give me a refresher Turkish course and send me to Turkey as a political officer. But the language class wasn't set to start so they had decided to just extend me in Vietnam for six months.

Q: Oh how nice.

COLBERT: I sent back, "I don't want to be extended in Vietnam for six months. I've come here for eighteen months, I'm out of here." They said, "Well, you know we don't really have anything for you, you'll have to go on leave without pay." I thought to myself, hmmm, I've been shot at, I've been spat at, I've been flying around in helicopters, this person in Washington is not going to play this game with me. So I went back and said, "Fine, I'll go on leave without pay, but I've consulted my attorney about whether you can do this to a person." I didn't have an attorney.

Q: No.

COLBERT: In the meantime I was newly married and I thought well I've been in Vietnam for eighteen months. I've accumulated lots and lots of money; I was working for AID, and they paid me overtime. I was working seven days a week, fourteen, fifteen hours a day and being mortared and shelled at night, so I was not in a mood to be trifled with. I figured well we'd just go on a six-month holiday, or my wife can go back to her job in the Library of Congress. I don't have to work for six months; clearly I didn't have to work for six months. So I said, "Not acceptable." Well they blinked and they sent me back to the Vietnam training center to train other people for six months, which was probably a good thing.

Q: Well let's talk about Quang Ngai.

COLBERT: OK.

Q: In the first place when you got there this is getting close to a rather crucial time but when you got there what were you supposed to be doing?

COLBERT: Nobody had a clue. Somebody decided they could send me to Quang Ngai. I arrived in Quang Ngai along with another Foreign Service officer who was going to do the same thing so we were both assigned as assistants or deputies to a retired Navy warrant officer who was advisor to the provincial social welfare minister. This person was in charge of orphanages and poor people and handicapped, sort of he was the social welfare minister. He had his cadre of people who worked for him around the province and in the capital of Quang Ngai city. My boss, this warrant officer, was supposed to advise him. He was terrified of leaving the city, this little town...

Q: This is Tape 2, Side 1, with Larry Colbert. Yeah.

COLBERT: I was saying that I was assigned to work for this Navy warrant officer who got up in the morning and went to the U.S. mini-compound on the ARVIN (South Vietnamese) division compound and had western style breakfast and then came and sat at his desk. He then went up by his vehicle to have lunch at the military compound and came back and then went there and had dinner and a drink and then went to bed. He never left his office. He didn't speak Vietnamese, he didn't speak French, and all he would do would be to ask for statistics from Vietnamese counterpart that had been requested by U S officials in Saigon. He would go with his interpreter and get the statistics from the person he was supposed to be advising and go back to his office.

He didn't know what to do with us and we were young and active. We wanted to do things, but he was really, really very cautious. We were young and foolish and wanted to do things. His tour was up and my fellow junior JO had gotten to know a district senior advisor, that's to say a major who was in charge of a small cadre of American military in a district outpost south of Quang Ngai so he went down there to be the civilian person there. I thought I wanted to do that at the time also at another district compound but I think it was a little nuts. Probably had I gotten the chance I would have done it then but later on I would probably not done so. But he went down there and I became the advisor and I had French so I could communicate with the Vietnamese official. Once I understood what an effective role should be, I became basically his pimp, not pimp in the traditional sense. I thought that there was very little advice I could give this man who was 45-50 years old who was a University graduate and Vietnamese and a professional welfare person - this from this 26 or 27 year old kid from another culture! So my solution was OK tell me what you need and I will get it for you. You want typewriters? I will get you typewriters. Do you want transportation? I will get you transportation. Whatever you want I can acquire. So I basically then saw myself as a facilitator. I did things which were quasi-legal but all for the good of our national interest. Nothing stuck to my fingers, I was given a black box full of local currency and each month I could use the black box to solve problems. The only question was no receipts. The people, the American officials who gave me this black box of money, wanted problems solved and the only time I got in trouble was one month when I didn't spend the money. So I basically was this Vietnamese official's conduit to the things he needed to help people. If it had been the mafia I would have been the person over whispering in the don's ear and making things happen.

The Vietnamese official was a really fine person; I think he was one of the most outstanding civil servants I've ever met. He had an impossible job. I remember once early on I went with him to visit an orphanage. I had a gun and I walked into this orphanage and I felt like such an ass. From then on I never carried a gun anywhere I went although there were guns all around me, and we certainly had guns in our compound. I just felt that I was doing such a welfare work promoting developing, and I didn't think that I should have a gun, so I traveled with him everywhere without one. And given my aptitude with weapons it is more likely I would have shot myself than anything else. He was a good person.

My big boss on the other hand, my first boss was a total idiot. He was an FSO-1, which at that point in my life as an FSO-7, which I was, put this person as close to God as one could get. He was the province senior advisor and was totally consumed with Vietnam. He spent most of his recent life, or most of his career in Vietnam. He had been in Quang Ngai forever. He was just - well it' hard to describe this person. I will tell you a story, which will probably help explain. I remember going once to a staff meeting where he asked me "Have you distributed the blankets that came in for the refugees?" I said, "Blankets?" He said, "The blankets in the warehouse. Why haven't they gone out?" So I get in my little International Scout "jeep" and drive out to the warehouse, which is managed by a great AID person who was a retired military sergeant who had been in supply who was subsequently murdered in his bed Quang Ngai by the VC while I was still there stationed there. I said, "George, where are these thousand blankets?" He shows me the warehouse and it is empty. No bulgur wheat, no oil, no nada (nothing). He said, "What blankets?" "Well Jim says there are blankets here." He said, "We haven't had any blankets since before you came a year ago." I said, "I didn't hear of any blankets here either. I'm in charge of social welfare; if there were blankets I would know. I know when you get..." "No, no, no blankets." I go back the next day, "Have you distributed the blankets yet?" I said, "Not yet." I go back to see George and I said, "George what is it?" I ask. George, "Just tell him you did it." At the next staff meeting, "What about the blankets?" I said, "Oh we passed them out." "Oh good." So the report went back to Washington that we passed out a thousand blankets, there were no thousand blankets but you couldn't tell him because he wouldn't believe it. Though on another occasion, after a terrible flood (this is after George's murder, I tried directly from Saigon to get blankets and was told there were none in country. I conferred with my Vietnamese counterpart who told me how urgently the blankets were needed. I then phoned AID in Saigon and asked for talking points for the US network reporters who were coming to cover the flood victims and noted just in passing that the victims were likely to ask about blanket. We got several thousand the next week, and for the record, I lied about the reporters.

The first month or so we were there, we learned the State inspectors were coming, Foreign Service inspectors. So Paul Barbari and I, (he was the other young JO who was working there) get invited to the Province Senior Advisor Jim May's house for dinner which we were told was in honor of the inspectors. May had a Vietnamese live-in mistress who I really thought was a wonderful lady. We arrived and he gives us little white coats. We are to serve the meal and certainly not meant to sit at the table,

Q: Jeeze.

COLBERT: So we do, I mean what do we know, I mean we were mad as hell. We thought we were invited to dinner, but we were invited to work. So the inspectors say, "Well, what are you doing?" I said, "We are here serving you dinner." They thought that was quite interesting. Luckily they wrote it up.

But he got in big trouble because of My Lai. He knew about My Lai and My Lai took place in Quang Ngai.

Q: This was a massacre by American troops.

COLBERT: A military unit had gone into a village and shot a lot of people. Lieutenant Calley was the officer in charge of the unit.

Q: Lieutenant Calley.

COLBERT: Well I was there when My Lai occurred. I had been on the Batanga Peninsula where it occurred, and I was on the Batanga peninsula after it occurred. People weren't very friendly to me, but I never understood why. I expected to be called and asked about it when the investigations began, because I was there, but I never was called. Luckily for me I didn't know anything about it, which on the one hand shows you how little I knew. On the other hand perhaps how much I should have known but I didn't know. But he certainly knew about it and covered it up.

Q: Who was that?

COLBERT: James May, Jim May. I mean the guy was certifiable. He was replaced by a much more competent person later on. Vietnam would probably fill up an entire just one tape.

Q: Well let's talk. I think the Vietnam experience is an important factor. Let's talk about Tet because it happened shortly after you arrived.

COLBERT: It did because I arrived and Tet occurred. I arrived in the fall, and Tet was on February 1. The weekend of Tet was a long holiday, and I had flown on Air America to Da Nang to see my buddies doing what I was doing. We all met in the Navy officers club in Da Nang, had dinner and flew back to our various and sundry posts. It was sort of like a busman's holiday for the weekend. The guy who was in Hue, a good buddy -everybody envied him because he had gotten Hue. Hue was a very sophisticated polished cultural city and the rest of us were in the boonies. During Tet, he was captured by the NVA (North Vietnamese Army) had his hands tied behind his back and executed in cold blood.

Q: They found him in a ditch.

COLBERT: Absolutely. Then you know.

Q: Who was this, this was...?

COLBERT: I can't remember his name but he was AID, a good guy. A friend of mine went back to Quang Nam and I went back to Quang Ngai. I got back to Quang Ngai and at some point maybe late afternoon, early evening, there was a feeling that something was going to happen. I know I was staying in Jim May's compound; the provincial senior advisor had a house with a wall around it, a big concrete wall and built into the wall were rooms, not apartments, rooms. I had a room; my room for my first year in Vietnam was smaller than this room by probably a third. It had a bed, a desk, a lamp and there was a bathroom down a little hallway and this was built inside of the wall. You went up some stairs and there were three rooms, not exactly luxury class accommodations, probably maybe 25,000 times worse than Motel 6. But, it also had a firing port with a screen.

Anyway Tet began and it was awesome. The three of us climbed up onto the roof of our little "apartment in the wall" and watched the firefight, because they were shooting over us. We all had small arms; I had a carbine, maybe two or three magazines and ammunition. Everybody had something like that; but nobody fired; because this was really between the big boys. These were rocket launchers, machine gun and this was the NVA regulars going at the Vietnamese Second Armored Division and the American military advisors on the compound. We were outside the compound; we were in the town. There were probably one, two three, four maybe five houses that had Americans living in them, maybe less. The Agency people, the Phoenix program were just down the street and then us and a couple others. So we, I don't know what the Phoenix people did during the fight but they had a lot more "toys," but we just sort of kept our heads down. It went on all night, and it was tremendous. You really were sitting in the middle of a storm of lead going in both directions, mortars, rockets and everything.

Then morning came, and the magic dragons came, puff the magic dragon. These were converted DC-3s with Gatling guns. Then the ARVIN pushed the NVA back to the edge of the city, where they stayed for a while and then they retreated further back. When it was over I think it's fair to say I could have walked from the May villa, basically just a small house with a wall around it, to the intersection which was probably 100 yards I could have just walked just on bodies of NVA and NVA that were in the streets dead without touching the pavement. I mean there were just bodies everywhere. We came out and it was all over; it was so quiet. You could smell cordite everywhere.

Every night we would back one vehicle against the metal gate. We had two metal gates that came together, and we backed the vehicle against them, so that a zapper (a person carrying satchel charge) couldn't blow the gate open. After some of weeks of agitation Paul and I had gotten our first vehicle. We had our own brand-new Scout International. The two of us that we could actually go to the refugee camps, we could go to the districts, and we could do other things – we were not tied to our office-bound warrant officer boss. We were mobile, and we were very happy. To keep our family jewels we had lined it with sandbags.

Q: Yeah.

COLBERT: So here we were standing in the yard along side our new Scout parked against the metal gate with the evening Tet battle over when there was this poof noise, and we were standing about as far away as your couch there...

Q: We are talking about 15 feet.

COLBERT: Thank you for helping because obviously the readers won't know, and a 16 mortar millimeter incoming went through the International Scout and blew up in the sandbags and showered sand on us. We didn't get a scratch, but that mortar missed us by 15 feet and if it hadn't gone into the sandbags it would have done some serious damage to us. So we then kept the jeep and we took the...the roof blew in very jaggedly and we pulled the jagged parts out and painted them red and labeled our Scout "The Flaming Asshole" We continued to use that Scout for the rest of the time. When it rained it was a little problematical, but it was great fun to pick up the visiting Cold War warriors from Saigon who came up. We always picked them up in that. When they came up to tell us how wonderful things were we always picked them up in that one because it had a great effect on the lower portions of their body – at least one part tightened up!

Q: What was it like getting around there?

COLBERT: If you are not going far you can go in a Scout. You can drive to Chu Lai, which was up the road maybe sixty miles. You can drive to the nearby districts. If you wanted to go to Mo Duc or Duc Fu, which were the far consular districts in the province you had to go by Air America helicopter or short take off and landing Air America plane. If you wanted to go to the highlands and there were four highland districts where the Montagnards were, then you flew by helicopter.

Q: Were you dealing with refugees the entire time? Was that...?

COLBERT: I was dealing with social welfare issues, getting and making sure that there was cooking oil and bulgur wheat and sheet metal or roofing material and concrete available for these people and to collect information from the Vietnamese to provide to the embassy people and vice versa. I think if there is any one example of how the system worked or didn't work - perhaps it is indicative of our current situation right now - I remember once I got an instruction from the embassy actually from CORDS telling me to, go my counterpart and tell him to do 'X'. So I make an appointment to see my counterpart and I say, "Mr. Le Dam the U.S. government thinks you should do 'X'." He say, "Well Larry you know 'X' is a good thing and I would agree with you 'X' would be a really good thing to do but my government telling me to do 'Y'. He said, "Now if you can get your people in Saigon to convince my people to tell me to do 'X' I will do 'X' but as long as my people are telling me to do 'Y' I will do 'Y'."

So I sent back a message saying that I went in and asked him to do 'X' and he said as I explained. I got this message back, "Don't tell us how to do our job, go back and tell him to do 'X'." What I'm really saying is they couldn't get the people in Saigon to do something, and they are telling me to get the people who work for Saigon to do it. Does that sound familiar to you somehow?

Q: Oh yes, yes. They said, "Well we told him to do it, and that takes care of it."

COLBERT: Yeah. They were saying no to us so you go tell him to do...I mean it was crazy.

Q: I think we probably ought to stop.

COLBERT: OK.

Q: But we will put here, we were talking about time in Quang Ngai, we've talked about your time in and put it on the tape so that we will pick it up during the Tet Offensive but afterwards we are talking about how you worked with your counterpart and where you've got. There are several questions that I would like to ask the next time. The problem of corruption and lack there of or how that played, the Montagnards did you see any discrepancy between the coastal dwellers and the Montagnards? Was there a resettlement program? How did you work with American military and I guess the ARVIN and maybe did the CIA have an...

COLBERT: An operation?

Q: An operation there.

COLBERT: Sure, I can answer all of those questions.

Q: Then I don't know was that the area where the Koreans were or not?

COLBERT: When I arrived Koreans were there and I can talk about that too.

Q: Yeah.

COLBERT: OK, sure.

Q: And anything else that and I take it did you meet your wife there?

COLBERT: No. We can talk about your wife but we would have to back up a bit to do that.

Q: Back up a bit.

COLBERT: I would like to talk about the flood too so we should make a mental note about the flood.

Q: OK, yeah.

COLBERT: OK?

Q: Yeah, very good.

Q: OK, today is the 9th of November 2006. Larry we've got a bunch of things. Well you say you want to back up a bit about your wife. Why don't you talk about where and how you met your wife and a little bit about her background?

COLBERT: Fine. My wife is Chinese; she came to the States I think in 1962-1963 one or the other I'm not quite sure, to do a masters program.

Q: She is from Taiwan I assume?

COLBERT: She grew up in Taiwan; she's from the mainland. Her father was a petroleum engineer who worked for the nationalist government and her mother was a teacher who was from a very prominent Beijing family. I think her grandfather was the police chief of Beijing at some point in the past, presumably way back. She's quite unique in the sense that she for a woman of her generation my mother-in-law I'm talking about now, had gone to a teachers school, learned English as a young woman and had unbound feet because she refused to have her feet bound. When her father was a widower and when he remarried the mother-in-law and the new bride and the daughter-in-law or the stepdaughter more accurately didn't get along so my mother-in-law to be ran away from home when she was 15 or 16 years old which is quite remarkable for a...you are talking very early twentieth century when this wasn't done in China. She actually went several streets down to her aunt's house, but she literally left the house and refused to go back. She also selected her own husband so this is...my wife's spirit obviously was earned and derived from her mother.

In any event, as I was saying earlier, my wife came here as a graduate student initially at the University of Oregon at Portland and then transferred to George Peabody College which now is part of Vanderbilt where she got a masters degree. She then had a series of short jobs moving up for more money and change I think from Pittsburgh Carnegie Library to Albany State Law Library. When I met her she had just started working at the Library of Congress in cataloging. I met her at an assignments party, that's to say in those ancient days when Foreign Service officers didn't know where they were going, new officers, but were simply told at the end of their basic training class she came with her apartment mate who was in my Foreign Service class, another young woman because that young woman's boyfriend was somewhere else so she brought her roommate. I met my wife at that point. I courted her while in French language training at the Vietnam Training Center. Since she was then a Green Card holder, that's to say a Permanent Resident Alien, not a citizen, I had to write two letters to Secretary Dean Rusk who of course didn't see them; one letter requesting permission to marry my future wife and another letter, which was a letter of resignation. The policy then was they either gave you permission or they didn't. If they gave you permission, they tore up your letter of resignation, hopefully, and kept your letter requesting permission to marry or conversely if you didn't get permission, they took your resignation on the assumption that you would choose wife over career, which I certainly would have done.

When I left for Vietnam permission had not come through so we didn't get married until maybe four months after Tet. Our plan had been to meet in Saigon and fly together to Taiwan to get married since my mother was long since deceased and her mother was still alive and weddings are really for mothers and for brides as opposed to grooms. In fact, her flight was cancelled in the West Coast because Ton Son Nhut airport in Saigon had been overrun and whatever American airline it was presumably Pan American couldn't land, and I, of course, was stuck in Quang Ngai ducking away from Viet Cong and NVA bullets. So we had to wait until that all quieted down.

Q: Well later we will return at some point to your wife to see did the Taiwan-China equation affect you at all and all that but anyway we will come back to that.

COLBERT: You want to come back to Vietnam now I think.

Q: Yes, let's go back to Vietnam. Why don't we start as I say how about corruption?

COLBERT: You know I didn't see it but then I wasn't really in a position to see it. I was in the province I think the big money was being made in Saigon. You heard stories about Americans who worked for AID selling things. I never saw that, you heard; well let me change that because actually I can give you a case of corruption, which I actually was involved in, that comes to mind. Not in the sense that I was corrupt.

We had sent some money to I think Tra Bong, one of the four Montagnards districts of Quang Ngai up on the Cambodian border and we learned somehow that this money had been extorted back by the army officer who ran the district. There was a Vietnamese captain in each district that was essentially the district governor. Somehow we in the provincial adviser that I worked in learned that this man had extorted the money back from the people who were supposed to get it, the victims or the people who were refugees or whatever. So I being a relatively minor player in this, very junior and being young and being the advisor to the Vietnamese refugee social welfare person, was sent by ARVIN helicopter, that's an old pot-bellied Korean War vintage helicopter - an old Marine helicopter with an Arvin crew. I was sent to this district to ask for or to get the money back. He knew I was coming; he had been told by the provincial ARVIN colonel who was the provincial governor that I was coming. So I went to his office and this Vietnamese captain had a humongous stack of piasters, the local currency. Visualize if you can a stack of money perhaps a foot wide and a foot deep, or maybe two feet wide and two feet deep, loose money which was turned over by him to me and then I had to get the money back to Quang Ngai city. I flew back to Quang Ngai city in a semi-open helicopter, that's to say it was a closed helicopter but not successfully closed, there were some drafts, sitting on all this loose money. Basically I sat on the money for about 30 minutes on this helicopter trip and then was met and we unloaded the money and took it back to province headquarters where I'm sure it disappeared again but in any case I did bring it back. So that was a case of corruption that I am aware of.

Speaking of corruption though I think it brings to mind another story, a true story. One day we came out of province headquarters in the center of town and there was this flashing in the air and it sort of sounded almost like lightening, or thunder. But in fact what it was a Chinook helicopter was carrying in a sling capacity underneath the helicopter big pallets of metal sheet roof that corrugated roofing that AID passed out. It had been improperly slung, or rigged or the rigging broke, so that it had tilted to one side at about a 45-degree angle and the roofing had started to come out at several thousand feet and it was going back. It would make a noise as it came out like a crack as it buckled and then it would flash from the tropic sunshine but it would come down...

Q: Sort of willy-nilly.

COLBERT: Willy-nilly, sort of cascading down flashing in the sun. It was quite impressive, perhaps ten or twenty-five, or thirty thousand dollars, maybe $100,000 worth of roofing cascading everywhere. I worked; my immediate boss was the deputy province senior adviser Colonel George Swearson, a wonderful man, a Marine. He said, "Larry, that's the only honest distribution of AID supplies I've seen since I've been here." I think maybe that was a good case of fair distribution because God decided or the winds at least decided where that sheeting landed. If it didn't slice you in half, you had some nice free sheeting.

Q: The Montagnards, you were on the border between the Montagnards and the Lowlanders weren't you?

COLBERT: I was in Quang Ngai city, Quang Ngai was divided into ten districts, six low land and four highlands. I don't know if I can come up with all the names now but there were four highland districts and I would occasionally go up there. At each highland district there was an "A" camp, a Special Forces camp and they were the advisors and the people who worked with the Montagnards in the highlands. I would go up and visit with them. I remember asking this one grizzled old Special Forces officer how the campaign for the hearts and minds at the "rice roots" level were going. I asked him sort of in a sardonic sort of way because it was just making conversation and he smiled and said, “Up here we grab them by the balls and the hearts and minds come along.” I didn’t spend a lot of time with the Montagnards but I did have contact with them.

Q: I was wondering, did you see sort of was there a clear line between the Montagnards and the sort of regular Vietnamese?

COLBERT: I think that there was distain on the part of the mainland Vietnamese for the Montagnards and I don’t think there was any great love lost on the part of the Montagnards either but I didn’t experience any of it directly.

Q: Well then moving on to the resettlement.

COLBERT: I was only involved in one large resettlement effort. I was probably in the middle of my tour when for one reason or not it was determined to move people from Quang Ngai which was in I Corps in the northern part of South Vietnam to the area around Cameron Bay which is south, I think, and east of Saigon- Ho Chi Minh City now-and in that case we flew families of people who had been displaced by the war from the contested area around Quang Ngai, Quang Ngai province, to this area around Cameron Bay. We flew them in I think Caribou’s which were small military cargo craft and maybe C-130s as well. I knew I flew with them, and we then trucked them to this area and gave them their concrete and their roofing material and their cooking oil and their bulgur wheat and that’s all that I remember. It was a big operation; I played a very small role in it because I was just a minion.

Q: What was your impression of the American military and the Arvin military? How did they get along?

COLBERT: Well where I was the only U.S. military units were north in a place call Chu Lai, which was an area, a U.S. military base on the beach, which is one of the initial points that we landed when we involved with our own forces. It was a large base and the Americal Division was based there, which had a very checkered record.

Q: Including the My Lai...

COLBERT: I was coming to that yes. Americal Division was the division, which had the unit, which operated in the so-called Russell Beach operation in the Batanga Peninsula. But it had a checkered record in any event in terms of it just wasn’t one of the best units. I think it was a reconstructed unit that had not been active since probably the Second World War.

I had very little to do with them other than the fact that for most of the time I was in Vietnam I lived in a house, I had luckily moved from that villa where the province senior advisor lived and I had my little hole in the wall place I described earlier. I along with one, two, three other young men, or two other young men and an older man shared a house, which was really on the outskirts of town. I would say that we were part of the defensive perimeter although we weren’t in that business. We felt well removed. We had a standing invitation for any U.S. military personnel who passed through who weren’t assigned there. They could stop there and have a sandwich or a beer or whatever they wanted; it was just well known that they could come and go, as they liked. So we had a lot of people come by. Things fell off trucks there all the time, off the back of trucks. Often people would come in; we had a Montagnards housekeeper/cook and she would cook somebody a steak or serve them a BLT (bacon, lettuce, tomato sandwich) whatever they wanted. We aren't talking about hundreds of people now, we are talking two or three or four a week but they were welcomed to stop and eat and have whatever they wanted.

Often a week later we'd get ourselves a gift of a case of grenades or a shotgun something that we might need. We couldn't acquire weapons, as we weren't provided weapons so we used the midnight auto supply. We could pretty much get whatever we wanted because we got along well with them and so they would say, "Thank you very much for putting us up this evening, what can we do for you?" "Well, we could use a couple gas masks."

So my encounters were basically of a social nature or there was an advisory group within the Arvin, the Second Arvin Division, which was based in Quang Ngai city, which was in charge of the security of the province south of Chu Lai. We could go there if we wished, and have a beer in the officers club or NCO (non-commissioned officers) club. It was a very small club, a very small officer's club because it was a very small advisors group. My encounter with the U.S. military was mostly with the people who were involved with CORDS. CORDS was a sandwich operation, that is to say each level was military civilian, military civilian or vice versa. So that above me was a lieutenant colonel and below me in some instances there were public affairs or public civic action teams, which were headed by lieutenants and sometimes by second lieutenants. I could call on them for projects and things. Those are the people I mostly dealt with in the military.

Q: What was the impression that you were getting both of your own observation and your other American colleagues about the performance, effectiveness of the ARVIN in your area?

COLBERT: That's a difficult question. I think the U.S. military generally held the ARVIN in somewhat disdain yet the ARVIN properly lead fought very well. I think that sometimes the leadership was poor; on the other hand the U.S. military had this tendency to step in and do it themselves. 'We can do it better, we can do it faster, we can do it.' So there was this tendency to not let the ARVIN face up.

By the same token I found it strange that a lot of South Vietnamese men of military age weren't in the military. A lot of people who worked for me, I had a cadre of Vietnamese who worked for me or indeed worked for my counter part who were of military age and weren't in. So I don't think the distribution of responsibility or the distribution of burden was equitable. Of course, that's probably true in our own society as well if you think about it. Maybe Senator Kerry didn't make his joke very well the other day but the reality was then that people who wanted to avoid service could and they could go to Canada, they could go to Europe, they could be conscience objectors or they could just stay in school or they could join the Foreign Service. I mean there were all kinds of options so even with conscription the burden wasn't being fairly borne by us so far be it for me to criticize them. Sorry for a long answer.

Q: No, no that's fair enough.

COLBERT: I would like to talk about something else for a minute. This is sort of amusing. I think I said earlier that when I went to college I got a deferment from my local draft board in this small county I'm from. From college I went to graduate school and I got another deferment and the draft board people said, "We are watching you, we know where you are." I told them, "I am from a small town so you know where to find me," and I went to graduate school. From graduate school I went into the Peace Corps and again required another deferment, which made them unhappy. That would be of 1964 when I went into the Peace Corps so that required another deferment. When I got out of the Peace Corps I came back and I had already passed the Foreign Service written and was about to take the Foreign Service oral and was asked to take my pre-induction physical.

I went to Fort Haliburt in Baltimore and I at 125 pounds to 130 pounds soaking wet was classified 1-A. The same week that Joe Namath who was then playing football for the Jets was 4-F because he had flatfeet or something. In any event, I remember that I was 1-A when he was 4-F and I couldn't do what he was doing. But I was still 1-A when I joined the Foreign Service and I was 1-A when I went off to Vietnam. About a week or so after the Tet Offensive when the APO, the military mail, was restored to Quang Ngai I got my draft notice to report for induction into the U.S. military. I was working for this wonderful Marine colonel who I just thought was the best thing since sliced bread, I mean one of the best bosses that I have ever had, one of the people that I most admire. So I said, "Colonel Sir, we have a bit of a problem here." He looked at this and said, "What are they going to do send you Vietnam? I'll fix it." So I never got drafted, I just stayed in Vietnam. I don't know to this day why my draft board did not pursue it, I think at this point the statute of limitations has long since passed and I probably saw more action direct or indirect than most people who got drafted. But I never got drafted and I avoided the draft by going to Vietnam before they drafted me so I think that was an interesting little side that probably has nothing.

Q: I got my draft notice after I had enlisted in the Air Force and I was in Korea. During the war I got my draft notice and I said, "Well here I am."

COLBERT: Bring me back.

Q: What was your impression of the CIA operations?

COLBERT: The part of the CIA that I saw was the long-range reconnaissance units, which were operational from my city although I had nothing to do with them. I knew they were there and the Phoenix program which was the program to eliminate...

Q: The cadre?

COLBERT: The infrastructure, to arrange for the termination with extreme prejudice of people who were in leadership positions in the Viet Cong or the NVA and the Chu Hoi program which was the program to encourage people to leave the Communist side and come to our side for grants of land and unity and all that sort of stuff. I knew people in those programs, some of them were former military and some were career CIA. I think they varied in quality from very good to very bad.

Q: From where you were did any of those things impinge on you?

COLBERT: On my work?

Q: Yeah.

COLBERT: Only in the sense that if people thought that I was doing that work then I could have become a target, more than I already was. In one instance I found out that a person who worked in the Phoenix program was using my name rather than his name to protect himself and I took umbrage of that because I didn't mind his using a cover name but using my name and my position was a bit much, a bit off the top I think.

Q: How about the Koreans in the area? The Koreans had a division around Da Nang.

COLBERT: That was in Quang Ngai where I was located. They were there when I arrived and their area of operations was very secure. They basically, I'm told, told the village elders that you are with us, everything is wonderful and grand and we'll protect you and everything will be fine. If anything happens and you don't tell us about it, don't warn us, then everything will be very bad. I think the Vietnamese were totally convinced that the Koreans had zero tolerance for any misbehaving so it was pacified in the sense that the cost of otherwise was just too high. I'm told, although I don't have any evidence to the contrary, that they ran the black market in Quang Ngai while they were there and ran it very well. But shortly after I arrived they left and it was strictly ARVIN and I think security varied from so-so to maybe almost good, back and forth.

There were areas of Quang Ngai that were no-go areas but you have to know that Quang Ngai was a problem even for the French. When the Japanese took over Vietnam after maybe 1940-41 when they came to Vietnam they didn't even try to pacify Quang Ngai and it was the Japanese who had maybe a few soldiers in the center, if at that. Major leadership elements of the Vietnamese Communist party were born there so this was real Indian country.

When I was at the Quang Ngai Airport ready to depart at the end of my tour, my Vietnamese counterpart said to me just before I went up the stairs, "Larry, you do know that every family in the province has at least one member in the VC – even mine"

Hopefully in his family it was him. I say that because if it were, if it had been then when Quang Ngai fell very quickly as the South Vietnamese government began to collapse he would not have suffered and I admired the great man a great deal. If he happened to be a member of the other side he was doing a good job at what he was doing and he was certainly a good person so he wouldn't have been persecuted and he wouldn't have gone to a resettlement camp and he wouldn't have been killed.

Q: The flood.

COLBERT: Oh the flood. There was one day or a couple days when there was tremendous monsoon rain and the rain occurred just as the tide was coming in so at the same time we had this major tide coming back from the sea, I presume it is the South China Sea. But anyway we had this terrific influx of water and then we had this terrific flood because of all the rain. So the water coming back from the tide, the rip tide and the rain the entire city flooded. You are talking maybe up to six, eight, ten feet everywhere. Let's say at its highest six, eight feet but virtually the entire town is covered. We were as I said earlier we were staying in this house, the four of us and we got a lift in a military truck, to a location perhaps one hundred yards from our house and then sort of floated or walked barely touching with our toes, but we basically got to our house and got into the house. It was a one-story house with a roof that you could get up to. The water was up to almost the top of the ceiling, there was probably maybe a two-foot gap where from the floor and it was all solid, muddy water. But the ceiling and the remaining part of the wall, which had not been covered by the water both, were black, black with insects, which had come in to escape the flood. So it was an incredible experience. There were, the house was totally, totally covered with no open space at all with insects that were trying to avoid from being drowned by the flood. We proceeded to the roof to sit it out until the rip tide went back and the water went down and amused ourselves by shooting snakes with 45s, and we just popped them both for amusement and safety until the water went down.

It was one of the most remarkable things I have experienced. To be in a city totally covered with water to a certain level and then go back and see your entire living quarters absolutely chuck-a-block full of insects of all kinds and not to mention insects of all kinds and not to mention insects, small animals as well. They had all come there for safety.

Q: Did this require an awful lot of work to put things back together again?

COLBERT: I think we had to get a new refrigerator and somebody had to clean the place up. I'm sure we didn't do it and life got back to normal in a relatively short time. I think maybe a day or two we lived on C rations of which we had lots.

Q: Well then you left there when?

COLBERT: The fall of '69. I left the country in the fall of '69. It was really quite remarkable at that point a number of people were doing what I was doing or similar things had been killed. I had gone there with that normal feeling of youth that I was indestructible and didn't really worry about it, although we were often shelled and certainly zappers came in and assassins came in and it was a dangerous place. I don't think I ever really had any angst about being killed. But as I got closer to the end I got a little more concerned with my well being because people that I knew had been killed or seriously wounded.

I remember flying on Air America from Quang Ngai to Da Nang, which was my first stop on the way out. I had to check out through Da Nang. And when we landed in Da Nang airport there was an accident, which occurred as we were landing. They were cutting the grass around the runway and one of the employees thought it would be easier if they used fire because it was much faster so they lit the grass on fire. Unfortunately there was an ammunition dump. So the ammunition dump went off just as we were approaching, and we had to get out of that plane and run. I sat then in this ditch for 45 minutes while the ammunition cooked off albeit perhaps a mile away but it was close by when you are watching an ammunition dump going over.

Then from there I went on to my last time in Saigon to check out. I remember I was walking to Bunker' bunker that is to say what we used to call Ellsworth Bunkers embassy, this big monstrosity that we built. I was walking there to process out and a Viet Cong unit tried to take over or blow up the local main post office and I was going by at the time. So my last week in Vietnam was rather eventful. I flew into an ammunition dump blowing up and then what was an unwelcome intruder in an attempt to blow up or take over the local post office.

Q: The local post office was on a square with a cathedral wasn't it?

COLBERT: It's in the main square, that's right. You know Saigon then? Oh that's right you said you...

Q: I was there at the time. I remember. Whither in '69, the fall of '69, where did you go?

COLBERT: I went back to the Vietnam Training Center to fill time, and we found a one-bedroom apartment in southwest in one of the new high rises, relatively new then. My wife went back to work at the Library of Congress. We discovered she was pregnant and in due course we had our first child. I went back to Turkish language instruction and I was assigned to Turkey. My thought was that I had spent two and a half years in the Foreign Service; I had really no State Department experience and sort of no embassy experience. I had been upcountry winning hearts and minds or losing them. I felt that I was somewhat behind my classmates in terms of experience. In fact I was ahead of them promotion wise because I went to Vietnam as a 07 and left as a 05. So I had two promotions in less than three years and I was ahead of my class because I had gone to Vietnam and been shot at and so on and so forth. I was doing well.

On the other hand I felt really somewhat at a disadvantage because I didn't know what an OM was; an Operations Memorandum was for those of you who don't know. I didn't know how to do an Airgram; I didn't know what an Airgram was. I certainly didn't know about things like TAGS and all that good stuff. I knew nothing at all. So I thought I should at least know Turkey and my Turkish was pretty good although very, very rusty and I spoke like a peasant rather than an Istanbulu, a person from Istanbul or an Ankarli a person from Ankara. So I thought if I went to Turkey at least the language would give me some heads up to make up for the lack of any other knowledge I had. So I asked for Turkey and they assigned me to the political/military section in Ankara via Turkish.

Q: In the first place how long were you, a few months, in the Vietnam training place?

COLBERT: Three or four months until the Turkish language class started.

Q: How did you find, you might say, the spirit there and the approach? What was your impression?

COLBERT: It's a long time ago. I think people were, most people going through it were AID. State people were a minority and whereas in CORDS I which I was in, the first CORDS group, we had already been assigned to Vietnam before CORDS was created. They weren't even sending FSOs to Vietnam for counter-insurgency work, upcountry work, when I came in. By the time I came back from Vietnam they were telling people that your first tour will be in Vietnam and if you won't go to Vietnam then you can't join the Foreign Service. So people I think knew they were going, some with enthusiasm, some with trepidation and some with resignation but basically everybody got along pretty well, I don't know. I think that the trainers, the people that talked about the politics and talked about the society and tried to prepare you for what Vietnam was about were very, very good people. Many of them had been involved in Southeast Asia for a long period of time. Erv Boomgardener who recently died, was one of them, a person from USIS (United States Information Service) who really knew the country very well. All I could bring to the table was the practical reality trying to work at a very junior level upcountry in a very big bureaucracy.

THOMAS B. KILLEEN
Refugee Officer
Da Nang and Hue (1967-1969)

Thomas B. Killeen was born in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania in 1940. He joined the Peace Corps in 1964 and was posted in Chile. He entered into the Foreign Service in 1967 and his career included posts in Israel, Bolivia, Thailand, Ghana, Venezuela, and Somalia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: In 1967?

KILLEEN: This is the first working day after 1967 began. I think our class was seventy-six. The leadership of the class, to the extent that the matter came up, assured us that nobody in the class was going to Vietnam, that was just not in the cards. And apparently during the course of our six week A-100 course there was a change, and part of the change came about because USAID was really having considerably difficulty. They couldn't recruit people to staff the jobs that they had in Vietnam and they had to get people elsewhere. The State Department was tasked with providing some warm bodies, with getting on board with the Vietnam effort. Along about midway in our A-100 program the leaders stopped talking about nobody going to Vietnam, and nobody was asking anymore because it had been thoroughly answered. So that the day the assignments were out -- I can't remember what the fellow's name was, but it doesn't make any difference who it was -- they began to read in alphabetical order the members of the class and what their assignments were and somebody whose name began with "B" or maybe "C", bang! -- Vietnam. There was a deep intake of breath in the room. They went down the list and somebody who had brought his wife, his name came up for Vietnam, and she started to cry. As soon as the first name came up for Vietnam, I knew that if anyone was going to go to Vietnam, I would -- a bachelor, that gives them fifty points, former peace corps volunteer, that gives him another fifty points, former Marine, that gives him another fifty points, he's gone. I knew as soon as the first name came up that I was going to go and that the choice before me was either to stand up and just walk out of the class right then, and in effect to resign, or to go to Vietnam. So, of course, when my name came up that was the assignment. Prior to that we had had some kind of consultation with our personnel assignment people. You know, "Where would you like to go, Killeen?" I said, "I don't care, any place in the world except don't send me to East Asia because I have no interest in that part of the world." And didn't; not anyplace, Japan, Korea, Vietnam, Thailand, India; I had no interest in that part of the world. "And," I said, "I have just come from South America so I am not anxious to go there, send me to someplace new; I am not anxious to go to Europe either, so Africa sounds fine, or wherever is fine." I wasn't too picky; I never was picky about assignments in the Foreign Service, what came up came up, that was fine.

Q: Well you served in Vietnam from 1967 to 1969. What did you do?

KILLEEN: Refugee work?

Q: Where were you working?

KILLEEN: I worked for a couple of months in a city called Hoi An, which was about 20 miles south of Da Nang. And then when the Tet offensive broke out there in January of 1968, the fellow who was doing refugee work in Hue was killed...

Q: What was his name?

KILLEEN: Jack Lunstead (?). He was killed, he was killed in his bathtub as a matter of fact. He apparently tried to take refuge in his bathtub, and the communists, who weren't very many, did go door to door on some things and they weren't going to allow anybody to do that and that was the end of him. Anyway, there I was twenty miles south of Da Nang and once again I was a former Marine and if anybody was going to Hue to be the refugee officer, I was going. Because it was, as it was said and explained and in the things they sought, a matter of high policy of the United States that we, the United States, would not give up the former imperial capital of Vietnam and we would not let the people displaced by war activities go unhelped. And we would be seen visibly helping even if at the particular moment the only visible sign of our help was the person of a refugee officer. So I went on up to Hue, and I went up to Hue twelve or thirteen days before the communists were kicked out.

Q: This was during the long Marine assault on the fortress there? The capitol building with the walls around it.

KILLEEN: The Marines were involved, the 101st Airborne Division was also involved and the South Vietnamese First Infantry Division, which was actually based in that area, was also involved. I have got a photograph, and I swear I am certain about my own recollection of it, that is a picture of the U.S. flag raised over the front gate of that wall by the Marines in violation of all policy orders and instructions and which was quickly removed. But I got a picture of that. That was some pretty hard sledding, that whole business. I went up to Hue, as I say it was over thirteen days before the communists got kicked out, I was there for a bit and then I went south to a refugee place that was north of the Marine base at Phu Bai and I shuttled back and forth.

Q: What were you doing? You not only had the problem of Hue, but was that also the time when they were cleaning out the Montagnards, getting them out of the area?

KILLEEN: No, oh no. And you have a little bit of the wrong slant on that. What you are thinking about, I think, and please don't be offended if I am putting words in your mouth, is: There were two distinct populations in Vietnam by broad group, one was the ethnic Vietnamese and the other was the mountain tribes. There was considerable antipathy between the people with the Vietnamese being the dominant group and the Montagnard population being largely content to let the Vietnamese have it all as long as they had peace and quiet in their own mountains. In those mountain areas, around some of the U.S. special forces camps, Montagnard populations did congregate; but to the best of my knowledge there was never any effort to move those peoples, in anything like a refugee guise, out of those areas and into the lowlands. There were some efforts to resettle them.

Q: Well I am really talking about resettlement more than anything, because I visited a couple of those.

KILLEEN: Of the Montagnards?

Q: I swear they were Montagnards, up near Hue, but towards the mountains. But we don't need to get into this. You were dealing with refugees, where were they coming from?

KILLEEN: They were from the city of Hue. The city of Hue got beat up pretty badly during the fighting. I just remember some rough numbers; the population was something like 138,000 people, 125,000 of them registered for refugee benefits. Something on the order of maybe 27,000 homes and dwellings, and something like 25,000 of them were either partially or entirely damaged or destroyed for purposes of collecting refugee benefits. It was refugee and rehabilitation. Specifically what I was doing was to try to, along with others -- by others I mean their own hierarchy -- to get the Vietnamese Refugee Service to do its work in getting the benefits into the hands of the beneficiaries, the people who were designated by law or regulation as beneficiaries. In order to do that there was a matter of registration, there was a matter of distribution, there was a matter of getting supplies, there was a matter of getting monies. The provincial treasury had been looted by the liberating forces; they had liberated the provincial treasury as well. Some things were as basic as that, we had to get food and money in, cash money, in order for the provincial treasury to operate, in order for civil servants to be paid, in order for beneficiaries of this refugee and rehabilitation package to get their cash benefits. Physically the cash money had to come in from out of town, from the capital.

As a matter of mechanics, some of what I did was to be a parallel channel of communications. If the Vietnamese service that I was attached to, advising, requisitioned something, I would pass through my channels of communication to the advisor to the Ministry in Saigon the fact that the request had been made and to move it along. And that is what would happen. If it was a matter of personnel, if it was a matter of material, if it was a matter of money, if it was a matter of awards, a matter of decorations, a matter of all kinds of things, I could use this parallel line of communication, and the converse was true. If there was something that was decided in the Ministry, a program to be initiated, this or that or the other thing, it could get passed down through American lines of communication to me and I could bring it to the attention of the local folks, who would often act upon the message that I was bringing because it was reliable.

Sometimes they would act upon it by resisting, but they would act upon it. Sometimes they asked for things that I judged to be something less than crucial and I would say, "This is on the way, but I don't agree with it," or words to that effect. In saying things that way I sort of implied that it was much more a tug of war, relationships were pretty good and we were pretty much on the same wave length.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese bureaucracy that you dealt with?

KILLEEN: Pretty good, genuinely pretty good. Pretty much dedicated to their war aims -- save the country, build a country, make a country, aims; their anti-communist aims. But in saying that I should make note that the bureaucracy, the ordinary clerk, was drawn from the best educated population in Vietnam -- the most intrepid and independent population in Vietnam, the group of people who had the highest sense of their own worth and the elevation of their place -- who were in fact angry that their city had been so beat up by their fellow countrymen. I say it that way and it implies that I am thinking of the physical property. Yes, some of it was the physical property; obviously the guys that beat up the property, the real estate, in a way were us, the Americans, the westerners, the South Vietnamese who were on our side. But it was the communists who came in, and really did kill an awful lot of the people of Vietnam. Killed maybe 2500 or 2900 while they were occupying Hue and then marched off an equivalent number, maybe it was only 2500, out into the wastelands to the east where they clubbed them and buried them alive. The people of Hue were pretty much universally angry about that, and they remained angry, they remained angry so that -- God, I am jumping ahead a long time -- more than ten years later a fellow was released from a reeducation camp, went home to Hue where he was dealing with local clerks. He decided he didn't want to stay in Vietnam anymore, he wanted to go and immigrate to the United States. So he went around, because he had heard about a program, the orderly departure program, to the local clerk -- this is the story he told me -- who was also from Hue. I say clerk, but he was a middle level bureaucrat. He said, "Yes, I heard about that program, let me see what I can find out for you about it," and walked this guy who had come out of reeducation camp through every bit of procedure without bribe or fine or anything like that. He was, in the current term, a home boy and he got him out of Vietnam. He was working for the communists, a communist functionary, but he was still angry at those guys who had beaten up the city of Hue so badly, and its people.

Q: What was your impression of dealing with the American military while you were there.

KILLEEN: Terrible, absolutely terrible. I didn't have much dealings with the Marines, I had dealings with the Army. I found some of their ways of doing business just impossibly obtuse, when not just plain flat craven. And it went on at all kinds of levels. I am going to try to build a little bit with stories. I got a ride on a helicopter and I told the fellow I wanted to go to a certain place and he said no, he couldn't take me there, that it was too dangerous and so on and so forth, that it was not a combat required priority to land there to put me down so he wouldn't do it. Well the next day I got an Air America helicopter to put me down in the same place...

Q: This was the CIA run airline. But basically it was sort of civilian type airline.

KILLEEN: Yes, not U.S. Army, it was a different chain of command. He put me down there without the slightest hesitation. That's where the customer wants to go, that's where we go, down we went. I told him to go away and come back and get me in half an hour and he said sure he would come back in half an hour and when I wanted him to land to put out a smoke grenade. I did and he landed and we left. Because what we were talking about was a compound that was not a hundred yards square and everything outside the compound, I don't mean to give the impression of guys with guns pointed, was unfriendly territory. The opposite story, another Army helicopter and I asked him to put me down in a particular place and he did. When we got down or as we were landing, I said "Now you better get the hell out of here. Get out and come back and pick me up in a half hour." "No, no, no, I'll wait for you." "No, no, no, get out of here." "No, I'll wait for you." "Son of a gun get out of here, if you won't come back for me in a half hour then don't come back at all, but get out." He started to raise from the ground and he was not 50 feet in the air, I was walking away, when a .60 millimeter mortar landed where he had been. Nobody was hurt, but when it landed I looked up, he was looking down and his eyes were about as big as that television monitor. He hadn't wanted to listen to me, he wanted to be obtuse about things. We then took off and I said to him something about "you didn't want to believe me, but I guess now you will," he did come back and get me, and he said "Yeah, yeah, yeah, yeah, yeah." I said to him something quite casual about how "most of this area in here is controlled by communists." At which point we flew out over the ocean and traversed the thirty or forty miles that we had to go to get back to Hue over the ocean and then cut inland to come into Hue to let me off.

I made those stories sort of rudimentary and sort of yuk-yuk stories because as far as I am concerned they illustrate some of the kind of things that happened. The fellow that I worked for was actually a U.S. Army colonel and I had a fair amount of respect for him. He had a principal deputy who was an Army lieutenant colonel for whom I had an awful lot of respect. The rest of the crew, there was a military deputy, the principal deputy, and then there was a civilian deputy who was a former Army officer. Most of this provincial advisory team were either active duty or retired military officers. A lot of those guys were fairly obvious retreads. I think that on balance the folks that were being sent to that particular provincial advisory team were the best available - I am not talking about myself. Although maybe I should put myself in just that same category stressing the available part of it. The former senior advisor to the province was a guy by the name of Phil Manhard and he was a State Department foreign service officer, now dead.

Q: No he's not. I am pretty sure he is not because I interviewed him, not on this but on China; I think he is in North Carolina now. I maybe wrong, but it must have just happened just recently.

KILLEEN: And you think he formerly worked in the city of Hue?

Q: He was captured. Later Ambassador to Fiji or Mauritius, something like that.

KILLEEN: Well I thought that I had seen that he had died. I don't know if he knows this story, and I don't know that it's true. The communists took over Hue by maybe a battalion of them walking into town during the course of a night, and the next thing anybody knew if there was any cop of the corner, or someone who looked like a cop on the corner, it was a communist. They found themselves in control of the city and called in their buddies who then marched on in in greater force. But during that particular period, which was the evening of Tet, the Vietnamese

New Year, one of the guys who worked for Manhard, a guy by the name of Augustino, was sleeping over with a girl friend right across the street from the U.S. Army's MACV compound where the Army advisory team to the First Vietnamese Army Division was lodged. Augustino found out, maybe he did so by looking or maybe by the one of the Vietnamese with whom he was staying telling him, that Manhard had not been taken. He went across the way to this MACV compound and asked them if they would give him a squad to go and pick up Manhard before the communists got him. And they refused; they refused to let anyone go out. So Augustino, as he told the story, as I remember, tried arguing with them for a little while and it sort of became a question of "You can come in if you want to, but you are not going to go out again. We are not going to open the gates for you to go out again. We are not going to open the gates for any other reason, including any kind of thing to go and get Manhard." Augustino at that point went to see if he could get Manhard, it was a matter of about three blocks, by himself before the communists got there. He found that they had already been there, or were circling in at the moment and he couldn't get to him.

This same MACV compound -- I think the commander of it was a colonel by the name of Kelley -- that doesn't sound right -- I don't remember. Maybe a mile away from where this compound was there was a little outpost where there were twelve soldiers headed by a sergeant. They were running the telephone lines and they asked the compound to let them come in so that they could get some food and water, or to send food and water, and the compound wouldn't do it. They were told to stay where they were, and they stayed where they were throughout the occupation of the south side of the city of Hue by the communists, which was, I guess, ten days or two weeks, without food or water. They didn't have any there on their little compound because they customarily took their meals at the MACV compound. They were kept alive, both by food and by water, by the madame of a local bordello at considerably greater peril to her life than in fact those communicators were. She ran food and water to them and kept them alive. In the meantime this MACV compound wouldn't let them in, told them to stay where they were. And they did and they kept those telephone lines open. I put that down as just plain craven conduct on the part of that MACV compound. There probably were, if not more, at least the equivalent number of troops -- not organized into combat units -- in that MACV compound as actually captured the city of Hue. They offered no resistance whatsoever, there may have been a couple of rounds popped off at some point or another.

I didn't actually realize this until sometime later as our compound was independent, it was several blocks away from the MACV compound. The CIA compound was across the street from us. We never abandoned our compound and they never abandoned their compound and I am confident in retrospect that part of the reason we didn't abandon our compound was because we weren't sure we could get out of the MACV compound once we had gotten in and quite literally had to get out of the compound in order to do the work we were there to do. That was, of course, true of MACV and they didn't come out of their compound.

Q: Did you spend all your time with refugees through the 1969 period?

KILLEEN: Yes. I took a couple of R & R's, but that was what I did and I did it there in the city of Hue and in the provinces.

Q: Did you have any feeling of being in the foreign service, this was your first assignment, or were you sort of off on your own?

KILLEEN: Such a question. You see I didn't really know against what to judge things. I knew I wasn't working in an Embassy, on the other hand I didn't have a clue what working in an Embassy was. It certainly didn't seem unnatural that a number of us would be separated out and detailed to USAID. During the course of the A-100 course, but apparently without any connection, the stories of other officers in Vietnam, both USIS officers and State officers, who were working in the provinces were told. They were told as some of the kinds of things that individuals sometimes get in to. We all knew of, and I certainly was dazzled by it, one-man posts -- there are still a couple of them left. The one that I had run into ..(?).., well as I said dazzled by this little jewel, was the one-man post at Antofagasta, Northern Chile.

KILLEEN: I was more than a little happy that I was able to get up into northern part of Vietnam where the Marines were. I felt a little safer in Marine country, because I could speak the language, than I would have elsewhere -- although I had a cousin who was working for ESSO in Saigon. There were no other State Department officers in Hoi An when I went there, but there were a couple of AID officers. The fellow who was the senior advisor in Hoi An when I was there was a CIA officer. There were a couple of AID officers and there may have been a USIS officer who was holding down the USIS slot. I am trying to remember and I haven't thought of these things in years. There was at least one military officer detailed to holding an AID slot in Hoi An. So then the world fell apart with the communists virtually overwhelming the country, it didn't really surprise me that when I was sent to Hue -- when I say it that way I was conscious of the fact that there was history being made there and it was an attraction to me to be close to it, that sweetened the things on going to Hue -- there were no other State officers in Hue at the time. There were CIA officers. Were there any civilian AID officers there beside the guy who was the retired army officer? I don't remember whether there were or not. But although he was a retired military officer he was in fact retired and was engaged by AID as a civilian employee. There had been Manhard who was there two weeks before I got there and was no longer there, but we really did have hopes at that time that he would either show up or be recovered. He was a State Department officer. There had been a consulate in Hue three or four years before I got there. There was an AID officer there who was an ordinary civilian. I didn't really have too much to judge it against. I knew that I was not dealing with a normal Embassy assignment; I didn't know how far afield it was. In fact I was part of CORDS 1; I and five others were part of CORDS 1 before there was CORDS. We were part of OCO and then OCO became CORDS and it was CORDS when it was the days of Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support, long before it got changed to Rural Development or anything like that.

Q: What about corruption? In the Far East and many other places you pay for services before you receive them often from the public. Or things are siphoned off; there was a lot of talk about the Vietnamese general in command of I Corps, how he had warehouses full of stuff. Did you have any experience with corruption?

KILLEEN: I didn't see it. I thought at the time, and still think, that because of the spotlight under which we were -- which was pretty intense; I even got a reporting requirement from the White House, came out of the White House, direct telex; and the Vietnamese were under the same spotlight -- it just didn't happen. Now you have to bear in mind, and this is not intended as a big but, that what we were about was to put into the hands of little people certain limited amounts of foodstuffs, cement, tin roofing, and cash -- there wasn't a lot of cash involved, though in aggregate it was, for individuals it wasn't. It wouldn't have taken a very dumb merchant or corruptee to figure out that once you get it into the hands of people you can then come around behind them and buy the stuff back, and in fact use the same trucks to take it back that brought it up. I never saw anything like that happen, either. I felt, and I think we felt, that once we got it into the hands of people that we had done the very best that we could do. By people, I mean the people who were entitled by law, or what was passing for law, to be the beneficiaries of this stuff.

There was one kind of a thing that was maybe sort of an exception on that, it was after the communists had been kicked out but it wasn't very long after. One evening this same Augustino that I mentioned earlier was seen going off someplace with an M16 over his shoulder. "Where in the hell are you going, Augie?" He said he was going to guard the warehouse. "What the hell are you worried about the warehouse for?" "They" had broken in or at least broken through a wall and he was afraid that they were going to come back that night and pillage it. What was in the warehouse at that point, there may have been very small quantities of something else, was bulgar wheat which was not a very attractive food stuff for the Vietnamese being a rice eating people. This bulgar wheat had a certain amount of popularity in the Middle East, but it was totally alien to the Vietnamese population. Well, everybody, what there was of a provincial advisory team, jumped up on its feet and said, "No, no, no, you can't do that," and we then proceeded to have a quick but fairly intense discussion of what it was all about. We came to the conclusion that absolutely the worst thing that would happen was that this bulgar wheat would be stolen, and that the next thing that would happen would be that it would be sold. That would begin to reestablish market places in the city of Hue which would then draw other kinds of things and we would take that particular step toward reconstituting the city as a living thing. We prevailed upon Augustino to sleep on his own bed that night -- I don't know what he was sleeping on, maybe a desk as most of us were. And that is exactly what did happen. Now was that corruption on our part?

Q: No, there was a practical application of how do you insert something into the society, sometimes its leaving something on a street corner and saying "Oh my, they have taken it." This belongs to that rather than somebody getting and stockpiling something that really is of great value and creating money.

KILLEEN: I never had any dope offered to me for sale, I never went looking for any. I heard about marijuana being available, I heard about one guy walking down the street with two AWOL bags full of marijuana. This was before heroine became widespread.

Q: When I was in Vietnam, which was 1969 and 1970, a little marijuana, but it wasn't a big deal. That wasn't the problem.

KILLEEN: Again, I think really that both the Vietnamese and the American side, to the extent that it may have applied to the American side, really put into the city of Hue... You see there was a new provincial chief because the previous one had been terrible, hid out in the attic of the hospital when the communists came into the town. The South Vietnamese government because of the glare of the spotlight, because of the terrible conditions that all of a sudden prevailed, put honest, upright, reliable, dedicated, nationalistic people into the city of Hue to supervise. Pretty much upright, remnants of the Vietnamese civil service that was left.

Q: You left Vietnam in April of 1969, is that right?

KILLEEN: April of 1969 it was.

Q: What had you been asking for and where did you end up going?

KILLEEN: I hadn't really been asking for anything, except as something on a wish list when I first came into the foreign service. First of all, I didn't really know that I was going to make it out of Vietnam. Three of us had Thanksgiving dinner together, three State Department officers. I went to Hue, another guy went to Kontum, or Pleiku it may have been, another one was in Saigon as part of the Embassy political section. He had come from the U.S. mission to the U.N.; he was by misadventure in Hue at the time the Tet offensive broke out and was scooped up by the communists -- he was knocked down a block or so away from the compound in which I ended up living and working and shot in the back of the head. The business about onward assignments and everything else like that I didn't give much if any thought to or consideration to, some of it was just because it was so far away and Washington was so far away and the Embassy was so far away, and I was busy and in a sense it was easier to be far away.

What actually happened was that a brother of mine died and I went back to the United States to go to the funeral. Then what transpired was one of those things that put the department's personnel system into my heart and to this day it remains very difficult for me to say anything against personnel. Quite literally at about 10:00 o'clock in the morning my supervisor told me that my brother had died and did I want to try to make it to the funeral. The message from the family made it quite clear that they understood that I was very far away and in a remote place far away. The funeral was set for, call it forty-eight hours and if I couldn't make it just let them know; they were not going to hold the funeral until I arrived -- although that's not the phraseology of it at all. Well I set off then to make it and literally packed an AWOL bag and that was it. After the funeral I took a couple of days off and I got a phone call from -- I'm not even sure who it was -- personnel and they offered me a deal. The deal was that if I wanted to go back to Vietnam of course I was welcome to, but if I didn't want to, then the department would TDY me to the Vietnam training center for a month and that would formally complete my assignment in Vietnam making me eligible for home leave and onward assignment. And I opted to do that, which meant that the folks back in Vietnam had to pack up for me. In that same period, which in my mind was about the time I was going to be doing it anyway, when I got back to Washington I would talk about an onward assignment. That is when I did it and once again I sort of got myself if not in trouble, out of joint, because I made some wrong assumptions.

When we were going off to Vietnam, the personnel folks had said, in effect, thank you all very much for doing this and take it from us, when you are finished with your Vietnam assignment you will have any assignment you want. I believed it. When I then went shopping for an assignment what I wanted was something in the Middle East so I could see what that particular area of the world was like. The assignment that came up, and I thought nothing of it, was to long-term language training in Beirut. In my mind, having in fairly short succession and at government expense, put it in those terms, had some language training in Spanish for the Peace Corps, had some language training in Vietnamese for the State Department but for AID because they loaned me out, I was now getting language training for the State Department. It took me a couple of months and some consultation, not consultation, he more than sought me out, he looked me up -- I can't think of a good phrase -- a guy by the name of Perry Culley (?) who was an Inspector and had been the DCM in Paris, said to me in effect do you know what you are doing. I said, "Yeah, sure. A little R&R from Vietnam and studying some Arabic in preparation for another assignment." He said, "Do you realize it's not just another assignment, that it is probably two more and then back to Washington and then very likely another assignment in the Middle East, because you're taking this language course." I hadn't; I had sort of thought of it as the Vietnam thing. So that is how I got to the Middle East and the assignment process was in a very real sense the Department of Personnel folks fulfilling their commitment to us who had gone to Vietnam to give us anything we wanted. When I said I wanted to go to the Middle East, there being no jobs open, they put me into a language course. I am sure whoever made the decision to do that said, "Of course he will appreciate that he is slated for long-term assignment in the area." I didn't. When I found out I asked that I be recycled out of the long-term and into an abbreviated language course and that then I get an onward assignment. When I was finished with the language course, lo and behold if a guy in Tel Aviv did not take advantage of a then thing we had in the foreign service where you could retire and get additional credit for retirement.

RICHARD R. WYROUGH
Bien Hoa (1967-1968)

Vietnamese National Military Academy
Dalat (1968-1969)

Brigade Commander, Task Force South
South Vietnam (1969-1970)

Colonel WyrOUGH was born in New Jersey in 1927 and educated at West Point and Georgetown. He served with the Military in Germany and Vietnam. He was deputy director for Panama affairs in 1975. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: Where did you serve in Vietnam?

WYROUGH: I had been promoted to Lt. Colonel early in my Pentagon assignment, and so my first assignment in Vietnam was command of a forward base about 5 or 10 miles from the Cambodian border due north of Saigon, in a province called Bin Hoa. Our headquarters was in the middle of an old French rubber plantation. When I arrived, the French still had their families living in these homes. The first Sunday I was there, as the senior person, I was the guest for lunch at the home of some French administrator, whatever his exact title was I don't remember, but it was a very colonial setting. And within days the VC [Viet Cong] attacked our base, the children and the families were all evacuated, and periodically on weekends the wives would come back, leave the children in Saigon. It was a relatively unreal, or surrealistic kind of situation.

About a month after I arrived I was selected for promotion to Colonel, a full colonel. And about that time General Westmoreland -- one of his pet projects was to expand and upgrade, from our perspective at least, the Vietnamese National Military Academy, remaking it from a two-year technical school modeled after the French style into a four year academic degree year awarding institution modeled after West Point. I was selected to go there. I left my assignment up near the Cambodian border on New Year's Day of 1968, headed for a series of briefings in Saigon. By that time General Abrams was the deputy commander under Westmoreland. In my interview with Westmoreland he said, now, tell me about yourself. You have a good Army wife, I may want you to stay up there longer than...at that time people were in and out in a year's time if they weren't carried out. That came as something of a surprise. Young officers in those days, you don't have much choice.

So, General Abrams that night at dinner said, Well, Dick, you go on up there and if you think it's worthwhile, then bring your wife and the boys to safe haven in Baguio.

Q: In the Philippines.

WYROUGH: I arrived in Dalat, which was the home of the military academy, the summer capital...

Q: A beautiful place.

WYROUGH: ...with a U.S. military police guard at the airfield to keep U.S. people out unless they were there for legitimate business. I arrived there in the middle of January of '68. I was the senior American, was met by the deputy province advisor, an American Army Lieutenant Colonel, and he took me to where I would live for two years. I said, tell me about your defense plan. In effect, my recollection was, he said, we don't have too much of a defense plan because this is R&R up here for both sides.

Q: That was sort of the story that went around.

WYROUGH: So, I said, well, you present me with a contingency plan because your responsibility is to advise the mayor, the province chief, my responsibility is to see that the American community here is secure. You present me with an up-dated plan. Which he did a week later, and I approved it and about a week after that Dalat was one of the cities hit during Tet. It was an interesting assignment.

Q: Could you talk a little about, as long I've got you on the microphone, a little about what happened in Dalat during Tet.

WYROUGH: Well, my team was in the process of being greatly expanded in size. We had just rented a villa on top of a hill, across the street from the villa occupied by the U.S. Military Police detachment in the city, who were there to guard the airfield as I mentioned. And I had put four of my new officers into this villa. One night the Vietnamese guards, military guards, didn't show up. We must have gotten some sort of intelligence to put us on a little bit of alert. But I ordered the men into my villa in a little better part of town, I guess. And that night that villa, which was empty, as it turned out was the first building hit in the city. It was on a ridge line, and the VC came down the ridge line through the outskirts of the city, attacked that villa, went across the street, attacked the military police villa, which happened to be on the high ground immediately over the market place. The VC held the market place, as I recall, for a couple of days, but we mobilized forces, both Vietnamese and U.S., and drove them out. The cadets at the academy were assigned rear guard, local security missions, freeing up the regular Vietnamese military to join their units in the counter against the VC. A Lt. General, First Field Forces commander, would come in from time to time, set up his headquarters...if you're familiar with Dalat, that grand hotel overlooking the city. And they established something operating directly of First Field Forces Headquarters called Task Force South. It was a combined military operation, U.S. units and working in close coordination with ARVN [Army of the Republic of Vietnam] units of the 23rd division. But over a period of ten days the Vietcong were driven out of the city. There was some loss of life, but very little. And things returned to normal. It came as a great shock to me as one of the military in the country, to learn of the domestic reaction here. But that's another story, I don't want to get into that.

A month later, I took the first of a series of visits to all the U.S. supported military institutions in the region, military academies, naval academies, air force academies, Korean, Philippines, Taiwan, Japan, Thailand, Malaysia. Even went down to Canberra in Australia to visit the Royal Military College to get a feeling for their experiences and their efforts. The first one was to the Philippine Military Academy. I checked out Baguio, decided that Baguio was not the right place for my family. It was remotely located, it would have been difficult to get to. But decided to bring them to Clark Air Base, they were given a safe haven program such as the Foreign Service had in Bangkok and Taiwan. At that time there were only three-four-five, six at the most, military families of officers with special assignments in Vietnam whose presence was necessary beyond the ordinary twelve months. By the time my wife left in the summer of '70, that program had grown to about sixty families at that particular location, and there were comparable increases, I think, in Bangkok and elsewhere.

We graduated the first four year class in December of 1969. It was an optimistic moment. Ellsworth Bunker, as the ambassador, came up for the ceremony. I met him then. General Abrams had come up a couple of times. I had been selected to command this separate brigade that operated directly out of the First Field Forces, called Task Force South, its headquarters by that time was in a small town on the coast, but north of Saigon, south of Cameron Bay. I had three U.S. battalions under my direct control, and my headquarters was co-located with the headquarters of the assistant division commander of the 23rd ARVN, and he had usually under his control four ARVN battalions. So we had a sizeable force. Our responsibility was what the military calls an economy of force effort. Our area of responsibility was the southern four provinces of First Field Forces. That included Dalat, the two coastal provinces, and the province in which Dalat was located.

I turned over my command, in those days those brigade commands were six months only. I turned over my brigade in June of 1970, having served almost three years in country. Came back to the Pentagon for my second assignment. There I was assigned to Latin American affairs. Except for the six months with Cuban affairs, I had no background but there was a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Latin American affairs who had remembered me from those days, and although I really didn't want the assignment, I got it.

DOUGLAS R. KEENE
CORDS Officer
Go Cong Province (1967-1970)

Mr. Keene was born and raised in Massachusetts and graduated from Colby College. He joined the Foreign Service in 1967, serving first in Vietnam and subsequently at Middle East posts including Jerusalem, Karachi, Cairo, as well as Amman and Muscat, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission. His Washington assignments also concerned primarily Middle Eastern matters, including the Arab-Israel problem. Mr. Keene was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: What were they talking about when you came in, because this was just the beginning of our buildup in Vietnam?

KEENE: Yes. That was talked about a lot—Vietnam and Laos, Southeast Asia.

Q: So, how did that work for you? You were married so this meant you would go or not?

KEENE: I was the very first married officer involuntarily sent to Vietnam—one of my claims to fame.

Q: Firstly, how did you find the A-100 course?

KEENE: I found it quite interesting. I learned a lot; I mean, I didn't know how to write cables, or conduct visa interviews, or any of that stuff. And I didn't know the culture of the Department or of Washington, so I thought it was a very, very useful course.

Q: How did your wife feel about coming into the Foreign Service?

KEENE: I think she liked that; she liked the idea of traveling, living overseas. What she didn't like was when I got assigned to Vietnam.

Q: You went to Vietnam from when to when?

KEENE: Well, at first I took Vietnamese at the Vietnam Training Center in Arlington Towers.

Q: In the basement. In the garage.

KEENE: In the garage, right. That was ten months, then I guess they gave us another month of area studies, and so it would be...we went in April of '68.

Q: This would be after Tet (a North Vietnamese offensive waged at the time of the lunar new year)?

KEENE: Just after Tet.

Q: Where did you go?

KEENE: Go Cong.

Q: Where?

KEENE: In the delta, Go Cong Province. I was in Saigon for about a month first.

Q: You were in the delta from when to when?

KEENE: This was 1967. We were in CORDS I. CORDS was the acronym for Civil Operations, Revolutionary Development Support. This was later changed to Rural Development. It was part of MAC. MACV/CORDS. First group through. Very interesting. President Johnson had the CORDS I to the White House and then they lined the group up around the President, invited the media in and Johnson gave a little speech, talking about the new CORDS program, calling us "Warriors for Peace." (Some of the guys from that group are planning a first ever reunion later this year, so that should be fun.) It was 27 months. I got there in April and left two years and three months later.

Q: So you left in July or so of '70. What part of the delta were you in?

KEENE: It was IV Corps, but it was northern IV Corps. It's a small province. A lot of people haven't heard of it. The biggest close province was My Tho.

Q: Did you know by any chance Howard Gross?

KEENE: The name's familiar.

Q: Because Howard was down there; I visited him down there. He was in My Tho. I was in Saigon at the time as consul general at the embassy.

In the first place, what was the situation when you were there? It was shortly after the Tet offensive.

KEENE: Yes, yes. Well, there was still plenty of visible damage in the town. I started out working in the province capital as a New Life Development Officer, (which was pacification), but then they eventually had four young FSO's (foreign service officers), including myself, and they decided that we had four districts, and each of us should concentrate on one district. So I did that for a little while in Hoa Tan District, and then when the army major who was district senior advisor, when his tour came to an end, I became district senior advisor, and spent all my time out there for the rest of my tour.

Q: What were you doing?

KEENE: Well, I was working with my counterpart, who was the district chief, and we were also doing military operations, we focused on pacification. We built a school and a medical clinic in every village, and we had ten villages in the district, something like 80 hamlets. We electrified one of the villages as a demonstration project, dug wells, paved roads, built markets. We were doing all of this "hearts and mind" stuff; at the same time we had military training teams there and military guys on the district team would go out with the Vietnamese on patrol, ambushes, stuff like that. We also visited local officials in their villages and hamlets on a regular basis to find out what was going on and where the problems were. It was a lot of responsibility for someone 22 – 23 years old. You were in charge of your District Team, Mobile Training Teams operating in your district, you could call in air strikes or refuse permission for them and you had $10,000 a month for development projects. It was quite a while in the Foreign Service before I had a comparable degree of responsibility.

Q: Was there much fighting?

KEENE: There was fighting. Not as fierce as up in I Corps, but we lost a few guys. And we'd get mortared, stuff like that.

Q: Who were you fighting? Regulars, or...

KEENE: We had both. We had local VC (Viet Cong), and we had one mainline NVA (North Vietnam Army) division that would come in and out. In a heavily jungled area, they'd come in there and have their R&R (Rest and Recreation) and sometimes they'd attack someone while they were there. It was known as the Coconut Grove and it was on the border with Dinh Tuong, and they'd go back and forth. We had in My Tho area--forget precisely the name of their base--we had the U.S. ninth division, and they would often try to get our permission to conduct operations in Go Cong, and we would never let them, because they were indiscriminate: they'd kill anything that moved. Created more problems than they solved.

Q: What was your impression of the leadership of the Vietnamese, civilian and military, when you were there in your area?

KEENE: I got to know my counterpart and liked him personally, but there was considerable corruption. You could actually tell they were stealing us blind, but you couldn't figure out quite how they were doing it. And I suppose in retrospect it was petty corruption; they'd steal some cement or some rebar, and resell it and stuff like that. We didn't give them the money directly; we spent that ourselves. The Corps gave each district $10,000 a month of AIK funds (Assistance in Kind)--recycled local currency, Vietnamese currency, which after a while you had to have a shoebox to carry $100.

Q: How did you find the Corp's operation, the direction from Saigon?

KEENE: I did think it was pretty good. I met with William Colby a few times, who was the head of it at that time, but more often we'd deal with the Corps guys. For a while that was John Paul Vann, and then Colonel William Wilson—Coal Bin Willie, as he was known. He was given to inspecting things down to that level of detail. Vann was an impressive guy; Wilson was not so much. Our local province senior advisor was a retired colonel who wasn't really all that impressive.

Q: Was Vann always pushing to get things done?

KEENE: He was a pretty dynamic guy. My little district—we did okay, probably because we weren't very high up on the radar screen of the North Vietnamese, so they were generally satisfied when they came up to inspect there.

Q: It was sort of a "live and let live" situation between the local populace and the Viet Cong?

KEENE: There was certainly a large element of that. There were clashes every now and then, or our PRU (Provincial Reconnaissance Unit) would go out and capture somebody, but it wasn't high level. Lob mortars in every now and then. We'd do H and I—harassment and interdiction--fire every night. You knew it was a war zone, but if you weren't stupid about it you could get around and go to hamlets and villages and talk to people and do projects.

Q: Well having been there two years, it made you one of the old hands.

KEENE: Yes, I guess so.

Q: How did you feel about the war? Did you feel we were making progress?

KEENE: Actually, yes, on a local level. I wasn't so sure about the national level. I remember thinking, for example, that the invasion of Cambodia was a huge mistake... things like that. But you wondered about how they went about trying to fight the war; I thought a lot of that was really misguided. But locally we did okay; I thought we were trying to do the right thing.

Q: You left there in 1970. How did you feel? Whither South Vietnam from your perspective at that time?

KEENE: I guess I thought it was a toss-up. I wasn't quite sure which way it would go, but it was certainly no sure thing that we were going to win. We never understood what we were doing.

Q: Who were some of your colleagues you dealt with there—the corps people? Were they sort of with the program or were you all a bit bemused, or how would you describe it?

KEENE: Well, I don't know. I dealt more often with the people on my district team than I did with... We'd go in once a week into the capital and go talk to the people in charge there and say "This is what we need. Can you give us some resources?" And that was okay; they were fairly responsive. The place was awash in money, so if you needed some extra cement or rebar, or whatever, you could usually get it. We had a couple of sergeants with us, they knew how to get anything. You wanted a jeep? They'd go get it.

Q: In my era we used to call them "midnight requisitions"

KEENE: They did a lot of that.

Q: The sergeants are of course the people who run the army anyway. Who were the people you were dealing with in these villages? Pretty much peasants?

KEENE: These were peasants, but some were elected or appointed as village chief or hamlet chief. Usually we'd talk to them. Sometimes it would be, after we got that up and going, the People's Self Defense Force chief. Then there were district officials: they had a health chief, and an education chief, sometimes military, sometimes civilian. We also did a lot with the RD (Revolutionary Development) Cadre. The district cadre chief was a dynamic, resourceful guy, who really had a good feel for what was going on in the area.

Q: Were you able to get reasonable teachers, doctors or medical attendants down into your level?

KEENE: Yes, we were. Teachers. The medical people weren't doctors, mostly; there were a couple of doctors around, but they were, you know, technicians. That's basically what we had to offer, too; we had medics who would help them set up, try to teach them.

Q: Well then, where was your wife? Did she locate in Bangkok, or somewhere else?

KEENE: She went to Taipei.

Q: Taipei. How did she find that?

KEENE: She liked it very much. They had a group of people in the same situation, and they were in pretty nice housing. It was formerly AID (Agency for International Development) housing—AID had begun to phase out of Taipei, and they took that over. It wasn't a bad life. She studied Chinese scroll painting, Chinese, Chinese cooking, and God knows what else.

MELVIN R. CHATMAN
199th Infantry Brigade
Vietnam (1967-1970)

Mr. Chatman was born in Oklahoma and raised in California and Michigan. After graduating from the University of Michigan, he pursued theater interests before serving in the US Army in Korea and Vietnam. In 1970 he joined AID and spent the rest of his career with that agency. His overseas postings include Vietnam, Malaysia, Bangladesh and San Salvador. He also had assignments with AID in Washington and New York City dealing with refugee, rice imports and training issues. Mr. Chatman was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

Q: But you went to Korea for three years and then how did you...did you go with the First Calvary to...?

CHATMAN: No, I volunteered for Vietnam.

Q: So you went there in what '67?

CHATMAN: '67.

Q: Where did you go?

CHATMAN: I was around Saigon, 199th infantry brigade. I was first there with the civil affairs unit, no excuse me I was first there with the liaison office with the ROK army, from there I went to a civil affairs unit for the city of Saigon, then from that position I went to the 199th infantry brigade as the company commander and then as the S-5 you know what the S-5? Civil affairs.

Q: Well this is taking place when '67 to?

CHATMAN: '70.

Q: '70. So you were there during Tet?

CHATMAN: Yes.

Q: What were you doing when Tet happened? This was '68, what were you doing?

CHATMAN: I was about two blocks from the presidential palace in a BOQ when I happened. We were shifted around sort of put in different holes to fill in officer responsibilities while the fighting was going on. I never got in any kind of real combat. I was there but there were a lot of people who never had to fire anything during Tet. I was one of those people but I was there and I could hear everything. But then I transferred to the 199th and became involved with what was left of, you know it took about a year for the whole Tet thing to get cleared up, I went to the 199th I was part of that clearing up operation.

Q: It was the second Tet or whatever it was...

CHATMAN: The next year it was a mini-Tet.

Q: A mini-Tet in and around Choowang wasn't it? What was your impression or having been in Korea and then coming to Vietnam? What was your, did you see a real difference between the Vietnamese and the Koreans you were dealing with?

CHATMAN: Yeah but it is an unfair comparison because I was dealing totally with the military in Korea where I was dealing with the military and civilians in Vietnam and there it was a different ball game.

Q: What were the sort of things you were dealing with in with the civilians with in Vietnam?

CHATMAN: The last year, okay first of all as S-5 you deal with civilians. You are a military representative but your job is to deal with the civilians the military has to be friendly with in order for operations to be successful. But then, I got into the organization that was an advisory system. As a military person I was assigned to an organization that was the advisory system to the mayor of Saigon. So I was in charge of three districts in Saigon of dealing as a civilian, because we wore civilian clothes. I was a military person but I dealt strictly with civilian issues and for the districts of Saigon.

Q: What districts are these?

CHATMAN: District three, district two, district four, maybe it was three districts, let me see, district 7. There were four districts.

Q: What area does that encompass?

CHATMAN: Cholon, one part of Cholon was district seven; district four was down there by the port, district two was in the middle of Saigon and district one, I can't remember oh the racetrack. One of them was near the racetrack. So they had the big fighting during the Tet.

Q: Well how did you...the civilian government was mainly a military government wasn't it? The Vietnamese...

CHATMAN: Not in Saigon.

Q: Not in Saigon.

CHATMAN: They were all civilian. They didn't have military; if you went in the provinces the district chiefs were all military but not in Saigon.

Q: How did you find dealing with them?

CHATMAN: I didn't have any problem but I spoke Vietnamese, I could read so it made it really one might say it facilitated my official life and it facilitated my private life.

Q: I must say the Vietnamese young ladies are certainly attractive. Did you get at all involved in the problem of the GIs in Saigon, people going AWOL (absent without leave), going out on Toudoo Street getting drunk and you know what have you? There were a lot of young men sort of running wild.

CHATMAN: I did but I didn't in an official capacity. I did what I thought I could do as an individual but my job was...that was not my job. My job was to help them establish a democratic type of mockery of the U.S. governments that is what my job was.

Q: What was your impression about the government of really of Saigon and how well it was sort of representative?

CHATMAN: It was representative in terms of an American thing?

Q: Yeah.

CHATMAN: It was corrupt it was totally corrupt. It didn't represent anything but what people were afraid of. People voted for the government because they were scared to death of the Communist. They weren't voting for the government because they thought the government was that much better, they were scared to death of the Communists at least that was my thoughts. We never ever had the kind of government system that we thought we had and we set up there for years and years and lied to ourselves as to how well we were doing. That was our fault.

Q: Did you find...?

CHATMAN: The caste system and all of that was bullshit we had. Remember the annual evaluation system and all of that stuff to rank the security level of each of the hamlets and stuff like that.

Q: Oh yeah. Did you sleep at night in a village and how many bodies...?

CHATMAN: Yeah right, right, right class one or I can't remember what the level was but there were three or four different levels of villages based on security.

Q: Well Saigon itself during the time you were there was not a particularly I mean the Viet Cong weren't in I mean they might have been undercover but they weren't much of a overt presence of Saigon or anything like that were they?

CHATMAN: No, except they assassinated people. I personally saw several assassinations. They were there and it that happened, but they were not like in Iraq or anything like that but the same type of thing but they were more directed towards individuals not groups of people like that kind of stuff that goes on in Iraq. They were very, very specifically person-oriented person's position type of thing.

Q: Did you have any dealings with the embassy there?

CHATMAN: We were the major primary advisors to the mayor so that became a very sensitive issue with the embassy. It was above me that dealt directly with the embassy, I was in one of the worker bees, the queen bees dealt with the embassy, I never really got...except I did an evacuation. I was basically almost on the embassy staff during an evacuation.

Q: You were there until when?

CHATMAN: The 29th of April of '75.

Q: Of '75. Did you spend your entire time in Vietnam? Or did you have any tours elsewhere or anywhere else?

CHATMAN: Yes, I was in Malaysia for two years I was in Bangladesh for six years.

Q: I know but during, between... you went to Vietnam in '67 and you were the first tour in Vietnam, how long were you there?

CHATMAN: You know we really didn't have tours. AID (Agency for International Development) just sent you there and you were there until you were sent somewhere else. Oh, in military.

Q: In the military.

CHATMAN: I extended like two or three times.

Q: So you were there with the military for how long?

CHATMAN: Three years.

Q: So this would take you to...

CHATMAN: '70.

Q: At that point you decided to get out of the military?

CHATMAN: Yeah, because the handwriting was on the wall about the future of non- West Point graduates.

THOMAS PARKER, JR.
Deputy District Senior Advisor
Saigon (1967-1970)

Mr. Parker was born and raised in South Carolina and was educated at Davidson College, the University of Michigan and Duke University Law School. After service in the US Army, he joined the State Department in 1967 and was posted to South Vietnam, where he worked in the CORDS program. Mr. Parker subsequently served in Japan and Uruguay as well as in the State Department in Washington. His assignments were primarily in the economic development and management fields. Mr. Parker was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 2009.

Q: Yes. But that was the language on which you got off probation, Vietnamese?

PARKER: Yes.

Q: That's great. So you finally went to South Vietnam?

PARKER: Yes, I went to South Vietnam.

Q: To Saigon or-?

PARKER: No, I was assigned to a province south of Saigon. I guess when we arrived we were given a tour, a day or two tour of the country, flying here and there and popping into places and popping out. In any event the dice were cast and I was assigned to Go Cong Province which is, I believe, the second province due south of Saigon. It was at the, I forget the corps designation; I think it was at the top, the tiptop of the fourth corps, which was the southernmost corps area in Vietnam. So I was at the province headquarters just for a few weeks or so and then went out to one of the district towns, lived in a district headquarters. I think the team leader, an Army major, Manuel Citroen, a nice guy, a little reluctant to have me because his hooch was already crowded and he didn't want to squeeze one more fellow in but I think he got used to me. There was no problem getting along with all my Army buddies.

It was a fascinating experience. I did have my own SUV before they were called SUVs, an International Harvester Scout, and so typically on any given day I'd check in with my counterpart, who was the deputy district chief, a nice young man.

Q: Vietnamese.

PARKER: Vietnamese, and chat for a bit and see what he was up to, see if he wanted to go out and see anything using my transportation because he had no transportation so many days we'd go out someplace together and if he didn't want to go out then I'd probably go out someplace, basically observe what was going on. I found pretty quickly that my effectiveness as an advisor was pretty limited because all of the Vietnamese government officials I was dealing with were educated and commissioned officers, competent and hard working and patriotic and it was their country, after all, which they knew a lot better than I did. They knew their local situation better than I did. So, I mean, maybe I would be surprised to the extent that I had some influence but it wasn't as if I was giving them the stone tablets from on high which they were gratefully accepting and then immediately adapting their programs to my advice.

So anyway, I traveled around my district and just to leap ahead to give you the chronology, I ultimately was transferred to the second district and in the second district I was district senior advisor, so that was nice, I suppose, in terms of having a little more responsibility and looking a little better on some résumé. One incident early in my career in the first district involved the HES; Hamlet Evaluation System. For every teeny tiny hamlet, a hamlet being the very smallest aggregation of dwelling units and barnyards in the country, a system had been devised presumably primarily by the Americans with perhaps some input from the Vietnamese; I don't know the extent of the influence of the two parties. But it's a system for rating every single hamlet and some of the questions were quite objective: Is there a school in this hamlet, a primary school in this hamlet? Others were somewhat subjective, what is the overall level of security? In any event I went through my district's hamlets -- there were, let's say twenty-five of them -- just as carefully as I could using the HES and in my opinion the typical hamlet was overrated by at least one, maybe two letter grades; I think there were five letter grades but in any event they were all overrated and I proposed to downgrade them all and that proposal did not prosper. What I was told was that with the passage of time, if I wanted to downgrade a hamlet or two now and then that would be acceptable, we wanted accurate assessments of the situation but it simply would not be acceptable to have this wholesale downgrading across the district.

Q: That's very interesting. But when you say "downgrade," in your judgment they should be downgraded, that meant that their security was more- was less an issue or more an issue?

PARKER: It was probably more an issue and not just security but educational level, the condition of the roads. I mean, I forget the various things that were taken into account in the HES but some were, let's say, economic kinds of indicators that would clearly affect the wellbeing and lifestyles of the individuals or social indicators, the extent to which the government was supportive and never showed its face in the hamlet.

Q: So if the overall level of these 25 or so hamlets was downgraded that would show a more difficult security situation, also that other aspects of the various communities were not, perhaps as high as the local officials were claiming they were.

PARKER: I'm sorry; what was the last thing you said?

Q: They were claiming that they were higher than you thought they actually were.

PARKER: Yes, exactly. And I had no ax to grind; I was just going through this list of factors for each hamlet as best I could, based on what I knew, and trying to be factual and accurate and I came up with a different result. So that-downgrading, the wholesale downgrading did not take place. However, I always, I did think and I still think that if I were President Johnson back in Washington or General Westmoreland or the province senior advisor or anybody along the spectrum with political or military leadership I would want my decisions to be based on the best factual information that could be had coming out of, in this case, Vietnam. So, I felt it was my duty to provide the best factual information but at least in this instance that initiative did not advance.

Q: And was the resistance to that initiative more on the Vietnamese side or the American side or-?

PARKER: Well I only heard of it from the American side but, I mean, the province senior advisor made clear that that was just not acceptable, my downgrading of twenty-three out of twenty-five hamlets.

Q: So you had to relate to and act as an advisor in the first instance to the deputy district chief and also to the U.S. Army major; what was his position?

PARKER: District senior advisor.

Q: District senior advisor, and then you were- so you were sort of supervised by those two?

PARKER: Yes.

Q: And then you, in the second instance you became the district senior advisor in a different district yourself?

PARKER: Yes. Excuse me, but let me back up. In the first case, where I was the deputy district senior advisor, I advised the Vietnamese deputy district chief; he did not supervise me if that's what you said.

Q: Okay.

PARKER: He did not supervise me.

Q: So who did supervise you?

PARKER: The major who was the American district senior advisor. And similarly in the second place, in the second district, where I was senior advisor and my counterpart was a Vietnamese Army captain, who was the district chief, I advised him for whatever it was worth; he did not supervise me in any way.

Q: Okay.

PARKER: He accepted me graciously and I hope he took some of my advice.

Q: And who did supervise you in the second district?

PARKER: The province senior advisor.

Q: Okay. Who was an Army or diplomat?

PARKER: He was a- I had two; the one rotated out and the new one rotated in. They were both civilians; I think one of them was a retired military and the second was maybe retired USAID (United States Agency for International Development). They were both civilians; but, obviously on the provincial team there'd be a lot of military guys there with civilians as well.

Q: And in a province typically there were three or four districts or more?

PARKER: Well this was a small province so we had just four districts, probably very small, so I can't state it as a fact but I would think that the typical province had more districts.

Q: Okay. And as a, well in the first district or the second district did you go to the provinces regularly or there was interchange with them?

PARKER: Yes. Well, regularly is probably an acceptable word; that doesn't mean that I went every day. I probably went at least weekly, sometimes on my own initiative, sometimes there would be a meeting of all the American advisors. Occasionally the province senior advisor and an entourage would come out to the district for some purpose, generally not just only to meet with me but there'd be a ceremony, a school to be opened or a road to be dedicated, something like that.

Q: And to what extent or to what degree did you have contact relations with the embassy in Saigon or the military headquarters or both?

PARKER: Well military headquarters not at all; with the- I mean, in the province I certainly knew all the American military men on perfectly friendly terms but didn't really interact professionally with them to any significant extent except that I lived with them on the district teams. So far as the embassy went the only interaction I had was with a woman whose name I now forget who had something to do with travel and she'd made it kind of her mission in life to make travel arrangements for all the FSOs (Foreign Service Officers) who were serving in CORDS (Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support) out in the districts.

Q: And while you were there they established the CORDS system or-?

PARKER: It was there when I got there so-

Q: You were part of it?

PARKER: We knew we were going to CORDS.

Q: Okay. Which stood for?

PARKER: Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support.

Q: How long were you in South Vietnam in total then?

PARKER: Eighteen months; that was a standard tour after one year of language training, which struck me as a rather short period of time but there was a war going on and you know; I heard some bullets go by and mortar rounds exploding very near by. However, here's something that surprised me greatly, given the year of language training, given the presumably successful 18 months in the country; as my tour approached its end I anticipated that somebody would come up to me and say "Parker, are you willing to extend?" No one ever did. I didn't volunteer so I left after 18 months. I was really very surprised by that; I'd think that would be on somebody's checklist, for heaven's sake, to see if-

Q: Well they were bringing in all these new Foreign Service officers.

PARKER: Well, that's true.

Q: The pipeline was being replenished, I guess.

Would you talk a little bit more, Tom, about the security situation as you experienced it? You mentioned you saw some- heard some bullets fly but you also mentioned that you would have this vehicle that you would go out in. Did you have a, you know, a security battalion that went along with you or how did all that work? Did you go by helicopter sometimes?

PARKER: I probably flew in a helicopter once or twice. Well, in both districts I lived in the little district compound which housed the Vietnamese district government and also the American advisory team so we were all there in the center of the district town, you know, a modest little town, and this compound was surrounded by barbed wire and had lots of- I forget all the designations but there was the regular Vietnamese army, the Army of Vietnam, there were the regional forces, there were the popular forces--I'm very shaky here--and I think there was yet a lower grade of militia so these people had various levels of training and proficiency so the people providing our security worked in the bottom couple of those four or five levels but I think they were adequate to the purpose. So anyway, we slept and took most of our meals in this guarded, fortified compound, notwithstanding which, in the first district, in particular, we were periodically subject to mortar attacks. There was an area nearby called the Coconut Grove, which is where the VC (Viet Cong) hung out, the Vietcong hung out, so every so often- and this would vary so sometimes this would happen on consecutive nights or several consecutive nights and other times there'd be weeks between such an episode. They'd fire a few mortar rounds; they didn't have anything other than small mortars and so the rounds would come in and we'd all run and hop into our two large bunkers. There was one occasion I remember and cut me off if this is boring, but I was sitting back in the back of our little team hooch, the rest of the team was watching some forgettable movie, there were movies every night, so I was sitting back in the back reading Edwin Reischauer's book, a small book about Japan because that's where I wanted to go on my next assignment, and Mrs. Jordan, who we lovingly called "Ba" Jordan, "Ba" is the Vietnamese term for "Mrs.," Ba Jordan, in light of my performance in Vietnamese had allowed as how I could probably study Japanese next if I really wanted to, so I was reading up on Japan, and heard these mortar rounds go off. The problem was that we also had the district's two or three, 105 millimeter howitzers right there in the same compound that I described and they were always firing out- they were firing outgoing, H&A (harassment & interdiction) fire to harass and interdict the enemy during the night, keep them from getting their sleep. And although you can distinguish incoming from outgoing, at least in my case as a civilian who's reading a book, with a movie soundtrack going on, I wasn't paying much attention but it did finally register on me that I heard lots of chairs scraping and the running of feet and a bunch of the Vietnamese kids had their faces glued to the window screen looking in so they could watch the movie and they all disappeared. I kept hearing these bang bangs and finally realized that it was incoming. So I ran out the back screen door, which was latched, and maybe I didn't realize it, I just sort of broke it open, getting a scratch in the process which sent forth a drop of blood and so I wondered if maybe I might be eligible for a Purple Heart but I guess that was a military decoration and I never pursued that. I went to the back bunker and it was so absolutely, positively full of these Vietnamese children that I could not get in, I couldn't get the slightest bit of shelter from that bunker so I turned around and retraced my steps through the hooch to the front bunker, which was occupied only by the Americans or maybe there were a few Vietnamese officers who had been watching the movie with us so I was welcomed with open arms and relief into that place. So that's an example of one security threat.

On another occasion I was driving down this particular long, straight dirt road, I think paved with this red crushed rock called laterite, it's all over Vietnam, and without incident I got to the, probably, the village headquarters at the end of this road and parked and went in. I had in my briefcase a 22 caliber revolver, which was my personal security since I was a civilian. So I walked in and was sitting there chatting with the village chief, and as I had been pulling in a convoy of South Vietnamese army trucks was loading the troops who had been out sweeping the area, had finished, were getting into the trucks, and they piled into their trucks and left and there was a loud explosion and then this enormous outburst of gunfire from the Vietnamese troops in the trucks towards the tree line over yonder, a hundred yards or so. Well, there had been a command-detonated mine in the road which they had detonated near one of the trucks. They didn't do a very good job; a couple of Vietnamese soldiers had light wounds but no serious harm was done. But the point is that I myself, in my little International Harvester Scout had just driven over that very same piece of roadway 15, 20 minutes, 30 minutes before and, thanks, be to God, I guess the guy with his finger on the plunger felt that an army truck full of troops was a more valuable target than me. Maybe they didn't know my importance. In any event, that was a sobering experience.

Occasionally we'd be out doing something, maybe with my American district senior advisor, maybe with my Vietnamese counterpart, maybe with two or three people, looking at a school, looking at a road, talking to people, and there'd be a sniper off somewhere and we'd hear the bullets go by. "Pssssss". An interesting noise, especially if it hasn't hit you. So that was about the extent of the security threats that I faced; nothing dramatic. But of course, I knew that I had to be careful so I was never driving my Jeep around after hours of darkness and I never took a tour of the Coconut Grove that I mentioned; I knew where I could go and where I could not go, where it would be ill advised to go.

Q: But you would drive yourself, you wouldn't have a-

PARKER: Yes, I would drive myself.

Q: -Vietnamese driver. Yes.

How- at the end of your time there, and looking back, knowing all that's happened and happened in the next, say 10 years or even less than that, you know, did you sort of see what was likely to happen or did you think that things were getting better or, you know, you had one perspective from kind of the district level.

PARKER: I did not foresee what would happen. I didn't think that was likely to happen. I saw progress; I saw the performance of the Vietnamese military on various levels that I witnessed. I'm not even sure that I ever saw a regular Vietnamese army unit; they were always provincial and local troops and militia. But they were more effective in their operations; the hamlets even after my initial mental downgrading were more secure. The roads were better; the schools were functioning better with more teachers so things seemed to be moving in the right direction. But as I explained it, I think that some visiting American senior officer on one occasion, I guess he had a question. He didn't ask what I foresaw but he said how are they doing, and I said something to the effect well, they're not doing as good a job as we would do, you know, my hubris--I never used that word before--they're not doing as good a job as we would like them to do but they are doing a better job, they are doing a job and they are making progress. So the general took note of that. So that was about the way I saw it.

So I was there in 1969 and 1970 so obviously that was before- no, that was after Nixon's first election in '68 and of course he had a "plan" to get us out and I suppose our withdrawals had begun. I'm sure they had; at least during my tour they had begun.

I've lost my train of thought.

Q: Well besides the military advisor team that you were kind of a part of as a civilian in the district, the two different districts, was there much other American combat forces there or military presence?

PARKER: No, there were no American combat forces. I don't think the American forces ever came through my province. Now, they may have been in the big province across the Mekong River but never in my province.

Q: Because it was relatively secure, compared with some other-

PARKER: Relatively. It was reported to be the birthplace of the Vietcong but it was relatively secure. There were no B-52 strikes. There was one lone bomb crater on the outskirts of the province capital, which I laid eyes on one occasion. Apparently an Australian bomber had come over one evening and read the map wrong and was off 100,000 meters or 10,000 meters, you know, the units that the maps use, and they put the bomb in the wrong place. I don't think were any casualties but this unhappy episode was immediately followed by a cornucopia of compensation and aid from the province headquarters, the American province headquarters to assuage hurt feelings and repair damages, but no, there were no American troops.

I mean, we did have, as I said, the American military personnel on our provincial advisory team so when the local Vietnamese forces went on operations there'd be a few Americans tagging along with them, if it was a big operation, with the headquarters. Down at the district level, for instance, Americans, two or three, might go out with one of the local Vietnamese units that was conducting an ambush that night or conducting an operation of some sort that night. But there were no American units coming through the province.

Q: This was also a period in the United States where there was a lot of anti-war feeling and to some extent that's still with us today. How much of that did you think about, talk about, remember?

PARKER: Well I was certainly aware of the fact that it was going on; it was going on before I joined the State Department, before I got to Vietnam. One thing that- Here is something that did impress me, I must say. I don't want to overstate this but there were certainly members of our entering Foreign Service class, I hesitate to say so many years later if it was everybody but me or a majority or what, but certainly some members were so strongly against the U.S. Government position in Vietnam I just found myself wondering why on earth they wanted to work for the State Department, why on earth does the State Department want them working for it if they can't wholeheartedly in good faith support what is the major foreign affairs undertaking of their government and their country at this time. So that was certainly food for thought. I don't think I myself found the ongoing demonstrations, you know, what I would read in "Time" magazine or "Stars and Stripes" especially upsetting. Maybe one reason was that I thought the demonstrators were wrong and I thought the U.S. Government was right. I was certainly aware of it, no question about that, and I think it worried, to a certain extent, the Vietnamese.

I was going to say a minute ago, I'll say it now, but I knew American troops were withdrawing because I was getting a haircut at some barbershop on one of the American military bases that I found myself visiting on one occasion for some reason, and some man was cutting my hair but there was a pretty girl around the shop, I forget if she was a barber or what have you, but I was in the barber's chair and she came over and sort of leaned over, both her hands here on my upper leg, looking up at me, and asked in Vietnamese, which I understood perfectly well, questions about whether the United States would "throw away," that was the translation I had been taught for the word she was using, whether the United States was going to throw away Vietnam. I did my best to reassure her that would not be the case.

Q: You mentioned that you had visits from, I think you mentioned one senior officer; were there visiting VIPs (Very Important Persons) coming through all the time to sort of see, either members of Congress or people from Washington or mostly from in-country, they would come around the district occasionally?

PARKER: Certainly not all the time. I don't remember ever seeing anybody from Congress. I remember William Colby coming through on one occasion and I spent several hours talking with him until he fell asleep sitting on the sofa in the house that I was living in at the time. I was there with him and my province senior advisor and we were going back and forth; they had questions and I tried to answer them. I don't blame the guy for falling asleep with the load he had to carry. It was 9:00, 9:30 p.m., something like that, so it wasn't that late, but he was tired so he fell asleep.

Then a four star general came through, and I can't remember his name, I'm surprised to say. I think this was after Westmoreland left and Abrams became the top guy, maybe the visiting general was Abrams's deputy; I don't know. But he was a four star general and he was a very astute guy, very concerned and sensitive to local concerns and I was very happy to be assigned as his interpreter for the occasion so I accompanied him for, I don't know, a number of hours I guess, interpreted for him with village chiefs and local people and he asked caring questions and insightful questions so I hope I understood and interpreted correctly.

Q: So you used Vietnamese quite a bit and your level probably improved in the 18 months?

PARKER: I would think so. I forget what I was tested for when I came back. Whatever the test results might have shown I certainly believe I improved.

Q: Well this is the- on the 6th of July, 2009, today, I heard on the news this morning that Robert McNamara died this morning.

PARKER: Oh for heaven's sake. Well-

Q: So I thought we should note that.

PARKER: Yes, sure.

Q: Is there anything else about your assignment to Vietnam that we should talk about that we haven't covered yet?

PARKER: Well there was one really memorable experience which I think shows what the people were experiencing. This was in my second district so I was out with my then-counterpart, the military man, the Vietnamese district chief, an army captain, and it was the rainy season and we found ourselves in a building, it must have been a community structure of some sort; it had thatched walls and screen netting above that and then a tin roof; it was pouring rain so you could hear the racket on the roof, and a lot of people from the hamlet had jammed into this building. I'm sure they were summoned, come hear the district chief, and the district chief was giving them a pep talk about, you know, you've got to support the government and your militia has to be alert at night and take its duties seriously and that's to protect the people and you've got to do this and you're going to do that and we are doing this and rah, rah. There was a young Vietnamese woman with a baby on her hip and she responded and again, what a blessing to have studied the language because I understood her perfectly, she said, in Vietnamese, "Captain, you come in here in the daytime and you tell us what you've just told us. The Vietcong come in here at night and tell us just the opposite and they kill us. What are we supposed to do?" and the tears are streaming down her cheeks and everybody around her was agreeing with her. So, that was very moving and I think illustrated how the people suffered, caught in the middle.

Q: What was the main source of livelihood? Were these mostly farmers?

PARKER: Yes, rice farmers.

Q: Was this- Would you call this the delta?

PARKER: Yes.

Q: Okay. South of Saigon.

PARKER: Yes, the northern tier of the delta.

Q: Okay. Alright. Well, it was an unusual first assignment.

PARKER: Yes it was.

Q: I know there were many of your classmates, counterparts in that era who did the same thing.

PARKER: Yes.

Q: Before, well, before and to some extent after you. So many of us, many of you had that experience and you really- Let me just ask again; you didn't really have much to do with the embassy at all during that period.

PARKER: No, that's correct.

Q: Did you, on R&R (rest and recreation) or otherwise travel in the region or were you pretty much just in the district?

PARKER: Well we had two R&Rs; I used my R&R's to go first to Thailand and second to Australia. I probably went to Saigon half a dozen times during my 18 months. I went once because I had a very bad sore throat and I went to an American military hospital; this nice young doctor treated me. I felt so guilty for even being there, knowing who all the other patients were; the wounded soldiers. I infrequently went to Saigon and I don't recall what took me there except to transit there on my R&Rs, perhaps. I had no reporting requirement to the embassy and the embassy never checked on anyone because after all I had been seconded first of all to USAID; USAID seconded me to the hybrid organization CORDS, which was half USAID, half U.S. Army, if you don't recall. So I was, it might have breached some written agreement for the embassy to talk to me. I don't know; anyway, no contact with the embassy.

Q: So did you, you know, you formed all these impressions as you went around and you advised the- you were in contact with the army, senior advisor and so on, did you write reports and if so, to whom?

PARKER: I wrote a lot of reports to my Department of State- my Department of State superior at the province level. He left maybe halfway through my assignment and whether I kept doing it after he left I really don't recall. I just basically sat down at the end of the day and typed a page or two of an account of what I had done during the day and send those on up to him and he seemed to value them highly. What he did with them I have no earthly idea. I think towards the end of my tour I was asked to write a report- there was an initiative of some sort by the Americans, maybe a joint Vietnamese initiative, a joint Vietnamese-American initiative, I don't know, but I was asked to assess my district chief, this would be in the second district, for evidence of corruption, both pro and con. So I came up with the best report I possibly could and tried to be conscientious. I actually touched on a couple of things which, you know, suggested maybe there was a little minor leakage here and there. I don't even remember what it was; I mean, certainly nothing major. Well, I got, just as I will get the transcript of this conversation in due course, I got to look at my report in due course and even these mild references on the pro corruption side had been taken out of the report. You know, they asked for both sides and they asked for my report so I did the best I could but the negative material came out. I thought very highly of this young man, but nevertheless the assignment was to assess everything; there were a couple of little things which might have suggested something slightly out of order so I touched on those, but that didn't survive.

Q: Alright. Anything else about Vietnam?

PARKER: It was a lovely country. I was always fascinated by the sky, and the clouds, especially during the rainy season. The colors in the rice paddies, the different varieties of rice, different times of year, and the different stages of the growth of the rice crop were just fascinating. I lugged a camera around with me essentially every waking moment in Vietnam and came back with 4,000 color slides, so I had fun taking pictures. I guess that is illustrative of the fact that I was very lucky to be serving as a civilian advisor in a relatively peaceful province, so with just some care as to where I was and what I was doing I had the luxury of being able to take a lot of pictures.

Q: Was there interest on the part of anybody in such, you know, mundane subjects as the state of the rice harvest or, you know, whether- sort of more commercial economic things like that, markers of-?

PARKER: I have the vague impression that occasionally agricultural attachés or experts from the embassy or from USAID would at least come through the province. I'm not sure that I ever laid eyes on them but they were interested, certainly, in the agricultural side of things. So far as the economy goes, I'm thinking there was a report of some sort, which wasn't my responsibility but somebody was working on it, probably at the province level and since I was at the district level I wouldn't have been involved.

WALTER L. CUTLER
Political Officer
Saigon (1969-1971)

Ambassador Walter L. Cutler was born in Massachusetts in 1931 and entered the Foreign Service in 1956. He served in Africa and Korea and was ambassador to Zaire and Tunisia. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

CUTLER: When I sort of offered myself up for reassignment and the Ambassador was fully supportive, there was one logical place for me to go at that time and that was Vietnam.

And, indeed, it wasn't too long thereafter that I received a message of congratulations that I had been selected for a "high priority" position in the American Embassy in Saigon, and did I have in any problems in going there, of course without family and all the rest.

Oddly, I really hadn't thought too much about going to Vietnam. But when I was asked to go there, I figured: Well, this is going to be a personal hardship (I had children at very tender ages in terms of development, 8 and 10, something like that), and yet I figured that there was a need and I had a duty to go. And I figured, perhaps naively, that all Foreign Service officers were going to end up in Vietnam at one point or another during the course of their careers, so I might as well go now.

So I agreed to go to replace Roger Kirk as the Chief of the External Affairs Unit within the Political Section. That in itself gives you a little idea of the complexity of the operation there. Because we had not only a Chief of Political Section, but we also had a Minister-Counselor for Political Affairs.

We had a very, very large operation. And as Chief of the External Affairs Unit I had two principal responsibilities: One was to coordinate, working closely with the CIA Station Chief and other Embassy elements, information regarding North Vietnam. We were the Hanoi and Viet Cong watchers, if you will. And the other, which perhaps was more substantively important although somewhat latent, was working within our government and with the South Vietnamese government in planning for a peace settlement: what we called "contingency planning".

So I went to Saigon in May of 1969, as I recall. My family was to be safe-havened in England, and I took them as far as Beirut, where we had a brief holiday, back in the days when Beirut...

Q: You could have a holiday in Beirut.

CUTLER: Right, right. Can you imagine that? This was 1969, and the reason I remember is that that was the moon walk. I remember going to the embassy in Beirut, where we all watched on television the first men on the moon. So after that, it was off to Saigon.

Q: Sometimes it's interesting to get one's initial impression. What did you think about the situation in Vietnam? Before, you said you'd been dealing with other matters, so this wasn't high on your list of priorities. How did you feel about the situation there?

CUTLER: Well, that was 1969, when I guess we still felt that there was something to be gained by our involvement in Vietnam, and I had no reason to question that.

I had had a peripheral involvement in the matter. When I was in Seoul, in a Political-Military position there in the embassy, I did get involved with the questions of the South Korean troops in Vietnam. This was a very important part of the "many flags" that we were trying to show to the free world in South Vietnam, and so I was perhaps a little more conscious of what was going on in Vietnam than I would have been had I been still in Iran or elsewhere, like Ulaanbaatar! I didn't question too much the wisdom of our being there.

But very soon after I got there I realized that the situation was not going well and was not likely to go well, even in the long term. And that it was a question of working out an honorable disengagement on our part, including getting our prisoners back, and trying to leave something in the wake of our disengagement that was viable. That is, trying to leave a government in South Vietnam that could cope for itself. I thought there was a chance of doing that. I didn't think it was likely, but I thought it was possible. So we were working for that.

During the period I was there, 1969 to 1971, the war was pretty much on the borders. It was not a period of heavy armed conflict throughout the country. And, as you may recall, the incursion into Cambodia occurred in 1970, while I was there in Vietnam. So one did not have the sense of a country about to go down the tubes. The military situation looked somewhat improved, but it was hard to imagine, over the long term, how we could get out without leaving a dubious situation at best. But it was worth the chance. And we had put so much into it by then, you just couldn't stop.

Q: You talk about a dubious situation. What was dubious?

CUTLER: Dubious was the quality of leadership in South Vietnam and the dedication and support of the people in the countryside of a central government in South Vietnam.

Q: Well how were we reading the support of the people? We were there most of the same time. But what were the modes of trying to figure out how the people felt about the government?

CUTLER: That was very difficult for me to assess. I was in a very particular part of our operations there. I was external, therefore I was quite consumed by the political situation in North Vietnam -- that's what we tried to watch -- and consumed by seemingly endless preparation and vetting of contingency planning for regroupment and withdrawal of our forces.

Q: This was the time Nixon was coming in, after you arrived there, and this caused much of the planning for the Vietnamization, didn't it?

CUTLER: Yes, but what I did, Roger Kirk had been doing for the two years prior to that. In other words, even back in the 1960s (Roger was there from '67 to '69), we were trying to get the South Vietnamese government to think ahead to what a solution would look like. Some of this was based upon the assumption that, militarily, we would come out on top, and that at some point the Viet Cong and Hanoi would come to the South Vietnamese government and say: "Look, OK, uncle." Or at least, "Let's talk about a cease-fire."

More and more as I was there, we began to think in terms of having to seek a cease-fire and to try to persuade the other side that there was something to be gained from less than total victory. But, initially, what we were talking about was an ending of the fighting, based upon either a stalemate or the North Vietnamese suing for a cease-fire because they couldn't take any more pressure. If that should happen, we didn't want suddenly to be there unprepared.

So we wanted, in-house, to be sure that we were looking at these various options, how it would be done and so forth. We had dozens, literally dozens of contingency papers covering various aspects of an end to the fighting.

Then, from time to time, we would consult with the South Vietnamese government. We would take our papers to them, and, together, we would go over these papers and get their input.

Now on that score, quite frankly, it was always difficult to interest the South Vietnamese leadership in this kind of longer-term thinking. Understandably, they were very preoccupied with the war. The thought of what would happen when a cease-fire came and after, was something which seemed rather remote to them. It didn't seem terribly relevant to the issues, the priorities of the day.

Nevertheless, every two or three months or so, Ellsworth Bunker would go over, and I'd go along beside him, along with Martin Herz, the Political Minister. We would go and see Thieu and Ky, the top leadership of the South Vietnamese, and we would discuss these contingency plans. These sessions were necessary; I don't know how useful they were. At times I felt, quite frankly, that the eyes of the South Vietnamese would start to glaze over a bit, because none of this was very exciting. It seemed, frankly, rather remote, even sometimes to me.

Q: What was your personal impression of the leadership, not only the top, but in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the people you dealt with in the South Vietnamese government?

CUTLER: They had some good people, but it was thin. By that I mean you go down below the Foreign Minister and perhaps his deputy and, quite frankly, at the middle to lower levels of the government I thought the quality was very uneven at best and lacking in really dedicated, competent officials.

One thing that always amazed me: Here we are in the middle of a war, the American Embassy working around the clock (as we tend to do around the world, but particularly in Saigon during that time), you'd try to raise somebody in the Foreign Ministry after five at night, and often it was difficult. They would take their regular holidays and so forth, and it's marvelous, but in a war situation, I thought it was rather extraordinary.

Q: I can remember on a Vietnamese holiday we would run the consular section, but we would run it purely with Americans, working twice as hard, because our Vietnamese staff, who were, of course, essential to our work, were on holiday. We were doing all the visa, passport, protection and welfare work while our Vietnamese staff had the day off. We hated Vietnamese holidays needless to say.

CUTLER: In retrospect, perhaps the Vietnamese knew what they were doing. They had lived with foreign invasions over the centuries, and this was the era of the American presence. Maybe their more laid-back approach to life reflected a sense of perspective in history, whereas we were rather frenetic in what we were doing.

Q: We tend to charge in.

CUTLER: That's right.

Q: Well now, looking at the embassy, how did you feel, can you talk about how the more junior officers felt about the war situation? It was a time of war protests and all this, and we were going through our own sort of '60s movement of young officers, who were sort of bringing some of the campus rebellion with them and all, and here you were in the middle of this with junior officers. How did they react to the war?

CUTLER: Well, I don't know, maybe you saw more of that than I did. I had a couple of younger officers working for me in my unit of the Political Section, and I didn't sense at the time any great disaffection or disillusionment with what we were doing.

Quite frankly, I don't think anybody had time to even think about what we were doing. There was so much work, the pressures were so heavy, and we were all just trying to get it done. I don't recall any major problems with respect to the attitudes, the dedication of those working in the embassy.

Remind you, it was a big place, and I never had time to sit around and chew the fat much with younger people, or with anybody for that matter. As you recall, it was sort of a six-and-a-half-day operation.

But on Sunday afternoons we used to go over to Martin Herz's swimming pool and engage in a literally bloody game of water polo. All of the frustrations and all that other lack of [physical] activity throughout the week would come out in this incredibly aggressive game of water polo. But we used to love it -- blood and all.

Q: Within the embassy did you have the feeling that Ambassador Bunker or Deputy Ambassador Berger had any qualifications about what was going on? How did they feel about the situation at the time, from your point of view?

CUTLER: I didn't have very much of a feel for that, as far as their inner thoughts were concerned. Again, it was a big operation.

E. ALLAN WENDT
Economic Officer, USAID
Saigon (1967-1971)

Ambassador Wendt was born and raised in Illinois. He was educated at Yale University, Institut d'Etudes Politiques (Paris) and Harvard University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1959, he specialized in international energy, Economic and Commercial Affairs at his various assignments in Washington DC and abroad. His foreign posts include Saigon, Brussels, Cairo and Ljubljana, where he served as the United States Ambassador to Slovenia from 1992 to 1995. The Ambassador was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

WENDT: I arrived in Saigon for the second time in August of 1967. As I said previously, I had been out there briefly in August of 1965 with Henry Cabot Lodge. I went back in August of 1967 and stayed until July of 1971 -- so, four years, even though the tour of duty was officially only 18 months.

Q: When you initially went out, what was your job?

WENDT: On paper I was assigned to the embassy Economic Section, but in actuality, I was in USAID. It was a joint State-AID economic section. But the embassy involvement was a fiction. It was one big economic section located in one of the USAID buildings. I had a job that involved markets. I was analyzing commodity markets in Vietnam, particularly rice. Rice was a critical commodity in Vietnam. Because of the war and the insecurity in the countryside, rice production in Vietnam had fallen off greatly. To make up for that, we instituted a PL480 (Public Law 480) program. Public Law 480 provides for the sale of agricultural commodities, surplus to the US, to foreign countries in need. It wasn't a commercial sale. We were paid the price of the rice in local currency. So, it was an assistance program. We got what was called "counterpart funds" in local currency, which we could use to pay a lot of our local expenses.

Q: In some countries, you face a real problem because they go for mushy rice and we don't. I mean, there are different types of rice. What was America producing?

WENDT: Our rice was considered by the Vietnamese to be rather low grade rice. As you imply, for Americans, rice is rice. For the Vietnamese, this is not so. There are many different grades of rice and ours was not near the top of their list in terms of quality. But nonetheless, they were a country in need and so they took our rice. We imported vast quantities of it into the country. My job was to help organize this trade, and in particular to learn enough about rice production and trade in Vietnam to be able to project what their needs would be for imported rice. It was a massive program. A lot of money was involved.

Q: This was the major agricultural program, wasn't it?

