BROWN: Vinh Long was a very well-endowed province from many respects. Geographically, it was located -- it is now Cuu Long Province. I visited there, by the way, a year and a half ago. Went back and saw my old place -- between the two branches of the Mekong River. So the Mekong River flows on either side. So you had an excellent water system on either extremity of the province. Then you had a canal, called the Mang Thit Nicolai canal, built by the French, at the beginning part of the century, which traversed it right down the middle. Then you had National Road No. 4 constructed by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which connected Vinh Long to the capital of the Mekong Delta, Can Tho. You had some very strong anti-communist religious minorities there. In addition to the Catholics, you had the Hoa Hao, which controlled one district, and then you had the Cao Dai, which controlled another district. These were assets to the rebuilding of the province. It was very fertile ground, alluvial soil, as most of the delta is. But this was particularly good, because it had been cultivated and canaled and developed during the years. It was one of the favorite provinces of the French, and indeed in the Diem eras, Ngo Dinh Thuc, had been the Archbishop. His cathedral there dominated Vinh Long town. Vinh Long was traditionally a province of absentee French and rich Vietnamese landlords. Interestingly enough, one of my Vietnamese teachers at FSI was the daughter of the man who was then the president of the Vietnamese Senate and later to be Foreign Minister, Tran Van Lam, and later to be president of Vietnam in its waning days.

In any event, Tran Van Lam's wife came from Vinh Long and they were representative of the landed, monied absentee Francophile Vietnamese aristocracy which as we both know, were part of the problem in South Vietnam. Part of the problem why we lost. Why the government was never able to fully capture the allegiance of the people who, basically were very hostile to the French era.

Vinh Long was really one of the provinces that exemplified this particular aspect of colonial French society and post colonial era. The province chief that I worked with very closely during my entire time there Duong Hieu Nghia, a full colonel in the army. The army of the Republic of Vietnam. He was a dangerous man. Dangerous to Thieu, the president. Nghia was a dashing, armored officer, who knew how to run a tank and an armored personnel carrier as a major in 1963. Gosh, five years earlier. He was the man who commanded the armored personnel carrier that escorted Ngo Dinh Diem and his brother Nhu from their hideout in Cholon in Saigon, to their death. I am not sure Nghia fired the bullets, but he was sitting on top, commanding the APC while one of Duong Van Minh's special agents actually fired the machine gun into Diem and his brother who were bound, lying in the APC, helpless. And later they were also bayoneted and messed up badly. Anyway Nghia was the guy who commanded the APC that carried out this operation in November 2 or 3, of 1963. He was considered a man too ambitious by half by Thieu and was never trusted, for some reason. Of course this is another one of the reasons why the generals who took over after Diem's downfall, and the whole era of the coups and counter coups, '63, '64, '65, and it was only because of the Tet Offensive, which destroyed most of the countryside that Nghia was brought from relative obscurity to go down there and command that province. He did a magnificent job.

He was a tough son of a bitch. But very enlightened in many ways. Very personable guy. In my view, the kind of province chief that, had this kind of individual been running the provinces of Vietnam all during the war instead of the sycophants that Diem employed as province chiefs, the course of the war would have been very, very different. I worked very closely with him.

Q: You left Vietnam and you went back to Washington for a very short tour. Could you tell us what you were doing?

BROWN: In the winter of 1968-69 I received a visit from the then Director General of the Foreign Service John Burns, who spent a day or two in Vinh Long Province as part of his tour around Vietnam, for the purpose of recruiting officers and strengthening the State participation of the CORDS program. It was one of the great ironies of the whole American effort that it was only in 1969 when the political decision had been made to get out of Vietnam, and Vietnamization was in full swing, that the State Department finally realized the importance of having a strong State representation in the CORDS program. I cannot recall how many State officers were in the CORDS then but I do know by 1970, when I got back to Washington, and was given the assignment people for the CORDS program, junior officers mainly, that by the end of 1970-71, the CORDS program, State foreign service complement, had increased rapidly. I was given a mandate. Burns came out to Vietnam to survey this question, and when he left I subsequently got a cable from him asking me to come back to Washington to enter Personnel again and be his CORDS person. Which I did.

Q: Give me an idea of how Burns and the institution see our participation in CORDS at that time?

BROWN: This is a whole volume unto itself because the participation of the regular foreign service really should be the subject of a very detailed analysis, because what I think some people in our service finally realized was the rather extraordinary opportunity for political activism that was offered by the CORDS program. It was the only place in the service that you could really get into nation-building and revolution-making, to be honest with you. And a lot of us were in it for that reason. Or felt called to be involved for that reason. Up until that time, it was strictly a volunteer program. Some people raised their hand and went. I remember Terry MacNamara for one. Steve Ledogar up in Military Region One. Frank Wisner and some other people had gone in. But basically it was not a program that people sought out.

With John Burns as Director General and his special assistant Jim Farber, who came with him to Vietnam, the attitude had changed. In fact the mandate had come down from Robert Komer, and elsewhere in the White House that the CORDS program, the pacification of Vietnam, was an essential element of American policy in Vietnam. But of course at an even higher level, the decision had been made to get out of Vietnam. The thought was, as Nixon took over the presidency, as I understand correctly and from reading his memoirs and other memoirs such as Neil Sheehan's biography of John Paul Vann, there was a feeling that the United States could remain in Vietnam in some degree of another three or four years. Which actually was the case until 1973. During this period there would be a certain intensive effort made in the countryside to bring about the political, economic and social revolution that had been distinctly lacking in Vietnam until that time.

In any event I was called back to Washington and entered on duty as I recall around June or July 1970 as John Burns' special representative for the CORDS program. My sole responsibility was to recruit mainly junior officers. The decision was made by then under secretary for management Macomber, to first assign people to the CORDS program and a massive effort was made to pack the program full of junior officers, generally Class 7, Class 6 some Class 5 people. And my responsibility was to do exactly that. Several new classes of FSO-8s and FSO-7s were brought on board in the '70-'71 period only on condition that they go to Vietnam on their first tour. A number of people turned down the appointments to the Service at that time.

Q: This was a period of great protest. So to say this was to be much more specific than even in the military. Because if you enlisted in the military you might end up in NATO or something like that. Whereas we were saying, "Go to Vietnam." Not everyone did but....

BROWN: It is one of the great ironies.

It might show a certain consciousness-lag in the American Foreign Service. In my personal view, had the State Department understood the importance of bringing about political change among "our Vietnamese" in Vietnam, instead of relying upon big battalions in the Westmoreland Search and Destroy strategy which is so well documented in the Neil Sheehan book, if we had done that in 1963, '64, '65, to a much greater degree in the predecessors of CORDS, OKO and the provincial reporting program, etc., which were good but very, very small, adjuncts of policy at that time, if we had adopted a different attitude at that time, then the course of the world might have been very different. Of course you would have had to have a corresponding de-emphasis of the military aspect of the war which I don't believe would have happened.

In any event I was responsible for the forced assignment of a number of officers. Interestingly there was no lack of volunteers at the senior levels. By that time it had become known that being a CORDS province senior advisor in Vietnam was first of all a fascinating assignment because you got to be number one or two on a 2-300 man provincial team doing very very interesting as we euphemistically call it program direction in the Foreign Service.

Q: Which means having executive responsibility.

BROWN: Which means running something, being involved in the war and often in fascinating provinces. By that time frequently working with Vietnamese senior officers who were rather good, finally. So we had no lack of what were then FSO-3s, FSO-1 now or Senior Officers.

Q: Foreign Service Colonel level.

BROWN: Yes, Foreign Service Colonel level. We had no lack of volunteers. But there again, the people who volunteer, in many cases in my view, in my recollection, people who were sort of desperate for a good assignment. We didn't really get the top notch, with a few exceptions, we didn't get the people such as we had gotten before. Like Frank Wisner, who was a province senior advisor, and some others of that caliber. We often got people who were somewhat older - no disrespect for age, I was quite old when I entered the program - but people who were rather anxious about advancement in the Foreign Service took this as a possibility of getting promoted.

Q: Wasn't this also held out as saying extra credit will be given on promotion panels?

BROWN: That became a very, very difficult question. I have not done a detailed study, and there again I think some thought is required on this.

Part of my mandate was to get good onward assignments for people coming out of CORDS. So during that year period, I not only assigned people to CORDS, I made sure that people coming out of CORDS were given good assignments. My recollection was that I was fairly successful in doing that because I had Macomber's and Burns' backing. So the Personnel Division would be talking to the regional personnel saying "Hey look, we have this young guy FSO-6 coming out of a year and a half of the CORDS program and he's done a great job and we want him to get a good desk job. As I recall we were fairly successful in that. Later on however in 1972, '73, as people finished up their tours subsequently, I am not sure that was the case. Certainly for senior people coming out of the CORDS program it was not always possible to get them good jobs as I recall. But in any event, these promises were made to the incoming classes in 1970 and 1971, during my time there and as I recall, scores, I can't remember the precise figure, but certainly as many as a hundred young officers went into the CORDS program, including women. The famous Alison Palmer case, you probably remember. Alison Palmer was in the CORDS headquarters as I recall, in Nha Trang, MR2 (Military Region Number 2) and she, as I recall, requested a CORDS assignment. Any way, there is a long tale of what happened in her struggle for equal opportunity for women in Vietnam. There were many problems associated with the CORDS program. A lot of these young officers were married, and had one small child, and the question of whether or not their family could either accompany them to certain places in Vietnam or had to be put in Bangkok. We had a large number of young families temporarily housed in Bangkok. There were special visiting privileges in the same way that the military had. My job during that year was to get the whole program going. I should mention another bureaucratic aspect of this. It is indicative of the way Vietnam operated going on its latter years from the American perspective. There was resentment among the AID FSR career AID types and the career Vietnam types.

Q: Language officers?

BROWN: No. I am talking about people who had made a career out of Vietnam. Who by 1970-'71 had been involved in Vietnam affairs, in some cases, for ten years. I'll mention a name fondly, George Jacobson who by that time had become a de facto head of the CORDS program below the Ambassadorial level, be it Komer or Colby. Jacobson had been in Vietnam for many, many years. He was a retired Army colonel. I refer you to the Sheehan's book which gives a lot of background on him. In any event Jacobson was a classic bureaucratic manager and he looked upon this influx of young and particularly senior level Foreign Service Officers who stayed as a threat to the rice bowl of many of the people who were his colleagues. Who were retired army majors, lieutenant colonels and colonels who had gone into AID on the civilian side of the CORDS program and made a career of it. I remember going to Vietnam after I had been in the job a couple of months. I went over for a tour, and my presence in Vietnam was actually resisted by the CORDS bureaucracy because they felt that I was too energetic in assigning State Department officers to billets that would normally be reserved to these career Vietnam types, not these young political types coming in from the Foreign Service. That is an interesting aside to it; particularly true for province senior advisor positions which were very much sought after. Part of the deal that the State Department made with the White House was that the State Department would not be regulated to simply supplying the infantry. They wanted the officers. So for every three young district senior advisors, we wanted one province level officer, and this was resisted. Resisted very strongly. And Jacobson and the whole CORDS bureaucracy as a whole said, "No, no, no, you've got it wrong. What we need are these bright young guys trained in language who go out to work in the field. That's where they can really do some good. We don't want them up there in the program management level." So this presented interesting...

Q: Let me ask you something here. About this time I was serving in our embassy. My impression, please correct me if I'm wrong, was that many of these career men were not very successful officers in the military and probably would not have been relatively moderate-ranking people in almost any organization. And they had seen this as an opportunity -- this often happens during a wartime situation -- to entrench themselves. Many had mistresses. They had really set themselves up very nicely. Was this your impression?

BROWN: Absolutely. There were some very fine officers in the CORDS program both military and civilian, but by and large the retired military guys that converted over subsequently, and took appointments with AID often at very, very fat salaries, plus all the special things, 20% extra for hazard pay, family allowances and visitation and all the accoutrements.

Q: Visitation that their families could stay in Manila or Thailand or back in the States.

BROWN: So that they could enjoy a very nice life in Vietnam. This was not always the case. A number of people I worked with were first-rate ex-military guys or career AID guys, but there was a large complement of losers, mediocre people who were attracted to remain in Vietnam -- John Paul Vann was a quintessential example of it -- by reason of the beauty of the women, deliciousness of the food, the proximity of danger and adventure but not too close, and the opportunity to be involved in a rather remarkable undertaking even in its waning days. (Vann, please understand, was a superbly effective individual despite the side that the Sheehan book emphasizes.) Particularly because it was in its waning days. Because after 1971-72, there were very few American units in combat, in fact the last American combat unit left sometime in 1972. A lot of Air Force remained. As you recall the Easter Offensive of 1972. But the last American combat units really for all intents and purposes, were withdrawn during 1971.

I'm getting ahead of my story a little bit. I want to move back up to Da Nang, but the hey day, the golden days of provincial work in Vietnam was from the summer of 1968, the post-Tet period, through 1971 into 1972, when the government of the Republic of Vietnam, was reaching its peak of effectiveness, and the government's control of the countryside was probably the greatest it would ever be. This is when the Foreign Service officers were really also at their peak of effectiveness. I guess the peak number of FSOs in the Vietnam program, the CORDS program, probably was reached sometime in 1971, maybe early 1972. And your figures will reveal more accurately than my memory but it strikes me that at one point we had 300 Foreign Service personnel trained in Vietnamese. Not all of them were in the CORDS program.

I'll give you two specific examples because I think they are interesting, of how the CORDS program operated in 1970-71. One of our very senior members of the Foreign Service still on active duty, M. Charles Hill, many years later special assistant to George Shultz, now a career minister. I can recount the situation with Charlie Hill, a very dear friend of mine. He was at Harvard in 1970, studying in the Chinese program. He was a linguist and he had taken a year at Harvard. He came out of Harvard as a very well regarded middle level officer. He was ripe for the CORDS program. His profile was everything that you wanted. He was a strong manager, knew Chinese very well, knew Asia very well. He was considered to be one of the most up and coming officers that we had, and he got on the CORDS profile. He received word that he was assigned to CORDS. Well he refused to go. His case became one of the very first test cases of the forced assignment policy. Macomber got into it and so did John Burns, obviously as did Cleo Noel, then director of personnel for John Burns. To make a long story short, Charlie Hill was given three choices, go to CORDS, or take an assignment to the American Embassy in Saigon, to prove that he was not against going to Vietnam. His third choice was to resign. Well, Charlie Hill chose to take a position in the Embassy in Saigon. He said that he had nothing against going to Vietnam, but "I do not believe in the CORDS program. I do believe in the Foreign Service and going where I am assigned, but this is out of the Foreign Service, so to speak." So Charlie Hill ended up in the Embassy in Saigon as special assistant to Ellsworth Bunker. Charlie Hill stayed on a long time. He stayed on three or four years and came to be one of the solid supporters of the Mission Direction. He ended up as executive director of the mission in Saigon to Bunker and then came back to Washington and of course the rest is history. He was special assistant to Bunker during the Panama negotiations, he went to Tel Aviv as political counselor, came back as executive director of the department, etc. etc. onward and upward, in our system to become career minister. Charlie Hill was the test case of the forced assignment policy.

Another example was the young man that I picked to go to Da Nang with me in 1971 as vice consul. His name is Craig Dunkerley. Who also has risen to senior officer status now, mainly in European Affairs but also in Japan Affairs too. Craig Dunkerley was somewhat hesitant about going to the CORDS program. He was not hesitant at all about serving in Vietnam. He ended up first as vice consul and then as political officer in the American Consulate General in Da Nang in the 1971-1973 period. Craig did a brilliant job as a very young officer. He was the kind of individual who was part of the protest movement in college. He came right into the A-100 course, I interviewed him. He was an actor, a drama major in college, and he was recommended to me by the director of the A-100 course (the junior officer course). In any event Craig Dunkerley had serious misgivings about our policy in Vietnam. Nonetheless he volunteered for about six or eight months of Vietnamese language training, and picked it up quickly. He ended up in Da Nang where he, and I've seen him recently (this is now twenty years later), had really the seminal experience of his life as vice consul and then political reporter of Central Vietnam. So I am sure you could multiply these examples by several hundred as to how people fared.

Q: We had a considerable number of the young men and women coming in. Most of them were...Foreign Service essentially recruits an elite and the elite in those days was usually in the protest movement. Against the war in Vietnam. Was there some soul searching or brain washing? What was going on that got these young civilians to go into Vietnam?

BROWN: Well, I will never know how many potential officers were lost, frankly when they were given this letter, which said you are hereby appointed an FSR-8 on condition that you accept as your first assignment, a CORDS assignment. There were always exceptions to that, of course, but it was a general policy for about a year or two. I don't know how many people were lost because of that. I think one could infer from the way the program operated that people who accepted the letter of invitation to join the service, to take an appointment, were generally willing, although reluctantly, to take an assignment in the CORDS program.

The forced assignment of junior officers did not last very long. My recollection is that there were not more than three or four incoming classes of FSO-8s and 7s that were subject to this. It lasted until and through 1970 into 1971. The program, for several reasons, was dropped. One big reason was the handwriting was on the wall. That if you appointed an officer to the program in 1971, and he took a year in training, that he wouldn't get there until 1972, and the thought was that if we stayed in Vietnam in the provinces through 1973 that was probably it. That was correct. Because many of the people who went into training after I left that personnel assignment, many of those people were the ones who ended up in Vietnam in 1973 and 74 and were the political reporters in the consulate generals around Vietnam up until 1975 when the place collapsed. But many of them were the ones who came in the program in 1971-72, because of the long lead time.

Q: What sort of feedback were you getting? Our generation had learned how to live with the military, and many of us had served with it, but you were getting a new group that was coming out that was very suspicious of all these things. How did these young people relate to them. And the military relate to them?

BROWN: It's hard for me to make a generalization on that. I do know in many cases some of the most unlikely people, the ones I was in training with for example, in 1967, I was fifteen to twenty years older than them. Some of them I would classify as hippies, or protest movement people or simply adventurers. Some of them were AID employees, not regular State people. So these people who I would have considered very unlikely ended up being excellent officers with a capital O in the provinces of Vietnam and got along very well with the military. Others did not do as well. It is hard for me to generalize. But I will say that if I could make this generalization, the top notch FSOs of middle grade, when they were assigned to the provinces as district senior advisors, deputy province advisors or province senior advisors, found that working with the U.S. military had a lot of pain, a lot of difficulties, but by gosh was a rather rewarding experience in that CORDS environment because of the unique relationship between civilians and military. In my province, for example, we had eleven or twelve civilians. I was the ranking civilian in Vinh Long as deputy province advisor, and frequently acting as province senior advisor, and I worked with between 100 and 200 military men under me. Majors, captains, first lieutenants, by and large. I found it a most rewarding experience. I think my experience was not unusual at all.

Q: How were things going then? What was the atmosphere in Washington?

BROWN: When I got back in 1970 we were still deeply involved in the war. By the time I got to Da Nang, as principal officer in 1971, the Vietnamization program was in full swing and the units were being removed. Perhaps we ought to move to that period.

I left this particular personnel assignment in July of 1971 and arrived in Da Nang the same month as principal officer there replacing Francis Terry MacNamara, whom I had replaced, oddly enough in Vinh Long province in 1968.

Q: When I was in Saigon, Da Nang's consular affairs were handled by my department in Saigon and so Terry was technically under me. It was purely a paper relationship however. By the time you arrived, Da Nang was a consulate.

BROWN: And it did do a good bit of consular work. But its real purpose was political reporting and I had two vice consuls under me, one of whom did nothing but consular work. There was plenty, marriages, notariats galore for citizenship purposes. Occasionally a protection problem. But it was the other vice consul and my job was 99% political, in terms of reporting and representation. As the American presence dwindled down, the consulate became more important, and in 1973, in January of 1973, of course, the CORDS program ended and all the CORDS program people who stayed on for development purposes, AID administrative purposes, were shifted and put under the consul general which I then became. By that time, when I arrived in July of 1971 there were 100,000 American military personnel in Military Region One. 100,000. I said goodbye to the last military man on January 30, 1973. His name was Colonel William Walker and I'll never forget watching him get on the last DC-7 leaving Da Nang airport and waving goodbye and thought, "Jesus, that's it. There's no more American military in Da Nang." Absolutely incredible to think. Actually there were American military who stayed behind to operate the quadripartite military commission and these were American helicopter units that were put under control of the ICCS (International Commission on Control and Supervision which was set up under the Paris agreement of January 1973) in effect. So these were helicopter units that had something else painted on their helicopter. They were replaced eventually by Air America units which were virtually the same helicopters, and in our consulate general in the 1973 era, we had a number of Department of Defense personnel in civilian clothes who were there for intelligence gathering and reporting purposes. Then we had a large contingent of CIA which was under the consulate general which had not been the case before. When I arrived the CIA had a huge station in there which reported directly to Saigon but when we became a consulate general the CIA was moved out of its rather luxurious quarters and moved into the consulate general building there in Da Nang.

In any event I went there, to a five US personnel post, myself, two vice consuls, an administrative officer and an American secretary. And it stayed that way until January 1973 when it was upgraded to consulate general, because of the peace accords, and I stayed until July 1973. At that time my colleague, the deputy for CORDS, each one of the four military regions in Vietnam had a deputy for CORDS who was an American civilian. In many cases they were retired military, but in the case of when I arrived, in fact here is another example which I should have cited along with Charlie Hill and Craig Dunkerley, is John Gunther Dean, whom we all know is one of the grand ambassadors subsequently of the American Foreign Service. I think he's had more ambassadorial posts than any Foreign Service officer that I can remember, six or seven now. John Dean came out of the Bowie Seminar at Harvard in 1970. He was looking for a job. (Have you interviewed him yet?) He has just retired after being Ambassador to India, and before that to Lebanon, Denmark, Cambodia and Laos. But at that time John Dean, and he would be the first to confirm this, was a placement problem, because he was so bright and cantankerous and so ambitious. John never hid his light under a bushel, but I remember John Dean flying down from Cambridge in 1970 and Burns said, "Hey Fred you've got to find a job for the hot shot from Harvard. We're having a little bit of a difficulty finding a job for him. He's been to the Paris peace talks, he's a real go-getter. See what you can do."

John Dean flew down from Cambridge and I described the CORDS program and he said, "Wow, that's sounds like just the kind of thing I would like to get involved in. How can I get a job in that program." "Well," I said, "It just so happens that I have a job..." He ended up as deputy, the number two job, to a senior AID fellow in Military Region Number One, Da Nang, and then when that gentlemen left, John Dean took over as number one. He was my colleague during much of the time that I was there. Did an excellent job. He had a propensity for this kind of job. Military organization in a war zone, basically, and John took to it like a duck to water. We saw a lot of each other and indeed suffered through the Easter Offensive of April, May 1972 and flew together and tried to get into Quang Tri Province, the capital city there that was on the verge of falling, north of Hue, right on the DMZ. On the way back, John and I were riding along in the helicopter and we took a number of rounds and were forced to descend in the helicopter very rapidly and almost crashed. But we went through quite a bit together and John left in the summer of 1972 to become DCM in Laos, DCM to Mac Godley, I guess. Then he stayed in Laos and did a number of things there including trying to contain counter coups on the part of the conservatives in Vientiane. For his good work he was made Ambassador to Cambodia as I recall, replacing either Coby Swank or Tom Enders and became famous for carrying the flag out of Phnom Penh in April of 1975. But this all began with John Dean's initial assignment to the CORDS program where he became well and favorably known to people like Charlie Whitehouse, to Sam Berger and Ellsworth Bunker and Bill Sullivan, the people who were basically running the American involvement in Indochina.

The CORDS program in central Vietnam in Military Region Number One was moved over under the program direction of the newly established American consulate general in Da Nang. And the same thing obviously happened in the other three military regions. Tom Barnes became consul general in Can Tho, Monty Spear became consul general in Nha Trang, and in Bien Hoa, Military Region Number Three, I forget. In any event foreign service officers were there by statute I guess. To be a consul general you had to be a career foreign service officer. And there were a lot of problems in that regard. I had a terrible problem in Da Nang because I took over an organization which at that time was being run by a retired army colonel. The deputy for CORDS. He thought he was going to become consul general. Well it was not to be. I was appointed consul general by Ellsworth Bunker and the guy that I had been number two to, became my number two. And he did not like that a bit. He saluted and did it for a while but it was a painful experience for him. He was a former army colonel who had been in combat and he was a heliborn assault pilot. Knew how to fly helicopters and all that. He was, I think this happened in many places around the country, as the American presence changed radically in 1973 with the Paris peace accords. I was succeeded by Paul Pople, former consul general in Milan, Italy, and I left.

Q: What was the situation there and what were you doing?

BROWN: For the first year and a half, while I was principal officer I was doing mainly political reporting dealing with some of what was left of the political party system in central Vietnam. Where it was strongest in all places in Vietnam. The VNQDD, the Dai Viet, the Tan Dai Viet, all the small nationalist parties that were the residue of the anti-French struggle, and the anti-Viet Minh struggle, and the anti-Viet Cong struggle in the previous decades. They all had their headquarters in central Vietnam. My duty was relate to them and also to the An Quang Buddhist movement in Hue. You recall the American consulate had originally been in Hue and it was burned down in 1964 during the riots there and was moved subsequently to Da Nang. More secure environment. My job was to relate to the Buddhists and I regularly paid calls to all the An Quang pagodas in Hue and in Da Nang. My job was mainly that and to increasingly relate to the senior Vietnamese officials in Military Region One which comprised of Da Nang, Hue and five provinces, Quang Tri, Thua Thien, Quang Nam, Quang Tin, Quang Ngai, where probably the bitterest fighting in the entire place had taken place in the period of fifteen years. The Street Without Joy, etc. The nature of the job changed radically with the Paris peace talks. I became principal officer of some two hundred people in the consulate general. We had small subsidiary posts in Hue, Quang Nam, in the city of Hoi An, in Quang Tin for a while in Tamky and in Quang Ngai city itself. So it was a consulate general with as I recall four constituent listening posts, generally one or two Americans with four Vietnamese working in those constituent posts. As consul general I had supervisory responsibility for political reporting which then took on immense importance. We were beefed up during that period. We had six or seven officers on detached duty from Washington. A lot of them were old CORDS types.

BROWN: So a lot of our political reporters who came back in January of 1973 were usually assigned usually on a six-month duty, were former CORDS types, former political reporters, political section people from the American Embassy in Saigon. Again this was a forced assignment for many of these people, other accepted it with great pleasure. As I recall we had six or eight people in our political section of our consulate general, including a political reporter in Hue and one part time in Quang Ngai.

Q: You have a government run by a former army general, Thieu. Democracy is a pretty fragile flower and so was this just feeding Washington or what good did this do. Couldn't one person do the job, "the political situation was chaotic..."

BROWN: It was more than the political situation, it was the security situation. To be perfectly honest with you, I spent a minimal amount of time in the political reporting of the closed sense. It was reporting on the geo-political situation in MR1. It was quite clear in 1971 that the North Vietnamese were not going to abide by the Paris peace accords and my job was to report on the security situation in every district, every province under my jurisdiction. And my reports were not just about the political party maneuverings in MR1 but about how the morale in the western district in Quang Nam was holding up. Whether or not the government of Vietnam was doing what was necessary to organize the people. It was basically the job of reporting the prospects for survival of the Republic of Vietnam. I became increasingly convinced that the prospects were very very bad.

Q: How were the peace accords viewed by you and your Vietnamese contacts. Was this considered a sell-out, a graceful way of getting the hell out?

BROWN: I suspect the situation in my military region, central Vietnam, was different and more precarious than the rest of Vietnam. In the Mekong Delta, MR4, you had a very very different situation, where the government had de facto control over the majority of the people and the territory in MR4. The situation changed in MR3 and 2. But in MR1 you had a precarious situation, with the Demilitarized Zone, a World War II-type battle zone with three or four divisions on each side heavily equipped with artillery, well-honed fighting forces facing each other across a phony military dividing line, you had the North Vietnamese army anywhere from fifteen to twenty miles to the west of the major populated areas. You had a geographic situation which was intolerable, in which the mountains in many cases came down to within a few miles of the sea, the Que Son Mountain Range, south of Da Nang was a spit of mountain territory that stuck out and almost cut the main road going south from Da Nang to the three provinces to the south. It was an intolerable situation. You had the Vietnamese military units, ARVN Divisions, 1st and 2nd, and 3rd, plus the paratroop division and the marine division, a total of six divisions assigned permanently in defensive positions to defend the major centers of Da Nang, which by that time, a million, a million and a half people, a big city; Hue which probably had 500,000 people, not to mention the four other provincial capitals, which were quite large provincial towns. To me it was an intolerable and untenable situation. I think the military people realized how untenable it was in 1973. My counterpart became in 1973 Lieutenant General Ngo Quang Truong, now a broken man, a computer programmer in Arlington, Va. At that time I used to see General Truong every day for a briefing, I sat next to him in the military briefings to which I was privy. In his headquarters, and one of the changes that I suggested, was that instead of my sitting next to him, in the front row, as we had these daily military briefings, to move the Americans to the background. That was quite a traumatic thing. The daily briefings to which all the officers went, etc., etc., finally the ranking American officer is moved from the front row, sitting at the right hand of the Vietnamese to the back row. I'm told that later on, my successor was excluded from that briefing entirely, which I think was an excellent idea. Because the name of the game at that time, as I discussed with General Truong, was to get out from under the Americans in a hurry, to the extent that you could. That's nice to say but the Vietnamese were flying American airplanes, they were driving American APCs and tanks, they were using American M-16s and they relied on Americans 100% for ammunition and oil. So it is one thing to say, divorce yourself from the American presence, psychologically, politically, geo-politically, it's one thing to be able to say that and another to be able to do it. In material terms. This was the basic dilemma, in my view unsolvable dilemma, of Vietnamese between 1973 and 1975. It proved to be their undoing. But General Truong and I talked about this quite a bit and I said, I remember my last meeting with General Truong when I left in July 1973, I said, "Under no circumstances trust the Americans. You are in the process of being abandoned." He said, "I know that." I said this in the context of a number of rumblings that Thieu was not doing what was necessary to make the Republic of Vietnam stand on its own two feet. There was talk about who would replace Thieu. Would there be a coup. General Truong was one of the few people looked upon as potential presidential material. And another coup. I was a great admirer of General Truong and often said to him, "If you are going to make a move, you'd better make it soon, because this country... The Americans are leaving. Don't count on the United States to come back." At that time, Watergate had not broken, although it was in the process of breaking. I claim no clairvoyance at that time to predict what would happen to the ability of the American president to support the Vietnamese as we had been. But I had the uneasy feeling that the whole thing was going to fall down. From the geo-political point of view, if you looked up at those mountains, you could see where the North Vietnamese divisions were. I'd go up in my airplane on the way to Saigon and divert a little bit to the west and you could see the clouds of dust as the North Vietnamese were building their four-lane highway south, putting in their 16 inch fuel pipeline that would lead all the way south, hundreds of miles to the south, which would fuel their tanks which eventually took Saigon. The hundreds of tanks which eventually defeated the ARVN in the south, they were not dropped by parachute and they were not manufactured by peasant guerillas, they were driven down the main highway through the Ho Chi Minh trail after getting off Soviet vessels in Haiphong. There is no mystery about how the north finally beat the south. But at that time I had an uneasy feeling that this whole thing was very very unstable. If only because the population center of Da Nang was within easy reach of North Vietnamese rockets and we were rocketed all the time in 1972. There were no rockets in 1973 during the peace agreement. But all during 1972 after the Easter defensive we'd get rockets coming into the CORDS compound. There were a number of people killed, not CORDS people, but Vietnamese in the vicinity. They had the total ability to do it. In fact they had the ability to launch those rockets while there was still 50,000 Americans sitting in Da Nang. They still could rocket the place.

Q: In Saigon, the morning weather report would also include in which districts rockets fell. What was your experience during the Easter Offensive.

BROWN: Charlie Whitehouse was then the deputy ambassador, he'd replaced Sam Berger, to Bunker. He was sort of Mr. Outside, having been dep-CORDS for Military Region 3. He was Mr. Outside. He did all of the relationships with the people in the countryside. In any event, I remember very clearly getting the word from Saigon, that an offensive was imminent and indeed it took place in a matter of hours after that.

First of all North Vietnamese divisions came across the DMZ, north of Quang Tri. They also came across to the west of Hue and attempted to capture Hue. They did capture the province capital of Quang Tri and drove down to within thirty or forty miles of Hue. They were stopped by massive American bombing and by the mining of Haiphong harbor and by bombing of Hanoi itself. The United States replied in massive form in a way that nobody, nobody expected to be honest with you. American naval vessels stood off the coast of Quang Tri and bombarded the North Vietnamese. Aircraft carriers were in action. Arclight strikes by B-52s were used (saturation bombing by units of three, six or nine B-52s flying wing to wing dropping 75 to 100 tons of bombs each) against North Vietnamese. Concussion type bombs, parachuted bombs, fire bombs, everything you could imagine. The first division of the ARVN, the paratroopers and the marines fought very very well, and with the American support managed to halt the North Vietnamese offensive in the Hue-Quang Tri area. The ARVN 2nd Division was decimated as was the 3rd Division and retreated in panic. It had to be reconstituted completely after the Easter Offensive which lasted several weeks and then there was a period of stalemate and General Truong was appointed the new commander of MR1 and took over job of reconquering a lot of land that had been lost in Quang Tri which he did but he never got back to the DMZ. Never got back. He did recapture, barely, the province town of Quang Tri which I remember had been leveled completely. There was no pile of bricks higher than two or three feet, which had been a town that housed 50,000 people.

Q: Yes, as I recall. I visited there before.

BROWN: Did you?. Yes it was built by the French, by and large, and it was completely destroyed. There was a huge influx of refugees. We received 500-700,000 refugees, the numbers are pretty amazing, into Da Nang. We had to, the CORDS people, John Gunther Dean, set up emergency feeding sites. We took over the old marine and army camps north of Da Nang, you recall where the marines had landed in 1965, huge expanses of military barracks were turned into refugee camps. I remember escorting Ellsworth Bunker there, and there were 2-300,000 refugees in the camp. I remember going with him to visit the refugee areas there in 1972. So we had a massive problem of taking care of the refugees who had fled, remembering the Tet Offensive in 1968 which after all, was only four years only. Everyone fled. One of the little-known massacres, these are the kinds of things that our friends the North Vietnamese never get due credit for. Everyone will remember the Mai Lai massacre but nobody will remember the convoy of death which took place in April of 1972 when the last remaining inhabitants of Quang Tri City were retreating south. They were mainly ARVN dependents, men, women and children (ARVN being Army of the Republic of Vietnam), people in the 1st and 3rd Divisions that had been garrisoning, marine corps division that had been garrisoning the northern military sector there. They and their families were retreating south along the highway from Quang Tri and were ambushed by the North Vietnamese who slaughtered, I don't know what the final count was, but you're talking 10-20,000 people slaughtered by small arms fire and mortar fire. The communists used their favorite tactic of knocking out the lead vehicle and rear vehicle and stalling everybody and slaughtering everybody in the middle. The blame for that is 50% for the North Vietnamese and 50% for the government of Vietnam for having conducted such an inept convoy. I remember going up to that highway and driving along and subsequently taking pictures and smelling the death all along the highway. This was little reported. One man who did report it was Josiah Bennett who was then in the political section in Saigon and Joe Bennett, to his great credit, went up and reported it and tried to make a big thing of it, and didn't get anywhere. People didn't want to hear about it in 1972-73. I think the Vietnamese component of the effort was increasingly overlooked by the American side. We wanted to get the hell out. You recall Nixon and Kissinger had gone to Shanghai, the Shanghai Communique was about the same side, he had his summit meeting with Kosygin. Rapprochement was in the cards, the United States kept up its rapprochement with the Soviet Union. At the same time we were opening up to China. The famous Shanghai was in May of 1972. Kissinger had gone on the secret trip to China in 1971. So the word was, get out of Vietnam. I think the North Vietnamese were rather unhappy that the Chinese would receive Richard Nixon at virtually the same time that he was bombing the hell out of Hanoi and mining the harbor of Haiphong, and causing massive damage to North Vietnam. Likewise the Christmas bombing of 1972, the Chinese sat still while the United States bombed the North Vietnamese back to the negotiating table. Some people will claim that if that bombing at Christmas of 1972 had continued another week, North Vietnam would have surrendered on almost any terms. That is an unprovable assertion but in any event I was very much involved in the reporting of the progress of the Easter Offensive back to Charlie Whitehouse. I did it every night by phone. I sent in cables and this got me in a little bit of trouble with John Dean who was reporting through his channels and there was an interesting dual-channel arrangement here (back channel, etc., etc.).

Q: Were you reporting the same thing?

BROWN: Sometimes not. I would report, my reports as I recall, were far more alarmist than John Dean. And John Dean had to go through his CORDS channels, everything had to be more upbeat. "We've met the enemy and they're ours, and all that." As I recall, my reporting was more blunt. Because I went out and would talk to the French priests who had come with these Vietnamese villages in 1953 and had settled in Quang Tri and had lived there from '54 to '72. They were forced to flee for their lives into Hue. I remember very clearly talking to these old French priests who had stuck with these parishioners all these years. What they had to say was just terrible. I guess my concern was my fear that Vietnamese society would not be able to reconstitute itself as a result of this cataclysmic event in the north.

This was the time when John Paul Vann was killed, leading the defense of the highlands, Military Region II and III. He was killed in June of 1972. This was really a watershed event because the North Vietnamese were able to make inroads into the territory theretofore controlled by the government of Vietnam, ARVN. This was very important because it set the stage for the peace agreement of 1973 and people on the ground realized that the North Vietnamese would do this again. No respect for agreements. It was really a race against time. And it was clear that the Americans were getting out of Vietnam. Thieu was forced to sign the Paris peace accords in 1973, and that was it. And then it began. So I was there for the first six months of that roughly two year period from '73 to '75 during which the Republic of Vietnam existed pretty much on its own. Albeit with immense American material support, billions of dollars a year, and a thousand men in what used to be MACV Headquarters. In '73 it changed from MACV to the Defense Attaché Office. The largest Defense Attaché Office in the world. So I was there roughly for the first quarter of that cease-fire.

Q: I assume you used to go down and meet at the embassy in Saigon.

BROWN: All of the time.

Q: Were they seeing things differently? Was Bunker still the ambassador?

BROWN: Bunker was still the ambassador through May or June of 1973. I could have stayed on. I was just as glad to leave. But Graham Martin didn't want me. He came in in April or May, because the lines of reporting changed. Up until that time I had the ability to send cables directly to Washington. That was stopped immediately, and all my cables were censored after that by the embassy. The ambassador has the right to do this. I do know that I began to correspond directly by pouch with the Vietnam Desk in the East Asia Bureau. My theme was that this was a no win situation. Central Vietnam is going to go. It is going to collapse. The psychological environment is such that anything can trigger the collapse of the military units and indeed that is what happened. It happened in a way that I did not foresee. Because central Vietnam went first. You recall Kontum, Pleiku. They defeated the ARVN there and that triggered the hysteria in MR1 because it was foreseen that we had the population in MR1 of 6 or 7 million people. It was perfectly obvious that MR1 was incapable of defending itself. Absent a huge deterrent strike on the part of the United States. It was the only thing. Because Thieu kept removing some key forces from MR1, paratroopers, for example, and one of the marine corps divisions. And it left MR1 hideously exposed. Even by the time I left, and my word was that the thing wasn't working. And that this was an untenable, extremely difficult situation.

Q: From your perspective the embassy was trying to put on a rosier hue.

BROWN: I felt that going down to Saigon and sitting in one of those mission council meetings, where they'd call down the four consul generals and Creighton Abrams, senior military guy there at that time, and he was replaced by lower-ranking generals, I felt a sense of other-worldness. That modern air-conditioned, carpeted...

Q: I was in a not very air-conditioned annex with consular problems. A whole world.

BROWN: But in that building you went up to the seventh or eighth floor, and you saw how they operated. I felt that it was.... Particularly, Ellsworth Bunker, who was a man of a certain age, even then. I felt it was an unreal atmosphere. Very, very strange. Look, I don't claim that I knew then what was going to happen. I do know that I was terribly uneasy and that I felt that the world as we knew it was going to come to an end. I didn't know when it would be, whether it would be '74 or '75 or 1980. I had no idea. But I did know that we were on the edge of a tragedy. I did know that.

Q: You came back in the summer of 1973. I assume you talked to the people on the desk.

BROWN: Yes, I talked to Bill Sullivan.

Q: How did they feel about the situation?

BROWN: My recollection, and giving it not much thought, is that they didn't give a shit. Just interested in getting out. Get out. Our interests lie elsewhere. I felt that the Vietnam working group, the Vietnam problem used to take over the whole EA bureau, but my impression was that nobody was very interested. "Yes, very interesting, Fred. Thank you very much. Bye, bye." kind of thing. People really didn't care.

Q: So what did you do then?

BROWN: I entered the senior seminar.

CARL EDWARD DILLERY
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Quang Ngai (1968-1969)

Ambassador Carl Edward Dillery was born and raised in Seattle, Washington. He graduated from Seattle Pacific University with a degree in history. One of his professors gave him an information pamphlet on the Foreign Service from the State Department. He did graduate from University of Washington and the University of California Berkeley, but received his master's degree from George Washington in Administration of National Security. In addition, he has served in Japan, Belgium, England, Greece, and the Fiji Islands. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 2, 1994.

Q: How did this Vietnam thing develop for you?

DILLERY: As I said, Chris Petrow roiled me up so strongly...he was a wonderful person who later became head of Mexican Affairs in the Department. He was just a real idealist. He was one of the people who was prepared to speak his piece at any given moment. Very liberal in his thinking. He was totally opposed to the war and it was driving him bananas. Then he proceeded to drive me bananas. So when a telegram came out requesting volunteers for Vietnam, the thought came to me that this would probably be the biggest foreign policy development that would affect our country during my time in the Foreign Service and I really should know something about it. Probably the best way would be to go.

Q: Going to see the elephant, I think is the term.

DILLERY: Something like that. So I sent in my request to volunteer and I remember Ambassador Knight called me in and said, "I know that Brussels is not Paris or Rome, but why would you ever want to leave Brussels?" I sort of wanted to say to him at that point, "Mr. Ambassador, I am not going to Paris or Rome." I explained to him what it was.

That was Christmas of 1967 and I came back and took the training course at old Arlington Towers training center.

Q: It was in the old garage.

DILLERY: Yes, the old garage. I started the training course and the more I thought about not wanting to do this it was too late.

Q: How did your family react to this?

DILLERY: Not well. My wife took this as desertion and said to me, "I would divorce you but that is the easy way out for you." They stayed in Washington, in Arlington where we had a home. I went out in March, 1968 and was in Quang Ngai until mid-December 1969. While I was in training the TET offensive of February 1968 occurred.

Q: What were you getting from your training? What was the attitude and how was the training getting you ready for Vietnam?

DILLERY: There were three different types of people in my training course. There were some like me, who were volunteers, not very many. There were a lot of junior officers who were being drafted and very unhappy about it. Then there were other people who were going out who had been hired to go to Vietnam to work for AID. Actually, all of us were going to be part of AID because we going to a program called Civil Operations for Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS). The training course was oriented towards that because this was CORDS training. In other words there was the embassy always at a much higher level and much more zippy than CORDS, obviously.

So this was strictly CORDS training. It essentially was to introduce us to Vietnam, give us a little bit of the history, the traditions and culture. Then there was a description of the CORDS program and what we were doing and how it had evolved from the several pacification programs that had existed before. A little bit about AID procedures. And basically that was it. There was an option of taking language training which a number of people did. But I wanted to minimize the time I was going to be involved so I didn't take that.

We all thought we would be going to provinces so there was a mock provincial team exercise so you would have a sense of what the various aspects were. It was pretty much hands-on-training by people who had been there and came back to tell us what was going on. It was mostly composed of talking sessions.

Q: What were you getting about TET? There were two points of view about it.

DILLERY: Most of what we got was that TET was a bad thing for us. I know the Administration attempted at that time to portray this as the Communist having given their best shot and failed. Given the casualties they took it was terrible for them, but clearly the people who had been there did not see this as such a good thing and felt the psychological impact of it would be negative...and I think it probably was in the long run.

Q: So, you went out when?

DILLERY: I went out in March, 1968 directly to Saigon where I found total chaos. I dropped in on my friends at the embassy. Gil Sheinbaum was the executive assistant to the ambassador at that time. He was a member of my A-100 so I saw him a little bit. I remember flying in from Hong Kong and looking out the window at the length of Vietnam looking for battle smoke, but didn't see any. I thought it looked very peaceful.

Q: As a matter of fact when I flew in I saw a lot of smoke but was told it was actually rice stalk burning time, it wasn't battle.

DILLERY: Anyway, I landed at Tan Son Nhut and my first sight was a great big hole in the ceiling of the airport from a rocket during Tet. I think it was a Sunday. I watched people getting picked up by people sent to meet them and leaving the airport and finally I was the only one left - - no one met me. I found somebody who took me to the Oscar Hotel in downtown Saigon. I stayed through that night and the next day went out to the CORDS headquarters and got settled in. It was kind of a funny arrangement because we had to go to the embassy to do some personnel things and then to CORDS to do the rest.

It turned out when you got to CORDS that they didn't really know what they wanted to do with you. One hoped they needed you. Yet, it turned out they had no concept of what they wanted to do with you. So you diddled around, made calls and talked to people in the headquarters. I had gone with two buddies from my training course...Bob Emmons and John Blodgett, both of whom found jobs at MACV, at CORDS headquarters, so they never left Saigon.

At my hotel I ran into Jim May, who was the Province Senior Advisor in Quang Ngai and a well-known grabber of every resource he could possibly get for that province. He had more FSOs working in his province than any other. We met in the lobby and when he found out who I was he said, "Why don't you come to Quang Ngai?" I said, "Well, nobody else has asked for me, sure. So where is it?" That was how I got to where I was going. There was no design that I could see.

Q: Where is Quang Ngai?

DILLERY: Quang Ngai is in I Corps which is the northernmost Corps of the four of Vietnam, and is the southern most province in that. It is two provinces below Da Nang.

Q: What was the situation in Quang Ngai when you were there?

DILLERY: Quang Ngai is a large province with a population of about 600,000. The mountains came pretty close to the sea there. The Americal Division was the American presence. It had been one of the areas of heaviest Viet Cong presence, always, traditionally. A lot of North Vietnamese officials came from Quang Ngai, including the then Prime Minister, Pham Van Dong. It had quite a strong political tradition. There were five non-communist political parties in Quang Ngai, although some with membership of only four or five people.

When I arrived everything was pretty much besieged, it was right after TET. The Province Senior Advisor's house was a compound with several buildings and lots of rooms, and I stayed in one of those. It had shell holes in the gate from a mortar that landed during TET. During TET the fighting was only a block away. So when I arrived there was a strong feeling of tension, in fact I think I made a trip to one of the district offices and it was the first time they had driven out since TET. A very, very, strong feeling of imminent danger.

Of the 600,000 inhabitants, 300,000 were refugees and one of our biggest jobs was taking care of them. My Lai occurred in that province before I got there.

Q: Had they started investigating that?

DILLERY: In a very desultory way the IG and a couple of other army inquiries had come, but they never found anything until the story broke in December, 1969. We didn't even know what they were investigating. They were casting their questions in such a way that you didn't know what they were talking about.

Q: I was in Saigon later on. I came in early 1969 and there were sort of hints around, because I was dealing with the Inspector General too, of them looking for something big, but they didn't say what.

DILLERY: We knew that the area around My Lai was the operating territory of the 48th Viet Cong Battalion, which was said to be one of the best Viet Cong military units in the whole country. That was real bad country out there. They were almost as formidable as the North Vietnamese army.

But the whole area was tense. We had ten districts and district teams in each one of them. Four or five of them were Montagnard districts and the advisory teams were really manned by Special Forces people.

In one district we had Marine combined action platoons. Five or six Marines were stationed with a popular force platoon to defend a village. That was real rough. They did more fighting than most of the larger military units because the Viet Cong attacked them on a regular basis. I understood that they caused more VC casualties than Battalions. Their living conditions were terrible, right with the local peasants -- and they were very brave. We had eight or nine of those units in one of our districts. They were part of the Third Marine Amphibious Force (3rd MAF) operating out of Da Nang.

As to the US Army, we were in the Americal territory and we had a close relationship with the Division. Two brigades of Americal were operating in our province. This was when Colin Powell was stationed with the Americal, I must have met him at briefings and meetings as he was on General Getty's staff.

Our province team was big. We had about 160 Americans of whom about 30 were civilians. The headquarters probably had 75 or 80 and the others were scattered out in districts. We had about 150 Vietnamese employees. Quang Ngai had a hospital, so we had nurses and doctors on the team. There also was the Phoenix program (the intelligence presence), an educational advisor, a police advisor, two Volunteers In Service to America (Vietnam's version of the peace corps) teaching English. I was the "Revolutionary Development Support Officer" when I first came. This was the officer that managed the warehouse with building supplies, food distribution, etc. to refugees. We had two people working on refugees. So it was a big, big operation.

The US Military part of the team were advisors to the Regional forces (sort of like the National Guard in the US) and the Popular Forces (the local militia in villages). You will remember there was the regular Army of Vietnam (ARVN). They had their own advisory team in Quang Ngai which wasn't part of us. We had a kind of parallel government structure to the government of Vietnam all the way down. Our office was in the headquarters building of the province.

Q: Which was where?

DILLERY: Right in Quang Ngai city -- the capital of the Province. Several things happened there, not only My Lai. One or two of the Buddhist monk immolations in 1967 occurred in Quang Ngai. It was a pretty busy and controversial area.

Q: Let's talk about your first job dealing with the refugees. What were the major problems you had to deal with?

DILLERY: Our job was to get food, bulgur wheat and cooking oil, to the refugees, and to provide villages with building materials -- metal roofing, cement and reinforcing bars. We had a big warehouse which I supervised in an attempt to keep some control over the supplies. The biggest problem was corruption. My counterpart on the Vietnamese side -- an army major -- was pretty clearly a crook, although we never proved anything on him. His people commandeered supplies from our warehousemen and quite frequently we felt they were not going off to carry out agreed projects. So we tried to stop that.

We also did the paper work and physical inspections of projects and approved the when complete. Because of all the refugees we were doing a lot of building of camps for them. We also did some building in villages that were not refugees. It was our job to work with the Vietnamese on these projects and to assign them out and monitor them.

The second Province Senior Advisor was Bob Burns, a wonderful person and also an FSO. The system in CORDS was that if the Province Senior Advisor was a civilian, the deputy was a military person and vice versa. Our Province Senior Advisor was Jim May at first and then Burns. Even under May it turned out that I was sort of the second civilian (I was an old FSO-4).

Q: Equivalent to a colonel.

DILLERY: A Lieutenant Colonel -- I got promoted to FSO-3 in 1969 after I became PSA. So I was really kind of the second ranking civilian in the province at that point. I was also kind of like a chief of staff, so I helped on a lot of other things. One of the things we did was the famous Hamlet Evaluation Survey or "HES" every month. You had to rate which hamlets were safe and which weren't.

Q: There was a whole matrix of things. Could you stay there the night? Are they doing this or doing that? It was then put into the great computers somewhere and out came a "how are we doing" type of report.

DILLERY: Yes. Then they produced beautiful maps with "our villages" in blue and theirs in red. I am afraid that we didn't do a very good job on this -- there was almost no place in the Province where we felt safe at night -- even in our own houses. So the HES probably wasn't a very good tool and overestimated GVN control.

Back to the organization of the advisory team. It sort of turned out that I was kind of like the second deputy province senior advisor because the first was the military one. He did that side and I was the deputy for the civilian things. So I managed all of the aspects...all of the civilians reported through me to the Province Senior Advisor and I coordinated the activities of the other agencies on the Team.

I continued in that role until the last six months. In June, 1969, I became Province Senior Advisor and was in charge of the whole shooting match.

Q: How did you find your Vietnamese counterparts?

DILLERY: Some real good ones and some not so good ones. The Major, I can't remember his name, who was my counterpart when I was doing a lot of development work was pretty clearly on the take. But the Province Chief and the Deputy Province Chief during the whole time were also army officers and terrific guys. They were really patriots, I thought. They knew what they were all about. They were good soldiers. I am sure they were quite honest. There were bad apples around. Some of the district chiefs were bad and some of them were excellent. So there was a whole range of them.

The official I most admired was the head of the refugee section of the Province government. He was small even for a Vietnamese so he was a tiny little guy but with great personality. He insisted on refugees getting what they deserved. So he struggled with the Major to make sure the refugees got their food commodities, building materials and money. We actually paid a little stipend to the refugees. He would go out with our refugee officer (FSO Larry Colbert for most of my time) and actually make sure they got the money. He was scrupulously honest. That guy, I am sure, made not one cent on whatever he did. So, there were all types.

My favorite was the Province chief, Col Ton That Khien. I really liked him. He was very well educated. He had come from Hue and clearly from an important family. His wife was a school teacher. He and I worked one little sort of illegal deal. He got paid almost nothing -- and had no entertainment allowance -- and yet was expected to entertain all the time. The way that he did that was to use the officer's club at Division Headquarters of ARVN, about a mile from our own offices. So one of our "AID programs" was to donate 4 or 5 cans of cooking oil per month to the officer's mess, and that paid for his tab. That was not legal, but I am sure it was in the cause of good.

Q: You had a very effective Viet Cong military organization, a battalion...

DILLERY: The 48th was famous and found very effective ways to keep us off balance almost all the time I was in Quang Ngai. We also had a North Vietnamese division headquartered in our province so the military pressure was pretty strong for most of the 22 months I was there.

Q: What were you doing with all this enemy military around?

DILLERY: We were working with the Vietnamese authorities to try to provide normal and perhaps some abnormal services to the communities. We were trying to work with the farmers to help them with irrigation problems; we were building schools and developing teachers; we were trying to work with the police to provide security; we were training regional and popular forces so that they could provide military security.

It turned out that one of the things that really helped was to provide US military security to a hamlet or village for a short while to allow them to establish their own village structure and security system. During the last few months of my stay the Americal Division was very helpful in letting us use their units to just stay in a village for a few weeks. That gave the local authorities a leg up and really worked well.

Let me back up and say this. Clearly the Vietnamese peasant didn't care whether it was the government of Vietnam or the VC in charge in their area. What they wanted was to be let alone. So they didn't particularly like either side. We were trying to give them positive incentive to support the government by building roads, etc., while the VC was mostly punitive and would shoot people who didn't support them. The VC also collected taxes and the peasant didn't see much benefit from that money. Their big argument, of course, was that they were fighting against us and we were the foreigners. However, the peasants would have preferred not to have either of us.

So our job was to try to provide them with the wherewithal and training to carry out these positive activities. We were working with the bureaucracy. Mostly we weren't very much on the ground with the actual people, although in the districts our guys were cheek by jowl with them doing small AID projects like dams and water. In headquarters. We would be designing the projects and submitting proposals and getting money for them.

Q: We are talking about the time you were there. How effective did you feel you were?

DILLERY: I would say that we were beginning to figure out how to promote GVN authority and control over larger parts of the Province. One of the really important aspects was the American military and remember they were moving out. This was in 1968 and just after I arrived Nixon gave the speech about withdrawing the Americans.

But the Americal Division developed into a very helpful force. When I arrived in Quang Ngai, the Province Senior Advisor would go to Chu Lai -- the Division HQ -- about once a month to talk to somebody in the division to find out what they were doing. They would be curious about what we were doing. But basically they saw the whole thing as a military situation and all that they were doing had to do with "what do you do to deal with these military forces" and whatever happened to the civilian people and structures in between was too bad. They didn't think very much about the activities of life that were going on.

But this changed. By the time I left, and this is not necessarily due to me, the Assistant Division Commander was coming to visit us every week and he was finding out where we were building schools and where we were running agricultural programs and he was telling us where they were going have an operation or to do the B-52 strikes. We would say not to do them there because that is where we are building a school.

As you know, our military were very committed to the "body count" philosophy. They would do "Arc Lights", B-52 strikes -- which by the way we could feel in Quang Ngai City even when they were miles away from us. Then a big job for the Americal was sending out units to find out what the body count was -- this was called "exploiting" the Arc Lights. The VC was very happy with our military chasing around the jungle because they could take pot shots at our forces.

In the latter part of 1969, the Division changed their emphasis somewhat and gave us military support as I described. This did provide real security for villages and farmers and just kept the VC out so they couldn't get in at night and take money and give political harangues. The Division also set up Fire Bases with semi-permanent establishments and artillery which could be used over large areas.

As a result of this strategy, the VC appeared to become somewhat lethargic in the jungles and our area of influence kept going farther and farther out. When the VC could not move easily and didn't have the excitement of battle, they seemed to lose some zip. We would find that if we could provide fire support and fairly small American presence in some of these farther outlying areas, that we could neutralize it. The VC couldn't move around very much. Basically our fire power was such that whenever there were big units we could handle that.

So during my period we saw things from that very tense period in 1968 get quieter and quieter until 1969 when there was very little military activity. Maybe the VC were just waiting to see us leave. But during that period the Government kept going farther and farther out in the Province. I can remember the airport, which was about five miles outside of town, was so bad when I first arrived that the VC used to shoot at our little airplanes coming in. We didn't get many visitors because of that.

A little while before I left, the Province Chief called and said, "I want you to go out to a village with me." "Where is it?" "Fifteen miles past the airport -- It used to be even further into the mountains." None of us had ever set foot out there before. We drove out there and saw some of the structures being built with our materials. Col Khien said, "I want you to meet the Village Chief." I said, "This village has only been here for two weeks, who is this Village Chief?" "Oh," he said, "he's the VC Village Chief, but he has looked at the situation and decided to come our way." So I took that as a sign that we were making progress. Progress maybe should be in quotes because the point was that it required a sustained American presence to provide the security. So it was illusory if you had to depend on the ARVN to provide that security that the Americans did. The bottom line was that we did provide security for the time I was there.

Q: How did you find the young Foreign Service officers without their wives and family were responding to all this isolation?

DILLERY: We had about five of them. The youngest one whose first assignment was out there and who has done quite well was George Moose. He already had the language and became the Political Reporter for the Province. He was single as were most of the young officers. But several members of the team had families in safe-havens -- the Philippines, Thailand and Hong Kong. They visited them every couple of months.

Q: Moose is now the Assistant Secretary for African Affairs.

DILLERY: Yes, and several times an ambassador. What I tried to do was...first of all there was a little bit of Foreign Service kind of work to do. We tried to encourage internal political reporting on what was going on in the province. George did that and did a fine job. We used him because of his Vietnamese ability. Larry Colbert, who is currently our consul general in Tijuana, was another young officer there and was our refugee person. Paul Barbian was one of our district people. I think he left the Service. There was disillusionment because they didn't see this as what they had come into the Service to do. Because it was their first tour I tried to get together with them as Foreign Service officers and tell them that it wasn't going to be like this. But there were a lot of things that were the same as regular Foreign Service work. We were trying to get foreign officials who were sovereign to do what we wanted them to do what we thought was best. And a lot of what we do in the Foreign Service is that.

You have to remember that we were all assigned to AID. I don't remember what kind of arrangement it was between State and AID, but I remember getting overtime, the only time in my career that I got overtime. We did have one lovely time when Cecil B. Lyon, a real old-line FSO, came to be our inspector. He came to our province partly because we had four or five FSO's at that time. He was staying at my house and we all gathered for dinner. I remember we scored points with him. He was getting along in years by that time, so about eight o'clock we were all sitting around after dinner and he said, "Well, gentleman, I will retire for the night, we have a big day tomorrow." He went upstairs. About 8:30 the Province Chief fired off a couple of illumination rounds from his mortar which happened to be right next door. Down came Ambassador Lyons wearing an elegant dressing gown and said in a somewhat excited voice, "What was that?" "Oh, that was just outgoing", we said. "Oh, oh," and he went back upstairs. Later each of us got a handwritten letter from him saying, "Really proud of you guys out there under fire."

Q: Everybody was reporting. No place has been reported down to the village level more than Vietnam on our part. You had the CIA doing it, the military doing it, AID doing it, your people and then the embassy people. Did you have province reporting officers coming out from the embassy to take a look around?

DILLERY: During my time we did not. I know that later or even earlier they did a lot of that, and possibly more in II or III Corps. Remember there was a Consulate General in Da Nang.

Q: I don't think it was a full fledged consulate general at that time. Terry McNamara was the consul and he was technically under me at one point, this was 1969 and it was sort of a consular office or something. It was raised to the status of a consulate.

DILLERY: There was somebody there when I first came and then Terry came at the end of 1968. So I had a lot to do with Terry. In addition to that we had CORDS regional office in I Corps. Chuck Cross was the head of that. He was a Foreign Service officer too. Russ Olson was his assistant. So there were several Foreign Service officers in Da Nang and we did quite a lot with them. And the consul did some reporting. That was our connection. There wasn't anything from Saigon.

Q: What was your impression in your area of the CIA operation?

DILLERY: Well, the CIA, of course, was heavily targeted towards the VC. They were trying to identify the VC cadre and agents through the Phoenix program. They had a lot of sources out among the VC. They really didn't intersect much with us. CORDS you will remember was founded from the old pacification program, the military advisor, the Joint US Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO), etc. So while the Phoenix program was nominally part of CORDS, they were pretty independent in what they did. They did not brief us a lot on their reporting. We saw results from their actions and occasional reports from sources.

Q: But you weren't in the position of calling in strikes and that sort of thing?

DILLERY: Well I wasn't but our District Advisors, all but one was military, did call in artillery and air strikes to support regional and local GVN forces so the Advisory Team did in a way.

Q: Did you have anything to do with the news media? Were they around much?

DILLERY: We did when My Lai broke. We had a reporter once before that in early 1969. Around Christmas time 1968 we organized an operation involving the ARVN, the Americal Division and a Marine unit to try to flush out and surround the 48th Battalion. The concept was to use five battalions to surround the area of the 48th and then close the net. Our part of this operation was to avoid an incident like My Lai.

For this operation we tried to get all of the civilians out of the villages that would be impacted and move them to a temporary camp we built for them. We ended up with about 12,000 people in the temporary camp. After things quieted down a bit, we moved them from that camp out to the sea side, which was only five or six miles away, and then back to their own villages after it was all over. It was about a three month process. During this time the VC got a story out that we had taken these people out to sea and thrown them overboard with chains tied to them to drown them. A reporter came to look into that report. I talked to him and disavowed that as happening. I was on national TV for about 15 seconds as a result of that. A moment of fame.

And then when the My Lai story broke in late 1969, a lot of press came. The most notable was Henry Kamm of the New York Times who arrived in Quang Ngai just at the time that the My Lai story was breaking. He stayed in my house because there was no other place to stay. So he was calling in his stories from my house at the same time the story was breaking. It was a little bit sensitive dealing with him, but he was a good guy.

Q: What was your role during the My Lai investigation?

DILLERY: My own experience on My Lai was in mid-November, 1969, (I was going to be leaving Vietnam about the 15th of December) I was in my office doing some routine work, and all of a sudden one of the staff came in and said, "There is somebody here from the OSI." A Mr. Feher, a very imposing person, came in and I thought, "Uh oh, they have caught me misappropriating funds." I had a little slush fund of about a thousand dollars a month. You weren't supposed to use it for labor but it turned out that one of the better things we did was repairing pot holes. So I used some for that. That was the only thing I could think of.

Anyway, Mr. Feher came in my office. He had a dossier about six inches thick which were the pictures of My Lai and reports about the incident. Looking at those pictures caused me to...it was like a light bulb going on...in about a tenth of a second to remember all these rumblings about operations in Quang Ngai in 1968 -- the same ones you said you always had heard -- and I realized what had happened. I said, "I Better go talk to the Province Chief about this."

So I took the file and went upstairs to see the Province Chief. It happened that the Son My District Chief, that is the district in which My Lai is, was in the building there for a meeting. I showed Col Khien the pictures and said we had something very serious on our hands here. He called the District Chief out of the meeting and they began to talk. I didn't speak Vietnamese but I could tell they were saying numbers of casualties bigger than anything I had seen in the dossier. He said, "What should we do?" I said, "Well, my first piece of advice is don't try to cover this up because if you do it is going to be worse as it is out now. I can tell you in America you get into more trouble if you try to cover it up than if you just go with it and let people have access and find out what really happened, bad as it might have been." He actually followed that policy for

Then it turned out that the investigator wanted to interview the people who had been involved. He did that at my house. This was a little bit of a drawing room comedy because Henry Kamm was there. I didn't want Henry to be in the room with the investigator and the district chief, etc., so I had to move one group into the living room and another gently out -- but it worked out OKAY.

Mr. Feher stayed for a couple of days. I hadn't been in Quang Ngai when the incident occurred the time of the incident, but it turned out that a number of my close associates were implicated, at least in the reporting on the incident. Our Deputy Province Senior Advisor in 1968 was Lt. Colonel Bill Gwynn, a good friend and a superb officer. He was cited in the final reports on the incident in connection with the reporting on the incident. He was a good friend and good guy.

There were a lot of questions about the "cover up" of the incident. I must say that it was well enough covered up in 1968 and most of 1969 that I didn't know anything about it. I did testify before the Peers Commission, General Peers, who carried out the investigation of the cover up. I told them everything I knew which wasn't very much.

I had been in My Lai several times because the Province Chief took me out there a couple of times in 1969. I remember being in a meeting with the My Lai villagers and listening to him talk to the people. It wasn't anything particularly different than being in any other village.

Q: Could you explain what My Lai was?

DILLERY: Sure. My Lai was the incident in January or February, 1968 where an Americal Company headed by Lt. Calley was on a mission in the Batangan Peninsula, about 15 miles east of the capital. The Americans came to the village of My Lai and for one reason or another killed a large number, said to be possibly over 500, Vietnamese villagers. The incident really was one of those things that led to the American public's final negative reaction to the Vietnamese war. It was a very, very powerful public relations event. It was a real tragedy.

To put it in perspective, it happened just a couple of weeks after Tet and this particular company was brand new having just arrived in Vietnam. By the way, remember the Americal Division was made up overseas, it had never been formed in the US and wasn't a traditional one. So everybody always said it lacked a little bit of cohesiveness.

Calley was not very secure in his leadership. The Company had been told they were going to run into strong opposition in this village -- from the 48th Local Force VC Battalion. They also had been told that there would be no civilians present since all would be at the market in another village -- but they did not go to market that day. It looked like panic just took over. The Americans just started shooting and it went on from there.

Then there was no reporting at the Division level about the incident. Members of the Company and a photographer who accompanied them did try to raise the issue but inquiries did not get very far. As I mentioned earlier, there were several investigations -- even Major Colin Powell conducted one -- and there were questions afterwards, but the story didn't break until late in 1969 when it became a major political issue in the United States.

Q: Is there anything else you want to mention?

DILLERY: No, I think we have covered it all.

Q: You left when?

DILLERY: I left in December, 1969. I returned to Washington and was assigned to the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations.

Q: One last question before we break. When you left Vietnam, how did you see wither Vietnam?

DILLERY: I guess I was discouraged because I did not see the will on the Government of Vietnam side that there was among the VC. There were really four groups, Vietnamese government/military forces, Communist security/military forces, VC supporters, and the peasants. Despite all the things we had done, I don't think there was a broad base support for the Government of Vietnam as such, whereas there was a small amount of support for the VC which was dedicated and passionate. So I left with the sense that the departure of the American security forces would have negative effects. I didn't see the total end of it at that time.

MORTON R. DWORKEN, JR.
Vietnam Training Center
Arlington, VA (1968-1969)

Military Assistance Command Civil Operations
Saigon (1969)

Member, Principal Advisory Team
Phoac Long (1969-1971)

Mr. Dworken was born in the District of Columbia and raised in Ohio. He was educated at Yale University and the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). Entering the Foreign Service in 1968, Mr. Dworken served abroad in Taipei, Saigon, Phoac Long, Vientiane, Athens, Port Moresby, Ankara, Canberra, Wellington and London. In several of these assignments he dealt with Political-Military Affairs. In his several assignments at the State Department in Washington, DC, he also dealt primarily with Political-Military Affairs. Mr. Dworken also served on Capitol Hill as a Congressional Fellow. Mr. Dworken was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 2008.

Q: Okay. Unless there is something else you want us to say about your period at SAIS, maybe we should talk about your coming into the A-100 class at the Foreign Service Institute, when was that?

DWORKEN: It was in the summer of 1968, and of course the Vietnam issue was uppermost. I'm told by colleagues who saw me at the assignment session at the end, when many of us had our parents with us, that I appeared to them to be dumbstruck when I was in fact assigned to Vietnam, to the CORDS program, Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support, the AID piece of it. (I was detailed to AID and assigned to MACV/CORDS.) I guess I was shocked, because I still believed that this wouldn't actually happen.

Q: Even though there had been a lot of preamble?

DWORKEN: Yes. And I can remember as part of our class activities, we had a couple of meetings with Director General John Steeves. I can remember a session where we went over and over with him the fact that some of us did not want to go.

Q: To Vietnam?

DWORKEN: To Vietnam. And I can remember asking him, even though I had the ambivalence that I mentioned to you earlier about wanting to go and experience it, but not being sold on the activity. I can remember asking him, "Why is it that the Foreign Service didn't give officers a choice?" And I can remember him just looking up from his chair and saying to me and to those of us who had concerns, "But you do have a choice, you have a choice every day, you can go where we send you or you can leave." His presentation stuck with me to this day, and of course, it has become salient again with Foreign Service Officers being assigned to serve in the pacification efforts, the provincial reconstruction efforts, and the embassies in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Q: In all of these oral histories that have been done over the years, there has been a lot of discussion about the A-100 class. I don't think you need to particularly go over that, unless there is something special you want to say about your experience in those 10 weeks. Did you have a foreign language when you entered the Foreign Service?

DWORKEN: I had French, to some degree. I had taken some at Yale and had spent a summer on a traineeship with a construction company in Toulouse. I think I took a year and a half, maybe two years at SAIS. I passed the French requirement for the Master's program.

Q: And you passed the Foreign Service language requirement after entering in French?

DWORKEN: Yes, I did. The course work in the A-100 class at that time led directly into another two weeks of consular training as well; it was pretty standard at that time that the two were combined. Not all of us obviously went off to do consular work. There was, I should mention, a fourth officer who was sent to Vietnam as a Vice Consul to the embassy in Saigon. There were 3 of us detailed to AID for field work in CORDS.

Q: So after you finished the A-100 class, you went into what was probably then called the Vietnam Training Center and learned Vietnamese?

DWORKEN: Yes.

Q: For six months or more?

DWORKEN: I did the whole 48 weeks of language training at the Vietnam Training Center in Arlington Towers in Rosslyn, just above the garages. That was quite a program. It was mixed military and civilian, inter-agency, primarily a language program, but there were also course work and instructors from area studies and country studies, culture, and music. We also did weapons familiarization across Key Bridge in Georgetown at the old car barns in the basement of the D.C. Transit Building. I don't even know if the building is still there.

Q: I think the building is there; I'm sure the firing range is not.

DWORKEN: I think it's part of Georgetown now, isn't it? I think they've taken over a lot there.

Q: Georgetown University?

DWORKEN: Yes, for some kind of community center and food court. In the basement were firing ranges, where we became familiar with M-16s, shot guns, pistols, and various other kinds of individual weapons. And we also had time at Fort Bragg in North Carolina.

Q: How long were you down there?

DWORKEN: Less than a week. We learned about counterinsurgency from the military's point of view, at the J.F.K. Special Warfare School. I later took a foreign internal defense correspondence course from there. We talked with Green Berets, learned about various aspects of their training, and watched field displays, but the bulk of our training was in Arlington Towers and, as I said, the bulk of it was language studies.

They had an intriguing approach to learning a language. I had a very high language aptitude that placed me in the top cluster of students. We were divided by our aptitudes to begin with, and then thereafter, we were divided by achievement, tested on a regular basis. We stayed together as a group (the three, four, five, six of us students), and the teachers rotated around. Every six weeks, they would give an examination; if you passed the exam, whatever the cutoff level was, you stayed in the language course, and if you failed the exam, you went to Vietnam.

It was a wonderful incentive to do well enough to stay above whatever that cutoff line was. Even with my high language aptitude, I was by that time not all that interested in going quickly to Vietnam. I had another one of these attitude changes, and my position in the pecking order of classes plummeted step by step, until I needed to stay just above the line each six weeks; I succeeded in doing so until I finished the whole course.

Q: If you'd done even better, if you'd excelled in the six week progress checks, that would have shown too much commitment or enthusiasm for what you were going to get into?

DWORKEN: I don't know, I think I learned there was a certain measure of effort that needed to be done and that was sufficient, and I just went to that level. You're right, there wasn't any great prize for being outstanding. I later learned that there was a cost of sorts, or depending on your point of view, a benefit: the more foreign language fluency you had, the more employable and professionally competent you were.

Q: More effective?

DWORKEN: Yes, I did find that when I did get to Vietnam, I spoke well enough and more importantly, I understood well enough so that I turned out to be, of the civilians on the Provincial Advisory Team I went to, the most fluent. And so there were lots of occasions in which I interpreted for the province senior advisor, or at least I was present and able to tell him whether he was getting the full translation from whoever the interpreter was. I couldn't interpret myself, I wasn't that good, but I was good enough to monitor and to understand the stream of thought. I actually wished then that I'd had even more language training.

Q: But on the FSI scale, where were you when you finished training, do you remember, two or two/three?

DWORKEN: It must have been two in speaking, two-plus in reading. It was a hard, tonal language. I think I tested higher than that in both speaking and reading when I had been in Vietnam for a while.

It was funny, when I got to Vietnam, to find out that the Vietnamese I spoke was not just South Vietnamese, which is what we were taught, but it was even more particular. I was told that I sounded like a woman from a particular part of Saigon, called Cho Lon, which was the area of the big PX and commissary. In fact, I had been taught mainly by women who had come from that area and who had met American military officers, married them, come back to the United States, and become instructors at the training center. They had passed to me a way of speaking, forming phrases and sentences, and a vocabulary that indicated to South Vietnamese people exactly where I came from, or where they thought I did.

Q: In this period of training, 1968 to 1969, the Vietnam war was becoming even more controversial in the United States and American political life in Washington as well. To what extent were you and the other students hooked up in that, or were you kind of in your own little cocoon, your own little world, learning the language and something about the culture, or did the controversy about the war creep into the learning program?