WENDT: Yes. We were importing at the peak of the program something like 750,000 metric tons of rice a year -- millions and millions of dollars worth of rice. So, finding out what was happening in Vietnam, not only with regard to how much rice they were producing themselves but also conditions in the countryside, was important. How big was the crop and what was the market outlook for the future? As areas became pacified, more rice would be grown. The job meant keeping your fingers on the pulse of Vietnam's agricultural markets and monitoring the security situation in the countryside, keeping a watch on such oddities as illegal exports. A lot of people said, "Well, there's really plenty of rice in Vietnam. The problem is it's all being illegally exported to Cambodia because the government in Vietnam has pegged the official price at too low a level, so that farmers don't find it worthwhile to sell their rice locally." That led almost to a mythology of oceangoing junks loaded with Vietnamese rice wafting across the Gulf of Siam and being sold illegally outside the country. In fact, this was a lot of nonsense. There was no evidence that any such thing was happening on a significant scale.

Q: Did you get involved with the so-called "miracle rice" program at all?

WENDT: Yes, I did.

Q: Could you explain what this was?

WENDT: This was a high yield rice. "IR-8" it was called. This was a rice variety that we thought would help cover the deficit in rice production in Vietnam. But it didn't work that easily. It was not that easy to grow. It needed a lot of fertilizer and other inputs that also cost money. The taste of the rice was maybe not as good as some other varieties. Still, the program was making some progress. But it was not a miracle solution to the rice problem in Vietnam. Remember, this was a country that was a net exporter of rice before the war. So, it really was rather sad, but it was a direct result of the lack of security in the countryside that a country that had been a net exporter had become very dependent on rice imported from the United States. Occasionally, Vietnam would buy rice in commercial markets from Thailand. We didn't much like that because we had ample rice available under the PL 480 program and our market, the US market, had adjusted to Vietnam's requirements. Also, the Vietnamese didn't have to pay precious foreign exchange for American rice. They could pay for it in local currency, whereas when they bought rice from Thailand, it was a straight commercial sale involving scarce foreign exchange. I think the PL 480 program actually was quite successful. It did what it was designed to do.

Q: Did you feel the hand of Senator Ellender from Louisiana at all, whose state was a major rice producer? Ellender was very much into sugar and rice, I think.

WENDT: Indirectly, yes, because every time the Vietnamese would go offshore and buy rice commercially -- say, from Thailand -- there would be screams from the rice trade in the United States. Of course, we had to analyze whether these purchases were justified or not. That was part of my responsibility. So, I became a kind of rice expert. I don't still have that expertise, but at the time, I probably knew as much about the rice market in Vietnam as any non-specialist around. It was interesting for me because I had to get to know a lot about how the trade was conducted. I met the Chinese rice merchants who conducted the trade. I traveled all over the rice producing areas in the Mekong Delta. It was an interesting job.

Q: Were you getting good reports from the field on rice production? We had all these officers out on the CORDS program at the time.

WENDT: I would not say that the information we got from American sources was all that useful. You could find out far more by talking to the Chinese merchants who were conducting the trade.

Q: We're talking about indigenous Chinese, too. Were these Chinese who lived in Vietnam?

WENDT: Yes, these were Chinese who lived in Vietnam. As you know, there was a big Chinese community there. But the Chinese were not newcomers. They had emigrated there from the southern part of China back in the Ming dynasty. They had been around for 300 years. But they remained Chinese.

Q: I know, when I was there, I used to see them coming out of government buildings on bicycles, coming out with huge sacks of rice, which I'm told were part of their pay. Were you looking at rice as being a currency, too?

WENDT: Well, not really, because we were not interested in promoting a barter economy. Matters like that were conducted outside of official channels. All of that was probably illegal. Inevitably, there was theft. We were bringing in such a huge supply of commodities, materials of all sorts, that inevitably in a period of wartime scarcity, a certain amount would be siphoned off. At the time, the Vietnamese were blamed for it -- to some extent, rightly so, but there was a lot of American collusion. Even in our own military, the GI drivers would occasionally sell on the black market an entire truckload of goods destined for the PX. So, there was corruption. There was corruption among the Thai and the Filipinos who were stationed there. I sometimes had to laugh a bit about it. Whenever there was a shipment of electric fans to the PX, the Royal Thai Cobra troops would find out about it before any of the rest of us and be in line outside of the PX when the fans were put on sale.

Q: I would see them being actually marched through. They would all buy the same things.

WENDT: Yes. And then the next day, if you wanted an electric fan, you couldn't get one in the PX, but you could get it at the street market. I'll never forget the French Consul General Jacques de Folin at the time coming to me—I had come to know him quite well. He said, "Allan, you know, now when I really need a stereo set, I know I can get one in Hong Kong or I can send out for it through the Peter Matheson diplomatic supply catalogue and what not. But all this takes time.

Could you possibly get one for me at the PX? That would be a lot simpler." I said, "Well, Jacques, I could, but it's a bit tricky for me to do that. It's against the regulations. I would feel a little uncomfortable violating our own regulations. I would have to sign for it." I think we had ration cards. I said, "I've got a better way for you to do it. You buy it on the street. I don't know how they get the goods, but they get them. You just find one of these ladies squatting on the side of the curb hawking various merchandise. She'll have the PX catalogue. You tell her what you want, and I guarantee she'll have it delivered to your residence the next day." And that's exactly what he did. Of course, he had no difficulty acquiring foreign currency on the black market, like virtually the entire foreign community except the Americans. The Vietnamese were maintaining the piaster with our approval and support at an entirely unrealistic and overvalued exchange rate. But for Americans, it was strictly forbidden to change money on the black market. Not all Americans observed those rules, of course, but I think a lot of them did.

Q: A lot did, and those who didn't ended up coming before the Irregular Practice Authority, which I chaired.

WENDT: Exactly. You know all about it.

Q: For this recording, we would take people... It boiled down to a civilian court martial. You would take away their PX privileges. This was for people who were not in government, but working for the government, which essentially killed them as far as operating in the Vietnamese economy was concerned. It was sort of annoying because almost all the other countries were living off the black market. In fact, we used to call it "The Bank of India" because of all the Indian money changers in downtown Saigon. We used to go after them.

WENDT: At the time, I thought that Americans should not have been put in this situation. I felt then, and I still do feel, that if the United States wanted to subsidize the government of Vietnam, we shouldn't do it through the exchange rate mechanism. We should just say, "Okay, we're going to subsidize you so that you will have enough foreign exchange," but not take it out of the pockets of the individual Americans who lived there by forcing them to acquire everything they might need locally at a very unrealistic exchange rate. There was no cost of living allowance to compensate for it, as I recall. There was a hardship differential, but it was not strictly speaking a cost of living allowance. It was just designed to compensate people for being in a tropical, developing country and a war zone. Anyway, that's the way it was. But only the Americans observed this restriction.

Q: Also, I think, it was a little unfair, too, because the military had no real need, you might say, for money. I mean, they had no need for anything because they could get everything through the PX and all. So, they had no appreciation of the civilians who were trying to live mostly by the rules. Very difficult.

WENDT: A lot of official civilians lived on the economy. You did need to acquire a certain amount of goods on the local economy, particularly to pay housekeepers and buy food. You couldn't buy all your food at the PX or commissary. It wasn't practical. I think that was unfortunate. I was not in a sufficiently high ranking position to be able to argue the case at the time. Even if I had been, I wouldn't have gotten anywhere.

Q: I'm interested in your reaction looking at how we were doing this. I mean, you came out of the FSI economic course and Harvard and all this. You've got economic models, how you do economic analysis, and all of a sudden, you're in a place where it looked like we were controlling all the levers. What do you think was right? What do you think was wrong from your observations at that time?

WENDT: I thought, on the whole, that what we were doing in the economic area was sensible. We had a commercial import program designed to supply needed goods to the Vietnamese, the sale of which would absorb a lot of local currency and thus keep down the rate of inflation. We paid for the foreign exchange part of it. Some people didn't like this program, which involved among other goods an influx of Honda motor cycles, you remember. The streets of Saigon were a relative sea of motorcycles.

Q: I was told this was something to absorb --

WENDT: Yes -- absorb local currency. That was the idea at the time, but it annoyed people because they saw the pollution, the traffic jams, all these young men -- we called them cowboys -- who should have been in the army rather than roaring around the streets of Saigon on their Hondas. But remember, this was a country that didn't have the kinds of transportation we're accustomed to in the United States. From a purely economic point of view, enabling people to go from one place to another is fundamental. You can't develop an economy if people can't move around. So, the program served that purpose as well. Maybe we allowed too many consumer goods to be imported. But we were trying to keep the lid on inflation and enable the Vietnamese to maintain a reasonable standard of living. If you don't bring in enough commodities, all you do is drive up prices. You don't want an economy of scarcity. So, we tried to bring in enough, not only to absorb the excess purchasing power that was generated in a wartime inflationary economy, but also to provide basic infrastructure needs, and transportation is infrastructure, even if it takes the form of Hondas.

So, I thought, basically, by the beginning of the 1970's we were on the right track in terms of the economy. I think the evidence justifies that view. I remember in 1970 the rate of inflation of the Vietnamese economy was less than two percent. This was at the height of the war, in an underdeveloped country with a rather primitive economy fighting for its survival, and yet the rate of inflation was only two percent. That was remarkable. To me, that as much as anything signified that we were on the right track. Domestic production was picking up. The domestic economy was producing more and more rice. Goods were moving in the countryside. Things were going in the right direction. I thought it was a vindication of our policies. Whether we could have done as much with fewer Americans in the country and with less money is always open to debate. As I said earlier, I do think at times we tended to overwhelm the situation. We might have achieved a comparable result with less of an American presence. I thought the American presence had become so large that it was itself a liability. We needed to get the Vietnamese to do more things for themselves. The problem was that if they saw that the Americans were going to do everything for them, they didn't have the incentive to take on all these responsibilities themselves.

Q: Which included not just the economic side, but also the military side. We tended to brush them aside and say, "Here, we'll take care of it."

WENDT: That's right. Well, eventually, we moved away from that with the Vietnamization program.

Q: I think that was what Nixon started.

WENDT: Yes.

Q: You started in Vietnam in early '68, was this right?

WENDT: I got there in August of 1967.

Q: In a way, everything sort of goes up to Tet and is post Tet. Tet was January 31, 1968. How did you see the situation on the ground, what you were getting from your colleagues and from being a member of the team and all? What was the military and political situation?

WENDT: We didn't have any advance indication of the Tet offensive. We were caught completely unaware. I know there was some intelligence indicating possible trouble, but I was not privy to that information.

Q: I'm not really talking about that. I'm talking about how it was going in general, both on the political side in Vietnam -- we've already talked about the economic side -- and also on the military side as you saw it up to Tet?

WENDT: To me, it seemed like a stalemate. I did not have the impression we were making great progress. I thought, at best, maybe we were holding our own. I did detect at the time what I thought was a lack of motivation on the part of some South Vietnamese to make the sacrifices necessary to prevail in the struggle. That may have been a shortsighted view, like all generalizations -- failing to take into account that there were lots of very highly motivated, dedicated Vietnamese people. Remember, this was at the peak of the American presence, the big buildup. I was worried that we were simply overwhelming the situation, kind of pushing the Vietnamese aside, and that ultimately, that approach was not going to work, and that we needed to find a way to motivate more Vietnamese to assume greater responsibility themselves for what was happening in the country, but that's not the way we went about it.

Q: President Thieu wasn't present by the time you arrived there, was he?

WENDT: Yes, he was.

Q: Did you have the feeling that there was at least a stable government?

WENDT: Not stable enough, I thought at the time. I have to back track a little here and say that I was skeptical at the time and I'm even more skeptical in hindsight about the wisdom of getting rid of Ngo Dinh Diem. What came after Diem was much worse. The Thieu government, at least in 1967, seemed to me to be not as effective as I would have thought necessary in order for us to prevail in this struggle for us, for the Vietnamese, for the West. There was a lot of backing and filling and signs of real progress were hard to find. Those signs did come later, but not in the way people anticipated. It was a difficult period. I was concerned and skeptical about whether we were on the right track. To me, it seemed more like a stalemate.

Q: Did you yourself deal with the Ministry of Agriculture, the Ministry of Trade, etc.?

WENDT: Sure.

Q: How did you find their level of efficiency and all?

WENDT: There were a few dedicated individuals, usually harassed and overworked, and a lot of people who didn't seem to be doing very much -- this was a common problem in developing country economies. They're not paid much and are almost driven into some form of corruption. Some people in very high places were quite corrupt. That's a theme I want to come back to in view of what happened to Vietnam after it fell to the communists. At the time, you judge by the evidence before you. Although we had good working relationships with the ministries, their top people were very hard-pressed. One might have wished for more people we could work with fruitfully. They were overwhelmed. I don't want to paint a negative picture -- not at all. As I said, there were dedicated, able individuals who I thought were doing their best in difficult circumstances. Yet some of my foreign colleagues would say I wasn't cynical enough. I can remember later when I would say something favorable about some particular individual -- and people would say, "Oh, you've got to be kidding. That guy was so corrupt. He's stashed huge amounts of money in bank accounts in France and the United States" and so on and so forth.

Q: Of course, one never knows... Sometimes, these are just plain stories.

WENDT: I know.

Q: It's easy to say.

WENDT: There was a lot of back biting. And the Vietnamese were pretty tough on each other. I think it's almost a national trait. They don't help each other that much. At times I had the impression they seemed to like carving each other up. But this was a particularly difficult period we were going through. We took a number of actions that were well-intentioned but perhaps in retrospect were misguided. They were more a reflection of our own circumstances and our own predilections than they were a realistic assessment of what was feasible and desirable in a wartime situation in Vietnam. This was sometimes true even in our assistance programs. There's a story I always like to tell about our effort to sell surplus commodities to the Vietnamese. You know, one of those commodities was bulgur wheat, a widespread product in the United States, but not evidently to the Vietnamese taste. We tried very hard to convince the Vietnamese that this was a useful product, that they should eat it, that it was nutritional and easy to cook, and so on. But they didn't want any part of it. So, we were getting nowhere.

One day in a province in the Mekong Delta, one of our USAID rural affairs people was touring a village and came across a farmer and his wife, and out in front of their hut a large caldron was on the fire. The woman was preparing a whole vat of bulgur wheat. The American was absolutely thrilled. This was the first example he had seen of the Vietnamese being willing to use this commodity. So, he took out paper and pencil and started making notes about this remarkable breakthrough and got an interpreter over to talk to the woman. But before he could pursue the matter, she came along and picked up the caldron, took it out back behind her hut and poured it into a trough for the pigs. So, the poor chap, thinking that he had discovered at last a great breakthrough on bulgur wheat -- he was crestfallen. Through his interpreter, he said to her, "I am absolutely dumbfounded. If all you're going to do is feed it to the pigs, why on earth did you bother to cook it?" And she said, "Well, that's the only way they'll eat it." So, that's just a vignette about some of the frustrations we encountered in our aid program.

Q: Let's stop at this point. We'll pick it up at the end of Tet. We haven't really discussed what you were doing, what happened, and all that. I think that's what should guide our discussion.

Q: This is the 10th of July, 1996. Let's pick up at Tet -- January, 1968. Where were you, how did it hit? Can you tell us your role in Tet?

WENDT: I had been in the country only about four or five months. As at most large embassies, there was a duty roster. Periodically, your name came up and you pulled duty. It was for a week at a time. Shortly before my turn in January of 1968, the Embassy instituted a new procedure, requiring that duty officers sleep in the building at night, instead of just being there until a certain hour and then going home. I suppose they thought that would provide more security in the event of a problem, that it would give you access to all the facilities of the embassy. It makes a certain amount of sense in a situation like that where there was a war going on. So, that was my first stint as Duty Officer. It wasn't the first night. I honestly don't remember which night it was, maybe the second.

I was sleeping in a small office on the fourth floor near the communications area. These were the quarters of the duty officer, very spartan, nothing much there but a cot and a chair. I had a manual of instructions. I had looked at that, of course, and one thing I noted right away was that most of the information in the duty officer's manual was out of date. So, I didn't pay a great deal of attention to it. Well, about 2:30 in the morning, I was half asleep. The sleeping conditions weren't ideal. Maybe I was dozing rather than sleeping. All of a sudden there was a loud explosion that really shook the building. I didn't know what was happening, whether rockets were being fired at the building or what. Anyway, we had been instructed in the event of an explosion to take cover immediately. So, recalling that instruction, I dove under the bed. A lot of people years later thought that was very amusing as a first reaction. I had difficulty explaining that I was simply following the precautions that had been given to us. When you're under a bed, this is a good shelter from falling masonry and debris and whatever. Anyway, it didn't take long for me to grasp what was really going on -- that we were being attacked. I then called the phone extension of the Marine guard down on the ground floor. He told me there was a Vietcong commando squad trying to break into the building. They had blown open a hole in the wall surrounding the compound, the outer perimeter, and rushed immediately into the compound, and surrounded the embassy building itself. They were firing everything they had at us.

In the beginning, of course, being inside the building, I couldn't really know what was going on - - and I was not foolhardy enough to go up to a window and look out, where I would have been in the line of fire. Actually, you couldn't look out that easily anyway because the building itself was surrounded by a concrete lattice work shell, sort of an outer wall with a space between the wall and the building itself -- and the shell looked like it was part of the building.

Q: Which was designed in some ways to deflect rocket propelled grenades (RPGs).

WENDT: Exactly. It was designed to deflect whatever they could fire at us, RPGs, B-40 rockets, AK 47's. I don't think they had any B-40 rockets, this commando squad. Anyway, the architect of the building was a foresighted fellow because he evidently anticipated what could conceivably happen, and it came to pass. I really thought I was living my last moments because I knew there was almost nothing in the embassy that could protect us. The Marine guard had told me that one Marine had already been killed. I think he also told me that several MPs had been killed -- four as it turned out. On top of all that he had a wounded Marine on his hands -- and there he was, all by himself. So, the situation looked bleak. I really thought it was only a matter of moments before the VC came crashing into the building. For all practical purposes, we were defenseless. We had no weapons.

As it turned out, there was another military man in the building, an Army communications man, who had a rifle. He was in uniform. Then I found out much later that there was another Marine guard somewhere in the building. But for a long time he never appeared -- he never materialized. I happened to see him only a couple of hours later when I went up to the roof. I didn't even see him on my first trip to the roof. It was a subsequent trip. He was crawling around on his belly just below and on the side of the roof. I couldn't figure out what he was doing or how long he had been there. I suppose he had been there from the beginning.

The next thing I knew that same Marine and the Army communications man climbed on board the first helicopter that was able to land on the roof of the embassy and took off, leaving me and a couple of other civilians alone in the building. I heard later they took off supposedly to provide additional fire power for the helicopter as it lifted off the roof of the building with the wounded Marine. We had gone down to the ground floor to pick up the wounded Marine and take him up to the fourth floor duty officer's quarters where we put him in the cot I had been sleeping in. Then, when we found out there was going to be an attempt to land a helicopter on the roof --

Q: How did you find that out?

WENDT: I was in regular contact with MACV headquarters near Tan Son Nhut Airport, the US military command center (Military Assistance Command Vietnam). Our communications held up very well -- so, I was able to talk to them. That was one thing I spent a lot of time doing -- talking on the phone. Anyway, the military had tried earlier to land helicopters on the roof of the embassy, but they were drawing too much ground fire from the guerrillas in the compound. Eventually, they did get a chopper in. They offloaded a couple of cases of M-16 tracer ammunition, which might have been useful if we had had any M-16s, but there were no M-16s in the building.

Q: M-16 being the standard rifle of the time.

WENDT: Right. But at that time, in 1968, the M-16 rifle had not been issued to the Marine security guards. I'm not even sure all our troops in the field had the M-16.

Q: The Marines probably had the M-14 at that time, which is a NATO weapon.

WENDT: Right. So, there were no M-16s and, therefore, this ammunition was useless.

Q: Before we move on here, you had this Viet Cong sapper unit around the embassy. Why didn't they get in?

WENDT: No one knows for sure why they didn't get in. The presumption is that they lost their leader early on and therefore were a little uncertain what they were supposed to do, or that whenever they tried to get close enough to the doors to plant satchel charges to blow them open, they got caught in a crossfire. You see, after a while, we had people on the rooftops of adjoining buildings firing down into the compound at the sappers. When I say "we," I mean mostly MPs, some American civilians responsible for security and presumably also some Vietnamese police or soldiers, although I don't know that for sure.

Q: This was a period when one took great exception to the fact that we had these planters in the compound which had lips that you could duck under, which they got rid of afterwards.

WENDT: The sappers did duck under the planters, that's right. They took shelter under them. But they should have been able to blow open the doors anyway. I often thought that a really professional group of commandos like the kind the British used in the Second World War would have been in the building in a matter of minutes, but these fellows never quite made it. There were various presumptions about why they didn't get into the building. I should note that at the beginning, the doors to the embassy were open. They were not routinely closed, particularly in the winter months at night when it wasn't so hot.

In any event, when the incident began, a quick thinking Marine on duty in another building across the compound saw what was going on, raced across the courtyard, and got the doors closed in the nick of time. So, interestingly, the one functioning Marine guard on the ground floor of the embassy was not even assigned to the embassy. He had been assigned to a different building. There were two other Marines, not counting the mystery one on the roof. As I said one was killed and one was wounded right off the bat. We were very lucky that this Marine, Sgt. Harper, saw what was going on, raced over, got inside and closed the doors. They were very thick doors made of teak, splinter proof wood. They stood up well to the pounding they received. A number of rockets were fired into the building and did a certain amount of visible damage, but it turned out to be relatively superficial and easily repaired.

Surprisingly, I was able to stay in touch with just about everybody I needed to talk to, including people who were responsible for the ambassador. They moved the ambassador to a safe house very quickly and set up a command post there. I spoke to those people by phone. I spoke frequently to the State Department Operations Center and to the White House Situation Room. Once I held up the phone so that the caller in Washington could hear rockets thudding into the building. All of these communications held up very well despite the siege we were under. But it wasn't always easy to call people locally in Saigon.

Q: In a way, I suppose people must have been really caught off balance if you couldn't have brought a significant number of American forces from Tan Son Nhut or someplace like that to the embassy.

WENDT: That's, of course, one of the points I kept making when I was speaking to our military headquarters out near Tan Son Nhut airport. They kept promising relief. But the relief never came. Well, it did eventually, but it didn't accomplish much. Six hours after the attack began, the military actually landed a platoon of airborne infantry onto the roof of the embassy.

Q: For the record, Tan Son Nhut is about a 20 minute drive from the Embassy --particularly at night when traffic is light.

WENDT: Right. You can imagine that I pleaded frequently for relief. I had to point out occasionally that the Embassy in the heart of Saigon was the symbol of the American presence in Vietnam. The fact that we had lost control of it was quite serious. I think the same word was coming out from Washington. The military explained later they were under attack all over the area and that the embassy was only one of their problems, albeit a major one. At one point they promised me that an armored column was on its way through the city to relieve the Embassy. I don't know whether such a column existed in reality. Anyway, it never arrived.

Q: Correct me if I'm wrong. I wasn't there at the time. I came a year later. While there were attacks on other places, this was sort of the only real attack in this particular section of town, wasn't it? Or were there also attacks against other buildings? I don't know about the presidential palace.

WENDT: I believe the Presidential palace was also attacked, and that fighting was going on at Tan Son Nhut and Bien Hoa Air Base. But I think the Embassy was the focal point of the attack, and it was truly a harrowing experience. I'm amazed in retrospect that I lived through it. After about the first hour or two when I realized I was still alive and that the worst fate had not befallen us, I began to think, "Well, maybe we're going to get out of here alive somehow." Of course, that does concentrate the mind a bit as well, the notion that you've got a chance at survival. But I was prepared for the worst. As I said, we had no weapons, though I did end up with a .38 revolver that I had taken from the wounded Marine whom we evacuated.

Q: I suppose afterwards, you could have had a whole arsenal.

WENDT: Yes, later I could and did have a whole arsenal in my bedroom in the small villa I lived in. I officially drew two weapons from the embassy, a Colt 45 automatic and an M-1 carbine -- both World War Two vintage weapons.

Q: What about the surviving Marine?

WENDT: I wrote a citation for an award for him and he did get an award -- I believe it was the Bronze Star. I thought he handled himself superbly in an extremely difficult situation, where for all he knew, the enemy could have come bursting into the Embassy at any moment, which is, as I said, what we all thought was going to happen. Miraculously, thankfully, it didn't happen.

Q: What were you getting from the embassy, the ambassador's security guard and otherwise? Did they say, "Stiff upper lip" or "We're trying to do something?"

WENDT: They were all kind of besieged themselves. They were on the outside trying to organize the armed reaction that we hoped would be mounted to retake the Embassy. I know some of our civilian security personnel participated directly in the action. Leo Crampsey was one, the Embassy Security Officer, and Bob Furey was another.

Q: And there was another one. A colonel who became...

WENDT: George Jacobson?

Q: Yes, Jacobson. I remember later seeing a picture of him on TV being handed a .45. Somebody was passing it off to him.

WENDT: That was at the very end. Jake as we called him was in a little house in the compound behind the embassy, very vulnerable. Somebody apparently threw a .45 up to him when he saw that one of the VC guerrillas was going up the staircase after him. But I was told subsequently that Jake actually finished this VC off with his bare hands. Apparently, he had been gassed, you see, and probably couldn't put up much of a fight. Eventually, we did use gas -- tear gas I assume -- in the compound. But I was nervous about that because by that time, we had some of our own men in the compound, and we might be gassing our own men.

Eventually, our people got over the wall and stormed the compound and finished off all but two of the Vietcong, who were taken prisoner. You see, gradually, the Vietcong got picked off one by one by our people shooting down into the compound from the rooftops of adjoining buildings. I was still communicating with the Marine guard, and I knew that by the time the platoon of Airborne infantry landed on the roof of the Embassy building in a helicopter, most if not all of the guerrillas had been killed or captured. So, I tried to explain this state of affairs when I greeted these troops, who were armed to the teeth with M-16's, grenades, knives, you name it, they had it. I was there when they got out of the helicopter -- this was around 6 or 6:30 in the morning, more than four hours after the attack had begun.

The platoon leader was a major -- Major Hillel Schwartz. I said to him, "The action is over. You might as well just go right down to the ground floor and take stock of the situation, but the fighting is over." He said, "Well, you may think it's over, but I can't take any chances and I have my orders." So, they insisted on deploying through the building floor by floor, beginning at the top.

The only problem with that, of course, was how they were going to get out onto each floor. Well, they could go down the stairwell. But each stairwell had a fire door which you could open only from the corridor -- that is, you could go into the stairwell from the corridor, but you could not go from the stairwell into the corridor. This was a security measure, of course. An alternative would have been to go down the elevator floor by floor and then out into the corridor, but the troops didn't want to do that. So, I said, "Okay, just to show you how confident I am that there are no VC in the building, I will myself take the elevator down floor by floor, go down the corridor, and open the fire door for you so that you can come out from the stairwell and deploy." And that's exactly what we did. You can imagine that I certainly wouldn't have risked my life doing that if I had had the slightest reason to believe there were Vietcong in the building.

Q: Basically, you knew the entrance had not been breached.

WENDT: That's right. I knew the entrance had not been breached -- and I knew from communicating with the Marine guard on the ground floor, Sgt. Harper, that the VC had not gotten into the building and therefore deploying through the embassy and securing it floor by floor was a waste of time. Yet that's what the airborne platoon did. By the time they got down to the ground floor, all the action was over, and I don't think they ever fired a shot.

Q: What happened thereafter?

WENDT: Well, that's rather amusing. I eventually went home but not before Noon. General Westmoreland, commander of all our forces in Vietnam, came to the compound. I greeted him. I explained to him that I was the duty officer. The compound was a mess. There were bodies all over the place and shattered glass and masonry. He said, "Well, I suggest you get this place cleaned up and get people back to work by Noon." That was certainly an unrealistic suggestion under the circumstances. There was serious fighting going on in many parts of the city and people were at risk. So, it was hardly something we could have recommended to the staff. Yet actually we did get things back up and going pretty quickly. I was kind of a mess myself, not because I had been wounded, but I had blood all over my shirt from the wounded Marine I had helped carry up to the roof.

I eventually went home towards the end of the morning. My housekeeper insisted that I get rid of the shirt right away because with all the blood on it, she thought it would bring bad luck. So, I took the shirt off and she burned it.

What intrigued me at the time was the question of whether or not I was going to be expected to continue my duty responsibilities that night. Now that I recall, that was only the second night of my duty obligation, and I had another five to go. So, once home I tried to take a nap. I was so wound up I couldn't really sleep, but I did try to get some rest. About five in the afternoon, I got a call from somebody saying...well, under the circumstances, I would be relieved of my obligation to take the duty that night and, indeed, for the remainder of the week. I wasn't really surprised -- I half expected the call, but I did breathe a sigh of relief.

To me the attack on the Embassy was an unbelievable incident. It's very hard to imagine in retrospect that we got through it alive. I consider myself extraordinarily lucky. My car, which was parked in back of the embassy, was all shot up in the course of the fighting. Of course, that was mere material damage -- not important. But I was driving around in a car with no windshield for a while until I could get the car repaired. Fortunately, it was the dry season. This was the end of January, and it didn't rain at that time of year. I had the car repaired and kept it for three and a half more years, selling it to a Frenchman when I finally left Vietnam three and a half years later in the summer of 1971.

Q. Did you get any kind of special recognition or award from the State Department after all this?

WENDT. Yes. In fact, both Griffin and I received the State Department's Award for Heroism. We were called back to Washington in December, 1968, for the ceremony, and Dean Rusk personally handed out the awards. They were given to several people -- I can't remember who else but I think one or more of the Security Officers, Leo Crampsey and Bob Furey, must have also received the award. My mother even flew to Washington from Chicago for the event.

The award reads as follows:

In recognition of your courage, resourcefulness, and effective leadership at U.S.
Embassy Saigon during enemy attack on January 31, 1968.

Q: Here you were, basically the new boy on the block. I always think one's receptors are a bit more sensitive than at home. This was when you first arrived. Of course, you got quite a welcome. What was your impression when the embassy started to go back to work? What was the feeling? What were they doing?

WENDT: I thought at the time that we had seriously misjudged the situation. Our intelligence obviously left a great deal to be desired. We had perhaps overestimated the extent to which we were making progress in winning the war. That's what I thought at the time. I learned afterwards that in fact we had had some advance indication of trouble during Têt, the Vietnamese lunar New Year. They had indeed increased the embassy security guard by 50 per cent, as I later noted somewhat jokingly, from two to three. Thus, we had one more Marine guard than we might normally have had. So, some people in the chain of command must have suspected something was going on. But the preparations and reaction, obviously, were not commensurate with the danger at hand. But I don't know for sure. Somebody must know. It must be in the classified files somewhere what kind of intelligence we did have. I think there was some evidence of unusual VC troop movements but far from Saigon. So far as I know, no one anticipated any military activity in the Saigon area -- and certainly not downtown where the Embassy was. And remember this was Tet, a sacred occasion all Vietnamese were presumed to observe, including, some may have naively thought, the Vietcong.

Q: Of course, it's always after the fact that you can see the clues that tell us what was going to happen, but it's always lost in masses of other information. I mean, this is a classic case.

WENDT: That's right. Presumably, we had nothing very specific. Anyway, it's indisputable that the Tet offensive resulted in a military setback for the communists and their attempted uprising. The Vietcong as a military force were crushed. But it's also true that we underestimated their strength, their ability to mount the offensive -- and politically, therefore, it was a jolt, as everybody knows. We paid the price. Lyndon Johnson actually started withdrawing American troops that year. Then Nixon was elected towards the end of the year and the withdrawals continued. I think most historians and political analysts agree that, while the uprising was a military defeat for the Vietcong, it was politically successful. It certainly shocked the American people and it contributed to the debacle that took place at the Democratic Convention in Chicago later that year, 1968. It polarized the country.

The mere fact that the Viet Cong were able to mount an offensive, even if it was crushed, even if militarily it was a failure, suggested that somehow our grip on the situation was not as firm as we had thought. Of course, people had been saying something like this all along -- the critics of the war, that is. But this was a concrete example of how we misjudged the situation. I am not one who believed at the time that we should never have been in Vietnam in the first place. I thought the objectives for which we fought the war were legitimate. I just don't think we went about fighting the war in the right way -- at least at that time.

Q: I join you on that.

WENDT: The problem was incremental escalation. It was always too little and too late. But I think the objective was a valid one. I know a lot of people would disagree. But they disagree primarily based on the hindsight of the result that we obtained, which of course was a big disappointment -- clearly, a failure to achieve our objectives.

One thing I always felt very strongly about was that it was not a military defeat for the US, even though the press and people who ought to know better continue to depict it that way when they talk about our "defeat" in Vietnam. The American military was never defeated on the field of battle in Vietnam. We withdrew of our own volition. We could have garrisoned the country and stayed there indefinitely if we had wanted to. But a political decision was made to pull our forces out and abandon the military effort. You won't find one person in a hundred who knows that that famous picture, I think taken on the 30th of April, 1975, of the helicopter lifting off the roof of the American embassy -- actually it was a USAID building, not the Embassy -- had nothing to do with the American military effort. Our military had left Vietnam two years previously in early 1973. That photo showed an evacuation of civilians from a USAID building as the communists were coming into Saigon. But I'll bet you can't find one person today, even in the State Department, who realizes that.

Q: I think you're right.

WENDT: It's shocking. Every time I read a seemingly authoritative, responsible article, I read about the "defeat" of the American military in Vietnam -- it really appalls me, and I'm not military. I never served in the military. I think we need to be clear about what actually happened. I also think that South Vietnam was doing relatively well, considering that the war was still going on in the early 1970s when I was there. In the economic area, we were making real progress.

Q: I certainly had that feeling from '69 to '70, the 18 months I was there. I thought things were going pretty well.

WENDT: Signs of prosperity were all around. The economy was emerging from a wartime situation. Economic activity in the provinces was growing. Security was returning to a lot of the rural areas. Rice production was up. American companies were contemplating serious investments. The rate of inflation had come way down. I think in the year 1970, it was only one or two percent, which is remarkable for a relatively small, developing country at war. I believe that if Vietnam had not been forcibly taken over by the communists, it would be as far along as the so-called Southeast Asian "tigers" are today.

Q: Oh, yes.

WENDT: We need to remember that the main reason we went into Vietnam was to prevent South Vietnam from being forcibly overrun by North Vietnam -- and the North's aggression against the South was materially supported on a large scale by Communist China and the Soviet Union.

Q. And wasn't China's support of the North much greater than we thought at the time?

A. Yes, indeed. Long after the Vietnam War, we learned from intelligence sources that China had several hundred thousand -- I have seen a figure as high as 600,000 -- military personnel in the North focused primarily on logistics, rebuilding highways, bridges and port facilities damaged by bombing. This was more than our entire expeditionary force. Of course, there was historical distrust between China and Vietnam, which escaped from Chinese suzerainty over 1,000 years ago, but they were close allies throughout the Vietnam War.

You know, many Americans believe to this day that the conflict was seen by most Vietnamese as a "war of liberation." This is nonsense. It doesn't correspond in any way to the realities I observed on the ground in South Vietnam. Liberation from whom? The French were long gone, and the vast majority of South Vietnamese knew very well that the US had no intention of staying in Vietnam any longer than was necessary to prevent the country from being invaded and overrun by the armed forces of the North.

Q. That was certainly true in the South.

A. Yes. Anybody who served in Vietnam knows full well that the South Vietnamese did not want to be forcibly taken over by the North. Even the communists failed to understand this -- I suppose they believed their own propaganda about "liberating" the South. In their 1968 Tet offensive, the communists believed the South would "rise up" against the "puppet" government and the Americans. Of course, nothing of the sort happened -- quite the contrary. The offensive was a huge military defeat for the communists -- though a propaganda success in the US -- and the Viet Cong infrastructure in the South, such as it was, was decimated and never recovered. After that, the war was fought by main force North Vietnamese units infiltrated down the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

Q Can you describe the situation as you saw it, say, from 1970 on?

A. Well, by 1970 South Vietnam and the Americans were beginning to prevail in the conflict. As I said before, the Southern economy was gaining strength, US assistance was increasingly effective, the rice trade was restored, and commerce was starting to flourish as more and more areas were pacified and communist control eliminated. I remember that the rate of inflation in 1970 was one per cent, which is quite extraordinary for an underdeveloped country at war. Militarily, the tide had turned. The South Vietnamese armed forces were increasingly effective and won some major battles in 1972 and again in the spring of 1973, in the latter case without US assistance. Remember that by then US armed forces had been withdrawn following the agreement signed with the North in January of that year.

General Creighton Abrams, who replaced Westmoreland as Commander of US forces, said in his memoirs that the South Vietnamese General Ngo Quang Truong was the ablest tactical commander he had ever encountered. Abrams was a tank commander in World War Two. Unfortunately, it was too late. The US Congress had turned irrevocably against the war in spite of all the evidence that the conflict was turning in our favor.

The agreement signed with the North allowed us to replace war materiel lost by the South on a one for one basis and to respond with air strikes if the North violated the agreement, which they promptly did by continuing to infiltrate troops and artillery across the 17th parallel. But we were unable to live up to this agreement because Congress cut off all funding for the war while the Soviets and Chinese continued their massive assistance to the North.

Q. All this is very poorly understood.

A. Absolutely right. Too many Americans forget or never realized that after the US withdrawal in early 1973, the war continued for two more years. As I said, the South won some major engagements but in the end was unable to sustain the conflict without US assistance. In that respect, I think it's not unfair to say that we snatched defeat from the jaws of victory.

Q. What do you think would have happened if we had been able to continue our assistance?

A. Of course, that's a matter of conjecture. At the very least, the war would have been prolonged -- perhaps with a better outcome for the South even in a unified Vietnam. I realize that's hindsight, but I think we could have exploited the growing Sino-Soviet conflict more skillfully. We know now that both the Soviets and the Chinese were fed up with the war -- they had more important issues at stake with the US. They were actually pressing the North to reach agreement with us. I also wonder if we could have found a way to take advantage of the historical enmity between the Chinese and Vietnamese. In any event, I do believe that, left alone, South Vietnam could have become another Southeast Asian tiger. But that was not to be. And note that the communists turned a potentially rich country into a poor country. Remember, we fought the war to prevent that from happening and, of course, to prevent the South from being forcibly overrun by the North.

Q: I also feel that, though it may seem peripheral, if Vietnam had gone down the tubes earlier on, Indonesia certainly would not have gone the way it did, and other things would have turned out worse. It's on the margins, but it's a matter of will, and we stopped a hemorrhage from hemorrhaging.

WENDT: I think that's absolutely right -- we bought time. The Vietnam War -- I mean the American part of the war -- went on from 1965, when the big buildup of American forces began, until 1973. So, eight years -- and don't forget the war continued two more years without us. Actually, you could say the war started earlier. Under the Kennedy Administration, we had 16,000 armed military advisers. In the end we bought time for other countries in Southeast Asia to secure their future -- at least to a takeoff point. People forget all this.

Q. What about Vietnam today?

A. The economy is ostensibly booming following the decision of the ruling Communist party to open it up as the Chinese did. The US has become one of the country's major trading partners. Foreign investment in Vietnam is growing. And the Communist leadership wants good relations with the US -- if only as a hedge against China. There are growing examples of cooperation between the two countries -- even in the military area. And yet the country remains a police state that tolerates no political dissent and routinely jails even Catholic priests who dare to speak out. Corruption is rampant and affects the everyday life of those without connections to the Communist Party. Bribes are a way of life -- far more pervasive than in the Republic of Vietnam. Those who prosper are those who cooperate with the regime and reward their collaborators in the Communist hierarchy.

Q. You certainly see signs of prosperity today.

A. True, but the bulk of the population remains poor and faces real hardship with a high rate of inflation. Tourists don't see this. I think the Vietnamese have been clever to develop the tourist industry in Vietnam. Tourists generally get a quite favorable impression of the country, which has a lot to offer. They don't see the political oppression behind the scenes -- and they are largely immune from the bribery and corruption that most Vietnamese face in their daily lives. Real economic reform has stagnated. One hears constantly of scandals, bad management, inefficient state-owned enterprises, the very slow pace of privatization -- it's a long list.

Q. Do you think the US should have entered the conflict in the first place?

A. Of course, that is a key question for historians. Americans have little patience for indecisiveness and stalemate. The US fought the war with serious limitations such as not invading the North -- in contrast to what we did in Korea -- and we refrained from strategic bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong until December, 1972, just a few months before we withdrew our troops. Of course, this restraint stemmed from our fear of escalation -- bringing in China and the Soviet Union, whose intentions we misread.

Yet there are historians who contend today that fighting the war in South Vietnam bought time for other countries in the region to achieve a degree of stability and prosperity that is evident today -- I'm sure you've heard this notion. In any event, I do believe that, left alone, South Vietnam could have become another Southeast Asian tiger or something close to that.

Was it worth 58,000 thousand American lives? Given the outcome, I think one would have to say no. But that's hindsight, which doesn't really get us anywhere. What I do believe -- and I think many historians would agree -- is that we could have gotten a better outcome. The war was lost at home, not on the battlefield in Vietnam.

Q: Oh, yes. So, Tet is over. Did you go back about your business on the economic front?

WENDT: Yes, I did. I went back to the joint State-AID Economic Section. I did that for about two years. And then I became Commercial Attaché and also a kind of informal troubleshooter for Ellsworth Bunker and Deputy Ambassador Samuel Berger, who, as you may recall, was the first person to occupy the position of deputy ambassador, a position that had never existed until then and I don't think has existed since. He prevailed upon me to stay a fourth year. One advantage I had was my fluent knowledge of French. So, I would sometimes be sent on special missions -- dealing with high ranking Vietnamese whose English was limited or non-existent -- on specific, sensitive problems, for example, corruption in the port of Da Nang.

Q: Let's talk about this time. It's not just the excitement of Tet. Talk about how you saw things moving during this time. We're talking about, what, '68 to '72?

WENDT: Actually, I left Vietnam in July of '71. In a few days, it will be the 25th anniversary of my departure from Vietnam, even though I went back briefly in January of 1973. I would say this period -- from 1968 to 1971 -- this was a period of consolidation and recovery from the devastation of the Tet Offensive. I thought things were moving along quite nicely, in particular in the economic area, which was the area I was working in. I thought a lot of progress was being made. As I said earlier, I think that had we not abandoned South Vietnam, had the country not been taken over forcibly by the communists from the North, the South would have done quite well. It's basically a rich country. You drop something in the soil and it grows. It has a benign climate. It has a rich agriculture. The seas and the coast are rich in marine life. And the country has a natural vocation for tourism.

Q: Were there other commodities besides rice that you worked on?

WENDT: Yes. One particularly interesting example was natural rubber. There were at least three major French-owned rubber plantations not too far from Saigon -- Michelin (like the tire company), Terres Rouges, and SIPH, which stands for Société Indochinoise de Plantations d'Hévéas – Rubber Planters Company of Indochina. All the plantations were within a relative short drive into the countryside around Saigon. I had met some of the planters socially in the French community in Saigon, and they told me a tale of woe. It seemed that the American military was destroying their rubber trees on a large scale on the grounds that the Vietcong were hiding among them and then springing surprise attacks on American military convoys. So, the military cut down large numbers of trees along the roads to get rid of this alleged sanctuary.

The French told me they understood the need to deprive the VC of shelter but that far more trees were being cut down than necessary for that purpose. We looked into the matter and concluded that this was indeed true, and that it wasn't necessary to cut down huge swaths of trees. We then went to our own military and persuaded them to limit their tree-cutting operations to what was strictly necessary to protect our troops. Happily, they cooperated, and the French planters were pleased with the outcome, which seemed to everybody to be a reasonable compromise. We also sought to persuade the Vietnamese Ministry of Economy that they should support the plantations or at least not interfere with them. We argued that, with a war for survival going on, natural rubber was one of the very few commodities South Vietnam could export for foreign exchange. Of course, as a matter of policy, it was in the US interest for Vietnam to be able to earn foreign exchange on its own.

The very able Vietnamese Minister of Economy, Pham Kim Ngoc, who had studied at Oxford and spoke quite good English, bought these arguments. The result was that the plantations got a new lease on life. The only problem was that the foreign exchange they earned from exports was based on the official exchange rate of 116 piasters to the US dollar, whereas on the free market, the dollar was worth over 400. Still, the plantations were back in business up to a point, despite the war.

One of the French planters I got to know was Denis Brochard at the Michelin plantation. He told me he had been a French prisoner of war after the fall of France in 1940. He was sent to a POW camp in the western part of Germany and while there he was allowed to import law books from France and managed to put himself through law school while a POW. I never got around to asking him how and why he went from the law to managing the Michelin rubber plantation in South Vietnam.

As we got to know the French planters, they often invited us to visit them on Sundays. They were very hospitable and somehow were able to produce a bountiful lunch for their guests, with cheese flown in from Paris. We tried to reciprocate by bringing them wine we bought either at the Commissary or through diplomatic supply companies.

Q. With a war going on, you were fortunate to find this form of recreation.

WENDT: Yes, indeed. I should mention that these were only day long excursions and that we had to get back to Saigon well before dark because there were Vietcong in the area at night. Somehow, the plantations had managed to persuade the VC to leave them alone. We wondered how this accommodation was reached but decided it was best not to ask too many questions and leave well enough alone.

I should mention an unfortunate incident that occurred on the way back to Saigon from a visit to, I believe it was SIPH. Bob Starr, Robert Starr, was the Legal Adviser at the Embassy, and he and I invited two young Vietnamese women to accompany us on the day long excursion. Both were junior diplomats -- Third Secretaries -- at the Vietnamese Foreign Ministry being groomed for service at South Vietnamese diplomatic missions abroad. One of them had a part time job with a Hong Kong company providing wine and spirits to the diplomatic corps in Saigon. That's how I met her -- I had to send back a case of wine that had evidently sat too long in the sun on a dock somewhere.

On the way back from the plantation -- I was driving my small Toyota sedan -- we were rammed by a US Army truck careening out of control back forth on the road. I swerved as far as I could off to the side of the road, but the truck still hit us on my side at about a 45 degree angle. I looked pretty bad -- my face was covered with blood -- but the wounds were just superficial face wounds that bled a lot but quickly healed. The two others who were on the right side of the care were unhurt. The young Vietnamese seated in the back seat behind me bore the brunt of the collision. The car was badly smashed up. She was hauled out of the car by Vietnamese from a nearby village who quickly gathered around the scene, saying "chet roi, chet roi," she's dead, she's dead. Well, as turned out, she was badly injured but very definitely alive. Miraculously -- and I think maybe it really was a miracle -- before long we saw a US Army red cross vehicle coming down the road. We flagged it down, and they took us all to the U.S. 24th Evacuation Hospital, where they operated on war wounded. She was operated on by a US Army neurosurgeon, who saved her life. She was later sent as a diplomat to the Vietnamese Embassy in Manila and was stuck there when Saigon fell to the communists in 1975. Happily, she got a job with the Asian Development Bank in Manila and a number of years later immigrated to the US -- Orange County, California, to be precise, where as you know there is a large Vietnamese community.

Q. What a tale -- only in a war zone like Vietnam could one imagine such a sequence of events. Now, let's go back to the main narrative.

WENDT: OK -- sorry for the digression, but I thought you would find it interesting. Oh, I just remembered another activity I got involved in, the herbicide program. I'm sure you have heard of Agent Orange. Well, one of my responsibilities in the Economic Section was to adjudicate US military proposals for herbicide missions -- basically, large scale defoliation of areas judged to be under Vietcong control. The military brought proposed herbicide missions to us for analysis of whether or not the missions would adversely affect friendly Vietnamese as distinct from Vietcong. I had a very able assistant in my office named Elliot Rothenberg, who was in fact a lawyer by profession. He was careful but zealous in analyzing the missions, and in fact we stopped a number of them where we had evidence that friendly Vietnamese would be affected.

The military often asked me if I wanted to go up on one of the missions. I must say I was tempted, but something -- and to this day I am not sure what -- always held me back. Needless to say, after all the news about the medical problems that arose after exposure to Agent Orange, my instincts served me well in this instance. Unofficial visitors from Washington would sometimes complain about the program. I always told them that the existence of the program was above my pay grade but that we did study the proposed missions carefully to ensure they were only carried out in Vietcong-held areas.

Q. Fascinating -- your office was really a jack of all trades.

Yes indeed. Anyway -- back to the main narrative, towards the end of my tour, I noted that American businessmen were expressing interest in South Vietnam as a place for investment. This might sound silly to a lot of people looking back at that period, but it's true -- I know. I dealt with a lot of American companies that were looking seriously at Vietnam, even with the war still going on -- though by that time the southern part of the country was largely pacified. I think one can say that South Vietnam was doing well, that we were making progress, particularly in the economic area, and we were achieving our objectives.

Of course, the North was still building up its armed forces and they were still getting aid and comfort from China and the Soviet Union, although there was already tension between China and the Soviet Union, even to the point where the Chinese were holding up war materiel that was being shipped from the Soviet Union to North Vietnam via China. But setting aside for a moment what was going on in the North, I think in the South, we were making real progress. The Tet Offensive in 1968 had rendered the Viet Cong ineffectual as a separate fighting force. They were no longer a significant military threat. They were not much more than a nuisance. Security was coming back. I think had we been allowed to continue in the path we were following then, we would have done reasonably well. We were beginning to get a grip on lots of issues. I remember some of the areas I worked on involving corrupt practices in Vietnam, for example, as I mentioned earlier, cleaning up the situation at the Port of Da Nang, which was creating problems for us in the logistical area.

One such problem was the illegal export of brass scrap. The Vietnamese in their entrepreneurial spirit were scavenging and collecting brass scrap from the battlefields and exporting it illegally. The scrap belonged to the United States. We surmised it was going to Hong Kong and then into communist China, where it was being manufactured into shell casings or bullets that came back to Vietnam and killed our soldiers. So, we wanted to prevent the illegal export of brass scrap and we wanted to collect it for our own purposes.

First, we had to convince the American military that it was not sufficient just to lay claim to the scrap and assert that it was ours. You could do that and you could be right, but that wouldn't prevent the brass scrap from being collected by entrepreneurial Vietnamese and then illegally exported. What you had to do was create economic incentives for the Vietnamese to collect the brass scrap and bring it back to the American military, and that would mean spending some money. At first, the military didn't want to do that. They said, "It's ours. Why should we spend money on it?" I said, "Well, it may be yours, but it's out on the battlefield. If you want it back, you may need to pay somebody to go out and collect it." Eventually, that's what our military did. A system was set up whereby some reliable Vietnamese were paid to go out and collect the scrap and return it to our military. I just cite that as an example of one of the many problems I worked on. But it all came to naught because of the political situation back in the United States.

I know that the political leadership in Vietnam may have left much to be desired and was certainly not all that we had hoped for. But even so, progress was being made -- I note particularly in the economic area. That's very important. That determines whether or not people are going to live decently, whether or not they're going to be able to feed, clothe, and house their families. If you can get a grip on basic economic conditions and improve them, then you can create a powerful economic incentive to support the political system that prevails at the time. Yes, I know, there were abuses. Yes, there was corruption. We know all this. But you know, it's much worse in communist Vietnam today.

Q: Oh, undoubtedly. And certainly in China.

WENDT: Remember all the people at home in the US who said "Anything has got to be better than the government of Nguyen van Thieu." I didn't think that was true at the time and in retrospect, of course, we know that it was absolutely false. What Vietnam got under the communist regime was far worse than the South Vietnamese government at its worst. Decades after the Communist takeover, on a per capita basis Vietnam remains a poor country.

Q: In the 18 months I was there, which paralleled yours, my sense was that in the middle of a major civil war, the government worked pretty well. I mean, there were things I didn't go along with and there were certainly problems, but positive things seemed to be happening, and there was definitely progress. I was a student of the Civil War. I couldn't say that during our Civil War period, we were much more pristine than the Vietnamese were during their civil war.

WENDT: Yes, that's absolutely right. At the time, it was obvious to anybody in Vietnam that some well to do families managed to prevent their sons and brothers and husbands from serving in the military, in combat. These young men, sometimes they were sent abroad to school or they got civilian jobs or something equivalent. No doubt that had a divisive effect. If you have an army where it seems that mostly poor people are being sacrificed, it doesn't work well. That was a problem in South Vietnam, but it shouldn't be exaggerated, as it often was by American commentators on the war. We're talking about a very small number of people. And as you say quite rightly, we conveniently forget the strains that exist when a country is at war. In a relatively poor country, a relatively underdeveloped country, the strains are greater than any we can imagine. The Vietnamese had been at war for many years, and I suppose that many of them had a hard time convincing themselves that further sacrifice of their men folk would make a difference. Remember that during our own Civil War, there were a lot of people with money who bought their way out.

Q: Oh, in fact, it was built into the system.

WENDT: It was built into the system. Not everybody served.

Q: You could buy a substitute.

WENDT: Yes, you could buy a substitute. We conveniently forget such things in our own history.

Q: Lots of shoddy material. Lots of corruption.

WENDT: Sure. We even repealed the writ of habeas corpus during the Civil War. Abraham Lincoln did that because he believed the fate of the Union depended on it. So, I think we need to temper our criticism and at least not apply to the Vietnamese, which we very often did, standards that were unrealistic, that simply couldn't be met and were not met anywhere.

Q: I had problems with some Congressmen who came out from Massachusetts decrying the corruption there at the time. I don't know how it is today, but Massachusetts was a very corrupt state government. Boston? Good God!

WENDT: You're absolutely right. We let the anti-war movement take hold of these issues.

Q: Also, we didn't have our act together. We didn't have an end game. We didn't have a firm grip on where we were going. This was obviously a major problem.

WENDT: I think that's right. When you consider that we started pulling troops out in 1968 and yet the war, our part of it, went on until 1973, ask yourself how you would feel as a soldier going into battle when you know your country is already winding down the war. That's a tough assignment. I think that had a very divisive effect in the United States. I believe we should have done much sooner what we in fact ended up doing, and which brought about the final cease fire - namely, the mining of the Port of Haiphong and the strategic bombing of the Hanoi area. Nixon finally did that in December of 1972, the famous Christmas bombing, when it looked like the North Vietnamese were reneging on a cease fire deal that the US side thought had already been reached the previous October.

I remember years later when I just happened to have my television set on. I think it was public television, and somebody -- it might have been David Frost, or some other well known TV interviewer -- was asking Nixon about foreign policy. It went something like this: "Mr. President, quite aside from the Watergate affair and all that, you are known as having been very skilled and successful in the area of foreign policy. Is there anything in that area you regret, anything that you wish you had done differently?" He thought for a moment and he said, "Yes, I made one very serious mistake, and that is I waited until December 1972 to do what I should have done as soon as I took office in January of 1969, namely send the B-52 strategic bombers against Hanoi and Haiphong."

I think that's absolutely right. It was a mistake -- if we were ever going to do it, then the sooner the better. That was the whole problem -- incrementalism -- the incremental approach to the war -- gradual escalation. It was fatal politically and it was not effective militarily.

Q: On the economic side, did you get involved in any of the debates or concerns about the use of what were known as TCN's, third country nationals?

WENDT: Not too much, really. I'm well aware that we had a lot of them and we relied on them. I suppose we thought we knew them better and they would, in many instances, meet our requirements better than the Vietnamese would.

Q: Yes. The Vietnamese were obviously unhappy about having this alien group come in who were more likely to stay around. The Americans they knew would leave.

WENDT: That's right. I suppose that's a problem in many countries. Perhaps because of the very rapid buildup, we had to rely on a certain number of third country nationals. I must say, I did feel at the time that the sheer size of the American presence was a liability. I thought we were overly engaged, that there was too much micromanagement of the war effort and that we tended to overwhelm the Vietnamese. We probably could have pursued the war effort more effectively if we had had fewer Americans and relied more on working through the Vietnamese. Of course, that's what we eventually tried to do with the so-called "Vietnamization" program, but that was, I think, although well-intentioned, somewhat misguided and a bit patronizing towards the Vietnamese. We should have been "Vietnamizing" the conflict from the very beginning, but we didn't want to do that. I never did understand what a lot of the Americans in South Vietnam were actually doing that couldn't have been done by the Vietnamese themselves.

Q: The whole effort was... We just got into everything.

WENDT: We got into everything. I think we could have streamlined our functions a lot more and not relied on so many Americans running around trying to handle everything themselves. Ultimately, you had to work through the Vietnamese. One of the things I really did enjoy about my tenure in Vietnam was the very good relationships we had with so many Vietnamese. I found it both professionally and personally very gratifying -- there was a lot of job satisfaction there, I felt.

Q: You left there in '71, is that it?

WENDT: I almost stayed a fourth year. In fact, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker did ask me to stay in a very nice way, so that if my response wasn't positive, I wouldn't feel he thought I was being uncooperative, but he did ask if they could persuade me to stay a fifth year. But at that point, I really had more or less burned my bridges, and I thought professionally, even four years was a long time, considering that the official tour of duty was only 18 months, and that in my own interest I probably should move on to something else. But I felt flattered that he even asked. That brief exchange took place at the Fourth of July reception in 1971 at Ambassador Bunker's residence in Saigon. I remember it well because Henry Kissinger was there. Although I didn't know it at the time, he was on his way to China. I think from Saigon, he flew back to Pakistan. There, the story was concocted that he had been taken ill or something like that. In fact, he was on his way to China from Pakistan. All that was brewing as we were standing around sipping drinks on the terrace of Ambassador Bunker's residence in Saigon. It was the first contact I had with Henry Kissinger.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN
Staff Officer, Planning and Coordination
Washington, DC (1967-1972)

Ambassador Arthur A. Hartman was born in New York in 1926. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948 under the Wristonization program. His career included assignments in Paris, Vietnam, London, and Brussels, where he served as DCM. Hartman was ambassador to France from 1977 to 1981 and ambassador to the USSR from 1981 to 1984. He was interviewed by William Miller in 1987.

Q: Let me take you back to Washington. You've been in London for four years and how does this next assignment take place?

HARTMAN: It takes place when somebody goes to Nick Katzenback and he's looking around for somebody. Basically, the Johnson administration decides that they want to have a more formal process to coordinate things and they decide to create this coordination staff under the planning staff. I was Deputy Director for Planning and Coordination, but there was a Director for Planning entirely and another staff entirely, including Henry Owen and others who were primarily on the planning side of the job. I had the coordination side which meant that I brought inter-departmental groups together, first at the senior level under Nick Katzenback; and then geographically kind of running those. I made sure that policy issues were brought up in terms of policy making, and that then the implementation of those policies was reviewed inter-departmentally by these groups. It was a very, Max Taylor was very much in favor of this, it had a kind of a military ring to it, it was sort of orderly and to a certain extent it worked mainly on the peripheral issues where you had to make a policy on a new issue that had come up before a conference or a regional policy. You got people together and at least you got option presented. On the implementation side of it, at least you were able to call people into account and say "Alright now, is this really working?" I don't think it was, it's not the panacea and it's often used I think, the structure is often used to substitute for something that's more basic, basically in difficulty. What was in difficulty at the end of the Johnson administration was the overall policy. No amount of bureaucratic tinkering was going to solve the problem that he faced of lessening opinion in favor of major policy, namely the involvement in Vietnam.

I think we did manage in some peripheral areas to make an improvement in terms of American policy and the presentation of that policy, in the coordination of it, and in the presentation to Congress of some sensible ideas on development assistance and how it ought to be organized. When the Nixon administration came in Henry was the NSC Chief and he and Elliot Richardson sat down and really developed from this older system in a sense, although they said it was brand new and they gave it a lot of kudos for being innovative as every administration has to as it comes in. It was really an outgrowth of this previous practice. When Elliot was Under Secretary of State, I was brought in. I was no longer running the planning staff, it was a pure coordination job directly under Elliot who was the Head of an overall under secretaries committee that did the coordination and what not, he drew on the planning staff for other things.

Q: So with Elliot at that point was Jonathan Moore?

HARTMAN: Jonathan and a lawyer at various times, different lawyers. Elliot of course was a great intellect and fun to work with and indeed he again was the bridge with the White House. This was because William Rogers and Kissinger were just not two minds that kind of linked up and worked well together, and Nixon really didn't want it to work that way. He was a very manipulative fellow and so basically what Kissinger did was to build up a staff and then he used this link with Elliot and this coordination staff to get some of the policy matters ironed out. William Rogers kept rather aloof from this whole process.

Q: Did he lose power and influence as a result?

HARTMAN: Well not because he was aloof from that process. I think this is the way Nixon wanted it and he was basically wanting to run the policy out of the White House, and this was just a way of kind of keeping control of the bureaucracy.

Q: So the big issues at that point were Vietnam?

HARTMAN: Vietnam certainly, but again in its sensitive aspects it never touched that group. In its gory details we were there, we had all kinds of studies prepared and the money thing was reviewed, and the military thing was reviewed, but when it came to a particular policy of what you were going to do in Cambodia, or what you were going to do somewhere else it was Kissinger, Laird and Nixon. Elliot because of his intellectual interests also found time to pull out particular policy issues.

Saigon (1973)

Political Officer, Nha Trang (1973)

Stephen T. Johnson was born in Tokyo, Japan in 1936. After serving in the US Army from 1956-1957 he received his bachelor's degree from Occidental College in 1960. He entered his Foreign Service in 1961 and his career included positions in Canada, Paris, Vietnam, Laos, Romania, and Kenya. Mr. Johnson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in January 1997.

Q: Well, in 1967 you left.

JOHNSON: Yes. I went back to Washington for training for Vietnam.

Q: Did you volunteer?

JOHNSON: I volunteered. It seemed the most exciting thing going on at the time. I asked not to be assigned to Vietnamese language training. I mean, I volunteered, but I didn't volunteer that much. I didn't want to spend all that much time. So I went back and took what they had, core training, [at that time]. I didn't take the language, but we did do the training for CORDS in which we learned about Vietnamese things and the like. Then I was sent out to Vietnam and arrived in early October of 1967.

Q: You were there on this tour from 1967 until when?

JOHNSON: Until I guess it was July of 1970.

Q: In the first place, had your father talked to you about Vietnam at that time?

JOHNSON: A little bit. We hadn't seen very much of each other. He had been in Vietnam and been also back in the Department as deputy under secretary again. Then he had been assigned in 1966 as ambassador to Japan. I hadn't really seen my parents very much for quite some time. We had talked a little bit about it. He was there, and he was wounded in the embassy bombing and stuff. But not that much. I stopped off and saw them in Tokyo on my way out to Vietnam in October of 1967.

When I arrived, I was assigned to the external affairs unit of the political section, which, in those days, was a section of about 25 people under a minister-counselor, Arch Calhoun. It had different parts. The internal-political sub-section had reporting, four or five fellows. Provincial reporting sub-section had nine - I think - two for each of the CORDS areas and one boss. Then there was political-military and, seems to me, there was some other part to it.

But in any case external affairs was three officers, one of whom did the French community in Cambodia, and I was basically the "Communist" guy. I did the North Vietnamese, and the Viet Cong was my job. I relied a lot on the old FBIS.

Q: The FBIS is what?

JOHNSON: Foreign Broadcast Information Service, which put out reams of stuff and also captured documents. The Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese were almost as bureaucratic as we are and put out lots of paper. Our folks kept capturing this and there was an establishment out by an air base which translated it all. So almost every day I would get a kind of mound of this stuff. A lot of it from my point of view, from the point of view of a military analyst, you know the laundry list of some battalion probably told them volumes, but it wasn't so interesting to me.

But there things that were of interest politically that you would get. You would also get interrogation reports. There was a Joint Interrogation Center where folks would tell their story. I was the only person in the political section who worked on those subjects. You know, kind of did little telegrams and gave advice and otherwise tried to follow things. I wasn't so much involved as some other people in the political section in analyzing South Vietnam, which is what most of the other people were doing. They were following South Vietnamese politics and the kind of political-military situation and corruption and all those other issues which were very controversial and difficult.

I had my own little bailiwick and briefed the press on things when negotiations got started, in Paris. On the whole subject of negotiations and the sort of the pre-negotiation negotiations, it was our little section that provided the support to the ambassador and the deputy ambassador, as the number two person in the embassy, and the minister counselor of political affairs. So we did a lot of paperwork there on writing up suggestions and ideas and doing telegrams.

While the Paris negotiations were going on, and even before, there was kind of a negotiation that took place in Saigon with President Thieu and Vice President Ki and their foreign minister and national security advisor. On our side were Ambassador Bunker and the deputy ambassador and the political counselor and one flunky, often me and sometimes my - well, more often than not - my boss. During that period, my bosses were Roger Kirk and Walt Cutler. Kirk was later ambassador to Romania and some other places. Cutler was ambassador to Saudi Arabia for a while.

Q: And Zaire.

JOHNSON: And Zaire, you are right. I always thought that Foreign Service officers should learn shorthand, which I didn't. I made some stabs at it.

Q: Was Martin Herz there at the time?

JOHNSON: Martin Herz was there, and he would take shorthand notes sometime, while I would laboriously be writing out longhand. They pretty much wanted a verbatim, so telegrams would get very, very long. Then they would always say don't worry about getting it out as long as we do it before 10:00 this evening, no problem. So you would find yourself bouncing around between Mr. Herz and Mr. Sam Berger, the deputy ambassador, and Ambassador Bunker about various versions of what had been said.

Again, it was the pre-word processing days. So when you came back to bring in your secretary to re-type it for the fifth time, she was getting a little bit testy. But we would do those negotiations.

Q: What were the negotiations about that you were observing with [Nguyen Van] Thieu and [Nguyen Cao] Ky?

JOHNSON: Well, in the main it was to get the Vietnamese to come along with us on what we were doing in Paris. Ky wasn't really very important; he was a fighter pilot kind of guy. He certainly was more likeable than Thieu. But not as smart. Thieu could see that from his point of view, this process was not leading to any place very good, that we were withdrawing. Any kind of a deal with the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese was not going to be one that he liked.

On the other hand he couldn't flatly refuse to go along with all this, so they would question, and they would suggest, and we would go back and forth. But basically it was this process of bringing them along so they would sign on the dotted line when that agreement was finally made. It was 1972 by the time we did it.

But when I was there in Saigon, it was the beginning of that process. You know, would you actually sit at the table with the Viet Cong? Well, no. They would rather not. Of course, we had the whole problem of the shape of the table which became very famous. I found it very hard to describe table shapes in telegrams. We didn't have fax machines in those days and we had to kind of reduce whatever was decided upon in words. But they were obviously very suspicious, very reluctant about the whole process, understandably so, from their point of view.

Q: What were you getting concerning the attitude of Ambassador Bunker and Deputy Ambassador Sam Berger? Was it great frustration or was it just that they saw this as a long process?

JOHNSON: I think they saw it as a long process. It was very hard to know what Ambassador Bunker was thinking. He was a fellow that you would want to back in a poker game. He never seemed to sweat like the rest of us. His clothes never got wrinkled. He was in his 70s at the time. He was carrying out his instructions, whatever they were. Once in a while, after a particularly long or difficult session, he would privately complain about that a little bit. But I think he just saw it as a long process, and his job was to move it along as best he could.

I was the scribe. I'd take telegrams and turn them into talking points when they came in. I didn't do this all the time because my boss, Roger Kirk or Walt Cutler, would be doing it sometimes, and I would be helping them out. They obviously weren't there all the time. We were not the movers of policy. About the only time I ever had any impact on what you might call policy, was when we were going to make a statement in Paris in which we equated our pulling out of Vietnam with the end of the war. I did a telegram saying, "No. It wasn't the end of the war." South Vietnam would still be fighting after we withdrew. We did send that in and that caused some consternation. I don't know why. This would become, I don't know, one of those articles of theology where in Washington they would equate our pull out with the end of the war. Of course, from the American point of view, it was. But it was kind of [like] saying the emperor isn't wearing any clothes [i.e., left to themselves the Vietnamese couldn't fight].

Q: While you were doing this, you were also doing the analysis of the Viet Cong and North Vietnam. I guess everything there would be before and after Tet in 1968. Let's do it before 1968. You went in 1967?

JOHNSON: I got there in October 1967. The Tet Offensive in 1968 was at the end of January, so I was pretty much a new boy when it happened.

Q: What were you getting before Tet as far as the state of the Viet Cong particularly?

JOHNSON: They weren't doing too much, but there were indications that something was up, when you read the captured documents and all the other things that I was reading. We did get one kind of proclamation of a general offensive. But people tended not to believe it because it was a pretty stupid thing to do. I guess the basic feeling, and it is hard to say because I was so new, was that things were going along. We were still a pretty large force in country.

Then the attack took place during Tet, which is the Vietnamese holiday that lasts a week or so. This was supposed to be a time of a truce. I got the impression from reading afterwards of various analysis by the Vietnamese communists of their own conduct, that basically they held back word back from their own people to the very last minute, in order to preserve security.

Of course, that meant that the units that were going to attack weren't able to do what they normally did. Before attacks normally the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese very carefully mapped out what they were going to do and practiced it. Everybody knew what his task was. They were quite meticulous. But by holding back the word until the very last moment, they weren't able to do that and so lots of the attacks were misdirected or got mixed up.

The squad that was supposed to get the American ambassador went to the wrong house. Some poor Vietnamese doctor was "done." The American ambassador was not a mystery in Saigon. Any rickshaw driver could have told you where that was. There were other kinds of screw-ups, but at the same time...

Q: The attack on the embassy. I had an interview with Allan Wendt, who was in there, saying that it was essentially a screwed up attack because they could have gotten in.

JOHNSON: Allan is right.

Q: But it wasn't done well. Or at least the theory being that maybe the squad leader was killed and rest of them sort of were milling around.

JOHNSON: Yes. I agree with Allan. When they made the attack that night, and I lived right across the street from the embassy in [an] apartment. My roommate was David G. Brown, as opposed to David E. Brown; we had two David Browns in the political section. Peter Collins was staying with us. He was one of the provincial reporters from the Delta. But when the attack took place, I have had the same theory that Allan Wendt has. Apparently, they blew a hole in the embassy wall, and some fellows came through that hole. The two military policeman, they weren't Marines at the time, at the gate shot it out with these fellows. The military policemen were killed, but they killed the first two or three people through the hole.

I think that must have been the leadership. Because basically for the rest of the night, these fellows milled around and hid behind decorative pots there in the embassy yard. As the Americans responded, the Marines and other people, the firefight went on the rest of the night. They also killed a couple of other military policemen who happened to drive up at just the wrong moment. As I understand it, one of the drivers of the embassy, who was in cahoots with the Viet Cong, smuggled in a fellow who then in his account went to sleep in one of the outer buildings of the embassy and performed no useful function.

Obviously, if they had done it right, they would have been in the lobby before we knew what was happening.

Q: Yes.

JOHNSON: Allan wouldn't have gone on to fame and fortune as he did. But, they fired some rocket grenades at the embassy from across the street, and they did other things. But, yes, it did not go well for them.

Q: Can you say what you were doing when the attack began. I always like to catch people when... I assume you were asleep.

JOHNSON: I was asleep. It was about 3:00 a.m. There were loud explosions and all kind of shots. We kind of peeked out and thought, "Well, this is very bad." But we couldn't do anything so after awhile we just went back to bed. We figured the apartment didn't have any back door and apparently the Viet Cong were out the front door. So we figured if they come in we're done, and if they don't come in it won't matter. So we went back to bed. Our only weapons were... I had a very blunt saber that a friend of mine had given me when I was in high school. David Brown had a Montagnard crossbow. He did province reporting in the highlands and the crossbow was, in fact, a lethal weapon but probably for only one shot.

We got up 7:00-ish, I guess, when there was another big explosion. We started to go to work. I think work started at 8:00. But there was just so much shooting we thought, "Well, we'll just go a little late today." So I think about 8:30 or 9:00 we got across the street to the embassy. There were bodies everywhere, and we crunched over the glass and went to our offices. My boss, who was I guess Roger Kirk at the time, his office had taken a direct [hit]. You remember the embassy.

Q: It had an outer screen.

JOHNSON: And that outer screen really did work. So it was a good idea. The outer screen had taken a hit and had gone through into his office. But they had that really good plastic stuff there. Anyway his office was beat up a little bit but not badly. I think the windows were all kind of ajar at the time. So anyway, we went to work. Then General Westmoreland came. The ambassador and we kind of followed them around as they looked at things out of curiosity.

Colonel Jacobson, the mission coordinator, who lived in the house in the compound, had a very close call. One of the Viet Cong group had gotten into his house and had been driven upstairs by tear gas, and Jacobson at the time didn't have any weapon. But at the last moment they tossed him a pistol, and he shot the fellow.

Q: I remember seeing that on T.V.

JOHNSON: He came up to me and in a jocular way said that because I was seen as the communist guy in the political section I should control my people better and not send them under his house and stuff. Of course, all of these reports are coming in from all over the country. The embassy itself was just a part of it. There was a big fight going on in Cholon. There had been an attack on the presidential palace, which had [failed]. There was other shooting going on all around town. I remember driving someplace or other, and there were roadblocks. Somebody, a Vietnamese gentleman, I think, hadn't stopped quickly enough at a roadblock and was shot.

Everybody was on the TV. Everybody was coming in with their own particular stories. There had been attacks on houses and on some of the CIA hotels and other kind of things. All very exciting. Political section people straggled in. I remember lunchtime. Because David and I lived across the street, we were the closest around, and we basically had a whole bunch of people to lunch. We had our rations and we fed them all.

Then that night, Allan Wendt having done his duty - normally you did the duty there for a week, but it was felt I guess that he had enough pressure put on him, so David and I had the duty the next night. The night after the attack. We sat up there, and we cooked some canned food. The Ambassador had some sort of little hotplate and we cooked ourselves some beans. Then we went downstairs, and there was a platoon of the 101st Airborne Division which had landed on the roof of the embassy at the end of the battle and kind of come down through the embassy. I don't think they actually had to fight anybody as it turned out.

But they were still there and were manning the perimeter and things, but a bunch of them were inside the lobby. For some reason we had the movie, "Barbarella."

Q: With Jane Fonda!

JOHNSON: So we put it on in the lobby of the embassy for the 101st Airborne Division and some drivers and odds and ends, and David and I watched "Barbarella." One problem with movies in Vietnam, which you may recall, was that whenever you got to really sexy bits, they would go off the sprockets because the units before you would always have run those parts through [many times]. "Barbarella" did have some sexy parts and would keep going off the sprockets and the guys from 101st were very unhappy about that. But we got through the night and nothing happened. There was a tank sitting in the intersection in front of the embassy which would shoot if anything moved. We hoped they wouldn't. It was a very confused time. [We were trying to figure out] what was going on in all these towns. There were big battles all over the delta and we were trying to keep track of it all. My job was [to follow] the communists. People were trying to put this jigsaw together to try to figure out what was going on.

People that you knew had been captured or killed. Hugh Lobet, my old buddy who was in the Operations Center with me, got killed down in the delta some days later. All this was going on at one time. It took awhile to kind of settle down. Then in May, this was the end of January, at the end of May there was, what some people called the "mini-Tet" in which we had another real rush at Saigon. Big battles out in Cholon. A German diplomatic friend of mine got captured and killed in that. He and I were supposed to meet for tennis. He decided to swing through Cholon to see what was going on and didn't make it.

During the first part of Tet, one of our problems was because everybody was going to our apartment to eat, David G. and I very soon ran out of food. We decided to go to the commissary which was in Cholon to get more food. The Viet Cong, the communists, were kind of between us and that part of Cholon. So we had to go around them to get to the commissary. We were among the first people there. We were kind of surprised. Anyway, we went in and loaded up. I had a Triumph convertible car. We loaded up as much as we could and started to come back. We decided for some reason to go around the other side of them coming back. We went up a street and all the refugees were going that way and turned out to be a bad idea. Anyway somebody opened up on us with a machine gun. We showed what a great U-turn you could do in a Triumph Herald and made it back with our stuff, unscathed.

Q: Were you getting, obviously this was more sort of the CIA province but well, were people saying to you, "Well, why the hell didn't you tell us this was going to happen?" I mean, this is like miscalling an election or something.

JOHNSON: No. No one said that to me. That really wasn't my job. But there were indications. I think I mentioned before in the northern part of the country they jumped off a day earlier. It always was a mystery to me as to why. It is hard to remember the Vietnamese communist organization of South Vietnam, of course, which was different than our side's organization of South Vietnam.

But in any case, the commands in the North, which dealt directly with Hanoi, jumped off a day ahead of the commands in the South, which dealt with Hanoi through the Central Office for South Vietnam [COSVN]. So that kind of discombobulated everybody. At least in my case, no, they didn't ask me why I hadn't predicted it.

Q: After this was over, the big Tet and all this, what were you getting from what you were seeing from the Viet Cong?

JOHNSON: Golly. Well, there were lots of after action reports on their parts. The battles had been mostly disastrous from their point of view. They had lost lots of leadership. They had lost lots of their soldiers. It had really hurt them. A lot of them were unhappy about what happened. Obviously, from the macro-political point of view, it was a success and the government of Hanoi was certainly trumpeting it as such. But in the South, on the Viet Cong side, they had a lot of unhappy campers about what had happened.

I think it came as a surprise to a lot of them. We think of this as being entirely propaganda but a lot of them really did believe that there was going to be the general uprising, that when they came into these cities and towns that the rest of the population of South Vietnam was going to rise up and join them. That didn't happen anywhere. That was disillusioning to a lot of their folks.

It meant, of course, over time that the North Vietnamese role became even greater for if no other reason than the elimination of so many South Vietnamese cadres. Then the North Vietnamese Army had to take a larger role as well. But it was hard on them.

Q: What were you getting before and after Tet in North Vietnam about our feeling about the leadership there and what they were after?

JOHNSON: Well, it was very hard to know anything about what the leadership was about. There were various people that had theories about hard-liners and soft-liners and rivalries and the position of Ho Chi Minh, who was still alive at the time. Ho Chi Minh died, I guess, in September of 1968.

Q: 1969.

JOHNSON: 1969, you are right.

Q: I was on home leave. My wife woke me up and said that he died. I think before I rolled over and went back to sleep I said, "May he rot in hell."

JOHNSON: I remember it was September because it was just at Vietnamese National Day. But you are probably right that it was 1969. So he was still around. Nobody really knew very much, really, about [the leaders'] relationships [to each other] or what difference it made if one succeeded and the other didn't.

Q: Because this is all much newer, we didn't have the equivalent of our criminologist who really watched who was where.

JOHNSON: There was really a very small community of people who followed North Vietnam. When I got sort of pitchforked into it, I looked around for the literature and stuff. There really was very little on them. There didn't seem to be that many people in Washington or in Vietnam or in Saigon actually following them from a political point of view. I was always a little bit shocked by that. That even after a few months I was the authority mainly because I had memorized the names of the people in the Politburo.

The CIA wasn't getting anything from the inner circles of the North Vietnamese leadership. We did get some political reporting from Hanoi from the French and the British. The French had a delegation general there, [headed by] quite a good man. We managed to kill him by dropping a bomb on the delegation general building or his residence. I'm not too sure exactly the timing of that, his mistress and him. The British had a little consulate and did reporting which they often shared with us. So we got some flavor of things up in Hanoi from that.

Obviously, we also had interrogation reports of North Vietnamese soldiers. It wasn't all "Name, rank, serial number, and date of birth." It was also, "How are things at home? How did the conscription process work? How was everybody eating?" and all those kind of questions. They always seemed to be having problems up there in North Vietnam. Things were not great, but [there was] nothing to suggest that they were going to break up or give up the struggle.

You would get defectors as well. My favorite defector was an Esperantist who was drafted into the North Vietnamese Army. They wouldn't let him correspond with other Esperantists, which I guess is the major activity of other Esperantists. So, immediately upon arriving in the south, he defected. I guess the interrogator asked him what he planned to do now that he was in the south, and he explained that he planned to teach Esperanto. I don't know how that worked out for him.

Q: Well, for somebody who might not be familiar with this, Esperanto was touted at least in the 1920s as a world language based on sort of Latin, Spanish in a way.

JOHNSON: We would have these odd people that would come down. I guess the vacuum cleaner parts of the draft. Certainly when you read the accounts of the soldiers, when you read the captured documents and the interrogation reports about how very difficult it was on the other side, how many people got killed and what their lives were like. One of their strengths was that they basically, as is the nature of guerilla warfare, got to chose when they were going to fight. That they could be at 50% of efficiency for five months but on "the" day they would be at 95 but the fellows on the other side would maybe be at 75.

For most of them, if you really looked at the timeline, they didn't fight that much. There were long periods in between which were not easy. [There] were periods of subsisting and that kind of thing. Then [there were] these occasional clashes, and you read about their terror of things like B-52s. They seemed to get advance word on B-52s most of the time. I guess the Russians had trawlers off Guam where they were taking off. Somehow or another, they usually had a pretty good idea of where the bombs were going to land. Quite frequently, you would read an interrogation report where the fellows would all be sitting around the camp and suddenly the word would come to get up and march as quickly as you can in this direction. Half an hour later, the place would get blasted. They weren't always successful of course, in that. They did suffer horribly from it.

But in the North, there were politics; there were rivalries. Obviously, we knew very little about them. I think it was kind of like watching shadows on the wall. We really didn't know that much about what was going on in the inner circles of their government. But they obviously were committed to the struggle.

Q: How about the information that you were getting from the CIA during this time that you were doing this?

JOHNSON: I don't think it told me too much. I don't know. I'm not too sure who was responsible for all these things. You know, a hand in the interrogations and things which was certainly useful of soldiers and other people of cadres that were caught. But just plain old CIA reports, well, at this distance, it is now 25-30 years, it doesn't make much of an impression on me. FBIS on the other hand was very useful all the time. We always went over that in a criminological kind of way trying to track who was hot and who was not for whatever reason.

Q: I mean, did you learn to read "Communis," the communist language newspaper?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. [This was] what the French call, "Langue du bois," kind of turgid, turgid stuff. You really paid your dues. They would give long and interminable speeches. I always wondered about them as communications tools because General Giap, for instance, would give a speech that would be three hours long. This was an instruction to the lads. Then [about] 10 Americans who followed Vietnamese affairs very closely would get together, and everybody would argue about what he meant. It always seemed to me that if people who were relatively knowledgeable about what was going on couldn't agree on what he meant, how was this being used as a tool for communicating with the lower echelons of the communist structure.

Those kind of speeches would be analyzed on their side, and they would have classes and stuff in which I guess perhaps somebody would say "What Comrade Giap really meant was that we are supposed to work in the jungle for the next six months rather than throw ourselves on the wire." I don't know. But it was murky stuff. It was turgid stuff. You read and read and read and look for those little changes in really criminological kind of stuff.

The North Vietnamese were never as precise I guess, as the apparently the Soviets were. Sometimes you would get kind of false leads where you would get excited about some change that really wasn't that significant.

Q: By the way, had Douglas Pike written his book on "Victor Charlie?"

JOHNSON: He had written that, and I had read it.

Q: So I mean, was this considered a fairly solid book? How did you feel about it?

JOHNSON: Yes. It was a good book. One problem is that Pike, tremendously knowledgeable, wrote almost as turgidly as Giap. So it was kind of hard to wade through. But it was a useful book at the time. Obviously, later events showed some of the things that he put forward weren't necessarily true.

Q: What was your impression of our military intelligence at that time?

JOHNSON: Well, I was concerned with the strategic kinds of things and obviously the military was producing things like... Of course, this was the raw stuff, the captured documents and the interrogations and that kind of thing. They were pretty good. The problem was that the people I dealt with at MACV [the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] were very intelligent folks [but] would come in and be there for six months and then go. So you got a kind of a turnover. Dumb as I was, I was there for three and a half years. Therefore accumulated a certain amount of knowledge.

Q: This was something I found. I chaired something called the "Irregular Practices" committee which was essentially a civilian court martial. We are talking about 1969-70. And I found after six months I was able to give historical perspective to the rest of the people around there. It was badly done in a way, particularly on the military side. They were using it too much as a personnel "getting your ticket punched" type operation.

JOHNSON: That was certainly - and this wasn't my subject - true on the fighting side of things. The people I was dealing with, one was Chuck Meissner, who later went on to be the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and died with Ron Brown on the plane. He was doing Cambodia and stuff. Larry Pressler, who was for a long time the Senator from South Dakota, you'd get people like that and others who were Ph.D.s and had really good education, but they weren't army/military careerists like say the fellow commanding the battalion. But that was just the way they worked. They did that for six months and they did something else for six months.

As you suggest, after about eight months you were the grand old man of whatever subject you were dealing with. It was stupid. It was stupid in my little bailiwick and it was stupid in other places as well. But I think particularly in my bailiwick because you could say about a battalion commander for instance that the demands-psychological and everything-were so great on that kind of job that maybe six months was all you really could do. That wasn't the case in MACV. Certainly a year wouldn't have been untoward or even longer. But that was a problem out there. But this was the strategic kind of stuff. It doesn't have to do with who is going to come over the wire tomorrow or what was happening in the A Shau Valley.

Q: In the political section, how did they use what you had?

JOHNSON: Mainly, I did little telegrams back to Washington which somebody must have read. I don't get the impression that I had a great effect on the way thinking was done at the top.

Q: Were there people, for example, in our political section, who would sit down and look to you for information concerning Vietnam? There is the internal politic guy and maybe somebody else. Would you all sit down and say, "Where are we going" or something like this or was it pretty much compartmentalized?

JOHNSON: Not too much. The ambassador sent in, I think it was weekly kind of personal reports to Washington which I think were probably drafted in large part by the minister-counselor for political affairs. Art Calhoun was the first minister-counselor; Martin Herz. Galen Stone was the number two in the political section. We never saw those reports. Maybe there was some of this synthesis in that. But I didn't get the impression that there was ever that great an interest, certainly in what the North Vietnamese were saying or doing. Not that much in what the Viet Cong were doing.

The embassy spent a lot of its time worrying about what the South Vietnamese were doing, that was it.

Q: You were one of the younger officers and part of the political section which had these provincial reporters who were out all the time. I understand the system was set up because we really wanted to have something other than rely on our American military advisors to take a look.

JOHNSON: Yes.

Q: What were you getting during this 1967-70 period?

JOHNSON: Their reports were generally much more pessimistic than what the army was saying. They were always getting themselves in trouble with the military. They went around and chatted up people, Vietnamese and Americans all over. Then wrote these reports. Invariably when the report didn't reflect credit on the United States or didn't reinforce whatever the accepted view was, the military reaction was to try to find out who had squealed rather than check the validity of the report. So they were always having a kind of rocky time of it in provincial reporting. It was never easy.

I wasn't intimately involved. My roommate at least for a long time, David Brown, and later Lars Hydle as my roommate, were both in that kind of thing. But I could see these kind of tensions going on. Andy Antippas who, in the second part of my time in Saigon, was in the external section with me and did Cambodia, and of course, Cambodia hotted up. He did some reporting which the military didn't like. That got him in trouble. I was kind of a little tranquil little island because no one knew or cared that much about what was going on with the Viet Cong. There wasn't that much analysis for me to struggle against.

Q: You left there when in 1970?

JOHNSON: I guess it was June or July of 1970.

JOHNSON: Well, I guess it just seemed me that it was interminable. I didn't see any end. I didn't see that we were any closer to the end. I guess I had been there so long and the situation had been so long that I just saw it as kind of part of life, as something that was going on. I didn't have any end scenario. We of course had these negotiations going on - but at that time - it is a little hard for me to remember when all these things happened - but at that time, we were really just the beginnings the negotiations in Paris.

We were essentially trying to win the war by attrition. There was all the "hearts and minds" kind of stuff. But the only way you could get the North Vietnamese to stop sending those folks down was to kill enough of them, and we didn't seem to be doing that. We were obviously killing a lot of them, but their willingness to persevere didn't seem to be that much eroded, or eroded at all. So therefore the war would continue.

The other way you might have won the war was to invade the North as we invaded North Korea. But there were lots of reasons why we didn't do that. It was never really contemplated as far as I know. So it just seemed that the war was going to go on. On the other hand, I don't think that I saw the South Vietnamese as being quite as fragile as they turned out to be in the long run. Of course, the situation was really quite different in 1975, but it was a little hard to see how the war was going to end.

Q: I'd like to end this session at this point. Where did you get assigned to in summer of 1970?

JOHNSON: I was assigned to the Vietnamese Working Group in Washington at the Department of State.

Q: Today is the 21st of January, 1997. Steve, you were with the Vietnamese Working Group from when to when?

JOHNSON: I guess its proper name was the Vietnam Working Group. I was the one who used "Vietnamese" in the first place. I was there from basically from the fall or late summer of 1970 until January of 1973, when I went back to Vietnam for six months. Then I rejoined it for a period.

Q: Well, we'll just pick up this 1970-73 period. Who was running this group when you arrived?

JOHNSON: You are really catching me out here. I guess it was Jim Engle who was in charge of the Vietnam Working Group at that time. Bill Sullivan was the Deputy Assistant Secretary with whom we dealt, and Roger Kirk was kind of his special assistant working on negotiations. Negotiations were, of course, going on in Paris at the time.

Q: Did you find a different atmosphere in the Washington group, although Roger Kirk had just been out there when you had been out there and others? Did you find a different attitude, outlook, than you had when you were at the embassy?

JOHNSON: Not particularly, no. Again, I had my own little bailiwick. I was the again, the Communist guy, the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong, and so I wasn't so much involved in our relations with South Vietnam and their various troubles and sins and difficulties. I was kind of off to the side in a sense. I was worrying about what the Vietnamese communists were doing.

Q: In the first place, I don't think I asked but while you were doing sort of North Vietnamese watching and Viet Cong watching-I guess in 1969, Ho Chi Minh died. Were you and others watching to see if this was going to make a difference?

JOHNSON: Well, lots of people were. There was lots of speculation. My view was that it wouldn't make much of a difference. Ho Chi Minh was kind of a generation ahead of the rest of the politburo in Hanoi and had handed on most of the daily responsibility to other people. Certainly the succession went smoothly and predictably. One of the things was that everybody said was, "Who is going to succeed Ho Chi Minh?" Well, nobody succeeded Ho Chi Minh. What he did was divide it up and there wasn't another Ho Chi Minh. But the other folks who were there had same idea of unifying Vietnam and bringing it under their communist party control.

Q: You were doing this at a very active time as far as negotiations were concerned. Since our people were sitting down looking across the table or tables or whatever you want to say but conducting negotiations with the North Vietnamese. I imagine there might have been quite a lively market in who are these people, what is making them tick at this particular point?

JOHNSON: There was. People were interested. We really had a lot of the information about the attitudes of individuals. You could get that kind of curriculum vitae kind of stuff about people without too much difficulty, but Le Duc Tho was the principal interlocutor in Paris from time to time. I am not to sure about all the timing of all of this. He of course wasn't there chief delegate. He went and kind of visited and dealt with people from time to time. But what was Le Duc Tho's particular attitude, and did that differ in any way from other people in the politburo? You really were talking about speculation there.

There was always a lot of argument and a kind of intense analysis about the hawks and doves in the Vietnamese communist hierarchy, I guess with some expectation that somehow or other they would mirror our own problems. All this was based, it always seemed to me, on very little evidence. We just didn't know that much. Obviously they must have. They did differ about tactics and things. They were obviously ambitious men, and some of them were no doubt willing to sink the knife bureaucratically into the back of others. But it was mostly speculation.

Q: Did you have any close relationship to the CIA analysis people and so on?

JOHNSON: I used to see them [perhaps] monthly. We had meetings over at the White House where Bill Stearman who had been in INR and was now in the Asia part of the National Security Council staff would convene these things. There would be people from the CIA, people that very frequently I knew from Saigon and from the military and various others. As I used to say, "pooling our ignorance" about these things.

Some of it had to do with how many soldiers were coming on the Ho Chi Minh Trail and what are they up to, and [some] had to do with, as I say, speculation about the political attitudes in Hanoi.

Q: Were we able to get a pretty good feel about the role of the Viet Cong vis a vis the North Vietnamese as time went on?

JOHNSON: We had as it turned out, quite an accurate picture of the apparatus, the Communist apparatus in the South, I'd guess you'd call it. We knew their political-military organization of the South, the various commands. For the most part we knew who the individuals were that were holding commands. There was always great speculation about the number 2 man at Central Office for South Vietnam who had a number of pseudonyms. Again, we had him right, too. Lyn Van Lin, who was normally called Muy Cuc in the papers, happily went to Ho Chi Minh's funeral, which was useful.

We knew that the national liberation front was just froth, that it didn't amount to anything. It had no operational significance. Various Vietnamese communist political-military organizations took their orders from Hanoi, some of them directly from Hanoi in the northern part of South Vietnam, and others through the Central Office for South Vietnam, which was always headed by a very senior party figure. One time, Le Duc Tho and later General Nguyen Chih Tho, who was killed, and then for the balance of the war, Pham Hung, who was a politburo member. We knew what it was, and we knew pretty much how it ran.

The Viet Cong or the Vietnamese communists had a different organization of the country. Their provinces didn't necessarily correspond to South Vietnamese provinces and sometimes had different names. So that was in my job, at least, or if you were in intelligence, you had to keep these two kind of political organizations in mind in their relationships to each other.

Another one that used to crop up every now and then as anomalous attacks was that the Viet Cong operated on Hanoi time, which was an hour ahead of Saigon time. Every now and then you would have an attack that wouldn't make sense unless you thought about the fact that if it took place an hour later it would have made sense. Like the rocketing of the national day parade in downtown Saigon which took place an hour before anything was supposed to happen there.

Q: What was the progress during this 1970-73 period on the peace talks?

JOHNSON: Well, they were going on. We on the Working Group had a very hard time knowing what was going on. Mr. Kissinger was doing the most important negotiation, and he kept his cards close to his vest. In fact, sometimes it was only through intelligence that we learned what the United States was doing in the negotiations or had some hints at what we were doing. But they were progressing.

Of course, at the end of 1972, we actually arrived at an agreement which all four parties - the North Vietnamese, the Viet Cong, Saigon, and the United States - signed on to.

Q: Was there concern within this working group about the U.S. Congress and all and sort of public opinion seeing that we were beginning to lose it here?

JOHNSON: Yes. People could perceive that. I forget the timing of it, but there was the great, great big demonstration in which anti-war folks tried to kind of shut down Washington. I think that must have been 1970. But there were other demonstrations. You could certainly, anybody in the United States could see that the tide of public opinion was going against continuing the war.

At the same time, of course, the United States under President Nixon's Vietnamization program was slowly withdrawing our combat units and other units from Vietnam. So our presence there was going down considerably.

Q: Were you getting at all from the American military with whom you were dealing about their feelings about how the war was conducted or had been conducted?

JOHNSON: Most of the people I dealt with were kind of intelligence people rather than operational people. Of course I knew officers who had actually been in the war, and most of them, a lot of them regretted and thought that they could have done better if they had been left to employ more means, that they had their arms tied behind them and they had other various complaints about the way the war was being fought. Certainly a lot of them thought the system of the one year tours and the lack of unit cohesion was detrimental to the army.

Q: Did you find within this working group that there were hawks and doves?

JOHNSON: I don't remember that being the case, no. We had a little bit of hawks and doves-at least one or two doves in Saigon at least. Of course, now it is a number of years away from that. I just can't remember whom I would really characterize in the Vietnam Working Group as a dove. There were certainly pessimists and optimists. I guess increasingly, pessimists by that time. I don't remember doves, no.

Q: Was there the CIA versus the INR viewpoint or was it a pretty of how we were looking at, particularly from your perspective of how we were looking at the Viet Cong and North Vietnam?

JOHNSON: I don't recall any really great conflicts there. The community of people that followed the Vietnamese communists was pretty small. Frank Snepp, who later on wrote a book about what happened to the CIA right at the fall of 1975, was one of the fellows from the CIA. And there were certainly arguments about various data. In my perception, there really wasn't a CIA view of what was going on and an INR view.

Q: Snepps' book is called "Indecent Interlude."

JOHNSON: Yes.

Q: Were you getting any readings at all at the time of the negotiations, I may be wrong, but wasn't it Christmas of 1972 or so where there was the heavy bombing of Hanoi and we upped the pressure. How was that perceived when that happened as far as its effectiveness? And after it happened, what was the analysis?

JOHNSON: Well, I think it was seen as pretty effective. Since we weren't privy to exactly what was going on in the negotiations, it was a little hard to know. But obviously the negotiations did achieve an agreement very soon afterwards. A lot of people, the more hawkish ones, wondered why we hadn't done it before. During the war there was this [protest] against the bombing of North Vietnam. Certainly there was great questions about its effectiveness in actually influencing the war.

But the bombing of North Vietnam was, as the Air Force and Navy people who ran the missions would complain, was very circumspect. There were lots of things we never targeted, one of them being Hanoi, and some of the facilities around it. So to actually go after targets in that area seemed to have a salutary effect on the minds of the North Vietnamese.

I think it was also the same time that we also mined the harbor, as mining the harbors was kind of a more passive thing to do, which nevertheless would have given the North Vietnamese... You can find mines and pick them up.

Nevertheless, it did make for difficulties, but they finally did arrive at the agreement and I guess it must have been Christmas. At the same time, just a bit before, that there had been a large Vietnamese communist offensive which was fought off. By this time the United States forces had been drawn way down. But you could still bring the B-52s to bear which were always useful when there was a large concentration of folks on the other side making attacks.

There was some very, very heavy fighting at the time in which the South Vietnamese you know, generally, did pretty well.

Q: How did you hear about the terms of the peace accords? Did you hear it the same time everybody else did?

JOHNSON: I expect it is a little hard for me to remember, but yes, I think so. We sort of got copies of them very soon afterward, and we read them. One of the things that went on that we haven't touched on during this whole time is the "Pentagon Papers" escapade.

Q: Ah, yes. Could you explain what that was?

JOHNSON: Well, the Pentagon Papers, I forget the timing of it. But Mr. McNamara while he was Secretary of Defense asked for a study of the whole range of Vietnam [issues], what were our decisions internally and also what were our diplomatic efforts. There had been all during the war kind of different initiatives, diplomatic initiatives, sometimes private ones to try to bring about peace talks. Those were written about.

In any case, this all ended up with I think was 40 some volumes of these things. Top Secret they were. This was before I arrived back in Washington, but in any case they apparently had been sent to the Department of State. You have been in the Department of State, forty-some volumes of Top Secret-no one ever looked at it. It was sent immediately to the bowels of some deep recess of the filing system of the Department. Everybody forgot about it. I had never known about it.

So when the New York Times started publishing it, this was a complete surprise not only to those of us on the desk but to those people on the "Seventh Floor" of the Department. Those that had ever heard of them had forgotten about them long before. Most of them never heard about it. So the first thing that happened was that, of course, people wanted to know what was coming. This was coming in kind of installments. The government made an effort to have a restraint on this. There was a case that went to the Supreme Court saying that you couldn't do this. I forget exactly the basis on doing it. Presumably, it was going to hurt national security, and it was Top Secret, and it was stolen and whatever other basis.

But no one knew what was in these books. No one who was then in the top or even the working levels of the Department of State. So there was a kind of a mobilization of a whole bunch of us who had served in Vietnam or worked on the working group. We were in one of the conference rooms of the Department, and they kind of distributed all these around. Everybody got a volume or two. The volumes were not uniform in size, and you had the job of kind of going through it as quickly as possible because the court cases were going on all the time and trying to discover what was in there. Bill Macomber was the deputy under secretary for management at the time, kind of the point man for the Department in the legal case.

Obviously these were subjective judgements about what was sensitive and what might hurt national security were it revealed today. Most of the stuff of the "Pentagon Papers" was not that exciting. It was historical. Some of it was already common knowledge. But there was this effort as we went through to try to pick out what could be used in this court case. I kind of went to the Department and didn't come home for a couple of days. You went all night and we tried to put together the papers to go to the court. Now all this [was] going on, on the fly. Everybody trying to discover what was in these things.

This was before the days of computers and the like, and so getting all this typed up in a form to go to the Supreme Court was difficult. You know, when you are working at say 3:30 in the morning and tired with secretaries, it was a real physical feat. Anyway we went through all that, and then the government lost the case and the New York Times and the Washington Post and other newspapers and then books went forward with the text from the "Pentagon Papers."

Q: What was the feeling that you got from it? Was there much in there that was a problem?

JOHNSON: Not really. Obviously the public survived. I didn't think from my point of view there weren't any revelations. All of this was a while ago now, but basically there were things on the negotiations which I guess would have been embarrassing or might have been embarrassing for the particular people involved and for the governments that had acted as intermediaries but were saying something else publically when they were doing this privately. So there were these kinds of things. In the long run of diplomacy, if you are shown not to be able to keep confidences, it will hurt you in some other way. It doesn't hurt you directly so much.

But there weren't any real surprises. Some of this, of course, I was just one of just a bunch of people reading it on the fly. Some of the history was rather interesting you know. I didn't really know some of the things that had gone on in the 1950s in those days and exactly what we were doing, and the French were pulling out and all that kind of stuff. Some of it was mildly embarrassing, but of course the people that had done it were pretty much gone from government.

Q: The people in the Vietnam working group knew Vietnam. They had been there and most had lived it for the last half decade or more. When you saw the peace accords, what was the general feeling?

JOHNSON: Well, I think the general feeling was, I guess, contradictory. On the one hand, most of us couldn't believe that it would really work, but at the same time, we kind of hoped against hope that it would, that somehow or other that because we had this agreement that maybe just maybe in spite of the kind of logic of the situation maybe peace could actually ensue. But I think that when you got away from that kind of euphoria over getting the agreement, most of us were pessimistic that it really could last.

Q: Did you find that your superiors trying were to put the best face on things? Or was that sort of the marching orders?

JOHNSON: Well, it is hard to know. I guess they were trying to say that it would be carried out, and we were going to do our best to make it work. For me personally at the time, one of the things that happened in connection with the agreement was that there was a decision by the Department to send, well it started out with 100 officers but finally got down to 45 officers who had been to Vietnam before and had some experience there, to on a six-month TDY tour of Vietnam to strengthen the reporting and other aspects of the embassy and the consulates. I was one of them.

So at the time, in Vietnam, there were... Well, I am not to sure when they were all set up. They had a consulate at Nha Trang, a consulate at Hue, one in Bien Hoa in III CORPS, and Kontum in IV CORPS. A consulate was in each of the core areas, and so all of these officers were sent back, including me. I wasn't in Washington during that time whether a spin was being put on things. I was zooming out to South Vietnam again.

Q: You arrived there in 1973?

JOHNSON: I got there towards the end of January 1973 and was there until August.

Q: Where did you go?

JOHNSON: My first job was in the embassy. There was a little group of four of us - John Helble as the chief, Vern Penner, and myself - that was established to help set up the International Control Commission. I guess the ICSC, the International Commission of Security and Control, I guess it was, which was a four nation organization of Canada, Indonesia, Hungary, and Poland which was established under the agreement to monitor compliance with the agreement.

Our job was to help these people. They came in, they were for the most part, military organizations but with diplomats as well, and they divided the country up into seven areas. They had people in the headquarters and, I guess, in the provinces. There were lots of practical problems with getting these people set up. The way they did it was Helble spoke Indonesian. Shepard spoke Hungarian. Penner spoke Polish, and as I say, I spoke "Canadian."

The Canadians were the easiest because, practically speaking, they... The American army was doing its final pullout. The American military left except for a military attaché of a sort of military assistance group, in March of 1973. They were turning over equipment to this organization. The Canadian sergeants got together with the American sergeants and somehow the typewriters and jeeps and air conditioners that worked ended up largely in Canadian hands. The Poles and Indonesians and others-the Hungarians kind of wondered why theirs didn't work so well. They really didn't understand the schmoozing aspect of it all. So the other guys had a harder job because they had to try to make sure or try to see that justice was done towards this or these other folks.

Q: One has to know that the sergeants run the army in any country and the Canadians and the American sergeants knew how to put this thing together.

JOHNSON: They did. I got around the country that time much more than I did my previous three years because my duties required me to visit a lot of these places. The Canadians had grown old and cynical in the previous ICC, which continued to exist in Laos and I don't know about North Vietnam or Cambodia. I guess it had disappeared in Cambodia, but did exist in Laos. Anyway, they had a bunch of veterans from the ICC in their organization. So they made a real college try to make this thing work and actually investigate cease fire violations and other violations of the accord.

But it was soon brought to a halt by the Hungarians and the Poles and ended up being rather so inert that the Canadians withdrew after awhile. Their places were taken by the Iranians. Much to Marshall Green's pleasure because then he was able to say that they were "Kurds in Hue." But any case that was very interesting-that three months that I worked on that.

One of the other things that was going on at the time once this control commission had kind of settled down there wasn't a need for a group of four of us to work on it anymore. Particularly since the Canadians could take care of themselves, I was transferred to the consulate general, I guess it was in Nha Trang, and my basic job there was to be the head of the political section.

Jim Engle was the consul general, but he had gone back to Washington in anticipation of going to Phnom Penh as chargé d'affaires, so Dick Teare effectively ran the consulate. We had in each of the 12 provinces of Two CORPS a reporting officer, and every one of these reporting officers spoke Vietnamese and had spent two, three, four years or even more in Vietnam before. They were people that had gone back as I had.

There were similar establishments in the other three consulates, and all of these officers had been guaranteed for the Department before they went out that their reporting would not be messed with in any way by the consulates or embassy. In other words, whatever they wanted to send in would go in without any expurgations or other [changes]. We would correct their spelling, but that was it. So there was an incredible amount of reporting that was done by really experienced officers. I don't know who was reading all this back in Washington, but it mostly went in the form of Airgrams.

But each one of these little provinces had a full-time political reporter that was basically able to send in what ever he wanted. The consulate in Nha Trang put out an incredible amount of reporting, and we really did have a pretty good picture of what was going on in the country. What was going on was an erosion of the cease fire, a kind of pushing forward by the communists, and a little bit of pushing forward by the Saigon government as well.

Of course, there was the usual reporting on the fecklessness of the civil administration of South Vietnam. There were other problems and the corruption and the like, but the most important part was that the communists were obviously using the cease fire to kind of prepare the way to continue their effort to take over South Vietnam.

Q: When you left, were you talking to Vietnamese officials as you went around?

JOHNSON: I didn't do much of that myself. My job was basically kind of an editorial one; as I mentioned earlier, I didn't speak Vietnamese. We had all these veteran officers who were doing the reporting, and my job was to funnel all these handwritten things that would come in and turn them into reports - and kind of shape them up and get them approved. As I say, you could only clean up the prose a little bit. There wasn't any real editing by the consulate. Some contact with local officials in Nha Trang, but not too much of that, since Dick Teare was doing that.

At the same time, we also were assisting [in] searching out crash sites trying to make determinations as to "missing in actions" and the like. I went on a few of those expeditions.

Q: When you left there what did you come back with I mean as far as from what you'd absorbed on this?

JOHNSON: Well, I guess that I came back with the judgement that the kind of reconciliation and peaceful evolution, if not envisaged in the peace agreement was at least hoped for in the peace agreement, was not going to happen - that most likely the war would continue. During the time I was there, the war continued at a rather low level. There really wasn't much going on in the way of military activity. There was some. There was building of roads and other kinds of things but not the large armed clashes that took place later.

HUGH G. APPLING
Provincial Advisor
Tay Ninh Province (1967-1968)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Saigon (1973-1974)

Hugh G. Appling was born in California in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947, initially serving in Austria, the United Kingdom, and Germany. After assignments in the Washington, DC, he was deputy chief of mission in Damascus and Manila before being assigned to Vietnam in 1968-1969 as senior province advisor to Tay Ninh. He received an award for heroism. He later returned to Vietnam (1973-1974) as deputy chief of mission. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

APPLING: They needed people and it was difficult to get senior officers to go. There was a time when the Far Eastern Bureau was able to commandeer officers and I was ordered to go. One day I was going as DCM to New Zealand, and the next day that was canceled and I was going to Vietnam.

Q: What was your job.

APPLING: I'm glad you asked that question. Those jobs were very little understood and most unusual. We were sort of petty viceroys, pro-consuls of a province, advisors, with a great deal of weight, to the province chief who had command of the local militia and authority over all of the civil side of the government, over the refugees, hospitals, agriculture, education, transportation and other economic areas. I had a diverse and numerous staff and we had authority and responsibility in our little world but our purpose was to strengthen the Vietnamese Community.

Tay Ninh is about 35 miles northeast of Saigon on the Cambodian border. The Cao Dai religion is predominant there and its cathedral is in that province. They had a social and political structure parallel to the government. I became a very good friend with their religious hierarchy. They had a tight community and took good care of their people. Their roots reached far back into nationalist opposition to French rule.

Q: Most Americans don't have any background for this. How did you go about it?

APPLING: With great difficulty. I believed that the Vietnamese understood the situation better than I or better than my staff. My first effort was to hear from them. To get as far down into the society as I could, to see what this guerrilla warfare was all about. The community seemed to be fine during the day and then at night there would be Viet Cong in the streets and propaganda lessons, troops terrorizing the farmers for food to feed their guerrilla. We had the border zones, where the Viet Cong took troops through, constant military movement.

Q: How did you find the local government?

APPLING: There were two province chiefs while I was there, one was a scholarly type, timid perhaps, not wanting to be blamed for anything. He was carried by his subordinates. He went back to Saigon pretty quickly.

The second, became a good friend and I respected him as governor and military commander. He had been raised in a tradition of nationalism and wanted very much to establish a stable society and effective government. He was a military man respected by the regular army and the U.S. advisors.

Q: Would you say something about the corruption. In some Asian societies it seems the only way things got done.

APPLING: The northern part of Tay Ninh province has extensive tropical forests, very valuable wood. The people were allowed to harvest it if they had a permit. I'm sure no one ever got a permit without kicking back some of the returns. The province chief never would say anything about it but I understood that officials in Saigon had a list of who cut timber and what happened to the wood taken out. I doubt if any business was operated without somebody getting some money for it.

The Vietnamese army would sometimes come in when the Viet Cong were especially aggressive and the command would set up at the province chief's home and the surrounding houses. They had no good lines of supply and someone had to feed them. The province chief had no choice but to get the food from the farmers. He acquired land himself, I assume at a low price, by putting the squeeze on someone. Public positions were not obtained without influence. Even so, there was much progress toward civil order and local government truly serving its people.

Q: The government of Thieu was exerting its authority through the province chief. But you thought things were working out.

APPLING: We had a good beginning. Using almost exclusively local militia, Tay Ninh produced a degree of stability, opened up a very large area for agriculture with new rice and new technology. We began to have local elections. People were willing though frightened to enter into local government positions. I was troubled that the people felt as little identity with the national government. There was little popular responsiveness to them. Little people felt that the Saigon government were just soldiers making the best of an opportunity for power and wealth. I had hoped that given time, local democracy would grow up, and with education and experience there would be greater confidence in the national government. But it was weak while I was there.

Q: What was the shock of the Tet Offensive.

APPLING: I came to Vietnam well after the Tet offensive. I think it had more repercussions outside Vietnam, than inside. It was not a military success for the Viet Cong and I didn't see any shock waves in Tay Ninh but I did not grasp adequately its effect abroad.

Q: How was the communication with the embassy?

APPLING: I was in the CORDS line of authority and the embassy was a fairly distant thing to us. Political officers would come out from time to time but we did not work very effectively together. The Ambassador gave me generous personal attention and I thought we were well supported in our unusual role.

Q: Was there any attempts to make things out to be better than they were?

APPLING: Not in the 1968-69 tour.

[Service in Australia 1970-73]

Q: You went back to Vietnam as DCM from 1973-74. Why did you go back.

APPLING: Previously, for personal reasons, I had turned down a request that I go somewhere, and I found that so contrary to my view of professional discipline that when the telegram came, I just went.

Q: Who was ambassador.

APPLING: Ellsworth Bunker was about to leave and Graham Martin had not yet arrived.

Q: Did you know Martin before?

APPLING: I believe we were in Paris together and he was then administrative officer. I knew him but not well. I saw him from time to time at the Department when I was there.

Q: Did he ask for you?

APPLING: Well, he would have had his choice of DCM, certainly I guess he didn't object.

Q: What was the situation in Vietnam when you arrived?

APPLING: We were just winding up the agreement on our withdrawal.

Charlie Whitehouse was chargé. In the first days there was a series of messages to iron out the last, most difficult passages with them, a lot of rushing out to the palace at midnight and crash messages back to Washington.

The agreements were then final and I was chargé for several weeks until Graham came out.

Q: What was the attitude about these Kissinger agreements, ours and the Vietnamese.

APPLING: The Vietnamese found them very dangerous. They repeatedly said they would have to rely on our support, not our military aid, but our support.

The embassy found the agreements acceptable. There was concern because there were lots of weak points. We hoped it would work.

Q: Were they a way of saving face?

APPLING: We felt that it was the best that we could do.

APPLING: Ambassador Martin's relationship with me could not have been more kindly and gracious. He arrived at the airport and I met him and went to the office. There he spoke of his reputation of a hard man and denied it. He sought my opinions and I understood from him that the decisive things in Vietnam were not there but in Washington.

The next day he called me in and we talked at length again. I knew he was due at the Foreign Ministry and I led him downstairs. There was no driver ready for us, which I thought was strange but supposed it was just a mistake. We got to the Foreign Ministry and no one was at the entrance to receive him. I ran in to talk to the chief of protocol and discovered that I had the schedule wrong. The appointment was for an hour later and I had mixed it up nervously trying to please the new Ambassador. What a blunder, but the Ambassador treated it lightly.

Q: How did he operate within the embassy.

APPLING: Very quietly. He wanted to listen more than to speak. He was disappointed that I didn't have a firm enough hand on what was going on but then our embassy was so compartmentalized that it was not easy to manage.

Q: I agree, byzantine is the word I use. Various powers involved, CIA, AID etc, and the military.

APPLING: And the DCM wasn't able to tell them what to do. You asked earlier about twisted reporting. I don't think the Ambassador ever allowed that to occur, but there were lots of fragmentary reports coming in and he was reluctant to pass on an incomplete picture because of the political situation in the U.S. Where everything leaked and could be abused. He didn't want one report to be misconstrued as the entire picture, good or bad. Younger officers chafed at this because they worked hard and reported accurately the fragments of the picture.

There was an endless train of visitors. I remember his meeting with Bella Abzug.

Q: She was from New York and very vocal about her opposition to the war.

APPLING: His conversation with her was amiable and penetrating. Both took very opposite positions but the Ambassador was charming, full of information and not provocative. I had expected fireworks but found a mutually respectful and friendly conversation.

Q: How did he deal with the Vietnamese government?

APPLING: A tinge of MacArthur. A little bit of the imperial. Listening to them and responding to their concerns. The conversations were like "You need to do this or you will lose support." And he was able to make our concerns understood.

I can only really recall three or four conversations with Thieu and the foreign minister. With the latter the subject was usually international support for their position, how they might usefully engage with others. I have very few recollections of Ambassador Martin meeting with other ambassadors. He had great respect for the French ambassador who was our neighbor.

We were both gone a lot. He was back in Washington twice for extended periods. I was in the hospital for a couple of weeks and then went to Australia for Christmas and left the following April.

Q: How did you deal with the middle grade and more seniors officers? There is the story that Ambassador Martin was completely out of touch and so on during the last days of our embassy there. What was the problem?

APPLING: I think in any large embassy the ambassador is rather distant from the junior staff. He necessarily deals with the chiefs, but he talked and walked around a lot. He might have been a little suspicious of the station chief, because he thought he might know things he was not revealing.

I guess because of my Tay Ninh experience, I seized opportunities to visit the consulates.

Q: After the peace accords, we had this system of consulate generals established around. How did they work out?

APPLING: They worked fine. The Consuls General were in and out of Saigon frequently, and were well informed about their areas. We didn't really funnel information to them about what was going on at home.

Q: Did you feel something less than a steady hand back in Washington because of the Watergate crisis?

APPLING: I was much less sensitive to it than I should have been. I think Graham had it constantly in his mind. He worried all the time about who had things in hand when response was needed. I was not good in that role.

Q: It took more than a year for this to play out and it was impossible to predict the downfall of the Nixon Administration because nothing like this had ever happened.

APPLING: I don't think I really estimated correctly the ineffectiveness of the governments of the U.S. and of Vietnam. We would bring up problems but neither could do much about them.

Q: When did you leave Vietnam?

APPLING: March of 1974.

Q: How did you feel about the situation in South Vietnam at the time?

APPLING: Uneasy. My gut feeling was that it was not working well and yet I cared about the country and was proud about how much good work had been done. I kept a measure of confidence that they could make a go of it. I saw defeatism, especially amongst my friends in the media. I don't think I made any sweeping judgements because I didn't feel I had a total grasp of the situation.

JOSEPH C. WALSH
Executive Officer, JUSPAO
City Unspecified, Vietnam (1967-1969)

Joseph C. Walsh graduated from college in 1933. He decided to pursue a career in Social Work, so he obtained his M.A. from the Fordham School of Social Service. In 1941, he was sworn in as an FBI Special Agent. One of his former FBI colleagues, Charles Noone asked him to come work for him at the U.S. Information Agency. He accepted the offer, which began his 20-year association with USIA. He has also served in Mexico. He was interviewed by Lew Schmidt on April 25, 1989.

Q: What years were you in Vietnam?

WALSH: I got there in August of '67. The infamous Tet Offensive happened a few months later, in the early days of 1968. And, perhaps of greater destruction, our JUSPAO headquarters were burned out the following August. Some correspondents, of which the town was full, pursued a concept that JUSPAO had been wrecked by enemy action. Such was not the case. The destructive fire was caused by badly installed electric circuitry along the ceilings of the ground floor.

Our office space was under a Vietnamese lease; the landlord initiated legal action insisting that the fire was caused by defective and unauthorized electric circuitry throughout the ground floor of that building and demanded all damages be repaired by JUSPAO. In Saigon those days, under contract with the U.S. Armed Forces, there were several very big U.S.-based construction companies. I sought their help but the costs they cited were way out of reach. Thus, I had to deal with local Vietnamese contractors whose work was agonizingly slow and badly done.

Meanwhile, especially with the greatly-appreciated "loan" of office furnishings from AID's Saigon/Supply Depot, we succeeded in locating and furnishing office space, albeit in several locations, with headquarters in the old bombed-out former U.S. embassy down by the river.

ROGER KIRK
Political Officer
Saigon (1967-1969)

Vietnamese Affairs
Washington, DC (1970-1971)

Ambassador Roger Kirk was born in Rhode Island in 1930. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955 and served in Italy, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, Somalia as ambassador, Austria with the International Atomic Energy Agency, and Romania as ambassador. He was interviewed in 1991 by Horace Torbert.

KIRK: I was minding my own business in the political section [Moscow] , and one fine morning a telegram came in saying I had been assigned to Saigon. This without any advance word whatsoever. And I would very much have preferred not to do that since I had four small children, and was still fond of my wife. I thought they could find enough people for whom neither was true to send to Saigon. But I had really no alternative but to accept on the grounds that if you're in the Foreign Service, unless you have a really good reason, you have to go where they send you. This was in early November-late October, and I managed to get them to agree I would leave after Christmas, so I moved to Saigon the 27th of December of 1967.

Q: Then, as usual, I suppose they said, "What? You here already."

KIRK: Well, no, actually they did seem to need me at that point. There was a small unit within the political section that was responsible for North Vietnam watching, and I was heading that unit. The reason, I guess, I was sent there really was because of my experience in the communist world. One of my first impressions in Saigon was at a New Year's eve party that I went to -- this is New Year's eve of 1968 -- where I would say almost all of the top people of the embassy, and even from the provinces, were present. It was a very good party but I'd just been three days ago in New Delhi, as I mentioned, and I was really stuck by the fact that these people were going to remake Vietnam. They were going to get rid of all the corruption, they were going to win the war, we were going to make a democracy out of it with a House of Representatives, a Senate, a Supreme Court. The whole thing was going to be very neat and tidy.

Q: All was going to be democratic, I suppose.

KIRK: Exactly, and it was all very high and noble ideals, but as I mentioned, India is sort of the grave yard of men's hopes and you learn a good deal of humility in India, even as an American, about your ability to change things. I must say at that point, I had considerable doubt that we could accomplish all that, praiseworthy as it was. Of course at the time Tet a month or two later, it became apparent that we could not. The Tet experience was interesting for me because we had a...

In those days spouses and families -- then usually referred to as wives and families -- were not allowed to be with you in Saigon, but for American holidays the spouses, not the children, were allowed to come in. The Vietnamese proposed that this should be done for Vietnamese holidays. Well, therefore, some spouses were allowed to come in for Tet, including my wife who came over from Delhi leaving our four children with their grandparents. In any case, there was a good deal of rumbling during the night, but the Vietnamese celebrate such holidays by massive explosions of firecrackers, and I told my wife that was all it was. Well, we woke up the next morning to no phone calls, no phone working, and the radio saying that Saigon was under attack. I said I obviously had to go up to the embassy so I set off in my grey pinstriped suit walking up through the center of the city, up towards the embassy. No one was on the streets, of course, and a few blocks from the embassy I saw an American tank with a bunch of soldiers around, and a major came over to me and said, "What are you doing?" I said, "I'm going to my office at the embassy." And he said, "There are Viet Cong all over that place, go back." So I did, and returned to the embassy later that day when it became apparent that the Viet Cong had in fact been cleared out.

In Saigon, certainly, we had the impression, and in the country we had the impression that Tet was a military defeat for the Vietnamese in the sense they committed their undercover South Vietnamese National Liberation Front forces, and did not achieve a major victory, or anything like the victory they'd hoped to achieve. On the other hand it was quite clear that Tet was a tremendous victory for them in the United States, where the decisive theater of the war was as it turned out.

After Tet and the move towards the Paris peace talks, my unit of the political section was charged with backing up the Saigon side of the peace talks. What that consisted of essentially was doing the staff work for a series of meetings between Ambassador Bunker, his deputy Ambassador Berger, the political counselor, first Arch Calhoun and then Martin Herz, and President Thieu, Vice President Ky, the Foreign Minister, and a note taker on the Vietnamese side. So the four of us -- I was the note taker on the American side -- would go to these meetings once or twice a week with those four individuals to whom we were presenting the kinds of concessions that we thought the Vietnamese should at least consider to get the peace talks moving. This, of course, is a very early stage in the peace talks. The concessions were nothing like as great as the ones that eventually had to be made. But Thieu, whatever else you could say about him, was a master of diplomatic negotiation and technique, and he gave virtually nothing away. He listened with great politeness to everything Ambassador Bunker had to say, but committed himself to virtually no concessions whatsoever.

One of the interesting things to me, during this several months really of meetings, was to see how Thieu downgraded Ky's status during the process of the negotiation. At the first meetings Ky would be in Thieu's office when we came into the waiting room. When we would be ushered in to join, they were obviously talking together. A little bit later, we could see through some translucent curtains the figure of Ky going into Thieu's office just a moment before we did. Still later Ky was in the waiting room with us. Of course, in the oriental world this was a dramatic symbol of his decreasing status in terms of the power situation in Saigon. And, of course, Thieu and Ky were very different people. Ky was a very flamboyant fighter pilot type; Thieu was much more quiet, oriental appearing, much less accessible to Americans, and much more clever at bureaucratic maneuvering.

In any case, these talks went on for some time, and we then began to get into the layers upon layers of classification, or sensitivity we had. The messages on these talks had one special classification. Then it developed there was a second series of messages that were coming in with another level of classification on the same subject. And this, as Vietnam went on, was just added to more and more. So you had circles within circles within circles that were only dimly apparent to us working in one of the circles at the time.

I guess what really struck me about the embassy operation there was that we had almost no contact with the Vietnamese. My feeling was that we knew little about what was going on, really, in Vietnam. We had this contact with Thieu and Ky, that was special, but with the people we had very little really and it was difficult to move around the countryside in many cases. It seemed to me we knew less about the Vietnamese than we had about the Indians, and knew less about the Indians than we had about the Soviets. We knew less about the Soviets than we had about Italians. As you move east somehow it becomes more and more difficult. Well, the cultural gap is greater and perhaps not unnatural.

Another thing of interest to me in that Vietnamese experience was that almost everyone had a program of action that they were following: be it pacification, military victory, economics. The tendency was very much to report successes for the program for which you were responsible. I think that was one of the reasons that the reporting got badly skewed, and it did get badly skewed, I believe, even though most people are certainly honest. There was one small unit in the political section called the provincial reporting unit which had two officers for each of the four corps areas of South Vietnam. These young men would go out, observe, and then write reports. And they had no responsibility for any program. Their reports were much more pessimistic than those of the military and the civilian -- civilians who were program administrators.

Q: Do you remember who ran that section when you were there?

KIRK: I just honestly don't. There are people who are now quite prominent in the Service who were some of these reporting officers. Dave Lambertson was one. These were all very junior officers and partly for that reason some of their reports were discounted. Partly they showed the indignation and surprise at corruption that you might expect from a junior American officer. That tended to leave people to give less weight to their reports than they might otherwise have done. It was sort of as if they were discovering the real world, that they were a little bit too idealistic. But I must say, I thought as a whole they gave a better picture of what was going on than almost anyone else. They were inconvenient, these reports, because they did vary with what was going out. That part of the political section was abolished shortly after I left, not because I left, but shortly after I left which I always thought was too bad.

I guess that's really all I need say about Saigon except that there were an awful lot of good people there.

Q: Well, they certainly had their pick of people almost, such as you.

KIRK: There was no question, you got the word and off you went.

Q: Was Bunker there most of the time? Or was he away a good deal?

KIRK: Bunker was there most of the time. He occasionally went to Nepal to visit Carol Laise, his wife. He was there almost all the time, and he, as you know, was an immensely conscientious person, always available, long hours, a wonderful person to work for, of course.

Q: I remember the Italian Foreign Office thought he was the best guy that had ever been in Italy up until the time I left anyway.

KIRK: I first met him really when I was in New Delhi in connection with the advance trip for Eisenhower's visit that I mentioned earlier on the preceding tape. I was really struck that Bunker welcomed us into his office, the eight, or ten, or twelve top people, if you will, on the advance party, along with his embassy people. He took off his coat and said, "Let's go to work," and proceeded to give the kind of personal direct attention to the Presidential visit that it required, which not all ambassadors did. And Bunker already by that time was a very distinguished ambassador. In Saigon he was always kind and thoughtful and wise.

I think it was hard for the American establishment at the embassy, and indeed later in Washington -- or at the same time in Washington -- to accept how tough the North Vietnamese were, and how determined they were. Again, our reporting of that subject was not terribly much welcomed in Washington.

After Vietnam I came back to Washington to work in Bill Sullivan's office -- right outside his door -- as a kind of special assistant, albeit not with that title. Bill was the Deputy Assistant Secretary in what was then known as FE, Far East, now EAP, for Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. And I spent a couple of years, as I say, with him. Bill at that point reported in the capacity of Deputy Assistant Secretary to Secretary Rogers, and he reported as deputy head of an NSC committee on Vietnam to Henry Kissinger. And as a mark of his diplomatic skill he managed to do both without offending either. We would have meetings twice a week of people from the Pentagon, from AID, from CIA, from the White House, and from State, to coordinate the sort of senior working level activities on Vietnam. Not that we were making the policies certainly, much less myself who was sitting there as kind of factotum and note taker, and facilitator. Not that policy was being made there, but to be sure that the implementation of the policy was coordinated and was moving ahead smoothly. I knew that work quite well.

It was interesting to me to see the interplay of...

Q: This was called the Vietnam Working Group, was it?

KIRK: The Vietnam Working Group was actually the Vietnam desk. This was called something else, Vietnam Task Force, or something like that. The director of the Vietnam Working Group was a member of this ad hoc body that coordinated things. He represented the State Department, if you will. He, unlike Bill Sullivan, did not have a NSC hat, which Bill did. For example, if a paper were wanted on various withdrawal scenarios, we would produce that as part of this group. If we had to coordinate messages of various kinds going out to Paris, or going out to Saigon, of an inter-departmental nature that didn't have to be done at the Secretary level, then we would do that. Of course the interesting thing in those meetings was the interplay between what was happening in Vietnam, what was happening in Paris, and what was happening in the United States. Different people reporting on different aspects of this and trying to keep all this in mind -- at this point it was essentially managing the withdrawal of the United States from Vietnam. Nixon was already President, and it was clear that withdrawal was the name of the game. It was a question of how fast, under what circumstances, and what kinds of negotiating techniques. The negotiations, of course, the real ones, were being handled by Kissinger in the White House but John Holbrooke, his assistant for those things, used to come over. Although he did not share with us what was going on, he knew what was going on.

As I mentioned, if we were asked to do papers for the NSC, then we would coordinate the production of those. And here again in this circles within circles I remember coordinating two papers simultaneously. One paper was close to the real paper. I was involved in that. That was a small group. Then there was a larger group that was doing another paper that was not witting of much of the material that went into the first paper. And I'm sure that there was a third paper of a yet higher level that was where it really mattered. I think to some extent that was Dr. Kissinger simply keeping everybody writing papers and not getting in his way. Though to his credit I think that he absorbed more of the detailed studies than most NSC members, or Secretaries of State.

Q: He was a fantastic character, there's no question about that.

KIRK: He is a fantastic character.

Q: It is not right to speak of him in the past tense, because he's very much around.

KIRK: I must say again, as a member and sometimes chairman of those inter-departmental meetings, it was extraordinary the difference in the power of the State Department representative after Henry Kissinger moved over to the State Department then before he was there. All of a sudden the people around the table were much more deferential because at that point Kissinger also retained the title of National Security Adviser. So as a State Department representative you could say, "I will appeal it to the National Security Adviser," who also happened to be your boss. This is particularly important in dealing with the Pentagon because they were often quite difficult on some of these things. I remember being taken over there for a very long briefing about how it was absolutely physically impossible to move our men out in more than a year and a half, or something like that, even if the President ordered it immediately, something that I expressly did not believe.

Q: They hadn't heard about operation Desert Storm yet.

KIRK: That's right. Moving troops and equipment out in an orderly way is difficult. Moving them out as fast as possible is much less efficient. But there another thing that was of interest to me was that an analyst -- who for these purposes had best remain nameless, I suppose -- in INR, the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, who was writing what I thought was some pretty good stuff on the North Vietnamese, particularly how tough they were and how they weren't about to give up. He was not able to get his material out through his front office, or even through his directorate in INR because it was going contrary to regular wisdom. He used to give me copies of his drafts, and I would give them to the NSC staff. That was the only way that we got this material to at least the NSC staff. I doubt very much if they showed them to President Johnson but at least they knew what a responsible analyst thought. And he was then fired from INR. We managed to get him a job as it so happened on the NSC staff. But the willingness of people to accept information contrary to their preconceptions is very limited.

Q: Well, you must have found out about this later on when you had that INR desk.

KIRK: Yes, yes indeed.

Q: Now you finally got a little...

KIRK: A delightful year at the Senior Seminar.

Q: By this time you'd been quite a bit on...

KIRK: I'd been on Vietnam from December of '67 until July- August of '71, which was plenty.

Binh-long (1969)

Political Officer
Saigon (1970-1972)

John Sylvester, Jr. graduated from Williams college in 1952. From there, he joined the Army, and fought in the Korean war. After joining the Foreign Service in 1955, he served in Japan and Vietnam. Mr. Sylvester was interviewed by Jeff Broadwater in 1993.

Q: I want to ask you some questions about Vietnam, but before we get to Vietnam, I know you spent at least one year in the White House, on the White House staff, in 1967, I think?

SYLVESTER: Yes.

Q: Could you tell me a little bit about that, what your duties were and how you came to join the White House staff?

SYLVESTER: Well, I was taken over essentially as a flunky. The White House, under President Johnson, tried to make a point of being a very lean operation, a parsimonious operation. So they covered all their expenses by borrowing everything from other government departments; they'd levy a photocopier from the Pentagon or a junior officer from State. And I was brought over to help in the office of the special assistant for the Vietnam civil policy, the pacification program. It was run by a very capable, rather acerbic ex-CIA officer named Robert Komer, and he had as a deputy Ambassador William Leonhart, a very bright senior Foreign Service officer. And I just worked for Leonhart, basically shuffling his papers.

But it was interesting to watch, because what Komer and Leonhart were trying to do was make a sensible, concerted effort on the civil side in Vietnam. In Vietnam, until that period, we had both military and civilian advisors in the countryside. And all the agencies were represented, not only Army, Navy, Air Force, Coast Guard, Marines, and so forth, but the U.S. Information Agency, or agricultural advisors under AID. It was clearly necessary to get everybody to work together, which they weren't doing very well up to that period. Komer was brought in to spearhead this, and he, working with the embassy in Saigon and the MACV authorities, finally combined the whole effort in the countryside of Vietnam as a joint effort.

For instance, the advisors, working with a Vietnamese province chief, who up to then would go in individually to present their problems or what they wanted to push on..., all worked, after that, for one person, the province senior advisor. The military advisors and the civilian advisors were wedded together. In one province, you'd have an Army lieutenant colonel be the senior advisor, and he'd have a civilian deputy, an AID guy or a Foreign Service officer on loan. In the next province, it would be the other way around; the civilian might be the senior guy.

Komer was pushing this all from the Washington end, trying to get it all to gel. And there were many, many problems, like getting supplies through the congested port of Saigon, trying to get the Vietnamese corps commanders to focus on the civilian side as well as their straight military duties.

And it was well done. Komer pushed very hard. He was an abrasive but effective man. He later went out to work as a deputy for the commander of MACV in Saigon, quite successfully.

Q: What was MACV?

SYLVESTER: The Military Assistance Command, Vietnam. And that took in, in the end, all American military activities, plus the pacification program, in Vietnam.

Q: Did you think the White House was putting enough emphasis on pacification while you were there?

SYLVESTER: Yes, well that came straight down from the president.

The only time I ever personally met a president was when Komer took us over one day, his, I think, seven or eight officers, to meet President Johnson in the Fish Room, his conference room in the White House. Johnson lived up to every story I'd ever heard about him: he was press-the-flesh; he was dominating; he was funny; he was acerbic. But he was also very interested in the particulars of the civil programs. For instance, What was the price of pork in Saigon?, an indicator of how the civilian economy was going. And he questioned Komer, I thought, intelligently and well about the issues.

There was one funny thing. Johnson hated to have his staff take vacations, but somehow Komer had persuaded Johnson to let him take a week of leave, going over to France with his family. And Johnson, in this meeting that we were in, kidded, or actually rode, Komer pretty heavily about goofing off for a week. Finally, he turned to the rest of us and said, "Now I hope you all will go home tonight, take a good long vacation, and then come back refreshed tomorrow morning."

But it was very interesting, and Komer was clearly following what the president wanted as he did this.

Q: Did your experience in Japan influence your thinking about the Vietnam War? My impression is that the Japanese generally weren't very supportive of American involvement. What did you think about that?

SYLVESTER: It probably influenced me some, but I think I was probably more influenced by my honors thesis in college on the Spanish Civil War, because there were many parallels between the war in Vietnam and the war in Spain, 1936-39. They were both cockpits for the great power conflicts of their era, yet they were also brutal civil wars. I felt strongly about the values of the war in Spain, generally favoring the republican side. And I thought one of the great lapses that led to World War II was the failure of the democracies to assist the side in Spain that to the largest extent shared their values. And I felt, in Vietnam, that we had a duty to try to help people who shared our values, to the extent that you have them in a developing country like that. And I felt the Republic of Vietnam, despite its many faults, was a semi-democracy and that we had a duty to help them.

Ambassador Francis Terry McNamara was born in Troy, New York in November, 1927 and served in the Navy during both World War II and Korea. McNamara graduated from McGill University in Montreal and then entered the Foreign Service in September 1956. His overseas posts included Salisbury, Vietnam, Dahomey (Benin), Beirut, and Cape Verde. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

MCNAMARA: At the time, my former ambassador in Dar es Salaam, Bill Leonhart, was in the White House, working on Vietnam. I told him that I'd really like to go to Vietnam. In part it had to do with getting away from South Africa, but in part also it was something that was going on, it was something happening, it was the great historic event of our time. I wanted to be part of it -- to see it up close.

Q: Yes, this was what was known as seeing the elephant. I did the same thing.

MCNAMARA: This was the historic event of the time, and I didn't want to be sitting in a backwater, watching it from a great distance. And at that point, Africa was fast becoming a backwater. Leonhart said, "Right, I'll fix it. We need activists in Vietnam." It was a Friday that I talked to him. On Monday morning, he said, "Report to the Vietnam Training Center at FSI." He made the necessary call to Personnel. When they heard that the White House was asking for me, my assignment was changed and I was on my way to Vietnam.

That is how it happened. I went to the Vietnam Training Center for six weeks and departed for Vietnam late in 1967.

During the training course, we went to play war games in Cacapon, West Virginia, in a State park. There was snow on the ground; it couldn't have been further from what we would encounter in Vietnam. Our instructors included a former missionary who'd been in China and Indochina in the old days. We were given a scenario for a war game. I conspired with some of my pals to subvert the thing by acting as though I were on one side, while in fact supporting the other. This screwed up the planned solution. After the war game was over, the born-again Christian gentleman accused me of lacking moral fiber. I had been "duplicitous," he indignantly accused. When I asked whether the Viet Cong might also be duplicitous who might not always tell the truth, the man of God turned his back on me. My point seemed to be beyond his understanding. Sadly, these were the kind of people that were preparing us to go to Vietnam.

Q: That was obviously part of the problem.

MCNAMARA: Anyway, I spent Christmas in Hawaii, with my daughters and arrived in Saigon on the last day of '67 or the first day of '68. Holiday celebrations had slowed up the processing and assignment machinery. As a result, there were quite a few of us awaiting provincial assignments in Saigon. Our orientation began with briefings given in a theater in the Rex Hotel in central Saigon.

Q: Yes, it was an officers' billet in the Hotel Rex.

MCNAMARA: I think they also used the theater for the press briefings. During our orientation period, we were assigned rooms in hotels in the center of town that had been rented by USAID. It was interesting to see Saigon on the eve of Tet. Nguyen Hue Street, a wide boulevard in the center of town, was full of flowers and flowering trees being sold to celebrate Tet. There was a festive spirit like the before-Christmas atmosphere in the United States. One could sense a feeling of optimism.

The people who briefed us exuded optimism. They seemed to think that a corner had been turned in the war and that things were going very well. I don't remember anyone actually mentioning a light at the end of the tunnel, but Westmoreland had just done so before Congress. It did appear, from the external signs visible to a complete newcomer, that things were going well and that people were optimistic, both the Vietnamese and the Americans. Preparations for Tet were going forward and the mood seemed to be one of happy anticipation.

I went to my briefing classes and awaited my assignment. Technically, I was on loan to USAID to work in the joint field advisory program called CORDS (Civil Operations for Rural Development). CORDS was largely military, but had a serious civilian component. It had only recently been formed to take in all of the provincial advisors, both military and civilian, and was responsible to MACV (Military Assistance Command, Vietnam). It had a directorate in MACV.

Q: MACV being the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam.

MCNAMARA: Right! Westmoreland was the chief of MACV, as well as being commander of all U.S. forces in Vietnam. Robert Komer, who had been in the White House, had just been named as the chief of CORDS. A civilian with a CIA background, he was a deputy to Westmoreland. The top leadership was mainly civilian. At the province level the leadership was split, military-civilian. If the Province senior advisor was military, then his deputy would be civilian. If the PSA was civilian chief, his deputy would be military. The theory was that our advisory effort should speak with one voice. In any case, at the provincial level, it was not easy to separate military from civilian aspects of the war. The VC were fighting a "revolutionary war" where such fine distinctions were meaningless. Unbeknownst to most of us, disaster was about to strike while we happily visited restaurants and watched the Vietnamese middle class prepare for their great annual celebration. On the eve of Tet suddenly the atmosphere changed. Security officers came to our hotel with a warning that we were not to go out that night. The whole atmosphere changed quickly, and where the markets had been overflowing in Nguyen Hue Street and elsewhere in Saigon, suddenly there were very few people on the streets. We were told by American security officers that we should get off the streets, stay in the hotel that night, and not go out on the streets at all. There was usually a curfew at about ten o'clock, I think, but they lowered the curfew to six or seven that night, to keep people indoors.

In the middle of the night, I was awakened by explosions. Other people in the hotel told me that there had been attacks by the Viet Cong in the city. We went up to the hotel roof, where we could hear the crunch of explosions and see tracers and flares lighting up the sky. The sounds indicated that some intense fighting was taking place nearby.

The next morning, there was smoke in the air in the direction of our embassy, a few blocks north of the hotel district where we were staying. There was much military activity all around the town. Helicopter gun ships were buzzing over the town firing at targets in the town itself. We started hearing reports on the radio that the embassy had been attacked by sappers who had gotten inside the wall.

By noontime, things had quieted down in the center of town. The shooting and the fighting at the embassy had ended. That afternoon, I walked up to the embassy. Everybody was very tense. There were troops all over the place. You could see the small hole that had been blown at the base of the wall going into the embassy, where Viet Cong had gotten through. There were signs of a battle everywhere. The face of the building was pockmarked, and the wall out in front was pockmarked. My friend Bill Simmons and I walked past but were not allowed to enter the embassy.

Fighting continued in Saigon for about a week. Every day and every night we went to the hotel roof to watch the fireworks. After the first night nothing happened in the center of town, but you didn't have to go far to find action. We could see it all from the roof. The smoke and the diving airplanes, the helicopters and the rattle of small arms.

In the middle of the Tet Offensive, Bill Simmons, an FSO colleague, and I got called to come to the CORDS headquarters. We were brought out in a car as there was no public transportation operating. We were told that we were being sent down to the Mekong delta. There were two assignments: one in Vinh-long Province, and the other in Binh Xuyen. It was decided that I would go to Vinh-long, and Bill was destined for Binh Xuyen. The next morning we were taken to Tan Son Nhat Airport for a flight to Can-Tho, the mid-Delta location of the IV Corps Headquarters. From there, we would be taken to our provinces.

The next morning, we boarded an Air America aircraft for Can-Tho. The VC were still in the university at Can-Tho, just on the outskirts of town. I recall seeing American airplanes bombing them as we entered town. It wasn't really very close. We were staying in the CORDS compound and you could see the airplanes coming down, the bombs going off, and hear the shooting. At the CORDS compound itself, however, all was peaceful. The VC had never actually gotten into the center of Can-Tho.

The next day, I was taken in a helicopter up to Vinh-long, which is the province just north of Can-Tho. The town of Vinh-long, the province capital, is at the north side of the province. To get there from Can-Tho you cross Bassac River and cross the whole province before arriving at Vinh-long. At the Vinh-long airport, there was much evidence of recent fighting. The VC had gotten into the airport, and the helicopter crews, on the first morning of the offensive, had to fight for their helicopters. During this action, the airport commander was killed on the tarmac in a shootout with the VC. Once out of the airport and into the town, I found a scene of mass destruction. Much of the center of the town had been reduced to rubble. The VC had taken over virtually all of the center of Vinh-long. Only the province chief's house, and the military headquarters compound had held out in the center of town.

I was replacing an advisor who had been killed during the offensive. His predecessor had also been killed, just before the Tet Offensive, in an ambush. My job was to be the chief of rural development (RD). Essentially, I would be in charge of all of the civilian developmental programs, plus a village pacification program. This would include armed development workers called "RD Cadres" who were supposed to live in and protect villages. Our advisory team was composed of some ten or twelve civilians and about two hundred and fifty military.

Q: These were Americans.

MCNAMARA: These were all Americans, yes. They had lost about five civilians, about half the team.

Q: Boy, that must have been about as bad as anywhere, except for Hue, wasn't it?

MCNAMARA: I think so. I don't know how many members of the team were lost in Hue, but, of course, people there were also taken prisoner in Hue. In Vinh-long losses were deaths. It was really bad. The town was badly mauled. The VC were inside the town and had taken over most of it. Then, to reoccupy it, there were battles, lots of aerial bombardment and so on. There were great piles of bricks and mortar in the middle of the streets. Houses blown into the streets.

Anyway, hearing that your predecessor has just been killed, and that his predecessor was also killed was unsettling. I was the first one who had held the job to walk out alive.

When I arrived, there were hundreds of refugees huddled in the town. Some were from the countryside. Others were townspeople whose homes had been destroyed. We had a very bad situation: (1) to take care of the refugees, and (2) to take back much of the province from the VC. It was very dangerous, or at least it was perceived to be very dangerous in Vinh-long for quite some time after the Tet attacks. We didn't hold very much ground.

Q: When you say "we," how much was American, and how much was Vietnamese?

MCNAMARA: Well, there were no American troops in Vinh-long at all. In the delta, in general, there were no American troops aside from the riverine force, which was made up of only one brigade from the 9th Division. They were mainly on boats and would deploy from the boats on operations. We had the American Navy patrol boats, and some SEAL teams. But that's really all. The Vietnamese were doing virtually all the fighting. However, American advisors were serving with all of the Vietnamese units. We also had our advisory teams with the provincial forces down to district level.

When I arrived, my staff, both Vietnamese and American, were traumatized. They had gone through some very bad experiences. My job was to rebuild confidence and then get them back to work in the countryside.

Q: In the first place, when you arrived there, how did you know what you were supposed to be doing?

MCNAMARA: Well, I was not given any specific instructions. The Province Senior Advisor, an Army colonel named Roberge, was fully occupied with the military situation. Until security was reestablished we could not help the Vietnamese build roads or teach people improved farming techniques. These were the things advisors were trained to do. We were bottled up in the town. These guys had just gone through some horrendous attacks. Many had been shooting it out with the VC. They had to protect their own homes. This was very bad stuff. They didn't have any American troops around to help them; they were on their own. The civilians and the military advisors had to protect themselves. They mustered everybody who could pull a trigger. And that was that. They went through some very bad times.

And the thing wasn't over. When I arrived we were in the middle of the Tet Offensive. They had gotten the VC out of the town itself, but they were just on the outskirts of town.

First, I opened our office and got people to show up for work. We had to go out and find our Vietnamese employees and convince them that it was safe enough to go about the town. We worked like hell to feed the refugees and helping to get tents to shelter them. Initially, this was about all we could do.

Q: Where were you getting the food?

MCNAMARA: The provincial government opened storehouses of rice. Some food was brought in by river barge. But, anyway, we got it in and we fed them. The refugee problem was temporary. But, in some instance, it lasted for a couple of months.

Q: You had military advisors as part of your team, is that right?

MCNAMARA: Oh, yes, yes, I had some military types.

Q: What were the professional American military thinking about this whole business? I mean, they were seeing it from a small shop. How were they taking it?

MCNAMARA: They were shocked by the suddenness of the attacks and by their unexpectedness. In Vinh-long, the VC had been infiltrating into the town for some weeks beforehand. They brought guns in coffins and buried them in a cemetery near the town center. They infiltrated in a variety of ways, and they were inside the town before anybody knew it. Then they started attacking the various Vietnamese installations, and the American advisors. The Vietnamese nationalists, the Army, never really expected this to happen. They thought that Tet was a sacred thing, and that no Vietnamese would violate a truce on Tet by mounting a massive offensive. Many soldiers had been given leave. Units were in barracks preparing to celebrate. Their guard was way down. The attacks could not have been so successful had they not been surprised.

Some two weeks after my arrival the VC mounted a second offensive in Vinh-long and again they got into the town.

At this point I was living in a little compound with most of the other civilian advisors. We were armed and ready to defend ourselves.

I was sharing a trailer with a large USAID fellow. In the middle of the night, the attack was preceded by shelling. He panicked trying to get out of the trailer while putting on a flak jacket. In his haste, he got stuck in the door of the trailer. I was inside and also wanted to get out of the trailer. My companion was a large, frightened mass of quivering flesh jammed in the door. He was incapable of helping himself. To dislodge him, I braced my back against the sink, put my feet on his ass and pushed. It was just like opening a champagne bottle. The cork popped out and shot out the door.

Outside, I helped organize the defense of our compound. We had a retired master sergeant with us, who was a civilian admin. officer. He was very useful. We had an M-60 machine gun that we mounted to cover the road outside the compound. We manned holes in the wall. We were ready for war. The VC were in the town, but had not reached our position.

At that uncomfortable time, we got a call from the team headquarters telling me to get our people out of this area as the VC had been seen close to our compound. Three Vietnamese armored "commando" vehicles arrived to escort us to a Navy compound some distance down the road. It was used to lodge SEAL teams and patrol boat crews. The place was relatively well defended -- certainly better than our little compound.

I went up on the top of the building, and it was just like a ship's bridge up there. The Navy commander of the little station was there. They had machine guns mounted on the parapet of the building. The commander was directing his defenses from the top of the building, which was probably the worst place to be. It provided a good target with only minimal protection from weapons like an RPG. In any case, I was there with him. We took the odd round, but there was no assault on us. The Navy had an awful lot of armament. Presumably, the VC decided to bypass our little fortress for there was plenty of fighting further into the city. Our place remained relatively quiet.

After three days, the second mini-Tet attack ran out of steam. We were then able to reopen the office and again encourage our Vietnamese employees to return. It was a gradual hand-holding exercise rebuilding self-confidence. I got them to begin to go out of town to our work sites. Getting them back on the roads was a major accomplishment. I led them by example. Finally, I visited all the districts regularly. At first, I had to go mainly in helicopters, but then I started driving the roads. It was six months before we really built a level of confidence where people would drive without apprehension on the main roads. All the time I was working on our Vietnamese counterparts cajoling, challenging, shaming them into venturing into the countryside where the war would be won or lost.

Tet was more of a psychological problem than it was anything else. In military terms, it failed. But psychologically, it was a great victory. Indeed, the biggest victory was won in the United States, because of its effect on the American people. At the time, however, it traumatized people in Vietnam.

Q: What sort of leadership was there? I'm not talking about you, but the people talking to you. Were they trying to buck you up? Did you have the feeling that we knew what we were doing? I mean, once you got past the initial period of just trying to protect yourself. Were we trying to explain it to ourselves? What was the feeling?

MCNAMARA: Eventually, there was an effort to explain the offensive. It was characterized as a terrible defeat for the VC. This was, of course, true in purely military terms. However, it missed the more important point of the impact on confidence in the U.S. Indeed, it was a watershed. The USG was never again able to convince the American people that the war was winnable. After all, they had seen VC in the American Embassy compound on TV.

The Vietnamese province chief, who had arrived in Vinh-long shortly before Tet, was a good leader and a very tough guy. His name was Nghia. They used to call him the "coup man." He was a cavalry colonel, a regular Vietnamese army officer. He had commanded the APC in which the Diem brothers were killed after the 1963 coup d'etat.

Q: The brothers Diem.

MCNAMARA: The brothers Diem were killed. He played a controversial part in their assassination. It's not clear whether he participated in the actual assassination or not. But he was certainly part of the coup. Obviously, the generals who organized the coup picked his troop of APCs to go out and get them. Therefore, he must have been considered politically reliable. I've heard a variety of stories, but the one that seems to be the most reliable is that it was Big Minh's aide-de-camp who actually did the shooting. But Nghia was there and he might have pulled the trigger himself. I don't know. He was involved in several other coups, and spent some time in Cambodia cooling off after one of the coups. He was a guy who was feared and not somebody that many of the generals had great faith in. They were afraid of him because he was hot tempered and an idealist. He was also involved in Vietnamese nationalist politics. So he probably never would have been given the job as a province chief if the situation was not desperate and his predecessor had not been badly wounded. They had to put a good soldier into the job, so he was chosen. I wasn't there when he first arrived, so I can't speak to that too much. But it is obvious to me, from what I know of Vietnam now, that he would not have been a prime candidate, except in a time of extreme crisis.

Providentially, he was there, because he was a damn good soldier. He did a remarkable job in Vinh-long in fighting the war with his provincial forces. He got the troops out and got them working, and he pushed the VC away from the various towns. Gradually, he took back control of the province in about six months time. The fighting was hard but the VC were on the run by July-August of 1968.

I remember we went to one very isolated district town down on the Mantit Nicholai Canal, which is a principal canal that the rice boats take going from one arm of the Mekong to the other, north-south, on the way to the market in Saigon. It's one of the most important waterways in the delta.

It cuts right across Vinh-long. They'd had horrendous battles with the VC over control of this waterway for some years before. I remember going down there to resupply the place and bring new troops in.

I told the Province Senior Advisor that I had to go with the convoy reopening the canal after Tet. Teams of my RD cadres were young going in for the first time, and I felt I should be with them. He didn't want me to go. He said, "No, it's too dangerous. I don't want you to go."

And I said, "But that's my job."

He said, "But you're a civilian. You shouldn't be doing that."

I said, "Look, we're all in this. This isn't a question of being civilian or military. Those guys are my responsibility, and I feel that I have to go with them."

Finally, he gave me permission to go along. We went down on Vietnamese landing craft guarded by monitors, heavily armed with 40- and 20- millimeter guns. We expected to be ambushed on the way down the narrow canal, but we weren't. We got to the beleaguered district town. This was the first ground resupplies that they had in over four months. Previously, helicopters were their only communication with the outside. Our operation played a big part in opening up the canal.

During the latter part of my stay there, we actually started to really do things in terms of development. We introduced the new IR-8 miracle rice. At first, it was difficult to overcome the farmers reluctance to experiments. Peasant farmers live from harvest to harvest. They can't afford to gamble with their crop.

Q: It takes quite a bit of fertilizer, too, doesn't it?

MCNAMARA: It does, it takes fertilizer and irrigation during the dry season. We were prepared to supply fertilizers and pumps for irrigation. The farmer's uncertainty was our greatest stumbling block. We tried to convince them to try the new rice strains without success. Finally, we had to hire experimental plots in various parts of the province. Vinh-long is one of the richest rice-growing provinces in Vietnam. We hired these experimental plots in every district, and we underwrote the planting of the new rice on these plots. We said, "If you don't get a good crop, we'll pay you for your losses." I had two agricultural advisors assigned to my team. One old guy (I don't know exactly how old he was; he certainly had white hair) had been an agricultural advisor in upstate New York, a county agent. And he was really marvelous, Bill something or other, a really marvelous old man. The two of them rolled up their sleeves and helped the farmers, showing them the techniques of applying the fertilizer. The rice crop from this IR-8 rice was so much more abundant than the harvest from the traditional varieties of rice, that we didn't have to sell anything after that. The farmers were lining up in front of my door, trying to get seeds for the next planting. And so we really succeeded in the opening phases of the green revolution in the Mekong delta.

Q: Did that require outside support, or could that continue without our help?

MCNAMARA: Once they were convinced that it was a good thing, then it didn't require any outside help except for making available fertilizer and small pumps.

I'll jump forward now. I came back to Can-Tho as consul general in 1974, six years later, and by this time, the green revolution had already taken place. The farmers were on their own. They were going great guns. All they needed was fertilizer and gasoline for their pumps. They had the money to buy it, as long as those ingredients were available. They had small Japanese pumps that could draw water in and irrigate their crops during the dry period. They were getting, I think it was, three or four harvests a year this way, whereas previously they'd only gotten two. They were getting extra harvests, and each harvest was far more abundant than the previous one.

A couple of other things happened that we are responsible for.

One was the rural banks, which were very important in the green revolution. We set up provincial rural banks in each province. This got the farmers out of the hands of the Chinese moneylenders. They could go and get loans at reasonable rates to finance their crops.

The other thing we did was land distribution to the tiller. Previously, the delta was owned by large landowners, and the Vietnamese peasants in the delta were, by and large, sharecroppers. And we, the Americans (and we can certainly be proud of this), got the Vietnamese government to agree to a land redistribution in the delta. The landlords were paid for their land, and the land was redistributed to the actual tillers, the people who were working on the land and who were cultivating it.

The confluence of all of these factors resulted in a real revolution, a green revolution, in the delta. By 1975, rice production had increased to the point that Vietnam was again ready to export rice -- for the first time in over ten years. Before the war, Vietnam had been the breadbasket of Southeast Asia. They had produced large surpluses. During the war, production fell off. In fact, we were importing American rice to feed the population.

The green revolution was also having a political effect. By 1974-75, the Viet Cong had almost disappeared. Their manpower sources had dried up, because the farmers were no longer discontent. They were prosperous owners of their own land. They had no reason to go to war against the government. They were benefitting from the status quo. All they wanted was to keep their sons on the farms, because they needed their labor to produce. The supply of manpower to both the VC and the government army was drying up in the delta. The local VC was pretty much out of business in the Mekong delta. We were finding, by 1974, that the bulk of the troops opposing the Vietnamese national army, were northerners. The local boys were no longer interested.

Q: How long were you in Vinh-long?

MCNAMARA: I was in Vinh-long from February until September 1968. So I was there for about eight or nine months.

Q: What was your impression of the direction of the program from CORDS and the embassy?

MCNAMARA: Well, most of our direction came from CORDS Headquarters. Komer was very active and very dynamic. He was also a little crazy. I think a lot of his activity was silly. Nonetheless, he did get support for our program and respect from the military.

One of the most controversial aspects of our efforts was the preoccupation with quantifying everything. Some of the things we dealt in couldn't be quantified. But some of the techniques that they were using weren't bad. They tried to quantify village security. Okay, the Hamlet Evaluation System (HES) was imperfect, but we didn't have any other tools, and so it was better than nothing. You can make fun of it; you can say, "How can you analyze these things statistically?" Well, you can't, perfectly. But you can use this imperfect information -- tempered with common sense -- to plan and to direct resources.

Q: "Did you spend the night in the village?" That type of thing?

MCNAMARA: For instance, Do the farmers cultivate their fields? Does the village chief spend evenings in the hamlets? Does the district chief come down and spend time? There were many indicators used to measure conditions in a hamlet. There was an economics side, and there was a social side, and there was a political side, and there was a military side to it. And they were refining it all the time. This was done by American advisors, so it wasn't cooked. The advisors were told not to fool with it, to do it as honestly as they could. If the HES didn't come out right, if it didn't show brilliant pacification, their careers weren't harmed. They didn't get bad efficiency reports if they didn't show instant results on pacification. Because, after all, they were advisors, they weren't there to lead the troops themselves.

Anyway, it may have been an imperfect tool, but it was a tool. And that's something that CORDS developed. It was useful, given those circumstances and given the kinds of people that were running the system at that time.

William Colby, who later became the head of CIA, came out as Komer's deputy. I remember Colby came to Vinh-long one weekend and stayed overnight with us. He was going out to various provinces to try to get a better feel for what was going on. He wanted to show the flag, and to prove that the top leadership was sharing some of the dangers with those of us in the trenches. He did get to know people and hear points of view that might not occur to his staff in Saigon.

After dinner, on Saturday night, we had a long philosophic bull session about the war. A liberal supply of alcohol assured that there were no holds barred. He encouraged us to be completely frank.

In any case, there was no reason not to be. For Christ's sake, we were there at the cutting edge of the war. Nobody was going to send us to Vietnam, and certainly nobody was going to send us further out into the boondocks. We were already there. Most of us, therefore, weren't too worried about saying what we had on our minds.

I remember telling him that I really felt that it was immoral for us to continue to encourage the Vietnamese to fight if we weren't willing to stay as long as it was required to stay. It was obvious to me at this point that the tactic of the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong was to wait us out. They assumed that we would tire and leave. If we weren't willing to stay the whole course, which meant convincing the North that we were willing to stay and that we weren't going to walk away from Vietnam, then it was immoral for us to continue to encourage the South Vietnamese to pursue the war. It would only mean that more people would get killed, and the result would be inevitable. Eventually, our friends would fall. We had to really do what we had done in Korea, which was to provide a credible American force there that was going to stay indefinitely until the threat had disappeared. And unless we were willing to do that, then we really should get the hell out.

He didn't really have any answer to that. He fumbled around a bit with it. Ultimately, I guess, he probably agreed with me, but couldn't say so.

Anyway, I can't say that we didn't get any leadership.

Q: I wasn't asking in a pejorative way; I wanted to get a feel for the actual situation.

MCNAMARA: I don't think it was that bad. I think Komer was foolish. He didn't provide very good leadership, but he was there. Colby was much better.

Q: You left in September '68.

MCNAMARA: Yes, and went to Quang-tri.

Q: When you left, how did you feel things were going?

MCNAMARA: They were going very well. At that time, they were going very well in Vinh-long.

Q: So the shock of the Tet Offensive...

MCNAMARA: It was finally dissipated, and confidence was restored. The Americans and the Vietnamese were doing lots of things. We were moving resources into the country.

I remember one night I was in our little compound when suddenly I heard a lot of noise outside. Trucks, many trucks going towards Saigon. They were moving on the main route, Route 4, just on the outskirts of the town. I thought it was a military convoy. I remember looking out the gate to see what was making so much noise, and found that they were civilian trucks, carrying food to Saigon. They were traveling at night to arrive at the market the next morning in Saigon. They were carrying all the bounty -- the marvelous fruits, vegetables, fish, pork and rice -- that's produced in the Mekong delta in such profusion. There it was: the economy had been restored. These were civilians bringing food to the capital.

So, no, things were looking up by the time I left.

Q: Where did you go?

MCNAMARA: I went to Quang-tri.

Q: Could you explain...

MCNAMARA: Quang-tri...province...the Republic of South Vietnam. Its northern border was the 17th parallel, which was the border between the north and the south, the Communist-controlled north and the nationalist-controlled south. It was the scene of probably the heaviest fighting that took place in the war. The greatest concentration of Americans was up there. It was the site of Khe Sanh, the embattled, surrounded military base that the North Vietnamese were hoping to take. The Marines turned out to be a lot more difficult to dislodge than the French were at Dien Bien Phu.

Quang-tri is a difficult place to live. The climate is dreadful. During the winter rainy season, it's constantly enveloped in a permanent blanket of heavy mist. It's almost like being underwater, it's so damp and cold. The dampness penetrates to the bone. I found it very difficult to get warm even inside. In the dry season, it gets hot, and dry. The red clay turns to powder that is blown dust clouds by a hot wind from Laos. Quang-tri has no agreeable season. Vietnamese avoided service there. Our province chief was a sleepy Cham gentleman who was there because no Vietnamese wanted a job that was fought over in other more salubrious provinces.

Q: You've persuaded me not to buy any real estate there.

MCNAMARA: No, it certainly is not a vacation place. I can't think of any advantages to life in Quang-tri.

And the people are correspondingly hard. They have a reputation of being among the toughest people in Vietnam -- for obvious reasons. You couldn't live there unless you were tough. It would be survival of the fittest, and you'd have to be very fit indeed just to survive.

It also is the site of the Roman Catholic national shrine in Vietnam called La-Vang. In the 18th and 19th centuries, there were martyrs there, Catholics who were killed by the old imperial authorities in Hue. So martyrdom was a big thing. There is a little cathedral there called Our Lady of La-Vang. Mary is supposed to have appeared to people. It's a holy place for Vietnamese Catholics.

Quang-tri lies to the north of Hue, the old imperial capital. The climate in Hue, however, is much better than in Quang-tri.

Colby got me the job as deputy province senior advisor there. The province senior advisor was an Army colonel named Mooney, who was a very tough, good soldier. He'd been in Vietnam twice before, in American units. He'd been a battalion commander, and I think he was the G-3 of the 25th or the 24th Division. A well-decorated soldier. He went on to become a brigadier general. Then, he had a heart attack and was forced to retire.

Living in Quang-tri in those days was a little bit like being in Verdun in World War I. The North Vietnamese were just across the Ben-hai River, on the 17th parallel. They would shell, using artillery that they had dug into caves on the other side of the river. They'd wheel them out and fire some shells at us. Quang-tri City was just within their artillery range. Then they'd pull them back in, and the Americans would riposte.

Most of the defenders of Quang-tri were American. It had the largest concentration of American troops in the country. The commander of the American troops in I Corps was a Marine. He had two Marine divisions, the 1st and the 3rd, and a Marine air wing under his command. The Marines were also bolstered by some Army units. In Quang-tri itself, we had the 3rd Marine Division, with either a full air wing or a good portion of an air wing to support them, as well as other ancillary units like Seabees.

When I arrived, there was also an Army mechanized brigade, as well as the 1st Cavalry supporting the withdrawal from Que-son. They had a lot of action in Quang-tri and really hurt the North Vietnamese badly, but then they left and went someplace else. They were used as a highly mobile fire brigade, going around the country where a sudden shock unit was required.

Anyway, there were an awful lot of American soldiers around, Marines mainly. That was new to me coming from the Mekong delta. The climate was also different, as was the type of war. There was no such thing as a guerrilla war up there. It was heavy units, divisions, regiments and battalions against similar regular Army units from North Vietnam. One saw precious few black pajama clad country boys wandering about with a stalk of sugar cane in one hand and an AK47 in the other. They were fighting major-unit, classical-war formations. This was a different kind of war than I had known in the Mekong delta.

Q: What were you doing?

MCNAMARA: I was the deputy province senior advisor. I was the number two, in charge of a team of about 300 advisors who supported the province government and the province forces. Each province had certain local forces that were raised and commanded by the province chief. The province chief, in every case, was a military officer. And so he had his own small army that he could deploy locally. They were light infantry. They were regular soldiers, but they were promised that they wouldn't have to leave their own province if they joined the RF or PF (regional forces or popular forces).

The Provincial advisors in Quang-tri provided liaison between the American forces and the Vietnamese local administration. That was our most important task because of the size of American forces in the province.

Another was to deal with refugees. There were thousands of refugees. The place had been fought over for years. There'd been horrendous battles, dating back to the war with the French. The fabled "Street Without Joy" is located in Quang-tri. The people had been driven off the land and out of their villages. Also people living along the coast were bundled up and sent to refugee camps. The North Vietnamese had been landing arms and infiltrators along the coast. The local villagers were thought to be (and probably were) sympathetic to the North had been displaced from the coast. These fishermen were just taken off the coast and sent inland and put in refugee camps.

We developed a plan to reestablish the fishermen on the coast, but under supervision, to prevent infiltration by the North. They were allowed to fish and to earn their living and to get out of the refugee camps under controlled conditions.

And so, one of the things that I did when I first got there was to develop a plan for the resettlement of these coastal fishermen.

Later, I also developed a similar program for another area. There's a river that comes down from the mountains up around Khe Sanh and empties into the sea. It comes right across the northern part of Quang-tri Province. The river valley had been populated and farmed before the people were displaced by the war. By the time I had arrived things were better. We had a lot of troops in the area. It seemed feasible to resettle these people back onto their lands and villages.

Originally, the Australians had supplied irrigation pumps in the area to be resettled. I decided to appeal to the Australian Embassy for help in getting the pumps working again. After some hemming and hawing, the Australian Ambassador did provide the needed spare parts. In any case, I spent a good deal of my time resettling refugees.

Q: When you talk about resettling refugees, how did this work? How did you advise and consult with the province chief?

MCNAMARA: Well, the province chief was half asleep most of the time. When he wasn't fully asleep, he was half asleep. He really wasn't doing very much. We really had to do it ourselves.

Q: You mean you bypassed him, basically.

MCNAMARA: We bypassed him. We'd get his okay on things, but it was really pro forma. He wasn't going to say no, because he didn't want to be bothered. To oppose us would have caused him some bother. Moreover, he was the Vietnamese token Cham. He had little real influence with his own hierarchy.

Q: Cham being...

MCNAMARA: The Cham are an ethnic group that predated the Vietnamese arrival in what's now central Vietnam. They were Muslims. They'd no doubt migrated into this area from Cambodia a couple of thousand years ago. There are lots of Cham ruins, very interesting ruins around central Vietnam. They were driven out of central Vietnam or assimilated by the ethnic Vietnamese. Nonetheless, there are small pockets of them left in Vietnam.

Q: I'm surprised, that being such a battleground, they didn't put a tough military man in there.

MCNAMARA: Well, they didn't. I'm not sure why, but I suppose it was because there really wasn't very much for him to do. The real military decisions were taken by the American Army and Marine Corps. And there was a Vietnamese division as well, the best division of the Vietnamese Army, the 1st Division led by one of their best generals. They were also very active, working with the Americans. So there really wasn't a hell of a lot for a Province chief to do.

Q: Here you were in a really military situation. Was there much interest in or awareness of, say, the Vietnam political scene? Or were you getting sensitive to the Vietnam political scene?

MCNAMARA: Oh, yes. No, I was very sensitive to it, especially when I got to Quang-tri. Central Vietnam was traditionally the most politically active part of Vietnam. Much more so than the Mekong delta. The Mekong delta was really pretty much apolitical. In the delta, most of the people didn't even take an active interest, much less participate, in politics. In central Vietnam, it was quite the opposite. People were very politicized, very interested, very active in politics. There were several political parties. Only a few years earlier, it had been the site of the Buddhist struggle movement against the Diem regime. Central Vietnam was really the place where that took place. It was put down by the army, but the feelings were still there, and the sensitivity was still there. I got to know some of the local Buddhist monks in Quang-tri. Some of them had been active in the Buddhist struggle movement.

We were plugged in politically. Colonel Mooney, the province senior advisor, was an unusual guy. He was very interested in politics. He was a super soldier, but in Quang-tri he took a far greater interest in the civilian, or quasi-civilian, side of things, political and economic, than he did in straight military affairs. We had a small inner circle there. I had my own house, with another young FSO. He was the refugee advisor.

Q: Who was that?

MCNAMARA: His name was Dick Cummin. He killed himself on a motorcycle here in Washington.

Q: He worked for me in Greece.

MCNAMARA: That's right, he was in Greece. Well, he and I were very close friends. Having spent a year there together, we became very close. In fact, I visited him in Greece.

Q: He bought that damn motorcycle. And we were telling him, as good consular officers, "These things kill you."

MCNAMARA: Well, he got drunk and took it out. Must have fallen down or gotten knocked down, hit his head, and that was that. I met his mother and took care of her in Lebanon, when I was DCM in Beirut. I got her out of East Beirut, and she lived with me for about five, six months. Then she insisted on going back. Anyway, that's another whole story.

Mooney had a USAID fellow, a guy named John Cleary, living with him. And the four of us ate our meals together. We had a little mess in Mooney's house. We all became very close friends. He relied on this small group of civilians that he had close to him more than he did on the military members of the team. Obviously, he paid attention to them, and he was a very fine soldier, but he saw the opportunities for doing something in Quang-tri more in civilian terms than he did in military terms.

The military campaign was really under the control of the generals. We weren't going to have a great impact there. All we could do was coordinate and provide the liaison between the Vietnamese provincial officials and the big Army units. But the resettlement of refugees and things like that, which were very important to everyone, these were things that we could handle with lots of support from the American forces. Mooney was bright enough to realize that he was more likely to make a reputation in Army by doing unusual things like resettling thousands of refugees than he could in directing a rag-tag bunch of Vietnamese militiamen.

Q: Did you get any other feelings, now that you were at a different level, about how...

MCNAMARA: Oh, I was at the same level.

Q: How did you look upon Saigon, your direction from there and all?

MCNAMARA: It was very distant. We were really far more responsive to the American military command in northern I Corps. There was also something called the 24th Corps up there. At the time of the battle in Khe Sanh, Westmoreland lost faith in the Marine command at Da Nang. He imposed another command on northern I Corps, called the 24th Corps, and put an Army general in charge, a guy named Stilwell.

Q: Richard Stilwell?

MCNAMARA: Yes.

Q: He was in command of troops in Korea when I was serving there. Was this common knowledge, how Westmoreland felt about the Marines?

MCNAMARA: Oh, it was in all the newspapers. It was a real slap in the face for the Marines for an Army general to be superimposed between one of their principal troop units and the Marine command. A Marine amphibious force, 3 MAF was what the Marines called the command in Da Nang, which was in charge of all of I Corps. They had their own air support, and their troop units are all integrated into a single team. Air and ground troops were all under the same commander in the Marines. This provided close coordination. Their doctrine and modus operandi are much different than the Army and the Air Force. The Marines, of course, are very proud of their famous Corps.

Q: What was it they had done, or not done?

MCNAMARA: Khe Sanh. I think Westmoreland felt that they had gotten themselves into a very exposed position in Khe Sanh.

Q: It became a matter of prestige to hang onto a piece of real estate that really didn't matter.

MCNAMARA: It was a little bit like the French in Dien Bien Phu. This was what people were so frightened of. It couldn't have happened to the Americans, because they had such overwhelming air power. There wasn't any way that the North Vietnamese could really mount a big, concentrated assault on Khe Sanh that could be successful in the face of this enormous air power that we could bring to bear. We were using B-52s to carpet-bomb around the Khe Sanh perimeter at one point. We also had lots of artillery. And we were never cut off; we always had support coming in. We were getting bombarded all the time. It was a difficult position. and it was one that was perhaps stupid to get tied down to, but, nonetheless, the North Vietnamese couldn't take it either, I don't believe.

Q: And they got tied down, too.

MCNAMARA: That's right. It was a meat grinder for them.

Q: Did you get involved with our main line units there as far as making them more sensitive to the problems of the populous? Was this what you did?

MCNAMARA: Yes. We talked to the officers, but we didn't talk to the men at that point. Later on, when I became the principal officer in Da Nang, I was also political advisor to the Marine general, the commander of 3 MAF; the senior commander in I Corps. The Marines had come up with the idea of...I think they were called civic action platoons (CAP). These were small units of platoon size that were put in villages, to live in the villages and to protect them. They had a training school in Da Nang for Marines who were going to go into the program. I lectured on Vietnamese politics at the training school, to sensitize the Marines to the differences in politics, the religious issues, the political issues and the ethnic issues. In Quang-tri, we talked to the commanders and to their staffs.

We would try, for instance, to serve as advocates for the Vietnamese. If the large units were doing something that was interfering with the local population, or somehow or other the local people were affected by some of their operations, we'd go and talk to the commanders to see if they would modify their operations so that they wouldn't harm the interests of the local villagers.

Also, we got a lot of resources from the American units. They would provide us with all kinds of civic-action resources, materials for instance, skilled labor. A village, for instance, might need a bridge built between two parts of a village, or they'd want to have a little market constructed, or to have something done with a road. The American forces were there in large numbers, they had lots of resources, and they did help the population a great deal in that way. They were trying to be good corporate citizens, in the American way. In the process, they did a certain amount of good.

Q: How long were you there in Quang-tri?

MCNAMARA: I was there from September 1968 until April 1969.

Q: And then what did you do?

MCNAMARA: A man named Nick Thorne, an FSO assigned to the embassy in Saigon, was in charge of a provincial reporting unit in Saigon. He had a group of young FSOs who went out and lived and worked in the provinces and would report on political events in their areas of assignment directly to the embassy. Thorne came on a visit to Quang-tri. He was going around the country. I took him out and introduced him to some of the bonzes and political figures that I'd gotten to know.

Q: A bonze is a Buddhist priest.

MCNAMARA: He was impressed with my contacts. So, when he went back to Saigon, he talked to his superiors, and they offered me the job as principal officer in Da Nang. They wished to open a consulate in Da Nang. There was no consular post in the country outside Saigon since the closing of the consulate general in Hue. It was important to have a diplomatic listening post in central Vietnam, the most politically active region in the country and the furthest from Saigon.

When the post was offered to me, I told people in Saigon I would love the job. It did mean signing on for a second prolonged tour in Vietnam -- something that many other FSOs were not keen to take on.

Q: I might add that I was consul general in Saigon at this particular time. And it was an extrusion; it was a consular unit that was, very nebulously until that time, part of the consular section in Saigon up there.

MCNAMARA: The historic background went back to the closing of the consulate general in Hue, during the Buddhist struggles in '65. It was then intended to move the consulate general to Da Nang. They acquired a building and a residence. All was prepared short of appointing a principal officer. This was benched by a former Ambassador who was serving as the Deputy for CORDS for I Corps with his headquarters in Da Nang. He was in charge of the CORDS program in all of I Corps. He did not wish to have an independent consul resident in Da Nang who might compete with him for prestige. Somehow he was able to bench the opening of the consulate as an independent post. A consular office was opened, however, that carried on many of the functions of a consulate, but without the stature of a full consulate. A junior political officer was in nominal charge -- obviously no threat to the amour propre of the former Ambassador.

To complete his hatchet job, the gentleman cooped the principal officer's residence complete with china, silver and car. The arrangement was reconsidered upon the departure of the ex-ambassador and his replacement by a man from USAID named Alexander Ferber. The embassy and the Department realized they needed an independent observer in I Corps outside the CORDS/MACV chain of command. Someone who was directly responsive to the Ambassador and the embassy.

I was offered the job, and took it. I had to get out of CORDS, of course, I was still assigned to CORDS. So I went to see Bill Colby in Saigon. He was, by this time, in charge of CORDS. I asked him to release me from the remaining months of my commitment to CORDS. Colby asked if I would not rather have a more senior post in CORDS? I remember telling him that, "I feel like Caesar in Gaul when he said "Better to be chief in the smallest village of Gaul than number two in Rome." (That's a bad paraphrasing of what Caesar actually said, but that's the sense of it.) My weak classical reference may have seemed bizarre, but it touched something in Colby. He gave me my release from CORDS.

I became the principal officer in Da Nang in April of 1969. We didn't have the formal inauguration until the next February.

Q: You had to have a shaman or somebody come up with a proper date and all that.

MCNAMARA: Oh, I consulted a Chinese wizard-astrologer-geomancer. I brought him down from Hue. I sought him out because he had an extraordinary reputation as a seer. His name was Mr. Hong. His reputation dated from a consultation with Nguyen Van Thieu, the president of the Republic of Vietnam when Nguyen Van Thieu was a captain in the army in Hue. Hong reputedly told the young Thieu that perhaps he would be president of the republic one day. Thieu became president and Hong's reputation was made.

Before assuming my post in Da Nang, I went off on consultations in Laos for a week to see what things were like on that side of the border. My consular district comprised all of I Corps with a common border with Laos. Anyway, I spent a week in Laos to see what was going on there. I also stopped in Thailand for a week's rest in Bangkok before proceeding to Da Nang.

I remember flying up on Air Vietnam. I didn't take Air America, the CIA airline that also served most of our non-military needs in Vietnam. As a regularly assigned diplomat, I preferred to use the regular civilian Air Vietnam flight. When I landed, there was nobody to meet me. I'd expected the staff from the consulate to come out to greet their new principal officer. Instead, I had to ride the Air Vietnam bus, which was not all that great -- little old ladies with chickens and baskets full of vegetables. It was a decidedly inglorious arrival at my first post as principal officer. Traditions in the Foreign Service -- even in the most remote places -- call for a new principal officer to be met by his staff at the airport. I got myself on the bus with my bags and went into town. At the Air Vietnam office in town, I hired a cyclo to take me and my bags to the consulate.

Q: Those are pedicabs.

MCNAMARA: Yes. Cyclo is what the Vietnamese call them. I arrived at my new post as principal officer in a pedicab. To add to my discomfort the Marine guards refused to open the gate for me. The consulate was closed. They told me, "Come back tomorrow!" I tried to explain that I was the new consul. Finally, they agreed to arouse the guy in charge of administration, a very sleepy fellow, who lived at the consulate. By this time, I was mad enough to chew nails and spit tacks. When he arrived at the gate in his underwear, he told me, "Oh, yeah. We heard you were coming. Oh, isn't it nice you got here." He then remembered that I was still outside a chain link fence with my bags perched on the seat of a cyclo. "Do let the new consul in," he instructed the Marines.

After he dressed, we road over to my house. It was a small villa situated on a quiet back street not far from the principal market in central Da Nang. The house was charming. The insides had been gutted by a previous occupant. The brick walls and beams were laid bare. A loft had been added as a second bedroom. The kitchen was modern and my bedroom was air conditioned. It would not have served as a principal officer's residence any place else, but I was quite happy with it.

Q: I spent the night there when I came to visit you.

MCNAMARA: In the loft. It was a nice little house.

The consulate itself was in a nice old villa on a side street next to the French lycée. At first, I thought somebody was very foresighted when they picked out this nice house, a beautiful little white house on a nice plot of ground, with grace old trees and a large lawn in front. As I got to know the place a bit better, I found out how we got the house. It turned out that the corps commander, who was a scoundrel named General Lam, a truly dreadful man...

Q: He was a crook, wasn't he?

MCNAMARA: Oh, a crook of the first water.

Q: He had these warehouses.

MCNAMARA: And he was a major drug dealer -- he and his wife. In any case, he gave us the house. I guess he thought it would be funny. No Vietnamese would live in it as they thought it was haunted.

The story, as it was told to me by a long-time neighbor, involved a French colonel who had lived there with his Vietnamese consort. His Vietnamese lady found out that he was cheating on her. She committed suicide, but her spirit is said still to haunt the house. Some neighbors swear to have seen a beautiful lady, in a white ao dai floating around the garden at night. They claimed that her feet never quite touched the ground. In fact, lawyer Song, who lived on the corner opposite the consulate, who drank a good deal of whiskey, swears that he frequently saw the lady floating around the garden. I was always suspicious that the whiskey might have contributed to his visions. I had an admin. officer, an African-American named Lou Russell, who took the odd nip as well, who claims that he was awakened a few times with his bed dancing around. He lived in an apartment in the consulate.

I was never privileged to witness any of these happenings. But the neighbors were convinced that the place was haunted.

I installed myself in Da Nang and set about opening our independent consulate in central Vietnam. It was the only post in Vietnam, aside from Saigon.

Q: What were your duties?

MCNAMARA: Mainly political. And one of the main targets was the non-Communist opposition. It wasn't a target exactly, it was an audience or a clientele. I also advised the American military and the CORDS people on political affairs. Central Vietnam was the most politicized part of the country, as I said before, so it was important to have someone who was in touch with the politics of the region.

The Buddhist struggle movement, although it had been put down, was still simmering just under the surface. There were political parties, some of which had a substantial membership. And then, of course, there was the political activities of the Viet Cong to report on and to analyze. Not just their military campaign, but their political campaign. Indeed, you couldn't separate the two. They viewed military activity as an extension of their political campaign. Of course, they were absolutely right, but it was sometimes difficult to explain this to some of our military brethren. They weren't fighting a war just for the pleasure of fighting and dying. There were political purposes behind their carrying on this long and very costly war.

Anyway, those were the principal things that I was supposed to be doing.

We did have a small consular section, with one vice consul devoted to that. We had a fair-sized American community in the region. Not just soldiers (we had about 300,000 soldiers in our consular district), we also had a lot of American civilians -- American-company contractors supporting the military. There was also a sizable USAID and CORDS civilian presence.

We also did some economic analysis and reporting.

Q: What was your impression of and how did you make contact with the opposition parties in the area?

MCNAMARA: Oh, I identified leaders of these groups, and the ones I found to be useful contacts, I met with frequently. Gradually, one enlarges his circle of contacts and acquaintances. The process is now called networking. As you got to know people, they would introduce you to more people. It fed on itself, as it would in any other Foreign Service situation. Aside from the war, my activities were not essentially different from those of a principal officer with primarily political responsibilities in any country in the world.

Q: What was the impression you were getting from this group and others about the Thieu government?

MCNAMARA: They didn't care much for the Thieu government. However, after the Tet experience with the Communists, many took the view of supporting the lesser of two evils. The things that the Communists did, especially in Hue, really had a big impact on the people in I Corps. There was a healthier realism towards the real character and the real aims of the Communists after the atrocious acts that took place at that time. A lot of people who had strongly opposed the government previously and who had demonstrated against them during the Buddhist struggle movement, were ready to accept the government, if not enthusiastically support it. They didn't like the government particularly, but they were frightened of the VC. They had lost their innocence and were now reluctant to play into the VC's hands by weakening the government.

Q: How about the Buddhists, did they...

MCNAMARA: These were principally the Buddhists that I'm talking about. Many Buddhist monks expressed these sentiments privately to me. There were many who had been leaders in the struggle movement.

Q: How did your role as political advisor to I Corps work out?

MCNAMARA: With difficulty. I can give you two instances.

I wasn't taken terribly seriously by the Marine general who was there when I first got there, named Nickerson. I would brief him once a week. He had me briefing the CAP platoons, but he wasn't too interested in politics.

One of my vice consuls developed a dossier on the Korean Marines who were under his command. They had a base south of Da Nang at a place called Hai An. The vice consul...

Q: Who was this, Don Westmore?

MCNAMARA: No, it wasn't Westmore. It was Jim Mack. He found that the Korean Marines weren't really very effective militarily. In fact, they were often guilty of brutalizing the population. He found that they stayed on their base, except to carry on a very active black market. Their reputation as aggressive soldiers had been built by careful attention to public relations rather than by any real participation in an active combat role. They had become more a negative factor than a positive one, because of the things that they were doing to the people.

For instance, if somebody fired one shot at a Korean from a village, they would level the village. Of course, the VC saw the political gain to be had in provoking them. The Korean's reaction was predictable, spreading further animosity among the people toward the government that was allied with such brutes.

Jim Mack wrote a well documented report on the Koreans that included an eye witness account of a Korean senior officer threatening to shoot a Vietnamese district chief when he complained about some of the things that the Koreans were doing in his district. Mack was there during the altercation. His presence may well have saved the Vietnamese officer's life.

When I showed General Nickerson Jim Mack's report, he became defensive refusing to accept what Mack reported was true. When I pressed him to use his authority to bring the Koreans under control, he tried to get me removed. He asked MACV to get me removed. But Ambassador Bunker told General Westmoreland that I was his man there and that he found what I was reporting accurate and useful.

Another time, I raised the subject of corruption by Vietnamese generals with Nickerson. At the time, there was a general Thuan who was the commander of the 2nd Division in southern I Corps. He was accused of implication in illegal exporting of cinnamon. No doubt, he was taking bribes in return for his assistance in the affair. At about the same time, he was accused of raping a 12-year-old. He really had a very unsavory reputation. People in Saigon were trying to remove him. This was the first time that the Vietnamese government had moved against a general for corruption. In my briefing of Nickerson I said, "It's a very good thing. People see this as a positive sign, that even generals are not above the law, that the government is willing to take action against a general when he's caught with his hand in the cookie jar."

Nickerson got very angry, and he said, "I'll bet you'd like to get rid of General Lam, too."

And I said, "You're right, I would. He's a crook, and he's poisoning your Marines. He and his wife are at the center of the drug trafficking in I Corps, and they're selling drugs to your men. You are quite right, Sir. I would like to get rid of him."

Nickerson almost came across the desk after me, he was so mad. With evident difficulty he controlled himself.

Q: Why was he being protective like this?

MCNAMARA: Well, he didn't want to make any waves with the Vietnamese.

Q: Politically...

MCNAMARA: Most American officers wanted to be known as having good relations with their Vietnamese counterparts. It looked good on their efficiency reports.

Q: Nobody wanted to make waves with them?

MCNAMARA: Actually it was more basic than that with Lam. I reckon that Nickerson felt he had a tacit agreement with Lam. At least this is the way I saw it. Nothing was publicly ever said, I'm sure, and maybe Nickerson didn't consciously realize that he was shielding Lam in return for the latter's acquiescence to any kind of military operation that Nickerson proposed. His ability to gain Lam's cooperation made Nickerson look good to his superiors. He had good counterpart relations. This was something that they emphasized in MACV: "You've got to have good relations with your Vietnamese military counterparts." If the American commander wanted to propose an operation someplace or other, Lam always said, "Oh, marvelous operation. Yes, you have my full cooperation." So Nickerson never had any problems with the Vietnamese as a result. And this was worth a great deal to him in career terms, because it made him look as though he was a very effective commander, one who could deal with an ally and get him to do the things that he wanted him to do. So it made him look good, and he didn't have the problems that some of the other American commanders were having with Vietnamese generals who weren't quite as cooperative as Lam was. Anyway, I'm sure that that was Nickerson's interest. Lam's interest was, of course, his business. Jesus, he'd sign any goddamn thing for any kind of an operation that Nickerson wanted as long as they left his and his wife's business interests alone. These interests included drugs.

Q: Were you reporting back to Saigon on all this?

MCNAMARA: Oh, yes.

Q: Well, how did Nickerson respond on Lam, other than restraining himself from hitting you? Did you keep meeting him?

MCNAMARA: Yes, I used to keep seeing him once a week in his office, but it was pretty cool. He paid scant attention to what I told him. But then, ultimately, he left. The military didn't stay around all that long.

For a while, we had a very good Marine general. He was an aviator. Not that that makes any difference. There were some first-class Marine generals. Nickerson was hard headed and not politically sensitive, but there were others who were very sensitive and sound military commanders. Nickerson's replacement was Keith McCutcheon. Unfortunately, he died of cancer after only a short time as III MAF commander. Too bad. He was a very good man.

At about this point, the American military withdrawal began. Most of the Marines left Vietnam in 1970. Only the 1st Regiment with PX Kelly commanding remained for a time. Command in Da Nang was transferred to an Army general command 24th Corps.

Q: Would you tell me the story, if I recall it, about your dealings with the Marine general and some Chinese fishermen. Do you recall that? At least you told me they had picked up some Chinese fishermen from mainland China, which at that time was a Communist country, and as I recall it, maybe I'm wrong, the Marines had put them in the stockade and treated them as prisoners of war.

MCNAMARA: Probably, but I don't remember now. But there were all sorts of bizarre happenings during my tour.

Q: What was your impression of the reporting system, now that you were a reporting officer, among other things, that you were getting from other places at that particular time? Nixon had come in. We were beginning the scaling down. It was just the beginning. In fact, rather quickly we were moving down.

MCNAMARA: One of the big problems that I had, I felt, was that my reports went to Saigon and people in Saigon decided what to do with them. They might send them on to Washington or they might not. More often than not, they would not. That was a problem for me. I felt this was wrong. It smacked of censorship. Maybe it wasn't conscious, but it was there. The reports should have been sent on routinely; they were not. Later on, when the four consulates general were set up, the reports went automatically to Washington. At that point, when we started talking about the withdrawal and scaling things down, I suggested (it was really my suggestion) that we set up four independent consulates general, one in each corps area. Being consul in Da Nang, it occurred to me, where it probably wouldn't have occurred to anybody else, simply because I was in that kind of position. They were saying the military had to leave. Under the kinds of agreements being negotiated we would not be able to have a military presence outside Saigon. I suggested that we put all of our residual activities under an umbrella consulate general in each corps area, and civilianize the whole operation that way. Ultimately, that's what they did. Bunker remembered my suggestion and implemented it.

As they were drawing down troop levels, they were putting people out of work. An awful lot of Vietnamese were working for various American activities, either directly or in a secondary way. I could see that we were going to have a really serious unemployment problem and, as a result, a political problem. We had mountains of piasters in our local currency accounts that we couldn't use for anything outside the country, and we couldn't find very much to use them for in the country that wasn't highly inflationary. You had to be very careful.

Well, I pointed out that unemployment was going to become a real problem during a transition period. I documented it by going around to all of the employers in Da Nang, using them as a sample and showing how the drawdown would affect employment. I then suggested that we could alleviate the unemployment problem by developing a program of labor-intensive public works projects. Cleaning sewers, paving roads, and many other public work could sop-up a large portion of the unemployed in labor intensive projects. At the same time money would be pumped into the economy from our piaster account.

There was a lot of resistance from USAID. A lady economist at USAID insisted that there would be no problem. The Vietnamese extended family, she claimed, will take care of unemployed members. I pointed out that in many families all the bread earners might be out of work.

My suggestion did get to Washington. Moreover, it aroused the interest of the Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bill Sullivan.

MCNAMARA: Yes. He took it up with me when I arrived in Washington. Ultimately, my plan was implemented. When I came back in 1974, it was functioning in all of the main cities.

Q: When did you leave Vietnam?

MCNAMARA: I left in August 1971.

Q: What was the feeling at that time from your Vietnamese contacts? There had been a sizable drawdown of troops. We had gone from almost half a million down to, what, 30,000 or something.

MCNAMARA: No, it wasn't that small by that time.

Q: But it was way down.

MCNAMARA: It was going down. By that time, it probably wasn't any more than 200,000. Maybe less than that.

Q: What was the feeling?

MCNAMARA: The Vietnamese were very nervous. They lacked self-confidence. I had little faith in Vietnamization myself. I didn't think that they would be capable, alone, of dealing with the northerners.

By this time, the country was pacified, by and large. In 1970, I went to Saigon where I picked up a Ford Scout vehicle. I then drove down to the Mekong delta, all the way down to the southern most point at Ca Mau. From Ca Mau I then headed north all the length of the Republic to Quang-tri and the DMZ.

Q: Quang-tri, my God. Really from one end to the other.

MCNAMARA: Yes, I went right from one end of the country, as it was then, to the other. It was the first time that an American civilian had done it since before Tet. I took two reporters with me, one guy from Time and another from The Washington Post. We didn't hear a shot fired in anger the whole way. We even visited Da-lat. We then went down the mountains from Da-lat to Phan-rang, and then up to Nha-Trang. All along the way we heard, from all sorts of people, even American and Vietnamese, that, "security was fine in my district, but the one just to the north is bad news. You're going to have trouble there." The populated parts of the country were pacified. Tet and the Phoenix program had destroyed the indigenous VC. The sanctuaries in Cambodia had been over run and the North Vietnamese had withdrawn, to a large extent back to North Vietnam. They were biding their time waiting for the Americans to complete their withdrawal. They knew that they could not handle the American heavy fire power. They launched their next offensive in 1972 when the Americans had virtually completed the withdrawal of their ground combat units. American air power coupled with Vietnamese elite units like the Airborne and the Marine stopped them in Quang-tri.

Q: Where did you go from Vietnam?

MCNAMARA: I went to the Naval War College in Newport, Rhode Island.

The Sahelian crisis ended for us in Cotonou just as I was coming up for reassignment at the end of my two year tour. A personnel officer from Washington named Don Norland called me.

Q: Who?

MCNAMARA: His name was Don Norland.

Q: Oh, yes, I've interviewed him.

MCNAMARA: At the time, I was an FSO-3, in the old system.

Q: Sort of the equivalent of a colonel.

MCNAMARA: Yes. In the new system the old class 3 is an FS-1. It is at the top of the middle grades. Norland offered me a posting as the minerals attaché in Johannesburg.

I was stunned. I told him that I knew nothing of geology.

He reassured me that the Department of the Interior would give me a crash 3-4 month course in geology and mining.

I asked, "Why me?"

Norland replied that I was "an economist."

"Well, I'm not really an economist," I countered, "I've been an economic officer. That is not the same thing."

In any case, he insisted, "We want you to be the minerals attaché."

I told him I was not interested and asked what other assignments might be available. Norland never gave me any alternative. He intensified his hard sell with descriptions of the marvelous opportunity I would have. I might even become Acting Consul General in Johannesburg when the consul general was out of town, he offered as the ultimate enticement. In the meantime, the country director for West Africa called me and asked if I would be interested in going back to Vietnam as consul general in Can-tho. He said that Graham Martin was looking for a suitable person to take the job as consul general in Can-Tho. He had been looking for some six months without success. The job was rated as an FSO-1 (Minister Counselor) which was two grades above my own grade at the time. The people that the Department suggested to him, he wouldn't have, and the people he wanted, he couldn't get. As you will recall, I had been a principal officer in Da Nang. Although I may have been junior in terms of my grade, I had much pertinent experience for the job as principal officer in another post in Vietnam.

The country director, knew Martin. He had served under him in Italy. He offered to speak to Martin on my behalf, if I wished to have the job. I assured John that I would be happy to go to Can-Tho, especially to a job with a two grade stretch. Such a stretch, at a senior level, almost never happens. It would be a great boost for my career. Moreover, I viewed the alternative being offered in Johannesburg as a definite career side track.

I told Norland that I wanted to see whether the job in Vietnam would be offered before deciding on any other possibilities. He assured me that I was not going to get that job. "You're only an FSO-3. That's a class one job. We are going to put a senior officer in that job. You're not going to get it, so you may as well take the job in Johannesburg and be happy with it." I continued to demur. My friend continued to speak to Graham Martin on my behalf. Graham Martin, at this point, was in Washington defending the AID program with Congress. After a week or so of indecision, I suddenly received orders to leave immediately for Vietnam. I was told to be in Vietnam in a week's time. At the time I was chargé d'affaires in Cotonou. There was nobody at the embassy that I could easily turn over the post to. I called personnel in Washington to tell them that I could not go right away. The new ambassador was not coming until the following month. The person next in seniority to me at post was a newly arrived administrative officer.

The personnel officer told me flatly, "We don't care what you do, just get out of there."

I replied lamely that, "The next person in line is the admin officer, who has just arrived. He's never been in Africa before."

The reply was, "Make him the chargé d'affaires, and just get out of there. You've got to pass through the Department, talk to Graham Martin, and then get to Saigon all in a week's time."

"Yes sir," I answered. With some concern I turned over the post to the admin. officer, who was in shock. I packed all my gear and sent it to Vietnam, including a collection of African artifacts which was later lost in the evacuation.

Before leaving I had a great party in the house that Anderson's wife built. She was a great woman. I loved her. She was a fine woman. Anyway, she had built a beautiful residence. It was her project, and she did a great job. I had many African friends including musicians from some of the local nightclubs. They also came and played free of charge as a going away present. Some of the more traditional members of the diplomat corps were shocked. The French ambassador just couldn't believe what he was seeing; all those young black bodies gyrating around a formal residence. Nothing like that had ever happened in Cotonou before.

I then left and drove in the ambassadorial sedan to Nigeria. My friend, Earl Bellinger, who was the admin. counselor poured me on board a Swissair flight after I spent a day celebrating with my Nigerian friends.

I came directly to Washington to talk to Graham Martin. We spoke for about a half an hour. He looked over my record. He'd already seen it and knew that I'd been a principal officer in Da Nang. He talked to me and approved of me.

Q: Did he ask you any questions about your impressions of whither Vietnam?

MCNAMARA: No, he didn't ask me questions like that. He just made it absolutely clear that I wasn't to interfere with the CIA's operation in Can-Tho.

After my assignment was blessed by Martin, I went on my way with a brief stop in Hawaii. My children were living there, and I saw them. I also had briefings at CINCPAC before leaving for Saigon. Amazingly, I made it in a week's time, from Cotonou to Saigon. The reason they wanted me there so quickly was that they were having a meeting in Saigon of the four consuls general from the four corps. It was supposed to be a big confab, a mission conference to brief the consuls general (who were a little bit like feudal barons). In turn, they briefed the embassy on what was going on in their areas. We were also meant to discuss the problems.

When I arrived Lacey Wright, an old friend from my previous tours in Vietnam, was the acting consul general in Can-Tho. Wolfgang Lehmann, whom you might know, was the DCM in Saigon. He had been consul general in Can-Tho. Martin brought him up to Saigon, and then was never able to find anybody that suited him to replace Wolfgang in Can-Tho until he found me.

The conference was interesting. We had briefings, which I thought were incredibly naive, especially one by Frank Snepp of the CIA, on the political situation.

Q: He wrote a book later.

MCNAMARA: Not much of a book. Anyway, I'll talk to you about that at a later time.

Martin, of course, was still in the United States, as he was through most of that period. He was in the unhappy position of having to defend the administration's policy of supporting the Vietnamese. Henry Kissinger, who at that time was Secretary of State, was avoiding association with a situation he saw as a loser. Nor was anyone else prepared to stick their necks out. So they left the defense of support for Vietnam in the hands of the ambassador, who should have been in Saigon, but wasn't. Martin spent much of his time in 1974-'75 in Washington, fighting the bureaucratic fight on the Hill.

Before I left Washington, I had talked to Jim Bullington, who was serving on the Vietnam desk. We had known each other in Vietnam. Jim was almost captured in Hue during the Tet attacks. He was hidden by a Vietnamese priest. At this time, Jim was working on the Vietnam Desk. As a friend and fellow old Vietnam hand, he told me: "It's all finished. They're not going to be able to hold out. The regime is going to collapse, and the North is going to take over." He was very pessimistic. And, of course, he was right. Most others I talked to in Washington and even in Saigon were more optimistic. No one predicted that the end would come as quickly as it did in 1975.

I remember Ken Quinn, who's now the deputy assistant secretary for East Asia and the Pacific, was in the White House working for the NSC. We were also old friends from Vietnam. Just before coming back to Washington, he had served in the Consulate General in Can-Tho. He congratulated me on getting such a marvelous job. We did not talk much about politics. Rather, he told me what a great job I was going to have as consul general. He said, "You've got a huge territory, with much autonomy and great power as Consul General. It will be a great job for you." And it was; he was absolutely right. Quinn also briefed me on social delights that were in store for me as a bachelor. This was my White House briefing.

My briefing in Saigon was disappointing

My first impression of Lehmann was bad. He appeared to be pompous, opinionated and lacking in real understanding of Vietnam and the Vietnamese. On longer acquaintance, he confirmed my initial impression of a foolish man who thought he knew a great deal about Vietnam on the basis of some six-eight months' experience in Can-Tho. In fact, he understood very little. I was further shocked to learn that I was the only one of the consuls general who had any serious previous Vietnam experience.

Martin's greatest weakness was to surround himself with sycophants. He chose people for their supposed loyalty to him. He'd been in Italy, Thailand, and Korea. His principal subordinates were almost all people whom he had known in other places. Few of them had previous experience in Vietnam. This was a serious weakness that was hard to justify. By this time, we had a large number of people with long experience of Vietnam. Surprisingly, prior to my arrival, none of them occupied one of these key jobs as consuls general. Moreover, his DCM had only been in the delta for six months. His understanding of his surroundings seemed superficial at best. In relatively junior jobs, at the embassy, however, there were many experienced, old hands. I did not have the impression that they were much listened to by their seniors.

A few old hands had survived. Colonel "Jake" Jacobson was still there as mission coordinator, but I don't know how much he was listened to on substantive things. I think he dealt more with operational aspects of the remnants of the CORDS network. But he was certainly a man of considerable knowledge, and experience. He met me at the airport when I arrived; he came out and picked me off the airplane and brought me into Saigon. We had known one another during my earlier tours, but we became good friends and allies while I was in Can-Tho.

In short, Martin's choice of subordinates was not brilliant. He picked them mainly for their personal loyalty to him. I'm not sure what it was, but most seemed without depth in terms of their understanding of what was going on in the country. This was true of the Mission's top leadership both in the embassy and on the CIA side.

Q: This consul general situation of developing little feudal baronies was sort of unique. After the American military pullout in Vietnam, what were they doing, and particularly what were you doing? What was the reason for these consuls general?

MCNAMARA: In about 1970 or '71, we were beginning our withdrawing. People were talking about an agreement with the North that would involve a complete withdrawal of American military forces from Vietnam. At the time, I was principal officer of the consulate in Da Nang. I suggested in a message to Saigon, that we set up consulates general in each one of the four corps areas. Under these civilian umbrellas, we could place all of the residual American activities left in Vietnam, outside Saigon. Apparently my suggestion was not forgotten. When the Accords worked out between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho were implemented, we set up four consulates general as I had foreseen. Under the Accords, no American military were to be stationed in the country outside Saigon. Instead, the CG's took over responsibility for all of the continuing U.S. activities. These included: road building, agricultural support activities, public health services and education. In fact, it encompassed support for all of the governmental and developmental activities being carried out by the government of Vietnam. In addition, American support for the Vietnamese military had not ended. We continued to provide essential logistics support which was monitored by the consulates general. We also gave military advice and intelligence. Finally, we had field personnel searching for the remains of MIA. While there were no Americans taking part in military operations, we were still providing advice and massive logistics support. All of these activities, where we'd had huge establishments previously, were put under the consuls general.

Can-Tho, in the Mekong delta, where I was, was the biggest and wealthiest of the regions. Indeed, it was the prize of the war.

Q: This is the rice bowl.

MCNAMARA: It had been the rice bowl of Southeast Asia. I had 16 offices, spread throughout the area. There were some 17 or 18 provinces in the delta. I had offices in all but one or two of them, with Americans resident in the offices. In all, I had about 1,000 employees.

Q: Good God!

MCNAMARA: Yes, it was a big organization. Most employees were Vietnamese, but I also had well over 100 Americans, as well as a sprinkling of Filipinos and Koreans.

Part of this large establishment was from the CIA. They maintained a certain separateness from the rest of the consulate general. In theory, we were supposed to be united under the overall direction of the consul general. In fact the CIA elements maintained both a psychological, as well as a physical separation. They still had their own compounds and separate logistical system. It was a hangover from the halcyon days when the CIA had a huge, semi-autonomous organization spread over the whole country.

Q: What was your impression of the CIA operation when you got to the field? You said you weren't very impressed by the briefing you got when you first arrived.

MCNAMARA: I was very depressed by it. It seemed amateurish. Moreover, it too was being run to a large extent by people without any real previous Vietnam experience. I arrived in Can-Tho almost simultaneously with a new regional CIA chief. His previous experience had been in Korea and Laos. His deputy had come from Laos, as had some of the other people in his organization. The little war in Laos had been run by the CIA. However, its intensity and the quality of the enemy was much different than in Vietnam. Taking people from Laos was akin to putting sand-lot baseball players up against the New York Yankees. They were simply out of their league.

Q: I sort of sensed that the Foreign Service establishment (I'm speaking in the broadest sense -- CIA and State Department) was beginning to run out of steam as far as Vietnam was concerned. So many of us went through there, but people were beginning to look elsewhere by this time.

MCNAMARA: Many were running for cover. People didn't want to go back. They didn't want to be associated with such an unpopular enterprise that might fail. I went back mainly because I was being offered a super job. By and large, I don't think that the personnel system in State or CIA were encouraging their best people to go to Vietnam. This reflected a general American disillusionment with Vietnam.

The war in Laos was really the Little Leagues. It was sandlot in comparison with the sophistication and the martial qualities of the Vietnamese Communist troops and their leadership. I have often heard that, in Laos, the nice relatively soft Laotians would often decide battles by how much noise each side made. Whoever made the most noise won the battle. Well, that certainly was not the case with the Vietnamese. They were tough, they were serious, they were world-class soldiers and very well led. This was the big leagues. Sadly, many of our personnel were no longer up to that level. Many were fine people, but they were out of their depth. They did not have sufficient seasoning in such harsh conditions and against such a formidable enemy. This was true of the embassy, and that was true of the CIA. Certainly, it was true of the CIA leadership that I had with me in the delta.

Q: What were they doing?

MCNAMARA: Its hard to know, because they kept an awful lot from me. They wouldn't share an awful lot. Theoretically, I was supposed to be seeing everything, but I know that I wasn't. One of their most egregious faults was sneaking behind my back in dealing with the corps commander. One day, I asked the regional CIA station chief why he was briefing the corps commander without my knowing it. The corps commander had asked me, "Who is in charge? Which one of you Americans is really in charge? You, or the CIA man? What's going on here?"

I assured him that I was in charge.

He then told me that the CIA man was telling him things that were quite different from what I told him. You people do not speak with one voice, he concluded.

When I got back to the CG, I summoned the CIA man to come to my office. I then asked him, "What the hell's going on? What are you telling the Corps commander?"

"Oh, I can't tell you."

"Why can't you tell me?" I asked.

"No, no, it's confidential," he panicked, "I am not able to discuss sources and methods with you."

Q: He could tell the Vietnamese corps commander.

MCNAMARA: And I said, "But you're telling a foreign official things that you can not tell me?"

"But he's one of our agents," the station chief asserted.

The situation was impossible. It was like Alice in Wonderland, dealing with these people. I couldn't get any sense out of him. I was not trying to run his operations for him, but I really had to know what he was doing. And what he was telling my counterpart to at least assure that the Americans were speaking with one voice. Otherwise, we would lose all credibility. Moreover, long experience had taught us that the Vietnamese would soon begin to play us one off against the other. Indeed, they were probably already doing so. It was insane to operate in such a divided way with one American element undercutting another.

Finally, I complained to Polgar, who was the CIA station chief in Saigon. He assured me that I was in charge of the whole mission in Can-Tho, including the CIA contingent. He very sanctimoniously assured me that he would straighten out my CIA man insisting that he keep me fully informed. Of course, that was bull shit. He told them nothing of the sort. This was play acting to assuage me.

I also complained to the DCM. He told me, "You just get along with them. You're making a mountain out of a molehill. This is nonsense. You're there to get along with everybody."

My situation was not a happy one. I was being lied to by the CIA and was left without support by my own superiors. Martin was absent during most of this period. Without the DCM's support, I had nowhere to turn.

Q: Well, Terry, as an old hand, I've found that an awful lot of the CIA operations depended on basically a payoff. They'd buy people. It sounds a lot fancier than it really was. And that is, you paid somebody and you expected them to be bought and stay bought. That was the sum and substance of most of the CIA operations.

MCNAMARA: Well, can I tell you, that's exactly what was happening. Except I am not sure these agents were staying bought. We were really in a ridiculous position. As a country we were completely bankrolling the South Vietnamese war effort. They should have and would have given us any information we demanded without further payment. We had agreements that they would share completely all of their intelligence and tactical information with us. Here we were, supporting the war. And although we'd pulled out our troops, we were still there, and we were essential to the conduct of the war. We could not operate effectively, even in terms of giving them the support they needed, if we didn't know precisely what was going on.

Let me go back. I had some very good, experienced guys there, especially the old CORDS people.

Q: These were Americans.

MCNAMARA: These were Americans, and some of them had been there in Vietnam for 12 or 15 years. Some were retired Army officers, very experienced people. Others were former Peace Corps volunteers. They had served elsewhere with Peace Corps, but most had been in Vietnam for 5 or 6 years and spoke Vietnamese. They were good, solid people. They lived in virtually all of the provinces, and had established excellent contacts with the local people, including their Vietnamese counterparts. Most of the time, they could get any information we needed. Moreover, they were, by and large, sophisticated enough to evaluate what they were being told.

Q: You're talking about the CIA?

MCNAMARA: No. I'm talking about the Vietnamese. Sometimes people like the military intelligence people would withhold things from the civilian military intelligence people who were assigned to me. They were employed by the Defense Attachés Office in Saigon. They were retired Army officers who served as military intelligence officers in the provinces. They were supposed to have complete access to information, but sometimes the Vietnamese intelligence officers wouldn't share stuff with them. They would hold back hoping to sell to the CIA. At other times, they sold the same info to the CIA as they gave my people for nothing. The resource I had that was most reliable was the old CORDS people who were living out in the provinces and who were well plugged in. They came up with far better, more reliable information that cost us nothing. On the other hand, the CIA people would produce information that was often inaccurate. Few of them seemed to have an ability to evaluate information, or to judge the reliability of sources. In any case, they were most often paying for information we had a right to receive as a matter of course. They were subverting the whole system without improving the quality of information available to us.

Q: They were paying for it. With paid-for information, there is not only, you might say, the moral problem, but there also is the very practical problem that it's a commodity, and it can be pretty shoddy, but if there's a market for it, people will...

MCNAMARA: The Vietnamese informants were selling the CIA what they thought they wanted, whether the info was right or whether it was wrong didn't seem to make any difference.

A perfect example of this was an incident that occurred in Can-Tho. The Vietnamese organized a conference. I was invited by the corps commander to all of the major conferences. He'd have his weekly briefing conferences, corps-level staff conferences and so on, and I would go as his counterpart, sitting next to him. This time, a man named Hoang Duc Nha, a nephew of Nguyen Van Thieu's and the President's principal political operator came for a special meeting. Obviously, they would be discussing domestic political questions.

Q: Nguyen Van Thieu was the president.

MCNAMARA: The president of the country. That morning, we had the long, regular weekly military briefing on what was going on in the corps area, the whole delta. I sat with the corps commander and participated in the conference, asking questions and discussing points of interest with the corps commander and his staff. In the afternoon, the corps commander drew me aside asking that I not attend. He explained that they would be discussing internal politics with Nha. It would not be proper to have a foreigner present.

I understood the General's point of view. As a good nationalist, he would find the presence of a foreigner repugnant. It was a point of view that was understandable and even admirable.

A day or two later, the CIA told me they were going to give me a briefing on what had gone on at the afternoon session. Earlier, I asked them to find out what went on in the closed portion of the meeting. To help them in their acquisition, targeting what was important and what wasn't, I'd said, "We really ought to find out, if we can, what went on in that afternoon meeting in which they were to discuss national tactics." Proudly, they prepared to demonstrate their prowess. A meeting was organized in a large conference room in the Consulate General. Their briefer commenced to describe what had happened at the morning conference I had attended. Finally, I stopped him saying that I had attended the morning meeting at which these subjects were discussed.

And they said, "No, this discussion took place in the afternoon."

I corrected the briefer -- gently at first. When he insisted that his version of the meeting had taken place with Nha present in the afternoon, I asked whether they had repeated in the afternoon meeting exactly what was said in my presence in the morning.

The briefer and his bosses insisted that their version was correct because it came from their agents. I kept pressing them. Finally, I asked them to identify their agents?

The case officer then blurted out, "It was the Vu-graph operator."

Q: The what?

MCNAMARA: The Vu-graph operator. You know what a Vu-graph is?

Q: Oh, yes, it's an overhead projector.

MCNAMARA: He said, "It was the Vu-graph operator."

I found the level of gullibility incredible. The soldier sold them semi-public information assuming they would be taken in by it. I assured them that the Vietnamese would not have Vu-graphs at a sensitive discussion of political tactics. I couldn't believe it, that these guys could be that naive and that stupid that they would pay for such patently false information, especially as I had told them beforehand exactly what had happened at the morning meeting and my assumption of what would be the subjects of the afternoon session.

Q: Well, I think this is the pernicious thing that happens with CIA intelligence. One, it's paid for. But the other one is that it seems to come from a source that is so much more exalted than what is developed by people out on the ground talking to people in the normal course of events. It takes on a mystique of its own, which, often, at certain levels in the government, people pay more attention to. And it can be wrong as hell, because it ends up depending on the integrity and the position of a Vu-graph operator, maybe.

MCNAMARA: Well, the guy was selling them what he figured they'd be naive enough to take.

Q: And also what he knew.

MCNAMARA: That's right, he wasn't there that afternoon at the political discussion. They wouldn't have Vu-graphs when they were having a serious discussion on political tactics.

Q: Incidentally, just to put it in frame, when did you arrive in Can-Tho, and when did you leave?

MCNAMARA: I arrived August-September 1974, and I left on the 19th of April, '75.

Q: Okay, now we'll go back.

MCNAMARA: The Foreign Service inspectors came to Can-Tho in February 1975. The head of the inspection team was Bill Bradford. He was an old administrative officer from Africa. I think he was the head of AF/EX at one time. Ultimately, he became an ambassador in Chad.

Q: I think so, too. I think I've interviewed him.

MCNAMARA: Well, he did the consulate. I told him that the division in our mission between CIA and others is potentially dangerous. If we don't speak with one voice and have a single chain of command, we could have great difficulty should we have to evacuate or find ourselves in some other crisis. He promised that he would put my forebodings in his report. I never saw the report. But I saw him after the evacuation; he was working on the resettlement of the refugees. He assured me that my predictions of trouble had been put in his report. "I've got it in my papers. What you foresaw was borne out by subsequent events." Things that have been written about the terrible divisions in Saigon during the final days were repeated in Can-Tho. I don't know what happened in other corps areas.

I tried desperately to build and enforce a unity of command. One of my aims was to simplify our administration and logistics. I wanted to do away with separate administrations and wasteful independent logistic chains. I reckoned that half our combined budget could have been saved by combining services and facilities. But the CIA people wouldn't hear of it. Lehmann said that I was making waves. I think, if the crisis hadn't come, he probably would have gotten me booted out of Can-Tho.

Q: What was the situation? Obviously, there was a change.

MCNAMARA: The situation in the country was deteriorating rapidly.

Q: You're talking about Christmas of '74, of course.

MCNAMARA: Seventy-four, yes. It was around that time, maybe just after. The North Vietnamese mounted an offensive against one of the provinces near the Cambodian border, in III Corps. They laid siege to the province capital. The South Vietnamese tried to reinforce, but were unable to do so.

Q: Around Pleiku, wasn't it?

MCNAMARA: No, it wasn't that far up. It was in III Corps. Pleiku was in II Corps. It was a minor province; I don't remember the name now. The South Vietnamese really tried to hold it, but couldn't. Finally, the province town fell. And that was the first province town to fall.

I remember coming into the Vietnamese corps headquarters' briefing room that morning. The Vietnamese senior staff officers were obviously very agitated about something. They were whispering to one another. I walked in with the corps commander. The sense of gloom was pervasive. Many of them sensed that this defeat was the beginning of the end.

The North Vietnamese were testing for an American reaction. When we didn't react to their attack on a provincial capital, prohibited under the cease fire, then they figured they could go ahead with their more important offensive plans. This attack was a precursor of the more general attacks that began with Kontum and ended in the fall of Saigon.

Q: How was this playing, as you were seeing it? I take it, the area you were in, IV Corps, was relatively quiet, wasn't it?

MCNAMARA: Well, there was fighting going on, especially around the periphery of IV Corps. Within some provinces, there was also minor skirmishing.

When I arrived in Can-Tho, I was struck by two things. The first was the sorry physical state of the consulate general buildings in Can-Tho. The second was the deterioration in the state of security in much of IV Corps. When I arrived, they had a hot dog stand in the lobby of the consulate general. My first weekend, I told the admin. officer to remove it immediately. I then got him to redecorate the lobby and put a new coat of paint on the exterior of the old buildings. The appearance of the consulate general was symptomatic of a general decline in standards.

I began my tour by insisting on cleaning up our physical facilities. I extended my efforts to an insistence on raising standards of work performance. I tried to infuse energy into a lethargic organization. The division in command and the problems with the CIA were my next target.

On the Vietnamese side, two things happened.

After the Tet Offensive, the VC infrastructure had surfaced, been identified, and then killed, captured or forced to leave the populated parts of Vietnam, by the much maligned Phoenix Program. A tough Corps commander, General Truong, who vigorously pursued the VC completed the task of putting the VC on the defensive. Cleaning the sanctuaries in Cambodia was another important element in pacifying the delta. Most of the supplies for the Viet Cong in the delta came through Cambodia. Once the supply lines were cut by the invasion into Cambodia, those supplies dried up for a while. And that had an effect on the war in the delta.

Another factor that was very important, which most people didn't recognize, was that the policies that we'd carried on in terms of economic development were really coming to fruition at about that time. We'd introduced miracle rice varieties from the Philippines. We'd redistributed land to the peasants after paying off the large landholders. We'd set up rural banks to provide ready credit to farmers and get them out of the clutches of the Chinese moneylenders. The success of our rural development program resulted in prosperity in the Mekong delta. When I returned after some four years, the farmers were prospering. They were growing three and four crops a year, where they had maybe two before. Each crop was much more abundant -- two, three, four times as abundant as any crop had been before. So they were producing lots and lots of rice. The USAID agriculture people calculated that, in 1975, for the first time in ten or 12 years, Vietnam was going to be exporting rice. Up to that point, we'd been supplying a lot of rice to Vietnam. Under our PL 480 program, American rice was coming in and feeding the Vietnamese. Now, they were beginning again to produce a surplus. Our efforts had succeeded in bringing about a green revolution.

As a result of this rural prosperity, the issues that had fed the rebellion by the Viet Cong in the delta had disappeared. The old peasant farmer didn't want his sons to go out and go to war. He wanted to keep them back on the farm to help him grow and market his rice. He had good economic reasons for not getting involved in the war. So recruitment dried up for the Viet Cong.

It also was much more difficult, of course, for the national army to recruit. They had to go out and drag draftees into the army. The peasant boys didn't want to go into the army, but they also didn't want to go with the Viet Cong. By the time I got there, I discovered that there were almost no locally recruited Viet Cong. The bulk of their forces in the south in the Mekong delta, were from the north. They were northerners who were doing the fighting, even as guerrillas, in the south. Actually, there was precious little guerrilla activity going on. It was almost all main force northern units.

Q: Obviously, that far south, with northerners down there, there wasn't much rapport. These were fish in unfriendly waters.

MCNAMARA: Yes. There were some, obviously, or the thing couldn't have gone on. But the real black-pajamaed local Viet Cong people were almost a thing of the past. If the northerners had gone away, the rebellion would have ended in a fairly short time in the south. The southerners could have dealt with it easily with their own means. But the northerners were the ones who kept it going.

Well, that was the situation.

When I arrived, there was a corps commander there, a guy named Nghi, who was an absolute wizard on briefings. He was a spellbinder. He had perfected the American Army briefing techniques. He could blind you with charts, statistics and all kinds of bull shit. A great deal of it was absolutely false. I saw American congressmen roll over when that guy got up with his charts. He was marvelous. He was a perfect product of the McNamara era. A perfect product.

The trouble is that he was also President Nguyen Van Thieu's bagman. He was Thieu's instrument for skimming the wealth off the countryside. The Mekong delta, being the richest part of the country, was one of Thieu's most important sources of revenue. The Americans had left. The money that the Vietnamese had been able to extract from our large expenditures was fast drying up. Money to feed the patronage machine had to be squeezed out of the people. A web of corruption was in place. It went from the palace in Saigon down to the corps commanders to the province chiefs to the district chiefs down to the lowest levels, the village chiefs and the hamlet chiefs. In the delta Nghi was the principal bagman. As corps commander, he was at the center of the web in the Mekong delta.

As I visited the various provinces, I found that some of the province chiefs were lying about their reports on the level of security in their provinces. They were saying that there were no problems in places where obviously there were grave security problems. The North Vietnamese were reinfiltrating into areas that had been cleaned out. The situation was deteriorating because they weren't doing anything about it. These guys were interested in making money and were neglecting the security side.

In Vinh-long, the province that I had served in when I first came to Vietnam, my old friends told how the situation was deteriorating while the province chief ignored reality. Our representative there, Bob Traister, was an old CORDS type who had been in Vietnam for at least ten years and spoke colloquial Vietnamese. He had good contacts and understood what was going on. He was the representative also for the neighboring province of Vinh-binh. He confirmed the grim picture painted by my Vietnamese friends.

The corps commander paid no attention to my warnings. There was no way that he was going to bother the province chief in Vinh-long because the province chief in Vinh-long was supplying him with regular cash payments. Nghi was not about to disturb the proverbial hen that was producing his golden eggs.

Q: Just to get a feel for how this worked on the American side, here you were, you were on the ground, you were the consul general, you understood about this corps commander, but he was your principal point of contact.

MCNAMARA: No. He was my counterpart. We were at the same level. He was in charge of the whole Mekong delta as both military commander and as civil administrator.

Q: You had to have good relations with him. But at the same time, American congressmen, American generals, other people were coming and being briefed by this guy. Did you take them aside afterwards and say, "This guy is like the Wizard of Oz. Don't pay any attention to him. This is what's really happening."?

MCNAMARA: Yes.

Q: Because at a certain point, this was obviously going to get back to him. How did you play this?

MCNAMARA: Well, I played it straight. I did try to correct impressions that he left with them. As far as I can remember, at that point, there hadn't been any American generals down there, but there were important visitors. I tried to play it as straight with them as I could. Congressman Leo Ryan, from California, who was later killed at Jonestown, Guyana, came down. I remember taking him out and watching a firefight from across the river near Chau-doc. I tried to correct impressions that this guy was leaving.

At this point, mainly in Saigon, but elsewhere in Vietnam, too, there was an anticorruption movement going on. A Catholic priest was leading the movement. This was putting a lot of pressure on Thieu. It was being played up big in the American press. As a result of the American press focus, Thieu could not use the police freely against these people. Demonstrations were being organized. In other times, Thieu would have unleashed the police who would have broken some heads, and ended the demonstrations. He couldn't do this because of the delicacy of his relationship with the United States. He desperately needed an appropriation from Congress for economic and military support. Finally, Thieu had to deal with the demonstrators by getting rid of some corrupt officials.

Under great pressure, he removed the IV corps commander and appointed General Nguyen Qua Nam, commander of the 7th Division to replace him. Nam was a real soldier. He was also incorruptible. An oddity among senior Vietnamese officers, Nam was a bachelor. This was important for wives were one of the principal conduits of corruption in Vietnam. I asked him why he remained a bachelor, and he said, "When the war is over, I will marry. Until that time, I'm going to remain a bachelor. It helps to keep me honest."

Things in the delta quickly changed for the better.

Q: About when was this?

MCNAMARA: It was just before Christmastime. In other words, I wasn't there for very long with this Nghi fellow. Wolfgang Lehmann, in Saigon, when I tried to tell him that Nghi was corrupt and really doing a great deal of harm to the war effort, told me he was the best soldier he'd ever met. Nghi was no soldier at all; he was an accountant, a Mafia accountant.

But Nguyen Qua Nam was a real soldier. He came in, a very quiet man, but a lot of steel in him. He asked me what I thought was going on, and I told him honestly that I thought that he was faced with two things, and they were interconnected: one, was a web of corruption. The second was a deteriorating security situation. The second, I suggested, feeds on the first. Corruption kept in place and distracted inefficient military people who wouldn't prosecute the war because they were so busy extracting money.

"I agree with you completely," he said. "Can you get me some information?" I told him that I would start in Vinh-long, the province that I knew most about. Fortuitously, it is a key province in the Mekong delta, located astride some of the region's most important lines of communication, running northwards to Saigon. "Give your information only to me," he instructed. "I will keep it in my own safe. I cannot rely on my staff for such delicate information," Nam confided. "I want to know about the province chief. I want to know what's going on. I want a good assessment on both corruption and the security situation, and a good evaluation of the province chief and of all the district chiefs. I want you to tell me whether you think they ought to go or stay."

I got my representative in Vinh-long, Bob Traister, to undertake studies on both Vinh-long and Vinh-binh provinces on the most confidential basis. Our report recommended the immediate dismissal of the province chief. We told Nam which district chiefs were worth saving and which ones ought to go. He reacted immediately by canning the province chief. A regimental commander from his former division was named to replace him. I had a few reservations about the regimental commander. Nam told me not to worry. He is a good soldier. That's what he's going to be focused on, fighting the war, not on civil administration. We'll have an honest civil administrator deal with the civil side. The real sources of corruption are there.

We did the same thing in Vinh-binh. There, he said, "Okay, I don't have anybody to replace the province chief. In any case, he is recoupable. I'll leave him there on trial for a short time. But he's on trial and he knows it. If things don't improve, he goes, too." The district chiefs and some of the other officials that we had indicated were sent packing.

To deal with the security situation, Nam established a special zone right in the heart of the delta. He took a colonel whom I had known in I Corps, a young paratrooper, and made him the zone commander. Regular battalions were assigned on a rotating basis to the zone from the ARVN divisions. Under the aggressive command of my paratrooper friend things started turning around in this key area in the heart of the delta.

Nam then went after the division commanders. His replacement in the 7th and the division commander in the 9th Division both were good soldiers. The 9th and the 7th were both performing well. They were in the northern part of the delta. The 7th was protecting the main route up to Saigon, Route 4, and the 9th was operating in the Parrot's Beak, which is a long strip of Cambodia that juts into Vietnam. It is a historic route of infiltration and invasion. He just prodded those divisions, because they were in good hands and were operating well already. The 21st Division, in the south, had a weak commander. As a result, the division was not performing well. Nam replaced this gentleman with a more aggressive officer. At the same time, he warned the other province chiefs that they must perform or be replaced. He also put out word that he would not expect the usual monthly payoffs. One province chief confided to Willie Saulter, my representative in a province along the "Parrot's Beak" that he was greatly relieved at not having to extract money from the local merchants.

Q: Let me ask a question going back to the initial discussion about the CIA. Basically, the CIA operation is a corrupting one: you're paying people of a government to supply you with information at the same time you're trying to wipe out corruption. How was this working out? When you tell your CIA man, "Look, we want to find out who's corrupt," obviously they're not going to tell you they're corrupt people.

MCNAMARA: That's right. Stu, I had better sources of information than they did. I did not involve them in any of these studies. In any case, I was never sure how I could trust them. They might well have told some of their friends about what we were doing. Since some of their sources were probably among the targets of our investigation, the whole effort could have been endangered.

Q: I'm sure you did.

MCNAMARA: Through people that I knew myself, because I'd served in the delta. I also knew a lot of people in the Vietnamese army with whom I'd served elsewhere. Also, I had my network of USAID guys from CORDS who were well experienced and well plugged in to very good sources of local information. So we had good information, and paid nothing for it. Moreover, we were capable of evaluating our information in a more sophisticated, knowledgeable way than was the CIA. In short, I got no information on corruption from the CIA. God knows what they were doing, because I didn't see all their output, but most of what I did was on the military intentions of the Viet Cong. Unfortunately, most of it was wrong. Of the rest, a large part came from their sources in the South Vietnamese army and police. We were getting almost identical material directly from the army and police as part of our regular liaison. Another significant source, I believe, was disinformation being fed to them by the Viet Cong to mislead us.

Q: Well, did you tell them to cut out paying Vietnamese officials, that you were trying to root out corruption?

MCNAMARA: I brought up the contradiction you mentioned, that we're against corruption, but yet we're corrupting people ourselves, to DCM Lehmann, station chief Polgar and the regional CIA boss. I had no success in convincing any of them that we were defeating our own interests. One of the biggest problems was that Martin wanted several independent sources of information. He deluded himself in thinking that he had such a source in the CIA hacks that were then operating in my part of Vietnam. Lehmann loyally carried out his instructions despite contradictions.

Q: Like trying to convert the Pope to another religion. That's the mother's milk of espionage.

Q: Rolling in money.

MCNAMARA: They did not understand or did not wish to understand. It all went over their heads. I tried to get them to do things which should have been acceptable to them.

Q: Then how did the situation during the winter and early spring, until April, play out, as far as you saw it?

MCNAMARA: In the delta?

Q: Yes.

MCNAMARA: In the delta, things, right up to the end, were going fairly well. Obviously, the problems elsewhere in the country were having an effect in the delta on morale. The war itself, however, was not going badly in the delta. NVA units periodically attempted to cut Route 4, but the 7th Division stopped them. Infiltration into the heartland of the delta was slowed, and Nam's effort to recover lost ground in Vinh-long and Vinh-binh had made a good start. The South Vietnamese could have held out in the delta for a long time, maybe indefinitely, if they had shifted their forces around Saigon southwards into the delta. Of course, this would have meant giving up Saigon. The North Vietnamese could not have used tanks in the soggy rice paddies of the delta. The southerners would have had the psychological advantage of fighting for their home. To accept the loss of Saigon, however, was probably too much for them to contemplate. I am not sure whether they ever really seriously considered a retreat into the delta. General Truong did come down to study the possibility just before the end. At that time, however, he was badly shaken by his losses in I corps, and may not have been capable of coming to grips with such a drastic strategy and of convincing others of its feasibility.

Q: It's marshy, with rivers.

MCNAMARA: It's marshy. You couldn't use armor down there. The South Vietnamese were doing pretty well in the delta, right up to the end. The problems were elsewhere in the country.

Q: What were you getting from the embassy, as the situation was falling apart?

MCNAMARA: Well, we got some reporting from the embassy on what was going on elsewhere in the country. I gathered most of my information on quick trips to Saigon where I could talk to friends like Jake Jacobson. The situation in Saigon was very tense, very nervous and panicky. Many Americans were panicking in Saigon, and very nervous.

When Da Nang was overrun and Nha-Trang evacuated, I told the embassy that, "I don't want any of the people from up north, who have been evacuated or who've evacuated themselves, coming down to the delta. I saw what a state many of them were in. Panic is infectious. These people could not teach us much about evacuation and might only succeed in frightening some of my own weaker subordinates."

I was able to keep everybody out except the CIA people. Some of them came down and did panic members of the CIA contingent in the delta. They scared the shit out of them by telling them what had happened up north and how this was inevitably going to be repeated in the delta. In mid-April, the CIA people began to predict a Viet Cong offensive against Can-Tho. One of their number, with fear in his voice, told me that the Viet Cong would come pouring into Can-Tho. They would "breach the town defenses in half an hour." This was sheer fantasy. It was crap that they were being fed by the Viet Cong. I'm convinced that the Viet Cong were feeding them disinformation. It was meant to spread panic and to tie down the intact army division from deploying northwards to defend Saigon. Unfortunately, my CIA colleagues were also passing the unevaluated intelligence to Saigon and to Washington, breeding further unease.

I was trying to calm things, saying, "We don't have that kind of a situation down here. Basically, the military situation here is stable. The problem is morale. The VC are creating incidents down here. What they're trying to do is to tie down the three regular divisions in the delta so that these divisions couldn't be redeployed to the defense of Saigon." General Nam agreed calmly with my assessment.

One night the VC captured some artillery pieces in Vinh-long and bombarded Can-Tho. They started fires that quickly spread engulfing a section of the city near our consulate general. We were almost burned out.