DWORKEN: Oh, it definitely crept in, more than crept in. We were all residents of D.C., and we would have to have gone deaf and dumb not to register it. And over time, it probably crept into the way I approached my language studies, becoming more negative. I think the more I studied the history and realized that there were lost opportunities in and after World War II, and that we had under Kennedy interfered so much in their internal affairs with coups and secret efforts to influence people, the more my attitude turned negative toward our overall war effort. That's a side of history that was pretty well known at that time.

I guess over the course of my training for Vietnam, I became less and less positive about what we were engaged in as a nation, but I still had this feeling that I wanted to be a part of it, wanted to experience it, to see it for myself, and so I tried to keep enough of an open mind.

Q: To what extent were you at the Vietnam Training Center involved in other things that were going on at the State Department, or were you pretty much doing your training and very much interested and engaged in what was happening in Vietnam?

DWORKEN: I wasn't engaged in the State Department very much at all. We were, as you know, physically separate, and we effectively were not part of the bureaucratic structure in any particular way; people came to us and lectured and went away. I don't recall very much in any way visiting State, though I do recall between the A-100 course and the consular course and the beginning of the Vietnam Training Center that I had several weeks in the Department. I went in to the East Asian and Pacific Bureau, where I was an assistant to the staff aide, helping to run papers hither and yon, and if I'm not mistaken, the great crisis in Europe in August 1968 was Czechoslovakia, and a Bundy was in the White House and a Bundy was in the State Department.

Q: In the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

DWORKEN: Right, I think he was Assistant Secretary, and I can remember taking to him packages that I had assembled of telegrams and intelligence reports and papers from the Operations Center and reports off the various telecommunications machines. But other than that experience before Vietnam training started, I don't recall any interaction with the State Department.

Q: And, how about the rest of the Foreign Service Institute? Not really, you were a large but very separate –

DWORKEN: Because we were physically in another building, I can't recall any FSI connection to the Vietnam Training Center. We were FSI/Vietnam Training Center, but we could easily have been 50 miles away from FSI.

Q: And in the period that you were there, there were considerable numbers of military or Defense Department personnel doing the same training?

DWORKEN: Yes, and as I later learned, the advisory teams at district and province level in Vietnam and in the four corps areas were very integrated and mixed.

Q: Integrated from different agencies?

DWORKEN: Yes, the State Department, USAID, the U.S. Information Agency, the Department of Defense, and the Central Intelligence Agency all had representatives in those language sections, I believe. They were mixed in amongst us and there were all ranks. Anyone headed for the pacification effort from colonel on down, all officers and the civilian equivalents in those other agencies and departments were all mixed together. It was great. Those were connections we kept while we were in Vietnam together, and some of them continued afterwards, and it was very good team-building.

Q: Actually you knew what CORDS stood for, I'm glad. So, say it again.

DWORKEN: Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support. The 'Civil Operations' part of it goes without saying, especially since it is currently understood in the context of Iraq and Afghanistan. But the 'Revolutionary Development' term was a replacement for an earlier term, 'rural development,' and in effect was taken from the Vietnamese government, which had a specific program by that name. Now, whether we encouraged the Vietnamese to call what they wanted us to do 'revolutionary development' or not, I don't know. But we were supporting the government of South Vietnam's development effort. There was a military four-star general in charge of MACV, and one of the deputies was a civilian deputy commander of U.S. Military Assistance Command Vietnam for CORDS, or DEPCORDS for short. That was Ambassador Robert Komer at the start. Later, it was Ambassador William Colby during my time.

I can't recall for certain whether we got our specific province and district assignments from CORDS Headquarters in Saigon, but I think that was the case. But we did spend some time in AID Headquarters in Saigon (now known as Ho Chi Minh City), some time in MACV military headquarters there, and time in the embassy as well.

Q: Now were you, you say "we," there were several of you that were part of the class, a group that had come out of the Vietnam Training Center together?

DWORKEN: Yes. Some of us were in the same numbered CORDS class; I think it was CORDS XIII. But there were also people who joined up with us so that we were all arriving in Vietnam at that point.

Q: But all of you were really coming out of the Vietnam Training Center?

DWORKEN: Yes. And we had specific training in what for me turned out to be a province advisory team job, and others had specific district advisory team jobs, and we also had training on internal political reporting, from a fellow named Cal Mehlert, who was in the internal part of the political section in the embassy in Saigon.

Q: Where was that training done?

DWORKEN: This was in Saigon in the embassy. They taught us what they wanted and made it clear that they wanted it from us directly, not through the CORDS hierarchy. It was straight political reporting, with an emphasis on biographic reporting, reports about the province and senior people in the governmental and social structure of the province or district that they were interested in.

Q: About how long did you stay in Saigon?

DWORKEN: About a week.

Q: And then you went to your province.

DWORKEN: Yes.

Q: Which was?

DWORKEN: Phuoc Long. The name of the province is usually the name of the capital city of the province, unless the locals use another name. Many people knew the name of the province and the capital city that I went to as Song Be, since the Be River ran around the edges of the province capital city and through a significant part of the province. Many Vietnamese called it Song Be Province rather than Phuoc Long.

Q: And where was this province in relationship to Saigon?

DWORKEN: I would say almost due north from Saigon about 100 miles, up near the Cambodian border at the southern end of the central highlands, but not in the military region that contained most of the central highlands. Vietnam was divided into four military regions from the demilitarized zone south, and I was in the northernmost corner of III, up against the bottom end of the central highlands and the Cambodian border.

Q: What was the terrain like?

DWORKEN: Not highland. There were some karst formations, limestone, that were sizeable in the northeastern part of the province as it abutted the central highlands, but it really was lowland and primarily covered with forest and jungle. There were some plateaus and some deep ravines and so on, and there was one mountain that was very prominent right on the edge of the province capital called Nui (mountain) Ba Ra. There was also a similar mountain in Tay Ninh Province called Nui Ba Den; they were sister mountains, and there were no other mountains like them, cone-shaped rising out of upland plateaus.

Q: And the river you mentioned, the Be River that went around the capital city of Phuoc Long?

DWORKEN: Yes, it curved around the capital city. The city itself was on a raised plateau, so there were edges and if you went over the edge, you were down in the river. It wasn't fortified, but it was defensible, and I recall, perhaps imperfectly, that the local airstrip was one of the streets in that part of the city. An airplane could run right along the edge of this plateau. [When I returned as a tourist in 2009, the topography of the area had been changed by a major dam on the Be River that created a large lake east of the city and Ba Ra Mountain and that altered the river's course away from the capital city.]

Q: Roughly what was the population when you were there?

DWORKEN: The whole province numbered just over 40,000, and the main concentration (including the province capital and one district) had approximately 25,000, if I recall correctly.

Q: It was that small?

DWORKEN: I remember it being much smaller, but I checked my records and those were the numbers then. The province was the largest in land area of South Vietnam but the smallest in population. The people were clustered by that point in the war around the capital city plus a nearby district capital and the three outlying district capitals. They were all in little 'islands' that the government controlled with villages and hamlets nestled for security right up against them, and the rest of the province was very sparsely populated and owned by the bad guys.

Q: Viet Cong?

DWORKEN: Viet Cong for the most part, although North Vietnamese main force units were periodically, and later regularly, present in or moving through the province. The province was essentially one large set of infiltration routes south to the areas of Saigon and the regional capital of Bien Hoa. Those same units were much in the American news for battles in Tay Ninh and Binh Long provinces, which were our neighbors to the west in Military Region III.

There were French rubber plantations in outlying areas of my province, and when we flew over, you could see the straight rows of rubber trees, but it had been several years since anyone had been, on the government side, working those plantations. And that was all considered "Indian country."

Q: What was that region called that you were part of?

DWORKEN: It was just called MR III. (The military called it III CTZ or Third Corps Tactical Zone.) Bien Hoa was the headquarters for that. Saigon was in effect surrounded by Military Region III, and Bien Hoa was where we took our military and civilian instructions from, we Americans and the Vietnamese as well, because we were co-located and functioning inside their structure to a large degree. Ambassador Charlie Whitehouse was the senior civilian deputy in MR III (the Deputy for CORDS or DEPCORDS), later succeeded by Ambassador Funkhouser.

Q: You arrived there in late summer, early fall of 1969. Why don't you describe what the situation was? What did you find when you got to Phuoc Long, what did you do? Give us the setting.

DWORKEN: Well, our primary responsibility was to serve as advisors. We were a provincial advisory team, and the individuals whom we were advising were in the province government, from the province chief, who was a Vietnamese Army lieutenant colonel, on down. The U.S. had a parallel structure in Advisory Team 67, and we were headed by a U. S. Army lieutenant colonel. (It was Bob Hayden, as I recall, for most of my time, an artillery officer. Artillery was an important part of our military presence there.) I should add that in addition to the advisory team structure that I mentioned and a U. S. artillery unit that was specifically associated with a similar Vietnamese unit in the province capital, we had a brigade of the U.S. First Air Cavalry Division present in the province. It was in the nearby district that I described to you earlier (called Phuoc Binh), and it also had a very large airfield on a Fire Support Base called “Buttons,” so there was a constant flow of aircraft in and out, and there were helicopters, helicopter gunships, and medevac helicopters based at that brigade headquarters.

We had those substantial American military forces very close to us, and in addition the Special Forces operated in the province, for two reasons: one, because of that North Vietnamese and Viet Cong presence I mentioned earlier, and second, because we were up against the Cambodian border. They were using, as I later found out, their bases in the province to operate cross-border. There were many things I didn’t know about our military activities in and from the province, until I was posted to Laos and was exposed more to the region-wide military, intelligence, and counterinsurgency effort that the whole U.S. government was involved in. I had a much more informed decision-making role there.

Q: In Laos?

DWORKEN: Yes. In Vietnam, I was quite a junior officer, pretty much in the dark. For example, whenever I was given information from an intelligence report about anything going on in the province, I was told it was from URSes or ‘usually reliable sources,’ and if I ever asked what a URS was, I was told that wasn’t any of my business. When I was in Laos, I was much more aware of who or what those sources were. For example, the Special Forces teams were in each of the outlying districts, with a B Team in the province capital area and A Teams out in the field. There was all this military activity, including combat patrolling, nightly artillery fire, and distant air strikes that we could hear or feel, and there was a significant amount of military attention paid to securing the province’s single land route south to Bien Hoa and Saigon. We civilians in the advisory team did not go on military operations and never used that road connection beyond the close-in district capital. When we left the province capital to visit the outlying districts or go to headquarters to our south, we always moved by helicopter or small aircraft, because the roads between the province capital, outlying district capitals and points south were just not safe.

Q: So what did you do and how were you able to do it?

DWORKEN: It was very difficult to move around, and that’s why I described that environment first; we were constrained and constricted by a whole variety of things, besides being culturally different and not speaking the language that fluently. Security was a big concern. Another was the disinclination of our Vietnamese counterparts to venture out much.

Our advisory team was focused on development and local security programs that the provincial government was tasked with performing. There was a whole range of things involved in development that we focused on, all the way from what now goes under the term good governance to agricultural production. We supported structures of government down to the lowest level of the hamlet and supported those activities that provided services from the national government to the people, such as providing local security and training security forces that were locally raised and locally equipped and that belonged to the villages and hamlets. That included the police but also a more substantial military activity involved with guarding the villages and hamlets, local self-defense forces backed by provincial military forces. And there was also a program to encourage those who had gone over to the other side to come back, to bring their families back with them, and to support those people. And there was another program to take care of refugees from the rest of the province who had come in previous years and had clustered around those islands of government control that I mentioned earlier. This was designed to house and feed them, and to help their efforts to grow crops that would both support them and would eventually enable them to enter into the larger economy of the province.

That whole range of development activity was performed with the idea of not doing it ourselves but encouraging, prodding, guiding, and supporting the Vietnamese government officers, who for the most part were also military, into doing it themselves. The chief for development in the province was, I believe, a Vietnamese captain, and he and I were called 'counterparts.' I had lots of resources, including a civic action platoon that was under my guidance (not my command, of course), but I could guide it to work in a particular hamlet or particular village on a particular project, such as digging a well, putting up small school or medical structures, or rebuilding a hamlet, a bridge, a pathway, or whatever.

I had an imprest fund that was always replenished whenever it got low; it had several thousand dollars in Vietnamese piastres (dong) in it. We civilian members of the province advisory team had under our control stocks of bulgur wheat and cooking oil that could be provided. These were usually used by individuals or sold on the market to get resources to invest in other food that might be more likely to be used. I had irradiated rice seed to provide, as well as metal roofing, reinforcement bars, and bags of cement that we could provide for small-sized development projects like schools, clinics and so forth.

Q: Were you the first Foreign Service Officer, State Department member of this particular province advisory team, or had somebody been there before you that you'd taken over from?

DWORKEN: I must have had a predecessor in terms of having someone on the team providing development advice, but I don't remember knowing who it was, and it may have simply been an additional duty of others. I know I had a successor, but I don't recall meeting that individual either. There should have been handoffs, although that didn't happen with any regularity. We civilians were there for at least 18 months, six months longer than the military were there, in some cases it was longer than the Vietnamese military in that structure were there. There was more continuity in our small group of civilians.

Q: When you say a small group of civilians as part of this larger team, how many American civilians?

DWORKEN: The larger part of the team was composed of around two-plus dozen military. The civilians were led by Tom Wajda from State (and later, Ed Tolle from USAID) who was the deputy province senior advisor. We had a Chieu Hoi advisor (that was the 'Open Arms' program to get the enemy to come back from the other side), a public safety (police) advisor, a community development advisor, and a refugee advisor -- all from AID -- plus a couple of NGO people working on agriculture, refugees, and health and a couple of civilians who worked for military intelligence, but ostensibly worked for me on education, youth, and sports. That was about it. I was the Assistant Senior Advisor for New Life Development, the second-ranking civilian. Oh, we also got a civilian administrative officer from AID after I'd been there a while.

Q: So how many?

DWORKEN: Depending how you count, approximately ten. We were one of the smaller province advisory teams, and as I mentioned, there wasn't much population in the province, and the terrain mainly belonged to the enemy and was the responsibility of the U.S. military, not the advisory team as such. And from the Vietnamese government point of view, the province was not a high-priority problem. Mind you, at the end when South Vietnam fell, the province was the first province to fall to the North Vietnamese, because it effectively was a southern terminus of the Ho Chi Minh Trail after it had passed through southern Laos, the panhandle, and down through the eastern part of Cambodia.

The first province that the enemy conquered was the one I had worked in. At the time of that collapse, I heard that one village chief, with whom I had spent some time on various self-development projects, had been part of what was called the VCI (Viet Cong Infrastructure) all along -- for years, he had been playing a double game. This single village and its seven hamlets had been the total government-led presence closest to the Cambodian border.

Q: And you never suspected that?

DWORKEN: Never. I guess I had generalized suspicions about all kinds of things, but nothing specific, not at all.

Q: Did you travel frequently to the other districts; you say there were three outlying districts?

DWORKEN: I made several visits to them.

Q: And were there district advisory teams in each of those?

DWORKEN: There were. They were all military members and pretty small in numbers; there were no civilian advisors there, again a reflection of the security situation. I think there were Special Forces A teams as well in each of the three outlying districts. To go back into the history of the war, the southernmost of those district towns, at Dong Xoai, was largely over run in 1965 in a major battle that I was told was the basis for the movie, "The Green Berets." The other big incident was an attack on the province capital's joint tactical operations center in early 1969 during which the American province senior advisor and others were killed.

Q: Before you were there.

DWORKEN: Well before I got there. So, we went out to district capitals and the associated villages, my Vietnamese counterpart and I, and whoever else on the team needed to go on that particular visit. And I can remember in Duc Phong to the east eating food I don't ever intend to eat again, which was, I think, a great honor to be served. How shall I describe it? It was a duck that had all the feathers plucked off. It had been diced into the smallest possible pieces, bones, innards and everything, and then it was put into a kind of casserole and cooked for us. It was very crunchy to eat.

We civilians were not issued with arms, but as I mentioned earlier, we were basically familiar with individual weapons from the time we had at the Vietnam Training Center. We all felt we needed to be armed when we were outside the province capital and the adjacent district, particularly when we had to fly in helicopters over enemy-held territory, so we all made individual arrangements with military friends to get weapons that were no longer on property books. I was one of those who did that.

I found that we had advisory team things that were desired by the guys in the brigade of the air cavalry at the base near Phuoc Binh. One of those things was hot showers. And another was access to commissary goods, in this particular case, cases of frozen steaks. I should explain: The military members of the advisory team had a mess hall supplied through the military supply chain; we civilians could use that if we wanted to. But, their living compound and ours, while side by side, were not the same, and there was a fence between us. Mind you, we had an outer perimeter that encircled both of us and we had bunkers we could take refuge in if need be. However, our living and working spaces were not integrated.

We preferred our own small civilian mess, so we could have local-style food from time to time, and we contributed money to its operation, if I remember correctly, and also paid our own Vietnamese cook. With those funds, we went to the commissary in Saigon and bought supplies every couple of weeks (not our staples, because those were obtained locally or from the military, but fresh meat, frozen meat, some fresh vegetables, as well as canned goods and a variety of frozen foods and luxuries like ice cream and so on). And like in later diplomatic posts where being a nonprofessional courier got you out of a remote, isolated place into 'civilization,' the opportunity to take the "commissary run" to Saigon was something valuable that was rotated amongst us. We would fly down on a small Air America plane, a Pilatus Porter, which was the only civilian U. S. air service that came up there; the rest were all military controlled. One of us flew down to Bien Hoa, the regional capital, where we had made an arrangement with one of the staff to provide us with an International Harvester 'scout' vehicle. We would drive down the main highway to Saigon, spend the night in a hotel there, which was a great luxury, see a little bit of the downtown that evening, and then first thing in the morning, go out to the commissary in Cho Lon, where we'd buy a lot of frozen beef and chicken to last for a couple of weeks plus all the canned goods and Vietnamese produce (fresh, but all packaged). Most everything like that was frozen rock solid and crammed into this vehicle for a quick trip up the road back to Bien Hoa. We made sure to buy a couple of cases of beer that we provided to Air America staff to compensate them for making these additional flights for us, threw everything into the back of the airplane and flew right back to Song Be. The guys would be out at the runway in their vehicles, so we could get all this by then slightly melted stuff into the freezers in our compound.

I ended up trading several hot showers and cases of those steaks (that I bought) for a 38 caliber pistol, and the belt and ammunition to go with it, and an M-16, which I later discovered was actually made up of scrounged parts from several M-16s. None of these weapons was on anybody's property books, but we all felt it was better to have them for defense of our place or to take with us on helicopter rides in case we went down between districts. Most of us made a point of not wearing or carrying weaponry when we were in our advisory roles on the ground with people who were not armed; if they were armed, then we would take our weapons with us, and we practiced with the weapons from time to time. There were two attacks on the advisory compound, both mortar attacks. I don't think there was any evidence there was a ground attack associated with those attacks, but we never knew whether or not that would be the case.

Q: Were there casualties?

DWORKEN: No, no one was killed; I vaguely recall there may have been minor injuries from one attack. There was some warning, and we were able to take cover in the bunkers. Our living quarters were not fortified. Some of us were in trailers, single or sharing; some of us were in the two prefabs that were divided into single bedrooms, each with a shower, toilet, and sink.

There was one very large incident which may have been an enemy attack, or I should say that we all thought it was, even the province senior advisor, the artillery lieutenant colonel. It was an attack on the ammunition for that combined artillery unit I mentioned earlier, and it set off the ammunition, so it was hard to tell from then on who was firing at whom, because all of this Vietnamese and American ammunition was 'cooking off,' and there were casualties from that. The U.S. province senior advisor awarded several medals after that night. It later turned out that somebody claimed that it wasn't really an enemy action, that it had been badly stored ammunition, so it was caused by friendly action, and the medals were supposedly not merited. That resulted in a visit by a Washington Post reporter who wrote about it, and there was a great fuss over that. I don't think anybody had a medal taken away, but it did not help the lieutenant colonel's career.

Q: We've talked about your assignment as development advisor with the CORDS Pacification Program in Phuoc Long province in South Vietnam from 1969 to 1971. What else should we say about that assignment?

DWORKEN: Well, there are a couple of things I would like to mention, about projects and activities that went on. One of the development activities I spent a significant amount of time and effort on, which was essentially part of that range of development activities I mentioned earlier, was specifically focused on the Montagnard tribe that was in the province. As with most of the central highlands and areas connected through the central highlands like the province I was in, there were Montagnard people, mountain people as they were called. They were not derived from the Viet Chinese invasion that occurred many hundreds of years before that pushed the people up into the highlands from the more coastal areas. The Montagnards were ethnically different -- more, if you will, indigenous to the area; noticeably discriminated against; less well off than the lowland Vietnamese; and more primitive in many respects.

There was in the province a small group of Catholic sisters that worked with the tribe, or the remains of the tribe, called the Stieng. [I checked in 2009, and there is still writing about them; they are in the country and also part of the refugee flow that has come and settled in the U.S.] But they were very primitive, and by comparison even with Vietnamese who had been rural and far away from Saigon and Bien Hoa for generations, still much less well off. The Sisters were trying to give them economic opportunities, and they had already started in their own very rudimentary way to take what was a Stieng custom of growing rattan and had tried to turn it into furniture that could lift the economic well-being of this tribe. Fashioning rattan is a very difficult process, because it grows essentially straight and it needs to be bent, held, formed, and tied together in structures, and it also has to be treated so it doesn't fracture and destroy itself in very short order. They were doing all this by hand, and they were fashioning little side tables, little chairs, stools, and various things like that as well as very decorative things. They were also using rattan as the structure for some of their buildings.

There were more developed rattan-producing activities in other provinces, but they might as well have been in another world, because there were no safe roads, as I mentioned, to get product to market, and there certainly were no means by which the Stieng could go and get equipment. I was able through my AID connection to other province advisory teams to locate rattan-bending machinery up north in the second military region, up in Da Nang. So I flew up there and arranged for the shipment on U.S. military aircraft of rattan furniture-making machinery, and by the end of my tour, that machinery had arrived, and the Sisters were very pleased and were beginning to install and use it. I never stayed long enough to see the production stage, so I don't know whether the Sisters did accomplish that to benefit the Stieng. They were in an unsafe area and yet seemed to be safe.

Q: They were Vietnamese?

DWORKEN: Mostly, although I think there was one European woman there. It was a longstanding presence, but I never learned very much about them. They were dedicated to those people, and those people were dedicated to them. That tribe was also active in the local self-defense force that I spoke about earlier, so they were potentially a target, and they did have some bad incidents where they were attacked. They acquitted themselves quite well, the Sisters stayed safe, and hopefully this industry in some degree or another is still going.

Q: And you paid for the machinery out of the funds that were available to you for provincial development?

DWORKEN: Yes, and for the transportation, which was the other part of it, and for some supplies and oil that would hopefully keep it going for a while. The other thing that I should mention is that there was an effort to evaluate our progress. It was called the HES or Hamlet Evaluation System. It was a computer-generated listing of every village and every hamlet in every corner of South Vietnam, and we had our province's portion of it. It was an American project to get some numerical way of measuring progress or the lack thereof from a range of objectively observable situations. For example: Do the police sleep at night in the hamlet, yes or no? Of course, that required observation. Some of us advisors at province and the districts were from time to time obliged to make those observations, or when the situation wasn't secure enough, to take the word of the provincial and district government officials and other Vietnamese personnel who were there. In other words, there was a mix of not quite good data and reliable data that went into this. Every hamlet came out with a letter grade A through E (or F?), and there was a metric then to judge whether your pacification effort was making progress or not. Now this was formulated and assigned from on high; it wasn't adjustable by us. We had to make our local situations fit the criteria.

Q: And you would be the one to do that for your province?

DWORKEN: Yes, I was responsible for gathering the data and making the initial evaluation, but I recollect that the province senior advisor and his deputy were the final say on what the American evaluation would be. It was also a way of indirectly rating our counterparts, because this was our tool, but judging, in effect, their job performance. There have been many criticisms of that system, but it did gather data on a fairly regular basis.

Q: Once a month or something like that?

DWORKEN: I'm not sure, but it was frequent enough so that you could get snapshots, compare one to the other, and come to conclusions about the situation and needed assistance and training. I don't remember any earthshaking rises or falls in the HES evaluation for our province, but I think we were on a slow upward climb with lots of reverses, mainly dependent on the flow of enemy forces; at least it seemed that way at the time. When there were many North Vietnamese units in or moving through the province, when there was fighting and hamlets were being attacked, then obviously the security situation component of the HES and all the other associated pieces would go down. I think we had both ups and downs.

I should mention one other thing. While the battle during Tet of 1968 was the great shocking event internationally and in the United States, every Tet after that was a concern to us advisors. In addition to my South Vietnamese government counterpart (the head of development on the province chief's staff), I also had a local national Vietnamese employee named Muon who was my interpreter/translator and general guide and arranger, from the local community. He was with me or in my office every day, one way or another. He came to me before Tet of 1970 and suggested that it would be a good time to go on vacation.

Q: That you go on vacation?

DWORKEN: Yes. Of course, I didn't keep that to myself. It wasn't clear whether the threat was personal or more generalized, since all of us advisors were out and about, and we were vulnerable to targeting. I took advantage of that and traveled on leave to places I thought I would never see again. I went to Bangkok, Vientiane, Phnom Penh, Siem Reap (where Angkor Wat is), and to what was then called Sihanoukville, on the coast, with its port and unfinished hotel. Wonderful time.

There was a mortar attack on the advisory team compound and the province chief's compound while I was away. As I said, nothing on the ground, as far as we could discern, but that was good information he provided.

Q: Good time to be away.

DWORKEN: Yes, very much so.

Q: Say a little bit more about your relationship with your counterparts, there must have been several in the 18 months you were there. Was the Vietnamese army involved with development?

DWORKEN: Yes. The officers that I worked with were all from outside the province. Mr. Muon, who I mentioned earlier, was the head local national employee for me, and we had two Vietnamese women who worked in the office as well, in clerical positions. You might wonder what clerical work was going on and that gets me to the response to your question.

With my counterpart, a Vietnamese army captain, we were obliged together to produce English and Vietnamese versions of a province development plan, an American overlay on the French colonial practice of planning. It was a very intensive planning process, with a national plan, a regional plan, and a provincial plan. And we built from scratch the first provincial development plan for that in Phuoc Long Province. He had sections to write, the American advisors had sections to write, we each had to translate and conform the two language versions. We collaborated over many working hours in each other's offices on goals and objectives, what kind of inputs we would have, and all the other considerations. We produced something that was over an inch thick, with enough charts and graphs and what have you, and it was approved by the province senior advisor, the American lieutenant colonel, and the Vietnamese province chief, whose name was Luu Yem. In retrospect, it was more of a bureaucratic tool than a specific action plan that anyone followed up on.

Luu Yem was part Chinese. I understood that his family was in business, all in his wife's name, something to do with motorcycles, a Vespa agency in Saigon, and what have you. I don't know how much farther he got in the Vietnamese military; I believe he came out in the refugee exodus in 1975. We had a relationship that was more official than anything else. I was invited to the province chief's home on a few occasions, but I think I was there more as a Vietnamese-speaking American in the company of more senior Americans. I never went to my main counterpart's home; I was never invited. Nor did I ever visit my senior local's home, although I do recall a picnic at one point with our Vietnamese civilian staff.

We had visits from Ambassadors Whitehouse and later Funkhouser; those were the CORDS senior officers in MR III. I later worked for Ambassador Whitehouse in Laos; he was a great guy who I think is still around, but I'm not sure.

Q: I think he might have passed away.

DWORKEN: That's a shame. I went to those occasional senior U.S. officer visits to the province chief's house, so I had a fair amount of contact with the province chief in his area, but not much contact with other province officers than the development chief's staff and the development chief himself.

Q: You mentioned before there'd been little training when you first arrived in Saigon with the embassy in terms of reporting. How much political, biographical reporting did you do for the embassy? How much contact did you have with the embassy over the 18 months?

DWORKEN: Very infrequent. I had a little with the embassy, particularly with Hawthorne ('Hawk') Mills, who later figured in my work as well in Athens when he was DCM. Hawk was the Mission Coordinator in Saigon, a one-of-a-kind job as a super-executive officer underneath the two ambassadors in charge. I was invited to come down at one point to compete to be Ambassador Sam Berger's staff assistant. I didn't get the job, but that was one time in the embassy. There were a couple of other times that I passed through Saigon and stopped in the political section, like when I went on that R&R leave I mentioned to you. I also went on an R&R trip to Hong Kong and another R&R to Sydney, Australia, so each of those times I was down in Saigon. The commissary runs did not provide much time for embassy contact, but I would make a point of stopping in to see Hawk and the internal unit of the political section when possible.

There were occasional bits and pieces that I picked up, biographics, information or evaluations of developments from this far-off province that had very little to do with Saigon. I gloried in the fact that we weren't anywhere near a flagpole. I didn't want to have all that much to do with Saigon, and there wasn't all that much reaching out on their part, either. There was one personal moment, when my parents decided they weren't hearing from me and called the State Department Operations Center. The next thing I knew, I had this radio telegram from the Embassy personnel officer saying –

Q: Keep in touch! (Laughter)

DWORKEN: Yes. That was a little embarrassing. I didn't write home as much as I probably should have, feeling it was enough to do the work from dawn to well past dusk. And a lot of it I didn't want to recapture on paper.

Q: I would suggest that we stop at this point, and when we start again, I would like for you to look back over the whole period and think of what it was like at the beginning and what it was like at the end and evaluate your impact or what, if anything, transpired in that longer period that we talked about. Does that sound okay, or is there anything else you wanted to be sure to say today?

DWORKEN: No. I will try and crystallize my views of that Vietnam period. The Laos period, I think we can do separately.

Q: Okay, it's now the 28th of March 2008. When we finished last time, we had almost completed our conversation about your assignment to the CORDS program in Phuoc Long Province, and I think you wanted to summarize a little bit your overall feelings about that assignment and what your view of Vietnam was when you left in 1971.

DWORKEN: Right, it was in the spring of 1971, and of course it's important to put one in that time frame, when the war was still going on and had several more years to run. I guess, as I look back at that time, I can recall a belief that what we were doing there was worth doing. It didn't seem futile at the time, just hard, even though futility, I think, has entered into the views of many since then. There were all kinds of difficulties, obviously, with security; there was some lack of popular support for the government structure that we were supporting, advising, and assisting; there were signs of corruption; there were signs of duplicity on the part of the people; and there was not, if you will, a national movement or resistance in the same strength and character that the North Vietnamese and their allies, the Viet Cong in South Vietnam, brought to the struggle. But as I say, it seemed doable.

General Abrams had come on board and had instituted a counter-insurgency strategy that did make a lot more sense than the strategy that General Westmoreland had been following. The CORDS effort was central to General Abrams's strategy, and we thought, those of us on the team, that there were signs of possibility and success. We undervalued, I think, the lack of support we had from the States, from the American people and the Congress; we undervalued the importance of that in terms of where things would be going. And we also, in a sense, lost sight of the power of the idea that the North Vietnamese and their allies in the South were putting forward, the idea of the unity of Vietnam and the exclusion of foreigners. That goes back to what I said earlier, when we talked about mistakes and the strategic errors we made, right after World War II in our dealings with Ho Chi Minh and with the French. There's a saying in Vietnam that when the elephants fight, it's the grass that gets damaged.

Q: Trampled.

DWORKEN: Yes. I know I left Vietnam with the feeling that we'd done a lot of trampling, no question about that. I also believed that by our involvement and actions, we had caused people who would normally have avoided the conflict to choose sides, that we'd been a catalyst to that choosing, and having done that, we had taken on obligations to the people who had chosen our side.

Now this is hindsight, of course, but the manner of our leaving a conflict like that is very important, and the manner of our going from Vietnam was flawed under President Ford and the Congress of that time. It was not part of any strategic plan, if you will. I have been troubled by that ever since. I'm still conflicted by it. I don't think in the final analysis that the United States should have been committed to Vietnam, but having been there, I wish that we had stayed with it in a more consistent manner. There's no question in hindsight that the manner in which South Vietnam fell to the North Vietnamese was a reflection of our past strategic errors and misjudgments. I don't have any hesitancy in saying that. I just wish that we had, as a nation, followed through more on our commitments as we were withdrawing, as we were in the process of Vietnamization over the course of the next several years after I left in 1971. Enough said on that.

In hindsight as well, I am afraid that we put all the whole-of-government experience and doctrine aside after the war and then unfortunately had to re-learn those lessons later when we fought in Afghanistan and Iraq.

JAMES B. ENGLE
Province Senior Advisor,
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Phy Yen (1968-1970)

Director, Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1970-1973)

Consul General Nha Trang (1973)

Ambassador James B. Engle was born in Montana in 1919. He entered the Foreign Service in 1941 and served in Latin America and Europe, and was ambassador to Benin. He was involved in Vietnamese affairs both in the field and in Washington from 1968 to 1973. He was interviewed in 1988 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Now we move from Central America to what was then the hot spot of American foreign policy. This is 1968. You had gone to the Senior Seminar for a year, which is the State Department's equivalent of a senior War College. Then from there, you were assigned to Saigon. How did your appointment to Saigon come about, and what were you doing?

ENGLE: I was a volunteer for service in Saigon or somewhere in Vietnam. Actually, in February 1965, I responded to an appeal by LBJ to the Foreign Service for volunteers who could serve in CORDS. That was the pacification program, served mostly in the provinces, to assist in pacifying the Vietnamese population and organizing it so it could resist invasion by the North Vietnamese and the few Viet Cong that were left. I volunteered against the wishes of my ambassador, and it turned out I was the only senior officer in the Foreign Service who volunteered at that time.

A few months later, I was on home leave and went into the personnel department, and was interviewed as a nut, because I was senior and I wanted to go to Indochina. They asked me all sorts of questions about, "Are you getting along with your ambassador? Are you getting along with your wife? Any problems with your children? Are you in financial troubles?" Well, I apparently satisfied them on this score. They thought I was crazy.

The next day, they said, "AID agrees to take you, and we'll give you one of the four regional positions," which later were called Deputy for CORDS out in the country. These were the four leading positions in pacification under the U.S. ambassador assigned to MACV as the Deputy Commander of MACV, who was at that time Robert Komer. William E. Colby was his deputy after '67. I would have one of these senior positions, but they said, "You've got to get ARA to agree to release you," ARA being the Latin American Republics Bureau. "They've got to approve, which means your ambassador had got to approve."

I went to ARA and they said, "We'll let you go, but we have to get clearance from your ambassador." They consulted him, and then it came out -- something I didn't know -- that he was up for transfer to Guatemala as ambassador, and they said, "We can't let you go anywhere. You've got to remain there as chargé d'affaires. You've been there already two years. Until a new ambassador comes, and then when he comes, if you want to go to Indochina, you can go." So it snuffed that out right there.

When I got to the Senior Seminar more than two years later, I began working again to go out there on my follow-on assignment, even though ARA said they'd tried to get me back. I had to do this all on my own, working with a junior officer in personnel, and it was just this lack of

Q: Why did you want to go to Vietnam?

ENGLE: For several reasons, but one, I had been in military government in World War II, and I figured I had skills that I could use. I had a prominent role in the military government, even as a junior officer in the provinces. I could use these skills in Indochina. But besides, it was the old patriotic thing that I had had since I was a boy, of wanting to raise the flag, wanting to get into a war if we were in a war. I just had to be in it. And I even persuaded my wife and children to let me go, and I've got six children.

Q: When did you go to Saigon, and what were you doing?

ENGLE: I got there in July of '68, and the reason I was given the job was because Bill Colby was the head of CORDS at that time, had been in the CIA station at Rome when I was there, and we were friends and cooperated a lot together. He gave me a job, which was to be the head of one of the divisions of CORDS in Saigon. It was a reporting and analysis division that would analyze all the reports from pacification, put them together, send them to Washington, put them in a form that the commander out there could understand, and advise him.

After I arrived, it turned out I was only to be deputy chief, so I complained about this to Komer and to Colby, and when I left on visitation after four months -- you could come back twice a year to your family -- I said, "If this is not corrected, if I'm only going to be deputy chief of this division and kept in Saigon, you can count me out. I'm going to get another job. I want to be here, but I've got to have a more responsible position."

At that time, it was clear that when that lieutenant colonel who was in that job left -- he became a full colonel while I was there -- they were going to bring in another colonel to replace him, and I'd be deputy to the second colonel. I said, "Unacceptable." I was already a Class II. "I'm senior to him, and I want a more prominent role in the war."

While I was gone on visitation, Colby arranged for me to become province senior advisor in Phu Yen.

Q: Where is Phu Yen?

ENGLE: Military region two, on the coast north of Nha Trang. It was by far the largest military region.

Q: You were working as a deputy on screening and consolidating these reports that were coming in. This has always been very controversial. There are all sorts of indices about whether a particular village was a class one, class two, or what have you. How accurate and how good a picture did you think was coming out of this? Or was this the typical bureaucratic thing, where everybody wanted to make sure that they looked good, so they were reporting what they felt was wanted, rather than a really accurate picture?

ENGLE: The latter is more or less correct. The reports were usually too optimistic.

Q: This is almost an impossible tool to use, isn't it, to try to get real management techniques into a political situation, particularly when we have something at stake, would you say?

ENGLE: I wouldn't fault them for developing this device, which is called the Hamlet Evaluation System. It was a cleverly put together device, it was quite sound. I don't know that you could have done much better in putting it together, and it was done by Clay McManaway. He's since been in the Foreign Service; he's an ambassador now. You can't put together a bureaucratic device like this and expect it to work the way it should work if you've got a lot of the factors that influence the evaluation that you can't control.

The basic factor was that the Vietnamese counterparts, mostly the Vietnamese ARVN [Army of the Republic of Vietnam] officers, who were in the administrative posts and in the military posts that we dealt with for pacification, almost all the province chiefs were colonels or lieutenant colonels in the army, they were working all the time to look good. They wanted the evaluation to cover up the things that they weren't doing or not doing well.

One of the basic causes of their being able to continue this was that the American military and, I think, on the political side, too, we did not convince the Vietnamese adequately that they should be straightforward and should be doing their job. See, the Vietnamese more or less thought that the war was something for the Americans and the Koreans to conduct. This was the attitude of the province chief, for instance. They were just poor little Vietnamese, scrambling around to make ends meet, and to try to rake in money on the side, and to take care of the families and that sort of thing, instead of fighting the war effectively.

We were never able to persuade them effectively enough to do what they ought to be doing, to fight the war as well as the North Vietnamese were fighting it. There were a few South Vietnamese who were doing this, but the great majority, no. The few who were like that didn't fit in with their system and therefore, couldn't get ahead.

Q: When you came back and went out to Phu Yen, what did your job involve?

ENGLE: I was the head of a team, a military-civilian advisory team, and it had approximately 250 military men. A number of them were senior NCOs. The table of organization had 23 civilian positions, of which not more than ten were filled at that time, to advise mostly on the civilian side, the operation of the provincial government. Under me, I had six teams in the six districts, and the teams out there are within the number I gave you; that's the whole organization. They were with district chiefs. Each of these district teams under me was commanded by a major, and the last year, by a retired captain who was a civilian. Usually it was a major. Sometimes later we got captains. They had the same functions in the district as I had with my team up at province.

Our business was to help them conduct the war effectively through their military forces. The province chief controlled the so-called regional forces and so-called popular forces, and they were forces outside the regular ARVN. The ARVN was to deal with the main force threat, and the RF and the PF, as they were called, were to deal with whatever threats came to towns and villages in the countryside. They weren't to be pitted against the NVA fourth division or whatever it was that was there, but with small units that tried to disrupt, and also to defend hamlets at night. Every hamlet was supposed to be defended at night when the North Vietnamese, with a few VC, infiltrated, trying to control the village totally just by being there at night.

The province chief controlled all the local forces, and then we also had the Popular Self-Defense Forces. All the rest of the men of all the villages and hamlets in the province were sort of conscripted into a force that was to help back up the RF and PF, because you ended up with maybe only four or five PF defending a village, and that wasn't enough. You needed other people who were armed, to support them. There weren't enough forces to go around.

So the total of these forces in Phu Yen province was 64,000 out of a population of 330,000. RF and PF were probably just several thousand; I can't remember the figure. The province chief commanded all this, and their effectiveness, in large part, depended on his command ability and whether he could get them to do the things they were supposed to do or not. This meant he had to be active militarily and give them proper instructions, give them proper orders, kick them in the behind if they didn't do their duty, and also to organize military operations to go out after these small units that were in the bush around hamlets, go after them, and provide intelligence so that we could get them with artillery fire. That required a lot of initiative, and the understanding and ability of the province chief was crucial to this whole thing.

Many province chiefs didn't have the understanding of this or didn't know how to command effectively, or took the view that was shared by so many other Vietnamese that really the Vietnamese shouldn't be very active in this thing at all, they should keep their casualties down, and not be aggressive. That was exactly the picture of my counterpart, who had formerly commanded a division.

Q: How long were you in Phu Yen?

ENGLE: I was in Phu Yen almost a year and a half.

Q: You came there just after the Tet Offensive in February of '68?

ENGLE: That's right. Then mini-Tet was in May. I arrived at MACV in July '68, and at the end of December or beginning of January, I was in Phu Yen -- '69.

Q: For the period you were there, what was the situation in the province? Was it under much pressure, or was it pretty much a matter of local pacification?

ENGLE: There were some pressures. At the beginning, there were less pressures than we thought there were. We thought there was a lot of pressure, but the pressure went down a great deal after Tet and mini-Tet, because there was large-scale fighting in Phu Yen. The Viet Cong infrastructure was almost wiped out. So therefore, their military threat was way down, and the North Vietnamese pulled back with our main force units. By the way, I want to make very clear that the war was not a Viet Cong war; it was a North Vietnamese main force war, basically, and they used Viet Cong people just to infiltrate into hamlets and to form small units, usually having North Vietnamese soldiers with them to disrupt and to attack hamlets and things like that. It was basically a main force war.

When I first went there, they were still recovering from Tet, and we were trying to win back hamlets effectively. There was an organized campaign out of Saigon to do this in each of the provinces, and I arrived just as they were putting this counter-offensive into effect.

We very rapidly got hamlets back, to the point where in the end, only three or four hamlets out of 100-some we didn't have effective control over, at least in the daytime. So everything went well for several months, in spite of the ineptness of the province chief. This was, in part, due to the initiative of our advisory teams.

Q: How good were the teams that you had there, the military, and, particularly, the Foreign Service?

ENGLE: The team I had was generally rather good, but there were some persons of poor quality on it, both civilian and military, particularly civilian. These were civilians who managed to get hired off the street in various parts of the U.S. in the middle Sixties because we were desperate to have personnel out there, and we would hire literally anybody and send him to Vietnam at a good salary with allowances and a good life, and they weren't energetic enough and their quality wasn't high enough, in many cases.

I had to try to get rid of those people. It was hard to do, there were so many ways of self-protection. It was hard to get rid of them. The same way with the military. If you had a man who wasn't very good, it was really very difficult to get rid of him unless you wrote a report that would ruin his career, if he was a career military.

Q: Did you have any junior Foreign Service officers?

ENGLE: Yes, I had three junior Foreign Service officers, all of whom were absolutely first class. By the way, I want to say there were also some very excellent civilian and military officers there on this team.

Q: Did you have any problem within the Foreign Service of inspiring the junior officers to see what they were doing, or were they motivated? Was it difficult for them?

ENGLE: They were always highly motivated. There were three, including one young black officer. They were highly motivated, all of them were very successful, and they were all admired by their military colleagues on the team, those under them and those who were over them and those on the same level, let's say. They've done pretty well in the Foreign Service since they left.

Q: You left in 1970 to go back to the Department.

ENGLE: Yes, in May 1970.

Q: What did you do in the Department?

ENGLE: I returned to become Director of the Vietnam Working Group.

Q: What did that involve?

ENGLE: That was the equivalent of a country director, and it was, at that time, the most important country director in the Department. That managed the war from the point of view of the Department of State's responsibilities. Most of the conduct of the war, of course, was managed in the Pentagon, but we had important aspects. We managed the embassy in Saigon, for instance, which was on top of the whole structure. MACV worked for the embassy. General Hayden worked for Ambassador Bunker.

We had the relationships of America and its allies in other countries in regard to that war, and we had to put together the policy papers, and we had to deal with the congressional inquiries. As I recall, I was director for about eight months only, more than 30% of the correspondence in the Department of State with Congress, congressional correspondence, was on the Vietnam War. This directorate had to deal with all that correspondence, and we had only eight or nine officers to do everything. I had to personally do a lot of congressional letters myself.

Q: How about the direction of the war from the State Department? Who was calling the shots, and what sort of shots were they calling?

ENGLE: The most influential person was Ambassador William H. Sullivan, Bill Sullivan, ex-ambassador to Laos, who had had a lot of earlier Vietnam experience and worked with Dean Rusk on Vietnam back in the middle Sixties. He was the most important element in this whole picture.

Q: What were we trying to do at that point? When you were there, how did you perceive the situation, and what we were going to try to accomplish?

ENGLE: We were going to try to maintain aid to the South Vietnamese, and we were going to try to reduce American forces to the point where we could get out and leave them to manage for themselves. We wanted also to arrange an end to the war with the North Vietnamese.

Q: In trying to work out policy and make policy recommendations, were you so involved in the day-to-day efforts, did you really have a chance to pull back and look at the big picture?

ENGLE: We did. We probably should have concentrated more on the big picture than we did. We had a lot of fires to put out right on the spot. For example, we had to be involved with all the visits of the top dignitaries from Vietnam to the United States. That took a lot of time. We had to support visits by senior Americans to Vietnam, and literally everybody was going. I remember having to do many of the papers for Vice President Agnew when he went there. I think that was in the summer of 1970. This drained away a lot of our manpower.

Q: How about relations with the military back in Washington? Were you seeing eye to eye, or were there some different outlooks?

ENGLE: I would say more or less eye to eye. In part, this was due to the effectiveness of Bill Sullivan up above me, who usually dealt with a very high level in Defense, and sometimes with Secretary Melvin Laird himself.

Q: You had a short detour from Vietnam, working with David Kennedy.

ENGLE: Yes. When I was Director of the Vietnam Working Group, in February 1971, I was informed that David M. Kennedy, Secretary of the Treasury, was leaving that position to make way for John Connolly, and that President Kennedy was making him an ambassador-at-large, and the President wished to send him immediately to Vietnam and other places on a special mission. Marshall Green, I remember, called me. Marshall was over Bill Sullivan, actually. He said, "Could you go?" I said, "Marshall, that would take three weeks of my time, and in view of everything that's happening, I haven't got that much amount of time to spend on this thing. There would be great difficulty of this directorate in meeting its requirements." He said, "Yes, I agree with you." I recommended that a Class VI officer who was a staff assistant of Marshall Green be sent instead, and Marshall said, "Fine, that's what we're going to do."

Well, apparently he went back to Kennedy. I believe this is what happened. Or maybe it was decided high up in the Department by Alex Johnson or somebody like that. We couldn't possibly get by with this kind of a thing, sending a junior officer; it had to be me. So I was called up and told that I had to depart the next day for Vietnam and other points with David Kennedy in a special presidential aircraft. I hardly knew what was involved, except that we were going to spend a lot of time in Hawaii, Hong Kong, and Bali. (Laughs)

Q: You're really talking about moving Kennedy out and giving him a pleasant trip, for the most part, in order to get another political appointee, John Connolly, in?

ENGLE: No, it wasn't quite that simple. That's the way it began, but the ambassador-at-large was also to take on other missions for the President, and he went on from that, very soon thereafter, to conduct trade and currency negotiations. He was the first one to do what Yeutter and all those people have been doing just recently.

Q: So it was more important, but it started out as moving him to one side in order to open up a spot for another person?

ENGLE: Yes.

Q: Were you doing anything else in Washington or on these trips dealing with Vietnam that you think was of particular pertinence? You mentioned something about a site ops operation.

ENGLE: That was much later. At this time I was also in the special working group of the NSC for Indochina. In fact, I was the secretary of that working group. It dealt also with Cambodia and Laos. Bill Sullivan was the chairman of that working group.

Q: What were your particular concerns?

ENGLE: This was sort of a policy making group that reviewed the main developments in these three countries and made decisions as to what to do or recommendations to pass on to the President or the Secretary of Defense. It had Defense and CIA people on it; it had everybody on it.

Q: What were the main issues you had to deal with?

ENGLE: At that particular time, we were in the course of reducing our forces. That was perhaps the main thing.

Q: So you were helping to monitor, to see how this was going?

ENGLE: Yes.

Q: This was the Vietnamization program.

ENGLE: The Vietnamization program. By the way, I should have mentioned earlier that I was maybe the first one to implement Vietnamization. Back when I was senior advisor in Phu Yen province, I read in the papers that Nixon and Kissinger had adopted this policy to Vietnamize and, through that method, reduce our presence. As province senior advisor, I decided that I was going to Vietnamize right then and there on the spot, and I started Vietnamizing in Phu Yen by turning over responsibilities to the Vietnamese province chief and his forces. I got a lot of flak from higher headquarters. They said, "Just wait for your instructions." And it took a long time for these to get down there. Even months later, things hadn't been properly worked out up above. In the meantime, I was Vietnamizing all the time, for instance, turning over artillery fires from the Koreans to the Vietnamese. They would be responsible, and the Koreans wouldn't have that.

We had two Korean regiments, you see, in that province. By the way, I was the senior allied officer, so I was senior to their commanders. I could bring about joint operations of the Koreans and the Vietnamese. This is a way of teaching the Vietnamese how to fight. I'd be the catalyzer of this thing and, in effect, the person who brought it about and managed what they did, which was a unique situation in the country.

Q: You went to Nha Trang. The peace initiatives had come after the cease-fire, which was when?

ENGLE: The cease-fire was in effect January 27, 1973.

Q: At that point, you were brought to Vietnam.

ENGLE: I left the U.S. that very day, after helping Alex Johnson and Bill Sullivan draw up a plan that would involve expansion of Foreign Service posts out there. We were going to have four consulates general under the embassy, established at the headquarters of the previous four Vietnamese military regions. Among our responsibilities was to civilianize all U.S. interests in each of these regions, and also monitor the cease-fire by observing the North Vietnamese, reporting how things were going in their contacts with the friendly side.

Q: You went to Nha Trang, which was the military district number two as consul general. What type of operation did you have there?

ENGLE: First of all, I took in ten TDY FSOs, junior officers, most of whom spoke Vietnamese, who served at least one tour some years before -- crackerjack, elite young men who were brought in from all over the world. I made one of them my deputy. We had to manage the phase-out of the U.S. military presence. We still had considerable forces there at that time. They had 60 days to get out completely, and we wanted to recover U.S. property that they had, and dispose of it properly, either appropriate it ourselves for civilian use, or turn it over by a systematic method to the Vietnamese for their use. In other words, not let it get out in the black market and things like that; do it the proper way to help the Vietnamese.

Then to establish a relationship with the Vietnamese authorities, mainly the military region commander who was a three-star general, and with province chiefs. I made the decision that I was going to maintain an American presence in every single one of the provinces, and that was 13 provinces. I had only ten FSOs to help me, so some of them couldn't go to provinces. A couple had to stay there. I had to use civilians inherited from CORDS to be present in the other places.

We phased down to the point where in some places, we had only one person. In of them, Quang Duc, I ended up with only one Vietnamese national as our presence, but under the American flag in the old headquarters. But I made that decision to stay in every province, and though there was pressure from the embassy at that time to get out of a lot of provinces, I didn't do it. I said, "It's psychologically important for the Vietnamese, if they're going to manage this whole show now, to have the American flag in every province and some place to go, with visits by me regularly to the Vietnamese authorities to reassure them. That's the only way they're going to stick together and have enough fortitude and will to resist the North Vietnamese who are still left there in position."

Q: How was it working? When were you in Nha Trang?

ENGLE: I was in Nha Trang from about February 1 to the middle of May, and then I was gone two months. I was recalled to Washington. I was to be chargé d'affaires in Phnom Penh. Then I went back for one week in July. But a lot went on in those three months.

Q: What were the major problems that you had to deal with?

ENGLE: First of all, I had to make the new Department of State operation credible to the Vietnamese authorities, make it clear that the United States wasn't leaving them totally to themselves, we were a capable organization, we could have liaison with them, they could come to us if they needed help, and we were there as an American presence.

I moved into the old commander's headquarters in Nha Trang, refurbished it to civilianize it, improved its defenses, which were very poor under the military, with Nung Chinese hired civilian guards, and immediately established relationship with all the key Vietnamese in that region, whom I talked to about their problems. These were mainly military, regularly. That was one thing.

Another thing was the physical establishment, and that was to set up a new civilian organization with the Department of State at the core, and the Agency was there, too, and build their offices which were very secure, and build new communications facilities -- we brought Seabees in to do that -- establish a consular unit in it with a consular officer to deal with consular problems, and to make this work in a new Department of State framework.

We had property to dispose of. I should have mentioned that. All this property that CORDS and the military controlled, they left a lot of it just strewn around, without any accounting for it at all. We had to gather all that up and dispose of it properly. But I made this old military headquarters, which was a great mass of barbed wire, a very unattractive place, into a beautiful Foreign Service consulate general. You couldn't believe it. The resources I had that were already available, paint and paintbrushes, wire. I even had grenade screens built in with wire we had that the previous headquarters didn't have, and yet they were obscure. You couldn't tell from the outside that there were grenade screens there.

Q: These are screens to turn back a grenade that might be tossed into a window.

ENGLE: Yes. This was a very secure place.

Q: At the time you were there, were there any significant attacks within the district?

ENGLE: Yes, there was military action in a number of places, mostly in Kontum Province. One of my self-imposed jobs was to visit all of the armored garrisons behind enemy lines. I took a helicopter. Not even the Vietnamese authorities would do this. They were responsible.

I remember I had this columnist, Robert Novak. He's on TV all the time now, across from the editorial page of the Washington Post. He came to spend a couple of days with me, and I made a plan to give him all I could give him of what was happening, so he could get a complete picture. So he stayed with me, and I took him by helicopter to the 22nd Division and introduced him. I took him then to a combat zone in the northern part of Binh Dinh Province, where we had to be in shelters, and there was artillery fire going on at the same time. Then we flew back by helicopter to the 22nd Division and had another helicopter pick me up and take me to Kontum, where there was a lot of military action. We had Richard Mueller. He's now special assistant to the secretary. Richard was one of the junior FSOs who spoke Vietnamese well, and he actually rendezvoused with some North Vietnamese and talked to them and reported. They sent reports to me which I sent forward, and on the basis of that, I managed to persuade Washington to make him the junior officer of the year.

We picked up Richard Mueller who, in effect, was the counterpart of the lieutenant commander commanding Kontum Province, which was one of the most damaged provinces in the war, where an enormous amount of fighting took place. It was subject to a lot of B-52 action during the war.

We picked up Richard, and I went over with Richard to the province chief, a lieutenant colonel, and I persuaded him to go with us, to overfly North Vietnamese lines 50 miles back to Dak Pec, where there was a large garrison, isolated. Mind you, we were unarmed and we had too many people on this helicopter, and we also had a case of beer and some other things, I think maybe two cases, which I was going to give to the officers up there. We spiraled up like this and wanted to get above the range of the missile, and then we wound our way down to Dak Pec, which is very mountainous and you had these positions around in the mountains. I went around bracing up the officers, after having given them the beer, and talking to a lot of people there with Robert Novak. He appeared terrified.

This is one of the things I criticize the South Vietnamese for: the commander of those people asked for a ride back, and the province chief let him come out. He should not. He should have stayed there. That was one thing that was wrong with the way the Vietnamese did things. If you take the commander out, there was no morale at all left. He's chickening out, is really what it amounts to.

Q: After the Nha Trang experience, what happened to you?

ENGLE: I was recalled. I got a message from Ambassador Whitehouse, who was number two in Saigon at that time. He said, "I've just received a message here from the Department saying that Ambassador Swank in Cambodia, at Phnom Penh, and DCM Thomas Enders are both leaving. They want to know if you would be willing to proceed to Phnom Penh immediately and take over from both of them. We would merely have a chargé d'affaires." The background for that is that Nixon had just been defeated on the Cooper-Church Amendment, which was on Cambodia, and he was in the middle of Watergate, in a lot of trouble, he did not want to have another debate on Cambodia in the Senate, and so we were going to go with a chargé d'affaires.

I had to give an immediate response. I said, "Respond saying that I accept." They asked how long it would take me to extract myself. I said it would take me 24 hours in order to make my proper goodbyes to the Vietnamese authorities, and then I could go. Charlie said, "Wait 'til I get a response to your response."

Ambassador Abramowitz was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 2007.

Q: When you left E, you were assigned to the Senior Interdepartmental Group (SIG). How did that come about?

ABRAMOWITZ: That was probably the biggest break in my career. Sometime before I left E, this SIG had been established in the office of the undersecretary (later deputy secretary). It was an interdepartmental group consisting of all the deputy secretaries of those governmental departments and agencies working in the foreign affairs field. It was intended to oversee the coordination and implementation of policies decided by the president – not the development of policies although it was sometimes difficult to separate the two functions. The group was part of the National Security Council apparatus.

Nick Katzenbach was undersecretary at the time. He appointed as staff director Art Hartman, who had a lot of both intra and inter-departmental experience. He was an outstanding officer. Art got Claus Ruser to be his principal assistant; he was a GS employee with very good academic credentials as an economist. He had a wide ranging mind, who delved with gusto into many issues. He was like a vacuum cleaner. Claus and I had met sometime before and had chatted about a variety of subjects. When it came to filling out the SIG staff, Claus mentioned my name to Hartman, who then called me. This was probably early in 1968. We talked and Art subsequently offered me the job. For me, it was an unexpected gift; it opened up new vistas – Seventh Floor, interdepartmental issues, major policy initiatives involving the leadership of the Department and other governmental departments and agencies.

My job title was staff member of the Senior Interdepartmental Group, part of the undersecretary's office. One of my principal tasks was to participate in an interdepartmental study of our military relationship with South Korea. There was then increasing unhappiness in the USG with Park Chung Hee and his government. The working group was chaired by the DoD representative, Earl Ravenel, a deputy assistant secretary in the Office of System Analysis in the Pentagon. The work of this group became particularly important after the Pueblo incident. Our study started with an examination of DoD's requirements for the defense of South Korea. Somehow, I became involved in a study of naval requirements, particularly mine-clearing efforts. This allowed me to travel to a number of military bases in the U.S., looking at what clearing capabilities were available and thinking on the issue. I also got involved in an examination of economic issues relating to South Korea as well as beginning the study of North Korea.

My sub-group eventually got combined with that of another working group created because of the Pueblo incident. The administration, in light of that event, undertook a study of the general American defense posture toward South Korea. Joe Yager became the chairman of this working group which consisted of about five members from DoD and State. I had known Joe since he was the DCM in Taiwan. I think that this was the first high level review of our relationship with South Korea for more than a decade. The questions posed were basic policy ones which was the reason it was under Seventh Floor supervision.

We finished our report in the spring of 1968 – I think. This was a time when our vision of Asia was essentially Vietnam. It permeated the Seventh Floor. We also had two divisions in South Korea and there was great concern about the potential for conflict on the Korean peninsula. The Pueblo episode was brought to an end when Cy Vance went to the Far East and sort of apologized for the “incursion” while leaving the ship in the hands of the North Koreans but getting the crew. Our report outlined and recommended consideration of a program for the withdrawal of our ground troops from South Korea over a five year period – no gentle policy. There were considerable differences over our recommendations, but I felt that the group had to issue a report which said something and caught the attention of senior policy makers to make them face up to the hard realities then existing on the peninsula, even if they did not accept the broad recommendation.

I spent full time with this working group for five to six months. As might well have been expected, the report went nowhere in great part because it ran into election season. It provided fodder for a lot of discussion; it was praised in various quarters, but the bureaucracy was certainly not going to do anything about it, particularly since it was the end of the administration. It was partly resurrected by the Nixon administration when it tackled the Korean issue as part of a NISM study. It may well have contributed to the development and implementation of the “Nixon doctrine,” whose biggest manifestation was the removal of one division from South Korea. The work of this group came in handy later on for me, when I attended the Institute for Strategic Studies (ISS) in London on a sabbatical, where I wrote an Adelphi paper urging South Korea to start negotiations with the North on normalizing relations between the two countries. I felt such a move toward dialogue would inhibit a U.S. effort to remove all U.S. troops while negotiations were ongoing – my theory being that the U.S. would not wish to undermine the discussions by withdrawing the troops making the South Koreans anxious about their future. I felt further removal of troops beyond the Seventh Division – much discussed at the time – was very dangerous.

Regardless whether our Korea report went anywhere, the process of writing it forced people to look at the situation in Korea, especially in light of a terrible incident – the Pueblo – which could have generated a war. Furthermore, our policy needed review in light of the sizeable Korean contribution to the war in Vietnam. It was likely the view of the undersecretary that the issues were likely to be considered from a fresher perspective than might have happened if the study was under the control of the regional bureau. I think in general that is the proper approach to issues that have been dormant, frozen, or unreviewed for prolonged periods. I doubt that people who have to deal with these issues daily can easily step back and analyze a situation with fresh eyes.

When not dealing with the Korean review, I spent my time dealing with minor policy issues which arose in the under secretaries’ committee. The staff would review it and submit some recommendations to Art first and then to the Deputy Under Secretary. I don’t believe that I worked on any really major issues during this assignment. Indeed, I felt somewhat underemployed initially, until the Korean study was launched. The undersecretaries’ committee agenda was not filled with challenging items. Much was routine. Part of the reasons for that was that the U.S. government was falling apart at the time. Rusk was hardly talking to Katzenbach. Vietnam was absorbing everyone's time with much effort being devoted to defending one's views and attacking others'. The country was in ferment over the Vietnam War. The students were in a rage. It was somewhat akin to the recent atmosphere on Iraq. The exception today is that our military is highly regarded and respected unlike the situation in the late 1960's.

Q: How did you like working for Katzenbach?

ABRAMOWITZ: I did not see the undersecretary much until after the 1968 elections. After the elections, Larry Eagleburger, who was then Katzenbach's special assistant, and highly influential, was assigned as the Department's liaison to Henry Kissinger. When Larry left, Art Hartman recommended that I take his job for some uncertain time. (While a SIG staff member, I had an office on the Sixth Floor). I was happy to do that. I spent the last two months or so of Katzenbach term as his special assistant. Of course, I did not have Larry's cache during the ensuing two months, but I did what I could and had an opportunity to begin to get to know many of the senior officers in the Department and learn about some new issues. Since it was the end of an administration, it was not a very busy period; not much was happening. Indeed, the Seventh Floor was pretty dead.

My view of Katzenbach is limited. I don't know what role he played in the Department. But it was widely believed that he and Secretary Rusk had a difficult relationship, stemming from disagreement of what to do about Vietnam. Personally, I found him interesting, very smart, quite thoughtful, and a very nice fellow. I learned from just watching him operate even in this gloomy atmosphere. Since the Department was essentially dormant at the end of 1968, I could not observe his skills as a manager and generator. He had managed the Pueblo incident at the beginning of the year, but I was then not close enough to see how he did that. By the time I became his special assistant, the main role for the undersecretary seemed to be to insure that the transition team and members of the incoming administration got all the support that they needed.

Q: Did you find that your perspective of the Department changed when you moved to the Seventh floor?

ABRAMOWITZ: Absolutely. It was a different world in at least two ways: first, I began to look at issues in a much broader context, rather than the narrow confines of my previous job. I learned to neglect the unimportant side issues which often take up so much time and effort by a bureaucracy. I learned to focus on the key matters and what was needed in presenting an issue to the undersecretary and how best to get information and analysis.

Second, I learned how to operate and maneuver among the Seventh and Sixth Floor principals as I tried to help obtain some consensus among them on what needed to be done and how to do it. That was also necessary for my own position because the quality of my presentations was important if I were to be taken seriously. For any Seventh Floor senior assistant, that was essential if you were to be of any value to your own principal; furthermore, it helped to build a cache for future assignment considerations. Sitting in Katzenbach's office for a relatively undistinguished and less than challenging two months was really the stimulus for my Foreign Service career.

Katzenbach was succeeded by Elliot Richardson, who decided to keep me in the position. I knew Jonathan Moore, Richardson's senior assistant to some extent – from my Hong Kong days – when he passed through (he was then Marshall Green's special assistant). We became friends. When Richardson was appointed undersecretary, he didn't know many people in the Department. So he offered me the job as his special assistant. He added that he only had one incentive plan. "One mistake and you are out!" He laughed; I must have smiled – weakly. But it was this opportunity that changed my whole career. It was purely fortuitous – completely unplanned and unforeseen. Others could have done what I did, but I got the chance and they didn't.

Q: Tell us a little about the staffing of Elliot Richardson's office?

ABRAMOWITZ: Richardson brought with him three people who worked for him for much of his time in Washington. Jonathan Moore, his executive assistant, was the main cog in the machinery; he was involved in all issues brought to the undersecretary; his forte was his ability to foresee the domestic political ramifications particularly as they pertained to Richardson's position in Washington, but his contributions to policy development went far beyond that. Jonathan was a very able officer, who had plenty of political experience and was able to interact effectively at high levels in and out of the Department.

Will Hastings, a lawyer, who worked for Richardson when he was the Massachusetts attorney general. He was brought in on many issues, but his major focus for the first year was on senior appointments – career and non-career as well as the undersecretary's relationship with the Legal Advisor. He also, like Moore, took great care that Richardson's reputation not be damaged.

Then there was a secretary, Cetta Leonardi, who was much more than that. She really managed his schedule and was a constant source of frank advice and counsel. She was his "protector" and knew him very well having been with him for many years. She knew his habits, his foibles, his moods, and served Richardson very well and was an integral part of his operation. She was totally dedicated to him.

I was the special assistant charged with culling out and presenting State Department issues to the undersecretary. I was to make sure that he was prepared for meetings and knew what was going on in the Department. I followed up on assignments that had been given to various offices, to assure that the assigned work was being done in a timely fashion and was satisfactory. I helped manage the undersecretary's schedule. All of these were functions that all special assistants normally perform. I had a Foreign Service Officer, John Stempel, as a staff assistant who reviewed much of the paperwork.

Richardson also hired a speech writer, Frank Seidner, who had been with the Department. Richardson used to give quite a number of speeches and remarks. Frank used to draft the first version, which Richardson would then edit to fit his style, and made all of his comments very much his own. He spent a good bit of time on his speeches.

This team worked together for all of his Richardson's tenure at State for 18 months which ended when he became HEW (Health, Education and Welfare) Secretary. He had been an assistant secretary there during the Eisenhower administration and knew well both the substance and operations of the Department.

Q: In your role of special assistant, were you involved in deciding what issues were to be referred to the undersecretary?

ABRAMOWITZ: Richardson became sort of the super-manager of the Department. Secretary Rogers was quite laid back – some even said “lazy”. That left a vast amount of territory for Richardson to cover. Most issues ended up on his desk both because of Rogers’ management style and his “Henry” problem. Richardson and Henry Kissinger had developed a close relationship, although it turned out that the relationship was not quite as close as Richardson had viewed it. Richardson was very active in generating consideration of issues and got to know a good bit of the working level of the Department.

He became involved in almost every issue. Alexis Johnson, the deputy undersecretary for political affairs, handled most of the day-to-day issues that needed Seventh Floor attention, although Richardson was at least briefed on those as well and was in constant touch with Johnson’s assistants. As chairman of the under secretaries committee – part of the NSC system – Richardson was involved in inter-agency matters related to implementation of policy decisions reached by the NSC. In this regard, the one committee action that received most attention were the first steps which eventually led to the establishment of U.S.-Sino relations. I am referring here to the removal of restrictions on American foreign subsidiaries including with China and other actions of that nature. I remember this effort particularly because I drafted the memorandum which eventually went to the president for his approval of these confidence building measures on China. It was just by accident that we were moving in the same direction as the White House in changing China Policy, although, as far as I know, no one in the Department had any idea what Nixon and Kissinger were up to.

Richardson was also responsible for the Department’s nominations to the White House for presidential appointments. He interviewed every one of the Department’s final recommendations particularly the non-career, many of who were not known to him. A number of candidates who had deep pockets were seeking a presidential appointment after having made sizeable contributions to the Nixon campaign. Richardson examined them very carefully to make sure that they would not at least embarrass the administration in their new positions. He also played an important role in moving some career officers up the ladder.

Richardson got heavily involved in major issues such as Vietnam (of course, everyone was involved in Vietnam). He even hired a special assistant whose sole role was to follow Vietnam developments. That was Charlie Cook, whom Jonathan Moore had found in the Pentagon. That was a full-time job which assured Richardson of being current on fast moving developments.

One of the more effective channels in the government to get things done as well as to smooth ruffled feathers was Richardson’s relationship with Kissinger. If there were any problems between the Department and the NSC or if some action needed to be taken quickly by one of those organizations, Richardson would invariably take it up with Kissinger and vice versa. From my vantage point, I never saw Rogers as a very effective Secretary of State – either as a policy developer or a manager. He was, however, a good judge of the American public and its receptivity to American foreign policy initiatives. He was an excellent advisor on how to get public approval, but in the policy development field – either as a creator, implementer, or defender – he was just not in same league as Kissinger. That became a real impediment to a good Kissinger-Rogers relationship, because it put Rogers in a second echelon which created resentment and anger on his part. Rogers was very much concerned about his personal status and his stature in the public's eye. I think you have probably discerned by now that I did not hold him in high regard, although I want to repeat and stress that Rogers had a better feel for the public's mood and views and how to handle issues publicly than probably anyone else in the government's national security apparatus.

Q: Would Richardson take actions on issues that might not have been on his agenda?

ABRAMOWITZ: Sometimes. A lot of this took place during his bi-weekly staff meetings to which all deputy undersecretaries and assistant secretaries were invited. Richardson used these meetings to discuss and assign actions on some issues which arose, which may not have been brought to his attention through formal channels. It was an opportunity particularly for the assistant secretaries to seek advice from their superiors and their colleagues and to bring the principals up to date on issues that were of current concern to them. I think these meetings were very useful to all participants. They allowed the assistant secretaries to raise issues that they might not have been able to get to the undersecretary's attention in the normal course of events. And it allowed Richardson to measure the competence of the senior staff. As I saw it, the assistant secretaries respected Richardson and frequently asked for his help.

Richardson also had a great interest in the workings of the Department, quite similar to those exhibited later by George Shultz. He was anxious to make sure that the institution worked, that the morale and excitement were maintained. His staff meetings were one of the management tools that Elliot used to monitor the workings of the Department. He was interested in effective process. That management interest also raised his curiosity about the Foreign Service. He liked most of the officers with whom he had contact. He was always on the look-out for the rising "stars"; he talked to many members of the Service and had a good feel for how it operated. This was a period of "reform" led by Bill Macomber, the deputy undersecretary for management. He established a number of task forces which together wrote a management-reform blueprint called "Diplomacy for the '70s." Richardson was very supportive of this effort. His notion was that the challenges of the 1970s required a smarter approach to diplomacy given the world's complexities. It required a U.S. State Department with very capable practitioners increasingly able to operate in much more complex settings. He was very interested in Macomber's efforts to build a better Foreign Service.

One matter in which the office was deeply involved was a huge passport problem. Americans were complaining bitterly, and rightly so, that they had to wait for months and months to get their documentation. Richardson was charged with resolving the issue. I suggested, and he accepted, that a commission be formed to quickly recommend solutions. It did so and the backlogs soon disappeared.

Richardson, of course, had a first class mind. He understood most issues quickly and would easily grasp the major details. He did not have a dominant personality and therefore would not always push very hard for resolution in many instances. He was always highly rational with a justification for all of his actions – especially when he was not inclined to getting involved. For example, he tried to stay out of issues that he knew were of particular interest to the secretary. He was very loyal to the secretary, and, as far as I could tell, never tried to up-stage or bad-mouth Rogers. Within the State building, Richardson was far more respected than Rogers, in part because he was always ready to listen to the assistant secretaries or the deputy undersecretaries. Rogers often mentioned how proud he was to have brought Richardson to Washington, but I suspect that he was also a little jealous of Elliot’s prominence on foreign policy matters, and his stature in the Department.

This is not to say that Rogers and Richardson were on different wavelengths. They consulted frequently and I never saw any indication that Richardson tried to undermine the secretary. Rogers was the boss and the final arbiter. Richardson’s relationships with the deputy secretaries – Alexis Johnson, Nat Samuels and Bill Macomber – were excellent. He and Macomber had been friends for some time and were very close. I liked Macomber a lot; he was forthright and even when he seemed to be out-of-step or off on a tangent, I respected him. I also liked Idar Rimestad, Macomber’s often reviled predecessor, who was entirely different from Macomber. In those days, the deputy under secretary for management “owned” the Department’s budget because starting with Bill Crockett, they were the creatures of Congressman John Rooney (D-New York), who was the chairman of the sub-committee that handled State’s budget. Rooney’s wishes were invariably followed; the Department spent a lot of time and effort to keep him happy. So one of the deputy under secretary for management’s high priorities was to keep Rooney and Wayne Hays happy (Hays controlled the Foreign Buildings Operations’ budget). Rimestad was sly, engaging, and exceedingly practical.

Q: Let’s talk about some specific issues. What work did INR do on Vietnam?

ABRAMOWITZ: I began in INR/EA just as the negotiations on a peace agreement in Vietnam were beginning. Our work was mostly concentrated on events on the ground – i.e., the fighting, its political significance, the impact on the government in Saigon, etc. We also focused on what North Vietnamese intentions seemed to be and what they would likely do. We were quite comprehensive in our scope of work. These analyses were also forwarded to our negotiating team. I remember that after one major military engagement, we wrote a paper entitled “Have we turned the corner?” I would describe our efforts as a continual watch of and interpretation of events unfolding in Vietnam – both north and south. The Paris talks were on-going and we tried to provide our negotiators with information and analysis we thought would be useful in their work.

Q: Did you have an opportunity to interact with the NSC staff?