There were such problems, but we weren't in danger of being overrun. I couldn't convince the CIA of this.

General Fred Weyand visited us in April as part of a mission to evaluate the situation for the President.

Q: He was Army Chief of Staff at one point.

MCNAMARA: Well, he was the Chief of Staff then. He had been in Vietnam, of course, and by this time he was a four-star general. I remember having him to lunch, and I asked him how things were going? "Very badly," he replied. He described how Thieu showed him letters written by Nixon, guaranteeing that, if Thieu would sign the cease fire agreement in '72, the U.S. would come to South Vietnam's assistance should the North mount a threatening invasion. The existence of these letters has since been in the press. At the time, their existence was not widely known. In fact, Weyand himself was not aware of the letters' existence until he was shown them by Thieu who called on us to honor our former President's promise. Needless to say, Weyand was disturbed.

As things began to deteriorate elsewhere in the country, I started thinking about evacuation and how to make sure that none of my guys in the sixteen offices all over the delta got left behind. First, I had to think through what kind of an evacuation would best meet our needs under several scenarios. We had an evacuation plan, which was worthless. It called for our closing the consulate general and driving to Saigon. That would only work under the most ideal circumstances -- a luxury we were unlikely to have. Then I looked at evacuation by helicopters, because that's what they were talking about in Saigon. When I considered our numbers I began to realize this would require a major commitment of helicopters, as well as troops to secure LZs. It was just mind-boggling. Finally, I looked at the feasibility of a water borne evacuation down the Bassac River to the sea.

At the same time, I decided that I'd better start closing my outlying offices and bring people to Can-Tho or send them to Saigon for evacuation. I had to bring our number down, but at the same time, I wanted to avoid panicking the Vietnamese who were already very nervous. I had to avoid precipitous action that could prematurely collapse the fragile Vietnamese structure while moving fast enough to assure the safety of my personnel. If we caused a panic, as happened in Nha Trang, all of us might be trapped. This was a very delicate operation.

I then began to consider who I would attempt to evacuate, if it were necessary. I took stock. There were about a hundred Americans almost equally divided between CIA and all of the other agencies represented at the CG. Most of the non-CIA types were field reps left over from CORDS. By and large, they were as solid as rocks. I also had three or four young FSOs, one of whom was a consular officer, the others did political reporting. Then there was a potpourri of other technicians, people who searched for MIAs (missing in action). I was determined that I was going to do what I could for our Vietnamese employees. I felt strongly that we had a special responsibility towards them and their families.

I could now see that only the water option was likely to allow evacuation of large numbers of Vietnamese. I started to look at it more closely and saw that even limiting evacuation to immediate families, we would have 3000-4000 people. That is an awful lot of people. I thought how can I deal with all these people? There's no way that I would have the means to get them all out. Clearly, only the water option was likely to give me the necessary capacity. But even then, I could not handle such large numbers.

I then began seriously to consider how we would reduce our number to a manageable level. After several sleepless nights, I came up with a scheme for setting priority categories for our employees. First priority was given those likely to be in mortal danger if taken by the VC. These might include CIA interrogators, etc. Second, would be people who could easily survive in a modern society, like the U.S. or France. These would include most of our well educated staff who had skills, and spoke foreign languages. In the third category, I placed all the other unskilled or semi-skilled employees who spoke only Vietnamese and were not likely to be in grave danger. These would include guards, char-ladies, the GSO force, etc. I then issued instructions to all of my American supervisors that they must place all of their employees in these three categories. Finally, I told them that we would make every effort to get those in the top two categories out with their immediate families, if they wanted to go. Those in the last category, we would only evacuate if we had the available capacity. Clearly, this was a soul scaring experience for many forced to play God in making what might mean life or death decisions.

Events were now moving rapidly. Offices were being closed and people sent to Saigon or brought to Can-Tho. We were reducing numbers of Americans and Vietnamese. Both the agricultural technicians and the MIA searchers were ordered to Saigon. I sent some on regular Air America flights while others were going by road to Saigon for evacuation from Tan San Nhut airport. Both Vietnamese and Americans, and they were supposed to be fed into the regular evacuation in Saigon. That was part of my plan. For the final evacuation, if it came to that, I figured we'd have to go down the river, unless we could get virtually everybody for whom we were responsible out beforehand.

I talked about this with people in Saigon. Jake Jacobson was absolutely against my going down river. He said, "It's too dangerous to go down the river. You've got to go out by air, and you will only be able to take the Americans, because you won't have enough helicopters." We had, at this point, three or four Air America helicopters working in the delta with a passenger capacity of some 30 people.

I said, "No, I won't go for that." I reckoned that I would still have between 300-400 Vietnamese plus some 30-40 Americans to evacuate.

And he said, "Well, that's the way it's going to be. If you don't like it, go see the ambassador."

So I went to see Martin and told him that I was very upset. I was being told that I would not be able to evacuate my Vietnamese employees. I explained that a water borne evacuation was the only feasible means of dealing with the number I had in mind. I told him that I had considered the possible dangers, but had concluded that the risk was acceptable under the circumstances.

He said, "Well, of course, you can take the Vietnamese. Of course, you can. It's part of our plan. Of course, you can do it." He was very agitated. He went in and grabbed Wolfgang Lehmann and hollered at him, and said, "What's this, Terry is being told he can't take his Vietnamese."

And Wolfgang looked frightened. "Of course he can take his Vietnamese employees," he stammered.

Martin said to Wolfgang, "You make sure that it's understood that he can do this, that he can take his Vietnamese out."

I then went back to Jake and told Jake what had happened. He looked me directly in the eyes saying, "That's all very well, what he's saying right now, but when the time comes and you have to get out of there, and the pressures are on and the time is short, don't be surprised if you get an order saying that you have to go by helicopter, and you won't be able to take the Vietnamese."

The CIA people were absolutely against this going out by water, as were some of the others. The admin. officer, a retired army colonel, was also absolutely against it. Some were just not as committed to the Vietnamese as those of us who had spent years in Vietnam and who had gotten to know Vietnamese as people and not just as paid informants. Moreover, many were frightened. They believed their own intelligence reports that we might be overrun any minute. They considered going down the river just short of suicidal. That's the way their attitudes were described to me.

Q: How far up the river were you?

MCNAMARA: Seventy miles. It wasn't suicidal, nor was it without risk. For years Americans in Vietnam had focused on movement by air. They almost forgot about travel by surface. None of those who condemned evacuation by water were sailors. None of them ever asked themselves how one might block a river? It would be very difficult to block traffic on a river as wide as the Mekong. Of course there are some narrow spots. Before deciding on the water borne option I flew over the river myself from Can-Tho to the sea. Certainly there are some dangerous narrow places with islands constricting the broad flow of the river. Nonetheless, traffic could only be stopped by armed boats in the river. The VC, of course, had no navy. They could, however, make passage dangerous and uncomfortable by firing at passing boats from the shoreline. The fact that regular traffic on the river had never been seriously disturbed would tend to indicate that our boats had a very good chance of traveling down river without being harmed. Moreover, we had the element of surprise working for us. No one, including the VC, would have expected the Americans to leave by boat. I counted heavily on this factor of surprise in my calculations.

Q: And it wasn't as though the whole place was filled with people in black pajamas, all heavily armed, waiting to rise up at any moment.

MCNAMARA: No, that was not the case. However, about halfway down the river from Can-Tho to the sea there was a known VC infiltration route that crossed the river using a series of islands as easy stepping stones and as shelter from the Vietnamese navy. The VC forces were known to be in the area. I had no success in convincing our CIA colleagues of the feasibility of evacuation by water. Moreover, they were becoming increasingly frightened.

Early on, I made a mistake at one of my staff meetings. At that point things were not yet clear. The end appeared to be near, but one could not yet be certain when or how it would come about. I was struggling with the problem of honoring what I saw as a commitment to those Vietnamese who had allied themselves with us. Unfortunately, I expressed some of my musing aloud. Perhaps I inadvertently contributed to their fright. Speculating about what the CG's role might be if the regime collapsed, I posed the possibility that a few of us might remain behind as witnesses to deter the VC from the sort of mass executions that took place in Cambodia. It would certainly be risky and we would probably be taken prisoner. But the VC would probably not want to kill us. American prisoners had proven too useful to them in the past. Moreover, our status as diplomats might provide some measure of protection, but probably not much.

I should never have said anything like that even in a closed staff meeting. I reckon that I scared the shit out of many of my colleagues. Under such circumstances one had to consider all possibilities. Nonetheless, I should have kept this one to myself.

Getting back to my evacuation planning. I'd bought a rice barge, with some of our counterpart funds. A friend working for USAID logistics in Saigon heard about my evacuation plan. His name was Cliff Frink. His lady friend had worked at the CG before transferring to Saigon. As a result, he knew most of the Americans in Can-Tho. When he heard that I needed boats he offered two LCMs, lightly armored landing barges, with Vietnamese crews. They had been prepared to carry supplies by river to Phnom Penh. Slabs of concrete had been added to their engine compartments. Elsewhere, the sides and coxswain's port were protected with 1/2 inch armor plates adequate to deflect small arms fire. I was delighted. The boats were perfect for my purpose. When they arrived from Saigon I cached them at different places on the riverbank -- one at the Shell Oil dock, and the other at a USAID compound that we had further down the river. I did not want them together for fear of losing both at the same time. We filled them with fuel, and docked them ready for use on short notice.

Earlier, I bought a rice barge to use for the evacuation. However, the LCM's were much more capable. They were sea worthy, had strong engines, could handle relatively large numbers and were armored. Moreover, they came complete with trained crews. I now was confident that the trip down the river and out to sea was feasible at an acceptable level of risk. Furthermore, the boats were large enough to accommodate several hundred people.

At one of the evacuation meetings in Saigon I arranged with the Navy, and Marine representative, for a ship to meet us off the mouth of the river. The evacuation fleet representatives assured me that there would be no problem in picking us up just off shore. They would use a shallow draft LST that could get very close to shore. All we had to do, they said, was get to the river mouth.

In the event the Navy wasn't there -- but that's later on in the story.

Q: Well, why don't we stop at this point, and we'll pick it up about how the final days played out.

Today is June 9, 1993, and we're continuing with Terry McNamara. Terry, every once in a while would you put in a date or two, or give somewhat of the context. How did plans develop?

MCNAMARA: I have now given the form of things as they were in mid-April. We started to seriously consider an evacuation in the end of March, or the beginning of April. As Da Nang and Nha-Trang fell, we had had to make preparation in case the whole country collapsed and we had to leave quickly.

There was, I suppose, always a possibility that somehow or other they'd be able to stop the North Vietnamese from taking Saigon itself. There was also the possibility that they might make a stand in the Mekong delta. It was defensible and was still firmly in South Vietnamese hands. To fight in the delta, the North Vietnamese lines of communication would be very extended. Moreover, they could not use their armor in the marshy delta. Thus, the final outcome did not appear predestined early in April.

As you may recall, there was a very gallant defensive blocking action by the South Vietnamese 25th Division, north of Saigon, which lasted for at least a week, maybe two weeks. They stopped the rapid progress of the North Vietnamese down the coast. This time, that was bought so dearly, could have been used to organize Saigon's defenses and/or shift forces to the delta.

As time went on, it became increasingly obvious that a total collapse would occur. Preparations for evacuation began in earnest in the second week of April. I began to filter people up to Saigon, gradually closing offices. This was a very delicate operation. If we did it too quickly or too publicly, we ran the risk of panicking the South Vietnamese and possibly collapsing their defenses and administration, as happened in 2 Corps and around Da Nang. That was a big risk. Also, we could have had a reaction against us by the South Vietnamese themselves.

Q: If we're going down, you're going down with us.

MCNAMARA: That's right. You guys got us into this now you are not going to leave us to face the consequences alone.

Q: What was the feeling about how we pulled out of Da Nang and other places like that? Were you getting any stories of lessons learned?

MCNAMARA: When I went to Saigon I heard various accounts of the chaos that took hold in the last days in Da Nang. The whole structure collapsed so suddenly. No one was prepared. I decided that there was little constructive to be learned from that dreadful experience. We had more time to plan and prepare ourselves for an orderly departure.

The one thing that I wanted most to avoid was panic. You had to try to hold people together, reassure them that they were going to get out, and maintain some kind of discipline. To avoid the spread of panic, I was very much against people who had been involved in the evacuation elsewhere coming to the delta.

Q: You didn't want them to infect the people.

MCNAMARA: I didn't want them to infect the people in the delta with...

Q: Defeatism.

MCNAMARA: Defeatism and panic. There's nothing like fear. It's much more infectious than any disease that you can think of. I'd seen this when I'd evacuated people from Katanga, how dangerous the spread of fear could be.

So I decided that I was going to get as many people out, quietly, to Saigon as I could, as quickly as I could, but with all due prudence in terms of staging them out and closing my offices around the delta.

As I closed the one in My-tho, for instance, I took the guys who were there and I sent them up to Saigon. They and Willie Saulter, who was my representative in an isolated little province south of the Parrot's Beak, were instructed to set themselves up in Saigon to help our Vietnamese employees and their families as I sent them up from the delta. They were to assist them in getting through the confusion to Tan Son Nhut. At the same time I went ahead with my planning for a final waterborne evacuation.

On one of my visits to the embassy in Saigon I met the former Consul General in Da Nang, Al Francis. I had heard stories that he had conducted himself very well indeed during the evacuation. Courageously, he fought to evacuate as many civilians as possible. I understand that he was saved by my former body guard, Bucky, from almost certain death at the hands of some frightened Vietnamese marines. When I saw him, he was frustrated and very disturbed. I remember hearing him screaming in the halls of the embassy. I thought, "That is just what I don't need in Can-Tho." Shortly afterwards, Al came to me asking whether he couldn't come down and advise us on some of the lessons that he had learned from his evacuation.

Q: This was a test in diplomacy for you.

MCNAMARA: Yes! Because I respected Al. He had done a herculean job in Da Nang. I certainly didn't want to offend him. Nevertheless, I also didn't feel that I needed him in the delta.

It was just the sort of thing that I didn't want in the delta. I wanted to keep people as calm as possible, and to keep some control over, as you put it, defeatism. Obviously, the South Vietnamese were being defeated, but, damn it, there were still ways of maintaining our honor and our sang-froid. We weren't going to get out of there if we panicked, and we certainly weren't going to maximize the chances of getting out the Vietnamese to whom I felt a moral responsibility.

I also had a responsibility to my counterpart, General Nam, not to panic and not to cause more general panic among his troops and the population. The situation was so fragile. We could have easily had the same panicky collapse of order and discipline in Can-Tho as had happened in Da Nang and Nha-Trang. The Vietnamese were watching me and the other Americans very closely. We could easily have precipitated riots if we had shown by ill considered acts that we were about to leave. It was a very delicate balance that had to be maintained.

In Nha-Trang, I understand, they called in helicopters to evacuate the consulate general. The North Vietnamese did not arrive in Nha-Trang until a week or so after the American consulate general evacuated in great disarray. In the melee around the evacuation helicopters the Americans lost many of the people they most wanted to get on those helicopters. By bringing the helicopters in prematurely, they caused a riot with people fighting to get places on helicopters. Sadly, some of our own most valued employees were shoved out of the way by crowds of people trying to get on the helicopters. They never got out. Perhaps I am misjudging the situation in Nha-Trang. I wouldn't want my opinion of what went on in Nha-Trang to be taken as authoritative. I wasn't there. Nonetheless, that was my perception of what went on at the time. I wanted to prevent it from happening in Can-Tho.

Against my instructions, the CIA chief brought people in who had been in the northern evacuations. As I anticipated, they spread fear and defeatism amongst their already receptive colleagues. I made only one exception. I did allow Mac Prosser, the former provincial representative in Dalat, to join us in Can-Tho. His wife was one of the Ambassador's secretaries in Saigon. Jake Jacobson asked me, as a personal favor, if I would take Mack down in the delta. I did, and he was perfectly okay. He was an old hand, a former Army officer who'd come into CORDS and had been around for a long time. He was not traumatized. He had not gone through the dreadful experiences in Nha-Trang. In fact, he was very useful later on when he kept notes of some of the easily forgotten details of our evacuation.

In our final briefing on the evacuation, Cary Kassebaum accompanied me to Saigon. We fixed a rendezvous at the mouth of the river with the Navy/Marines. They promised that a ship would be there. I took that promise seriously. It was also made perfectly clear to us by the evacuation fleet representative that there would be no fleet of helicopters for evacuation from Can-Tho. We were on our own, as I had expected we would be. Providentially, I had made the right assumption early enough to allow me to prepare for an evacuation using only our own means. Otherwise, I never would have been able to evacuate any of the Vietnamese employees who had stayed with us to the end in Can-Tho.

At that time, when I was in Saigon, the embassy itself was in chaos. The city itself was quiet, but you could see the apprehension in the faces of all of the Vietnamese. They didn't know what to expect. They were expecting the worst, but they didn't know quite what might happen. I didn't go out to see the evacuation points at Tan Son Nhut, but I was told that it was a madhouse.

I went around to some of the safe houses where some of my people from Da Nang were being held in preparation for the trip to the airport and a flight to safety. I wanted to say goodbye to them and wish them well.

While in town, I went to a French restaurant that I often frequented, La Cave. Before, when I'd gone there, the food was good, and the service was excellent. This time, I took Kassebaum with me. They had curfew on, so we had to go late in the afternoon to have dinner. The old Frenchman who ran the place, a Corsican who knew me, was very sad. He apologized for the poor service. He said he only could give us a fixed menu, very simple fare. We ate a last supper in Saigon, which wasn't too bad. My Corsican friend gave us a particularly good bottle of wine that he said was being saved for a special occasion.

We had taken the assistant cashier with us to the embassy. She carried back a large stock of American dollars and lots of Vietnamese piasters. These were to be used to pay off our employees. They might also have come in handy, if we needed to pay for cooperation in our evacuation. My admin. officer, a retired Army colonel named Averill Christian, who worked for USAID, had sent her up. He wanted to have the cash on hand, so that if we needed to bribe somebody, we'd have the money. We also wanted to be able to pay off all our employees before we left -- the ones who were going to stay behind, in piasters; the ones who were coming with us, we wanted to be able to pay off in dollars, so that they'd have some money when they got out. We were taking care of all eventualities.

No one could yet be positive that there would be an evacuation. In my own mind, I was ninety-five percent sure that it would come. There was always the possibility that somehow or other they'd hold on in the Mekong delta and we wouldn't have to leave. I was told in the embassy, that some negotiations between the GVN and the VC were going on. Obviously, these weren't as serious as I was given to believe at the time.

I returned to the delta to continue preparations for an evacuation. At the same time, I maintained the flow of people going to Saigon progressively thinning our ranks.

Early one morning, I got a call from Jacobson. This was maybe three or four days before the final evacuation on April 29. He asked me if I had ordered helicopters for an evacuation from Saigon? I told him that I had not.

He said, "Well, somebody from Can-Tho has ordered a large number of Air America helicopters to come to Can-Tho for an evacuation. I assured Jake that I had given no such order, nor did I have any knowledge of such an order having been given by anyone else in Can-Tho.

"What about your CIA people?" Jake asked. "What do you think of such a mission?"

"It would be a very bad idea," I responded. "We are not ready to evacuate all our people yet. I still have teams in one or two of the provinces. Even in Can-Tho our people are not prepared for a sudden evacuation. Our preparations have not gotten to that point, nor would the local security situation warrant immediate evacuation. Moreover, the sudden arrival of helicopters for an evacuation of Americans could elicit panic and chaos among the general population and the Vietnamese army. We could cause another situation like in Nha-Trang. Under those circumstances, many of us might not get out, especially if everyone were not taken out in the first load. Those waiting for a second or third load would have a hell of a lot of trouble. This is just the sort of thing that happened elsewhere, and we don't want it to happen here. It's not necessary. It would be very bad, and it could prematurely collapse the whole South Vietnamese structure in the region -- something we did not want to happen.

I am convinced that it would be a bad thing."

"I will ground all of the Air America helicopters here, and you take the same action in Can-Tho, until we find out who gave that order."

Obviously, it was the spooks. There wasn't anybody else who could have done it.

So I gave the order immediately that all of the helicopters were grounded in IV Corps.

Then I called in the chief spook to my office. Initially he denied any knowledge for involvement in the order to bring helicopters to Can-Tho for an evacuation. A little while later, he came back to my office. This time he admitted that he had given the order to send the helicopters. I got very angry. He had initiated a monstrously dangerous course of action without any consultation, or even warning to others whose safety he might have endangered. He admitted that the CIA people and their agents would be the focus of his evacuation. The other Americans, as far as I could see, and certainly all of the Vietnamese for whom I felt responsible, were going to be left behind. Presumably, I would not have known anything about their operation until after they had departed. I hit the roof. This was the ultimate in duplicity and irresponsibility.

I told him that all helicopters were grounded -- they were grounded in Saigon, they were grounded here -- and that was that. He asked to use my direct line to Saigon. I refused. I told him that this was the last straw. He would have to leave Can-Tho!

As I calmed down I realized that I could not afford to fracture the always shaky unity of the Consulate General at such a critical time. Despite the fact that there had been repeated duplicity and were now guilty of almost criminal irresponsibility, I remained responsible for the safety of the CIA people, as well as all others at the CG. I had to provide strong leadership. Obviously, the CIA chief had already panicked. He could not be counted on to act responsibly.

This was part of the problem of not providing experienced people who knew and could deal with problems in Vietnam. Experience in Laos or elsewhere did not equip people for the kind of trials they faced in Vietnam. The CIA chief was a great tennis player. He was an Irishman with red hair, an athletic build and a hard looking face. He looked tough as nails. But there, at nut-cutting time, when it really came down to a crisis, he lost his nerve, as did many other supposed tough guys in our CIA contingent. Without strong leadership, the organization came apart with everyone looking for his own exit to safety.

Surprisingly, my ex-Peace Corps volunteers, like Cary Kassebaum, who looked like Caspar Milquetoast and had glasses about as thick as the bottoms of Coke bottles did not panic. They and my junior FSO's were rock solid. Moreover, these two groups were among the most insistent on our moral responsibility to take care of those Vietnamese who worked for us. Obviously, we could not take care of all of the Vietnamese in Vietnam, but we could at least try to take care of those who worked directly for us, and their immediate families. We had a clear moral responsibility to do that. Most of the CORDS old-timers like my deputy, Hank Cushing, the ex-Peace Corps volunteer and the young FSO's all shared this view.

Anyway, I felt I had to bury my difference with the CIA chief and work with him to get his people out. I called him again to my office and told him, "Look, I feel that you've done something which is very bad. Under any other circumstances, I wouldn't even talk to you again. But under these circumstances, we both have a responsibility. We both have to get all of our people out. So we must work together."

He indicated that he understood and agreed.

"Okay, how do we best accomplish this joint goal? How did you plan to use the helicopters?"

Answering my question, he told me that there was to be simultaneous landings of Air America helicopters. All CIA personnel would jump aboard and be whisked to a ship at sea. They had gotten the Navy to move a ship down to a position off the Mekong delta.

In fact, Jacobson had found out about this movement of helicopters through an admiral, who asked him, "What about this order I have received from the embassy to move a ship?" Jacobson couldn't figure out where the order came from; it had not come from his office which was responsible for the coordination of all evacuation operations. After checking, he found it had not come from, nor did I approve of it.

I was aghast when I heard what the CIA people had been planning. Nevertheless, I set about modifying their plan to make it less dangerous and more acceptable. I decided that helicopters come in singly, go to designated LZs outside town, pick up people sent to the rendezvous and then take them out to a ship offshore. The helicopters would fly low to avoid detection by the South Vietnamese radar at Ben-Thuy airbase near Can-Tho. We would use only the three or four helicopters assigned to work in IV Corps.

I instructed the CIA man to get his Vietnamese employees and agents out first. I reckoned that they would be in greatest danger should they be taken by the VC. When his people were all gone, I planned to continue the helicopter operation until all of our employees and their families were safely on the offshore ship. At that point, I would only have to worry about the remaining Americans and a few essential Vietnamese employees. Given these reduced numbers, we could probably all leave in one load on our 3-4 helicopters and not bother with a waterborne evacuation.

The air operation was started as I have outlined. Hank Cushing was given responsibility of monitoring it. I had insisted that Hank, a USAID employee, be named deputy principal officer even though the State Department was dead set against it. The Department wanted an FSO. I reasoned that a joint operation should be jointly staffed. The deputy ought to be from USAID. Moreover, I had known Hank when I was in Da Nang and he was province senior advisor in Quang Ngai. We were old friends and I had great faith in him. He had the experience needed for the job, and the confidence of both Americans and Vietnamese in the delta. Hank and Averill Christian, the Admin. officer, were charged with the detailed management of the evacuation.

In the last days of April, people were being moved out rapidly. Having taken precautions, our unobtrusive operation caused no ripples. The LZs were never used more than once. People were picked up by the side of roads or in fields. The helicopters were going all over the delta for their pickups. The system was working well. If we had more time, we probably would not have needed our boats. But we could not foresee when the final order to evacuate would come.

On the morning of April 29, the chief spook came to me and told me he had almost all of his people out. As planned we would then start on the non-CIA folks. By this time, only eighteen Americans, out of over one hundred, remained in the delta. We had already identified the people for whom we felt responsible. The others had been filtered out through Saigon as provincial offices were closed and non-essential programs curtailed. A number of "high priority" Vietnamese had also been reduced. Many had been sent to Saigon. There, they were having difficulty getting through the processing at Tan Son Nhut, despite the best efforts of the Americans I had sent to serve as expeditors. Others had come to Can-Tho to await transportation to Saigon, or a direct evacuation. The problems in Saigon, of course, were beyond my control. I could only hope that our people would be given appropriate priority by those running the processing in Saigon. Later I learned that this was not always the case.

My last provincial office was closed in Vinh-long, by Bob Traister on April 27th or 28th. I told him I wanted him out of there that weekend, the weekend before the 29th. He informed the province chief and the deputy province chief that we were closing our office. His relations were especially close with many of the provincial officials. The deputy province chief, the top civilian official and a fine man, called me on Friday to ask if Traister could stay for a going-away party on Saturday night. His friends felt they were likely never to see one another again. All knew that the end was near. After I had given my permission the deputy told me that he probably would never see me again. He thanked me for my friendship and for the things I had done for the people of Vinh-long. There was no panic in his voice, only dignified resignation. Traister arrived in Can-Tho on April 28th. His was the last provincial office to be closed. Our timing could not have been better.

We had Vietnamese army interpreters assigned to our advisory effort. They worked directly for us as part of our operations. Traister brought his whole team with him including the soldier interpreters. They were good soldiers with lots of experience in the field. As soon as they got there, I told Traister to take his gang on board the Mike boats and the rice barge to protect them. Traister himself boarded the LCM docked at the CORDS compound. Thus, we had reliable armed men on the boats; nobody could steal them, nobody could screw around with them. We also had Vietnamese crews on the Mike boats.

Q: A Mike boat being...

MCNAMARA: An LCM (landing craft, mechanized). It's a triangular open decked landing craft, with a door in the bow that lowers to allow vehicles and personnel to exit the boat.

Q: It's sort of a half-sized LST, isn't it?

MCNAMARA: No, it's not half sized, it's much smaller than that. It'll take a good-sized truck or a World War II tank. It's a good-sized boat, but there's nothing indoors. The only cabin is over the engine. The rest of the boat is open, but with high armored sides protecting the cargo deck. The coxswain's post sits on top of the engine compartment in the stern. They are good work boats. They have heavy dual diesel engines, a shallow draft, and are lightly armored. Our Mike boats, however, had been reinforced with "sleeves" of concrete protecting the engine compartment against rocket attack.

Traister was on the boats with instructions to protect them.

On the morning of April 29th, I was in my house, in bed, when I was awakened by several explosions in the town. I jumped out of bed, got on the radio, and called the Marine NCOIC Staff Sergeant. Hasty came on, with his high-pitched pubescent voice. He was tall and skinny, with glasses. He looked about 15 years old. But he was a staff sergeant of Marines, and he was incredibly gung ho. When I told him that we were probably going to have to evacuate by water, he said, "Sir, that sounds very dangerous."

I said, "Well, maybe so, but that's what we're going to do."

He drew himself up and seriously declared, "Well, no guts, no glory."

I almost wet my pants. He was marvelous. A caricature of a Marine.

Q: Well, war is the great playground for an awful lot of people.

MCNAMARA: Despite his fantasies, he was very bright. Since our days together, he has become an officer in the Marines. The last time I saw him, about three or four years ago, he had just completed an MA at George Washington University in Middle Eastern studies. Hasty was very reliable but naive and very full of the Corps. Death before dishonor and that sort of thing. The only problem with him was that you had to restrain him, hold onto his coattails so he wouldn't do anything foolish. But beyond that, you didn't have to push him, which was the biggest problem with so many people.

Anyway, I got him on the radio, and he said that some rockets had landed on the Can-Tho waterfront. I believe he told me that one of my favorite restaurants was damaged in the attack. (Some Chinese had a hotel down on the waterfront, which you wouldn't have wanted to stay in. I don't think they changed the sheets very often, but they had a good restaurant.) To reassure me, he said that the physical damage was not extensive. I am sure that the purpose of the VC bombardment was more psychological than physical. The city remained calm, however.

Then he came over to my house, in a great squeal of brakes. There was a little terrace off my bedroom on the second floor, and I walked out on that. He was down on the driveway inside my little compound (I had a chain link fence around my house). And we talked; he told me what had happened then in more detail. So I said, "Okay, I'll be down to the office as quickly as I can get up and get dressed." So he went off to inspect whatever other damage there might be, and get his Marines squared away for the day.

We were then resigned to the fall of Saigon and the probable collapse of the regime. Thieu had gone and "Big Minh" had taken over as President. Our fate, and that of Vietnam, would be sealed in the next few days. In the delta, the VC were doing everything they could to give the impression that Can-Tho and the rest of the delta were in imminent danger. As I said, they had shelled Can-Tho earlier and now they had rocketed the town. Neither had any military significance, but they did send a morale damaging message.

The spooks were getting many reports of preparations for an imminent attack on Can-Tho. One version claimed that the North Vietnamese were massing troops just south of Can-Tho, in preparation for an attack. They allegedly expected to pour into Can-Tho City overwhelming the formidable defenses. As one CIA operator told me, with real fear in his eyes, "They could be in here in a half an hour's time." I was hearing similar reports from other sources and largely discounting them as VC psychological warfare ploys. The corps commander, General Nam, agreed with my analysis. He reckoned that his forces could repel any known force that could then be thrown at the defenses of Can-Tho. The North Vietnamese simply did not have the troops in the delta at that time.

Q: This was several days before, because by this time, they'd pretty well left.

MCNAMARA: Their Vietnamese auxiliaries were gone when the helicopters left. There were still some CIA Americans in Can-Tho. These reports had been building up. I had been talking to the corps commander, General Nam, and he and I both agreed that this was just a disinformation campaign, and that what they were trying to do was to tie down the South Vietnamese troops in the delta, so that the South Vietnamese would not send troops northwards to the defense of Saigon and to help counter the thrust southward of the North Vietnamese columns coming down from the north. It was the oldest tactic in the world -- a diversion.

There was no real indication that there were the numbers of troops that would be required to break through the defenses of a very heavily defended Can-Tho, where you had a seasoned, calm commander who was determined to hold the place and who had good troops to do it with. There was no way that, without an awful lot of firepower and an awful lot of enemy troops, they had any chance at all of breaking into that town. And there were no indications, whatsoever, that they had that kind of strength in the delta at that point.

The threat wasn't credible if you analyzed it calmly based on the good enemy order of battle information we had. But, panicky people who had lost their nerve were not able to analyze rationally. That's just what had happened elsewhere in Vietnam. A lot of the collapse of the Vietnamese in the north had come about because of panic and loss of nerve. Their flight from the highlands and from I Corps was not because they had lost great battles. They hadn't. They had lost their nerve and they panicked. A recurrence of this was just what I was trying to prevent from happening in the delta, if I could. The corps commander was a very steady guy and was not likely to be panicked. He saw his situation clearly and was a good tactician.

Anyway, this was my appreciation of the situation, and I was sending it to Saigon, both through the defense attachés military analyst attached to the CG and through my own channels. One of my young FSOs, a man named Dave Whitten, who wrote very well, and I were writing reports and sending through both the DAO and our own channels. That was our appreciation of it.

The CIA's appreciation was very different. They were seeing the collapse in the delta as imminent, with the North Vietnamese pouring into the center of Can-Tho in an almost effortless thrust. As one of them put it, "They can be here in a half hour's time.

Of course, their own bad intelligence was taking a terrible toll on their nerves. The thing was feeding on itself.

On the morning of April 12(?) at about 1000 hours, I got a call on the direct telephone line from the embassy. It was Jacobson, the evacuation coordinator in the embassy in Saigon. In a calm voice he gave me the order to evacuate. He said the order had come from the President and we were to begin our evacuation at eleven o'clock. He then instructed me to evacuate by air, using the three Air America helicopters that were working in the delta. "You will be able to take only the Americans with you."

"You mean I can't take my Vietnamese?" I asked.

"No, you are to go by air as quickly as possible as we need your helicopters urgently to help with the evacuation of Saigon."

Well, I had heard earlier that morning, from the CIA guy who was running the helicopter air operations, that Tan Son Nhut had been bombed and that they had knocked out some of the small Air America Huey helicopters. I knew that the evacuation plan for Saigon called for using those small Hueys to pluck people off the tops of buildings. You've seen some of the famous pictures?

Q: Yes.

MCNAMARA: Well, if they had knocked out a number of the helicopters at Tan Son Nhut, that meant that their capacity to execute their plan would be reduced. Jake had said that my helicopters were urgently needed in Saigon. So I said to Jacobson, "Well, you know I want to take my Vietnamese out. As I've told you before, we are ready to go by water. I want permission to go that way."

He replied, "No, no, no."

I said, "Look, I know that you need helicopters desperately in Saigon."

He said, "That's right."

I said, "I know that Tan Son Nhut has been bombed. I've got helicopters here, and can release them more quickly if we evacuate by boat. Otherwise, it may take five or six hours to get the choppers to you in Saigon. You need them now, don't you?"

He said, "Yes."

I said, "They're out on missions now. We've got to get them back here. They must then be gassed up by hand pumps." (I wasn't letting the helicopters land at the airport because of the danger that Vietnamese soldiers might commandeer them at gun point.) "Then they would have to fly out to the fleet, gas up there, and fly back to Saigon. All of that will take at least five hours, probably longer, and you'll be lucky if you ever see those helicopters today. I know that this is part of your evacuation plan."

Just at that point, the line went dead. I tried everything to get back in touch with him, so I could continue to make my case and get permission to go by water.

I was going to go by water whether I got permission or not, but I preferred to go with permission. I respected Jacobson very much; he was trying to do what he thought was right and in our best interest. But I just didn't agree with him.

Anyway, I tried every means of getting back in contact with Jake. We tried radio nets through the Philippines, through Thailand, through ships at sea. Nothing worked. Time was passing. In desperation, I picked up the telephone again and it worked. I got through to Jake, and made my case again. Reluctantly, he agreed, "You've got your permission to go by water," he granted. "Just get the hell out of there."

I had finally worn him down. The whole world was ending around him, and he could not get me off the telephone.

"Just get out of there. And send those helicopters to Saigon as quickly as possible because we need them desperately." These were his last instructions to me.

Immediately after hanging up, I grabbed Kassebaum and Hasty (I wanted witnesses), and went to the CIA offices on the third floor of the CG. There, I told the CIA chief and a group of his subordinates that I had received the evacuation order from Saigon with permission to go by water. "We have been ordered to release the helicopters immediately. They are desperately needed in Saigon," I explained.

The CIA chief acknowledged my order to go by water, but asked that they be allowed to take their own motor boats that were fast and armed with machine guns. "We could run interference for you," the CIA chief explained to me.

I agreed, instructing him to meet us in the middle of the river at noontime. The time was then getting on to eleven o'clock. I concluded our conversation with an offer to take any of his people with us in the LCMs. The rendezvous in the middle of the river at twelve o'clock was set because our boats would be coming from different points along the river bank.

The CIA chief's name is Jim Delaney. He acknowledged my instructions with an unequivocal, "Yes, sir. No problem. We'll be there at twelve o'clock."

His deputy Fordick, repeated agreement that they would go by boat, and would meet us in mid-river.

Before leaving, I again told them to, "Send those helicopters to Saigon as quickly as possible."

In any event, the helicopters were never sent back to Saigon. Many of the people waiting on the roof tops were never evacuated. I understand that some of them were CIA employees. The Marine helicopters couldn't land on the roof tops because of their size and weight. But that was all part of the plan. It was perhaps too complicated, but that was an element in the evacuation. And so a lot of people got left in Saigon, including an awful lot of CIA agents, because they didn't get taken out of these compounds by helicopter, as was foreseen in the plan.

I then continued my rounds visiting all of the different elements in the CG. I issued the same evacuation order. In our plan, I was then to go to the dock at the CORDS compound and get the boats loaded and ready for departure. My deputy was to bring up the rear closing the office behind him. I went forward to get things moving.

I left the CG with Kassebaum, who was living in my house. We took my car to the house where we picked up guns, changed clothes, and picked up a few things to take with us. I didn't want to take much, because I didn't want the maids to know that I was leaving. If they knew, I feared they would spread the word quickly around town. We were being watched closely by the town's people. To prevent panicking them, I had issued orders that nobody could pack their household goods and ship them to Saigon without my specific permission. Some people snuck their stuff out without my knowing it. But the reason I said this was that people were watching us very closely, and the least thing could panic them.

I said nothing to my maids. I gathered up a few things, not much, just a few things.

Also staying with me was one of my future wife's brothers.

Q: She was Vietnamese.

MCNAMARA: She is Vietnamese, yes. I mean, we weren't engaged, at that time, we were just friends from the time I was in Da Nang.

Her brother had just arrived a day or two before. He had gotten himself out of Hue, Da Nang, and Nha-Trang. He was on a boat where some of the military ran amok killing, robbing and raping. The boat ultimately arrived in Phu Quoc Island. The soldiers on the boat that had mutinied, raped, killed and stole from the civilian refugees. Some were taken off the boat and executed by the Vietnamese Navy. The authorities were attempting to restore order by these drastic measures. My future brother-in-law came within an ace of being shot. He was saved by somebody who recognized him and convinced the naval officer in charge that the money he had was not stolen. My wife's family was among the richest in central Vietnam. He had not stolen from anybody. Once out of the clutches of the navy executors he got off at Phu Quoc somehow and found his way to Saigon. His father was prepared to stay in Vietnam. He was a member of the old royal family, and wished to remain in his own country. But he sent his son down to me, to save him. He wanted his son to have a chance.

My future brother-in-law, my driver, Kassebaum and I got into the car for the short drive to the CORDS compound where the boat was docked. I'd left all of the money I had, for the maids, on top of my dresser, a big stack of piasters.

Q: About five or six inches tall.

MCNAMARA: Not quite, but all that I had. I hoped that they would get it before looters invaded the house. Given my system of priorities, I didn't feel that I could offer the maids a place in the boat.

When I arrived at the CORDS compound, the Marines had already started loading the boats. As people arrived they were hustled aboard the boats. I took up my stance near the entrance to the dock. I was determined to monitor who got on the boats. I feared overcrowding. I also wished to assure places were given those on our priority lists.

At some time during this period the Marines gave me a helmet liner that they had painted navy blue, with a big gold star on it, and an inscription: "Commodore of the Can-tho Yacht Club." (This is significant because of what I was accused of later.)

It was a joke. I put it on because I felt that one of the best ways of maintaining morale and preventing panic was to appear confident, even lighthearted. So I tried to joke with people and to relieve tension. The Vietnamese, naturally, were worried and scared. My young Marines and CORDS old-timers were businesslike but joined in my show of bravado. We tried hard to maintain a calm, matter-of-fact, businesslike front. As we started on this adventure, I was not as full of self-confidence as I tried to appear.

Anyway, they gave me the hat. I probably never should have put it on, but I did. And Kassebaum took some pictures of me with the hat on.

Later, I was accused by Frank Snepp, in his book...

Q: He was CIA.

MCNAMARA: He was a CIA guy in Saigon, who wrote a bitter denunciation of the whole evacuation and of the CIA station chief and of the management of the embassy.

Q: Decent Interval is the name of the book.

MCNAMARA: Decent Interval, yes. Some of it may be true, some of it is not. I have no idea what went on elsewhere in the country. But in the Mekong delta region, which was my area, he hadn't been there, didn't know anything about it personally, so he got his stories from his own former colleagues, the ones who ran away.

He accused me of having a Patton complex (General Patton), of being vainglorious, and by inference of being a little crazy because I decided to go out by water. He was not able to refute the fact that I got out and saved three hundred and some people. The "Patton" complex is pure bull shit. The fact is that we got out and we saved all of the Vietnamese for whom we had a responsibility, who wanted to go and who were in Can-Tho at that time. That is the bottom line.

As we prepared to debark, I was getting people aboard the boats and the boats prepared for the trip down the river. People were coming into the compound and getting on the boats. Several CIA men came bringing people with them. I put them aboard while the CIA people left, ostensibly to join their comrades on their own smaller boats. General Nam's aide-de-camp and his wife and children arrived. Duc gave his family into my care, wished me luck and returned to his general's side. I was never sure whether this was an indication that Nam knew what I was doing. I suppose he did for he had already told me that he would never stand in the way of Americans leaving.

When I agreed to take Duc's family I asked him to say goodbye to the general for me. I probably should have gone to say goodbye myself, but I was afraid at that point that the general might stop me. I just couldn't take that chance. Also, I had to be present to make sure that everything went right at the loading. I didn't feel I could absent myself from the departure point. The decision had been taken by somebody else to leave, and I was under orders to get out of there. I was then focused on carrying out my orders. It might have been more gentlemanly to go and say goodbye in a civilized way, but this wasn't a civilized situation.

Anyway, Duc left his family. A CIA secretary, who was living in an apartment in the CORDS compound, who was later killed in Lebanon, Phyllis Filatchy, came out of her apartment as we were loading the boat, jumped in a car, and zipped off. I assumed she too would be on one of the CIA boats.

Loading continued. Back at the consulate general, Hank Cushing and Sergeant Hasty were closing up the office as if we were coming back at two o'clock after luncheon. They were showing people out, getting the place closed down, and getting other people down to us. Some of the Vietnamese that we had selected for evacuation told us no, they didn't want to go, they wanted to stay there. We agreed that was their choice.

I remember the cashier, a little Chinese girl, elected to stay. So we gave her money with instructions to pay anybody who hadn't been paid. There was a list of people who were owed their pay and separation settlement. We gave her the list and said, "When they come in or try to get in touch with us, then please pay them." I hope she gave them their money. I don't know whether she did or did not, but there wasn't anything else we could do. We didn't keep the money, we gave it to her. If she put it in her pocket, well...

We also tried to get hold of the people at the Vietnamese-American Association, which wasn't official, but it still had connections with USIS. There had been a USIS presence in Can-Tho up until two or three months before the evacuation. The USIS branch PAO was then withdrawn. When he left, the Association became independent, but retained a connection with USIS. We couldn't get hold of anybody at their library. For a week or so before, we had tried to get people in USIS Saigon to make arrangements for the Association employees. We were never able to reach the PAO. We could never get anybody. The impression one got, from trying to talk to them, was of great chaos. They should have taken responsibility for the people who worked at the Association. At least, they might have told us what to do for them. We could have sent them to Saigon if we had some instruction from USIS. The head of the Association, whom I think may have been a U.S. government employee, was pregnant. She had gone home to Bac-lieu, a province south of Can-Tho to have her baby. There was no way of getting her. The other ladies who ran the place were in town, but must have been taking a holiday while the boss was having her baby. We started calling them about ten-thirty but we were unable to reach them by the time we left the dock at 1200 hours.

At the same time, my vice consuls, and others, were going about town alerting people, picking them up, getting them down to the boats. The consular officer, Dave Sciacchitano, went to people who were on his consular list, American citizens or those having close American associations. For instance, women who had children born of American fathers. He tried to convince them that their children, who had a claim on American citizenship, should be given an opportunity to go to America. He was able to convince some but not others. I remember, in the end, he failed with one girl. She just wouldn't leave. She was torn by indecision and fear. Reluctantly, he had to leave her and get on the boat.

As they were closing the consulate, Cushing and Hasty heard noise in one of the building's back rooms. Investigating the source of the noise, they found the CIA code clerk, trying to destroy his codes. For some reason, he wasn't able to do so, he just wasn't strong enough. He couldn't do it by himself. His colleagues had all departed leaving him alone. In their haste, they must have forgotten the poor devil. Fortunately, we had some cooler heads with us.

Earlier, before I left the consulate general, I was near the front door, when the CIA chief came down the front stairs from his offices. He was pulling two big mail bags behind him. They were obviously very heavy as they clunk, clunk, clunked down the steps. I imagined them to be full of gold bars. They seemed heavy enough and were emitting metallic sounds as they thudded in his wake. When he reached his car parked in front of the CG, he threw the bags into the back seat, pulled his poor, bewildered Vietnamese driver out of the driver's seat, jumped in, and sped off with tires squealing. The poor man looked frightened as hell. I am still puzzled as to what he was going to do with his heavily laden mail bags. Perhaps he still has them.

Getting back to the CIA code clerk, abandoned in the CG back room, Cushing and Hasty helped him destroy his codes and other classified gear and brought him with them down to our boat. At the time, I couldn't figure out what was holding Cushing up. I was on our radio calling to him to hurry as the tide was ebbing fast. Further delay risked hopelessly beaching our boats for hours until the next tide came in. Of course, I had no idea that our CIA colleagues had abandoned their communicator with his codes. Cushing replied to my pleas with a laconic, "We are coming." Hank, who recently died, was unflappable.

Finally, Cushing and Hasty arrived with the code clerk sitting between them in near hysteria. He could not find his girl friend. They had stopped by her house, but she was nowhere to be found. Finally, Cushing and Hasty had to drag the communicator with them for he was reluctant to leave without his friend.

We forced him to get on the boat. Suddenly, I heard shouts of joy. The girl was on the boat. She had come along with the consulate general employees fearing abandonment. They had a happy reunion. Incredibly, the CIA people had forgotten their communicator who was responsible for their most secret codes. They simply forgot him in their anxiety to get away.

Just as we were about to board the boat, Cushing's maid came out of his house screaming that she wanted to go, but that her son was still at school.

By this time, I realized that we would have enough room for people like her in our boat. Therefore, I had no reluctance to take any of our employees who were there and wanted to leave with us.

But the tide was ebbing and we had to leave. I told her that her son would have to arrive within the next few minutes or be left behind. She was distraught. Just at that point, a little kid, with a school bag, waltzed in the front gate of the compound. He was whistling, in no hurry, coming home from school. Why should he hurry? She rushed to the gate, grabbed him, hugged him, and jumped on the boat still sobbing.

I then gave orders for those still on the dock to get aboard. The Vietnamese crew of this LCM had jumped ship. I told Traister, who'd been guarding the boat, to start the engines. He was about half drunk, maybe more than half. He went to the engine room and knocked around. Somehow he started the engines. I'm not sure how he got the engines started, but he did, the engines were started. I took over the controls in the coxswain's compartment. I had been in the Navy and the Merchant Marine, but I had never run a boat like the LCM. I did understand the principles. In any case, there was no one else who had any significant nautical experience. So I took the controls of the boat and started trying to maneuver it off the mud bank. By this time, the tide was running out fast.

Suddenly a group of Filipinos came rushing down the dock dragging children, Vietnamese wives and girlfriends after them. They were CIA employees who had been abandoned. I stopped everything. Hasty rushed up the dock, grabbed them, and helped them get aboard. I too got off the boat to hustle them aboard. I was the last to board.

The boat was stuck in the mud but still in the water. With Traister's help, I violently maneuvered with both propellers until she became unstuck and off the bank. What a relief to be free of land and underway! My comfort was short-lived. We had a long-shafted outboard motor to propel the rice barge. In getting off the mud bank, the propeller had broken. The barge was dead in the water. There was nothing to do but tow it with the Mike boat. Mike boats have two powerful diesel engines. We threw ropes to Cushing who was on the barge with our GSO, Walt Heilman, a former merchant seaman and a mechanical genius. A very useful guy to have around. With the barge under tow we started out into the main stream of the river.

Just as we were getting underway, two helicopters flew overhead. The deputy chief of the CIA informed us by radio, that they had gotten permission "from Saigon" to use the helicopters in their evacuation. Therefore, they were taking the helicopters out to the evacuation fleet. Would we like some assistance, he asked? I could only conclude that they had disregarded my orders and taken the helicopter despite the desperate need for them in Saigon. I was never able to ascertain who might have given them permission to take the helicopter. It certainly was not Jacobson who later denied any knowledge of their request. He described their action as "piracy." Certainly, it was extremely irresponsible. No doubt the result of their panic. I was furious, but I was trying to maneuver the boat. So I told whoever was talking to them on the radio to tell them to please remind the Navy that we needed help when we arrived at the mouth of the river. We could also use some air support on the way down the river. I was never able to learn whether they made any effort to pass this information on to Naval authorities.

Anyway, whzzt, they were gone. I heard later that when they were taking the helicopters, their Nung guards (Chinese Nung's who were supposed to be very reliable mercenaries) held them up at gunpoint. They relieved our CIA friends of gold and dollars. Maybe that mail sack that seemed full of gold was part of the Nung's payoff.

We were now on our way down the river. The second Mike boat (LCM) that had been tied up at the Shell dock was also on its way down river, just ahead of us. We took up position behind it. The crew of this second boat had not run away. A former Vietnamese naval officer was in charge. He knew the river very well. I still had the rice barge in tow. In total there were some three hundred Vietnamese, eighteen Americans, and five or six Filipinos in the three boats.

We continued on down the river for some 6-7 miles past Can-Tho. To our north, over Vinh-long. The river there is very wide. We could see a helicopter firing its machine guns at something on the ground. We could see the tracer bullets flying in both directions. The war continued.

Off to the port side, some Vietnamese navy boats were approaching on an intersecting course. They were "monitors" whose armored turrets mounted 40- and 20-millimeter guns. Pretty formidable stuff. Suddenly, the lead monitor fired a machine gun volley over the bow of the leading LCM. The signal was unmistakable. I gave the order to stop. There wasn't any way that we could outrun them, and there was no way that we could outfight them. The only thing to do was stop and talk to them. I had women and children in all three boats. Good God, we could have had a massacre if they'd ever started shooting with the 40- millimeter guns at our boats.

We were stopped. A lieutenant, junior grade, who was in charge of the flotilla of navy boats said that he was under instructions from the corps commander to stop us. General Nam believed that we had South Vietnamese army personnel and draft-aged males on the boats. He wanted us to be brought back to Can-Tho, to check the boat for deserters.

The navy people wanted to come on board our boats. I refused to let them come aboard. We were at an impasse surrounded in mid-stream with awesome 40- and 20-millimeter guns pointed down our throats. Most of the males on our three boats were heavily armed. If the navy people had come on the boat and tried to take any of the Vietnamese off, there could have been a shootout. I could not allow this to happen. All three boats were full of women and children.

Certainly, General Nam had good reason to have us stopped. A senior Vietnamese air force colonel was on my boat. He had been the deputy base commander at Ben-Thuy. I knew him very well. He had come down at the last minute. I thought he was there to bid goodbye to the Shell Oil manager who was a close friend. Unbeknownst to me, he shed his uniform and hid on the boat. One of my Americans identified him only after we had begun our voyage. By that time, there wasn't anything to do except throw him over the side. I could not do that. I was angry and disgusted with him, but I didn't feel there was anything I could do about it. I would not have minded the navy taking him, but I couldn't give him up without giving up some of our employees who were of military age.

Luckily, two weeks before, I had made an agreement with Commodore Kwang who was in charge of the South Vietnamese navy in the Mekong delta. I got his wife and children evacuated through Saigon in return for a promise of help should we have difficulty in our river borne evacuation. He owed me a favor. I wasn't very sure whether he would or could honor our agreement under these circumstances. Nevertheless, I asked the navy lieutenant to get in touch with Commodore Kwang and inform him that we were being held. I offered to allow the Commodore to inspect the boats if he would meet us in mid-river. I did not want to return to Can-Tho not knowing whether we would ever be able to leave again.

The lieutenant was friendly, but some of his sailors were not. They looked potentially dangerous. Obviously, they resented our leaving.

As requested, the lieutenant got Kwang on the radio. The Commodore offered to come immediately to resolve the impasse.

We were held for about an hour and a half waiting Kwang. When he arrived in a small boat, we greeted each other as friends. He smiled at me, "You don't have any officers, soldiers or males of military age on your boats, do you?"

"Of course, not," I replied. "The people in our boats are all my employees and their families."

"Right. Then I see no reason to bring you back to Can-Tho. I'll go back and tell the corps commander that I have inspected the boats and found no one on the prohibited categories.

He was really a smart cookie. He had taken the precaution of bringing a young sailor with him whose aged father was on one of our boats. He encouraged the sailor to say goodbye to his father in full view of all of the other sailors. It was a very touching goodbye; the young sailor was staying behind. This disarmed the other sailors whose animosity disappeared.

To further ease tensions, I gave the sailors our rice barge. It was more a hindrance to us with its broken propeller. We took the people who had been on the rice barge and divided them among the two LCMs. This meant that all our people were in modern, sea worthy craft behind protective armor. I was greatly relieved.

We loaded lots of supplies on the LCMs including military rations and water. To raise morale among our passengers, I allowed the distribution of some of our rations. They disappeared among the family groups as if by magic.

While we were stopped, I told my Americans to disarm all Vietnamese. The fact that they'd give their guns up to us was important. It was a sign of trust. Perhaps, they had no choice, but we got no resistance. My men circulated among the Vietnamese reassuring them in their own language. We kept all of the guns on the top of the engine compartment behind my steering post. The Marines were there to guard them. We also had a machine gun off one side and a BAR (Browning automatic rifle) off the other side. All of the Americans were armed. As my own protection, I had my Gurkha kukri from Katanga. It meant a great deal to me. I could not leave it behind. Besides, it might come in handy.

Q: You're talking about...

MCNAMARA: This is a Nepalese Gurkha knife that was given to me by Colonel Matra of the 3/1 Gurkha battalion in Katanga. I had been made an honorary Gurkha in Katanga during my times there living with the Gurkhas. My kukri was one of the few things I brought with me in the evacuation. Other than that, I had little more than the clothes on my back, an old pair of dungarees and a sports shirt. However, I did have the damned helmet the Marines had given me. We took some pictures on the boat with me at the helm of the boat. One of those pictures got into the State magazine. I was at the helm of the boat wearing the helmet and sun glasses. It did come in handy, however, when it rained later on our trip down river. It helped keep the rain out of my eyes as I stood in the open steering cockpit.

After Kwang released us we recommenced our journey down river. It was about two or three o'clock in the afternoon. The tide was running out fast which was useful in giving us additional speed. This was important in my calculations as I wanted to reach the mouth of the river during daylight. I was not so confident of our ability to navigate on the river in the dark. I had only an Army grid map that did give depths for the river. It's accuracy, however, was somewhat questionable. Channels often changed in rivers that were not dredged. I had marked what I thought to be the deepest channels as I overflew the river. This helped but was not infallible. Luckily the Vietnamese commander of the other boat knew the river well. I followed him, for the most part, through the seventy miles from Can-Tho to the sea.

About 30-45 minutes after our release by the Vietnamese navy we were cruising down the river when, out of the corner of my eye, I saw a flash. I turned my head instinctively in that direction. To my horror, I saw a long rocket with flame at the rear. I remember the smoke coming out of the back of the rocket, with the flame. Jesus Christ, I jammed the throttles to full speed. If I could have pushed them any further, I would have. I said to the Marines, "Hey, we've just been fired on by a rocket! Shoot at the source of the fire on the right bank!" One of the young Marines was behind a BAR on that side of the boat. There was an M-60 machine gun on the other side. He had never seen a BAR before. They were first developed in World War I. Certainly, this model was of WW II vintage. It was procured informally from a Vietnamese source to round out our armament. Nothing like it had been issued to American troops in 20 years.

Q: It was really World War I, I think. [Produced in the U.S. beginning in 1918.] It was an automatic, but very heavy, sort of like a machine gun.

MCNAMARA: An automatic rifle, but very, very heavy. Marvelous weapon, but it was too heavy to carry. But, anyway, he jammed the goddamned thing and couldn't get it to fire. So one of my CORDS guys, who had been in Quang-tri with the Air Force, but on the ground, picked it up, cleared it, and then fired a clip of ammo to show him how it worked. The young Marines had never been in combat. Another one had an M-60, and he aimed it horizontally and fired. The M-60 is like a mortar; you have to aim it upwards to get trajectory. The goddamned thing went out a little ways from the boat and exploded. Another of my old CORDS hands grabbed the grenade launcher, reloaded it and fired it properly.

Q: Basically, it's a grenade launcher, isn't it?

MCNAMARA: Yes, it goes up and down in a mortar-like trajectory.

Anyway, we put up a tremendous volume of fire. Some of the Vietnamese got hold of M-16's and supplemented fire by the Marines and my CORDS people. One or two rockets were fired and we put up such a volume of fire that they must have decided to leave us alone.

The rockets passed near our stern scaring the hell out of us but doing no damage. It's pretty hard to hit a moving boat in the middle of a wide river.

We were now approaching the narrowest part of the river. The channel flowed between islands. It was a well-known infiltration route used by the North Vietnamese, moving from one part of the Mekong delta to another. The VC held the banks on both sides of the river and often occupied the islands in mid-stream. The channel narrowed as it passed between the island. We would be dangerously close to shore. This was certainly the most perilous part of the trip down river.

Before we got to this narrow part, a U.S. Navy F-4 flew very high over us, and did a barrel roll. I optimistically thought, "The Navy now knows where we are. They will protect us. We even have air cover." I had asked for air coverage to suppress anybody who wanted to screw with us. There it was, our U.S. Navy's F-4 fighter plane up in the sky, doing a barrel roll.

Less encouraging, the CIA communicator that we had rescued after his abandonment had several radios. He used every frequency imaginable. No one would answer. Finally, we put out an international "May Day" distress signal. Still no reply. Just as we were coming to the narrow part of the river, heavy rains began to fall. Providentially, a deluge obscured us as we passed between the islands. At times, the banks seemed close enough to touch. The VC aren't stupid, however, they get in out of the rain. Navigation was a problem during the rains. I could see very little ahead of our boat. We would have had difficulty following the channel without the experienced Vietnamese captain in the lead boat. I might have run the boat onto a sandbar.

The rain covering our passage through this very dangerous patch was another piece of extraordinary good luck. Oddly, it stopped soon after we emerged into the wide river below the islands.

We continued down the river. There was no traffic on the river until we came upon a boat coming towards us from the opposite direction. It was the first boat we had encountered since leaving the navy. Normally, that river was full of traffic. That day there was none. I suppose, the river folk were also frightened of what was happening. As we approached the other boat, I maneuvered so that we would pass to port side. I had the M-60 machine gun on that side, with my trusty Hasty all set to fire. As we came abreast of the boat, you couldn't see anybody on board. Then a woman and a child came on the deck. They were quickly past us. It was an innocent small cargo boat by the looks of it. There wasn't anything to be alarmed about.

At about seven o'clock, we reached the mouth of the river. There was a peaceful looking little fishing village on the left-hand side as we came down the river. Many fishing boats were anchored off the village, but there was no sign of life in the village itself. It looked deserted, but obviously was not. The fishing boats were all in good condition, bobbing at anchor just off the village. Their owners were not far off. No doubt, they were too frightened to show themselves to our heavily armed flotilla.

We still were unable to raise any response on our radios, nor did we see the promised ship off the mouth of the river. I remember Christian advising that we stay in the mouth of the river overnight. "Let's not go out to sea." He and others were afraid of the sea. Like so many people who have no experience with the water, they were naturally apprehensive about going out to sea in those small, open boats. There was an island at the entrance to the river from the sea. They wanted me to tie up there and stay overnight. The next morning, they reasoned, we would have a better chance of finding the ship.

I vetoed this option. I did not want to stay in the mouth of the river. I was fearful that someone might come to interfere with us in the middle of the night. We knew that the VC controlled at least one bank and possibly both banks of the river. We had just had a run-in with the South Vietnamese navy. We did not need any more of that. The safest thing to do, I reckoned, was to go out to sea. Get about three or four miles offshore, and then we would be safe. The VC don't have a navy. Nobody was likely to bother us out there. The boats were seaworthy enough in a reasonably calm sea. Being a former sailor, I felt safer at sea than I did on land. But most of the people with me were land oriented. They were afraid of the sea. The unknown was what frightened them.

Since I was in charge, I decided to put to sea. No one questioned my decision, or my right to make it. We could discuss options, but, when a decision was taken, all loyally followed instructions. To maintain morale, I insisted that the U.S. Navy must be just over the horizon. They've probably got us on radar right now. They wouldn't abandon us. The American Navy has traditions to uphold. Honor would never allow them to abandon friends in peril on the sea. Moreover, the Task Force representatives had promised that a ship would be waiting for us. We only had to get far enough out to sea. The water's too shallow in here for them to bring a ship in, I reasoned. They will find us with their radar if we get away from the land.

I wasn't quite as confident as I made out. Nonetheless, I would not stay in the mouth of that river overnight. It would have been a stupid thing to do. The people who made the suggestion weren't stupid, but they also weren't seamen.

Symbolically, as the sun set, we left Vietnam. I could see the channel out to sea marked on my map. Depths were deepest on a line going in a southeasterly direction. Obviously this was the main channel. We just went in that direction. In any case, I had the captain of the other boat to follow, so I didn't have any problems.

I remember looking back as the sun set over the Mekong delta for the last time. God, it was beautiful. A beautiful big red-orange sunset over the flat, lush region. I had been entranced with the beauty of the delta ever since I first arrived some five years before. It was so beautiful, especially at sunset.

Anyway, I remember thinking, "This will be the last time that I'll see this."

Then I turned around to more important things, like which direction we should take once clear of the channel. To my sorrow, I discovered, at this late date, that there was no compass in my boat. Someone must have stolen it. We could not be sure of our directions. The night became increasingly dark with low cloud cover obscuring the stars.

There were many lights out at sea. I found they were attached to fishing nets laid there in the shallow water. At first, we were fooled by these lights thinking they might be boats from our expected navy ship. There was no one.

My only point of reference was the flashes from a tremendous battle going on onshore, near the little district town that I had visited several times in Vinh-binh province. The district chief was a guy I'd nicknamed "Snuffy Smith," after a comic hillbilly strip character. My Snuffy was a Vietnamese version of the "good ol' boy." He had an undecipherably strong rural accent. Despite his rank as a major in the army, he looked and dressed like the local fishermen and rice farmers. He was the chief of a district that had been surrounded and under siege for years. The rounds and sights of heavy combat that guided us away from Vietnam must have been his final battle.

After several hours of searching in vain, we had all but given up for the night.

First, I tried to tie the two boats together so that we would not be separated in the night. This did not work. The boats beat against one another in the swell. We risked putting a hole in one of the boats.

Then, I decided that we'd tie up the boats to the buoys holding the fishing nets. They must have anchors that kept the fishing nets in place. We could lay there over night. The next morning either the Navy would find us, or we would run northwards parallel to the coast to where I knew the evacuation fleet was anchored off Vung-tau. All you had to do was keep the coast to your left. It would be uncomfortable to spend a night on the open sea but we were safe enough. The next day we would certainly find the fleet, one way or another.

My only questions were: What was the range of the boats? How much fuel do we have? Could we make it that far?

I found out, later on, that the boats could have gone all the way to the Philippines with the amount of fuel we had.

But I didn't know that at the time. I was worried about that. And it was hard to communicate with the captain on this other boat. Finally, I put Mr. Christian, my admin. officer, on the other boat.

Q: Mr. Christian, from Mutiny on the Bounty.

MCNAMARA: He didn't mutiny, although he was one of those who really didn't want to go down the river. Later on, he admitted that it was the only thing to do. He admitted to me that he'd made a mistake and that I was right. The water evacuation was the best option we had. He was very bitter about the way the CIA people had deserted us and run away. Later, he made some strong accusations to the press.

As we were about to lay to for the night, we saw some especially bright lights in the distance. I didn't know for sure if it was a ship. But we decided to make for the lights. It turned out to be a ship, called The Pioneer Contender, an American freighter owned by the President Line. In fact, it was the freighter that the spooks had asked be sent down to lay off the coast to evacuate their people. There it was, anchored off the coast. It was well lit. The ship had a Marine contingent aboard as guards. As we came alongside, they were not happy about these strange boats coming out of the night. Initially, they were reluctant to let us come aboard. Finally, we convinced them that we were fellow Americans and not pirates or VC saboteurs.

It was a ship on which they'd had some awful experiences in the evacuation from Da Nang. Vietnamese soldiers had run amok raping, stealing and killing. There was mayhem on the ship.

The crew locked themselves up in their quarters and ran the ship. Vietnamese gangs took over the rest of the ship.

Understandably, the Marines were apprehensive. They didn't know who these madmen were, coming alongside in a boat in the middle of the night off a hostile coast. The unknown is always a little frightening, and they didn't expect us.

Christian finally got aboard. He explained who we were and where we had just come from. Still wary, the Marines agreed to take us aboard. Rope slings were lowered into our boats. Our passengers were loaded into the slings and hauled up onto the deck. The Vietnamese were put down into the hold, where there were other Vietnamese. Some of them, maybe all of them, had been evacuated by the CIA people from the delta.

By this time, I'd been at the helm of our boat for over thirteen hours without a break. I was exhausted; my legs were starting to turn to rubber. But until we got everybody on board, I wasn't going to leave the helm, because I felt responsible for the boat. We could not abandon it.

We unloaded the other boat first, and then I brought my boat alongside. They told me, from the ship, that the Navy wanted our Mike boats in Vung-tau to evacuate people over the beach. So I said, "Okay, we'll run the boats up there." Hasty and Cushing volunteered to stay with me to run our boat. The Vietnamese crew would remain with the other boat. I was exhausted. Hasty agreed to run the boat while I slept on an Army stretcher that had gotten onto the boat. We were going to follow the Pioneer Contender, leaving the next morning for Vung-tau.

Christian had gotten onto the ship where he ran into an American CIA man from Can-Tho. The Filipinos, who were with us, had worked for him. Christian made a deal with the Filipinos to run the boats for us up to Vung-tau. We would take them over again for the evacuation from Vung-tau. He paid them with cash he brought from the CG.

We got on the ship. The Marine captain in charge of the security detail was very officious and not very welcoming. It was difficult to explain to him who we were and what a Consul General was doing wondering about in the South China Sea. Still skeptical, he took me to the ship captain's stateroom. The captain was there with his chief engineer and chief officer. They knew what a Consul General was. Quickly, they sat me down and gave me a cold beer. Then they put me in a stateroom that the CIA man had occupied. I even got a shower. Sadly, I was the only one in my crew who got a bed that night. Well, the Vietnamese were okay, because they were down in the hold where it was dry and clean. They had facilities there; with food and water. My Americans had to sleep on deck. It was cold and wet; it had been raining, and they had to sleep outside.

Christian, at this point, had what looked like a heart attack. He was an overweight, fifty-five to sixty year old retired colonel. He had exerted himself tremendously during the past month. The pressure had been intense on all of us. But Christian had probably more than his share. We put him in a bunk. The Marine medic gave him some medicine and calmed him and tried to take care of him as best he could.

I went in to see him, and he said, "Terry, you were right. This was the only way of getting out. We never would have gotten out otherwise." He admitted that going down the river was the right thing to have done under the circumstances. It was nice to have somebody who had been completely against it admit that. I had never been very close to him. I was close to most of the other people, but we had never been very close, he and I. But that bonded us, that experience.

Anyway, we were on the ship, we were safe. But they hadn't been waiting for us, didn't expect us. There was no Navy ship anywhere near the mouth of the Mekong. The Navy had simply forgotten. Later on, I asked a Navy captain in the evacuation fleet, "Didn't you hear us on the radio?"

"Oh, yeah, sure," he replied.

"Then, why didn't you answer?" I asked.

"Oh, communications security. Our communications were blacked out because of communication security," he told me as a matter of fact.

I thought for a moment of "Catch-22," or was it Alice in Wonderland? Unbelievable, but true.

After visiting our Vietnamese passengers and my American crew, I went to bed.

The next morning, I woke to the gentle movement of the ship as it bobbed along. They'd actually gotten underway while I was sleeping, and we were on our way to Vung-tau. I got up, went down, talked to my guys, and saw that they were all okay. I'd looked in on them the night before and made sure they were okay. The next morning, I got them to come up to my cabin for showers.

Then I went up to the pilot house and asked the captain if I could use his radio, to try to get us off that ship and onto one of the ships in the evacuation fleet. There wasn't any room for us on the Pioneer Contender. I couldn't let my guys sleep out in the open. I got some pretty nasty remarks from Navy people over the radio; telling me to shut up. Not a very pleasant welcome from uninformed bureaucrats.

However, some USAID logistics guys heard me. And they had taken a tugboat from Newport...

Q: Just out of Saigon.

MCNAMARA: Just out of Saigon. A Japanese tugboat with an Australian captain that was on charter to USAID. The logistics chief from Newport said, "We're coming to get you." These were some of our comrades; these were guys who knew who we were and were sympathetic. So they said, "We've got an LST anchored" (someplace or other). "We'll come and get you in the tugboat, then we'll take you to our LST."

The coordination was made. We were picked up by the tugboat, which had pulled barges filled with Vietnamese out of Saigon. It also looked as though they'd looted the commissary and PX in Newport. "Liberated" is probably the better word.

Q: Requisitioned.

MCNAMARA: Requisitioned, whatever, because they had all the goddamned supplies you could ever want on there, cases of everything lying all over the decks of the tugboat. The Australian captain said he was going to take the boat back to Australia. What he was going to do with it when he got to Australia wasn't clear to me. Whether the owner was ever going to see it or not, I don't know. But, anyway, that wasn't my concern.

They took us down to a rusty old Korean LST, which was leased by USAID logistics, and we got aboard. Again, there was no place indoors to sleep. All of us, me included, were sleeping out in the open now. We spent two nights sleeping out on the deck on this Korean LST. There wasn't enough food for everybody. The Koreans did their best. It was, again, an LST under charter to USAID, and a lot of these USAID guys were on it, with their Vietnamese girlfriends. They, of course, had taken all the staterooms. By the time we got aboard, there was nothing left but the deck. Anyway, we slept on the deck, and I bombarded the Navy to get us the hell off there.

After two days, helicopters took us off the LST to the evacuation command ship.

I had gotten rid of all the shoulder-held weapons; I left them on the Mike boats. But we still had pistols and knives and things like that. We looked like cutthroats. So, as we got on the command ship, they took our pistols away and gave us chits for them. Of course, we never got them back. Navy men love souvenirs.

The ship was crowded with refugees, but it was a huge ship, with troop compartments on it. They normally would carry large numbers of Marines. The decks were made for helicopter lands and takeoffs. It was an assault command ship.

We were taken down to the wardroom for processing when we got aboard the Blue Ridge. Tables were set up for processing. We were debriefed. The Marine colonel, to whom I'd talked in Saigon about evacuation and who was there when the Navy guys had promised me a ship would be waiting at the river mouth said, "You mean, they didn't send a ship for you?"

And I replied, "Hell no."

Anyway, he said he was very proud of us. He took my Marines in tow immediately and had them sent off to be bedded down with the ship's Marines. He went over and talked to some of the officers on the ship, and we were treated royally. I was given the chaplain's stateroom. All my Americans were berthed in officer's staterooms. We were treated like heroes. In contrast, people coming from Saigon, even Jacobson, who had been a senior officer at the embassy, were living in the troop compartments, sleeping in ten-high bunks. You know what they look like.

Q: Oh, I crossed the Atlantic in one of those. Pretty awful.

MCNAMARA: That's what they did with these very senior people from Saigon.

Q: Blue Ridge was the name of the ship.

MCNAMARA: Blue Ridge that was it, exactly. So, anyway, we were treated royally, as heroes. We'd come out, flying our flags.

Q: Had you flown a flag, by the way?

MCNAMARA: I did, indeed. I had American flags up. As we got to the mouth of the river, I put the consulate flag on a boathook, as a flagpole, and we flew that from the bow. Oh, yes, we went out, flags flying.

We were really the only people who weren't traumatized in the whole thing, as far as I could see. Others looked beaten and depressed. My gang were upbeat. We had done what we had planned to do. We'd gotten ourselves and our people out. Nobody helped us. I was very proud of the guys that I was with, and they were all proud of having been part of what we'd done.

On a Navy ship, they have a police force. The head is called a chief master-at-arms. He's the big gun, a senior petty officer. I'd been in the Navy, as an enlisted man, and I knew the structure. I knew that if I really wanted to get anything on that ship, the way to do it was not to talk to the officers, but to talk to the chiefs and the senior petty officers. That's the way the Navy works.

Anyway, the word got around that we were the guys from Can-Tho who'd toughed it out and gotten ourselves out, in a sort of Terry-and-the-Pirates mode.

Somebody told the master-at-arms that I was a general. I was a consul general at the time, but they forgot the consul.

Q: One can end up as consul general at about a major-general or a rear-admiral rank, if you're playing around with those things.

MCNAMARA: Well, sure. In any case, the billet called for an FSO-1, which is certainly major-general rank. I wasn't an FSO-1, but that's what the job called for.

Anyway, they started calling me "General." And the chief master-at-arms came over and said, "Sir, please, sit down. We'll serve you."

The other evacuees were waiting in long lines. I had my group with me, so I said, "Well, my staff..."

"Sir, this table is yours."

He got a big sign: RESERVED. So we had our own table. My Marines started telling sea stories to the other Marines and then to the sailors. We were celebrities.

I had the chaplain's stateroom, and my other guys had other staterooms. The Marines, of course, were billeted with the other Marines. But we all stayed together, absolutely together, a tight-knit group.

I said, "We've got to have an office." I asked the chief master-at-arms, "Who can get me an office?"

And he said, Chief somebody or other; I don't remember the chief's name. "The chief runs everything on this ship. You've got to talk to him. I will make an appointment."

I said, "Right."

And he said, "He'll come here."

I said, "No, no, no, I'll go to him. Where's his stateroom?"

He sent one of his sailors to guide me to a press center organized for journalists.

They called the chief from the center to announce my arrival. He told them to "send the general down."

The general went to talk to the chief. And the chief was a sergeant Bilko type, a wheeler-dealer.

Q: Sergeant Bilko was a TV character who was a wheeler-dealer.

MCNAMARA: A wheeler-dealer in the military sense. This guy was just that sort of person. He'd been up night and day, organizing things and running around frenetically, but obviously knew what he was doing and controlled everything. A little bit like the Mafia, you know, and he was the godfather.

Anyway, I told him, "Chief, I'm the consul general from Can-Tho. My people and I need an office where we can set up our Can-Tho-at-sea office."

The chief said, "Right, general. I have just the place for you. The chaplain is not on the ship now; he's on leave. You get the chaplain's office."

So I took over the chaplain's office. We put up appropriate signs: "Consulate General, Can-Tho," et cetera. And we set up a duty roster for the Marines. I had the place manned night and day, twenty-four hours a day, telephone watches were always in touch with me by phone. The master-at-arms in the mess hall had coffee cake and cookies sent down on a regular basis. He got the mess cooks to serve us. We had virtually anything we wanted on the ship, without moving out of our office. So we were all set up on the ship. We had absolutely no problems, and we were well looked after.

We were next to the press center. Journalists were in and out. They couldn't quite figure out who the hell we were, but, anyway, there we were. Some of them talked to my guys, and some of my guys (Christian, for instance) told them some awful things about the CIA.

Graham Martin, the ambassador, found out I was aboard. He sent word that he wanted to see me. I too wanted to call on him to wish him well. He was sick with pneumonia. He had the admiral's stateroom, way up in the superstructure. When I arrived, he congratulated me on having gotten out and gotten my people out. He had his public affairs advisor, a man named John Hogan, with him. I had known John from East Africa when he was the PAO (public affairs officer) in Nairobi. Martin told John to set up a press conference for me, to tell my story, because he wanted some positive stories to get out about what had happened, and thought that mine was one of the better ones. Graham Martin told me not to say anything about the CIA, that he would take care of them.

Q: You had told him...

MCNAMARA: Yes, I had told him the whole story of what had happened. And he said, "Don't say anything about it. Don't you get involved in it. I'll take care of them. And tell your guys not to say anything."

So (perhaps I shouldn't have, but I did) I said, okay. I went down and dutifully told my guys. But I couldn't control them all. I told him that. I said, "I can't control all these people. There's no way of stopping them from talking to the press if they want to. But I'll talk to them and ask them not to, and pass on your assurance that you will take care of this."

I felt strongly that a lawful order had been disobeyed by the CIA contingent in Can-Tho. But more seriously, they had compromised the safety of other Americans and the safety of a lot of Vietnamese, not just in Can-Tho, but in Saigon, too, by taking those helicopters.

I also brought up the question of the division of authority and responsibility, or the lack of authority and responsibility. It was the source of many of our problems. Obviously, that wasn't something that you could charge the CIA rank and file with. It wasn't of their making. It was something that Graham Martin himself should have dealt with earlier on. He should have brought the CIA under control. He didn't. It was his own fault, as much as anybody else's. If he couldn't do it, he should have gone to the president. And if that didn't work, he should have resigned. Perhaps, his responsibility was even more profound. He may have encouraged the divisions that caused him so many problems.

Q: This was the way he operated. He was renowned for never letting one side know what the other side was doing.

MCNAMARA: He wanted to have a division of responsibility. He wanted to get reporting from them and from the consulate general, independently. I can understand that to a degree, in terms of reporting. In terms of intelligence, I can understand it. But in terms of operations, it was disastrous. It was disastrous in Saigon, and it was almost disastrous in Can-Tho. It wasn't quite, because we were very lucky and better organized.

Q: Did you have the press conference?

MCNAMARA: I had a press conference and told our story. Some newspapermen wrote it up. Our story got into Time. Time International, anyway. It was published somehow or other in an English-language newspaper in Saudi Arabia. I got a copy of the article from a neighbor of my ex-wife's family, who was in Saudi Arabia. He got the thing, tore it out, and sent it to her to send to me. A little roundabout, but, anyway. I don't know what other coverage it got, but I saw the article in either Time or Newsweek. Oh, and there was something in The Economist. Our adventure was given minor notice. And that's what it was, it was a sideshow. The major story was the evacuation from Saigon. Obviously, Can-Tho was just an interesting aside.

Q: Shall we stop here, do you think?

MCNAMARA: Yes.

Q: When we pick this up the next time, we'll talk about what happened thereafter, and continue your career.

Today is September 17, 1993. Terry, we left you last time on the Blue Ridge. How did you get back and what was your reception?

MCNAMARA: The Blue Ridge landed in the Philippines, at Subic Bay Naval Base. They put us through customs there, and they tried to take my treasured kukri from me.

Q: That was your Gurkha knife.

MCNAMARA: My Gurkha knife, which was given to me in Katanga. And I argued. I said, "I'm going to stay here forever if you don't let me keep that knife, because it means a lot to me." They finally worked themselves up to a Navy captain, who realized that it was a waste of time to argue, so he said, "Go ahead, keep the knife."

So we got on a C-47, on our way to the embassy in Manila. The C-47 was almost flipped over by a crosswind as we were landing in Manila. That would have been ironic after our departure from Vietnam.

Q: That was an old plane.

MCNAMARA: We landed in Manila and went to the embassy. There was great confusion, lots of people from Vietnam. Martin and Wolfgang Lehmann were there with many others from embassy Saigon. A friend of mine, Frazier Meade, was the political counselor in Manila. He gave us the use of an officer in his section of the embassy. While there, we began writing efficiency reports and citations. I decided that everyone who came down the river should be given a medal for courage.

The strong cohesion of my people from Can-Tho was maintained in Manila. While there we decided that we wanted to go to Guam, as a group, to find and help the Vietnamese who had come out with us, and others from Can-Tho who may have gotten themselves to Guam. Many of my guys were Vietnamese speakers. In any case, even the ones who didn't, certainly understood a great deal about Vietnam, far more than most people in Guam.

Wolfgang Lehmann said, "Absolutely not. You've got to go back to the United States, and you've got to go back quickly."

I appealed his refusal to Martin, who said, "Of course, you can go."

A cable was sent to Guam offering our services. They wouldn't take us as a group but were willing to take most of us as individual volunteers. I stayed in Guam for several weeks where I found a number of former employees from Can-Tho. Others were there for several months.

The former Consul General from III Corps was there as a State Department representative. He wanted to leave and asked me to take his place. Initially, I was receptive until I met the Admiral in charge of the military's operation. He made it very clear that there would be no real role for a senior civilian on Guam. The military were in charge and saw no reason to share any of their authority or responsibility. I understood his point of view, and concluded that I would only be frustrated if I remained on Guam.

Q: Just a quick thing on Guam. The evacuation was so fast, and so many people were pouring in, how did you find the sorting out? I heard a story from Clayton McManaway, saying that a couple of guys didn't even know where they were. They were just a couple of fishermen and were picked up by the thing. It must have been sort of a mess. How was the sorting out going on?

MCNAMARA: Clayton McManaway wasn't there.

Q: No, I know, but he heard these stories.

MCNAMARA: Well, it was a mess, but it was amazing how well the armed services had things organized in Guam, which was the first real point of arrival on U.S. territory for most Vietnamese evacuees. Several large camps had been set up. They had social services organized. Water, food and all of the necessities were in place. By the time I got there immigration people were starting to work. There was confusion, but it was far better organized than anyone could have expected. The military did a superb job.

One problem we were able to work on was to reuniting of families. Many had been separated and were desperate to find family and friends. The language problems often prevented most Vietnamese from communicating with their American hosts.

My group from Can-Tho found a nucleus of Vietnamese-speaking Americans who served as ombudsmen with the American authorities. Records were made of every person who arrived on the island. Many people were able to locate missing friends and family members with the help of our informal interventions. We set up an information booth in the middle of the camp, with big signs in Vietnamese: "Information. Come here and we'll try to sort out your problems." I had a lot of young and no-so-young people, and they went out and tried to find people and sort out personal problems for disturbed, confused Vietnamese.

No, I don't think that it was as confusing as I would have expected it to be.

The whole evacuation, in fact, was less confusing than anyone could ever have expected. When has anyone ever tried to evacuate that many people by air from a city under siege? It's never been done before. It was a major accomplishment in terms of the logistics of the evacuation itself.

Q: Well, then you came back. This would be when?

MCNAMARA: This was May.

Q: You came back to Washington in May.

MCNAMARA: Well, I went by way of the camp in California.

Q: Pendleton?

MCNAMARA: Yes. I stayed at Camp Pendleton for about a week, looking, again, for people from Can-Tho, to see who might have gotten out and to see if I could help any of them.

After spending about a week there, I then made my way onwards to Washington, where my reception at the State Department was one of indifference.

At Pendleton, for instance, the reception was very warm. Nick Thorne was in charge there, and he took me out with all of the people I knew who were working there, and we had a big reunion.

In Washington, it was far cooler. A lot of people were very ambivalent about the whole thing. Some of them seemed to feel that the victims were somehow or other responsible. Perhaps that often happens. I have heard similar comments from people evacuated from other countries in less controversial circumstances.

Q: This is one of the reasons why I'm getting you and others to talk about this. I was just talking to one of our people, and I'd said I'd gathered together a whole bit of information, accounts about Vietnam. And he said, "Well, a person's not certain, but I really just don't want to read it."

MCNAMARA: That's twenty years ago.

Q: Yes, this is the problem. You're not going to learn; you're not going to absorb experience.

MCNAMARA: It was obviously a terrible emotional crisis for many Americans. There are people who really can't be objective about Vietnam. They can't talk about it, they can't think about it objectively, even now, some fifteen or twenty years later.

Q: You belonged to East Asian Affairs when you came back, is that right?

MCNAMARA: Yes, I did. They still had a Vietnam task force, so I went and sat around there for a while and finished writing my efficiency reports. Some of the people who came out of Can-Tho were still in Guam taking care of people. Others were back in the United States by this time.

Those in Washington stayed together pretty much.

The whole exercise was very controversial. Suddenly, the State Department also was in great disarray. They were suddenly stuck with large numbers of personnel coming back from Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. What were they to do with the sudden influx? The system was overwhelmed.

Q: One further question. When you came back (I hate to ask this question, because I pretty well know the answer), did anyone try to say, "Okay, Terry, here you were, you were running this operation down in southern Vietnam. What were the strong points? What were the weak points?" In other words, basically a solid debriefing?

MCNAMARA: Oh, no. Nobody asked any of those kinds of questions. No.

Q: I'm doing it now.

MCNAMARA: No, there were no questions asked at all. They would have been very happy if I'd just gone away.

Q: Did you find people avoiding you in the corridors of the State Department?

MCNAMARA: Not so much me, but I'm sure that they avoided people, like Graham Martin. He was a pariah.

I wasn't given the warmest of welcomes, I suppose, but there were a lot of people who appreciated what I'd done in taking people out down the river. That was a sort of romantic, dramatic thing, and so I had lots of people shaking my hand and congratulating me on the fact that I'd gotten out. And that was nice.

But, as an institution, there was no effort to debrief me or to find out what happened or what we might have done differently. They didn't want to know about it. And then, of course, they were overwhelmed with all these people coming back. Plus there were the problems of the mass of refugees. At another level, which I'm not really qualified to talk about because I wasn't involved in it, people were scurrying for political cover, at the Henry Kissinger level and the presidential level. That was where Graham Martin, of course, was dealing. I saw Martin in Washington. He was still sick but defiant when he talked to me. He refused to go away quietly until he had been vindicated. I think he was trying to force the administration to nominate him for another job, even though he knew he could not get Senate confirmation. For the administration, of course, he was an embarrassment that they had hoped to use as a scape goat.

I stayed around Washington for a while, trying to sort myself and things out. But then I came to the conclusion that I was wasting my time. So I went home to see my mother.

I had sent people from Vietnam to my family, to sponsor: some to my brother in Ohio, some to my mother, and some to an aunt in Florida. This was before they set up the official sponsoring system. I did this on my own. When these people arrived, I had to sort out their problems. My relatives were a little shocked when suddenly a family of Vietnamese arrived to stay with them. I went to see my mother in Troy, New York. I'd stopped at my brother's house on the way. He was okay. He was willing to take in people, but those destined to stay with him found other alternatives more attractive.

My present wife, three of her sisters and a brother came to my mother's house and stayed for about two weeks. They then went off to France to join older sisters and a brother who were long settled in Paris and Grenoble.

My maid's family was supposed to go to my aunt's in Florida. She was going to employ the maid and take care of her children. But when I was at Camp Pendleton, my maid's sister from Canada called her and told her that unless I could guarantee that I would take care of her for the rest of her life, she should come to Canada. When asked for such a guarantee, I encouraged her to go to Canada. Clearly, I could give no one such a guarantee. So she went to Canada. But, later on, she had a falling out with her sister. I then got her out of Canada, and she came back down here. She worked for Fred Brown until he got married. His new bride didn't want a live-in maid with several children around the house. Fred found the lady a job at a restaurant and financed a house for her. She's still here in Washington. Indeed, I just went to her son's wedding. Her family is all fine. Fred has continued to help them, as needed.

Anyway, I went home and tried to sort out such problems. Once they were solved, I went on a camping trip. I had an old Jeep that I had gotten in Dahomey from the Peace Corps. I was going to go across the Sahara in it. The trip was canceled when I suddenly got orders to go to Vietnam. The Jeep got sent back to my mother's house. I drove around the Adirondacks and the Green Mountains in my Jeep, with a Vietnamese girlfriend.

After some 2-3 weeks, I drove to Washington, stopping in Newport, Rhode Island. I had sent two orphans to a friend there who wanted to adopt children. I got them out at the last minute in one of the infant-evacuation flights. When they left me, I made the boy, who was a little older than the girl, promise that he would stay with the girl, never leave her side, and take care of her. I pinned notes, identifying them, to their clothing. All this was lost. Nonetheless, the boy never left the girl. When their flight left Saigon, I warned my Newport friend that they were on the way. She and her husband found out somehow or other that some of them had arrived in Philadelphia. They went to Philadelphia to search. There was great confusion. No one could give them any information. Finally, they appealed to Senator Pell from Rhode Island. His intervention led to their finding the kids whom they took home. I wanted to see the outcome of my efforts at running a private adoption scheme. When I got to Newport, I found all well with my orphans learning to swim in my friend's back yard pool. Evidently, all was well.

I continued on my way to Washington.

Q: This was what, July, August?

MCNAMARA: This was probably sometime in July. Shortly after arriving I went to see a friend, John Loughran, who was the country director for West Africa. It was he who had intervened with Graham Martin on my behalf and my assignment to Can-Tho was the result. John gave me some disturbing news. He said that Dean Brown, then in charge of a special Vietnamese refugee task force, told him that I was in bad odor in the Department. He suggested I call Brown to give him my version of what had happened in Vietnam. Brown told me that he'd heard that I had evacuated people against orders, and that I had been hiding in the Pacific, not wanting to come back to Washington because I was afraid to "face the music." "The best thing you can do now is to help resettle the refugees." I told him that none of the above was true. I had permission to evacuate Vietnamese. I had not been hiding and had nothing to fear as regards my conduct during the evacuation. I explained that I was neither traumatized, nor guilt-ridden by my experience. Brown seemed neither convinced, nor pleased by what I had told him. I strongly suspect that the source of his misinformation was the CIA where he has long enjoyed close relationships.

For a short time, I wandered the halls of the State Department. Then I did go to work for the task force, resettling people. (Brown was gone from the task force by this time.) Ultimately, I became the associate director for operations. I helped close some of the camps, especially the one at Pendleton. I went out to Pendleton and helped Nick Thorne close the camp. I was given orders to get it closed, so we went out and got it closed.

Some of the young Vietnamese students decided that they weren't going to leave the camp unless they got absolute guarantees of full four-year scholarships. These were some of the boys who had dodged the draft by hanging around the university in Saigon for many years. We had scholarships for them in community colleges and some less well known four year institutions. They expected Harvard and Yale. This wasn't possible. Finally, I had to tell them that, "We're closing the camp. Either you go to the colleges we found for you, or you go out on the streets. One or the other." I had a company of Marines standing by. "Those are the trucks that will take you to the airport. You will then board aircraft for the destination where your schools are located. Those who refuse to board the truck for the airport will be taken in another truck to the camp's main gate where they will be dropped off to fend for themselves. You cannot stay here. This camp is closed. The Marines will assist you to board the truck for the airport. They will assure that those who did not wish to go to the airport will board the truck for the main gate. The choice is yours." All opted for the airport and college. Sadly, we had to get tough with these last few recalcitrants. Most of them were the spoiled offspring of the Vietnamese elite. Life had been too easy for them in Saigon. Finally, they had to be made to face reality.

Q: Of course, you did.

MCNAMARA: We couldn't keep them at Camp Pendleton, and we couldn't get them scholarships to Harvard.

Q: We didn't want to develop a Palestine-refugee-type situation in the States.

MCNAMARA: The American people had been incredibly generous. Most refugees appreciated what had been done for them. It was only a small minority that caused problems. They were used so enjoying privileges in their own society. Before leaving Washington I'd gone to see Phil Habib, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs. We had been friends for several years. He called the Deputy Director General on my behalf. Phil told me that he had no good jobs available to give me. But he then called the Deputy Director General asking him to give me special consideration. With Phil's urging the Deputy Director General set a time for me to see him. Later that day, he assured me that he would find me an appropriate assignment. "Just have patience," he asked. I heard later that he made inquiries as to my suitability for a DCM-ship. My first option for my next assignment was an ambassadorship. Martin had recommended that I get an embassy. But his recommendations were not worth much at this point. I concluded that my chances of getting my own embassy were not bright. I then scaled down my ambitions to a principal officership in a Consulate General with substantive responsibilities. Bob Miller, who was then Deputy Assistant Secretary in the East Asian Bureau told me that I had been mentioned as a candidate to go to Laos as the chargé d'affaires. Someone else opposed my nomination because I have five children and had just come out of Vietnam. Instead, Tom Corcoran was sent to Laos. He had been vegetating in Quebec which he hated. He'd spent his whole life in Indochina. That's where he really wanted to be. He was rescued from Quebec and sent to Laos. I was then sent to replace him as Consul General in Quebec.

ELLSWORTH BUNKER
Ambassador
Vietnam (1967-1973)

Ellsworth Bunker was named ambassador to Vietnam in 1967. He was interviewed by Michael L. Gillette in 1980.

Q: Let's start with your appointment, Ambassador Bunker. Do you recall the circumstances under which you were chosen ambassador to Vietnam?

BUNKER: Yes, I remember how it occurred. I had been asked by Secretary Dean Rusk to go to Buenos Aires to head our mission to the OAS [Organization of American States] meeting. He had to leave, asked me to come there and take his place. I was then in Nepal. On the way back from Buenos Aires to Washington, I had a message from him which I received in Sao Paulo saying he would like to see me on my return. I got back on a Saturday, went to see him, and they said, "The President is in Texas, but he would like to see you Tuesday morning on his return. But I forewarn you, he wants you to go to Vietnam."

So I went to see the President on Tuesday morning, and he said he wanted me to go to Vietnam. Well, I at first said, "Well, you know, Mr. President, you've just appointed me ambassador-at-large and I was married last month in Kathmandu. I really have to consult Carol [Laise]." He said, "That's right, you do. I'll give you a plane. You go out to Kathmandu and consult Carol, and then meet me in Guam." He said, "I want you to go because it's the most important issue facing us today in our foreign affairs. I think it's very important that you should go out there and take over." So I did go out. I cabled my wife that I would be there probably for only a few days. And as I got off the plane she said, "Well, I know the answer."

But the President said to me, "I'm going to give you a plane. I want you to go see Carol every month." I did get the plane, of course. I didn't get up every month either. But when I couldn't go I would send the plane up to Kathmandu and she would come to Saigon. It became a very popular flight because there were extra seats--I think some thirty extra seats in the plane--and we had a long line waiting for R-and-R in Kathmandu. So it was always full, whether I sent it up for her or whether I went up myself. It was a feature that added greatly to my satisfaction and situation.

Q: I recall reading that Congressman H. R. Gross, who opposed so many expenditures, opposed the use of that plane.

BUNKER: Yes, he did I think, but he didn't get much support, fortunately from my point of view.

Q: Did President Johnson elaborate the reasons that he was naming you or wanted you to go in particular? Did he enumerate the particular talents that he hoped you would bring to the job?

BUNKER: Well, he did remark on my role in the Dominican Crisis and did say that he admired the way I had handled the Dominican situation, and that we were facing even tougher problems in Vietnam and he wanted me to go out there and see what I could do with the situation.

Q: Was there any aspect of your job that he emphasized at that point?

BUNKER: My recollection is, and I have written to Walt Rostow also to see whether my recollection is correct, because I saw the President alone. There was no note taker there. I have no record; I made no record of our talks either when I came away from it. My recollection is that the President emphasized the fact that he wanted to see the training of the Vietnamese accelerated and speeded up to enable us to more quickly turn the war over to them, which was our main objective, of course, to enable the Vietnamese to defend themselves. As a matter of fact, a month after I arrived General Creighton Abrams came out in May, 1967 as deputy to [General William] Westmoreland. About his chief function then when he first came was to speed up the training of the Vietnamese armed forces. He did a splendid job, of course, and succeeded Westmoreland and was outstanding as commander there. So that--and I've asked Walt to check his recollections--certainly was my objective when I went there, and I think that was the beginning of what later was known as Vietnamization.

Q: Was there intended any departure from the procedures under Ambassador [Henry Cabot] Lodge?

BUNKER: Well, I don't know, because I really don't know what the procedures were.

Q: But did the President say, "I want you to do this differently than Lodge?"

BUNKER: No, no. I don't recollect that he did that. But he did want me to arrive as soon as Lodge left, which was quite unusual for a new ambassador to arrive the day his predecessor left. Lodge left in the morning and I arrived in the afternoon. Usually there's a gap of some weeks or even months. But the President was very anxious apparently to see the post covered, so that I arranged to get there just as Lodge almost stepped on the plane to take off.

Q: Did you have any doubts in your own mind about accepting this post, aside from the one that you've already mentioned, consulting your wife?

BUNKER: Well, I realized it was going to be a difficult post, but my feeling was that since the President had placed a great emphasis and importance on it, that it was something that one had to undertake.

Q: Now given the broad authority of General Westmoreland, was there any notion that possibly you might be in a secondary role?

BUNKER: No.

Q: Was that spelled out in advance?

BUNKER: Well, it was understood that the ambassador was in charge. I simply acted on that premise. I never had any problem with Westmoreland or Abrams or anyone else. Westmoreland and Abrams never took any major step without consulting me first. I simply assumed that was the way it was going to be and proceeded on that basis. And I must say I had splendid cooperation from both of them.

Q: Let me ask you about the Guam Conference. Do you recall specifics of the President's activities there at Guam?

BUNKER: Well, first you had a general review of the situation. Lodge summarized the situation as he saw it from the political aspect; Westmoreland the military aspect. [Nguyen Van] Thieu and [Nguyen Cao] Ky were both there: both spoke, Ky at greater length than Thieu because Ky was acting as prime minister. Thieu was head of the council then and Ky was the more active and more articulate in some ways. But they both gave a report from their own view of it, aspect of it.

The atmosphere I would say was generally rather upbeat. There were reports of progress both from our people, from Lodge, Westmoreland and also from the Vietnamese, so that my reaction to the Guam Conference was that the feeling in Vietnam was fairly optimistic as to the progress that had already been achieved.

Q: Was this your first meeting with Thieu and Ky?

BUNKER: Yes, the first time I had seen them.

Q: What were your first impressions of them, do you recall?

BUNKER: Thieu was quite reserved, I felt, rather enigmatic, rather more difficult perhaps to get at, to get to. Ky was more articulate, rather flamboyant, and much more voluble. But Thieu had a certain solidity about him which I think Ky lacked. Ky gave the impression of being, I say, more flamboyant, more articulate, but not as profound as Thieu, as deep.

Q: Did the President seem to have a greater rapport with one as opposed to the other?

BUNKER: I don't think so. I don't recollect that he did.

Q: I understand from the messages that there was some problem or some pledge that Thieu and Ky gave to President Johnson that you would later remind them of again and again. Do you recall the circumstances of that?

BUNKER: I don't specifically recall that. Well, one thing that I did--and this may be it--was to impress on them fairly continuously the importance of their working together and in harmony, not only at the time of the council but after the elections, also in 1967 where Ky became vice president and took a secondary role. You see, there was considerable rivalry between Thieu and Ky for the top spot. There was even a threat that this might divide the military, and I remember calling in the military and making it very clear to them that we couldn't go along with any division in military ranks at the time of war, that they would have to come to some decision themselves. I wasn't going to tell them what it ought to be, but nevertheless they'd have to come to a decision.

Q: On one candidate or the other?

BUNKER: On one candidate.

Q: Was it a decision that was reached at the level of Ky and Thieu or was it something that their principal military backers decided on, do you recall?

BUNKER: Well, it came about through a meeting of the military council at which both Thieu and Ky were present, is my recollection. Ky finally agreed that he would accept the vice presidential spot.

Q: I want to ask a lot of questions on that, but before we get there I want to ask one more on the Guam Conference, and that is, what was the primary purpose of that conference, do you recall?

BUNKER: Well, I think the primary purpose was to review the situation as it stood, to get some feeling for what was possible, not only from the military point of view, but the political point of view. the development of democratic institutions and how rapidly that might progress. The question came up about the elections which took place in September--

Q: Third, I think.

BUNKER: 1967, and the preparations for that, for the drafting of a constitution. and the more or less tentative timetable worked out for that. Then one other decision that came out of the Guam Conference was to put the pacification program under Westmoreland. And Bob Komer was appointed to head up the pacification program under Westmoreland.

Q: Was this a decision that President Johnson made? Do you recall the process here?

BUNKER: No, I don't think so. I don't think he made it himself, but he agreed to it. I think it was suggested because the pacification program required a preponderance of military personnel out in the provinces. Numerically I think the military outnumbered the civilians about three to one, about that. Therefore, it seemed logical to put it under Westmoreland with a civilian head.

Q: [William] Porter I suppose had resisted previous attempts to do this, and his argument had been that the soldiers would not give a top priority to community development projects. Do you recall the rebuttal to this point?

BUNKER: No, I don't recall that. As a matter of fact, at Guam I had not been aware of Porter's opposition to it.

Q: Was there a belief at Guam that pacification was not working properly? That it needed to be overhauled?

BUNKER: Well, I think there was a feeling that it needed to be invigorated and speeded up, and that more emphasis should be put on it. That it was an essential part of our whole program.

Q: My notes indicate that the conference in Guam ended on March 22 and you arrived in Saigon on April 25, so I've got a month here that I can't account for. Do you recall the circumstances of the intervening month?

BUNKER: Well, you say the Guam Conference ended when?

Q: March 22.

BUNKER: Yes. And I arrived... right.

Q: Did you go back to Kathmandu?

BUNKER: I went back to Kathmandu, but I'm trying to think whether I went first to Washington and then Kathmandu. But I did have some time in Kathmandu, to give Lodge time to arrange for his departure and say his farewells and so forth. So that I waited there in Kathmandu and when I got word about Lodge's departure time, then I arranged my arrival time.

Q: Did you have an opportunity at some point, either at Guam or in the intervening month, to get Lodge's impressions of the situation there in Saigon?

BUNKER: No. I never saw Lodge from the time I left Guam, and of course didn't see him when he departed. So the last talk I had with him was in Guam itself, and there of course we had a chance to talk. Lodge, I'm not certain, but I have the impression that he rather felt that Ky was the more dynamic of the two. I remember his saying that Ky was a learner, could grasp things. But as the situation turned out, I think that Thieu was the abler in most ways.

Q: Let me ask you your first impressions of the mission in Saigon? I suppose the new Chancellery was under construction by this time.

BUNKER: It was under construction. I opened it.

Q: It opened the following month I gather. No, it would be in the fall I guess.

BUNKER: I arrived in the spring. I think it was in the fall, yes. Yes. we were in the old building when I first went there.

Q: The embassy personnel?

BUNKER: Embassy personnel, yes. I think was very good. First-rate. In fact in recalling my talk with the President when he asked me to go out there. He said, 'You can have anybody you want. If there's anybody there that you don't want, he'll be on his way home in twenty-four hours.' I think in the whole six years I was there I only asked for one change.

Q: Do you recall that one?

BUNKER: I've forgotten who it was now. I think it was our economic counselor at the time that I thought wasn't quite up to the job. But by and large we had a first-rate embassy. This was especially true of the younger people in the Foreign Service who were out there and out in the provinces, out on their own, of course in very hazardous posts, and did a magnificent job.

Q: You mentioned Bob Komer coming out to work on pacification. Was this part of your decision or was he already scheduled to go out there?

BUNKER: No. He was scheduled to go out, yes. And Bob was a very able fellow, but not always easy to control, I remember shortly after he got out there he sent through the back channel a message recommending that the head of our AID program be changed, without saying anything to me about it. I found out about it.

Q: How did you become aware of this, do you recall?

BUNKER: Well, what I did was, I had all the back channel messages come to me. Bob found out this, discovered this, and said, "I understand that all the back channel messages are routed through you." I said. "That's correct, Bob." I never had any more trouble with him.

Q: Barry Zorthian and Edward Lansdale apparently were scheduled to leave Vietnam, but it was decided that they would stay after your arrival. Do you recall that?

BUNKER: Well, they did stay for a period, yes. And they were both very useful. very able.

Q: How about Ambassador [Eugene] Locke, what was his role there?

BUNKER: He was my deputy.

Q: Did you delegate a certain area?

BUNKER: Oh, yes, I delegated particularly pacification to Locke. But he didn't stay very long, as you recall. He came out with me. He left I think in January, 1968 to go back to Texas to run for governor. So that he left I think in January.

Ambassador [Samuel] Berger didn't get out there until March, so there was that interim period which included Tet when I didn't have a deputy.

Q: Did the fact that Ambassador Locke was an old acquaintance of President Johnson cause any chain of commands problem at all?

BUNKER: No, not at all.

Q: Let me ask you about the atmosphere in Saigon at the time you took over. How would you describe the city and the mentality of the city in the spring and summer of 1967?

BUNKER: I think the city was quiet when I got there. People were going about their business. There was not an air of great apprehension. I think people were confident that progress was being made. The city gave the appearance of going about its business. And of course it was Tet which upset that whole situation there. But I think there was some feeling of euphoria.

Q: Others have given the impression of Saigon as being sort of very removed from the war and very different from the provinces.

BUNKER: I think that's true in certain ways, until Tet came along when that changed rather rapidly. But I think that was true at the time I arrived.

Q: Let's talk about U.S.-Vietnamese relations. I gather that one of your principal functions as ambassador was to deal with Thieu and Ky and to apprise them of our positions, to use, as Bob Komer would say, leverage on them to get them to do the things that we hoped they would do and things of this nature. Would that have constituted a major part of your role there?

BUNKER: Yes.

Q: I gather at the time of your arrival there was a considerable conflict between them.

BUNKER: There was rivalry between them. Certainly rivalry, particularly until the decision was made as to the ticket for the elections in September.

Q: Was there any one individual who was the key to this decision?

BUNKER: No, I don't think so.

Q: Not one military man on the council?

BUNKER: No, I don't think so.

Q: Did you yourself favor Thieu over Ky?

BUNKER: I did, yes. Yes, I was pleased when they finally did decide on Thieu.

Q: Was this primarily based on the difference between the two men or was this at all relating to different policies that one might espouse?

BUNKER: Not different policies, but the difference between the two individuals. I thought Thieu was a wiser, more solid person. Ky was too unpredictable, too emotional, too flamboyant. Thieu more solid.

Q: Did you use your influence before the unified military ticket, before they resolved the two candidacies? Ky was censoring some of Thieu's campaign statements and General [Nguyen Ngoc] Loan apparently was using some public officials and one thing and another. I gather you may have used some influence to get them to control some of the political activities that you regarded as excessive. Do you recall that?

BUNKER: Well, yes. Loan, this chief of police, was a very difficult--well, I had little use for him. I made it very clear to Ky and Thieu that I didn't think he was the right person in that job.

Q: But he stayed for a good while.

BUNKER: He stayed for quite a while.

Q: Was he primarily a Ky supporter rather than Thieu?

BUNKER: Yes. Yes, he was. No, he was bad medicine.

Q: Did you exert any other influence on Ky before he agreed to assume the vice presidential position?

BUNKER: I didn't. No, I didn't exert any influence on either one of them. I simply said to them and to the military, General Cao Van Vien, who was chairman of the joint chiefs, and two or three others whom I called in. I said, "I'm not interfering in this, but you've got to make up your minds. There can't be a division at a time of war among the military. It's not possible."

Q: Did you fear that it would go beyond a political division, that it might also involve a coup?

BUNKER: Not necessarily a coup but I just thought it would divide the military into Factions which was not acceptable.

Q: Why do you think Ky agreed to step aside?

BUNKER: Yell. I think that Thieu had the larger measure of support from the military actually.

Q: There was some notion at first that Thieu would actually be merely a figurehead and Ky would have the authority to name the cabinet and to head the armed services. Do you recall the dispute over a formula of who would actually do what?

BUNKER: No. As far as I can remember, I don't think Ky had any veto over individuals. I don't recollect any.

Q: Let me ask you about the civilian candidates, the others. There was quite an array. Was it important to the U.S. and to public opinion to keep those candidates in the race?

BUNKER: I think it was important, yes. Because I think it was a demonstration that the elections were free, as they were. Thieu and Ky were elected with a plurality, not with a majority. I think they got about 35 per cent of the vote. As it turned out, it was of course a more democratic election than the one in 1971 where there was no opposition. If the civilian candidates could have agreed on one they might have given Thieu and Ky a good run.

Q: Was there any civilian candidate that we favored informally as an alternative?

BUNKER: No, I don't think so.

Q: Would it be fair to say that we expected and hoped the Thieu-Ky ticket to win?

BUNKER: Yes, I think so. I think it's fair to say that we thought that would be the most effective in carrying on the war and carrying the country along. Because there are too many factions among the civilians, as evidence by the fact that there were eleven civilian tickets I think. So that it was very difficult to find a civilian who could bring the country together.

Q: I gather they were united only in their opposition to Thieu and Ky.

BUNKER: That's right. Yes, sure. And of course all those countries are more accustomed to authoritarian rule than we are. I mean, after all, they adopted our presidential system. As one senator said, "We've got a democratic system now though we have a history of four thousand years with no tradition in it of that kind."

Q: Was the election a maturing experience for them?

BUNKER: Yes, I think it was, yes. Because it was carried out, I think, really quite well. We had a great many observers there, as you know.

Q: Do you think that as the process continued during that campaign that there was less censorship, more freedom of the press? Did you see an emerging democracy in terms of the practices?

BUNKER: Yes, there was more freedom, freedom of the press. One of the problems of the whole war we had to contend with was the fact that there was no press censorship, which raises the issue or the question whether a democracy can wage war successfully without censorship and with the war now being shown on television, which never happened before. This is the first time it happened, the first time that the war came into everybody's living room. No question in my mind that it had a very important effect on public opinion in this country, whereas the other side didn't wage war under those handicaps. They had complete censorship.

Q: Let me ask you about the prospect of "Big" Minh [General Duong Van Minh] returning from Bangkok to run as a candidate. Do you recall how this was prevented?

BUNKER: I should, but the details escape me at the moment. I must try to refresh my memory on that.

Q: Do you recall I think it's the Dongha incident where the other candidates were assembled and supposedly prepared to debate and Thieu did not join them? They all got mad about it.

BUNKER: Yes, they got mad about it. I remember that, too. Yes. But I do remember they got mad about it. My recollection is, too, that I've forgotten now why Thieu and Ky didn't show up. I think it's because they didn't want to give importance to the other side, lend that much credibility to their opponents.

Q: Did you urge Thieu to appear with the other candidates?

BUNKER: Subsequently I did. I told him I thought

Q: Anything else on the campaign that you feel is important?

BUNKER: No, I don't think so. I think I did report this to the President in one of my messages. We did have a chance to observe the elections over a wide area of the country, and the reports from the observers came in that they were fairly conducted, without pressure, and with everybody given a chance to vote, and that we were really quite pleased with the way the government had organized the elections and carried them out. I guess [Hubert] Humphrey came out for the inauguration.

Q: In one of these wires you referred to your persistent persuasion and patient prodding. Can you recall any particular examples of using your influence to get Thieu and Ky to adopt a policy during the campaign that has more in keeping with public opinion?

BUNKER: During the campaign?

Q: Yes.

BUNKER: No, I can't recollect any particular instance.

Q: There was a crisis I suppose at the end when the national assembly appeared to want to invalidate the election. Do you recall this crisis?

BUNKER: I do recall the crisis, but I don't recall the circumstances particularly.

Q: Well, I gather some of these assemblymen were defeated senate candidates.

BUNKER: Yes, that's right, some of them were defeated and wanted to--because of that reason, I think, but I just don't recollect the details.

Q: Could it be that some of them were also Ky partisans?

BUNKER: Might have been so.

Q: But I think the record indicates that you met with a group of them and brought them to a different frame of mind.

BUNKER: Yes, but I don't recollect what the reason for the... I think it was because, as you say, some of them were defeated. It's hard for an Oriental to accept loss of face.

Q: In addition to the observers, did the embassy make any other efforts to ensure an acceptable level of honesty and voter participation in the elections?

BUNKER: Well, we made it very clear to the government, Thieu and Ky and the rest of them, that we placed great importance on fair elections and that there should be no coercion or attempts of coercion of the voters. I made it very clear to both of them that the question of support. Degree of support they would receive from here would depend very largely on how the elections were carried out and how they were seen here and not only seen here and reported by the press.

Q: Did your pressures, do you think, generate anti-Americanism?

BUNKER: Well, I don't think so really. Maybe at times. Well, there were times, of course, later on when they generated anti-Americanism, when I tried to get them to go to Paris.

Q: What was President Johnson's reaction to the election, do you recall?

BUNKER: Well, I think he was very pleased, of course, with the way it was carried out, and I think he expected certainly that the military would be returned to power and probably felt that that was the best thing for the country, given the situation that existed at the time. And he was concerned that the election should be seen here as being open and free.

Q: I understand that there was an invitation to the UN to send observers as well. Do you recall your role in that invitation?

BUNKER: No, I don't recall specifically.

Q: Now General Loan arrested a former economics minister, [Au Troung] Thanh. Do you recall that incident?

BUNKER: No, I don't recall that.

Q: I have a note here that you filed a stiff protest after that happened.

BUNKER: I probably did.

Q: Was there a problem of regionalism that affected the government in Vietnam?

BUNKER: Well, regionalism in the sense that you had, for example, the Cao Dai religious sect, which is very strong in the South, very anti-communist and therefore pro-government. There's still also an element which was rather insistent on its prerogatives as such. and of course there were the Buddhists and what we call the radical Buddhists. who were often anti-government. And there was the Catholic element, which had come from the North, which was a minor but substantial element in the country, Thieu himself being a Catholic. So that you had this sense of rivalry between the Catholics, the Buddhists, the other elements like the Cao Dai. On the other hand, while that led to rivalries domestically, politically, still they were united I think in their opposition to the communists. So it was an element that could and did occasionally cause some disturbance, unsettlement. Before I got there they had the Buddhist uprising in the North, you know, at Danang.

Q: It seems that the Buddhists were never really brought into the process, that they were always a force of resistance.

BUNKER: Well, particularly what was known as the An Quang Buddhists, the more radical element. There was another element which was much more cooperative with the government, but it was the An Quang Buddhist faction that got the publicity, of course.

Q: Did you yourself have any formula for muting their opposition?

BUNKER: No. I didn't have any formula. I can't say that I did.

Q: In retrospect, as you look back, could anything have been done to further unify the country?

BUNKER: I don't know. The Thieu-Ky rivalry was at times unsettling and it's something that I kept working on constantly, pointing out to both of them it was absolutely essential that they work together.

Q: How responsive were they overall in these meetings?

BUNKER: They were responsive in the meetings, but they didn't always follow through.

Q: Did persistence help here? Were you eventually able to bring them around in some cases?

BUNKER: Yes. Yes. I think so, until the elections of 1971, and then they had the split between Thieu and Ky. But then Ky pulled out.

Q: Some of your advice to Thieu seems to have been more along the lines of political advice: to get out more among the people, to use television, to become essentially a more aggressive leader in attempting to unify the people. Can you elaborate on this sort of advice and the success of it?

BUNKER: Well, Thieu, as a military man and being himself rather austere, and I think because of perhaps the secretive characteristics about him, was not used to using the press, the television. He was used to command as a military man, not used to persuasion, to giving orders but not used to persuasion. And he had to go through really an educational process. This is what I was trying to help him with and urging him to do, to expose himself more to the people. And he did progress a great deal I think. I went with him on a good many trips where he did get out among the people and talk to them, and I think improved very much in the course of time on his public relations aspect.

Q: Do you think he ever achieved the status in the minds of the Vietnamese as a national leader?

BUNKER: I think he did, but not necessarily--as a leader, but not as a national hero.

Q: Was there anyone in South Vietnam at the time that you felt would have been the natural leader to unify the country?

BUNKER: No. No, I didn't see anyone.

Q: Let me ask you about some more of your pressures. One, dismissing corrupt officials. I gather this was something else you were very interested in.

BUNKER: Yes.

Q: How far did you get with that?

BUNKER: Well, we made some progress with it. Thieu did replace quite a number of province chiefs who were guilty of corruption. Some of the military were, some not. One of the problems we had occasionally was with the military wives, the wives engaged in corruption instead of their husbands.

Q: Now another thing I understand that you were interested in was the matter of higher military and civilian pay scales. Do you recall your efforts there?

BUNKER: Yes. Yes, I know I did try. I did urge Thieu to improve their pay scales, because they really were getting very poorly paid, which as I said to him, leads to corruption. The attitude in the Orient towards corruption is somewhat different than it is here. In most of those countries there are no social security laws. The extended family, the family is the social security unit, and your first duty is to take care of your family, provide for your family. If you do engage or feel that you have to engage in corruption in order to do that, there are extenuating circumstances which you don't have here in the Western civilization. So people look at it with more tolerance as being done to take care of the family situation.

Q: Were the salaries increased?

BUNKER: Yes. Yes, they were.

Q: And did the government have the funds to do this?

BUNKER: Yes. Well, we of course were giving economic support to the government right along, but also the country was making progress economically in spite of the war, particularly in the later years of the war when I was there, not only in the industrial sector, but particularly in the agricultural sector where farmers were really more prosperous than they'd ever been. I can remember going down to the Delta, which is the great agricultural area there, and seeing farmers who used to ride bicycles riding motorcycles, and seeing television aerials or radio aerials in houses. And they were buying tractors, sometimes pooling on their tractors, but getting into machinery operations. There was a very large land distribution program effected, which became effective in 1970, 1972.

Q: Did we have a policy of advocating land reform?

BUNKER: Oh, yes.

Q: I know President Johnson was interested in that.

BUNKER: Oh, yes. He did have a very great interest.

Q: How effective were you at advancing that policy?

BUNKER: I think we were quite effective in advancing it and had good cooperation from Thieu and the government. They did a very substantial, really very creditable piece of work.

Q: Did you also favor giving more authority to the province chiefs rather than the military commanders? Do you recall this question?

BUNKER: Well, we recommended or advocated more authority to the Province chiefs because their concern was with the local government rather than with the military effort, except from the point of view of the village and hamlet security aspect. But they were closer to the people than the military were and were permanently stationed in the provinces. Consequently they had a greater interest in the progress of their own provinces, an interest, of course, in security, too, but also in the economic situation and the political situation. So that we felt that if people had problems or grievances or things of that kind, that the province chief was the more suitable person to whom they could address themselves and look for relief or redress or whatever it might be.

Q: The question of prisoners of war and repatriation of prisoners, were there questions here that were addressed to the Thieu Administrations?

BUNKER: I'm not quite clear on your question.

Q: Well, for example, did our concern over the safety of our POWs in North Vietnam cause us to advance a particular policy of how Viet Cong prisoners should be treated or repatriation?

BUNKER: Yes. We were, of course, interested in seeing that these prisoners, our prisoners, were treated according to the rules of warfare and that they were properly treated, and saw to it. And I think they were. The Con Son Island incident, where there was a great fuss about--

Q: Oh, the tiger cages?

BUNKER: Tiger cages, yes.

Q: Did you ever attempt to improve the conditions of Viet Cong prisoners or to step up repatriation in order to aid our own prisoners of war?

BUNKER: I'd have to refresh my memory on what we did on repatriation, I just don't recall at this point.

Q: Cambodia must have presented a dilemma at this point. It was clear that the enemy was using Cambodia as a sanctuary.

BUNKER: Oh, absolutely. In fact, I sent a message back in June--June 9, June 19, I've forgotten the exact date--recommending that we go into Laos and cut the trail on the ground, that the war was kept alive, of course, in the South by the infiltration of men and supplies and materiel and equipment, reasoning that if we could cut the trail that the Viet Cong in the South would wither on the vine. Well, obviously I was turned down; they never did it, on several grounds. One, it would be a violation of the Laotian treaty of 1962 to which we were signatories. My response to that was that it was quite true it would be a violation, but the other side violated it from the day they signed it, and the Laotians would be delighted to have us go in.

Secondly, it would take two or three more divisions, which again was true, but we put in that many more before we got through.

The third point was that there was fear it might provoke the Chinese. but my observation on that was that while we have no relations with the Chinese, had none, our friends did. The British had embassies in Peking, the French, Dutch, and we could make it very clear to the Chinese we had no designs on China or on North Vietnam. North Vietnamese could have any kind of government they wanted as far as we were concerned, but they weren't going to take over the South.

Well, we didn't do it. If we had done it, of course it would have helped to close sanctuaries, not only in Laos but in Cambodia, too. But we didn't do it, and then finally did go into Cambodia.

Q: Of course you had a problem with Prince [Norodom] Sihanouk, I suppose.

BUNKER: Well, Sihanouk tacitly let it be understood that as long as we didn't bomb civilian areas and kept our bombing to the sanctuaries that he didn't really object to it, although he wasn't going to say so.

Q: But you understood that this was his position?

BUNKER: Yes. Yes.

Q: There seems to have been some rivalry between South Vietnam and Cambodia here. One example, the halting of shipping on the Mekong River that impaired the Cambodian economy. Do you recall your efforts to free up the shipping on the Mekong River, keep Sihanouk in a friendlier posture?

BUNKER: I'm not very clear on it. I think we did, and did arrange to let shipping go up the Mekong. It's my recollection it went up pretty freely, even though the other side were bringing in supplies through Sihanoukville and bringing them up into the sanctuaries.

Q: Let me ask you about the post-election situation. Was there an effort made to broaden the base of the government?

BUNKER: Well, yes, I think there was. I think in the appointments to the cabinet, and Thieu did make several changes as time went on. I'll have to look. I'm certain I reported that in my messages, but I'd have to check it.

Q: During this period, before Tet and after the inauguration, were there overtures made to the other side to discuss settlement terms or cease-fires or peace conferences?

BUNKER: 1967. When was the San Antonio formula, which has been referred to in some of these?

Q: I have September 29, 1967 on that.

BUNKER: September 29. The President made a proposal there. I've forgotten just what the terms were. September, 1967.

Q: I believe there was a normal flow of men and materiel continuing from the North during the bombing pause, but no stepped up activity. Wasn't it something like that?

BUNKER: Yes, I must look it up to refresh my memory on that.

Q: For example, didn't President Thieu write a letter to Ho Chi Minh?

BUNKER: He did write a letter. The question came up of how it was to be delivered, I remember. I'm not sure whether we ever reached a solution, or that he ever did, on the ways to get it to him.

Q: I gather there was some consideration of having the Pope deliver it, and even some speculation that perhaps President Johnson in his visit had taken the letter with him to Rome when he saw the Pope at Christmas?

BUNKER: Yes, but my recollection is that it never was worked out.

Q: Really?

BUNKER: Yes.

Q: It seems a shame that there's no basis for communication. Another intriguing event was the Buttercup affair, where an NLF emissary supposedly was on his way to meet with you and was arrested. Do you recall this?

BUNKER: I recall it, yes, but I don't recall the details.

Q: There was some speculation that this was merely a hoax on the Viet Cong's part.

BUNKER: I must really refresh myself on that, too.

Q: But do you yourself recall any talks, informal talks, that you had with emissaries of the other side on the basis of settlements or ceasefires?

BUNKER: No. No, I never had any talks. No.

Q: Were there neutralists that you could talk with that could get word indirectly to the other side?

BUNKER: Not that I could talk with, no.

Q: What about foreign nationals, say British or French or other individuals that had contacts with North Vietnam?

BUNKER: Well, we never made any approach to the North Vietnamese through other nationals in South Vietnam. Now, anything of that sort was done in Washington, but outside of Vietnam itself. I never got involved in any negotiating proposals or peace proposals in Vietnam with other nationals, or with emissaries from the other side.

Q: Anything else on the negotiations before Tet?

BUNKER: No, no. I don't recall anything.

Q: Let me ask you about pacification. How would you define the pacification program?

BUNKER: Well, the pacification program had two sides at least to it. One was the question of the hamlet and village security. That was the primary objective. The second objective, also equally important, was the economic aspect. And third, the political. So that pacification was, you see, a well-rounded program in which the rural self-defense forces were involved, training civilians in defense. Economic development was equally important. And you remember the village elections, council elections, were held all over the country also beginning in 1967. So that it was the development of a conscious part in the government of the people at the local level that really was involved in the pacification program, self-help program.

Q: Let me ask you about the CORDS program, Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support, as part of pacification. Do you recall that?

BUNKER: Yes. Oh, yes, very well. That was the principal part of pacification as far as Komer was concerned and his duties. That was really a very essential part of our whole program in Vietnam.

Q: What specifically did this involve?

BUNKER: Self-government at the local level. Revolutionary development is really a misnomer; rural development would be the better name for it. We called it revolutionary development, but I think we got changing it as it went along. We called it revolutionary development because in the beginning it was developing local political self-consciousness and self-government at the local level. But the reason I say it was rural development in this other sense was it involved agriculture, too, fisheries, agriculture, all of the economic activities involved at the village level, at the local level. So that it was a comprehensive program and a very important one.

It involved, as I say, security first, the training of the local citizenry. One indication of the confidence the government had in support of the citizenry was the fact that they distributed, if I remember correctly, six hundred thousand weapons at large in the countryside. Well, if you felt uncertain about the loyalty of the people, you wouldn't give them arms they could use against you. I mean, I think it was a mark of confidence by the government that they had the support of the citizenry. Anyhow, that was an important part. Training both men and women, too, in this hamlet and village self-defense.

Q: Did you have any feedback on the extent or evaluation to determine if, in fact, the arms were falling into friendly hands rather than potential Viet Cong?

BUNKER: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. Except where the Viet Cong could come in and capture them, we never had any indication they were ever turned over to the Viet Cong.

Q: How about the Phoenix program?

BUNKER: The Phoenix program, I think, was an important program in unearthing the underground. It was criticized, I know here, saying it was an assassination program. It was not an assassination program. People were killed when they resisted arrest, yes, of course. But the great majority of those people were imprisoned and were not executed. There were casualties, of course, because there was resistance, but it was an important program. You see, what happened at Tet was because Tet was a military defeat, a very significant military defeat for the other side, but a psychological victory for them here in the United States because of the press reaction and the way it was reported. And that I think is brought out by Peter Braestrup in his books. But what happened was that the communist side was so confident that the Viet Cong surfaced for the first time. The underground all came up and were identified, many of them killed. I mean, they virtually suffered such severe losses at Tet they never recovered from it. But it made them more vulnerable. More identifiable, and hence the Phoenix program became more effective.

Q: Was it tied into the Chieu Hoi program at all, the returnee program?

BUNKER: Yes. Well, yes it was, where ralliers would come in. In my earlier messages to the President, I think every week I reported about the Chieu Hoi.

Q: Do you think that these people who came over and were evidently reimbursed for doing so and joining the South Vietnamese army, do you think they ever slipped back into the jungles and rejoined the Viet Cong?

BUNKER: Not many so. Maybe a few, but not many.

Q: Really? Our intelligence indicated that--

BUNKER: That's right, they didn't go back.

Q: Did you talk to many of these people and determine why they were changing sides?

BUNKER: I never talked to them personally, no. Our people did, of course.

Q: Well, lots of stories came in about the hardships and the North and the difficulty there, and the hardships of fighting in the South, this kind of warfare they were carrying on. Most of these Chieu Hoi people were guerrillas you know, not many of them were the regular military who were living hand-to-mouth and fighting in the jungles. What was Edward Lansdale's role in the pacification program?

BUNKER: Well, principally as an adviser, based on his long experience there in that part of the world: principally as an adviser on the local scene--which he knew. I suppose, perhaps better than most of us, most of the people who were there: he'd been there longer--aha, I think the native culture, psychology, so forth.

Q: Was he controversial in official circles?

BUNKER: Not with me or there at the time. I think he had been at some time. But I had no problem with him. I thought he was quite effective really.

Q: Was he critical at all of pacification, the implementation of it?

BUNKER: I don't think he was.

Q: I gather this was one of the ARVN's weakest areas, pacification.

BUNKER: Well, it may have been. Yes, I suppose perhaps so. They were more concerned really about fighting the war and the enemy. However, I think they cooperated pretty well.

Q: William Corson, who was over there, made the criticism that the pacification project should not have to be cleared through the Vietnamese officials. Do you recall this issue?

BUNKER: Corson? Now, when was this, do you remember?

Q: This would have been, I think, in the 1967-68 period.

BUNKER: I don't even remember, was Corson stationed there?

Q: He was with the marines. He was a

BUNKER: Oh, yes, marines. In the North. That's interesting, shouldn't have to be cleared with the Vietnamese? I'd forgotten that. That's interesting. Do you remember how that came out?

Q: He wrote a book called The Betrayal.

BUNKER: That's right, that's right. I haven't read it. Have you read it?

Q: No. I have some notes on it here though.

BUNKER: What was the thrust of it?

Q: Well, I'm not going to elaborate, since I haven't read it, but I gather he was critical of Komer's performance.

BUNKER: Komer's handling of it?

Q: Also another issue that seems to have been raised was the method of evaluation of various hamlets.

BUNKER: Hamlet evaluation security, yes.

Q: The A-B-C-D rating system..

BUNKER: A-B-C-D, yes. A-B-C-D and the communists. Yes, well, like all evaluations it's inexact, of course. It's an approximation, really. But it was an approximation and gave a pretty good idea, I think, of the general situation. I say, like all evaluations based on judgments, it was not exact, but it did by 1972, end of 1972, you could travel anywhere in the country you wanted to go without any security protection or anything at all.

Q: The press argued at the time that the C category, which was the designation of hamlets under government control, were really sort of a toss-up and would thereby in the evaluation total reduce the government control to less than 50 per cent of the population.

BUNKER: Well, depending on, I think, what year you took the evaluation, because the situation kept changing steadily for the better.

Q: Did it?

BUNKER: Yes.

Q: Was this a direct result of pacification, do you think, rather than just military advances?

BUNKER: It was a combination of both. No question, a combination of both. The military situation improved and the pacification situation.

Q: What did we learn from that pacification experience that you would apply in other situations?

BUNKER: Well, I think we did learn the importance of getting the local population people involved in their own situation, not only their own protection, their own economic development, their own political development. This was the whole thrust of the pacification program. It was government at the local level involving defense, involving the political situation, involving the local councils, hamlet chiefs, and the local economic development programs. So it was a rounded approach. I think it applies not only to Vietnam but to other situations in the less developed world.

Q: It seems that apathy was a great problem, that so many of the Vietnamese people were not interested in the Viet Cong or the other side, but on the other hand they seemed apathetic about the Thieu-Ky government.

BUNKER: A great bulk would prefer to be left alone, obviously. I mean, prefer not to be involved in the war on one side or the other. But I think this is true anywhere in the world you go. I mean, many of them just wished the war would go away. Sure, no question.

Q: Another area that you seemed to have some concerns about was intelligence. In fact in November, 1967, when you came back to the White House and met with President Johnson, I gather that there were some proposals to revamp our intelligence system to get better intelligence.

BUNKER: Yes. I don't remember the specifics of that particular talk at the White House, but certainly the intelligence was a matter of concern, a matter of great concern to us. The question of attempting to improve the intelligence was also a matter of concern. Now, I felt that the agency, the CIA there was well run. We had good people, I thought, there. Ted Shackley, for example, was first-rate. His successor who was there a briefer time, Lou Lapham was good. Tom Polgar was the last one. He was only there about--well, he stayed on with [Ambassador Graham] Martin, but only the last year I was there. They were all, I thought, good, able. I thought they were doing a pretty good job for us.

Q: How about military intelligence? Did you feel that you were getting adequate military intelligence?

BUNKER: Well, I wasn't so sure about the military intelligence. Of course, I had a briefing every week from the military, a general roundup, of the situation each week. But it was more difficult for me to judge about the quality of it.

Q: Enemy troop levels. There have been indications, or certainly at least contentions, that we drastically underestimated the size of the enemy force in the field.

BUNKER: I don't know. I don't know about that.

Q: Do you recall this being a source of concern at the time?

BUNKER: No, I don't, really. Where did that develop, do you remember? Estimates of enemy force level.

Q: Let me ask you about some of the visitors that you had out there. I gather there was almost a constant flow of congressional and diplomatic visitors.

BUNKER: Oh, absolutely. I think the Christmas-New Year's season, 1967-68. I've forgotten how many congressmen, senators I had. I think I remember a hundred and forty-six or something like that, fantastic. Just descended on us in swarms.

Q: Was there any sort of official policy of how you treated these people and what sort of procedures to follow with them?

BUNKER: Yes, well, in this sense, that they all got briefings, of course, from the military aspect and also from us on the political aspect, the economic situation. And where they expressed a wish to do so, we would take them out into the country in areas we thought it was safe for them to go. I remember Senator [Charles] Percy and his wife came out. I think he got out in a place where he got pretty close to getting under fire.

Q: I understand that he injured his hand or something when he jumped for cover.

BUNKER: Something like that, yes. But we had some amusing experiences, too, I remember. The first helicopter ride I ever took in Vietnam, I had a forced landing.

Q: Crash landing.

BUNKER: Yes. Have I described that to you?

Q: Please do.

BUNKER: General [Bruce] Palmer was out there as deputy to Westmoreland, and he was out at Bien Hoa base. He had been with me in the Dominican situation, where he was deputy commander to the Brazilians. I was going out to see him and we were flying along over the highway, and we started to come down. I looked out and I didn't see anything that looked like the base, and I thought maybe we were going to be met by a jeep or something. Well, then the traffic began to swerve off. And we came down and we skidded along. I got out of the chopper, thanked the pilot. He said, "Oh, we're not there yet. We've had a forced landing; I had to come down. My power shut off. Fortunately we were over fifteen hundred feet, or we couldn't have made it." Well, it was a very amusing incident in a way, but what happened was there was a photographer aboard. He got the strap of his camera afoul of the fuel valve, shut off the fuel. We came down and we were rescued by the Jolly Green Giant. [HH-53, special operations helicopter].

So I was quite amused by it. I described this to General Palmer. He said, "Anyhow, another chopper should have been following you anyway. Somebody will catch hell for that."

Q: Did you have any other close calls while you were there?

BUNKER: Oh, yes. Tet. We were under fire.

Q: Well, we'll deal with that in detail. But in your travels around the country?

BUNKER: No. At the same time I went out to the First Division fire base. The commander there asked me if I'd like to go around the base. I said, "Yes, I would." So he assigned an officer to take me out, show me the base. He took me around outside the base. So I came back and he said, "Where did he take you?" I said, "He took me around outside of the base." He said, "Well, we're supposed to be protecting you, you're not supposed to be protecting us." So I reported this to Bruce Palmer. too. "Oh." he said, "Somebody will catch hell for that." I got back. I thought it had been a very amusing day. I told Westmoreland about it. And he said. "A lot of people have already caught hell." (Laughter) But no, except for Tet, I don't think there were any very close situations.

Q: Did official visitors from Washington ever tend to want to go beyond the areas that were safe?

BUNKER: No.

Q: Let me ask you about George Romney's visit. This is the one where he was brainwashed.

BUNKER: Yes, but I think that was before my time.

Q: He came back then I guess in December of 1967.

BUNKER: Yes, he did come back in December. We didn't try to brainwash him then. (Laughter) As I remember, his visit was a very brief one. It really didn't make much of an impression on me.

Q: Hubert Humphrey attended the inaugural ceremonies, I believe.

BUNKER: Yes, he did.

Q: Can you recall the occasion?

BUNKER: Oh, yes. He headed the delegation, our delegation. Hubert, as usual, got along extremely well wherever he went. He was really great. But, as you know, Hubert didn't have many terminal facilities, and I said to him, I'd like to have him address the embassy staff. We had a very large embassy, you know, the biggest in the world. I said, "Now, Hubert, they'll all be out in the compound in the yard in the sun, and it's hot. So only talk ten or fifteen minutes." He said, "Oh, sure, Ellsworth, that's fine." Well, Hubert made a rattling good fifteen-minute speech. Then he made a second fifteen-minute speech. I thought, well this is going to be all. Then he made a third fifteen-minute speech. I think we timed him at fifty-two minutes. But he got a good hand, of course. Oh, he was great.

Q: Did he have any proposals or advice or any suggestions for President Thieu that you recall?

BUNKER: I don't recall any in particular, but he got along very well with Thieu. They were very appreciative of his coming out.

Q: How about the Maxwell Taylor-Clark Clifford mission in July, 1967? Do you recall that?

BUNKER: Well, that was to our allies, not to Vietnam. They went to our allies, I think, in the interest of seeing whether they could get further troop reinforcements. But they didn't come to Vietnam at that time. Clark Clifford came out later after Tet in 1968 again and wanted to start withdrawing troops then, and I objected to that because I thought it would have a very demoralizing effect. And I was upheld. We subsequently met in Honolulu, and the President agreed that we would not begin to pull out.

Q: Anything else on visitors?

BUNKER: Well, I remember that Governor [Ronald] Reagan and his wife came out, just what date I can't quite remember. He was a strong supporter of what we were doing, and I was very happy to see them because he really backed us up.

Q: Did you get many visitors who were opposed to the war or opposed to the conduct of the war, the way it was being conducted?

BUNKER: Some. Yes, we did. Well, Townsend Hoopes came out when he was Secretary of the Air Force I think. He later became opposed to the war, as you know. Congressman [Lester] Wolfe--in fact, I think Wolfe at one time said he thought I ought to be recalled, if I'm not mistaken. We had a visit from Senator [Edward] Kennedy, who was critical of the way we were handling the refugees, but unfortunately came out to make a case. He had his mind made up when he came apparently, because he avoided the embassy largely and brought some staff with him. They went to a refugee camp which was being abandoned because we had built a new one and a better one, but made their report based on what they'd seen at the old one, which didn't go very well with me. I didn't feel it was really a straightforward report.

Q: Did you meet with him while he was out there?

BUNKER: I saw him just briefly, that's all. He stayed away from us largely.

Q: Let's talk about the refugee situation some more. I gather there were a tremendous number of displaced people.

BUNKER: There were, yes, a great many. If you add them all up, they weren't all displaced at one time, but the total, I think, came to some five million. But that was spread over a span of years; it didn't all happen at once. I mean, they came out and went back again. But the point is that, as I guess Bob [Sir Robert] Thompson put it, or someone, they voted with their feet. They never went over to the other side. They always ran away from the other side.

Q: Was there anything that could have been done in your opinion to improve the refugee situation?

BUNKER: My feeling is, given the fact that the country was at war, given the fact of limited resources, I think it was handled remarkably well. Obviously hardships existed, but the fact is, as I say, nobody went over to the enemy. They did vote with their feet, and went back as soon as they had a chance to go back. Naturally they were attached to their own villages.

RICHARD T. MCCORMACK
Head of Operations Research, Philco-Ford
Saigon (1968)

After attending Georgetown University, Mr. Richard T. McCormack assumed a multitude of administrative roles for the Nixon Administration in addition to serving under Governor William Scranton of Pennsylvania and Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina. Mr. McCormack's career also included positions as the US Ambassador to the Organization of American States as well as Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. Ambassador McCormack was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

McCORMACK: Then, friends suggested that maybe I should go to Vietnam and consider some of the problems there. So I became the Head of Operations Research for Philco-Ford in their Southeast Asia Headquarters in Saigon, Vietnam.

Q: For whom?

McCORMACK: Philco-Ford Corporation. I originally worked mainly on the war refugee problems in Vietnam, but I had broader responsibilities. I was headquartered in Saigon, but traveled widely in Laos, Cambodia, Thailand, Indonesia, and Malaysia. The Tet offensive occurred while I was there. I was also working as an analyst and sending papers with suggestions to Embassy people. At one point, Ambassador Robert Komer, who was in charge of the pacification program, asked me to become the Deputy Science Advisor to the Commander of U.S. Forces in Vietnam, with responsibilities for coordinating all the soft science research being done in Vietnam by such groups as Rand Corporation. This was a GS-18, PL 313, position. I agreed to do it.

This was, of course, a time of tremendous turmoil. I said I would take the job under the condition that I could return to the U.S. and recruit five or six top people of my own generation to work with me. That was agreed. So I flew back to the United States in July. Then a Congressional hiring freeze passed. I recruited six of the ablest people of our generation. We sat in the Pentagon and sat and sat. Komer, who was kind of an irascible fellow, began sending outraged cables demanding that I be sent back, but the Pentagon just wouldn't move. I later discovered that some functionary in personnel had said, "How can a 27-year old man take GS-18 responsibility levels?" So they used the excuse of the hiring freeze to delay. So after a month of this, I gave up and helped coordinate the Vietnam issue for Nixon in his '68 campaign headquarters in New York. My six friends all went off to brilliant careers in other areas.

Q: Well, let's talk about the time you were in Saigon. What were you doing when the Tet offensive hit McCORMACK: I was living in Saigon in a very exposed section of the city when the attack occurred. There was a lot of gunfire in the neighborhood where I lived.

Q: Where was that?

McCORMACK: I lived right between Saigon and Cholon. You remember Cholon?

Q: That was the Chinese part?

McCORMACK: I was right on the border of Cholon. I was staying in an apartment building owned by a Vietnamese, Mr. Thu, a very nice man. We had Viet Cong all around us.

Q: Where there was a bunch of heavy fighting?

McCORMACK: Heavy fighting. In any case on the day of the TET attack, I was curious to see what was happening because you could see smoke coming up in different places and could hear gunfire. I walked down to the Bachelor Officers Quarters, where I often ate. Someone explained to me what was happening, so I began moving around town, going from one area to the other. I went to see if the U.S. Embassy was still under fire. I could see big piles of smoldering wreckage in front of the Embassy. The Viet Cong still had people who were hidden in the area there, and they were firing. Then I went to the Presidential Palace where there was another problem. As I was walking around the corner to the Presidential Palace, which was on my right, I stepped over a bunch of bodies that were on the sidewalk, and there was absolute silence. I looked around, and all of a sudden gunfire erupted. I dove into a little alley, where the Korean Embassy was located. It turned out the Viet Cong were occupying a large building next to this embassy, which was immediately to the left of the Presidential Palace. There were two brick walls along the driveway, where the Ambassador's car was normally parked. That is where Korean marines were crouched, attempting to deal with the Viet Cong in the high rise, 30 yards to the left.

They were firing at each other, and I was there with them. Of course except for a pistol, I was unarmed, but it went on for quite awhile, and it was very loud. Walls were shaking and people were screaming. As it turned out, a CBS camera crew was filming us from across the yard of the Presidential Palace with a telescopic lens. During one period when the gunfire was particularly intense, I leaned up against the wall and just put my fingers in my ears because the noise was absolutely deafening. Tank fire eventually dealt with our problem. All this appeared on the CBS evening news, generating letters from personal friends who saw the footage. The same footage was run again years later as "Letters from Vietnam," a special CBS program on the war.

Fortunately the Viet Cong never got into my apartment building. After a week, they were pushed back. Then I began traveling around Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. Herman Khan was doing assessments for DARPA, and I was put on his plane. He and I traveled all over the region, interviewing military people to learn what might be done.

Q: What was your impression at this point where public opinion was beginning to move against the policy in the United States? In the field, what was your impression about the value of our commitment there and how things were going?

McCORMACK: I thought it was a winnable proposition under certain circumstances, but I was not always impressed by what I saw at the upper levels of our operation over there. It was also very obvious to me that we were more enthusiastic about winning that war than a lot of the Vietnamese were by then. It was largely an American war. There was a tremendous amount of dedication by the U.S. Officer Corps: captains, colonels, majors, lieutenants. There were many good people there. At the time, though, I felt our strategy of graduated escalation was flawed and not well thought out. But in those days, I took the domino theory seriously. We all did. As I traveled around other countries in the region, it was very clear to me that even Thailand was potentially vulnerable. Malaysia had just come through a very close call with communist insurgents.

Q: During the trouble, what did they call this? I can't remember what they called it.

McCORMACK: I did not by any means think that it was a hopeless proposition, but I felt that we might not win it operating the way we were. Herman Khan came up with his idea of building a barrier around Vietnam with moats and fences. Herman Khan was a very smart man and I was very fond of him. I kept in touch with him for years after that. Some of his ideas were brilliant. Some of them, however, were not. After returning from our fact-finding trip around Vietnam, Herman addressed the officers of the U.S. Command in Vietnam. He started out by saying, "The reason the war is going badly is because of the shortcomings of the men in this room." Some of the officers actually got up and walked out. But in any case, I learned a lot selectively from Khan. He was quite an interesting man with a tremendously eclectic mind and a very engaging personality.

CHARLES LAHIGUERA
CORDS Refugee Officer

Phouc Long Province (1968-1969)

Mr. Lahiguera was born and raised in New York. After graduating from Georgetown University and serving in the US Navy, he entered the Foreign Service in 1963. Though he served outside the South East Asia, his primary duties concerned the Vietnam War and its aftermath, particularly refugees. His overseas posts include Germany, Curacao, Vietnam, France, Hong Kong, Thailand and Swaziland, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Lahiguera was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

LAHIGUERA: Well, I went back to Washington and they put me in a training course. In fact I was in the same class with Terry McNamara.

Q: This was State Department?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. This was our operations and rural development course. It was our aid program on the ground. It was funded by USAID.

Q: So, '66 to '67 you were in training mostly?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. The training at FSI was at Arlington Towers. The atmosphere in the language school was not very cordial. In fact, it wasn't like anything I ever saw before or since. It was a very unfortunate situation. I was interested in learning Vietnamese, but many of the students assigned were first year students. They were brought in after the A-100 course. It was my impression that they all were assigned to Vietnam. A lot of these candidates had a very adversarial attitude. They didn't want to learn Vietnamese and they didn't want to go to Vietnam. The Department was going to make them by George and it was shape up or else. This was their welcoming speech. They had a woman in charge of the program who I did not admire at all. I felt there was a lot of unnecessary hostility. I was working along and I remember there was one young man studying with me, a fellow named Vespa. He had no problems learning Vietnamese and he spoke French. He had just come I think from graduate school somewhere. He had a very good education. He had just finished graduate school and didn't want to go to the language school. So, he didn't want to study Vietnamese and they were giving him all kinds of problems. So, he finally just resigned and he ended up getting a job I think in Greece with Citibank. He was perfectly willing to go. He just left because they were being so unpleasant. At the time of this program Westmoreland had started putting some light on the end of it and I had a vision that I was going to go through this year learning Vietnamese and the war was going to end and I would be the only Vietnamese speaking officer assigned to Ottawa. In between that, I thought the people managing the course were just terrible. I finally went to personnel and said, look I don't need the language qualification, as far as qualifying I had the requirements to go. I just wanted to go. I didn't ask for language training. If you don't think I have to have it, just let me know. They said, all right, we'll take care of it. The next thing I know I was assigned to leave. They terminated my training and I was about to leave when the Tet invasion occurred.

Q: January of '68 I think.

LAHIGUERA: Exactly. So, I was just waiting for the airport to reopen and as soon as it reopened, I flew in.

Q: Well, you got to, you were in Vietnam from '68, early '68 until when?

LAHIGUERA: '68 to '69. Towards the end of '69, so roughly two years.

Q: Tet was basically still going on at the time you got there, wasn't it?

LAHIGUERA: Well, obviously there was still a lot of fighting and there was a curfew in Saigon. You had to be in by 8:00.

Q: Well, you sort of met and got absorbed in the apparatus when you got to Saigon?

LAHIGUERA: I was processed in and they said, what do you want to do and where do you want to go. I said, look I'm a volunteer. Put me where you want. So, they said, okay, we'll think about it. I was still very naive about all this. They said, well, I think we're going to send you to the refugee camp. I said, that's fine. Then a fellow come in and said they needed a refugee officer up in this province, the Phuoc Long province which was in the third corps on the Cambodian border. I said, fine, I'll go. Phuoc Long province is a special place. They only took volunteers for Phuoc Long province and allowed us to inspect it first. So, I flew up to Phuoc Long province.

Actually where we were was Song Be. We had no roads in Phuoc Long, I mean none that we owned. The only way to get in and out of Phuoc Long was to fly. It had very steep decline. They had to have them shooting out of airplanes coming in. So, I remember at the little airstrip they had a big sign saying, "Song Be can be dangerous to your health." We had all kinds of black humor. There was a Lieutenant Colonel Rider who was in charge. He lived in a little trailer, which was bunkered with concrete. I found it an interesting place. I fell in love with the place and went back and told them I'd go. They assigned me to Phuoc Long and I became the refugee officer at Phuoc Long .

Q: Well, now what was sort of the CORDS (Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support) team consist of in that province?

LAHIGUERA: Well, in provinces that were militarily active, the senior province advisor was the military officer. We had military principals in the province and we had a deputy civilian under contract. A gentleman named John Joseph who was a FAA retired airborne colonel from the Second World War and he had done combat jumps in Europe. He was highly respected by the military. He was a very competent officer. I liked him a great deal. We had a civilian admin officer and a GSO. I had to worry about most of the refugee population. John Joseph did the civilian, other civilian programs. I focused on the refugees. We had about 100 Americans I'd say assigned on the team. Most of them were military.

Q: What was the military situation while you were there?

LAHIGUERA: We didn't have any large units in our province and we were defended principally by a local force, a local Vietnamese force. We even had bunkers and our advisory team on the military side made several bunkers. The normal civilians lived separately in prefabricated housing. I had a little trailer with a local hired Vietnamese guard. We were protected principally by the Vietnamese military. Our military was involved in immediate protection of the Americans. We had one reconnaissance airplane. The town of Phuoc Long had the main airfield where we got supplies in. All supplies had to be brought in by airplane and were taken out by air. We had an advisory team living in that town as well. There was a district team in each district. There were camps along the border. They led a D camp in Song Be. I got to see all of these places and worked at them all. As I said, there were a lot of refugees, mostly Montagnards. Most were from towns near a Vietnamese communist infiltration route. They had been told to move and they didn't move and the communists came and burned the towns. We tried to get big projects done and give them everything they needed. We built refugee villages. When the communists came in and drove people out, they'd be given some land and provided supplies.

Q: Well, the communists were basically forcing the resettlement as opposed to our trying to keep people together?

LAHIGUERA: Oh yes, no we didn't have any force at all. This was all triggered by their military.

Q: What were they trying to do, the communists?

LAHIGUERA: Well, they used this area as an approach towards Saigon.

Q: Were they mainly North Vietnamese as opposed to Viet Cong?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. After Tet my impression, my experience was that we always were against North Vietnam. I was in one district that was used as a processing place for bringing troops in. They shot down one of our planes when I was there. It severed an artery of the pilot. He was able to land the plane, but he died because he lost so much blood. He died before we could get him out. Then our district advisor was in a staff meeting, there were only about a half a dozen of them and they took a shell right under the table and killed them all. We had these Swiss aircraft, that's what they called them? They were able to set down on a very short runway. They were designed to fly in the Alps. We used to get them to get in and used helicopters to get out to the districts.

Q: What were you doing for the refugees?

LAHIGUERA: Mainly, just monitoring their conditions and providing what they needed, food, tin roofing. Arranging for medical visits and getting military to the refugee camps. I spent a lot of time in the camps. I brought a lot of patients from the camps to our hospital. We had a hospital manned by both Vietnamese and U.S. army doctors. I used to spend a lot of time going back and forth. I remember dramatically. There was a young boy with the bubonic plague. I just thought it was amazing that in this day and age, he had this stuff. He had a very swollen neck and under his arm. It just infected his glands. I remember talking to his mother. She didn't want to let him go to the hospital. If he didn't go, I guaranteed he would be dead in a week. The refugees had the belief if you go to the hospital you die. We got this fellow there and he was cured with penicillin. You could get the plague in the dry season before the rains came; apparently the rains killed the flu. We had to worry about it.

Q: Were you getting much on the political situation in Vietnam itself or could you find yourself living in your own little world pretty much?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, you lived in your own little world. We were surviving. We were under pretty frequent attacks. Little mortars fell regularly. There was an incident with a journalist, I think he was from New York. Anyhow, we were all in the military mess, in the military camp and mortars came in and we were just about to start dessert. We all dropped on the floor and these mortars dropped onto the compound and they were buzzing around and then it stopped. Everybody got up and brushed off the dirt and sat down and started passing the tea. This poor journalist was just shattered. He was off on the next flight out.

One other interesting thing while I was there. The senior officer, this colonel, had been wounded before I got there. Not in the same place, I forgot what location, but he had been leaning out of a bunker and a rocket came by and creased his head a little bit and he had a scar on his forehead. I went over to see him one afternoon after I was there five or six months. I parked the car and I was just about to go to his office, this was in the middle of the afternoon, and we got a shower of mortars. I was trying very hard to become part of the floor of this nearby building and my car got splattered. I had a white shirt on. When I got up, I looked like somebody who had just cleaned the chimney. The place was a mess. Our senior advisor was sitting at his desk and he had shrapnel come right through the wall. He had a package of cigars in his back pocket and they cut through the cigars and got him in the rear end so we had to move him around on a stretcher. We medevaced him out and he elected since that was the second time he was wounded, he elected not to come back. He allowed us to pack him out. We shipped his stuff to Saigon and I remember his replacement was a gentleman by the name of Lieutenant Colonel Ray Suarez, I believe from Mexico. Suarez was another volunteer who had extended his stay in Vietnam and he stayed close to a year or so. We were attacked and he was killed.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese officials you saw there?

LAHIGUERA: Well, we had a colonel who was the province chief and I thought he was very good. I remember when Suarez got killed, after the day we were supposed to be overrun, he went around in his armored personnel carrier and waved at everybody just to show that they had not gotten him. I worked with the Vietnamese district officers. I found them quite confident. There was some animosities between the Vietnamese and the Montagnards. That was a problem and I'm sure it still exists even now.

Q: Oh, I think it's traditional really. It's the mountain folks and the plains folks.

LAHIGUERA: Well, it's more than that because they're ethnically completely different. The Montagnards are more closely related to Cambodians and the Vietnamese are more closely related to the Chinese.

Q: Did you find yourself ever telling the Vietnamese officials to ease up or be better dealing with the Montagnards?

LAHIGUERA: What I did have to do was make sure that they provided the Montagnard refugees what they were entitled to. That was one of the things that I was there for. I had a counterpart in the Refugee Bureau. He managed to show that he had siphoned off some supplies and I had called in the inspector general for the Vietnamese service. They did an investigation and confirmed it. He was demoted, but he was sent to Dalat, which is a resort area. That was a very Vietnamese way of handling things. I think there was this feeling that Montagnards ought to be taught in Montagnard schools in Montagnard, in their language. I always thought this was insane because if they were going to learn, if they were going to participate in the Vietnamese economy, they had to learn Vietnamese and they had to be accustomed to dealing with the Vietnamese society. So, we did build refugee schools and staffed them with Vietnamese instructors. I don't think this was completely in accord with the instructions. First of all, we couldn't get Montagnard instructors and I didn't think it was realistic.

Q: How did the writ of CORDS and the embassy play where you were? Were you getting visitors from Saigon quite often from the CORDS headquarters and then also from the embassy and the political section and all that?

LAHIGUERA: In Song Be we didn't get too many visitors. We went down to Bien Hoa, which was the III Corps headquarters periodically and did reporting, but they seemed to feel if we survived we were meeting the requirements.

Q: I take it you really had the feeling that you were at the end of beyond or something?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, it was.

Q: Was there a feeling that this was a place where you could really hang out? Why weren't you overrun? Why did it stay this sort of static position of lots of fighting around?

LAHIGUERA: Well, they attempted to overrun us. I can remember towards the end of my time there, they made a major push against us and we brought in a lot of helicopter gun ships and these fixed wing aircraft. Puff the Magic Dragon was what they were called and all these 50 caliber machine guns on the side. We also had artillery. There was an artillery base in Quang Ngai. We pounded them pretty severely. After this one assault the Montagnards reported to us that the North Vietnamese forces carried the bodies out all night. We generally knew what unit was in the area and what regiment of course, so as I said we weren't talking about the so-called VC (Viet Cong).

Q: Well, you did this for what, almost how long were you there?

LAHIGUERA: Just over 18 months.

Q: That's a long time though in a place like that?

LAHIGUERA: Well, it, yes, I guess. Well, actually I take that back. In Song Be I was there a year.

PARKER W. BORG
Deputy District Advisor, CORDS
Binh Dinh (1968-1970)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Well then, you went to Vietnam when?

BORG: When I went to Vietnam it was the summer of 1968, and I was assigned immediately to a district headquarters up in the second military region, Province of Binh Dinh, where I was assigned as the deputy district senior advisor.

Q: You were there how long?

BORG: From 1968, summer of 1968, to December 1970.

Q: What was the situation there?

BORG: The district surrounds the city of Qui Nhon, the largest city in the province, but does not include the city. It had islands out in the ocean which had never been touched by the war. It had fishing villages along the sea which had minimal contact with the war. There was a leper colony that had also not been touched by the war. There were valleys where US troops had established their rear support elements, and there were miles and miles of slums. There were agricultural villages that grew rice. In the northern end of the province there were villages that had been destroyed and were no longer inhabited, and on the interior it went all the way into areas where the Montagnards lived. So it had sort of a full range of things that happened in the war, that the circumstances in Vietnam I could see in my district in a miniature form.

Q: What were your responsibilities?

BORG: I was the deputy district advisor. I had a major who was my boss. The district had about 250,000 people living in it, broken up into 26 villages and some 150 hamlets. On our direct team there were about six or seven people, and then I think it grew to maybe six or seven military advisory training squads and one civic action team. I was the deputy, meaning all of the military people reported to me, so I had some six or seven captains that reported to me and I reported to the major. We were integrated into the MACV (Military Assistance Command, Vietnam) structure.

Q: This must have been a little difficult for both sides, the captains to report to you and you to deal with the captains and all that.

BORG: Since I had had a year of Vietnamese and spoke the language and nobody else did, if the captains had come fresh from college or been in ROTC (Reserve Officer Training Corps) and come over to Vietnam fresh, I got along well with them. If they were somebody who had worked their way up from the ranks and been sergeants in the military and made it into the officer corps and they were some 40 years old or whatever they might be, they were a little more difficult to deal with.

Q: What were you all doing there?

BORG: My job, outside of the administration of the team, was to work on rural development, and over a period of time the program evolved so that I had a large sum of money - it was almost an endless pot of money - to be used in villages for village development programs. A Vietnamese counterpart and I would go around the country - almost every day we'd go to a couple of villages - and we would talk with the villagers about "What is it that you think your community needs?" What we tried to do was reinforce local government, get people to think about projects that they wanted to build in their communities, and see that they held meetings where they decided on the project, and then we provided the materials and the money in order to implement the project, and afterwards we would come around and inspect the projects to see that they were effectively done. This is what took up my days. In addition, I'd go out with the military advisory teams. Each of them was responsible for a certain number of local units. While there were American support elements that lived in the area, the defense was all in the hands of the local Regional Forces and Popular Forces, and our advisory training teams were training these units in defense of their communities.

Q: During the time you were there, what was the situation on the ground vis-à-vis the enemy?

BORG: This was, again, after the Tet Offensive and so there was a much greater awareness, because of the Tet Offensive, of where the Communist sympathizers were, so we had a pretty good understanding in our community of which villages and which hamlets were most sympathetic to the Communists, the Viet Cong. I remember one particularly illuminating story. I was out at a hamlet that had been many times fought over, and I talked with somebody in the village: "Tell me why is it that this group of people support the Viet Cong and this group of people don't," and they said, "Well, you have to understand that back in 1800/1850, we were invaded. When Vietnam had been unified by Gia Long, he sent his troops up and landed here, and some of the people stayed and they took the land away, and so the people who are with the Viet Cong now are the people who were dispossessed back in the 1890's or whatever it was, and so they've always been against the government and they're against the government now." What I learned elsewhere was that it was a very complicated series of local disputes that determined who was the Viet Cong in every one of the communities. We had a sense of who they were, where they lived, but our approach was to try and provide government assistance programs to all the villages, to all the hamlets, even those that were sympathetic to the Viet Cong, on the understanding that, if they could see that the government was doing something on their behalf, they might become more sympathetic to what was happening with the rest of the country.

Q: The Tet Offensive has been described as just taking the heart out of the Viet Cong because they threw all their cadre into that and so many were killed and all. Did this show itself where you were?

BORG: I think it did, yes. Our compound had been overrun during the Tet Offensive, and the place where my predecessor had lived had been destroyed, and he just happened to be out of town or out of the camp at the time. Otherwise he would have been killed. But the Tet Offensive was very serious in this particular area, and there were many fewer Communists but there were still the older people who were sympathetic and there were the younger people who hadn't quite gotten into the movement, but these were not troops that came in from the north who were fighting. These were local people who disagreed with the way things were going, and they banded together sometimes but more often they just fought individually.

Q: In your area was there any North Vietnamese army threat?

BORG: Not that we saw.

Q: What was your impression of the hand of the South Vietnamese government where you were?

BORG: The hand of the South Vietnamese government was invisible. There were regional officials appointed by the central government. There were health ministries in Qui Nhon and education ministries and so forth, but in terms of the impact, the knowledge that people had about the central government, it was nonexistent. People were concerned about their families first, their hamlets second, their village and their province, and everything else might well have been in South Carolina or Soviet Russia as far as they were concerned. It's not something that they really thought about.

Q: How did you feel that the AID program was going?

BORG: There must have been a macro-economic AID program which was run out of Saigon which, as far as we could see, had no impact whatsoever on anything we were doing. We had military assistance funds. All of the development activities that were going on locally were the things that we were funding. I'm sure I could find a book somewhere that describes what AID was doing, but there were no projects that I knew of anywhere in the area that were AID funded, although we worked with AID and I suppose our program was a big part of the AID effort.

Q: Where did your money come from?

BORG: I'm not sure whose budget it came out of. I suppose I could check, but I don't recall. We did not report anything through the AID bureaucracy in Saigon. The money came through the CORDS office, which was more closely connected with MACV. It wasn't even in the same set of buildings.

Q: How did you feel that the projects you were approving and looking at, were these things done in pretty good shape?

BORG: It was a mixed bag. It depended upon the community. We would go around, and the person who was my counterpart on these projects was incredibly tough on the villagers. He was a local boy, and he would go in and he'd periodically take the cement blocks that they had built and he'd drop them from shoulder height, they would shatter, and he'd say, "This is poor quality. You've got too much sand in these, and they're never going to work. We're not going to pay you any more money. You've got to find some community resources to replace what it is that you lost, and that's the way it is." He was very, very tough. He was subsequently ambushed and killed, but that was after I left. I think that to me would indicate that he was probably pretty tough his whole career.

Q: How did you find the US Army worked in your area?

BORG: Again, the only US military that we had any real contact with were the MACV people, and our CORDS/MACV program was sufficiently integrated that I thought at that time, and I still think, it was a very successful combination of civilian and military into a single organization. Yes, there were problems, but things worked far better and there were many more successes than there were failures.

Q: Did you get any feel about what the embassy was up to? Did you have people from the political section coming around and chatting with you?

BORG: Never. I had more journalists that came around from The Washington Post and the various other publications. I didn't know a soul who worked at the embassy. I guess there were provincial reporters.

Q: Usually it's the provincial reporters that get out and talk to people.

BORG: I could not recall who the provincial reporter responsible for where I was might have been, and I don't recall ever meeting the person although there must have been somebody that came out and did it. But, again, there were how many provinces in the country and there were how many districts? In Nam Dinh alone there were eight or nine districts, so the idea that a provincial reporter was going to come out to my district would have been happenstance. The person might have gone to some neighboring district. You were asking about the things that we did. One, we did the community development, and we also had the civic action team which we used if we needed really big materials for building bridges and so forth, I-beams or something like that. Their task was to go to the nearest US military unit and see what they could scrounge, and there was a group of champion scroungers. The second aspect of it was seeing that the military assistance teams understood the lay of the land, and I spent a lot of time with each one of the teams when they arrived, helping them to understand the section of the district that they were in, to understand that Vietnamese were not an enemy, and to talk with them about how to go about their activities to minimize the casualties. One of the things I discovered in our area was that the local Vietnamese officials did not want to see any casualties, so when I was going about my work, I made sure that I stopped in the local village headquarters and said, "We're here now and we're going down this path on our motorbikes, and this is where we're going to be at lunch," and so forth. We found that this kept us really quite safe. The violence in the area took place at night. Rarely was there anything that happened in the daytime. I spent a lot of time trying to help the young lieutenants and captains understand what it was that the war was about in the area. Then the third component was the evaluation of the security situation in each one of the communities, and I think you've probably heard about the Hamlet Evaluation System (HES). I can't believe now the amount of time we spent on the 10 different factors for each little hamlet, and we seriously attempted to make an honest evaluation of what the circumstances were. While there might have been pressure in some places to show improvements in the hamlet security, there certainly was no pressure ever applied to me to see how things have improved over a period of time, or now that you've got this military advisory team, aren't things much better. We certainly saw, when province senior officials came in, that a new province advisor immediately downgraded the security to the extent possible so that by the time they left things had been much better. But we declined to play that game in our community. We used to joke that, while security was bad in a number of communities where we were working, it was bad at night, whereas if you did a similar hamlet evaluation in Washington DC - this was 1968/'69 - some of the hamlets there would appear far worse and you wouldn't want to spend the daytime in some of these places.

Q: The major with whom you were working, was he feeling pressure from the American military to show something a little fancier?

BORG: I worked with two separate majors, both of whom were sufficiently out of their element that they left me alone, and they were quite happy to have me doing different things. They would attend the meetings in Qui Nhon, and I would try to avoid the meetings if I could. But I got along with them all quite well.

Q: How did you deal with something like the slugs, which wasn't a village? It was, I guess, a residue of the refugee program.

BORG: Is that what you call them, the slugs?

Q: The slums.

BORG: The slums, ah. We didn't do much. They were in such awful shape. They rarely had village organization. They were just accumulations of people that had assembled around the area where motor pools and various military camps had their logistical headquarters. So we really didn't even try to work with them. We had enough work with the agricultural communities.

Q: How about the Montagnards? Did you have much dealing?

BORG: Yes, we went down there. There was one village and it had about three or four Montagnard settlements, and the people there were, I think, maybe Banaa. I don't recall specifically, but there was a Korean unit, the Korean Tiger - it wasn't a regiment; it was a Tiger...

Q: Brigade.

BORG: No it wasn't a brigade.

Q: Battalion.

BORG: No, bigger, Tiger Division. The Tiger Division had its headquarters in my district over in one corner, and they didn't have any troops operating around their division headquarters. It was at the upper end of the Montagnard community, and so the Tiger Division provided basic defense down that valley, so there was never a security problem down there. We were able to work well on projects without much problem. In fact, one night we even went with the villagers hunting at night. This was something that was inconceivable in most parts of Vietnam, but they wanted to organize a hunting party at night, and we all put flashlights on our heads and went traipsing around the jungle killing what few animals that hadn't already been killed.

Q: The Koreans had the reputation of being quite tough, and so this meant that everybody avoided them, which included the loyal Vietnamese, the Viet Cong, the North Vietnamese.

BORG: That's right, absolutely, but they had already established their security system in the community by the time I got there, so I arrived with a peaceful status quo and it remained that way.

Q: When you left there, were there any incidents?

BORG: We were a district that was continuously under siege, one would say, in that we had rocket attacks at night, probably once a week. When I first got to the village, I had trouble sleeping at night because I was just very, very nervous about where I was and what was happening, but after I had been there for a while - I was there for a year and half - they couldn't even wake me up in the middle of a rocket attack. I was a security breach by not hiding under my bed; I just, you know, slept through. But we did have incidents. We lost two or three people from MAT's, military advisory teams, who were caught in ambushes and killed. But there was no defining event. I remember driving down the road one day and there was a group of soldiers assembled on the side of the road next to a big mountain, and the mountains in this area were not mountains so much as 300- or 400-foot piles of stones with all sorts of caves and so forth in them. They said, "We cornered a couple of Viet Cong in the cave." I said, "Oh, that's very interesting. What are you going to do?" and he said, "Well, we're going to call in air strikes." I said, "You're calling in air strikes, are you?" They said, "Yes, we've already called the base." There was an American military base at a place called Pooka not too far away. So before long the American jets - I can't remember what they were at the time - were circling not far above our heads and firing whatever they were firing at the time into these piles of rocks. We were all sufficiently close that when they struck the shrapnel would come all the way back to where the troops were standing. I'm not really familiar with military operations per se, but I was overwhelmed at how sort of casual and informal all of this was. It was a Vietnamese unit and they were engaging the enemy using American troops. But it wasn't long before all the local ladies were out there selling soft drinks and snacks. Here were the jets going over and people were going around, "Do you want a Coca Cola?"

Q: When you left there in 1970, what was your impression whither Vietnam?

BORG: Well, my impression, which I guess I developed maybe a quarter of the way, maybe I hadn't had at the beginning, was that the United States really didn't care particularly about what might happen in Vietnam as long as Communists didn't take over. The things that we were doing were all pretty marginal. We were holding the line. But what was most remarkable to me was that when I got there the Tet Offensive had ended but we were still under the Westmoreland doctrines of how to fight the war. Creighton Abrams took his place and supported everything that Westmoreland had done in words but reversed everything that Westmoreland had done in deed so that - it was called Vietnamization - we were providing advanced military equipment, the M16 rifles and the grenade launchers, and training local troops in the use of these pieces of equipment. So they were far more effective at defending their communities and they had far greater pride. We provided military uniforms for the first time, so they looked pretty spiffy. I felt that our pacification effort in this area had been a great success in that we had succeeded in building a sense within these communities that - again, I'm only speaking for the communities where I was working - they had pride in their village and the people wanted to defend their villages. We made a point, during the final eight months or so that I was there, of going out and spending nights in some of the more hotly contested villages, the district chief, myself, the major who was with us, and a collection of other officials, and we were defended by sometimes the local popular forces.

I left very pleased with the work that we had been doing in the villages. We also went through elections of the village chiefs and hamlet chiefs, so we had popularly elected officials in each one of the communities. They had their own military forces that reported to these leaders, and the communities seemed to be working. So I left with a sense of satisfaction, again feeling at the same time that the United States was not necessarily in it for the long-term development of places like this, because we were looking at the picture in Saigon and the leadership in Saigon, and that was absolutely irrelevant to what was happening in the villages. The political leadership in Saigon was not relevant.

Q: While you were there, did you have much of a chance to talk to other FSOs out there?

BORG: Yes, there were a half dozen or so FSOs working in the province with me, some in similar jobs to mine, and we had meetings once every couple weeks where we would talk about things. Different FSOs approached their jobs in different ways. Some of them did things very similarly to the way I did them, others spent as much time in their bunkers as they could, and there were some who went really gung-ho and strapped M16s on their backs and pretended they were junior power rangers or something going out shooting up the countryside and participating in ambushes. In our training program before we went out there they gave us weapons training so that we could shoot a .45, I think it was, and once I got there I was assigned a weapon. I was criticized by the other Americans on the team that I didn't spend the time that I should going to target practice and cleaning my weapon on a regular basis. They said it's really dusty and it's going to misfire. I responded to all this by deciding that the weapon for me was more of a threat to me than it was going to ever be of any use, so I made a point of never carrying a weapon. I always tucked my shirt in so that anybody who saw me could see that there was no gun anywhere. It was known that I did not carry a weapon, and I felt much safer this way than if I did have a weapon.

Q: From your other colleagues was there developed an esprit, or was it a job to get through and get the hell out? How did you feel?

BORG: It was a job to get through and get out. Yes, we had esprit in that we were all in this together, but I don't think people were under any illusion that we were making a big difference.

Q: So in 1970 whither?

BORG: In 1970 I was, in about October, getting ready to leave my district because we had 18-month tours. I was really interested in seeing the war from the perspective in Saigon, and so I began going down and talking with people about finding a job in Saigon. I was talking with the people in the office of Program Plans and Policy, which was run by Clay McManaway.

WILLIAM LENDERKING
Advisor to Vietnamese Information Representative
Pleiku (1968-1969)

Joint US Public Affairs Officer, USIA
Saigon (1969-1970)

A native of New York, Mr. Lenderking graduated from Dartmouth College and served a tour with the US Navy in the Far East before joining the Foreign Service of the US Information Agency in 1959. As Public Affairs, Press and Information Officer, he served in posts throughout the world and in Washington, D.C., where held senior level positions in USIA and the Department of State dealing with Policy, Plans and Research. Mr. Lenderking was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: And you were in Vietnam from '68 until when?

LENDERKING: I was there almost exactly two-and-a-quarter years, leaving in mid-winter of 1970.

Q: Let's talk about your initial impression. Before Tet, what were you told you would be doing and where were you going?

LENDERKING: I was in Saigon for a few days just for checking in and learning my assignment. My first impression is that it was lucky I had learned some Vietnamese because all new arrivals were supposed to be met at the airport and assigned to a hotel, because Saigon was very chaotic and they didn't want people wandering around getting lost and blundering into difficulty. In my case, there was a screw-up of some sort and I was neither met nor assigned a hotel; they had no record of my coming and I thought okay, if this is what Vietnam and the American involvement here is like, we're going to be in deep trouble. Guess what? I was right.

Anyway, I could speak Vietnamese so I made my way into town, having found a taxi and giving the driver directions on my own. We were not supposed to do that for security reasons, and I found a place to sleep and the next day I was able to straighten it out. But that was not a good start.

Q: What were you going to be doing?

LENDERKING: My assignment was a reflection of the unreality that people in Saigon had about the way the rest of the country worked. I learned right away I was going to Pleiku in the Central Highlands not far from the Cambodian border. My job was to be Psyops Advisor to the Vietnamese Information Service rep there, and the psyops advisor on the civil-military advisory team in Pleiku. The team was part of CORDS, the bureaucratic acronym for the pacification program. More on that later.

There had been a lot of fierce fighting in and around Pleiku Province, and the U.S. 4th Division was based outside the small city in a huge area. The climate was fairly nice but it was a poor provincial city and I, as a mid-level foreign service officer, definitely not a senior officer, was supposed to deal on equal footing with Major General Ray Peers, who was a legendary figure and a very senior Army general. He was commanding general of the Fourth Division, and there was no way he was going to deal with me as an equal. In fact, although I met and worked with many military men from the rank of captain on up, I never even met General Peers. So I found someone farther down the pecking order who I could deal with. The basic problem was that some of the objectives of the pacification program ("hearts and minds") were at cross purposes with the objectives of a big, tough Army division ("find the enemy and kill them.")

I was assigned to CORDS, which is the Civil Operation for Revolutionary Development Support, otherwise known as the pacification program, headed by Robert Komer at the time. We had an advisory team in which every significant Vietnamese official had an American advisor, a counterpart, who was supposed to get him resources and advise him on how best to pursue the war. On our team, which was more than half military, we had a group of about 45 or so military advisors and the civilian advisors numbered about six or seven, depending on the vicissitudes of the war and assignments. We civilians had our own separate compound, five or six people, and we lived about a mile away from the military advisory team compound. They were commanded by a full colonel and we worked very closely with those guys and they were, for the most part, very good. I got to know some of the younger officers quite well, as well as the colonel who was the head of the team, who was technically my boss and I got to know them all well and liked them a lot.

Q: This is before Tet; what was the situation in the field at that time in Pleiku?

LENDERKING: I stopped in Nha Trang on the way to Pleiku, which was the headquarters for Region Two. Vietnam was divided into four regions for purposes of military organization and I met with the senior psyop people in Region Two, and they said well, you come at a good time because we are expecting trouble. There has been a rising level of Viet Cong activity and we have lots of intelligence that there could be a major offensive and we're glad you're here. And in Nha Trang I had lunch with my predecessor, who was on his home.

Q: Who was that?

LENDERKING: His name was Frank Dean. This was the only time I ever saw him, and he was very, very glad to be leaving. He looked tired and sort of beaten down and he said with obvious relief, "I'm out of here." He then told me life in Pleiku would not be very comfortable – I was not going to like it, there are very few creature comforts, there is a lot of fighting and it is a dangerous place, and so on. He said just for his own privacy and wellbeing he rented a small house on the outside of town so he would not be crammed in with the military guys or the civilians. He said he saw them all the time, every day, and just needed a little privacy. Well, basically what he was saying was that he wanted to have a Vietnamese girlfriend in, so having his own house was very convenient for him. When I got to Pleiku I went and looked at this house, which was a small, rather forlorn house on the edge of town, but a bit nicer than living in the civilian compound with a tiny bedroom and a cot. But I said to myself, I'm so new here, I don't know the lay of the land, I'm hearing all these reports that there could be an attack, I don't even know how to get around on the roads and I'm not going to live out in that house until I know it's safe. And that saved my life because that house was overrun a couple of days later and was used as a temporary staging area for Viet Cong who would then go on to attack the town. So I moved in with my civilian colleagues on the advisory team. There were four or five or so of them and that was a good decision to make.

Q: We're talking now about the time just before all hell broke loose -- with all this talk of pacifying, what did that mean, exactly? What was your daily workday like?

LENDERKING: There were a number of projects all involving aid of one sort or another for the Vietnamese so the government would be able to show it was working for the people and the people would then be inspired to support the government. This could be building schools; it could be helping with the refugees and internally displaced people; there was a Chieu Hoi advisor who was supposed to work on messages and programs to encourage the Viet Cong people who might be wavering to defect; there were some construction projects and agricultural assistance, things of that sort. Anyone who was in Vietnam at the time, and thousands of Americans worked for CORDS in the provinces at one time or another, could probably talk for hours on these things, and all these programs were flawed because the war, in a place like Pleiku at the time, was overwhelming everything. And the Vietnamese people whose hearts and minds and basic allegiance we were competing for were just trying to survive and there was no program I could see that was reaching them in any way that would reassure them that the government was on their side because the government was in fact corrupt, a lot of the officials were venal, they were not interested in helping the people and they were badly organized and they were not very capable. That is, the Vietnamese military talent level was not very high in Pleiku, and in most places in Vietnam, with some notable exceptions. And civilian officials were even worse – more corrupt, less motivated, poorly trained and unqualified, you name it. To be fair there were outstanding exceptions and I did meet a few of those.

My Vietnamese counterpart was a civilian. He was lazy and corrupt; all he wanted from me was supplies that he could dispose of as he saw fit and to his own advantage. And he wanted me to get him a gun and help him find accommodations for his girlfriend, and things like that. Now, we were all under instruction to build rapport with our counterparts in order to make the advisory concept work, but I saw these things as outside my job description, shall we say. So I was beginning to see early on that there were deep flaws in this program and far from being reassured, as I was told in Washington I would be once I got with the program, my dismay was growing by leaps and bounds. And this was even before the Tet offensive.

Q: How did the American military welcome you and how did they feel the war was going?

LENDERKING: The American military people I met and worked with were, for the most part, exemplary people. I'm talking especially about some of the enlisted men and most of the young officers and the commanding officer of the advisory team, and he was a full Army colonel. And later on, the officers I worked with in JUSPAO in Saigon. These guys were well-trained, dedicated and probably more inclined to be gung ho than the civilians -- we were generally more skeptical -- but we got along well. There was a dichotomy -- the guys in the field tended to be realists because they dealt with the muck of the war every day at close quarters. The true believers tended to be more in Saigon, where they could talk about their pacification theories over after work drinks and didn't have to worry much about rockets coming in the window and things like that. Of course, even Saigon had plenty of action from time to time.

Anyway, whatever our misgivings in Pleiku, we were all there to do a job, and we all accepted that. We generally liked one another, we worked and socialized closely (social life in Pleiku consisted of a beer or two before dinner, and maybe a few more after as well). The military guys welcomed me and my civilian colleagues as valued members of the team, they depended on us to get out and see what was going on and we were extra eyes and ears for them. When I arrived, I was issued an old M1 rifle by the CIA, who apparently were authorized to give us these things. But we were non-combatants and I never fired it the whole time I was there, although I'd take it along on overland day trips of any distance outside of Pleiku.

Q: That's not much protection. It's an awkward weapon, and not easy to load.

LENDERKING: In that case I'm glad I never had to depend on it. I also had my own jeep, so I could go where I wanted and I often ventured out of the city alone to visit a village, talk to the people and try to gauge how things were going, what the people needed, and what we could do to further our mission. Doing this by myself probably sounds dangerous, and it was, but I wasn't foolhardy. It's interesting, but very quickly most of us developed a kind of sixth sense of when and where it was safe to go on a dirt road somewhere in a territory that is basically Indian territory. And when it was safe to enter a village, and when it might not be. In those situations, you rely more on your gut instinct than anything else, more than the morning intel briefing from the military guys. And so I developed this feeling quickly; it was maybe a couple of weeks after the Tet Offensive when I began to have this confidence. And you looked for telltale signs; for example, if you went into a village, if there were no people around, that was clearly a bad sign. Or if the little kids didn't come running out to greet you or something like that. If that ever happened I just turned the jeep around and off I went, and I wouldn't even get out of the jeep. But for the most part, everywhere I went I was in my jeep by myself so in that sense I was on my own in hostile territory. But it was not as dangerous as Baghdad is today. (July 2007).

But there was a very large U.S. and Vietnamese military presence in the province. So I traveled all over that province by jeep and to other places by helicopter and other airplanes of all kinds. I calculated once that I'd been in about 30 different kinds of aircraft in Vietnam during my two year tour. After I left Pleiku and was transferred to Saigon I went all over the country, so I saw a lot of it.

In our compound I was the only person who spoke Vietnamese, the only one who had had Vietnamese training, so one of my first duties was to check on the guards, old guys in sandals who always ran off at the first sign of danger, and who could really blame them? They also had a habit of dozing off at all hours – their jobs were unbelievably boring – so I'd say their only value was as a kind of deterrent. Occasionally, I'd see some Vietnamese, perhaps an itinerant food seller, stop and ask them questions, but if anyone wanted to enter the compound they wouldn't have been deterred by our guards.

Daily life in Pleiku was trying at best, but it was especially hard right after Tet. Of course, we were all grateful we'd survived a close call with no casualties at all, so that was important, and we got right back to work after a day or two and we knew that large offensive attacks from the Viet Cong were improbable for a while. But we had a number of housekeeping difficulties, the most important being that the generator for the compound lost power and we had no electricity and therefore no power to operate the water pump at a time when it was beastly hot and extremely dusty. There was a kind of laterite red dust that would seep into everything – our living areas, our clothes, our vehicles, our hair, our eyes, our noses, everything. There was no protection from it, so at the end of the day the thing you wanted first off was a shower. Although we tried to fix it ourselves and had several mechanics in, we could only get it running for short periods. It was a heavy generator housed in an outdoor shed, and it took three or four of us at full strength to turn the crank to turn the wheel to try to get the generator started. It was very hard work, and most of the time it was futile.

Now, we had maids come in every day to clean the floors and wash our clothes because they would get so dirty, and they would use whatever power we had to wash the clothes. And so we could not get the generator fixed and I was designated as the compound person to talk to the maids and to the one guard we had out at night whenever we had a problem. I explained to them as best I could that we had a water problem and to go ahead and clean the houses and wash the clothes but try to conserve water. And every day when we were coming back from our day's adventures, usually about 4 pm, the maids would just be squeezing the last drops of water from the wet clothes and walking off to spend the night with their families, and they'd say to us with a smile, "Hut nuoc roi," which means "water gone already." I can't tell you how those three little words came to have a dispiriting affect on us. Of course, we eventually got the generator fixed, but I think it took about four weeks.

Now, just to finish the housekeeping details, we may have had a small oven in the back of the main house but we hardly ever used it. Instead we jumped into our vehicles and went up to the Advisory Group quarters and joined them for meals, which we paid for. That way we didn't have to cook, or clean up.

Q: OK, now when was the Tet Offensive? Was there any lead up to it where you were, and what happened?

LENDERKING: When I got to Pleiku, people again said there were a lot of indications that something big could be underway. And the second in command of psyops in Region Two in Nha Trang came up with me, and I guess he did this with all new people, to introduce them around to the brass and say to the various military commanders, here is this guy, he can help you get the message out and you've got to work with him, and so on. So I appreciated that. He was very pleasant and helpful, a lieutenant colonel, and the first night we were there he stayed in the civilian compound with us, and there was an extra bed in my room. It must have been about 2:00 in the morning, there was some shelling and it sounded like really close, artillery shelling and machine gun fire, and of course I was very startled, it was my first experience of this. I jumped out of bed and said, "what's going on?" And I hear this voice from the floor, and Ben, the Lt. Col, is down there lying flat, and he says in a slow drawl, "better hit the deck, Bill." And so that was my introduction. So, right from the get go, there was a lot going on.

The Fourth Division had their big division headquarters outside of Pleiku, maybe ten miles, but there was also a big installation at the airport, about three or four miles from our compound, which was close to the tiny downtown of Pleiku. There was a big airfield there and it was used for both civilian and military purposes, and there was a big military installation there that was part of the Fourth Division. They had a military field hospital and I used to go up there all the time. There was a small PX (post exchange) and you could buy provisions and it was clean and you could get a cold beer and slightly different food. I used to go up there in the evening because it was like something out of MASH; they had a field hospital and I started hanging out with some of the nurses; it was just nice to go and have a beer with them after they got off work. But I would pop into the field hospital to see if anyone was interested in a beer and just getting off work. And often they were just mopping up the blood from an operation they'd just finished on a wounded soldier. So it was pretty graphic. And they were a pretty plucky bunch so it was nice just to sit down and talk with them for a little bit because it was kind of a lonely place. I got along well with all my civilian counterparts too; they were great guys and we all bonded. We might not necessarily have been close friends in any other circumstances but we became very close and of course all we did was talk about the war and I learned a great deal from them because I was the new guy.

Q: So what happened during the Tet offensive?

LENDERKING: Our little compound had four very small buildings, maybe 2-3 basic bedrooms in each one, like a cabin, except that the buildings were just cement blocks and had mostly cement floors. So during the main night of Tet, firecrackers were going off all over the place after dark because that is the principal way the Vietnamese have of celebrating that holiday, Chinese New Year, the biggest holiday in Vietnam and China.

The Viet Cong cleverly used all the noise and smoke as cover to disguise their attack, and soon there was a lot of gunfire and it occurred to us that there was something more than firecrackers going off. At first we didn't think anything of it but we were a little bit nervous. Also, for a couple of nights previous, there had been really concentrated attacks on Camp Holloway, which was where the Fourth Division helicopters and small planes, used for reconnaissance and forward air control, were kept, and that was quite near our compound, only about a mile from where we were so we heard all of that, but wouldn't find out until the next morning what was going on.

And not to string this out too long, but we got word by radio from our military guys about a mile up the road that there was an attack going on and the best they could tell was that there was a small platoon of Vietnamese Regular Army Rangers out there, about 12 guys, in a rice paddy and that is where the attack in this part of the town was coming from. So get ready, they told us, the attack is coming right towards you and we don't know where they are planning to attack but there are some of the enemy right there. And this was about a mile away, over nearly open ground.

And so we heard this; we had a bunker inside our building, and it had sandbags and a metal airway runway piece over it and we had some hand grenades and a couple of guys who knew how to use weapons. I would have been hopeless because all I had was my M1 rifle and a grenade with a pin sticking out of it. But we had a Filipino Special Forces guy who was the civilian advisor to the Chieu Hoi program, aimed at persuading the Viet Cong to lay down their arms, and he knew what he was doing. And it was a comfort to have him there along with a couple of other guys who'd had recent military experience. But we wouldn't have been a match for anyone had they come in the door. Of course, our one guard, an old man with a wispy beard, ran off the minute the guns started firing.

So the Viet Cong are coming up the dirt road and I'm thinking, "Oh my God, what am I doing here?" My civilian boss, the head of the civilian team, was nervous and he said, if you're not comfortable staying here, they have room for us to stay overnight with the Advisory Team just a mile up the road. And we all discussed it and decided we were going to stay where we were, where we'd be less of a target and had the flexibility of moving around if we had to. If we're going to be attacked, we're going to stay here together, we decided. And the military team up the road was much better armed and there were active duty guys who knew how to fight. But they were much more likely to be a target for rockets and direct attacks that we couldn't handle, so we guessed that although the Viet Cong knew we were there (we'd received threatening notices before), we were not a very important target to them so took our chances by maintaining the lowest possible profile.

The civilian boss headed up to the military compound for the night, and when he left he was very nervous. The rest of us stayed, and we survived; so did all the military advisors up the road. The Viet Cong came close, but did not enter our compound.

Q: How long did this last?

LENDERKING: All night. At one point it sounded very, very close as though there was fighting just outside the gate. And I firmly believe, but I can't prove it, that it was that small Vietnamese platoon of rangers that saved our lives. They were not defending us, but they were blocking access to the city from a large rice paddy, and they either deflected or turned back the Viet Cong choosing to enter the town that way. Now, we never saw those guys, and we often disparaged the Vietnamese army because it was rife with corruption, incompetence, and lack of discipline. So maybe it's a bit ironic that a platoon of Vietnamese rangers inadvertently saved our lives.

No one came bursting through the door or anything like that. But a couple of guys I knew in other places like Hue were in fact captured and killed in circumstances much like that.

Q: So in Pleiku, was the Tet Offensive sort of a one day thing?

LENDERKING: It was really basically one day. And the next morning, this is my recollection, we went into town and all the buildings had huge artillery and shell holes in them, plus strings of holes where bullets had hit. And there were all the corpses of the Viet Cong and the people were standing there holding their noses because they were decaying and puffing up in the sun and the smell was pretty powerful. There must have been a couple of hundred bodies. The Army put them out to impress the people that they'd whipped the Viet Cong. And by this time the sun was out, and it was quiet, there was no more fighting, and the townspeople were just standing there, clutching a handkerchief or something to their noses, not talking, just standing there looking. In addition to the scene right in the central square of the town, which had just a few buildings, there were outlying hamlets and villages. One in particular, a hamlet with perhaps a hundred two-room shacks arranged on the side of a hill, the Viet Cong entered in force, and for some reason lost to history they made a fatal mistake by allowing themselves to be caught in daylight out in the open without any cover except those tiny houses, from which the occupants had apparently fled. And our pilots, I don't think the Vietnamese Air Force was involved, spotted them and just cut them to pieces and I think there must have been several hundred killed and they were lying all over the place. All the houses had huge holes in them from the firing – they looked like Swiss cheese. One of my colleagues said you know, they are our enemy and they would have killed us but you almost have to feel sorry for those poor devils who got caught in that, because it was carnage.

Q: Was this mainly from an air attack?

LENDERKING: Yes. I think the main body of the Fourth Infantry Division, a huge army division, was out fighting in outlying areas. In that period, there were some legendary battles, the Ia Drang Valley, other places in Pleiku and Kon Tum provinces, where there were some fierce set piece battles, mostly before Tet.

Q: Were these Viet Cong as opposed to regular North Vietnamese?

LENDERKING: Yes. None of the people I saw had regular uniforms on. They had just peasant gear of some sort but they were all armed and suffered heavy casualties.

Now, right after this we had a post-mortem, and some of the military guys were crowing about what a stunning defeat this was for the Viet Cong. And here we were talking about the whole country, our region, about the Vietnamese who penetrated our embassy in Saigon and were fighting almost hand-to-hand with our people in the embassy. And some of the military guys were insisting it was a huge setback for the enemy and a lot of us didn't see it that way at all. We were surprised at just how enormous an attack they had been able to mount countrywide and how close they had come to actually turning the situation entirely to their favor. Yes, they certainly took heavy casualties but then in the following days the security situation was not any better for us. The attacks, after a day or two, mounted up again. The roads were often not safe to go on; you took a chance when you went out to a village. We all did it. If we could, we would go out in a helicopter because it was safer. But it was always dangerous.

I remember going out on a road in the morning, it was a dirt road going to a village I had to visit, and it was fine. And when I came back several hours later there was a Vietnamese Cit-lo, a little putt-putt kind of thing, lying smoking beside the road. In other words, it had passed over a bomb and detonated it (what was later called in the Iraq insurgency war of 2005-2008 an IED – improvised explosive device) and these kinds of bombs were placed in the roads all the time. I should explain that most of the roads in Pleiku province were unpaved, but the main ones were broad and not rutted, so you could drive around 50-60 mph on them without a lot of discomfort, although you kicked up a lot of dust. Anyway, the Cit-lo detonated the bomb on the exact spot I had passed over earlier. How did I miss it? Or, was it planted after I passed over it, in broad daylight? Either way it was spooky, and it could have been me and my jeep that were detonated. That's the way it was.

Q: What was the population of Pleiku? It was up in the highlands; were these Montagnard or was it a mixed population?

LENDERKING: It was mostly Montagnard, although there was a small overlay of Vietnamese small businessmen in the town. And the Montagnards in Pleiku consisted of several tribes, principally the Rhade and Jarai. They spoke their own languages and they even had different kinds of huts and villages. They had not been very well treated by the Vietnamese and, as it turned out, not very well by us either, although most of the Montagnards were friendly to us and some of them became fierce fighters on our side. The biggest project I was involved in was one to relocate the Montagnards to a safer place and turn the area in which they farmed and lived into a free fire zone. The idea was that they would be safe and we would provide security and anyone moving in the rest of the surrounding area would be fair game. And to make sure the population understood this we dropped leaflets. Well, can you imagine anything more ineffectual than that? And people went around in the villages and said you have got to stay out; this was their land, mind you, this was where they farmed, this was where they roamed freely. I could give you a lot more details about this project, which was huge. It involved building almost a mini-city on what looked mostly like scrub land – perhaps thousands of huts with tin roofs, in a new community called Edap Enang. This large village we built was supposed to accommodate thousands of people but it had no infrastructure to it. It seemed to some of us the real question was, how are these people going to live and how are they going to survive?

To answer your earlier question, I don't recall how large the population was but it was not a heavily populated province. It had a couple of plantations, tea plantations, that had been run by the French, and the French plantation owners wanted to stay. They didn't like us at all because they knew that wherever we were there was going to be fighting. And some of the plantation owners, I think, stayed on but maybe had to leave eventually when the North Vietnamese won the war. I don't know if some managed to stay. But I never got to know them.

Q: Were there Special Forces camps around there?

LENDERKING: Yes. There were a couple, especially over near the Cambodian border because that was an area the Viet Cong used often, for infiltration and safe haven. And so I was over there a lot. We had a Special Forces guy who stayed with us for a while in our compound. We always had an extra bed or two if someone wanted to come in and the guys would come in sometimes and they just wanted a shower and a hot meal. And wow, they looked awful. They had rings in their ears and they were covered with dirt and dust and they really looked like savages. You had to feel sorry for them -- they were pretty tough guys to be living out there under those conditions -- but they were so grateful just to have a warm shower and a decent meal.

Q: Did you get any feel for efforts of the central government to put teachers in the provinces or anything like that?

LENDERKING: This was a problem. We were filing reports all the time, and we had a weekly province report and all the different section chiefs would write something. The reports were nonsense because it was all based on numbers: this week we opened X number of schools; used X bags of cement and rebar to build houses; spent X number of dollars. These were used to compile progress reports and because the totals were going up, Saigon could report we were making "progress." But none of the real questions were addressed: there were no teachers for the new school buildings, or they were unqualified, or the Viet Cong had killed them or intimidated them and they had run off; the cement and rebar were being pilfered by the Vietnamese, or watered down so that if you walked across the cement floor in a new schoolroom the cement cracked under your feet -- things like that.

So basically, the idea was not to talk about what was happening, really, but to inform Saigon what problems we had solved. This approach was supposed to be forward looking and we were encouraged to put in these progress reports what we had accomplished during the week or previous weeks so people would say our projects continued to make progress. They all seemed to start out that way. So we had all these empty shells all over the country that we had built and were not being used. And we had education advisors who could not get textbooks and all kinds of essentials. So there were major, major dysfunctions.

Q: Well, was anybody coming from headquarters and from CORDS and asking how are things going? And could you tell them and did they pay any attention?

LENDERKING: All the time they came. And most of them would make sure they did not stay overnight because it made them nervous. And I can understand that. I mean, I got to feel that, after I had been there several weeks, I got used to it and my anxiety level went down because I was dealing with the situation every day. But if you came from Saigon you did not want to stay in a place like Pleiku overnight. But they came all the time and yes, we took them around to the projects, we told them things are not going well here. About this time I formed the conclusion, and I think it is very relevant to the situation in Iraq today, that without security there is nothing; nothing can happen. You can have a corrupt government and a situation where justice is episodic and the government takes advantage of the people and rips them off and so on.

But if the government provides a modicum of security and exerts its authority over territory then you have a situation which is at least viable, and maybe some projects and programs can be initiated. But without security nothing is possible, and that is what we found, in Pleiku and elsewhere. There was no security, there was no place that was secure. And so all these projects, all the money we were expending...I can't remember how much money I had but I would go to the one bank in Pleiku, this tiny little place, and draw down my account and there were wads of piastres, you could put them in a gym bag or something like that. And I paid my Vietnamese assistant, and the culture-drama team we operated in the province. The culture drama teams were one of the few things we did that actually worked, and ironically the idea for them was borrowed from the Viet Cong. They were teams of Vietnamese entertainers that operated in most provinces, singers and storytellers, who would go into the villages dressed in black pajamas and they would get the people involved in stories and they would tell them that the Viet Cong were bad and not to support them. It sounds simplistic, and I was initially skeptical but I developed tremendous admiration for these mostly young people, who were brave, intelligent, and talented. They could sing, dance, tell stories and argue politics in a way that people could understand and respond to. They lived at the grass roots and they were like troubadours. And they were very impressive. My Vietnamese was not great but it was good enough so I could talk to them. They knew that if they got caught they were certainly going to be killed, and the women, who often were young and attractive, would have terrible things happen to them.

Well, CORDS was a huge organization and there were literally hundreds of different programs and some of them were imaginative. But in the end they didn't make much difference because the security was never good enough; the soldiers were generally poorly led although some of the Vietnamese officers were outstanding. But in a situation like that, the Vietnamese never developed enough confidence that they could handle the job, and all our programs couldn't instill that in them. So what you ended up with was a very large army with every individual top to bottom motivated chiefly by the need to save himself and his family rather than fight for his country.

I have to tell you one little anecdote because it was memorable. There was some criticism of the civilian team that I belonged to, and I guess just through attrition, no one was killed but some people left and they were not replaced, so perhaps by default I became deputy province senior advisor, a grandiose-Potemkin-like title. What it meant was that I was no longer just the psyops guy but the senior civilian in the province. We always had a military guy as the senior guy and the top civilian was his deputy. The whole advisory team was about 55 or 60 people, military officers and enlisted and civilians, and I was, for a number of months, in charge of the civilian team of about six or seven guys so there was a real imbalance. But I felt the whole situation there was not going well and that the programs were ineffectual. There was criticism of the team from some of the military guys because while we did not have much security our little compound was a little more comfortable to live in and at the end of the day we could have a couple of beers and put our feet up and play some poker or talk, and it was more congenial. And so there was a little bit of resentment on the military side, that they took all the risks but we lived better. But we did not live very well; I mean, there were rats in our houses and other unwholesome aspects, and it was not all that comfortable. The Filipino Special Forces guy got bitten one night and had to have that very painful series of 13 rabies shots in his stomach.

So I asked to go out on an overnight patrol one night and the colonel said okay, I know you are not a combatant, you are not experienced with weapons. You know there is a big risk and if you want to take it I'm not going to say no but keep your wits about you and so forth. And a couple of civilian guys said, you know, if you have to use a rifle you will shoot yourself in the foot. And they checked me out a little more. Anyway, I did this and I went out on an overnight patrol and it was a memorable experience because it was scary. The purpose was to surround a Vietnamese hamlet in which there were suspected Viet Cong, enter by surprise at daybreak and see if we could capture any suspects. We had to travel through heavily wooded areas; at any point we could have run into an ambush. The senior American was a savvy young captain I respected, and we had a radio man and we had me, and I was not supposed to be there. And there were about 50 or 60 Vietnamese troops, and they were carrying a heavy machine gun and their own individual weapons. And even I, inexperienced as I was, became alarmed at their behavior because we were supposed to be moving silently and they were bunching up and giggling from nervousness; we had to keep telling them not to bunch up and to spread out, because if we were ambushed we would all be killed in one burst. We came to a stream we had to cross, and one of them couldn't swim at all and would have drowned from the heaviness of his pack if we had not grabbed him and pulled him across. I found I was going back and forth helping these poor guys get across the stream and they were scared, they were alarmed and afraid they were going to get ambushed and killed and they were certainly more nervous and alarmed than I was. I realized they were just young Vietnamese soldiers and probably hadn't had much training.

Anyway, the idea was to enter the hamlet at daybreak, surprise some people in there, and maybe capture some weapons and suspects. We reached an open field at the edge of the hamlet while it was still dark and decided to stay there until daybreak. Now, one of the most fearsome and effective weapons we had was what we called spooky, which was a helicopter with a Gatling gun arrangement mounted that could fire something like 600 rounds a minute. And when those things opened up they could cover a field in a matter of seconds and put direct fire into every square foot of that field.

While we were lying in this field waiting for the night to end so we could enter the hamlet, there was a spooky operating perhaps a quarter mile from us, and it was firing at something but it was circling around and getting closer and closer to us. And it dawned on us as it was getting closer to us the crew didn't know we were there. And so we thought well, friendly fire, we could easily be killed. Finally the captain got the radio man and he broke radio silence -- we were not supposed to do this, but he got on the radio and he said, using very strong language, there is a Vietnamese platoon down here and an American advisory team and get the hell away from us. So they did and we weren't killed and the next morning we went into the village and people were surprised; we got a couple of suspects. There was no firing; the suspects were rounded up and taken off for questioning and that was the end of it. But we knew that because we were going to turn them over to the Vietnamese they would probably be beaten badly or something like that.

Every day it seemed like something happened that was memorable and indicative of what was happening in the war. Right after the Tet Offensive, almost immediately afterwards, General Westmoreland, who was commander of the American forces in Vietnam, went around the country to see the soldiers and give them encouragement. The Tet offensive had been a major upset, so these visits were both timely and necessary for morale. Now, the field hospital I mentioned was quite a nice, clean, well staffed hospital, and I received a radio message saying there was a North Vietnamese prisoner up there and he's been wounded. He's lying in a hospital bed and he's so grateful for the care he's getting that he's ready to talk, and we can use that for a propaganda message.

So I got my tape recorder and I raced up there and I saw this guy, and there were some other Vietnamese soldiers in there too, and the poor guy was in bad shape, all bandaged up, conscious but grimacing with pain. He'd been getting good treatment. I talked to him, and I could make myself understood to him. I could ask him who he was and how he was feeling, but he was in no shape to talk to anyone. He was hurting and it wasn't because he was hostile or anything like that, but I think he was just glad to be alive, just as any of us would have been. But he was in bad shape. So I realized that messages were getting distorted from the grassroots as they went up the line. This guy was in no condition to talk to anyone, so the idea of getting a useful statement or something was just nonsense. And I went back a couple of times and he was never in any condition to say anything that would help us.

Anyway, in the midst of all this in comes Westmoreland and he's going along and the North Vietnamese soldiers, there were only three or four of them as I remember, were lying right in adjoining beds to the Americans and there was no problem, no one was worried about security or anything like that. The guys were all wounded, some pretty badly, and that was the one thing they shared. And so I said hello to the general and I must say, he was very impressive. He made some major mistakes in Vietnam; mainly we had a strategy that was based on measuring our success by body count and that was not the way to measure success or failure. There were also distortions in how we counted the casualties. But he was a good soldier and I was very impressed with the way he greeted the wounded American soldiers, stopping to talk to each man informally, with no pomp or standoffishness due to his rank, and he put his arm on them and for a minute or two it was just one soldier talking to another. It was quite moving. So that was another indelible experience for me.

Q: As time went on, what were you getting from the village chiefs? Did you feel you were getting true stories from them or were they looking to you to give them supplies and they would say whatever it took to get them?

LENDERKING: I think they would tell us anything they thought we wanted to hear that would help them. The CORDS hierarchy seemed to assume that it was a simple matter to go into a village unannounced, seek out the village chiefs or elders, sit them down, find out what they needed, and then put it all together and chalk up another success. I was among the more fluent Vietnamese speakers of all the provincial CORDS representatives, but the level of communication I had with the village folks was quite primitive, not because I couldn't communicate in Vietnamese, but because the cultural and political divide was enormous and couldn't be bridged by simplistic contact. That was a basic lesson that most Americans just didn't understand about grass roots nation building across cultures.

On paper our CORDS organization looked good. But it didn't account for practical obstacles that we were never able to overcome. In Pleiku, there was a province chief who would be similar to a governor; a province was the same as a state and he was a Montagnard, so that was good. But he wasn't an educated man, he didn't have a lot of experience. He had an unfortunate habit of giggling, and looked out of place in a uniform so there was no inspirational leadership he could provide to his province. But his chief military man was a Vietnamese major and he was very good, brave officer, one of the truly good ones. I wonder what happened to him. But anyway, a lot of the Vietnamese military leadership was not competent.

One day I was out in a village where the province chief was supposed to go and I don't know what happened, but there were all these aircraft around and he was supposed to be transported by helicopter. I went out in my jeep – it was a big ceremony or something -- because there wasn't any room in the helicopters that were going out. The province chief was going to say something at a ceremony. We would have these things from time to time, where they would round up the villagers and make them stand out there in the sun for a couple of hours and then a dignitary would come in, like a province chief, and he would walk around and say a few words, then get back in his helicopter and off he'd go. You had to wonder, what are we accomplishing with this kind of nonsense?

So anyway, the province chief's helicopter did not come and I got on the radio and tried to straighten things out. I saw all these helicopters going back and forth, and finally it's getting dark and still no helicopter for the province chief, who didn't have any security guards with him and he was getting a little nervous. You didn't want to be out anywhere outside of the town after dark, certainly not on the roads because the night belonged to the Viet Cong. And so they finally said well, there are no helicopters, they're all assigned. And sometimes helicopters would be assigned to some high ranking officer to take his girlfriend around or something, in addition to official missions. Now it was getting dark so I said to the province chief come on, let's go, I'll take you in my jeep. And he climbed in beside me, in my jeep with a canvas top, and I guess we were probably about 30, 40 kilometers from Pleiku. I hit the pedal hard and headed back as fast as I could go on the unpaved road, and I thought well, wouldn't it be nice if the Viet Cong caught us, and the province chief would be a nice catch for them. Anyway, we got back. I guess the moral is that there were always things to be worried about, something was always going wrong, but this was life in a war zone. There was reason to be concerned on this day but nothing happened. So you'd think you were just lucky.

I guess I should say a word or two about danger. These were new experiences for me, and even though I had military experience, I was at sea in the Navy and that didn't include combat. I was certainly apprehensive about a lot of situations I encountered in Vietnam, first in Pleiku which was a hot combat zone, and later in Saigon, when a guy could throw a bomb from a motorcycle into an open café and take out most of the people inside. That happened sometimes, and I experienced one or two such incidents at close range. I can't say I became nonchalant, but life does go on, even in a combat zone. I mentioned that I developed a kind of sixth sense that I learned to depend on, and that gave me confidence. Still, I'm sure at many times I let my guard down and was just lucky that nothing happened. I don't think I was ever specifically a target. Yet, people I knew were killed in some of the same circumstances I was living through every day, so it wasn't like a walk in the park.

Most of us coped – it was something you did. But some people, including American military officers, Vietnamese troops, seasoned Foreign Service officers, cracked under the everyday tensions, which weren't palpable but just a fact of life. In any case, an Army major I knew quite well said, "I just can't take it any more." He was worried about his wife, his family, and of course himself. I think he was transferred, and that was probably wise. So, I have nothing really profound to say about facing danger, and don't consider myself brave, but you either do it or you don't, and there's no predicting how a given person will react. Most people I saw, including the Vietnamese people who were generally under much greater duress than we were, took it in stride and did the best they could day by day. A few couldn't deal with it, and I never thought they were cowards or anything like that.

Now, getting back to CORDS, there was a disconnect between policy and what was actually happening. Robert Komer, who was an ex-CIA guy and in overall charge of the huge CORDS operation – he was nicknamed "the blowtorch" because he knew he was dealing with a cumbersome Vietnamese bureaucracy and a huge American unwieldy bureaucracy and a very, very difficult war -- Komer's idea was apparently to pump money and resources into the economy through all these programs, get them going and that is how reconstruction and development would happen. Well, it didn't happen that way at all. I think there were some good ideas but they were tried too late and by the time of the Tet Offensive it was too late. I would say Komer was a very smart man; he was not a good listener and he was not a success. His successor was Bill Colby, who later became head of the CIA, and he came up to Pleiku to talk to us and I was very impressed with him. He was a very smart man and he seemed to be one of those guys who knew what you are going to say before you said it, and then paraphrased it better than you could have. He was clearly well briefed and knew about all the jargon and all the field talk; he never asked, what are you talking about. And he would say, we need you guys to do a better job. One thing we had to do on the psyops side was send in a weekly attitude report, which got to be kind of a joke because how could an American out in some province or in Saigon gauge what the peoples' attitudes were, especially if he didn't speak Vietnamese, and most of us did not. Even if we did speak Vietnamese, and I spoke well enough to talk to people about serious topics, who are you going to talk to? You go into a village and go up to some guy out of the blue and start asking him questions, is what he is telling you just blowing smoke or is he actually telling you something? Well, of course, you can't just happen on a stranger in a foreign country and expect him to tell you anything useful about what's going on in his life.

Anyway, the idea developed, I guess it was on Komer's watch, you had to specify in the report who you had spoken to. So these guys were saying, you know, seven cyclo drivers and four bar girls said they feared the Viet Cong were going to come again, or some such thing, and it was total nonsense. So Colby said look, we need to know better what you are doing and who you're talking to. You've got to find people who are credible interlocutors, talk to them, and report what they say. I know it sounds easy, but it wasn't, and it didn't happen except in some of the larger cities where it was a little bit possible to build some rapport with local leaders, politicians, merchants, soldiers, whatever.

I believe Colby knew the whole CORDS program was in deep trouble, and there are a number of things he did -- I can't remember all the details -- to tighten things up and just make us stop chasing after mirages and get down to reality. And in fact after some months things started to get better and we had some military successes and the follow up was much more effective in terms of getting resources to the grass roots and establishing an anti-Viet Cong presence in the villages and so forth. So it was a mixed situation say, maybe eight or nine months after the Tet Offensive.

Q: Did you get to Nha Trang or Saigon from time to time?

LENDERKING: As often as I could. My usual feeling, even to go to Nha Trang, a small city on the beautiful Region II east coast, was that I was a country boy allowed a few hours in the big city. After Pleiku it almost seemed that way. There was an excellent French restaurant in Nha Trang and the city is right on the South China Sea; the location is beautiful and the beaches are gorgeous. Now, you had to be careful if you were going to go out and spend any time on the beach; there was no security out there and also the kids, if they could, would rip you off. I lost a nice camera when I was a little careless and it was gone in a flash.

Q: I lost a pair of pants at Vung Tao (a famous Vietnamese beach resort).

LENDERKING: I'm not surprised. The kids would take everything they could grab. But people from Saigon were going out to Vung Tao. I only got there once and it was a very quick visit; I didn't have time to even walk on the beach but it was crowded. Now, here was another aspect of that crazy war -- you'd go to Saigon and wild parties were going on -- guys with money in their pockets and beautiful women available -- and it was a totally different atmosphere from the austere countryside, where it was dangerous every minute, there were no amenities, and the most you could look forward to was a couple of beers and some conversation at the end of the day. Of course, Saigon could be dangerous too at times, and it certainly was dangerous during the Tet Offensive, but you could go up to the roof of one of the major downtown hotels such as the Caravelle, or the Continental, with its large open street level veranda where guys used to sit and drink a citron presse or a beer at the end of the day and watch the staggeringly lovely Vietnamese girls float by or putt-putt down the avenue on their scooters. The Majestic was the third big hotel, and it was right on the Saigon River, so it had a great vantage place for watching the war, just across the river, in full technicolor. You often could see up close a firefight in progress, with helicopters firing rockets, machine gun fire rattling into the night, and so on.

Q: I remember seeing the movie "Patton" and watching traces go up in the air and flares going off...it was an odd world. So, did you develop a sort of country boy versus city slicker attitude toward your American counterparts?

LENDERKING: For sure, yes. One thing that is legendary, even to this day, is the daily press briefings that were held at JUSPAO, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office, which USIS operated with the military. And those came to be known as the five o'clock follies. At any given time there were 4-500 foreign correspondents there in-country and some of the really top names in journalism were there at one time or another as foreign correspondents. So it was a big deal, and this was how the world was seeing the war, through what these guys wrote.

One experience I had in Pleiku: we were informed that a Viet Cong company had surrendered, and this was a big coup for us because the Chieu Hoi or amnesty program was not really successful. Some people came in but they were low level people and they were just tired of the war and we very rarely got anyone of any consequence. For this reason, the surrender of a large number of the enemy was a big deal. But I was a personal witness to all this, and my colleagues who went out to check and see who those folks really were saw right away they were just bedraggled Montagnard villagers forced out of their homes and just trying to survive. They'd been uprooted from their village by the war and had been wandering about for some time without much water or food, and maybe a couple of them had old rusty guns or something. They weren't Viet Cong, they weren't combatants – they were just part of the war's huge flotsam, but somehow someone thought it would be helpful to call them Viet Cong and report they had come in and laid down their arms. So after hearing from my colleagues in Pleiku what this incident was about, the very day I went to Saigon on other business, and at the end of the day I went to the Five O'clock follies. And guess what they are talking about? The big news of the day, announced to a briefing room full of war correspondents was this: a company or a platoon of 55 hard core Viet Cong have come over to our side. And I took this in from the back of the room, and I said to myself, this is just total bullshit. And this is what happens: an incident of some kind occurs, and immediately it is passed up the line, getting more distorted at each link in the chain. Now, obviously I wasn't going to say anything there but I went afterwards and said you know, I'm from Pleiku and my colleagues saw these people you're calling defectors, and what was said just now was total nonsense. Well, they didn't want to hear that. I was pouring water on their story. They didn't want to hear me out and put out a correction; they wanted me to go away and not come back. I could give you many such examples.

I remember a cocktail party conversation, not really a cocktail party but there were always parties going on in Saigon, some reception or other, and I was talking to a guy from USAID (United States Agency for International Development), a senior guy in Saigon. I told him who I was and we were just talking, and I said it doesn't matter whose side you're on or whether you think this war is justified or not; from my perspective we are losing and we're not going to win it. The war is unwinnable and we're doing all kinds of things wrong. And he got red in the face and said if you feel that way you're disloyal. You should go home; you shouldn't be here. And I said, "I didn't ask to come here but I'm doing my best and all the guys who are here are doing their best but this is what the situation is. And we're out there where we can see what's really happening."

When you came into Saigon there would always be guys from the provinces in there; they're coming in to get some money or coming in to push a project or something like that so I talked to many of them and found I wasn't alone in the way I felt. Almost all of us in the countryside felt that way. Guys in other parts of the country had stories very similar to the ones I've mentioned and they had the same sense of disillusion: we were doing badly, we weren't winning and our side was not capable of winning the war. So I felt okay, it's not just me, it's not just because I am disgruntled; I'm seeing the same things these other guys are seeing. So I think that was a good chance to learn that we were not crazy or disloyal; but we were dismayed and a lot of guys had really good projects going but they had this sense that our side was not capable. And my Vietnamese was getting better and better because I was using it all the time and I would talk to students on the street corners in Saigon or something like that and they were just like guys who hang out on street corners anywhere. They were chasing women and looking after themselves, and I said to one of these groups one day, why don't you join the army and fight for your country? They were university students, and they said "No, we are not soldiers, we are intellectuals; we are students." So I paraphrased Lyndon Johnson's well-worn argument, "do you think it's okay for Americans to be here and fighting this war, when Vietnamese students hang out on street corners, drink coffee, and chase women?" "Oh yes," they replied, totally without guile. "You should fight, it's perfectly all right for you but it's not for us and you go out there and win it and we'll stay here."

That little vignette always stayed with me. As privileged kids in a class-ridden hierarchical society, what they were advocating was perfectly reasonable. They weren't soldiers, they were young intellectuals. It helps to explain why our side could never win.

Q: Well of course, in a way it reflects two things; the Chinese, who put the soldier down at the bottom and all that; and the Mandarin Chinese and also the French.

LENDERKING: Exactly right.

Q: While you were in Pleiku, were there teams of provincial reporting officers from the embassy coming out and talking to you?

LENDERKING: Not so much. I knew some of those guys and we are still in touch to this day and they were more in the Delta and more populated areas where they could get a better gauge on Vietnamese attitudes and what was going on both militarily and politically. And I think because most people disdained the Montagnards as a military force and they really weren't a strong political force for the most part, we didn't see them much in Pleiku but they were there. And I read their reports and they were good, they were usually very solid. The trouble was, our hopes to help build a democracy in this infertile soil were unrealistic. There were political parties and some good people in some of them, but they faced overwhelming odds and of course they ended up being overrun.

And here is another little vignette. I had a good friend who I went through Vietnamese language training with who was a State Department guy assigned to the political section. And I exchanged notes with him, I guess maybe after we had left Vietnam, and he said he agreed with the criticisms of the reporting and acknowledged the process of distortion and how the message got altered along the line to Washington, because of the pressure to produce good news. He said, the best reporting on Vietnam, for all their faults, came from the press and there were good people and bad people but press reporting was the most reliable. And the second was the CIA. And the third I guess were the provincial reporting units, the fourth was the reporting from the embassy, and dead last were the voluminous and so-called objective reports from CORDS and the countryside. He told me supervisors would alter reports people had written, and alter the meaning to reflect good news, which was not borne out by the facts on the ground.

Q: Who was this officer?

LENDERKING: His name is Dick Thompson and he was a very conscientious officer - you probably know him.

Q: Yes. I think I have interviewed Dick.

LENDERKING: He was a smart officer with a lot of integrity, and still is – and we got to be good friends.

Q: How were relations between what you were doing and the headquarters of the Fourth Division? Was this not the ivy (IV) division, the famous fighting Fourth?

LENDERKING: Yes. Well, I went out there a couple of times to remonstrate with anyone who would listen to me and basically I just did not count enough. I mean, I never got in to see General Peers but there were a couple of guys, say, lieutenant colonels, majors, I could talk to and their attitude was that an Army division is a massive thing and we have a war to fight and we're not going to worry about the people who get in the way. And that was very unfortunate because some of that has happened in Iraq, too. And they did have a war to fight and they were doing things like using Agent Orange and they were trying the best they could to not contaminate places. The planes were only supposed to fly when the conditions, like wind direction, were a certain way, and there were other rules as well, but in a war zone you fly those planes when you have them, you know. Put your finger in the air and take off.

One time, I had an argument with an Army captain. He said his troops had to destroy what were called "monkey bridges," makeshift bridges made of a narrow plank or two that the people used during the day to cross streams to get to their crops, or whatever. And then at night the military would come and chop them down because the Viet Cong were using that bridge too. And the captain said, look, I am here to protect my men and I'm not going to allow that bridge to be used by the Viet Cong to attack my troops. Of course I could understand his viewpoint; I would have felt the same way in his position. But here was a tiny but fundamental conflict, right at the grassroots, that went to the heart of some of the problems of trying to defeat what was already more than an insurgency. It was an attempt by North Vietnamese to repel what they regarded as an invasion and occupation by a foreign power, and that's what it was. From our viewpoint, we were trying to help a weak and corrupt non-communist regime survive so that communism would not take over another country. If we had understood better that the forces of nationalism and xenophobia were stronger than any pro-communist sentiments, perhaps we wouldn't have made so many mistakes. In any case, we feared that Vietnam would become a satellite of Communist China, and that was never really a possibility. Later, the Vietnamese flared up at the Chinese over a border incident, and the Vietnamese really bloodied some Chinese noses and gave a very good account of themselves before the Chinese numerical superiority dictated an end to hostilities.

Q: Did you stay the whole time in Pleiku?

LENDERKING: No. I was rather disillusioned at this point and I was having some domestic problems -- I think the separation was not good for our family, the same effect it had on many families. I felt bad about having to go to Vietnam -- we had three young children and I really missed them. I had to leave my wife, Lois, to cope with all of that, moving into a new home and neighborhood in Washington, looking for a job and all the rest of it, and so I went home on leave and I thought hell, this is awful. I'm not accomplishing anything; it's dangerous, if something happens to me what is going to happen to my family, blah, blah, blah. I seriously thought about quitting the Foreign Service – it was my only option to serving out my tour -- and in fact at one point I did submit my resignation while I was on my first leave. I was looking around for another job, which I was not able to find because I didn't have enough time – my leave was only for a couple of weeks. But as a result of all this indecision I overstayed my leave. I said to my wife, "I've had it, I'm not going back." And my wife said, "you've got to go back, otherwise people will think you're a quitter and it will dog you the rest of your life." A couple of close friends said the same thing. So after a few days of inner turmoil I decided to go back, and take my chances. A couple of other friends said "you still have a good career, go back, finish up, stay in the Service."

And so I did. I went back, I was basically AWOL (absent without leave) by about, oh I guess almost two weeks, and so the head of JUSPAO wasn't happy when I got back. He called me in and he said, "You don't know this, but I was considering you for an important senior job in Saigon, where you'll be supervising people technically senior to you. It will require dedication and good judgment. But before I consider it any further I have to have your ironclad assurances that you will restrain the impetuous side of your nature and not indulge in any further adolescent capers." Those were his exact words.

Q: Obviously this was seared into your mind.

LENDERKING: Yes. And it was such a classic dressing down that I almost smiled, and said "okay, yes, I'm back, I'll do my best." And so I went up to Pleiku to finish up and work my way out of there, hoping I wouldn't get shot now that my luck had changed for the better, and Komer hears that I'm going to transfer. I don't know where he got this but I saw his message protesting my transfer, and it said, in effect, "why are we transferring good guys out of the field? Here is a dedicated officer who wants to stay in Pleiku and continue his work. I think he should stay." My heart sank. I was dying to get out of Pleiku. I had been there a year, I felt I'd paid my dues, I could see nothing good happening there under any kind of realistic scenario, and I wanted to move on and maybe do something where I could try something different.

Anyway, it took about two months to effect the transfer and I went down to Saigon, and I got the senior job there. I was supervising guys who were senior to me, FSOs and military up to the rank of LTC, and because I had field experience I was often called on to be the vetter- to vet projects that were aimed at communicating better with the Vietnamese. And so I brought that perspective to the job. Now, of course I wanted these things to be as effective as they could be, but I also was as honest as possible without being a total naysayer, saying that some ideas were unrealistic, inappropriate, counter-productive, poorly crafted, and so on. Our military counterparts, the U.S. military, were very weak in that regard; they just did not have any clue about who the Vietnamese were as people, what their values were, anything like that. I at least knew something.

Q: I would think that you would get all sorts of cockamamie ideas from people sitting there who had no idea. You know, let us put our message on bars of soap or what have you.

LENDERKING: Yes, exactly. There was a lot of that. But sometimes there were good ideas. I don't want to be totally negative. They had these little radios that they dropped and could only tune into one frequency that of course was limited to messages from our side, such as surrender messages. But I heard that the Viet Cong figured out a way to rejigger the frequency. Well, who knows? But I believe it. So many of our ideas were well-intentioned but ineffectual, because they didn't reach the core of Vietnamese attitudes. The Vietnamese enemy – Viet Cong and North Vietnamese – was clever and inventive. They were defending their own country and were willing to fight as long as it took, while we were there for a year or two and then went on somewhere else, usually disillusioned and dismayed.

We used to have frequent meetings, probably once a week, joint meetings with the military brass, and the military psyop guys were headed by a full colonel, and I guess I was the senior civilian; big conference room, table, all the military trappings out at the military base at Ton Son Nhut near the airport, and this guy said, "Today we are considering putting messages in cereal boxes so that as the Viets open their cereal they will get a message. And I or someone said, you know, that is not the way Vietnamese eat their food; they do not have cereal boxes. Whatever they might be eating, rice, fish, or meat or whatever, they eat it with their fingers or with a fork or spoon or chopsticks. They don't have cereal boxes. Well he said, "OK, we'll put these messages in their Cracker Jack boxes, or whatever the hell these people eat." You see, he just didn't have a clue.

Q: Seems reminiscent of the attitude in Panama years later, where we, trying to get Noriega, blasted the house he was holed up in with loud rock music, hoping to wear him down. Now, how long were you in Saigon?

LENDERKING: I had a year in Saigon. So the way it worked was the tour of duty was two years plus whatever time you had spent on home leave. I think I had two more trips home of about ten days each. And I have to tell you, of course this interview triggers all these memories, the first trip I came home was about three or four months after Tet. I was really anxious to see my family for reasons I just mentioned, and by then I considered myself a hardened veteran because I'd been up in Pleiku through all the tough times and I flew home non-stop and happened to arrive when a huge anti-war demonstration was going on in Washington. So the next morning I went to American University, which was one of the centers of it, and Walt Rostow, who was National Security Advisor, and a lot of other prominent people were speakers. I had only left Saigon the day before and I go and hear Walt Rostow and he's talking about a country that bore no connection or resemblance at all to the place I had just left 24 hours ago. He was saying the Viet Cong have suffered a terrible defeat; the people are happy, they are rallying around us. Well, my goodness. The country was in ruins, the people were afraid, disillusioned with their government, demoralized, and the programs are not working. By that time, it was not just Pleiku – the whole country was really in bad shape.

And then all the other groups represented there – and there were scores of them – each seemed to have its own agenda at this huge rally. The different groups had separate workshops, so I went to one that was dominated by a group that was probably affiliated with the Black Panthers. I quickly realized they weren't interested in the war at all; they knew almost nothing about it except that they were against it, and wanted to use the protest to get some resources for themselves for their projects in the city. So I was disillusioned by the likes of Walt Rostow, and I was turned off by the various advocacy groups who wallowed in ignorance about Vietnam and were nothing more than political opportunists. So when I got back to Vietnam, I was almost glad to be back, because although there were plenty of people whose views of the war differed from mine, at least all of us had some familiarity about the issues and the problems.

Q: Well how did your family welcome you when you got home? I know my wife was taking courses at University of Maryland at the time and she was picking up an awful lot of their anti-Vietnam stuff. I'm sure it wasn't an easy time to come back.

LENDERKING: It was not. It was tough on my wife. We eventually got divorced, and I can't in all honesty blame Vietnam for that, but it made things more difficult. The situation was tough on her. I was never late with sending the rent money and the support money and those things but she had three young boys to contend with and she was trying to get a job, and when she found one she had to juggle house and job. But as I mentioned, she also didn't want me to resign, because she liked the Foreign Service and our life overseas. So she was ambivalent about Vietnam. Later, when there were some of the huge anti-war protests on the Mall, I took the kids down there as an act of witness, not to demonstrate. My oldest son was about ten at the time.

So I took them down to the Mall and there were thousands and thousands of people, plus some of the anti-war celebrities such as Peter, Paul and Mary, Jane Fonda and others, and someone unfurled a North Vietnamese flag and they started chanting, ho, ho, Ho Chi Minh or something like that. I said to the kids, let's get out of here; we're protesting the war, not glorifying the enemy. So I took them home, again dismayed by the shallowness of my fellow Americans, whose dislike of the war immediately transferred them into supporters of Ho Chi Minh. And that was another indelible experience. I explained to my sons why I took them in the first place and why I then pulled them out of there when I didn't want to be any part of that aspect of the demonstration. There were always those elements in any kind of political demonstration in Washington, and there still are on the Iraq issue. The radicals, and some of them are genuinely dangerous, always try to hijack the demonstration and use it to their ends. So I really got soured on those big demonstrations.

Later, Lois, my wife, was going to take a candle and march in a demonstration and I said look, it's an act of hypocrisy...you've urged me to go back. If you were really against the war you wouldn't have urged me to go back where I was in danger; you would have said stay here and support me. But ironically, it was probably a good idea that I did go back, because I really liked the Foreign Service and I didn't wreck my career, and in the end it was very satisfying. But there were tense times.

Q: JUSPAO was essentially USIA's headquarters in Vietnam...?

LENDERKING: Yes, but it was married with the military.

Q: -How did you deal with your sense that the information that was being disseminated didn't reflect what was happening in the field?

LENDERKING: It may be hard to explain the work atmosphere of JUSPAO. The head of JUSPAO for some years – I came on the scene near the end of his tour -- is a legendary figure, Barry Zorthian, who is still around and still very articulate about the war and public diplomacy issues. His successor was my PAO in Tokyo, Ed Nickel, who was nobody's fool, a very savvy bureaucrat. Ed's idea was, we all know how many of you feel about the war, and you may be right. But we have a job to do and we're going to do our very best. That was a reasonable position. So Ed would tolerate people like me to a certain extent, as long as he saw I was trying to do a good job and not out there trying to sabotage the mission. Here's what I mean: some years later, in 1973, when I was back in Washington, USIA formed a large inspection team for Vietnam and I was chosen to be part of it because I think I was the only guy on it who had had a lot of experience in Vietnam. Most of the others were senior to me. And Ed Nickel, and a few others tried to keep me off the team because they knew how I felt and they felt my views would wrongfully influence the team. Now, no one ever stated this in writing or to my face, but I learned about it from colleagues.

Ironically, as it turned out most of the others on the team – we were seven in all -- felt even stronger than I did and when we got out to Vietnam the people who were in charge of USIS -- the office in Saigon and all the infrastructure we still had in Vietnam -- were not particularly cooperative with us and thought that we were probing where we had no business to probe; but that is what inspection teams do.

Q: Before we leave Vietnam, I do want to get some of your impressions of the press corps. I don't know if you dealt with them but there were hundreds of correspondents running around, and some of them were amateurs, or wrote amateurish stories. There was a lot of that as well as solid reporting. And I would like to talk about that next time, plus anything else you would like to raise about Vietnam, because this is important.

LENDERKING: Well, I've self-reflected as the Japanese say, on what we talked about last time and I had a couple of maybe amplifying thoughts and we can do that next time.

Q: Today is the 16th of March, 2007. Bill, amplifying thoughts and the press corps.

LENDERKING: Okay, plunging in: As for amplifying thoughts: I've had these considerations before, but I served in quite a few countries, nine altogether, and in four of them there were major American foreign policy blunders, from serious mistakes to fiascos or disasters, Vietnam probably being the worst. So roughly 50 percent of my career was in assignments that dealt with American blunders that did not need to happen. Books have been written about all those things, Vietnam and the rest of them, but you have to wonder, if you agree that these other places were also disasters, that would be Cuba, Vietnam, Italy and Pakistan, what is there wrong, systemically, that causes such foreign policy failures? We have so many able people to analyze situations and carry out our policies in a forceful and credible way.

Q: Well, let's talk about the press first, and then get to the other topics. What was your impression of the foreign press corps in Vietnam?

LENDERKING: In Vietnam, there were as many as 500 foreign correspondents there at a given time, and they ran the gamut to really top people to adventurers and people who weren't really competent. But I would say, on the whole, as I said last time, the press did a better job of presenting accurately what was really happening than the embassy reporting, the CIA, and others such as USAID. I'd have to rank CORDS reporting way down at the bottom because there was so much pressure to produce good results. Most of the bosses weren't interested in knowing what was really going on. They wanted to know how much money you spent, and they wanted to hear things that would allow them to say the programs were succeeding, when in fact most of them weren't succeeding at all. In fact, I kept a memo, I think I probably still have it, a directive from our regional headquarters in Nha Trang (Region III Headquarters) saying that the amount of money we spent would be an indication of our effectiveness and that we were not spending all the money that we had allotted. Never mind, they didn't know what we had spent it on or what the result was – we were just supposed to push the money out there and then report something positive to Saigon. The result was a jumble of meaningless statistics that they kept track of by computer – so many tons of cement used to make so many school houses; so many Viet Cong laid down their arms, although we never were able to differentiate actual fighters from those poor souls who were just fleeing the horrors of war, like those scraggly Montagnards I mentioned earlier.

Anyway, the press was very good but even the best of them had their faults. I happened to be in Japan, towards the end of my tour in Sapporo, when David Halberstam of the New York Times won his Pulitzer Prize for Vietnam reporting. If you went back and looked at his reporting there was some brilliant investigative reporting and it put him on the map as a first rate correspondent, certainly one of the best and brightest among the correspondents. But the night he won the Pulitzer, I happened to be having dinner with the Times's man in Japan, Emerson Chapin, who was a senior editor on the foreign copy desk when I was a copy boy there. He was almost apoplectic about Halberstam's Pulitzer: he said almost every story Halberstam sent in had to be very carefully fact-checked because there were so many factual errors. He said ruefully, at the very least that Pulitzer should have been shared with the foreign copy desk because he and his fellow editors had to do so much heavy lifting to change Halberstam's often brilliant raw copy into a story that would meet the Times's high standards for accuracy, fairness, and depth. And while Halberstam certainly produced a lot of really good hard reporting, he was very loose with the facts and "The Times" was very scrupulous about those things. They had a huge "morgue" – a ready reference capability, and a large number of fact checkers. Chapin said everything that Halberstam sent in had to be sent to the morgue to be fact-checked, and if anyone deserved the Pulitzer it was the fact checkers and editors.