ABRAMOWITZ: I had meetings and conversations with NSC staffers working on East Asia, particularly on China. My experience in East Asia plus my tour with Richardson had given me a wide range of contacts which grew while in INR. I think by the time I had finished my INR assignment, I knew and had access to most, if not all, the EA players. I felt at ease in bringing issues to their attention – issues which they might not have focused on in a normal day, given their schedules.

I remember that after the Vietnam peace settlement, Bill Sullivan called a number of us together to talk about implementation. That was an unusual role for an INR member because it involved us in operational matters.

Q: Did you have some reservation about us withdrawing from South East Asia?

ABRAMOWITZ: Sure, but I knew it was over. We were facing a situation which was bound to end in many tragedies. Our withdrawal could not have a happy ending. The American people were withdrawing their support of our policy; Vietnam was collapsing; Cambodia was a true mess. I became involved in South East Asia when our position there was badly deteriorating. I watched both from CINCPAC and my subsequent assignment in DoD the end of a decade of war for the U.S. The question that was always posed for me was whether the deterioration could be somehow arrested. Ultimately, we ran out of political options. That became depressingly clear to me when I accompanied Deputy Secretary Bill Clements to Saigon in December, 1974. At that time, he assured President Thieu that we were prepared to provide all the funds and tools he needed to keep his country's independence. It wasn't that easy and Clements knew it. I could understand why the deputy secretary took that line; he could not tell him the truth. At this time, I am not sure the consensus of the U.S. staff working in and on Vietnam was that the war was lost; I thought so in December, but I may well have been a minority at that time. Secretary Schlesinger, by the end of 1974, was deeply concerned that the war was being lost, but I am not sure he had yet reached my conclusion. Clements was probably more positive. In any case, the deputy secretary could not deliver such bad news. The government could have fallen even quicker. We talked briefly about it after his meeting with Thieu. He was not about to further undermine the morale of the Vietnam government

The first issue I had to confront after assuming the DAS job was, of course, Vietnam. By then the situation was pretty grim. While first and foremost a military matter, ISA had many interests of its own in the whole issue besides military ones. We were concerned about the accuracy of the reporting from Saigon. This was a question both of coverage and understanding. Were the reports from Saigon providing sufficient coverage of what was going in South Vietnam or was it skewed by perceptions developed Saigon? Was it candid and a decent reflection of reality? I sent a number of my staff to South Vietnam to quietly examine the situation and get a broad range view of what was going on. I did not have a particular policy bent, but I did think that it was important for decision-makers to have as good and as objective view of the situation as possible. I had full confidence that the people I sent provided their candid views of the scene as best they could. I had of course had been aware of the Vietnam situation when I was the POLAD in Hawaii, but my duties were more those of an advisor; in ISA, I had operational responsibilities toward the Secretary which required me to be as knowledgeable as possible about the Vietnam situation.

One of our joint (ISA/EA and DSAA) efforts in Vietnam was to gather a team (of which Rich Armitage, later deputy secretary of state, was a member) which was charged with rescuing from Vietnam as much military equipment as it could, to keep it out of the hands of the North Vietnamese. Armitage had been a Navy Seal and was instrumental in removing a lot of naval equipment, including ships, from South Vietnam. Most of it was consigned to the junk heap. Some of the last acts of members of this team concerned the evacuation of both Americans and Vietnamese from Saigon. The key was to find sufficient number of helicopters which was a very serious challenge. Ambassador Graham Martin, to his credit, wanted to evacuate as many Vietnamese as he could get aboard. He just wanted the helicopters to keep coming; he tried to delay the final departure, but we were not able, in the end, to meet his desires. Schlesinger had to finally put an end to the evacuation, leaving behind undoubtedly a number of deserving South Vietnamese. Time just ran out, and the last days were nerve-wrecking with the Viet Cong at the outskirts of Saigon and during the evacuation helicopters arriving later than anticipated. I spent those last days in the MCC (Military Command Center) along with everybody else. It was a dark time.

When I first started in ISA, the issue was Vietnam. So my first effort to become educated was to go to Saigon. As a DAS, I was viewed by the military as the equivalent of a three or four star general. Sort of ridiculous in terms of the number of people who worked for me. I was given a plane to travel around the country. I saw most senior Vietnamese and American leaders.. There was one event on that trip I shall never forget. In Saigon, I stayed with Marshall Bremen, our PAO in Saigon. We had taken the Foreign Service entrance examination at the same time and remained close friends ever since. Marshall hosted a party for me which was attended by our ambassador to Vietnam, Graham Martin – a legendary figure at State in his own right. I had first met Martin when I worked for Elliot Richardson. Graham was one of those who “walk the halls” of the Department of State, to get a feel for what was going to get the latest news, and advance whatever cause he had. He was an unusual man, well known for his determination and his deviousness.

At the party he and I had a furious argument about the situation in Vietnam. He took the opportunity to attack all “doubters,” focusing in on Ted Kennedy. Somehow or other, even though I was working for a Republican president, I found myself defending Kennedy. All the guests were left open-mouthed at the vigor of the argument, particularly since Martin was an ambassador not to be trifled wit. I don’t think they had ever seen anyone talk to Martin as I did. The next day, I was at the air base leaving Vietnam, and Martin’s assistant came to see me. He had with him the book that I had written with Dick Moorsteen on China. He asked me to autograph the book for the ambassador, which I was glad to do. It was Martin at his best; he was making an overture, although I was at best a small mover or shaker in Washington. But Martin didn’t want me to leave Saigon with a bitter taste in my mouth; so he made his “peace overture” so that I wouldn’t inject my views based on a personal bias. That was Graham Martin. He also never feared to take unpopular stances.

I had frequent meetings with State Department officials like Marshall Green and Phil Habib who served also as Assistant Secretary. There was much focus on our military assistance program, particularly in an effort to provide the South Vietnamese with as much equipment as we could and similarly with South Korea when we considered removing all our ground forces there. The mood at meetings was very bad, particularly among our military who were completely demoralized by events.

I would have to add at this point that I thought that the policy process to deal with South East Asian issues was a day-to-day affair, and invariable ad hoc. The sole objective was to keep the war going until a situation was hopefully created which would make the end of our involvement as palatable as possible. Eventually, after a series of battles, the general conclusion came to be that the end was in sight. By “general conclusion”, I refer to the sentiment both of the civilian and the military components of the Pentagon, although there was little tension between these two groups when it came to the issue of ending our engagement in Vietnam. Toward the end of that engagement in April, Schlesinger sent General Fred Wiant to review the whole military picture. The secretary asked for an honest, straightforward report. Wiant told him that the war was over and that there was no chance of the South Vietnamese regaining their lost territory. After that analysis, our attention turned to evacuation efforts, both of our military and civilian presence as well as those for those South Vietnamese that had been helpful to us.

What followed the Vietnam War was the successful effort to create an all-volunteer army, a turning point for our military, and for the nation. The move from a draft to an all-volunteer force, which enabled General Abrams to turn a highly demoralized army into one that has performed outstandingly since the early 1980s. This revitalization had another interesting result; whereas soldiers returning from Vietnam were treated shabbily by their countrymen and the military institution was viewed with disdain by the American public, those who today return from Iraq and Afghanistan are greeted with open arms and the military has a high standing in the American public. Today, every politician praises the military, even while most condemn the war. During Vietnam, both the war and the military were “bad.” The all volunteer force has also permitted us to fight for some seven years. That would not have been possible if a draft still existed.

As the Vietnam War was coming to a conclusion, my focus shifted to the issue of how to preserve American influence in East Asia. What should be our posture in the post-Vietnam era? What role would the Chinese military now play in the region, not only as a result of our withdrawal from Vietnam, but also in light of the Sino-Soviet split. How should we react to China? How do we better preserve the peace in Korea? These were probably the core East Asia issues that the administration focused in its last year. Our attention to East Asia was heightened by Sam Nunn’s legislative efforts to reduce our military presence and bases in the area. Secretaries Schlesinger and Rumsfeld thought that Nunn’s initiative was the wrong approach. I certainly shared their negativism. I thought the failure in Vietnam called for the maintenance of a strong military presence in the area; it was not – so soon after Vietnam – to further diminish our posture in East Asia. We were concerned that our failure would embolden communist efforts in Southeast Asia and we needed to show our strength and dedication to our allies.

We have discussed our efforts in Northeast Asia. We did not neglect Southeast Asia at ISA. We created considerable angst in the region with the withdrawal from Vietnam and our efforts to enhance Sino-U.S. relations. You have to remember that our Vietnam involvement spread far beyond the borders of that country into Laos and Cambodia and even into Thailand where we had five major military bases. By the way, when I was ambassador to Thailand, I had an opportunity to talk with McNamara who by then was the head of the World Bank. He was very proud of the construction of those bases, pointing out that our military efforts had important unintended consequences. The establishment of bases had required the improvement – indeed the development – of a huge road network linking these facilities. In addition to enhancing our military capabilities, these roads opened vast parts of Thailand to agricultural production. The farmers could now deliver their products to profitable markets. These bases changed the nature of agriculture in Thailand.

Thailand saw Vietnam as its principal enemy and they were also fighting a domestic communist insurgency. ISA wrestled with two principal issues with Thailand: 1) what to do with our sizeable number of bases or perhaps more broadly, what should be our military presence be in that country and 2) how do we reassure the Thais that we were still pledged by treaty to assist them in maintaining their security and independence, particularly against Vietnam. Both of these issues required much interaction with the Thais to give them confidence in our commitments. They of course were concerned that our military reductions would detract from our interest in Thailand; we tried to give them as much military assistance as we could to offset the closing of the bases and help with their insurgency in the north. Military assistance to Thailand was a useful tool not only to improve Thai military capabilities but also to give visible meaning to our verbal assurances of continuing support.

ROBERT S. ZIGLER
Program Officer, USAID

Robert S. Zigler was born in Illinois in 1920. He received his bachelor's degree from Manchester College in 1942. During his career with US AID he served in Laos, Vietnam, Philippines, Washington D.C., Ghana, and Upper Volta (Burkina Faso). Mr. Zigler was interviewed by W. Haven North in November 1998.

ZIGLER: I went there in 1968. I had a short term of a year in Washington. Warren Ziegler, who was a Peace Corps director in Nigeria, was in charge of AID training. He had seen me out in Laos and thought that maybe I should come back and work on local employee training which I tried to do, but I didn't do very well.

Then a fellow named Abe Ashkanase came by. He was being sent to South Vietnam to head up an AID training program for American and Laotian personnel. He asked me to go out there with him. At that time I ran into a quote from Oliver Wendell Holmes which said, "A man cannot be said to be judged a man of his times unless he has been involved in the passion of his times." That hit me sufficiently. I figured that is where my passion is. You can debate that. Nevertheless, I went to Warren Zigler and told him that is what I wanted to do. He was an idealistic type; he appreciated that. So, off I went to Vietnam. This was 1968 just after the Tet offensive.

At that time the situation in Saigon was such that there were planes flying around the city at night and they would drop flares, so you had a curtain of light surrounding the city all night. The idea was to prevent the possibility of infiltration. I stayed at the downtown hotel at that time, and you could go up to the top of the hotel and see dive bombers going down attacking different enemy sites in the suburbs. Rockets would come in from time to time. Curfews sometimes as early as 6:00. You would get out of work and you would go home. That was the nature of the life.

Now, some of the people that went through the Tet offensive were nervous and cautious. I went over to see a man after Tet and the lights went out in his building for some reason or other. I was going up the steps and he was coming down. When we met, he had two guns, one in each hand, and he was shaking like he had palsy. I tell you I tried to assure him very quickly that I was a friend indeed. Here was a person who was really jittery.

A lot of AID men lived two in a house. My buddy had a number of guns. He lived in the other. He came over to me and said, "Can I put my shotgun in your closet?" I said, "Okay." Then one night I heard a lot of shouting in his room. It was after curfew so what is going on here? I presumed for a minute he was being attacked by somebody and I should charge in there and help him because he was my house buddy. I should pick up that shotgun and charge through with it. Then I realized I had shot a shotgun only once in my life. I didn't know anything about that gun. I could trip and fall; you know all the possibilities, so I didn't. The place quieted down; so I stayed in my room. What happened was, my buddy met a Filipino man in a bar and it was too late for the Filipino to get home because of the curfew. He brought him home and said, "Hey, you are going to sleep on the couch." That was all right, of course, but the Filipino wanted to take a shower at midnight, which my friend didn't want him to do. That was the reason for the shouting.

Now, while we are on the human problems of presence overseas, one of the other aspects has to do with the relationships between men or women with local nationals. You have the issue of international intermarriage. As you may know, there was a lot of attention about American men marrying Vietnamese women. The same thing for Filipinas. I would say this, from a mission management point of view, it could be argued that it is a good thing for an employee to have a woman in his house staying with him. We are talking about men in their 30's or 40's or early 50's perhaps. It means he doesn't go down to the bars. That, as you know, is a questionable situation. Then you have the reduced problem of disease. From the point of view of having a man on the job every morning at start up time, if he has a condition like that at home, good performance is more likely. Another thing, too, I found that in Vietnam a lot of those women were very protective and assertive. In a sense, these guys weren't as free to roam as you might think. These women wanted to know where their men were and what they were doing.

Q: But they were not married to them.

ZIGLER: No, they were not married. I also noted that a lot of men went out there whose stateside marriage might not have been in too good a shape and they might have been divorced within the next one, two, three, or four years anyway. Then as you and I know, people change through the passage of time, so that could be a factor. Using the Philippine reference, I was involved for a short time at Grande Island in Subic Bay with the refugees out of Southeast Asia. I met some American women whose job it was to orient Philippine women who had met American sailors and military personnel. Most of that was done in bars and places like that, public locations. It was their opinion that these women, once given a chance to go in an ordinary legitimate way, shaped up very well. They developed into good wives. Remember, I started out on this from a managerial point of view. If you wanted to have an employee go to bed at 10:00 at night and not run around in the bars and be on the job in the morning; this is one of the conditions that makes that possible.

Q: You didn't officially endorse it I suppose, or did you have to as a manager?

ZIGLER: No, that was an interesting phenomenon. I think the way it worked was nothing was said about it, but it was something that kind of oozed around you might say and was known. Nobody that I knew of got any kind of a deleterious or negative report from the point of view of work as a result of that.

Q: Tell us about the situation in Vietnam as you saw it.

ZIGLER: Of course, at that time the war was on. This again is where unrealism raises its head. The American presence there included trying to win a war, defend a nation, and also create a republic. That is hard to do in a wartime. Even in this country and you go right back to Lincoln; leaders use an authoritarian style. That is contrary to public administration or political science concepts. That made it difficult, and yet progress was made.

Number two is, and this was something that nobody knew but learned after the fall of Saigon. I knew two men who stayed on in Saigon after the fall, one American and one Englishman. The day after the fall, the American went down to his office, he was an American contractor. He didn't know about the Saigon evacuation from where he was located. Sitting in his office was a soldier dressed in the uniform of the North Vietnamese army. Who was this soldier but the man who had worked with him for the last four years as his chauffeur! The English man had a similar situation. His former colleague was now a colonel. We are talking about infiltration and the business of how do you maintain and control security?

Now when it came to travel, you had the standard situation of what was open and what was free. You could fly or you could drive depending on what the security situation was.

Also again in Vietnam, you had a number of groups of people. You didn't have just Vietnamese. You had the Montagnards in the north and the Cao Dai down in the south. Here again is the problem of all nations of the world, how to create unity. When you have these different, strongly ethnic groups who have survived because of that ethnic strength to begin to cooperate, tolerate, give up, is a tough thing to do.

As far as the food was concerned, and this was true for Laos, the American military was there. It was an incredible establishment. They had a supermarket there that was as big as anything you have seen in the United States. There was a PX which sold everything from golf clubs to tennis rackets, camping equipment and TV sets. From the point of view of personal survival, it wasn't a problem. You could always get fresh meat or frozen turkeys!

There was a problem with script, and at that time the American establishment had its own script, and you had to buy with that. From time to time then, they would change the script. Instead of yellow, they would switch to blue. At that time, you had a lot of this script that had floated out into the community and was owned by Vietnamese. They weren't supposed to have it. It was legal tender. The general mode would be for a person to accumulate some of this and then get an American friend who had access to the PX or the commissary to go in and buy. But you see, when the money was changed, that was a big surprise to everyone. It was never predictable. If they couldn't get it exchanged through someone, well, they just lost. So that was a control technique that was used as far as money was concerned.

Q: What was your job?

ZIGLER: I was head of an institution called the Staff Development Center. We trained Vietnamese adults who were employees of the US government and the government of Vietnam to be better employees. The subjects were English, typing, shorthand, accounting, data processing, management, and telephone techniques. We had a building called the Staff Development Center that was built specifically for that. There was a Canadian man, Bert Mills, who was the start up person. As you know, the start ups are so important for success, and he was an important start up, no question. Anyway, we had about 1500 students. We had an office staff of about 12-15 people and a faculty of 30-50. These were mostly returned Vietnamese AID participants. They had been in the United States and had earned their degrees and came back. They taught on a part time basis. For, example, in the English program, we had two Ph.D.s and about four masters in linguistics or teaching English as a second language.

Q: These were Vietnamese?

ZIGLER: Yes, and the rest of the faculty were Vietnamese who had degrees in agriculture, public administration, or education. It could be argued that when it comes to learning a language, that the best person to teach that language is a person who has had a similar experience. In other words, I would rather learn French from you in my beginning days than I would from a French person because you know the problems of learning French. You can help me over the hurdles. Now, when I get to a higher level, a switch is okay.

Anyway, we had the building; it had a language lab and classrooms. The faculty used to give monthly programs on the teaching of English. You thought you were in an American university with the level of the lectures given. Students were all employees of the US or the Vietnamese government. Some of the students were also taking English prior to going to the United States as participants. We also had a business section where we taught management, accounting, typing, shorthand, and telephone techniques.

Q: How long did this go on, what period of time?

ZIGLER: I got there in '68 and it was going on until the spring of '75. At that time it was terminated because the need had been considered to be met. The United States Information Agency had a tremendous English program. They taught thousands in their English language schools. That was really something.

Q: Considering the long term results, is the Center still there ?

ZIGLER: No. One of the tragedies related to that was the head of our business teaching program. Now she was an idealistic person, unrealistic perhaps, but anyway, she intentionally decided not to evacuate and stay and help the new country.

Q: Was she American?

ZIGLER: No, Vietnamese. Then when the North Vietnamese took over, they announced that all people who worked for the Americans should register. So, she registered out of integrity. What do you think happened to her? Well, they packed her up and shipped her off to one of these training programs which was more or less a prison. She actually broke down as a result and has never recovered as I understand it.

Q: Sort of a reeducation program in those camps?

ZIGLER: Yes. Now you evidenced an interest in Americans leaving. This you may or may not know, I would say there were at least 20 guys (I was one of them) who had a sense of responsibility and association with the Vietnamese. I was in the Philippines at the time of the fall, but I thought about it and others did, too. They were willing to stay on after; to stay with their comrades you might say. The American Ambassador at that time was able to make an appropriate, effective directive to them to leave which they did. There was a lot of personal involvement there with the Vietnamese people. You didn't want to abandon your friends and leave.

I also want to mention something else which would be of interest. We had a requirement to start a secretarial training program to take the places of American secretaries. We had two groups with about 15 in each. The courses that they took were in English, typing, shorthand, and different aspects of AID. Their requirements were the same as if they had been an American taking those courses here in Washington in terms of typing and shorthand. The English exam wasn't required in the USA, but we had one. We used it as an entrance test. It was from the University of Michigan. It established competency levels that could not be questioned. One of the interesting things we did was to teach something about the AID organization. We had two sets of cards. One card would say "director," and then a related one would say "John Smith" (he was the director). With two sets, you could pair them. Then one set would be agriculture, public safety, etc., GSO, etc. We had about 15-20 titles and the names that fit them. It was fascinating to watch these girls, they were all competitive. We'd shuffle up the deck of cards with titles and lay them out to be paired. We'd time them and see who got the best time. That was a good way to develop a familiarity. I had originally in my unwisdom thought that it was better, and this might have been true from the point of view of spreading the American presence, to not have any relatives or sisters in the program. I learned later on it was a smart idea because if you had a student in this program whose sister was already working someplace, you had a source of reference the student could use as another teacher, so that worked out all right.

Q: How were they as students? How did they succeed?

ZIGLER: Well, they did well except there were some of them had problems with shorthand. I then started a process where I would accept the failures in shorthand. They would work for me as a secretary and keep practicing. Then when they were able to pass the exam, they would be transferred to the open AID positions that they were being prepared for. The interesting thing there, now we are back to culture again, and difference and respect for age. A number of American technicians would write reports out on yellow paper, and the handwriting, of course, might be somewhat difficult and the spelling might be questionable. Once again, since they were the boss, these girls would type exactly what they read. Shorthand, as you can understand, would be troublesome because of unfamiliarity with the language, but we got them to take 80 words a minute.

Q: How long a course was it for them?

ZIGLER: As I remember it, it was three months. We gave them an IQ test. At that time AID had developed an IQ test for Vietnamese. These secretarial trainees were all over 120, as I remember, according to that test.

Q: In that three months they had to learn the language?

ZIGLER: No, they knew the language before. Now there was a selective process. We had a test and so there was a good language level, no question about that. They didn't start from scratch.

Another interesting program we had there was in cooperation with the Control Data Corporation and the AID data processing unit. We provided the facilities and some of the management assistance for training about 32 computer people, data processors and analysts. We tested over 500 people talking before we ended up with 32 candidates. Of course they all completed the training. Some of those who were in the secretarial as well as the data processing came to the United States. They worked for AID and the UN and other international organizations as well as private ones because of this competence they achieved while they were there in Saigon.

Q: What was your understanding of the rest of the program AID was sponsoring at this time?

ZIGLER: All right, now I am ready to speak with enthusiasm. I will generalize by way of introduction to say the United States has suffered and AID has suffered because what I am going to tell you is not well known. It is my understanding there was one AID man who was given the assignment to write up the history of AID Vietnam. He had three volumes completed. One went out to the so-called resources in St. Louis and the other two have disappeared so even those books have suffered.

Q: Do you know who that was?

ZIGLER: I don't know for sure. I think it was Robert Craig. Anyway, here are some of the results. By the spring of 1975, 90 agricultural development banks had been started. Now the old traditional agriculture methodology was for the farmers to borrow from the Chinese money lender. His interest rates could be up to 100%. What this meant was that these people with their own money, this was self-funded essentially, had created a local bank and from that they got appropriate loans at a fair rate of interest. That was good. Also, when the French left Vietnam, something like 750 students took the baccalaureate exam, which is equivalent of high school. Now this was again part of the French colonial methodology of providing opportunities and reward for advancement to selected people. That was the way they did it. But the last school year, with AID support, which would have been the school year of '74, there were 75,000 students who took the baccalaureate exam. That was the same number of school years. Now whether it was exactly equal is something else. But that shows you the increase in the educational system both in teachers, buildings, facilities and numbers.

As you know, in the traditional French baccalaureate exam, you have to write out your answers, and the questions related to the previous questions. If you erred in some way on the first question, in terms of numbers, and you use those incorrect numbers for your second one, then that makes the second answer wrong. Well, anyway you still have to write, which I admit is a good way of determining language competence. But because of 75,000 exams, that methodology wasn't used.

Q: Did these 75,000 go to AID for their education system?

ZIGLER: Yes. AID had a test expert who developed a true-false, multiple choice test that used automated methodology to correct the exams.

Also that spring, the medical school which was run by the American AMA produced the largest graduating class of doctors in the world. Now that doesn't necessarily mean it was the best. They had the largest number. Also, the dental school had just finished the first year, and they might have had the same level in numbers. There was a public administration school that had about 1,000 students. There were some sad stories. One, I remember, was the president of the student body, on a wrong side ideologically, who was thrown off the third floor. That was the end of his student career.

Another significant achievement was rice sufficiency. The production in 1974 was enough to be sufficient for the entire South Vietnam if transportation was possible, but that you see, was limited or interdicted.

There were 5,000 returned AID participants. This is everything from a short term to a Ph.D. Another incredible human resource, there were supposed to be 180,000 Vietnamese who had worked for foreigners. This was a consequential human resource group because regardless of what they did, they learned something about difference or change or modernity which could be used and expanded.

Q: Where did you get these numbers?

ZIGLER: Well, I picked them up while I was there in one way or another. For instance, the man who was in the development of the ag banks program told me his experiences

Q: Do you know whether these institutions are still functioning?

ZIGLER: I don't know. You know, you run into some tricky business in trying to modernize. In my IVS days in Laos, I thought I would get our Laotian employees to put their money in the banks and that would be modern money saving. Since I was the boss, they did. We would go down to the bank each pay day. They had their bank books, and the numbers kept getting a little bigger. Then one day the Lao government shut down the bank. It was a French bank, and it was shut down for about three months. The savings were in there. When the bank finally opened up, what do you think happened the first day? Who was late for work? So here you have another uncertainty with the development banks. How they survived I really don't know. I know rice production is up. Vietnam exports rice now.

Q: What you are saying in effect is that wherever the program had a impact on the culture it opened up the society and the impact has carried over to Vietnam today?

ZIGLER: Absolutely. In fact, usually some of the important people regardless of what country, have been associated with AID. I would agree on that, no question. Now for inducements for change because we haven't talked about that. In a way, we did about Laos when we said, "If you want to build something or other, we'll provide you the cement and roofing sheets."

One of the strategies used in rural areas of Vietnam, particularly in the rice area when AID tried to get farmers to grow more rice or better rice or two crops was a plan make it possible for the village storekeepers to obtain consumer items like radios, bicycles - things that a farmer would want that he didn't have. There it was right in the store. He didn't have to go to far off Saigon. So this inducement was right there so he would try and do better, get more money so he could buy from the storekeeper. The storekeeper up to that time didn't have the capability of getting new supplies. An interesting development concept. Other achievements of AID were airports, roads, and bridges. I guess they are still there.

Q: How did you find working with the Vietnamese generally?

ZIGLER: That was an interesting experience of course. A couple of things, number one relates to the idea of learning the local language. Well, for me, everybody that I worked with wanted to speak English and hear English. It is true that if I knew Vietnamese and I walked through the office and heard the people speaking Vietnamese, I would know what they were talking about, which might be beneficial. But when I talked to them, they didn't want to speak Vietnamese at all. So, English was the language in the office.

Then there were a couple of other cross-cultural experiences that I will cite. This has to do with status and so on. I remember driving one time up to the school, and there were all kinds of students standing around. These were adults, of course. We had two or three men who were maintenance or cleaning men. I thought I would show these waiting students that even the big boss can carry the boxes in from his car. So I loaded up about two or three of them. It was quite a stack. I paraded through all these students waiting to go to class. Eventually my top Vietnamese aide came to me and said, "You know, that wasn't a very good idea." I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "Carrying those boxes in from your car." He went on to explain that what I had done, in a way I had insulted or demeaned or lowered visually my rating of these maintenance men. They felt that the big boss, Mr. Zigler, didn't think that they could carry boxes.

And another interesting one: I had moved into a large house with another AID man who was head of the data processing section. He had his crew of about 39 Vietnamese people and I had my group of 15 staff and 30 some teachers. We'd have parties which was part of the goodwill program of course, so we sent out an invitation. Everybody likes a free meal and dancing and music. We did it on one of those old reproducing machines, remember the kind with the blue ink, ditto. We wrote it "come one come all," "hot dogs," "dancing," "drinks." We thought that was an informal, happy, congenial invitation, and distributed it to everyone. We found out that almost all of the Americans came and most of his Vietnamese, but on my side very few of the Vietnamese came. We had ordered enough hot dogs and drinks and everything for the total numbers. Anyway, when the next week came around I asked my assistant what do you think happened? Well I'll tell you I think it was your "invitations." I said, "What do you mean; it was friendly and happy." "Yes, but it was the wrong way. You should have had a properly printed formal invitation, and then they would have believed you were serious. You see, when you sent them that other one, they didn't think you were serious. So they didn't want to go. They didn't have to go. If you would have sent them something else, they would have had an obligation."

Then we move on to another aspect of interaction. The people I associated with were of an equal educational level as I. They lived, as you might presume, in the city, and I would invite them from time to time, along with other government officials, to my house. Sometimes they would come and sometimes they wouldn't. Eventually I learned that a number of the "no shows" was due to the fact that they thought they were expected to reciprocate. And if they reciprocated, they didn't have the ability to reciprocate at the same level that they thought they should. They didn't have all the same color cups, or enough plates, or enough money.

Another interesting issue had to do with the use of the toilet seats. As you know, there are many cultures that use the squat system and a hole in the floor. At the school we were outfitted with the American equipment and we had the standard commodes. Many times I would see heel prints from shoes right on top of the seat. They didn't lift it up; they just stood on the seat. Again that is a difference in lifestyle, and again these were people who had been educated for four years or more in the United States.

Another interesting thing I did relates to the cross cultural aspects of student life. On a Saturday morning, I had a class for all people planning to study in the United States. I had sessions on such things as how to take a test. Most of these people had worked through the French exam system which started from the top and worked to the bottom. Now, in the system we use, there are 10 or 15 questions in a category. If you can't answer the first one, you skip it, you go down until you find one you can and then you back up. As you know, through the passage of test time, sometimes you find answers that you have forgotten. Well they would be more inclined to do question one and then do two and then three, which is a poor way. So we gave them test taking experience. We had sessions on social life and sessions on college life and so on.

The way I would start it, on the first day I was to come in late. These were all government officials at that time. They were already in their seats, white shirts usually with a tie. I'd come in with a pair of old tennis shoes with the strings untied and flopping and a sloppy pair of pants and a tee shirt hanging down low. I would swagger down the aisle and then stand up on the table right in front of them and start to talk. My message was “when you get to America, don't pay any attention to what the professor looks like. What you want to do is pay attention to what he says and what you can hear.” That was always a startler for them I'll admit because it was unconventional.

The same way with doing business. This again is a social style. You and I are serious because we are sitting down. If we were standing up in the hall, that is not a serious discussion, so if you want to be serious with a person, you have to sit down. Also, you don't sit on a table. Anyway, those are some examples of working with the Vietnamese people.

To finish up, I also was involved in American orientation to the mission. We had an orientation every month. It ran for about two or three mornings. The Mission Director would come over and put in a 15 minute talk. We'd have movies and lectures about different aspects of Vietnamese politics and culture. The mission required it or wanted it. I did it there at the Staff Development Center. Sometimes USIA people would come over. Very seldom did any Embassy people or any other agencies that were out there. Voluntary agency people would send people over. I also did their orientation for new Vietnamese employees about what AID was doing, the problems of the world, the population increase, food, etc. We'd have 20-30 people because of the size of the mission. I used an interpreter.

Q: What was your view of the overall American effort in Vietnam at that time? What were we trying to do given that Vietnam was a controversial subject; could we have accomplished anything in AID terms?

ZIGLER: You remember I recited all the AID performance record. It is my opinion that if North Vietnam would have stayed north of the 17th parallel, that South Vietnam today would be a gem in the history of development partly because of the incredible human resources. You had a nation that had both agriculture as well as tourism potential. There was access to the ocean as well as the interior, which is up about 3000-5000 feet. There were different climatic conditions there, which makes it appealing to tourists. It would have been a real achiever. It would be superior to Korea, I think, not necessarily in heavy industry but in the world of human appeal and achievement. So that is a generalized response.

Q: What about the North Vietnamese's approach or strategy or understanding of the development process? Did you have any perception of that at the time?

ZIGLER: To me the fact that the North Vietnamese were able to engender such continued endeavor on the part of people to go to war is incredible. When you think about the results which took them years to achieve. Of course, then they have this history of success against the oppressor which they don't forget. They resisted the Chinese. They resisted the French. I know Frenchmen at Dien Bien Phu who told me their machine guns were so hot they didn't dare touch the barrels. They just sat there and mowed the attackers down. The Vietnamese kept coming and eventually they over ran. So, you had this incredible purposefulness that was maintained. As you know there were all kinds of tunnels that were dug under Saigon. I talked about this human infiltration.

Now, when it comes to development itself, I don't think they did very much except survive. Now they got some assistance, no question about that, from the outside. I don't know exactly how it got there, but we know about the Russian Chinese association. That enabled them to carry on their military actions. I don't know if they got any food or anything like that. I think they were pretty self-sufficient.

Q: I guess this the point you mentioned earlier, that because of the war some people felt it was a hopeless situation for trying to do development work of any kind. We were really going to lose in the end in terms of development because of the war situation?

ZIGLER: Well, when you think in terms of numbers of people as human resources when 180,000 had association with foreigners and then the 5,000 AID returnees. Then you had USIA people and you also had military people. How many of them were evacuees I really don't know, but certainly their influence and the people still in South Vietnam are influential; some are people that were associated with the American presence in one way or another.

Q: Well, anything else about the Vietnam experience?

ZIGLER: Yes, I'd like to say this about the American team, and I'm talking particularly about the field people. I will contest that it was the best trained, best prepared group of people that the United States has sent anywhere anytime, period. Why? Well, as you remember they started out with a training program here in Washington over in Rosslyn, the Foreign Service Institute area. They studied the Vietnamese, and the cultures and language for months. They achieved a level, I think it was FS-2.

Then it was decided to do training in Hawaii, an interesting idea. Instead of training in Washington, they would move out to Hawaii. From a training point of view, psychologically and physically it had appeal because it was separated from the home base. Trainees could concentrate. Also it was a new culture. It was also easy to bring in people from Southeast Asia to serve as teachers.

Then you had an interesting organizational situation. It was a new program, and it was in the United States. Administrators could go out and check easily. It was USA. It was not foreign travel, so budget wise it was a little easier to arrange travel. So you had a lot of people who talked to trainees, and the people who they talked to were usually the talkative ones and usually the discontented ones. So, the reports for awhile were of discontent and negativism. As a result, Hawaii training was terminated rather than maintained and it came back to Washington.

So anyway we are talking about the time spent in the preparation. I can remember an unusual program when there was lots of AID money available. We took a squad of trainees into Tennessee and a couple of times to West Virginia. They would go out and research and develop in one week a development plan for a county.

Q: This is part of the development studies program?

ZIGLER: No. This was separate from that but it included some of the ideas. They did not have a language problem. But they had all the human factors, they had resources and records available, and they could write it up. You talk about spin-off; a number of those communities used those plans for development purposes. The report was turned over to them; it was reviewed before they left. How many national developmental agencies had the money and the time and the capability to do that? I have never heard of any other country that did it. So there we go on that. That is the one reason I make this argument for the best prepared group of people.

Q: What was the size of the mission roughly?

ZIGLER: I think it was over 1000. Then another interesting thing, we are talking about Saigon. The Texaco company had put on some TV shows in the USA called Texaco Theater of the Air. These were movies and they shipped some of them to Saigon. These were American classics like "Our Town." We had a movie projector, so we would advertise, but this was always with a curfew. We'd show it at 6:00 and be done by 7:30. You sit and watch and wonder how long it takes to go home. It was not the most relaxing.

Q: Did you visit any of the rural areas and the pacification posts where we had people assigned?

ZIGLER: No.

Q: What was the situation there?

ZIGLER: I can't talk to that really. I know men who went out there and I traveled around as a tourist, but I never talked to them. You have other people who could speak more effectively and competently on that than I. No, I think that is the end as far as I am concerned in Vietnam.

Richard Sackett Thompson was born in 1933 in Pullman, Washington. His father was a college French professor, who later became a Dean at Washington State University. It was on a trip to France with his mother in 1952 that impressed him so much, he resolved to become a member of the foreign service. He graduated from Washington State University in 1955, after taking his junior year at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris. He was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford and obtained his master's degree from Georgetown in 1980. He spent two years in the Army in 1958-1960. Q: Where were you taking Vietnamese?

THOMPSON: Well, it was in the old Foreign Service Institute, which was also where I had the A-100 course when I first came in, which was in a remodeled garage under what is now River Place, then called Arlington Towers, in Rosslyn. I remember that when I first went in I wondered why you had this wide door and sort of sloping ramp down to the registrar and information desk. It was only years later I realized that was because it had been a garage and was for the cars to drive in. So I spent 40-42 weeks studying Vietnamese.

Q: You already had probably a better grounding than most Foreign Service people in French, how did you find coming up against tonal languages?

THOMPSON: Well, I had also done a lot of singing, so maybe that helped. You weren't allowed into the course unless you showed a relatively good aptitude. When you come into the Foreign Service there is or was a test that you took called , "Modern Language Aptitude Test." I think all of us scored fairly high on that. People varied in their diligence and ability to learn, but most of us managed to do it, I think. And it was quite intensive. We had six hours a day with a different teacher each hour for the benefit of either the students or the teachers, or both, so you heard a variety of approaches and accents, but all working on the FSI method which emphasizes repeating phrases and sentences after teachers to get it right. It emphasizes the oral use of the language.

Q: How did you come out of that?

THOMPSON: I felt very uncomfortable. Although I operated in Vietnamese at times for the following five years, I never felt really comfortable in it. I think perhaps because I was a little old, by now I was in my mid-30s, and I never really felt that I mastered the language even though in fact I was a good student and after I had been in Vietnam for a while I tested 4/4. I really felt my 4/4 in French was much more meaningful in actually being able to communicate with people in a nuance complex way than it was in Vietnamese.

Q: Did you get some area studies while you were at FSI?

THOMPSON: There were some lectures. Just after I left I think they improved and strengthened that part of the program. I thought that was pretty lacking. I had language training and not much area studies.

Q: I came through a little bit later in the garage too, but I got two weeks to familiarize myself with the language which was impossible, but I got the area studies program which was rather an intense series of lectures.

THOMPSON: I think we specifically did not get the area studies, only now and then there would be some especially distinguished lecturer and we would go hear that one and be let out of our language lessons to do it. But, otherwise I thought it was very weak on area studies, I didn't really have much of an idea of what was going on in Vietnam or the area's history and background, or anything when I went over there.

Q: You got there in 1968. When in 1968 did you get there?

THOMPSON: Well, I got there a few days before the Tet attack in January. My boss said, "Well, things are very quiet Dick, you will travel around with Peter Collins seeing how we do it and working up your language capability for a few weeks before you strike out on your own."

Q: You were going to be what?

THOMPSON: I was going to be in what was called the Provincial Reporting Unit which was a group of eight officers plus a boss who among them covered the four Corps areas of the country - I Corps, II Corps, III Corps and IV Corps. IV Corps was the Delta. We had relatively few American troops in the Delta so it was rather different from the other areas. Peter Collins, who had been there for several months already, and I shared the Delta, we shared the provinces. He took the important ones and I took the less important ones...that is not quite true because it was partly geographic. In the end, because of the Tet attack, instead of taking it easy, as soon as we could catch a chopper down to the Delta...we both caught the same plane down to Can Tho, the capital of the Delta and then fanned out visiting our provinces riding choppers, scheduled Air America Lines, or taking a vehicle, to see what the situation was in these various provinces after Tet.

Q: Could you describe your experiences after Tet, you had just arrived?

THOMPSON: I was sharing an apartment with another man several blocks from the embassy. I could hear a lot of shooting but I didn't know what was going on except by phone. I was advised by my boss to stay put.

Q: Your boss was whom?

THOMPSON: Tom Cochran. I stayed put in my apartment until close to noon the following day when my apartment mate, who was a military officer also serving in the embassy, came by and gave me a ride down to the embassy. It was a distance I could have walked, but I wasn't about to walk around the streets without having some idea of what was going on. So I got to the embassy about 11:00 the next day. There were still some Viet Cong bodies in the courtyard that had not yet been taken away, and of course the place was all shot up and there was a lot of confusion.

Q: Here you are brand new. What was your feeling about how this thing had happened and its effectiveness?

THOMPSON: I just don't recall having that kind of conversation. Nobody had all that amount of time to talk to me. The only thing I remember was the urge to get Peter Collins and me out to visit our provinces as soon as that could possibly be done so that we could be doing after action reports. I don't really have a feel for the mood in the embassy. I was just accepting whatever happened and not really thinking about the longer term.

Q: There is a certain point when you come in you are not in a very reflective mood, you are just absorbing this brand new thing. What happened in the Delta during the Tet, Tet was not just a one day thing?

THOMPSON: You are absolutely right. The part I remember very clearly, I would go up to the roof of the apartment house and it was like a fireworks display. All around town you would have choppers shooting tracers down around the suburbs where the fighting went on for some time. And the people on the ground sometimes firing up at the helicopters. Then flares being dropped all around. It was a spectacle that I would watch from my roof. As I recall, I was probably down in the Delta for a while and came back and it was still going on. As you say it lasted for quite some time.

In the towns I visited in the Delta, of course, there had been some very heavy fighting for a while but they were repulsed from all province capitals, and I was visiting basically province capitals. So very typically I would come in on a helicopter and as you would see the town from above you would have some modest masonry structures in the middle of town, which may or may not have been partly damaged by the fighting, and then you would have a large area of burned out huts. It was reed huts that they lived in and they burned easily. So, you would have one quadrant from the center of town out which was where the attack had taken place, been repulsed and there was a lot of burned houses. So you had a burned area as a segment of each province capital. And then, I landed and would talk to the senior Americans; the local politicians, where to be honest I usually used French rather than Vietnamese because that was a much easier way for us to communicate; and the local priests, the Buddhist priests, the Cao Dai sect leaders, if they were there, and the Catholic priests, of course. I would talk to people like this with positions in society to get their views of what had happened at Tet, from all points of view -- military, our development programs, what propaganda by the VC was circulating, etc. For a while there we just threw everything into our reports that we could think of that might be of use to try to analyze what happened.

So, it was a fascinating time. Every place there seemed to be some unusual circumstance that caused the VC plan to go awry. I won't try to recite what they all were, but every place felt that the VC had almost succeeded in taking over but because of some factor that had suddenly intervened that was favorable to the government side they had been pushed back in every case, so they took no province capital in the Delta, nor did they take the capital of the Delta, Can Tho, itself, where there was some very heavy fighting. Of course, they did take Hue in the north and were pushed out after a month of fighting. That was a somewhat different situation.

Q: What was the feeling both of the Vietnamese and the American side about Tet then, that you were getting from the Delta? Was this basically looked upon as a success or was it shock and dismay?

THOMPSON: That was where you had this great dichotomy between how things looked on the ground and how they looked in the United States. On the ground the VC had been pushed back with very heavy losses. They had such heavy losses that they really decimated the VC in the sense of the southern armed forces. The north which, of course, was running the whole thing, Hanoi, had to send northern troops into the Delta after that to provide them a fighting force in the Delta because their southern branch had become so decimated. It was a military defeat for the Communists, but a political victory because the reaction of the United States was that people felt that they had been misled that things were going better and that the enemy no longer had such a capability.

Q: Were you getting a feeling from the Vietnamese of pride and confidence that they had taken care of this matter?

THOMPSON: Oh, very definitely. In the Delta, with very few exceptions, it was Vietnamese troops who managed to do the job. So they were really very proud of the fact that they had taken the best shot of the VC and taken them out.

Q: So you finished this survey and went back to embassy and made your reports?

THOMPSON: Yes. It wasn't a survey, I did the same thing for 18 months. I tried to hit all my provinces the first couple of weeks to get a view of what happened after Tet and then after that I would be more selective. I did not have to go back to Saigon to deliver my reports because I could turn them in to the CIA operator in Can Tho. So Peter Collins and I usually met and cooperated on the reports. We just typed them out as best we could and gave them to the CIA telegraph operator and he would send them in. Of course the CIA was glad to have them because they could use them to check against their own reports. Sometimes the people in the embassy would mutter that the CIA got our reports before our own bosses did. But, anyway, the information could be transmitted that way. Other times we would travel back to Saigon and stay there a few days and write our reports and then go back out again. There was no set pattern to it really. For each Corps you had two officers. One of the two would live in Saigon and one would live in the region. Peter Collins lived in Can Tho and I in Saigon. The vague idea behind this was that they wanted some people around in Saigon so if they suddenly needed to consult about what was happening there might be somebody there -- except if you were doing your job you wouldn't be there either. This was true except for I Corps in the north which was too far away and both officers lived up there.

Q: You were under the political section?

THOMPSON: Yes, that's right.

Q: What was your impression of the political section and how it operated during this period?

THOMPSON: Well, it was very good. The ablest officers, without calling myself an able officer, generally very capable people were being assigned to Vietnam. It had a priority in the world to get the best people. So, by and large, they were very excellent officers to work with. I think the total officers in the political section was something like 25, because you had 8 on the Provincial Reports; a similar number working on internal politics at the Saigon level, the various parties and organs of government; you had a labor attaché; a political military section. It was a very large political section indeed.

Then, when you got up to the top leadership of the embassy, of course, you got into some interesting and sometimes controversial people.

Q: Could you talk about some of these people?

THOMPSON: Without naming any names at the moment, I think one problem in Vietnam in understanding what was going on was that a lot of the top people had been in Korea. I think there is a very clear difference which these people didn't grasp. In Korea, the Communists had virtually taken over the whole peninsula before we drove them north, so all Koreans hated the Communists. In Vietnam, on the contrary, the Communists had the prestige of having defeated the French. They by and large presented a humane face in the areas where they did control and there was much more ambivalence about the Viet Cong even among the people who presumably were on our side or our supporters. The government that we were supporting, these were the generals who had sided with the French puppets fighting the Viet Minh Communists who embodied the cause of nationalism. There was this concept of Chinh Nghia, leading or main principle, which might be translated "righteous cause. I find it hard to define but you have it or you don't and the Communists tended to have it because the driving force of the society tended to be more in their hands because of these factors I mentioned. So even the people I would deal with that were staunchly anti-communist, nevertheless had real admiration for the people on the other side who suffered privation, did not have luxurious living, lived out in the jungle for years and worked hard. Ho Chi Minh, himself, was known for his ascetic style of living and they would contrast this with the corrupt life-style of the military government in Saigon. So for the Vietnamese their loyalties were often very ambiguous and a person would have a brother fighting on the other side and things like that. I think the Americans who came in with Korean experience where things were black and white, did not realize the ambiguity of the situation in Vietnam and how people were not really staunchly anti-communist in a sense, even though all this fighting and dying was going on. The people had a respect if not sympathy for the other side. I think this was an important difference. I don't want to name too many names, but I think an example of the Korean school would be Sam Berger...

Q: Yes. He had been ambassador to Korea.

THOMPSON: ...who I liked very much. Shortly after I arrived there was a Vietnamese member of the parliament who was calling for a peace settlement involving a coalition government. Well, that was the position of the North, the Communists, in the negotiations, so he was eventually imprisoned. The senior Americans couldn't understand how the Vietnamese could have any sympathy for a man who was advocating the enemy point of view. But, of course, if you have this more ambiguous view of the war and the conflict, why it certainly made sense to the Vietnamese to call for a coalition government which would end the fighting and bring peace and reconciliation to the country.

Q: Martin Hertz was the political counselor most of the time you were there wasn't he?

THOMPSON: Yes.

Q: How do you think he saw things? He is one of the intellectuals of the Foreign Service.

THOMPSON: He was an example of that. At the end of his tour he wrote a memo called "Bell Ringers," and I wish I had it somewhere. He described in there several incidents, for example a conversation with a leading general who said he had a brother who was a general on the other side, etc. which to him brought forth this ambiguity of the war and of feelings toward the war which I am describing to you which I thought most people would get from the New York Times before even going to Vietnam.

Q: Was there sort of a feeling that you have to think positively? We had a great commitment there, obviously, did you have a feeling that maybe we were thinking too positively all the time?

THOMPSON: Well, of course, you have to feel positively. The President says we are going to hold out here and you do your best to carry out the mission. I think the lower down you got in the hierarchy the more pessimistic you were about the long term chances because you could see the continuing strength and respect for the VC out in the countryside and the weaknesses on our side. But the view became progressively more rosy as you went from the village level to the district level to the province level to the Saigon level and then back to D.C.

I was quite startled in the spring of 1969. A high ranking senior embassy officer had visited Washington and came back and assembled the entire political section to discuss the situation. He told us that the war was about over, they can't hold out more than a few more months, you can expect peace this year. That was in 1969. That is sort of an extreme example of how the situation looked different...the realities are hard to define or express in the best of circumstances and you just got farther from reality with the chain I described.

Q: Was this one of these cases which is not unique to Vietnam where you have the more junior officers getting out into the countryside coming back with quite a different picture than those who are of more high rank, and partly because of their position of having to deal with the government, etc.? Did you feel there was kind of a split within the embassy between those who were getting out and reporting one world and those at the top who didn't seem to get the message?

THOMPSON: I think Ambassador Bunker had a pretty realistic view. Generally speaking our reports went into Washington as we wrote them. At one point the head of our unit then, Nick Thorne, would tone down our reports a little bit. When he went on leave and a young tiger took over as acting head, he said he was going to send in all our stuff exactly as we wrote it. So people wrote all these Airgrams telling about how they visited a town and all the Buddhist priests said that Big Minh should be president and Thieu was corrupt and should be out, and so on. All this stuff went into Washington unimpeded for two or three weeks. And, nobody took any notice whatsoever. There was no effect of this presumably franker reporting at all. And, of course, Washington was reading the New York Times and the other news reports coming out so they weren't just relying on the embassy. They realized the embassy probably toned things down a little bit.

You know, the State Department has a system for sending in dissent messages so if an officer has a policy difference he has the right to send that in and it is given high level attention in Washington. So, on one occasion I had written a cable about corruption, I think it was the fact that the general in II Corps was illegally logging cinnamon and selling it which was supposed to be prohibited. He was using army trucks. It was something like that, an everyday occurrence. I had a comment in there that the corruption would probably continue as long as the present military government was in power. This got toned down in the front office. I said, "Well, why don't I send this as a dissent message just representing my views." Then they went ahead and sent it the way I had written it. That was the only time it ever came up in my case personally. But I think Washington had access to a lot of information besides embassy reporting and I don't think that really made a big difference.

Q: Well, there is a certain amount of inertia, once you start going down a certain course it is pretty hard to change.

THOMPSON: I think the problem in Washington was, as you say, how do you change the policy without creating an even worse situation. A lot of people forget that when we got into Vietnam there were active Communist insurgencies considered dangerous in all the countries of Southeast Asia. We were afraid the Communists were going to take over in the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand. In Indonesia there was an attempted Communist coup in which they came very close to taking over. It is against this background that we were trying to keep the finger in the dike in Vietnam. People looking at the situation later on when we had improved relations with the Soviet Union and China, don't remember that this was a time in which we felt we were competing with the Communist influence all over the world. I mentioned earlier about having an embassy in Niger. We managed to stop them in Korea and we had to do the same thing in Vietnam. So I think people fail to remember that background. But, once we are in, then it is very hard to disengage and you come up against another of the myths that people were saying after we achieved the peace agreement in 1973, that we could have had the same agreement four years earlier and saved a lot of lives. Well, that is not true at all. In 1969, which I think is the year the Paris Talks started, the Communists were demanding a coalition government. Well, that meant we had to overthrow the government we supported in the south, and everybody agreed that would mean an almost automatic Communist takeover, because that would leave them as the only organized force in the country, and it was not until the negotiations in the fall of 1972 that they agreed not to require that as a precondition for some sort of agreement. So the Communists changed their position and it was only then that our government felt that it could honorably get out. We could leave and the government we had put in place there and were supporting would still exist. To overthrow that government ourselves would provide problems of credibility and dishonor, I think our leaders felt rightly, around the world. Only after the Communists made the additional concession did the US government feel that we could honorably withdraw. So, following up on your question, how you get out of it even when the world had changed...for example, after the opening to China in 1972, we no longer felt we were opposing China by remaining firm in Vietnam. In fact, the Chinese and the Vietnamese were staunch enemies. So, as the international situation changed, the original interest of having to oppose communism everywhere became greatly diminished as we improved relations with Russia and China, but it is still very hard to withdraw once you are in that deeply. I think our leaders were right feeling we could not do that until the 1972-73 period.

Q: How long were you doing provincial work?

THOMPSON: For 20 months. I came back in October, 1969.

Q: Let's concentrate on that period. What was your impression on how the American military was dealing with the situation in the Delta? You were able to go around and sample opinion and probably had a different view than many. How was this system working in the Delta?

THOMPSON: In the Delta area there were American military as advisors, but not regular units, at least in the provinces I was in. It depended so much on the personality and ability of the individual advisor. In some places we had very good people and in some places I felt they weren't so good. But it was still an advisory position and I think the Vietnamese officials, by and large, had a more fatalistic view. In other words: This war was something that had gone on for a long time and was going to go on a lot longer. The result eventually would be settled by arrangements among the great powers -- China and the US and Russia -- so whatever they did wasn't very important. The most important thing for them to do was to survive and perhaps lay up a small fortune for their family and children, because your family is more important to you than anything.

Starting from that basic premise you weren't in a situation where the Vietnamese really wanted to take chances or run risks of getting people killed or even themselves killed or stirring things up too much. So I think you had a pretty passive Vietnamese military and I don't think the American military advisors would make that much difference. Now that's a very broad generalization.

Q: Were we continually uncovering corruption and making noises about it, or were we learning to live with it?

THOMPSON: Well, probably both. I think everybody who had been there for a while realized this was endemic and that a certain percentage of everything you gave would probably be skimmed off one way or another by the local authorities, but there wasn't much you could really do about it and unless it was really blatant you wouldn't complain. There were certain times and places where people did object and probably obtained some improvement if it was exceptionally blatant from a public affairs point of view vis-a-vis the population, beyond the bounds the population would accept, because they would probably accept a certain level as being part of a way of life.

Q: I would guess that the Delta wasn't an area of particular interest to the press who were probably involved elsewhere.

THOMPSON: You are absolutely right. There were relatively few reporters in the Delta, they tended to be more with the American troops or in Saigon.

Q: What was your impression of the media at that time?

THOMPSON: I would not have an impression of the media during that period. As a provincial reporter traveling around the Delta I met reporters rather infrequently. During my next tour, which we haven't talked about yet, I became better acquainted with a number of them. My first tour, ending in October, 1969, I really didn't meet enough to have an impression.

Q: Okay, Dick, why don't we call it off at this point and we will pick up next time with your second tour which was from December, 1969 until February, 1972.

THOMPSON: Fine.

Q: Today is August 12, 1994. Dick, so we are now in December, 1969. What were you doing after you came back after home leave?

THOMPSON: I might mention that on November 8, 1969 I got married in the National Cathedral in Washington to Kathlee Calhoun Crouch, who is the daughter of the late Edward Crouch. He was a well-known Foreign Service officer in his time who ended up being deputy assistant secretary for budget and finance, testifying on the Hill because he got along well with Congressman John Rooney who virtually ruled the State Department at that time. So I came back to Vietnam with a bride.

Q: Did she come with you at that time?

THOMPSON: Normally wives were not allowed except for members of what was called the Mission Council, a sort of large country team they had there. They wanted me to come back because they were trying to get experienced officers to come back for a second tour. So I said that I would come back if I could bring my wife. So they said, "Okay." She was one of a relatively few wives.

Q: When you came back, what were you doing?

THOMPSON: I came back to a slightly different position. During my first tour I was what they called a provincial reporter covering 8 provinces in the Delta out of 16. My second tour I was following Vietnamese internal affairs and had special responsibility for the lower house of the national assembly; certain political parties; a special organ of their government to fight corruption, since that was recognized to be a serious problem; and the supreme court. It was more typical political section work than my first tour.

Q: How did you find contact with the Vietnamese deputies?

THOMPSON: Well, it was very easy. You know, Americans, especially young political officers assigned to Saigon, were really spoiled because the United States represented power to the Vietnamese and whatever faction there might be, and there were a lot of political parties and factions there, they all wanted to have an American connection because that was their way of getting their views to the American embassy. So it was really very easy to do political work, to make contact. In fact, you were being besieged by people really too minor to waste your time on. And the deputies were generally friendly. There were very few who tried to be standoffish towards Americans. They were generally very friendly as were all the Vietnamese in the government because they recognized that they wouldn't exist if it wasn't for American support.

Q: What role did the lower house play?

THOMPSON: That is a good question. They had a national assembly with a lower house and an upper house. I am trying to remember back now, they did pass legislation and often important legislation since they and the government were united in the anti-communist effort. Key pieces of legislation necessary to the war effort that were passed sometimes were changed by the national assembly. There were what were considered opposition deputies who used the assembly as a platform to be consistently critical of the government. There was a very active press in Saigon and about 50 daily newspapers ...maybe 35 Vietnamese language and a dozen Chinese language and a couple of English...representing a fairly wide spectrum of political opinion. There was a pretty free press there. A lot of them were very critical of the government and of the United States presence there, too. They would publish pictures of what were allegedly fetuses deformed by Agent Orange and things like that. So there was more political life and activity going on than a lot of people might suspect from a distance. You might just think that it was a military government and that was it. But they did have some of the substance of democracy there. They had a constitution and an election in which President Thieu was elected president. Even though behind the scenes the military did retain control through its control of the military apparatus, they permitted quite a significant degree of political activity and freedom.

Q: What about the supreme court? Did they play much of a role?

THOMPSON: My memory is, and I am sure scholars have done a better job on this, is that since their constitution did provide for judicial review, as we do in the United States, now and then an issue would be taken to the supreme court which would have some significance and political importance. I remember a time or two I was in a rather embarrassing position of lobbying the supreme court to make a decision one way or another. In retrospect, this would be unthinkable in the United States for a foreign diplomat to be lobbying the US supreme court. But these were issues relating to what we thought were important political aspects of what was going on there.

Q: I am always interested in nuts and bolts, how do you lobby a supreme court?

THOMPSON: You call on the chief justice or the other justices in their offices and point out the importance of the decision they are about to make, for example, disqualifying a presidential candidate or not disqualifying him, or something. I don't remember the precise issues, but they were things that we felt important to the political health of Vietnam.

Q: You were there from 1969-1972, I was there from 1969-1970. It was at a much lower level at that time. Was there any change that you saw up through 1972?

THOMPSON: From the military point of view, we had obviously driven the opposition's main force units pretty much back toward the borders by the time the Paris Agreement was signed. Certainly there was a political structure in place in many areas and the North was just building up waiting for its chance to attack again. But, as you say, the cities were quite tranquil during that period. There was the Tet attack, of course, in early 1968. In the spring of 1969 there was another lesser nation-wide offensive that was very serious in certain locations. And then things were fairly tranquil until the signing of the Paris Agreement in January, 1973.

Q: How about opposition groups? Were the Buddhists a problem anymore?

THOMPSON: That is interesting. They had been so important before I got there with the immolations, etc., which is the period of our willingness to go along with the overthrow of Diem.

Although we had somebody who is our most fluent Vietnamese speaker...

Q: Who was that?

THOMPSON: Harold Colebaugh, who left the Foreign Service some years ago. His career was relatively brief, but he was a very talented linguist. But when I was there I don't recall that the Buddhist political parties really had a leading political role. Some parties had more Buddhist support than others. But the Buddhists as such, as I recall, were in a somewhat secondary role.

Q: Were you limited in your contact with the Vietnamese military? I am thinking of the embassy. Or did we leave that more to our military?

THOMPSON: Well, we had a couple of Foreign Service officers in the embassy who were supposed to follow political/military affairs. I know they saw generals from time to time, but I would be reluctant to try to describe in detail the extent to which we were in touch with the senior officers. Of course, Ambassador Bunker kept in personal touch with the top military leaders. After a while the prime minister was also a general. I think when I arrived the position was held by a civilian and for some reason that didn't work out and so a general was made prime minister. Ambassador Bunker certainly kept in touch with that top level. He was constantly having people to dinner and doing an excellent job of keeping in touch.

Q: This was probably the largest political section we have had anywhere. How did you find the political section, particularly this latter half of your time there? There were a lot of people running around, lots of contact, but how effective were they?

THOMPSON: Washington wanted to know in detail what was going on in Vietnam and it was a vitally important issue for the United States then. So I think the political section was certainly needed. For example, the provincial reporters, the unit of about eight people who went around the country, plus a chief, that would be nine people all together and that was part of the political section, gave the civilian part of the embassy and, I think, Washington tremendous insights into what was going on around the country. There was the CORDS system which was ultimately considered under military command but with a civilian deputy. You had people out in the country working on reconstruction and helping the local forces fight at the same time. There was reporting going back through their channels also. But it often didn't reach Washington as fully as our reporting, and it tended to be spotty in some provinces. In some locations you would have some bright young fellow with Vietnamese who would really turn in some interesting information, and in other places you didn't. So I think the embassy reporting really pulled it together for Washington. I think I counted 25 or 26 people in our political section at one time. For an important country I didn't think that was too many.

Q: Let's talk about corruption. How did you see corruption? For many looking at this from a distance, it seemed that the Vietnamese government was sort of fatally flawed because of the corruption angle.

THOMPSON: World wide the idea of taking care of your family first and then your village and clan, etc. is rather strong as opposed to our idea of a government. A certain degree of government taking a rake-off is expected by everyone and accepted, but it was excessive in many cases. This was obviously a great weakness of the Vietnamese government that we were supporting. Some people were considered excessively corrupt and grasping and greedy and that weakened us in competition with the Communists who, of course, although they had their people on the take, by and large were rather honest and ascetic as symbolized by "Uncle Ho" who apparently lived a very simply life. It was almost monastic, as I recall. That was a very serious problem, weakening popular support for the government.

Q: Did you see any serious effort to try to do something about it?

THOMPSON: Not really. There was an organ set up by the constitution to fight corruption, I forget the name of it now, but it just couldn't be effective because the main people being corrupt were the military leaders who really ran things. So there wasn't much that they could do.

Q: Were you ever involved in saying, "I hear general so-and-so of the II Corps is taking a rake off here and there" and reporting it and that sort of thing?

THOMPSON: That was done especially at the provincial level where we had a province senior advisor, who I think would be telling his province chief that he had better curb this or that. I don't recall much being said about this at the national level. It may have been, but I don't recall any such demarches.

Q: When you arrived there the second time...you basically left during the Johnson Administration and came back in the Nixon Administration....did you note any change in demands on the political section such as more candor, less candor, more complete, less complete?

THOMPSON: I am trying to remember. As I recall, Ambassador Bunker was kept on straight through. I didn't really notice any changes from one administration to another. What was sort of interesting was that the Communists were very clearly trying to exploit every presidential election. In 1968 it was the Tet attack and then in 1972 it was more on the negotiations scene that they were trying to use the American presidential election to weaken our political will. They were really combining military strategy with political tactics in a very skillful way.

Q: In the second period, before we move on to the Paris Peace Mission, were there any major developments in Vietnam that you were involved with?

THOMPSON: I might say two things. In the first place, there were a lot of functioning democratic institutions and the people were used to it and politicians got used to it, and I think there was a lot of progress in making democracy a reality among the political elite of the country. In 1971, as I recall, there was a presidential election and that turned out to be a one man election. There were various ways you could be nominated to be president. You had to be nominated by a certain number of deputies and senators or by a certain number of the provincial councilors. President Thieu had been telling Ambassador Bunker that there undoubtedly would be several candidates. Then suddenly, close to the deadline for qualifying people, Bunker discovered that President Thieu had pressured almost all of the provincial councilors to sign up for him. In fact, there were very few that hadn't signed up for him and would be available to sign up for somebody else. Ambassador Bunker felt that Thieu had really lied to him on this one and was furious about it. As I recall, somehow Nguyen Cao Ky, who was a well-known figure had got enough to be nominated, but I think then he withdrew. Either he didn't get enough or he withdrew, I forget which, so he was suddenly out of the picture and Big Minh, a leading general but a critic of the Thieu government, was the only hope to be an opposition candidate. I think there were enough lower house. He had quite a bit of support among lower house deputies. I think he had enough or would have had enough signatories from deputies to run, but he said it was obvious that it was going to be a fixed election and he wouldn't run. There was a famous meeting when Bunker came back from Washington and called on Big Minh. Big Minh said afterwards that Bunker had offered him one or three million dollars (I can't remember the exact amount) if he would run, the idea being that the US wanted it to be a real election with two candidates, at least in appearance. I went with Bunker to that meeting but at a certain point I was asked to step outside so I don't know exactly what went on between them. I think probably what really happened was that Ambassador Bunker offered financial help to Big Minh's campaign or at least it was in that form and Big Minh turned it down because he said he knew it was clear, even though we were offering money, we still wanted Thieu to win. Thieu was the US candidate but we wanted Big Minh to run to make the election look good and he wasn't going to do that. So, he didn't run and the election in the end was uncontested, which was certainly a setback. But, overall, I think if there hadn't been a Communist threat they might actually have become a democratic society.

Q: You left there in December 1971, is that right?

THOMPSON: Yes, that would have been a two-year tour. I got there in December, 1969 and probably left December, 1971 or January, 1972.

Q: I might just note for the record that you got the Superior Honor Award for your work there. Was this for just sustained work or was it for any particular action?

THOMPSON: I am very grateful to John Sylvester who wrote it up and pushed it through. He wrote it up that I had done excellent reporting, sometimes in physical danger, which was certainly true from time to time.

Q: This goes back to your provincial reporting?

THOMPSON: I guess it would have been the first time, although he was actually my boss during my second tour. I guess he must have gone back into my provincial days when writing this up. On one occasion, for example, I was sitting at the airport in Can Tho, the capital of the Delta region, in a small plane waiting to take off, when mortar rounds started coming in on the airport. The pilot had to sit warming up his engines while the mortar rounds came in and then he took off. Or you would be flying along in a chopper and land at some small town and be told that the VC had fired at the chopper from a nearby tree line. Of course you couldn't hear it while in the chopper because of the noise. I guess there are incidents like this in the life of everyone there. I think it was given for a combination of excellent reporting and some danger.

Q: When you left there in 1972, whither Vietnam in your opinion at that time?

THOMPSON: Well, I think we all felt that Vietnam would be dependent on strong American support in view of the tenacity of the North. The only way the South could survive would be through continuing American support. You could see that such support was gradually slipping away over the years. So, I think our long-term prognosis was pretty poor, even though by 1972-73, there was an appearance of tranquility. There was a major communist offensive in the spring of 1972, but thereafter the enemy's main force units had been pushed back into remote areas around the borders and economic development was proceeding very rapidly. Their exports were going up very quickly. Rice production was booming. There were fish farms. The country had had virtually no exports for a number of years and their imports were covered by US assistance, but their exports were now zooming up. There were signs that they could have a viable economy. But this was all kind of a false picture of prosperity in view of the constant threat of the North renewing the offensive.

Q: What was your next assignment?

THOMPSON: After my second tour in Vietnam I was assigned to the Paris Peace Talks. But before we move on to Paris I should note Kathleen and I had two children born at the U.S. Army Third Field Hospital on the edge of Saigon. John Edward Thompson born August 29, 1970, and Francesca Cloud Thompson born September 1, 1971.

Q: Okay. You were in Paris from 1972-74. When you arrived, what was the status?

THOMPSON: Well, they were a kind of ritual that had been going on for at least a couple of years. There had been all that discussion about the shape of the table, but by the time I got there that had been settled. Of course, those sorts of issues are very important because they are symbolic. One side maintained that they were four-sided talks, and the other side maintained they were two-sided talks. So you had all these seemingly trivial issues like the shape of the table and the arrangements, etc., which really were symbolic of who was actually going to prevail and impose his view on the other side. They went to the heart of how the war would come out.

By the time I got there there were these talks in the Conference Center in the Avenue Kleber. They were very ritualized with the exchanging of statements around a large table, then you had lunch, and then would come back for some rebuttals. There were four delegations for North Vietnam, the United States, The Republic of Vietnam and the Provisional Revolutionary Government, which was the puppet government that Hanoi had set up purporting to represent the South. Of course, the famous Madame Binh was the head of that delegation. You would come into the room and the first few minutes are kind of exciting to be sitting there with the North Vietnamese and Madame Binh. And then the speeches drone on and it becomes less exciting, especially as every speech had to be given in three languages. The procedures were set up that the Vietnamese would speak in Vietnamese, it would be translated into French and then into English. There was simultaneous translating so you could hear all three at the same time, but it still meant that every statement was made three times so everything was really dragged out.

Q: What were you doing?

THOMPSON: I was liaison officer in our delegation. This meant that I was the person authorized to talk to the other delegations to set up meetings, sometimes to exchange documents, and at times visit their headquarters to exchange documents or procedural proposals or something. If you stop and think this makes a lot of sense because you need to have a designated person as a contact point for the delegations. If someone else from the delegation called them they should ignore him or her. You could imagine a delegation with 12 or 15 people if anybody felt he could phone somebody from another delegation and start setting up meetings or passing papers, etc. You needed to have a definite point of contact for that sort of thing.

I did some of the reporting on the meetings and there was always a press conference right afterwards in the same location where the four delegations would take turns speaking to the press. I would do a reporting cable of what was said at the press conference. At the actual meetings, part of the arrangements was a big circular table and a small rectangular table on each side which sort of divided the big table into two sides. That was part of the proceedings. I sat at a small table and opposite me on the other side was the North Vietnamese liaison officer. His English, of course, was much better than my Vietnamese. When somebody started a speech we would exchange the text because they were all written out ahead of time to help your translators know what to say. So, he and I did certain things relating to our duties as liaison officers even during the meetings.

The whole point of these lengthy meetings was to make them last until lunch because the French would give a good lunch. Apparently in the early days, it had been a nice hot lunch, but as the years went on, it started becoming a cold lunch, but it was still very tasty. So, the object was to make sure you could go on long enough to get lunch. And then you would come back for a round of pro forma rebuttals and then go home.

Of course, behind the scenes, as revealed later, Kissinger was carrying on his secret talks. Now and then, in hindsight, there was a faint reflection of those in what went on in these more or less public talks.

Q: Who was leading our delegation?

THOMPSON: When I arrived, it was William Porter, who was a very respected career officer and who thereafter became briefly number three man in the State Department, Under Secretary for Political Affairs, and then I forget if he retired or left with the change in administration or what. Anyway he held that job for a relatively short time. A very nice person. Very realistic. One of the relatively few high ranking people I heard that always spoke honestly and made sense. He was in the Phil Habib mold who always spoke directly and frankly and realistically. His assistant was Heyward Isham, another career officer who retired not long thereafter. The next important development was in October, 1972 when Kissinger revealed the secret talks.

Q: What did that do to what you all were doing?

THOMPSON: It meant the suspension of the talks around the round table at Avenue Kleber and a couple of us were then taken from the regular delegation and brought into the Kissinger talks. I was brought in as a second interpreter. He had a very gifted interpreter, David Engel, who really spoke fluent Vietnamese.

Q: Where did he learn Vietnamese?

THOMPSON: Well, I think in the system. He was at the Foreign Service Institute and just a very gifted person. I was pulled in to the delegation as sort of an additional flunkey to attend meetings. I don't remember exactly what happened, but basically what happened secretly was that the North had started to pull back from positions it had been taking before and that was when Kissinger revealed the secret talks in October. I attended one or two meetings then at houses in Neuilly, a suburb of Paris where we met with the North and they in effect were confirming that they were pulling back from previously agreed positions. There was one last meeting in early December at which Hey Isham was head of our delegation, all the top people having left already. Hey Isham and I went out to a Communist-sponsored meeting place on the outskirts of Paris and just ran down the list of issues and confirmed that they had pulled back on everything. This set the stage for the famous Christmas bombing of Hanoi, after the election.

Q: You say that they pulled back from previously agreed positions, these are ones that both sides had agreed to?

THOMPSON: Yes, in the secret talks.

Q: And then all of a sudden they just stopped?

THOMPSON: I can't remember. I am talking from memory. I am sure Kissinger has written about this.

Q: Were both sides looking over their shoulders at the battlefield at that time?

THOMPSON: No, they were looking over the shoulders of the American presidential election. And I suppose the reason they pulled back was because they saw that Nixon was going to win and they were not succeeding to influence the election by their maneuverings in the secret talks. The last meeting we held with them was after the election, I recall, in December, and they were still recalcitrant so we had the famous Christmas bombing.

There were two military officers attached to our delegation. During most of the time it was a general and a colonel, but towards the end it was a colonel and a lieutenant colonel. They had the best intelligence coming in from around the world to our delegation. During the Christmas bombing the North started shooting down B52s, the first time any were shot down. I can't remember how many were downed but from our intelligence we also knew they were running out of missiles so they would soon be totally helpless in the face of our bombing. Under the influence of this bombing, which I think was intended to be close to Hanoi, somehow stray bombs not only strike the French embassy, but killed the ambassador's mistress, which is very unkind indeed. So, in early January they agreed to resume the talks, the secret talks which by then were not very secret because hordes of newsmen would follow Kissinger wherever he went.

Q: Did you attend these meetings?

THOMPSON: Yes. Some meetings were between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho, and I would be there. As they started to make progress, they broke into two levels and Kissinger and Le Duc Tho would be working out the general agreement and Ambassador William Sullivan would be meeting with a deputy foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach, who later became foreign minister. Bill Sullivan and Thach would be working out the protocols which were the details of application, how you set up inspection teams, etc. in a separate set of meetings. So there were two sets of meetings going on. The principals, Kissinger and Le Duc Tho might be meeting in one place and Sullivan and Thach in another meeting place. So I was the interpreter for the Sullivan/Thach meetings and David Engel would stay with Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. Now and then I would be in one of the principal meetings. Maybe they would have to meet and talk to set some guidance for the secondary meetings and then the secondary meetings would resume.

Q: How did Kissinger and Le Duc Tho conduct their meetings?

THOMPSON: When the meetings first resumed in January, they were very frosty. The media, of course, didn't have much to go on but they set up cameras on raised towers 20 feet high so they could focus down inside the walls and see what happened between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. Kissinger would arrive and knock on the door and somebody would let him in. Then after some days Le Duc Tho would come out and greet him on the doorstep and guide him in, and then he would shake hands on the doorstep and guide him in. So the newsmen judged by this how warm the talks were getting. As they started to make progress, at first you would have lunch separately. Then they started having lunch together making it a social occasion between the two delegations. And then Kissinger and Le Duc Tho would sit together and chat during the lunches. So the atmosphere gradually grew warmer as we made progress toward an agreement. By the time we got to the point where they were sitting together they were chatting together almost like old friends. You could tell that they were both very intelligent men, very dedicated to the interests of their respective countries and that there obviously was continuing reserve and carefulness even as they were seemingly chatting in a social way.

Q: Before going to a meeting, what would you and the support people on the delegation do? Would you sit around and try to figure out what you were trying to get from that particular meeting?

THOMPSON: I was not a substantive factor in this. Kissinger certainly would sit around and talk with Bill Sullivan; George Aldrich, his legal advisor who had been working on the negotiations for years; Bill Stearman, who I think is now on the faculty here at Georgetown and who was there with the NSC, about what they were going to get out of these meetings. I was not involved in that.

Q: You had been in Vietnam for a long time, did you find yourself being asked how such and such played with the Vietnamese, etc.?

THOMPSON: No, Kissinger and his substantive assistants had been dealing with the Vietnamese in these negotiations for several years and there wasn't anything a political officer from Saigon could add. They had been gaging and judging these people at the level they worked for years.

Q: At this point we essentially bypass the South Vietnamese and the Viet Cong?

THOMPSON: That is very true. Of course, the PRG was only a puppet anyway, although Madame Binh tried to pretend she had a more serious role from time to time. We immediately briefed the South Vietnamese after every meeting. Kissinger usually sent Bill Sullivan to do that. Whether he told them everything or not I don't know. You will recall that at one point the issue arose that the negotiators had been working with English language documents and there was also a Vietnamese translation. We gave the South Vietnamese the Vietnamese version of the document and they said, "Well, look, in Vietnamese this says very different things than it says in English." We went back to the North and got some changes in the Vietnamese language to correspond more closely with the English. But they were somewhat shunted aside. I can't remember the exact sequence of the meetings, but I recall at one point when the agreement had been virtually finalized and we were preparing for a very formal international conference because there was sort of a guarantee statement that would be signed by China and the Soviet Union, as well as the four countries involved. There was an international conference with the foreign ministers of all the great powers for the first time in many years after World War II. They all came together in Paris to sign the document guaranteeing and recognizing the agreement on Vietnam. While the preparations were being made for this, suddenly Madame Binh called for a meeting around the old round table again. I remember I was meeting with Ambassador Sullivan and Thach in another room in the conference center to work out some final procedures for the formal signing while she had called this meeting. I can't remember what she was talking about, but anyway, our meeting finished and we came in to the other meeting and Thach was resuming his chair as head of the North Vietnamese delegation. Thach, the deputy foreign minister, walked behind Madame Binh who was talking to the group and stopped and made a choking gesture behind her where she couldn't see him and everybody else in the room laughed and he went on and sat down. This, I think, was pretty symbolic of how the North Vietnamese regarded the Provisional Revolutionary Government. They were nonplused when she called the meeting because this was not following orders.

Q: During this time did you form any relationship with your North Vietnamese counterpart, or were things still chilly at your level?

THOMPSON: Since we met together and chatted during the luncheons, of course, and I had my counterpart close to me at the general talks, so we chatted a bit about our families and other things, I felt there was a certain degree of personal relationship. At the secondary meetings between Sullivan and Thach working out the protocols, again you had the regular meeting at a table, which might be the dining room table in a house in a suburb, but then you would adjourn for tea after a while and Thach spoke pretty good English, although Sullivan and he could talk in French too, and they would sit off to one side and probably work on some of the details. Tea breaks are very important in diplomacy as you know and that was certainly true of these.

Q: Did you stay until the end of the whole process?

THOMPSON: Well, even beyond in a sense. I am trying to remember when the Paris Agreements on Vietnam were signed. It was in late January, 1973. At any rate, once the agreements were worked out and initialed all the foreign ministers came together and had a big signing and cocktail party in this conference center at which the Foreign Minister of South Vietnam and Madame Binh clinked glasses and toasted peace...I remember at the same party I ran into a Soviet diplomat who had been posted five years in Hanoi and we talked for a half hour in Vietnamese, that was our common language. That was kind of fun.

One of the things that was set up by the Paris Agreements on Vietnam, was a joint economic commission between North Vietnam and the United States because we had undertaken a commitment in the agreement to bind up the wounds of war, which meant to give the whole of Indochina additional help. There was a secret promise, under Johnson, that was originally proposed to North Vietnam that they would get a considerable amount of assistance and this was confirmed in an exchange of correspondence between the prime minister of North Vietnam and Nixon that they would get, as I recall, $3.25 billion over five years. The Agreements also set up a joint economic commission. So I stayed on in Paris as one of two delegation members who were kept on -- the other one was Bill Marsh, now US Representative to the FAO in Rome -- to staff this new delegation. New people came out from Washington to be substantive members of this delegation headed by Maurice Williams, then deputy administrator of AID, who is a very able man. On our delegation, only Maury Williams and I knew that Nixon had promised $3.25 billion over a period of five years if the North Vietnamese would be good. This was a secret for several years. It finally became public a few years later.

So these meetings started taking place at two levels. There would be meetings between heads of delegation in which key issues were discussed. Of course, the North wanted us to hand them a check for $650 million every year and they would know how to spend it. We were saying that they had to have projects and sign agreements for each project and have the full AID detailed treatment of each project. The North was saying that that was ridiculous, etc. So, we worked out a set of principles which would guide the US assistance. In our general meetings with everybody from both delegations present we would be discussing our assistance on the basis of specific needs they had, the commodity import program, a statement of principles to guide the US assistance to North Vietnam (their principle would be hand over a check and ours would be all the usual oversight safeguards of an AID program). But after two or three months it was clear that they weren't abiding by the agreement. They were preparing for future war, so we broke off the talks.

In June, 1973, there was something called the June Communiqué. Things were breaking down so seriously that Kissinger and Le Duc Tho came back to Paris and had some additional talks and came out with a communiqué which to some degree modified the Paris Agreements and described how both sides would implement them. This joint economic commission came back and met again briefly, as I recall, in June and July. But the North was not observing various parts of the agreement from our point of view and we adjourned those talks and never met again. I think the world has not really noticed that that joint economic commission ever existed, ever met, but we were, of course, holding out carrots to the North Vietnamese to observe the Paris Agreements, which would have preserved an independent South Vietnam.

Q: When the Paris Accords were signed in 1973, how did you feel? What did you think?

THOMPSON: We felt that the North would probably take over the South in the near future. We were withdrawing our support from the South. Kissinger observed it, and the rest of us, that the South could not stand up and prevail since US support was gone, and Congress had passed a law forbidding any further bombing of Hanoi. These agreements would give us a chance to pull out our troops and make an honorable retreat. There was a lot of talk that Nixon could have had the same agreement four years earlier, but that is not true because the North had been insisting that we set up a coalition government with the current government, neutralists and communists in Saigon even before they would let us withdraw, which was absolutely intolerable. It was only in the negotiations of 1972 that they started to say, "Okay, you don't have to overthrow this government before you leave." So the South Vietnamese government which was our client stayed in place, we withdrew our troops, got our POWs back and were able to withdraw the American forces in some sort of order from Indochina, and that was about the most we could hope for really. We left with the government we supported still in place and with some perhaps small fighting chance to maintain itself, but we weren't very optimistic. So I think we all felt we had gotten what we could out of it and managed to negotiate a more or less honorable US withdrawal from this commitment to Southeast Asia, which obviously was not supported any longer by the American people.

Q: By the time the Peace Accords were signed were you watching Congressional actions as far as support for the war went?

THOMPSON: Yes, that was very clear. Even the hawks were giving up. Of course, then the fighting was resumed, there was the offensive in 1975 and there was a very key vote, and I can't remember how much the money was, perhaps $300 million, on assistance to the South. By then even the hawks were saying that there was no sense throwing good money after bad, so even the hawks were not willing to vote money for Vietnam by 1975. You could see that trend developing already.

Q: When did you leave Paris after these economic talks had broken down?

THOMPSON: After these talks adjourned in July, Marsh and I were left there in charge of the delegation.

Q: This was in 1973?

THOMPSON: Yes. These talks had adjourned but in theory they could resume. Our delegation's quarters were very splendid because these quarters were a section of the American embassy in Paris which had been organized to house the US ambassador to NATO and his assistant. So they were very nice offices in Building B, as it was called, adjoining our embassy in Paris. It was just Bill and me in two very impressive large offices with large anterooms and a whole series of smaller rooms for other members of the delegation, etc. So we were kept on there I guess almost indefinitely. Finally after a while I said to the Department of State, "There is nothing happening here, will you reassign me?" But by then my two years were almost up and they said, "Fine, we will do it." Ambassador Graham Martin asked me to come back to Saigon to be head of the external affairs unit in the political section. I left Paris I believe in February, 1974 and I arrived in Saigon in late February or March after some home leave in the States.

Q: We are talking about February 1974, what was the situation then in Vietnam?

THOMPSON: The internal situation, as I recall it, was relatively peaceful. There wasn't fighting, the Republic of Vietnam seemed to have extended its sway over most of the population of the South. The economy was improving, as I was saying before there was some international aid coming in in addition to American assistance and you started to think that maybe this country was going to survive after all. Although you knew that the North was strong and wouldn't give up, at that time they were obviously lying low. I was chief of the external affairs unit in the political section, which was very different from my earlier two tours. Now I was following Vietnam's relations with the world and my main local client was the Foreign Ministry. The main thing I was doing was trying to keep the PRG from being accepted in international organizations. Bureaucratically it was kind of fun. Usually we would get an intelligence report indicating that the PRG was about to open an office in Geneva or something of that sort to represent the PRG in the UN organizations based in Geneva. Then we would send cables all over the world saying that this is an awful thing and recommending approaches be made by Washington to a bunch of countries to stop this. Washington would get out a cable saying "Okay, proceed as recommended by embassy Saigon in para 3 reftel," or something like that. In Washington they were sort of paralyzed, nobody wanted to do anything and take the lead, but Graham Martin's orders were to try to preserve South Vietnam if he could and by God he was going to try to do it. I even got some phone calls from Washington saying that people didn't like these cables from Saigon going all over the world. I said, "Well, we are just doing our job. You guys are paralyzed back there, and this is what we are supposed to do."

Q: Why would they be paralyzed?

THOMPSON: Well, there was no interest in Vietnam anymore and they would rather not think about it. I think it was just harder to get higher-ups who were going on to other problems to worry about keeping the PRG out of international organizations. So we were really taking the lead on that and that was kind of fun.

The other main function my section had was watching Hanoi. I had a State Department officer, David Walker, who had been doing this for years, and he would look at all the intelligence reports we were getting plus looking very carefully at the public broadcasts from Hanoi from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service and doing analysis of what was going on.

Also nominally in my section was Frank Snepp, who later wrote a book, "Decent Interval" on the fall of Saigon, which was interesting reading. Frank Snepp was also involved in analyzing what Hanoi was up to. The external unit had the main function of watching Hanoi and keeping the PRG out of international organizations, dealing mainly with the Foreign Ministry.

There developed another fun function at that time. Congressman Leo Ryan of California, a moderate Democrat, came to Saigon and I was named his escort officer. When he arrived in Saigon he was put in the guest quarters next to the ambassador's house and the ambassador came over [this is Graham Martin at this point] and the Congressman was very grumpy to him. I think he was mad at the State Department about something that didn't have anything to do with Saigon, as I recall. He also had a cold from the trip and was tired. He was pretty short with poor Ambassador Martin. I accompanied him on a trip around the country and I always enjoyed these trips because you get a lot of chopper rides and small plane rides and get a good look at the countryside and get to talk with a number of interesting people. Congressman Ryan went back to the United States and issued a report supporting continued aid to Vietnam. Well, Ambassador Martin thought that somehow I had something to do with this favorable result so he made me the control officer for all VIP visitors to Saigon. So I spent a lot of my time flying around Vietnam escorting people, which was great fun. One group was especially outstanding, Congressman Pete McCloskey, who is a liberal Republican, and Senator Dewey Bartlett. The two of them came together. Bartlett later died of cancer and McCloskey ran against Nixon in 1972 in the Republican primaries so there would be some alternative to Nixon. McCloskey had been in Vietnam before and had a loose leaf notebook with the notes from his previous trip. Every time he was talking to a Corps commander he would hear what he had to say and then respond, "In 1972 you said the same thing, has nothing changed?" He was really interesting to travel with. So, the third function was escorting VIPs around the country which I enjoyed very much.

Q: How did you find Graham Martin? He became very controversial because of his hanging on until the very end.

THOMPSON: I was in a rather special position with Graham Martin because Eddie Crouch, my wife's father, had been a very good friend of Graham Martin. My mother-in-law, Kitty Crouch, was a very good friend of Dotty, Graham Martin's wife, and still is for that matter to this day. So I was to a certain extent persona grata with him. He brought in a group of personal friends who had served with him at other posts to fill various key positions in Saigon and this group would give parties for each other and I was included because of my wife. We would go over to his house and watch movies with him and his family. Often his daughter, Janet, was there... I don't know if you have read the book, "The Last Ambassador" by the Kalb brothers. It is a novel based on the fall of Saigon which includes the daughter of the U.S. ambassador there at that time and that character was modeled on Janet Martin who spent a considerable amount of time in Saigon. She was one of my wife's best friends, so I had a personal relationship with the Martin family. I respect him a great deal for his personal integrity. I think he did not reach out like Ambassador Bunker did, he would read reports from everywhere but he didn't personally talk to Vietnamese very much except when he had to make a formal demarche, as I recall. He was an insomniac so at 2:00 in the morning he would be writing reports and cables on yellow legal pads on new ways that we might outflank the North and win after all. I can't add a great deal to the picture. But he is definitely a man who had his own quirks and his own blind spots, even though he was also a very able man and had been ambassador to at least Italy and Thailand before that and been very highly regarded. He did his best to preserve South Vietnam and that was really something impossible to do.

Q: What was the prevailing feeling in the political section -- that there would be an eventual Northern attack which would prevail?

THOMPSON: Yes. But that was somewhat in the back of your mind because superficially things seemed to be going very well. Then suddenly, I think it was February, 1975, there was an attack on Ban Me Thuot, the capital of one of the highland provinces not all that far north of Saigon. As I recall, there were elements of three divisions involved in this attack and we hadn't known they were there. Previously by listening to radio communications we had had pretty good intelligence on where the major North Vietnamese units were. They had figured out we knew where they were from their radios, so they had run tremendous long land lines or used couriers, etc. and managed to move in the jungle without our knowing where they were. So suddenly we had an attack not very far from Saigon by elements of three divisions. At that point most people thought this was the beginning of the end. The estimates by various agencies of how long Saigon would last varied from something like six weeks to six months. But once the North renewed the attack people started getting pretty pessimistic. It was not long thereafter that there was an attack in the north. The South had to keep divisions throughout the country making it easier for the North to roll up the country by concentrating its forces in one area at a time, moving southward. There was a plan to try to defend the Delta region at some point, but by then the Southern troops were crumbling and they couldn't form a defensive line anywhere. So once the end began it came rather quickly. More quickly than the North expected too. Usually they planned everything for months and worked everything out on sand tables, but they did not expect to win that quickly. They did not have plans in place to govern Saigon and the South, for example, but they made the decision once they saw how weak the South was to go ahead and win that year. Of course, that was my calculation too, when I agreed to go back to Saigon. I bought a house in 1974 when I was in Washington on home leave. I thought that I could probably finish a two-year tour in Vietnam before the North would win. We received extra pay for serving in Vietnam which would enable me to repay my parents for the down payment on the house. In the end it was only one year to the surprise of both the North Vietnamese and myself.

Q: You left when?

THOMPSON: I left -- I am confused whether it was April 29 or April 30, because it was one date in the US and another date in Saigon -- but the day of the fall of Saigon, I left by chopper from the embassy roof, about 9:00 PM. There was a very dramatic period leading up to that.

Q: Please talk about it. I think it is very important to get a feel for the embassy and the political section and how you felt. For those of us sitting back in Washington, when you saw Da Nang go down and those dramatic pictures of people being pushed out of planes, etc. you knew it was over. But the embassy kept functioning. What were you all thinking?

THOMPSON: By and large the same thing. It was only a matter of time. There were just differences of opinion as to how quickly the end would come. At a certain point about the beginning of April they started permitting families to be sent out to a safe-haven. I think I sparked that. I should be somewhat modest, but I suggested to the Deputy Ambassador, Wolf Lehmann, that it might be a good idea to start getting families out. My family went to Bangkok, but the Thais said that they did not want all these people so we had to send the rest somewhere else. When I went back to Vietnam with my wife in 1969 families were generally not allowed, but it gradually became easier and easier as the situation improved and a lot of families including children were in Saigon by 1975. I sent my family out about four weeks ahead, around April 1. By this time we had three children: Alexander Sackett Thompson had been born October 21, 1972 at the American Hospital in Neuilly, a suburb of Paris. Kathleen was much more comfortable there than at the military hospital outside of Saigon.

Getting back to the last days of Saigon, there were scary stories, especially the CIA people started saying that if they left for a weekend the local Vietnamese working with them started thinking that this must be the end. I went for a weekend to Thailand to visit my family and came back and my maids were tremendously relieved to find that I had in fact returned. As the fighting got closer and closer politically an interesting situation developed. The Paris Agreement on Vietnam set up an international commission to watch over the withdrawal arrangements and these people were still there. There was a Polish delegation and a Hungarian delegation and Tom Polgar, the CIA chief of station in Saigon was of Hungarian descent, and he felt he was getting good information from the Hungarian delegation indicating that the North was going to stop short of taking over Saigon and force the formation of a coalition government. You could see a lot of reasons the North might do this. It would give them international legitimacy, they would be eligible for international loans and assistance, on the surface they would be abiding by the agreements on Vietnam which called for a coalition to be established, and creating a very stable situation. So you can imagine that there might be reasons for the North Vietnamese to stop short of Saigon. On the other hand, Frank Snepp indicated in his book that he had a good strategic source who was telling him that the North was simply going to take over Saigon.

So this affected me personally in the sense that...there was the night of the 28th when I was awakened at 3:00 in the morning because Tan Son Nhut airport, on the outskirts of Saigon, and three miles from where I lived, was being shelled. When I went in to the embassy that morning I didn't know if I was going in to accompany the ambassador, who still thought there would be negotiations locally on some sort of coalition, so I wore my best summer suit ...if I was going to be evacuated I might as well take it out with me, or I might need it to accompany the ambassador to negotiations. So, either way I wanted to wear my best suit. I also had a very small bag that had just the key things in it you would need if you were going to be evacuated...towel, soap, toilet kit, change of clothing, etc. So I took my evacuation bag into the embassy and learned that evacuation was indeed in the cards.

Now, as far as evacuation was concerned my role was to be in touch with several other embassies. We had drawn down personnel in the American embassy, my secretary had left some time before and I had had several substitute secretaries and then they left. But certain people who had a role in the final evacuation were kept on. My role was to get in touch with certain other embassies and tell them, "We are leaving, if you want to leave with us do this." The last few days all four lines of my telephone had been constantly lit. I couldn't begin to take all the telephone calls I was getting and it was very hard to get a line out. I was afraid that on the final day I would not be able to get in touch with these embassies by phone and I would have to physically go around to them. In the end, however, I got through to them very quickly and my actual duties were done. So I helped other people do things like shredding documents. Some people had not shredded documents, for example the ambassador had not shredded his documents and he had file cabinet after file cabinet that had to be shredded that last day. I had about this much left.

Q: You are showing about six inches.

THOMPSON: Yes. I tossed them in the shredder and was ready to go. I also took my telephone list, containing Vietnamese contacts, etc. and shredded that. I didn't want to leave anything that would show them who my friends were. So then I helped other people shred and organized various things that last day. At one point my maid telephoned me to say that the guard at the gate had left my house and she was very frightened and didn't know what to do. I said to take the TV and anything else she wanted and to clear out because we were evacuating and I wouldn't see her again. She was crying, I was crying. The Vietnamese language is very hard to speak at best but I found it very hard to speak while crying. Then my faithful chauffeur came around. I had inherited him from my predecessor. I gave him several months salary for him and all the others in several envelopes in Vietnamese currency, which I hope he was at least able to get to the one at the house. I was able to pass the envelopes through a locked gate. Somebody told me that a few months later they had seen my car, which was very distinctive, a yellow Volkswagen squareback with a shiny silver knob on the shift lever being driven around Saigon. So, some Vietnamese Communist official presumably got that.

I got to the embassy at the usual time, around 9:00 am and parked the car across the street and never got back to my car again. The embassy was soon surrounded by Vietnamese wanting to get out. There were already several thousand inside the embassy compound, because during the night certain Americans had been bringing their friends in.

I am really getting ahead of the story because for several weeks there had been a degree of evacuation going on of South Vietnamese who might be in difficulty if the North Vietnamese won. There was a lot of controversy at higher levels about evacuation with the military authorities wanting to start evacuation fairly early on and the ambassador resisting this as I understand from the stories at that time. You have the famous story of Lionel Rosenblatt and Craig Johnstone, two Foreign Service officers stationed in Washington, coming back to Saigon to help their friends escape during the final weeks. I was keeping a tally of how many people there were at the embassies we were responsible for that we might have to get out on the final day and other people were keeping a tally of the number of Americans that might have to be evacuated the last day. In the end, no American who wanted to evacuate, as far as we know, was left behind. But the number of Americans actually went up on some days rather than going down. This infuriated the ambassador because he thought it would be coming down. But people were coming back to get their Vietnamese friends or their loved ones out.

We started helping Vietnamese who would be in danger leave the country and at some point the ambassador gave this his blessing, I don't know when. When I came down to breakfast each morning I would find several Vietnamese there who wanted me to help them get out. I would apologize for eating while I talked with them. I would eat breakfast and they would give me pieces of paper, listing their family members, how they could be contacted and stating why they were in danger. Upon arriving at the embassy I would write a cover memo for each of these and put them in the in-box of Shep Lowman, the head of the unit in the political section dealing with Vietnamese internal politics. The members of this unit were going around at night and picking up the Vietnamese, or telephoning and telling them to be at a certain place with their family members and suitcases, and taking them out to the airport. So I put these papers in his in-box and he would decide which ones were worthy to be taken out under our program. He conducted the actual evacuations but I would receive all these petitions from these people and put them into our system. I was very touched when one Vietnamese friend said that if I didn't get out he had a friend who would help me to get out -- he was an importer who had a lot of boats and when the final day came he would get on his boat and sail away. Later I learned the Vietnamese friend who offered to help me did get out and it turned out that his friend, the businessman, did not get out because he went down to his boat and all the crew members turned out to be VC. He said that the last he knew his friend was working disguised as a cyclo driver, the Vietnamese equivalent of a rickshaw driver, in Saigon and living a very meager life. So, if I had tried that way out I wouldn't have made it. Anyway it was very touching that somebody offered me a way out.

But anyway, there was all this confusion in the final days. All these stories of people throwing babies over the fence at the airport to get them out, etc. which is all true. There was also a heightened sense of sorrow from various things that happened during the last couple of weeks. A few days before the final evacuation a C-5 loaded with orphans went down near the airport and many were killed. Also, a couple of days before the evacuation I got a call from the Australian ambassador saying that he was concerned that his friend, the Australian chargé in Laos, had not shown up at Tan Son Nhut airport when he was supposed to meet him. So I started phoning our embassy in Laos and other sources. It developed that this plane had been shot down in the Highlands by the South Vietnamese for some reason and that his friend had probably been killed. So, after piecing things together I had to call back and tell him that his friend had been killed in this crash. This kind of sorrow for several days was pretty depressing for me.

Q: How about the consular section? I'm a former consul general there.

THOMPSON: They were working very hard. There was a line several people wide and a couple of blocks long in front of the consular section every day. I say this subject a little bit to correction, but people in the United States, of course, were sending in petitions to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for their Vietnamese relatives to get out. So the Americans would be told by the INS that it had approved their petition and sent it to the consular section in Saigon, so tell your relatives to go by the embassy and pick up their visas. Well, you couldn't pick up your visa if you were at the end of a line two blocks long. In the case of Vietnamese relatives of an American that I knew, Edward Height, I helped them bypass all this because I knew they were relatives of an American and they got on a bus at a certain spot and were taken to the airport and evacuated. But there was a mismatch between what was going on frantically in the Consular section in Saigon with the petitions piling up and the routine information being given to the families back in the United States.

Q: Were you privy to how Graham Martin was operating during these last days?

THOMPSON: In a sense, what he thought was happening and what really did happen worked together. For example, he thought that the North Vietnamese would stop short of Saigon and negotiate a coalition government. The embassy would remain in place and keep functioning, working with this coalition government. Once it became clear this scenario was not true and the North...they paused a few hours until we finished our evacuation and then they came on in. They paused just outside Saigon to let us get out. Once it was clear that they were not negotiating and we were going to evacuate, things were really out of his hands. His only goal then was to evacuate as many people as possible because he felt that we owed it to these Vietnamese. The choppers went on and on evacuating people. There were several thousand people, including the famous bar girls from Mimi's, within the compound at that time. He wanted to make sure everyone possible would get out before we left. When I left there weren't very many people remaining, but they kept going for several more hours. Finally he was ordered by the President to leave because the chopper pilots and crews were far beyond the limits of endurance that they should have been observing in terms of flying. He was ordered to get out and he did get on a chopper. And then the battalion of Marines who were guarding the embassy perimeters withdrew and the looters came in. There was a lot of talk about some people being shot at, etc. as we left the embassy. I certainly never saw any of that or felt in danger. There had been a lot of talk among Vietnamese who worked with Americans who said they were going to take the pin out of a grenade and hold it and stay with you until you are able to get me out, etc. The final day I didn't hear or see anything of that sort. The people around the embassy were peaceful, they were not shooting at us. They wanted to get out if they could, but they were not hostile as far as I can remember and not shooting at the choppers as they took off. So the evacuation went off, as far as I am concerned, in a rather peaceful way. Once you got up in the air there would be tracers coming up at you, but we were told we were above where they could reach.

On the last day the big symbolic act was cutting a certain tree down in the parking lot within the embassy compound to make room for the choppers to land. Of course, when you came to the embassy you were not allowed to park in that lot, there was another lot across the street. The choppers could land both on the parking lot and on the roof to take people off.

I took a chopper from the embassy roof about 9:00 PM for about 45 minutes to a ship out in the South China Sea. There were tremendous flames and tracer bullets you could see out toward Long Binh where we had a large base which was obviously to some extent burning. There was a tremendous light show going on all around.

Q: Where did the ship take you?

THOMPSON: I went to what was called a landing ship dock, I can't remember the name of it although I have it written down somewhere. This is a boat whose purpose is to transfer troops from a troop ship to an aircraft carrier or to shore. Helicopters can land on its deck and the rear end comes down and six smaller boats can go out. So you could shuttle troops from a troop ship on to this ship and then they can get on the small boats and go ashore, for example. The military took more time than people expected to put the ships into position. You can't just put a boat off shore and simply take people off. You have to have a way for people to get on the boat. The helicopters would land on this boat and the Vietnamese would get out and go down to these smaller boats which would take them over to commercial vessels which had nets over the sides and they would climb up them. Then they were taken to Guam, which is ten sailing days away.

Vietnamese refugees had to go on to the commercial freighters, but American evacuees simply stayed on the ship that I was on. It had extra space. I had a bunk and was quite comfortable. The next day we were not far from an aircraft carrier and the South Vietnamese Air Force people loaded up planes and flew out to this aircraft carrier. You have heard the stories, they would land in a helicopter, they would all get off and then the aircraft carrier crew would shove the helicopter into the ocean because they needed space for more helicopters to land. So the equipment couldn't be saved. This went on for several days and it was quite dramatic with various boats and the aircraft coming out from the shore to the fleet here to be rescued. Finally we were told to steam off to Subic Bay. Have you talked to Francis "Terry" McNamara?

Q: Yes.

THOMPSON: He had quite a dramatic departure from the Delta. Some refugees in the end stayed on our boat, camping out on the deck until we got to the Philippines.

Q: Did you find yourself using Vietnamese to talk with them?

THOMPSON: Yes, to some extent. Once they got settled there wasn't all that much. I would go among them to see if they had any problems now and then. The ship provided them with food and a blanket apiece. They brought some stuff with them. Apparently most of them were Catholic and there was a priest who was their leader. He was the only one you needed to talk with. The Philippine government did not want any Vietnamese brought to the Philippines, but apparently the instructions to the U.S. ships stated that only Americans could be brought to the Philippines. This caused some problems because the chopper I was in included a Japanese diplomat. He had come that morning to the embassy on some liaison mission and then because of the crowds surrounding the embassy decided he couldn't leave. He could have climbed over the fence and probably gotten back to his embassy but I guess he didn't feel he should do that. So, he stayed at the embassy. When he got to the American vessel they would not let him stay on board, they made him go with the Vietnamese, as if he were going to Guam. But eventually he was located and plucked off a freighter after spending a couple of days with Vietnamese refugees. He became famous in the Japanese diplomatic service for the adventure of having been taken out of Saigon in this way. The rest of the Japanese were evacuated in a more orderly fashion. There was a French woman and her daughter, who I knew very slightly, who had gotten to the ship earlier and the executive officer of the ship was insisting that they go with the Vietnamese because the Philippines had said only Americans. So there were these other people from other countries who really would have had no problems in the Philippines. I don't know where the French woman and her adult daughter ended up. So, the evacuation from my point of view was quite orderly and successful.

Q: You went to the Philippines?

THOMPSON: We went to Subic Bay and had some processing there and then were flown to a Naval air station near Manila and then bussed to the embassy where we got hotel rooms. I spent a couple of days there before going back to Thailand as soon as I could to get back together with my family.

Q: And then what happened? Did you all go back to the States?

THOMPSON: Well, some people immediately went into the effort to help Vietnamese refugees. There was a refugee task force that was formed under Julia Taft. I went to Thailand and just felt drained. I stayed there with my family for two or three weeks. By that time my wife had an apartment. I stayed there until the rainy season came and I couldn't sun myself or go to the swimming pool any more, so we decided to go back to the United States. I had compensatory time and I used some of that. When I did go back to the States I was put on the Vietnamese Refugee Task Force for a month before I took up a regular State Department job.

Q: What were you doing with the task force?

THOMPSON: Well, I was working with Lionel Rosenblatt. He had a small group of inspectors and troubleshooters. I went to various camps around the United States to see how each camp was carrying out its processing and whether the procedures that one had adopted would help another to do its processing faster. That was rather interesting. I did that for one month.

Q: How did you find the process worked to get the Vietnamese to work? It moved rather quickly didn't it?

THOMPSON: Well, you know the impressive thing was De Tocqueville was right about private organizations being so important in our society. There were a number of these refugee organizations, I hate to mention one and leave out others. The Catholic Charities, the Tolstoy, Lutherans, etc. were doing such a tremendous job of helping these refugees. Of course, the Lutherans were mostly from the northern United States, so the refugees would get from the north down to the south as soon as they could for the warmth. But these organizations were tremendously impressive in their capacity to absorb these refugees out of these camps. Again, the camps were usually set up by US military organizations who were just superb. So the camps were all doing well. I visited Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, and Indian Gap, or something, up in Pennsylvania and I felt everybody was doing a very good job in all of these locations to get these people processed and out into American society as soon as they possibly could.

CLARKE MCCURDY BRINTNALL
Major, U.S. Army
Phouc Vinh (1969-1970)

Brigadier General Clarke McCurdy Brintnall was born in Omaha, Nebraska. He attended Wentworth Military Academy and University of Nebraska, but graduated from West Point in 1958. Though his bachelor's degree had an emphasis on engineering, he also studied American history, diplomatic history and Portuguese. He has also served in Brazil and Panama. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 2, 1996.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

BRINTNALL: July of 1969 to July of 1970.

Q: Where were you serving?

BRINTNALL: I served with the First Cavalry Division. I was the Intelligence Company Commander for the Division.

Q: Where were they located?

BRINTNALL: At that time the headquarters was in Phouc Vinh, north of Saigon. It was positioned to block the approaches from Cambodia.

Q: When you got to Vietnam in 1969-1970, how did you see the military situation? What was your impression? The Tet Offensive had taken place in 1968 and so here you were in this particular period.

BRINTNALL: I was a little bit puzzled. I knew what our Division was trying to do, but I didn't really understand the overall objective, exactly what we were doing there. However, I was a new Major and I thought that maybe I wasn't supposed to understand. At any rate, I was too busy to spend much time in introspection. Half way through the tour I decided to resign from the Army, effective at the end of my tour in Vietnam. Later I withdrew the request, but I was still troubled.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

BRINTNALL: We provided the tactical intelligence for the First Cavalry Division and its three brigades. The Division had 345 helicopters and was a formidable fighting force, a superb unit. I had detachments stationed with the Division's three brigades. We provided tactical order of battle, imagery interpretation, counter intelligence and prisoner of war interrogation.

Q: What was your impression at that time of the enemy presence in Vietnam, of both regular line troops and the Viet Cong? How were we seeing the forces arrayed against you.?

BRINTNALL: Obviously, they were very tough and they were very good. We had respect for the units. Particularly the regular army units.

Q: Were you seeing at that time that the Viet Cong had pretty much shot its bolt?

BRINTNALL: No. I didn't see that it had shot its bolt. I saw it as a very active enemy that was continuing its efforts to defeat the South Vietnamese and American forces.

Q: How about the ARVN? The Army of the Republic of Vietnam? What were you getting both from your own views and also from the commanders who were dealing with the ARVAN?

BRINTNALL: I was a little disappointed. I had expected that after all those years of fighting they would be better than they were.

Q: This is a time when we were beginning to draw back as far as our participation...

BRINTNALL: The emphasis was on the "Vietnamization" of the war, something we probably should be doing since the beginning. This was President Nixon's plan to get us out of the war and turn it over to our Vietnamese allies.

Q: Did you find a change in the tempo of what the First Cavalry was doing?

BRINTNALL: Yes. I was told that it did not enjoy the high tempo of operations that it had when it was in the North, but it was still very active. At this time there was much greater emphasis on working with and training the South Vietnamese counterparts, but the patrolling, the fighting and the casualties continued.

Q: How about the American Troops? Were you beginning to see the problems that developed later on of moral and discipline?

BRINTNALL: There were problems, yes. For us, they were not overwhelming problems. The First Calvary Division was an absolutely first-rate unit and did not have some of the problems that affected other units. But were there morale and disciplinary problems? Yes.

Q: Were you there during the bombing incursions into Cambodia at that time? Did you get involved in that?

BRINTNALL: I was there but was not involved, either directly or indirectly.

Q: You were fairly close to it weren't you?

BRINTNALL: Fairly close, yes, but I really was not aware of it.

Q: It wasn't discussed at the briefings?

BRINTNALL: No. I don't recall our actions in Cambodia ever being covered in the regular briefings.

Q: It, after Tet, it was another of those defining moments. I know. I was Consul General in Saigon at the time and I thought well, goodnight. I thought this might do something to break up North Vietnamese's bases of supply. But obviously it was too complex for us to go in and out in such a hurry. Well, you left Vietnam when in 1970?

BRINTNALL: July of 1970.

Q: We left the same time. What did you think about whither Vietnam when you left?

BRINTNALL: I was uneasy. I didn't know whither Vietnam. I knew that things weren't going right militarily, politically or economically. I didn't know what to do about it but I had left Vietnam and began to think about other things.

CHARLES STUART KENNEDY
Consul General
Saigon (1969-1970)

Charles Stuart Kennedy was born in Illinois in 1928. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955, serving in Germany, Saudi Arabia, Yugoslavia, Vietnam, Greece, South Korea, Italy, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed in 1986 by Victor Wolf.

Q: I see that from the Department, you went in 1969 and '70 to Saigon as consul general. This, of course, was at the height of our involvement there, but at the same time, shortly after it became obvious that we were going to be reducing our military presence there and hopefully eliminating it as quickly as possible. Do you think you could tell us something about the consular work in Saigon, movement of peoples who were in Saigon during that period of '69 and '70?

KENNEDY: The interesting thing, really, is that there wasn't a great press for visas. The war wasn't going too badly. I arrived in February 1969, and I left in July 1970. Those 18 months, American troops were beginning to disengage, the war had gone rather well, the Viet Cong had exhausted itself in the Tet Offensive the year before I arrived, and the situation was, you might say, upbeat. Another thing that one has to remember is that the Vietnamese themselves really loved their families, loved their homes. You might think, "Gee, everybody wants to get out of here." There wasn't much of this. Some professionals had left, but if they were going anywhere, they would probably try to go to France rather than the United States. So our main emigration was wives of G.I.'s, and even those might get their visas, but then they would go to the United States, take a look around, and say, "To hell with this," and many of them came back and kept their green cards [alien registration cards]. But our problem was often trying to tell the American husbands that their wife, who had gone home to see the family, she really wasn't being trapped back in Vietnam; she just didn't want to come back at that point.

Prostitutes were always a problem for consular officers where ever American soldiers are stationed, and we had about half a million G.I.s in Vietnam at one point. The consular problem was that prostitutes were not eligible for visas under the law and the only way around the problem was if a special act of Congress was passed for each exception. Congressmen were not happy about having to introduce special legislation for constituents who had married prostitutes, consuls were unhappy about the paperwork and investigations that had to be done on each case, and the men marrying these girls were not only unhappy, but angry at the consuls for impeding their brides from coming back to their homes. During the Vietnam war Congress changed the law to make it easier, and we consuls breathed a sigh of relief.

Some of the girls that the soldiers would become involved with were pretty unattractive and I wonder how they made out when brought home. They looked pretty good after being out in the jungle, but I suspect that most of these marriages did not last and the girls were thrown on their own resources, generally back to prostitution at massage parlors, within a short time. I remember we would get letters from time to time from a ex-soldier asking us to locate "Jenny (or Mary, Susie) etc. who lived in the third "hooch" [hut] in the prostitute section of Vung Tau, the local R & R [Rest and Rehabilitation] area near Saigon and ask her to marry him." We would try to help and sometimes could locate the young ladies and put them in touch with their loved ones in America. The problem was that the ladies of Vung Tau were "rent-a-girls" who would take care of a soldier for the week of his leave and then move on to another and often have no remembrance of the man who had rented her some months before.

Q: You're saying there was, in a certain sense, a misconception or a poor communication or poor understanding. The Americans assumed that these women were in terrible difficulty and desperately trying to get out, whereas in actual fact, many of the Vietnamese spouses were not that terribly concerned about not returning to the United States, at least at that point.

KENNEDY: Absolutely. It was quite a contrast between Korea, where there was not a war, when I served some years later. So immigration from Vietnam was not as major a problem as were other problems of Americans in trouble, but that's another story.

One problem that I did have was with Vietnamese orphans whom Americans wanted to adopt. The situation was urgent. Because of the war there were many orphans, often just infants being kept under appalling conditions in hospitals. Americans respond to this sort of crisis and were trying to adopt these children. The problem was that the Vietnamese had a French-based law on adoption. It was a typical European approach to adoption for the time. You had to be of the same race, religion and over 50 in order to adopt a particular child. Of course this ruled out almost all Americans. The only way to get the adoption approved and a visa issued was to get the law waived. The only person who could waive the law was the President of Vietnam, who had other more pressing problems. President Thieu would not delegate this task and so there was quite a bottleneck. From time to time I would send word to the ambassador that we would like some movement on the orphan approval business and reluctantly he would raise the issue.

Q: Of course, from 1975 on, we began to have large numbers of people leaving. Were there any precursors? Were there any signs that such a thing might happen?

KENNEDY: No. As I say, the war was going well, and it was only when things started to collapse that everybody tried to get the hell out. There was a general feeling that if the country was to collapse, if the Vietnamese Government would collapse and the North would take over, yes, there would be a tremendous desire to get out. But that just wasn't happening when I was there.

The following is an excerpt from the unpublished memoirs of C.S. Kennedy regarding his time in Saigon.

The staff of the consular section consisted of about eight Americans and twenty Vietnamese, mostly ladies. A major problem besetting all foreign organizations trying to do business in Vietnam was the shortage of English-speaking staff and the consular section was no exception. Most of the Vietnamese had only been working for us a few months and there just was not that depth of expertise that consular officers had come to expect in most of our posts; we consular officers were in fact spoiled and in Vietnam all of us had to go back to our instruction manuals to relearn the basics of visa work and then to teach the willing but novice young ladies in their tasks. It was difficult since these young ladies (I use the term deliberately, since most were young and of good families and were in fact ladies) were not fluent in English and had been acculturated by their society to say "yes" when asked if they understood something even if they did not. Once trained, however, they were quite efficient and developed a rather commanding presence in dealing with our clientele, who were mostly the wives of U. S. servicemen who came from a lower strata of society; a good number were actually hardcore prostitutes and difficult to deal with.

I had a fairly segmented group of consular officers, my two senior officers were of the old breed, no real interest in what was going on beyond their immediate concerns. My deputy was quite competent in his field of consular expertise but had a drinking problem, which meant he was not always on hand. The other senior consul was close to retirement age, a confirmed bachelor with a host of lady friends from the older American ranks who took more of a sisterly interest in him than otherwise, or so I believe. He had connections all over the city and could be invaluable in getting odd bits of consular business done, but he was temperamental and I found I was having to continually massage his ego and tell him that he was important. He was always feeling he was being insulted by other people or ignored and so a good part of my time was spent as resident consular psychiatrist, not only with him, but also with some of the younger officers. They were having problems of conscience, being in Vietnam when many of their contemporaries in civilian life were out protesting American involvement in the war. Also we had a lot of work and kept at it five and a half days a week, plus other duties so there was pressure. There were several female officers in their first or second tour as FSOs who were having problems because of all the American military officers who were attracted to them but with whom they had little in common. I could understand their dilemmas and the pressures of their social lives, but it could also play hell on their tempers. I had a couch in my office and from time to time one of my officers, male as well as female, would come in, stretch out and explain why they could not stand such and such any more. I did my best to be whatever was called for, listening or making suggestions based on whatever advice columns I had read in the newspapers or got out of my previous courses in psychiatry or on sheer gut instinct. I also spent a good deal of time going over the litany "why are we here?" which I more or less believed in, and still do, but never was as convincing as I should have been since I was not really sure what we really wanted and was more and more dubious about how we went about things.

Several officers stick out in my mind. There was one whom I can't help feeling was an experiment, and a stupid one at that, on the part of our selection and recruiting people back in Washington. He was in his early twenties, wore his hair long and stuck out in a great mop, which in that era was not done in the business/government world. I have never been a great conformist, especially in matters of hair, but this sort of "Afro style" especially in a young white man, was considered the sign of a radical and radicals were the kids who were protesting against the war. Now I was trying to man a quiet little office that was serving young men who were over in Vietnam in uniform and who were, willingly or not, putting their lives at risk in a debatable cause and many of them felt the State Department had considerable responsibility for their presence in Vietnam. Needless to say, seeing that character, and he was not a strong personality who could have overcome the initial impression, dealing with passports caused all sorts of scenes with some of our more vocal military and civilian clientele. He was a poor officer, haircut or no, so I had to keep him in the least demanding job, passports, while I worked frantically to get him out of my section. No one wanted him, but eventually he was transferred elsewhere in the embassy. Before he left there were even a few letters to the editor of the local English language paper complaining about long-haired State Department radicals in the embassy consular section.

I had long talks with the lad, but could not order him to get a haircut as we were not that sort of organization and it went against the grain. I did point out, however, how it was hurting his effectiveness but he really did not understand. While we worked in shirt sleeves, we did wear ties and when this young vice consul started coming to work in a crumpled shirt and no tie I called him in and explained that we wore ties as sort of a badge of office in an informal world, that for an odd reason it did convey a bit of authority and I would appreciate if he would wear one, which he did thereafter. After my little spiel when he left my office I suddenly realized that this was practically the same speech given me by Consul General Schwinn back in Dhahran ten years before when I had experimented with an open shirt policy. I suppose that we consuls general have a tie fetish.

Not to dwell on my young non-conformist vice consul, but he started another little practice that I had to squelch quickly. He used to post anti-Nixon cartoons on his office wall. Now President Nixon was not one of my favorite people and I had no problem with some of the sentiments portrayed in the cartoons, but it was a government office, one dealing with the public and my jerk of a vice consul just did not see what was wrong with his practice. I am sure he felt I was a conservative fuddy-duddy, and perhaps I was, but the cartoons came down as a result of a direct order. I might add that it has been general practice throughout our history to have the picture of the reigning president in the offices of the chiefs of the consular sections as well as in ambassadors' offices. In Belgrade I displayed Kennedy and then Johnson on the wall behind me, keeping Kennedy on since it was sort of an icon for the Yugoslavs. On the wall facing me though I found some old engravings of presidents and had the two Roosevelts, Teddy and F.D.R., and Truman hung as they were the leaders that I especially admired. In my office in Saigon and later in Athens I kept Nixon's picture on the part of the wall where it would be partially obscured when I had my door open, and I followed an open door policy.

There was another officer, on his second tour who gave me an even greater headache than did the hairy one. This was my Protection and Welfare (P & W) officer. He seemed quite competent and went about his job of visiting American prisoners and taking care of legal matters in an effective way, or so I thought. Part of my responsibility was overseeing our consular post in Da Nang and when there was a shortage of personnel there we would help out. I sent my P & W officer up to Da Nang to fill in while the regular vice consul was on leave and I took over his work for a couple of weeks. The first thing I did was to go through the officer's in-basket filled with letters and memos that needed action. Now we all had cases that are of sort of left to percolate or waiting for additional data so I was not too concerned that the in-basket seemed pretty damned full, but the farther down I got the more annoyed I became. It seemed that this young man had been quite lazy in taking care of matters. As I went farther down into his work basket I found matters that were seriously overdue. I finally cleared up that mess after some long days and nights of work and was ready to give the man unshirted hell when he got back. Out of curiosity and suspicious concern I went to his file cabinets to check out how he had handled past cases and found out that by and large he had done nothing.

There were all sorts of legal problems that required extended action over a long period of time, especially matters dealing with the deaths of Americans overseas and if the officer is not conscientious about following through the families in the United States might not be aware that some details have been left undone until years later, if then. By the time I discovered this mess the Viet Cong Tet offensive had been over more than eighteen months. A number of American civilians had been killed and their estates were the responsibility of the consular section. I found wedding rings, bank books and other items that should have been sent on to the next of kin, but which had been filed and forgotten. I was horrified and steaming mad as I worked on the problem. The letters I had to write to the next of kin to pass on the things I had found squirreled away were difficult, but I did clear things up eventually.

When my vice consul returned from Da Nang I had a long discussion with him. I am sure that his problem was more serious than being just a matter of laziness or carelessness. He was apparently a person who had a real problem in making decisions and filed things away without action if he could not bring himself to take some stand. For the rest of the time he was working with me I had him bring his daily work to my office and discussed what action he had to take and checked on this. I spared no details in my efficiency report on his performance as I was convinced that he just was not able to be an effective FSO despite an impressive academic background. I recommended he be selected out of the service, and that until that happened he be kept away from positions in which he would have unsupervised responsibility. Naturally his next assignment was to a small post in Thailand where he was the sole administrative officer. I heard he fucked up (that is the appropriate word in this case) again. He was transferred to another small post on an island in the Pacific where he again was the only administrative officer! He did the same there and after about two years after he left me he was selected out. The wheels of Personnel grind exceedingly slowly in cases of incompetence.

There were no country team meetings such as we had in Belgrade with all the section chiefs attending and reporting to the ambassador. Instead there were several mini-country team meetings consisting of different mixes of section chiefs presided over by Sam Berger. I used to meet once a week with the chief of the huge administrative section and Berger. Much of our discussions were over what to do about the black-market activities of Americans working either for our government or for one of the many large American construction firms doing business in Vietnam. One sour point was the so-called Embassy Club in downtown Saigon. It had been established under the auspices of the embassy in the mid-1960s during the period of major growth of our military and civilian presence in Vietnam. There had been a lot of trouble with American civilian sailors and construction workers, with far too much money, raising hell and at the same time being the prey of all the slimy characters who collect around places where there are transit workers with big bucks. The club was envisaged to be sort of a civilian USO with good, inexpensive food, a place to relax and few souvenir shops. There was a board of governors with the embassy represented by its administrative officer. Unfortunately because of lax supervision, or lack of interest, the club eventually got out of hand. The little souvenir shops soon were selling gold, furs and jewels. Embassy people more or less avoided the place, I only went there once or twice. It was pretty well taken over by the big American operators whom we suspected, with ample evidence, of being heavily into the black-market. They brought their fancy women there in droves which gave the place a certain atmosphere. The gold, furs and jewelry were convenient articles to get illegal funds out of the country. If you wanted to make a quick deal, probably illegal, the best place to make a contact was at the Embassy Club. This was not a savory situation for the embassy to be in, but because of contracts and concern about publicity, it was difficult to turn the situation around. I was involved because I had responsibilities in dealing with black-marketing problems. We debated the matter of the damned club in many mini-country team meetings. Finally the solution was more or less handed to us. During a yearly inspection it was found that the roof of the club needed major repairs, so we shut the club down and put the jewel, fur and gold merchants out on the street (the deputy ambassador cleaning the temple!) and then announced that the club would reopen at an unspecified date and just did not authorize any money to repair the roof.

The consular section performed the full range of work with visas and passports being our main production. Despite the fact that there was a nasty war raging all over the country there was no great pressure for visas to the United States from the Vietnamese. We issued a lot of non-immigrant visas to Vietnamese going for business or training in the United States, and our immigrant visa unit had its hands full with the Vietnamese wives of GIs, but there was not the large-scale attempt to use tourist visas as a way to get to America and stay, or much of the fake marriage racket to get an immigrant visa as I later encountered in Korea. The Vietnamese were much like the French, they loved their country and wanted to stay there if possible. We had, in fact, some trouble with this love of the homeland. Americans would marry Vietnamese girls and bring them home where they would find themselves isolated (there were not yet the large Vietnamese colonies that developed after the fall of South Vietnam in 1975), and the women would then pester their husbands to allow them to go back and visit their families "for Tet". Often once back these wives would dig in their heels to stay, writing their husbands that they could not get back because the Vietnamese Government or the American Embassy would not let them. We would get a hot telegram from a congressman or senator asking what in the hell were we doing separating a fine and loving couple. We would check and sure enough the lady in question would be happy in the bosom of her family; and frankly I could not blame her for not returning. The family was all important in Vietnamese culture. One telegram came from Senator Mansfield of Montana asking about such a wife who apparently arrived in Great Falls, Montana in the dead of winter, took one look and decided that she had to return to Vietnam to take care of a sick relative. I doubt if she ever returned until, perhaps, the final days of the collapse. The good American congressmen were sure that any woman would prefer to be in the United States in their congressional district than in the middle of a war in Vietnam and suspected we had tried to hinder their return to their loving constituent's arms.

We would get odd requests from time to time and would try to help the GIs since they were usually out of their depth once they tried to do something not in the normal military routine. For example there was Rosie of Vung Tau. I received a letter from a young lad back in the United States asking me if the embassy could help him locate a girl; her name was Rosie and she lived in the third "hootch" [i.e. hut] on the left from a certain bar. Could we find out if Rosie was all right and have her write him as he wanted to marry her. Now Vung Tau was a town on the ocean near Saigon; it used to be called Cape St. Jacques, a resort area and some GIs went there instead of on a R & R out of the country. The place was full of young Vietnamese girls who followed the GI trade and obviously Rosie was one of those. As I got into the subject I found there was almost a rent-a-girl service for the GI in Vung Tau. He would appear for his week's R & R go to a bar meet a girl and after a bit of dickering over the fee would have the girl, a hootch, the surf, the sun and God knows what, for a week. He would leave at the end of the week and the girl would go back to the bar for the next transaction. The whole thing seemed like a sensible arrangement to me.

I called a young FSO who was working as a political advisor to a military unit in Vung Tau. We both agreed that the chances of finding Rosie in the third hooch were dim, and even if found she would have been acquainted with perhaps fifty-two young Americans in the past year and her chances of remembering the one we were matchmaking were also remote. The Vung Tau FSO, however, liked the challenge and set off to find Rosie and did. Rosie remembered the ex-GI well and was quite happy he wanted to marry her. We put the two in touch by letter and we may well have been responsible for another American dynasty.

While the major preoccupation of our embassy was to help the South Vietnamese government defeat the attack on it by the North Vietnamese, I spent a great deal of my time concerned about Americans in trouble with the South Vietnamese. Besides the half a million American troops in the country at the time I arrived in 1969 there must have been close to 50,000 American civilians of various persuasions, U.S. government people in a multitude of programs, the place swarmed with reporters of all types from the resident correspondents of the major media organizations to free-lancers, most of whom were young, no real responsibility or experience and have a fine time enjoying a war, and at the same time criticizing it from no base of expertise. There were American contractor personnel who were rapidly turning Vietnam into a giant construction site, and then various American entrepreneurs and businessmen, some legitimate and some not. My major concern was with those who were not.

At any time in the past century or so there have been boom towns which attract the flotsam and jetsam of the world. San Francisco was one at the time of the gold rush in 1849, Alaska had it during its gold rush, Oklahoma was another in the 1920s during the oil rush, and wars created their own rush, London in 1940, then Paris in 1945 after its liberation; Seoul had its little boom time during my war and Saigon, along with Bangkok, Hong Kong and Singapore were the magnets for all those who were after a fast buck in the 1960s until the collapse in 1975.

There were plenty of legitimate business people in Saigon but there were also men who gravitated to where money was being spent to get the jobs done and to hell with the cost. There was a thriving black-market in the country consisting mainly of items brought into the country duty free to the large American military PXs we maintained there. The GIs would buy items at the PX walk out the gate and would be met by swarms of Vietnamese who would buy certain items at double or more of their cost. The military police were running all over the place arresting GIs and Vietnamese, there were ration cards and restrictions but the trade was just too lucrative to stop. Although we were all supposed to be fighting a lean and tough war the PXs were loaded with stereo radios, phonographs, TV sets, fancy liquors and what have you. There were two major decisions behind stocking PXs with such inappropriate items for a country at war. One was that our soldiers should be kept as happy as possible and a major attraction to military service was the ability to buy expensive items at low cost. Many soldiers did not sell on the black-market but brought a stereo set home as their souvenir of Vietnam. I still have mine, which is a bit crackly, but useable.

There was also the theory that if there were not PXs with luxury items the GIs would take their not inconsiderable wages and spend them on the local economy and bring inflation and impoverish the local populace, hence the PXs were used as sort of sponge to soak up the military pay. Another use of the PX was as a tool in international affairs. President Johnson and his advisors wanted to give the war in Vietnam at least the patina of a multinational effort by the forces of democracy, i.e. the good guys, fighting against the spread of communism, i.e. the bad guys. Therefore there were small contingents from New Zealand, Australia, the Philippines and a sizeable force of South Koreans and a moderate contribution from the Thais. In order to keep the Philippine, Thai and Korean troops happy they were given access to our PXs and they used this opportunity to a fare-thee-well. I recall watching with annoyance and a bit of secret admiration, a Thai officer taking about a platoon of his troops through the main PX in Cholon, marching them from counter to counter, see that each purchased exactly the rationed limit of items such as cold cream, ladies shampoo, certain popular snack items, radio cassette tapes, towels and the like and then marching his now heavily laden troops off the compound while our military police provost marshal (police chief) for Saigon watched, getting redder and redder in the face. I understand that Korean troops did not mess around with that sort of nonsense. Wholesale lots of requested items were just delivered all packed to go home since the market was better there. If I recall correctly each soldier was allowed a cubic ton of goods to bring back with him, officers got more.

It was in this milieu that every American confidence man and sharp trader who could get a ticket and visa to South Vietnam operated. Some of them had worked out deals with the military and civilian employees of the PX and were doing especially well. Others had to operate on the fringes of the black-market, making little deals with individual GIs and the shrewd Vietnamese and Chinese who were involved in the business.

The consular section came into the picture when American civilians were caught by the Vietnamese in illegal transactions and either had not taken the precaution to bribe some official or was just in the wrong place at the wrong time. We always had a population of about twenty or thirty Americans in jail, mostly in Chi Hoa Prison in Saigon. It was not a nice prison, but in many ways life was better there than in many American prisons since foreigners were kept together, had no real work to do and could get certain foods and other items if they had the money. We used to visit them every few weeks and bring in some cases of combat rations to supplement their diets, listen to complaints and report on the progress of their trials or appeals.

There were some American prisoners who were in for crimes other than black-marketing, often for homicide. There were two items that were readily available in the American community, guns and liquor, and an atmosphere that put quite a premium on displaying toughness. Mix these together and people get killed and those that do the killing usually end up in jail. One case I remember was a man who worked for one of our construction companies out in the boondocks. He and his buddies had been drinking heavily sitting on the veranda at sunset. They thought the Viet Cong were sneaking up on them and one man took out his trusty automatic rifle and let loose at what he thought was a Viet Cong infiltrator, killing a laundry man delivering his clean underwear. The American ended up in jail. The South Vietnamese did not want to flood its jails with a bunch of Americans who required special care and feeding. A sort of tacit agreement developed, never spoken about or even alluded to, whereby Americans in jail gradually left the country in a completely unofficial manner. What would happen was after an American had been in jail for several months or longer he would be released and told he would be called back at some unspecified time, but he was not to leave the country. The prison authorities would keep his passport as surety. The ex-prisoner (or prisoner interruptus) would appear at my office, we would supply him with a new passport, and then my unit which dealt with seamen would find him a berth on an American ship leaving Vietnam so he would not have to go through passport control. I would explain with a straight face that we were getting him a job on a ship to allow him to earn some living expenses until he was called back for a review of his case by the Vietnamese and to be sure to report back. Off he would go, never to be heard of again, and the Vietnamese authorities never questioned about the missing Americans. It was all very sloppy and I could not promise our people in jail they would get out or even hint that they would. All I could say was to keep cool (not easy in a tropical jail) and things would work out. I often wonder how the alumni of Kennedy's underground railway (or better undersea steamship line) are doing.

Two cases that stick in my memory concern a black-marketeer named Harms, or Arms and a murderer whose name I forget. Mr. Harms was in trouble with the Vietnamese over a long period of time, in and out of jail, but had several things going in the black-market and did not want to leave the country. At one point when he was out of jail there had been a big political issue by the media about the South Vietnamese using open roofed "tiger cells" for political prisoners and how they had been mistreated. One of the top correspondents for either CBS or NBC television came to see me to say that they had interviewed an American named Harms who said he had been kept in a tiger cell and had been mistreated while the embassy had done nothing to help him. I explained that I could not state categorically that Mr. Harms had not been in a tiger cell, but that we had seen him regularly while he was in prison and he had never mentioned ill-treatment. I also pulled out a fat file that had been given me by the Provost Marshal's office and read excerpts from it dating back to 1944 in Paris where Mr. Harms had been involved in black marketeering, then later in the 1950s he had done something in the Philippines and Korea, as well as in West Germany. The correspondent said that they would not take Mr. Harms' word on anything but he would love to do a story on the gentleman's career.

My murderer case was an interesting one. It seems that we had hired an American firm to bring in one of its big dredges into the Mekong River to keep the channel open. While doing its work in the middle of the river the first mate and the captain of the vessel got into a quarrel. The captain at one point went into his cabin, took his pistol, came back and killed the mate. Both were Americans. A U. S. military lawyer came up with the bright idea that this was a crime on the equivalent of the high seas since it took place on an American registered vessel in the middle of an international waterway; the Mekong is navigable into Cambodia. Acting on this theory our military police took the captain into custody and there he sat while the matter was referred to Washington for the top legal people to mull over the legal niceties. In due time, months in fact, the answer came back that this was not a high seas crime (which any layman could have told them) and to turn the man over to the Vietnamese authorities as it was their problem. When our police tried to do so, however, the South Vietnamese lawyers said, "oh, no, we agree that it indeed it was a crime on the high seas on a U.S. vessel and so South Vietnam has no jurisdiction". (I like to think that there was a twinkle in the eye of the South Vietnamese official who gave this decision). So this particular hot potato was right back in our laps. I told the Provost Marshal, "ok fellows, I have no option but to give him a passport and wish him godspeed." The U.S. military people then got mad at me, they had to be mad at someone, for not doing something, that something was not spelled out. All this time the captain kept quiet, did not protest his incarceration as a civilian in an American military jail, and in due time was reluctantly released, came to my office, picked up his passport and went back to the States.

Everything we did in Vietnam was a bit bigger than life; I for example, found myself in my capacity of consul general presiding over what were in effect the courts martial of American civilians. Because of the problem of black marketeering and other forms of corruption that spring up like toadstools wherever there is a massive, hurried spending situation, as in a war. The ambassador and the head of our military establishment, General Creighton Abrams, wanted to get some control over non-Vietnamese civilians who were involved in cheating either the U. S. government or that of South Vietnam. A joint embassy-military review panel was formed with the precious name of Irregular Practices Board and as the ranking civilian I chaired it. There was a civilian representative from A.I.D. (the U.S. government's Agency for International Development) and three officers from the Army's Judge Advocate's office. Cases would be presented to us by the Provost Marshal's office, i.e. the military police, with that officer acting more or less as the prosecutor. What we were doing was to review the cases of Americans, Koreans, Filipino and other non-Vietnamese who had been caught or suspected of dealing in the black-market or other "irregular practices" that could make them persona non grata (my diplomatic background keeps showing through) to the U. S. military. We were really looking only at the small fry; the big black-marketeer either would face criminal prosecution by the U.S. or Vietnamese would get off by some means or other. Our punishment would seem like a minor one, but was quite severe to those involved, the loss of U. S. military privileges. A person who lost his PX card and other privileges, could not deal with the U.S. military as a contractor and could not get on military bases. For someone absolutely dependent on access to the military for their livelihood, such as people who ran entertainment agencies for the troops, worked for an American contractor building new military facilities, or reporters who relied on military transport and the ability to get on and off bases, the loss of privilege was for all intents and purposes an end to their work in Vietnam. It was even more than that since they were sort of on the blacklist of our military so that later they could not pursue their trade in other countries where we had troops. Many of the people who came before us were dependent on their contact with our military for their livelihood, and we did not take our responsibilities lightly.

The actual responsibility of the Irregular Practices Board was to act as an appeals panel with our recommendation to be presented to the commanding general in Vietnam (Abrams). As far as I know our recommendations were always accepted. If a civilian was caught by the police, American or Vietnamese, in a black marketeering type operation or other such activity they could just have their military access papers taken away and they would slink off into the sunset. If, however, they felt they were getting a bum rap they could ask for a hearing by our board, and could be represented by a lawyer.

I did not relish the idea of presiding over the board when I first heard about it, especially when I found I was the only member who was not a lawyer by training, and that the sessions were open to the public. Like it or not I gritted my teeth and went to my first of many monthly meetings. It was not as bad as I thought it would be since the matters brought before it were rather simple. The most common case was of a civilian going to what we kiddingly called The Bank of India in Saigon. There were small shops, usually a tailor's, run by Indians in Saigon. Our culprits would have gone to one of these stores and given them a check with the payee left blank. The Indian tailor would give the check writer Vietnamese piasters at the black-market rate, about three times the official rate, and then smuggle the check to Hong Kong to be cashed for dollars. Then those dollars would be used to buy piasters in Hong Kong at perhaps four times the official rate and the piasters would be smuggled back to Saigon and so it went. There were all sorts of restrictions on the export of currency and the rules were well known. These checks would be seized from time to time by raids on merchants believed to be in the black-market. Since writing a check without the payee's name on it was an unusual procedure and was pretty much a give-away we listened with considerable skepticism of the explanations of how Indian tailors had these checks from the men who wrote them, but none were convincing. We would ask questions and try to get a handle on the person involved, was he an old hand in Vietnam, or a brand-new arrival who just might have stumbled on evil ways. I found that I played a role in these hearings of trying to give a little perspective to our findings and to make some allowance for naivety. The military members tended to be harsh in their judgement, unfairly I thought. For one thing the people we saw were civilians and there was a certain contempt for their work by the men in uniform; the civilians were often considered parasites. The punishment of taking away all military access privileges was much stricter than that meted out to a soldier caught in a minor black-market caper. The soldier might lose a stripe and be fined, but did not get a dishonorable discharge, which in fact we were handing out to civilians. Another factor overlooked by the military members of the board was that soldiers never really needed Vietnamese piasters. All purchases on their bases at the PX and snack bars were in U.S. script, special dollars printed for use in Vietnam. The civilian, however, had considerable expenses in piasters, such as food, rent and gas and with the black-market rate of three times the official rate the temptation was far greater than for someone in the cocoon of the U.S. military. Prices in Vietnam were, of course, pegged to the black-market rate, not the official rate. My Judge Advocate colleagues did not take as compassionate a view of the weakness of man, but I was able to get some of the first time minor offenders off with a short suspension of their privileges and strong admonition to sin no more.

My second monthly meeting was one which I would have loved to avoid. I still felt unsure of my role and was not exactly delighted to learn that we were being handed a hot potato. A TV cameraman for one of the major networks had been caught with a check in the hands of the Bank of India. Since the news media people were giving the U.S. military and the South Vietnamese a difficult time, being extremely critical of every action; so there was no love lost between the two groups. I started getting some calls from news people complaining that our military was picking on the cameraman to punish his network for its reporting and the First Amendment was brought up, Freedom of the Press etc. Naturally I could not prejudge and said we would look at the case with open eyes. I guess news was slow but my little board room was packed with media types ready to see their colleague was not railroaded by the hostile government people. There even had been a request for TV coverage, which I ruled against, enough was enough.

The cameraman had a young American attorney, Sesto Vecchi, who later became an acquaintance of mine, but he did not endear me by asking all sorts of questions as to the legal basis of the board, which as a brand new chairman I had problems answering, but my fellow members helped me out. He then launched into how this was a matter of abridging the freedom of the press. Here I was able to make the point that we were only looking at a possible black-market violation, and that the press was not immune from the consequences of the law and regulations. Finally when all the rhetoric was exhausted and the bare bones of the case were examined it was clear that the gentleman had indeed been using the Bank of India. Also I asked if he were being paid an expense allowance that took into account the high cost of living if someone were to pay the official rate and not the black-market rate for piasters. He allowed he was. By this time the other news people realized that there indeed had been hanky-panky and their man had been caught fair and square. Since the amount was a large one we recommended that his privileges be suspended and he be deported from the country. While the media did not press the issue, I will not forget, however, the presence of that crowd of initially hostile news people in the audience and how intimidating it could be. It helped me to be more sympathetic when I would observe from afar it turning on various people in the government or in private life.

While I had been in the Air Force I had always kept a wary eye on the justice side of that organization and my suspicions were confirmed by my close contact with the workings of the military in Vietnam. The term military justice has been called an oxymoron and that definition had some merit. A typical case involved an American who obviously was living on the fringes of the black-market. He had a Vietnamese girlfriend who was deep into the black-market and her place was raided. The police found practically a warehouse full of PX items. Because the American was sleeping with the woman at the time he was accused by the U.S. military police of being in the black-market. He well may have been, but there was nothing to show he had purchased any of the items found in her place. Although I argued long and hard and wrote a dissenting opinion the rest of the Board voted for suspension of his privileges. Even more disturbing was the case of a Filipino who was accused of black-marketing activities because of the usual checks found with black-marketeer. The accused man proved to us quickly and conclusively that these were not his checks or on his bank. The name was the same, the Filipino equivalent of John Smith, but the handwriting and bank accounts were quite different and the man was out of the country when it happened. We never should have had the matter referred to us since any good cop would have thrown the matter out immediately. Our Provost Marshal lieutenant still kept arguing against the man on the presumption that he obviously had been up to no good anyway and this was a good chance to take care of the matter. It was frightening to see this attitude displayed out in the open by a person in responsibility, and his military colleagues did not seem at all upset. We did at least dismiss the case.

There were some moments of relief. One referred for our august deliberations concerned some young American civilians working for a U. S. construction firm who got a little drunk and talked their way onto a base, claiming they were the bodyguards of the wife of the South Vietnamese president, Ky. They commandeered a jeep, drove around the base, took a rifle from a soldier who was asleep while on guard duty and played a few other relatively harmless tricks before the MPs got wise to them. We on the Board had a hard time keeping straight faces while our righteous young lieutenant laid out the charges in this matter while the crestfallen "ex-bodyguards" were lined up in front of us. We gave them a short suspension and had a good laugh after the room was cleared.

Several years later while I was in Athens I heard I, along with the entire Army chain of command, had been named in a suit by a man whose privileges had been taken away. It was the case I mentioned before of the man sleeping with the madam of the warehouse. The suit was filed by a famous lawyer named Melvin Belli and was for $1,000,000. I wondered what would happen, but nothing apparently came of it so I took my million dollars that I had set aside and spent it.

Not only was I chairman of the Irregular Practices Board but also of the TCN Board. When I first was told I would be the head of the TCN Board I was sure I was going to have to deal with an exotic oriental disease, a new secret weapon, or some political movement. It turned out that TCN referred to Third Country Nationals, or someone who was not a national of either South Vietnam or the United States. Really we were concerned with Filipinos and Koreans, for the most part, who were working for the various American contractors who were doing most of the construction and maintenance in Vietnam. A word is due here about these contractors. They were in organizations that not only built highways, airfields and harbors; they also maintained helicopters, tanks and aircraft, repaired them after combat etc. They ran the harbors, electric generating plants, food supply outlets, worked on civic improvements for the cities and villages. Often the American civilian contractors were right out in the combat areas keeping them running. This was a capable, hard working, hard drinking, bunch of guys. Much of the American contractors' work was being done by Koreans, Filipinos and a smattering of other nationalities only vaguely supervised by Americans. These TCNs had been trained in our military installations in Korea and the Philippines and were familiar with American equipment and the American way of doing things. They were willing to put in long hours, were excellent at the jobs, and were cheaper and less trouble than Americans to supervise. Most of the best manpower in Vietnam was in the armed forces and those that were not tended to be the less efficient and not as amenable to the discipline and working conditions of our hard-charging contractors. Besides in Vietnam dealing with the Vietnamese, our contractors had to meet all the rules and regulations of the government's Department of Labor and deal with local unions. The TCNs, on the other hand, were paid well, did their jobs and went home at the end of a contract with a nice nest egg. There were no unions or other aggravations (I'm speaking from the contractors' point of view) to worry about. It is no wonder that the American contractors were unanimous seeing that the TCNs did most of their work.

The Government of Vietnam (GVN) was not too happy with the TCN situation. Money and jobs that could be earned or done by Vietnamese were going to people from other countries. There was also a matter of pride or face. By bringing in all these Koreans and Filipinos the Vietnamese were being told in effect that they could not manage their own country. There were other hidden factors including the fact that the local Vietnamese military commanders often got a "bite" from the pay of local workers on American projects, but could not get as good a payoff from TCNs. The GVN also was concerned that once the war was over (on the premise that the South would win) they would be stuck with a lot of Korean and Filipino entrepreneurs well-inserted into the local economy, something which was already happening.

Because of the desire of the Vietnamese to keep a firm lid on the number of TCNs in their country and voracious appetite of the American contractors for more, the situation became what could be termed turbulent. The GVN had control over the TCN population through the use of the labor permits, and the policy of issuing these permits was erratic, to say the least. A basic problem was that some of the contractors were paying hefty bribes to get labor permits, while others who tried to play it straight, as the embassy insisted, were having problems keeping their operations afloat through the lack of skilled technicians. There was a great deal of hard feelings among the contractors and all sorts of accusations of illegal and unfair dealings with the Vietnamese government. Shortly before I arrived the matter had caused considerable concern at quite high levels at our embassy. With the usual response to this sort of thing, the ambassador established a committee with all the major contractors represented, the head of the U.S. civilian personnel for our military and a few others. As a disinterested party the consul general was made the head of the committee. When I appeared on the scene not too much had yet been done by the committee except to air all the gripes, which I suppose was something. I felt a little like Daniel tossed into a den of ravening American construction people. These men were specially selected for their hard-driving, no nonsense approach to getting things done immediately without regard to cost or difficulties. They did not look kindly upon a soft-spoken FSO who was obviously brand new to the Vietnamese scene. After a few meetings the soft-spoken was no longer so soft-spoken as I heard the same litany over and over again from some of my irascible members about "God damn it, we're here to fight their war and why won't these so and so Vietnamese let us get on with the job!" I tried to explain the Vietnamese point of view, but these men were not interested in points of view. We finally hammered out a solution which I think was pretty much my creation. I took charge of all dealings between the GVN Ministry of Labor and the contractors over TCN labor permits. I set up a little unit with some clerical help from the contractors, put a consul over it and soon we had a smooth running operation. This procedure also cut out most of the opportunity for bribery and I felt rather pleased with myself that it all worked out so well.

My negotiations were not solely with the difficult contractors; I also had to sell the Vietnamese on the idea and had quite a few meetings with the Minister of Labor and got him to be more forthcoming on TCN matters, but we established overall limits on the number of TCNs allowed in the country, which gave the Vietnamese what they wanted. I recall one meeting late in the day in which I was the only American at a large table with about twenty Vietnamese. I was tired and at one point started to say, "but what does the Government of Yugoslavia want?" but before the fatal words came out I looked at all the oriental faces and somehow Yugoslavia seemed to be wrong. At one point we almost got into a cat and dog fight between the Ministry of Labor people and the contractors over forms. The Vietnamese representative mentioned that the contractors would supply the forms used by the TCNs to get their labor permits. The American contractor representative started to have a tantrum "these damn people not only won't let us get on with the job, they won't even supply the blank-blank forms!" etc. I realized that here we had a cultural difference. In the United States all agencies give out forms free, but in Europe you often have to buy a form at a kiosk. Either system makes sense, but Americans are not used to paying a penny or two for a form. I was able to smooth over this contretemps over and the system was established and worked.

EUGENE KOPP
Deputy Director, USIA
Washington, DC (1969-1970)

Eugene Kopp, a lawyer by background, joined USIA under the Nixon Administration and eventually became the Deputy Director of that agency. He was interviewed in 1988 by Hans Tuch.

Q: Tell me about the Keogh Administration, the four years when Jim Keogh between early '73 and the election of Jimmy Carter when he was the Director of USIA. What do you think were his main accomplishments or his main problems while he was Director of the Agency? He was there during Watergate.

KOPP: Exactly right. I'll mention three serious outside problems the Agency had during that period. One related to Congress and the other two related to issues. One was Watergate. How do you explain to foreign audiences what was going on with Watergate? How much coverage did the Agency give to Watergate when, in its early stages, it was a lot of innuendo and unnamed sources and a lot of speculation and very little in the way of facts? And beyond that, how do you explain to foreign audiences what on earth was going on in this process whereby a chief executive, a President who was viewed as a very strong leader by foreign audiences, was from their point of view being savaged for reasons that they had great difficulty understanding?

Then the second major outside problem we had, of course, was Vietnam. The wind down in Vietnam and then the ultimate collapse of the ARVN and how we played that story as we were trying to get Americans who were still on the ground out of there. So I would say those two matters were the most prominent outside problems we had.