Well, that's just one example. I don't mean to denigrate Halberstam – he was one of the great ones. But even the best were mistaken at times, or careless. And when Halberstam left Vietnam for a while and came back a couple of years later, I believe, it's interesting that he came back to do kind of a Vietnam update and some fresh reporting, and he of course went back to his old sources. But the situation had moved on and those old sources were no longer the best people he should have been talking to. I'd bet if you dug out his reporting from this later period, it would seem rather undistinguished and a lot of it was probably flat out wrong. I don't have any particular pieces in mind, but that was my impression at the time, when I followed what the media were saying very carefully.

Q: How did you find dealing with what I would call the "amateur press corps"? I mean, they tended to get in trouble from time to time and this consul general- I and one of the other consuls had to go and bail them out or something because they were sort of an undisciplined group, sort of like coming for spring break, and reporting in an scattershot way. Did these types cause you much of a problem?

LENDERKING: They didn't cause me a problem because I didn't have to deal with them, and very few correspondents came to Pleiku. In Saigon and JUSPAO, my job didn't encompass dealing with the media, but rather trying to see that the huge number of products we issued – newspaper stories, films, book translations, photos, you name it – met standards of credibility and accuracy. Also, I was one of the principal contacts with military psyops, and I have to say that despite a lot of energy and earnestness, backed up by DOD's limitless supply of resources, the products were generally amateurish and ineffective.

Now, back to Pleiku for a second: if correspondents did go there, they went to the Fourth Division to try and get the story about the larger battles – Ia Drang Valley, and others. And they got the Fourth Division treatment about what the Fourth Division was doing. They didn't cover the pacification program, which was where the real war was being waged, and lost. The only two people I remember, the whole year I was in Pleiku, were Peter Kann and Robert Keatley of The Wall Street Journal. Peter Kann was one of the best of the correspondents who spent considerable time in Vietnam. He eventually went on to become president of Dow Jones and The Wall Street Journal. Robert Keatley spent less time in Vietnam and some years later become the managing editor of the "South China Morning Post" in Hong Kong. Anyway, both of them were very savvy, eminent reporters. I was grateful they chose to spend a whole day with me and the pacification program, so I showed them as much of the province as we could cover in a jeep in a day. We looked at the war from the grassroots, not through the eyes of some briefer at the Fourth Infantry Division. I felt that was the real way to understand what was going on, not just get your information filtered through the Army. The Army was great talking about weapons, orders of battle, set piece battles, estimated casualties. The subtleties of pacification tended not to be worth very much of their time. The Army briefers also, in my experience, put out a lot of misinformation. That is, they didn't intentionally distort, but they reported only one side and they didn't know very much about Vietnam, the people, or their history and culture. Since I attended our own local briefing in Pleiku every morning I knew what the briefers were saying. And I contrasted that with what I saw with my own eyes in driving around and talking to people. And then I could also hear what our briefers were saying in Saigon at the Five O'clock Follies.

Anyway, that is a long winded, roundabout answer, but in Vietnam I didn't have a lot of contact with the press. In later assignments, as the press attaché or the public affairs officer I was intimately involved with the media every day, especially in Italy, Thailand, Peru, Pakistan, and Washington.

EDGAR J. GORDON
Economic Officer
Saigon (1968-1969)

Mr. Gordon was born in New York City in 1930 and educated at NYU and Princeton. He began working for the Treasury Department in 1957. His career, largely as treasury attaché, included posts in Paris, Seoul, Buenos Aires, Saigon and Hong Kong. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: So you settled for Vietnam in what, late 1967?

GORDON: Middle of 1968.

Q: Middle of 1968? Well, this was after Tet then?

GORDON: That is what I was going to say. We went on long home leave-about the only long home leave I've ever had during my Treasury service because of the way things fell. We went through Latin America to the States and then decided to return by way of Puerto Rico (my wife's father came from there and neither one of us had ever been there) for a few weeks to escape the cold of Washington.

So up to this point, as I say, we were discussing Vietnam. The only question was that since families were not permitted, where my wife and children would live. We decided they would go to Taipei based on the advice of friends in the Foreign Service and CIA who had already served there. But that meant, for the first time, that we would be separated for long periods of time because I could only [visit] once a month. Vietnam itself didn't seem to pose any particular danger if you were sitting in the embassy in Saigon.

But when we were in Puerto Rico, Tet took place, and I remember we were looking at a copy of "Life" magazine a few days later with these pictures of Saigon. My wife looked at me and said, "Are you crazy...you're going to go to a place like that?" And I said, "Frankly, it's too late now. I can't admit I'm a coward and not go. Maybe if this had happened before I would have said I'm not going. I can't very well change my mind now." She was rather disturbed by that and rightly so. And so was I disturbed because it was an element of risk I hadn't really counted on when I accepted the assignment. In the end, I could have refused to go, I wasn't obliged to go, there were other people.

But we went back to Argentina for a few months at that point. I didn't actually go until June. I missed all the Tet and the aftermath and the second rising in May. Saigon was still a little "hot" as they say when I got there in July and we did have a few rocketing and things like that. It remained a dangerous place but if you minded your business and avoided certain areas, it wasn't too serious.

The American organization in Vietnam was enormous. The combination of the embassy and the AID mission proper and CORDS [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support], which dealt with the provinces probably had a couple of thousand American professionals to speak of in this place. It was larger than any embassy, AID mission anywhere in the world. The AID mission was so large that even the meetings of the heads of sections was about thirty five people or something of that. Of course, the military also had two large headquarters with which we dealt from time to time.

All the economic work was concentrated in AID. The embassy economic section was relatively small. And the foreign service officers assigned to it were put into AID. So we had one division. We had an economic counselor, who was at that point an AID man, Lloyd Jones. The people under him consisted of AID people, foreign service people, and there were some military who had economic backgrounds who were seconded as well. I was the only Treasury person in that group.

I was given an office with three assistants to work on the financial/macroeconomic issues. I reported to the chief of the economic section, who in turn was supervised by the economic counselor who also controlled the aid programming function. That was the situation from the time I arrived until about October or November. Jones decided to make me chief of the economic section which meant I had all the economic personnel under me. There was the question of administration. I had had only one person, a secretary, under me up to that point in my government career. There I had something like 20 professionals and half a dozen secretaries, a few of which weren't even in Saigon. We had a couple of field offices that we were responsible for in the corps areas-in three of the four corps areas in which Vietnam was divided for military purposes. So this was quite a challenge to me. To organize work and motivate so many people was difficult for a man accustomed to working alone. Just the sheer burden of writing reports on them was something.

Q: Writing efficiency reports, yes!

GORDON: I never had to do that before because we didn't have efficiency reports in Treasury until the establishment of the SES [Senior Executive Service]. I remember at the end of tour there were something like twenty efficiency reports to do. I spent the last month writing efficiency reports. But again, it was an interesting period. And, of course, we were working I think with the same focus I had when I was working on Vietnam my first year in Treasury, and on Korea later. Usually the problem was that the exchange rate was overvalued and that was distorting everything.

We were trying to get a devaluation but we succeeded in getting a very complicated reduction in tariffs. There was a rather long and lengthy negotiation on that score. We were also concerned in a whole host of things because the United States was so deeply involved in Vietnamese economic affairs that we were really co-governing with the Vietnamese Economic Ministries-the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Economy. I can't remember specific issues but we handled anything that came along. We had almost as many professional people at a high level as some of these ministries had because they were really pretty thinly staffed when it came to professionals who could develop policies, not simply those who could shuffle the paper and carry out the operations. In fact we had so many people we had to limit visits so that our counterparts could not be spending too much time talking to us rather than doing their work.

Given my previous experience and analytical interests, I also spent considerable time improving the reporting system, converting it from a casual AID process where operational, not descriptive reports, to a regular enhanced embassy reporting schedule.

This was the situation from late 1968 and then I left just before Christmas, 1969. It was a very interesting period. There was a great deal of work to do. It was very different than the normal embassy situation in the same sense that Korea was. We had policy issues that we constantly had to work on and to which we urgently had to propose solutions. I enjoyed it from that point of view a great deal. Personally it was rather difficult because as I say I had never been separated from my family for any length of time. We developed this routine of going home about five days every month, which is more than a lot of people did who had their families in the States. My children were young at the time. It was a strain on them and especially on my wife, who kept busy teaching at the American school in Taipei. She has afterwards told me a number of times that it was a test of the durability of our marriage through which we came successfully, but not easily.

Q: What about the currency there? As I recall the-what was it? The piaster was at a certain level and the real rate was three or four times that and was used by everybody except all those government groups?

GORDON: Well, the issue was, as in Korea in the early 'sixties, that by having an over-valued exchange rate and at the same time having the rationale for the import program basically the generation of local currency for budget support, you were providing a higher level of aid than the economy really needed. Also you are bringing in goods at a subsidized exchange rate you, in effect, were simply allowing whole rafts of people to make exorbitant profits on the imports because the true price of these goods locally reflected the much more depreciated black market exchange rate.

We couldn't solve the problem by an outright devaluation at the time for political reasons. Instead, by raising various tariffs and surcharges we created a complex multiple exchange rate to do this. It was not a very good solution from the either technical or economic point of view but it was perhaps better than they had before.

Subsequently, Chuck Cooper, who had been the economic counselor during my first three months there, and then returned after I left, came up with another idea. It was to create a special exchange rate for personal exchanges, high enough so that the black market disappeared. The effect would be to increase the government's foreign exchange resources. He had proposed this idea to me on a visit in mid-1969 and I had resisted it because I thought they already had too much foreign exchange and was intent on them getting less, not more. It was carried out in 1970.

Maybe that was my ideology in this matter but the South Vietnamese government, just like the South Vietnamese Army, wasn't a very effective honest organization. While we had good relationships with the people we knew and I like them personally and some of them, at least the ministers and the senior people were fairly competent, they really weren't in charge at the end. President Thieu and his group were in charge and they made the ultimate decisions. And those decisions required that the people who ran things got as much money as possible because they expected that they wouldn't be there forever. They wanted to save up a nest egg.

It was, as I say, an interesting job because we had so many responsibilities but ultimately frustrating because you knew what ever you did wouldn't last very long. The breakdown didn't take place for another four or five years. I was succeeded by two other people from Treasury which maintained the post until the very end, April 1975.

Q: What about corruption? Did this play much of a role in what you were dealing with?

GORDON: It didn't touch us directly but we knew it was there. That was one of the motivations for raising the import price and getting some of this revenue directly into the budget, rather than allow it to simply dissipate in the form of random riches for who ever was getting the licenses to import these things.

Q: I recall one of the measures was to promote the importation of motorcycles and other things in order to generate more proceeds.

GORDON: Well, yes. That was the idea, the choice of commodities once the aid dollar amount was set, depended somewhat on the demand for particular products. Usually AID had a list of authorized goods that they could bring in under these programs. Obviously they wouldn't let them import Mercedes or something of that sort, with U.S. aid dollars. But there was a proposal to import motorcycles because those were readily saleable and you would get the proceeds into the budget very quickly once licenses were issued for them. Saigon filled up with these Honda motor bikes. Just from a personal point of view I can tell you that the curfew went off at six thirty in the morning and went on again at ten or eleven at night-I'm not sure.

At any rate I remember getting up in the morning and getting ready to go to work and at six thirty suddenly there would be a blast of sound outside because everybody had been dressed and sitting on their motorbikes in their houses waiting for six-thirty. And the streets were absolutely filled with these motor bikes. I think we had imported two to three hundred thousand of these things and the bulk of them were in the Saigon area. They were from the Vietnamese point of view a relatively cheap form of transport.

Q: ...talking about the Hondas...

GORDON: They used very little gasoline. With that long seat you could get a wife and husband and a couple of kids on one of these things.

Q: I saw one time, a family of seven, husband, wife and I think, five kids on it at once.

GORDON: So you were there. But then I guess people criticized this after awhile, saying this could hardly be the most essential thing you can import in a war time economy and they finally cut it off. That increased the price and domestically anybody who had a Honda immediately had a windfall profit in terms of selling them or using them for any other purpose, or leasing them. That was an issue.

Q: What kind of guidance did Treasury provide?

GORDON: I received very little guidance directly from Treasury. I really worked basically with the embassy and AID missions. When I went to Washington I would spend a lot of time with AID because they were the ones involved with all the economic issues that I was involved in. I was considered part of their team out there.

So while Treasury had a point of view, no one sent me letter saying don't do this, that and the other thing. I was back two or three times during that year and a half in Washington which is fairly unusual for us. Treasury was essentially happy that I had become influential in the mission and trusted me to take the right positions.

Q: What was the atmosphere like in Saigon in 1968?

GORDON: Saigon itself, after Tet and after the May offensive, until October, was still a bit "warm." One incident I might mention concerns the visit of one of the assistant secretaries of Treasury in September. He wasn't my assistant secretary. He was in charge of among other things, the U.S. Mint. His ostensible reason was to see if he could get a contract for the U.S. Mint because Vietnam did not have a mint of its own and its coinage was manufactured abroad. The real reason I think was that Mr. Wallace, who had once worked for Senator Paul Douglas, with the 1968 election in two months and Vietnam the number one issue, wanted to be able to say that he had been there and talk about it. I can't remember if Douglas was running for election or what the reason was.

I set up a schedule for him, the most important event of which was a visit to the Central Bank which was in charge of coinage. I never knew whether this was a coincidence or whether someone knew he was there. We had a date at the Central Bank in the afternoon and we were a little bit late. I remember we were hurrying down the stairs to get into our car in the parking yard outside when we heard this explosion. We went outside and there were several Vietnamese lying dead in the parking yard.

The AID mission fronted on a wide street and one of what we used to call Saigon cowboys, a guy on a Honda had tossed a grenade into that place at a time when a number of Vietnamese employees were just leaving. They had just been standing, there talking getting ready for transportation, when this thing came out of nowhere. I sometimes think that if we had been two minutes earlier we would have been in our car at that point when that grenade went off. I don't know what would have happened to us. I have no idea and we never did find out whether it had anything to do with him or it was just happened to be random terrorism against AID.

But it was one of the rare incidents. We were generally not targeted by the terrorists. Very little terrorism actually took place inside Saigon proper.

Q: Did you get involved...Sam Berger had this idea and was tasked with trying to do something about Americans involved in the black market. Did you get involved with that at all?

GORDON: I don't think so. Another subject which I didn't mention which was the beginning of the US troop withdrawal in 1969. I think that was a big issue. Stabilization being the other. I was part of a group that was formed to look at the consequences of the U.S. Vietnamization, as it was called at the time. We had gotten this message... I guess it was about mid-1969 which of course was very hush-hush at the time that President Nixon had decided he was going to gradually withdraw American troops from Vietnam.

The mission was asked to propose several scenarios how this could be done. My job was simply to look at the economic consequences of the reduction of the American forces in the country and what affect this might have on foreign exchange availability and any other economic consequences It was a secondary issue: obviously the military-political issues were far more important.

There wasn't anything very sophisticated one could do about this. Basically you could look at the amount of foreign exchange and develop some relationship between the number of soldiers and what they were spending and then examine some secondary effects. I think that the embassy came back with three scenarios shorter or longer-it was really the speed of the withdrawal. I put an economic price on each one of them. That was sent back as the position and I think they probably picked the middle position. It had already started in the fall of 1969 in the Delta region which was the quietest. By the time of the North Vietnamese offensive in the spring of 1972, there were no American ground forces left in Vietnam. There were some aviation I believe. But that was it.

Q: And so in the summer of 1969, fall of 1969 you left?

GORDON: Just before Christmas. I was there 18 months.

CARL C. CUNDIFF
Economic Officer, USAID
Saigon (1968-1969)

Ambassador Cundiff graduated from the University of the South in Sewanee, Tennessee and the Fletcher School at Tufts. He entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His career included posts in Saigon, Paris, Lagos and Abidjan and he was named ambassador to Niger in 1988. He was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1996.

Q: And then you volunteered for Vietnam? Was that a real volunteer or were you sort of coerced? Did you have a choice at that time?

CUNDIFF: There was a lot of pressure on people to go to Vietnam and since I wasn't married at the time, I felt that I would probably end up being sent to Vietnam at some point anyway. I was, I guess you might say, anxious to get on with it and I also had friends of mine who were already serving in Saigon. And I wanted to join them if possible.

Q: So you went there in 1968. It was an interesting and busy time there. Did you go with any Vietnamese language or any other special training? Was this a direct transfer from Singapore to Vietnam?

CUNDIFF: I was transferred initially back from Singapore to Washington for training. I took two types of training. Initially I was tested for language skills. I did not test high enough to be put in the long-term Vietnamese language training program. So, I completed a counter-insurgency training program and after doing that I went directly to Saigon.

Q: You were assigned to what...the embassy in Saigon or did you go into one of the CORDS provincial programs?

CUNDIFF: I was trained for the CORDS provincial programs. But I was interested in serving in the economic section because of my background and I was able to get assigned to that section upon my arrival in Saigon. So I spent my eighteen months in Saigon working on economic issues.

Q: Now was this a combined AID-embassy economic section?

CUNDIFF: It was a combined embassy-AID economic section located at USAID headquarters in Saigon.

Q: What kind of things did you do there? And how long were you in Vietnam?

CUNDIFF: I was there for a total of a year and a half and I specialized in taxation. The collection of customs duties and the collection of income taxes. The object of the exercise was to participate with a group of economists who were working on various models for trying to keep down the rate of inflation during the war.

Q: Was your role and that of the others primarily analytical to try to understand what was happening? Or were you advisors? Or was it some combination of the two?

CUNDIFF: Well, I would say, there were two parts to the economic stabilization program. One was to analyze the situation to find out what was going on. Secondly, the object was to use that information to shape our policies and to shape those of the Vietnamese to the extent possible. One of the critical policy questions was how much did we need to provide to the government of Vietnam in the way of commodity import financing so that they could absorb the purchasing power of the economy and keep down price increases.

Q: Remind me sort of, the state of the war in this period-this year and a half. Was it coming close to Saigon?

CUNDIFF: It was close. It was actually in Saigon in a sense. I arrived in June of 1968 which as you may recall was right after what we call, "Mini-Tet," which was an offensive by the other side in May and before that, at the end of January or early February, there had been the big Tet Offensive when the embassy compound had been occupied. And a large part of the city was fought over. When I arrived in Saigon, the city was essentially secure, but there were rockets landing on the city and coming in from the swamps across the river primarily. But that was not a major problem. Terrorism continued while I was there. USAID headquarters was grenaded while I was out actually making an economic demarche in Saigon. So, I went out the entrance to AID and when I came back 25 minutes later there were signs of a grenade attack.

Q: So there was a feeling you must have had of insecurity about or at least concern about personal security as well as the other broader issues that you were dealing with.

CUNDIFF: I would say there was a feeling of insecurity but not the same sort of insecurity that the soldiers would have who were in an actual combat zone.

Q: I am sure you had good relations with the Vietnamese tax authorities and economic policy officials. Did they have a sense of hope or was there a feeling of despair or discouragement during this period?

CUNDIFF: I don't remember whether there was hope or discouragement. My impression in general was that people were simply going about their lives as they could under difficult circumstances. And the war just seemed to be part of life. I don't recall that anybody anticipated that it would be over soon but I guess nobody thought it would go on forever either. It seemed like a very long-term commitment on their part and ours. And I worked fairly closely with some young Vietnamese economists in the Central Bank and their moral certainly seemed to be high.

Q: Were they trained in France or the United States or...?

CUNDIFF: In this case they were trained in the United States. And that is probably why we got to know each other a little bit.

Q: Did you use French quite a bit or was it English?

CUNDIFF: No. English largely dealing with the Vietnamese. Some French occasionally with older Vietnamese civil servants. And then I used my rudimentary Vietnamese on the streets and in restaurants and with taxi drivers and that sort of thing.

Q: Who was the head of the joint section in the period that you were there? Do you remember?

CUNDIFF: Well, there were a couple of heads of it...it changed. There was somebody by the name of Chuck Cooper who was there for a while. Then there was Bill Sharpe who was head of it for awhile.

Q: These were mostly people from AID?

CUNDIFF: These were people from AID. However, there was one State Department person at one period of time who was there. I'm sorry I can't remember his name now.

Q: But there were several other State Department officers in addition to you in the...?

CUNDIFF: Yes. There were indeed. I would say that there were probably more AID officers but there were a number from the State Department.

Q: Did you do much outside of the capital in terms of travel and working with the provinces and people in the provinces?

CUNDIFF: I personally only made two trips outside the capital. One to the Delta to look at the situation there. I went to Canto for a very brief trip. And went to Da Lat, north of Saigon up into the mountainous area in what we called "Three Corps" at the time.

Q: You say you were there...?

CUNDIFF: Nineteen months, I think. Eighteen months.

Q: That was kind of the length of your assignment as it was set from the beginning. Was there pressure on you to extend or come back after home leave for another tour?

CUNDIFF: No. There was no pressure at that time. Later, when I went to my third assignment in Paris, however, I was put on notice to come back to Vietnam to be part of one of the peace-keeping efforts that was going on at that point monitoring the peace process. But as it turned out, I did not have to go back.

Q: Because the situation probably, in Vietnam changed. We pulled out, or...

CUNDIFF: No. I think the reason I didn't have to go back on an urgent basis from Paris was, as it turned out, they had enough officers to do the job they had in mind.

GALEN L. STONE Political Counselor
Saigon (1968-1969)

Ambassador Galen L. Stone grew up in Massachusetts. After attending Harvard University and serving in the U.S. Army, he joined the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Germany, France, India, Vietnam, Laos, Austria, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Cyprus. He was interviewed on April 15, 1988 by Malcolm Thompson.

Q: Very interesting, as you know it has always been a problem with Ambassadors who choose to take people outside of the normal Foreign Service staffing pattern and generally arrange to do so. This naturally causes some problems in the Department. Would you care to comment any further on your tour in Saigon? How were things looking then? Was there light at the end of the tunnel?

STONE: Well, when I arrived there, it was just after what was known as "mini-Tet." The Tet Offensive had occurred in late February of 1968, the mini-tet came in May. I arrived just after that. I had only been there about ten days having had no prior involvement with that area at all.

In fact every other person who was assigned to the country was required to take as a minimum a three weeks orientation course before taking up their assignment. I was told that I didn't need to have that course, that they wanted me out there immediately and I could learn on the job. Well, within ten days of my arrival I was told I was in charge of the visit of the Secretary of Defense, the preparation of briefing papers and everything else, and it was very much a case of being thrown into the water and having to do your best to keep your head above it. Fortunately that visit came off well. One's existence in those days in Saigon with no families for distraction was pretty intense. We worked probably fourteen hours a day, seven days a week. There was just no break at all. The only break that I took was during the lunch hour, when I would go to Circle Sportif, which had a magnificent Olympic-sized swimming pool, and swim laps and work out my frustrations in the water. I was responsible for twenty-four junior Foreign Service officers, eighteen of whom were trained in the Vietnamese language, and these young fellows were going out in the countryside in jeeps with pistols on their hips to talk to the local headman and provincial officials, to do our best to keep a finger on the pulse of what was happening in Vietnam. We were really in competition with the wire services, because Washington did not want to be surprised by any story that came out of Vietnam. We just worked flat-out and filed a tremendous number of telegrams and reports to keep Washington fully abreast of the situation. There wasn't much light at the end of the tunnel, really.

Q: Was this during the period of Ambassador Lodge or Ellsworth Bunker?

STONE: Ellsworth Bunker was the Ambassador, and Sam Berger was the Deputy Ambassador. They had two Ambassadorial positions there at the time.

Q: This followed then the overthrow of Diem?

STONE: Oh yes! This was long after the overthrow of Diem. This was President Thieu's time, and to me the most satisfactory part of my assignment there was a result of trying to fix appointments with President Thieu and other top officials of the Vietnamese government. For this purpose, I was expected to deal with the Protocol Officer of the Palace. I soon found out that this man was totally ineffectual and I could never be sure which end was up.

By chance I met a distant relative of the President who worked in his inner office, and a fellow with whom I felt very much on the same wavelength. I arranged with the Signal Corps to have a direct telephone line installed between his office and mine, so we could do business over the telephone, which saved an immense amount of time. This man has remained a close friend and at the present time is a senior officer in one of our largest corporations, living outside Chicago and making a great success as a businessman.

Q: Was General Westmoreland in charge, or was it still General Taylor?

STONE: No, Westmoreland had just left and General Clayton Abrams was the new commander. He would regularly attend the embassy country team meetings. I had the pleasure of accompanying him on Christmas day of 1968. We flew to Tay Ninh which was very close to the Cambodian border because we had an indication that the Viet Cong might release three American prisoners. We wanted to arrange this release without any political implications, so I was asked to accompany him. We flew to Tay Ninh and we stayed there on the ground until these three soldiers eventually were released and got back to our lines.

Q: With the changing Generals from say Westmoreland to Abrams, did you notice - or was there a marked difference in the relationships between the army and the embassy, or was it more or less smooth?

STONE: I wasn't there during the Westmoreland period so I can't speak to that situation. The relationships when I was there between the civilians and the military were excellent; very close working relationships between Ambassador Bunker and General Abrams. I chaired one of the committees which was involved in joint military - civilian operations. We had very close working relationships with the military, and by and large they went along very well.

Q: Very good, anything else that you would like to talk about in hindsight about your year in Vietnam? Was there anything that looking back on you wish that you had done differently, or wish that you would have seen the embassy handle differently?

STONE: I wish that I could have had a certain period of time to prepare for that assignment, I had none at all. I really felt like a bit of an ignoramus as far as that part of the world was concerned. I had read and studied almost nothing about it during my earlier career of even in college, so that it was all relatively new. I found it a very fascinating and interesting part of the world and I can well understand why a number of our officers have made it their area of specialization.

I quite enjoyed the Vietnamese as people. They are a dynamic people, hard working. At that time, I had very close relations with the U.S. military. A field force commander used to come and pick me up with his helicopter on the roof of the embassy and I joined him in making his rounds of various divisional and other unit headquarters, getting briefings on what was going on and this was a very stimulating experience.

Q: It's been said that many of our top ranking officers in the policy making positions had, like yourself, very little experience in Southeast Asia and particularly in Vietnam. That may be one of the reasons that perhaps our policies did not work out; that you were not alone in your lack of basic training and understanding of the area. Do you think that is a fair comment?

STONE: Well, I think there is some truth to that, but after all, the policy is set not by the embassy but by Washington. The mistake in Vietnam was partly that we allowed ourselves to get out in front of the South Vietnamese. We were really taking over and fighting the South Vietnamese's war for them, rather than supporting them from behind to the extent I think we should have. It was certainly a great tragedy and the thing that upsets me the most when I look back on it is the criticism of the U.S. military. Today you have films like Platoon which in my mind depict the seamiest side of the U.S. military in Vietnam and are not a true reflection of the caliber of the army that we fielded at that time.

I personally believe from what I saw that we had an excellent and well run army that was functioning in the field. Of course we did not turn loose the ability that we had to fight the enemy and, as you may have heard, the other night, Mr. Nixon was saying that the thing that he felt was the greatest mistake during his Presidency was not bombing Hanoi and Haiphong which he thought would have brought the war to a much more rapid end.

Q: Do you think it's fair to say that the objectives were ever clearly delineated so that the military was really put in an impossible position?

STONE: Yes I would. After that I went back to India and that was the period which was to me, the most frustrating of my Foreign Service career as I mentioned earlier. When the word came that we were sending the aircraft carrier Enterprise task force into the Bay of Bengal, I really felt that all I had been working for in terms of improving relationships between the United States and India was being totally jeopardized almost overnight. I seriously considered resigning from the Foreign Service at that point. I discussed the matter with Ambassador Keating. I recalled a colleague who had preceded me at the Imperial Defense College in London, David Ness, who resigned from the Foreign Service because of a policy difference relation to Egypt when he was the Chargé d'affaires there. I remember that the day after he resigned, there was a front page story in the New York Times, and after that Mr. Ness was never heard from again! I finally concluded that I could be more effective by remaining in the service and doing my best to do what I felt was right, rather than submitting my resignation.

Q: That raises an interesting question that I was going to ask you about later, but we might as well touch on it now. What can an officer do when he does disagree with the governments' policy? In this case, what actions were you able to take - if any - to express your dissatisfaction with the policy that you were supposed to carry out?

STONE: Well, I made my feelings very clear in my messages to Washington, but I was overruled. At that point, once the decision is made, if you are a good Foreign Service Officer you simply carry out your instructions as best you can. If it becomes a matter of such conscience for you that you simply can't do it, then you have no choice but to resign. I think that many career officers have been in that position. While you may not like it, you have to do the very best you can to defend your government's interest as reflected by those in responsibility at the time.

Q: I thoroughly agree, but I think that today it must be very difficult for officers in controversial areas such as Central America and the Middle East to live with that problem?

STONE: My son was a member of a congressional staff group that was sent to El Salvador to observe the recent parliamentary elections. The main reaction he returned with was astonishment at the extent to which events in El Salvador are being run out of the U.S. Embassy. So sometimes, as we all know happened during the period that I was in Southeast Asia, our embassies do play a remarkably involved role in the events of other countries.

SAMUEL VICK SMITH
Deputy District Advisor
Bien Hoa (1968-1969)

Samuel Vick Smith was born in California in 1940 and graduated from New Mexico State University. He served in numerous posts including Nairobi, Vietnam, Madagascar, Tokyo and New Zealand. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Was there much in the way of indoctrination as to why we were in Vietnam and what you were going to be doing in Vietnam?

SMITH: Well, I wouldn't call it indoctrination. We all took this original course of four or six weeks which was called "operations" where they told us what we would be doing, more or less. Then we had about an hour of that every week, too. They explained all the programs and they gave us history. They gave us some pretty good history of Vietnam over the last one hundred-fifty years, especially over the last ten to twenty years up to that period. As far as indoctrination of why we were there, there wasn't any. I think everybody had their own views. I think most of us were with the program. The brightest were the most skeptical.

Q: Well, were you running across, I mean by this time the opposition could pick up and organize and all, was this hitting your group at all?

SMITH: No, I don't think so. I think there were people in our group who were maybe sympathetic to the opposition, maybe, but not so much that they were going to quit or resign. There was one young man who had had one tour in Latin America and had decided this was the way to jump-start his career and he had volunteered. He had a family, two or three little kids, and the rest of us were single. He actually went to Vietnam and then realized this was a big mistake and he came back and had to resign and that was tragic. I kept in touch with him for a couple of years, but I don't know what happened to him. It was just too bad. I think if I'd been married and had kids I would have looked at it entirely differently, but I was single. I hadn't volunteered to go, they chose me to go and I was willing to go. It was at least going to be interesting and exciting probably.

Q: When you went to Vietnam, you were there from when to when?

SMITH: Well, I got there I think in late October of '68, it may have been early November. I can't remember which now. I was supposed to spend eighteen months, but as will become obvious later I left in June of '69. I was supposed to be there until what would be the spring of '70.

Q: Well, where did they send you?

SMITH: As you will know later, I married a Vietnamese lady who I met here and she has written out the places correctly spelled with the diacritical markings. They sent me down in the delta to a province, which we called Kien Hoa. Before it had been called Ben Tre, and after the communists won the war they renamed it Ben Tre again. The capital town of the province was Ben Tre and that was one of the towns that infamously was said "had to be destroyed to be saved" during the Tet Offensive in early '68. To get to this province by normal means you would take route four down to My Tho and instead of turning right and going deeper into the delta, you would take a ferry across the My Tho River, which is the northern big branch of the Mekong. Then you'd be in Kien Hoa Province which was bounded by arms of the Mekong as it went down to the ocean, or the South China Sea. There were nine districts in this province. I think the population in the province was half a million people. So, each district was in the order of 50,000, and my district was Binh Dai.

Q: When you get a chance to correct this, you can fix up the spelling.

SMITH: Binh Dai was an interesting little district. I was sent there to be the deputy district senior advisor. The way the Vietnamese had their government organized was you had about forty provinces and each province had a province chief. Most of these were Vietnamese army colonels. Each province had from four to ten districts. They each had a district chief. Most of them were Vietnamese army majors. Our "pacification" program was known as "CORDS." Originally it was "Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support." The Vietnamese said we've got one revolution already, we don't need another. So, we changed it to "Civil Operations and Rural Development Support." This was an integrated program, which I guess was started in '67, and it had the U.S. Army, the other U.S. military, USAID, USIS and everybody working together within an integrated command structure. So, you could have military people supervising civilians and civilians supervising military people. It was all run by the deputy for CORDS up in Saigon who, when we got there, was William Colby.

Q: William Colby.

SMITH: Right. The country was divided up into four military regions or corps and the fourth corps was the delta, which is the rice basket of Vietnam. There I was down in this district, Binh Dai and there was a major who was the Vietnamese district chief. His advisor was a U.S. army major who was district senior advisor and he had two deputies, a captain for military matters and I was the deputy for administration. My counterpart was the district chief's administrative officer who was a young army lieutenant who didn't wear a uniform because he was doing a civilian job. He had a white shirt and slacks. I should say a little more about the advisory team. We were in a district of 50,000 Vietnamese. It was an island with a major river on one side and a minor river on the other side, the South China Sea at one end and a canal at the other end. Our district advisory team was the major, the captain, two or three sergeants and me. We were the only Americans there. There was no Vietnamese regular army force, and no American army force at all. The district chief had four "regional force" militia companies. Then he had about thirty "popular force" platoons. These regional forces, and popular forces were what he was supposed to use to counter the communist insurgency which controlled admittedly probably fifteen or twenty percent of his land area in the day time and a lot more at night.

Q: You came there oh about ten months after the Tet Offensive?

SMITH: That's right.

Q: How had the Tet Offensive been carried out in your area?

SMITH: I think it concentrated on the province town, the province capital of Ben Tre, and that's why Ben Tre had to be “destroyed to be saved.” I guess they overran some other areas. I think there was one district town they overran, but they never completely overran Ben Tre and they didn’t do much at all in our district that I ever heard about. Again for those who aren’t conversant with all this history, there was something important that happened while I was in the training. I remember it very clearly. When we entered the training at the very beginning of ‘68 we were told there were about 300,000 communist soldiers in South Vietnam. About 200,000 were local guerrillas and about 100,000 were North Vietnamese Regulars. Several months later they were giving the briefing and they said there are about 300,000 communist soldiers in South Vietnam. About 200,000 are North Vietnamese Regulars and about 100,000 are guerrillas. I put up my hand and said, “That’s not what you said before.” The briefer said, “Well, it’s changed now.” During the Tet Offensive a great part of the communist guerrillas were wiped out and this is why people say that it was a tactical victory for the South Vietnamese and the Americans but a strategic defeat because the communists won the war here instead of there. Where I was it was never anything but guerrillas. It was a real guerrilla war. I’m sorry, I cut you off.

Q: No, no. Because you know I think it’s interesting to get a feel for the time. What were you doing?

SMITH: Well, I was supposedly trying to aid the district chief and his deputy for administration on “winning the hearts and minds.” Part of this was to go out to areas which were sort of contested and provide more goodies from the government. A big part of my job was to complete the hamlet evaluation system form every month. The famous HES Report where we rated every hamlet. A number of hamlets made up a village, a number of villages made up a district. We had about eighty hamlets and the only way you can really do this report halfway honestly was to go out and visit the hamlets. So, I did a lot of that. The hamlets were rated A, B, C, D and V, -V for VC, so V was an F. We conceded a number of hamlets to the Viet Cong and these were in what we called “free fire zones.” These were places where any American artillery or air force or navy plane could shell or bomb at will without anybody’s prior permission, because the people that lived there were supposed to be communist. Then the rest of the district as I said were the areas where you could usually travel safely in the daytime, but at night you might not want to try. I spent a lot of my time going out and visiting these hamlets to see what was going on. You did learn things. One of the things I remember: I can’t do it anymore, but the Vietnamese they taught us at FSI was good enough that I could find this old lady who had never spoken anything but Vietnamese in her life. I could ask her “at night do the Viet Cong ever come out of that tree line over there and come into the village?” She could understand me perfectly and then she’d answer and I couldn’t understand the answer. She’d say, “yes” and then give me a lot of details and I never could get the details. At least I knew that this was a place where on the hamlet evaluation system form, I would have to say we don’t control it at night.

Q: The hamlet evaluation program came under a lot of criticism because there was a lot of pressure particularly on our military commands to make it look good.

SMITH: Oh, yes. There was pressures of various kinds on us, but I never felt any. I think the most pressure I had was I wanted to be a success. I wanted our district to be a success. So, I just naturally I tried to make it look as good as I could while not lying to myself. I was still only twenty-eight and twenty-nine. I was a former physics major where things are black and white, and I don't think I fudged very much. If I fudged, if I made a mistake it was an honest mistake.

Q: What were the Viet Cong, I mean was it mainly Viet Cong in your area or regular North Vietnamese?

SMITH: There weren't North Vietnamese, it was all guerrillas. I think there were village units and then there was an infamous 519th battalion. The 519th Battalion roamed around the whole province and they were the ones who were causing the most trouble. There were all these areas that they could stay in safely. Our district was one of the better districts, so there were other neighboring districts that were worse where they could have refuge. Our district chief would get an order at night from the province, a coded order over the radio, which would tell him to run an operation the next morning. The next morning he would gather up two of his four companies of regional forces and commandeer a couple of boats and we'd go up the Mekong. In this case it was the My Tho River and we'd go up the My Tho to some place and disembark and go into a village where we would find nothing. The worst that ever happened was we'd find that they'd abandoned the place or a couple of times there were booby traps. The communists, to my mind, clearly knew we were coming. Somebody was telling them we were coming whether it was a leak at the province or a leak in the district, but since the orders were sent out overnight, by the next morning, they'd had enough time to skedaddle. I frankly think the district chief probably didn't mind that at all.

Q: How about the problem of corruption?

SMITH: Before we get to that I ought to talk more about the war. Write corruption down so we don't forget it, but there were attacks near us. The government had something called the RD Cadre, the Rural Development Cadre. These were young men who were probably better educated than the soldiers and were supposed to be idealistic. They were in platoon-sized units and they were supposed to go out and bring security and development to the people. It was a way they could get out of being in the army. We had one of those little platoons in our area and they got attacked in the middle of the night and about eight of them were killed. They killed at least one Viet Cong with claymore mines, which I can describe if need be. They were pretty unhappy. This happened in the middle of the night. Then a couple of other nights we were mortared in our compound and one of the attacks was clearly aimed at us Americans. We were living in a long building and their sixty millimeter mortar was set up perpendicular to our building. Its rounds all fell short, just parallel to our building. What had happened, obviously, was that somebody had paced off the distance because they just went down the road from where we were and set up the mortar in the middle of the night in somebody's backyard. Either they paced it off wrong or the wind was wrong and the mortars fell about fifty yards short, parallel to our building. If they had hit our roof we would have all been killed because they would have exploded on the roof and then showered us with shrapnel. When things like that would happen we'd go and hide in the bunker for a while.

Q: Did you have any sort of quick response teams, military?

SMITH: That was all up to the Vietnamese. When the communists attacked this Rural Development cadre camp, RD cadre camp, the district chief and my boss, the major, and some other people got together and went out to see what had happened. Of course everybody was afraid that they would get ambushed on the way because the common tactic of any good insurgency is to attack one place and then ambush the rapid response team. They weren't ambushed. That was about all that could be done. The district chief presumably could have always tried to organize something like this. In this compound where we lived there were two regional companies, the militia troops; there were also two 105mm howitzers from the Vietnamese army. The artillery were the only Regular Vietnamese Army in the whole district. They would sometimes, if there was an attack on a village, give fire support up to their range maximum which may have done some good.

Q: How about naval craft, river craft?

SMITH: We had a lot of contact with the U.S. navy and we always felt that if we ever got in trouble ourselves and had to ask for help, the only chance we would have had was some navy helicopters which were called the "Sea Wolves." I think it was considered a wing of attack helicopters. There were only two or four based anywhere near us. These were Army surplus helicopters. You could still see on the sides where they had painted "Army." They were armed with rockets and machine guns. They would visit us and we'd give them a Coke. The navy had small fiberglass speedboats which were called PBRs which had two .50 machine caliber guns in a kind of a turret on the front and a couple of machine guns in the back and a crew of four or five. They used to bring us fresh water. The Vietnamese had to live off water from a brackish well or rain water. The dry season being half a year long, you couldn't use rain water half the year. We would get jerry cans of fresh water from the Navy. The U.S. Navy as far as our little district was concerned, was the only U.S. military that could do much for us with these lightly armed speedboats and helicopters.

Q: What about from Saigon? You used to send out progress reporting officers who would spend time out and you know, ask around, were you, did these come through there at all?

SMITH: Never saw any?

Q: You were out of sight, out of mind?

SMITH: We weren't easy to get to. The only way to get to us was by helicopter or Air America HelioCourier or boat. You couldn't drive there because in the center part of the island, the road wasn't completely safe and at the other end of the island where the canal was, you couldn't get across. We were only accessible by air or sea.

Q: Was Can Tho ever the big city?

SMITH: Yes, Can Tho was the big city to the Vietnamese, but it was in a different province. Everything for us had to radiate out of Can Tho to give you an example of how things worked. The abnormal way we got to Saigon was, first of all, a boat or a helicopter or a light airplane took us to Ben Tre. Then another Air America airplane took us to Can Tho, which is farther away from Saigon, and then finally a bigger Air America airplane would take us to Saigon. Well, that could be a two or three day trip.

Q: Sure.

SMITH: The Vietnamese, either the communists or the non-communists, could probably get to Saigon in five hours by taking a boat up to My Tho and taking a bus.

Q: I was wondering if near that river was there a?

SMITH: Excuse me. My Tho is where the PBRs had their little base and then just up the river a big American army base called Dong Tam which was part of the U.S. ninth infantry division, was where the navy helicopters had their base.

Q: Yes. Somewhere around there, there was a famous monk who...

SMITH: Yes, the coconut monk.

Q: It was cult there around the monk. Was he ever...

SMITH: Was this the guy with the garish temple on the river?

Q: Yes.

SMITH: Yes, he was called the coconut monk. He was an engineer. If you took the ferry from My Tho across the rivers to get to our province you'd pass one little island out there. The end of the island looked like Disneyland with all these big steel things that this engineer had built, painted garish colors, red, yellow and blue. That was his establishment and that's all I know about him.

Q: Well, I went to visit one time. You know I wanted to see it.

SMITH: Did I describe it right?

Q: Yes, absolutely. All of a sudden here you are in the middle of a war zone or something like this you run across Disneyland west or east.

SMITH: But the boat, the ferry I was on would just pass it and we'd look. I probably took a bad picture of it.

Q: Did you run across Howard Gross while you were there?

SMITH: Don't think so.

Q: You mentioned talking about corruption. What about it, this was always a concern of ours, wasn't it?

SMITH: Yes, and I tried to be a corruption cop and didn't get very far. I would inventory the supplies in the district warehouse and try to account for the roofing, aluminum roofing. Aluminum roofing was a big commodity. The commodities in the warehouse were cement and roofing. Roofing was easy to count. I'd count it and I'd count it again and it wouldn't come out right. Finally the poor old guy who was running the warehouse came to me with an interpreter and fessed up that he had been stealing the roofing. I was so sorry for him that I didn't do anything about it. It was penny ante compared to what was really going on, it was nothing.

Q: Well, I mean the real problem often would be I guess, at the district level?

SMITH: This was the district level.

Q: I mean higher up, what would be higher up?

SMITH: The province.

Q: The province level. I doubt in the Delta there was as much as, you know one thinks of Da Nang and that sort of place.

SMITH: Well, I think what we're edging up to is, if there's not much to steal you can't have much corruption. There wasn't that much down there. Looking back on it, I was wasting my time. It was nothing really. There wasn't that much coming down to us to be stolen. There was probably all sorts of other stuff going on. The district chief was probably getting kickbacks. There were probably soldiers who never showed up by giving a kickback, things like that, but how was I to know?

Q: What about that whole area was the sort of rice bowl thing. Was there good rice production?

SMITH: Yes. Since I was only there a short time; most of the time, the rice wasn't growing. I arrived after one harvest and left just as they were getting ready to plant.

Q: How did things play out there because you left in June of '69?

SMITH: How things played out was I was on one of these trips to visit the hamlets so I could fill out the HES form. I was in an International Harvester Scout with an American army master sergeant who had only been there a few weeks and our interpreter was a Vietnamese master sergeant. The main district road ran right down the middle of the district. It was up on a dike with rice paddies on both sides. This was in June of '69, the rains had just begun to start so that the rice paddies had become wet and dried out again. It was just at the beginning of the wet season. On the way out from Binh Dai we passed one of the MATS team; which was a small group of American army troops who were supposed to be advising a small group of Vietnamese militia troops. These MATS teams typically had about two officers and three enlisted men. The senior guy would be no more than a captain and often a first lieutenant. We stopped by this MATS team to get a spare battery for our radio because we thought the battery in our radio was going bad. The battery was about the size of a carton of cigarettes, a big, wax covered box. It really was a battery because there were lots of little cells inside and at the end were a couple of wires you plugged into the radio. So, we got to where we were going and we spent the night in this mud fort with the popular forces. It was clear that our battery was going dead. I switched the batteries and then it became clear that the new replacement battery was already dead. It didn't work. The next morning, rather than continue with the trip we drove back to get another battery because it wasn't safe being out there without any communication with anybody. We were just two Americans, and one Vietnamese. On the way back we happened to pass a unit of American army engineers who were working on the road. We got their call sign and asked if they had a battery, which they didn't. We kept going and we got to a village where, by this time, it was probably nine-o'clock in the morning. I asked the village chief in my Vietnamese if the road ahead was secure. In Vietnamese he said "yes." Then my Vietnamese interpreter asked the same thing so there wouldn't be any misunderstanding because it was his neck, too if it was not secure. So, we drove off down the road. There were places in this road on top of the dyke where years earlier the VC had destroyed the road so that the tide would go back and forth between the paddies and so there was a large dip. At the bottom of this dip it was muddy from the rains that had just started, but not in earnest. The mud had dried out into these big cakes about the size of a pie plate, sort of a hexagonal shape. We gingerly went down into this dip and kawahami; the left tire hit an anti-tank mine (we presume because that's where they'd been laying them.) These anti-tank mines were about six inches in diameter, two or three inches deep and they are made to blow the tread off a tank. These were things we'd made and given to the French and the VC had gotten them. It takes an International Harvester Scout and just rolls it over a time and three-quarters. I remember uttering the immortal, "What happened, did we hit a mine?" We're upside down; my glasses are broken or gone, and I was in and out of consciousness. The American army sergeant wasn't badly hurt and pulled me out of the overturned Scout. I had sandbagged the Scout as best I could for mines.

Q: The Scout is like a large...

SMITH: Like a Bronco or something.

Q: So it's sort of like a large jeep.

SMITH: Yes, except that the jeeps were made so you could put sandbags up under the pedals and the Scout was made so you couldn't. I won't go into the geometry of it, but there was no easy way to completely sandbag the driver's position. It was my tire that hit the mine. The American Army sergeant dragged me out. We were all three scared. We were laying against another paddy dyke waiting for what comes next. We were trying to use our broken radio and I was in and out of consciousness. The two things I remember the Vietnamese interpreter saying to me was, as he saw this blood from my face and down my chest. "Ong, Smith, you very bad." I was bleeding a lot, but not too much. The main injury was my left ankle, which was all smashed. I had shrapnel up and down my left side from my knee to my arm to my face. The other thing he said confirmed what we'd always thought - that he wasn't Vietnamese. He was really Chinese. He said, "Those damned Vietnamese, they said this road was safe." He had been in the back seat and so he was the least hurt and I don't think the American army sergeant was more than scratched. Nobody had seat belts. Fortunately the weak radio could reach that engineering group and we had their call sign. They called a medevac and a medevac came in and picked us up and took us to Dong Tam and that's the last I saw of the other two.

I should say some other things just to give the color of it. I think the medical corpsman in the back of the helicopter was fascinated to find this young civilian American in the middle of nowhere blown up, more fascinated when he found pistols on me. I had a .38 pistol in my pocket and a .38 pistol under my armpit. I gave that to the corpsman. I was in and out of consciousness. At one point the corpsman said, "Sit up, the pilot wants to take your picture." I sat up and the pilot took my picture. Probably the first American civilian he'd ever picked up and I gave him a sign. Frankly I don't know which one got the pistol. Then we get to Dong Tam, this big U.S. army base, part of the ninth infantry division. They had taken this huge area, it was probably a square mile and just denuded it of everything and built a fort. The hospital, which was called the Third Surg, was huge timbers with sandbags and dirt to protect it from mortars and rockets. Inside was an inflated hospital, which was pumped up with air-conditioned air, and inside everything else was like any normal army hospital. They did the surgery on me. That was in the morning. Probably that afternoon a young army doctor came in and said, "Well, your left ankle is badly broken and the rest of the stuff we fixed up and you're really lucky because, do you know what the carotid artery is?" I said, "No." He said, "Well, that is the big artery that carries all the blood to your brain. It's got a sheath around it, the carotid sheath, and the shrapnel cut the sheath, but it didn't cut your artery, so that's why you didn't bleed to death out there in a few seconds." He said, "We picked little gears and little things out of your cheek." I said, "Could I have those?" He said, "No, we threw them away." These little gears were either little gears from the speedometer or little gears from the mine itself and I wish I had those, but I don't. Within twenty-four hours I was on a helicopter up to Vung Tau, a more established and safer hospital, but older and not as good. That's a story I won't bore everybody with, but I was laying flat in this big army CH47 helicopter.

Q: The Chinook?

SMITH: Yes, it flew me up there, me and a bunch of other people, strapped down in stretchers.

Q: They shake a lot, too, don't they?

SMITH: Oh, yes, they make awful noises. Especially when they stop it when they're starting and the crew chief runs out the door with a fire extinguisher. That's scary. Anyway, we got there and then I spent about eleven days in this hospital in Vung Tau where, since the water was minerally rich, all the bed sheets were a light tan color. We had a ward in a Quonset hut of about sixty people and there were about two sets of crutches, which was always a problem. Whenever they would move you from one place to another, they had to lift your blanket to make sure you weren't stealing crutches because there were never enough crutches. Another thing I learned there was that, in our district, whenever a helicopter came in to pick up wounded, if we gave them a wounded person on a stretcher, we had to get a stretcher back from them or we wouldn't have a stretcher. So, anyway, I spent a long time in Vung Tau. The surgeon of the Third Surg had operated on my ankle and then they operated on me twice more there in Vung Tau. They never could get it set right because you know; the ankle is just a bunch of bones. It was shattered so badly there was nothing they could tie together very well. So, it's still not right, I can walk okay, but it's still not right. If you look on an x-ray, you can see how bad it is. I stayed there a long time, I think, because the embassy in Saigon had to fill out the papers so that the Air Force would evacuate me. Without the papers and the agreement to pay I was stuck. So, finally they all got their act together. Then another trip to Tan Son Nhut where we spent the night and then a C-118, which is an old DC6, over to Clark Field in the Philippines because no matter what happened to you, the State Department evacuated everybody to Clark Field. I got to Clark Field and the Air Force doctor said, "Well, what are you doing here? You're leg is badly broken, we can't do anything more for you. You might as well go home." Well, then of course the State Department had to get into the act again and so forth after every surgery. Every time we took a trip by air they would go to all this trouble to put a cast on and then they took a little saw and sawed the cast off so that if you went down in the water you wouldn't sink. So, I spent about a week at Clark Field and finally again the State Department got its act together. Incidentally the day I was blown up was D-Day, the 6th of June, 1969. Finally we left Clark Field and we were supposed to go to Yokota Air Force Base outside Tokyo, but a typhoon intervened and we went to Guam. Then we went to Yokota and finally after all that, the next trip was the trip that finally got somewhere. We left Yokota and refueled in Anchorage, refueled in St. Louis and ended up just before the 4th of July weekend at Andrews Air Force Base. I had been told that I was going to Bethesda Hospital. I was put into a civilian ambulance at Andrews Air Force Base and I said, "Am I going to Bethesda?" The driver said, "No, you're going to George Washington University Hospital. That's what the State Department told me to do with you." I saw this little box of records. You always have to have your medical records. There was this little box, six by six inch box, with all my medical records in it. Off we go down the Suitland Parkway to GW on a hot July day and I arrived there and the first time the first doctor showed up, the question was, "Where are your records?" So, somewhere after the ambulance arrived at GW and before the doctors could get to me, my records were lost. Part of the trouble of course is being named Smith. This happens. So, I had to tell the doctors what had happened. I had to tell them the ankle was broken and they'd tried to set it three or four times. This was a mine explosion and all this other stuff is from shrapnel. I didn't mention that at one point in Vung Tau every time I ate, saliva would come outside my left cheek from this scar here and that was worrisome until finally the saliva glands I guess atrophied. I probably have five saliva glands now, instead of six. I was in GW Hospital for about another week and finally they operated for perhaps the fifth time and that time the surgeon that had been assigned by the State Department didn't give me any anesthetic. He just gave me a sedative. I didn't go to sleep. He had one nurse pushing down on my knee and another one pulling on my leg. He would try to set it by sound and when I made too much noise, he would stop. I said, "Why didn't you give me a anesthetic?" He said, "Well, you've had General Anesthetics five times in the last two or three weeks and sometimes people don't wake up." So, from the sixth of June until about the first of July, it took that long to finally get back here to Washington, DC.

Q: Well, then this is a good place to stop, but I'd like to put at the end so we know where to pick it up, what happened to you?

SMITH: Well, let me, I'll say a little bit.

Q: Yes, I was wondering about how the State Department, you know, sends out these brave heroes, but also, how do they receive them?

SMITH: Well, the first thing that happened was, I got a letter from Marshall Green, the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia, in which he started, "Dear Vick." Well, that's what my father was called. I've never been "Vick"; I've always been "Sam." So, I told the poor staff assistant who brought the letter, "Take it back. I don't want it; it's not addressed to me." Then people from the Vietnam Training Center came over and they were standing over me looking down at the bed. They said, "Well, Sam, we've got good news. You've just been promoted to FSO-6 and we're going to send you to Nairobi via Swahili training." So, finally what I wanted came true. I said, "Thank you, thank you." I looked up at them and shook their hands. When next we talk, we can talk about that and we can talk about what I did in-between which mainly was once I got out of the hospital, but on crutches, I went to the Vietnam Training Center to help on the staff. Of course, that was really good for morale for the new troops to see me hobbling around on crutches. By that time the method they were using to recruit people to go had gotten pretty dishonest, too, whereas in our case, they were honest with us.

Q: Well, why don't we talk about what you were seeing, I'll put this at the end so we'll know where to pick it up. We're into the late summer of '69 I guess.

SMITH: That's right, or mid-summer.

Q: You're recovering from your wounds and you're at the Vietnam Training Center and you were mentioning the recruitment was not as honest as it had previously been.

SMITH: I had this cast on. All you could see was my toes and then the cast came all the way up to my trunk. All the way, a full leg cast with a pin going through the heel to try to keep it pulled out. The pin went through one side and out the other and it had two knobs on it so, the steel pin wouldn't catch on things.

LLOYD JONNES
Counselor for Economic Affairs/Associate Director, USAID
Saigon (1968-1969)

Lloyd Jonnes was born in Ohio in 1924. He graduated from Antioch College in 1948 and served overseas in the US Army from 1943 to 1945. Working for the ECA and USAID programs he served in overseas posts including Switzerland, Austria, the United Kingdom, Libya, Turkey, Vietnam, and Indonesia. He was interviewed August 19, 1986 by W. Haven North.

JONNES: In '68 I was assigned to Saigon for a year as the economic counselor at the embassy and as the program officer/planner for the AID mission. That was quite a different world. I arrived in Vietnam about the first of August, 1968, to take on the dual position and found myself almost immediately in the middle of the fourth wave of the TET offensive, the first one having been the very end of January that year. Two more followed, and yet a fourth, each weaker than the preceding one. Nevertheless it gave me once again a taste of war. As I mentioned, I had been an infantryman in World War II and it was in a perverse sense going home, but not a home I particularly liked.

The responsibilities that I had in Vietnam were two-fold: one, to seek to ensure that the South Vietnamese government maintained reasonable economic policies that above all restrained inflation, for hyperinflation could have undone all of the efforts to sustain the South Vietnamese nation; two, to help direct whatever the United States could do to speed the processes of economic development in the middle of wartime. The Vietnamese economy was of course a typical dual economy, so typical of the less developed world, that most of the output was agriculture, and there was a very, very thin industrial/processing/handicraft/trade sector.

Let me back up. I would underline that the principal concern of my office was to ensure that the price of rice remained relatively constant. And this necessitated that one had available emergency supplies of rice, but it also entailed constant surveillance of what was going on in rice production in the country, because one did not want to completely destroy the local agriculture economy by throwing large quantities of imported rice on the market. On the other hand, if the progress of the war was such that it physically threatened domestic rice production, one had to be in a position to provide food supplies on a large scale almost immediately.

So much of the year I was in Vietnam was spent moving around particularly in the Mekong delta, constantly checking on what was going on in the rice market, what was going on in the production side of rice. A mundane economic problem and yet at times a very exciting process, because one was working really in the middle of a war. Where we were out beyond the sound of artillery, one could regularly hear the B-52's working off in the distance, a formidable sound. And at night on the outskirts of Saigon the war was present. One could go on the roof of our building and see the gun ships operating and see the flares go up and hear the sounds of shooting. Such a setting, if I may understate a bit, tends to prejudice the process of development, if only because physical security is a necessary condition. I also spent a great deal of time in talking with reporters and visitors.

Q: Further on the rice, what were the factors and how did production....?

JONNES: In the year I was there I was very fortunate that domestic rice production was doing very well in spite of all four TET offensives. Rice was moving into the market, and one may assume the price was such that the farmers were willing to move to sell their rice. But this was a constantly shifting equation, and one simply had to be aware of what was going on.

Q: Were you providing assistance to the rice growers?

JONNES: Yes we were providing all sorts of assistance. Above all we were trying to provide security through the military, and trying to make available the traditional inputs, trying to ensure that credit was available to the villagers. We were also launching the introduction of some new varieties of rice, but this was a very tricky matter because of the traditional pattern of consumer tastes; the city people were unwilling to use the new rice because it didn't have quite the right consistency.

One of the key questions in this equation of inflation was that of the wage level that the U.S. forces paid to its Vietnamese employees. This became curiously enough one of the great policy issues that we macroeconomic workers had to cope with because the U.S. DOD was not particularly concerned with price levels as such. Their concern was to make sure that they had employees who were willing to do the many jobs that needed doing for them, and what they had to pay was really irrelevant to them. For the South Vietnamese economy, the level of these salary levels was a critical determinant of what was going to happen to the GOVN's budget. It became almost impossible to persuade the Department of Defense of the unhappy aspects of their wage policy, but the time that was spent arguing with them in Saigon and back in Washington was incredible in retrospect. I would say that we fought a successful delaying action time and time again, but ultimately the Department of Defense was not to be deterred.

Q: Was there inflation?

JONNES: The year I was there, for practical purposes, no. The price increases for consumers may have been within five percent. But because rice problems were being kept in hand, and because we kept the Department of Defense at bay, as it were, we were successful in the short run; in the longer run we were much less successful I think. In mid-winter of '68-'69 I had a long chat with the prime minister who was persuaded that the problem of inflation was really the American fault, that the patterns of consumption that the Americans showed to the Vietnamese were a stimulus to ever-growing consumption by the Vietnamese. He felt that the psychology of this was the critical question, that one need not worry so much about what was being paid to the Vietnamese by the U.S. or what might happen to the Vietnamese budget. So in a sense I got little support.

Q: Was he right?

JONNES: I'm sure there was a psychological impact of the pattern of consumption by the Americans. How much this effected the price level is almost anyone's guess.

Q: What was the problem, what was the issue then?

JONNES: We were just chatting about the psychology of inflation, how he felt it was inevitable simply because of our presence. But then war by its very nature is inflationary. He was suggesting a much more passive position on dealing with the problem. The government itself had of course a swollen bureaucracy because of the war, and their wage policy was a major determinant of price increases. If they felt that their budget deficit was going to be underwritten by the United States, there was no reason for them to exert any discipline.

Q: So you had a debate with the government also?

JONNES: We had a debate with the government, but this was much less serious because you never knew to what extent you were being successful in your communicating. So if they tended to feel the issue was irrelevant because of the simple fact of our presence, their interest in any action would be equally irrelevant.

The other half of my duties were those to which I devoted much less time, i.e.: what could and should the United States do to encourage, to stimulate, to help with the process of longer term economic development in Vietnam.

We had a very large AID mission in the country, about 2,500 people, American officers who were focusing on what was happening at the village level. And we had our people in each of the four regions. AID representatives in each of the four regions responsible for conducting those programs of education, village health and general community development that would support the further thrust of development. The program office staff concerned with these programs ranged at about 225 people. Essentially Jim Roush, who was my deputy for the programming side, looked after these.

Q: What all were you doing?

JONNES: They were concerned with transportation systems, they were concerned with various agricultural programs I mentioned, they were concerned with public health, they were concerned at the national level with educational programs, of public administration. All of the more typical development undertakings that AID had sponsored over the years. We did a great deal of teacher education in Vietnam as I recall. Perhaps this sort of detail I can get as we come back through it.

Q: Do you think they were effective?

JONNES: Everything we did probably had its effectiveness severely reduced by the simple fact of war. There was hardly an area in Vietnam that was not being touched one way or another by direct war or by the indirect effects of the war. The Viet Cong was almost ubiquitous. The problems of village security were in a word overwhelming. And how one can encourage or work with the people in the villages under these circumstances was a constant problem.

Q: Do you have any sense of lasting effects? Obviously you were only there a year.

JONNES: This was a short term assignment for me. In the longer run we obviously didn't succeed because of factors having precious little to do with what we were up to. My own feeling was one of disaffection with the process because my judgment had been that the United States had erred in its policies toward Indochina in the mid-1950s at the time when the Geneva Accord was concluded. That was the moment to have agreed to a political solution, but the United States saw fit not to sign the accord and not to support the process of electoral resolution of the political problems of Indochina. My appreciation of French colonialism was never very high, and the prices we have paid in truckling to French colonialists in the name of anti-Communist were a bit high.

Q: What was your view about the policies that were implemented at the time you were there, the general policy toward Vietnam?

JONNES: Well, I thought probably it was doomed to failure. Having long since concluded that we had gone in the wrong direction, I simply gritted my teeth and focused on the suboptimal problem of short term economic evolution of the country. Another possible way out would have been, after the events in 1963 and the virtual revolving door leadership of Vietnam following the killing of the Nhus, to negotiate then. And who knows what might have happened had Kennedy survived. He survived the assassination of Diem in Vietnam by only two weeks I guess. It was a very unhappy time.

In retrospect, one of the more powerful shocks of my life was the discovery of the grave misgivings that McNamara had about our policies there that led him out of DOD and the similar problems that led to Clark Clifford's disaffection. If the Secretaries of Defense are opposed to our policies, what are the civil servants, not to mention the US citizenry, to think of these policies.. There I was worrying about precisely the same things as they were. Domestic political events in 1968-9 were extraordinary. President Johnson became a political prisoner; he could go nowhere in the country of which he was president..

Q: Did you have any chance to voice your concerns while you were there?

JONNES: I voiced my concerns to the head of the agency very loudly. Yes.

Q: The head of the agency.

JONNES: Mr. Bill Gaud.

Q: What was your line of comment?

JONNES: Basically what I've been saying to you. I found that paradoxical that I should be in this position I was in, feeling about the general venture as I did. In fact I had long since expressed views to the head of the Vietnam bureau, Grant. I had not expected to be in Vietnam longer than a week or two. And I was lied to systematically.

Q: What was the reaction of Mr. Gaud?

JONNES: Very understanding. And I was being transferred out. I had planned to go elsewhere at that time, i.e. to one of the international agencies. It was a very unhappy time of my life.

Q: Was there a primary security issue that you concluded while you were there?

JONNES: I'm not sure I know what you mean. Personal security never bothered me particularly. While I had been in infantry war in 1944-45 and did not like it at all, that was not a problem. Perhaps, we could have won the war, but that to me was a secondary issue. The real issue was what we were doing to the United States, and how we misunderstood what was going on in Vietnam.

If one goes back in history to Ho Chi Minh in France in 1919-1920, here is this image of a poor struggling Vietnamese Indo-Chinese who presents himself at every political gathering in the country trying to make the French understand that the Indo-Chinese want their independence. The only political group in all of France that gave ear to any of this were the communists. In 1920 in Tours at the annual meeting of the communist party, here is Ho Chi Minh receiving support. The relevance of Marxism to Indochina is totally zero, perhaps a negative quantity. But politically, this is where he got his support and was led right down the path. The United States could have supported the independence of Indochina except for our need of the French in dealing with communism. To this, one might add the view that our support of the South also would convince the Russians of our steadfastness in opposing Communism. Our Vietnam involvement ultimately, in my judgment, was part of the cost of the cold war if you will.

Q: And our misjudgment as to whether there was an honest national government as opposed to communism.

JONNES: Yes, exactly.

Q: Did you have any contact with the Vietnamese people in your travels around? What was your impression?

JONNES: I had a lot of contact but certainly not with villagers.

Q: Did you talk to villagers about this?

JONNES: It was very difficult to talk to villagers.

There were all sorts of policy problems. One of the more curious was the position of the South Koreans on Vietnam. They had been encouraged to support our position in Vietnam and one of the devices for insuring this was in effect a broad assurance that we would do everything we could to help ease the economic impact of their being there. This included opening up the PX's to their people. Also, there was a South Korean group that was interested in getting the scrap metal out of the actual war zones. It was their view that they had a first priority on this and that they should be assisted in getting it out no matter what the cost in terms of dealing with the war conditions. It was almost impossible to deal with this; they were so clamorous in reiterating their demands for access to scrap metal.

WILLIAM VEALE
Captain, U.S. Army
Vietnam (1968-1969)

Mr. Veale was born in Washington, D.C. into a US military family and was raised primarily at Army posts in the US and abroad. Entering the military after graduating from Georgetown University, he served with the US Army until joining the Foreign Service in 1971. Throughout his career Mr. Veale dealt primarily with Political/Military and Disarmament affairs, serving both in the Department of State and the Department of Defense. Among his assignments, Mr. Veale was posted to Strasbourg, Berlin and Rangoon. He also taught in the Political Science department at the US Air Force Academy. Mr. Veale was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 2000.

Q: When you got back from Vietnam and on to the campus at Georgetown, did you find any strong feeling against you personally because of your service there?

VEALE: I found that there was a strong feeling generally against individuals who had served in Vietnam and I had had a particularly demanding assignment in Vietnam and I was fairly closed mouth. I didn't like the attitude of the students. I didn't like the attitude of the American press. I thought most Americans were under-informed about the real situation in Vietnam. So, I was pretty disgusted.

Q: Could you tell us in a few words what your demanding assignment in Vietnam was?

VEALE: I was a case officer running agents into Cambodia. This was fairly sensitive stuff and I was undercover and working fairly closely with individual Vietnamese who were caught between a rock and a hard place, between their lousy government and a worse enemy. I thought this was a tragedy. I later heard a reporter talk about the situation and I am amazed to hear the same kind of things coming from her that I was experiencing.

ANDREW F. ANTIPPAS
Political Officer
Saigon (1968-1970)

Andrew F. Antippas was born in Massachusetts in 1931. He earned his Bachelor's from Tuft's University and entered the Foreign Service in 1960. His career has included posts in Africa, Japan, Vietnam, Cambodia, Thailand, Korea, Canada, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 19, 1994.

ANTIPPAS: I think that I volunteered in March, 1967. My tour in Kobe wasn't up until October, 1967. I kind of hoped that I would go right away. The way it would work, if my wife stayed in the United States, the tour was 18 months. If she was "safe-havened" in a post near Vietnam, the tour was two years. My idea was that she would stay in the U. S. for 18 months, I would be promoted, and we would go on to greater glory. She didn't see it that way. She said, "I'm not about to stay home." So she decided to go to Bangkok for safe-haven. Of course, by that time she was also pregnant.

I didn't get to go to Vietnam right away. In fact, I didn't get there for something like eleven months, which was a very difficult time. I got to Saigon just after the Tet offensive [of late January, 1968]. The whole scheme of things had changed by February, 1968. In fact, my arrival was held up by the Tet offensive. When did you go to Vietnam?

Q: I went there just a year later, in February, 1969.

ANTIPPAS: We were in Saigon together, in the Embassy. Of course, by the time I had volunteered to go to Vietnam, I couldn't take it back. It would really have hurt you, professionally, to have declined to go. At that time the Department was ordering people to go.

Whole junior officer classes were being ordered to go, over their objections.

I was assigned to the Political Section. I was supposed to replace an officer in the Internal Unit of the Political Section. Then, when I got there, it was decided that I would work in the External Unit. We had a 25-man Political Section. These were Foreign Service Officers, not including any "spooks." They were all "straight leg" Foreign Service Officers. We had four or five guys that covered the provinces, three guys in Political-Military Affairs, three in External Affairs, five in Internal Affairs. We had one guy to cover the Upper House of the National Assembly, another guy to cover the Lower House, we had two guys covering the labor situation. One guy would cover the Buddhists. We were very specialized.

When I got there, I went to the External Unit. It was decided that my area of concern in the political section in Saigon would be Cambodia, the French Community, and what we called the "More Flags" project. The latter was President Lyndon Johnson's effort to get more foreign countries to support the South Vietnamese Government. A lot of work already had been done on this. I was a sort of "guardian" of the files but periodically I would have to go out and visit the Philippine contingent [PHILCAG], the Thai division, the Iranian hospital down in the [Mekong] Delta -- and things like that.

In fact, I spent most of my time working on Cambodia. The "French Community" really meant the rubber plantations. Many of the French left in Vietnam worked for the rubber plantations. The rubber plantations were mostly located in Zones "C" and "D" [areas North of Saigon where communist armed activity was very active], as well as near the Cambodian-Vietnamese border, where they were being used as sanctuaries by the Viet Cong. There was a sort of synergy between the functions.

My job required me to be chairman of the Mission Cambodia Committee. We were not represented in Cambodia at that time. Prince Sihanouk broke diplomatic relations with us, I guess, in about 1965, over border incidents with South Vietnam. We didn't reestablish relations until 1969. Between 1965 and 1969 the Australians were our "protecting power" in Phnom Penh [capital of Cambodia]. It's interesting to recall that W. Randolph Kidder who was nominated to be Ambassador to Cambodia in 1965, had been the Senior Inspector who inspected Douala in 1964. He was the man who suggested that I be left in charge of the Consulate in Douala for several months and be given a chance to "show my stuff." After his assignment as an inspector and his nomination as Ambassador to Cambodia, he went to Cambodia, but Sihanouk never accepted his credentials. We closed the Embassy down after that.

During the time I served in Saigon the Johnson administration was trying very hard to convince Sihanouk to do something about the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong use of his territory. In 1968 we recorded over 200 border "incidents," involving firing from Cambodia into Vietnam or attacks by the North Vietnamese which resulted in the loss of American lives on the border.

Then there was the famous "understanding" of some of the missions sent by the administration to Cambodia to try to talk Sihanouk into being more cooperative. One of these missions was led by Eugene Black, who was then President of the World Bank. He was accompanied by Philip Habib. During your time and mine in Vietnam Phil Habib had been Political Counselor in Saigon. He was one of the "legends" of the Foreign Service. Wasn't he your Ambassador in Seoul?

Q: No. My Ambassador was Dick Sneider.

ANTIPPAS: Anyway, Phil Habib was the Foreign Service Officer who accompanied Eugene Black to try to talk Sihanouk into being more cooperative. We wanted to "beef up" the International Control Commission in Cambodia so that it could be more effective, by offering them better communications equipment and maybe even helicopters. For the benefit of people who don't know about the International Control Commission [ICC], it was created as a result of the Geneva Accords of 1954. The Commission had four branch offices: one in North Vietnam, one in South Vietnam, one in Laos, and one in Cambodia. They were each basically independent of each other. The function of the Commissions was to make sure that the provisions of the 1954 [Geneva] Accords were met. Most of the Commissions became virtually moribund very quickly. The only one that seemed to function at all was the one in Cambodia, because it suited Sihanouk's purpose to have an international presence to try to protect Cambodia's territory.

The members of the Commission were the Poles, the Canadians, and the Indians. India provided the Chairmen of the International Control Commissions. The Indian who was Chairman in Cambodia at that time was V. V. Paranjpe, whom we all thought was pro-communist. He actually went on to be Indian Ambassador to China. He was a China "expert."

There was a constant battle. Sihanouk would take members of the ICC up to these border sites and make a big "PR" thing, alleging that this was where the Americans bombed Cambodia. Dead bodies would have lain out there for three or four days until he could get the ICC to go up there. You want to talk about a sight! The poor ICC representatives -- they were all diplomats -- were just trying to do their jobs. They would look at these fly-ridden bodies. We had, of course, good relations with the Canadians. The Canadians never really acted as our "agents," per se, because they were much more independent than that. But they were basically our friends.

One of my jobs was, from time to time, to brief the Canadian ICC representative, At that time, a Canadian diplomat named Dick Gorham, who would come over from Phnom Penh. I would take him to J-2 of MACV [the Intelligence Branch of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] to get briefings about where the North Vietnamese were in the border areas. If he could get down there, he might find them. I remember telling him one time that in the "Parrot's Beak" [West-Northwest of Saigon, where a salient of Cambodian territory jutted into South Vietnam], "If you guys would go down here and go one kilometer further, you'll find the Command Post of the First North Vietnamese Army Division."

I remember arranging for a firepower demonstration to be put on at a range in Long Binh Province. We actually had the military fire various kinds of weapons and then we took Dick Gorham out and showed him what the hole looked like [at the impact points]. What the Cambodians would do was to go out, dig holes, put pieces of rusty shrapnel in it, and say, "The Americans did that." We wanted to show the Canadians that, "If we shoot something, this is what it's going to look like." So the Canadian ICC representative became much more active.

The other representatives on the ICC, the Poles and Indians, knew about this. They assumed that the Canadian ICC representative was feeding us a great deal of information. Dick Gorham went on to be an Under Secretary of External Affairs in the Canadian Government in Ottawa. He hated the Indians. He'd been assigned to India at one time and disliked the Indians. He couldn't stand Paranjpe, the Indian ICC representative.

I remember that when we reopened our Embassy in Phnom Penh in 1969, my wife Judy and I went over to visit Phnom Penh and Angkor Wat [Buddhist temple complex Northwest of Phnom Penh]. We went to a party at the apartment of the Canadian Military Attaché. Dick Gorham was there -- the whole, small Western community was there. Dick introduced me to Paranjpe while we were standing on the balcony of this apartment block overlooking the Mekong River. My wife was there. Dick said, "I want you to meet Mr. Andrew Antippas. He's an American Embassy Political Officer in Saigon. He follows Cambodia, and this is his Canadian wife." I saw Paranjpe's eyes widen, and suddenly, everything fell into place for him. I thought that he was going to do a "back flip" off the balcony when Dick said that. Paranjpe was probably thinking, "The son of a bitch. He's been doing that all of this time. He's been feeding intelligence [to the Americans]." Because the Indians saw their job as covering up what the Viet Cong were doing in Cambodia. Gorham's job was to try and get this information out, try to "expose" it, try to do his job.

Anyway, Cambodia was an interesting subject to follow. I wasn't, as I have mentioned, particularly a believer in why we were in Vietnam, since my original feeling about Vietnam had been the one I gave to Charley Whitehouse in 1965. Since I had been in Korea and knew very well what the French had experienced in Indochina -- I had grown up during the Indochina War, after all -- I doubted the wisdom of what we were doing in Vietnam. But the fact of the matter was that we were engaged, our armed forces were engaged, and we were taking a beating through the communist use of neutral territory -- in Laos and Cambodia.

I really became kind of a believer in doing what we could, not so much to get Cambodia into the war. Nobody believed that the Cambodians could do anything to influence the war. One of the things that I knew was the condition of the Cambodian Army. It was pathetic. It was a 30,000 man force, organized into 50 battalions scattered all over the country, mostly in "Beaugeste" type mud forts [from the novel by the British author, P. C. Wren]. Those forts were simply there to demonstrate Cambodian sovereignty, not to be able to defend anything. They couldn't have. The North Vietnamese would pull up artillery units, next to the Cambodian forts, and fire into Vietnam at our Special Forces camps. The U. S. Air Force would come over and attempt to plaster the North Vietnamese, but they would frequently hit and kill Cambodians.

One of the things that Eugene Black and Phil Habib had gotten out of Sihanouk was a commitment to receive intelligence information on the presence of Vietnamese Communists on his territory. He indicated that he would accept such information. One of the jobs I had, working with American Intelligence, was to prepare what we called "packages" of information about the location of these base camps. There were about half a dozen or a dozen, major communist base camps just inside the Cambodian border, which we knew about, mostly through signal intercepts and POW interrogations. We knew which units were in there and what they were doing. Now and again we would have an American prisoner who would escape and tell us what was in there.

There's an interesting aside that I must tell you about, just to show what the atmospherics were in Vietnam during that period. I would prepare these "dossiers" and give them to the Australian Embassy in Saigon, which would send them over to the Australian Embassy in Phnom Penh, which, in turn, would give them to the Cambodian military. Sihanouk never acknowledged the receipt of any of these "packages" of intelligence. We would know, again from signal intercepts, that the Cambodians would send out a unit looking for these Vietnamese Communist units. One time one of these Cambodian units got lost, up in the Northeast "Tri-Border" [Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos] area, trying to find one of these locations. It was really pathetic. But we knew that the Cambodians were beginning to realize how much of their territory was being taken over by the Vietnamese Communists. I think that what really "blew" their fuse on this matter was that the Viet Cong started moving their families into these base areas and farming the land. Then they started issuing tax receipts to the Viet Cong families for the rice fields that they were farming and preventing Cambodian District Officers from going into those areas. They would literally seal off whole zones of these base areas.

Well, anybody who knows the Cambodians will tell you that they really get upset about Vietnamese encroachments on their land. All of the Mekong Delta, all of the territory South of Saigon had been part of Cambodia, up until the 19th century. It was only at the beginning of the 19th century that the Vietnamese, moving slowly southward, as they have done over the past five centuries or so, took over. The Cambodians called this area "Kampuchea Krom," which means "Southern Cambodia." The ethnic Cambodians living in the Mekong Delta, many of whom we recruited for our Special Forces, were called, "Khmer Krom," which meant "Southern Cambodians." When they worked for the U. S. Special Forces, they were called "KK," or "Khmer Krom."

You can be sure that when the Cambodians finally realized that the Viet Cong were, in fact, taking over their territory, they started getting upset. That's what happened in 1970, when there was a...

Q: General Lon Nol took over.

ANTIPPAS: Well, the overthrow of Sihanouk took place because there was a demonstration in the provincial capital of Svay Rieng, which is the "Parrot's Beak" area I mentioned before. It took place in late February or early March of 1970. I was not in Saigon. I was back here in Washington. There was a demonstration in front of the provincial governor's house [in Svay Rieng], protesting the Viet Cong takeover of their land. The "Tet" offensive [of 1968] in Saigon had been launched from the "Parrot's Beak." The southeastern tip of the "Parrot's Beak" is only about 35 miles from Saigon.

Then there was a sympathy demonstration in Phnom Penh. That is where what happened becomes questionable, because that was set up, we think, by Lon Nol's younger brother, Lon Non, who was then a police official. Sihanouk was in France on one of his periodic "rest or health cures" [in Mougins, near Nice]. There was a sympathy demonstration which was followed by another sympathy demonstration near the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Embassies. The Vietnamese communists had two Embassies in Phnom Penh: the Viet Cong Embassy of the so-called "Provisional Revolutionary Government" and the North Vietnamese Embassy. A mob sacked both embassies. They literally threw everything in them outside, including over $100,000 in U. S. currency, which they burned. We later found half burned greenbacks. The Vietnamese were using this money to buy rice in Cambodia for Vietnamese communist troops in the border areas. We used to have people take pictures of bicycles carrying sacks of rice down to the Vietnamese-Cambodian border area. There was a very sizeable cross-border trade going on, particularly in the so-called "Parrot's Beak."

Following the riots in Phnom Penh, all hell broke loose. Sihanouk was very angry. He made very threatening noises from France that he would "fix" those responsible when he returned to Cambodia. Gen Lon Nol started negotiating with the Vietnamese and said that he would reestablish the "status quo ante," but the Viet Cong troops in the border area had to leave Cambodian territory. In other words, he would continue the arms and the rice trade, because the communists were also shipping arms through Cambodia, along the "Ho Chi Minh Trail."

This was one of the great intelligence debates of the Vietnam War. Which was the route the weapons and ammunition that the Vietnamese communists were using. The trail or by sea on 100 ton trawlers? We knew the stuff was coming from China. There was a way of calculating the expenditure of communist [artillery] ammunition, just by the number of "booms" that went off. Every U. S. unit would report how many [Vietnamese communist] shells were heard exploding on a given day. Over time you could figure out how much ammunition they had on hand. This would tell us what the resupply operation would have to be. The experts could figure out how much was "in the pipeline." The debate was whether the Viet Cong were bringing the ammunition down by trucks along the Ho Chi Minh Trail, or on these 100 ton steel hulled trawlers which go down the Vietnamese coast and then up to Sihanoukville in Cambodia. The weapons and ammunition would be offloaded and the supplies were then trucked up to the Cambodian-Vietnamese border, where the communist units were stationed. A great internal debate went on in the intelligence community in 1968 as the Johnson Administration was winding down. The U.S. Navy under Admiral Elmo Zumwalt was convinced the stuff was coming down by ship. It was very hard to prove since we had few agents inside Cambodia and the top Cambodians were profiting from the arms and rice trade.

Near the end of the Johnson administration [October, 1968] William H. Bundy, Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs, the younger brother of McGeorge Bundy who had been President Kennedy's National Security Adviser, came to Saigon with a group of high-powered people from CIA. They conducted a debate with MACV as to whether the Viet Cong ammunition was coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail or through Sihanoukville. The obvious, political implication for the administration was that if the predominant amount of ammunition for III and IV Corps in South Vietnam, more or less the southern half of South Vietnam, was coming through Sihanoukville, that was something that we could do something about. We could blockade Sihanoukville, overthrow Sihanouk, or do something else. But if it was coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail, nobody could stop that. We had been trying to stop that for three or four years, without success. You can see the political implications.

This was at the end of the Johnson administration. We were going into the elections of November, 1968. The last thing in the world that the Johnson administration -- or the Democratic Party -- wanted to do was to expand the war into Cambodia. Given my position in the Political Section in the Embassy in Saigon, I sat in on the briefings for the Bundy party. I worked very closely with the intelligence community representatives in following all of this. In fact, I received an award from the U. S. Navy for the work I did in this effort to try to identify where this Viet Cong ammunition was coming from.

The Bundy group came to Saigon and asked to see all of the reports that we had which asserted that the ammunition was being delivered in Sihanoukville, trucked inland by General Lon Nol's people to the arms caches, and then distributed to the Viet Cong military authorities. They went through this debate. I remember that the decision was that there was no real "smoking gun" and, therefore, the Johnson administration wasn't going to do anything about Cambodia.

However, the following, Nixon administration was very much of the view that this was happening.

Q: How did you feel about it? What did the people who were dealing with the problem in Saigon feel about it? Obviously, this had political repercussions.

ANTIPPAS: I believed that Cambodian territory was being used to resupply the Vietnamese communists. I can still remember the name of the [Cambodian] trucking company used to bring the ammunition up [from Sihanoukville]. It was the Hak Lee Trucking Company. We would find out that there was a Chinese [Communist] ship off the Cambodian coast, going into Sihanoukville (now Kampong Som). So my job was to rush over and ask the Australian Embassy in Saigon to send a message to their Military Attaché in the Australian Embassy in Phnom Penh, stating that there was a [Chinese] ship arriving in port and requesting him to "hot foot" it down there to see what he could find out.

He [the Australian Military Attaché] would do that. He would jump in his car and drive down Route 4 to Kampong Som, a four-hour drive from Phnom Penh. More often than not, he would get there and meet the [Hak Lee] trucks coming back. I don't know whether this incident was simply "alleged" or "apocryphal" or what, but there was an assertion made that one case of guns had fallen off a truck, had been found by people friendly to our side, and had been reported back. By virtue of the serial number on an AK-47 [Chinese-made automatic rifle], they could tell when that gun was manufactured in China and when it was delivered. Therefore, it had to come by ship through Kampong Som.

We had intelligence reports that said that the Hak Lee Trucking Company was delivering these weapons to certain locations where the Viet Cong would take them and distribute them. I think that the Australians believed this. Well, nobody actually saw them do this. It was worth your life to watch them deliver the weapons to the communists.

We also had U-2 [very high-altitude, reconnaissance aircraft] flights over Kampong Som. The port at Kampong Som had been built by the Russians. We built Route 4 under our aid program in the 1950's [the so-called "Khmer-American Friendship Highway"]. In fact, the project to build Route 4 was the source of the story on the "Ugly American," [from the book of the same name].

The port at Kampong Som had no onshore loading and unloading cranes. There was no equipment to offload ships at the docks. Ships had to offload cargo, using their own, shipboard cargo booms. I remember that we would have these great debates. The U-2 photos that we were taking could tell us how big the cargo hatches were. Looking at the booms, you could tell how long it would take to unload that size ship. You could then analyze this information. The experts would say that it would take two days to unload whatever it was -- 10,000 tons of ammunition or whatever it was that they were unloading. The communists always managed to do it faster than that, because I think that they worked day and night. They'd get this stuff on the trucks and get the trucks up Route 4 or Route 5 up into the Vietnamese-Cambodian border area and deliver it.

Anyway, there was a great debate about how this was done. I believed that this was how it was happening, based on the expenditure of ammunition. Afterwards, Gen Lon Nol's supporters kicked Sihanouk out and he became our "buddy." I was at the Embassy in Phnom Penh in 1970 as a Political Officer. We actually began to confirm these earlier ammunition reports. We visited some of the arms caches where these items had been kept.

It's kind of funny because the arms caches we found in Grenada, when I participated in the Grenada operation in 1983, looked just like the arms caches I saw in Cambodia. This was because they were built by Russians -- designed and constructed by Russians or Russian trained people. The piles of weapons all looked just like the ones in Cambodia. Talk about "deja vu all over again!"

So the Johnson administration was unable to "pass the ball" to [former Vice President] Hubert Humphrey, the Democratic candidate for President, and the Nixon administration came into office. During the Eugene Black and Phil Habib visit to Cambodia in 1968 Sihanouk reportedly either said or indicated, using our favorite Foreign Service term, "indicated," that it was all right to bomb communist base areas. However, Sihanouk was reported to have said, "But if you kill Cambodians, I will scream like a stuck pig." He reportedly said, "If you kill Vietnamese, that's all right with us." Since most of these base areas were basically uninhabited, that's what was said. So, based on that, the Nixon administration began the "secret bombing" of Cambodia in 1969. This campaign was first "discovered" by William Beecher and surfaced in articles in the "Boston Globe" in March, 1969.

I believe that I was the first individual in the Embassy [in Saigon] to find out about the "secret bombing" of Cambodia, because I had special access to MACV J-2 [intelligence] information. I used to wander into the office of the J-2 all the time -- particularly the photo interpretation side. You know, they were keeping track of what the Vietnamese communists were doing, because you could tell a great by photo interpretation.

I remember an Airman Second Class acquaintance of mine who was a photo interpretation specialist, in J-2. I wandered into his office, in a very secure area, probably the most secure area in the whole building. People used to call MACV headquarters, "Pentagon East." This specialist said to me, "Do you want to see something interesting? We tried to hit the CP [Command Post] of the First North Vietnamese Army Division last night with B-52 strikes, and they were one kilometer off the target." He showed me the track, on a 1:50,000 scale map. It was about five kilometers inside Cambodia. I said, "What? We just did what? We bombed Cambodia?"

I jumped in my car and sped back to the Embassy. I told the Deputy Ambassador -- Sam Berger, at that time -- and I don't know who else I told. I don't know whether Martin Herz was the Political Counselor at that time or not. Anyway, I was telling Sam Berger. I could tell from the expression on his face that he didn't know that this was authorized. So I was dismissed from his office.

Then all hell broke loose. General Westmoreland was furious. I was never allowed back in the photo interpretation lab after that. I wonder what happened to the photo specialist? The affair caused an enormous "stink" in the U.S. when it was discovered that we were bombing Cambodia. Of course, the explanation was that, "Sihanouk said that it was OK to bomb Cambodian territory as long as we just kill Vietnamese. If we kill Cambodians, "you'll hear about it."

Of course, the border incidents continued, and we continued to kill Cambodians. It would happen, time and time again, that our forces would return fire into Cambodia and would kill Cambodians. So I spent my time dealing with incidents like this.

Q: Did you get any feel for what the CIA was doing? They had a huge operation in Vietnam, and you were in the Political Section. How did they "interface" with you?

ANTIPPAS: We had, of course, signal intercepts, which were a big part of their function at that time. I had the impression that they didn't have much in the way of "resident assets" in Cambodia. They had become notorious in Cambodia. The CIA was alleged by the Cambodians to be implicated in an effort to overthrow Sihanouk in 1959. This caused such a stir that the CIA subsequently kept a very low posture. In fact, when Mansfield visited...

Q: This would be Senator Mansfield.

ANTIPPAS: Yes, Senator Mike Mansfield. He was quite an Asian expert, in his own right, and was very friendly with Sihanouk. We reopened the Embassy [in Phnom Penh] with Mike Reeves as chargé d'affaires in the summer of 1969. I remember that I helped them a good deal in reestablishing the Embassy, with resources from the Saigon side. Senator Mansfield arrived in Phnom Penh the week after Mike Rives set up shop in the Royal Hotel. Mansfield spent a week in Phnom Penh. He made a commitment to Sihanouk that there would be no CIA presence in Cambodia. He said that there was none then and there would be none later. And there wasn't -- at least initially, when Sihanouk was still in power.

So I think that the CIA really had very little in the way of assets in Cambodia. Of course, the conventional wisdom in some quarters in Washington and elsewhere was that the CIA overthrew Sihanouk, that it was at our behest that Gen Lon Nol' supporters kicked Sihanouk out. I don't believe that this is true, based on my own knowledge of what was going on in Cambodia. Obviously, there's a lot that I didn't and wouldn't know. However, over time you learn the signs. I believe we had decided that we were getting out of Vietnam, as a policy. The great debate was simply over the rate of our withdrawal -- how quickly we would get out. One of the great criticisms of President Nixon and Secretary of State Kissinger was that it took them four years to get us out of Vietnam.

I think that no one who had any knowledge of the capacity of the Cambodians to fight had any illusions about their ability to defend themselves. They certainly were in no position to take on any kind of Vietnamese at all. Overthrowing Sihanouk would have set off a dynamic that no one could predict or control. More than that, it's one thing politically to shoot into a so-called "neutral" country, with the screams of outrage and diplomatic repercussions that would follow. It's another thing to shoot into a communist country. If Cambodia went communist, we would really have ended up with "egg on our faces" and would have a situation like the one we had with North Vietnam and Communist China.

It seemed to me that nobody would want to do this [i. e., overthrow Sihanouk] because we were drawing down and getting out of Vietnam. Bombing Cambodia would start off something that we couldn't predict. Secondly, if Cambodia did go communist, that would be an even bigger problem. So it was better simply to keep the status quo, until we could get out of Vietnam. I think that the argument that we overthrew Sihanouk to widen the war and bring Cambodia in on our side of the struggle might have been plausible in 1966 or even 1967. By 1968, it was too late. We were on our way out. The American people had indicated very clearly that they wanted to "get out" of Vietnam. So I have always taken the view that Sihanouk was overthrown by Cambodians.

[After we reopened our Embassy in Phnom Penh], I was one of the first Americans to attend sessions of the Cambodian National Assembly. We had a very tiny Embassy in Phnom Penh -- only eight people -- when all of this took place. I arrived in Phnom Penh as a Political Officer in April [1970]. Three weeks after Sihanouk's overthrow on March 9, 1979, the Vietnamese started attacking the Cambodians. I didn't finish that story, which I began earlier.

Lon Nol had started negotiating with the Vietnamese, saying that he would reestablish the "status quo ante," but Vietnamese [communist] troops had to get out of Cambodian territory. They talked for a week or two, in March, 1970. Then the Vietnamese evacuated all of the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong Embassy staff. The Chinese communists also evacuated their Embassy staff.

Vietnamese troops in the "sanctuaries," particularly up by the rubber plantation country [where the "Terre Rouge" plantations were located], started attacking Cambodian Police and Army posts in Kampong Cham province. A full three weeks before we intervened, the Cambodians were being attacked and pushed back. By the time the American "incursion" into Cambodia began on May 1, 1970, the Vietnamese communists were 25 miles outside of Phnom Penh. When I got to Phnom Penh, on April 27, 1970, the Vietnamese were literally outside of Phnom Penh. The first CIA officer, John Stein, arrived in Phnom Penh two days before I did, on a Special Mission aircraft. He was basically an Africa hand. He had no Indochina background whatsoever. That was sort of a tip of the hat to Sihanouk's fear of the return of CIA people with Indochina experience.

At the time I was sent to Phnom Penh, Tom Corcoran was Country Director for Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. He said, when he sent me to Phnom Penh, "You should know that Mike Rives doesn't want you. Nothing personal, he doesn't want a bigger staff. But when U. Alexis Johnson, [Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs], signs this telegram, you're going out there." He said, "I want you to report more than what's in the newspapers. Find out what the hell's going on there." I did that.

The Cambodian National Assembly overthrew Sihanouk in 1970. It approved a resolution that said that Sihanouk, in fact, had endangered the well being of the state by collaboration with the communists. It was the National Assembly which had approved the constitution which made Sihanouk "head of state for life." So since they made the constitution, they could unmake it, and they threw him out.

I went to the National Assembly and started talking (in French) to the members. During the two years that I was a Political Officer in Phnom Penh the National Assembly was my "beat."

Q: Let's talk a little more about Saigon before you do that. You mentioned something about a story concerning a prisoner escaping.

ANTIPPAS: Right. We had very little information about the communist "base areas" in Cambodia. We had the case of an American soldier who had been captured up in the Central Highlands of Vietnam [Ban Me Thuot-Kontum area]. He had been taken into one of the communist "base areas" in Cambodia, number 704 if memory serves, as a prisoner. One of the things that they did was to take his boots away, which makes it a lot harder to run away. Nevertheless, he managed to escape and walked out of the communist "base area" and back into South Vietnam, where he managed to be picked up by American forces.

I went out to the medical clearing station near the Saigon airport and MACV headquarters, where he was being treated, to interview him. He'd been brought in for medical treatment, as his feet were all torn up. He had walked out of the "base area" barefoot, through the jungle. I wanted to talk to him about what he saw, what was there, and what the "base area" looked like.

Of course, he couldn't tell me very much. But it was interesting to see all of these wounded American soldiers at this medical clearing station near the airport. The severely wounded were being evacuated to Japan for further hospital treatment. I saw a lot of these beat up Americans -- just kids. You know what movie they were watching on AFVN Television [American Forces in Vietnam]? They were watching "Combat," a TV serial on the American Army in combat in Europe during World War II. Every week you had a new episode of this war. Here were all of these kids -- literally kids, who had legs and arms blown off and terribly beaten up. People talk about being "anti-war." If you haven't been in a ward full of wounded soldiers, you really don't appreciate what war is all about. That struck me -- the irony of soldiers wounded in Vietnam watching a TV series on World War II.

Q: What was the atmosphere in our Embassy? At this time you were in this huge Political Section [in Saigon]. What was the atmosphere about what was happening? Was everybody so busy that you weren't focusing on...

ANTIPPAS: There was a lot of concern, about corruption, which was considered a major issue.

We were very concerned about the corruption of our allies -- the wholesale theft of PX items for example by the Thai and the Filipinos in particular. Our Political-Military unit worked very hard to stop the use of "Agent Orange" for defoliation -- to stop defoliation completely. You remember that the defoliation effort was called "Operation Ranch Hand." They were quite prescient to realize what that meant.

I remember the son of my first boss in the Foreign Service, a guy I had worked for in the State Department in 1961. His youngest son received an ROTC [Reserve Officer Training Corps] commission and was sent to Vietnam as an infantry officer. He looked me up in the Embassy. He used to come down to Saigon for weekends, when he could get time off from his base camp up near the Cambodian border. He would come down, and we would talk. I would show him a little bit of the night life of Saigon.

He told me what it was like to lead an infantry platoon through these defoliated forests. We allegedly defoliated them so that we could see the enemy. Nobody was thinking about the chemical impact on the immune system of our soldiers, or anything like that. He said, "These are triple canopy forests. You defoliate the first canopy, you might even get the second canopy." Literally, these planes would fly over the forest and turn everything gray. They would kill all of the leaves. But he said, "You still had to walk down there, through all of the third canopy, which is all of the lower brush. But with the sun beating down on you, it would be like a Turkish bath." He said that it was "murder" to move through these areas, because the defoliation really didn't help all of that much. So he felt that it didn't make any sense to do this. He wondered why we were spraying this stuff all over the place. Our Political-Military unit was trying to stop defoliation, and eventually we did stop it.

It was interesting that one of the people that I had a lot to deal with in connection with the Cambodian arms traffic was the Commander of the U. S. Navy Forces in Vietnam, Admiral Elmo "Bud" Zumwalt. He went on to become Chief of Naval Operations. I worked with him directly. He had been Naval Attaché in Denmark at one point in his career, so he had a very good appreciation of how Embassies work, unlike most of the military guys, who had no understanding of diplomatic niceties or our requirements and needs, and the context within which an Embassy had to work.

It was ironic that one of Zumwalt's sons was running a patrol boat [in the Riverine Forces, the so-called "Brown Water Navy"], down in the Mekong Delta, along the Cambodian border. The son had been sprayed by these defoliants several times and eventually came down with cancer and died. Of course, Zumwalt had ordered the defoliation of these waterways as part of his function as Commander of Naval Forces in Vietnam to cut down areas for ambush. Our boats used to be ambushed down there. It was a terrible, moral burden for "Bud" Zumwalt that, in fact, he had believed that he was responsible for killing his own son in the process.

Q: How did you feel about the reporting as far as what was "getting through?" Was there a kind of ferment, say, among the Political Officers?

ANTIPPAS: Let me give you a personal observation on that. I'm glad that you mentioned it. I was the Embassy Duty Officer the week of the May offensive of 1968. The "Tet" offensive took place in February, 1968. The next "high point" was expected to be in May. I forget why that was. There was a holiday in May. We expected a repeat of the "Tet" offensive, when they [the communists] almost got into the Embassy. I remember the first night that I was on duty [during this period]. The Embassy Duty Officer spent the night at the Embassy, sleeping in a small room next to the Code Room on the top floor of the Embassy. He had a flak vest and a pistol. This was early May, 1968. We didn't run the air conditioning in the building at night, because paratroopers of the 101st Airborne Division guarding the building were stationed on the catwalks between the sunscreen and the building. We had the paratroopers there and turned the air conditioning off, so that they could hear if people were skulking in the bushes surrounding the Embassy.

The building was kind of silent when I went to bed that particular night. I heard a couple of mortar explosions go off up the street. So I jumped into my pants, pulled on my flak vest, buckled the pistol belt, pushed the elevator button, and went down to the Embassy lobby. The Marine Guards were running around in circles. One of them looked out the back door and said, "Son of a bitch! The back gate's open." I thought that this was no place for me. I punched the button and went back upstairs, went into the Code Room, and locked the door.

That was the opening salvo of the May offensive. It was not as severe as the Tet offensive. There was a lot of fighting...

Q: Particularly in Cholon.

ANTIPPAS: In Cholon. There was a battle around the "Y" bridge [on the south side of Cholon]. The 47th Infantry Regiment, in which I took my infantry basic training in 1952 at Ft. Dix, NJ, was involved in it. My job was to stay in contact with everybody. I called the MACV Situation Room every morning to find out what was going on. I also called Washington and talked to John Burke, Director of the Vietnam Desk. I was in a kind of loop at night. I called each of the Corps areas and learned what was going on. I was preparing my own intelligence summaries, right from individual sources, before anyone had a chance to "massage" this information. The information which I assembled was put in a cable, which we would send out to the Department, reporting what was going on.

The commander of U. S. Forces in Vietnam, General William Westmoreland, was very irritated at these cables that were going out and which his people hadn't seen -- reporting what was going on in the country, before his staff had a chance to look at the information. Deputy Ambassador Sam Berger said that MACV was complaining bitterly about these cables. However John Burke, said, "Keep up the good work. The only way that we know what's going on there is what you're sending us."

Q: Was there a feeling that...

ANTIPPAS: There was the whole "body count" issue and the whole matter of "massaging" impressions of what was going on. This was another reason why we had this Provincial Reporting Unit -- so that our guys, who reported through the Embassy, but not to AID or to the military, would go around and try to find out what was actually going on.

Q: What would happen? Let's say that they would go out, and we would get information from the Provincial Reporters which indicated that MACV was putting its own "twist" on a given situation. Would the Embassy report something different from MACV or would it end up going through a process of "synthesis" so that everybody reported the same thing?

ANTIPPAS: I can't answer that directly. All I know is that the Provincial Reporting Officers would come into Saigon from time to time. There were five of them [Actually, the Unit reached a high point of eight officers, including the chief of the Unit.]. They had a boss whose name escapes me [Tom Conlon]. He was Political Counselor when I was in Bangkok, and John Burke was DCM. There were four guys that I remember: Jim Mack and two David Brown's: David E. Brown and David G. Brown, both of whom are now Office Directors in East Asia, one for Korea and one for Regional Affairs. These were bright, young guys several who spoke Vietnamese. Some of them had just come into the service or out of language school at the FSI and were still "feeling their way". They were assigned to different areas of South Vietnam and traveled as they thought suitable [sometimes by plane, sometimes by automobile or truck, usually alone and frequently at substantial risk to their lives], picking up information. They would come in and "dump" their material on someone [Tom Conlon, as chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit]. I think that their message was getting through but I think that their reporting, given the interagency politics that had to go on, may well have "pulled its punches." There are many ways to do that. I saw the same kind of thing more directly in Cambodia, more so than in Vietnam.

Q: We'll come to that later on.

ANTIPPAS: We'll come to that, because I was Desk Officer for Cambodia. I knew the guys in Cambodia and I knew what was coming out. I believed that I understood what was happening in Cambodia. I had to assume -- from my own experience of what was going on in Vietnam -- that the same kind of thing took place there. Of course, it [the U. S. presence in Vietnam] was much bigger. It was enormous. The CIA alone had an enormous computer capability by that time [in Saigon]. They were feeding in all kinds of material. They were getting all of the answers that they needed. They could produce any answer you wanted, based on the data that was being fed into it. There was an enormous "scam."

Q: Andy, within the Political Section, was there a chasm between, may I say, Martin Herz, Sam Berger, and Ellsworth Bunker -- that level -- and the officers who were going out in the field?

ANTIPPAS: I don't think so. The one thing I clearly recollect is that I did not serve under Phil Habib [during this time Deputy Assistant Secretary of State with particular responsibility for Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia]. I came in after Phil Habib had been Political Counselor in Saigon. I'll tell you, anybody who had to fill Phil Habib's shoes had a big job. He had such a manner and such ability to relate to his officers. He was such an iconoclast himself that he was just wonderful to work for. He motivated everybody. He was tremendously loyal but at the same time he was a hard taskmaster.

He was replaced by Arch Calhoun. Arch hated to be reminded of the fact that he had been Ambassador to Chad, because he hated that place. He said that he didn't want to be reminded that he had been Ambassador in Chad, "that awful place." He was a German specialist. He had been U. S. Minister in Berlin. His reward was to be assigned to Saigon as Political Counselor.

This is a kind of reminder of the jobs we had in Saigon. We had former Ambassadors as Section Chiefs, which we never do in the American system. Other foreign services do this all the time. It's nothing for a foreign ambassador to serve subsequently as consul general in New York.

Q: They don't carry the title with them. We do. It's about the one title we have that we carry around.

ANTIPPAS: If you've been an Ambassador, you have to be at an ambassadorial level in subsequent assignments or you are forcibly retired. But Vietnam was special. We had such large numbers of assets. I mean, 25 Foreign Service Officers in the Political Section! The Political Section was bigger than most of our Embassies throughout the world.

Arch Calhoun was a different breed of cat. He was a more soft-spoken kind of guy. Habib was a real "blue collar" type guy, and everyone loved him for it. He encouraged people to speak out. He encouraged people to be iconoclastic. You could tell that. People would say things in staff meetings that I could hardly believe. I felt that they were really telling people off or speaking their mind. This had quite an impact, I thought, for several years after Habib left Saigon and the East Asian Bureau. Of course, I worked for Phil Habib in the East Asian Bureau, toward the end of the Indochina experience. I had a real sense of how he operated. It was wonderful to work for a guy like Phil Habib. He looked to you to say what you really think. He would ask questions like, "Do you think? What do you think?" He made clear that he wanted to know what we really felt.

In the Bureau of East Asian Affairs he would have meetings with the lower-ranking Desk Officers from time to time, without the Country Directors [their supervisors] present. He wanted to hear the unvarnished attitudes and opinions of his officers. I think that this is the best way to operate. This is a system which I used when I became a supervisor. In my later career as a supervisor I tried to encourage people to say what they really thought. Are we doing something right or not? People can't argue that I didn't give them a chance to say what they thought. Of course I found out that a lot of people don't think at all.

I think that from Ambassador Bunker on down people were encouraged to say what they felt and how they saw things. But once you've done that, you've done your job. It was up to the senior officers in their relationships with the military, the CIA, or the host government to carry out the policy. If you couldn't live with that, then you had better get the hell out of the Foreign Service. You should quit. And a number of people did that.

Dick Holbrooke is one of those who quit. He went on, after his Vietnam experience, to go into politics, in effect. He's done very well for himself. That's your choice. There is a discipline within the Foreign Service. If you can't tolerate the policy, and you might well not tolerate the policy, the only honorable thing to do is to get out, once you have had your say, once you feel that you've really aired your feelings.

Now, one of the things that I did get involved in was dealing with the French, which in this context meant dealing with the rubber plantations [in South Vietnam]. I was the point of contact when our military would do something involving the rubber plantations. They would do two things. One, they would defoliate or, more importantly, use bulldozers with the "Rome Plow" attachments. They would cut down hundreds of thousands of trees on their main supply routes which ran through the plantations, on the ground that the communists were ambushing their convoys going through the plantations.

Well, without telling anybody, the U. S. Army would go in on a weekend and cut down 100,000 trees. The Army started with a 50 meter margin on each side of a main supply route, cutting down these rubber trees. Then they would widen these margins to 100 meters on each side. Finally, in 1969, I think, they widened them further to 200 meters on each side. So that's a quarter of a mile. Of course, the Viet Cong would sit behind that patch of plantation and lob shells onto the roads, because they had them zeroed in. When the U. S. Army cut down these trees, they left windrows -- piles of brush, which made excellent ambush sites. The Viet Cong would burrow into these trees and shoot at armored vehicles or trucks or whatever was coming through. So we had big arguments with the military.

I remember trying to make a case that the rubber plantations were an economic asset that should be preserved for peacetime use, and we should not be destroying them. It really did not make much all that much sense from a military point of view. So we would have these big fights with the U.S. military. I found that the Embassy supported me. My "clients" were the French, who would come to us. Basically, they cooperated with us. The French were very helpful. They knew what the Viet Cong were doing in their plantations. They would pass the information to me. On more than one weekend I would go up to the plantations and spend the weekend -- fly up in the rubber plantation airplane. Do you remember a guy who ran the American Chamber of Commerce when you were Consul General in Seoul? He's a retired brigadier general, a heavy set guy. His name was Frederick "Brick" Krause.

Anyway, I first met Krause when he was a full Colonel and brigade commander in the 1st Division at the Quan Loi rubber plantation [Binh Long province], up near the Cambodian border. I had gone up to investigate a defoliation complaint by the plantation. The U. S. Army had defoliated a bunch of young [recently planted] rubber trees -- not the old trees. I went there and was standing by this Colonel's CP [Command Post]. We'd just gotten off the plane. The French rubber plantation manager was there. The Viet Cong had apparently seen our plane come in and decided to lob some shells into the CP area. You should have seen five guys try to get into a one-man hole! I remember the Frenchman standing there, looking scathingly at these Americans, scurrying for cover.

Krause retired from the Army as a brigadier general in Korea. I ran into him at the residence of Ambassador Dick Sneider, when we had the East Asia Consular Conference in 1977. You were there, weren't you?

Q: Yes.

ANTIPPAS: Well, this brigadier general was at the reception that Dick Sneider had for the conference. I said, "God, you look familiar." And then I found out that this guy had been a brigade commander whom I had visited in Vietnam at that time. We have remained very good friends since that time.

I think that the Embassy was supportive of trying to "rein in" the American military, because the military became a virtual law unto themselves. It was a lot harder to deal with them on PX corruption.

Q: I was a member of something called "The Irregular Practices Committee." I was the chairman of it, which was a kind of civilian court martial. Did you get at all involved with the "More Flags" business and the corruption of the Thai, in particular and the Filipinos? The Koreans had this so well organized that it wasn't even corruption. They just...

ANTIPPAS: Well, what happened for example, was that the manager of the Commissary or the PX in Cholon was a Filipino employee. He was one of those "TCN's," or Third Country Nationals. The PX would get in a supply of TV sets, stereos, or whatever. He would call PHILCAG, Philippine Civic Action Group, which was out in Tay Ninh province. He would call them, and they would scarf up everything that had come in. I was in Saigon for months before I could buy a TV set. The old saw about the Thai was that, "If we could only maneuver the Viet Cong between the Thai and the PX, we'd have a military victory on our hands."

Q: I can remember watching Thai soldiers being marched into the PX. They would each buy the limit of whatever they could. This was a whole unit. Then they would turn it over to their officer.

ANTIPPAS: They would buy refrigerators and sell them off the back of their trucks. It was on such a wholesale basis. Our military took the view that this was simply the cost of doing business, and who cares? "We'll bring in more and sell whatever we can." Our allies were so corrupt. It used to anger everybody in the Embassy.

Q: And a lot of our military, too. Do you remember seeing the Provost Marshal of Saigon, standing outside of the PX, watching these Thai go in there and just...He was red faced, his jaw muscles quivering.

ANTIPPAS: We had the same thing in Korea.

Q: What was the feeling in the Political Section about the Vietnamese Government?

ANTIPPAS: They felt that it was pretty weak. There was always a question in everybody's mind whether or not these people were going to be able to "hack it." Thinking back on that time, I'd really have to give the matter some thought. I think the situation was pretty hopeless, from our point of view. The problem was so insuperable, given our inability to stop the North Vietnamese from reinforcing their troops in the South. How can you possibly protect hamlets? We had this hamlet protection program and all the other "gimmicks" that we tried. For example, the Vietnamese Government, with U. S. support, took people and resettled them in villages that they tried to protect. How could you do that, when you couldn't stop the infiltration of the military forces, the ammunition, and all the supplies that the communists needed?

It was all part of the same situation, you know. You couldn't solve the problem in Cambodia and Laos or stop the communists at the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone, roughly the 17th Parallel of North Latitude]. How could you possibly bring any kind of security to the countryside?

I'm convinced that if we could have handled the military problem successfully, the political problem could have been solved. There really was no political problem. The South Vietnamese didn't want to be communists. It was also very evident that nobody wanted to be a communist in Cambodia. Nobody believed any of that "liberation" blarney. It was just that we couldn't solve the military problem with our own self-imposed limitations, which involved how to stop the communists from coming down from the North.

ANTIPPAS: February, 1970. Somewhat in disgrace.

Q: What happened?

ANTIPPAS: It was very interesting. I really thought that I would be promoted to FSO-4 for the good work which I had done in Saigon -- and I really had done good work. I got pretty good ratings on my efficiency reports from my several bosses in the External Unit of the Political Section. I worked hard. I think that I once went three months without getting out to Bangkok to see my wife. My son was born there in Bangkok. In Vietnam I was shot at. I was running around in the woods with the U. S. military.

But I had a personality problem with the chief of the Political Section under Martin Herz, the Political Counselor [who replaced Arch Calhoun]. Martin Herz liked me personally. He was the resident Cambodia expert in the Foreign Service. He had served in Cambodia in the mid 1950's and had written a little book, "A Short History of Cambodia." You might remember it. Since I was the Cambodia expert in the Political Section, he liked me. I had known him from my first job in the Foreign Service. He was in the Africa Bureau when I was setting up conferences. So I had a pretty good relationship with him. Martin Herz was a very tough taskmaster. I've seen him make grown men cry. He was tough. He could take faster dictation than most secretaries.

Q: He did his own shorthand and his own typing.

ANTIPPAS: Anyhow, I got along with him and thought I got along with the section chief as well, because he and I were both from Massachusetts. He was a Massachusetts "blue blood." His wife was "safe-havened" in India. He went from Saigon to be DCM in New Delhi under the former U.S. Senator from New York. Was his name Keating? It turned out that this officer would pass through Bangkok on his way to New Delhi and have dinner with my wife at our house, while waiting for his flight. She'd pick him up at the airport in Bangkok. So I thought that we had a good relationship.

Anyway, without a long "to do" about it, there was a "glitch" in our relationship. He got angry with me and wrote in my efficiency report for 1969 that he questioned my judgment about something that I had done. That's all that's needed in the Foreign Service. An efficiency report was then as now, so important. My file was put down at the bottom of the pile. I was ranked in the lowest 5% of my class. You hope to be in the top 5% of your class to be promoted. When you're in the lowest 5% of your class, you are what they call "low ranked" for that year. If you were "low ranked" a second year in those days, you were selected out of the Foreign Service.

I wasn't promoted that year [1969]. What had happened was that all onward assignments were canceled. I had just then wangled an onward assignment to the Armed Forces Staff College at Norfolk, followed by assignment to Greek language training. I had asked for Romanian or Greek. So I had been given what I wanted. Roger Kirk, who was my boss in Saigon, wangled this Greek language training, followed by an onward assignment to Athens. Because of my "low ranking," the training assignments were canceled.

I remember that Martin Herz called me up to his office, on December 22, 1969. He said, "I just got this 'back channel' message from Personnel in Washington that says that you've been 'low ranked.'" I was due to go home in January or February. Herz said, "They want to know when you're going home. They want to talk to you."

I was devastated by that. I said, "Look, I've got to go to Bangkok and tell my wife. No way I can tell her over the telephone." I had really screwed up this great adventure of the Foreign Service in a major fashion. There was a question as to whether I had a career. You remember the telephone system available at overseas Embassies at the time. This is before we had communications satellites. In the war zone we had military switches. The switchboard in Saigon would go to a switchboard someplace else, say, in Thailand. You had to go through about four different switchboards to make a civilian telephone call, including the Thai civilian telephone system. So, more often than not, you'd start a telephone conversation with your wife and family, and you'd be cut off. You'd be pre-empted by a higher priority telephone call. I told Herz that I had to tell my wife about this disaster, face to face. So Herz authorized me to catch a military flight and go over and tell her. Bless her soul, she took it very well. I was really down about it.

Q: Had you known, or was this...

ANTIPPAS: It came out of the blue. I had not expected that at all.

Q: Did Herz understand what the situation was?

ANTIPPAS: Well, I think that he understood. But, you know, the section chief did this to a number of people in the Political Section, particularly unit chiefs. He did this to Bob Shackleton, who was the Political-Military guy, and three or four other guys. He "clobbered" a number of other people. So I left Saigon very depressed. I thought, "Well, where do we go from here?"

DENNIS G. HARTER
CORDS Officer
Ba Tri District, Vietnam (1968-1970)

Special Assistant to Ambassador Colby
Saigon (1970)

Mr. Harter was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Georgetown University, Seton Hall and American University. He joined the State Department in 1966 and was assigned to the CORDS program of USAID in Vietnam. He subsequently studied Chinese and served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guangzhou, and Hanoi, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission (1997-2001). In his Washington assignments Mr. Harter dealt primarily with East Asian matters. He also served as Director of the State Department's Press Office in Washington and as State's Representative to the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle. Mr. Harter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: You went out when?