As far as relations with Congress, we had for the most part during Keogh's tenure very excellent relationships with the appropriating and authorizing committees of the Congress, with the exception of one monumental problem involving the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee that controlled authorizations for USIA and State. And, of course, I'm referring to Congressman Wayne Hayes. Very early in 1973, Congressman Hayes served notice on us. And since I don't know who's going to be listening to this tape I will not tell you the exact language used since it may be a family audience. But he had a friend, in this case not a female, who had been a Congressman from New York who had been defeated. And he called the Agency and demanded that we give this former Congressman a job.

As we looked into the matter, it became quite clear that, given the positions that this former Congressman had taken on issues when he served in the Congress, that he was exactly the wrong kind of person to be a senior officer in the Nixon Administration. And we decided we had no choice but to resist the appointment. And that brought down the full weight of Wayne Hayes' wrath upon Keogh and me and the Agency.

What always frustrated me was that we could never get much protection or support from our friends on the Hill for what was clearly an outrageous case of a Chairman's excessiveness. But we couldn't. And that was a major problem for us until Wayne Hayes got into his own problems with Elizabeth Ray. And that was the end of Wayne Hayes. Not a tear was shed as he left in disgrace.

We would try to emphasize the need for that kind of sensitivity at the Voice, and this mainly involved the coverage of what was "news," we would always meet with resistance and sometimes heavy criticism. A lot of the outside criticism Tom I'm frank to tell you was generated by people at the Voice. We know that. A lot of the charges of censorship that we got from the Hill we're pretty sure were generated by people who didn't like the management and the policies that we wanted followed.

If we've got another few seconds, let me just give you some specific examples of what I'm talking about. We've already talked about the policy of how we were going to cover the news with relationship to Watergate. Let's forget Watergate and let me give you several examples of what I'm talking about.

You may remember the My Lai massacre in Vietnam. The officer who commanded that platoon was Lieutenant Calley. And, of course, that whole matter was fully reported at the time the awful thing happened in Vietnam.

But you may also recall that months and years later, Calley had been convicted, but his conviction went up on appeal. And I remember very clearly this had to be six months to a year after his original conviction. There was some stage in the appeal when the conviction was either reversed or modified. What happened is unimportant. The fact is some appellate court did something in connection with Lieutenant Calley's conviction that became a news item in the United States, absolutely valid news item, the facts to be reported.

What did the Voice do? The first question was were any foreign audiences going to recognize what Lieutenant Calley's conviction had been and were they going to be interested in it? But assuming you got over that hurdle, the Voice instead of simply reporting that Lieutenant Calley who had been convicted X months ago, the court ruled today and simply give the facts, we found the Voice in its reporting going back over almost in shot by shot detail the entire My Lai massacre. And its reporting was indistinguishable from what you were hearing on CBS and NBC and ABC every night. And we felt that it was not necessary for the Voice to go as far as the commercial media went with the negatives. It was a matter of editorial judgment, not censorship.

LANGE SCHERMERHORN
Consular Officer

Ambassador Schermerhorn was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Mt. Holyoke College. Entering the Foreign Service in 1966, she had several assignments in the State Department in Washington dealing with a variety of administrative and political matters. Her overseas posts include Colombo, Saigon, Teheran, London, and Brussels, where she served twice. In 1992 she was named US Ambassador to Djibouti, where she served until 2000. Ambassador Schermerhorn was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: For the record, I was your boss. I was the consulate general there during this time. In the first place, what was your perception of how things were going after you got there and were looking around? You were kind of the new girl on the block. What were sort of your initial impressions?

SCHERMERHORN: Well, I was amazed at the American presence. Just the vast numbers of people and the kinds of things that people were doing, it was quite incredible. The American presence, I mean not only official, but the business, the contractors because, up to that time the biggest construction consortium that had ever been put together was operating there. It was

PA&E, Pacific Architects and Engineers, Brown & Root, and J.R. Jones.

I had been taken to the PX (military store) to get some things to start and looking around and being absolutely flabbergasted to see whole counters full of diamond jewelry and fur coats and all of these things in the PX. I had never been in a military store so I didn't know what PXs had anyway, but to see all this stuff. I'm saying, "fur coats in Vietnam?" Well, as it turned out this was one of the aid economist's possessive ideas of how – we had all these troops, we paid them and they had a lot of money, so rather than have them flood the market, we were going to sop up this exchange by having goods to buy. But of course what they forgot was it just meant instead of having a black market in money, which you had anyway, we had a black market in goods too. So the whole thing was insane.

Q: Your generation of Foreign Service officers was also the generation of people who were demonstrating in the streets all over the country against the war. What were you picking up at the junior officer level?

SCHERMERHORN: Well I think there were a lot of people there who were not that enthusiastic about it but were enthusiastic about starting their careers and felt that if this was what they had to do, that's what they would do. Again, I remember the first day or second day I was there, there were so many young people and they were very hospitable. They said, "You've got to go over to the political compound." Well the political counselor and something, there was a compound with a number of embassy houses on it. There were young men who were in the political section, young men who were in CORDS, young men who were something which was a little different called the Provincial Reporting Unit, which was part of the political section but supposedly they went out in pairs in the countryside and talked to people, and they'd all studied Vietnamese. This was the thing, we'd had I don't know how many Foreign Service officers – I think it was over 1,200 who actually had had the forty-four weeks of Vietnamese. It was quite a significant proportion.

There were a lot of them, especially the ones who were working in CORDS with Vietnamese counterparts. The Americans realized that they were pretty weak reeds to rely on some of these Vietnamese counterparts. Either, they didn't have the level of competence for the kinds of things we thought we were trying to do with these programs, or simply because they had a different agenda than what we had and they weren't going to give too much to this. So I think that was where a number of them began to question whether we could succeed in what we were trying to do, if it was indeed clear. It wasn't entirely clear, maybe, what we were trying to do. The catch phrase was "build the hearts and minds." And there were a number of people who worked at the MACV, the military headquarters, that had a briefing unit there that was composed of some young FSOs that were in CORDS, but were assigned to this, and some military people. One of the military people was Chuck Meissner. He was a captain and had a Ph.D. in economics.

Q: His wife Doris was director of the Immigration and Naturalization Agency.

SCHERMERHORN: I think there was quite a bit of cynicism among people, but it was kind of as if we'd been caught up in this great maw of doing all this stuff here, ordering our lives around. I think the thing that people thought was maybe we can make a difference. There were people who thought that. I used to think that after I was in Vietnam; that the people there who went through that and went back to the Department had a different view and were somewhat skeptical of the way the bureaucracy had worked there and sort of that things would change. Of course things have changed, but not because of those people; because of the social pressures otherwise. It's pretty hard to change the bureaucracy.

Q: It is. Did you get any feel for how the war was going while you were there?

SCHERMERHORN: Well, you know, I had a very interesting perspective on things. In some ways I knew more about it, in a very broad brush thing, than some of my colleagues who were working in specific provinces because in the consular section I was the visa officer and what that meant was visas for war brides and adoption cases. With the Vietnamese government, you couldn't travel on a Vietnamese travel document unless you obtained an exit visa, and the government didn't give exit visas because they didn't want people to leave unless you had some specific reason like you were married. And the other category that got visas were the military who were going to training programs, pilot training and whatnot, but those were handled not by personal interview; those were handled in bulk. So, most of my clients were Vietnamese young women who were the girlfriends of GIs or a civilian who was there.

It was interesting that this was designated as a French language job, which might've once made sense, but most of the Vietnamese girls who came in were not from the milieu of Vietnam where they spoke French, so they spoke only Vietnamese – but we had consular assistants who could do all of the translating. The GIs usually came in with them so I had a big map of Vietnam with the four regions listed on it and the provinces and stuff and they'd come in and I'd chat a little and ask them where they were and they'd say, "Oh, I'm in Buon Me Thuot," or "I'm in Can Tho," or "I'm up in Pleiku," or whatever, so I quickly learned all the places and what they were doing and so forth. They'd talk about it. "Well, it was pretty bad," or "I'm getting out now. Thank god."

But of course the whole business of the marriage of these people was a problem because the military had a system; before you could get married, you had to go through an approval process in the military. And what they did was they made them go through everything that you had to do to get an exit visa from the Vietnamese government, and to get the entry visa from us. But they strung it out so that these certificates and so forth usually had a time limit, so they would string it out so that if they actually got through all of this great obstacle course and then were ready to get married, by the time they actually came back to get the exit visas, they'd have to go through this all again and a lot of them were only on a year's rotation. The military was hoping that they'd never get through this process. Though, some of them were extremely diligent about it and against all odds managed to do all this.

You heard a lot of bad stories and one of the things you rapidly realized there, what they called the tooth to tail ratio, and people used to say that in World War I it was five soldiers to one or something, and in World War II it was one to three, and in Korea it was one soldier to five, and there it was like one to ten; so there were a lot of people who weren't actually out there on the front line, but were hanging around. Those are the people who had more time on their hands to meet the girls. I mean here they were in – they used to call it the land of the great PX. So we had a lot of cases and some of the stories were very sad and some of them were things you'd look at it and you'd say to yourself, "Well, now if I were a social worker, I'd be doing my utmost to try to discourage this young man from doing this." Of course, that was not your role, nor your function. However, the military certainly didn't mind exercising that role. But then there were also civilians who met Vietnamese girls.

Q: Well also there were GIs who got discharged and returned to get their girlfriends too, weren't they?

SCHERMERHORN: Yes.

Q: In fact they were part of a real problem.

SCHERMERHORN: Well actually one of the things that I feel good about there, and because of my wonderful boss, we did have a problem with...if you weren't actually married according to the Vietnamese law that was recognized by the U.S., you couldn't get the immigration visa because you weren't an immediate relative, and there was no provision for someone going as a fiancé to get married there because the definition of visitor is someone who is going to leave. If you say you're a fiancé and you're marrying an American who's living there, then you're not a visitor. So it was a catch-22. The only way you could go if you weren't married was to get a non-preference immigrant visa. The visa categories had six grades of preferences and all the visa numbers, the allotment – which was a limited amount – would go to those categories. Only if they weren't filled would there be some other ones left. Basically it was a catch-22 again; as a fiancé you really couldn't meet the qualifications, even if there was a number available. So we had some very unhappy people who didn't want to come all the way back to Vietnam, but wanted Miss Susie to go.

Q: Also on the other hand, we didn't want these young guys coming back to a war zone.

SCHERMERHORN: Right. And most of them, if they didn't get the marriage completed, a lot of them did give up. But some of them didn't and I can remember there was one young man and he wanted to marry this girl. When I saw her, this was one of the times when I wanted to be a social worker. He had a letter from his senator, Senator Stennis, saying we had to see that this all happened, and he was still in-country. So we actually found this guy and called him in and said, "This is what you have to do. If you want to get it done, you're going to have to start now," and we went over and over and "Do you understand?" and he went off and he claimed, "Yes." He came back – this is a several step process and so forth – and we said, "Okay, the last step is you have to go down with her family book," this is like the French registration system; you must be registered in the district you live in and have a document, but you're not married until you actually get these stickers and stamps and whatnot on it. So we don't see the guy again and he leaves, I guess, for the United States and she comes in and she doesn't have this stuff so we can't do it. So we come back and we said, "You didn't do what we told you to do." Everybody else who got to that stage, who was told, got it right. So this guy was really not with it.

Then I get this call from the head of the visa office in Washington and he says, "I know, but we want you to issue a visitor's visa." I can't remember his name now – George something – but anyway he was a civil servant; he'd been in that job for a million years. He asked for the vice consul; he asked for me and he gets me on the phone and he says, "Well in this case I want you to give a visitor's visa to this girl because it's a congressional interest," and all that. I don't know where I thought I was coming from, but I said, "Okay, and I will take this as your permission to give visitor visas to the seventy-five other fiancés who are in the same situation that we can't help," and he said, "No, no. I didn't say that," and I said, "I'm not going to do it for one if I can't do it for all. That's not fair." It wasn't fair because there were a lot of other people in this situation. And he said, "Well, get your boss on the phone," or something, and you were there and you took his call and I don't know what transpired – I couldn't hear that part of it – but at the end of it you said, no, the guy will have to come back and get married here. We did a good thing, Stu, because that was when they started saying, okay, this is a problem. We have to have a way to fix this catch-22 business. Then, that's when they put the legislation for what's called the K visa.

Q: Yes, we were pushing very hard and of course we were the biggest problem, but it was also true in other places.

SCHERMERHORN: In Korea and in [inaudible].

Q: But we had a war on, so we were saying, you know, we've got a real problem here. We got something done.

SCHERMERHORN: I just think, you know, we're a society that's based on fairness and equity and that wouldn't have been right.

Q: No, it wouldn't have been right.

In the first place, could you give a little bit of the ambiance of the consular section?

SCHERMERHORN: I remember your predecessor was still there when I arrived; there was an overlap.

Q: You got involved with the adoption business, too, didn't you?

SCHERMERHORN: Yes.

Q: Do you want to talk a little about that, because that was different?

SCHERMERHORN: There had been an interest but I think it began to get very big. There were people coming from the United States to adopt. They would come and the scope for fraud and misunderstanding in this was quite high. In this society that had been torn by war for so long, there were a lot of children that were placed in what were called orphanages, but they weren't really orphans; perhaps the father was off with the military, the mother had died and sister couldn't take care of them. They meant to come and take them back; it was not meant to be a permanent thing. So there were a lot of children who actually were maybe not orphans who ended up in some of these places, and then there were people who just wanted to get their own children out of there and if they had six or seven maybe they'd put one in hoping it would be adopted. So there was a lot of scope for problems and there was a lot of document fraud. You had this French system of registration of family, but all you had to do was go in and have two people swear that this was the child of so-and-so to the authorities in the district – and who knew whether it was true or not.

There were also some nuns wanting things there and there was one Australian woman, Rosemary – I can't remember her last name...

Q: Oh yes.

SCHERMERHORN: But she was working with a couple of recognized, established orphanages which were legitimate.

Q: She was really a remarkable person, really remarkable.

SCHERMERHORN: Yes, and she was the one who helped facilitate a lot of this. I mean toward the end of my time there when she was talking about...I know that some of them maybe she helped facilitate the documents which weren't, you know. But their view was we can't have this system constipated; there are people who want these children and there are children who need these families. She was quite extraordinary. There was quite a bit of that. But again, it was this same business; you had to get all of the documentation that the U.S. government required for an immigration visa and you had to get the exit visa which they wouldn't give until you could show that you had an immigration visa. As my time there went on, there began to be more and more cases of that, and also more cases of these people coming out of the woodwork and saying, "Well, I re-upped," as the GIs used to say, "I've been here for five years," because some of them did actually keep extending and extending. You know, "I had this girlfriend, but now it looks like I'm going to have to go. What can I do?" and so on.

I left before that famous thing where the plane with all the babies on it crashed.

Q: That happened in a C-5; that was just awful.

If I recall, and please correct me, but wasn't there something in the Vietnamese law which was based on the French law which almost said that if you went to adopt a child you had to be over the age of childbirth and it was very restrictive. The only way you could get around it was to get the president of the republic to waive it. And I'd sort of send notes up to the ambassador, "Could you please get the president to move on this?" because he had a little pile of them on his hands anyway, being a war.

SCHERMERHORN: I think what's so fascinating when people are looking at a war from afar is that they don't appreciate all the ancillary activities that the war generates the social impact.

Q: Yes.

SCHERMERHORN: And you know, when you think that in Vietnam – I mean we even had a few people there in the '50s – but say from 1966 to 1975, we probably had three million Americans, at least, go through that country and a population of eighteen million or so. That's a tremendous social impact.

Q: One of the things that I've noticed in other countries where I've served, such as Greece and Korea, particularly Korea we had GIs, and even in Germany when I was there during the occupation or just after, that you could be assured we had people leaving on regular immigration to the United States who you were reasonably sure they would make a success out of it. In Vietnam we had no feeling. Of course they have made a tremendous success out of it, but there's no particular feeling for that because there wasn't any of this mom and dad going off to...

SCHERMERHORN: No, but that was totally excluded at that point. It was only with the fall of Saigon. Only we had people marrying, and as I said, from a social work point of view you could look at some of the pairings and say, "I don't know if that's going to work."

Q: I recall a case – maybe you got involved with it – of a woman who married a GI and he took her to Great Falls, Montana and she spent one winter in Montana and headed home for Tet and he tried to get her to come home and she was saying, well, the embassy won't let us get... And Senator Mansfield, again, said, "Why won't you let her go?" She was not going to go back to Great Falls, Montana.

SCHERMERHORN: That's right. She had never come in. She was just using that as an excuse. I do remember that one. There were so many stories like that.

Q: Did you ever get out and sort of do some of the orphanages?

SCHERMERHORN: I went to one with Rosemary and it was a pretty awful place – overcrowded and not enough people to look after them.

Q: Did you get around much? What sort of things were you picking up, both from what you were seeing and from your friends? I was at mid-level there, but you were at the junior level which is always the more interesting one because these are the people who get out and get around.

SCHERMERHORN: Well, we were busy, as you know. We worked from eight until six and then you did a lot of the paperwork.

Q: There were no women in CORDS, or at least...

SCHERMERHORN: There weren't when I got there, but it was interesting. When I arrived my friend Lionel met me and he said – everybody shared apartments there, at least at the junior level – "I share an apartment with someone in this building and the apartment just below us is vacant right now," but he said, "You have to have somebody to go with you. It's not for a single person," and he said, "There's another female vice consul here," this woman Sandy Keith. She was a vice consul then but she was going to move – I think she moved to the political section.

Q: I think she did.

SCHERMERHORN: “And if you don’t mind, you and she should put in a bid for this thing.” So right away we met and we agreed and we did. So we got this apartment. And there were always lots of people coming to visit in this building and so on. So I went off to Nha Trang with a group; I went to Vung Tau, which is the little resort on the sea coast that we drove to; and we went to Can Tho. We had a consulate in Da Nang and I remember talking to the vice consul about some case up there.

Q: Don Westmore.

SCHERMERHORN: I remember speaking to him, it was very close to the fourth of July and I said, “If I can get up there, may I come to the Fourth of July reception?” No, he had said on the phone, “Oh, and the consul general,” whose name was Terry McNamara, “is going to Hue.” Hue was the former capital city and the place that had been hit during the Tet Offensive the year before. But again, I didn’t have any reason to go there unless I was with...I said, “If I get up to Da Nang, could I go with him?” and there was this long pause and he said, “I’ll ask,” and he came back and he said, “Yes, okay, but if you can get here.” You were kind enough to let me go off and I went to the Fourth of July reception and then I went around Da Nang and saw it and it was fascinating. It was fascinating because they had the former dynasty culture, the pre-Indo-Chinese culture, that had a little museum with Cham statuary there; but it was open air because the statues were kind of big. You could walk through it, but you saw Vietnamese Army people were bivouacked in this museum. It was strange. So the next morning, here we are in Da Nang, and I present myself at the appointed time and Terry is there with his 4x4 and he’s in his blue jeans, cowboy boots with Q: Oh, yes, and probably several M-16 type guns.

SCHERMERHORN: Yes. Well, I’m in my little dress and sandals and he says, “Okay, I’m going to sit in front with the driver and you sit back there,” and I looked over my shoulder at the back and it was loaded with machine guns. So he outlined the program. He said, “I have to go and call on four or five people. We’re going to be there about five hours and I’m going to drop you off and you do whatever you want to do and don’t worry about it.” So that’s what happened. I walked around and I saw the old imperial palace and I did all this stuff. And it was a very charming place. I actually have a chard of blue and white pottery that I picked up from the terrace of the imperial palace.

Quite soon after I got there, Sandy Keith and I...some Army major came in and he wanted some kind of consular thing up in Pleiku and Can Tho and said we’ll take a little expedition. So the two of us went up there and went to both places. I remember in Pleiku they had a ceremony with the head man, because these are the Montagnards, not the ethnic Chinese, Indo-Chinese people, and Vietnamese. They looked like bushmen, or people from the Kalahari or something. They had a ceremony and they had this big platform and these big vats with something in it, and the reeds coming out of the vats, and these drums that are kind of like the Indonesian gamelan or something. So we go up on the platform and there was a lot of chit-chat and stuff and then they look at the major who is the head of our delegation, if you will, and they want him to sip through this straw – what they said was rice wine – and he refused to do this. I said, “Well that’s protocol. We have to do it.” So does that, and it was vile, vile stuff. I don’t know what it was. But anyway we go through all this stuff and I don’t pass out.

Major –Sandy knew him and she said, “Todd, you have to play the game,” and he said, “Not me. Better you than me.” But we went off and because I did this they gave me the seven bracelets that you put on that are supposed to ward off the evil spirits or something.

Q: You left there in '71 or '70?

SCHERMERHORN: I left there in October '70, but I have a few other little anecdotes.

Q: Oh, absolutely, I want to grab these.

SCHERMERHORN: One thing you have to realize about Vietnam is in that period I think they had the best food of anything in the world because you had three or four styles of Chinese food; you had Vietnamese, which is similar but more delicate probably than any one of the regional Chinese cuisines; you had the dim sum, you had the barbequed type of thing which they do – pork and chicken, and it’s sort of like we know. Remember there was a restaurant that had only the barbequed chicken. And then there were probably half a dozen excellent French restaurants: the Provincial, the Normandy – nobody could figure out where Madame, who was the patron, got her eggs and butter and cream, but she had those wonderful dishes – and of course the seafood was wonderful. I used to go and eat the raw clams and people used to say, “Don’t do that,” and I’d say, “I haven’t gotten sick yet,” – and I never did get sick there. Then there were Senegalese that was sort of a history of a little vestige of French colonialism; there were some Senegalese troops and you had a restaurant that had Senegalese gumbo. The first time I ever had couscous was in Saigon. Behind my apartment building there was a place that a retired French soldier was there with his Vietnamese wife – he had been in Algiers – and he had couscous. It was really terrific food.

But the best meal I think I ever had in Vietnam was a couple of these...well, it turned out that one of my high school classmates had joined the Foreign Service after he’d been in the Navy, and in fact, when I was in San Francisco and had just passed the exam, his ship came in and we got together. He said, “What are you doing?” and I said, “I’m going to go in the Foreign Service,” and he had been accepted at law school and he was going to go, but then he took the exam and passed it and so by the time I had finished my time in Colombo, he had finished law school. He was on his first tour there. Anyway, half a dozen of us went out to Nab Dai, which was sort of the port area along the estuary there, the river. But we went out beyond that and we parked this fleet of vehicles. I said, “Where are we going? There’s nothing here.” Well, he said, “Over there,” and across the marsh – it looked like you’d have to walk on water to get there – it was this tiny little hut and you walked for what seemed like miles across there and you went in. It was just a thatched roof, all open at the sides, with floorboards with wide spaces between them, and what they gave you were crabs that were cracked open, sautéed in the shell but cracked with peppers – that wonderful Vietnamese pepper – and some lemon juice, and you ate it and then you dropped all the shells and everything right down to the floorboards and you could see things swimming. It was wonderful food.

There's one story, too, that I think might illustrate the family issues in Vietnam about immigration and adoption and whatnot. There was a very nice Vietnamese woman, a very respectable looking woman, probably in her late thirties, and an older American who was not in the military – he was in AID or something. They came in and were going through all the business to get married and she had two daughters, like five- and seven-years-old, and the birth certificates said everything. We're ready to do this and we're very happy because they're really a nice little family and everything, and we're waiting for them to come in so we can sign it and do the formal thing, and then one of the consular assistants comes in and says, "Miss Schermerhorn, you have to look at this," and she points out to me on the medical exam of the woman and down there the doctor had written, "Patient had total hysterectomy" and I'm doing the math and I'm saying, "No, no, this doesn't compute." So I called the husband in, and I mean this is delicate, right? What do you say? And I said, "You know, we have a little problem here. This is what the medical exam says, but of course you have the little girls," and he said right away, "No, that's right, they're not." He said, "They're her nieces but their mother has died and their father is in the military and we haven't seen him. We don't know whether he's dead or alive." And she went and got these birth certificates.

We got her immigration and the immigration inspector says, "Who is this darn vice consul? I can't figure out that because, in those days the form was right on top of the thing where they had all this...but, by some miracle – I had mentioned non-preference visas – we had just gotten some sort of end of the month, extra, special thing; we had just gotten two non-preference visas and because we always told people we never had any, we didn't have a queue anymore. That was the one time in my whole twenty months there that I could actually do that legitimately and we did so they could go as they planned. But that's a very good illustration; here she said, "I am responsible. I am going to take care of these children," and never mind these legalisms about this is my extended family.

Q: When you left there, what of Vietnam in your impression?

SCHERMERHORN: I don't know. By the time I left, having arrived the day of our maximum presence, we were down I think 200,000; we were down to about 350,000 at that time and it seemed like half of them had walked into the consular section. The public face of it was we were winning their hearts and minds. This thing was successful.

Q: I felt that way when I left. I thought, well, you know, it's not the greatest democracy, but compared to a lot of other places it seemed to be going and the Viet Cong was no longer much of a problem. It was the mainline North Vietnamese.

SCHERMERHORN: Oh, you had asked where I'd been. Barbara Watson, who was then the assistant secretary for consular affairs, came. Remember that? We planned a trip for her and one of the things to do was to go to Tay Ninh, which was the parrot's beak in Cambodia, but by helicopter, and to see the Cao Dai temple there. I remember that. We showed her everything and we talked about these issues of social problems and whatnot, and the kind of clientele we had, but I had the impression that it didn't make a lot of impression on her. Here, in this country, we were doing with fewer people as much, on a prorated basis, activity as they were doing in Germany and those other places with a big military presence.

But I did go to Cambodia and this was something that was very interesting. I went in the first week of May 1970 and we hadn't been able to go there. From the time I was in Colombo I wanted to take my little two week trip that you could take and go there but they said if you have a diplomatic passport you shouldn't do that. When I got to Vietnam it wasn't open, but then there was a window starting in about October or November of '69 when they said it was okay. And a lot of these various young men who I worked with were going off and they said, "Hey Lange, you better come with us if you want to see it."

Q: Lange, 1970, you were where?

SCHERMERHORN: Well I left Vietnam and we could still take American ships if there were any to be found, and we had the American President liners, which were basically cargo ships but had some passenger [compartments]. So I flew to Saigon to Hong Kong, and then from Hong Kong, Manila, Yokohama, I took an American President liner, then I flew because it would've been too long. I knew it would be the last chance to do that and so I did it.

JAMES W. CHAMBERLIN
Vietnam (1969-1970)

James W. Chamberlin was born in Miami, Florida in 1945. He received a BA from Principia College and an JD from the University of Alabama in 1972. He served in the U.S. Army in Vietnam from 1968 to 1970 and entered the Foreign Service in 1973. His postings abroad include Sao Paulo, Bangkok, Brasilia, Warsaw, and Rome. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Mr. Chamberlin in 1997.

Q: Can you talk a bit about your experiences in Vietnam? When were you there? What type of work did you do?

CHAMBERLIN: I was there in '69 and '70, in an artillery battery. We were in Northern I Corps which is near the DMZ on the border with North Vietnam. I was very fortunate in that before and after my tour, there was quite a bit of action in this region, but while I was there it was relatively quiet.

We had several people in my unit who were killed, but mainly because of accidents, rather than hostile fire, although in one incident we were firing at the enemy when one of our 175 mm guns blew up, killing or wounding the entire gun crew. Nevertheless, it was an interesting experience to be on a mountain top near Khe Sanh shooting at the Ho Chi Minh trail, or on the DMZ firing along the DMZ itself. When we were on the DMZ, Air Force forward air controllers would fly up and down the border. When they would spot footprints in the sand next to the river, we would start shooting at the footprints and usually the guy, some poor NVA soldier trying to infiltrate into South Vietnam who was hiding in a tunnel or something, would start running as we started zeroing in on his location. It would be a race to see whether he could cross the river back into North Vietnam, because we couldn't shoot across the river. He knew that; so, he would try to run and swim across the river. For me, it was a war of small incidents, not big set piece battles like they had in earlier wars.

Q: Were you up there around Quang Tri and Rock Pile and all that sort of good stuff?

CHAMBERLIN: Yes. The first place that I was stationed, Camp Sally, was just outside of Quang Tri, where we shot for the 101st division. Before I left, we were near Dong Ha which was further north. Those were the two main towns that I was in. In between, we were in the field on small firebases that had been used earlier by other Army or Marine artillery units.

Q: While you were there were you feeling the hot breath of the anti-war movement? While you were there or did that come later? How did that work?

CHAMBERLIN: Well, when you were there, you weren't too aware of it. We were out in the field most of the time. So, about the only news we got was from AFVN radio. The AFVN didn't cover that kind of stuff much, and so you didn't hear too much about it.

I think you really got it when you came back. In fact, that is the main reason I ended up going into the Foreign Service when I got back. Even at the University of Alabama, which was not a hot bed of liberalism, it was clear that the only thing that was interesting about the Vietnam War was the opposition to it. There were quite a few veterans that came back to the University when I did, and the way they got attention, if they wanted it, was to talk about atrocities -- seeing babies killed and things like that -- which of course I didn't do. I spent my whole time there in an artillery battery trying to make sure that we never fired into a civilian area, never fired without political permission from the South Vietnamese, didn't make any mistakes in the data that we sent to the guns, and so on. As far as I know, I was never involved in any kind of atrocity, and never shot at any civilians, but that was all that people wanted to hear about.

LACY A. WRIGHT
Political Reporter
Saigon (1969-1970)

Mr. Wright joined the Foreign Service in 1968 after earning degrees at Mendelien College and Loyola University. His foreign service took him to Vietnam both during and after the War. Other assignments took him to Milan, London and Bangkok as well as to the State Department in Washington, where he worked with International Organizations in matters concerning refugees, and UNESCO affairs. Mr. Wright was born and raised in Springfield, Illinois. Mr. Wright was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You've always enjoyed languages. How did you fit with Vietnamese?

WRIGHT: I did all right. I think I had a 3/3 at the end, although when I got there I did not learn to speak Vietnamese as well as a lot of the people I had gone to school with, because they were sent out to the field to live in provinces or districts, whereas I went to the embassy political section as a so-called provincial reporter, so I had less opportunity to practice than they did. But anyway, I got to the point where I could do my job with my language, but a number of these people who really lived night and day with the Vietnamese became superb at it.

Q: Well, now, you were in Vietnam this time from late '68?

WRIGHT: Spring of '69. I went there in March of '69.

Q: And you were there until when?

WRIGHT: I was there until September of '70, the first time.

Q: Let's concentrate on this first part first. When you got out in the first part of '69, what were your jobs?

WRIGHT: I was attached to the political section of the embassy, and in that very large section, there was a sub-unit called the provincial reporting unit, and it was headed by a Foreign Service officer by the name of Nick Ford, who was later succeeded by Cal Maylert, and it was divided up according to the different corps in Vietnam. There were four corps. And there were two provincial reporting officers for each corps. I was assigned to Fourth Corps, which is the Mekong Delta, a fellow by the name of Dick Harrington and I. We were the two provincial reporters. We spent about half our time in Saigon and about half our time down in the Delta. We were both living in Can Tho, which was the Fourth Corps headquarters, the unofficial capital of the Delta, and our job was to go around the Delta, to its 16 provinces, and report on what we saw happening. We had a very vague mandate. We were sometimes given specific assignments by the head of our unit in Saigon, but often we weren't. Often we went to a place, and we looked around and tried to divine what was going on that would be of interest to the embassy and report it. We were quite free in what we were able to do. It was a marvelous job, marvelous.

Q: What was the situation in the '69-70 period in the Delta?

WRIGHT: At that time, the last American troops were leaving the Delta, that is, the last American ground troops, in the Ninth Division. The Ninth Division, which was based in My Tho, was packing up and leaving. And from that point forward, which is something that a lot of people don't realize, that is, from 1969, so for the last five and a half or so years of the war, there were no American ground troops in Fourth Corps. There was American air support, but by and large, the Vietnamese were fighting in the Delta in large part on their own.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese leadership in the Delta at this time?

WRIGHT: I'm trying to think who the corps commander was then. I don't remember who was there then; however, the head of the Vietnamese Ninth Division then was a general by the name of General Di. I'll think of his full name in a second. He was regarded as a very good man—honest, hardworking. I can remember that during this period his picture appeared on the cover of the New York Times Magazine, a big cover story about him, but he was, I thought, and still do think, an example of a good officer, competent at what he was doing, with a sense of dedication, hard work and under terribly difficult conditions. General Di, by the way, now lives in Orlando, Florida. I spoke to him about a year ago on the telephone. He had just gotten out of Vietnam not very long before. He told me that he was among the last five or so South Vietnamese officers who were released by the Communists from prison. He spent something like 18 years in prison after the end.

But let me go back to your question. I think there were a number of officers, like General Di, who were extremely good men, operating under very adverse conditions, who were admirable. There were also, of course, a lot of the other kind; and there was a system of cronyism, and worse, in which all of these people had to operate. And I think it has to be said that, although there are many reasons why we lost the war, some of them our fault, had there been a greater level of dedication on the part of people in command in Vietnam, including a number of military officers, things also might have turned out differently.

Q: What was your impression of the lower level, of the province level, of the Vietnamese leadership there, and also the village level?

WRIGHT: It was mixed. You had examples of good, competent province chiefs with leadership qualities, and you had examples of the other kind, I'm afraid. And the fortunes of a province were determined in very large measure by the kind of leadership that it had. So I don't think it's saying anything very profound. It goes without saying that when you have good leadership in a province or in a military unit you have good results.

Q: What about our various efforts in the region for both aid and advisors and all this? I mean the American side.

WRIGHT: It seems to me a number of our programs were successful. The Rural Development Banks, for example, introducing new strains of rice, road building—these were efforts which really introduced, even during the war, a new level of prosperity into the Delta. And in fact, don't forget that, I would say, from 1969 to 1973, things in the Delta, and I think in the rest of the country as well—although I'm less acquainted with that—were going awfully well. The theory is that in 1968 in the Delta we were regarded as extremely dangerous. We're not so regarded during this '69-'73 period. A great deal was done to lift standards of living, and a great deal was done to clean areas of Viet Cong elements and to make life a lot more livable for people. It was not until, say, the spring of 1974, maybe a bit earlier, that things really started to deteriorate and move, kind of, inexorably toward the end, the fall of Saigon.

Q: During this '69-'70 period, was there much hostile action taking place in the Delta?

WRIGHT: Oh, yes, quite a bit. I can remember going to the military briefings every morning for different periods at IV Corps headquarters. These were in the form of a briefing to the commanding general, and I would say that on the big map, on an average morning, there would have been recorded maybe a hundred incidents. In some of them maybe no one would have been killed, or one person killed, and in the bigger ones maybe a hundred or two hundred people would have been killed. So there was a great deal of military activity going on, but these were not dramatic pitched battles, like you saw farther north in Khe Sanh and elsewhere. These were skirmishes between units or parts of units, but they were occurring every day of the year, just about.

Q: Were these North Vietnamese troops, or were they mostly Viet Cong?

WRIGHT: Mostly Viet Cong, although increasingly North Vietnamese troops as the end approached.

Q: We're still sticking to the '69-'70 period. In the late spring of 1970, there was the incursion into Cambodia. Did that have an effect in the Delta?

WRIGHT: I haven't thought about that particular question for a long time. I remember one effect it had was that there was a lot of looting done in Cambodia, and units were returning to South Vietnam loaded with stuff. I haven't thought about this for a long time, but I remember it was of such proportions that I can remember John Paul Vann being very unhappy about what was going on and speaking to the commanding general about it.

Q: Can we try to get a feel for the spirit within the political section in Saigon? In the first place, you've got this huge political section, now reporting more on local events than we probably have in any other country in the world ever. Was there a division between the young officers seeing it one way and older officers seeing it another, or any conflicts?

WRIGHT: Oh, sure. Yes, on the subject of corruption, which is usually what divides people in these kinds of situations, it certainly did then. There was great tendency on the part of older officers to take what they regarded as the longer, more culturally sensitive view, and to regard corruption as a perhaps unfortunate fact but nothing we should get overly worked up about, as opposed to the view of most of the younger people, including me, which was that corruption was something that got in the way of the war effort and that we ought to be more active in trying to suppress.

Q: Did you have a feeling that your reports that were coming in were being suppressed, doctored or what-have-you, as far as how it went up the chain of command and to Washington?

WRIGHT: It's a little bit hard to compare the two periods because in that first period we did not have consulates out in the field, so they were not doing any of the kind of reporting that they did later. But during the '69-'70 period—Ambassador Bunker was there—I would say that in both periods that I was there, '69-'70 and then '73 until the end, there was pretty heavy massaging of the reports that came out of the younger officers. I don't necessarily find total fault with that. I think in such a sensitive and complicated situation, it behooved the embassy to look carefully at what went out and not simply say, "Every man for himself. You can all report whatever it is you think you see happening." That, especially when you state it that way, would be an absurd position for an ambassador to take. But I think that in the doing of this, the bias of the older officers was in the direction which I have described, so some of what was being sent out of the embassy reflected this and was probably—when things like corruption were being discussed—not etched as finely as they might have been otherwise. At the same time, I would certainly not think that this, in itself, had any particular effect on the way Washington saw the war or the actions that we took. In fact, I think that the more you read about the history of the war, the more it's clear that the President and others high up in the succeeding Administrations had a very good idea of what was going on in Vietnam, warts and all. When they took particular decisions which might seem to ignore those facts, they took them for very different reasons. And so the more I read, the more it's clear to me that there was no dearth of knowledge about what was going on in Vietnam in the top echelons of our government.

Q: Did you see a difference—here we're talking about the '69-'70 period—between what the American military was reporting and what the provincial reporters and others were reporting?

WRIGHT: Well, we reported in vastly different ways. First of all, most military reports are incomprehensible to the rest of us. They are often reports which fit into a format, so it's the format itself which determines what's going to come through in the report. There is little prose reporting, I think it's fair to say, and usually the prose is so horrendous that it can't be read anyway. I don't mean to be overly critical of military reporting, but I think that military reporting generally would not be set up to catch the kinds of things that we are talking about. It's not set up to report on corruption, and so on. Now again, that doesn't mean that military commanders sitting back in the Pentagon were ignorant of what was going on in Vietnam. I think there was so much that went on by word of mouth and in other ways that I doubt that most of the people sitting back here were ill informed—although I must say that when you read about people like General Westmoreland, I think that probably there were some misconceptions, maybe some big ones, about the way the war was going.

You know, Bill Colby had, I thought, a very good article in the Washington Post some months before his death, in which he said, among other things, that most of the histories written of the Vietnam War pretty much stopped at Tet '68, ignoring what went on later. His view was that, yes, we made terrible mistakes up until that point, but after it we corrected a number of them. And so that kind of reporting is like reporting the Second World War but stopping in 1943 or so. And so his view was that we had corrected a lot of the things that were wrong and that we, in our lives, were doing extremely well during much of that latter period, until we petered out and greatly slowed down our assistance.

Q: Did you find there was much reliance on what the CIA was doing, or was the CIA sort of doing its thing and the political section was doing its thing and the two didn't meet particularly?

WRIGHT: My sense is that we were both doing our thing. I guess they met up in the Ambassador's office, because he read both of them. There was so much reporting coming out of both sides. One of the features of the CIA reporting in those days was that the CIA station chief did periodically, maybe every month or six weeks or two months, his own assessment of the situation. And these were extremely well written, not always accurate, but extremely well written pieces which were fairly comprehensive in their picture of the situation, and there are things that I have not seen since written by the CIA station. And I suspect that when these well written pieces, seemingly comprehensive pieces, went back to Washington, they were regarded with some seriousness.

Q: You know, something I've heard a lot about are young officers like yourself, trained in Vietnamese, getting out in the provinces. Did the CIA have the same system of training people in Vietnamese, or were they more reliant on other sources?

WRIGHT: They trained some people in Vietnamese, but by and large, their people who were out in the provinces did not speak Vietnamese. These often tended to be people who were, say, former police officers—people who were brought in from outside to fill those positions. And they were not necessarily people who knew much about Vietnam, although some of them eventually stayed there a long time and could have been said to have a lot of experience in Vietnam. But I would say that, over all, their people did not tend to speak Vietnamese.

Q: I would assume in that situation it would have been a real detriment. I mean they would have been more dependent on—

WRIGHT: Yes, it tied them very closely to the Vietnamese who worked for them. They tended to have one of the things that the CIA did there, I think in pretty much every province during the height of their involvement, their own separate quarters, their own house, their own everything. It pretty much made a shambles of any attempt to pretend they were integrated into the rest of the establishment. And to make matters worse, they habitually referred to their quarters as the embassy. And this was standard—all over the Delta, certainly, and I'm sure all over the country—that if a stranger, Vietnamese or otherwise, came around looking for the embassy house, he would be pointed to the CIA house, which was unfortunate. But there was either little care, or perhaps it was inadvertence or incompetence, but little was done to create a situation where the CIA would be hard to find or would be integrated into the rest of the group.

Q: I noticed when I was in Saigon, at the same time you were in this period, '69-'70, that the CIA had their own guards, Nung guards, who looked different from others. So as soon as you'd go outside and you'd see a house, and here would be a Nung, a fairly big guy who doesn't look Vietnamese at all but Oriental, and you say, "Well, it has to be a CIA house."

WRIGHT: Exactly.

Q: So they didn't fly a flag, but they might as well have.

WRIGHT: I can remember when I was acting consul general, after 1973, in the Delta, at a certain point, the CIA told us it was sending someone down and that this person was to be unknown as a CIA operative but was to be integrated into the political section. And so I did my best to keep up my part of the bargain, and we prepared as best we could. We prepared an office for the person and everything, and it turned out when he arrived that the CIA station chief, first of all, decided he would go out personally to meet the man at the airport, which was a bit of a give-away. Many of the CIA people lived in a certain part, in front of the CORDs Club, and they all drove distinctive types of cars and they all had their names on their parking places in front of these little town houses that they occupied. I came to find out after the guy had arrived that they had painted his name right into one of these parking spots, right in front of where all of the CIA people lived. With that kind of attention to detail, going in the wrong direction, it's an example of what I think, by the way, is a fairly common phenomenon around the world, but which was really accentuated there. The agency often takes extremely inadequate steps to hide the identity of its people.

FREDERICK (TED) G. MASON, JR.
JUSPAO Affairs Officer
Saigon (1969-1970)

CORDS
Saigon (1970-1971)

Frederick Mason was born in Connecticut in 1926 and graduated from Yale. His career included posts in Saigon, Paris, Casablanca, Antananarivo and Rome. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

MASON: At the end of two years in June of 1969 I was brought back to Washington and to the Vietnam Training Center at Arlington Towers, where I attended lectures that lasted two or three months. We had top flight speakers like Herman Kahn of the Hudson Institute, and experts like Chester Bain, who wrote a book on Vietnam. These were some of the people who helped us to flesh the subject out very thoroughly. So I can't say that I wasn't prepared to go to Vietnam and I appreciated that. I asked to be in the press office because of my French, thinking I could deal with the French press better than some of the others. But no, I was assigned as Reports Officer of JUSPAO (Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office). JUSPAO was in the Rex building downtown. I arrived the first of October of 1969 in Saigon.

Q: How would you describe the situation in South Vietnam, at the time that you got there in October of 1969?

MASON: We considered, in spite of what the press was saying, that we had won the Tet Offensive, so what was going on was not an immediate danger to Saigon. I remember that people would climb onto the roofs of their buildings to watch what looked like heat lightning way off in the distance but was in fact artillery fire. I remember that there was one that landed on a tennis court at the Sporting Club.

Q: ...The tennis court. I was a member of the Cercle Sportif.

MASON: I can't stand that kind of heat, lying in the sun and even swimming is no pleasure to me but that was it.

Q: So now what was your job?

MASON: I was reports officer.

Q: Which meant what?

MASON: It was a miserable, frustrating job. On my first day, I showed up for work and was told without explanation to get out the weekly report. I guess it was a Friday or Saturday. I was supposed to work the entire weekend to get this report out. Well, it came back to me a few days later with the comment, "This report requires considerable rewriting" and so on. Of course, I hadn't had any experience in writing reports to Washington, or instruction in how to do so. I took the individual reports, which came from all over South Vietnam, and put them together by subject, I guess, or by military region. And my great complaint was what I imagine took place everywhere in Vietnam, that with an unpopular war and an unpopular President who was trying to justify the war, no President would want to hear bad news. So any bad news just wasn't reported as far as I could see from the final reports that went forward.

The only classified item in it was the number of leaflets dropped on the trail that week. And what the North Vietnamese did with those leaflets, I can only imagine. Another thing that I noticed was the posters put out by JUSPAO, beautifully done artistic posters showing happy peasants protecting their villages. One had a village silhouette in the background with a soldier from the South Vietnamese army in the foreground protecting the village. But on its tallest building in the distance there was a cross, just two tiny lines making a cross. I said, "Since the South Vietnamese are divided between Buddhists and Christians and the Buddhists greatly resent the Christians, who were converted by the French and whom they consider to be pro-French, pro-American and not good Vietnamese, why do we have to have a cross on this?" I was told to shut up because these were approved by a committee that went over these things very carefully. Well, to me this was a waste of time and money, because without the cross, it could have been a good message, but with the cross, it alienated the Buddhists and reinforced their feeling that the Christians were lackeys of the Americans.

Those are little things, but you could multiply them by as many cases as you could think of.

Then there were delays in getting the reports approved. Since there were three bosses in the front office: Chief - JUSPAO, his deputy, and a third man, I don't have to mention their names, it doesn't matter. They all went over this report before it went out, and it was delayed and delayed. They were swamped with work. They had much, much too much to do, so that by the time the report went out, much of it was obsolete, or if they heard something in the meantime in the field, they'd send it back to me to be checked out. Then I would go back to the person in the field and he would say, "My God! I gave you this report three weeks ago and it hasn't gone out yet? Naturally, things have changed. Why couldn't it have gone out? I'd sent you a new report. Now I have to go over this same report that I wrote before." So there was frustration all up and down the line and we were swamped in paperwork, in Saigon and in the field. I found this a thankless job. I was trained to be a public affairs officer and I am doing nothing but paperwork, sitting in that icebox of a JUSPAO office, and sick with a cold every other day from the air-conditioning. So I asked my boss if I could have a different job for my second year there and do something else and not go back to the States after two years in Vietnam with nothing to show for it but having written reports which were re-written before going out.

They did move me and I am sure they held it against me, but I didn't mind because I was made a PSYOPS - psychological operations - advisor in CORDS (Civil Operations and Rural Development Support) Advisory Team 44 in Gia Dinh Province (the suburbs of Saigon). Now CORDS under Bill Colby was a real working outfit. Every province had a team, a Province Senior Advisor and specialists from the military and the civilian side. JUSPAO was also military and civilian, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office. But at CORDS, I was the man in charge of public affairs, reporting what I thought was the truth about the rural development program. My boss was one of the finest men I ever met in the Foreign Service, Dave McKillop. He would call me and his Filipino assistant, Ed Navarro, after our daily staff meeting, which was, I guess, 7:00 A.M. or 7:30, and Dave would sit in a chair between us and we would have a cup of coffee and talk things over. This, to me, was supervision the way it should be. Not the way they do things in my agency, and it increased my respect for the State Department. Of course, I would have preferred to be in the political section of the embassy, but there were no openings, since everyone wanted to be in the political cone.

There I was with Dave McKillop, and he wrote the finest rating I have ever been given. It was just outstanding. I would have gone into combat with him. He was there for my first year. Actually I guess I spent 14 months, so he wasn't there for a full year. He was replaced by Bob Walkinshaw, who was a labor officer, since retired and I enjoyed working with him also. It was one of the best jobs I have had anywhere in my career. I'm happy to have had it because it gave me the possibility of going back to America, having mingled with the people and seen what actually went on in the suburbs of Saigon, down to Can Gio on the South China Sea, all the way down the Saigon River. There were five or six districts. We had district advisors, young officers and we had the Province Senior Advisor nearby and we were in daily contact with him. I saw mistakes being made. I remember once, when they were about to have an election, the supervisor gave a party and invited the various contending Vietnamese parties over to the house for drinks. Naturally, only one or two showed up. We were interfering in their election, and this was the kiss of death. So I learned a lesson there too: what not to do when there are elections about to take place.

I got great satisfaction in Saigon. My wife was able to get a job there since according to the rules at that time, a woman who was able to get a job on her own was welcome to come and live with her husband and they would make it a two year tour instead of an 18 month tour with safe havening in say, Baguio, or Bangkok or Hong Kong or wherever it might be. So, I had my wife with me the whole time and we took short, week-long vacations every three or four months and saw a great deal of Southeast Asia and that made it very tolerable. She was very happy there. She sang with the Saigon Choral Society. They sang Carmina Burana and The Messiah. She even taught typing to the Air Force. So she was occupied and it was the perfect situation for the two of us, except for the war.

Now you asked me about the feelings and the attitudes and the atmosphere when I arrived in October. I described what it was in October, but then, of course, we had the Cambodian incursion, which cleaned out the whole Third Corps Area. Saigon was in the middle of the Third Corps Area, or third Military Region, and the Vietcong there was defeated I was told the kickoff for the Tet Offensive had taken place in the Hoc Mon district. The surrounding countryside had been saturated with Vietcong, but not after the Cambodian incursion. I don't actually know what damage we did in Cambodia. I have asked people, and I don't know if I have the truth. I have the strong impression that we only bombed the Trail. We didn't bomb cities or towns as such. I hope I'm right. But whatever else it did, it opened the area.

I had a Ford Bronco and a Vietnamese assistant (whom I helped to bring his family to the Los Angeles area after 1975 and with whom I'm still in contact). We could drive all over the area. I drove with my wife one Sunday up to Tay Ninh on the Cambodian border to see the Cao Dai Temple, and down to Vung Tau (Cap St Jacques) once. By day the roads were open, which made a big difference, and gave us a greater sense of security. I no longer heard the artillery at night that I had heard when I first arrived there, so that when I left, I stopped in Paris in the fall of 1971 to see General Walters who was still there as the Defense Attaché and took a great interest in the war, and reported to him. I told him I felt that unless some outside force came in, at least locally we know that the people are with us and that we will be able to hang on, that Vietnamization will succeed. Well, I was wrong, because Congress didn't vote the funds to keep the South Vietnamese Army properly armed and their morale suffered and it went in a matter of weeks, but long after American forces had left.

Q: Yes, you're talking about 1975.

MASON: Yes, 1975. I don't want to get into criticism there, since I had left in 1971. For about $35 more, we came back through Asia and stopped in as many places as possible and made it a great trip. We had a few days in Kashmir on the Dal Lake and in Beirut, and in Lisbon and across Puerto Rico and Florida, where my mother was living. Then I was assigned to the staff and faculty at the Vietnam Training Center. I was proud of that. It was a good job. I spoke to groups who were going out to Vietnam following us, because they were expected to go out with no let-up in the CORDS program or the other programs within the provinces. We did this until the spring of 1972 when the whole thing - the Vietnam Training Center - just closed down. I remember we had General Haig as a speaker and at just about the time he was there, it was announced that we were closing. So I had to look for another job. At USIA no offer was forthcoming. I was willing to take anything, because I wanted to know how the Agency functioned. By that time I had spent four years, from 1967 to 1971 (four and a half years really), without an assignment at the Agency. But I also tried the State Department and lo and behold, I found a job in Media Services, part of the Public Affairs section of the State Department, under Paul Auerswald, where I worked with a retired Naval commander named Ed Roeder, who had done a lot of television work for the Pentagon.

We started a program of sending out to the local stations around the country little scripts which outlined American policy with slides. We would take photographs which we would send with a text. If we happened to mention Secretary Kissinger, we would send a slide of Kissinger, so that his face would appear behind the speaker's face at the local station. This was good work because I was able to follow policy - it could have been the Law of the Sea or any number of subjects which local stations out in the Dakotas could use as they please. There were a few that sent them back saying, "We don't want this propaganda, we don't want handouts," but that was their loss because we weren't forcing it down their throats. We were merely saying, "This is American policy." That is the way it was for my two years spent at the Vietnam Training Center and in Public Affairs at the State Department.

Then I discovered to my dismay that the Agency did not consider this mainline work. It was not an assignment with USIA. Well, I had a great deal of trouble getting a statement of need-in other words that they needed me at the Agency-because I was not doing Agency work. I was working at the State Department. I had a strong feeling that when there is a war-time situation and when that war is a land war, the navy still has to get involved. Every service has to have its share. I felt that USIA was playing this game too. That's why they had JUSPAO, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office, which added layers and layers of people there. I can tell you one thing that caused me to be looked at askance. Our Deputy Director came to town and sat in on one of our staff meetings. He told us that every USIA officer coming up for a new assignment would be sent to Vietnam, if he hadn't already been there, and he would break the assignment of anybody who had an assignment somewhere else and had not been to Vietnam. Well, a high ranking individual came from Washington, USIA whom I'd met before, and he called me in and asked what we'd been told. I told him, and he stared at me and said not another word. That was the end of the interview. So I shouldn't have mentioned something the Agency was doing for us to raise our morale!

J. RICHARD BOCK
Refugee Officer
Bien Hoa (1969-1970)

Special Assistant to Ambassador
Saigon (1970-1971)

J. Richard Bock was born in Philadelphia in 1942 and educated at the University of Washington and Princeton. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included posts in Bremen, Bien Hoa, Saigon, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Berlin and Melbourne. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Today is May 30, 2002. Rick, off to Vietnam. First, you were in Vietnam from when to when?

BOCK: I arrived in April of '69 and I left just a little over two years later, spring of '71.

Q: Okay. How would you describe the situation in Vietnam in '69?

BOCK: Well, it was, of course, a little over a year after the Tet Offensive and the South had recovered reasonably well militarily from that, although psychologically there were scars. There was what was called the Mini Tet Offensive - that was the Tet of '69, which would have been February, I believe - which was also a fairly broadly based attack on government and American strongpoints around the country, but not nearly as serious as the '68 one. But that was in the immediate background when I arrived. We're talking about drawing various conclusions, one that "This isn't nearly as bad as the previous year" or alternatively "They're still in the position of being able to do these things."

Q: How were you processed in and where did you go?

BOCK: Well, we went over there pretty much as a group, arrived in Saigon, spent a week in Saigon basically doing paperwork, in- processing, getting some briefings. We were at that point assigned to a region. I think I'm right in saying that we did not know what region we would be in before we arrived. Then I was assigned to Region III, which is the area surrounding Saigon and headquartered in Bien Hoa. I went up to Bien Hoa. I don't remember all the specifics, but what I specifically remember about my regional in- processing is that they sent me out on a weeklong tour of the area by chopper and Air America plane. So I spent a day and a night in each of five or six provinces. That particularly sticks in my memory because one of those provinces – actually, I was sent to a district in Tayninh Province which was a continual battleground. I mean, the district advisory chief lived in a bunker. There was artillery going all night. When you tried to sleep there was always radio communication going on. You really felt you were in a war zone. So when I finally reached my own assignment, it seemed very peaceful by comparison. I suppose that was good.

Q: Yes, there were areas within that Saigon region that were a continuous battleground.

BOCK: Yes. Well, Hau Nghia Province was maybe the worst of the provinces. It was just south of Tayninh between Saigon and the Cambodian border. The province I was assigned to was Binh Duong (“Bin Zoong”) Province or “Bin Yoong” Province using the southern dialect, which is just up the Saigon River from Saigon. It was probably a 45 minute or an hour drive, not that far in distance but fairly far in terms of the difference between the city and the province. Although the province capital where I was assigned was reasonably peaceful, the districts surrounding it were battlegrounds to a considerable extent. The province included what was called “War Zone D.” It included War Zone C. It included the Iron Triangle, which had been the site of several big battles. It included the Michelin rubber plantation, which was still a hotbed of Viet Cong activity. The area was just crawling with American troops. Although we had no American forces stationed near the province capital, we had elements of the 25th Division, the 81st Airborne, the 1st Air Cavalry, and perhaps one other division when I arrived. That gradually became less as time went on.

Q: How was the province governed and what was our role in the government?

BOCK: Well, the provincial governor was a military man, which was if not universal then at least typical. I think all the districts – there were six districts – were all governed by military men. There were civilian administrators under him. The governor was both commander of his own regional forces and civilian administrator. So he had kind of a two sided hierarchy there over - the military and the civilians. Our advisory team was set up to kind of parallel this structure. In our case, we had a military provincial senior advisor, a Lt. Col., who had a military advisory team under him as well as a civilian advisory team. The deputy provincial senior advisor was a civilian. This was standard: if you had a military man at the top, you had a civilian next; otherwise it was vice versa. Many provinces had civilian provincial senior advisors. And we were structured so as to be counterparts to the various provincial agencies that we were dealing with.

Q: What was your impression of the governor?

BOCK: He was in some ways sort of a typical military man given to issuing orders right and left. There was always the question with everybody in Vietnam as to what extent corruption was taking place. I don't think we ever quite got a handle on it, but at least there were rumors that he might have been involved in some activity, but not in an obvious way. He didn't have difficulty in dealing with Americans and with all the advice he was getting, but he was clearly his own man and you could not be certain that any advice he was given would be taken, but he was always open to it.

Q: How about your bosses?

BOCK: I went through two sets. The provincial senior advisor when I arrived was a full colonel by then, Angus Mundy, who was extremely personable and had a very good reputation. He left within months after I arrived. And he was replaced by Lt. Col. McLean Raymond Fleigh, who I thought was very good. He was both a capable military man and also very sensitive to the situation we were in. I found him very easy to deal with and I'm very pleased that I had him as boss. Then there was the top civilian, the deputy PSA. When I arrived, there was a shuffle and a fairly junior officer who had been assigned in a lower level position was put into that position for 10 months, or so, a fellow named Gardiner Brown, whom I found very good to deal with. He was then eventually succeeded by Merle White, "Woody" White, who was a more experienced Foreign Service officer. Again, I have nothing but good words to say about him. He was very good to work with.

Q: What were you doing?

BOCK: It's interesting. When I was assigned, I was assigned as a refugee officer. There were a lot of refugees in the province because of all the military activities that had been going on. When I arrived, though, I was confronted with a situation where Gardiner Brown had just been moved up and his position was vacant. So, I was asked in very short order to look after what was called the New Life Development Office. I was the NLD officer. I find that a little difficult to describe. It basically covered the range of aid programs, community development programs. It was in concept broader than that. It had certainly a political element to it in trying to use community development to encourage and develop support for the central government. But in practice it was really mostly monitoring, if not overseeing, what the Vietnamese were doing with all the assistance we were giving them. So, that was what I was doing there for about 10 months, I think. I had a staff of several Americans and several Vietnamese working under me.

Q: Then what would you do?

BOCK: Well, one of the things I would do would be to go out with one of the Vietnamese provincial government counterparts to monitor projects that were being funded out in the villages, to talk with local level officials about what sort of projects they wanted, any problems they had with projects that were under development. I would also do that on my own. I had still the refugee responsibility, which meant helping out with and overseeing refugee relief. There was a great deal of concern all over the country that these kind of relief funds might be misused, so a good part of it was just to make sure that whatever we were providing for these purposes was being used the way we wanted. Increasingly, I also got involved in trying to implement the now infamous hamlet evaluation system, which was something set up by Bob Komer, if I'm not mistaken, to try to have a broad based database on how well we were doing in the pacification program. It included a range of measures, both development issues, Viet Cong infiltration issues, and so on. These were supposed to be done by each of the district advisory teams. Well, many of the district advisory teams, being four levels away from the people who had devised this system, didn't have a clue. I sort of fell into the job of going around and helping all the people in our districts figure out how to make this thing work, which was an uphill struggle.

Q: My understanding is that it was hard to get what amounted to a really objective evaluation because when push came to shove, the members of the team, particularly the leader, had to show both progress and that things were good when if you wanted to have a real evaluation, you might be in a place where things were bad and probably were going to stay bad.

BOCK: Yes. One of the things that became evident over time was that every time you got a new district advisor, the hamlet evaluation system ratings went way down the month he arrived and then gradually went up for his year and then went down again as soon as the next one came in. Everybody had to show progress. Some of it was gaining the system. Some of it was just psychological. They knew that their own ratings depended on showing progress and they wanted to see progress where they could.

Q: Looking back on this and looking not only at your work but you were going around and traveling around, here were Americans put into a culture that a couple of years ago none of the people there had a clue about and doing work that we weren't trained to do, except for a quick course. How did you find this working? It always struck me as being something that was fine on paper, but when you got right down to it, there were so many obstacles to making it...

BOCK: There were. What we were ultimately trying to do was, in that immortal phrase, "win the hearts and minds of people." Some of what we did to accomplish that objective was useful. There were a lot of schools that were built. There were a lot of medical stations out in the provinces. This was good. But in terms of really accomplishing our objectives, it took something well beyond that. It's hard even now to think of what could have worked better than what we were doing. If we'd ever gotten to the point where the Vietnamese people at large felt that the South's government was on a steady winning streak, then a lot of this would have fallen into place. But the people were caught between the devil and the deep blue sea. They had, particularly in our area, a lot of North Vietnamese soldiers with whom they didn't necessarily identify. But on the other side, they had a fairly corrupt and in some cases brutal system, which is perhaps inevitable in war. You had 18-20 year old Vietnamese who were drafted up and sent out there and they were scared to death of anything that moved, just like our soldiers in some cases. They would not have the local people's welfare at the top of their list of priorities. So it never really gelled.

Q: As you went around, when you got below the province level, how did you find some of the district... Was it province and then district?

BOCK: Province was the higher level, and then district.

Q: And at the village level, how did you find the Vietnamese government worked?

BOCK: There was a big difference between district and village. The village leaders were local. They were locally elected, although the elections weren't necessarily always democratic, but they were local people. The district, on the other hand, was an arm of the central government, so there you had people assigned and the district chief was also a military man. So, the district functioned very much as a province did, although much less elaborately. But you had these lower level military officers and civil servants who were there in many cases, particularly in the less secure areas, you had a lot of your district administration not living there, not staying there overnight. They would come in in the daytime and then hightail it out. This was even true in some cases with the school staff. They just wouldn't stay there overnight. So, one question of effectiveness of the district government was how well these people had managed to integrate into the local population from outside. At the village level, you had a different equation. These were people who by and large lived there, although there were some exceptions to that. They were local people. There, the question tended to be were they playing both sides of the war. In some cases, they were.

Q: How did you find going down, did we have junior officers out at the district level and all?

BOCK: We had, of course, district advisor teams in every district. They were largely military. They tended to be about six people headed by a captain. Of the six districts in Binh Duong, three of them had most of the time a civilian assigned to the district team. One of those civilians was a Foreign Service officer like myself. The other two were young AID employees. I should say that the whole thing I was involved in was CORDS. All the Foreign Service officers in CORDS were detailed to AID, so we were all under AID administration.

Q: You knew who was Foreign Service and you knew who was coming in for the... Sort of career Foreign Service person.

BOCK: Oh, yes, because we all knew each other's backgrounds. Some of the AID people were career and some were direct hire because they needed more people than they had. And when you had a civilian, then you had somebody whose focus was on the civilian programs. In the three districts, where we didn't have that, then a district advisor would designate one of his military people to do it, but they were not trained at all for this.

Q: What was your impression of how our military worked in this? Again, it was a very unfamiliar milieu.

BOCK: I tended in our province to see a considerable difference between the military assigned to the advisory teams and the military assigned to the regular units. And there was a certain amount of tension between the two. The folks assigned to the advisory teams were there to work with Vietnamese counterparts and they did. I don't know how much training they had. In many cases, I think very little for this. But they were fairly well inculcated as to what their job was. So they were sensitive to what the Vietnamese government was trying to do and all the surrounding issues. The main force units were a much greater struggle because they were there to fight a war.

Inevitably, they had difficulty in distinguishing between the good Vietnamese and the bad Vietnamese. There was always a latent tendency to suspect any Vietnamese, including the gal who came into the hooch in the morning to pick up the wash. And with some reason. So, our provincial senior advisor often found himself kind of in the middle of these things and trying to persuade the various units in the province to be more cognizant of the impact they were having on civilians. That said, we didn't have any My Lais or anything like that.

Q: Was My Lai in your area?

BOCK: It was in the region, but it was pretty far removed from Binh Duong.

Q: It was just coming to light about that time, too, wasn't it?

BOCK: I think it was. We had minor incidents, reports of some people in a convoy throwing grenades off their truck at civilians along the road, not all the time, but now and then.

Q: How about your Vietnamese?

BOCK: I found it extremely useful. This assignment out in the province is, I'm ashamed to say, the only time in my career when I consistently spoke the local language to the office staff. I started that from the outset and I found it very useful because then I was speaking Vietnamese all the time. I don't know what my fluency was, but it was certainly adequate to go out to local villages and talk to people.

Q: Do you feel you were able to get a reasonable line on what was happening when you went out and talked to the local people?

BOCK: There were limitations. We were the foreigners from the West. Depending on the circumstance in the local village, people might or might not want to tell us what was really going on. I never felt that I really knew. You would pick up what you could. The more you went back, the more you'd find out, but...

You had asked me earlier about what sort of things I did. Another part of my job description was political reporting. I did some of that. We functioned in that regard as kind of an extension of the embassy. The embassy had in its political section an internal unit with one person assigned, I believe, per region. That person would come out occasionally to do interviews.

Q: Do you recall who came out?

BOCK: Let me finish the thought. The region also had someone who kind of did the same thing. For most of the time I was there, Lars Hyde was at the region and doing political reporting and Mike Skol was the person in Saigon. But in addition to these two full-time reporting officers, we were encouraged to write up reports and pass them through those channels on all sorts of things, including political party activity, or if there were any things to do with security interests which would be of interest outside the standard CORDS structure. I did a bit of that.

Q: Did you feel that you were under pressure to show the rosier side of things?

BOCK: No, I didn't. I think that was probably a distinction between the military and the civilian side of the advisory setup. We were under the supervision of the Deputy for CORDS at the region. When I was there, that was Charlie Whitehouse. He was of course very interested in and committed to the whole pacification program, but I never sensed that that translated into an insistence that we had to show progress regardless of circumstances. So, no, I did not.

Q: Did you get any feel for the government sitting in Saigon? Was there any almost connection between that and loyalty towards that or was that just another government far away?

BOCK: Well, it was more the latter. There were efforts - my memory is not very clear on this - I think about that time efforts by the president to set up his own political party and try to establish it around the provinces. I believe that was happening to a considerable extent in our own province, but it tended to be kind of an artificial exercise, as that sort of thing often is. So, to a large extent, Saigon seemed to be rather far away and sort of an "us versus them" kind of situation.

Q: Did you get that feeling at all between you out in the province and our embassy back in Saigon?

BOCK: Yes, to some extent, although this system I described a few minutes ago about the roving political reporters gave us kind of a window into the embassy and diminished that to some extent.

Q: During the time you were there, were there any major developments in your province?

BOCK: The time I was there coincided with a general quieting of the insurgency. I mentioned the 1969 mini Tet. That was the highpoint for a while. So, there were successes in the sense of less Viet Cong and North Vietnamese activity for most of the period I was there. In the spring of 1970, and by this time I was no longer in the province, was the big Cambodia incursion. That was a major development from the perspective of our province and that region because it was directed at North Vietnamese military units who were ensconced on the border and using that base to put pressure on the provinces between the border and Saigon and that was us. So, from a purely parochial perspective, that incursion seemed like a good idea. And it wasn't until you started thinking about what might be the effects in Cambodia itself that you ran into the other side of the picture.

Q: I was in Saigon at the time and I thought, "Gee, good idea. What the hell?"

BOCK: I was amazed at the reaction in the United States.

Q: This is something, too... While you were there, did you get any feel for what was going on in the United States?

BOCK: We kept up with the news, but, no, I wouldn't say I had a real feel for it. Certainly I did not have enough of a feel for it to prepare me for the reaction to the Cambodia incursion.

Q: Were you married?

BOCK: No.

Q: So you were getting post reports... My wife was picking up another degree at the University of Maryland and I was getting the campus feedback and wow.

BOCK: No. I suppose I was in correspondence regularly only with my parents and they did not fill me with political news.

Q: How about getting around? Was this dangerous?

BOCK: There is no easy answer to that. I got around a lot. I drove to all the districts. The one district I couldn't drive directly to was the one up in the Michelin plantation because the road went through the Iron Triangle and that was bombed out. You had to make a rather circuitous route to do it and often we would fly, but I did drive on a couple of occasions. You would only do it in the daytime. You couldn't even drive to Saigon at night. There were checkpoints set up and so on. There were some people who were very cautious about driving. I think that tended to be the case more with the military than with civilians. That was their training. But I drove not only around the province but around the region. I drove to most of the provinces in the region at one time or another. I drove up to Dalat at one point and later down through the Mekong Delta. The roads were open. There didn't seem to be a problem from my perspective.

Q: Did you carry weapons?

BOCK: I was issued an M16 on arrival. I never carried it. I would have been a danger to myself and anybody around me if I had ever had to use it, although I was given rudimentary training in how to use it. I didn't want to carry a weapon.

Q: I have to say, as consul general there at the same time, our concern was, there were too many damn guns around that construction workers, Americans or something, would have too much beer and kill themselves when the Viet Cong turned out to be the laundry boy or something like that.

BOCK: I don't think we had that problem out in the province. My feeling was, that wasn't my job. If it was going to be a situation where I was going to be under the gun, so to speak, then I shouldn't be there. That wasn't what I was there to do.

Q: In some of these places that were under fairly frequent attack, were there Foreign Service officers there? Were they turning into military in a way?

BOCK: I had a very limited sample to go by. Only one of our three district civilians was in such an area. He was up at Ben Cat and Ben Cat did come under attack from time to time. I would have to say no in that case, but that's not representative. To the extent I knew about other provinces, I didn't see it.

Q: Did you ever find yourself having to use your diplomatic skills of getting between the American civilians and the American military?

BOCK: Not directly. Because we had this rather large and elaborate military advisory structure in the province, if I became aware of a situation which required that kind of mediation, I would take it immediately to my military bosses. They were enough on the same wavelength that I was that they would be the ones to tackle that. There was no real negotiating. I was dealing with people who were coming from where I was coming from.

Q: Yes, and who had the clout, too, to take care-

BOCK: Well, who may or may not have had the clout, but who had more clout than I did.

Q: Something that I'm sure you got familiar with was the difference between an American Foreign Service briefing and a military briefing. So many of the briefings that I would get from the military were so terribly canned and I really didn't feel I got much out of them whereas the Foreign Service ones seemed to be a little more at least instructive or something. You'd be talking about the real situation rather than too many flip charts and all that. Did you find this?

BOCK: Yes, not so much during this time in the province because the military people out there did not have the capability to do this kind of elaborate briefing. However, and maybe this is jumping ahead, I spent about two months following my provincial assignment at regional headquarters in Bien Hoa. One of my jobs there, at least for part of the time, was to do civilian briefing for the commanding general. So, I was there in tandem with military briefers. This was a major military command now, so you had exactly the kind of thing you're describing with all this rapid fire flip chart kind of stuff and I was up there just trying to talk and it was quite a contrast.

Q: I know. Shortly after I arrived, somebody had set it up for me and my deputy, just the two of us, Paul McCarthy. We went up to Bien Hoa and I think a major came out and did this. There was a big table and it was just the two of us. It was like he was addressing an audience of 500 or something. It was sort of eerie. It wasn't us guys sitting around and telling what it was. This is how they did it. I realize it has its purpose, but the wavelengths weren't right on that.

BOCK: Well, I have a vague memory of the commanding general coming out to our province and getting a briefing and the military team being all uptight about it. But even in that situation, we just didn't have the capability to do the real military briefing.

Q: You had a two month time in Bien Hoa? What were you doing there?

BOCK: One of the things I was doing, and I guess the one that was the most time consuming, there was a provincial survey team made up of Vietnamese who would do public opinion surveys. I was very familiar with their work because they would come around to provinces and would be tasked by provincial advisory teams – because they worked for us, not for the Vietnamese government – but they were headquartered in Bien Hoa and were often tasked out of Bien Hoa... So, when I moved into Bien Hoa, I was running them and editing their reports and either devising things for them to pursue or soliciting questions to be asked from the various provincial advisory teams. I was also working at the regional end on the hamlet evaluation system. I was doing the military briefings. There may have been some other things, too.

Q: Did you then go back?

BOCK: No. There was a personnel situation which had left me unhappy. I mentioned that I had been doing this acting NLD advisor job. Well, that was very satisfactory to the provincial advisory team and to the region, but the central system still kept that position on their books as vacant. Lo and behold, they assigned somebody to it, a guy with no background, who came out. There was an effort on the part of the provincial team to block his assignment and it didn't succeed. So, I was back in a subordinate position to somebody that didn't know anywhere near as much as I did. I hope I wasn't too obvious about it. I began to look for a way out, with support from the provincial senior advisor. So that was the genesis of my move to Bien Hoa. It was also the genesis of my next move. In Saigon, the embassy had three special assistant positions that it recruited CORDS Foreign Service officers to fill: the special assistant to the ambassador, the special assistant to the deputy ambassador, and the special assistant to the head of the CORDS program. I had become aware of this through my contact with these embassy rovers and so when I heard that there was about to be a vacancy, I put my name in the hat and went in for an interview and was accepted.

Q: Which one?

BOCK: This was special assistant to Ambassador Bunker.

Q: We used to laugh about this. One, it was obviously an honor and was a very good thing to do. But it was called, I think, the Charm School or the Charm Competition because this was a competitive thing. The people who got it were usually damned good Foreign Service officers, but they'd been out in the field. It was a little bit like the competition to be specially picked to go to the Ops Center or something like that.

BOCK: I guess it was, yes, within the Vietnam context.

Q: So you did this from when to when?

BOCK: It must have been about June of '70. Although I was originally on a year and a half tour, this was done with the knowledge that it entailed an extension. So I served there about a year.

Q: Okay. So this would be June of '70 to...

BOCK: April or May of '71.

Q: What was your impression of the operation of the embassy?

BOCK: Well, the embassy was absolutely monstrous. From the perspective of the ambassador's office, there was a lot of stuff that just never came to his attention at all. The deputy ambassador was a DCM. The reason to call him the deputy ambassador-

Q: Was it Sam Berger at that time?

BOCK: Yes. That probably had more to do with relations to the military than anything else.

Q: I know, for example, I hardly ever saw the ambassador. I reported to Sam Berger.

BOCK: Yes. That was true for so much of the embassy. So, on the one hand, I was aware of the vastness of the embassy community, but on the other hand, I wasn't that engaged with a lot of it because I was there directly in the ambassador's office and was interested in only those things that he was interested in.

Q: How did Ambassador Bunker use you?

BOCK: Well, what I was there to do was, first of all, to manage the paper flow, try to determine what he needed to see and what he didn't. Secondly, to handle his contacts with the Vietnamese government to the extent it wasn't being handled by the political counselor or someone similar. To help out when he went out on visits or entertained. So, it was very much the personal staff assistant type of job, certainly not a policy position.

Q: Who had been your predecessor?

BOCK: Al Adams. He moved then into the political section, so he was still there. At the outset, that was a real advantage because he was there to bend his ear, you know.

Q: From your perspective, how did Ambassador Bunker operate?

BOCK: I'm not sure I know how to reply to that. He had a number of trusted people that he dealt with constantly, starting with Sam Berger, including in particular the mission coordinator, who at that time was Hawk Mills, Ambassador Colby, head of the CORDS program, and the commanding general, General Abrams. So, he tended to rely on a fairly small circle. I should include the political counselor as well, although I didn't sense that he was as close.

Q: Who was that?

BOCK: Hitchcock, I guess. Bill Hitchcock.

Q: Was this a team that seemed to work together?

BOCK: I think it worked together reasonably well. On the economic side, that required Berger because that was an area that Bunker really didn't get into very much. But Berger was there and he was good. As far as the military relationship is concerned, yes, I didn't see the kind of tension you might expect between the civilian embassy and the military command. They were all, I think, working from the same script. I can remember, without having been involved in them, the endless consultations regarding the Laos incursion, which took place during the time I was there. I can't remember the name of the operation. It was not successful.

Q: Operation Lan Som.

BOCK: Yes. It was a Vietnamese operation supported by the U.S., but the troops on the ground were by and large Vietnamese. There was a period when Bunker spent a great deal of his time working on that, constantly talking with Abrams.

Q: Did you get any feel for Bunker's dealings with Washington? Nixon was in. Henry Kissinger was the National Security Advisor.

BOCK: I did not get a very good feel. One of the restrictions of my position was that all of the highly restricted traffic did not go through me. That went through Eva Kim, his secretary. The other person I should mention that was constantly in consultation with Bunker was Ted Shackley, who was chief of station. So, you know, a lot of those messages, particularly from Kissinger, went through CIA channels, so Shackley would be bringing these things in. One would become aware of things from time to time, but I didn't have a great overview.

Q: Sometimes it happens – I can't imagine Bunker, being the gentleman he was to get into one of these screaming matches over the telephone – that you get with relationships sometimes. I've just been reading a book about Phil Habib dealing with Washington. He was not one to keep his voice down.

BOCK: Yes. No, I don't remember anything like that. He would go back on consultations, of course. I don't know what happened then. But even then I wouldn't have expected him to get in a shouting match.

Q: Were you getting any reflections of Bunker rolling his eyes, getting instructions or requests from Washington or something like that?

BOCK: No, not that I remember.

Q: As a personality, I find it difficult to think that...

BOCK: Yes, he was a very self-contained individual. He was already into his 70s. He had been through a lot. He didn't have to be there. But he had this real sense of service and that carried over into the way he dealt with people.

Q: I imagine that you were terribly busy most of the time.

BOCK: Yes.

Q: Did you get any feel for Bunker, but also the embassy dealing with the Vietnamese government? This was the Thieu government. How did they function?

BOCK: I didn't have a direct view of it, but during the time I was there, certainly Bunker talked to Thieu quite a bit. He would also talk to a couple of the people around Thieu.

Q: Did Ky ever come into the thing?

BOCK: I don't think Ky had any particular contacts with the embassy, at least not with the Ambassador.

Q: He was Vice President.

BOCK: He was Vice President. He was kind of doing his own thing. All of the Embassy dealings that I'm aware of went through Thieu or, depending on the issue, through some of the cabinet ministers. But with Bunker, Bunker dealt with Thieu. I have vague recollections of some tensions there, but not enough that I could give you any real details. Again, Bunker, with his personality and sort of stoic approach to things.

Q: As a young officer, there was sort of a young officers' mafia in Saigon, which included people like yourself, many of whom had served in the field and came in. It was a very lively social group. Can you characterize what you were picking up from them and you were adding about what was happening?

BOCK: There was a certain amount of general cynicism both about the capability of the Thieu government and whether the pacification strategy was really working. But this was not a crisis period. So, this was kind of background noise. I can't remember any real tensions in that regard. It was more sort of people just chatting. I do remember the corruption issue was a major one. It was one that Sam Berger got in the middle of. He was at some point designated as the person who was going to have to deal with this. There were considerable pressures put on him - some of them were raised by more junior officers - about what was going on. Since it was Berger's deal, it was something that I wasn't getting involved in at all, but I certainly was aware of it.

Q: Well, I got involved in some things, for example, there had been an organization called the Embassy Club in Saigon. You probably didn't run across it. At one point, they had to repair the roof or something. It was going to take a while.

BOCK: This was the one in back of the main embassy, right?

Q: It was downtown somewhere. Later, they had a regular club with a swimming pool, but this was really a place where you could go get drinks. But they had little gift shops which were selling fur coats and diamonds. You can imagine, it was a hotbed of everything that you didn't want. They said, "Well, you really have got to repair the roof," so Berger took that to shut it down and said, "We're not repairing the roof." I ran something equivalent to a civilian court martial system. It's called the Irregular Practices Committee. American civilians who got caught in black market activities, we could take away essentially their PX privileges, which killed them. They couldn't operate anymore, including newsmen.

BOCK: The whole question of irregular practices on the part of Americans was something I was aware of from the time I was in Vietnam. Everybody knew that virtually any military unit's paymaster had ready access to Vietnamese girlfriends. I don't think I ever saw a paymaster who didn't have some sweet young thing on his arm. Such were the temptations. The ability to siphon off commissary goods and PX goods and so on was legendary. I don't remember this coming up very strongly during the time I was at the embassy, but I may just not be remembering it.

Q: I remember watching Thai soldiers being marched to the PX in Cho Lon and each getting a certain amount of whatever they got. It would eventually end up on the black market.

BOCK: If I'm not mistaken, what Berger was charged with dealing with was not that kind of thing at all, but major diversion by Vietnamese of U.S. aid commodities. But I don't have the details on that.

Q: Were you able to get out and talk to Vietnamese in Saigon?

BOCK: Not very much. I did get up back to my old province on occasion. Sometimes I'd go up there on a Sunday if I knew that I wasn't going to have to work, and talk to the Vietnamese staff that I had gotten to know up there. Not to any significant extent in Saigon.

Q: Particularly the time you were with Bunker, this was the time of Vietnamization. We were beginning to draw down our troops. This was the Nixon Doctrine.

BOCK: Yes, and negotiations were going on in Paris, too.

Q: Yes. Was there any disquiet about our getting out of there, moving our troops out?

BOCK: I would say from the embassy perspective, very little. I think to the extent there was disquiet it was with what was going on in Paris in terms of cease-fire negotiations and what restrictions would come out of that. As you will remember, there was eventually a real standoff between Nixon and Thieu. Actually, in the early negotiations, between Johnson and Thieu, but later on with Nixon as well. The embassy was clearly reflecting to some extent Thieu's concerns about some of those issues such as how fast we would have to withdraw. But in terms of the ongoing withdrawal which had been put in place in '69 or '70, I didn't sense any particular qualms about that. Of course, these cross-border operations, both Cambodia and Laos, were designed to set the stage for that, too, and to the extent they were successful, as Cambodia initially was, that helped. If they weren't successful, as Laos was not really, then that raised alarm bells.

Q: As a Foreign Service officer put in this sort of unique situation, what were you looking at towards whither Rick Bock? Were promises made?

BOCK: No promises. People always talked a good game. "This will be good for your career." In those days, there was a pretty standard pattern for junior Foreign Service officers, which was, of your first three assignments, two would be abroad and one would be in Washington. Vietnam was my second overseas assignment. I had not yet been assigned to Washington. So there was a general understanding, which I don't think I ever questioned, that I would be assigned to Washington. And I was. So, then it was just a question of what office in the Department.

Q: When you left there in April-ish 1971, whither South Vietnam?

BOCK: I think the focus tended to be on how would these cease-fire negotiations pan out? Could there be something put in place which would really remove the North Vietnamese regular units from the South? If that was the case, then I think the general consensus in Saigon was that at least then the Thieu government had a decent shot at surviving, no guarantees certainly. So the focus tended to be on what was going on in Paris.

Q: Was there any concern that the Nixon people were in to get us the hell out of there no matter what and what might be equivalent to a sellout?

BOCK: I don't remember that specifically. There may have been.

WILLIAM K. HITCHCOCK
Director, Refugees and War Victims
Saigon (1969-1970)

Political Counselor
Saigon (1970-1972)

William Hitchcock was born in Colorado in 1919 and educated at the University of Colorado at Boulder and American University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1953. His career included posts in London, Paris, Madrid, Calcutta and Saigon. He was interviewed by Stephen Low in 1998.

Q: Jim Grant lives two houses away from us.

HITCHCOCK: Jim Grant was responsible for Vietnam affairs in AID, a job of major importance since AID served as the administrative umbrella for all American civilians in Vietnam engaged in the direct prosecution of the war (as well as those doing regular AID functions). In his usual, effective manner, Jim explained how refugees and other types of war victims - between 2.5 and 3 million of them - had become a major problem both because of the human suffering they represented and the way they were being exploited by anti-war activists. After a few telephone calls, I agreed to take on the job, subject to my first reviewing the situation in the field. I went out in January of '69 and spent most of the month there, came back to DC for most of February and hit the job full time the first of March, 1969.

The Director of CORDS (Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support) at that time was Bill Colby (later in charge of the CIA). (I lived with him my first month in Saigon while looking for a place to live.) The Directorate of Refugees and War Victims was one of the four Directorates of CORDS, the acronym for the civilian side of the war effort, also known as the Pacification program. Nineteen sixty-nine was an interesting, challenging year to acquire the responsibility for intensifying our refugee assistance efforts. The war was still active but the general security situation had become more stable than it had been in 1968 after major enemy assaults during Tet the previous February. In these improved circumstances many South Vietnamese displaced by the war could be returned home or otherwise helped to rebuild their lives. A substantial proportion of them were given help either by our programs directly or indirectly through about 30 voluntary agencies (VOLAGS), the largest of which, I think, was Catholic Relief Services. About a hundred million dollars were spent a year on our refugee assistance efforts in addition to the contributions from the VOLAGS. We had refugee advisors in all the provinces of South Vietnam, some 18 in all, and the VOLAGS, too, had personnel sprinkled liberally throughout the country. It was an intensive effort.

Q: The objective was what, to ease the plight of the refugees?

HITCHCOCK: Yes. There were two and half million displaced people. Technically they were not refugees (i.e., people driven out of their countries); in Vietnam, they had been driven out of their homes and most couldn't return to them. We called them refugees. There were also several refugee camps usually located in areas where the war made their return-home impossible. They were mostly located in the northern part of the country. We also dealt with another category of war casualties we called war victims. These were people whose homes were destroyed as a result of some war related action. We gave them material for rebuilding their homes, food during the rebuilding period, and other help as required.

I spent a year in charge of our refugee efforts. It involved a lot of work, much of it done while moving around the provinces of SVN (South Vietnam) by helicopter. I usually traveled with the Minister of Social Welfare of the Vietnamese government.

Q: Your French was good enough?

HITCHCOCK: Not really; nor was my Vietnamese. My work was almost all done in English. We also had translators as required, usually for dealing with village or provincial officials.. There were a lot of inspiring, committed people involved in the U.S. refugee effort, as one might expect. Quite a few were FSOs, usually on their first assignments. Others came from NGOs (non-governmental organizations) or other similar activities. One junior FSO was George Moose who later became Assistant Secretary for African Affairs.

Q: Do you think the program was effective?

HITCHCOCK: I think it or something like it was crucial. These people had to have the kind of help that was given including the food. They also needed assistance in preparing their land for planting. And, yes, I think it was very successful, especially during 1969 when the intensity of the war had subsided a bit.

Toward the end of January or February 1970, Senator Fulbright opened special hearings on the Vietnam war before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of which he was the Chairman. Very near the start of the hearings he heard the CORDS side of things. To make our presentation,

I returned to Washington with Bill Colby and John Paul Vann. The hearings were not as hostile as we expected. The Senator had decided that CORDS was not where he was going to focus his fire. It must be said that our presentations went well in part because we could report progress made possible by the improved security situation that existed during that period of time.

Ambassador Bunker, about the turn of '71-'72, asked me to move to the Embassy to replace Martin Herz whose tour as Minister Counselor was coming to an end. I, of course, agreed to do so and made the transfer after returning to Saigon from the Senate hearings about the beginning of March as I recall.

Q: Of 1970?

HITCHCOCK: Yes. My new job was called Minister Counselor for Political Affairs, but it also had several other responsibilities beyond the range of the political section. We also had a Political Counselor for whom I was directly responsible. The Embassy structure included an ambassador and a deputy ambassador - Ambassador Bunker and Ambassador Sam Berger. Sam gave his attention to special problems such as corruption within SVN, and he served as principal adviser to the Ambassador. I provided special assistance to the Ambassador, going with him occasionally to meetings, drafting messages, undertaking special studies, etc. I also was our action officer on the Peace talks, then going on in Paris. Galen Stone was the Political Counselor when I arrived and rotated out shortly after. Lauren Askew was the Political Counselor during my tour and supervised the daily work of what I believe was the largest political section the Foreign Service had. But I, too, had a very active role and was in frequent consultation with the political section, including, of course, Askew.

I was Minister Counselor for a little over two years - until the spring of 1972. I had been in the Refugee job about 15 months. So my total time in Vietnam was a bit under 3 and ½ years.

Q: You were much more involved in the policy issues in that position than you had been as the Refugee Coordinator?

HITCHCOCK: Of course, but our refugee assistance efforts were also important not only for the refugees as such, but also as a limited antidote to the anti-war movement in the States. As you will recall the war was a significant event in almost every American's life; many opposed it and their opposition increased in effectiveness as the war continued. In the Embassy we were well aware of the opposition, but our main concern continued to be the war and our role in pursuing it. Many of us, for example, had to remain sharply focused on the fact that there was a 12 or 13 hour difference between Washington and Saigon - every day. We had to get messages out at the end of the day in order to receive instructions at the beginning of the morning. These messages, in contrast to a lot of messages at other Foreign Service posts, frequently went directly to the President. We did not then have, as you will recall, a strong Secretary of State, but we had a strong National Security Advisor (who soon became the Secretary of State). This was just after the end of the Johnson presidency, early in the beginning of that of Nixon.

Q: I have heard from a number of the junior officers that they were aware of the deteriorating situation, but that they felt they couldn't report that.

HITCHCOCK: I have to ask when?

Q: Did you have personal contact with the junior officers in the field or were you able to get from them a flow of information that was satisfactory?

HITCHCOCK: Not always, but generally yes. We got what we needed - from the field, from our own officers in the Political Section (many of whom were Vietnamese speaking), and other contributors. We had information from many sources. The greater challenge was in evaluating and using it effectively. Knowledge of developments in and about the North was a weakness among our analytical tools.

Q: Were we deluding ourselves?

HITCHCOCK: Maybe in retrospect, but at the time, there wasn't much doubt about there being a feeling of general optimism in the immediate wake of Tet '68. You never approach a military situation as a military person with the conviction you are going to lose. And, indeed, you tend to see what happens as a reaffirmation of that positiveness. The indicators were generally much more positive in Vietnam at that time than they were in the States. But I would add that during that period in the States everything was really going to hell in terms of support for the Vietnam War. I can't remember the date of Kent State, but it was probably around '72. I'm not going to get into the U.S. side of the war except to say there were lots of people who came to Vietnam of varying degrees of importance - national importance in U.S. - who were strong opponents of the Vietnam War. Among them was George McGovern, as he was beginning his presidential campaign effort. I was the control officer for his visit. There was a tendency to put as positive a face on the state of the war as possible - or as negative as possible if you were an opponent. It was difficult to marry these two opposing points of view and reach useful conclusions in terms of our national interest.

From Vietnam it seemed to many Americans that a number of promising approaches to the pursuit of the war were avoided because of self-imposed constraints. For example, in Vietnam there was widespread support for a greater effort to interdict movements of the NVA (North Vietnamese Army) along the Ho Chi Minh Trail, which was predominantly located in Laos. There was even a constraint against bombing access to the Ho Chi Minh Trail in North Vietnam where the trail enters Laos, although we did some bombing of the Trail in Laos and there was some bombing of the Trail in northeastern-most Cambodia. The point was, we never undertook a major effort to stop the North Vietnamese from bringing war materiel into SVN over the Trail, and we could have. The effect on the ability of the North to pursue the war in the South would have been major, possibly decisive - or so many advocates believed. I don't know why it wasn't done, but I presume that, as in other cases, it was a concern about the possibility of escalating the conflict. I cite this not to reflect any disappointment on my part, but to identify the kind of dissatisfaction about the prosecution of the war one occasionally encountered in Saigon. But there were many Americans in SVN whose principle concern was with the obviously rapid decline in U.S. support for our continued participation in the war, not to mention our continuing support to our ally, the South Vietnamese. This latter concern was given a substantial boost by the introduction of the Vietnamization of the war effort by President Nixon and many of the actions that followed that decision.

Walt Cutler, in charge of external relations in our political section, and I work together on possible Peace possibilities, including negotiating proposals for presentation in Paris. The thoughts we developed, I thought, were sometimes rather inventive, never necessarily breakthrough stuff, but inventive. Even though we never knew whether anything ever happened to our efforts after we submitted them, I know we both enjoyed the work.

I also coordinated with the Vietnamese (the Deputy Foreign Minister) once a week, I think on Thursdays, the position the U.S. Delegation proposed to present at the peace talks in Paris that week. These coordination talks continued even after the highly secret negotiations involving Secretary Kissinger and Le Duc Tho of North Vietnam had commenced. Allowing us to continue our meetings in ignorance obviously was part of the effort to protect the secrecy of the Kissinger talks.

Q: It sounds to me as though you were more operational than analytical and that you were really putting out fires and didn't have the opportunity to stand back and see where we were going. People didn't develop strong positions pro or con on the war at this point. You were too busy doing it.

HITCHCOCK: I think you may be right. The pressure on us to do what we did was substantial - 90 hour or so work weeks. So it could be argued that we hardly had time to do what you suggest. It was also true that much of the criticism of the war coming out of the United States was criticism without much knowledge of what was happening on the ground. Of course, that may not have been important to the critics whose greater concern was probably what they feared the war was doing to the United States.

I became known, I think, as a kind of skeptic within the inner circle. I will tell a story that may not be flattering to me. One of the real warriors was Ted Shackley. Shackley had been the head of the CIA operation in Laos, for five years or more before he came to Saigon as the station chief. He was really committed. Whenever these issues or instructions from Washington that we had to pursue, or comment on, arrived, I was always skeptical or would say "let's look at this." He came up once with the sharp rebuke, "If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen." Well, look. You go through four years in India in which one of their greatest doubts about American foreign policy was Vietnam, you become cautious.

Q: Had you had any content with people like Paul Kattenburg when you were in INR?

HITCHCOCK: Lou Sarris was the INR Vietnam specialist. I knew him when I was in INR in the early '60s. I also knew Kattenburg at that time, though not well.

Q: And, he had the reputation of being very pessimistic about Vietnam.

HITCHCOCK: Yes, and it was a view warmly shared by Tom Hughes who was the Director of INR at the time. I think sometimes that they were more skeptical than the events supported. But, I must admit, some of their skepticism turned out in retrospect to be almost prescient.

There is a piece on the war that has been pulled together under the auspices, I think, of the LBJ Library. Have you seen that? It is a brainstorming on Vietnam by a selected number of top-level policy people like Mac Bundy, Bill Bundy, Tom Hughes, Doug Cater, that level of person. It is a very interesting insight into some of the policy making during the war. I would say that even at that level, they didn't have time for a lot of quiet reflection on things. I'm not sure you always do in situations like that. Imagine a similar session on World War II.

The pace of events was stunning. Within a matter of days of my arrival, the Cambodian invasion occurred. I had no involvement in that, in the sense that I didn't about it. I was just getting my feet on the ground. A succession of things quickly happened. I was a member of the limited country team which consisted basically, in this case of: Bunker, Berger, General Abrams, Shackley who was CIA, and myself. And, they added to that as the agenda required. Bunker had his embassy country team meeting and then he would have this limited meeting, usually at his home. There were certain issues that would get discussed that didn't get discussed at the earlier meeting.

We had activities going on around the clock. Some of these became quite memorable. Bunker would get special instructions, usually from the President, to see Thieu (President of South Vietnam). He'd sometime see him at three o'clock in the morning. By the time I came to work, which was about 7:00-7:30 am, he would have drafted his report and no one knew about it. It was very secretive. Usually it was Thieu because most of the contact had to go at that level from Bunker and particularly if the message was a presidential instruction.

The thing about the Vietnam War that I think you and some of the rest of us might try to understand is how basic decisions grow out of circumstances which soon get lost in the background or are just forgotten. How much did Vietnam emerge from some of the circumstances that existed in Southeast Asia in relationship to other things like the development of the Cold War, the statements the Soviets and Chinese were making at the time which were quite frightening? How much our involvement in Vietnam emerge from our early support for the French in Vietnam partly in order to get them to agree to lines of communication and logistics through France for NATO may be one such example. If you are able to take yourself back to such NATO prompted decisions you might end up with an attitude toward Vietnam which is much more understanding, even if you didn't necessarily agree with it.

Q: Precipitated into opposition to Vietnam?

HITCHCOCK: The war in Vietnam was an easy target for criticism by younger generation (i.e., draftable) Americans because they were interested in other things, and fighting a war, anywhere, was not one of those things.

I never became an advocate of the Vietnam War. I did become an advocate of our getting out of it as honorably as we could and with minimum adverse political consequences. I'm afraid we missed both these objectives. It's shaking a little more into shape with the passage of time, but it will never be seen as one of our major moments of honor.

BRUCE W. CLARK
Deputy District Advisor
Tuy Hoa (1969-1970)

Office of Inspector General for Foreign Assistance
Washington, DC (1970-1971)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1971-1972)

Bruce W. Clark was born in Los Angeles, California in 1941. He attended Claremont Men's College from 1958 to 1959 before transferring to Stanford University, where he received his BA in 1962. He also served in the U.S. Army Reserve before joining the Foreign Service in 1966. His career has included positions in countries such as Germany, Vietnam, Belgium, and Saudi Arabia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 4, 2002.

Q: So where did they send you next?

CLARK: To Vietnam after several training courses. At that time, almost all single officers, and I think officers without children, were sent to Vietnam with a few exceptions. I was assigned to CORDS - Civil Operations and Rural Development. That was the USAID organization that ran the pacification program.

Q: When did you get there with the Foreign Service?

CLARK: In 1969.

Q: Was there any sort of dissension in the ranks? Did you just salute and go or did you feel you had any choice in the matter?

CLARK: I didn't have any choice as I understood it, but I had two friends who resigned rather than go there. One not so much because he disagreed with the policies but because he was an Italian speaker who had been assigned originally to Italy but sent instead to Mogadishu with a promise that he'd be assigned for his second tour. Nonetheless, after a really unpleasant time in Mogadishu, they assigned him to Vietnam, so he said goodbye, joined the UN and just retired a couple years ago. But others didn't go because they thought the policy was wrong. By the time I got to Vietnam I was very suspicious because I'd done a lot of reading on Vietnam at FSI and was beginning to have a lot of doubts, especially after Tet, whether or not this was the way to do it.

Q: Did you take Vietnamese?

CLARK: I took the short course and didn't do very well because of the tones. I could reproduce them but I couldn't hear the difference when someone was speaking.

Q: Like learning the Morse code. I never could tell the difference between a dot and a dash. It went by too fast, which makes it a little difficult. It's almost the same, up against the same frustration. When in 1969 did you go out to Vietnam?

CLARK: I think I got there about April.

Q: And you stayed 'till when?

CLARK: Eighteen months. So something like October...

Q: Of '71?

CLARK: Of '70.

Q: '70.

CLARK: Is that right?

Q: Yes. That would be right. Where did they assign you?

CLARK: Well, I arrived in Saigon and I was told there were several posts around the country that were available. So I called a friend of mine for advice....

Q: Who was this?

CLARK: David Passage.

Q: I've tried to get and interview him.

CLARK: Well he's hard to get in touch with. Anyway, he was working at MAC V Headquarters in Saigon. I guess he had just had an argument or something with one of his bosses and was really down on working at MAC V. He recommended going anyplace outside Saigon. So I said okay, I'll go out in the country somewhere. Since I was raised in California and liked the ocean, I tried to choose a place near the ocean. And preferably a place where I didn't have to take those awful malaria tablets which made me ill every time I took them. So I went to Tuy Hoa in II Corps in Central Vietnam.

Q: Well, when you got there in the spring of '69, what was the situation in South Vietnam?

CLARK: As the country goes, it was still recovering I suppose from the after-effects of the previous year's Tet. I didn't have any special feel for the situation, but FSI had done such a good job in indoctrinating me about the need to be extremely careful about my security that I was amazed how freely people moved about. When I arrived in Saigon, they put me in USAID I - one of those hotels for USAID officers. I was almost afraid to leave the room. When they said to go across the street about a block to eat, I said 'Is that safe?' After awhile I got used to the fact that the situation was by no means as dire as they had said in Washington, then on the way up-country they took me first to II Corps headquarters in Nha Trang. When I arrived there and got off the plane, they took to a little hotel in the middle of Nha Trang with no visible security. I looked at this and said 'There's no way I'm staying here; anyone could walk in here.' So I guess the reality was that the security situation was a lot better than I thought it was, but nonetheless I stayed instead with a fellow I had just met a couple months before in Washington. Actually I personally never had any security problems, but friends of mine certainly did. I lived downtown in the little town of Tuy Hoa in a house I shared with another USAID officer. We had a couple of guards that slept through the night instead of guarding, I think, but never had any problems even though VC had made it into the center of the town during Tet.

Q: Tuy Hoa. What was the situation there? Was that a district?

CLARK: Tuy Hoa was a district in the province of Phu Yen, on the coast north of Nha Trang. Since Tuy Hoa was the main town in the district and also the provincial "capital," so to speak, the town was pretty secure. It was separated from the much less secure valley by a highway, railroad tracks and a river. The town was pretty secure, but how secure the valley was at night was anybody's guess. And if you went far from the town into the woods or the jungle during the day you could be asking for trouble.

Q: What were you doing?

CLARK: I was the deputy district advisor. The district advisor was always an Army major.

Q: A district was the smallest unit?

CLARK: Yes. Corps were divided into provinces and provinces into districts.

Q: You'd had military experience, albeit in the reserves. Was that helpful where you were?

CLARK: Well, a little bit, but where I was the U.S. military didn't play a combat role. The district team lived right outside the center of town and spent most of their time advising and training the Vietnamese. There was not a lot of military action in Tuy Hoa district, probably because the province headquarters were there and a lot of Vietnamese military. However, in Tuy An, the district to the north, the district team's compound was overrun by the VC one night. My counterpart there, whose name I've forgotten, had to fight for his life with his machine gun and grenades. I went up the next morning and saw a stack of about forty VC bodies. I mean they really had a tough time.

Q: Well, what were you doing?

CLARK: Basically seeing where our aid was going and how it was being used. Going out to the villages, and seeing that the villages or hamlets got what they needed.

Q: What was your impression of how was it being used?

CLARK: About 10% effective if judged by our intentions. The aid would arrive on a truck in a square inside the district government compound downtown. When it was unloaded, the merchants would come and buy it, which they weren't supposed to do, of course, since this was all being donated by the United States. Basically all of the stuff moved smartly into the market. The powdered milk went to feed pigs (not children), and the oil went into the marketplace to be sold.

Q: Had we learned to accept this?

CLARK: I guess. I mean, I reported it and I think everyone just sort of assumed that 10% effective was okay. It was extremely wasteful. And, of course, corruption was rife. The province chief was in on it.

Q: Did this turn you off to the South Vietnamese cause? How did you feel?

CLARK: I liked and respected the Vietnamese I worked with. The district chief was a Army captain and concerned with military matters. He had two deputies - one civilian and one a lieutenant - who spoke English, and I went around all day with them, visiting villages and hamlets outside the town of Tuy Hoa. I think they were trying to do the best they could under the system. I felt very sorry for the Vietnamese. But I didn't think the war was really of winnable, because I thought that for the people who had influence and contacts the war was, in a way, a golden opportunity to make a lot of money. These people didn't suffer so much. They could buy their sons out of the military, and there were many ways to make money off the war and the Americans. Stuff that we threw away could be converted by Vietnamese into dollars. For example, the garbage from the U.S. airbase across the river south of Tuy Hoa was a gold mine. People fought to get the contract to haul the garbage away. The same went for the contract for doing the laundry for the airbase. A lot of American money and aid flowed into the economy but I think most of it benefitted people who were basically already rich.

Q: Was this stirring up any dissent within the AID ranks, officers like yourself? Were you sat on from an upper level so to say, and told to cool it?

CLARK: No. I don't know what happened when reports got to Saigon or to headquarters in Nha Trang. Our province senior advisor, who was a very honest, hardworking Foreign Service Officer, was very sympathetic.

Q: Who was that?

CLARK: James Engel. I'm not sure about this, but I think he was transferred because he had a falling out with the Province Chief over corruption. They had several real hot arguments, and I think his bosses figured out that that situation wasn't helping anything. He was, I think, transferred to II Corps headquarters in Nha Trang and replaced with someone who they hoped could work with the province chief. But he, too, got really angry at all the corruption.

Q: How about with your colleagues, fellow Foreign Service Officers? Did you sort of sit around in the evenings and talk about the problems that you saw?

CLARK: Yes. But there wasn't much we could do about it but report. I don't think any of us were big supporters any longer of our involvement in Vietnam. I think we all sort of favored the idea of declaring victory and leaving.

Q: Well, you were there when they were just beginning to draw down, weren't you?

CLARK: Right.

Q: Did that have much effect when you were there?

CLARK: Tuy Hoa had really been in the middle of the fighting in Tet '68. But afterwards, for some reason, the Vietcong did make a big effort there, so the absence of American and Vietnamese troops was not much of a problem. Also, Tuy Hoa and the whole province was basically defended by Koreans. What I call Korean-occupied. The Koreans were tough. No one messed with the Koreans. I think the Vietcong decided to let the Koreans own the highways and so forth and avoided tangling with them. I think the VC concentrated on other areas, although it was clear that small units of VC were around and entered the villages and hamlets at night.

Q: Well, this is one of the interesting things. When the Koreans came in they didn't get involved in a great many fights, but they scared the bejesus out of both the Vietcong and the South Vietnamese.

CLARK: Well, they were really pretty ruthless. They'd drive up and down the highways shooting not only at water buffalo but at almost anyone that moved in an area that wasn't considered secure on the general premise they must be Vietcong. They were really fierce.

Q: Did you have any dealings with them?

CLARK: No. Not really. I met them once in awhile but that was all.

Q: Did you get any insight from speaking to Vietnamese? I mean were you able to get any feel for how they felt about things, how things were going and all?

CLARK: Well, the Vietnamese I worked with obviously did not want the Communists to succeed for political or family reasons. Naturally they feared imprisonment or worse if the VC won and that their families and all would suffer. But I don't think they had a lot of hope that things were going to get better for the government.

Q: You didn't get much of a feel, then, that the South Vietnamese government was making a big effort to win the hearts and minds in your area? President Thieu wasn't coming around inspiring the troops and that sort of thing?

CLARK: No one like that ever came to Tuy Hoa or Phu Yen province while I was there except for William Colby, who was head of our pacification program.

Q: Did you get any feel for the operations of the CIA there?

CLARK: No, not really in Phu Yen. I know that one officer who served in the district south of mine was reportedly a young CIA officer, but I thought he was a Foreign Service officer. So I know they were around. I had no idea what they were doing or that they had different contacts or anything.

Q: There were these young men working out of the political section in the American Embassy in Saigon, called provincial reporting officers. Did they come around?

CLARK: Yes, they came. There were several. I thought that they went to Saigon but actually lived and worked at corps headquarters like Nha Trang. and traveled around all the time. I remember one in particular, a very nice fellow who spoke Vietnamese.

Q: Who was this?

CLARK: I think it was Fred Shoup. I always wondered how he related to the military. He had a soft, cultured manner that was quite a contrast to the military officers who had come in from the field in camouflage uniforms with grenade belts and weapons in hand.

Q: Well, after eighteen months you were sort of counting your days in your job, weren't you.?

CLARK: Oh, yes. I was eager to leave. I enjoyed seeing parts of Asia on leave which I never would have seen otherwise, and the policy of sending all single officers and unmarried officers without children there produced, I think, the biggest gathering of bright, interesting people I've ever met in one place. Saigon was just filled with people of my own age, many of whom had served elsewhere. It was a fabulous sort of group.

Q: I was there at the same time, and it really was exciting. I was an older officer but it was very exciting.

CLARK: My best friends even today are almost all from that era. They lived in Saigon or elsewhere and I met them while I was over there.

Q: Did the Director General John Burns come around? I know he visited Vietnam when I was there to ask FSOs where they wanted to go and what they wanted to do afterwards. Did you meet him?

CLARK: I never met Burns, but he may have sent over a team that visited Phu Yen to talk to the FSOs. I'm not sure about their names. Phillips and Henderson, maybe? They came and visited almost every Foreign Service officer in place. I guess they took notes on how officers were doing and what they wanted next. They seemed to me to be very impressed by what they heard in Saigon which, I thought, was not too representative of the experience out in the provinces. I personally thought people in the provinces should get some extra points, because life in the provinces, even if you weren't in a bunker, was a lot harder than it was in Saigon.

Q: Oh, yes, I spent eighteen months in Saigon and it was very comfortable life. I didn't mind being separated from my family. And then I would go out and look at some of the young officers, you know, in a sandbagged dugout.

CLARK: Exactly. It seemed to me when it came to assignment time that the guy that spent eighteen months living in a dugout should get preferential treatment.

Q: So what did they do with you?

CLARK: I was sent back to Washington and assigned to the long-since-abolished office of the Inspector General for Foreign Assistance. And my main job was to lead more experienced inspection teams back to Vietnam, which I did. I went back to Vietnam a couple of times, and once to Central America.

Q: How did you find looking at Vietnam from the headquarters perspective of AID when you went back there?

CLARK: I had the impression that the Inspector General of Foreign Assistance very carefully targeted the areas to inspect in line with Congressional interests. They didn't want their inspection reports to be ammunition for critics. So the inspectors were very careful about what they looked into. For example, if you said, "Yes, we're here to look at what happens to powdered milk and oil, but look at what's happening over here," the inspectors might reply, "Yes, yes, but we're not here to look into that." So I don't think they were very effective.

Q: Of course, there was the great problem that if you tried to do this, any critical report would be immediately fed to the enemies of AID in general and get played up. Then, rather than helping to correct the problem, it just becomes ammunition to destroy the program.

CLARK: That's right. So there's a reason for it.

Q: And this is one of the problems of reporting on corruption, I think. If you're in a country and you keep reporting on corruption, critics of AID or what have you will zero in on the corruption and not on other developments.

CLARK: During one of my trips, I think that I had a tiny part in uncovering some serious problems in the USAID effort there. By that I mean there were a lot of officers that were supposed to be assigned out in the countryside who weren't actually living - at least full time - where they were assigned and were maintaining an apartment in Saigon that USAID was paying for. I mean it was a total breakdown. Some would have a car out in the country and a car assigned to them in Saigon. You know that type of waste. And I think the Inspector General did finally get USAID to make sure that people were actually living where they said they were living, and if they had one car that they didn't have another. Very sloppy administration and misuse of funds.

Q: Particularly by this time, I think you found people who were turning this whole effort into a career program of leading the high life, you know, with a Vietnamese girlfriend, black market activities, and so forth. I think the real true believers by this time had probably mostly left, leaving the field to the sort of careerists who were trying to stretch it out as long as they could and make as comfortable a life as they could.

CLARK: I think there were a lot of fellows who found Vietnam a very profitable way to make some money, have some girlfriends on the side, and spend every weekend in Thailand or whatever.

Q: You also had a significant number of people, I think, who were estranged from their wives back in the States. The atmosphere, I think, was much better in the beginning when people were really making an effort.

CLARK: Well I think it couldn't help but get worse the way they recruited people for Vietnam. They were going out to, say, Fresno and signing up policemen who had no experience abroad.. And then suddenly these guys were abroad without their families and double or triple their old pay in a rather loosely administered situation. That sort of thing leads to abuse.

Q: Were you concerned that you were getting too in with AID as such and away from sort of the regular Foreign Service?

CLARK: Yes, I wanted out of that job, since I didn't find it what I wanted to do. So I was switched from there to the Vietnam Working Group, which is probably the job I liked least in the entire Foreign Service.

Q: Well, you were doing the Vietnam Working Group from when to when?

CLARK: Well I think I was with the Inspector General for maybe eight months or...

Q: This would put you in the middle of '71.

CLARK: I think I was maybe a little less than a year with Inspector General. Then I moved over to the Vietnam Working Group which was headed by James Engel who had been my boss in Vietnam. Except by the time I arrived he had left to be an ambassador to some country in Africa. Dahomey, I think.

Q: Yes.

CLARK: Got in a lot of trouble there, too. Anyway, my new boss while I was there was Josiah Bennett. He was from New England and fit all the ideas you'd have about a close-mouthed New Englander. (Laughter) Never said anything. Information is power and he wasn't going to share it with anyone.

Q: Well, you were there from sometime in '71 until when?

CLARK: I was in the Vietnam Working Group until about March '72.

Q: What were you doing? What piece of the action did you have?

CLARK: Basically our job was to defend our war effort to critics, Congressmen and military people who would ask why we were allowing this or that to go on. We had to write responses that fudged the truth or were simple unresponsive. This was very painful for me because a lot of the criticisms were right on. But we always had to come up with some answer that either avoided answering the question or gave a response that we didn't believe in.

Q: Were you picking up on the anti-Vietnam movement and all?

CLARK: Well, I think most of the people in there were well aware of the criticism and sort of sympathetic to it. We weren't participating in it, certainly, but I think our belief and support for the war withered.

Q: What about the other officers? Were they having the same problem you were having?

CLARK: Well, one officer was Steve Johnson, who was the son of U. Alexis Johnson, then the Undersecretary of State. I don't think he had as much problem, but he probably knew what his father was dealing with and had a much better understanding of all the pros and cons that someone at that level had to deal with. And another officer was Theresa Tull. I think she was supported the effort and thought that it all could come out well if everyone would do the best they could.

Q: She was later Ambassador to Laos, I think.

CLARK: That's right. But the atmosphere in that office was pretty grim for me.

Q: Well, you must have been ready to get the hell away from the whole Vietnam thing, weren't you?

CLARK: Yes, I really was. In fact for years afterwards it seemed to me those who had served in Vietnam would talk about nothing but Vietnam. It just got so tiring. I was glad when the topic finally faded away.

ERNESTINE S. HECK
Political Officer
Saigon (1969-1971)

Ernestine S. Heck was born in Oregon in 1940. She received her bachelor's degree from Oregon State in 1962. Her career has included positions in Bombay, Saigon, Teheran, Niamey, Katmandu, New Delhi, Colombo, and Madras. Mrs. Heck was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 1997.

Q: You arrived in Vietnam and you were there from when to when?

HECK: I was in Vietnam from July of 1969 until the end of May/beginning of June 1971, so I had about 22 months.

Q: What was your job?

HECK: I was one of the political section officers. We had, of course, a very big embassy, and there were a number of people from other agencies who were under cover as political officers, but the real State Department political officers when I got there were 23 in the embassy proper and that's not counting the ones who were out in various CORDS jobs reporting political things. When I left, there were 17, and in both instances I was the junior officer of the lot, but the people who were coming in behind me were more junior than I. So I was the odds and ends person. You can imagine, when you try to divide a pie, which really represents only Saigon city and the national government, Foreign Ministry, the courts that were located in the city but didn't include a lot of the reporting from the field - you really get into things in great depth when you have 23 people running around covering these things. We had an internal section and external section of Political, Military, and Labor - there's one more - but in any case, there were five sections in the Political Section. Each section had a section chief, and we had a political counselor, a political military counselor, a deputy ambassador who was himself an ambassador, and an ambassador. So the hierarchy that breathed down our necks about what we reported was big. The first thing that one ran into when one got to Saigon as a political officer in 1969 was that what the front office believed and reported and what junior officers believed and tried to report and were thwarted in reporting were two entirely different versions of what was happening. There was tremendous bitterness among many of the officers, great cynicism among many of the officers, because they couldn't get their thoughts across, they couldn't tell it as they saw it. They kept getting overridden by the powers that be. I don't think that the people who were in those senior positions were being hypocritical or dishonest; I think they actually saw it that way. They were insulated. They were doing so many things which didn't get them down among the people, that when somebody whom they respected, like a general, told them something, they believed it, and the general in turn believed it because somebody told him that. So the stuff that got to the ambassador and the deputy ambassador was a far cry from what the more junior officers were seeing and reporting. So there was a real chasm in the embassy between the people who led it and the rest of us, not that we didn't in many cases greatly respect these senior officers or political appointees but we just saw a completely different war, and I think that permeated the entire mission. Correct me if I'm...

Q: Just for the record, during most of this period I was consul general sitting in an office to one side, and I was just doing consul general work. Ernie, let's talk about the two sides you mentioned, the junior officers. How did work and reports come to you, and what were you getting, and what was your particular area?

HECK: As I said, I was the absolute junior-most of this lot, so I didn't get a heck of a lot of real reporting. My responsibilities were the Supreme Court and the hierarchy that supported it, the court system in the capital city, who were not part necessarily of the political mainstream, and Saigon City itself, something called the SCAG, the Saigon Civil Action Group, the military and civilian organization which ran the city of Saigon, which then had about 3,000,000 people as I remember. I also did the real scut work, the weekly report. There was a weekly cable that went out every, I think, Tuesday evening with all of the things that were not important enough to send separate messages on but had to be reported, and that was mine; and finally, biographical reporting and with it all the things that go along, making lists of future leaders and various committees, dealing with USIS to identify perhaps the journalists who were going to become something or the cultural people who were going to become something in the hierarchy. So it really was not an exciting political job where I got to do a lot of my own reporting, but a lot of people with whom I worked did, and they would come back absolutely frustrated, particularly the guys who worked across the hall from me who did provincial reporting. They were responsible for various provinces of the country, divided by corps, by the four military corps, and they did go to their corps a lot and they did do reporting on what was happening in the field. They came back telling one story, and they could never get it past the political minister-counselor, or maybe it could get that far and it would never get out of the front office. They were, to a man, very frustrated. I should mention that they were all men. In this group of 23, there were two women when I came; and when I left, I was the only woman. We didn't have a lot of women in Saigon anywhere. There were a few women in the Consular Section, a few women in the Economic Section, almost none in the Political Section. From that comes a story of how those of us who were women were resented. Specifically those of us who were in political or economic work were resented. The old embassy had been down on the Saigon River when Henry Cabot Lodge was ambassador. There had been, as there often was, a bomb attempt. A bomb had been thrown at the old embassy, and some people were injured. I believe several were killed. This would have been in the mid-'60s. Apparently there had been some snafus at that point about how it was reported and what happened. Ambassador Lodge said to somebody in the embassy, "From now on I only want men who are political and economic officers to be the duty officer, because Mr. X loused it up somehow." That word was apparently chiseled into stone. Of course, Henry Cabot Lodge had no women in the political or economic sections, so when he said "men in the political or economic section," he just meant people, we thought. For the period that I was there, no woman could be a duty officer. Well, being a duty officer in Saigon was unlike being a duty officer in most places. You lived at the embassy, you slept next to the communications unit, you were on the front lines for a week. It wasn't that you took your little radio home to answer phone calls in the middle of the night. You were there and you were the operations center for the embassy. By having maybe three or four women in the embassy at that point, it meant that everybody's turn came up four weeks earlier if they were men in either of those two sections. These men with whom we worked didn't like it, and, of course, they had every right not to like it. It was unfair to them, and we thought, we women, it was unfair to us. We wanted to actually be the duty officer. If we were going to be the officer, let us do it. Our front office in that period, '69 to '71, would not change the regulation. They didn't want any women in harm's way, I suppose. So we were not allowed to do it, and it was a constant thorn in the side. When anybody got a little annoyed about something, it was always something to be thrown at any of the four women.

Q: When you say there was a split, what was coming in from the provinces that wasn't going out?

HECK: Well, first of all, that our troops weren't doing as well as perhaps they were being reported to be doing. There was the infamous body county, about which, I'm sure, others have reported, but the military and USIA - we had a press czar, as it were, a USIA senior officer - ran something called the Four O'clock Follies, or the Five O'clock Follies. In any case, it was a daily press briefing, and there were always these very neat little statistics, that we had killed X number in this little skirmish here or there, or this many were killed on the Ho Chi Minh Trail in such and such a province, or whatever, but there were always statistics which were dubious at best and didn't necessarily mean that anyone had actually seen a body. A lot of it was sort of by guess and by gosh and extrapolation and inference and so on. Our men would come back from provincial reporting and say, "This place where we were supposed to have killed 18, it didn't happen, man, it didn't happen that way." Or they would come back and say that the district chief, who would be a mid-ranking military officer in the Vietnamese army, was very corrupt and that he was doing X and Y and selling X and Y in terms of weapons and shaking people down and so on. Some of them were excellent officers. Others of them were corrupt, but the story we were putting out in those days was that they were all excellent officers, they were all terribly patriotic men who were fighting for democracy and the American way in Vietnam. The awful truth of it was that by 1969 there had been fighting in Vietnam for almost 30 years, first against the Japanese and then the French and then the war that started after 1954's settlement of the division of the country temporarily. I think what most of us finally saw is that Vietnam was a very complicated place and that there were a lot of people in Vietnam whose loyalty truly was only to his extended family. After that many years of fighting, any of us, I think, would be very cynical about what we were doing, and our major interest in life would be protecting those we love and care about. Some of this other twaddle that we were putting out was very simplistic and just didn't hit the mark at all. So this is the sort of stuff that our younger officers would come back with, and of course it wasn't right, because we had this story which was still one of optimism and we were always just about to break the back of the enemy and we were just about to have another breakthrough and so on and so on and so on. It got very nasty, and basically there was a great deal of telling junior officers to shut up. There was no real dissent channel of the kind we had later on. You couldn't do too much other than complain, and I think that many of the seniors felt that some of these junior people were then spewing it all forth to American press, who were more than happy to pick up some of these stories and play it back to the United States. So it was an unhappy sort of a place in terms of trust and camaraderie amongst different parts of the same mission.

Q: Was there any effort within the political and upper reaches of the embassy to get together from time to time with provincial reporting officers or others, to talk to the ambassador, to the deputy ambassador or to the chief of the Political Section?

HECK: Well, certainly in the Political Section we had staff meetings and things like that, so, yes, there was an opportunity to do that. I do not remember any efforts made to do that with the front office. It may have been there. I just didn't know about it.

Q: Front office means the ambassador?

HECK: The ambassador and the so-called deputy ambassador, who at that point was Ambassador Samuel Berger, who had been ambassador to Korea, a very important job. The reason for having what we would normally call the deputy chief of mission as an ambassador, and using his title with abandon was that it had been determined, I suppose in Washington, although maybe in Saigon, that the U.S. military wouldn't listen to anybody who didn't have the title of ambassador. So, it was decided that our embassy would be headed by two ambassadors, both of them using the title, so that they could have more weight with the military leadership. That had been General Westmoreland and then it became General Abrams just after I got there.

Q: Did you find that in a way the spirit of the military - I'm talking about the American military - was permeating the embassy? There's usually more of a free flow in an embassy, but it sounds as though it was mostly the junior officers or mid-career officers. You don't talk up and all. Would you say we had absorbed a military structure within the embassy?

HECK: I think we had to a certain extent, certainly after Tet. One of the more stupid, if I may say so, decisions about how to man the embassy came into play in terms of absorbing the military culture. In the Tet offensive in March of 1968, in the aftermath of that, the military - I believe it was General Westmoreland - determined that it was unfair that the boys in the foxholes, the men out in the field, the guys in the fire bases, had no regular working hours. They just had to be out there for a certain period of time, and they had to do whatever had to be done, whereas the men in military headquarters had fixed hours. So a decision was made at that point to expand the fixed hours and to cut out any days off. The military then after Tet went on to the seven-day-a-week, 52-weeks-a-year routine and, I believe, had very long hours. Certainly then the State Department picked up on this, or at least the civilians, so by the time I got there the official embassy hours were seven a.m. to seven p.m. or seven-thirty a.m. to seven-thirty p.m., whatever it was. A 12-hour day was our official day. We, of course, had a curfew, so it didn't leave a heck of a lot of time at the end of the day for anything. The first year I was there, we had no days off. We worked seven days a week, we worked Thanksgiving, we worked Christmas, we worked New Years, we worked the Fourth of July, we just went to work seven days a week. This was offset, of course, by frequent trips out of country, either rest and rehabilitation provided by the State Department or trips on military R&R flights where they would give a few seats to the civilians too so that we did get some respite from all this, but officially we were working 365 days a year. The second year I was there, we were allowed Christmas and Thanksgiving off, I believe. Of course, you don't get your best out of people who are having to do work with their brains on that sort of a schedule. It's just one more of the things that seemed sort of senseless, because certainly we had the personnel to cover the place seven days a week. We could have allowed people to have a day off occasionally, but it just didn't happen that way. There was obviously, although I was certainly not privy to it, a great deal of tugging between the civilian leadership and the military leadership in Vietnam. Now that is, of course, a problem that sometimes comes up no matter where an ambassador may be posted, if he has, in fact, combat troops in his area or if in fact he has a significant military establishment, American military establishment, in that area. Relations between the civilian and the military are not necessarily a bed of roses in those situations.

I do remember, for instance - and this is just something I thought about a minute ago that I wanted to mention - the idea of whether or not our front office understood what was going on amongst the people. They had, of course, very important problems to deal with, and I am not trying to second guess them, but just one story that illustrates this. The major military PX was located in the Chinese area called Cho Lon some distance from the embassy. We at the embassy would occasionally go out there to buy our food and other items that we needed. It was also, by the way, open to allies, so you would see at this place soldiers from some of our allied countries in Asia going first to the area to buy the suitcase and then going to the cosmetic counters to buy a suitcase full of cosmetics to ship back to their native places.

Q: They would be marched in. I saw Thai soldiers. I'm told the Koreans didn't do this, because that was all arranged for them. They were given packs when they left.

HECK: Well, the Thais certainly did it, and they would pick up their suitcase first and then go to the cosmetics or to the electronics, whatever we had, and buy it out. In any case, on that long drive, we would normally pass the central food market which was near the old opera house that had become the parliament. Then there would be this half-hour drive out to the place, particularly around the central food market, where our people would go to get vegetables and fresh meat and things like that. There was a long line of grandmotherly women squatting on the pavement usually with a little box in front of them. On that box would be something like a Sears catalog. Very often it was the Sears catalog. Anybody could stop there and they could pick out what they wanted to order, and those women would deliver it to them. They had a fixed time, like three weeks, and within three weeks that item from the American Sears catalog would be delivered to whichever Vietnamese wanted it. I remember telling this to my so-called deputy ambassador, Ambassador Berger, and he refused to believe it, as he never had to drive by the food market. He never saw the catalogs and he didn't realize the amount of American goods which were coming in surreptitiously into the country. He wasn't thinking about things like that. Of course, that's part of the corruption that weakened the society and became a bone of contention in the United States later. So it's all intermingled. Obviously there were Americans involved in forwarding those orders through some sort of APO, and I'm sure that great money was made. I know of people who lost their jobs for having dealt in diamonds as government officials, civilian officials. Shortly before I left - well, first of all, I should say that the major drink of choice among many men in Vietnam was cognac or brandy, and that it was drunk in large amounts. Particularly, I think, among the Chinese Vietnamese but also throughout Saigon it was a major drink. The river port that our things came into was a place called Newport on the Saigon River not far from Saigon City, and shortly before I left, an entire truck of Hennessy was diverted from a convoy moving from Newport to Cho Lon to the commissary. Now, this convoy had MPs on every truck, and it had an MP leading the herd, and a truck disappeared. Well, obviously the MPs, some MP at least, was involved in this, and a truckload of Hennessy would be worth a great amount of money. It wasn't just a civilian American who was involved in this; there had to be military also involved in it. There was a great deal of that, and our front office wouldn't see it. I also remember, by the way, gift wrapping a leg of lamb once for President Mun Van Tie from my ambassador, who had ordered from the commissary a frozen leg of lamb to give the President of Vietnam. I remember gift wrapping it, which seemed to me a strange thing for me to be doing as a political officer, but then there you are.

Q: What was your impression, albeit from a distance, of Ambassador Bunker?

HECK: A man of great integrity, great dignity. I adored him. He didn't want to be there, but he was just too patriotic a man to not be there. I'm sorry that that was his last appointment with the U.S. government, because I think he deserved better. I think that the snakepit that was Vietnam at that time tended to tarnish all of the people who were there, certainly all of the seniors who were there. But I had great respect for him, as I did, for that matter, for the deputy ambassador, Sam Berger. Personally I found them both very impressive men, and I kept in touch with Ambassador Bunker afterwards, particularly because I had worked for his wife, Ambassador Carol Laise, and she was a friend. The last time I saw him was I was his control officer in New Delhi in '85 just a few months before he died. I thought very highly of him, but I'm not sure that he's the person who should have been there. For one thing, he was not mean enough and tough enough perhaps in the sense of what we perhaps needed in order to make the civilian side of the equation more a part of the play on the ground in Vietnam. I don't know. I think I was in too low a position to actually make a judgment on that.

Q: You had at least two officers of the Political Section - what would they be, political counselors? - Martin Hertz and then Galen Stone?

HECK: No, Martin Hertz was the minister counselor. Galen Stone and Lauren Askew were the two counselors whom I had at the time. Both Galen Stone and Lauren Askew were very senior men at the top of the pecking order of the Foreign Service, and there they were reporting to three people above them. It was an extraordinary experience.

Q: Did you have any feeling about how they were dealing with things, because at a certain level if you've got all these young junior officers reporting up and then they in turn are reporting up? It sounds like it was sort of an incestuous operation.

HECK: The hierarchy was ridiculously complicated, and also most of the men in the senior positions had no Asian experience as far as I know. The Asianists, such as they were, were at the next level down as heads of the section. My head of the political internal unit, which is where I fit into this thing - I had two heads of the political internal unit, and they were both Asianists and had a better feel for the complications of the society and the personalities involved perhaps than people further up the line. But I have a feeling that form got in the way so much that substance was secondary all the time. When you have to think of jobs that really matter, for instance, for 23 political officers, you're really down there into the form rather than substance category.

Q: Isn't there a problem when you get too many people that almost too much information is out there and you have people who are too busy with almost the administration of the thing?

HECK: Absolutely. I'm sure that nothing that I did was ever looked at by anyone in Washington other than the very junior-most of people, and I suspect that's probably true up the line. The fifth section in the Political Section, which I did not mention, was the Labor Division. I don't know that anyone in Washington really cared about labor in Vietnam. It was just tertiary to the problem. And political military - what does that mean in a country where every male over the age of 15 seems to be in a uniform, and so on and so on. I'm sure we could have slashed the whole section by 50 percent and things would have been better.

Q: Did you have any feel with the reporting? Granted, this was a place that sometimes the junior reporting officers were able to get their feelings out, their experiences out to the world, but did you also have a feeling about the press, about what was driving them? Was it an adversarial situation by this time or not?

HECK: The press was full of very bright young men who went on to greater things later. I'm thinking, for instance, of Bob Kaiser from the Washington Post, men like that. I think, without having asked anybody about this, I think they saw themselves as the protectors of American honesty, that somehow they had to let people know back in the United States what was really happening. In many ways they didn't know any more than any of the rest of us, but they certainly did see an awful lot of very awful things in their travels around Vietnam which were not a part of the Five O'clock Follies, and they made sure that that got out, and I think for that they did something that was probably very important. The whole issue of the Vietnam War, I guess, was sort of a loss of innocence for a lot of us. Suddenly we weren't the good guys. We had been the good guys in World War II, and we most definitely saw ourselves as being the good guys in the Korean War against those awful North Koreans and so on, and the Chinese Communist threat rolling over with real Chinese coming down off of the Yaloo River. But it wasn't so easily understood, it wasn't so black and white in Vietnam. Yes, there was a lot of corruption on our side. There were rights and wrongs on both sides. I don't think we were used at that point to dealing with the fact that maybe we weren't always the white hats in situations like this or that we might be thrown into something where we would be forced to do something against perhaps our own heritage. Then, of course, there was this added fillip of the problems in the military itself. I mean, this was the time when enlisted men were so-called fragging their superiors by throwing grenades into closed areas where a superior might be. There was a great deal of social ferment in the military as well as in the civilian world - what did we say - back in the world, back in the United States. So it was an ugly time. I think for me personally, a lot of what I came out of Vietnam with is personal and not having to do with job, but it was a very strange thing to be a young, single woman in Vietnam, an American woman I mean, when there weren't many young, single, American women in Vietnam. Of course, there were nurses and so on, but there surely weren't very many in total, and we were in a very strange situation. I have a lot of sort of almost half-guess remembrances about the strangeness of life there that will stick with me till the end of my days. It was a place which was unhappy, aside from the war, just the civilian life there in Saigon was a very, very weird situation.

Q: Did you find that there was sort of a junior officer mafia that would sit around and...

HECK: Oh, absolutely. And, of course, we had been told collectively, perhaps not each of us singly, but it was a widely used line in Washington that our careers would jump forth from here on because we had served our country by going to Vietnam. Well, of course, this didn't happen, as we all know now, but this was a line that Personnel tended to be feeding us, that you'd get the next assignment that you wanted, you'd get promotions faster than others, you were all going to be ambassadors. Anyway, there was a great deal of sitting around with junior officers at parties and even in the office and griping, and it was very much an us-versus-them, us the junior officers versus the rest of the contingent out there. It tended to make us join in groups against the sort of vague senior enemy out in the hierarchy there.

Q: Looking back on it, did you feel that this gap between the senior officers and the junior officers might have also had something that I think I noticed? When you get to being older and all, you've sort of seen it all and you realize that the world isn't a very perfect place. There is, you might say, more tolerance for corruption, for things not working as well and all. One of my problems as a supervisor has always been to get young officers to accept the fact they're going to be lied to and not to take it too personally.

HECK: I think what you're saying is right, and I think a lot of what we had in Vietnam was just a reflection of what was happening in our society, which was in ferment back in the United States, and it didn't all have to do with the Vietnam War.

Q: This was really the '60s hitting it.

HECK: That's right. This was the time of pavement stones being thrown in the streets in Paris and so on. All over the Western world there was ferment among social groups, the young people against the rest sort of thing, and Vietnam was only one part of that. That's very true. It was an unhappy time, I think, in general for us as a country.

Q: At that time - because we're trying to go to the time and not how we saw it later on - did you see South Vietnam as being a viable place, and maybe with your other people, and what was sort of the prediction of...

HECK: My prediction, for what it's worth: One of the things that got on my plate was sort of once a month lecturing to newly arrived people in Saigon, which meant largely people working for USAID and military officers, middle grade and below, who were going to be working in headquarters, at Totsena, Binmore, places like that, but doing jobs which were not going to be in the field. So once a month or so I would go out and I would give the political briefing to this group which usually was 20 to 40 people, almost all men. I do know that the line that I was using in that period, '70 and '71 - I didn't start this until the end '69 - was basically that what we had done for Vietnam was to give them some time, but they were going to have to do it on their own. My personal opinion was that it wouldn't last five years, and in fact it didn't last five years. We pulled out. We basically were out of there by '72, and, of course, Vietnam fell in April of '75. I didn't want to be right, but I was right, and it didn't last very long after large numbers of American fighting troops left the area.

Q: What was your impression of the American military officers you would be seeing? I assume they would be around the captain/major level and all. I mean on a social scene or in business and all, what were you getting from them, your impression of them?

HECK: I think perhaps the group that I dealt with most closely came out of Tan Son Nhut from the intelligence side of things, and we - we meaning a number of my friends and I working in the Political Section - spent a lot of time with these. They were basically captains, a few lieutenants. They were very cynical themselves. The best of them were very cynical. They were great fun, but they were cynical. So even in the military there were divisions and fissures. One of them went on to become a political appointee in the State Department during the Republican years. That was Chuck Misener, who then died with Ron Brown in Dubrovnik, near Dubrovnik in the former Yugoslavia in the mid-'90s/early '90s, as an official, high-ranking official, of the Department of Commerce. I remember that he particularly was - he and his buddy who was a relative of a Foreign Service officer with whom I had worked - they were very, very cynical, every bit as much as our provincial reporters who were telling it like it was. I'm sure that permeated the military in headquarters offices.

Q: Just looking back, did those who had served in Vietnam, in your experience later in the Foreign Service, did that create a bond or something that was different than maybe other postings or not, or do you have any feel for that?

HECK: I think a lot of people who were in Vietnam remained close to each other, at least more close than most. You had been through a great deal when you had been through Vietnam together. Aside from the fighting, I mean just the weird world that we lived in as government officials, civilian government officials, was enough to keep us bonded through the next 30 years, and, yes, we see each other even today, some of us. Of course, people's careers have gone their own ways, but it's something that we will always look back upon and can share. A number of us, I think, do not talk a great deal about Vietnam except among people who have been there, and obviously this is a pool of people who had been there and know what you mean when you say a certain thing or refer to a certain incident. It was a very strange place, you will have to agree.

Q: We both share that experience. What was the feeling towards President Nixon?

HECK: Well, I don't think he was particularly trusted by those of us who were over there - as a group, I mean. There was a good deal of resentment about his various orders to bomb inside of Cambodia, which brought the Cambodians into the war full time, the various machinations around stopping bombing on certain holidays in the North and then starting it up again, but that may have reflected the society as a whole. I don't think that President Nixon's strength lay among people under the age of 40, even back in, as we called it, the world, and certainly out in Vietnam there was a good deal of cynicism, but more so about his minions, because they were the ones who then had to make the various policy announcements. I would say that this was also true of how people felt about Johnson when he was the President and about his people. You remember the way that poor Robert MacNamara was looked at by certainly people of my level in the State Department. No, it was a time when one didn't trust necessarily one's own government in large part, and we, like all the others in the country, I guess, we were being buffeted about by the same winds. It's an experience that I was not unhappy to leave. In Vietnam we would say, "So many days and a wake-up," and I think the civilians counted that as much as anybody else. You're going to leave in two months, so it's sixty days and a wake-up, and on that wake-up morning you're out of there, and the civilians were every bit as eager to get that way as, I think, the average grunt or the average headquarters officer.

Q: What was your impression, and maybe of your colleagues in the Political Section, of the work of the CIA?

HECK: Well, it was a pretty shadowy organization in Vietnam in that I didn't have a lot of interaction, other than social with some of the junior officers amongst them, but the head of the CIA was something of a pro-consul, and that was kind of frightening. I had one run-in with one of the heads of the CIA - because I think there were two during my time. First of all, the Political Section had asked me to become friendly with a leftist woman lawyer in Saigon who was suspected of being a conduit to the Viet Min and by extension to North Vietnam. I did this, and I saw quite a bit of her for six months or so, and then I was told to drop it, that I was to not see her again. So, being a good soldier and so on, I dropped it and I did not see her again. Well, one Saturday afternoon quite late in the day, I was called up to the sixth floor and into the lair of the gentleman who was the chief of station and the pro-consul.

Q: The sixth floor was the CIA floor?

HECK: The sixth floor was the CIA floor, and this particular gentleman in effect accused me of not following orders and seeing this woman, and reported to me that I had been seen - and more importantly, my car, which was quite unusual, it was a Chevrolet whatever they were called, a jazzy little sports car...

Q: Camaro or something?

HECK: Chevrolet Camaro, and there weren't a lot of them in Saigon. My car and I had been seen at a funeral at Binwon north of Saigon in the company of this lady, and he really raked me over the coals. Well, first of all, I had never seen the woman again. I hadn't spent my Saturday at a funeral, but more to the point, I didn't work for this man, I didn't report to this man, and he had no right shaking me down like that. In effect, it was sort of an interrogation, and it went on for what seemed to me to be a very long time. I'm sure it wasn't, but it really shattered me. Now, what I should have told him to do was go take a big jump off of a pier somewhere and to leave me alone, and I should have reported it to my own hierarchy, and I didn't. I just crept home and was afraid of this man and his organization, which was a stupid thing to do because, of course, he had no right to deal with me that way. But there was a good deal of that sort of thing, of the CIA being an organization unto itself in Vietnam. Now whether they did a good job or not in the field, I don't know. I have visited friends who were CIA and in charge of their organization for certain parts of Vietnam. A man I had worked with in Bombay was down in the far part of the South, and I had spent some time visiting him once. So I look at it in something of a patchwork, but I think that it was just one more of the problems that we had in Vietnam of the dichotomy of the divisions between the civilian leadership and the separate little fiefdoms which ran on their own, and I certainly put the CIA in one of those as a very important fiefdom.

Q: Oh, boy! You were there - we were both there - during a time when somebody really kicked over the milk bucket in the United States, and that was in May of '70 when the United States went into Cambodia for a bit. What was the reaction, your personal reaction and maybe the younger people around you at that time?

HECK: I think there was a great groundswell of feeling that this was a stupid move on our part, that it wasn't going to destroy the fact that the enemy, the Vietnamese, whether it be the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese troops per se, could still get refuge in that part of the world inside the borders of Cambodia. The sad part of it was that the government of Cambodia couldn't control the movement of the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese troops through its own region. It didn't make any difference in the long term, therefore. It didn't stop anything. If these was indeed a Viet Cong headquarters in the Perinspeke or elsewhere inside of Cambodia, we never found it. All the talk about the caches of arms and so on was that, just talk, efforts to make it look like we had actually gone in and succeeded in stopping something when we didn't. What I saw, and I think what a lot of people saw, was that we really ruined the country, because we dragged into the war Cambodia, which had, no matter how tenuously, been able to stay out of the war until that point. Prince Sihanouk was and is and remains a very slippery, crafty, Machiavellian politician, and we had a lot of reasons for not liking what he was doing, but he did in fact keep his country out of this. In the aftermath of our going in, we dragged the country in. He departed. Lon Nol came in. I remember being over in Phnom Penh shortly after this happened and after our attacks in 1970 - I think it was in April of '70, but whatever, when we went in - and watching what looked like college boys in trucks going to the front. This is, of course, not the first time in the world that this has happened, but here are these kids with no real idea what they were getting into "going to the front in the back of an open-bedded truck" with no particular preparation. The things that happened to Cambodia in the years that followed up to '79 all go back to that day ten years earlier, and I think that we bear a great responsibility for what ultimately became the killing fields and then became the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia, which actually brought some calm to the area, and we are, therefore, somewhat responsible for the rather tenuous position that the country finds itself in today. So I think we have a little bit on our shoulders there to bear.

WILLIAM A. ROOT
Transportation/Communications Officer
Saigon (1969-1971)

William Root was born in Massachusetts in 1923 and educated at Colorado College and Columbia University. His career included posts in Bonn, Copenhagen, Saigon and West Berlin. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Well then in '69 you left for the first time. Where did you go?

ROOT: At that time I went to Vietnam.

Q: What were you doing?

ROOT: I was with a joint State-AID outfit in Saigon dealing with transportation and communications infrastructure, most of which was developed by the U.S. military.

Q: You were there from '69 to when?

ROOT: '71.

Q: '71. We overlapped a bit then. I was consul general in the embassy '69 to '70. How did you find the AID structure and all? What was your impression of it in Vietnam?

ROOT: Well it was very artificial structure. We were pretending we were really in control, and it turned out we weren't. The usual political machinations showed up in things like rice. We wanted to sell them rice, although they had their own production capability. I wasn't concerned with that. I was, as I say, in the transportation and communication side. There it was a reasonably constructive role we were expected to play. The objective was to help the Vietnamese understand what they could reasonably maintain after we left. It would have taken their entire national budget just to maintain some of the roads we built. Roads and communications equipment were not easy to maintain. In that sense I think we made considerable progress, although it turned out, of course, that we were talking to the wrong people.

Q: What was your impression of the people you dealt with in Vietnam?

ROOT: Well, Vietnamese officials were more competent in their fields than I had expected. Naturally, they had their own interests to look out for, including at times some disturbing personal interests.

Q: We are talking about say corruption?

ROOT: Yes. Selling telephones.

Q: At the time you were there, how were you looking upon the war in Vietnam?

ROOT: Well it disturbed me. There were all kinds of protests going on back here, including those in which my own children participated. That was not so unusual. I discovered that virtually everybody I dealt with on the U.S. side in Vietnam was as disturbed as I was. We didn't seem to quite know what we were doing or what was feasible and what wasn't. Finally the incursion into Cambodia took place.

Q: This was in the spring of '70.

ROOT: Yes. I was so disturbed that the next morning when we had our usual staff meeting, and we were still talking about rice and balance or payments, I piped up and said, "I don't know about the rest of you, but it seems that maybe we ought to have some discussion about what happened yesterday." One of my colleagues said, "There goes Root with his Nuremberg defense," which wasn't exactly my idea. Eventually I did write a dissent about what we were up to in Vietnam, and I was amazed when I got back to Washington to learn that I was the only one in Vietnam who wrote such a memo. I was amazed because the vast majority of people I talked with every day felt the same way I did.

Q: In essence what was your dissent based on?

ROOT: Well of course it couldn't be based on a thorough knowledge of everything going on, because I didn't have that knowledge. But I did feel that I knew enough to at least indicate my concern. It was quite a fascinating experience. There were two options. One could either send it directly to Washington without stopping anywhere in between, or you could go through channels. I opted to go through channels, because I didn't particularly want to keep it secret. I wanted to see how it would play. There was one chap in the political section who told me that I just didn't know what was going on. Well I didn't pretend to know everything that was going on, but I didn't think they knew either.

Q: Did you get out in the field?

ROOT: Most of my work had to do with interacting with the central government people in these technical areas and with the U.S. military.

Q: You were part of the AID organization?

ROOT: It was a joint State-AID economic office.

Q: Did you have a feeling we were throwing money at a problem?

ROOT: Yes. One of the aspects that really disturbed me was a proposal to build a new airport for civil aviation use. It struck me that there were already so many airports for military use that it boggled the mind to think that the Vietnamese would need even more after we left. But the engineers could, of course, make an engineering case that it would be nice to get this or that. I kept making negative comments. This was not entirely appreciated. When it came time for my efficiency rating to be prepared, the boss said that I was stubborn. I said, "Would you mind changing that to persistent?" He said, "I'll change it to persistent, but you are stubborn." I thought that I should be stubborn on something like that.

Q: Oh, absolutely. When you left in '71, what was your personal prognosis of where things were going?

ROOT: It was pretty clear by then we were not going to prevail. It was just a matter of time.

INTS M. SILINS
Vietnamese Language Training
Washington, DC (1969-1970)

District Senior Advisor
Duc Thanh District, Mekong Delta (1970)

Aide to Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker
Saigon (1970-1973)

Ambassador Silins was born in Latvia and raised in Latvia and Maryland. He was educated at Princeton and Harvard Universities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1969 and served abroad in Saigon, Duc Thanh (Vietnam), Bucharest, Stockholm, Port au Prince, Leningrad and Strasbourg. In 1990 he was appointed United States Representative to the Baltic States, resident in Riga, Latvia, and from 1992 to 1995, he served as United States Ambassador to Latvia. He also had several tours of duty at the Department of State in Washington, D.C. Ambassador Silins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: So, from sort of '69- '70, you were taking Vietnamese, is that it?

SILINS: Right. Taking Vietnamese and being trained to be a district advisor in the so-called pacification program.

Q: Can you talk a bit about the training of people there and the outlook at that point towards Vietnam?

SILINS: Well, I've called this the most painful period of my life, painful not in a profound sense but in the sense that it was boring and restrictive. The way that Vietnamese was taught there was boring to me because of the narrow range of the vocabulary and the expressions they focused on. It was designed primarily for military people – most of the men doing the job I was headed for were young captains and majors – so it had a lot of military lingo, you know, not the kind of things that I was interested in saying, actually.

My own views on Vietnam were very mixed at the time. I felt that we had made a big mistake in getting in. At the same time I felt that in some sense we were on the right side, which I still feel today, but of course not that we should have killed so many people trying to support that side. I agreed to go in part because by then it was already clear that we were pulling out. I mean, we'd started to withdraw well before '69. So I was torn. I was willing to go because it was something that my country, the U.S., was doing and I was willing to do my part in it, but I didn't feel it was a good thing to have gotten into. At the same time I wasn't all that impressed with the anti-war movement. So it was a very uncomfortable period. A boring training program, these mixed, divided feelings, mixed emotions and waiting and waiting until the training would end and I could finally leave for Vietnam. It was a difficult time.

Q: Well, this was a relatively quiet period, I guess, wasn't it?

SILINS: Depends on where you were. It wasn't all that quiet. Just before I left Washington, the night I was driving my airfreight to Andrews Air Force base, the radio started broadcasting news about U.S. bombing of Cambodia. That was an expansion of the military conflict and made my mother, who had lost my father in another war, very nervous.

Like everyone else, the first thing I remember after landing at Saigon's Tan Son Nhat Airport was a blast of tropical heat and the shriek of jet engines. I have fragmented memories of my first disoriented days in Saigon. Being knocked off my feet, unhurt, by a car while walking along a sidewalk, the Vietnamese occupants jumping out, smiling and laughing, not out of amusement but acute embarrassment and apology. A Vietnamese woman invading my room in the middle of the night in a fleabag hotel, just looking, it turned out, for a place to sleep until morning. Another fleabag hotel where I awoke with large cockroaches nibbling on my eyebrows. And so forth. Welcome to Vietnam. The fleabag hotels, by the way, were not places of my own choosing but where I was assigned to stay by my employer, the CORDS program.