HARTER: I went out in August of 1968.

Q: And you were there for how long?

HARTER: I was in the countryside until January of 1970. We all had an 18 month assignment overseas for the CORDS tour. I then extended for six months to take a job in Saigon as the special assistant to Ambassador William Colby who was then the Deputy in charge of the pacification program under the overall Commander, General Abrams. I had originally been chosen by Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker to be his special assistant, but I made the mistake of speaking my mind to the then policy coordinator at the embassy and he took me out of consideration for that job.

Q: Who was that, do you remember?

HARTER: I think it was Martin Hertz. I told him, after I'd been interviewed and selected by Ambassador Bunker, that no one had told me when the job was supposed to start, but that I hoped I could finish up a major project in the district where I worked, which I needed to complete by the end of the year. Martin Herz reacted very negatively to this statement and, his message to me was, "If you're not prepared to serve at Ellsworth Bunker's command when he expects you to be there, you're not going to serve in Ellsworth Bunker's office at all." He then told Ambassador Bunker I didn't want the job. John Paul Vann, the head of the civilian program in IV Corps where I worked had nominated me for this interview and he was very mad when I told him what had happened. Shortly thereafter, however, the staff assistant job came open in Ambassador Colby's office and he again nominated me for that position. I was again selected and fortunately was not required to be there before the start of the New Year so I could still finish off the project in my district.

In order to take the job with Ambassador Colby, I had to extend my tour. As my time in Vietnam was winding down, I had been talking with the Personnel Officer at the Embassy about getting back into the China area and was applying to study Chinese, beginning in the summer of 1968, at FSI in Washington and so my initial extension with Ambassador Colby was only for six months.

In February, I guess it was in February 1970 I was told I'd been accepted for the Chinese course and would be able to start that fall when the new classes began. Even though I'd only been on the job for a little more than a month, I was really getting a great opportunity to work in the headquarters with Ambassador Colby. So I asked Personnel if I could extend for another year, to take me into the following summer, and then take the Chinese language course opening in 1971. PER (Personnel) in Washington said FSI would not hold open the training slot for a year and that I would have to apply again for the training in the next bidding cycle if I stayed in Vietnam. Since I was assured of getting the Chinese language training in 1970, I didn't want to risk taking a chance on not being chosen the following year for whatever reason and so I said, "to hell with it. I'm going to go back to Chinese, because I don't know whether I'll get the shot to work on China again."

There was another unusual circumstance on the personnel front at that time. When I was looking at job options with my the Personnel Officer at the Embassy, I told her I wanted to transfer from CORDS where I'd had 18 months of experience, into the Embassy for my second assignment in the State Department. She said, that wasn't possible because all of the vacancies were already slotted with people in the language training or direct transfer pipeline from a year ago." This included officers who had no language training or just the basic FSI language training and they had no experience in Vietnam. No effort was made to recruit State Department officers assigned to CORDS for Embassy positions. Instead, the Department was sending brand new officers into the Embassy in Saigon and sending home officers with 18 months or more of field experience and who spoke Vietnamese with relative fluency. While I thought the FSI training we received was really very good and quite comprehensive, it didn't really prepare me for a lot of the work I did on a daily basis. For example, there were no local newspapers to read where I was assigned and what I needed to read in Vietnamese was provincial and district level government documents and reports. And, there is no better way to learn to speak a language than to be immersed in that language environment every day. So my Vietnamese was certainly a lot more fluent at the end of my first 18 months in the countryside than it was when I left FSI's CORDS training. Anyway, what I was trying to point out here is that State Department personnel policy was not making the best use of its officers.

Of course, it may have been the time. When I arrived in Vietnam in 1968, personnel issues, it seemed to me, were handled strangely. You had no sense that anyone in the AID structure in Saigon knew where there were regular vacancies coming open and where personnel were needed to start up new programs or any real semblance of a structure or organization to put people in place. It seemed as though periodically, Saigon would be sent a bunch of bodies and when they arrived somebody would try to figure out where to put them. Two of my classmates when they came in went off on their own and negotiated their own jobs in offices where they wanted to be. And, that was it. This was apparently not an unusual occurrence and for one of the new arrivals there was just acquiescence. And, while it was projected we would all be going out into the countryside, this classmate had lined up a job where he could stay in Saigon.

The other fellow, one of the members of my small language class, ran into a much tougher assignments officer. While my colleague had gone to speak with an office about opportunities in one particular field that interested him, he was not trying to stay in Saigon and avoid working in the countryside. My classmate was not a “sit-in-the-office” type, he was clearly somebody who wanted to be out in the field and he had wanted to use his Peace Corps background in a particular area. He like a lot of others of us had been frustrated by the lack of a real placement system and had just been trying to maximize his usefulness in the program. But the personnel officer over-reacted and said, “You’re not leaving Saigon.”

Let me explain this a bit further. When we all reported to the main AID office in Saigon we were all gathered for a meeting and were told “you have no assignments.” AID’s plan was to run us through some orientation sessions and make sure we all had proper payroll arrangements and then the idea was to parcel us out to various locations where there were vacancies. The fellow who had successfully arranged to stay in Saigon already had an office backing his assignment so he didn’t get into any difficulties with his bucking the system. My friend, however, had only been asking questions about different assignment options and hadn’t signed on with anyone. So he had no one to back him up and say “we want this fellow in our program.” As a result, the personnel officer had his say and stuck my friend in the Saigon office in charge of the People’s Self-Defense Force (PSDF), a relatively new program designed to train village and hamlet militia to protect their own homes. It was totally different from what he was hoping for. He stuck it out in Saigon for a year but I was able to break him out of that office and arranged to have him come to work with me in the District where I had been assigned.

As I said, the assignments process was really strange. Here’s how I ended up in a small district on the coast in IV Corps. The Senior Advisor in the province of Kien Hoa was named Nicholas Thorne. He was an ex-Marine who had joined the Foreign Service as an Admin hand and then was recruited for the CORDS program because of his military background. Kien Hoa is the province at the mouth for the Mekong River where it hits the South China Sea. Right there where all the river branches come out into the sea, those are the various districts in Kien Hoa. It’s now called Ben Tre Province. A few months earlier, Thorne had said to his CTZ (Corps Tactical Zone) Senior Advisor in Can Tho, “I want a Foreign Service officer assigned here. I’m going to make him a district senior advisor, because we ought to have a civilian district senior advisor somewhere in IV Corps and right now, there are none.” All of the civilian advisors assigned in the districts were deputy advisors in IV CTZ. There were lots of civilian senior advisors at the province level, but these men were almost all ex-military. There were a couple of civilian senior advisors in districts closer to Saigon in III CTZ but in general people had thought until that time it wasn’t safe enough to put a civilian in charge in the delta districts. Anyway as the result of Thorne’s request, AID either in Can Tho or in Saigon had decided to get one of the members of my class into that assignment. But, the person they had projected against that request was the one who successfully negotiated himself into a job in Saigon.

Anyway, when we finished the orientation class, we were all farmed out to different CTZ Headquarters where the real decision-making was supposed to occur on where we would all get placed. I was part of the group sent to IV Corps and, I think I was the only regular Foreign Service officer in the group. So, when I got to Can Tho, the office had Nick Thorne’s request for a Foreign Service officer and, I then became, I guess, the only live candidate. That’s how I ended up going to Kien Hoa. The district I was assigned to was Ba Tri District, a coastal district in the middle of the nine districts in the province. It was a pacification show place. In 1965-66, the Vietnamese and their U.S. advisors sought to create some models for development. They were trying to determine what kind of military forces and activity combined with civilian economic and political project mixes might provide the best security and development options for different parts of the country. I don't know who was actually responsible for choosing Ba Tri, but it was certainly an atypical spot, even in the relatively flat southern part of the country. The district was virtually treeless. It had a small mangrove swamp along the coast and beyond that it was nothing more than flat, wide-open rice fields with small settlements scattered throughout the area. It had no tree cover, no places for people to hide if they were going to try and carry on the guerrilla type operations that characterized the war in the south.

During the Tet offensive in 1968, the Vietcong had two conflicting goals, destroy the pacification effort in Ba Tri district and take over control of the provincial capitol, Ben Tre, a big symbol for the VC offensive in the south. Ba Tri was connected to the provincial capitol by a laterite highway and an old French-era bridge where it crossed the main canal that connected some of the Mekong branches close to Ben Tre. Ba Tri and its pacification program were protected by two battalions of the ARVN 7th Division, the Vietnamese regular army, in Ba Tri. The Division headquarters was in Ben Tre where a couple of other battalions were based.

I should also add as a footnote here that the National Liberation Front, the Vietcong's so-called government, was founded in Mo Cay District in Kien Hoa Province. So that made capture of Ben Tre a very important objective and one that would have had great significance for the Vietcong if they could capture and hold the city. Mo Cay district and its immediate neighbors was a very hard nut for the Vietnamese Government to crack. Like a lot of other delta areas, there was lots of tree cover along the rivers and swamps that broke up the rice field areas, making it easier for the VC to hide out, move under cover and harass government forces and civilian villages. In the entire time that I was in Vietnam, Kien Hoa was either the most insecure or next to the most insecure of all the forty-odd provinces that U.S. advisors were rating under the Hamlet Evaluation System (HES). And yet I was in one of the safest districts in the entire country. That of course, is why nobody raised any real objections when Nick Thorne said he wanted to have a civilian senior advisor there before one was sent anywhere else in IV CTZ.

Going back to the Tet offensive. The VC (Vietcong) military forces were of course successful in over-running Ben Tre City and taking control of virtually everything in the immediate surrounding area. You will recall there was a famous saying from the aftermath of the Tet offensive that was quoted all over the press - "We had to destroy the town to save it." The place they were talking about was Ben Tre. The VC were afraid the two battalions of ARVN forces in Ba Tri would come and reinforce the provincial capital, so the first thing they did when they attacked the city was to blow the bridge between Ba Tri and the center island district in the province, Truoc Giang District, where the capital, Ben Tre was located. While that gave them a better chance to take on the forces around Ben Tre, it also meant the VC attacks in Ba Tri to destroy pacification progress pitted a reinforced, VC main force company against two ARVN battalions in a district where there were no places to hide. The VC unit in Ba Tri was annihilated. After the Tet offensive, the VC had to rebuild that unit from scratch. Because there was so little for the Vietcong to pull together to stymie the pacification program, the targets we were focused on for the rest of 1968 and 1969 had all been much further down the line in the more gradual plan that had been put forward to take control of the district. Because the Tet offensive had been such a devastating blow to the communist forces, the Vietnamese Government decided to remove the ARVN battalions and to concentrate military protection for the district entirely in the hands of locally recruited military units, the Regional Force (RF) Companies and the Popular Force (PF) platoons. The pacification effort moved rapidly through all the remaining target villages and hamlets in the entire district. I believe we had basically accomplished all the goals to establish a government presence in all parts of the district by the end of 1968. And, by early 1969 we had conducted village and hamlet elections that weren't scheduled to take place until sometime in the 1970s under the original plan. We had recruited and trained 5 RF companies and probably around 60 or more PF platoons to provide protection for the district. Thus, a combination of terrain and poor Vietcong tactics turned the situation in Ba Tri very much to the advantage of the Vietnamese Government. With the large Regional Force presence, the District was often called upon to provide mobile forces to operate in other districts and under the Vietnamization program which President Nixon popularized, U.S. helicopter resources would be used to bring Ba Tri's Regional Force units into military operations in neighboring districts, usually just for a single day operation, though occasionally for a couple of days. This sort of military operation made our field unit advisors very important. They were the ones who could get helicopter gunship and fighter aircraft support and medevacs for wounded soldiers because their radios could connect with American military in the air over the southern part of the country.

Q: When you arrived there what were your duties?

HARTER: I was initially assigned as the Ba Tri Deputy to work with a U.S. Army Major who was finishing up his advisory tour as District Senior Advisor there. Previously he had been the S-3 (military staff designation, officer in charge of operations and logistics) for the provincial advisory team, the operations officer, in Ben Tre. During the Tet Offensive, it was he who said "we had to destroy the town to save it." Just before Tet, the Province Senior Advisor, a Foreign Service Officer, on his way to the local airport said, "Nothing ever happens at Tet, I'm going on holiday." While the Major's comment made the international news, the Senior Advisor's comment became the inside joke for the province team. The number two, the Provincial Deputy Senior Advisor was U.S. Army Lieutenant Colonel Dare. When the attack began, he left the advisory compound and went across the street to the Vietnamese Province Chief's house. He went into the bunker in the basement of the house and didn't reappear until the Tet offensive was over and the VC had left the city. That left the S-3 Major, Major Lizardo, in charge of defending the advisory compound. These two residential compounds along the river comprised just about all the territory that was not over-run by the Vietcong in Ben Tre.

When I started in Ba Tri, I was to overlap with Major Lizardo for several weeks and to work as his civilian deputy. I had two Vietnamese counterparts. The first was the Deputy District Chief for Administration, a French-trained Vietnamese bureaucrat who was in charge of the civilian side of the local government, though in reality this meant largely that he managed the paperwork. My second counterpart was a Vietnamese ARVN Major who was the actual District Chief. Major Thanh had been an NCO (no-commissioned officer) in the French Army during the previous war period and then became an officer under the new Vietnamese army. He was relatively young, at that point probably only 40. Officially, he was Major Lizardo's counterpart, but we shared the duties of working with Major Thanh. Part of this was because I was going to be taking on the Senior Advisor responsibilities after about two months. But the other reason was simply the nature of how the District was run. Major Thanh ran the district's military operations, but he also made all the decisions which determined how the district was managed. Thus, in order to have any impact on what was happening on the civil side, I really had to work directly with him. Moreover, I spoke Vietnamese and the two Majors, Lizardo and Thanh only spoke basic GI slang in the other's language. Although other U.S. advisors who spoke Vietnamese had come into the district and worked on one project or another, none of them had ever been assigned to stay in the district and work directly with the local authorities. So the two of us were able to communicate directly and I often passed on Major Lizardo's suggestions to the Major and vice versa.

Once Major Lizardo left and I was officially his counterpart, I would generally accompany the Major Thanh in his visits to hamlets and villages around the district. We'd each travel in our own vehicle but then we'd join together to talk to local officials, businessmen, farmers, etc to learn about what was happening in a particular area. We'd ask about VC activities, try to find out about local problems and talk about government programs. Around mid-day, we'd generally have lunch with some of the local officials and then we'd either have a mid-day break there or back at the District headquarters before spending much of the afternoon reviewing things at the District compound. My ordinary work day started around six in the morning and I generally finished up around 8:00 or 9:00 pm. Some nights we'd have a movie from the U.S. military and we'd set it up outdoors in the compound to show to the military families who lived there with us. We had electricity in the compound from our generator for about four hours each evening and thereafter operated with Coleman lanterns if anyone stayed up late. Some nights the Vietnamese Operations Center there would get reports from outlying military units of VC movements in the District. Then, if the VC units were in range, the Vietnamese would often fire artillery into the night. That control room was immediately adjacent to my bedroom and with the sound of the artillery, I'd have to get up and quickly determine where they were firing so we could get on our radio net to alert American aircraft that we had artillery fire in the area. Some days then were a lot longer than the average 14 or 15 hours that I usually spent on the job. And, of course, there was work to do like this every day, including the weekends. The only weekend days I had off were when I was traveling out of country on R& R (Rest and Recreation) trips.

I've said a couple of times, the reason Ba Tri was the first District in the Mekong Delta to get a civilian senior advisor was because it was "pacified." But as I noted earlier, we frequently had reports of VC troops moving through the District in the late night/early morning hours. One evening, the main force VC unit that operated in our part of the province was spotted passing through the District by one of the local Popular Force platoon ambush units. Amazingly, the local unit engaged the enemy with gunfire. I say amazingly because this was a small ambush unit and the unit passing through probably had between eighty and one hundred men and for the most part, Vietnamese ambush parties let any enemy movements proceed unmolested because it was safer that way. Anyway, the local forces engaged the enemy and reported the contact to the District headquarters a few hours after midnight. The VC were so surprised by the ambush that they moved into one of the village housing areas and took over that area for self-defense. After he had been notified, the District Chief contacted his Regional Force outposts and by six in the morning he had four or five Regional Force company sized units surrounding the village exchanging fire with the VC in the houses. I assembled my Advisory unit team and sent my Deputy, Captain Echeverria, an NCO, the radio operator, Private Sowders, and the interpreter out with the District military force that joined the attacking forces. I went with the District Chief to the Command Post he set up back behind the fighting area and the tactical struggle was enjoined. The District Chief had notified the Provincial authorities about the bottled up enemy force and the Vietnamese offered to send air strikes against the VC unit. The Major refused this offer, saying the VC were in a populated part of the village and he did not want civilian casualties. He also decided not to use his 105 artillery tubes because he could not be sure this too would not lead to unnecessary civilian losses. Instead, he tried a couple of probing attacks along the edge of the houses and looked to the idea of a frontal assault as his main tactic. During the firing, the American advisors, particularly the young radio operator were actively engaged in firing at the enemy. Unfortunately, Private Sowders was too eager in his desire to engage the enemy and while firing his own weapon he was exposed to enemy fire and seriously wounded. Captain Echeverria gave the radio to the NCO and along with the interpreter tried to line up a medevac flight to get Private Sowders out of the combat area. The two of them tore a bamboo door off of a nearby house and using that as a stretcher carried Private Sowders out of the fighting area to a place where a helicopter could come in and get him. He was successfully picked up but he died enroute the hospital. Afterward, I wrote Captain Echeverria up for the Silver Star and the interpreter for the U.S. Bronze Star and both nominations were approved and the awards presented. This surprised the Captain because while he appreciated my writing the award nomination for him said the military would never approve an award that had been recommended by a civilian. But the big loss was Private Sowders. He was our youngest team member, only 21, and just married before he came to Vietnam. Although it was going to be done by someone in the military chain of command, I felt I also had to write to his wife about the loss she now had to face. That was the only time I had to write such a letter but it certainly was a difficult thing to do. The rest of our team throughout the eighteen months I was there was remarkably lucky. Only Captain Echeverria's replacement, Captain Donohue, suffered a serious war wound and had to be medevaced and subsequently taken out of country for treatment. He was coming back from an operation with a Regional Force company which had not had any enemy contact when he was wounded as the result of the detonation of an artillery shell booby trap that had been placed on a rice paddy dike. It was really unfortunate because everyone had seen the booby trap and had deliberately gone around or over it when one of the Vietnamese soldiers stumbled into it and detonated the charge. Captain Donohue got hit with shrapnel behind one ear and by the time he was taken out of Vietnam for further medical treatment he had not recovered his hearing in that ear and had some problems with balance. So, to get back to my point, although Ba Tri was a pacified district, the war was always there and you simply could not assume nothing was going to happen.

Before we go any further, I should note how many people were involved in our local advisory effort. This was a very large district team. We had eight or nine men assigned at the district compound headquarters and then we had subordinate units – groups of five – who stayed out in the compounds of the regional force companies who were now the main Vietnamese military forces in the district. These are the teams I was referring to earlier when I said they'd go out on operations with the Regional Force companies and use their radio links to American support forces in case there was contact with enemy forces.

Q: These are Americans?

HARTER: That's right, these were groups of five Americans. Usually one officer and four NCOs, different grades of sergeants. We sometimes had Army Captains heading the five-man teams; sometimes they were lieutenants. Although the plan was to try to keep a captain on those team assignments, we ended up with a lot of lieutenants, because our team requirements expanded so quickly. As I said earlier, as the district became more and more pacified, the national plan was to reduce the ARVN presence and replace the regular army with local force units. So, when we lost the battalions, when I first came in the summer of 1968, we still had one ARVN battalion in the district. That battalion left, I think by the end of the year, but certainly by January 1969. So, our regional force company and popular force platoons that were assigned around the district had to expand. We went up from initially two or three regional force companies when I arrived to five before I left. We went from popular force platoons, maybe 20 odd of those units to 60 or more popular force platoons by the end of 1969. Each of these units had distinct responsibilities. The regional force companies were set up in bases scattered throughout the district and they were to provide rapid response in the event of any trouble in the district. The popular force platoons were more locally centered and they focused on securing lines of communication and village areas with larger population concentrations. Also in that mix was the group I mentioned my classmate had been associated with, the People's Self Defense Forces (PSDF). This group was composed of local hamlet residents who were given only rudimentary military training, wore regular clothing – black pajamas – and they were only expected to try to protect their homes if the VC tried to get into the hamlets. They were just a little local gendarmerie or militia that would be used in the event of a hamlet emergency. They were pretty hopeless as a real defensive force because they were really too poorly trained to be very effective and the weapons they had to use were the bottom of the line hand-me-downs which had already passed through ARVN and the RF and PF.

I should also finish up what happened in the big battle with the main force VC company that was caught in the District. As the afternoon wore on, the District Chief's idea of a frontal assault was not approved by the provincial authorities. He asked for additional military forces and was turned down. In the meantime, the VC were utilizing their own network to provide a way out for the entrapped unit. Reports came in to the District Command Post of isolated incidents in other parts of the District. A hand grenade incident in a market place. Another being thrown near a military outpost. As night began to fall, the District Chief pulled his forces out and sent them back to their static security positions to protect different parts of the district. Once it was dark, the VC unit pulled out. We later learned they had lost their company commander and some other senior military leaders during the fighting. And, they certainly learned it was not just going to be all that easy to march across Ba Tri District in the middle of the night without risking some kind of contact. Still, it was disappointing to see such a well-staged military operation that had the opportunity to destroy a main force VC unit end up with the VC walking away. Unfortunately, that sort of indecisive combat characterized a lot of the fighting in Vietnam.

In addition to working with the Major, my job was also to work with the civilian administration and look at the development of the political, economic and social units within the villages and hamlets in the district. This was all to fit into a national plan of elections and village development. I had what they call an AIK or Aid-In-Kind budget that I could work with. At its peak, I think it was close to $2,000.00 a month that I could spend at my discretion to stimulate development projects. This would be anything from helping to get supplies for a new maternity clinic, supplies for a school, or even lending money to put concrete floors in a pig sty. The biggest project we got involved with was providing some funds for building a new dam near the district capital to prevent salt water intrusion into the inland crop producing areas. A lot of the very small scale self-help projects that were being promoted were associated with Vietnamese Revolutionary Development (RD) cadre. These teams of young men and I think perhaps occasionally some young women were scattered around the villages and hamlets at the early stages of pacification development work. Their goal was to try to get the local people to work together and identify needed projects, while at the same time trying to foster loyalty to the GVN. The teams consisted of young Vietnamese mostly from the cities who dressed like the peasants in black pajamas and worked alongside them. Their goal was to encourage the local villagers to establish schools and the RD cadre did some of the early classroom teaching. They also tried to teach the farmers better farming methods – especially to introduce hybrid rice strains from the International Rice Institute (IRI) in the Philippines, to teach better hygiene, to help people with health care and maternity issues, and to explain the rudiments of self defense for the villages and hamlets. The RD teams were supposed to take care of themselves in the field and to help protect the village but they very quickly became prime targets of the VC because they were keeping the VC from getting at the local population.

At one point in Ba Tri we had, I would guess, as many as eight to ten Revolutionary Development cadre teams spread out in the district. By the time I left in January 1970, all of them were gone and had been gone for at least half a year. By that time, we were considered to be secure, a model, a showplace, and for the last several months I was there, it was a place to bring officials from other parts of the delta to see what could be accomplished. As the Vietnamese altered their presence in the district to rely more and more on local self-generation, the U.S. was engaged in a similar program which we called Vietnamization as we tried to reduce our footprint in the country beginning in the latter part of 1969. As I said before, I had a very large American advisory team. At its pinnacle, the team had as many as 35 Americans, counting the little five-man teams I had scattered around in the district and my headquarters team. By the spring of 1969, I had brought my classmate from Saigon to work as my civilian deputy, thus making us probably the only district team in all of Vietnam with two civilians running most of the programs. With Vietnamization underway, we first dispensed with the teams working with the regional forces and then began reducing the headquarters team. This was the project I wanted to complete before I took on the proposed job with Ambassador Bunker. By the fall, we were down to two civilians and a military advisor who worked on intelligence issues. The lieutenant did such a poor job I kicked him out of the district and he was sent back to Saigon to work at the airport. At the end of 1969, my civilian deputy succeeded me and remained as the only American advisor assigned to the district. He stayed for several more months and was replaced by another advisor who was there by himself. I don't believe he was replaced.

Q: You were really presiding over a success?

HARTER: Yes, at the time we certainly saw it that way.

Q: How did you find these revolutionary teams of young Vietnamese?

HARTER: By and large they were very good. They were very enthusiastic, particularly the newest ones. They had problems dealing with the peasants, because many of them were city kids and they tended to look down on the rural people. There were attitude problems from time to time but as they got more acclimated to the rural areas they became a lot better. And, this was a better alternative for them than being in the military. By and large they wanted to be seen as doing well at what they were doing so they didn't end up getting drafted. In the end I think a lot of them did get drafted just simply because the war situation got so much worse over time for the Saigon Government. But, I found by and large these kids were really, really quite good. I call them kids but they were probably only five to six years younger than I was.

Another Government program designed to assist the rural areas came out of the Education Ministry. The Ministry recruited teachers as part of a national service plan, mostly young women, and sent them to the countryside to help set up school programs for the villages. As I said, when the Revolutionary Development (RD) cadre, came to work in a village they started up some basic education classes in whatever facility they could find. They had elementary text books and basic teaching materials to work with. The idea was that once you got people started on the education front you could try to get the villagers to pitch in and build a small schoolhouse which could pull in students from the various hamlets in the village. Further, as the GVN operations extended services into these areas when they were more clearly becoming "pacified" the Government program would help build regular school buildings out of concrete and rebar. At that point, the Ministry of Education would begin to dispatch regular teachers from outside the area to serve in the schoolhouses. This was not an easy transition. You had these young women, fresh out of some kind of educational training by the Ministry who probably had never been away from home and family before and they were terribly home sick. Some of them were college graduates, but most of them were high school graduates who were anywhere from 16 to 19 years of age, city dwellers, being sent to rural areas to lives of hardship and poverty. Looking at Ba Tri, we had lots of people that lived very close to the poverty line, particularly among the farming community. Because we were a coastal district there was a lot of salt intrusion that affected the rice fields and we had a lot of problems getting really good rice crops. Because there were very few trees, we had no coconut industry and fishing to produce income for a family was difficult because there was a lot of expense to put together a boat, motor, fuel, nets and other supplies before you could even start getting any fish. So, those people who made their living off the land didn't make a very rich living. There was no big push for big vegetable growing efforts to supply cities because of the security questions, the lack of good transportation, and again salt intrusion didn't make it easy to grow vegetables except right next to people's homes where they raised vegetables for family food and not much for the market. Salt, however, did create an industry for the district because we had some people who lived close to the coast who made their living by scraping dried salt off of the fields after the salt water had evaporated. This salt was used to produce nuoc mam and it was used to salt and preserve fish.

Nuoc mam is the Vietnamese fish sauce. It's made by simply throwing salt and water in with a bunch of anchovies in a large ceramic jar and letting the mix ferment in the sun. Then you take the liquid run-off from the fermentation process, and bottle it and sell it as "anchovy water", the translation of nuoc mam, for cooking.

Q: If you'll look at the ingredients of Worcestershire sauce, there's an anchovies base to it.

HARTER: That's interesting. I'd never noticed that on the label. I think there's a lot of those kinds of sauces throughout the world, I mean it's not only Southeast Asia, where they make sauces from fish. I'd guess they do that also in parts of Africa and South America too.

Q: How did you get on - I mean here you are, with no, you know, this is your first real experience of this nature.

HARTER: Yeah. I was a neophyte in all of this. Many of my classmates had been in the Peace Corps, had lived abroad with their families. Some only had academic-year-abroad experiences in college, but even that was more than I had. I'd visited EXPO when it was in Montreal (1967) and had been to that city for a college debate tournament at McGill University. But my travel to Parks College in Missouri was the farthest west I had ever been before stopping in California to see Disneyland on route to Vietnam. Each CORDS class had a week's training in Taiwan to become more familiar with rural agriculture in Asia before we reached Saigon. And I took a couple of days to help a friend of mine settle his wife in Manila before we both went on to Vietnam. That was the extent of my international experience. And, here I was in the countryside in Vietnam supposed to assist the local government run better programs to help the people.

Q: Well, how did you find yourself - you're not a country kid anyway.

HARTER: No, not at all. Not at all.

Q: How did this work and how did you work with your Vietnamese counterparts?

HARTER: Well, it was all a combination of things, trying to put into practice the lessons you picked up in the classroom and trying to do things that seemed to be sensible for the situation at hand. The district environment was also pretty confining at first. When I first got to the district my office and my bedroom was a bit smaller than this room and I shared it initially with Major Lizardo and his military deputy, a Captain; the three of us lived in it and slept in it. The room was part of the District headquarters and was the District Chief's house as well. When Major Lizardo left we were only two in the room, but within a couple more months we had expanded the advisory team's part of the building and the Captain could move into that section across the small courtyard with the other military personnel. And all of them at that point had individual small rooms of their own and I was by myself in the room attached directly to the District offices and the District Chief's house.

Q: You're talking about a 20 foot by 20 foot room or something?

HARTER: Yes, it was smaller than that, maybe 12 by 12, and it had no windows. It had a wooden door that opened onto a small courtyard and a screened door you could use to get some air into the room. So yes, that's where the Major, myself, and the military deputy all worked and lived. On the other side of the courtyard was a smaller building which comprised our kitchen and dining area and there were a couple of rooms shared by the NCOs and the enlisted men and our radio communications room. We had a latrine at the back end of the building with an indoor toilet and a shower that consisted of a pull cord that released water from a 55 gallon steel drum on the roof of the building. You could get hot showers in the evening after the drum had baked in the sun all day long but an early morning shower was always cold, cold, cold. The overall compound headquarters building thus had a wing for the U.S. Advisory team, a main entrance area for the official business and offices of the District – where the public came to do business – and then a wing where the District Chief was housed. My room was between his house and the tactical operations center for the district, the military communications and battle planning area, which operated 24 hours a day and which coordinated night-time artillery fire whenever there was some report of VC activity within range of the District's 105mm artillery pieces. Originally everything was inter-connected but they made it all work by sealing off some of the connecting doors so you couldn't go from one section's living area into somebody else's office or home.

Still, it was a compound with the district headquarters and our living quarters in the middle. This was surrounded by a small group of multi-room bamboo and thatch houses where the District compound military men and their families lived. All this was enclosed within an eight foot high berm of mud that was topped with barbed wire. The compound inhabitants were all around us and we had generally good relations with all of them. There was one incident, however, that I will never forget. I told you Norris Nordvold had come down from Saigon to be my civilian deputy. He had been a classmate at FSI and was a former Peace Corps volunteer who had served in Africa. Norris brought with him a wooden statue from Africa which he kept in his foot locker in his small room in the district team living quarters. One day that statue disappeared and it was obvious that only someone living in the compound could have stolen it. Norris decided he would try to get the statue back by claiming it had magical properties. That night after dinner he went back out behind our house to an area facing most of the other compound houses where the Vietnamese lived. He proceeded to offer prayers and small offerings of fruit and cigarettes to a fire which he had built. He told the curious Vietnamese onlookers that he was praying to the missing statue and asking that it punish whoever had been responsible for stealing it if they failed to return it to its proper place. After about ten or fifteen minutes, he finished and we all went back into our respective houses. Early the next morning, a small boy was found drowned in the concrete well which was immediately behind our house. The child was probably not yet five years old and the sides of the well were probably three feet high so no one could understand how he ended up falling into the well. Shortly thereafter the child's father returned the wooden statue which he had stolen the day before and asked Norris' forgiveness. That's a bit of a digression from my description of the compound and how the team lived, but it certainly had a big impact on all of us. It certainly created a much deeper appreciation for the power of superstition.

Q: First place, what about during the time you were there, the supervision from Saigon or elsewhere?

HARTER: Supervision from Saigon was negligible. Supervision was primarily from the province and occasionally from Corps. We did, however, get visitors from Saigon and occasionally from the U.S. One of our VIP visitors was Secretary of State Rogers. He came for a short visit and the District set up a briefing and a bit of a Potemkin Village tour which I conducted for him as I drove a Jeep through various set demonstrations of local activities. These included driving into a village where he could see a local market, stop in and see the school and maternity clinic and then drive by a rice field that was being cultivated and watch a group of People's Self-Defense Force members undergoing some basic training. The latter view was interesting because all these older men were in their traditional black pajamas and were engaged in an exercise with their old rifles. Secretary Rogers turned to me and said, "They're all wearing black pajamas. I thought the VC wore black pajamas. How do you tell them apart?" I'm not positive I kept a completely straight face but I know I tried when I told him "That sir is the big problem, telling them apart."

Q: Where is the Corps, Can Tho?

HARTER: Can Tho was the CTZ (Corps Tactical Zone) headquarters. But it only got really active when John Paul Vann was transferred to IV Corps. Before that the Corps leaders would occasionally ask some of us in the districts to go to meetings in Can Tho, but after going there for one set of meetings I tried to avoid them. I thought at the time they weren't very useful. Now, John Paul Vann was a very different story. He was a real activist, a totally involved individual. Where his predecessor largely stayed in Can Tho and held meetings and "pushed paper," Vann got out into the provinces and districts to see what was going on and to give personal instructions to the people on the ground about how he wanted things done. Unfortunately, I got on the wrong side of John Vann the very first time he and I met. Although our relationship later on was fine, and, as I said earlier, he nominated me among all the other civilian advisors as the IV Corps candidate for a job in Ambassador Bunker's office and then Ambassador Colby's office, we certainly started off on the wrong foot.

Q: How did that happen?

HARTER: Well, as I told you the Province Senior Advisor who put me in Ba Tri was Nick Thorne. A few months later, after having too much to drink, he wandered out of his house in Ben Tre in the middle of a mortar attack and received shrapnel wounds. He was medevaced to Saigon and then to Bangkok and never came back to Vietnam. He was replaced by a man from my large, starting class at the CORDS Training Center. His name was Albert Kotzebue, but everyone called him Buck. He joined CORDS after a full career in the military which started during World War II. He was the first American officer to meet the first Russian officer at a bridge in Germany when the two eastward and westward marching armies came together in 1945. During the first eight weeks of the CORDS training he and I were bridge partners doing our breaks at lunch time. We got to know each other pretty well and I guess he basically had a lot of confidence in what I was doing in the district. He did not try to manage the district from Ben Tre and did not get involved in any of the things I was doing. I don't know how he managed the other District teams, but with me he just basically said, "Let me know when you have problems."

And, the first problem I had of any significance, at least as far as CORDS activities was concerned, resulted from an early instruction issued by John Paul Vann. Shortly after Vann arrived in CORDS IV Corps Headquarters, he said, "I want every senior advisor once a month to write a letter to his counterpart and tell that counterpart exactly what he has done right and wrong during the previous month." I went right to Kotzebue and said, "You know who I work with; you know his big ego and his feelings of being looked down on by other ARVN officers because he was an NCO. You know, I cannot write a letter to him and expect it to have any possible positive results. He'll stop working with me completely and try to get me removed."

Q: This is a Vietnamese?

HARTER: Yes, this is a Vietnamese. He's diminutive, maybe 5'3", and I'm six one. He's come up through the ranks; he feels very important in his position; he's doing a pretty creditable job; he is very active, very involved and gets out and around the district to show the flag and find out how things can be made better. I continued talking to Kotzebue saying, "He's not as corrupt as a lot of the other people around here; he is not going to respond positively even to a letter that includes positive things if I say something negative to him in writing." At this point, I looked Buck in the eye and said "I cannot do this." Kotzebue agreed and said, "You're absolutely right, he is the wrong person to do this with. Don't do it, don't write the letters. I'll explain to Paul Vann why you're not doing it."

At that point, I went back to the district and promptly forgot all about the issue. Unfortunately, I think Buck did too. Some weeks later Vann came to the province for his first visit and he wanted particularly to come to Ba Tri as the pacification showplace. The district chief welcomed him and did part of an overall district briefing on what had been achieved and where there were still some problems to be overcome; Major Thanh left and I did a second part of the briefing describing the overall situation from the American perspective. Vann appeared to be very pleased and complimented me on the presentation and on how everything appeared to be coming together very well in Ba Tri. Then, after looking again at the briefing maps he turned and said to me "can I see the letters you've written to your district chief?" And I simply said, "I've never written any letters to the district chief", and, before I could say another word, Vann went through the roof. Vann fumed, "Who do you think you are? You're no different from anybody else who's under my command. When you get an order, you obey that order; you follow the instructions to the letter. For the next three months I want a copy of every letter you send to your counterpart on my desk the same time you deliver it to him." He stormed out of the District office where we were doing the briefing and, along with Kotzebue and a few others from the CTZ Headquarters he got back on his helicopter and left.

The next day, I went back to my boss in Ben Tre and said, "What happened? I thought you were going to explain this to him?" He said, "I never got around to doing it, so Vann didn't know why we had decided it wouldn't work to give Major Thanh the letters." At that point, I said, "O.K. I'm going to write those letters and I'm going to deliver them to you and to John Paul Vann, but I'm still not going to give the letters to the district chief. I still think if he gets a letter from me he'll go off his rocker and it won't accomplish a thing. But, I'll write the letters for John Paul Vann." Kotzebue agreed that was the best way to do it and he kept my secret for the next three months, after which Vann told Kotzebue I didn't need to send Vann copies of any more of my letters to the District Chief. After that Vann and I had a good relationship but I don't know if he was ever aware that the letters he read during those three months had never been handed to my counterpart. When I say we had a good relationship, it wasn't that we had a lot of direct communication or that we were personally close. Vann was never in any one spot all that long. He came in and out of the district a couple more times while I was there and we always had good communications and understanding when it came to talking about what was going on. I think Kotzebue also gave him favorable reports on my performance.

Q: I might add just parenthetically that this job, I mean the aide to Bunker was considered a great plum and there were certain people who use to call this the beauty contest, because very personal people like Walt Cutler and others would be offered up. This is a very prestigious place.

These are people who have been in the field and serving.

HARTER: I think Bunker was also very interested in trying to get someone who had been more involved in Vietnam programs working in his office. What I mean to say is I think what probably impressed him more than anything else about me as a candidate was that I had spent, close to a year and a half in the countryside; I knew the pacification and war issues, particularly the Mekong Delta issues, quite well. I had direct first-hand experience with the political and economic and social consequences of the war. The people in the embassy who did political and economic reporting on the situation in Vietnam didn't travel that much and when they did, they were largely in and out of the bigger cities. I don't think an Embassy political reporter ever came to Kien Hoa during my tour because they would have naturally gravitated from Ben Tre to Ba Tri and none ever came while I was there. I think Bunker probably found it refreshing to think he'd have someone in his office with that kind of local background. And, although neither of us ever mentioned it in the interview he conducted, Bunker had visited Ba Tri twice while I was there so I had gone around the district with him and talked about what was going on.

Q: What was the political situation in the Delta as you saw it? How was the government's reach there from your perspective?

HARTER: Again, I got to see probably the best of what there was to see, because Ba Tri was a showplace and we got VIP visits and we got the resources to make the programs work. President Thieu came to the District a couple of times – which is why Ambassador Bunker was there -- while I was the District Senior Advisor. I think it would have been pretty rare for the President of Vietnam to go to a small district more than once. There were forty provinces and if all had several districts like Kien Hoa, that would mean maybe 250 districts to visit, but he went to Ba Tri twice during the 18 months I was there.

I was impressed by the President, because he had a very common touch about him as he traveled in the district. I had no idea how he performed elsewhere and especially not what he did in Saigon. Although he was in a very nice starched, well-pressed uniform he didn't put on airs. On the other hand he didn't try to appear in farmer's clothing and pretend he was the same as everybody else. Nonetheless, he had an easy and common communication with the people in the countryside. I'm sure they were all in awe of him as he arrived and they got to see the President of their country but he didn't just march on through for photo-ops. He had done some homework and had an idea of what was happening in his programs.

One of the programs that he visited, I guess it's a tried and true Revolutionary Development, Peace Corps-type project, was the piglet loan program. It was a tremendous example of how a small investment in a rural environment could lead to a very dramatic change in an individual's or a family's life. Under this program, the government would give a family a couple of female piglets to raise. When the piglets got bigger the government brought a boar around to impregnate the young female pigs. After the next generation of piglets was born and weaned, the family was allowed to keep some of those piglets and I think under the program they also got to keep one of the original pigs they had raised. Then the government took the rest of the piglets and at least one of the original pigs and lent them out to other families. But, this was a way in which a family all of a sudden went from being a subsistence farmer to somebody who had the opportunity to earn income by raising animals for sale. Income that they could continue to generate through each successive generation of piglets. It was a tremendously successful program.

I can remember Thieu coming down with Ambassador Bunker and other visitors to talk about this program in the villages and hamlets. Seeing him go out and look at the program and talk with the families who had the piglets. And hearing the farmers in return just honestly expressing -- hesitantly, a little in awe of the President being in their village and in their house -- how this had changed their lives. It's the kind of program you could use today in rural Iraq and Afghanistan though you'd have to change the animal to something other than a pig to match Muslim sensitivities. This is the sort of opportunity that gets a family's whole economic situation turned around. You can do it with chickens; you can do it with a variety of different animals. The pig program was just the one that was the most successful in Vietnam.

Q: How about the green revolution, the rice?

HARTER: We got the opportunity to promote that as well, but this was a tough sale for the peasants in Ba Tri. Introducing the IR-8, and IR-9 varieties of rice at that particular time was really tough, particularly because Ba Tri district was a district largely filled with subsistence farmers. Moreover, because of the salt intrusion problems, we didn't get two or three crops a year on a regular basis like some of the prosperous inland areas could get. We could only count on one rice crop a year, and any more than that was considered a real blessing. So, telling somebody to try a new brand of rice that would produce greater returns in a shorter period of time and maybe give them a chance to try for a second crop or a third crop in the same fields was a very, very risky sale. If the weather and the other factors essential for the rice crop didn't work out, the farmer had nothing to show for his experiment. And, that meant a very difficult time for the farm family. You could only get a few people each growing season to try the new rice and a big success on one crop was only that, a big success on one crop. It didn't necessarily convince the same farmer, let alone his neighbors, that this new rice was worth a full time commitment in his fields. Each crop season only a few farmers would agree to plant the new rice in their fields in Ba Tri, or at least try it in a small section of their fields. In other districts where the conditions were intrinsically more favorable, farmers were more willing to take a risk and they did find the new strains from the Philippines were very productive in Vietnam. Of course, not everyone agreed that the rice tasted as good as the traditional varieties so you couldn't always get complete agreement to go with the new rice.

Q: What about fishing?

HARTER: Fishing was generally small scale and confined to the rivers and the immediate coast line. Nobody went out for more than a day and usually always in sight of land, even though that land was flat and got out of sight pretty quickly as you moved out to sea. It was a particularly profitable enterprise for only one of the 16 villages in the district. This village was on a river and near the mouth where it entered the South China Sea. It was never a really prosperous village, but it was the one village that did make money out of fishing. Thanh Phu, the district across the river on Ba Tri's southern border was much more active in fishing both the river and the ocean. But it was also a much more active site for the VC. And so, eventually quite a number of fishermen from Thanh Phu fled across the river

The arrival of the refugees in the district created a couple of new and interesting problems for me. First, I was targeted for assassination by the VC as a result of work I tried to get started in the refugee community which was focused on teaching refugee women how to use sewing machines. Secondly, I planned to set up a fishing cooperative using the boats the fishing families had abandoned in the neighboring district when they fled across the river to Ba Tri. Neither of these efforts really got off the ground, but they provided some real challenges and in both cases threatened to get me killed. In the first instance, being targeted directly by the VC and in the second case getting shot at by the U.S. military aircraft.

I had become acquainted with three young Vietnamese school teachers who had been assigned to teach school in the village where all the refugees were located. After determining they knew how to use sewing machines, I asked if they would agree to teach the skill to some of the refugee women if there was any interest. They agreed and I used my AIK funds to purchase a sewing machine and several women agreed to learn. I am not positive, but I believe they had already held a couple of classes when an armed VC unit entered the village one night and gathered a number of the residents together for a propaganda session. Although the VC did not specifically say they were going to kill me because of the plan to teach women to use sewing machines, when they came into the village they told the villagers they assembled no one was to get involved in anything that I was encouraging because the Americans could not be trusted. The VC also said they would kill me the next time I came into the village.

Word of the event reached the district headquarters the next morning and I was told about the threat by district officials. I was initially very upset because I thought the VC had not considered anything I had done up to that point to be worth a threat on my life and I certainly didn't think a small sewing program merited so much attention. But, after I got over that little bit of ego, I realized I could not simply let the threat stand unchallenged. So, contrary to the advice of my military colleagues I waited until it was relatively late in the day – after 5:00 pm – and it would be getting dark within a couple of hours, I got in my International Harvester Scout that only USAID civilians used and I drove alone down to the coastal village about 20 minutes away from the district headquarters. I went directly to where the school teachers stayed and spoke with them and told them not to be concerned about the VC threat and that I intended to continue to support the school and the sewing program. I made sure I walked around in the area and said I was there because I had heard of the threat and wanted to know where the VC were who were unable to come out to confront me. Although this was all a bit theatrical I'd guess from the Vietnamese perspective, I wanted to make sure the local residents knew I was still going to try to keep active in their village. After about 30 or 40 minutes of walking around and talking to people, I got back in my vehicle to drive back to Ba Tri's district town. It was only then, as I was driving back, that it dawned on me how potentially stupid my action was. Along the road back to the district town, there was a rather large bend in the road where all vehicles had to slow down to make the turn. As I approached that area, I noticed a Vietnamese woman in typical black pajamas standing off on a rice paddy dike about ten or fifteen yards from the road. She had one hand on her hip – but no baby in her arm – and I thought this seemed like an unusual position in which to be standing. As I slowed to make the turn, her arm dropped to her side and I immediately thought – That's a signal to the VC to ambush me on the road – but it turned out to be nothing more than my imagination and I drove back to the district compound perhaps a little more considerate of what my life might mean and I tried to avoid doing stupid things like driving out alone toward dusk. And, no, I wasn't carrying any weapon. I had decided soon after I arrived in Vietnam if I was seen walking around with a weapon all the time, the village people weren't going to have much confidence in the local security situation. So aside from a few occasions when I had to drive to the provincial capital for early morning meetings and I basically was the first vehicle on the road – it was still pitch dark and the road barriers were up at all the PF checkpoints – I never carried a weapon. Like most of my colleagues at the CORDS training center I purchased a personal weapon – a Walther PPK – because the AID instructors told us we wouldn't be issued weapons in Vietnam. While that might have been true if we worked in some advisory offices in Saigon, all of us out in the field virtually had our pick of weapons. I inherited a folding stock M-2 carbine and a Swedish K 9mm sub-machine gun from my predecessor, Major Lizardo. These were weapons he had acquired from CIA personnel who were working in the province capital. Anyway, I am digressing from the second part of my story about the refugees.

When I learned the refugees from Thanh Phu District had largely left their fishing boats behind I kept trying to figure a way we could get them over to Ba Tri so the people could resume fishing. Discussions with the Vietnamese military didn't produce any interest in a cross district military operation just to liberate some fishing boats and risk people getting killed. I thought if I could get the boats I could set up a cooperative which would maintain control of the boats but allow the fishermen to use them to earn money and eventually buy them back with the objective of using the money they provided for renting the boats to start small capital funds for other needed projects in the village.

Then all of a sudden a different opportunity arose through the U.S. Navy. One of the outlying teams in Ba Tri was a U.S. Navy advisory unit that worked with a Vietnamese Navy riverine patrol force set up near the mouth of the district's southern river with the South China Sea. These units would patrol along the coast and along the river to try to prevent the VC from re-supplying their troops by sea, since we were a long way from the Ho Chi Minh trail supply lines. They would stop the local boats and make sure they were licensed and not carrying contraband and try to maintain control of the coasts. Anyway, the U.S. Navy unit got word that a U.S. Navy PT boat team was prepared to come to the base in Ba Tri and conduct a joint exercise with the Vietnamese Navy designed to search for signs of VC riverine activity in neighboring Thanh Phu. I saw this as my big chance to get into Thanh Phu and to arrange to tow out the fishing boats. So I arranged all this with the Navy advisors in the District and we started off early in the morning to enter the canals on the other side of the river. Our District Advisory Team had a 16 foot long fiberglass Boston whaler that had been ordered through Saigon for a lot of the districts that were located around the delta. It was supposed to provide us an emergency "vehicle" to get out of the District if there was a major military fight. So I took one of the team interpreters and one of my NCOs and we got in the Boston whaler and attached ourselves by rope to the back of one of the Vietnamese patrol craft. As we entered the canals I began to see the fishing boats moored along the docks where some of the local village houses were close to the water. I started marking the boats on my plastic map overlay with my crayon marker. The idea was we'd finish our patrol run and then pick up the boats I'd marked on the map and tow them back across the river.

Unfortunately, all of that proved to be a pipe dream. About half-way into the operation, a single VC soldier came up from a spider hole along the side of the river and fired a B-40 rocket that hit the Vietnamese boat that was towing me. The VC immediately dropped back into his spider hole and was completely invisible. But that was the signal for all hell to break out on our side. As soon as the B-40 struck the boat every Vietnamese and American weapon on board the various boats was turned on the shore and fired on automatic. The din was amazing. When the enemy rocket hit the boat, a Vietnamese sailor fell overboard into the canal, although at the time we thought he might have been wounded by the shot. I instructed the interpreter to cut us loose from the Vietnamese ship and directed the sergeant to move our boat so we could get the sailor in the water. We did so and got him back on board his ship but by that time the U.S. Navy OV-10 aircraft decided to get into the action. They had come along on our operation to serve as spotters for potential enemy activity and to provide air support in the event we ran into a large concentration of VC. As my Boston whaler and its crew was maneuvering around in the water to stay out of the line of fire and to avoid the milling patrol boats, the OV-10 aircraft started strafing runs to hit the river bank area where the VC was likely to have fired the shot. The result was machine gun bullets hitting the water on both sides of our little boat until the U.S. Navy patrol boats could get the aircraft to back off because there was only one VC involved in the action and he had long since disappeared. Once the shooting had stopped, the U.S. Navy advisors conferred with the Navy PT boat team and they agreed we would continue on with the patrol. But, they quickly decided we would not go back out of the District on the canals we had come in on so we wouldn't risk a return ambush by a reinforced or at least alerted VC force. So, all the boats I'd marked on my map just stayed where they were in the canal and the other route we followed to get back to the river produced not a single wooden candidate for liberation.

Q: What about, there wasn't much U.S. military in IV Corps?

HARTER: No, the U.S. military was largely excluded from the delta. A part of the US 9th division was based in the province immediately north of Kien Hoa just outside My Tho, the big river trading city of the northern delta. The U.S base was west of the city at a place called Dong Tam. That province was actually in III Corps, but since Kien Hoa was the northernmost province on the coast in IV Corps, the 9th division sent a company of U.S. forces to help in clearing out the Vietcong in Kien Hoa. This unit was based in the district immediately north of mine on this central island in the province. As I said earlier the districts that made up Kien Hoa were totally surrounded by rivers and canals that connected the rivers. We had been connected to the mainland by the bridge that had been blown at Tet in 1968. All the time I was there, the bridge did not get rebuilt and we had to cross the river on a temporary ferry that had been brought in once order had been restored after Tet. This district, it was called Giong Trom, and my district Ba Tri were on the middle island and the other districts in the province were arranged above and below it like jaws around the middle island of the district. The other district names I remember were Thanh Phu and Mo Cay which I mentioned earlier, Truoc Giang District where Ben Tre was located, Ham Long district in between Thanh Phu and Mo Cay and Binh Dai which comprised the whole upper jaw around the middle island which would make a total of seven districts in the province. Anyway, the 9th Division was sent down to assist in the destruction of the Vietcong military forces that remained after Tet. When the unit was based just north of our district, my NCOs used to go up there and trade or scrounge U.S. food from the mess sergeants. That way we'd occasionally have U.S. steaks and other frozen meats and we'd get trays of eggs and other items that were hard to find in the local markets. I actually developed a taste for duck eggs and Vietnamese noodle soups for breakfast.

Earlier, I said Kien Hoa was one of the most insecure provinces in the entire country and even after the Tet offensive failed in the province there were still a lot of main force VC units, including one in Ba Tri, and forested areas where the ARVN forces didn't go to challenge the VC units. The province was so dangerous that I was the only civilian to spend an entire 18 month tour in a district there without being medevaced for either war injury or severe illness. One of my civilian colleagues in Giong Trom died from disease, he was from CORDS 2. Three other civilian deputy senior advisors were injured in mine incidents in their districts; their vehicles were blown up on district roads. The 9th Division was there probably six or eight months of the time that I was in the district, operating in Giong Trom and occasionally in other parts of the province. And then, they too were pulled back as part of the Vietnamization process in the latter half of 1969 and they did not operate in the delta anymore. The division did not have a very good reputation and their commander was considered to be one of the big "body count" advocates. He didn't seem to care about civilian casualties and chalked up everyone in black pajamas as VC. He was known for sweep operations that produced lots of "death and destruction" but not much to help the pacification process.

Q: Did you have much conference with fellow, district advisors from other places?

HARTER: No, there was no real interchange that way. The folks in Can Tho may have been trying to encourage that by having periodic meetings in the CTZ headquarters but the meetings were so boring I didn't go. We had good monthly meetings in Kien Hoa where the province assembled the senior advisors and the provincial department heads to talk about provincial issues and programs. You'd get the latest instructions from Saigon and have discussions about the results from the Hamlet Evaluation System to see where additional emphasis need to be directed. We could also go around and have individual meetings with the different provincial offices – New Life Development, PsyOps, Military Intelligence and Operations, Public Affairs – and try to get your district ducks lined up in the provincial pond; figure out what you needed to do; what other supplies you could beg, borrow, or have your NCO steal; and who you could talk to in the various other divisions of the advisory team to cajole the extra support you needed for your local programs, things like that. Because I was the only civilian District Senior Advisor, I didn't get to talk with the other civilians because my counterparts from the other districts at these provincial gatherings were all Army Majors or Captains. It was actually only when I got to Saigon and I was working with Colby that I was able to help bring some of these civilians into a dialogue in Saigon with Colby and with other people in the senior CORDS management so that they would have a better idea of what CORDS civilians were actually doing on the ground. We would do this sometimes over dinner at my house or sometimes just in meetings in Colby's office. But, that was the only time I can recall really having a bunch of other civilians who were working in the countryside exchanging views with one another.

Q: Dennis, you've came to Saigon. You've already talked about that you did not go as aide to Bunker. But, we'll talk about working with Colby. You were in Saigon from when to when?

HARTER: From January of 1970 until late June, maybe early July.

Q: I don't know if I asked, but this goes way after you were there, really at the end. But, I interviewed a long time, Terry McNamara who was Consul General in Can Tho when he had to evacuate by sea. He had some scathing things to say about the CIA and how they sort of got out all the Americans and left their other people. I mean, they didn't do a very good job. What was your impression of the CIA operation where you were, or did you have any impression?

HARTER: We didn't have any CIA personnel in the district. When I first arrived in the province, I did meet some CIA people who worked on intelligence issues there but we didn't have any regular connections after that except for an occasional beer together in the club when I came up for provincial meetings. The CIA was involved in creating a special program designed to target the underground VC government structure called the Phoenix program. Together with the military intelligence people they pulled together all the information we had on individuals and units and funneled that information into local District intelligence units called DIOCC's – I believe that stands for District Intelligence Operations Coordinating Center. These centers were designed to bring intelligence together for the district and for the province and then the local military and intelligence personnel could try to collect more information to enable them to locate these individuals and capture or kill them. Provincial Reconnaissance Units (PRU), a hard-nosed Vietnamese military strike team, and other units were used to go out and get the VC cadre. In a sense, the idea was to instill a sense of insecurity and fear among the VC so they could not operate as freely as they had in the past. Of course the goal was also to eliminate them, not just make them afraid. But, by making them afraid of being caught in the villages, the VC were far less able to operate. So I had one of these DIOCC's in my District and a US Army lieutenant was assigned to work with the Vietnamese military in the district and help them develop a good intelligence collection and targeting system. But while this was a CIA program at its inception, it wasn't being staffed or run by the CIA at the district level. When I first got to Ben Tre, I did hear some stories about the way the CIA people in the province during the Tet offensive had gone off on their own instead of staying in the compound with the military advisors. But, I didn't have any dealings with anyone from the CIA when I was in Ba Tri.

Q: O.K. You're back in Saigon. What were you doing?

HARTER: Well, I was one of the special assistants or executive assistants to Ambassador William (Bill) Colby who was in charge of the CORDS program and the deputy to General Abrams. There were three assistants in the main office. The senior man was Colonel Sam Smithers and he was in charge of our group and liaison with the military both on the advisory and the combat side. An USIA officer by the name of Everett Bumgardner was the second assistant. He had been in and out of Vietnam for at least a decade. He spoke Vietnamese and had contacts throughout the Vietnamese hierarchy and society. Just before I left the office, Ev, everybody called him Ev, was replaced by Frank Scotton, another USIA officer with a long association with Vietnam. I was the third assistant and I came in to replace Bill Stewart another FSO who was probably my grade level, I guess a (FSO) six or a five. Bill subsequently left the Foreign Service and joined Time Magazine, spending several years in Asia as a correspondent. Bill was also the one who introduced me into the famous house at 47 Phan Thanh Gian, the house that originated the light-at-the-end-of-the-tunnel parties.

Q: Did you go to that New Year's Eve party?

HARTER: Yes, that's the one I'm referring to. But, no, I did not go to the one in 1970. I arrived a couple of days after New Year's to begin work in Saigon.

Q: I went to the 1970 one, yeah.

HARTER: Bill Stewart introduced me to the house, but I didn't just move in when he left. Bill's replacement in the house had already been identified and I had to wait my turn, as well as to see if the other roommates would agree to let me join the household. When the next member left, I moved in. Fortunately, I didn't have to wait very long. And so, for probably five of the six plus months I was in Saigon, I lived at 47 Phan Thanh Gian. As an aside, Phan Thanh Gian was a leading courtier of the Nguyen Dynasty who negotiated early agreements with the French which resulted in the French eventually taking over the southern part of the country in the middle of the nineteenth century. He committed suicide when the French invaded the areas in the south which were under his leadership.

Q: Could you talk a little about that and your feeling, I mean using David Halberstam's sort of the best and brightest in the Foreign Service, young officers, which is a different dynamic than the older ones, of which I was a middle age representative. How did that work and what sort of things were you talking about there? How things are going? Because, young people, you know, provide a different feel than I think you get as you're farther up the ladder.

HARTER: Well, we did have an interesting mix of people doing a variety of different things but all very much I believe looking to be involved in government service, though I was the only one of that immediate group who actually stayed with the government. One of the people in the house and the one I actually replaced in the house when he left Vietnam was David Sulzberger, son and nephew of the New York Times Sulzbergers. David was an AID direct hire and worked AID's new life development program, trying to translate national program objectives into something which could be used in the provinces. I think he was responsible for the house being sort of a magnet for young journalists who were in and out of Saigon all the time trying to follow the war. Another of the roommates was Seton Shanley. Seton was a Foreign Service officer on loan to AID and was a civilian member of the coordinating group in Saigon working on the Phoenix program. Like me, he worked in MACV Headquarters at Tan Son Nhut Airport.

Q: Seton had studied to be a Jesuit?

HARTER: Yes, that's correct but it's my understanding he left the Foreign Service shortly after Vietnam and returned to the seminary. I believe he may have entered an order.

Q: I think he's married to a Vietnamese, but maybe I'm wrong.

HARTER: Not while I was there and not as far as I've heard. He certainly left Vietnam single. The other roommate who was there while I lived in the house was Gage McAfee. Gage was from a well-to-do family of lawyers in New York City. Actually, I think Seton's father also was a lawyer. Gage was trained as a lawyer and he was Ambassador Colby's special advisor on legal issues. He was working with the Chief Justice of the Vietnamese Supreme Court. The Chief Justice was involved in writing a new constitution and particularly a Bill of Rights for the Vietnam and Gage was his advisor.

Although I was not living in the house in January 1970, I often went there after work to talk and to get to know my future roommates better. We did have a lot of conversations about what was going on in the war and about what we were all doing. At that time, quite a number of my civilian friends and associates were skeptics and often quite sarcastic when we talked about the war. But I think there was still a great deal of optimism among the people who worked in Saigon. And, we certainly did not slack off in our commitment to trying to make our programs work better. Although there was a lot of posturing among the members, it did appear as though the National Assembly was beginning to function as a legislative body and not just as a rubber stamp for the Executive Branch. We all thought the Executive Branch was too dictatorial but we could see some of its power being tempered. Based on what Gage told us, there was also progress on the constitution and legal reform to protect civil rights was underway. Those of us who had come from the countryside like myself or who had other contacts with people in the countryside, felt there had been positive changes after the Vietcong failed in their takeover efforts at Tet two years earlier. Unfortunately, we were really out of touch with what was happening in the United States. So, we didn't realize that the United States mood had totally changed. And, even our young journalist contacts and friends didn't talk much about that, preferring to try and ferret out comments from us about what we saw happening or talking about the military operations they had accompanied. The journalists though, because they had been on these operations, had a much more jaded view of the battlefield success that was being reported. They had no respect for the MACV press briefings "the five o'clock follies" and very little confidence the war could be won militarily. Their conversations with the ordinary soldiers gave them a different perspective about how much of the fighting to take over territory from the VC and North Vietnamese rarely resulted in any real gains and how one unit after another seemed to be fighting on the same battlefields month after month against enemy units that always were able to reclaim the territory when the U.S. units moved on.

Q: I was there at the same time, of course. My feeling was, they're doing as well as the Lincoln government during the Civil War, you know. Things were operating and I thought they would bring it off.

HARTER: Yes, and the civilians who had an understanding of how the Phoenix program was to work felt it was the right way to go, taking the fight directly to the VC cadre who were trying to create a parallel government operation in the hamlets and villages. We saw this as a big morale booster for officials in the countryside and a real worry for the VC, making it harder for them to move in and out of populated areas to try to propagandize and collect taxes. And, in many cases the Vietnamese and US units that went after the VC were going into areas where the VC ate and slept and felt they were safe. Once they too had to face the threat of a midnight wake-up call, it was felt they would be a lot less active in GVN controlled areas. If the GVN could do that effectively, it would be a major tool to re-establish its own presence in the countryside. Now when I say this, it's important to acknowledge that some of the younger people in Saigon saw the Phoenix program as a real danger and felt that it would make the government as brutal in its handling of the enemy as the VC had been toward those working for the government.

Q: Now when you're working for Colby - first place, describe how Colby operated and the atmosphere he generated around him.

HARTER: He was probably one of the most serious and yet open people I have ever worked with. When I first joined his staff and we were discussing my role, he sat me down in his office and said, "This is MACV Headquarters, all the military go home at 5 o'clock. Unless you're working on a special project for me that doesn't require you to interact with other people in this building, I want you going home the same time that everybody else does. And," he said, "don't feel that just because I'm here you have to stay. I can take care of myself." And, from time to time when I was still working on a project that he had assigned, he'd stop by my office and ask me if I was sure I needed to still be there after 5:00 pm. Colby was also very open and receptive to new ideas and he was constantly trying to get more feel for what was going on in the countryside.

Whenever possible he'd try to leave town on Friday night to visit various provincial and Corps headquarter areas. And, he'd usually take one or more of his staff members with him to give him more eyes and ears on the ground. We'd fly out at the end of a Friday's workday, come in to a province or district and spend the following day talking to people, Americans and Vietnamese. We'd have meetings, visit projects, try to have informal sessions to learn what was going on in the area and particularly look for things that needed fixing. Because so much of his time in Saigon was tied up with meetings and high-level sessions, Colby rarely had a chance to get a real feel for programs as they worked on the ground without these trips. But, here too, he also was a prisoner of his rank and status and was constantly dealing with the top officials in the areas he visited. On these trips it was rare for him to get a chance to talk to the people who had direct experience in advisory efforts with the Vietnamese at the "basic levels." So, one of the things I tried to do was to get lower level civilian advisors from the districts to meet and talk with Colby when they came to Saigon.

Q: You didn't feel that - the military assistant can get pretty nasty. Lieutenants report to captains, captains report to majors, etc. Each level is more aware of what's up the people at top want to hear and it tends to stifle, particularly the captains on down from getting out and around. But, this wasn't happening on the CORDS side?

HARTER: I don't think that was happening on the CORDS side, particularly not where Colby was concerned. Colby wanted to hear what was going on from as many different people as he could. So, sometimes when we were going out into the provincial meetings, I would try and get in touch with some of my CORDS colleagues and try to see if it was possible to have an informal meeting with some of them beforehand or after he'd had his regular briefings. Colby met regularly with people at the embassy to talk about what he'd learned in the countryside. I know he had regular meetings with Ambassadors Bunker and [Ed: Samuel] Berger and with the other people who were focused on the political developments in Vietnam. He also was very quick to meet with top officials of the Vietnamese government and to use his influence to try and get things changed. He was the one who assigned McAfee to work with the Vietnamese Chief Justice on the new constitution and he kept pushing Thieu and others in the leadership to make this a priority.

My job at MACV Headquarters was mostly focused on the advisory effort and involved working with other people in the headquarters. I didn't have any real dealings with Vietnamese officials very often. The only Vietnamese I had any contact with, and that was fairly irregular, was the President's personal advisor, Hoang Duc Nha. Bill Stewart, my predecessor used to see him more regularly. Sometimes, however, when we felt it would be useful to give some program a push from the top, I'd go and talk informally to Nha about some of the CORDS issues and see if he could give some momentum to Vietnamese efforts in the provinces and districts. So, he was my primary contact with Vietnamese government officials at that particularly time. The rest of the work was mostly internal coordination with Colby and with the various people at the CORDS headquarters. I'd occasionally be asked to review some program reports and get comments from different offices and then prepare reports for Colby that he would use in meetings.

Q: How were we treating the accusations, perhaps well-formed problems of corruption at the highest level?

HARTER: The corruption issue wasn't part of my portfolio and I never worked on any issues involving Vietnamese official corruption. My friends and I talked about it but, I didn't have any first-hand knowledge of how that was being handled either in CORDS or through the Embassy. I know there were discussions at the CORDS headquarters about corruption and that was translated into proposals for the Embassy to approach the Vietnamese government. I know Colby talked about corruption problems and pointed out individuals who were weakening the GVN image when he met with President Thieu. Colby also asked about corruption problems whenever he visited units outside Saigon. He was interested in corruption and malfeasance as a local issue and on whatever information the localities could provide about how it affected the resources available from higher levels, most particularly from Saigon. Colby never hesitated to tell Saigon officials about what he learned in the provinces, good or bad.

Q: Talking about CORDS - I mean, here we were recruiting young men and some young women, you know, pass the Foreign Service exam and all. I mean, these are people who sort of rate high intellectual endeavors as opposed to the Peace Corps or military life. I would think there would be some problems of people, who were just plain, not ready for living in bunkers or getting mortared and all of that.

HARTER: I don't know anyone personally who got to Vietnam and then threw it all in and said, "This isn't for me, I am leaving." I gather there were some who declined the invitation to join the Foreign Service when they were told, their only option was to go to Vietnam. And, it was people in this group who complained about the recruiting process and got it changed so that incoming classes didn't all end up in Vietnam. I suspect there were more people in this group who said, "Forget it, I'm not going" as opposed to people bailing out right after they arrived in Vietnam. But, most people I knew who went out to work in Vietnam had at least one harrowing experience during their tours. It wasn't always necessarily as bad as living in bunkers, but there certainly were times when you did end up in a bunker, or where you ended up in situations in which your life could be at risk. Like I said the last time, where you drove roads early in the morning and you had to get from point A to point B you really had no idea whether those roads were safe or secure or if you'd have any opportunity to protect yourself in the event there was a threat. All of us, of course, had the option to have guns for self-protection. I mean we had weapons available to us outside Saigon. I don't think anyone in Saigon ever offered me a weapon and there were no weapons at 47 Phan Thanh Gian for us to use in the event we had to protect ourselves there. When I was in the District, I didn't think that gave me the right image as an advisor and so I did not carry a weapon and certainly I never let it be seen that I had a weapon with me or in my vehicle on the occasions I did have a weapon there. There were a few occasions when I made sure I did have a weapon with me, but by and large I didn't travel with one.

Q: Were there any particular issues that you found you were engaged in?

HARTER: During the time that I worked with Colby, I don't recall any specific program or issue I was asked to develop, but then it was a pretty short tenure, only six months or so. I came up with some ideas and some suggestions like getting Colby together with civilians from the countryside. I mentioned when I was in grammar school, I was a member of the school safety patrol. I thought that a safety patrol would be a good thing to introduce in Vietnam. If you remember, traffic in Saigon was terrible, even though it was nothing then like it is now. I saw a safety patrol as a way to cut down on traffic accidents and eliminate some of the traffic chaos around the schools at arrival and dismissal times. I saw it too as a way to develop respect for the government and a respect for law and order among the school kids. Colby liked the idea and it got proposed to the Vietnamese and it was started up in Saigon a couple of years after I left.

Q: Well, you were there when we had announced the Vietnamization thing and essentially you were there when the first sort of major troop withdrawals were taking place. Was there disquiet concern about this?

HARTER: I think there was a certain amount of concern in the headquarters, particularly about whether or not the South Vietnamese military would be able to stand up to the same kinds of challenges that the American military had. People were concerned whether ARVN would be willing to move out to react to a threat or an actual attack or whether it would just sit in defensive positions and wait for something to happen. I think the initial responses and reactions from a number of the ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam and particularly from Vietnamese Marine units were viewed as positive. These units did not just wait for something to happen.

The Vietnamese marines, at the beginning had a pretty good reputation and so did the Vietnamese Airborne units. Given proper supplies and air support they were capable of engaging in operations that were successful and I think some of the Vietnamese military leaders were surprised their units would get out of the barracks and actually do something. There were always exceptions -- units that didn't do well at all, but that was usually the result of poor leadership rather than inadequate troop performance. As I mentioned in the previous session, Vietnamization started while I was still in the district and affected the advisory program as well as the U.S. combat forces. Over half a year, my team went from over thirty persons down to two civilians, and when I left, only one civilian. The only other group still in the district was that naval advisory group down on the river working with the Vietnamese Riverine Forces.

Q: Were we concerned in CORDS and all that among the Vietnamese staff that there might be a significant undercover North Vietnamese, sort of spies?

HARTER: I guess there was always a certain feeling that was possible and that loyalties are bound to be stressed in any kind of a conflict where families were split on both sides. I still don't want to call it a civil war, as many of the critics did and still do. Yes, the people involved were all Vietnamese, but they had very different political and social systems involved on both sides. And, once there was no chance for reunification based on an equitable balance of sharing power, two very different states came into being. Historically, there had most always been two or three different regimes operating in the territory that was Vietnam. The Vietcong were not independent actors; they were directly run by Hanoi. Many of them were from the old anti-French resistance, but they were also followers of Ho Chi Minh. After the North's victory in 1975, those who didn't respond to Hanoi's beck and call were moved quickly out of the way. Those southerners who were among the top Communist leaders stayed with leadership group and some eventually got to have important positions at the top, particularly on the government side. But getting back to your question about spies, I guess one always had the thought there could be spies operating around you, but I never paid a lot of attention to that as a day-to-day issue. Moreover, MACV Headquarters was almost entirely comprised of Americans.

Q: How about the press, the American press? Were they sometimes setting the agenda on what tissue Colby might be responding to or concerned about?

HARTER: Well, I suppose there was a certain amount of that. The 47 Phan Thanh Gian house I lived in was a sort of gathering place for young journalists. And, a lot of the young stringers, people who were not regular employees but who wrote stories that they tried to sell to the news organizations often congregated at our house when they came in from their various trips with the US military. While these journalists were not "employees" they often were affiliated with one of the news magazines, Time or Newsweek or US News, or with some of the newspapers and worked exclusively for them. They just didn't get any of the regular employee benefits and for the most part, they had arrived in Vietnam on their own and latched on to jobs only after arrival. From this group, you'd hear grumblings about the military orchestrating this particular trip or that. The U.S. Military would take the press out to see the troops in the field and some of that turned out to be too orchestrated for the younger journalists. Because these journalists went out with main force U.S. units, they were out in the real combat zones. So, you'd hear their concerns that the security situation was really pretty tenuous when you got out of the bigger provincial cities and towns. And, a lot of them would talk quite regularly about how difficult it was to see the South Vietnamese government forces being able to prevent the North from invading the country and taking over once the U.S. troops were gone. Where a lot of the advisors at MACV seemed to have positive feelings about the Vietnamese military's capabilities, the younger journalists had no real confidence the South Vietnamese would be able to stand up to Hanoi's regular troops. Most of them felt the only thing that was keeping the South in the fight was the U.S. presence. Once the U.S. forces left, the South Vietnamese would have to depend upon the US commitment to provide weapons, supplies and air support in order to survive, and the young journalists didn't seem to think that would be possible.

Q: What was your impression of young correspondents? Once there were some demonstrations against the government, I can't remember what it was about, and the demonstrators had black arm bands on or something. A bunch of young American press people put black arm bands on and were in the crowd. Anyway, they got arrested. One of them, I think was John Steinbeck's son. And, I had to go and such and bail them out. It just seemed kind of, I mean these weren't serious folk, they were having fun.

HARTER: Yeah. Well, I mean some of it was like that, sort of kicking back and blowing off steam when they were in Saigon. I know that some of the guys in my house grew marijuana in flower pots in the back yard and so there was always a supply of marijuana available when the journalists came around and they also brought little packages they had purchased on the streets or in the countryside. There was also a lot of music in the house and a lot of that was from the hippie scene in the US and sometimes the dialogue got a little fuzzy. But, by and large the people I met and dealt with in this group were all very sharp. And even the ones that didn't stay with major publications beyond a year or so -- I'm talking about the stringers, not the regular journalists -- these young reporters were really good journalists, good investigative reporters, people who were interested in what was going on. Some of the more serious ones continued on to very responsible positions. Bob Kaiser of the Washington Post started out in Vietnam as a junior reporter.

He later was in Moscow, in a number of different places there and later a senior manager in DC. Some of the old Washington based reporters came through too. When I was in the district, one of the visitors who came in on his own was Joseph Alsop. I'm still not sure how he got directed to Ba Tri on this particular visit to Vietnam, but he came in late one afternoon and I took him around to see things in the district and talked to him about pacification. He wrote a column about his visit to the district and about me personally as part of the series he produced from that trip to Vietnam. You did have a feel that the journalists, while critical -- I'm not referring here to Joe Alsop, because he supported the war -- were really quite serious about what they were doing. Dan Sutherland was a Christian Science Monitor correspondent and he came down to the district too. I later used to see him regularly in Saigon.

He stayed with the (Christian Science) Monitor and then later went with the Wall Street Journal and I ran into him again years later when he was covering China. Karen House was there then too and she was just getting started. I can't recall whether she was with the Wall Street Journal then or not.

Q: You mentioned that things were going relatively well. This is the post-Tet period. But, you weren't picking up what was happening back in the states. Was anybody coming back to you and was taking you aside and saying, "You know, things aren't going well back in the United States."

HARTER: No, I didn't get that feedback. Even talking to some of the journalists, I don't recall there being a lot of that information coming through in any of the discussions we had. Of course, some of the stories about the demonstrations in the U.S. made it to Armed Forces Radio or the Stars and Stripes, but I think the military would not have played that up too much. So I guess we were largely unaware -- I should say I was unaware -- of how divisive the war had become and how people in the US were pushing the government to get out of Vietnam.

Q: You left when?

HARTER: I left in the summer of 1970 to get Chinese language training at FSI so I could get back into a China focused career.

STAN IFSHIN
USAID Officer
Saigon (1968-1970)

Mr. Ifshin was born in Brooklyn, New York in 1942 and graduated from John Hopkins University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1967. He has served in numerous posts including Saigon, Taiwan, Kuala Lumpur, Jakarta and Phillipines. He was interviewed by David Reuther in 2001.

Q: That was August...

IFSHIN: August of '68. We'd just arrived in Vietnam. First of all we are getting our debriefing and a bomb goes off. A motorcyclist with a bomb, just outside one of the office buildings where we were being briefed. We heard it go off and we thought, ok. Then we went out to this hotel and we were having a few beers, we were on the roof of this hotel as I recall and the lights were flickering across the street. A couple of the guys said, "Do you think those are signals? It looks like signals to me. I think somebody's signaling something there. Anyway, somebody called, I don't know who, some sort of security authority saying he thinks he sees somebody signaling. And they asked how long he'd been in the country, and he said he'd been there a little less than 24 hours, and they said, okay, thank you. [laughter].

And then we got our assignments. We were told what parts of Vietnam we were going to.

Q: So you didn't get that information until you arrived?

IFSHIN: Until we arrived in the country, yes. I was assigned to Three Corps, which was subsequently to become third military region, which is the area basically around Saigon. I was assigned to Thu Thua district in Long An Province. First they sent me to Bien Hoa, which is the corps headquarters and John Paul Vann was the head of CORDS in Three Corps.

Q: Just to get this straight, Three Corps extends from the ocean to the Cambodian border. It's a horizontal stripe almost.

IFSHIN: Well, I think of it more of a blob, frankly. But it's on the ocean, yes, and it goes right up to the Cambodian border.

Q: How many provinces were...

IFSHIN: I don't remember. 8, 12, I don't remember. It was the area around Saigon. Long An was about 20 miles south of Saigon. John Paul Vann wanted to interview everybody before they went off to their assignment. He wasn't there when I arrived so I sort of had to sit around Bien Hoa. And he also had a program where he wanted people to go out and observe CORDS activities in three different locations before they went to their assignment. I remember the first place he sent me, I can't remember the name of the province right now, anyway I arrived in a chopper or small plane that set me down at this isolated airport. Nobody is there. The plane takes off and leaves, and I'm standing there with a suitcase in the middle of Vietnam on a runway. When I say runway, this was PSP planking, a rudimentary type runway. There was a building but nobody was around. And then a jeep came scooting up and they said, oh, yes, sorry we're a little late, and they took me off and they said we have a civilian here but he's not here right now. But you can watch what we do. I really didn't think they were doing much of anything, but I watched them for the day or 48 hours or 72 hours or whatever I was supposed to watch them for. I got picked up and flown back to Binwa.

And then they sent me to the city, a fairly big important place, and I flew in at the airport, mass confusion, no one's there to meet me and I hear there's VC in town. I have a contact number or I get one from some of the American personnel, this was a big airport and there was lots of American personnel around and I got some number to call the CORDS office there. And they said, well, we have VC in town and you better just go back. So I go back to the air traffic people and say can I get back to Binwa. No, there's no flights to Binwa. Are there any flights to anywhere? And there was a flight to some place I'd never heard of, and I asked, well, is that a big place, and they said yes, and I asked am I likely to get a flight to Binwa from there. Yes. So that's what I did in fact and came back to Binwa. I went in and I'd had two of my three trips and I said, "I think I'm prepared, I think I'm ready to get out there and do my thing. I've seen enough of what everyone's doing and how it's going."

So I went down to Thu Thua, where I was the lone civilian on a team that consisted of a major, two lieutenants, about 4 or 5 senior sergeants, when I say senior I mean 06s and 07s, and a couple of more junior specialist type, corporals, 03s and 04s. Basically, Thu Thua was not a bad little place with a population of about 50,000. It was about 20 minutes ride from the provincial capital. I got to the work as the lone civilian sort of getting into the civilian areas of the pacification program. And there were a number of things going in the civilian area.

Q: Were there teams assigned to each city? How did that team come to be assigned there?

IFSHIN: Yes, CORDS assembled the largely military teams.

Q: Yes, 80 percent were military.

IFSHIN: Right, and in the district, as I say, I was the only civilian.

Q: So this was a district in the district town.

IFSHIN: Right. In the province there were 6 or 7 districts, and there was a CORDS team in I think 3 or 4 of them, and a CORDS headquarters in the provincial capital with all kinds of advisors advising in this area and that area and doing that and this. Everything was going along reasonably, I think... I want to make a comment about the hamlet evaluation system. You've heard about that?

Q: Yes, oh, yes.

IFSHIN: We used to assign these letter grades, a whole string of letter grades, to each hamlet in our district.

Q: This was an attempt to sort of standardize what everybody was seeing.

IFSHIN: Right, and also to measure progress. You could see where it was last month, and this is where it is this month.

Q: What are some of the categories of things that are being observed?

IFSHIN: Were there VC in the town during the day? Were there VC in the town during the night? Were there tax collectors with VC infrastructure, when is the last time they were there? Had we carried out this program A, program B, was this instituted in the town? What's the last time there was a military incident? I can't remember exactly how many hamlets I had in my district... maybe 30? And we carried a couple of so-called VC-controlled. These are places we didn't go, except in force. And then we had a lot that as far as we knew, the VC weren't there and hadn't been there for a while, and we assigned them their ranking on that basis. One of the things that I was very determined about and felt strongly that nobody was every going to catch me exaggerating these things and I was going to call them as I saw them and be just absolutely accurate. This is the point I want to make: after you'd been there three or six months and you're evaluating things and you are working hard, and you say, "well, you know, things must have gotten better after all the hard work I'd put into this, so where this used to be a C, maybe it's become a B, in this particular category, and this one is now this. So there's a certain amount of grade creep in all this.

Q: How much of these evaluations... are you going around to the individual hamlets and chatting up the either the government people or tribal father, although that's not the right term?

IFSHIN: I wouldn't say...village chief... I wouldn't say that I got to each hamlet every month. Certainly the ones that we carried that were VC controlled I didn't get to. But I got around. I was assigned an International Harvester Scout, that was the vehicle that CORDS assigned its personnel. And I'd go driving all over the place and get into these various hamlets and talk to people. I spoke Vietnamese fairly well at that point, and about what was happening and how things were. I'm skipping ahead here. There's another point I wanted to make. This was much later in my stay.

We had what we called what we called our pacification offenses where we'd come in with military forces and then bring in all the Vietnamese government's services, these were the so-called VC-controlled hamlets, and we'd move in in force and be out to make them government hamlets. It was interesting, in many ways this was the first time I had visited these places and I'd talked with people. I think they were being honest with me and I'd say, "When's the last time the VC were here?" And they'd say, "Tet, 1967." What happened then, they rounded up a bunch of our young men and they marched them off to Saigon and they never came back.

Q: You mean Tet '68?

IFSHIN: Yes, you are right. I'm talking about in '69 actually when we were doing these offenses. Basically, it's quite true, after Tet, I don't know if it's conventional wisdom now, but it certainly widely acknowledged that while Tet was an enormous victory for the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese in the United States, a tremendous propaganda and psychological victory, it was in fact an overwhelming military defeat. The Vietcong at least in my part of Vietnam was essentially wiped out in that period. And from there on in, we were fighting North Vietnamese, largely North Vietnamese regulars.

Things were going rather well in my district, and the decision had in fact been made that I would become the district senior advisor, instead of the Army Major, that is when he was replaced and I would be the senior person on the team with the Army Major as my deputy. And just about this time... I smile, but it's kind of a very sad business... My district stretched all the way up to the Cambodian border, although basically there was no population and this was a free fire zone for a number of miles toward the Cambodian border and the population was all concentrated in the south of the district. And two, well, I don't know if it was two Vietnamese battalions, it's all become foggy, but in any case the North Vietnamese force infiltrated through this free fire zone and attacked a couple of hamlets that we'd always considered quite secure, and with a great deal of destruction. The American Colonel, Asa Grey, who was our province senior advisor, landed in a helicopter near the battle zone and was killed. On reflection, this is all quite sad. In any case, when he was replaced by another Army Colonel who thought this was a really rough district and bad things are happening and of course the whole plan that we could possibly have a civilian as the senior advisor there was thrown out. So I continued as the deputy in Thu Thua and was sort of unhappy about that situation, and was subsequently moved to the province capital as part of the pacification team there and had some province-wide responsibilities.

Q: Speaking of responsibilities, when you are in Thu Thua, what are you doing on a daily basis?

IFSHIN: I was on the road a lot, visiting various hamlets and trying to discuss the functioning of the civilian side of the Vietnamese government, and were they getting the services they were supposed to get. If they weren't, I would try to follow up to see that they in fact did get some of these services.

Q: That means that you hooked in to the Vietnamese government, at that level you are attempting to stimulate them to produce...

IFSHIN: Or I'm contacting an American at the next higher level asking him to get his Vietnamese contacts to produce for my Vietnamese contact who claim that they can't do what they're supposed to do because they don't have the inputs.

Q: Are your Vietnamese contacts suggesting that you are going to have more clout if he needs a sack of concrete or some bricks or whatnot?

IFSHIN: Oh yes, sure, right. He's convinced that he's not going to get anywhere if he goes to his next higher level and asks for it but if the Americans tell them to deliver it maybe it will work.

You could argue that we weren't really building government there.

Q: That's the next question, because if the decision is up to him to circumvent his own organization then his own organization isn't learning anything. On the other hand, CORDS guys were reporting at all kinds of levels that this one official is simply incompetent or crooked and he's the bottleneck...

IFSHIN: Well, in fact, after I'd been in Thu Thua for a while, we had the Vietnamese district commander who I recall was also a major, was replaced by a Vietnamese lieutenant colonel, who was terribly corrupt. I was aware of the corruption and was doing something about it and trying to get him to stop building some of the private projects he had going on using government materials for that. A fellow named Ev Bumgartner, was a longtime Vietnam hand who was based in Saigon, got in touch with me and said supposedly there was some sort of a contract out on me. [laughter] That I was interfering and they were going to get rid of me. I thought it was all a bunch of nonsense really, and Ev did, too, but he wanted to let me know, rather than...

Q: Just in case things looked suspicious from time to time. Are you armed or with an armed escort?

IFSHIN: Normally, I went out on my own. I had, by this time, acquired quite a bit of weaponry. I bought a Walther PPK. I don't know if you are a handgun enthusiast, I am not. But that was James Bond's weapon, after he got rid of his Beretta. So I figured if it was good enough for James Bond it was good enough for me and that was my personal weapon. But in fact, I also acquired an M16 and a shotgun and various other weapons of one kind or another.

Q: Did you practice with any of these things? [laughter]

IFSHIN: No, I never fired in anger, and seldom.

Q: Did you fire in practice?

IFSHIN: I might have shot my Walther PPK a couple of times just to see how it operated and what I had to do to shoot it. I guess I fired an M16 and some of the other weapons, but I don't recall practicing with them. We came under mortar fire occasionally in the district headquarters. You know, they can stand off 20 miles away and lob mortars, so that would happen. Once, walking across the fields with another American, he claimed that a bullet had whistled between us. I did not in fact notice that, but I don't ever remember coming under individual hostile fire of that kind.

Q: Some of the other people in CORDS remark on the resources they had to distribute. Was that something you were in, could you control concrete or had funds or had administrative resources or were you prodding and poking rather than providing?

IFSHIN: I think I was prodding, poking rather than providing. We would get some resources and we could access things, but I wasn't in the direct chain of providing. It was more or less trying to get someone else to provide.

Q: So basically you are performing a reporting role. When I was next door in Thailand about the same time, that's what Tom Barnes had us do. We went to every district and most of the villages and talked to the police chiefs and the village chiefs and what's going on.

IFSHIN: We were doing that, but I'd go back to the province and say we need such and such for this hamlet. They've got a project, they want to build a footpath and they need so many bags of cement and some rebar. Can you get that for me? And eventually, usually, we'd manage to get it for them. I remember that there was a Navy Seabee detachment in the province for quite some time, and they'd put in a walking bridge, a hanging bridge across a large canal we had that was quite impressive, really, and there had never been a bridge across that canal before. And then they also put in a road for me toward one of the hamlets that we carried as VC controlled. That might not have been the greatest project in the world because shortly after that there was a command detonated mine on that road that sort of let us know it wasn't really safe to use. Putting in a road wasn't going to be sufficient to make this a marvelous safe hamlet. But I was convinced that if we just tie them into the market, we could do this, we could pacify them, win their hearts and minds.

Q: So, you went from the village level back up to the province, or the district, you...

IFSHIN: I was at the district.

Q: You started out at the district.

IFSHIN: Yes, usually I was trying to tie the hamlet to the province through the district, trying to get each to perform their functions and get them to do what they were supposed to do.

Q: From time to time, were CORDS people brought up from the district to the provincial center and discuss their problems... sort of a staff meeting?

IFSHIN: Yes. I'm trying to remember how many civilians we had at the district level. I can only remember myself and John Zerolis. I don't know if you know John.

Q: He just retired.

IFSHIN: He was in the neighboring district right next door. Then a fellow named Bruce Kinsey was at the province level. I think he had been in a district before that. Bruce had been in a district and then went into the provinces. I forget what title he was given, but it was an important title at the province level. I used to work closely with Bruce as we got along well together.

Q: This is not the right time, but it occurs to me... what were you told as to why there were foreign service officers in CORDS.

IFSHIN: Because LBJ (Lyndon B. Johnson) had said that he wanted the foreign service to participate and I think that was the only reason. Now, subsequently we were told that this was going to be a great experience for us and we were learning all about rural southeast Asia and we were seeing a really unique side of things that would stand us in good stead throughout our careers. And all that was of course crap. But the bottom line was that LBJ wanted the foreign service there and rather than deliver officers who had by dint of hard work acquired a lot of experience and they said, well, let's send some young guys out there and hope they survive.

Q: My research suggests that about 10% of the foreign service was in CORDS at any one time or that 10% of the slots were for foreign service, 80% were military and then other agencies. But there's a book, I can't think of the author right now, it's called Pacification and he suggests that with Tet and literally the demise of the Vietcong, CORDS then put on a big push to really move the program and move pacification in the absence of the Vietcong which had expended itself in Tet. That was basically the period you were there. Was there a sense that now's the time to make some hay?

IFSHIN: Well, as I say, when we started our pacification offensives, which was after I'd been there for some time, but when we started that, we went into open areas and found that they were quite ready for our efforts. There were no Vietcong around.

STEVENSON MCILVAINE
Province Advisor
Camau (1968-1970)

Born in Pennsylvania of Foreign Service Parents, Mr. McIlvaine was raised in Washington D.C. and abroad. He graduated from Harvard University and served in the US Army before joining the Foreign Service in 1967. His assignments abroad took him to a number of posts in Africa, including Kinshasa, Bissau, Dar es Salaam, and Lusaka, where he served as Chargé d'Affaires. At the State Department in Washington, Mr. McIlvaine dealt primarily with African issues. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: How did you deal with this?

MCILVAINE: I told them what I told myself, which is what I believed at the time, that I had to see it myself. I wanted to know what was going on. They would argue, "Yes, but you're actively supporting a dead policy." Well, I didn't buy the argument that everything we were doing was wrong. I thought the basic premise that we should help the country avoid being taken over by force was reasonable. Once I had been there nearly 2 years and come back, the first thing I was persuaded of is that the government we were backing had no credibility with the Vietnamese people whatsoever and therefore that would not work. That was never going to work. It would stay afloat only as long as we could prop it up and when we left it would collapse, and it did. I also, unlike most in the anti-war movement, came away even more persuaded than before that the other guys were also bad guys and that they had no virtue that I could see except that they were better organized and better disciplined than the guys on our side. I was in a province where I worked basically with villages, convinced that the victims in this were most of the Vietnamese people, particularly the rural people, who were being preyed on by both sides. I pretty well committed myself to doing whatever I could and finding whatever means I had to help protect them from both sides, not just the other side. I was working long and hard to protect my villages from predatory district chiefs and corruption and government abuse as much as I was from the VC. But it was a fascinating time.

Q: You were there from when to when?

MCILVAINE: I arrived right after the Tet offensive in June of '68. I left just before the Cambodian invasion in the spring of '70.

Q: What were you doing?

MCILVAINE: I was a province advisor in Camau, the southernmost province in the whole country in the Mekong delta. It was the province where the Viet Minh originally started, but it never really had the main force war. It was still very much a war of hamlet squad against hamlet guerrilla squad, and mortars, ambushes, not giant main force battles. We didn't have any of that.

Q: What sort of organization were you coming into in that area?

MCILVAINE: There were 2 American USAID civilians because I was detailed to the CORDS program, so I was essentially USAID detailed to the province advisory team, which was all American military. We were the only ones who spoke Vietnamese. There was a team of 30 or 40 American military outside the province headquarters in a little tented compound on raised flats. They had all these little walkways over the mud. Then they had district teams of 4 or 5 in each district, or each district we could get to. Some of the districts we could never get to. We were the only Vietnamese speakers, so we basically had a free hand to deal with the whole civilian side of government. They were just dealing with the military issues. We worked with all the province officials on land use, agriculture, school building, everything, development issues. We were given a free reign and no supervision. John Paul Vann was running things in the IV Corps at that time. That was very exciting. There was a senior official that you heard about and read about actually coming down and asking you what you thought. Unheard of in those days, that a senior official would actually ask you and listen to what you said. That was part of the legend of John Paul Vann, that he really did listen to people. So, it was again like my Congo experience. The intensity of a war environment where any mistake can get somebody killed. You do the wrong thing at the wrong time, it's not just a mistake, it could be fatal. I thrive on that. It seems to be something I really like – not all the time, but for spurts. So I very much enjoyed that.

In Vietnam a village would be up to 24 hamlets and 10-15,000 people. I worked with 3 villages that I could reach from the capital by sampan or whatever where I found village chiefs who seemed to be reasonably interested in actually helping their people rather than helping themselves. I would do whatever I could to help them.

I also got into all sorts of interesting adventures. I'd be very careful to take a sampan out without any advance warning, without telling anybody where I was going or when, and just go down to the market and pick at random one of the sampans and take off. You wouldn't tell them where you were going until you got out of town. All the precautions you had to take. I carried a Swedish submachine gun that I got from the CIA Phoenix Program, borrowed. It was a strange time. We'd get mortared 2-3 times a week. The town would get mortared.

Q: What were you picking up from your contacts about how they felt about things, the Vietnamese?

MCILVAINE: "Please leave us alone. Everybody leave us alone." This was the Mekong delta, where the living was good in any kind of peace. It was all paddy land. The whole province, 2 feet above sea level was about the highest point. Going upstairs was a big deal. They had rice paddies and a cyclical life where you plant the rice, the rice grows, you harvest the rice, and then you have 3 months of drinking until it's time to plant the rice again. Because it was perfect rice growing country and there was always plenty of water in the Mekong, they always lived well until the war in these villages. Further up in the bush, in the more jungle portions, there was real support for the Viet Cong, but there was no support for the Viet Cong in my area. Increasingly, there was no support for the government either. The government simply preyed on them. It took. It didn't give. It didn't provide anything except maybe through us.

Q: Did you get much feeling of dealing with the government officials about the problems you were mentioning?

MCILVAINE: Oh, yes. There were a few. There was a refugee chief who seemed to be trying to do his best. You always wonder afterwards who was really working for the VC who had another line out. Nobody posted a scorecard after it was all over saying, "Fooled you. This guy wasn't and this guy was." But some of them were obviously adventurers just making a buck. Those guys you tried to cut out and keep out of whatever you were doing. Some of them were trying to do the right thing within the limits of the system they worked in and you tried to figure that out. But it was an intense experience for a 23-25 year old to try and understand the pressures they were under.

Q: Did you get involved in any classic conflicts between calling a province chief "corrupt" and the people above you not being very happy with that?

MCILVAINE: No. The thing I remember as most interesting was the portable rice mills, a really vivid explanation of what was going on. One of the things that kept coming up in this village that I most enjoyed working with was that they had to take all their rice to the one rice mill in the province capital run by a Chinese businessman, pay the fixed price, and get their rice milled there. About the same time, I heard about these little Honda portable rice mills. I found out USAID had some, so I got them to send me one. I took it down to the village and said, "Let's try this." It was a smash success. The village set it up and everybody was bringing their rice and waiting in line hours to get their rice milled. They did it because they didn't have to take the rice to the province and pay the province price.

Well, in short order, the rice mill was confiscated by the province government and the national government issued an edict banning portable rice mills. I hit right at somebody's rice bowl. This was a national thing. Monopolies on rice mills were set up. It was bought, it was paid for, and it was not to be messed with. This kid had screwed it up and boy did they shut that down as fast as they could. That was illuminating.

Then after a year of working in the delta, I was pulled back to Saigon and spent 9 months working for a little office called the Pacification Studies Group in MACV headquarters that Colby had set up under Craig Johnston, who later became ambassador to Algeria and a few other things. He had about 8 or 10 Vietnamese speaking junior officers and 8 or 10 ex-Viet Minh Vietnamese, Chu Hoi, and the idea was that Colby would say to Craig: "Something's going wrong in Province Y, but the reporting's not giving a very clear picture and maybe they're covering something up. I don't know what's going on. Can you find out?" A team would be sent out. We would pair. We'd get to the province airstrip and the Vietnamese Hoi Chan would disappear into the Vietnamese community and I'd go deal with all the American officials and then I'd deal with the Vietnamese officials. Two or 3 days later, we'd meet and compare notes and see what we figured out was really going on. I loved it. It was being an investigative reporter, which is something I've always liked. I was good at it.

Q: What sort of things were you finding?

MCILVAINE: There was always 3 levels of stories below the official story. I remember different trips. I would write these 2 page things to Colby that did explain what the real problem was. There was always something. Unfortunately, I can't remember a good example. You have to understand the relationship between the province chief and the senior American advisors and the province chief and his family and maybe the Chinese or whoever else. In one case it was the community of Catholic refugees that had come down and settled in my old province in Camau off in the corner and built their own little Catholic enclave and how they were dealing with the provincial government. Another one was in III CORPS in Ben Hoa. I got all over the country. I got to see places I hadn't seen. I remember Street Without Joy that Bernard Fall wrote about. It was the first time I had ever gotten up into the north, into the big war country. It really expanded my understanding of Vietnam and the problem. Those people were so bitter. It was the delta taken 10 times worse. They had been tramped on and killed and shot at by both sides over and over and over again and they hated everybody. The hostility rang out at you from people along that stretch on the coast. They had just been through it too many times.

Q: Did you run across any problems of Americans getting involved in corruption?

MCILVAINE: I didn't. We always admired the wheeler-dealers. In Camau, we cornered the market in VC flags. We had most of them. They were very good trading material. I remember one NCO who managed to trade a VC flag for this giant generator that was too big and he couldn't get it into the province and if he had, we didn't know what to do with it. It would have electrified the whole province. But he couldn't pass up the deal.

Q: There you would have been part of the young FSO mafia.

MCILVAINE: Yes. I'd get up to Saigon for a weekend. Many of the future stars of the Foreign Service were there.

Q: As you were there, what feel did you get about whither Vietnam by the judgment of the young officers?

MCILVAINE: I think it was almost universal that this was going wrong. We were there.... After the Tet offensive, there was a lull. The VC had really been knocked back. So, for a while there, things looked like they were really moving. But if you were working at the grassroots level, you came away with the impression that the guys on our side are hopeless, that if this is what we've got to work with, it isn't going to work. I think that was widespread with the guys who went to language class with me and went out to districts at the same time I did. We would meet back in Saigon. Higher up, those who went to the big jobs in MACV and provincial headquarters might have been a little more optimistic. The embassy seemed to be on a totally different plane. I had one friend from the A-100 course at the embassy for a while. It was like they weren't in the same country.

I don't think I ever even got in the door of the embassy. USAID I and II and all those places, yes, but I don't think I ever got in the door of the embassy.

Q: My consular section was an adjunct. I was consul general. It sounds fancy, but we were dealing with consular matters.

MCILVAINE: Which were plenty.

Q: Yes.

MCILVAINE: And they weren't interested in your views on policy. The embassy did have a reputation of being very closed to the outside world.

Q: I remember looking at the diplomatic list. Here I was, consul general, which sounds fancy. I made the upper half of the American diplomatic list by one. There was something like 80 people on that thing.

MCILVAINE: They had so many bigshots.

Q: Yes.

MCILVAINE: Double ambassadors and all the rest of it. That embassy did not serve our government well, I'm afraid.

Q: Well, the pressures on it were such that...

MCILVAINE: Well, nobody wanted to hear...

THOMAS MACKLIN, JR.
Youth Affairs Officer
Saigon (1968-1970)

Thomas Macklin, Jr. was born in Texas in 1935 and educated at San Diego State and the University of Maryland. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included posts in The Hague, Saigon, Bridgetown, Algiers, Tel Aviv and Moscow. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You got to Saigon when in '68?

MACKLIN: It was late July. Because I was in training with a guy named Lionel Rosenblatt in the Vietnamese language training and we were both having trouble with Vietnamese and Ted Kennedy had gone off to Vietnam and discovered there was a refugee problem there and had criticized the State Department and the State Department said, "No, there is no refugee problem" or did something to deflect Kennedy and said, "In fact, we have several trained officers going out now to deal with the refugee problem," they came to the Vietnam Training Center and said, "Anybody want to go early?" So, Lionel said, "Yes, I'll go. I want to go over there and get it over with." So, he went to Vietnam. I thought about going then, but I didn't. There were four or five guys from my Vietnam Training Center class who went. Instead, I went off and did this master's thesis and then went off in summer. But the guys who were there were there for Tet and mini Tet and had some really hair raising stories. One of the guys who was killed was captured by the Viet. Cong in Hue, a guy named Bob Little, who was really a nice kid, a Harvard graduate, smart, and really liked the Foreign Service. He was captured by the Viet. Cong and was murdered in an extremely brutal way. Lionel was trapped in a building in Saigon during the last Tet. So, I went out over the summer with a group of CORDS IV. I didn't know any of them very well, but they took us to Taiwan first for two weeks to work with rural communes to see what it was like in a rural atmosphere where there was no security problem or insurgency. It was pretty interesting. Then we flew individually into Saigon.

Q: When you were in Taiwan, what were you expected to learn?

MACKLIN: They took us around to rural communes and they had us speak to village chiefs. They had some agricultural organizations for purposes of marketing or just channeling agricultural produce back to the city. Farmers didn't do it individually. It's kind of like a dairy association with rice and ducks and other things. So, we talked to those people and just got a feel for it.

Q: You arrived. How were you received and where did you go?

MACKLIN: That was actually kind of interesting. Normally when you go to a diplomatic post, there is somebody at the airport to meet you and say, "Here is where you're going to live," etc. There was a hurricane or a typhoon in the area at that time. We had gone from Taiwan to Hong Kong and then from Hong Kong into Saigon. I noticed all the other guys were staying in Hong Kong two or three days longer than I was. I figured, "Well, if I get there sooner, maybe I'll get a better job or a better something." So, we wound up flying through a hurricane, which was awful. The plane dropped 2,000 feet and went up 2,000 feet. There was food all over the inside of the fuselage. It was pretty messy. So, I arrived in Saigon a little bit rattled. Hong Kong had been a little bit mild and Saigon was typically about 105 and sweaty and the airport was just kind of a mess with a not very effective loudspeaker system and there was nobody there to meet me. So, I got off the plane. I had a bag. I got my other bag. I looked around and there was nobody there. I wandered all over and asked some people. I asked some military people and they didn't know what CORDS was and they didn't know what the embassy was. It was a holy mess. So, I didn't know what to do. So, I finally found a military phone, which was basically a phone that you pick up and then you ask a Vietnamese operator to put you through to someone, kind of like rural America in the old days. Terrible connection. I said, "Give me CORDS headquarters. They'll know what to do." So, there was a lot of squeaking and squawking and somebody picked up the phone at that end. I said, "Hi, my name is Tom Macklin. I'm in the new CORDS group and I've just arrived and there is nobody here at the airport. I'm happy to grab a taxi and go on into town, but I don't know where to go. If you guys could let me know which hotel to check into, I would be grateful. I'll just head on in on my own." He said, "Buddy, you did the right thing. Just sit tight and I'll come get you." I said, "I don't mind taking a taxi. You tell me where to go." He said, "No, sit tight, old pal." So, I sat down and about 10 minutes later I hear a string of names being announced over the loudspeaker, including mine. So, I go over and there is this young babe about 20 with a clipboard with some names on it. I said, "I'm Tom Macklin. Did you just call my name?" She said, "Yes." I said, "That was quick." She said, "What do you mean, that was quick?" I said, "I just called you guys and you're here already." She said, "What do you mean, you called us?" I said, "Well, there was nobody here, so I called CORDS headquarters and asked what to do and somebody said, 'Sit tight. Somebody will be there to get you in a minute.'" So, we hung around there for about half an hour looking for people and nobody else showed up, so she said, "Come on" and we got on a jeep and drove back into town and went to one of the USAID/CORDS personnel offices. So, I'm sitting there with this babe in this hot, steamy office filling out forms and some guy walks past me with a big cigar with kind of a New Jersey accent and barks out a couple of orders to this babe and says to her, "Has anybody seen that asshole, Macklin?" I said, "I'm Tom Macklin." He comes up to me with his cigar, starts poking me in the chest, and says, "Look, listen to me, you son of a bitch, the next time you call up General Coors and ask him for a lift, you damn well better stay at the airport until he shows up!" I said, "What are you talking about?" He said, "You called up General Coors, the head of the whole aid program and asked him for a lift and he went out there to get you and you weren't there." I said, "I didn't know who I talked to. There was nobody there to meet me." He handed me one of those, "We'll fix you, son of a bitch" look on his face and walked off. So, eventually, the other CORDS guy showed up. We were parked in a hotel. It was a smelly, rundown hotel with no air conditioning. The lights were constantly blinking on and off. They had Vietnamese staff in the hotel who pretended they didn't speak English most of the time. The other guy spoke Vietnamese. I hardly knew a few words. For about a week, we were kept there. They took us to various places to eat and started processing us through. It was still, you'd go up on the roof of a hotel and look at the city at night and there was shelling off in the distance. In fact, we got shot at on the roof the second or third night. A handful of us were up there. This was over by USAID I someplace. Just a seedy little small place. We heard a bullet ricochet off the concrete wall behind us. So, we ran like hell and got to the exit and there were two more shots. We ran downstairs and told the people in the hotel and they said, "Ah." They couldn't have cared less. We assumed it was a sniper. I'm sure it was just some drunken serviceman saying, "Let's scare those assholes over there." But you don't know at the time. It was kind of nutty like that. About the fourth night there, George Tuttle, with whom I had roomed in Washington, who was working at a district just outside Saigon, came out to get me and said, "Come on, spend the night with me out in the country. You'll like it." So, we went out there. He lived in a trailer about 20-30 miles from Saigon next to a small army unit which was next to a large complex of gasoline tanks. It was kind of a small refinery and storage area. Of course, if they ever mortared that, the whole area would go up, but that's where they parked him and that is where he lived and he never complained. It was kind of interesting. The trailer was supposed to be air conditioned but really wasn't. It was kind of hot and steamy. At night, you could hear and feel the B-52 raids off in the distance. It was like an earthquake.

Q: These were searchlight strikes.

MACKLIN: It was off in the distance and you could hear a distant rumble, but the ground would constantly shake. It was a lot like being in an earthquake in California. Then in the middle of the night, George when he went to bed said, "If there is an attack, this is where we go. That is our bomb shelter." The far end of this trailer had a bunch of holes in it that had been plastered over and it was kind of like somebody had taken a shotgun and went bam, bam. There must have been 200 little holes. He said, "That's where a mortar landed outside the trailer." So, in the middle of the night, wham, there were three or four right outside the trailer. I jumped up, ran to the little bomb shelter, and the noise kept up. You could see the flashes. I saw George standing in the door of the trailer. He said, "Tom, you asshole, come on back." I said, "George..." He said, "Tom, those are outgoing. That is not incoming. There is a difference between outgoing and incoming." I said, "Well, you could fool me." He was next to a mortar unit and three times a night every night they would fire off a few rounds just to keep anybody around there ill at ease. I don't know how he slept through it.

Anyways, I went back the next day and they started dividing up jobs. They wanted to send me off to one of the border provinces. The guy was still kind of peeved. They wanted to send me off to Kunminh or something. But at the same time, there were three jobs in USAID Youth Affairs working out of Saigon. So, I went over and interviewed for one of these jobs, which kind of peeved the guy with the cigar because he wanted me to go off to Kunminh or someplace. So, I agreed to accept this job. In retrospect, I would have probably been better off in Kunminh, but I accepted a job working in Youth Affairs with an organization called CPS. It's a long Vietnamese term. CPS was an organization that AID funded to organize high school teachers in the provinces in new committees and then those committees of teachers were to organize their students into civic action projects. The educational system in Vietnam was based on the French system. The upper classes went to an elite school and the lower classes learned a trade. So, these upper classes who went to these elite schools tended not to identify with the guy in the provinces or the farmer or the urban worker. So, the effort was to get these high school students to identify with the problems in the countryside and to organize civic action programs. There was resistance to it from the Vietnamese side but then they simply saw it as a source of money. We'll do what you want us to superficially on an organizational level, but we don't believe in this, so we're not going to really follow through with it. I spent the next year and a half trying to make some sense out of it. I traveled a lot. We had committees all over Vietnam. So, I traveled around the country on Air America. I had a couple of Vietnamese working for me. I just couldn't speak Vietnamese well enough to communicate with anybody. So, I had big problems with my boss and my boss' boss and I had problems with the Vietnamese. The end result was, I really didn't do very much.

Q: What were the problems with your boss and your boss' boss?

MACKLIN: It was more bad luck than anything else. There had been a collection of fairly dynamic young guys working on Youth Affairs a couple of years before I got there. There tended to be a lot of people in Vietnam who went out there and fell in love with the place and stayed on for a long time. There were three or four guys who had gotten involved initially in Youth Affairs and saw this as a great opportunity, kind of the Bobby Kennedy approach to things. Half the population is under 18. The Viet Cong are mobilizing these guys; why can't we? So, they had gotten involved in Youth Affairs programs and achieved some limited success and then decided that the Vietnamese bureaucracy was so stodgy and had such an emphasis on age that they were not really going to support any real effort in Youth Affairs. So, they said, "The hell with it." I found this out about a year later, too late. So, they didn't close down the program. They just withdrew and went off and did something else. The two USAID directors whose directorate included Youth Affairs felt Youth Affairs was a waste of time and money and the only reason they maintained the office was because there was pressure from Washington to do something with Youth Affairs. My direct boss was a guy named Charlie Reed who was a nice fellow. He was stupid. He had been a superintendent of public education from Oceanside, California. Charlie had gone through a terribly ugly divorce in the late-mid-'60s. In those days, if there was any scandal connected with your person, you could lose your job in the public school system in Southern California. In fact, he had been encouraged to move on. So, he had gotten a job somehow with USAID. But his background was in education administration. That is the paradigm he used for everything. You had to have extensive lesson plans before you could do anything. My view was, we were dealing with an alien culture who didn't want to do what we wanted them to do and we were going to have to wing it. He said, "No, you can't waste government money by traveling on these Air America flights with everybody else and their goats and chickens unless I see an outline of what you're going to do." I said, "Well, Charlie, it's hard to give you an outline if I don't know what the situation is there. I can give you an outline that says we will set up a committee, this is what the committee will do, this is how many people are going to be on the committee. I can do all of that, but it doesn't mean anything." He just looked at me like I was lazy or naive. So, I eventually won him over. I didn't get poor efficiency reports, but the frustration was monumental. There were a lot of people within the USAID structure who felt that the real answer to the youth problem was organizing Little League baseball. The Vietnamese weren't interested. There were constant problems. I traveled a lot with my Vietnamese assistant and we did organize a lot of committees. Occasionally, they would do something worthwhile. My counterpart at the Ministry of Education was sacked after I had been there for about a year because his family fell out of favor with the family who sort of controlled the ministry at that time. We were sort of awash in excess resources. Everybody was going off in a different direction. There was no cohesiveness. It was just kind of stupid. We would get together and whine about it.

Q: Did you find that you were up against the cultural situation where no matter what youth said, youth was something to keep quiet about and do the bidding of elders?

MACKLIN: The Vietnamese are very good at external emotions. They are very good at putting on the right face, but it's a very hierarchical society. Kids are supposed to go with their parents. Administrators are supposed to obey their seniors. Their seniors were always people who were older. The higher you went, the older they tended to be with the exception of some of the army.

So, students were expected to obey these teachers. Again, the teachers tended to be cynical about this. There were some NGO groups that I dealt with a bit and tried to get them involved in this and they said, no, this was tainted, that these were kind of tainted because “you have money from the U.S. government. If you can do this without money from the U.S. government, we’ll support you.”

Q: Where were the NGOs getting their money?

MACKLIN: I don’t know. I think they were being paid salaries by their NGO organization but they were operating without a budget or with some sort of a local budget or maybe from scrounging stuff up. But I found them impossible to deal with. The people at the Ministry of Education were supportive and they’d smile and didn’t do anything. My boss kept wanting more and more lesson plans. His bosses kept trying to figure out a basis for abolishing our office. My direct boss kind of went through what several older divorced men and some not divorced men went through in Saigon. They discovered young chicks. So, he’d go off trying to pick up chicks. It was kind of embarrassing. There were all of these people from organizations like PANE and the other big contractors who were there making millions of dollars and guys would volunteer to come over and work for them and they’d love it. They were fighting the communists, making tons of money, and the Vietnamese girls were very willing. It was a great opportunity for these aged warriors.

Q: You and I met quite often while we were there. I was there from ’69 to ’70, about 18 months. What were you getting from your fellow officers as they’d come into your place?

MACKLIN: We had an apartment in Saigon, Lionel Rosenblatt and I. Then eventually Lionel left and went back to the Ops Center. His place was taken by a guy named Stan Jorgenson. Then Stan left after about three months and a guy named Jan De Wilden moved in. Because we had a big apartment in Saigon, there were a lot of people who would come to Saigon who would camp out at our place. Mostly young officers like to complain and there was a lot to complain about. They’d complain about excesses and about corruption. One of the really big issues that people would complain about was the suppression of any negative reporting by the embassy. The embassy leadership in the Political Section and in the front office didn’t want to see reporting that was negative. People would come in with documented proof of corrupt officials in the provinces and it was just suppressed. You were supposed to get out there and support the policy. Martin Hertz was the worst [chief of the Political Section], but he was by no means alone. That was the biggest complaint I heard, that there was corruption, there was a lot that was wrong, and the embassy wouldn’t report it. There were complaints over the military but very few complaints over local military units. Most of the guys that I know who worked in the provinces found the U.S. military reps out there as very concerned and very sensitive to the problems of the peasants and not inclined to go up in a gunship and blast anything that moved. Although that went on, it was something that both the military and the FSOs tried to discourage.

Q: What was your feeling while you were there and by the time you left about how the war was going?

MACKLIN: Almost uniformly, I found the USAID people expected this to follow the World War II model, that we would win militarily and that we would then go in with an even larger assistance program and rebuild. We kept saying, “I don’t know. The Vietnamese are divided and as bad as the government is from the North, they don’t seem to like their own government either. We’ve got to figure out a way to disengage. It’s kind of frustrating.” It was a nice place to serve. It was a pretty country. It is green. The architecture, French provincial, is lovely. There were places like the 614th and some of the avenues that were very pretty architecturally. The food was absolutely wonderful and was cheap. The girls were beautiful and compliant. The politics were Byzantine. You could constantly find Vietnamese who would say anything. We used to make fun of people in the Political Section who spent inordinate amounts of time cultivating people, Vietnamese leaders in parliament as if these parliamentary coalitions actually meant something, and spending lots of representational funds trying to get to know somebody from the Chamber of Deputies or something. The younger people there spent a lot of time having fun and a lot of time whining and complaining.

Q: By the time you left, did you see the light at the end of the tunnel?

MACKLIN: No, it looked like more and more of a morass. You left after I did.

Q: I left in July of 1970.

MACKLIN: About a month after I did. Security had improved a lot at that time. By the time I left, you could drive a bullcow without running into a roadblock. Charlie Salmon and a couple of other guys drove from Saigon up to Dalat and back. Those kinds of things were unheard of. There was a feeling that maybe it was getting better militarily, that somehow security was really improving. I’m out of my element. I had a feeling in retrospect that it was just a function of the number of American troops. With that many American troops, security would improve a bit. But when we left, it fell apart again.