Q: Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support.

SILINS: Right. Our Saigon processing-in included a pep talk from the famous John Paul Vann, then the golden boy of the pacification program. He was later dissected in Neil Sheehan's A Bright Shining Lie. CORDS then sent us off on an orientation trip to various districts and provinces in different parts of South Vietnam. In one of them we came under mortar attack, a reminder, if we needed one, there was still a war on. And I was issued a Colt 45, which I carried for a few months. But then, I have to say luckily, I was assigned to a very peaceful model district, where I replaced Ken Quinn as District Senior Advisor. And there I formed at first a rather distorted view of the war and its prospects. It was in Sa Dec Province in the Mekong Delta, flat as a board, between the Bassac and Mekong Rivers, not more than a few meters above water level at any time, a good deal of it underwater in the rainy season.

The district was called Duc Thanh District. It was controlled by the Hoa Hao, a Buddhist sect that was very anti-Viet Cong, so they kept most of the war at bay. It was prosperous, with rich soil, rice agriculture and some other crops, animal husbandry, handicrafts and light manufacturing. What I was doing there was basically AID and Peace Corps-type work. I was the head of a small team reporting to the province senior advisor, Bob Traister. His deputy, who wrote my efficiency report, was an Army lieutenant colonel. I had a Filipino agricultural advisor who was spreading the green revolution. You remember IR8, one of the new rice varieties that were supposed to revolutionize the world's food supply? My villagers were skeptical and didn't care all that much for the taste. And we were building roads and bridges and schools and little dispensaries, medical treatment centers, and so forth.

Much of our travel was by boat, a Boston Whaler with a temperamental motor. I also had an International Scout, the SUV of the time, which I eventually traded for a real Army jeep. With my counterpart, the Vietnamese District Chief, I made regular visits to the villages and hamlets to inquire into their problems, needs and wishes. All too often an inescapable part of such official visits was heavy drinking, usually warm brandy and soda in very large glasses, and occasionally exotic foods such as seven-day-old duck eggs and field mice. We had a fairly comfortable compound with a generator but showered in canal water from a rooftop tank settled out with alum. I also had a small military training team consisting of a lieutenant named Al Heckman, a sergeant, and about four enlisted men whose job was to strengthen the local self-defense forces as part of the Vietnamization policy. Except for a little nibbling around the edges of the district, there was no Viet Cong activity, no war. We had neither U.S. nor Vietnamese regular forces operating in our territory. That was fortunate for all concerned but it encouraged an overly rosy picture of what was really happening in Vietnam.

The most violent military activity in my district, I regret to say, came when a U.S. helicopter, its crew having blown an emotional fuse as a result of combat trauma, flew over Duc Thanh and sprayed some villages at random with machine gun fire. Luckily, they hit only houses, not people. An Army team came to investigate and offer compensation. They brought along a beautiful Vietnamese girl, Phuong, as an interpreter. She was wearing a flowing snow-white ao dai and delicate shoes, so I carried her over the muddy stretches and narrow bamboo bridges as we went from hamlet to hamlet. She was light as a cloud.

Another close call with friendly fire came when Secretary of the Army Stan Resor came on a visit to our model district. Luckily I was monitoring the military radio as our motorcade approached the village where Resor was to meet with a unit of the local forces we had been training. One of the helicopter gunships escorting him reported “suspected hostiles wearing black pajamas” near the meeting point and requested permission to fire on them. I broke in and stopped them. The guys in black were the self-defense forces the Secretary had come to see.

Q: Oh yes, yes - the aide, which is a very good job, but it was done with a certain amount of propriety and all that. Walt Cutler was one, and others had gone through that.

SILINS: It was a wonderful opportunity for me. So I got to see the war from the rice shoots level and also from the top.

But to continue with your previous question, my impression of the Vietnamese government.... When Ambassador Bunker went on one of his consultation trips to the U.S. and expected to be away for some time, this was after I'd been working for him for about a year, with his permission and authority I took my own little research trip in Vietnam. I visited parts of the country that I hadn't seen before, especially farther north, in Military Regions I and II. I talked to district advisors in depth, saw what the situation was like and got their candid assessments of how representatives of the Vietnamese government were performing. Having been one, I knew what to ask them. I wrote a short report for the ambassador concluding that our policy just wasn't going to work, that the political structure we were trying to build simply would not hold together unless the Vietnamese government made some basic changes. It was clear to me that aside from oases of security like Duc Thanh, things were not going well at all, as we now know.

Q: What was the problem?

SILINS: Well, there were several. Corruption, insufficient motivation. Lack of trust in the Thieu regime and its representatives. Resentment of the foreign military presence. A growing conviction that U.S. forces would be worn down as the French had been before them. A basic problem was that Vietnamese government officials were seen as, and perceived themselves as being, puppets of a foreign power, which was a fatal problem in Vietnam over the long run. We could not impose a solution from the outside, because the attempt to do that, for people as intensely patriotic, really, and xenophobic to some extent, as the Vietnamese are, would cause the government agents that worked for us to be seen as puppets of a foreign power. That was a fatal flaw, such a program could not win lasting popular support.

As I recall, my report sat on Ambassador Bunker's desk for the space of a week or so, then he returned it to me. I don't recall that he made any comment on it. It was not, of course, the only negative assessment of U.S. prospects in Vietnam that he read, as I know very well since I selected much of his daily reading and put the papers on his desk every day.

Q: What was your impression of Ambassador Bunker?

SILINS: He had the most impressive presence of any diplomat that I have worked with. Of course, he was the first one of world class that I worked with closely when I was still in my impressionable youth, but he was exceptional. He had great power of recall. He could recognize Marines that had served for him when he was ambassador to India when they came through Vietnam and wound up on his security guard. So, a superb memory. When I started working for him he was already 75, 76, something like that, but with plenty of energy. He worked six-and-a-half days a week without fail, long hours.

The most impressive thing about Bunker was something that to this day I can't really explain, and that was an ability to get people to do things without overtly asking or telling them what he wanted them to do. That is the true genius of leadership, when you can get people to imagine for themselves what it is you want them to do and do it accurately... that's just something extraordinary, I don't know how he did that. He did it with me as his aide, but he could also do it with the very senior Americans that formed the Mission Council. I saw him in action because I had the privilege of sitting in on Mission Council meetings for almost two years, but to this day I am not sure how he was able to lead in that indirect way.

Perhaps I should mention here the "honeymoon flights." These were the shuttle flights between Saigon and Katmandu that were a unique feature of Bunker's tenure in Saigon. They came about because Bunker's second wife, Carol Laise, was the U.S. ambassador to Nepal. They married in Katmandu in early 1967. President Johnson, when he pressured Bunker into taking on the Vietnam job not long after the wedding, promised that a government plane would be provided for regular, shall we say, conjugal visits. The flights continued into the Nixon administration. So every few months Bunker would fly to Nepal or Carol Laise would come to Saigon. There were always quite a lot of extra seats, so members of both U.S. missions alternated on R & R trips. I went on one of the longer ones, with the additional duty of escorting Bunker's lithe and spirited granddaughter from Brazil. I almost got her killed. I think her name was Patsy.

Q: What happened?

SILINS: I was staying with the Peace Corps doctor in Katmandu, who organized a motorcycle outing. We were coming back from the Tibet border, with the young lady riding on the back of my bike. The road, like almost all roads in Nepal, as you can imagine, was narrow with a vertical wall on one side and a steep drop on the other. A water buffalo was moving along the road ahead of us, placidly trudging along in the same direction as us, hugging the safe side. As we were about to pass, suddenly it lurched into the middle of the road, almost knocking us over the edge. I guess it was startled by the motorcycle's engine noise. With miraculous luck neither of us suffered more than minor scrapes.

I still remember those ten days or so in Nepal very vividly. It's sad to think how much Nepal must have changed by now.

Q: What about the relationship during the '70-'73 period, particularly during your time between Bunker and the media, American media in particular?

SILINS: Yes. I used to talk to the media, newspaper and wire service reporters mostly, quite a lot. I can't say that I told them much they didn't know. I took almost too seriously my responsibility not to leak anything from the ambassador's office. But I liked them because I'd been in a humble way one of them way back when I worked for the Washington Star. They were interesting folks, they're smart and they know what's going on. So I would see reporters like Fox Butterfield of The New York Times or George McArthur of the AP often, but I probably wasn't much professional help to them, I'm afraid. Bunker met regularly with the press, including informal get-togethers, but neither side made much of a dent in the other. Bunker was restrained in expressing negative opinions of the press but I believe now, judging by statements in his own oral history interview, that he regarded a free uncensored press as a serious, potentially fatal, impediment to a democratic society's successful prosecution of a war.

JAMES D. PHILLIPS
Vietnam Inspection Team
Da Nang (1970)

Ambassador Phillips was born in Illinois in 1933. He received his Bachelor's degree from the University of Wichita in 1957 and his Master's in 1958. After serving in the US Army from 1953 to 1955, he entered the Foreign Service in 1961. Postings throughout his career include Paris, Elizabethville, Luxembourg, The Gambia, Copenhagen and Casablanca. Mr. Phillips then became the ambassador to Burundi and Congo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 5, 1998.

PHILLIPS: Well, before I left I had an interesting experience. The Director General of the Foreign Service was a man named John Burns. He was a friend of a friend of mine from Paris named Perry Culley who was in the inspection corps. Burns told Culley he saw a problem in putting together an inspection team for Vietnam. At that time, through a program called CORDS, a number of young Foreign Service officers were stationed in remote areas of Vietnam where they worked with the military to try to win "the hearts and minds" of the Vietnamese people. They would be part of a five or six person team, usually consisting of one FSO and the rest military. These young officers had to be inspected like any other Foreign Service officer in Vietnam. Burns believed they were involved in work so different from traditional Foreign Service jobs that they would not relate well to traditional inspectors, normally older officers at the end of their careers. So the idea was to add two younger officers to the team. I was an FSO 4 at the time. So Burns through Culley got my name and the name of Charlie Higginson, another FSO 4, and they asked us if we would be part of the inspection team. It was a three month assignment. Our responsibility was to inspect all the officers below the grade of FSO 4. We were assured we would have the same authority as any other team member.

Of course I accepted. The assignment lasted from mid-June of 1970 until the beginning of September. The inspection team leader assigned me the Delta and the Da Nang area in the north and Charlie got the central part of the country. We both inspected young officers at the Embassy in Saigon. I interviewed over 50 officers, saw a great deal of the country and met with people like the famous or infamous, depending on ones point of view, heretical ex-military leader John Paul Vann. I met with Ellsworth Bunker several times. It was a remarkable experience.

Q: I was Consul General in Saigon from 1969 to July of 1970 so we may have bumped into each other. I had some junior officers.

PHILLIPS: I remember Lange Schmermerhorn.

Q: I remember Lang. She is now an ambassador to Djibouti.

PHILLIPS: I have kind of followed her career.

Q: Let's talk about you going out into the field. What were you getting from the officers in the Delta?

PHILLIPS: It was varied, as you can imagine. It would depend on the officer, on what he was doing and how he related to the military. I remember one of them named Lacy Wright.

Q: I am interviewing Lacy now.

PHILLIPS: He was performing very well. He was doing things he would never have had a chance to do in a normal assignment. He had enormous responsibility, worked closely with John Paul Vann and was enjoying the job. Like most of these young officers, however, he was concerned about the dark side of Vietnam. He was keenly aware of South Vietnamese corruption and he sensed the futility of U.S. involvement. In other places I inspected, there was bad blood between the Foreign Service officer and his military colleagues. Teams that couldn't get along were worse than useless.

Q: This was about a year and a half after the Tet Offensive and it was as we were beginning a pullback of American troops. What was the picture you were getting at that time about what we were doing in Vietnam?

PHILLIPS: I had access to a lot of places that most non-military people rarely saw. I went by helicopter from Hue to Da Nang, flying low over a good part of the northern sector. Terry McNamara was Consul in Da Nang.

Q: Was Dick Moose there, too?

PHILLIPS: No. Moose wasn't there. I saw a lot of Vietnam even some newspaper reporters wouldn't have seen. I came to believe that the huge U.S. military presence was not effective. And there were social problems. Drug use and prostitution was endemic in Saigon. On the other hand, before I went to Vietnam I had been opposed to U.S. involvement, but when I got there I saw the war in terms of a sort of North Vietnam Sparta against a South Vietnam Athens. The southerners were corrupt and they didn't have the best management skills, but they didn't want to be dominated by the militaristic north. There should have been some way to reconcile the differences short of total domination by the north. I felt sympathy for the southerners. If you remember Saigon you remember the schoolgirls sort of flowing down the streets in their colorful school uniforms. It was somehow beautiful and touching. Saigon functioned fairly well despite the corruption. But it was clear that the Vietnamese would have to work out a solution for themselves. A continuing, massive U.S. presence was simply not viable a option.

Q: Did you see in later years a sort of Vietnam Veterans cadre developing within the Foreign Service?

PHILLIPS: I think a lot of officers had a very hard time after Vietnam adjusting to everyday working conditions. I followed Lacy Wright's career for a while. He went to London and it didn't work. To go from practically running civilian operations in the Delta to a normal embassy job was difficult. I kept in touch with some of the officers I inspected. But I don't think the Vietnam old boys network had much staying power. A larger, more influential network today consists of former Peace Corps volunteers.

PARKER W. BORG
Policy Programs and Plans, CORDS
Saigon (1970)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: So in 1970 whither?

BORG: In 1970 I was, in about October, getting ready to leave my district because we had 18-month tours. I was really interested in seeing the war from the perspective in Saigon, and so I began going down and talking with people about finding a job in Saigon. I was talking with the people in the office of Program Plans and Policy, which was run by Clay McManaway.

Q: Yes, I know Clay.

BORG: I was thinking very seriously about this. Having spent 18 months in the field, I was really interested in seeing what the war looked like from the Saigon perspective. I got a cable that came out telling me that I was going back to Washington in January and I had been selected to be on the Secretariat staff. I didn't have a clue what the Secretariat staff was, having never served in Washington, and I called a friend of mine, someone who was in Washington who was a staff assistant in the East Asia Bureau, and I said, "What is the Secretariat staff?" and he said, "Ah, that is the most fantastic job. You're the first person from the CORDS program that has ever been selected to this. It's a really terrific opportunity. I would give my eye teeth if I could have a job like that." I thought, "Hmmm, what's going on?" but I decided ultimately that I really wanted to see the war from Saigon, and so I told them, no, I didn't want to do this, that I would spend six months in Saigon and then I would come back. A couple months later I got a notice that there was another opening that had come up in July or August and that maybe I would take that one. But even before that I had been notified that I was going to go work in INR on Southeast Asia because I had a lot of friends doing INR Southeast Asia, so that's what I thought I was going to be doing, but then I decided I wanted to stay and see Saigon. So I signed up instead to stay in Saigon for six months.

Q: What were you doing? You were in Saigon in the first half of '71?

BORG: No, it was the first half of '70, December through July 1970. I worked in the planning office of the Policy Programs and Plans, Directorate of CORDS, which was under Bill Colby at the time. Our office wrote the pacification plans. Our big initiative at the time that I was there was to extend the political development, which we had already witnessed in the hamlets and the villages through the elections, to the provincial level and to transfer the ministries' budget authorities from Saigon to the provinces so that the provinces decided where the schools were going to be built and what money would be used for health rather than some bureaucrat in Saigon. I thought this was a worthy goal, and I worked on writing the various papers. This was a completely American initiative. We wrote the papers in our office. I did a lot of the drafting. Then we sold these programs to the Vietnamese, who we felt at first may not have understood exactly what the political implications were of transferring so much authority to the provinces, by having a provincial council and then the provincial council would have a budgetary authority. I don't think they had any taxing authority, but each province would be responsible for its own developments. Since I had very strong views that the Saigon government seemed to be irrelevant, it seemed that the most useful thing we could be doing was to strengthen the feeling of province, and then after that one might work for the national level.

Q: How did you find the people in Saigon, Americans? Were they a different breed of cat?

BORG: Yes, a totally different breed, because few of them had any experience in the countryside. Most of the civilians that I worked with had taken an assignment in Saigon as soon as they got there and maybe gone out as far as the resort village...

Q: Vung Tau.

BORG: ...Vung Tau or had gone out to Tra Vinh and that was the extent of their provincial experiences, or maybe they went up to Buon Ma Thuot for a weekend or something like that. So I found them consistently out of it. The person who turned out to be my best colleague in the office was a guy who had been in Special Operations Command, a military major who had been out working on the Cambodian border killing people. But he at least knew what the countryside was like, and everybody else was writing in a vacuum.

Q: How did this work? Did you find yourself sort of trying to be subversive or...?

BORG: No. There was enough work that gravitated to me to keep me totally occupied, and working with this military major there was nobody who changed the things that we had written, so the things we had written were then translated into Vietnamese and were sent on. My boss was quite pleased with what I was doing.

Q: Where was your office located?

BORG: It was out at MACV headquarters. That's where Colby had his office and various associated directorates. I had almost no contact with anybody in the embassy. I don't know if I ever met anybody in the political section. A CORDS friend of mine eventually ended up there, but he hadn't gone there at the time.

Q: You had this hamlet evaluation, provincial reporters and all this, and you had these programs. You would think there would be some sort of cross-fertilization or something.

BORG: I think it was too large an operation for anybody to cross-fertilize. There was an office, one of the directorates under Colby, that looked at all of the hamlet evaluations and tried to assemble them into a coherent whole. I knew some of the people who worked there, and I thought that was a hopeless bureaucratic exercise to sort through all of this garbage.

Q: To show how big this was, you and I overlapped. I was consul general in Saigon...

BORG: And we never met.

Q: Different worlds.

BORG: That's right. I met a couple of people who worked at the embassy in the consular section, and I knew one person...

Q: Lange Schermerhorn.

BORG: ...Lange Schermerhorn, who worked at the embassy. I knew a girl who worked with Lange's roommate...

Q: Sandy...

BORG: No, it was Kay Stocker. Kay Stocker worked in AID, but other than writing reports back to Washington, I have no idea what she did.

Q: It was a funny world.

BORG: That's right. I don't think I went into the embassy more than once or twice the whole time I was there. That first time I came down I was under consideration to be special assistant to one of the ambassadors, and I came down there for an interview, but I was not selected.

Q: It used to be called a beauty contest. Young officers would come in and they would be selected, whoever was the most personable or something like that.

BORG: I was not particularly interested in the job nor was I particularly disappointed that I was not selected for it. You know: "Come down. You're a candidate for this. Please show up," so "Okay." I left in the summer of '70.

Q: Did you get a different view? You wanted to look at things from Saigon, but it sounds like you were somewhat limited.

BORG: I was totally wrapped up in what I was doing, and I thought that what I was doing was a positive contribution to decentralizing the war.

Q: Also, militarily the situation was not too bad because the Viet Cong had been really knocked out by the Tet Offensive.

BORG: Things were going swimmingly, and there was much less violence all over the country than there had been at the time I arrived. So as far as I was concerned, I had had my Vietnam experience, and it was a positive experience in that I thought I made a positive contribution to what was going on in my particular communities. One of the things that we did in the villages was that, if any Naval or Air Force units wanted to participate in any activities in our community, they had to secure our concurrence, and we'd regularly get some battleship offshore that would say, "We have intelligence that there's a Viet Cong unit operating in such and such an area, and we want to use our big guns to smash them," and we'd say, "No way. There are settled communities in here. There's no way we're going to let you." Likewise, with the Air Force: If they wanted to do a bombing mission or an Arc light mission in the area, it had to be approved by us. So we were able to control the American side of the war also within our communities. Another thing I found great fun was that, whenever there was a Vietnamese soldier who was wounded in battle, we had helicopter units that would come and pick them up and take them to the hospital, but they would only go into questionable areas if somebody from the unit, from the unit on the ground, the headquarters, would go with them, and I was always willing to fly at night in these helicopters and go out to the villages. I felt I knew my way around and I was sufficiently young and naive about things that I never had any particular qualms about doing something like that. But I felt that my participation in the field had been positive and my experience in Saigon had been a positive one.

DAVID LAZAR
Director CORDS, Region I
Da Nang (1970-1971)

David Lazar was born in Chicago and educated at Depaul University. His career with USAID took him to Vietnam, Peru, Bolivia and Panama. He was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1997.

LAZAR: The inevitable, Vietnam, in 1970.

Q: What was your position there?

LAZAR: I was the Director of CORDS Military Region I, which was the northern five provinces.

Q: What did that involve?

LAZAR: Everything. CORDS was a structure that we put together in Vietnam to bring all civilian operations under one centralized authority. Among other things that included the training of regional and territorial forces, paramilitary groups, which the army didn't want to have anything to do with.

Q: What were the conditions in the area that you were responsible for?

LAZAR: Well, there was a war going on. This has nothing to do with anything, but I must tell you this story. One of the first guys that wanted to see me when I got to Vietnam was the head of the public safety program who was in charge of self-defense measures at our compound in Da Nang. The compound in Da Nang was called the Alamo. There were a couple of things I considered a little more important at the moment, as we were not under actual threat, than getting people to cooperate in this endeavor, so I put him off for a while. But, he was really insistent, so I finally had a meeting with him. His gripe was that he couldn't get people to participate in self-defense compound drills with assigned people to positions and assign weapons to them. Could I think of some way to accomplish this? Couldn't I just tell people that they had to do this? I said, "The first thing we have to do is change the name of the compound. You are not going to get many people interested in defending the Alamo." Jokes are wasted on public safety officials. It seemed pretty obvious to me.

Another funny experience I had happened the first morning I was there. I had flown across the United States and the Pacific non-stop, except for a one hour layover in Tokyo, down to Saigon, getting in about 9:00 o'clock in the morning local time, right into a series of all day briefings and then up to Da Nang where I met some members of my staff, etc. I went to bed and got up the next morning early because the day started with a briefing with the commanding general. I was still pretty blurred from that whole trip and wasn't quite sure where I was. I walked over and opened the heavy grenade curtains we kept across the windows and looked out and saw all these people in black pajamas. I wasn't quite sure where I was and finally focused on the one thing I recognized which was a Panamanian flag. Da Nang was a port and there was a ship in port. It took me about 30 seconds to get all that in focus and realize where I was and why the Panamanian flag was there. That Panamanian flag nearly saved my life. It was the one piece of reality I could get a grip on while I figured out what the hell else was going on around me.

Q: What kind of activities were you having to work on?

LAZAR: Everything. Despite the briefings in Washington, I wasn't really aware of what the hell the job involved. I sort of found out the first morning at the commanding general's briefing. Some of our military had been involved in an accident and there were some civilian injuries. The commanding general turned to me and said, "Are your people up there?" I said, "I don't know, should they be?" My deputy, said, "Yes, Sir, we have some public safety people up there." The job was gauleiter in a word. We paralleled the civilian, Vietnamese government from the district level up to the provincial level and all the way up to Saigon.

Q: How many people were under your direction?

LAZAR: When I first got there 1,100, in five provinces.

Q: What kind of people were they?

LAZAR: Four of the five provincial representatives, my next echelon down, and the majority of the district representatives, were military. Their counterparts were all military. The government was run by the military. We told them what to do, if they weren't already doing it.

Q: What kinds of things were you telling them to do?

LAZAR: Check and see that their village headmen slept in the village at night, for example. Many of them didn't because it was insecure. They were responsible for running the various programs that we were pushing.

Q: What kind of development programs?

LAZAR: Public health, agriculture and some public administration. I had a public administration guy on my staff. We really couldn't do much of anything because there was too much disruption. We wanted to give the Vietnamese people the notion that the region was pacified and that life was going to go on as it had always gone on, peace was here and the enemy was being kept away. Well, that was bullshit and they knew it was bullshit. Besides they thought they were smarter than we were and they were probably right. They certainly knew the situation on the ground better than we ever did. One of the most famous sayings to come out Vietnam was from John Paul Vann, who had been a colonel in the army and gotten into trouble, went back to Vietnam as a civilian, and had the equivalent of my job down in IV CORPS, in the south of the country, which had serious military problems. Our military problems at the time were not that bad, there were incursions, but mostly we had a pretty secure perimeter. Anyway, at a once a month Commanding General's staff meeting in Saigon, General Creighton Abrams made the statement that we really ought to be able to do things better having been here for 20 years. John Paul Vann jumped up out of the audience and said, "Excuse me, General, but no we haven't, we have been here one year twenty times." And that was about right. We never seemed to learn and the Vietnamese knew that.

Q: We never understood the situation; what was going on?

LAZAR: No. Some people did. John Paul Vann may have better than most people. But, most of our people never did. They wanted to do their 18 months and get out of there and I don't much blame them for that, particularly the AID people who were going through the motions. They would have loved it had they been able to have some serious impact.

Q: Do you think anything resulted from our development work?

LAZAR: I can't really say. I haven't been back. I didn't see anything going on when I was there that I thought would have any positive impact.

Q: We were just holding the ground and there to provide services?

LAZAR: Trying to relate to the Vietnamese in a positive way. Some of it may have rubbed off.

Q: You thought of it as a pretty bad experience?

LAZAR: Yes, it was my only bad experience in AID. The rest of it I loved.

Q: What was the core of your unhappiness?

LAZAR: The futility and the killing. As you may have gathered, in Peru, Bolivia and Panama, I had a lot of friends among the people I worked with. I related very closely to them. I understood them and they understood me. I spoke the language, after all, and, if I may say so, I spoke it well. I knew it enough to pick up nuances, not just literal meanings. It was really a collaborative effort, working with people and sharing common goals with them. Even though it was their country, I wanted to see those programs work, to see things happen. So you had this sense of really working together. In Vietnam we were there simply to make sure people did what they were told. By and large they did, because if a District Chief didn't do what his American advisor "suggested" that he do, the American advisor would get on the phone to the Provincial Rep who would talk to the Provincial Chief and the Provincial Chief would send a message back down to the District Chief to do what he is told. Or it came up to me. Or to Saigon, if necessary. But sooner or later, that District Chief was told what to do.

Q: Do you remember what they were being told to do by and large?

LAZAR: Well, for example, we had this HESS rating system. Have you ever run into that?

Q: No.

LAZAR: It was a list of ninety four items that we were to report on every week or month. How many village headmen sleep in their village? Has production of rice increased? It was an attempt to measure pacification, to reduce pacification to a set of numbers. Every month the information would come up through the villages to the districts to the provinces to me and I would send them on to Saigon and Saigon would use them to tell the President and the press the numbers were up and pacification was working. Pure bullshit.

Q: Did they tend to inflate the numbers?

LAZAR: No, it just didn't mean anything. I suppose there was a certain amount of lying, but that wasn't the point. The point was the Vietnamese became masters of what I came to call substantial non-substantive compliance. They would check off all those items and still find ways to run things the way they wanted to run them. I expressed myself a couple of times, but nobody wanted to hear that. Those numbers looked good. It was something like dealing with economists, only worse. You have all those numbers and they must mean something!

DELL PENDERGRAST
Psychological Operations Advisor

Mr. Pendergrast was born in Illinois in 1941. He received his BA from Northwestern University and his MS from Boston University. His positions abroad included Belgrade, Zagreb, Saigon, Warsaw, Brussels and Ottawa. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed him on June 24, 1999.

PENDERGRAST: During my ten months of language training, I had extensive area and country studies, which gave me a lot of badly needed education about the region. And, I think my views started to evolve and shift even while still in Washington. It was partly my exposure to the intense antiwar feeling taking place in the United States, which I had not experienced while in Yugoslavia. I had not fully appreciated the depth of opposition that existed in the United States, and that inevitably did have some impact on me. I remember in the fall of 1969 the Moratorium, a major event in the antiwar movement that turned violent in Washington. Even some of my Vietnamese language classmates, who were going to Vietnam, participated in the Moratorium, which was a little bit beyond my reach at that point. I think there was another thing that helped to shape my attitudes towards Vietnam, and that was a deepening concern about a blind, stubborn faith in American technology and power to win the war. I began to question the widely held belief that American military and political power alone could make the difference in the war, a self-deception which afflicted many in the government and the military. My reaction was partly developed by exposure to the swaggering Vietnam hands, civilian and military, who came back and forth through the Vietnam training center at the time. They had a rather patronizing attitude toward the Vietnamese, which I found disturbing and offensive. Such people seemed to think it was our war and we were going to win it regardless of the Vietnamese, another form of the myopic cultural arrogance which I mentioned earlier. I was by no means a dove or opponent of the war. Its basic strategic goals were sound, but before I even arrived there, I had become nervous about the way and the people implementing our strategy.

Q: How was Vietnamese as a language, as a tonal language? How did you find it?

PENDERGRAST: I had never experienced anything like it, because my language background was entirely in the Slavic family, but actually I seemed to adapt pretty well to it. I never became really fluent, but I managed at the professional level. I never needed an interpreter and was able to travel unescorted around the countryside. The tonal language is major, unfamiliar challenge for any American, but once you master the tones, you really are in control, because the grammar, the structure, tends to be simple, certainly compared to a Slavic language. So as I look back over the languages that I've studied over the many years, Vietnamese was possibly the easiest. But that's maybe because I was still young and able to adapt to languages much better than I could later.

Q: I can't remember, were you married?

PENDERGRAST: Yes, I was. I was married, and my wife initially decided that she would go to Bangkok and spend the time there because, of course, they were not allowing families into Vietnam during that period. In the end, she became pregnant with our first child and decided to stay with her mother in Chicago. In retrospect, it was a good decision, because the home environment was better for her in the pregnancy and then for the birth of our son. And it worked out, I think, pretty well. I'm glad that later she was able to come and visit me in Vietnam for a couple of weeks to get a taste of my experience there.

Q: Did you have any problem with your wife? This is a question I ask of people because often the wives were subjected more... I mean, you had your work to do, you knew what you were going to do and you were a government officer and all, but the wives were out kind of in... I'm talking about in the American public, and they were getting an awful lot more pressure. I know my wife did.

PENDERGRAST: You mean during the Vietnam period.

Q: Yes, during the Vietnam thing. My wife was at a university while I was in Vietnam, and I came back and I found it wasn't very easy.

PENDERGRAST: No, she had no problem being identified with someone working in Vietnam. She lived in a conservative North Shore suburb of Chicago. I don't think there was any strong anti-war feeling there. In fact, her main complaint, I recall, was the paucity of information about Vietnam and the lack of interest among the people she knew in that area. She read the Chicago Tribune and other local papers, but, remarkably, in the middle of the war, the information was spotty. She was getting letters from me almost daily from Vietnam and her curiosity was stimulated, but she could not get much satisfaction in the local media.

Q: I remember on my way out trying to find something on what was happening in Vietnam, and I was in Houston, and there was, you know, a paragraph. The papers, when you get beyond sort of The Washington Post, The New York Times, maybe The Los Angeles Times, you're in another world.

PENDERGRAST: You're absolutely right, and she really did feel being in a sort of information vacuum, but she was distracted by her first pregnancy, and when my son was born while I was in Vietnam, and she was quite fully occupied.

Q: Well, you then got to Vietnam in 1970, is that right? When?

PENDERGRAST: In January of 1970, and I was assigned by USIA in Saigon to be an advisor, what they called a psychological operations advisor to the Vietnamese government, in a province northwest of Saigon called Tay Ninh, approximately 60 to 70 miles northwest of the capital city. It had been in the '60s a very prominent battleground between the communists and the South Vietnamese government, the site of the infamous War Zone C, which was a vast stretch of largely uninhabited jungle that had become a major base for the communist forces. I was based in the province capital with the province advisory team and worked with the Vietnamese information service located in Tay Ninh.

Q: You were in Tay Ninh from January of '70 to when?

Q: Could you talk about your job and maybe some of the incidents and your experiences?

PENDERGRAST: I was the advisor to the Vietnamese information service assisting them in the propaganda effort supporting the war. The situation in Tay Ninh was complicated because that province is the center of the Cao Dai religion, the largest indigenous Vietnamese religion. It is - at least at the time - a religion that numbered, I guess, three to four million people, primarily in Tay Ninh and along the central coast of Vietnam. It's an extraordinary, quintessentially Vietnamese religion which is eclectic and the elements of different faiths, Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Confucianism, and animism. And it also tends to be very hierarchical and authoritarian, organized along the lines of the Roman Catholic Church, with a pope, cardinals and bishops, and at that time they had a very powerful hold over Tay Ninh. The province government and military structure was essentially a Cao Dai structure. And so what we were working with was not just the Vietnamese government representative, but indeed with the Cao Dai, which rippled the whole fabric of the provincial system. In many ways, of course, that was a great advantage, because the Cao Dai were fiercely anticommunist. Their loyalty to Saigon over the years had been mixed, but at that time in the early >70s they pretty well accommodated to the national government, which allowed them a fair degree of autonomy in Tay Ninh.

What my job entailed was working with my counterpart, the head of the Vietnamese information service, who was of course a well-connected Cao Dai figure, in a variety of information and cultural activities ranging from publications and cultural events and entertainment staged in villages to promote government themes as well as small village libraries and information centers across the province. Increasingly, I began to feel it was rather patronizing to believe that somehow we Americans could tell the Vietnamese how to communicate with their own people. I was a little uncomfortable with that, but my main value, I suppose, was helping in contacts with regional and national headquarters to get needed resources for the Information Service. But at times I did begin to feel a little like a third wheel in that environment, even though I spoke Vietnamese and, indeed, was the only civilian Vietnamese speaker in the province - and got along very well with the Vietnamese - but I was still the outsider.

Q: Well, sometimes these jobs, the Vietnamese experience talking to other people is that often they'd say Uh-huh, but use you as a source equivalent to a supply officer.

PENDERGRAST: There was an element of that and was able to help, I think, in some way to support the Vietnamese Information Service chief, an educated, soft-spoken, pleasant gentleman. We got along well together and he was most gracious in his hospitality to my wife when she visited over the Christmas/New Years period in 1970. But I always had this sense that he had been fighting this propaganda war for 20 years, and who am I, a relatively young Foreign Service officer coming to tell him how to do it?

Q: Was there a difference between the... Did you run across a difference between the Cao Dai and the government of South Vietnam's approach to information they were putting out?

PENDERGRAST: No, at that time, as I mentioned, there was relative harmony between the Cao Dai and the government of Vietnam. They shared parallel interests in resisting the communists, their common enemy, and they enjoyed considerable autonomy from Saigon in terms of running the provincial administration. It was in essence a Cao Dai government, although few would openly say it, but from the province chief on down, they were all Cao Dai. It's interesting, even the regional military force of Tay Ninh, of course a separate military unit, not in the ARVN (Armée de la République du Viêt-Nam (Army of the Republic of Vietnam - i.e., South Vietnamese Army), had uniforms that carried the Cao Dai colors.

The Cao Dai historically have been inconsistent in their loyalties. At one time they had been very anti-government, and back in the '50s were one of the sects actively and even violently opposed to President Diem. Later on, in the '60s, they began to adapt and work with the government in Saigon, which had enough problems with the Viet Cong and did not want to face the Cao Dai as well.

Q: Did you find yourself in any problem with your Saigon JUSPAO, I guess it was, headquarters, in that here you were dealing in a province where the game was somewhat different. I mean, this was not straight GVN, Government of Vietnam, work. I mean you were working more with a church. Did you have trouble sort of getting that across?

PENDERGRAST: No, I didn't. The people from Saigon were very interested in the Cao Dai. We'd get periodic visits from the Saigon warriors, as they were called, and they always wanted to visit the Cao Dai temple, which was, and remains today, in fact, one of the great tourist Meccas of Vietnam. The Cao Dai temple is an elaborate structure, which looks like something that Disney might have created with its bewildering display of dragons. The camera-toting tourists from Saigon loved it. A large part of my job as my tour evolved really shifted more and more away from the JUSPAO information activities into a mostly political reporting function. My province senior advisor for most of the tour was a senior career FSO, Parker Wyman, and he did not speak Vietnamese. He relied on me to maintain contact with Cao Dai political activists and to develop reporting to the embassy in Saigon. So a great deal of my assignment in Tay Ninh turned out to be essentially a political reporting role, which I found both interesting and challenging, particularly because the so-called propaganda advisory role, I believed, had its limits.

Q: Was there any Catholic or Buddhist influence, and how did the Cao Dai interact with these?

PENDERGRAST: There was a very small population of Catholic and Buddhist residents in Tay Ninh. They usually were confined to one or two villages which had their own form of autonomy within this largely autonomous province. They were pretty much ignored by the Cao Dai, a relationship of mutual tolerance and indifference for those most part.

Q: What about the other side. I mean how effective was this Cao Dai government? I mean you had War Zone Z in the middle of the jungle and all this. I mean, what was the other side doing?

PENDERGRAST: Well, in the spring of 1970 shortly after I arrived in Tay Ninh, we had what was euphemistically called the Cambodian "incursion," the major military operation by South Vietnamese and American forces moving into the so-called base areas in Cambodia. Tay Ninh was the principal launching pad for that operation. It was fascinating to witness this huge avalanche of American tanks and other vehicles as they went across Tay Ninh into Cambodia, at the time the largest military operation since the Korean War. I did, in fact, briefly accompany some U.S. Army public affairs people just across the border into Cambodia, but most of the time I was there watching this enormous military operation and helping with the flood of hapless Cambodian refugees created by the offensive.

Although failing in its objective to find the Viet Cong headquarters, the Cambodian operation, however, did have success in pushing back the communists, dispersing them, undermining their capability to penetrate the populated areas in Tay Ninh, where they had actually been able to operate in preceding years. As a result of this Cambodian invasion, most of my tour was a period of relative peace and security in Tay Ninh. The communists were for the most part disorganized, weakened, in many cases simply absent. I could by myself, during daytime hours, travel unescorted virtually anywhere in the populated part of Tay Ninh. At night I wouldn't do it, but in the daytime it was not a problem. War Zone C, the uninhabited area in the northern part of the province, was still out of bounds. But I was fortunate to have the opportunity to travel freely and get to know people in rural villages and hamlets where Americans would not have gone without military escort two or three years earlier.

Q: How did you find the American military there? I imagine you would find yourself more or less in a role between the military, speaking Vietnamese and all, and maybe keeping relations and things in better form than they might be. Did you find yourself in that?

PENDERGRAST: I had contact both with the military advisory team with which I worked on a day-to-day basis, but also with the regular military units that were still in Tay Ninh when I arrived, the First Cavalry and 25th Divisions, but they left the province during my tour. I think, in general, that the advisory people who worked closely with the Vietnamese were much more sensitive, more aware of the fact that this was not just a World War II-type conflict, but in fact a complicated political war. The regular combat units, I believe, were afflicted more with the fixation that this was another conventional World War II operation and we would just overwhelm the enemy with our technology and power. This was, in my judgment, the great mistake of Vietnam; we were just re-fighting the last war, trying to do what we did in Europe and in Korea, and never really understood that this was a very different environment and a very [different] type of war. In many ways, the tragedy was compounded by turning the South Vietnamese army itself into an American-style, World War II-type organization, heavily dependent on logistics and supporting firepower- all of which made both ourselves and the South Vietnamese less capable of dealing with the principally political challenge that we faced.

Q: Were there any major developments, incidents, or something during the period you were there until you left in '71?

PENDERGRAST: Well, the major event, of course, was the Cambodian invasion that not only resulted in, at least, the temporary easing of the security threat, a brief respite that we enjoyed, but also generated an enormous flow of refugees from Cambodia into the province that we had to deal with as well. While I was there, the process of Vietnamization was the main reality in a war-torn part of Vietnam, where Americans had been fighting in great numbers for five years, and suddenly they were gone. But remarkably for a time, at least, there was no sudden decline in the security, mainly because the Cambodian invasion had severely damaged the Vietnamese communist infrastructure and their support from across the border.

Q: How were the Cambodians treated by the Cao Dai and-

PENDERGRAST: Generally, the Cambodians were not viewed with great respect or dignity by the Vietnamese, in fact, looked down upon by the Vietnamese, whether Cao Dai or others. Particularly when dealing with the refugees, it was not the Vietnamese government but the American government that really was most committed to helping these people. The Vietnamese authorities were at best indifferent. A vast cultural and social chasm separated the Vietnamese and the Cambodians.

Q: Were there Montagnards in the area?

PENDERGRAST: No, there were no major minorities at all because it was so heavily Cao Dai in the province.

Q: What was your impression of going back to Saigon and seeing the folks at the top and all that?

PENDERGRAST: It was in many ways a surrealistic experience to visit Saigon, as I did occasionally, because there the American military and civilian presence remained pervasive despite the rapidly dropping levels of U.S. combat troops. Vietnamization certainly didn't take hold there. And, frankly, I was somewhat troubled to see the Americans, many had been there for years, living in the lap of luxury as a result of this war. Saigon was always (and remains today) a dynamic, entrepreneurial city. I left Vietnam with enormous respect for the Vietnamese as a people. They are intelligent, industrious people. They make the best of what they can. But at that time they were simply taking advantage of the fact that you had a lot of Americans throwing around a lot of money. The problem was that in the process they lost track of their own fate and their own destiny. I remember specifically several times Vietnamese telling me in unguarded moments over a few beers at night, that they really believed it was our war, the American war, and they were just sort of bystanders or minor players in these events. I think that problem persisted right up to April of 1975, the belief among the Vietnamese that the Americans never really would walk away from their war. It was certainly true in 1970 and probably the same in those last days in 1975.

Q: Well, getting this experience under your belt, whither - 1971, what were you thinking about, what did you want to do, and what did you do?

PENDERGRAST: Well, I didn't have any real strong preference or expectation about any particular assignment or job. My tour in Vietnam was shortened abruptly by a few months. I was back in Chicago visiting my wife and expecting to go back to Vietnam for my last months. Literally on the day before I was to get on the plane in Chicago, I received a call from Washington telling me that as part of the draw-down in the American presence in Vietnam, my position was eliminated and I was not to return. Maybe they were just trying to save travel funds since I already was back in the States. As a result, my colleagues had to pack me up there and return my belongings, and I went back to Washington. In a sense, it was a somewhat anticlimactic way to end a tour and particularly disappointing not to say goodbye to my Vietnamese colleagues and friends. I knew a large number of people in Tay Ninh and was disappointed it would happen that way, but I had a new son and my wife, and it was good to be reunited with them. But it still was not a good way to come to closure with such an experience. Maybe it finally did come to closure just last year when my son, who had been born while I was in Vietnam, went to Vietnam himself as part of a graduate business school project and spent three weeks in Vietnam, mostly in Saigon and Hanoi. He took one day to visit Tay Ninh because he knew I had been there. He saw the Cao Dai temple and the city of Tay Ninh, tried to look for some landmarks I had told him about - never found them - but, I guess everything comes full circle and I'm glad that he could help to bring some closure for me. I'd like to visit Tay Ninh myself someday.

MAURICE E. LEE
Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1970-1971)

Maurice E. Lee was born in Pennsylvania in 1925. He joined USIA in 1949 and served in Germany, Japan, Turkey, Vietnam, the Philippines, Korea, and Israel. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1989.

LEE: Following my year at the War College I was sent to Vietnam. About two-thirds of the military in my class also went to Vietnam. Needless to say anything that I wanted from the military while I was in Vietnam I got because of my previous association with my military classmates.

Speaking of Vietnam -- another interesting thing that happened while I was Program Coordinator, Mr. Shakespeare was Director at that particular time. He felt very strongly about the threat of communism and anybody who'd ever worked for him knew this all too well. And I recall one time when he was presiding over a meeting he announced he wanted every USIA foreign service officer to serve a tour in Eastern Europe or the Soviet Union. We tried to tell Mr. Shakespeare that this was not possible. Because there just were not enough positions in those countries to fill. And I remember my telling him, why can't you give people with Vietnam experience credit as having been close to communism? He said, "I want to tell you something Mauri, looking at a communist through the sight of a gun and looking at one eyeball to eyeball are two different things." So he set up an orientation program where groups of senior officers went to Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union to visit these countries and meet some communists. I went on one such trip which was very interesting

As I stated earlier, following the National War College experience I was sent to Vietnam where I was number three and later became Deputy Director of the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office

(JUSPAO). I carried the dual title of Deputy Director of that Office and Counselor of the Embassy for Public Affairs. We had a dual role there principally to --

Q: Pardon me. But at that time had Barry [Zorthian] left?

LEE: Yes, Barry had left and Ed Nickel who had replaced him arrived a little before me. He came in right after Tet. Tet was the horrendous North Vietnamese Army Assault coordinated all over South Vietnam. It came close to defeating the U.S. and South Vietnamese military forces. It was ultimately repulsed with great losses to the North, but it sparked a psychological downturn in the U.S. and proved a major factor in our ultimate withdrawal.

I came in later in 1969. It was a huge program made up of USIS officers, State Department people, CIA and the military. As a matter of fact, one of my deputies was an Army colonel. JUSPAO had several missions. One was the pacification program. It was our job to get out and convince the people through various programs to support their government which was in many ways a controversial program. We also were responsible for keeping the American press there briefed. We did have a small cultural program going. We were spread out all over the provinces of South Vietnam. In fact, the JUSPAO program was huge. To give you an example, one of my direct responsibilities was the rebuilding of the country's radio and TV stations. During Tet the Viet Cong had badly damaged the four TV stations and four main radio stations. So we brought over an NBC team of engineers who were in the process of rebuilding those stations. And I gather after I left they finally finished that job. So we had some nice modernized stations to give back to the North Vietnamese.

We had an old constellation that we sent up every night it could fly to broadcast into North Vietnam. We also dropped leaflets up there. We had such a fine printing operation, the RSC Manila, that we printed what was taken for counterfeit, bogus North Vietnamese money in the form of leaflets with a message and dropped them over North Vietnam. North Vietnam charged that we were trying to bankrupt the country because they were so good that people could cut the message off and use them as money. An interesting anecdote to that was a later director of the East Asia area had some of those as a souvenir in his safe in Washington. The Secret Service found out about it and were going to come over and take them away from him. We had a tough time explaining to them that they were really leaflets and not counterfeit money.

Q: Yes, I understand that your people who were up in the countryside were almost never or perhaps never the heads of the offices that were up there. Were these people, the heads of the office, State Department personnel? Or were they military personnel?

LEE: As you know, there were four zones. And we did have a senior USIS officer who was head of the Public Affairs Program per se in each of those zones.

Q: Do you have any other Americans?

LEE: He had other Americans under him. They could be military. They could be State. And then there was the province chief. And that could be a State Department man or military man. While he worked for that man, he also had a responsibility to us.

Q: Well, to what extent was he able to or did he try to get any of his own ideas on public affairs work over? And to what extent was he almost completely under the thumb of the Province Director?

LEE: This is always the problem when a guy's working for two different bosses. If there was a problem our man would come to us and we'd try to straighten it out at the Saigon level. I don't recall any serious problems. We didn't have that many people. I think there were around 200 Americans in JUSPAO. You're bound to run into personality conflicts. And everybody has his own idea of how to run the war. Some of the men that were really out in the boonies probably were doing some things that you wouldn't put under a "Public Affairs Program." But we tried to keep our programs within a certain periphery. And if we heard of anything that was out of that periphery we would try to correct it.

Q: Well, now did the people in the provinces involve themselves in anything directly that you would call PsyWar as opposed to more of the standard operations of public affairs? And if they did, what kinds of things did they do?

LEE: Well, you have to realize that we were in PSYOPS in essence. We're no longer in PSYOPS. Later on we were taken out of it. But that's a broad term. It depends on how certain people define it. If I heard that one of my people were out on night raids (and I know of several that did go out on them) or riding around the countryside in black pajamas like the Viet Cong trying to woo the people, I'd get word out to cool it.

One of the big programs we had, one of the reasons we were trying to get the TV stations back on the air, was that each village no matter how small was given a TV set. They put it in the middle of the village square where everyone could watch programs. Now, these programs obviously had a certain PSYOPS aspect, of propaganda, because we were trying to help the Vietnamese government win the Vietnamese people over to their side and away from the Viet Cong.

Q: The programs that went over this telecasting system were originated where? In Saigon? Or did they go out to feeder stations?

LEE: Well, they originally went out to feeder stations as I recall.

Q: I mean, were they on tape? Or were they original programs?

LEE: Well, in the beginning we had tape. We had tape fed into the machines.

Q: But these were done essentially in Saigon not in Washington.

LEE: As far as I know they were done in Saigon.

Q: And were there transmitter stations?

LEE: Yes.

Q: There had to be transmitter stations up in the --

LEE: Yes, but as I say in the beginning they were out. And we had both the radio and TV, not all the radio but most of them, the big ones.

JOHN M. REID
Political Officer, JUSPO
Saigon (1970-1971)

Mr. Reid, a Virginian, was educated at Virginia Tech, Columbia and Harvard Universities. A specialist in East Asian and Pacific Affairs, he served in Saigon, Vientiane, Bangkok and Seoul, primarily as Public Affairs Officer. In his Washington assignments, Mr. Reid also dealt with affairs of that region. He was also assigned as Public Affairs Officer at Beirut during the Lebanon Civil War, and was a casualty in the bombing of the US Embassy in Beirut. Mr. Reid was interviewed by Charles R. Beecham in 2002.

Q: Now let's talk about your assignment to Saigon in 1970.

REID: I had studied Chinese in graduate school, and, throughout my career, I hoped to get assigned to a Chinese-language post. Bob Clarke, who had been deputy in Bangkok, had gone to Taipei as PAO, and, in 1970, as the end of my first Thailand tour was approaching, Bob said he could find a job for me. It was decided in Washington, however, that, since I had been distribution officer in Bangkok, I should go to Saigon and try to repeat my success there.

Howard Biggerstaff had returned to Washington by this time and was working as a post management assistance officer, and Lynn Noah was in Saigon as research officer. In March 1970, after my assignment was announced, I went over to Saigon to discuss the job with Bigg, who was in Saigon on TDY, and with Lynn. We agreed that, with Vietnamization, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO) would eventually get out of the massive publication airdrops in Vietnam and that the priority should be development of capability for regular direct mailing of printed material to a list of appropriate Vietnamese.

Lynn said that, to get JUSPAO to commit itself to this, I would have to develop a program proposal and budget and get it approved. Before I went on home leave, I went over to Saigon for three months and worked on this—a proposal encompassing scope, objectives, budget, staffing and equipment. At the same time, Lynn introduced me to a Vietnamese research contractor who was able to begin developing lists of key Vietnamese, names and mailing addresses, in specified occupational categories. It was very much like the distribution and record systems which all USIS posts maintained in later years. Within the three months, I completed the proposal, presented it, got it approved and went on home leave. While I was away, the research contractor continued working on the lists.

When I returned from home leave, I moved myself out of JUSPAO headquarters in the Rex Hotel building and, at the invitation of Frank Phillips, JUSPAO Logistics Officer and a good friend, across the river into the JUSPAO warehouse in Khanh Hoi. This is where the publications were actually handled. At first, getting the project going was quite challenging and required a lot of supervision. We had to organize the information from the research contractor and use special equipment to engrave it onto lead plates, used for printing the addresses in those pre-computer days. Once we got that going, continuing with the project was a fairly mechanical thing. As we completed the work, group by group, we did commence the mailing. I think it was a surprise to everyone that the South Vietnamese postal system worked quite well.

About the time when the distribution project was becoming routine, Frank Scotton visited the JUSPAO warehouse to see a Vietnamese employee he knew. I had met Frank in 1970 when we were both sent to Kuala Lumpur to work on the visit of Vice President Agnew. Frank was back in Vietnam, I think as a special advisor to Ambassador Bunker. Frank saw me hard at work and asked me what I was doing. When I explained it to him, and he looked at our information, he expressed some surprise and astonishment that anyone was doing a project like that in Vietnam. Frank later told me that he conveyed some of this back to the leadership at JUSPAO. In any case, a few days later, Brian Battey, one of the JUSPAO deputy directors, summoned me and asked how I'd like to work for a while in the embassy political section.

I accepted the offer and was sent over to the embassy for what was supposed to be a three-month detail. I worked for Steve Winship, political-military officer in the embassy, and Steve put me in charge of POW issues. The NSC had tasked the embassy with doing a paper on repatriation issues—what would be the legal, political and practical issues if there were ever an agreement to repatriate Viet Cong and North Vietnamese prisoners held in South Vietnam in exchange for the release of American POWs. At that time, as I recall, there were about 23,000 Viet Cong prisoners and about 10,000 North Vietnamese regulars held in camps in South Vietnam. I was able to travel around and look at most of the camps including the largest, on Phu Quoc Island, off the south coast of Vietnam.

I worked very hard on this study, and I think Steve liked what I did. I liked and got along well with the people in the political section. The study got sent to the NSC, there were some questions, and we answered them. The study never surfaced again, as far as I know, and the way the war ended made the prisoners a non-issue.

I was supposed to have gone back to JUSPAO after three months, but I liked what I was doing, and no one said anything, so I didn't either. After spending an hour a day with my Vietnamese tutor, I was getting fairly proficient with the language, and, at some point, someone waved the BPAOship in Hue in front of me, but the offer never surfaced again. Since the distribution job had become a routine mechanical thing, I didn't want to go back to JUSPAO. At the same time, my friend, Frank Albert, who was in Laos, began encouraging me to take the job of binational center director in Vientiane. I made my bid, and it happened.

MICHAEL W. COTTER

CORDS
Mekong Delta (1970-1971)

Staff Aide
Saigon (1971)

Ambassador Michael W. Cotter was born in Wisconsin in 1943. He graduated from Georgetown University in 1965 and received a JD from the University of Michigan in 1968. Postings throughout his career have included Saigon, La Paz, Can Tho, Quito, Ankara, Kinshasa, Santiago, and an ambassadorship to Turkmenistan. Ambassador Cotter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You arrived in Vietnam. Tell me how you were received, where you went, and what it was like.

COTTER: Okay. Actually, I was going to mention before I got to that, the trip there was interesting, for a number of reasons. I mentioned I arrived there on Christmas Eve. One of the things that happened on the way there, something that has stayed with me, is that while I was traveling to Vietnam, one of my close friends, and the only one, I must say, of my close friends, who was killed in Vietnam, was a rear seat in a Navy fighter. Anyhow, they sent most of us, who were going to be in CORDs, to Taiwan. On route to Taiwan, I stopped in Japan. I took a train from Tokyo to Hiroshima, and spent a day seeing the town. I had reservations for a night train back to Tokyo. I had a long wait in the Hiroshima station. I was sitting in the train station, reading a book. All of a sudden, I felt this hand on my shoulder, and someone talking to me in Japanese. He obviously had been drinking. I studiously ignored him and read my book. Everybody else in the room studiously ignoring the whole thing. The next thing I knew, I smelled something burning. The guy next to me brushed my head. It turned out that this young kid, who was obviously inebriated, had put a cigarette to my hair, and the person next to me put it out.. I continued sitting there reading my book, trying to ignore what was going on. The next thing I know, a couple of policemen approached. They discovered I couldn't speak any Japanese, so they went away and returned with an English-speaking colleague. They expressed their regret about this incident, and so forth. I gave them my passport, which, of course, was a diplomatic passport. There was much discussion, after which I was taken off to a VIP room and put there until the train left. About a year later, I was down in the Mekong Delta, in Vietnam, when I got a cable from the Embassy in Saigon passing along a query from Embassy Tokyo as to whether I was the Michael Cotter who on such and such date was in Hiroshima Airport and had been attacked by someone. It turns out that the individual's father had gone to Embassy Tokyo with money for compensation. I had Saigon send a cable back, saying, "Yes, I indeed was that Michael Cotter, and I appreciated the thoughtfulness, and would they accept the money and give it to a charity on my behalf?" I thought it was an interesting anecdote. I can imagine how perturbed that Japanese father was when this incident occurred, and how it upset the Japanese police when they discovered that it was an American diplomat.

Anyhow, we went to Taiwan and looked at cooperatives, down by Tai Chung, a very interesting trip. It was an exposure to how imaginatively the Taiwanese, even then, were raising a whole variety of products, and an interesting visit to Taiwan, itself.

So, I got to Saigon on Christmas Eve. I had requested to be assigned to the Mekong Delta. I had felt that having invested 10 months in Vietnamese language training, I didn't really want to go somewhere where there were lots of American troops, and whatever development work we were doing in Central Vietnam was going to be clearly secondary to the war effort. I don't recall now whether it was in Saigon or when I got down to Can Tho, which was the principal town in the Fourth Region and the Delta, that I discovered I was assigned to Kien Hoa Province. We had a week's orientation in Saigon. I arrived in Can Tho on New Year's Eve, 1969. There is something that passes for a BOQ there. I don't know what it was before, some kind of a hotel. Right next to it was a cess pool. Every evening there was a movie on the roof of the BOQ. My first night in Can Tho, I was sitting on the roof of the BOQ, watching of all things Night of The Living Dead, watching tracers, and hearing the 105mm howitzers in the distance. You feel very alone in a situation like that. It is your first tour, and none of the colleagues I had studied Vietnamese with ended up in the Delta. I don't think this was like showing up for a first tour in the normal Embassy, where you sort of walk into an extended family, but to end up in Comte, South Vietnam in the middle of a war. Anyhow, I went onto Ben Tre in Kien Hoa Province. Now, Kien Hoa is a province that is between two of the major outlets of the Mekong River. The river has three major outlets to the South China Sea. Kien Hoa is between the two northernmost. It is bordered on the north by Dinh Thuong Province, the capital of which is the major city in the northern Delta. Kien Hoa has been called birthplace of the Viet Cong, and Madam Binh, who was the Viet Cong Foreign Minister in those days and later an official in the northern government, came from Kien Hoa province. The capital Ban Tre had been made famous in the Tet Offensive of 1968, when it was described as the town we had to destroy in order to save. I was assigned to be the Civic Affairs advisor on one of the district advisory teams. District advisory teams in the CORDs and the MAC-V program, consisted usually of just military personnel, because there really weren't enough civilians for all of those districts. Where we could, we had civilian officers from the State Department or AID in some cases. The Ben Tre district team was located in a compound. South Vietnam is divided into provinces which are further subdivided into districts and into villages. Normally, the district advisory team would sit in the principal village of the district, but in the case of Ben Tre, since that was the province capital, the district headquarters were set in a compound, about three kilometers outside the capital. It was simply a beamed compound about 50 meters square with a number of buildings. Our quarters were sort of built into the side of the berm.

Q: Berm being a ?

COTTER: A dirt wall, with a ditch, like a moat, outside of it, where you dug the dirt. I think the thing was probably 10 feet high. That was surrounded by open rice fields. Beyond that, about 1 km away were dense coconut groves. Kien Hoa did, and probably still does, grow a lot of coconuts. I also had some great seafood while I was there, particularly shrimp. The other interesting thing about that district was that there was a famous individual, at least famous at that time, popularly called the Coconut Monk. This fellow was a Buddhist monk who lived on a boat in the branch of Mekong, between Kien Hoa and Dinh Thuong. His boat was tied up to an island, where he had a temple and a village. He was quite well known because there were a lot of young men whom he accepted as adherents; young men who were trying to get away from both the Viet Cong and the government's draft. Every once in a while, the government would make an effort to do a conscription raid on the island. It always produced an enormous protest. But, by the time I arrived, they pretty much left the Coconut Monk alone. He was nominally under government control, but in fact, he pretty much ran his own village.

Q: Was he the man who leaned against the big jar? He never slept lying down, or something like that?

COTTER: I wouldn't know that. I went over a couple times and called on him. He was an eccentric fellow, but quite successful in what he did.

Q: I don't remember. I met him once.

COTTER: You got to Kien Hoa, by the way, by taking Highway 4, down from Saigon to My Tho; then you had to take a ferryboat. There was no bridge that went into Kien Hoa, itself, and indeed, to get to a number of the districts, you had to take ferryboats because there weren't bridges. If there had been bridges across some of the large canals, they had been destroyed over the course of time. The interesting things about Vietnam was how much - and I've seen this since in the Foreign Service, not so much in our service as in other services - comment there is about the tail-to-tooth ratio, i.e. the size of the support system that we have overseas compared to other embassies. The fact is the size of that support mechanism allows us to work a significant part of the working day. In places like Zaire, with some of the other, smaller embassies, the diplomats often had to fend for themselves, spending 50% of their time simply getting things done, and staying alive, and thus only able to work about half the time. Well, in Vietnam, in the boonies, this was true in spades. We spent an enormous amount of time simply managing housekeeping things. For example, radio watch. We monitored the radio 24 hours a day. One or two nights a week - there were seven of us on the team, so probably one night a week - you had radio watch all night. Then, there was a daily trip, up to the province capital to get mail and supplies. That would take one or two people, and generally consume half a day. There were a number of other regular housekeeping chores as well.

Essentially, my responsibilities were to distribute AID commodities. We distributed corrugated roofing, soy enhanced dry milk, and managed a number of other AID projects. One of the interesting things projects, the results of which I would like to go back to Vietnam to see, was an effort to completely change the pig population. Pork is a very important food in Vietnam. The Vietnamese pigs were these potbellied, black pigs that had a lot more fat than meat. AID introduced a western, much meatier pig. Over the time I was in Vietnam, you actually saw a significant change in the quality of the pig stock. It would be interesting to back 25 years later to see what kind of pigs are there now.

The other main responsibility I had was doing the HES, the infamous Hamlet Evaluation Survey, which got a lot of bad publicity in the U.S. press, which suggested that it was a way to encapsulate the war in statistics that really bore no relation to reality. We did a monthly HES. We had a questionnaire for each village in our district. Then, there was a much more detailed, quarterly HES. The questions were, for example, who controls the area, whether the government had control at all times, daytime or never. You filled in the appropriate box. Actually, like most of these statistical things, it was quite good if used properly. It wasn't very good when all that got published were the statistics that said, "Eighty percent was under government control," without any explanation. Filling out the HES could be difficult, because it always put you in conflict with the Vietnamese District Chief. Obviously, his reputation and promotion possibilities weren't enhanced by the fact that some of his villages were under Viet Cong control. The worse he showed up on the HES, the unhappier he was. This always produced a certain amount of conflict. In the first district I was in, Ben Tre, we could visit about half of the villages in 1970. The other half of the villages, we couldn't get to; they were Viet Cong controlled all the time. I recall one group of villages that we visited once a week. The villages themselves were quite secure, but the road to them was very dangerous. It was a dirt road on which the Viet Cong regularly placed mines at night. Several times a week the motorcycle-pulled little rickshaws that were used for transportation would arrive at the compound with dead bodies in them. The district senior advisor made it a practice for a team of us to go down there once a week. There was a South Vietnamese "Popular Forces" unit, like a local militia located about half-way down the road, whose job it was, in theory, to keep the road clear. However, they much preferred staying in their compound at night to going out and patrolling to keep the VC from laying mines. So, we traveled down the road once a week on the theory that if the American advisors went down the road regularly, the "Popular Forces" had more incentive to check the road. We would drive down this in a jeep with a layer of sandbags on the floorboards and under the seats covered by a layer of flak vests. We would ride on top of this. My successor, who was an Army captain, was killed on that road when that jeep hit a mine. He was thrown out of it, and landed on his neck. There was a certain amount of danger involved. I spent about five months in that district, and then I went down to...

Q: Well, in the first place, just to get this, you were in Vietnam in 1969...

COTTER: Let's say, from the beginning of 1970, until the summer of 1971.

Q: How did you find you were received, working with the military?

COTTER: Quite well. The military, at both the district and the province level, were happy to have someone do things like the HES, and the other civilian things we did, plus I was the only Vietnamese speaker on the team. I was received quite well. The province senior advisor, Buck Kotzebue, was a retired Army Colonel, who was working for AID as the province senior advisor. He and his team were quite good. I had mentioned that I wanted to go to the Delta because there weren't any American troops there. The U.S. Ninth Division had been located at Tan An, a town between My Tho and Saigon. When I arrived at the beginning of 1970, the Ninth Division had, in essence, pulled out. The base at Tan An still had a few people disposing of things. It worked quite well for us because we could send up foraging teams from the district to pick up all sorts of things. But, the military were quite accepting. I enjoyed that relationship. You had to learn how the military did things: radio protocols, how to bring in helicopters, and many other things. If you weren't able to do that, my guess is that you would have had a much harder time. We clearly were living in a military situation, and we operated by military rules more than State Department rules. The military guys out there sort of admired someone who would go out to the villages and do various things, because most of them were much more reluctant to mix. For instance, we would eat bologna six different ways when there was great food to eat out locally, simply because these guys weren't prepared to eat out. I remember in Vietnamese training, they went through a long explanation of the fish that lived in the fish pond, and how you could eat them. One of the other innovations we had brought to Vietnam was building latrines over fish ponds, which was much more sanitary than what people had done in most of these areas before. Well, of course, we also introduced fish into the fish ponds. The fish would eat what dropped into the pond. There was a big discussion at FSI about whether you could eat these fish. We were assured that indeed the fish would assimilate whatever they took in and were perfectly healthy to eat. In my case, that was very useful, because when you would go out to villages, particularly in the morning, they would serve you a breakfast, which tended to be a bowl of rice with a fish on top and some of this horrific rice liquor that the Vietnamese drank.

COTTER: No, not nuoc mam, which was a fish sauce. This was a rice alcohol that smelled sort of like fuel oil, baside, I think, is what it was called. We would try to go out to villages on a regular basis, either to deliver things or simply to talk to the village officials. I found the Vietnamese very open and accepting. Again, they hadn't had much experience with American troops. Whatever bad experiences people may have had when you get a large number of foreign operations in the area, the Delta Vietnamese didn't have. This was my first exposure to how cultures see each other. As usual, children were the most instructive in this regard. We used to say the Vietnamese would call us "long noses," but what got most of the kids was how hairy we were. You would go around in villages, and kids would come up and touch your arm because they couldn't believe the hair. Vietnamese have very little body hair, so kids would come up and just be fascinated by the hair an American had on his body.

After five months in Ben Tre District, I was transferred down to Ba Tri District, which was a district right down on the South China Sea, at the very mouth of the Mekong. Ba Tri was a pacified district where our team could visit all of the villages. We were a three-man team. I was the district senior advisor, and I had a medic - an Army sergeant - and an Intel Lieutenant. The three of us managed things there. In my first district our seven man team included a couple of weapons specialists, who, on occasion, would go out on patrols. They were primarily there to train and work with the local Vietnamese forces. In Ba Tri, there wasn't much need for that. We did a lot more development work. There were a couple notable things about Ba Tri. While on the land there wasn't much war going on, we did have, very extensive mangroves. Where the land there ended, there were over one kilometer of mangrove and then the South China Sea. The sea was shallow for at least a mile out, mostly because of sediment deposited by the Mekong. On the edge of the Mangrove Swamp was a SEAL [the U.S. Navy's Sea, Air, Land, Special forces] base. The Viet Cong used one mangrove both for cover and transportation routes. The SEALs would generally go out on night patrols to interdict that travel. One gained a lot of admiration for them because it was certainly a high-risk proposition. The most military kind of thing we ended up doing in the Ba Tri district team was very often calling in and supporting Medevac (medical evacuation) helicopters because the SEALs would often end up in firefights on their night patrols. At 3:00 a.m., we were having helicopters coming in to deploy out of our district compound in order to go down and get SEALs out of trouble. The SEAL base had two advantages for us. One was that there was a group of Pinochle players there, and the other was that once a month or so they had a Navy supply ship come down to resupply them, so we could usually count on them for things like lettuce, frozen steaks, and so on. One of the problems with living in the Delta was that we were at the very end of the U.S. supply line. I remember when I arrived we had, in that compound, no generator. The town power, to the extent it existed, would go out about 9:00 P.M. Actually, we had a generator, but it didn't work. We sent it back to Saigon for repair, and we were told it was an old model the Army no longer issued. We weren't a big enough team to qualify for the size of generator they were then issuing, so it was a Catch-22. Nonetheless, we received our monthly supply of two or three fifty-gallon drums of gasoline, to supply the generator. Well, one day the district chief came to me and said, "Look, I have a deal for you here. My brother runs the ice plant in town, which happens to have a gasoline compressor. How about if I provide you with a diesel generator and a soldier to run it, and you turn over the gasoline to me?" I did that quite happily. So, we finally had a generator. However, it was so small that we could either watch a movie or have the lights on, but not both at the same time.

After 10 months in the Delta, (the tour in Vietnam is 18 months generally) I was transferred to Saigon, to work as staff aide to Deputy Ambassador Sam Berger. He and Ambassador Bunker generally chose staff aides from among the CORDS officers. I was fortunate to be chosen. The move to Saigon was a radical change. I had been, in theory, in the Foreign Service, but in fact, seconded, more or less, to the military. I was supposedly seconded to AID, but when you lived out in that part of the world, you were not very AID-like or certainly not very Foreign Service-like. So the move to Saigon was first real experience of working in an embassy. By this time, I had been in the Foreign Service for about two years. Ellsworth Bunker was the Ambassador. Samuel Berger was called Deputy Ambassador. Berger had been an Ambassador in his own right, to Korea, as well as Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asia. There are myriad stories, as you know.

Q: Well, why don't you tell me. I would like to hear what you heard about Sam Burger.

COTTER: No, not about Sam. I was talking about Saigon, in general.

Q: Well, tell me, because this is for the record, not for us.

COTTER: Well, working in the Berger/Bunker front office was an interesting experience. Sam was a fairly gruff person. Both he and Bunker were very focused on the substance of what they were doing. Bunker was a gentleman of the old school, who may not have remembered your name but was unfailingly polite to you. Sam was not that polite. I was young and innocent, and when I left, Sam was too busy to do a performance evaluation on me. It wasn't until my next post, when I was mentioning this to my boss, who said, "you've got to have a performance evaluation." I contacted PER, who confirmed that I should have an evaluation. So, I had to send a cable back to Berger and ask him to do a performance evaluation for me, which he did somewhat haphazardly after the fact. Unfortunately, again, this is what Saigon was like. The Embassy was so big and so busy, there wasn't a lot of cohesiveness, even among the junior officers, as to how the system functioned. It was a strange atmosphere. Sam Berger did have two lovely daughters, one of whom was Sherry. The officer who was Bill Colby's staff aide, Tony Allitto, and I, along with Sherry Berger, took one of the "honeymoon specials" to Nepal. Bunker was married to Carol Laise, who was Ambassador to Nepal. Bunker, in true imperial style, had an executive-equipped DC7 at his disposal. Once a month or so, either Carol would fly to Saigon or he would fly to Nepal. He would usually take staff along. On one of those trips, I met Skip Gnehm, who at the time was a Vice Consul in Kathmandu.

Bill Colby, who headed the CORDs program at that time, was really outstanding. He would have, about once a month, a dinner for some of the civilian advisors out in the field. As I recall, there were generally 10 to 12 invited. He would have us over to his house for dinner where very free-ranging discussions took place. It was a nice opportunity for most of us to come up to Saigon, have a nice dinner, and engage in some conversation. I think it was very useful for Colby because he would get the kind of insight into what was going on in the field that few senior people in Saigon ever got. Once you got a group like this together, you probably got more sensible information about what was going on than you did any other way. It's worth noting that we did, from the field, very little reporting. We got occasional visits from people from the Embassy, but not that often. Frankly, down in the out-of-the-way parts of the Delta, we got much less in the way of visits than did advisors in other parts of the country, that, for whatever reason, were always considered more important. I was in Saigon during the incursion when we finally went into Cambodia.

Q: That was in May or June of 1970.

COTTER: Was it 1971?

Q: 1970.

COTTER: That was before I would have gotten to Saigon. I got to Saigon after. It was May of 1970?

Q: Around then, because I was in Saigon, I went in July 1970.

COTTER: I still believe that the Cambodia incursion was a military necessity and the right thing to do. I know we were much criticized for it, but those of us who were there were aware that Cambodia had long since ceased to be neutral. The large caches of weapons and other material that were taken certainly justified that incursion.

Q: I've been interviewing Winston Lord, and we have been talking about the great indignation, back in Washington, about this invasion of Cambodia. For those of us who were there, what is the big deal. Where is the moral indignation? It wasn't as though we were going into a neutral country.

COTTER: All we were doing was beginning to level the playing field. I must say that I had come out of the Delta with quite a bit of respect for what our government was trying to do. I like the fact that I went to a place where there were no American troops. To this day, I think the Mekong Delta is the heart of what South Vietnam was. One of the problems, of course, was that South Vietnam was never run by South Vietnamese. It was always run by Central Vietnamese. A lot has been written about how Vietnam works; that it is shaped like a dumbbell, a big north, and a big south, and a narrow belt in the middle; and how for centuries, the central area, which couldn't support itself, has managed to rule breadbaskets in the north and the south. I think Ho Chi Minh was from the center and Diem was from the center. Southerners were always, even by the Saigon government, looked down upon as country cousins, and not taken very seriously. But, people who lived there were good farmers and the heart of the nation. I think they were much more comfortable living under the Saigon government, and what it would have been, than they were under the communists.

Anyway, at this time, I was staff aide, which was essentially pushing papers and making sure clearances were done. You get some interesting anecdote out of this time. We actually had for a while, four Ambassadors in Vietnam. Bill Colby also had the rank of Ambassador. And while I was in Saigon, there appeared on the scene as head of the third region (around Saigon) Ambassador Richard Funkhouser, who had been Ambassador in an African post. Funkhouser first also used the title. I remember one day the Marines called, and said the German ambassador was arriving in a helicopter on the roof. I didn't understand what the marine was talking about, as the German ambassador didn't have a helicopter and wouldn't have been allowed to park it on our roof in any event. Then I recalled we had gotten a call from his office saying that Ambassador Funkhouser would be arriving, and indeed, Ambassador Funkhouser, who had a helicopter, as the head of CORDs in the third region, arrived on the roof. Finally, at one point, Burger had to call him in and tell him that while he might have been Ambassador at one point, he was creating too much confusion by using the title in Vietnam. He wasn't entitled to use the title in Vietnam, and that we already had a confusing number of Ambassadors. So, Richard Funkhouser reverted to just plain Mr.

Q: While you were in the Delta, what was your impression of the problem with the central government, of corruption, how things were being translated to that center, down?