Q: Did you have any impression of Ambassador Bunker?

MACKLIN: Very nice guy, a real gentleman. A lot of people had dealings with him. I never did. I never went on any of the support flights to Nepal with him. Some of the guys did. Wonderful guy. Very gracious. Didn’t have a terrier like personality that all of his deputies had – Sam Berger, deputy ambassador [later National Security Advisor to President Clinton]; Martin Hertz; and the rest of them. He was a nice guy and I think he had a pretty good appreciation of this, but that is only intuitive. I have no real idea what his own private thoughts were.

Q: You left there in early 1970?

MACKLIN: Yes.

I did a lot of traveling and saw a lot of the countryside.

Q: With these youth groups, who was running them?

MACKLIN: They were run by teachers. The ones that I felt were really making a contribution were run by, particularly up in Second Corps, we had two or three committees that were pretty good. They were organized by high school teachers who seemed to have dynamic personalities. One time in Kue Young, we went up there and they had organized a group of students to go out over the weekend and help clean up a refugee camp. They went down where the latrines were and dug new ditches for the water to flow away and tried to help clean the place up a little bit and probably didn't make any difference in the long run in terms of the camp, but it certainly exposed the students to what life was like for refugees. Whether or not that had some long term impact, I don't know, but things like that can't hurt, for the rich class to see what the poor class is doing and for the poor class to see somebody from the rich class come out and do something for them.

The worst trip I ever had was the one to Dalat. Dalat is a pretty little town almost 4,000 feet high with a pretty lake. It's a lovely little French resort town. I went in there and there was supposed to be an active committee. They had a committee that did nothing other than spend the money we sent them, had never organized a program. We spent most of the day running around trying to find the people in the committee. Although they were supposed to have known we were coming, there was nothing set up. We didn't get to visit a school. Nothing. At the end of the day, we needed to find a place to spend the night. Then there was a hotel in town, but it was full so we went up a big Army compound there. I was accompanied by three Vietnamese. They looked at me like I was from Mars and said, "You can't stay here." It was a huge compound with barbed wire and bunkers and watch towers and stuff like that. I said, "Well, where can I stay? Do you have any idea?" They said, "No, we don't care. Just get out of here." Well, the province senior advisor was a friend of mine from Holland, a guy named Hawk Mills. I knew he lived someplace, so I found out from somebody where he lived. It's kind of like I've always imagined parts of Colorado to be like. Four to five thousand feet with lots of pine trees. Very pretty up there. We found Hawk's house. Hawk was on an R&R out of the country, but he lived in a huge house that must have been 12 bedrooms. He had a guard out front, an old guy who would sleep all night long in front of his house, mostly to ward off thieves. But I said, "Look, Hawk is a personal friend of mine and he said I could stay here if I ever came to town." They said, "We don't care." So, I slept in Hawk's bed and the three Vietnamese people I brought with me slept downstairs. It's funny about Hawk. He was in Key Minh himself for a long time. The first time I saw him in Saigon, having come in to Key Minh, while he was gone from Key Minh, they mortared the compound and they hit his trailer with mortar and basically blew it apart. But he was in Saigon, so they didn't get him. Then the next time I saw him in Saigon, he was always going out on night patrols with a group of rough, tough, Special Forces guys, routinely going out. I learned later that the guy who was standing in Hawk's place in the formation (Hawk was always second or third man back) took a bullet right in the chest, killing him. So, there was this association of "lucky Hawk." Every time there was danger, he had the good sense to leave town. So, I was staying in Hawk's house. About 2:00 am, a fire erupted outside the house. Hard to tell how close. The way you could always tell, they said, if it was just people firing at shadows or a real fight is if you could see green tracers and whether or not it went on for more than 30 minutes. Well, it went on for about two hours. There were green and red tracers. I'd look out the window and it was impossible to tell. It sounded like they were in the backyard, but they were probably about two miles off. Hawk's house was just... There were rifles and grenades. He had enough stuff there to arm Pancho Villa. What was I supposed to do, supposed to break out a window and start shooting? So, I did nothing, which was really the right thing to do. But frankly,

I was uneasy. The next morning, it finally died away. It was a beautiful day. The sky was blue. I went downstairs, not having slept much, and there were my three Vietnamese all red eyed and kind of shaky. I figured, well, "If they were scared, let's not stay a second time. Let's get the hell out of here." So, we went on and got a flight back to Saigon.

WILLIAM A. WEINGARTEN
New Life Development Program
My Tho (1968-1970)

Mr. Weingarten was born in New York in 1936. He received his BA from Colgate University and his MSFS from Georgetown University. He served in the U.S. Army overseas from 1958-1961. His postings after entering the Foreign Service in 1962 included Paris, My Tho, Belgrade, Brussels, Canberra and Ottawa. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1999.

Q: How did the Vietnam assignment come about?

WEINGARTEN: I volunteered for it. I thought that I ought to for a variety of reasons. I thought that I was probably going to be selected for it anyway.

Q: It was certainly the - WEINGARTEN: I would get some credit by volunteering for it. And the other thing was that it was the big event - not of my generation, but the generation behind me - of that period, so I thought I should go and see what it was all about.

Q: I also went to "see the elephant" - I mean it -

WEINGARTEN: That's a good way to put it.

Q: Well, then, you were in Vietnam from what, '68?

WEINGARTEN: To '70.

Q: To '70. What were you doing there?

WEINGARTEN: Well, I was in charge of what they call a New Life Development Program. And this was all a translation from the Vietnamese of all of the civilian programs that we put in there to try to make their government work better - agricultural programs, public safety, budget, public works, every aspect of a local county government that you can think of we probably had a counterpart to it. We did have a counterpart to it.

Q: When did you get there?

WEINGARTEN: I got there in August.

Q: Of '68.

WEINGARTEN: August of '68, last part of August.

Q: By this time Tet had occurred.

WEINGARTEN: Yes.

Q: Did you find things in pretty much disarray? What was your impression of Vietnam when you arrived?

WEINGARTEN: When I arrived, I spent three days or so in Saigon, and Saigon was being hit by rockets at the time, and there was a good deal of tension in Saigon. And these were big rockets.

Q: Not these little -

WEINGARTEN: - little ones with 107 mm things. They were pretty inaccurate, but they made a lot of noise. So the impression I had of it was kind of a tense city, and then when I got out to My Tho, which was not the most appealing place I had ever seen. I remember coming down by helicopter and looking at it and thinking, What in the world have I let myself in for? Happily, it was just a far more relaxed, far easier kind of place than Saigon.

Q: You were in the Delta, then.

WEINGARTEN: Yes.

Q: That's M-y T-h-o, two words?

WEINGARTEN: M-y T-h-o, two words in one.

Q: Were you there the whole time?

WEINGARTEN: Yes.

Q: Could you describe both your briefing, what were you told to do, and how did things work out? What were you doing there?

WEINGARTEN: Well, I think we pretty much weren't told a hell of a lot of what you were supposed to do. You kind of pick it up. All of these guys who were experts in their job, and you were supposed to help them with it, make sure that they got their shipments and so on. You became kind of an overall controller-expediter, and you had to develop good relations with the provincial government and with the U.S. military that was there. So we got involved... One thing I really got interested in doing was public works, building bridges and so on. We had this idea in the fall of '68 that if we could build little bridges across drainage ditches and tiny streams and so on into villages that were otherwise cut off, that they would be able to get their produce to the main road, to the market, and the corollary was that the government would be able to come from the main road into the village. And so we first talked to the Ninth Division, and the Ninth Division said they noticed once that they had a whole lot of metal lying around that they weren't using. I asked about it. It almost looked like bridge sections. They weren't bridge sections, but they were pieces that could go into making bridges. So I said, Can we use these, and they said sure, welcome to them, just haul them away. We couldn't haul them away - they were too heavy - so we got a helicopter. A big helicopter should do it. And then we had a Seabee team.

Q: Construction Battalion team.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, Navy Construction Battalion, a team of about 12 guys who were all really good, cross-trained in all their specialty. And so we got these things together and we went out and talked to villages and said, "Would you like a bridge to make things easier for you?" And most of them said sure. So we built the bridges, and then in March of 1969 they all got blown up.

Q: What happened then?

WEINGARTEN: Well, they had sort of a Tet II offensive in late February or early March, and all our little bridges got blown up. And so we went back and said, "How come..." By this time we knew that the Vietcong never just turned up suddenly. They always sent a guy out before hand with a little notebook and he'd measure the abutments so they'd figure out how much C-4 plastic explosive they'd need. So we said, "Why didn't you tell us when this guy comes around standing by the bridge making notes measuring the abutments? Why didn't you let us know?" Well, the basic reason boiled down to they didn't really think it was their bridge. It was the American bridge, and they were not going to get into trouble over the Americans' bridge. So at that point we said, okay, if the bridge is going to be rebuilt, it will be by you guys. So I told the village chief we'd provide some money for it, but apart from that we'd have nothing to do with that. He would have to get the labor himself. So I probably learned from that experience what every advisor before me and after me had learned, that you can't do it yourself.

Q: No.

WEINGARTEN: You can't do it as an American project. But then we did another one which did last. It's a big bridge, about two hundred feet long, a pretty good-sized bridge. It was across one of the tributaries of the Mekong, and it opened up an area that we hadn't been in before. The Seabees built it, and one of the things that I was able to do was to steal a pile-driver for them - intercept a pile-driver - an old Eiffel. You know, Eiffel built the Eiffel Tower, but Eiffel also even then was selling machinery in Southeast Asia, the Eiffel Company. It was a little one-lung pile-driver with a two-stroke engine - bum-bum- bum - that would pull the pile up and drop it - bang. It drove the piles, built the bridge, and that still was standing in 1970. Might still be. I don't know. I may go back and take a look for it.

Q: How did you find relations were with the Vietnamese, both the military and the civilian?

WEINGARTEN: Vietnamese?

Q: Yes.

WEINGARTEN: It depended on the military unit. You had your elite units, your Vietnamese Marine or Airborne or Ranger outfits were just different as night and day from local troops. As it was in the Army. Have you been in the Army?

Q: I was in the Air Force, enlisted man.

WEINGARTEN: I think the units that we worked with were mostly the popular force and regional force. The regional force were the companies that could be used anywhere in our province, and the popular force were restricted to their village for operations.

Q: What was your time like that you were working with?

WEINGARTEN: We had a large team with about, oh, I guess maybe about 100 people or so, and maybe about 15-20 civilians and the rest military. So I think we got along pretty well. There were sometimes towards the end there, when I remember I got my orders to go back to Washington, and I couldn't get out for a while. What I was going to do, my wife and I were going to go to Phnom Penh and then down to what is it, the big... you know, where the...

Q: Angkor Wat?

WEINGARTEN: Angkor Wat. And we had our visas and everything for that, and then we had to cancel that because of our invasion in 1970, April, '70.

Q: It was May or April.

WEINGARTEN: April, yes.

Q: April, '70.

WEINGARTEN: So then I said, well, I'll get out of here in June and we'll go back through Europe for a month or so and then I'll come back to Washington. Well, I had my orders to depart, but because it's a military outfit they wouldn't let me go until my replacement turned up, so that caused a little strain. I went to John Paul Vann and I said, "I've got my orders and I'm supposed to get out of here. I've been here two years." I was getting a little antsy, and because by that time we'd gone through what seemed like three different sets of military advisors and they all were able to get out when their time came up... So I had to wait and finally got a replacement. At the replacement, I threw my stuff in a box, put it in the back of a Scout and left for Saigon.

Q: Well, I take it your wife was where, was she in Bangkok?

WEINGARTEN: No, she was in the Philippines.

Q: In the Philippines. Were you ever under attack, or not, there?

WEINGARTEN: In Vietnam?

'Q: Yes.

WEINGARTEN: Oh, yes, yes. It was pretty mild stuff. There were mortar attacks basically. We got mortared fairly frequently, and we got ambushed once, and I still like to tell that story of our ambush, and I had to get out of the Scout and jump into the rice paddy, which is not such a benign place to jump into if the rice paddy is just full of human waste basically, and fired back. And then we got out of there. There was a truck in front of us with a .50 caliber machine gun, and somebody got up and was working that. And we got about a mile down the road and there was some kind of officer - a U.S. Ranger officer - and we were kind of dirty and a little bit shaken. He gave us each a beer, a cold Budweiser. This was probably at 11 in the morning. And I lit up - I smoked at the time - I lit up a Marlboro and took a drag on that, and I swear to God, the smoke went all the way down to my toes and back up - the best drag I've ever had on a cigarette - and the beer tasted as good as anything I've ever had - better. I guess at the time the greatest fear I had was driving down a road that was on a berm. I could see far enough ahead. There was a roadblock, and the guys on the roadblock, I couldn't see what kind of weapons they had, but I could see the weapons had banana clips, which was a feature of the AK-47, and I thought, I'm done for. So I had the M-16, had that loaded, cocked, and I was going to drive on and see if I could drive on through. And it turned out they were our people, our Vietnamese, who had welded or soldered the magazine so it wasn't a square magazine, but a banana clip on the M-16. That was a big relief. So anyway, we left.

Q: I'm trying to portray this life. I mean, here were a bunch of essentially civilian diplomats out driving jeeps in very dangerous country.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, but it was interesting times, anyway.

Q: Were you getting some of the new officers? You were getting young Foreign Service officers coming in, weren't you? I've often thought, you know, we were getting some of these guys had been protesting or demonstrating in the streets in the United States against the war six months before, and then they went to be nice cushy diplomats and the next thing they know they were in My Tho or some other place like that driving around. What was the spirit, morale, or whatever you'd like to talk about?

WEINGARTEN: I don't recall that we ever got anybody down there. Howard Gross and I were the only Foreign Service officers in My Tho. Then we had one guy also a Foreign Service officer down the road in Vinit Kiem, and then everybody else was an AID officer. And it was an AID Foreign Service reserve, but I never ran into anybody who thought, My God, no, I went into the diplomatic service and here I am. And the Foreign Service officers up at the embassy always struck me as pretty dedicated to the effort. So I never ran into anybody like that.

Q: You mentioned Howard Gross. Howard took me on a tour of his bridges. I remember this. I came from the embassy to My Tho, and Howard and I had served together in Yugoslavia. We probably met at that point, but Howard took me out to see his bridges. He was very proud of these. I was very antsy because I was a Saigon type, and I hadn't been out in the-

WEINGARTEN: He called them his bridges, Howard did?

Q: Well, I know, his bridges - I mean I just remember he took me to bridges.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, those were my bridges.

Q: Oh, they were your bridges. Well, he took me to bridges.

WEINGARTEN: Okay.

Q: And showing me.

WEINGARTEN: Well, I used to have the exact opposite impression. I was more at ease in the country than I was in Saigon. I'd get up to Saigon and have the feeling of being a country boy in a very big and bustling city. I didn't know my way around, and I didn't like it very much. And I'd go to the embassy or go to AID headquarters and think, what am I doing here? What are these guys doing here? You remember that AID complex? They had guys there that I don't think knew what they were doing. They'd come down every once in a while to My Tho, which was close in, and want to take a look at a village. It might be the chief of the Village Development Division of AID. You know, "That's a village, eh. That's what it looks like." But they were interesting times.

Q: Well, when you left there in 1970, how did you feel things were going? Whither Vietnam in your opinion at that time?

WEINGARTEN: I was pretty confident that we had turned the tables on the war, that the Vietcong had hurt themselves tremendously in 1968, and many of their cadres had been killed in this tremendous uprising. The Vietnamese Army never looked particularly good, but at least it looked as if it was big enough, heavy enough that it couldn't be overturned, and it seemed to be there was more peace in the Delta most of the time. Some exceptions where they'd have a hard-core Vietcong or NVA battalion would come through, and they were very, very tough and very difficult to... They could really inflict damage on our local troops. The consequence was that we would have to have South Vietnam Marines or Airborne or Rangers down to match them. And we were the first, the Delta was the first part of Vietnam from which our troops were withdrawn, beginning in '69, and so it was a sort of a cockpit of Vietnamization. And it really seemed as though things were going pretty well. I left there and figured I'd never have to go back.

Q: What about corruption? How did you feel about that, or what did you observe?

WEINGARTEN: Oh, yes, there certainly was corruption, but it didn't affect... It was really pretty much a Vietnamese thing, Vietnamese demanding money from other Vietnamese. But we would... There were things we didn't know. We didn't know, for example, why the budget had been proclaimed up in Saigon and yet our province didn't have its budget for months and months and months. As it turned out, it was either being lent out along the way at exorbitant interest rates or it was being ripped off. But where I was the corruption didn't seem to be all that much. I mean it was not... This was really out in the country, out in the sticks, and we didn't seem to have as much there. Now I guess up in Saigon you must have had a good deal of it. It must have been endemic, but I never had the impression that it was really affecting daily operations.

Q: What did you want to do, and how did you want to sort of direct yourself when you were getting out in 1970?

WEINGARTEN: Well, Howard had told me a lot about Yugoslavia, and I wanted to get back to Europe, so about that time, sometime in early '70, John Burns, the director general of the Foreign Service came out, and he saw everybody.

Q: I remember that trip.

WEINGARTEN: He came down to this little room I was in, and he said, "Well, where would you like to go after Vietnam, after your tour here?" And I thought, Wow, that's a pretty nice offer. And I said, "Tell me, where do you have me pegged to go now?" And he had a guy with him, and he asked the guy, and the guy says, "Indonesian language training." And I said, "I'd much prefer to go back to Europe." At that time, I had thought that I had done my overseas service. And I thought, well, one of the ways I can beat the rule that requires domestic service is to go back for hard language training and then go back overseas. And only years and years later - I think you'll like this - I discovered that as far as the State Department was concerned, service in Vietnam counted as domestic service.

JAMES J. GORMLEY
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Da Nang (1968-1970)

James J. Gormley was born in New York in 1932. He entered the Foreign Service in 1964 and served in Mexico, Thailand, Paraguay, Vietnam, and various assignments in Washington, DC. He was interviewed in 1992 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: After that you came back to Washington?

GORMLEY: Well from Mérida I was assigned, got orders to go to Vietnam, which I did not welcome.

Q: Were you married at the time?

GORMLEY: No.

Q: Did you get some training before you went to Vietnam?

GORMLEY: Yes, I got a whole year at FSI.

Q: What did the training consist of and what did they tell you you were going to be doing?

GORMLEY: The bulk of the group was assigned to CORDS, there may have been one or two persons who were going to work at the Embassy but most of us were all going to CORDS. CORDS wasn't that old an organization by that time, although it was a successor to another alphabet organization, OCO I believe. We were all being prepared for rural development. The language course was good, not all of FSI's language courses are good, and I thought the area studies component was quite thorough, quite good.

Q: Here you were taking training for a year, this would be 1967, 1968?

GORMLEY: Starting in about August of 1967 and ending July 1968.

Q: Tet was when?

GORMLEY: Tet was January of 1968.

Q: What was your feeling and the feeling of your colleagues about going to Vietnam at the time and our involvement there?

GORMLEY: Very few of us had volunteered for it, as a matter of fact I suppose the bulk of the class was a junior officer pool going on their first tour. I think a lot of them when admitted into the Foreign Service had had to preagree to go to Vietnam, so there wasn't much enthusiasm for the idea of going there. I think virtually everyone in general approved of the main thrust of the policy; you could disagree with a tremendous amount of the execution but there was no one in the group who I recall who actually thought that the major thrust of this was wrong. Everybody thought it was right.

Q: What about the area studies, were you getting people coming back talking to you with enthusiasm about what was going on?

GORMLEY: Again, here you get to the point of execution. So much of what the administration was doing in there was kidding itself and so much of what we were getting very often was propaganda and what we thought were lies. You could not believe most of what we were getting, unfortunately.

Q: What type of thing -- because I am trying to recreate the spirit of the times -- when you say getting lies, at that point struck you as not being correct?

GORMLEY: Now we are going back to a long time ago.

Q: Oh, I know, I understand, and this is hard.

GORMLEY: I wish I could recreate it. I remember -- let me start with some random things and maybe I will make some coherence out of it, although I doubt it. I remember one time we were being instructed or getting something from some Army people on interrogation etc., etc., and this guy was basically approving the use of torture. I remember one of our group who was a lawyer got up and said, "But isn't this all in violation of due process?" At the time all of us tough minded types laughed and said, "So what." But in retrospect I think that was one of the leading questions of the course; the United States cannot operate that way. That is one of the people I still see, I was just talking to him the other day on the phone.

Q: Who was this?

GORMLEY: His name is Harry Quillian. He wasn't in the Foreign Service very long. It was his second or third tour and he was assigned to the consulate in Da Nang instead of to CORDS. He was very opposed to the Vietnam war and was my roommate for a very short time in Da Nang. He had gone over a short time before I got there and he said when he was leaving for what was purportedly leave that he wouldn't be back and he quit the Foreign Service. A person who I have a great deal of respect for.

Q: How did you find the military? I suppose it was a mixed course with military with you?

GORMLEY: No, not in the language and area courses; they would be participating as trainers and we had to go down to Fort Bragg upon one occasion to the Green Beret school. And there were military on the staff, but there were no military in the course.

Q: Well here you were, a boy from Queens, you're not a country boy and you are going out for rural development. What were they trying to teach you, what were you going to bring to Vietnam?

GORMLEY: They did a lot of very elementary things; we weren't going to dig out any wells but as it happened I ended up in a city, in Da Nang where I didn't have to worry -- well there were rural areas even in Da Nang. The idea was more to influence and report on what the Vietnamese were doing and to see that there was some connection between what the policy was and what was happening down to a very low level of governmental unit in Vietnam, the district.

Q: What was your feeling in going to Da Nang? What was your feeling about -- this was the time of the great anti-war protests on the college campuses -- these and were they having any repercussions in your training ranks?

GORMLEY: Actually there weren't many great anti-war demonstrations in 1967, 1968. I think Tet really began it. Up until then, I think most people thought that we were winning. General Westmoreland had come back about November of 1967 and talked about how everything was going our way and we were going to wrap this up in a year or so. It was a time of great upheaval but it was not upheaval caused by anti-war sentiment. The assassination of King was during that time and you stood on your balcony in Arlington and watched the fires in Washington; you went into Washington and even on Connecticut Avenue you had troops.

Q: I recall on Wisconsin Avenue seeing the 82nd Airborne with flak jackets walking up and down the streets. I never will forget it.

GORMLEY: So there was plenty of upheaval but at that point it hadn't focused on the war.

Q: It was more race.

GORMLEY: Race and the whole Berkeley thing I think had started in about 1965.

Q: At the University of California.

GORMLEY: And there were the race riots in Watts in 1965. So there was a great amount of upheaval but it wasn't focused on the war during the time we were in training.

Q: Then you went out in the summer of 1968 to Vietnam?

GORMLEY: Right. Oh, I might mention that the group was really upset by Tet in the same way that the American people were. I was very emotional about it. I remember somebody was staying with me, I had a little tiny apartment in Arlington, and it was Saturday morning and I turned on the radio -- I had no television in those days. The reader of the news was reporting the Tet attack, obviously not understanding himself the significance of it, and he started reeling off where attacks had taken place. This person was a Mexican and she didn't speak English and she asked what was the matter. I said, "They've attacked every fucking city in Vietnam." We were furious and the staff was shattered. Of course, one of their contentions was, once they had recovered their balance, that the Viet Cong had shot its wad -- which was correct -- but we didn't appreciate that at the time.

Q: You had been told that here was a place where things were really under control and yet all these places supposedly under control had had significant fighting.

GORMLEY: And there were symbolic things like the Viet Cong getting into the Embassy and the taking of Hue -- it was ferocious to try to get that back.

Q: Then you went over when?

GORMLEY: We probably had some leave because I think we had a week in Taiwan before we went to Vietnam and that week was basically to see the work of the Joint Committee on Rural Reconstruction that had occurred in Taiwan. We got sort of a Potemkin village tour of Taiwan which was very impressive. I visited in Taiwan last year too and that was a lot more impressive.

Q: So you got out to...

GORMLEY: We didn't know where we were assigned until we got to Saigon. I learned later that they had been thinking of putting me into the Embassy-USAID joint economic section, which they did not do. They sent me up to Da Nang.

Q: So you were up in Da Nang at about what time?

GORMLEY: I would have gotten there in September of 1968 and I stayed through February of 1970.

Q: What was the situation in Da Nang while you were there?

GORMLEY: As far as security went we were under a pretty constant threat of rocket attacks. Not the area I was in because it was mostly aimed at the airport which was to the south of us. You got so that you just slept through these rocket attacks; you didn't even hear them, except on one occasion when they decided to change their target and they hit -- we were right on the river -- a boat carrying fuel right near. That got me out of bed!

Q: When I was in Saigon a little later, you would turn on the radio in the morning and hear where the rockets fell, in what district, and it was like the weather report. If it wasn't your district or the Embassy's district, you know -- isn't that interesting.

GORMLEY: I remember staying in a hotel near the central market in Saigon when the central market was hit by rockets. It was interesting.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

GORMLEY: I was the deputy to the senior advisor for the city and our problems were city administration and refugees. Da Nang had been before the war, say in the last days of the French period, say 1939 or 1940, a very pretty little city of about twenty-five thousand people. There were about 250,000 or 300,000 people living in Da Nang when I was there, a lot of them in very squalid refugee camps. One of our projects was the relocation of refugees into more decent housing. The other was just improving city services. We had a very, very great resource in the city, the Seabees.

Q: The construction battalions of the Navy.

GORMLEY: Right. And they had a strong commitment to civic action. We had a committee, the mayor, the head of the navy civic action group, and ourselves. We did an awful lot of work on small building projects, road projects, that were very positive.

Q: How did you deal with the Vietnamese officials? What was your impression of them and how successful were you in working with them?

GORMLEY: There were two mayors when I was there. The first one was a man whom nobody much liked, who had a reputation for being corrupt. I remember his name, Le Chi Cuong. He was assigned as province chief in one of the delta provinces shortly after I got there. Very amusing man though; at his farewell there were tears in his eyes and no one else's. Every Vietnamese in that room was saying, "God I'm glad to see you go, you bastard." He was followed by -- of course all the people who headed provinces were military men -- a colonel who had been head of Diem's palace guard, a Catholic, who, as a matter of fact, had to plead for his life back in 1963 and had succeeded in staying alive and was hustled off to some inconsequential posts in the highlands. Of course Thieu was in power now and this group was back in favor. He was then assigned as mayor in Da Nang. He was very personable and I found him a man very easy to work with. I still kept contact with him on my second tour in Vietnam in 1974. Of course his counterpart was my boss, the senior advisor, but I had a lot of direct contact with him and I felt very flattered when I left. He had a custom for departing Americans of having a dinner for them in City Hall. The mayor had the best chef in Da Nang. When I left he had my farewell at his house which I thought was quite a compliment. With the mayor I always spoke English because the mayor spoke better English than I spoke Vietnamese. The deputy mayor, who in all the provinces was a civilian and usually a graduate of the public administration academy and much younger than the general run of colonels who headed provinces, and I got to be very friendly. He was a very decent man and with him I always spoke Vietnamese because he spoke no English.

Q: How did we work with the Vietnamese? You were trying to resettle refugees for one thing and work on city services, but what was our role?

GORMLEY: In large part we were intermediaries between the city and those in the U.S. military who had resources. But also by the fact that we did control access to resources we could also have a say in what was to be done. I remember that sometimes this was not so well handled. My first boss in Da Nang was a total incompetent; he was a USAID type hired especially for the Vietnam program whose forte had been public recreation; he was allegedly a city manager though I could never determine any city that he had ever managed. He was totally unable to operate in an Asian context. He had, on a specific refugee relocation program, this grandiose idea for more or less Texas style public housing, which was insane -- there was no money for it, there was no way of doing it -- he was pushing this. The mayor wanted a much more modest thing where mainly we would provide the materials and the people would build their own houses in a certain area which he had selected, which was in a sensible place. Upon one occasion the mayor was briefing on his ideas and my boss was challenging him. Of course he challenged him in English. The mayor completely ignored him, didn't even respond to what he had said. We had on our staff a number of young draftees who because of graduate degrees in various things were lucky enough to not be sent to get shot and were sent to our staff. One of them was a young guy with a degree in architecture, really a terrific, smart young man; of course he was only a corporal and the Vietnamese are extremely rank conscious, for that reason all our people always wore civilian clothes although the mayor knew the guy was only a corporal. After ignoring my boss this young corporal raised certain objections to the mayor's plans and the mayor defended it, showed why he believed this and that; it was such a put-down of my boss it was tremendous.

So our relations were mixed. Some of the Americans were pretty poor at any kind of relations with the Vietnamese.

Q: This is one of the things that all of us who served there as Foreign Service officers thought -- God, what are we doing, after all these people have been around for a long time and in many ways know how to do things better. We sort of came in there like a bull elephant.

GORMLEY: Very often, as in that specific case, we would have our own more grandiose ideas and not really listen to people. In the end we did because we got rid of my boss, partly with my machinations, and we got a new senior advisor. The mayor's plan went through and we supported it and it was very successful.

Q: What about the problem of corruption? I Corps, which Da Nang was in, had a general who as I recall was renowned for having warehouses full of his things -- I think at that time, I may be wrong on this.

GORMLEY: Well certainly General Lam had a very unsavory reputation. He was still commander up until the time...I believe he was dismissed after the Lam Son operation, the invasion of Laos. But he was still corps commander up until that time. He was a political general, a businessman more than anything else. There was no one there who showed him much respect except for the Marine general who was his counterpart. No one took him seriously as a military man.

Q: What about the problem of corruption? What were your instructions dealing with corruption?

GORMLEY: I am not sure we ever had instructions. Obviously we were to report anything that we saw that was untoward. What I believed in doing was working with the Vietnamese officials who you thought were honest until proven otherwise and cutting off those you didn't. There was, I thought, very little corruption in terms of diversion of materials or that kind of thing. A lot of money was made by those who glommed on to Americans for things like renting property and they were usually pretty unsavory types. I know the leading landlord in Da Nang was a woman who owned seemingly almost everything in town that the Americans rented; she was a lady bountiful to the American colonels in town, she set a great table. I was invited to her house twice until she figured out that I wasn't going to do her any good. When you speak of corruption, there was an awful lot of corruption, in a real sense, of Americans there, both of abusing our control of resources and of living awfully well in a time when other people are living pretty badly.

Q: I agree, it is disquieting. What was your impression of USAID as an operation in the unique situation there -- wartime, sky's the limit type of thing.

GORMLEY: Of course so many of the people were hired specifically for Vietnam and had very little experience with USAID before that, so they were there to fill out this enormous organization that was built up. Some of them went by the book as far as how to do economic development in the country and it was totally irrelevant to what we were about. There were plenty of good people. Certainly the USAID officer in charge, he was called deputy for CORDS, that was the head civilian in our corps, deputy to the commanding general of the Marines up there. When I went there it was an FSO, Charlie Cross, who later became Ambassador to Singapore, and, I believe, to Taiwan at one time though I don't know whether we still had an Embassy in Taiwan. Cross really was not engaged, he just sort of coasted hoping that no one would notice how things were going up there. So you shouldn't report much, just report enough to keep everybody off our backs -- until I manage to complete my tour and get the fuck out of here and get an Embassy job. His successor was a USAID type who since has died, his name was Alexander Firfer. He was flamboyant and he was active, and in general shook things up. I thought he was a much more vital presence than Cross had ever been; he was erratic, he was cold to most people, his nickname was "mad Alex." I think he was a vital force.

Q: What about relations with the military? Da Nang was under a Marine officer, wasn't it?

GORMLEY: Yes. The U.S. commander for I Corps was the commander of the III Marine Amphibious Force. I guess General Walt had had that job previously and when I was there it was a guy named General Nickerson. Nickerson was sort of a Pattonesque type, at least in his own mind.

Q: A couple of revolvers?

GORMLEY: Yes. He certainly could not tolerate talk of corruption about General Lam and he certainly tried to stifle that. Another taboo which we never could criticize was the Korean Marines; again this one wasn't directly concerning us, the people in Da Nang, because we didn't have the responsibility for monitoring General Lam or the marines. The Korean Marines could never be criticized.

Q: They were basically an inert force, weren't they?

GORMLEY: They were super at making sure that they got their share of PX goods and they certainly held their own bases very strongly and terrorized the Vietnamese around them, but that was about it. They were above criticism as far as Nickerson was concerned. They were our great Korean allies.

Q: What I am getting from you is that there was at the top a lot of going along with the situation and not trying to analyze what was happening and setting up concerns.

GORMLEY: As for the big picture, by early in his administration Nixon was beginning the troop pull down and I think at that point the North Vietnamese, very wisely, said well they're getting out and we will not push for a while. So after the end of those mini-offensives that followed Tet in 1968 things were really pretty calm for the rest of the time I was in Vietnam. Oh there was the general low level of guerilla attacks, the rockets, but there was no great battle fought. I think that they very wisely thought that as long as Nixon was under pressure to pull out American troops it was in their interest not to interfere with that. I know Firfer claimed that the low level of activity in I corps was proof that we were winning the war but I held that it was proof that the war was lost, that we were getting out and once out we would never be back. Obviously the people who were here and whose whole aim was uniting their country would succeed; they had the will and we didn't. I said that to the mayor the first time I talked with him; I think I was the first American official who told him that "You can't rely on us." He was a little stunned but it turned out to be right.

Q: Did you have any dealings with our consulate there?

GORMLEY: Mostly just on a social basis. I would write up biographical material on officials I was dealing with but it was mostly social. There was a good friend, Don Westmore, and I liked Terry a lot, Terry McNamara; those were the two that were in the consulate that I...Jim Mack came for a little bit late in my tour. They were all good people.

Q: You left there when?

GORMLEY: In February of 1970.

Q: Looking back at it at that time what did you feel, any accomplishments? How did you feel about it when you left?

GORMLEY: One, I never wanted to go in the first place. I still recall flying in and looking at the bomb craters in September of 1968 and saying, "Gormley, you ass hole. You had a year and a half to get out of this and you didn't do it." But when I was there it was the central event of the time and I felt excited to be a part of it. I never did anything that would violate my own conscience and never did anything that would cause me to lose sleep; I felt good about what I had done, even though I felt it was an absolute losing cause. It was a very positive experience; I liked the country and I liked the people.

Q: I must say this reflects somewhat my feeling. I was consul general in Saigon from 1969 to 1970, about eighteen months there. It was seeing the elephant, this was the big event of our time and I think I feel much better about having seen it rather than not. I certainly wouldn't want to go through it again; I liked the Vietnamese, wished them well. My concern was that I thought we got too much involved in everything and I was concerned about our staying power too. One last thing about this -- did you get any feel about what the CIA was doing there and their effect on all of this?

GORMLEY: I had very little contact with Agency people, although there was one whom I knew from the States who was in Saigon and whom I saw when I initially came to Vietnam. I forget whether I saw him again during my tour, maybe I did. He was the one who emphasized to me that thing that I emphasized to the mayor, you can't count on us. He was very pessimistic about our staying power. In Da Nang itself, Cross's deputy when I arrived was CIA, I even forget his name now. They were concerned with the Phoenix program.

Q: Which was basically the elimination, in polite terms, of the communist cadre.

GORMLEY: There was much less extermination in that than the peaceniks would have you believe, but yes, that was it. I did not have much contact with the Agency people, not that I can recall now; reading some of their material, that was about it.

Q: Then you came back for two years, into personnel, is that right?

EUGENE ROSENFELD
Chief of Mission, Press Center
Saigon (1968-1970)

Eugene Rosenfeld began his government service in the Census Bureau. When the 1940 Census was over, his background in journalism led him to a position in the Office of Emergency Management (later called OWI). He has also served in India, Tanzania, London, and Ethiopia. His interview was conducted by Jack O'Brien on November 28, 1989.

ROSENFELD: I had talked to Ambassador Bunker, who had not gone out there yet. I had talked to Harold Kaplan, who had just come back. This was before I went into treatment. Bunker said, "You had better get that thing taken care of before you can even think about going out there," which is, of course, what happened.

Meantime, I was temporarily assigned to IPS, in with Nat Glick, to get out the first issue of Dialogue magazine. I had edited and produced a similar intellectual quarterly in India when I was there. Nat had been working on Dialogue for about two years, so following orders from Tom Cannon, IPS' Number two, I nudged Glick and we managed to get it out fairly quickly, before I left for Saigon. We had some problems with the art department and with some other things, but it was a successful effort.

Once that was out of the way and I felt sufficiently well, I went off to Saigon.

Q: What was your assignment there?

ROSENFELD: I was to become Chief of the Mission Press Center. Barry Zorthian was the head of that whole operation at that time but was clearly about to phase out, because he had been there something like four years, I believe.

So the decision was made that I should handle the Mission Press Center and Ed Nickel would take over the JUSPAO operation, which was for the in-country program. The Mission Press Center had to deal with mainly foreign correspondents, although there was obviously some connection with the Vietnamese press which was not really a significant media operation at that time, but nonetheless it had to be paid attention to, even though it was largely government controlled.

We arrived, I think, two days after Tet 1968, of ill fame, and it sort of went downhill from there. It was not too long an assignment. I was there for about eight or nine months. It was not a happy one.

Zorthian was phasing out, supposedly in perhaps two or three months and as we were housemates I quickly got to know an awful lot of the press people, TV and so forth, but the overall situation became increasingly bad.

I think it hit its nadir when we all sat around my office waiting to hear the broadcast of President Johnson's speech, around the end of March, where he indicated that he was not going to run again for the presidency. Some people thought it was a good idea and some didn't. I was unhappy about it, not just from the psychological viewpoint, but it was one of the things that you had to live with and it intensified a very difficult and unhappy situation.

There were a lot of very good USIS people there, even though they came out for different reasons. Looking back on it now, maybe it wasn't as bad as I felt then, but at that time my reaction was that people volunteered to go to Vietnam because they figured if they didn't volunteer they were going to get sent anyway. You had to have it on your record and it was good to have on your record because it would lead presumably to promotion. I think that was one of the first reasons people went out there.

The second reason is that you got these special allowances and perks and things where you could go back every three or four months and where your family could be set up in Bangkok or in New Delhi or in the Philippines or whatever.

The third reason was that maybe you were having trouble at home with your wife and it was a good way to get away and not to worry about it since dependents couldn't come to Vietnam.

The fourth reason was that you really believed in what the U.S. was trying to do there. I am not trying to be a hero about this. I did believe and I did feel that USIA, our people had to participate, had to provide their skills and do their share. And as former newsmen you wanted in on the top story of the decade.

I did what I could. It was not a wildly successful effort on my part. I can remember one particular story, however, which I think may have had a little bit of effect on history.

The Mission Council was the top brass. It consisted of Ambassadors Bunker and Berger -- Sam Berger was the deputy ambassador -- Bill Colby was CIA station chief. General Westmoreland was the chief of the military assistance thing. Chester Cooper, I think, was the economics guy then. Don McDonald was the AID chief. Ed Nickel was on the Council where Barry had been from the beginning of his tour, I believe.

Barry was away, so I sat in for him at this one particular session. I sat in on maybe two or three MC meetings altogether. I felt this was a piece of history going on there and it was worthwhile remembering.

This was around the middle of April, 1968. Tet, as we know, was a very important turning point. This particular meeting climaxed with a report by General Westmoreland who was a brilliant briefer. This was the key group, the inside inside, in the inner sanctum when we had these meetings, protected in every possible way. The walls were covered with maps and charts of different battle areas.

Westmoreland got up to give his briefing -- it took him about twenty minutes to a half hour -- about what was going to happen. The intelligence that they had was that there was going to be an attack by the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong around the first of May and they were going to hit not the hundred-and-twenty-eight places that they hit at Tet but the, oh, maybe about five or ten key areas as another unexpected major assault. MACV had the full intelligence on NVA attack plans. The general did not say how his people had obtained it. It was generally known that they had captured a Colonel Dac and that he had given them a lot of information about this forthcoming attack and they were basing a lot of their planning, defense and counter-attack planning on this.

At the end of Westmoreland's briefing he said, "This is the way it is going to be and I don't want this to go one inch outside of this room. This is totally top secret at all times. Nobody is to know anything about this at all. You have got to hold this extremely tight." Everybody nodded except me.

I said (cautiously), "Well, it seems to me that, since while we may have had a military victory at Tet we suffered a very severe psychological defeat because people did not expect it and people did not think that they had this kind of strength. Therefore, I think it might be a good idea, that we give the press a briefing -- within limits -- about what was going to happen and bind them on it that they could not file anything until the action started." I was convinced that the press, while not totally reliable, was reliable enough so that if we threatened them with expulsion if they broke the confidence rule, they would play along.

Everybody around the room sort of looked at me aghast. Westmoreland turned to me and said, "Oh, I thought of that but I rejected it." I said, "Okay. I just think that it is a possibility that we might be able to do something to get a psychological edge at this stage of the game." End of meeting.

About three or four days later I got a call from General Sidle, who was Westmoreland's chief PR man, a wonderful guy, very good, who said, "Gene, why don't you get some of the guys together -- you know, five or six, you know the right guys, guys that we can trust."

I said, "What's up?" He said, "I can't tell you anything." I said, "Well, okay, when do you want to do it? Three o'clock? Three o'clock Wednesday, right?" He said, "That's fine."

So at three o'clock Wednesday some 35 guys I had asked to come to the meeting with Sidle were in the briefing room. Sidle was astounded when he saw this mob. He said, "What the hell are you doing?" I said, "I'm not sure what you plan to tell them, but it is a briefing, and if you are just going to tell five or six guys the others are going to get sore as hell, so you are going to have to bring them in on this thing one way or another. You might as well do it in one shot."

I had a pretty good idea of what he was going to talk about -- the upcoming "mini-Tet." His sanitized version of the Westmoreland briefing to the Mission Council was a first-class job on a very tight off-the-record, hold-for-release basis and nobody broke it. Everybody was aware of what was supposed to be happening. It turned out to occur almost exactly the way he had predicted and we scored quite a few points. It didn't change the course of the war but it was, in my view at least, a turn-around from a public relations standpoint, which is what I was there for and which is what JUSPAO and USIS were there for.

When it came time to leave, I said my goodbyes to Ambassador Bunker. I took the opportunity to ask him if he had had anything to do with General Westmoreland's mind-change about the mini-Tet briefing. Bunker looked sort of blank at that but when I refreshed his memory he said, "Oh, yes, I remember now. Yes, I urged Westy to do it." Frankly, I didn't believe him. Although Bunker was a man of towering integrity, I preferred to give Westmoreland the credit for having the good sense to follow my sterling advice!

CHARLES S. WHITEHOUSE
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Saigon (1968-1970)

Ambassador Charles S. Whitehouse was born in France of American parents in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service 1948 and served in Turkey, Cambodia, South Africa, Guinea, Vietnam and as ambassador to Laos and Thailand. He was interviewed by Roger Ernst in 1989.

WHITEHOUSE: The jobs Foreign Service officers had in CORDS, Vietnam, were really very unusual. I had about 1800 people working for me in the part of Vietnam called III Corps, which was the nine provinces surrounding Saigon. There were teams in every province and sub-teams in the districts which made up the provinces. Very often there would be a senior Foreign Service Officer, a Class-2 or 3 officer, in-charge or a colonel, or lieutenant colonel, as his deputy or vice versa. I worked for the three-star general who was the commander. He had a major-general as one deputy and me as the other. Our teams were going into the villages on intelligence, on refugees or police matters, on agriculture, on building roads and bridges, etc. These were very, very exciting management jobs. We were working in an atmosphere of constant crisis, but we had a remarkable degree of harmony between the military and the civilians. The best man in this field was Jean Paul Vann, who I succeeded in III Corps, Neil Sheehan has written a book called "Bright Shining Lie" about his life. I think all Foreign Service Officers who worked in CORDS, got a lot out of the experience because it was so much more challenging than working in an embassy anywhere in the world.

Q: Do you see some current or future applications of this type of inter-service interdisciplinary coordination now applying in a more peaceful world where the coordination between diverse conflicting political and economic interests is important.

WHITEHOUSE: I do. I think for example if you take Peru or Colombia, I think you could make a very persuasive case that the classic American structure of an American Embassy is not appropriate to the kinds of problems we confront there today. You have a major cocaine-growing problem there in the Upper Huallaga Valley and a very savage insurgency run by the Shining Path guerillas. I think that there should be a far more integrated up country operation than we have today. The classic elements can do their traditional work but at the same time you've got to have dynamic leadership given to activities that are up country and to the mechanics, the military trainers, narcotic agents, AID people, peace corps who work there. All of this has to be pulled together and treated as one effort. You can't have narcotic agents go off in their corner and do their thing, the military trainers go off in their corner and do their thing. It has to be, in my view, centralized and centrally directed and centrally supported. Your communications support, your food, your medical support and air support is all harmonized and centrally directed and shared among the interested agencies.

Q: I can see what you're saying.

WHITEHOUSE: It all has to be an integrated team effort and that is what we finally learned in Indochina. We did it differently in Vietnam than we did it Laos. But then in Laos you had an extraordinarily close-knit country team. The CIA station chief, AID director, and the senior military officer and I went around like an eight legged animal. We were in touch with each other every day, all day long. We had staff meetings every day and we all recognized that what one person did instantly influenced the programs of the others - there was no such thing as independent action.

Q: You didn't feel the separatism that existed and still exists I guess in the agencies in Washington. The field was unified or had the opportunity to have a common view and then could get its act together.

WHITEHOUSE: The lines to the field in Indochina had become so complicated because of the financing and the management arrangements that there was nobody in Washington who could keep it straight at all. Therefore we had a lot more autonomy in the field than people would have today.

In Laos, for example, there were two young men in Washington who were our desk officers. They didn't have a clue about the petroleum procurement problems that we faced, in 1974 and this office had all our activities. The AID people understood their programs and what they were funding and financing, but were only dimly aware of the degree to which military aircraft or military supported programs were in fact being used to support the refugee programs up country. You cannot have bookkeepers who will be able to say, this airplane is going up to landing site 219 and it's carrying bullets but it's going to come back with six refugee families and therefore the price per agency is so minor. You can't get into all that. We're one country and one government and I think we did remarkably well in Indochina in overcoming that kind of nonsense.

Q: I have to interject. I can hear Ambassador Bunker for whom I have the highest respect, saying to me, "Roger, what you need to think about is what is the national interest, not that of your agency. If we get the national interest right, your agency will be taken care of." You'll do the right thing. You're saying the same thing.

WHITEHOUSE: Yes, Ambassador Bunker felt very strongly that there was a clear national interest and this sort of interdepartmental nonsense was something that just got in the way. In Indochina the programs were vast, the amount of money being spent was huge, but the amount of authority given to field was happily sufficient so as not to have to push questions back and forth to Washington all of the time. Under my predecessors, Bill Sullivan and Mac Godley -- very, very good, arrangements had been made. I don't think I broke any new ground. I kept interdepartmental relationships that had been created before and in which everybody was very, very comfortable. It required, and I say this in all modesty, a good deal of personal leadership and vigor on the part of the ambassador to keep the lions on their perches and to keep them from scratching one another sometimes, but we had a very, very good group in Laos as we did in Vietnam. There are always situations in very large enterprises in which people do get a little cranky with each other, but in Laos, we really didn't.

Q: I really saw your approach in Bangkok, in Thailand. The country team was a very much unified operation, and I don't want to say, whoa to the person who fouled the nest and got out of step, but everyone knew in fact, that there was one representative of the president, that was yourself, and we all had to carry a national responsibility.

WHITEHOUSE: I think there is such a thing as operating style. I think it is important to deal right off the top of the deck with everybody and not take the AID mission director off in one corner and whisper something in his ear and then have a separate conversation that might be a little different with the CIA station chief, and saying something different with the senior military officer. I'm a great believer in staff meetings and everybody hearing what the other fellow has been told and having a chance to get his nickel in. I think that was one of the great flaws of Graham Martin, the man who succeeded Bunker in Vietnam. He was a great fellow for conspiratorial type relationships. He would say something to one fellow, and then to somebody else, and then don't tell so and so that I told you this. You create an immense web of complications operating that way, so I'm dead set against that.

GEORGE A. ANDERSON
Political-Military Affairs Officer
Saigon, (1968-1971)

Mr. Anderson was born in Nebraska and raised in Iowa. He was educated at the University of Missouri and the University of Copenhagen, Denmark. He also pursued studies in Brussels, Belgium. Entering the Foreign Service in 1957 Mr. Anderson had several assignments at the State Department in Washington, DC. His foreign posts include Copenhagen, Oslo, Saigon, Brussels and Vienna. During his career, Mr. Anderson became an expert in labor affairs, serving as Labor Officer and Labor Attaché at a number of these posts. He was interviewed by Don Kienzle in 1996.

Q: Should we turn to your next assignment?

ANDERSON: My next assignment was out of function, and out of the geographic area. That's when I went to Vietnam. I went there as Political-Military Affairs Officer for two years.

Q: You want to describe some of your activities there, since this tape will be available to a broader audience than just those interested in labor?

ANDERSON: I arrived there right after Tet, the first days of March 1968. The most interesting job I had... Well, at first I got into study of herbicides and warfare, and Dave Carpenter and I together did the definitive study on herbicides and warfare, as a result of which we concluded that a lot of it was totally ineffective and no longer of any use if it was effective, and we cut the program to less than a third of what it was. But by that time it had become a terrible political football in the U.S. And I worked on it for the rest of the time I was there as well as when I was on Laird staff, what they called the Vietnam Task Force, which was a little under-layer that dealt with and handled military/political aspects of Vietnamization there.

Q: Do you want to just to back up a bit and explain what the main issues were in the herbicides stuff?

ANDERSON: The herbicides were, of course, at that time dioxin and the agent orange. This was mainly a political issue as whether it was hurting the farmers and was it doing any good. The idea that there was dioxin in it was little known by anybody and it was not an issue. The issue was that there was drift involved and it was killing the forests, it was an environmental thing, and it was hurting the peasants, and so forth. So they were really concerned on the eco-system and what its effect was going to be. We had dropped over Vietnam at that point approximately over half of all the herbicides manufactured in the world. People know very little about what kind of herbicides were involved, they don't know the difference between orange, white and blue, they don't know the difference between the herbicide and desiccant, most of the paver that you hear out there talked about is totally uninformed. Coming from an agricultural area, and having been at that point the owner of farms, and my brothers and I used herbicides on farms that we'd bought together, I knew quite a bit about herbicides, but I learned an awfully lot more about it there. And we put out a book, it's about 3/4 of an inch thick, and it is the definite study.

Q: What was the title of the book?

ANDERSON: I just don't know whether it is "Herbicides in Vietnam" or what it is. I have a copy of it because it's been declassified, and I got myself a copy of it. At the time we came to the conclusion that only about a third of it was effective, and only for certain things. For the same things that it's effective in the U.S. Farmers had to put in their ditches, for example, to keep on noxious weeds and for visibility purposes at corners. They were using agent orange at that point, on all of the parklands in Washington, D.C., in the parkways three times a year. The entire state of Wisconsin, all the cow pastures, they were using agent orange on those; this is an herbicide, broadly, and the senator from there was a big complainer, but you couldn't buy a quart of milk that wasn't taken off of land that hadn't been sprayed with it.

Q: Was this Proxmire?

ANDERSON: No, the other one, I forget what his name was. No, not Proxmire, he never got involved in this fight. But anyway, we did cut it back. I handled all the politically touchy problems. For example, they had CS gas and whether you could use it or whether you couldn't, to flush people out of underground networks, or whether you should blow buildings apart was preferable to gassing them, using teargas; that's the only gas that was ever used. These kind of problems. Incursions into Cambodia, incursions into Laos, spraying rice lands in northern Laos, all of these problems, which kind of weapons you could use; all those were questions that came to my desk in Vietnam.

After that I had responsibility for approving every herbicide mission, so I had to determine if we would allow it or not, and where it was going to. We also in that study plotted every single herbicide drop in the country and all the aborts. So we knew where this had taken place. The only one that had a health-risk problem with it came to be agent orange, which was always; it's a herbicide that takes a minimum of six weeks before it starts to act. The idea that you go in and spray the troops with this while they are attacking is an absurdity. You sprayed six, eight weeks in advance of an operation. And very often they sprayed and then the leaves would drop; the cover was gone and you walk through there just like you walk through a bean field or corn field in the U.S. with broad leaf herbicide. No difference at all.

We handled all those things, but the most interesting aspect of the job for me otherwise was that I read all of the intelligence reports everyday. And I picked out what the ambassador saw about the military situation, so I got a very thorough view of what was going on militarily in Vietnam. We worked very closely with Mick Dee, I was in every province under attack several times; it was rather an interesting, to say the least, digression from labor.

Q: Did you volunteer to go?

ANDERSON: I volunteered to go, because we had more or less held the lid on the problems in Norway very well. We never had the trouble with the Norwegians that we did with the Swedes and the Danes. And partly that was because of our closer relationships and lot of the work that I did with the labor unions, and they were much better to deal with. But I really wanted to see what was going on out there. Having come into the tail end of the Korean war, here was a war going on that I had been talking about and looking at and I was interested in going out and seeing what was really going on. And I really did get to find out what was going on, and I do not think that definity of work has yet been written about Vietnam. I think practically everything is written from a totally biased point of view; one way or another, today either pro or con. I did that for two years, and when I came home, I really wanted to go to the Air Force Academy to teach. I needed a rest; my boss out there wouldn't give me a drop on my assignment of three months necessary because I was too important, and then he took a nine-month drop on his to become deputy chief of mission in another country in southeast Asia. And I was rather surprised that an FSO3, or I was a 4 then, was more important than an FSO1.

Q: Before we go into your next assignment, you want to backtrack and say what perspective you think should be contained in the definitive work on Vietnam?

ANDERSON: My view of the entire post-war period is that what we were in was something almost ideologically equivalent to the 30-years war in Europe. Vietnam was a single battle that we lost, in a war that we won. I do not believe that any event in the conflict between Soviet socialist command economy on the one hand, and the West and us on the other side can be looked at in isolation. Whether it involved Chile, or whether it involved Ghana, or whether it involved Vietnam, these were all part of a seamless web of conflict that was rooted in an ideological difference between the Soviet Union and eventually China, and us. Some of it was hot, some of it was cold, but there was always, constantly probing. It was done under the umbrella of a nuclear threat, which had never existed in a similar situation, which put a cap on how violent we allowed this conflict between the Soviet Union and the U.S. to take place. So that eventually with the fall of Russian communism and the Soviet Union, we won the war. But we have lost that battle. I think that trying to look at it in isolation as either right or wrong is totally inappropriate. Because in international affairs there is a dynamic that develops. As it did with Hitler prior to World War II, and as developed with the Soviet Union after the war, they probed, and they won some places; at points you have to check things.

You don't know - everything contributes to the dynamic, or inertia, one way or another; either in movement or in stopping something or preventing something from starting, so that what we really ought to look at now is step back from the entire post war period and recognize that we were in, of all of the four-five reasons that people have fought through the history of man, ideology is one of them. And the other is just trying to take what the other guy's got. Booty, or whatever you want to say. Sometimes it's merely for the idea of control, certainly Caesar, some of the things he did were that way. But all the way through the history of man there had been about four or five reasons why men fight, one of them was ideological, and this was an ideological war.

And, therefore, Vietnam had a role to play in that. And the fact that we didn't just let it collapse in '54 or in '59 or in '62 or in '65, or even as late as '70, because Allende came along later than that. And he very nearly turned Chile into a Cuban situation. He was within an ace of doing that, and I played a role in preventing that as a labor attaché, believe it or not. Which was quite fortuitous, nothing particular on my part, it was an accident of my being at that place at that time. Nobody really knows what would have happened, had Truman doctrine not been developed. And Greece gone, or if one of the Berlin things we had faded on. Or Korean thing we had not stood up for it.

All of these probes that were done one way or another, and they were not equally important; it depends whether you have live frontiers or not, you can tolerate Cuba for another 500 years probably because you don't have any live frontiers, but it would have been quite different if Chile were Cuba. There you would have live frontiers that change the whole equation. Anybody who has ever studied diplomatic history knows that live frontiers are a significant factor in diplomatic history and warfare. I think that we have to take a whole new perspective on it and recognize.. But people who were involved and wound up in it, they are completely blinded by their own personal experience, they are not able to step back and look at that in the context of the total conflict that existed, the struggle around the world between the Soviet Union and the command economy, the authoritarian form of government and the democratic market economies of the West. But we won the war with all but maybe a few notable institutions in the U.S. who still have a bent to think that there is still something better than a free-market way of ordering economy.

Q: If you had to step back on Vietnam, should we have been engaged the way we were?

ANDERSON: Yes. We went at it all wrong. It's much better if you are going to engage yourself, to engage yourself fully and get it over with quickly. Our people cannot tolerate a long, extended war, and will eventually turn against it. Where the British could put up with ten years of struggle in Malaysia and finally win it. Because it was in their nature to accept that. Our nature is to get the war over with, and go back to doing what we were doing. And we have totally different, and we are not patient. And we won the war several times, and we lost it several times. Until eventually, whether we won it or lost it, by other events elsewhere, it became irrelevant.

But had it gone communist early on, then what would have happened to Malaysia, what would have happened to Thailand, what would have happened in other areas, that's part of the dynamic that was checked. As I said in that study I did a long time ago, you put your fingers in the dike and hold long enough, the Soviet Union was going to come apart. Yugoslavia was going to come apart. Nigeria was going to and still will come apart yet. India may eventually very well come apart. I don't think South Africa can survive as a unitary state; not without serious bloodshed. I don't know how, blacks against blacks, whites against others; we tend to lump all the blacks in as a unit, we don't do that with the Europeans. We recognize the difference between a Norwegian, a Swede and a Dane for God's sakes, but we don't notice the difference between the Bantu or Zulu, and that they can somehow get over this... Look at what happens in Nairobi, Kenya, or what went on in Congo, or what went on in Rwanda, Burundi, or what's the other one where Idi Amin was...?

LAWRENCE J. HALL
Deputy Director, JUSPAO
Saigon (1968-1972)

Lawrence J. Hall was born in Jersey City in 1920. He attended both New York University and the University of Wisconsin. He began his career in journalism in Twins Falls, Idaho, with The Twin Falls Times-News. His writing took him to Paris, where he worked for the International News Service. It was in Paris that he developed an interest in international affairs. He applied and received a job with the Economic Cooperation Administration (The Marshall Plan) as an assistant writer/editor. He also served in Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, India, and Morocco. He was interviewed by Hans Tuch on August 23, 1988.

Q: Things may have even gone downhill from there when you went to Vietnam in 1968 and spent two years in Vietnam. What was your job there?

HALL: I was the Deputy Director of JUSPAO (Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office) and for a great deal of the time I was the acting director, since Ed Nickel was frequently away.

Q: This was during Ed Nickel's time?

HALL: Yes, I volunteered for Vietnam. Alan Carter said I could stay on the job in Iran as long as I wanted to, but I wanted to be out from under his thumb, for one thing, and I also had had no war experience of my own and while this looked like a sad case for a war, I decided I should know first hand what war was like.

I told Dan Oleksiw, who was the area director for the Far East and an old friend of mine, that I would go out there but I would only do it if Ed Nickel completely consented and wanted me there.

Dan lied to me, as he is sometimes wont to do, so Ed Nickel was rather chagrined that he had to let go of Keith Adamson in order for me to take the job. I got along very well with Ed because he had a high regard for tight administration and operation and so did I. He also, once he got to trust me, let me have a free hand in doing pretty much what I wanted to do as long as I kept him informed.

He played the role of keeping the liaison with the embassy, with the mission council, of which he was a member, and the top brass in the military command.

Q: JUSPAO at that time was a very controversial, well, a huge operation and also controversial in terms of USIA. What were your views about our mission there and our job at that particular period?

HALL: Our mission there, of course, was to do whatever we could to try to make the world look with sympathy on our conduct of the war and the fact that we were there at all, an impossible task. We tried to do this in many ways, one of which was providing material for Washington to give to the media. The U.S. official contact with the press in Vietnam was a whole separate operation which was not under JUSPAO's purview at that time.

Q: With the international press?

HALL: There was no other press to speak of since local media was under tight control. We had one project which was hosting visits by PAOs from all over who came in groups for a one-week orientation.

Q: I was one of those.

HALL: You were one of those?

Q: I think shortly before you got there.

HALL: Yes.

Q: JUSPAO at that time also was really doing the information work for the Vietnamese?

HALL: That is right. Not to the degree that it had been handled in the immediate past, but yes, in terms of psychological warfare operations which we were doing directly with their military PSYOPS (Psychological Operations) programs.

We were also doing our own classified PSYOPS programs, as well, creating the leaflets that we dropped over not only Vietnam but Laos as well.

Q: Were our efforts, in your own personal view, I would say they were honorable, but were they worthwhile?

HALL: To a small degree, but then I think all of public diplomacy only weighs in the final balance of support for foreign policy to a small degree. I think it is a legitimate operation even when you measure it in percentages that might range from two to fifteen or twenty.

I do not believe public diplomacy -- with certain narrow, very narrow exceptions -- is a telling portion of the American government's effort to promulgate special aspects of foreign policy. It supplements negotiation of policy, perhaps creating a more receptive public attitude for it.

Q: Certainly not in an area where we were so involved with arms with the military, I mean, where possibly I would think maybe public diplomacy has a bigger chance of making a more substantial contribution to our foreign policy process where we are not involved militarily or where we have a relationship that enables us to have an impact on the population in a democratic society or in a developing society.

Would you agree with that?

HALL: Yes, if you define foreign policy very broadly. If you define it narrowly, no. It is a very difficult thing to do, with or without public diplomacy, to change public attitude to favor a specific aspect of foreign policy. Therefore, it is very difficult for public diplomacy to have more than a marginal effect in such cases.

Q: You said earlier that the relationship, the operation with the international press and with the American press was handled separately.

Who did that? Was it also a USIS operation or was it completely outside of the USIS purview?

HALL: In about 1968 -- I maybe wrong on the exact date -- the then Associated Press correspondent in Saigon found that he was being briefed on the war from the American side by a USIA officer and he asked his organization to protest that, since he felt the function of USIS was to propagandize. He felt that it was the wrong thing for us to be doing.

Q: Who was that?

HALL: I think it was Peter Arnett, the Australian who did such outstanding coverage of the war for AP. I am sure he had a lot of support from other American newsmen. In any case, it was analyzed back here, I guess by the White House and State Department, and they decided there would have to be a cut-out.

So, a foreign service officer was named as the head of the briefing section. I am not sure what the term was. He was appointed to the embassy staff under the Deputy Ambassador, given a little box there, and his assistant was the USIS officer who did the briefings, just as he had done before. But now he was seconded to the State Department.

Q: Was this part of the 5:00 o'clock follies?

HALL: Yes. I think it had been the 5:00 o'clock follies even before, but that is right. There was always a military briefing and a civilian briefing.

Q: So, the deputy to the then spokesman was a USIS officer and he was the one who did the briefing.

HALL: Who did the briefing and who continued to do the briefing -- Gene Rosenfeld at that time.

Q: Oh, Gene, of course, yes.

HALL: Then he was succeeded by our Vatican expert, from the Herald Tribune, who wrote a book on the Supreme Court.

Q: McGurn?

HALL: Yes. He was succeeded by Barrett McGurn. Before him, there were several.

Q: Rappaport?

HALL: Rappaport was an assistant. There were more than one press assistant who was USIA people, but that was, in effect, outside of JUSPAO, except for administrative support.

Q: You said earlier that you received visits regularly from PAOs from other countries, I being one of them on a USIA program to acquaint PAOs from other countries with what we were doing in Vietnam. I came from Berlin at that time.

That was an effort on USIA's part to get our own officers propagandized, so to speak, to be able to halfway intelligently try to explain our policies in their own home countries.

HALL: You remind me that after I was back in the Agency about 1970, maybe the middle of 1970, there was a PAO meeting held in Brussels for European PAOs, attended by Frank Shakespeare and by Frank Shakespeare's press spokesman, Frank Gavin. Do you remember Frank Gavin?

Q: Right.

HALL: Frank Gavin was a very -- I was going to say right wing, but very conservative person, even more conservative, I think, than Frank Shakespeare.

Q: Which is difficult.

HALL: Exactly. During that meeting -- oh, Bruce Herschensohn also attended that meeting and he was also very conservative.

Q: Oh, yes, I remember that.

HALL: At that meeting, Gavin was given the floor and he berated all those stalwart PAOs for their inability to convince the world -- in this case, Western Europe -- that our cause was just and that we were fighting the good war, to get them on as allies.

He went so far as to say, "I think when this is over, there should be an investigation, a Congressional or a high level investigation of you people to find out why you didn't do your job" or words to that effect.

Q: I remember that.

HALL: He almost implied a conspiracy.

Q: I remember that. I came from Berlin. I was PAO in Berlin at that time. I was quite upset about that, I remember, because I remember I had spent three years in Moscow, two years in Sofia, and now had been in Berlin for two or three years, and I really felt that I knew what the program was.

HALL: Two of us denounced him at that meeting. I asked for the opportunity because I had been most recently in Saigon working there and after I was finished cutting him up, Pat Van Delden stood up and gave him hell.

Q: She was able to do that, yes.

HALL: She was a lovely woman.

Q: In 1972, you retired.

HALL: Right. At that time, I was bored with being head of research, which in a way is an impossible element. Henry Loomis refused to give me a field job, at least immediately, and I had the necessary twenty years to retire.

THERESA A. TULL
Political Officer
Saigon (1968-1970)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1970-1972)

Theresa A. Tull was born in New Jersey in 1936. She received her bachelor's degree from the University of Maryland in 1972. Her career included positions in Brussels, Vietnam, Washington D.C., Philippines, Laos, and ambassadorships to Guyana and Brunei. Ambassador Tull was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November 2004.

Q: Before we get to that even though it was a short period, what were you getting, was there a sort of a sizable group that was going out in the training process when you were back in Washington getting ready? Was there a real program to get people to Vietnam?

TULL: Oh, very large numbers of students. The CORDS program, I forget what the acronym stands for, Civil Operations Rural Development or something like that. They were getting a lot of people military as well as Foreign Service, AID people, USIA to learn Vietnamese and they would go out and they would be staffing embassy offices in each of the provinces of South Vietnam. We'd have a CORDS office in each of those provinces and maybe it even had suboffices in the smaller administrative units within the province itself. There might have been other small offices. There were a lot of people taking Vietnamese language in 1967. Not all were taking 44 weeks. Some of them were taking shorter periods, but most of the Foreign Service people were taking it for 44 weeks.

Q: Was there a cadre within those going out there of junior officers like yourself and all who were dubious about this, or were they enthusiastic about this, were they opposed to the war? Did you get any feel, was there any sort of movement going on?

TULL: I got no feeling of that whatsoever. The people that I studied with and ended up working with over there for almost three years in Saigon, I think they were like me. They viewed Vietnam as the hot issue of our time for the U.S. government. It was exciting to be involved with it. I didn't detect any sense that we shouldn't have been involved. Most of the Foreign Service people I met were willing, maybe even volunteered, but were definitely willing to go. Probably that might not have been the uniform case of say older officers who were sent over, I don't know, but this group that I went with, most of whom either ended up in the embassy or at provincial offices were junior officers, or, were one or two promotions up from junior officer. There was not a lot of feeling of what a waste this is. What am I doing to my career? This is a total waste. No, let's get over there. This is the exciting issue of our day. I guess this is probably a similar sentiment that a lot of our Foreign Service people might feel today about volunteering to go to Iraq, God bless them.

Q: Yes. Well, when you got there, I mean this is before the Tet Offensive, how was the situation explained to you and all when you got there? What were you doing?

TULL: I was assigned to the internal affairs unit of the political section. We had a very large political section. There were close to 20 officers. I believe that might have included the political officers who were assigned to each of the four military corps areas. There might have been one in each Corps area who actually technically belonged to us in the political section, but I believe we had five or six in the internal affairs unit, which followed the internal Vietnamese developments, particularly political developments. There was the external affairs unit which dealt with Vietnam's relations with foreign countries and ultimately with the peace process with the negotiations in Paris; the political/military section; a labor office with a couple of officers. When I first went there and here I'm drawing on a memory to try to pull a name out, there was a very famous retired American general who had a little operation in our political section. He shared the space. He didn't report to anybody except the ambassador, but this is frustrating. He had been very active in the Philippines. I've got it: General Lansdale, I think it was Edward Lansdale.

Q: Oh, yes, he was the man who, he had been a colonel and very much close to Magsaysay.

TULL: He was very close to Magsaysay, in combating a communist insurgency in the Philippines. He was very well known at the time. He wrote a book and he was regarded as an expert in counter insurgency warfare. He was fascinating. We had the head of the political section who was on our floor and then there was a political counselor on the floor above me. It was a large operation. I believe I was the first woman officer ever assigned to the Saigon political section.

Q: Who was head of the political section, the political counselor?

TULL: The counselor when I first went was Arch Calhoun and he was later, when his tour was finished, Martin Herz. The head of the political section when I first went was Laurin Askew and he was replaced by Galen Stone. Both very nice people.

Q: Very competent.

TULL: Yes, they were.

Q: Again, prior to Tet, what were you getting, were they saying we're winning the war. The government really has extended its control or were they saying this is very problematic?

TULL: I don't recall. I definitely don't recall that there was any hyping of progress, certainly not in the political section. The sentiment was pretty strong and again whether it was before the Tet Offensive that I got this or after, the sentiment was strong that our military, the military components were under extreme pressure from McNamara to do body counts of dead enemies to show progress. In the political section this approach was ridiculed.

The first couple of weeks I got there, it was a question of finding your way around Saigon and being assigned certain duties. I as the junior-most person in the section got a lot of the grunt work. There was a daily publication put out by the Vietnamese government in Vietnamese, French and English and it was my job to scan that for items of information. You had to look at all three because the one that had the meatiest coverage and the thickest number of items was the Vietnamese, but you would also maybe see an item in English and then check it in the Vietnamese and find out there were four or five more sentences that gave you more information about who was doing what or what the Vietnamese government would be up to. That sort of thing. I was pushed into doing that. I was also made the biographic officer, one of the "fun" things that junior officers get to do. I also perused Vietnamese newspapers. Saigon had about 35 daily newspapers, most of them in Vietnamese, a couple in English. I skimmed those daily to find out who was attacking whom. The average American did not realize the variety of opinion that was allowed to be freely expressed in South Vietnam. So, you had different groups that had their own newspapers and they could attack government policies pretty strongly provided they did not support the communist policies. They could criticize bland issues, they could criticize this, that and the other, so there was a lot to look at there and they were vying for their audience. There was many a night, not in the first couple of weeks, that I would take home newspapers, home being the hotel and I would work to 1:00 or 2:00 in the morning writing cables summarizing some of the key editorial comments in these papers that reflected fledgling political party views. I had hardly gotten my feet wet when the Tet Offensive struck.

Q: How did it hit you personally?

TULL: I was in this hotel.

Q: Which hotel do you remember?

TULL: Let's see, the Astor on Tudu Street, but we would pronounce it Tudu, T-U-D-O, Tudu Street and it was about a block around the corner from the Vietnamese naval headquarters. It was around maybe 2:00 in the morning and I heard tremendous blasts of what I thought were firecrackers going off, but major sounds of firecrackers. Not being totally stupid I slithered to the window and cracked a Venetian blind of the hotel room and saw some people shooting at each other in the street, running around the corner. Were you there for the Tet Offensive?

Q: No.

TULL: No. There were strings of firecrackers hung from buildings and earlier in the evening people had been igniting them illegally because the government didn't want that, but you saw all the red strings of firecrackers hanging and in the street the paper red paper residue. So, when I heard suddenly at 2:00 a.m. or 3:00 whatever it was, this tremendous racket, I just assumed it was more of that, but it sounded stronger, so I didn't want to stick my head out the window obviously so I just cracked the blind. I could see some fighters, but they were scooting around the corner. Apparently they were part of the attack force on the Vietnamese naval headquarters. That was just as I say around the corner. I was pretty scared and decided I wasn't going to stand by the window. I remember being concerned naturally thinking well, now if these people take me over, they come into the hotel, they're right outside, if they come in the hotel, should I acknowledge that I speak Vietnamese? Would it be better if I didn't? You know, these thoughts are running through your head. At any rate they did not come into that hotel.

We got through the night and when daylight came I put the radio on. Armed Forces Radio was announcing that the embassy had been attacked and that there was a widescale offensive going on in sections of Saigon and it said that personnel, embassy and military personnel should remain in their quarters until further notice, but keep the radio on. It was in the middle of the Tet holiday and so I went on the roof of the hotel, it had a rooftop restaurant, because I wanted to see what was going on. You could see tanks going back and forth and bodies in the street. You could see helicopters and still hear fighting and shooting. This would have been maybe 7:00 a.m. or something like that. While I was there two army majors who were billeted in the hotel, they had not been there in Saigon very long, they came up and they were astounded to see me. What is this American woman doing here on the roof? Because the hotel staff, most of them, were off. They were not serving breakfast; the restaurant was closed and we knew that it would be closed.

Q: It was Tet, yes.

TULL: It was Tet. These two fellows, they were really antsy. They wanted to get to MACV and see what was what, but the radio was telling them to stay where you are unless you're called. We watched, the three of us watched the show, from the roof. At one point I looked across the street. We were on about the sixth or seventh floor of the hotel. There was an apartment house across the way and I looked out and here's a middle aged Vietnamese man coming out on his rooftop in his undershorts, which is what they'd wear all the time, no problem with that. He comes out and he starts feeding his chickens on his rooftop terrace, just oblivious to the noise and the military action.

After a while, these two majors got hungry and they thought we could take a chance. They were looking down the other side of the hotel roof and they saw a restaurant across the street that seemed to be open. This was on Tudo Street. They said, why don't we give it a shot? I said, well, we're supposed to listen to the radio. They said, yes, but you also have to get something to eat and that restaurant's open. You don't know how long its going to be open. I thought hey, with these two guys I'll go, and we went and got breakfast. No problem. Went back to my room, got the radio on and suddenly there's an announcement that says, all the employees of the American Embassy should report to the embassy immediately, but USIA personnel and AID personnel should stay in their billets. Well, I'm thinking, what am I going to do? I was brand new. How am I going to get to the embassy? It was feasible walking distance; I had walked daily up to this point. It was the equivalent of maybe 10 blocks, but am I going to be walking over bodies or dodging bullets? I thought it was kind of stupid myself, but needless to say I was also very curious and I'm brand new, the first woman in the section and I'm not going to be hiding behind my bed in the hotel. I did use a little commonsense because there was an apartment building around the corner about a block away where I knew two of the secretaries from the political section had apartments and I thought maybe if I go around there if the three of us decide to go to the embassy there will be safety in numbers and we'll see what's what. Anyway, I screwed my courage to the sticking point and went out on the street, went around to the apartment building. They were very happy to see me because they had heard the word, too, but they were concerned about just walking, getting out and walking up to the embassy. They wanted to obey the order, as did I. Well, also in that apartment building were a couple of USIA officers who had been there for a while and they had a Jeep between them and they were just champing at the bit because the instructions were State Department should go to the embassy, not USIA and other people. They said, we'll take you in our Jeep. That gave them the excuse, if they were challenged to say, oh we were just taking these embassy girls, these embassy women to the embassy. We agreed and they drove us to the embassy. The trip was a series of sights I'll never forget, with streets with a sprinkling of dead bodies in the gutter and shooting in the background. When we got to the embassy itself they had not yet removed the bodies of the Viet Cong who had been killed in the embassy front yard, caught I guess inside the compound, the front lawn you might say. These bodies, so young, were there and I remember the images are so vivid. I remember being so struck by how red the blood was and how it was so red on the white concrete surface of the embassy steps and, huge flower pots.

I went in. One thing I absolutely would not do under any circumstances was take pictures. I just felt that was beneath contempt. I didn't even take a camera although I know other people were there snapping. I didn't do it. I got to my office. First I reported to the section chief, Ted Heavner, he was the chief of the internal affairs unit. He was startled to see me. I said, "Well, the order came out over the radio that we were supposed to come and we had a couple of secretaries with us, too." He thought it was a mistake to call us all in.

In my office, there was some concrete debris on my typewriter and on my desk from rounds, I guess mortar rounds that had been launched against the embassy. It had a concrete screen outside, probably set back maybe a foot or so, but still some of that chipped off.

Q: An ornamental screen, but the idea was to detonate any rocket-propelled grenade.

TULL: Right. So, there was obviously some debris there on the typewriter and the desk. Can't say that I did much work because everybody was just trying to figure out what was going on. There was still fighting in the streets. The Viet Cong had taken over part of a building across from the embassy. It was a substantial distance across. It wasn't like from here to there, but it was probably with this other apartment building, half a football field or something and the Viet Cong were occasionally putting out sniper shots. I guess about the only thing I was able to do was to send a cable to my family telling them I was alive and well. We were all doing that. They said everybody can send one short cable to have the State Department call your family. Before too long I guess a few hours after that it was decided that most people should go home. There was not a whole lot we could do that particular day. I don't think I went in the next day. I think the day after that they sent a vehicle to pick us up.

Q: Did you get any feel for what's going on or well, this is a big surprise?

TULL: The element of surprise was clear. Yes, it was a great surprise, but very quickly within a day or so it was clear that it was a massive defeat for the Viet Cong. Absolutely massive defeat because they had risen up quite confidently all over the country and after the initial shock was over they were mowed down. They were really mowed down. It was a tremendous setback for the Viet Cong military. For the U.S. however, psychologically I think it was the turning point of the U.S. involvement because the idea that these Viet Cong had actually gotten into the embassy courtyard, they never got into the embassy building, they might have actually gotten in the door of the consular section which was next to the embassy, a separate building, but the idea that they had gotten there was just so shocking and was played up so much in the press that nobody ever believed, I don't think the average American ever believed that it ended up as a defeat for the Viet Cong. Adding to that the fact that, George Jacobsen. He had a position at the embassy.

Q: He was an administrator.

TULL: Some sort of a mission coordinator. I think he handled aircraft and whatever the ambassador wanted. He lived in a house on the embassy compound and he actually at point blank had to kill a Viet Cong who was coming up the stairs to get him. Somebody I think threw a gun up to him or whatever and so that got tremendous play on television and all. That really did steer things away from the fact that so many Viet Cong had been destroyed. It really set them back immensely, but the VC won the offensive psychologically.

Q: I would have thought that being in internal affairs this must have put quite a load on the whole internal affairs unit, what the hell does this mean within the Vietnamese society? I'd talk to people and find out how what the effects of this were.

TULL: Yes, we were so large that we, individual officers had individual political parties that they followed. Following the Viet Cong and their doings was not something we did in the internal affairs section. The external affairs people had someone who was pretty expert on Viet Cong operations, but was principally it was CIA that dealt with that. No, I was quite a shock that they had managed to come into the city and they held sections of it for a while. It was wild and woolly.

Q: In Cholon there were a couple of fights there.

TULL: Oh, major, yes, major. It was after a few days the hotel opened up again for food and all and there were rocket attacks and various things. It was surreal. You work all day literally through the lunch hour in that case and get back to the hotel where I lived for such a long time, go up to the roof because life has to go on. You have to feed yourself and you have to give yourself enough strength to go on the next day. You'd be sitting up there, a friend would come and join you, you'd have a drink and a meal. It's dark at 6:30 or so in that part of the world and you'd watch the pretty tracer bullets and the patterns flares would make. You would think I'm looking at lethal fire that could be killing people on the ground and I'm thinking isn't this making an interesting pattern against the night sky.

Q: Star shows going on. Yes, I used to go later to the Rex Theater, but you would still see some of this. Not the Rex.

TULL: The BOQ.

Q: The BOQ up at the top.

TULL: It was a different experience let me tell you.

Q: Did you have contacts within the various parties that you went to see and if you were what were you getting from them?

TULL: No, at this stage of my embassy career shall we say I was not having contacts to speak of with Vietnamese outside the embassy. The political parties were divided among other officers and I was the junior person and I think there was a feeling that well, let her prove herself and then maybe we'll let her have a political party or something like that. Eventually I did get the job of following a political party, but it took a long time, several months.

Q: Did you feel that being a woman was a problem? You know sometimes.

TULL: It might have been a problem with my male colleagues, or male superiors. I think they felt protective.

Q: Yes and also sometimes there's a feeling well, playing the game, well, its fine we accept her fully as an equal, but will the foreigners do this? This has often been the excuse.

TULL: I don't think that was an issue in my experience in Saigon. I think it was more, I'll be very kind and generous. I think I was more concern about my physical safety. For example, I didn't have, I was not put on the embassy duty roster. As I indicated in Brussels after three weeks I was on the embassy duty roster. I found out I was not on the embassy duty roster and when I inquired about it I was told it was because the duty officer had to sleep in the embassy every night. They had a little room with a bed and bath. You had to physically be there and they just felt it wouldn't really be appropriate for me to be there alone and then of course the officer who was there in the embassy on the night of the Tet Offensive he was a little bit under siege. He did a fine job. Allen Wendt was his name.

Q: I've interviewed Allen. He didn't have a weapon.

TULL: No, nothing.

Q: He was an economic officer, an expert on rice and the duty officer.

TULL: That's right. After that I did not push for the idea of getting on that duty roster. I did push to try to get out and do what I regarded was real political work. It took quite a long time. In addition to the work I was telling you about with the newspapers, anytime President Thieu gave a speech, there was a voracious appetite not only in the embassy but in Washington to get a verbatim account of what he had said. Usually two really superb Vietnamese language officers in the section recorded the speeches and did a highlights cable.

Q: Who were they?

TULL: Hal Colebaugh and Harry Dunlop. Particularly Hal. Hal spoke Vietnamese like a native. So, when there was a speech, they would listen to the speech on radio or television, but also record it and then go through it and do a highlights cable, put together a cable saying President Thieu expressed strong support for blah, blah and expressed concern about the lack of whatever. I remember this one occasion I had gone to dinner at a friend's house and the next thing I know there's a phone call and I was told that I would be picked up. We had a curfew at this time. I was going to spend the night at this friend's home. If you went to dinner you spent the night during this period of a curfew, a 7:00 p.m. curfew, whatever it was. I was prepared to spend the night, but I was told I had to go back to the embassy it was around maybe 8:00 when I got the word. We were gathered up, the three of us who spoke Vietnamese, and taken to the embassy because the word that we got was that the highlights cable of this particular speech had aroused such interest that President Johnson wanted the entire text word for word, an hour-long speech. The three of us spent the night going over it, we each took a section of the tape, and did a word-for-word translation from Vietnamese into English. I will say that this was a little later on, maybe it related to preparations to go to Paris for the peace talks I'm not sure. I remember Galen Stone was there by that time. I think Galen came in the summer of '68. It was around then. Anyway, he very nicely, since he had called his officers in he came in to the embassy, too. He didn't know Vietnamese or anything, but he felt that he should. I remember that. Then he insisted we go home I guess around 9:00 or 10:00 when we got the cable off and have a couple of hours sleep before we came back in. We did that sort of thing. I wasn't given a political party to follow until later in the year.

Q: Did you get any feeling this early on, you know, there were several sort of American points of view. One there was a CIA point of view and two, there was the embassy point of view and three there was the field point of view. I mean, were these, did you see sort of the clash of interpretation?

TULL: I can't tell you much about the CIA point of view from the low level that I was working at, but definitely there was a lot of fresh air brought into the discussions at the political section meetings by our officers who were out in the field who were with the CORDS program or our regional provincial reporters. See I had wanted to be a provincial reporter. I neglected to mention that. I thought I would be assigned to be a provincial reporter since I had the language, but at the last minute the political counselor decided that, no way should a woman go out and do that job so I ended up in the embassy. The people in the provinces would come in and they would just tell it like it is at our staff meetings that it wasn't going well in the provinces. We're talking after the Tet Offensive of course you know. It wasn't going well. The body counts were ridiculous. There was a lot of corruption. They would talk about Vietnamese, and Korean, corruption and I know the political counselors weren't too thrilled to hear that, particularly Martin Herz. Of Arch Calhoun I don't have strong memories, I don't think he was there more than six or eight months when I was there, but I had great respect for him. He was the one who allowed me to come to Saigon, allowed, notice. The non-women's liberation point of view. He let me come. Wasn't that nice? These young officers were very bright and very capable. They would come in and they would give an account of what was going on in their particular province, and what was wrong with the province chief, or what was right. It wasn't totally negative. They were not there with a point of view to push, but they did want the facts to get in. I remember Martin Herz was concerned about what they had to say and they were concerned that their point of view was not getting through to the ambassador and it was not being reflected in embassy reporting which they thought was too upbeat about the overall situation. He arranged for periodic dinner meetings with this group of young officers with the ambassador, which the rest of us were a little bit jealous of because it did give them a wonderful opportunity to discuss in depth what their perceptions were. At least they knew that the ambassador was hearing their concerns and their point of view. It at was useful for the ambassador to have their input.

I don't know when you talk about a different point of view from the CIA. We're talking 1968 and what I recall most is that later when I did start to be following political parties and preparations for the Vietnamese elections that the CIA officers who were my counterparts in grade or maybe a little above me would come down and pick my brain about what was going on politically. Of course I cooperated. I figured we all worked for the U.S. government, but then you'd see one of their classified reports would go out and sometimes it would basically be what I had said or what the other officers had said. We were not, I don't think, at odds at that level. Now, at the senior level, you know what the station chief said to the ambassador or vice versa, I don't know. I didn't see a divergence at my level. The divergence was in the reluctance I think to report too negatively on the situation.

Q: Well, then how did things develop? You were there all of three years.

TULL: It was about two and a half years.

Q: A long tour there. As time went on, you were able to get out and around more?

TULL: Yes, eventually. I had an 18-month tour. That's what most of us had and then home leave and then I returned for a year. A very fortunate thing for my experience there occurred when the director of the Vietnam working group came over.

Q: Who was that?

TULL: John Burke. He ended up, poor man, being ambassador to Guyana when Jonestown took place. John was the director of the Vietnam working group. He had been in Saigon in the political section before and he had good contacts. There had been an election, again I'd have to refresh my memory on dates, but I did get involved in following the election of the Senate and House. I'd have to check the dates, but the president of the national assembly was Senator Huyen, H-U-Y-E-N, and he had known John, John had known him on a previous tour when he hadn't been a senator yet. John had called on him and Senator Huyen commented that he wished that he could have some English lessons. He wanted to improve his English. John mentioned this when we were at a luncheon maybe at Ted Heavener's or the political counselor's and I was there, too. He said, "How about having Terry give him English lessons?" Now, Harry Dunlop followed the senate at that point and Hal Colebaugh followed the lower house. I suddenly had this opportunity to become the English teacher to the president of the senate. I wouldn't be reporting on the daily activities of the senate, but at any rate I was delighted and because I guess it was mentioned so publicly that why don't we have Terry do this, it was approved. So I then started going over to the Senate. I began my day there. I would go to the Senate from my home, the hotel, whatever it was and I would meet with Senator Huyen and "teach him English." He had some English, but there were some formulations that he needed some help with, and vocabulary.

Gradually we developed a very close relationship. He was a dear, dear man. He started volunteering a lot of information that was of interest to the embassy, particularly later as the relationship developed. I didn't go in and say I'm Theresa Tull, we're going to have English lessons. What action are you going to take on the such and such bill? I didn't do any of that. It was just a slow gradual building up of confidence. For example, the U.S. government was very interested in having the South Vietnamese pass a land reform bill, figuring giving land to the tiller would help dampen enthusiasm in the countryside for Viet Cong promises that they were more caring of the peasants. This was quite a controversial bill. Not everybody wanted to take their mother's and father's land or their own land away. I was able to monitor the progress of that bill through the legislature from the word go with Senator Huyen as part of our English lessons. I actually had some workbooks and I got some information about teaching English as a second language and we would work through some phraseology and drills. But our conversations focused on current issues facing the government and the National Assembly.

From the lessons we developed a close friendship and it was very helpful for me, and I believe to him, as well. It gave him a regular means to communicate with the Embassy. When Harry Dunlop's tour was finished, I was given the job of following the Senate; reporting on the Senate. This was a very enjoyable and exciting experience, because Huyen was the third ranking person in the country. There was the president, the vice president, and then chairman of the senate, as I recall.

Q: Looking at the situation then, sort of the feeling has come out that somehow this was a dictatorship and all. How did you see the political process? I mean you were sort of inside it.

TULL: I think that Thieu got a very bad rap in the U.S. press because the Vietnamese people were not being offered a choice between Thieu and Thomas Jefferson. They were being given a choice between Thieu and a communistic dictatorship. I say looking at the situation there they had a national assembly that was freely elected, slates of candidates, competing slates of candidates. The municipal and provincial elections were also vigorously contested. In fact I wrote an article that ended up in a book about those elections. It was part of a compilation of studies on electoral developments in Vietnam. It was edited by Joseph Zazloff from the University of Pittsburgh. They had 35 newspapers in Saigon with competing points of view, but if the paper advocated a position that the government, the South Vietnamese government thought echoed the Viet Cong position you were thrown in jail. That was all there was to it. There was a wide area of freedoms and then beyond that you could not go, you could not advocate a communist takeover.

I had one episode for example of this with Martin Herz, the political counselor. There was a very controversial member of the "lower" house, how I got so involved in it I don't know, maybe Hal was away, whatever. He was left leaning, extremely left-leaning. He was accused by the Thieu government of advocating Viet Cong positions, I forget which specific position, but he made a speech, the speech that they eluded to was made on the floor of the House in which he should have had immunity, but the word got out that he was doing this. He had a newspaper, which he put his views into, but on this occasion he was on the floor of the House and security goons came and dragged him out and took him away to jail. Well, I don't know how I got the job of writing this up, but I did. I drafted the cable on this episode and I remember Martin Herz wouldn't approve it. You had several layers where you had to get approval for cables and if something was going to be negative it definitely had to go to a higher level. So this cable was rejected. I was very upset because this is what happened, it happened, Washington had a right to know. I didn't put a strong comment in the cable, but I said clearly this is what happened here. The man was taken from the assembly floor. He was bounced down the steps. I had witnesses who told me this and I think one of them was probably my principal contact, Senator Huyen. I thought it was important that this be told. The cable was rejected.

Well, it happened the very next day after I had finished this cable late in the day and was told it wasn't going, there was the big political section staff meeting, all 20 of us there, and Herz chaired it. He tried to explain to me why we couldn't send that cable because he felt that obviously it was exaggerated, we can't exaggerate these little difficulties they have from time to time. I just wouldn't budge. I just stood by what I had written. I said it's up to you to decide to send it, but that is what happened and I'm standing by what I wrote. They bounced him down the steps and his head hit the steps once or twice, according to what I was told. Well, we can't send it, he insisted. Well, everybody around the table is kind of looking like, good grief, because here is the counselor going back and forth with me. By this time the head of the Internal unit had changed and he was not a very forceful individual, but Galen Stone, the head of the section, spoke up quietly and said, well, I think Terry feels pretty strongly about what she wrote, Martin, and she's been a pretty reliable, no, she's a reliable observer, something like that. So, we simmered it down and I was really ticked off, but okay. You follow orders, you know, I'm not going to get on a plane and go to Washington.

To Herz's credit, later that day I got a phone call saying that Mr. Herz wanted to see me and Galen and so the two of us went up to his office. We went in to see Herz and he says, "I'm signing off this cable. I've given it more thought and you're right, it should go. I really appreciate your explaining it forcefully and standing up for your principles and your beliefs on this issue." I was impressed by his willingness to rethink the issue. I think the fact that I did stand up to him on what I thought was an important issue caused him to respect me. He was a man who appreciated that. He would roll you over with a bulldozer if you would be wimpish, but if you would stand up, and make a reasonable argument, he would listen. He was supportive of me after that.

Q: You were there when Nixon announced the Vietnamization and the gradual drawing down weren't you or not?

TULL: I was in Washington I think.

Q: Were you there, well a way we can figure this out was.

TULL: I was in Da Nang or getting ready to go. Maybe I was there, yes.

Q: I was wondering whether you, where were you when they went into Cambodia, we went into Cambodia?

TULL: I was in Saigon.

Q: Saigon.

TULL: I was in Saigon January '68 to September of '70.

Q: Yes.

TULL: I think it came out in '70 didn't it?

Q: Yes I do, I think so.

TULL: When was his election?

Q: Which election?

TULL: It would have been '72.

Q: '72.

TULL: So, I think he did it before that election.

Q: I'm quite sure he did.

TULL: Maybe '70 or '71.

Q: Yes.

TULL: I might have been there. I was there when we went into Cambodia. I'm pretty sure I was. I'd have to double-check the dates to be sure.

Q: Yes, well the Cambodia thing was the spring of '70.

TULL: Okay, well then I was in Saigon.

Q: How did that play in the political section?

TULL: I think we were supportive. I didn't hear a lot of negatives about it among my colleagues at the embassy. I guess we were pretty hawkish.

Q: I was, I thought its about time we did it. I was sitting there running the consular section and I thought yes, right on, you know?

TULL: Well, you know that the Communists were using Cambodia as an open backdoor into South Vietnam. There wasn't a lot of rebelliousness among the officers when I was there except that the provincial reporters were determined that their picture of what was happening in the provinces had to be told to the embassy and particularly the ambassador and they did get that the opportunity for meetings with the ambassador. Whether their input was incorporated into the ambassador's reporting or not is another thing.

Q: What about the media, I'm talking particularly about the American media? They were all over the place. Did they go after you?

TULL: We, the political section, had pretty good relationships with American media. I remember specifically Dan Sutherland who was with...

Q: Christian Science Monitor.

TULL: He might have started off with the Associated Press, but he ended up definitely with Christian Science Monitor. I got to know him socially as did some of the other officers. He didn't speak Vietnamese. Occasionally he would give me a call once we got to know each other and say there's a demonstration on such and such a street. I just thought you'd like to know. I'm going to go down and I'm going to pick up whatever I can, whatever information I can. He occasionally, this is not every day, but he would come back and maybe he would have leaflets that he had picked up that were in Vietnamese and I would look over the leaflets and tell him what the leaflets said and he would tell me what happened. It was a fruitful interaction. You could tell, there were certain people you would trust. Now there were others you wouldn't. Quite frankly, Ward Just was there. Just has made a very good reputation as a novelist, but I didn't have the same feeling of trust toward him. I felt that he had more of a "gotcha" approach. Talk about heady things for a young officer: Bob Shaplen, Robert Shaplen who wrote those wonderful books about Vietnam, occasionally visited Saigon. One night, Shaplen, Hal and Harry and I and maybe a couple of others, went out and had a wonderful meal, a Vietnamese meal under the stars and went back and forth trading ideas and views and experiences on Vietnam.

Another media experience, using your phrase loosely, involved the columnist Joseph Alsop. One Thanksgiving a lot of junior officers were planning to get together for dinner and I got a call from Ambassador Berger. He was the deputy ambassador.

Q: Yes, Sam Berger.

TULL: Sam Berger. He invited me for Thanksgiving dinner and I thought, gee, I already have an invitation, but I'm not going to turn down an ambassador. In those days you had certain training along those lines. I went and I was very glad I did because it was just about eight or ten people and one of the guests was Joe Alsop and it was fascinating because I'd read his columns for years. After dinner Berger excused himself and we were all set to leave, but Alsop wanted us to stay and talk so he, myself and probably Harry and Hal, sat around and exchanged views and impressions with Alsop on the war, disagreeing with him at times, and it was a very interesting occasion.

Q: By the time you were ready to leave there in the fall of 1970ish or so, what was your impression of how things were going whither in South Vietnam?

TULL: Okay, I'll back up just a second. I just thought of another item when Vietnam was preparing for elections, I forget whether they were the senate elections or what. I was thrown to the wolves. You recall the "5:00 Follies" which was the embassy's press conference at 5:00 p.m. and I was sent down to brief the happy reporters on the election situation and they were shall we say a little skeptical about the whole idea, but that was fun. At any rate if you wouldn't mind repeating the question. How did I feel at the end of the tour?

Q: Whither yourself in South Vietnam?

TULL: At that stage? Well, it wasn't doing badly at that point at all. It was 1970, a pretty good year. In '68 of course you had the Tet Offensive and you had the mini Tet Offensive and you had a very successful period of achievement and expansion of government control. I left feeling pretty good about it. They were gearing up for new elections, presidential elections as well as the senate and lower level elections, but definitely presidential elections were coming up. I was confident they'd be reasonably free elections. They had been before, they really had been. Granted the Vietnamese military had had a lot more resources and impact and everything else than the civilians candidates did, but other people had a voice and did their thing. I went back to Washington and was put right into the Vietnam Working Group, as the internal political affairs officer. That was a very interesting experience, too.

Q: Well, had there been any reflection on what you were doing and your fellow officers and all of the demonstrations in the United States mainly student demonstrations and all. How did these affect you all?

TULL: Well, I was concerned. I thought it was unfortunate. I don't think the war had been properly explained and I thought the emphasis on body counts was probably aggravating the situation, but I felt that we were there because we were invited to be there to help South Vietnam forestall the communist takeover from the North. I had idealistic views that eventually perhaps the North and South could work out some reasonable accommodation, maybe a federalist type arrangement where there'd be some freedoms in the South that didn't exist in the North and I also thought that perhaps the South which has I believe some oil deposits offshore might eventually be able to even finance their own continuing strife if that's what they had to do. Yes, it was distressing to know that what you were doing, was opposed by so many people. My own family was very supportive, but I had friends in the Foreign Service who weren't in Vietnam who opposed the whole business of the Vietnam War and who couldn't understand what I was doing there and why I would think it was worthwhile. It was something I thought was worthwhile.

Q: When you came back, I assume you were back, what the fall of '70?

TULL: Yes.

Q: And you did the Vietnam working group until when?

TULL: I did that for two years.

Q: '70 to '72.

TULL: Yes and then I went back to Da Nang. No, I did it for two years and then I went to the University of Michigan for a year of graduate studies thinking I would get out of the Vietnam game, but I didn't. I ended up going back to Da Nang.

Q: When you came back, did you find was there a different feel for Vietnam, you know, sort of the departmental feel for this group that was dealing with it that you had at the embassy or was it?

TULL: In the Department itself? I don't know. In the country I think attitudes had hardened, as a result of what I believe was the misinterpretation of the Tet Offensive. We knew that the Viet Cong had been devastated by that, yet that was not the perception. The perception was it was a major U.S. and South Vietnamese defeat and we ought to get out of there. I know in retrospect we were just trying to hold back a wave with a bucket, but you couldn't fight against that opinion, but things weren't looking bad in September of '70.

Q: When you got back to the U.S. during that time, what were you picking up during this two year period you were dealing with internal affairs?

TULL: At times I made speaking trips to college campuses and to media outlets, and that was quite interesting. I have to say I was a little concerned at first; the first time I was going to go to a college campus I thought we'll see about the questions. A lot of the questions were based on ignorance and when you could explain specifically what was going on or answer a question with specifics I didn't get as much hostility as I would have thought. These young people had been fed a lot of slogans and they didn't want to go and be drafted, and I don't blame them for being concerned. It was a wretched situation. My own personal view is that the conduct of the war from the way the U.S. government managed the draft was so unfair. It was absolutely absurd. Because you could afford to go to college you would be out of the draft or you could come up with some phony baloney like Cheney did, get four or five different deferments, or you could go to graduate school or you could say you're going to be a minister. It was just so wretchedly unfair. Only those who couldn't afford college got drafted.

Q: The National Guard.

TULL: Oh, yes, like the National Guard nonsense of our current beloved leader. It just was not right. I have a personal view that a lot of the antagonism toward the war by the young college people stemmed from guilt. They claimed they were opposing the war because it's an unjust war, etc. I think part of it was they had to oppose it on those grounds because otherwise they would be opposing it because they were afraid to go and fight in the war. They justified their resistance by saying this is an unjust war. They did not want to say I don't want to serve my country. They said this is an unjust war, therefore, I am virtuous and anybody who does go is not virtuous, therefore I am not guilty of shirking my duty. That attitude contributed probably to the poor treatment that some of our veterans received when they returned to the United States.

Q: Oh, yes. I agree with you absolutely. Just shown by the fact that as soon as the draft stopped the protests stopped. Nobody cared anymore.

TULL: It's a shame it wasn't corrected a lot sooner where you have a draft number and you knew right away you were going to go or you weren't going to go. Just changing the mechanisms of it so that you had your magic number. They had a draft lottery after that. That made much more sense. It did. It just defused the whole business. It was wretched and of course horrible mistakes were made here. I mean at Kent State, that was so stupid, and tragic. It's so sad that these young people were killed while protesting. It's crazy that people would have reacted that way, but meanwhile I'm trotting along and I'm going, making speeches on local television stations and going to college campuses.

Q: Do you remember any of the universities you went to?

TULL: The University of Cincinnati, Pittsburgh; (Joe Zazloff had me come there) and some other places. The media tour would go say to a certain section of the country. I went to Birmingham, Alabama and to Columbia, South Carolina, Palm Beach, Florida, go on local television stations be interviewed sort of their version of the Today Show in the morning or give a little speech at night, so I did a fair amount of that and that was okay.

I had a couple of interesting experiences leading up to the Vietnamese elections in the fall of 1971. Since I had been the internal affairs officer in Saigon and doing the same work, back in Washington, I had acquired an extensive knowledge of the Vietnamese constitution, which had been written maybe shortly before I got to Saigon. The South Vietnamese were getting ready for presidential elections. Bill Sullivan was a Deputy Assistant Secretary in the East Asia bureau at that time. He asked Josiah Bennett and me to come to his office to brief him for a meeting he was having the next day with Secretary of State William Rogers on the Vietnamese elections. The two of us did so. Sullivan asked a lot of questions, and I provided a lot of information to him – both orally and via documents. We went back to our offices and a half an hour later his secretary called me and said Ambassador Sullivan wants you to accompany him to his meeting with the Secretary, Terry. I was delighted. A little later, the Ambassador, knowing the protocol also invited Joe Bennett to attend the meeting. The next morning, Secretary Rogers was going to meet the next afternoon with President Nixon on the subject of the elections. They were really concerned about the alternatives, if any, in the constitution, if the election were not contested. A likely opponent to President Thieu, Duong Van Minh, was threatening not to run, and there was the prospect of an uncontested election.

Anyway, the next morning I was a very excited individual, going up to Secretary Rogers' office. The other folks there were like the head of INR and the head Policy Planning. It was a small group and the only person who brought anybody with them was Bill Sullivan. I'll never forget this. We walk into his office and a very courtly William Rogers is there and Ambassador Sullivan says, "Mr. Secretary, I'd like you to meet Theresa Tull." The Secretary says, "Oh, you've brought your secretary with you. How nice." or something like that. Sullivan said, "No, sir, no, Terry is our, she is our expert on the Vietnamese constitution and I thought it would be helpful to have her here for this discussion." "Oh certainly." Then the Secretary invited me to me sit next to him, and the discussion began. I didn't open my mouth unless spoken to. Before long Rogers asked Sullivan a question and he said, "Well, that's really something that Terry could handle better than I." So, I gave the answer. After that Rogers just spoke directly to me, He asked a range of very intelligent questions.

Q: He's a lawyer.

TULL: Yes, so it was exciting, let me tell you. I have great admiration for Bill Sullivan. His approach is one that I tried to follow in my own career later. He didn't have to pretend that he knew everything. He had to present the person who did. It was not up to Bill Sullivan to know what Article 7-A of the Vietnamese constitution said. That's what he had me for, and he had enough confidence in himself that he could share that opportunity. It was really very smart. It was quite an experience for a young officer.

Q: Well, also it shows another side to William Rogers, sort of his lawyerly side which often gets lost. People talk about how disinterested he was and all that.

TULL: He was very involved in this discussion, definitely.

Q: I'm sure he really engaged on something of substance and that is elections.

TULL: Absolutely. I had another fun experience. Remember Congresswoman Bella Abzug?

Q: Oh, God, yes, from Brooklyn was it?

TULL: I think Brooklyn and very much a woman's liberation advocate. And a vocal opponent of the Vietnam War.

Q: She also had a great polka dot outfit or something.

TULL: She always wore a big hat of some kind, right. Anyway, again the Vietnamese elections were coming up. She sent word that she wanted Bill Sullivan to come and brief her committee in the House on the Vietnamese elections. Sullivan said, well, he couldn't make it, but he would send the expert on the Vietnamese elections and constitution up to her committee and that would be Theresa Tull. The word came back that no, she wanted Bill Sullivan. She didn't want anybody junior to him. I think Sullivan maybe called her himself at this point and said, gee, you know, I'm really surprised that a person with your background and your reputation would want it known that you turned down an opportunity to have the woman who is the expert on the Vietnamese elections come and testify before your committee. Not wanting to turn down a woman, Abzug agreed and I did go up and testify at her hearing on the elections. She was a piece of work, but it was funny because that was Sullivan's angle, gee, you don't want a woman to come? At any rate it was wild. I didn't change any minds on that committee. I recall that Ms. Abzug told the press that I had been thoroughly unresponsive to their concerns.

Q: You did that for what?

TULL: A two year tour.

Q: A two year tour. That takes us up to when?

TULL: Let me see. Let me see here. You know I have another item that I meant to mention with regard to my Saigon experience.

Q: Yes, well, why don't we put it in now?

TULL: We'll back it up because one of the leaders of the coup against Ngo Dinh Diem was Duong Van Minh. He was believed to be a very popular South Vietnamese general - politician and he had been living in exile in Thailand when I arrived in Saigon in January 1968.

Q: Was he known as Big Minh?

TULL: Yes. He was Big Minh. The U.S. was trying to get the Thieu government to allow him back to Vietnam so that he could play a role politically, broaden the range of the political players. The word came that he was coming back to Vietnam apparently this had been worked out at a high level. The embassy wanted to have somebody at the airport to cover his arrival, but they didn't want to send anybody high-ranking because it would look like the embassy was paying entirely too much attention to Big Minh. So word came to me that Terry Tull was to go out to the airport and meet Big Minh. Off I went to the airport. It was quite interesting. All sorts of reporters were there. His fellow coup generals, including Tran Van Don who was a big shot in the senate at that point and several other senators were there. I was principally trying to get color, what's happening, who's there, and that kind of thing, but I felt I should at least let Big Minh know that the embassy was represented. I did manage to have a minute and say welcome back, General Minh. I'm Theresa Tull from the American Embassy. We're pleased that you've returned to Vietnam. He looked like, who is this?

Minh settled into his old home, not far from the embassy and it was arranged then that I would call on him. I frankly think that it was General Lansdale who arranged our meeting.

Q: The Philippine, kind of like the ugly American somehow.

TULL: Yes. I was sent to have a meeting with Big Minh, the first meeting he'd had with an American official in many years. We had a good discussion, which I wrote up as well as I could. I think I had two meetings with him in all. After a week or two, I went back to see him again and he was obliging and again told me what his thoughts were candidly. After that he apparently decided that he was entitled to a little more than a third secretary at the American Embassy as his contact and the word quietly got back to the embassy. In the meantime, apparently the Thieu government having had not gone into total conniptions at the thought of the embassy having contact with him, so a high ranking officer -- probably even the political counselor -- might have taken him on. It was exciting to be the first U.S. contact with an historical figure like that.

Q: Yes, well, of course this is the fun of going where the action is.

TULL: Yes. That was very interesting.

I mentioned that I had come back in September of '70 as the internal affairs officer for the Vietnam working group. That was the job I was supposed to have, but at that point the director of the group was Jim Engle. He was a very nice man personally, but he was one of the few officers I've encountered in the Foreign Service who could not get past my gender and I found that I was being given assignments that I felt any secretary could do. He'd like me to rearrange the library shelves; they had a few books to rearrange. Maybe I could look at the files and see if I could reorganize them. This sort of thing. In the meantime he's talking with Steve Johnson, who was a very sharp, nice fellow who had been in Saigon with me. In Saigon Steve did the external Vietnamese affairs and then later Steve went on to the Paris Peace Talks. So Jim is talking to Steve and wants to bring him into the office. The next thing I know Steve was in and Steve was basically doing the work (although that wasn't the title for his job) that should have been my internal affairs responsibilities. I spoke to Jim about it and said this was not the job that I was brought back to do. Did he intend for me to do this job and if he did not, if he wished to have the other officer put in the position, that would be fine, too. I'd be happy to go to personnel and request a transfer. No hard feelings, but let's move on. Well, no, no, he didn't intend that. I guess he didn't want on his record that someone was complaining. I said, I'm not being utilized to the extent that I should be. No, no, he didn't want that. I should calm down and it would be okay. We would work it out. Well, one of the beautiful things about Foreign Service work is that you're never in any one place too long nor is your boss. So, you can ride out difficulties sometimes. Fortunately, Jim was asked to accompany a high ranking Department official who might have been, maybe somebody named Kennedy, who was an undersecretary, on an orientation tour.

Q: Well, there was a Richard Kennedy who was, yes, he had several things, at one point he was for political military or something.

TULL: No, no. This man was commercial in some way, economic, but he was very high ranking in the Department and he was a political appointee, newly brought in and he wanted to take an extensive Asian trip and the Department wanted to send someone with him. Jim was given the job to accompany him and they went off on this long trip. The man liked him so much, liked having his expertise (Jim was a very bright, nice person) that he asked that Jim be assigned to him and Jim was replaced by Josiah Bennett. With Joe there it was no question whatsoever that I was the internal political officer. I settled into the job and it worked out well. Joe was a good person.

FREDERICK Z. BROWN
Province Advisor, Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Vinh Long (1968-1970)

Consul General
Da Nang (1971-1973)

Frederick Z. Brown was born in Pennsylvania in 1928. He entered the Foreign Service in 1958. He served in France, the Soviet Union, various posts in Asia, was spokesman for the Department of State, and was a staff member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In Vietnam he was with CORDS from 1968 to 1970 and then consul general in Da Nang, 1971-1973. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

BROWN: During my time in Moscow, I became very interested in the "pacification program" in Vietnam. I had always had a very deep interest in the concept, the theory and practice of revolution. That was one of the things that attracted me to Soviet affairs. And I had gotten into that in Thailand, in terms of role development. How do insurgencies occur, and what you do to combat insurgencies. The question of social reform. Social equity. Why systems are oppressive and why the people we work with in many cases, the United States is friendly with, tend to have governments that are repressive, and create within themselves the seeds of their own destruction. Of course you may say that this happened in Vietnam.

But in any event, I was struck, I remember very clearly in about mid-1966 with some of the material that was being published at that time in the State Department Bulletin, and the Foreign Service Journal in what was then the OCO or CORDS program (Office of Civilian Operations) in Vietnam. The CORDS program was Civil Operations Revolutionary Development Support. It was the same thing. Mainly the pacification program, which in Vietnam only got going in 1966-67 and really took off in 1968 at the time when the political decision was made to get out of Vietnam. Only then did we begin, in serious fashion, to put into place in the countryside of Vietnam, the kind of nation-building on the civilian side that should have been done many years before. This of course is part of the theme of Neil Sheehan's book on John Paul Vann.

Q: It was called A Bright and Shining Light-America and Vietnam.

BROWN: I am finishing the book now. It does not tell all the truth, in my view, despite its 800 pages. It tells a lot of the truth.

In any case, I became fascinated with the concept of taking Vietnam, the Vietnam that we supported, the South, and working with the people to defeat communism, to carry out the social revolution that I felt had to be carried out if our effort there was to be successful. I became very interested in this in an intellectual fashion but also in terms of getting out into the countryside. I have always been one to get out and work with the people, to get my hands dirty. I saw this as a great opportunity. I always believed that you had to learn the language if you were to really understand what goes on in a country.

In Thailand, I picked up a great deal of Thai. I studied Thai and was able to acquit myself fairly well. In Russian, I did okay in Russian, but I volunteered for the CORDS program. And was accepted. And it came about, two years to the day after serving my Moscow tour. I could have - the logical thing for me to have done, actually, would have been to go to an Eastern European post. Or back to the Department to work in INR on the Soviet Desk. I think I could have done that. But instead I volunteered, in the spirit of John F. Kennedy, to go save the world in Vietnam. Again, a bit behind the power curve, I guess. But in any event, I started Vietnamese language training with CORDS class number five. The 5th class. In August of 1967. I graduated from the CORDS program with an S-3 in Vietnamese in September of 1968. Went off, again the oldest person in the class. Most were kids. I was then forty. Forty years old. My ear was not as good as some of the other kids. Most of the people in the class were in their twenties.

Q: What motivated the people?

BROWN: A lot of the kids off on a lark, not knowing really what they wanted to do. They were foreign service reserve, limited appointment people who came in to get on the action and go to Vietnam and fight the vicious Cong. Be with the beautiful girls. Get out in the countryside. There was some of that. There was also some very idealistic, highly motivated people who felt that this was the way to serve the country. We had to help the South Vietnamese win their battle. There was a very pronounced strain of that. I can tell you that when the Tet Offensive came along in 1968, right in the middle of our class, it knocked the hell out of our morale. We thought, "Jeez, what are we doing?" "Why should we be involved in this?" And then you add, all this other turmoil going on, the anti-war movement was getting going in the spring, you had the assassination of Martin Luther King, the assassination of Bobby Kennedy, Washington burning. I remember having to walk back from Arlington to my place in Washington, because the bridge was closed. They were burning things in Georgetown, burning things on 14th Street.

Q: You probably saw the same thing I did, which was troops of the 82nd Airborne, in black jackets and helmets, walking through the main street in Georgetown.

BROWN: That's right. I remember them pushing me off the sidewalks, saying I can't walk there. "What do you mean, I live here," I said. "Get out of here." I remember that very clearly.

So that had a big impact on a lot of us, and many of us felt in going to Vietnam at the time, "Why are we going there?" But also, the feeling, "Let's get the hell out of Vietnam" became more and more pronounced as I stayed. I stayed on that tour of duty until April of 1970. Of course, Johnson declined to run again, Nixon was elected. The announcement was made that we were getting out of Vietnam. The Paris talks were proceeding, etc., etc., so this whole momentum was going in that direction. None the less, the motivation was very very strong in 1967 and really carried through. Those of us that went to the provinces in the fall of 1968, happened to get in on what turned out to be the most successful era of the Vietnam involvement. In the countryside. Largely thanks to the terrible communist losses suffered during the Tet Offensive. Which, particularly in the Mekong Delta, where I was assigned, and we can get to that in a minute, and in Vinh Long province, in MR4 which was comprised of thirteen provinces (Military Region No. 4, which was the most southern of the regions in Vietnam). My province was Vinh Long Province, right in the middle. At any rate, during the Tet Offensive, it was in that area that the Viet Cong infrastructure had been absolutely devastated. Probably to a greater extent than in MR3, which was the area around Saigon, to the north. Or even in MR2, which was the largest military region, in the center of Vietnam.

In the Delta, much of the activity of the Tet Offensive was carried out by local Viet Cong battalions, as distinguished from the North Vietnamese battalions that were so prominent in the center and northern part of South Vietnam. They were badly torn up. Badly torn up. Not only in the Tet Offensive itself, but in the second wave which took place in May of 1968. As a result, what you had was a vacuum beginning in the summer and fall of 1968, into which was thrown immense American resources. And I was part of those resources. Virtually everybody in my class, of CORDS 5, were posted in the Mekong Delta. In my province, Vinh Long province, of 500,000 people, we had deputy province advisors 11 young civilians. We had a civilian Vietnamese- speaking bright, shining new officer in all of the districts. Amazing. In addition to a very heavy contingent of province headquarters, which was where I was. I started out there as head of the revolutionary development program, the second ranking civilian in the province, American civilian, and was moved up to be deputy province senior advisor, the ranking civilian. Head of all of the civilians. Frequently a chief of a 200-man joint military-civilian team. Provincial Advisory Team No. 68. At that time it was the golden era of pacification. I prefer to call it rural reconstruction.

What we were trying to do was take many of the precepts of communist political and social organization, and apply it with American resources and democratic twist, and a participatory twist to the South Vietnamese environment. Vinh Long was one of the places it worked fairly well.

Q: What was the capital?

BROWN: It was Vinh Long town. Then there were seven districts. The capital had a population of 50-60,000.

Q: What was the economic basis?