COTTER: Corruption was endemic. I served most of my career in Third World countries, most of which underpay civil servants and public security officials, with the result that all of those officials tend to live on what I call "user taxes." If you want a service provided, you pay for it. When you are paying civil servants or police officials five dollars a month, it is sort of to be expected that this happens. That kind of corruption was endemic. I know that more senior officers were accused of selling goods and other things. At a district level, you really didn't see this. Your Vietnamese counterpart was usually a Major, living generally with his family. In a military situation, I don't doubt at all that all of those people made more money in various ways than their salaries. But, they certainly didn't live ostentatiously. When you got down that far, you didn't see much impact from the central government. We did not have, in Kien Hoa, regular ARVN, Army of the Republic of Vietnam Troops. The only troops we had were regional forces and popular forces, most of whom were commanded by local people, and most of whom, as a result, had affinity with the local people. How much collaboration went on with the Viet Cong is, of course, a different question. There was always suspicion that a number of the "Popular Force" and regional force people were playing both sides of the street, and particularly in a place like Kien Hoa, where parts of the province, for which regional forces nominally had responsibility were not accessible to those forces or anyone from the government. Because those units undoubtedly had patrolling requirements, I'm sure that a good number of them had things worked out that said, "We won't bother you, if you don't bother us." The other option was they were probably going to get killed.

Q: In Kien Hoa, for example, where you say about half the villages were unreachable. Was there somebody sitting back in the Fourth Corps, or something, saying, "We have to get to those places?" I mean, mounting military operations or was it just let go?

COTTER: It was just sort of let go. They were low level efforts. Again, we and the Vietnamese put quite a bit of effort into the regional forces of, and we put a lot of effort in the CORDS program, into providing commodities and other benefits to villages, to try and convince them to come over to the government. The impact of the Tet Offensive was only beginning to be seen. When I was there, it had a devastating effect on the Viet Cong. Actually, I am getting ahead of myself a little bit. I went back to the Delta in 1973, after the cease fire, and I was one of the first tranche of language officers who went back to monitor the cease fire. That was after two Tet Offensives, one of them the one of 1968, and the other of 1972, which had really devastated the Viet Cong. When I got back to Kien Hoa in 1973, there were North Vietnamese troops there. The province that had provided the Viet Cong with troops as recently as 1970, was forced by 1973 to bring in northern troops in order to sustain a North Vietnamese/Viet Cong effort. By that time, I could visit almost all of the villages in the province. Some of them were difficult to get to because the roads were not very passable, but you could visit them all. In essence, by 1973, we had won the war in Kien Hoa. If they had to depend on North Vietnamese troops there, the Viet Cong had lost the war, because the North Vietnamese were as foreign in accent and behavior, practically, as Americans were, to the South Vietnamese. I think this was true in good parts of the Delta, simply because by their miscalculations in both 1968 and 1972, the Viet Cong exposed significant numbers of their critical political and military cadre who were killed.

Q: The villages that were under Viet Cong rule, how were the people living there?

COTTER: Not very well, by all reports, but it is difficult to tell, because you didn't get in. When we got in later on, by 1973, what you found were villages in very bad shape because they were subject to some patrolling during the day and attack from helicopters. Every night the 105 mm artillery that belonged to the district would fire. In theory, they had ranged in on trails used by the Viet Cong. They would fire randomly on those trails. Some people said the regional forces really didn't bother that. They simply had "X" number of rounds, and would fire them off into the coconut groves. But people who lived in those areas certainly didn't live as well as people who lived in areas controlled by the government.. Again, in the Delta, you didn't have the kinds of things that you had up north, the strategic villages and what not, where we gathered people, and put them into villages. That kind of thing never occurred. Most of these folks were rice farmers. The coconut groves were not well maintained because they were dangerous, either from booby traps or from the presence of Viet Cong. People didn't live very well in the Viet Cong areas simply because the Viet Cong didn't have the resources to improve their lives.

Q: When you were back in Saigon, back in the big city, were you getting anything from the junior officer Mafia? There, more than anywhere else, or any other time in the history of the Foreign Service, we had people, who, like yourself, were coming in, and had been out in the District, and really had been seeing things, from the ground, rather than the perspective of the capital. What were you talking about among yourselves, about how things were going, wither Vietnam, that sort of thing? Was there much of that?

COTTER: I'm sure there was a lot of discussion. I know that there was significant unhappiness because the kind of reporting that went up, if it was at all negative, from a reporting officer's in the field, wasn't particularly appreciated. In other words, there was a goal that we were attempting to reach, and reports that didn't support that goal were not appreciated. I remember at one point I came in for some criticism because I had sent up a report that was positive on the Viet Cong situation in Dinh Tuong. It brought down on me the wrath of the CIA station chief. His name was Tom Polgar. They said that I was being negative. They actually sent someone down to the district to talk to me. This was a guy named Frank Snepp, who later wrote quite a controversial, probably quite accurate, book on Vietnam that was suppressed by the CIA, because he wasn't supposed to write it.

Q: A Decent Interval, I think it is called.

COTTER: Frank did a lot more traveling around than a lot of other people. My guess is he probably had responsibility for the Delta, as opposed to other regions. It is hard for me to say. There was certainly unhappiness with the accuracy of some of the reporting or the fact that Embassy reporting in Saigon didn't necessarily reflect what was going on in the countryside. But, again, so little of any of that was focused on the Delta to begin with. My experience in the Delta would have been much more instructive had I served somewhere in Central Vietnam and could have gauged it much more. As I say, the Delta was simply not ever considered integral to what we were doing. Also, I think as a staff aide, and not working in the Political Section, you weren't quite part of that junior officer Mafia as much as you would have been if you were actually working in the Section.

Q: Did you get any feel for relations with the CIA, for example, in the Embassy?

COTTER: No. In the field, you worked some together. I must say, I don't recall any experience with the Phoenix program, in my district. We had CIA people in the province but not the district. The Intel people were Lieutenants in the Army. I think relations with the CIA were okay, except that the CIA was again like everyone else, interested in, not necessarily what was going on, but what we had determined we wanted to go on. My feeling is that our effort in Vietnam would have been very successful. We lost the war not in Vietnam, but back here in the States. By the time I got back in 1973, this was very obvious. That was two years before we left, but we had already started cutting back significantly on the assistance we were giving the Vietnamese. One of the hardest things I ever had to do in the Foreign Service was one of the things we ended up doing back there during my second stint, was in essence, telling the Vietnamese who were accusing us of abandoning them, "No we aren't. I am here as actual, physical proof that we aren't abandoning you." Of course, we were abandoning them. For instance, in 1971 the Vietnamese fired off 105 millimeter rounds every evening. That didn't happen in 1973. Well, maybe, you say, because the place was pacified, but I think the reason was because there was no longer a steady supply of shells. The Vietnamese had to account much better for expendable items than we did. They weren't going to use up shells that weren't going to be replaced. When the war ended, it wasn't a bunch of rag, tag, cousins in black pajamas that came down the pike, it was the North Vietnamese Army driving Soviet tanks. In fact, the Russians supplied that force. At that time, we had stopped supplying the South Vietnamese, essentially. We lost the war because people in the United States were not willing to see it through. The government hadn't articulated the reasons for it, or whatever, or the press had misplayed it. Now, again, we are now at a time in history when it is easy to sit with hindsight, after Vietnam and the Cold War, and look back on the inevitability of various things. I'm not certain whether the war itself created as much suffering for the Vietnamese people as what happened to the South after they were taken over by the North. In many ways, not only reeducation of individuals, but simply the reorientation of what, frankly, is very free, economy-oriented people. The Vietnamese, at least the South Vietnamese could not have taken very well to whatever form of collectivization was forced on them. How that turns out, I'm not certain. I think we had good and laudable goals, if we had had the ability to articulate it back here and carry it through, it would have been worthwhile. We would have saved Cambodia imaginable suffering. We would have saved the Laotians significant suffering, and we certainly would have saved the South Vietnamese significant suffering, which was due, to a significant part, to us having lost interest in that adventure.

Q: I take it the media didn't cross your path at all?

COTTER: Very little. Who is the woman who wrote the famous book?

Q: Fitzgerald.

COTTER: Yes, Frances Fitzgerald, she came down once, but very few other media got down that far. You had some media who would visit the Coconut Monk, but you would never see them at a district because we lived beyond the Coconut Monk. They would come down from Saigon, on a day trip. Other than that, you found very few journalists who actually came that far down, which was too bad because they generally got treated very well when they came, simply because we would be starved for any company. District teams were usually happy to put journalists up, but we didn't get very many journalists. You had very few in Kien Hoa and very few from Saigon, in general, because it was hard to get to, and because it had a reputation of being a dangerous place.

Q: You left Saigon in 1971. How did you feel about where things were going, at that point?

COTTER: My feeling was that things were going positively, that we finally had gotten engaged in Cambodia, and had begun seriously to try to disrupt the Ho Chi Minh trail. The war was not going badly in the south. You saw less from there than you would have back in the States, with the impact of the press, I think. In those days, you didn't have CNN. We didn't very often get the New York Times. We essentially got Stars and Stripes and Armed Forces radio, which were your accesses to the world. But, from what one could see in Saigon and where I had been in the Delta, the war was going quite well. Of course, Johnson had resigned over the war, and Nixon had come in. I guess it was fairly obvious by the time Nixon came in, or at least soon thereafter, that one of his goals was to find a way out. One had hoped for a way out with honor, but I'm not sure we achieved that.

RICHARD A. VIRDEN
Wireless File Correspondent, USIS

Saigon (1970-1971)

Mr. Virden was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at St. John's College in Collegeville, Minnesota. He joined the Foreign Service of the United States Information Service (USIA) IN 1963 and served variously as Information, Press and Public Affairs Officer, attaining the rank of Deputy Chief of Mission in Brasilia. His foreign posts include Bangkok, Phitsanulik and Chiang Mai in Thailand; Saigon, Vietnam; Belo Horizonte, Sao Paulo and Brasilia in Brazil; and Warsaw, Poland, where he served twice. Mr. Virden also had several senior assignments at USIA Headquarters in Washington, DC. Mr. Virden was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

VIRDEN: So that was it. Well, I thought about it for awhile and decided to go ahead. One of the jobs that was open was for a Wireless File correspondent; since I had a background in journalism and continued to be interested in it, that appealed to me more than serving, say, on a provincial advisory team.

So I chose that; USIA agreed and sent me to French language training for a few months, then on to Saigon, where I arrived in July, 1970. I stayed until October of 1971.

Q: So you were in Saigon?

VIRDEN: I was based in Saigon, but I traveled all over the south. I moved around in South Vietnam, reporting what was going on in areas like pacification, refugees. I wrote hard news and feature stories for the USIA wireless file; these pieces would appear in military publications like Stars and Stripes and other commercial newspapers around the world.

I sometimes attended the infamous "Five O'clock Follies," to hear what the U.S. and Vietnamese military and civilian briefers were saying and pick up leads on stories to chase down, in Saigon and in the field. I hitched rides on U.S. military helicopters and fixed wing aircraft, Air America too, to get around.

Early on I had an emotional reunion at a firebase near Chu Lai, off the central coast, with my brother Tom, who was then nearing the end of his one-year tour as an Army grunt; he'd grown up since I'd seen him last, as a fun loving teenager, three and a half years earlier.

Q: What was your impression, you mentioned the "Five O'clock Follies," the press briefing that was held at five o'clock, the nickname for it, what was your impression of the media, the American media, there at that time?

VIRDEN: By this time most reporters were aggressively skeptical and anti-war. Remember what period we're talking about here. This was the summer of 1970, and most Americans had pretty much turned against the war by then.

We still had a huge military presence, of course, about 400,000 troops in the south. That was down from a peak of 543,000. We'd started a process of so-called Vietnamization, so we were reducing that figure gradually. By the time I left we were under 200,000. But throughout that period, we were a major presence.

You had a whole variety of correspondents. It was a very large press corps, from the U.S., Vietnam and around the world. Many were very good, dedicated reporters. Some had been there for the duration. There were others who never left Saigon and “covered” the war from their desks in the city. But most of them were diligent, courageous, well qualified people. I was impressed with them.

I spent some time with them, including more than a month in a makeshift press camp up in the northern part of the country when the South Vietnamese Army crossed the border into Laos, near Khe Sanh, to try to cut off the Ho Chi Minh Trail. That was in January and February of 1971. There was a press camp set up somewhere in Quang Tri province to facilitate coverage of this operation.

And, again, I saw a lot of very dedicated journalists doing their job; some of them died trying to get the story of this particular campaign.

Later in life, when I was teaching at the National War College, I was pleased to bring one of the greatest of the Vietnam correspondents, David Halberstam, to speak there.

Q: Of course he was the author of The Best and the Brightest.

VIRDEN: Yes, he won the Pulitzer Prize for that book, which is a devastating analysis of how America’s elite led us into a quagmire in Vietnam.

Q: Yeah. Did you find that sort of you were considered a government flack or something like that by the media people?

VIRDEN: Well, I don’t know about that, I suppose there may have been some who looked at us that way. Most didn’t spend any time thinking about us one way or another; they had a big war to report. The reporters I knew seemed to regard me and the other two wireless file correspondents as simply colleagues. We showed up at the same places they did and reported what we saw and heard.

I remember one feature I wrote that first summer about the so-called “Street Without Joy.” Bernard Fall wrote a book by that title, about the French experience in that stretch of land. Maybe you know that area?

Q: Oh, yes. I’ve traveled it, from Da Nang up to Quang Tri.

VIRDEN: Yes, exactly. Were you in Vietnam at this same period?

Q: I left in July of 1970. I was consul general there.

VIRDEN: Well, we must have just crossed paths then. You left the month I arrived. And you’d been there for --

Q: 18 months.

VIRDEN: I'm sorry we didn't meet at that time.

Anyway, I went up to that area in July or August of 1970. I flew to Da Nang on a C-130 and then went by Jeep through that string of villages, which were coming back to life in this period. Pacification was actually having some effect.

People had basically abandoned those villages around the time of the 1968 Tet Offensive, considering them unsafe. Now, two years later, relative security had been restored and people were moving back home. So I wrote a feature describing what had been done to make that progress possible; it got a big spread in Stars and Stripes and was picked up by quite a few other publications.

I remember covering a ceremony for a group of Chieu Hoi, defectors from the Viet Cong who were coming over to the government side. On another occasion I interviewed a North Vietnamese POW. A sampling of other topics included a Vietnamese doctor running a field hospital up in the highlands; American legal experts invited to help re-write some of the country's basic laws; land reform; Vietnamese elections; and press conferences held by visiting politicians of a variety of political persuasions. Vietnam was still a huge international story, and there were few slow days.

Q: My impression was -- I wasn't, obviously, in the media side of things -- but there were a lot of really amateur journalists there.

VIRDEN: Yes, well, there were a lot of very young guys -- and a few women -- who didn't have any training as journalists but just sort of caught on as local stringers or runners for some of the media organizations. Some of them learned fast and did a good job and others were opportunists.

So you got a mixed bag, yes. They were not all of sterling character. Some of them were just adventurers and some of them were shoddy journalists.

My general impression, though, was that most of them were dedicated and really determined to discover the reality and report it accurately. They didn't always succeed. I remember standing on the tarmac at Ton Son Nhut with much of the Saigon press corps when Henry Kissinger, then the National Security Advisor to President Nixon, left Vietnam for Pakistan. No one sniffed out that he would take off from Pakistan for Beijing -- and end more than two decades of our non-recognition of China.

Q: Well, I would think you would have been sometimes in a difficult position, where sort of the free media was reporting one way and we were trying to, particularly the military or the embassy side was trying to report something the other way and there you are in the middle.

VIRDEN: Yes, well, I think as a country we had a major problem with what was called the “credibility gap.” I saw lots of examples of the divergence between the Washington narrative and the on-the-ground reality. One of the worst was something called the “hamlet evaluation system,” under which you got inflated statistics all the way up through the internal reporting channels. It brought to mind that old saying about “lies, damned lies and statistics.”

You had all these numbers about how great everything was going; that included the body count, which was often invented or exaggerated every step up the line, from the lowest level on up. A recent Vietnam novel, Matterhorn, reminded me all over again how that worked and how self-deceiving the numbers were.

Q: Yes, whether officials could sleep in the village at night and that sort of thing. One cooks statistics if you can.

VIRDEN: Well, that’s what gave rise to the phrase in those days, the credibility gap. Or think back to old computer terminology, “garbage in, garbage out.”

That was not the kind of reporting we did. Those of us working for the wireless file and U.S. government publications were just trying to relate facts, some of the untold or under told stories that also merited attention.

So, the body count and other such statistics to measure progress in the war, we were not using that kind of stuff. If you believed the figures in the hamlet evaluation system, we were always on the verge of declaring victory – until we lost. We did not do that kind of reporting.

Q: as we were both there, the media tended to concentrate on horror stories or something. This is true of course in the United States. You don’t report on how nice things are here in Arlington, you report on a disaster somewhere.

VIRDEN: Well, that’s the nature of the beast, perhaps. That’s what commercial media, some of them, believe: that “if it bleeds, it leads,” that kind of reporting. To some extent what we were trying to do was counter that by simply reporting some of the other events or broader developments that were also part of the picture but were not being noted.

Q: Did you ever run across times when they would take your story and not publish it for policy reasons, or that sort of thing?

VIRDEN: Yes, once in a while, there would be pressure to try to make things look better than they were and I would feel that from either an editor in Saigon or back in Washington.

An example is that invasion of Laos in early 1971. That was a real test case. The South Vietnamese Army went across to try to cut off the Ho Chi Minh Trail once and for all. Unfortunately, it didn’t work very well; they got their tails handed to them.

The United States provided air support, but we did not go in on the ground with them, so it was kind of an early test case of how the ARVN, the Army of South Vietnam, would do on their own. They did not do very well.

There was pressure on us to report this invasion as a success story from the get-go, but we were able to fend that off by arguing that inflated claims would only undermine U.S. credibility and ultimately blow up in our faces.

Q: What was your impression of the government of South Vietnam, its extension into the field, its officials and all?

VIRDEN: My conclusion was that we were backing the wrong side. The government just was too weak and corrupt; Americans had basically taken over most of the war for the South, trying to win it for them. And in the end that couldn't be done.

I'll put it this way: based on what I saw out there, I came to believe we got ourselves on the wrong side of Vietnamese nationalism. Even though we sent a half million man expeditionary force over there we could not change the stark fact that the government of the South couldn't attract the loyalty of its own people.

It's a simplification, of course, but I think accurate. The Viet Cong and North Vietnamese and Ho Chi Minh -- as a representative or symbol of Vietnamese nationalism -- were stronger than our South Vietnamese ally. Try as we might, it was not within our power to change that fundamental reality.

Q: Did this leave you with a template for viewing future American policy, as you went around. You'd been in a place where basically we'd backed the wrong horse.

VIRDEN: That's a very good question. Yes, it did; one fundamental conviction I developed at this time -- and hold to this day -- is that military force is a blunt instrument not well suited to solving political problems. We would be better off relying on other instruments, other tools, instead of resorting so readily and so often to military power.

A related observation is that in crunch time U.S. military commanders prefer to rely on U.S. troops -- who are well trained, well equipped and will follow orders -- rather than depend on local allies -- who might fall short in any or all of those categories. We saw this phenomenon when we took over the war in Vietnam, and we're seeing it again now in our reluctance to turn matters over to our local allies in Iraq and Afghanistan until they receive still more "training." This tendency to turn to our own forces is natural enough, but it does not bode well for our prospects in any future proxy wars. And it should make us wary of trusting military commanders to decide when we can safely hand over the keys.

Q: By this time, how'd you feel about a career with the U.S. Information Service?

VIRDEN: Well, I have to say that I don't regret having gone to Vietnam. It was a central event for my generation. It dominated our national life during that period, and in many ways the fault lines that were either created or exposed by the Vietnam War still define to our political life today.

So I was glad I was there to witness it and learn from it. But wartime Saigon was also a corrupt, raffish, cynical place; I was relieved my tour was over and was ready to move on to other assignments.

Q: You left in '71?

VIRDEN: Yes, late '71. I left Saigon in October and Linda and I were married in late December, in her hometown in Minnesota, during a snow storm. Our first assignment together was Brazil, where we went in the spring of 1972.

Q: Well, how did your wife and your family and friends back in Minnesota and all, how'd they feel about the war?

VIRDEN: Very anti-war, very strong feeling there, as much of the country, against the war. This was also the time when Americans were not treating returning soldiers very well, to our shame.

I think John Kerry said this -- and I liked his way of putting it -- during the 2004 election: "You have to separate the war from the warriors and whatever you may think of the war, don't blame the people that are sent out there to fight it. Blame the politicians for sending them."

We failed to make that distinction during the Vietnam War and maybe we've learned from that. The Iraq War was also highly unpopular, but the soldiers who were sent out there to fight it were not blamed for it.

NATALE H. BELLOCCHI
CORDS
Da Nang (1970-1971)

Commercial Attaché
Saigon (1971-1972)

Ambassador Natale H. Bellocchi was born in Little Falls, New York in 1926. He received a degree in industrial management from Georgia Tech in 1944 and was soon drafted into the U.S. Army to serve in a rifle platoon during the Korean War. His Foreign Service career included positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, Japan, India, and an ambassadorship to Botswana. Ambassador Bellocchi was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 21, 1995.

Q: So you were in Vietnam from when to when?

BELLOCCHI: '70 to '72, and it was quite a shock.

Q: Where did you go?

BELLOCCHI: I was assigned first in the CORDS program for one year. I went up to Da Nang, and then to a small place called Tam Key, which is sort of a wide place in the Street Without Joy up there, in the northern part of South Vietnam. It was a shock because I had been to Vietnam many times as a courier when the French were still there. And the place that we were sent from once we got to Saigon, was Da Nang. Da Nang had been called Tourane and it was a beautiful little seashore village. Cathay Pacific Airplanes used to have to stop there on their way to Bangkok from Hong Kong. In those days propeller craft had to stop someplace; they couldn't go that far. It had been beautiful. And here I got out, and oh dear. I mean there were American military people all over the place. The first thing that happened, a bunch of kids came around, grabbed my watch and ran off. I thought, oh my gosh, what has happened to this place?

John Gunther Dean was then the sort of district director of CORDS up there in Da Nang. I went in to see him before going down to my place of assignment in Tam Key. The night before he had had a dinner for several Foreign Service people in I Corps. When I left the next morning he said, "The only advice I can give you, is that before you get on that little airplane (there was a little airplane to take me down to Tam Key)take a good shot of cognac." I thought, what in the world is happening.

It turned out it was quite a place. We had defenses all over the housing area to protect ourselves. The area was controlled by the Viet Cong during the night, and we had it during the day. If we wanted to go out to the boondocks, which I did on many occasions, the only question was, are you sure you're going to be able to get back before nightfall. It was quite an experience, I must say.

Q: Was this north of Da Nang?

BELLOCCHI: Just south of Da Nang. There had been some problem with the Americal Division whose base was on the coast. They had been pretty badly decimated. Units were still going out to the Triple Canopy jungle, which was not too far away, to set up outposts. Once you got away from the seacoast you got into that business. Having been in the military, I had been in the army in Korea, the state of our military there was appalling.

Q: This was at its worst, wasn't it?

BELLOCCHI: They were half-dressed and ill-shaven, dirty and undisciplined. I mean this was just unbelievable. You couldn't help but understand right away, why we had to get out of there or we wouldn't have an army left. There were a lot of things that happened during my time there. Of course, fighting still persisted in our province. I had an occasion where...a little boy had just been orphaned by the fact that some of our troops had been in and shot up the village. The parents had been shot as Viet Cong. And how could they possibly know who was Viet Cong and who wasn't? It was impossible. Some of the Vietnamese had weapons merely to protect themselves. Then somebody came who claimed she was the aunt of the little boy, and I guess everyone finally agreed that it was best that she take the boy. Whether she was the aunt or not, who knows, and what she wanted the boy for. That kind of incident is really sad. It was really clear that we had to get out of there.

Q: We were already withdrawing our forces, weren't we?

BELLOCCHI: Yes. But this was a part of Vietnam where there was still some fighting going on. Down in the south it had been much more pacified, but up in the north it was still risky business to go out in these helicopters and little villages in the hills away from the coast somewhere. Everyone was fine and friendly but you better be sure you get back on that helicopter. They better come and pick you up or you're stuck for the night, and in bad shape.

Q: What were you doing?

BELLOCCHI: Well, CORDS, and I was the deputy, what they called province senior adviser. A military man was the senior adviser. You had AID people there, most of them were giving away wheat and helping start little projects. But by the time I was there, the Vietnamese province governors, or whatever they're called, chiefs, they had been handling groups of American advisers who'd been passing through that place for so long, that they sort of said, why don't you get over there and do your own thing. And that was really what we were doing, except some of our military, always very energetic, wanted to actually get things done. Occasionally they would join in on some clean-up operations out in the hills. On a couple of occasions I would jump on a helicopter and go out there, and actually do a little warring while I was there. I'm not particularly attracted to that kind of thing, but I was curious. It kept us busy, but I was quite anxious to get back to something I knew, and after a year when something opened up in Saigon I was delighted to go down to the embassy .

Q: Before we move down to Saigon, what was the morale like? The military was bad, how about within the Foreign Service people there?

BELLOCCHI: In the Foreign Service or AID, or any of those others, it was there for the money primarily. There really was not much enthusiasm. You didn't see any kind of dedicated people really out there that wanted to improve the livelihood of the people, and that kind of thing, no. They were there to put in their time.

Q: By this time, I guess, everything had been tried that could have been tried, wasn't it?

BELLOCCHI: They were pretty well along. The Americans in their own way had done a pretty good job in many ways. They did have these provinces organized. They had been pacified in some of these areas. But we dealt primarily with provincial militia. We didn't deal with ARVN at all.

Q: ARVN being the Army of the Republic of Vietnam, the regular army.

BELLOCCHI: We never saw them in Tam Key. We dealt with the militia, and the militia was there defending their own farm lands. So these guys were far more dependable frankly to work with than the ARVN who was out to see what they could get out of all this.

Q: Did you have any feeling--again, we're talking about when you were in the province--about corruption?

BELLOCCHI: Oh, yes. You'd load up a truck full of bags of wheat, and it starts down from Da Nang, by the time it gets to where it's going you've lost maybe 20% of it. They're paying off all the way down. Oh, yes, it was rampant all over the place. And even at that level I'm sure there was much bigger stuff going on above it.

Q: I take it at this point, even though you were part of the 12 years experience of a one-shot deal for your year there. Had people, I'm talking about the Americans, gotten pretty used to the way things were done in Vietnam, and not fighting the system?

BELLOCCHI: Not trying to change the world. Yes, absolutely. That's why I say there wasn't anybody there that was trying to change the world, not trying to change them. They were there to put in their time, and do their little bit.

Q: The peace talks were going on, but no great progress was made.

BELLOCCHI: Well, there wasn't progress, and it was still at that time the idea that we were leaving, but we were turning over everything to the Vietnamese to do the job. We'd given the ARVN all of the equipment they needed. We'd established a civil authority in the provinces all over the place. The idea was increasingly, let them do it themselves as we leave, hoping that somehow they would be able to manage it. They called it "a decent interval." I think there was a lot of enthusiasm for this idea. An awful lot had been done in that sense. There had been a lot done but it wasn't the time. To try to do that while they're still fighting a war was just, I think, beyond reason.

Q: Then you went down to Saigon. You were in Saigon approximately from when to when?

BELLOCCHI: One year up north and one year in Saigon.

Q: So this means '71 to '72. Who was the ambassador then?

BELLOCCHI: Bunker was still there. Sam Berger was the deputy ambassador.

Q: What was your impression of the embassy when you went there? Here you had been sitting in this little province and all of a sudden you're in...

BELLOCCHI: ...in the big embassy. My office actually was in the old embassy, and not in the new one, but of course we'd go to the new embassy quite often. Well, you're struck by guards all over, soldiers all over protecting you, and protecting the embassy--quite a large bureaucracy. The ambassador and deputy ambassador had sort of a coordinating office. Charlie Hill was one I remember. Hawk Mills was another one. They were fairly high level Foreign Service people. They were acting as coordinators just for the ambassador's office. And then you had the economic section that wrapped up the AID program people all working together. You had a huge station.

Q: Station being the CIA.

BELLOCCHI: It was very large. We'd been there too long. Even our political officers were getting wrapped up a lot with people trying to determine who was who. But also in the corruption and the high living that went on, mostly without their wives.

Q: I was there '69 to '70 for 18 months. It was not a healthy atmosphere.

BELLOCCHI: It was very unhealthy. I was very pleased because when I went down to Saigon, I was the only Chinese language officer in the embassy at that time, and Bunker wanted me to be sort of the liaison with the Chinese community. I was given the title of commercial attaché, but clearly there was no commerce being done there. It was a good title for working with the Chinese community. In that regard, my wife, who was set up in Bangkok, and it was agreed I could have her come down. There were only four or five of us that had our families in Saigon at that time. It was absolutely the right decision because all of our dealings with the Chinese...they're great party-givers, and the girlie restaurants are common in Cho Lon. But because I had my wife we did all of our entertaining and socializing with the Chinese community as families. And they, of course, were very accommodating in bringing their wives for a change to a party. But that made it much easier for me to conduct myself in the way we should conduct ourselves, by having the family there. It made a big difference.

Q: Because so much of what went on was sort of a bachelor existence. Americans aren't very good at this sort of thing. I mean, we either feel uncomfortable, or you go overboard.

BELLOCCHI: And we socialize a lot, so therefore it was a bad situation. Most of the Americans that were there were bachelors, but so many had people they stayed with. It was not a healthy atmosphere, and a lot of them got wrapped up in these things. I was just pleased that I could have the family there.

Q: Again, I want to talk about the '71 to '72 period. How could you characterize the Chinese community, and how did they fit into the scheme of things?

BELLOCCHI: They controlled the economy, of course, just as they do in most southeastern Asian countries. Many of them were very, very helpful to the Vietnamese authorities. Many of the Vietnamese and Chinese had known each other for years. I think many of them made themselves a fortune. But they also cooperated very much, and were very helpful. I remember one of the Viet Cong campaigns out in the countryside outside of Saigon. Several of the Chinese owned a lot of textile factories around the area. They kept their people employed even when they were not able to produce anything because of the Viet Cong interdictions in the roads that prevented any delivery of the goods. They just kept them employed. They were almost like the family, almost like the mafia type of situation where some of these guys are very important, and very rough, but they have a whole group of sub-businessmen that sort of rely on them. And these leading Chinese were very paternalistic in the way they dealt with their subordinates.

I can remember the Economic Minister asking me if I could help in talking to the Chinese community to keep the price of rice from increasing. It was during a Viet Cong campaign when traditionally the price of rice would start jumping up. And they did. And I think in that sense they were very cooperative. The leading businessmen all took care of themselves, and once Saigon fell most of them wound up in places like Hong Kong. They all had passports that got them out. So common. Many and most of them that went to places like Hong Kong, did not survive very long in the business sense. Their ability to make a lot of money, was in knowing the country, and the officials, and the human relationships. Once they got into another a Chinese area, where they could even speak the language, they didn't know how to operate and they lost their money very quickly.

Q: Did you see, because I think it has some pertinence to almost what is happening in the United States, the Chinese have this renowned ability to go in and sort of set up business, small stores, what have you. And the Vietnamese seem to be less, you might say, business aggressive. When I was there at almost the same time, there was great concern in Vietnam because we had a lot of what they called third country nationals, TCNs, and among them the Koreans were coming in, and the Koreans are great business people, and they were pushing the Vietnamese aside, and also the Filipinos, but particularly Koreans. The Koreans also seem to have this instinct. Did you find this?

BELLOCCHI: The Chinese are entrepreneurial, it's almost part of the culture, and it has been for hundreds and hundreds of years. Yes, they're entrepreneurial, and because their society and culture is based on human relationships so intensely that they're the best networkers in the world. Even here in America if you go around the Chinese-American community, they have hundreds of associations. Chinese Americans join as many of them as they can, and they network around the country. I'm amazed when I go to meetings here, and find, hey, there's so-and-so from Chicago. There's another one from Atlanta. They get together all the time, they're networking all the time. That's their strength. And it's true in southeast Asia as well.

Q: Now you're at the embassy looking at the bigger picture and I guess you were getting some reflection although you were concerned with the Chinese element, what were you getting from your friends at the embassy, or dealing with the sort of mega situation, whither Vietnam? We're talking about '71 to '72.

BELLOCCHI: In that period of time, I think what I would say is the lower levels in the embassy and AID, and all the others, were still complaining about the corruption of Vietnam as if it was unique to Vietnam. Those of us who have traveled around southeast Asia know that it was part of the whole culture in the whole area. There was nothing unusual about the corruption in Vietnam. Number two, I think that by that time I was certainly impressed with the Vietnamese leadership of the ministerial level, for example. There probably was some corruption. I'm sure there was, but by and large I was impressed with how little there was. There were very many dedicated people in that leadership. I took part in the negotiations between the Vietnamese and some of our oil companies when they were starting to negotiate exploring out there in the area. Boy, it was really very straight, open, transparent. They were very, very careful to keep it very open and transparent so there wasn't any corruption. I remember the Economic Minister was trying to keep the price of rice from going up, and he was always very open the way he was doing things. So I think there were a lot of our senior people in the embassy who had gotten to know the senior people in the Vietnamese government and had considerable confidence in these people. They were doing a pretty good job actually. It may have taken 12 years before it got to that stage, but certainly at that stage there were some pretty good people in the government.

Q: You're pointing out something that I think anybody who is looking at these oral histories, and later things, but it seems to me there's a generational thing. I was basically a consular officer, but had the same thing. After I'd been around for a while, I knew there was a certain amount of lying, and everything else in order to get a visa. But the young officer would come in and coming out of the American culture, horrified; somebody lied to me. Or somebody tried to pay me off. And after you've been around for a while, okay, it's just part of the game.

BELLOCCHI: It's part of the system.

Q: You turn them down, but you don't turn this into...I think the younger people tend to be terribly puritanical, because they're just not ready for this coming out of our society. Today it would be different.

BELLOCCHI: If you don't voice indignation, they take it to be an acceptance. It's not acceptance but you understand what they're thinking.

Q: So I think this is why often one will find many of the protests and the screams coming more from the junior ranks than the more seniors. It's not because the more senior is jaded, or less tolerant, it just understands the situation.

BELLOCCHI: It's just understanding. It's not just a morality problem, but it's an understanding of the problem.

Q: When you got on the plane at Tan San Nyut, you and your wife, what did you think whither Vietnam when you left in '72?

BELLOCCHI: Well, clearly we were leaving, I mean, the U.S. was leaving Vietnam rather quickly. I think there was some optimism that they would be able to hold out. I really do. I think that generally...maybe there was some secret assessments of which I was not a part, where they thought that they couldn't. But I think that by and large people at that time were thinking, we've done a fairly good job and we're giving them the wherewithal. Part of my job as "commercial attaché" was to take part in the local procurement program. Instead of buying things offshore for AID and all the other things that were going on, increasingly we were looking for local suppliers to do that so the Vietnamese could start to generate their own system. I think that there was some optimism that maybe they could hold out.

Q: I felt the same when I left in '70 too.

BELLOCCHI: It may have been unrealistic but it was the case.

Q: It was in many ways a military defeat too, which is always different from just a collapse.

BELLOCCHI: And that's why I think there's some criticism of a recent book of McNamara that he doesn't mention the Vietnamese, there were a lot of Vietnamese that devoted themselves completely to the cause.

Q: McNamara just came out with sort of a mea culpa book--this is Robert McNamara, Secretary of Defense for most of the Vietnam time, and which has gained a lot of attention, but it's all America, and it's all, "We did it wrong." I think it's terribly limited but its gained a lot of notoriety.

BELLOCCHI: Yes, and I think it did not bring in the Vietnamese, and the amount of sacrifice that those people made. You know, wrongly or rightly, they did make an enormous sacrifice.

DAVID WINN
CORDS
Long Khanh (1970-1972)

David M. Winn was born in Texas in 1942. He graduated from Swarthmore College in 1964, received an MA from the University of Texas in 1966 and an MPA from Syracuse University in 1969. He served in the Peace Corps and then joined the Foreign Service in 1969. He has served overseas in Vietnam, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, France and Senegal. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: So, you went to Vietnam, you were there from when to when?

WINN: I went on an 18-month program from the summer of '70, and I extended six months in order to get Arabic, so I was there from the summer of '70 to the summer of '72.

Q: Where did you go?

WINN: To Long Khanh Province, which was about three hours by road northeast of Saigon, Xuan Loc District. We were all assigned to districts, not even a provincial capital. We were assigned to the lowest administrative level, smallest, Xuan Loc District, Long Khanh Province, near a rubber plantation, a beautiful rubber plantation. Long after I left, in 1975 it was the last major town to fall before the North Vietnamese moved into Saigon.

Q: When you got there, how were you received? How did they get you ready?

WINN: When I got to the Vietnam training center?

Q: Well, were you besides French, were you getting good preparation?

WINN: Well, there again, I remember us being bored. We could see even then pretty much the futility of the whole thing. Getting this kind of hodgepodge of various courses in again superficial public administration, a lot of lectures and slides; endless lectures and slides on the various defense forces, the semi-civilian defense forces, local level black pajama, and also how the paperwork on how to issue sheet metal to build schools. It was an odd combination of development and self-defense and that sort of thing. We also had weapons training by the way. There was a week at Fort Gordon, Georgia, learning how to fire various weapons, but I remember long and tedious lectures. Most of it was language training, but extremely boring stuff, all of which one drew on once you got out there since you had to invent the job on the ground. We never did figure out what we were doing out there. We were out there so Lyndon Johnson could say we also had this civilian program in the field. The military we were working with never really figured out exactly what we were doing either. I figured out what I was doing. We were driving out in these little hamlets keeping an eye on the Vietnamese development programs and again trying to stay alive, you know, not getting killed. But it was kind of a bizarre, very bureaucratic training, endless slides and lectures, endless charts on the Vietnamese.

Q: First of all when the military gets into it, you get into the wiring diagram.

WINN: Well, it was a mostly a military run thing, I mean CORDS, I haven't even used the term yet, C-O-R-D-S, basically AID with a heavy security component.

Q: Did you get involved with the embassy at all?

WINN: Oh absolutely not. No, the Embassy, I don't even recall going into the Embassy. In fact, I know I didn't. We landed in Saigon, but we never went to the Embassy, we went to some outlying building to get some ID cards, but, no the Embassy, no they never came out to visit me and I never went in to visit them.

Q: You never got one of these provincial reporters poking around?

WINN: Never, the only person that came out was Frank Wisner who was doing a survey from Washington through Vietnam on how the FSOs are doing who are assigned to CORDS. I never had once in two years anyone from the embassy visit. Although we were a three-hour drive, but I remember being irritated at that frankly. I mean, it's bad enough to be assigned to the program and then to be utterly ignored. There wasn't even lip service paid. Now, I was at district level. At province level there was a Foreign Service officer as Province Senior Advisor, a fellow who was on his last tour, Park W-O-L-L-A-M, long since dead, and then of course above him at the highest level was another FSO named Funkhouser.

Q: Richard Funkhouser?

WINN: Yes, who later retired. He had been assigned to Vietnam from being ambassador to Gabon. You know the famous story. He was sitting out there as ambassador to Gabon and he got a cable that said, "Give us the reaction in Gabon – a worldwide cable – to Lyndon Johnson's speech of last night." He sent back three words, "Gabon slept on." Then within a few days he was in Vietnam. He was the ultimate boss there. Johnson personally had him punished.

Q: What were you doing?

WINN: I was trying to milk it for all the adventure I could, and all the military lore. I'm not saying that the tour was not valuable subsequently, although it's not as valuable as some like to make out. I might have had a more useful tour at a real Embassy. I had a Filipino assistant, wonderful guy, and a Vietnamese. The three of us, this weird group, would get in a little civilian four-wheel drive vehicle and we would drive around visiting hamlets and checking on their self-development projects. So, what I did I would accompany this very conscientious, very professional Filipino guy, me just a body trying to learn the ropes and make-work development projects. I would do a tiny bit of political reporting for Park Wollam, never for the embassy. We did have a presidential election. I did some political reporting, but day-to-day I would literally reinvent the wheel. How do I get through the day without sitting in this compound, but without getting killed? One of the young captains in the compound there, he and I would go out and he was a clearly an intelligence type, and I used to find it kind of exotic to go around with him, probably a mistake, branding myself. He later became head of DIA, Pat Hughes, lives right out here in Rosslyn, so we became fast friends these 30 years. But, the poor major that was the head of our district team, he was wondering what was I doing down there, because I was officially his deputy and with an astonishing amount of authority in this team for a first tour Foreign Service officer. So, he was trying to dance around me and figure out what was he doing with this jerk he's got; he just wanted to run his operation. We lived in a Vietnamese compound, so we were the odd men out among the Vietnamese. Later on we had a huge influx of refugees and I actually had a focal point.

Q: Where were they coming from?

WINN: They were coming from the north as things began to fall apart in Long Khanh, a Catholic province. All these Catholics up in the north came to Long Khanh, already, full of refugees that had come down in '54. That gave me a little more of a focal point, working with the Vietnamese. I always felt, though, that I was never really in control. I always felt that the Vietnamese were always pulling one over on me, you know? I said to these guys, "We're outsiders in their country and they're running it." I always vaguely felt I was being taken for a ride and they knew it, but did my best to try to hold up and try to keep an eye on the U.S. budget at least.

Q: Did you run into the French farmers at all?

WINN: Yes, quite a bit. I didn't make a habit of it, but they did have one who was especially hospitable. He had a plantation about half an hour into the middle of the rubber trees, and it was something right out of Apocalypse Now. There's this guy out there with his beautiful Vietnamese mistress and he may have had a wife in Saigon. He was a very exotic fellow. I still have a picture of him. I would go out there by the pool and all these French plantation types and French Embassy personnel would be around the pool. One day I came out here and he said, "You just missed the Viet Cong. They came through here and kind of looked around and if you'd been here you would have been dead." That was my last visit to the pool. But it was so funny, this exotic world, beautiful Vietnamese women and mistresses and right out of as I said Apocalypse Now. But they pretty much kind of steered clear of the Americans; they didn't want us round.

Q: Essentially, they worked out a modus vivendi.

WINN: Modus vivendi, yes.

Q: They would pay the Viet Cong and the Viet Cong would not bother them.

WINN: That's right, they wouldn't bother them. This guy found me amusing and I found it kind of fun to go out there a few times and I translated some things into English for him. I remember we'd be there poolside and the American helicopters would circle around looking down at the ladies. Modus vivendi. Our problem was the Viet Cong mines. You never knew what road you went down you weren't just going to get blown to hell. The compound was directly assaulted twice during my two years there. That was exciting.

Q: What did you do?

WINN: Well, we were sitting there watching, I'll never forget it, Barbara Streisand in Funny Girl. In those days we had the old 16mm films and I was the operator. We were sitting there as we would at night. I heard a pop that I later came to recognize, a hollow thunk out in the rubber trees, and I looked around and the room was empty because my colleagues had recognized the sound of a mortar being fired. Then this huge blast headed toward the edge of the compound. Then this pop, pop, pop, rounds being "walked" closer and closer and I thought, I better turn off this projector. I followed my colleagues. Basically it wasn't a very determined ground assault, but I remember the noise, the sheer amount of noise that you just don't get in a movie, of rounds coming in and firing back. Then they put one of these gun ships that they still use in Afghanistan, it was bizarre. You couldn't see the plane itself, but you could see this line of fire that was emanating out of apparently nothing in the sky. They would just rake the areas around out compound. Anyway, that happened twice. I think we did have some Vietnamese killed that night, but no Americans. Some wounded. I remember a great fear I had for the rest of my tour was not mortars, but sappers. I realized that those Vietnamese could get under anything. They'd get under the wire and once they got into the compound they would begin throwing satchel charges around. So, we had to put a lot more claymore mines out. The occasional dog would come by and get blown up. As I say, as the only civilian, you get very familiar with weapons. I had an old grease gun, which was more of a danger to everyone else, of no use to me, but I figured I would go down shooting. I don't know why I just put it in the floor of the car when I went out. I'll never forget I was having dinner with Pat Hughes the other day and he said, "You know, I was just thinking about all the times we nearly got killed in Vietnam." I said, "What on earth are you talking about?" He said, "All those times we were out driving around and times at the rubber plantations. I later learned you know, that we had just barely missed an ambush there." It was news to me.

Q: What was the talk of you, I mean you were really talking to military colleagues, they were the people you were with?

WINN: Yes and it was all nuts and bolts. It was pretty boring stuff. I was the fly on the wall. I remember making a tape of a typical evening's conversation and I wished to hell I had that tape today, but there's always a radio crackling in the background, constant radio chatter. We were an advisory team, but the conversation was mainly nuts and bolts about this operation or that operation. We had of course U.S. military operating in the province. It was pretty basic stuff. The air of cynicism about the Vietnamese will to fight was pretty hopeless, but we were there to do the job. I don't recall much indignation about the demonstrations back home. I don't recall it coming up very much.

Q: Did you get involved in military operations yourself?

WINN: Not per se. I went out on a couple of all-day patrols, just to keep my side up, actually put on a uniform took a lot of pictures, just to be able to show these guys that I wasn't going to stay behind. I didn't have to do it, probably not a good idea, but other than that, no. The other unauthorized thing I did was to go around with Pat Hughes and watch him interview Vietnamese agents, which was silly of me. I was compromising myself, I said, "what a hare-brained thing to do," but I found it more interesting than going out and looking at chicken coops. But military operations per se, no. I have a vivid memory of one day when three American guys American guys festooned with war paint and bandoleers of bullets came out of the forest - they were what were called LURPS [Long Range Reconnaissance Patrols]. These guys had been out there for weeks and had just turned into animals. To this day I'm kicking myself for not getting a picture of them. They surpassed anything that Hollywood could have come up with. They lie in wait and kill people from ambush and then move on.

Q: Long range?

WINN: Reconnaissance patrol or something.

Q: They take them out of a helicopter and drop them and then they have to make their way back.

WINN: I remember thinking, how can they ever reintegrate into civilian society, but I guess they melded back in. Another of my many vivid memories – we were all sitting in a jeep. I would go out with my military colleagues all over the place. We'd just ride around and we were sitting in the middle of the compound and one of the Vietnamese had his grenade launcher pointed up and he absentmindedly pulled the trigger. This thing went straight up into the air and was going to come straight down and kill us all. So, we ran like hell and damn if it didn't come down and blow up the jeep. The point of this story I saw so many accidents or would come on the scene after. So many people were killed in Vietnam from accidents. I remember a guy reached in his jeep to pull his gun out and a string had caught on the trigger and he just took a whole burst right in his belly, I was right around the corner.

Q: Well, I know that, I was, 18 months I was consul general in Saigon. This was '69 and '70 and I left when you. We had all these American civilians, but our main problem was accidents on Hondas.

WINN: Yes, I can imagine. Oh, the traffic, well, you know, I hit a little girl on a bicycle, that's quite a story. Sorry to interrupt you, but I'm on a roll. I was driving outside and we could never leave the compound at night, but I remember late one afternoon I was driving back and a little girl on a bicycle rolled up right in front of me and damned if I didn't hit her square. We were always hitting people. You know, these traffic accidents were horrific. She went flying through the air and there was blood all over the windshield and I thought I had killed her. I took her and got her to the American hospital and she had severe scalp lacerations and that was all, thank God. That was the longest night of my life. I thought I had killed her. It turned out she was fine, she also had a clubbed foot from birth. To make a long story short, I arranged for the U.S. military surgeons to correct her clubbed foot, and I've often wondered how good a job they did, what became of her, where is she now? When visiting her in the hospital I saw so many of these young Americans with their legs blown off. I wonder about this lady. She'd be long since grown of course, with her clubbed foot, whether that operation was a success. I tried to help her, I followed up in the six months remaining in Vietnam; she had this corrective shoe and whatever. But I extended six months. They said, "You know, what do you want to do next?" I said, "I want to learn Arabic." They said, "No, no, no. You can have pretty much any post you want, but you don't want Arabic. Another two years out of it. Do you really want to go and be on ice another two years without an EER to speak of?" I said, "Yes, I want to learn Arabic. I said that from the beginning." Finally they relented, but they said, "We don't have another class. You have to stay in Vietnam another six months." So I did and went off to Beirut and Arabic.

Q: Well, by the time you left, you got out in what '72?

WINN: Well, the summer of '72, yes.

Q: What was your feeling? I mean obviously you were getting the grand overview from what one small district, but what was your feeling about whither Vietnam at that time?

WINN: I still have my letters, and I must say there is a tone in my letters back home that we're on sort of the wrong side. I just saw so much determination on the other side and so much corruption and lack of enthusiasm on our side and so much cynicism on the part of the American advisors that I just couldn't bear it. It looked to me like kind of a lost cause by the time I left.

Q: What about the corruption side? Were you able to get a good view of that?

WINN: Pretty good view. I remember the then CIA chief came through there. A famous guy, brown glasses. I remember him talking to me.

Q: Colby?

WINN: Colby came through, that's right. He came out there and took me aside, more than any Foreign Service officer ever did I might add, and sought my views on corruption. I do recall telling him and he nodded knowingly. He was really up on it. There seemed to be quite a bit of corruption from what I could see. You just never knew, I always felt I was being diddled, the whole two years I was there, trying to stay ahead of the corruption, but never really succeeding. But a few I must say, particularly the Vietnamese colleague I worked closely with, some were extremely dedicated. I often wonder, were they all swept away?

JOHN GUNTHER DEAN
Deputy, CORDS
Da Nang (1970-1972)

John Gunther Dean was born in 1926 in Breslau, Germany and was educated at Harvard and the University of Paris Law School. His career included posts in Vientiane, Togo, Paris and Danang and he was ambassador to Cambodia, Lebanon, Thailand, India and Denmark. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

DEAN: I would not go that far. Students, and for that matter every citizen, have the right to differ. I also have no problem with demonstrations or night vigils. It is violence that I deplore. I did have a slightly different problem, an issue which I still have not resolved in my own mind. It turns around the role of a government servant - civilian or military - and how to react to receiving orders with which he disagrees. Specifically, when the Secretary of State tells me, as a Foreign Service officer, that I have to go to a certain post and I disagree with the policy, what should I do? In my case, I always decided to go. The only alternative is to resign. I went from Harvard in 1970 to Vietnam. I had seen the anti-Vietnam demonstrations at home. I had been involved in the Paris negotiations on Vietnam. I ardently believed in the negotiations. I still believe today, that first and foremost, regardless who is our adversary, let us find a way of sitting down and explore whether we can find a negotiated solution. That is my profession. In my opinion, diplomacy is in part the art of trying to convince others of the mutual advantage of our policies or actions. But above all, as a Foreign Service Officer, I accept to go where the Secretary of State or the President believes I can be of greatest service to the country. Hence, when I received orders to go to Vietnam, I went as Deputy for CORDS in Military Region One. In 1970, we had five U.S. divisions in that military region alone. Before we get into my assignment to Vietnam, I would like to express my gratitude for this year away from the "pressure cooker." I learned a lot at Harvard: how the world was changing and continues to change. Intellectual institutions look at any problem from many different points of view. There is never unanimity on any one point of view. Hence, I was willing to accept some others having a different view from mine or that of our government. Perhaps I also learned something about dissent and how to differ with my superiors. I still believe today that I owe my country the best assessment I can give, even if others disagree with my evaluation. If I differ on a policy, I believe an honest Foreign Service Officer should make it known. Silence is not an option. Personally, I did not make my career by ingratiating myself to my superiors. Many of the things I had seen and heard about in Vietnam shocked me, but I felt that, as a Foreign Service Officer, my duty was to serve the country, Just like a military officer who gets orders to go to war, I felt that if I was assigned to Vietnam to work with our military leaders, I had no choice but go - and I went in the summer of 1970. I was detailed by the Department of State to the 24th Corps in Military Region One, which was the region in the northern part of South Vietnam against the DMZ.

Q: When did you go out to Vietnam, and when did you return?

DEAN: June or July 1970, and I left Vietnam in July or August 1972.

Q: What was the situation in South Vietnam at that time when you got there?

DEAN: The South Vietnamese Government was headed by General Thieu. General Thieu had established a certain amount of political stability since the 1960s when a number of Vietnamese generals had toppled Ngo Dinh Diem and vied among themselves for power. But North Vietnam was determined to unify the country. During my period in Vietnam, the U.S. withdrew our divisions from Vietnam. We “Vietnamized” the war and left the South Vietnamese to oppose their northern countrymen. The U.S. provided the funds and weapons to the South Vietnamese military forces, as well as advisers to assist the South Vietnamese to withstand the northern drive to bring all of Vietnam under its control. We also assisted in the economic and social development of South Vietnam. It was a privilege to work with Ambassador Bunker on the civilian side, and General Abrams and General Wyant on the military side. Ambassador Bunker's assistant was Charlie Hill. While we may not have had the same politics, we certainly had a good working relationship. The country was governed by a group of Vietnamese dedicated to opposing militarily the expansion of North Vietnamese communism. The South Vietnamese army, navy, and air force were competent but the war had been going on for years without diminishing the will of the North to unite Vietnam under its control. In addition to the regular Vietnamese army, there were provincial forces and regional forces all over South Vietnam. These forces had American advisers. In my military region, I had 1,100 advisers. 100 of them were civilian advisers, and 1,000 were military advisers. The headquarters for Military Region One was in Danang. I moved into the house formerly used by an American admiral which was commonly referred to as the White Elephant.

Our job was to help the Vietnamese regional and provincial authorities in both military and civilian affairs. In short, I was in charge of the American advisory effort for Military Region One. But more important than our advisory effort in 1970 was the presence in our military region of five U.S. divisions. The entire U.S. effort was under the 24th Corps. The first commander of the 24th Corps in my time was a four-star Marine General, an aviator. He was followed briefly by Marine General Robinson. Then, the Army took over the Corps. Lieutenant General Sutherland was followed by Lieutenant General Dolven. My last boss was Major General Kroesen, who became a four-star General and Commander-in-chief of the U.S. Army in Europe. But by the time General Kroesen took over in late 1971, all U.S. divisions had left Vietnam and we had only an advisory function to the Vietnamese. May I add that I got to know General Kroesen very well and I think the world of this excellent soldier. Let me say a word about my work. The position of Deputy for CORDS (Civilian Operations for Reconstruction and Development Service) to the Commander of the 24th Corps was assimilated to the rank of Major General. The person who held that position had a dedicated helicopter at his disposal. Nearly every second day of the week, DEPCORD's duty was to meet with the advisers in the field and see what was going on, and what headquarters could do to support the advisers in the field. One of the military advisers under my command was a full colonel. He was killed. He tried to land on a U.S. ship. It was he who usually briefed me in the morning, at 6:00, at my house, on what happened during the night in the military region. Our region extended from the Demarcation Line (DMZ) to the next four provinces southward, and included the city of Danang. At 7:00 a.m. was the Commanding General's briefing at the headquarters of the 24th Corps. In a U.S. military installation, about 20 minutes by car from my house in the city of Danang. The first day I attended the Commanding General's briefing, I could not answer any questions on what had happened during the night. Thereafter, I asked one of the colonels under my command to give me a “pre-brief.” I said to him: “You brief me one hour before I go to the 7:00 a.m. meeting. I don't ever want to be caught being a dummy.” In the course of the 7:00 a.m. briefing, we might be told that a certain military post was overrun and the American adviser to the Vietnamese military had lost his leg, or an eye. At that point, the Commanding American General could turn to me and say: “Dean, what are you doing about it?” “Sir, I am flying up there and see whether medical help has been given, and whether I have to repatriate him or replace him. I will give you a report in the afternoon.” Sometimes, it was a different kind of a problem, for example, taking care of refugees who were fleeing from violence. At one point, in 1972, Quang Tri Province, the northernmost province of South Vietnam, was completely overrun by the North Vietnamese. In the process, in April 1972, the North Vietnamese had surrounded the provincial capital where 100 American advisers were huddled together, awaiting rescue, in order to prevent our advisers being taken prisoners. I decided to fly with the helicopter dedicated to my duties to Quang Tri City and take out as many Americans as I could. I was able to take three or four trips from Danang to Quang Tri City, and every time would take seven or eight people out. On my last trip, as I was going up with American Consul Fred Brown (Frederick Z. Brown), we were shot down over Highway One, about 15 kms south of Quang Tri City. Fortunately, the rifle shot by hostile forces hit the oil line of the helicopter and not the gas line. I would not be here to relate the story because the helicopter would have exploded. Our helicopter dropped to the ground like a bag of potatoes and we hit the ground hard. We were shook up. The helicopter could not go any further. There was a may day call, i.e. an American in distress and in need of help. Another helicopter came, under fire, to pick us up and lift us out from the spot where we had been shot down. We were taken to an installation near Hue where I asked the U.S. military whether the Vietnamese could not give us some tanks so that we could try to rescue by land the U.S. advisers for whom I was responsible. I was told that this was no longer feasible. Perhaps 24 hours later, General Hudson of the U.S. Air Force, was flown to Danang and it was from there that he organized the extraction of the remaining 50 Americans from besieged Quang Tri City. The entire operation was carried out while North Vietnamese tanks were firing into the installation. We took out not only Americans but also many South Vietnamese who had been fighting the forces from the North. The extraction by American helicopters from the beleaguered city took place at night. The pilots were so hot that they flew without clothes, except for jockey shorts. The helicopters hovered over the extraction site just long enough for the people to climb into the helicopters. There was no time to land and take off. It was also too dangerous. We got everybody out who was supposed to leave. The Vietnamese Governor of the Province and the key employees of his staff were air-lifted out to Hue.

Q: Did we have anything with which to retake Quang Tri?

DEAN: No, not at this stage. By April 1972, there were no more American military units in Vietnam. We still had aircraft which could bomb the advancing enemy and give the South Vietnamese forces an opportunity to push back the Northerners. After the fall of Quang Tri City, I was told by one of the top people in Saigon that I would not be allowed to go home until the South Vietnamese had taken back Quang Tri Province.

We did take the province back, in June 1972, and I was allowed to go home one month later.

Q: The South Vietnamese had some of their crack divisions...

DEAN: They had some excellent troops and some very good generals. They fought well on the whole. The Governor of Quang Tri was evacuated to Hué. I saw him daily and I urged him to keep his provincial administration intact. In this way, he administered in “exile” the refugees from Quang Tri Province in Hué. Our advisers helped him by providing food, tents, and wood for cooking. Three months later, the Governor of Quang Tri was back in his province after the South Vietnamese military had retaken the province. One of the advantages I had in the 1970s was that all the Vietnamese senior military officers and civilian officials had been trained by the French and spoke rather good French. This made it easy for me to communicate with them. Most of the senior Vietnamese officers and officials were dedicated and decent. But the war had been going on for so many years that the population had become weary. The destruction was tremendous. People had been fighting since the early 1950s. Before fighting the French, there had been the Japanese occupation. Certainly, the people in the countryside were tired. The Vietnamese military had American advisers and American-supplied weapons, but the war-weariness also permeated the troops. Not every war story relates the heroic behaviour of the valiant fighting forces. In the extraction of the surrounded Vietnamese forces and their American advisers in the Citadel of Quang Tri City, I recall the pusillanimous behaviour of an American adviser which taught me a lesson.

In Quang Tri City, in the compound in which the U.S. advisers were lodged, there remained only one air-conditioner functioning. It was April - beastly hot. That lone air-conditioner was run on a small generator and cooled down the code-room for sending messages. While all the advisers - civilian and military - regardless of rank, had to stand guard all night long, the Lt. Colonel in charge of the Advisory Unit was sleeping in the air-conditioned code-room. After the extraction, the American advisers complained about the bad example set by their leader. Shortly after the story got around, I received a phone call from the American Commander-in-Chief in Saigon. He said: "John, do you have any sons?" I replied: "Yes, I have two sons" "Would you ever want them to be serving under this lieutenant colonel?" I said: "No. This guy does not perform very well." "What are you going to do about it?" "Well, I decided I was going to give him a bad Efficiency Rating." The Commander-in-Chief, a four-star American General, said: "John, you prefer charges against him" and he hung up. That means: have the officer court martialled. On my staff, I had a lawyer and he drew up charges against the Lt. Colonel. The Lt. Colonel had been on the promotion list to full colonel. He was taken off the list. He was a West Pointer. His career was ended and he returned to civilian life. Under fire, the man had failed in his duties as a leader. On the whole, the American advisers were an outstanding group of able, dedicated people. But the behaviour of some of the support troops left something to be desired, especially when it came to black marketing. The advisers in the field were mostly fine soldiers and acquitted themselves with distinction. Vietnam was a war where the American soldiers got little support from the home front. It mattered. When I came home from the Second World War on a troop transport ship, there was a band playing at the wharf in New Jersey and young ladies with donuts and coffee came aboard to welcome the returning heroes. When I came home in 1972 from the Vietnam War, after two years and one month, there was nobody to greet you. Not only were there any festivities but nobody talked about their experiences in the Vietnam War. It was more like people wanted to forget about that chapter in our history. It took time for the folks back home to realize that the Vietnam War, like all wars, had caused hardship, wounds, and bad memories.

Q: I have to say that when I came back from Korea in 1952 or 1953, nobody was interested. You just sort of came back.

DEAN: In Korea, we had done our job and militarily it was a "draw." In Vietnam, we lost. That word, "lost," is only being used today. It was not used from 1975 until the end of the 1980s. Let me go back to some of the outstanding work done by our American advisers to Military Region One. It also shows what CORDS, the Civil Reconstruction and Development program, was all about. Refugees by the thousands were streaming out of Quang Tri Province. They preferred fleeing to living under the communists. From Quang Tri they walked to Thua Thien Province whose capital is Hue, the imperial city of Annam. But Thua Thien was also under attack, so the refugees walked close to Danang. These refugees had nothing but their clothes on their back, or perhaps a small bundle slung on a stick over the back. The American military forces had left by that time (1972) but the neat white barracks had remained. These barracks, made of wood, were spic and span, with showers, toilets, and screens. They stood empty. So, I telephoned the American Commander-in-Chief in Saigon and said; "Sir, I intend to turn over this former American base to the Vietnamese refugees." He replied: "John, you are in charge" and hung up. I decided that his reply was enough and I did not ask for any other opinions. I turned over the empty barracks to the refugees for lodging. Others gave them food, mostly non-governmental agencies (NGOs) from all over the world, including many American organizations. Yes, the refugees partially destroyed the barracks. As it got colder, the refugees used the wood to keep warm, and they dismantled certain buildings to obtain the wood. But I thought that the war was about people, about trying to make the refugees feel that our side cared more about people and their welfare than the other side. So, I made the decision to turn over a former U.S. military installation to the refugees coming down from Quang Tri Province. Not every military man agreed with that decision. After all, they might have preferred to turn over this facility to the Vietnamese army. I turned over another former small American installation to the refugees because they kept on coming. That installation also was partially destroyed by them. Working with senior army flag officers helped me to learn about decision-taking. If you are the field commander, you rarely have the time to request guidance from headquarters. The decision has to be taken on the spot. The immediate situation requires action. This experience in Vietnam undoubtedly influenced me when I was faced with difficult situations in Cambodia, in Laos, in Lebanon, and in India where the tactical situation on the ground often required immediate action. In all these posts, I had to make quick decisions and my experience in Vietnam made me realize that "Time is of the essence." Take responsibility. Do it. If your superiors don't like it, they can remove you. As I look back on my time in Vietnam during these war years, there was a sight which bothered me then, and still sticks in my mind today. Every day, at 7:00 a.m., I had to be at the briefing of the Commander of the American military presence in MR1. A Vietnamese civilian drove me from my residence in Danang City to the headquarters of the 24th Corps. On the way to the military headquarters, I saw Vietnamese - old and young - male and female, on top of the huge mounds of leftover food from the plates of our military, searching for food, for their own consumption. They used a stick with a sharp point in their search for edible left-overs. Seeing these poor people, in the early hour mist, on top of garbage piles, with the headlights from cars bringing this picture into focus - darkness giving way to the sight of misery - made a deep impression on me. The misery caused by war is a memory I still carry with me today. One of humanity's better qualities is compassion. This experience and sentiment felt in Vietnam played a role later on in Cambodia. I found it difficult to leave the Cambodian people to a fate which I feared could be a genocide. Perhaps this sense of compassion is one of the differences between Dr. Kissinger and myself on the Cambodian tragedy. Perhaps I don't see the entire global picture as those in charge in Washington, but I do see the suffering humanity and I am affected. I am on the spot. Is that one of the differences between a field commander and his superior sitting in an office far, far away?

Q: Did you have any contact or get any feel for what was going on in Washington?

DEAN: No.

Q: Was it just a different world?

DEAN: I had very little knowledge of what was going on outside of Vietnam, except from reading the Army newspaper. I felt I had a job to do in Vietnam, and people had confidence in me. I tried to do my best. I saw things in war which were despicable. I also saw acts of great bravery, or ordinary people just doing their job - Vietnamese and Americans alike. Let me recite another experience which will underline the importance of good leadership. Back in 1970, when we still had American divisions in Vietnam, I was up in Quang Tri Province when I saw an American tank column coming out of an incursion from Laos. As they came out of Laos, they were surprised in Quang Tri Province by North Vietnamese troops who pursued them. When tanks are in danger of being captured, the soldiers get out of the tanks and run toward friendly lines in the hope of saving their lives. I happened to have been there, standing in back of the American Brigadier General speaking to American troops, when they arrived in a safe area. He said: "Men, you go back and get these tanks. These tanks are going to turn against us. We can't afford to have our tanks in the hands of our enemy. Go and get them!" The answer of the troops was: "General, up yours. Go and get them yourself!" The man was relieved of his command. What he should have done was: "Men, follow me. I am going to lead you. We've got to get our tanks back. We can't let the enemy take over these tanks in good condition and use them against us. Follow me, men!" I have tried to apply this lesson in my role as leader of a team: Lead by setting a good example.

Q: Did you find at this point of the war that the American military, particularly at the troop level, was beginning to not disintegrate, but there were a whole series of things, including...

DEAN: You did have fragging. I was aware of that.

Q: You might explain what fragging is.

DEAN: Fragging is throwing a grenade from the rear, usually against an officer who is disliked by the troops. It's using explosives to eliminate a member of your own team. What I noticed in Military Region One was that most soldiers were counting the days until their tour of duty would come to an end. The average American soldier in a fox-hole was alone with his buddy in an isolated advanced position, and he acquitted himself with valor and a sense of duty. They were in my mind great guys. I also had under my command young Foreign Service Officers on their first tour of duty, assigned to some out of the way district in Thua Thien Province, or in the hills of Quang Nam Province, etc... Many a night, these distant, isolated districts came under attack by the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong. How many of these young men, assigned to help in rural development, education, and hygiene, came under attack at night? Was this the kind of duty they expected when they had entered the U.S. Foreign Service? I have the greatest respect for these young FSOs at the time. They learned about leadership, how to set an example. Some of them are today ambassadors. They did not sign up for that kind of hazardous duty in Vietnam. Nonetheless, the Foreign Service officers assigned to CORDS in Vietnam carried out duties far removed from what is generally associated with traditional diplomacy. When I had to fly to some distant field hospital and decorate an adviser who had lost an eye or a limb, I understood the meaning of “duty” and “service to your country.” I liked the Vietnamese people and I had a good relationship with their leadership. The South Vietnamese were beginning to worry - “Are we being seen as the stalking horse of the Americans? “Are the North Vietnamese painting us South Vietnamese, as collaborators?” I still wear today, with some pride, cufflinks given to me by General Thieu when I finished my tour of duty in Vietnam. I was asked by Ambassador Bunker to go to the Presidential Palace in Saigon, and I was awarded a number of Vietnamese medals for my service in Vietnam. Another realization I gained during my years with the military in Vietnam was that war hurts mostly civilians. I also gained the impression that most American generals don't engage troops lightly and prefer a negotiated solution to war. Senior military officers know what it means to ask soldiers to risk their lives. Politicians very often don't take sufficiently into account the results of violence and war, both on our soldiers and on the civilians of our enemy. The experiences I gained in Vietnam were very useful for me in the positions which I was about to receive for the next 20 years.

Q: In Vietnam, who was the head military commander while you were there?

DEAN: General Abrams. Years later, I went to his funeral in Washington. He was an excellent chief, indeed. Once a month, the top brass, including the 4 Depcords, assembled in Saigon to be briefed and to exchange views on what was going on in the four military regions. General Abrams presided. On occasion, he could be very outspoken with those who may have made a mistake, even with other top generals under his command. General Abrams was also a very private person. Sometimes, late at night, he would listen to classical music. He was one of the best. He was replaced by Freddy Wyant. His style was different. He was less aloof than Abrams. We got to be friends and stayed in touch for many years. He was in charge when the Quang Tri invasion occurred and we worked together closely during that period. He came often to Military Region One and he was still in charge when South Vietnamese troops retook Quang Tri Province in July 1972. I learned from General Wyant that when you are in charge, that means you must take the decision and you are held responsible for the result. Often, he would say: “Don't come to me for advice. I have confidence in you. Do what is necessary.” That style of leadership helped me to do what I did later in Laos. Not everybody appreciated that kind of leadership. I remember, I was reprimanded in Laos by the Secretary of State for answering the Prime Minister's question when he asked for advice, for not referring the question back to Washington. I assume that Washington was afraid that I might give advice which was not “politically correct.” We will discuss it in our discussion on Laos.

Q: I would like to know a little more how you operated. You are saying the young Foreign Service officers were performing well - the Foreign Service officers assigned to CORDS.

DEAN: Very well.

Q: I assume that you flew by helicopter to the outlying districts where the young FSOs were stationed?

DEAN: Yes. We only had advisers - civilian and military - in regions under South Vietnamese Government control. Certain areas in South Vietnam were written off to the Viet Cong and obviously there were no South Vietnamese Government presence there, nor American advisers.

Q: Basically though, it was really the North Vietnamese who controlled areas in MR1 not under South Vietnamese Government control, wasn't it?

DEAN: Whether you call them North Vietnamese or Viet Cong does not really matter. There was some support in the outlying districts for Hanoi's struggle to unite Vietnam, for nationalism and for ending fighting which had lasted for a couple of decades. Our FSO advisers tried to help the districts to improve the conditions of life of the poor farmers. For example, young officers in a small district or in a small town would say: "I am going to get you some seeds to grow some corn." Or they might say: "I can get you some lumber so that you can repair your house." Or "We will get you some pigs to diversify your farming." They might have a literacy program, I recall that during my tenure in MR1, CORDS helped to keep functioning the University of Hue. After the 1968 debacle in Hue, we helped the Vietnamese rector and professors to reopen the university. Final examinations were being given at Hué University during the fall of Quang Tri Province, in 1972. The graduation of a new group of civilian students was essential to the future of Central Vietnam. Our CORDS advisers helped the university teachers to supervise the exams, provide security, and make the university function. We received an award of gratitude from the University for our assistance.

Q: You spent quite a bit of time flying out and talking with the senior officials of the region.

DEAN: A great deal. I visited regularly the 4 provinces under CORDS control. I also worked closely with the major urban centers. Danang was a relatively important port and the hub of Central Vietnam. During my tenure in Central Vietnam, I received an instruction from Washington to protect the famous Cham Museum. The message said that President Nixon had received a request from Phillip Stern, curator of the Guimet Museum in Paris, asking the U.S. to ascertain that the Cham Museum in Danang would not be destroyed nor damaged, as the museum in Hué was in 1968. With the U.S. advisers to the Mayor of Danang, I went to look at the Cham Museum. I learned that the museum was entirely dedicated to the preservation of Cham art. The Chams were carriers of Hindu influence which is reflected in their sculptures and their temples. Their art is similar to the sculptures at Borobudur in Indonesia. Cham temples can still be seen in Central and South Vietnam. The Danang Cham Museum is an open air structure - the building has a roof, but is open on at least one side. Every item in the museum is locked into a wall with a steel rod. Hence, with metal rods, the art pieces could not be stolen. This museum survived entirely intact. I asked the mayor to send a military detachment to the museum to protect it from greedy traders cutting off heads of the sculptures for resale abroad. A group of soldiers was assigned to guard the Cham Museum in Danang. Today, that museum is one of the great tourist attraction of Vietnam. It is certainly the most outstanding museum of that particular art form in the world. In 1999, the French published a guide book with reproductions of each artifact in the Cham Museum and offered thousands of volumes to the Danang Museum to be sold to tourists. In the foreword, there is specific mention of President Nixon's Instruction to the American authorities to help protect this unique museum.

Q: At the Danang level, how did you find dealing with the Vietnamese Commander? Was General Lon still there? I have heard from other people that General Lon was more a political general and had large warehouses full of his stuff. In other words, a lot of corruption there. Did you find this?

DEAN: I am quite sure that there were abuses. As for the general you mention, I was in Vietnam to help the South Vietnamese to withstand North Vietnamese efforts to topple the Saigon regime. I tried to understand and work with South Vietnamese civilian and military officials. They had mostly been French-trained and spoke fluent French. They came from a rather privileged class of people. Their wives sometimes used the position of their husbands to increase their material well-being. Some generals were less action-oriented than others. Some of the senior military officials also had second thoughts about how they were perceived by their own people so as not to be seen as "puppets of Americans."

We could at times be quite heavy-handed by wanting to run the show by ourselves. This tendency obviously changed after the American military units had left Vietnam. Perhaps the general you referred to was a more cautious person. The general in charge of Thua Thien was a very scrappy general who led his troops himself. Some Vietnamese military in 1972 were also asking themselves if perhaps this war was not going to lead to a victory, would the Americans stand by them in time of difficulty? It's easy to say "He did not fight hard enough," especially if he is sitting in a very comfortable easy chair in Danang or in Saigon. I once received a book which was dedicated to me with the words "We manned the walls of freedom together." Yes, I was in the front lines on the ground, having my windows shot out, some times being physically targeted by the adversary. The man who dedicated this book to me was sitting in a comfortable office back home, thousands of miles away from the military confrontation. I am sure he worried a great deal, but it is not the same when you are in the field facing physical danger. You asked about General Lon and the Vietnamese generals. Some were good generals. Some may have had sticky fingers. But we had our own problems among American soldiers. Let me cite the example of my own orderly. Three out of four of my orderlies were punished for abuse of my commissary privileges. I cannot change others, but I tried to be a worthy representative of the United States. Setting a good example was more important to me than pointing fingers at others.

Q: Were we concerned about the generals - the reputation was there of General Lon, who was spending more time aggrandizing his personal fortune than leading... Was that a concern?

DEAN: Definitely. It was also a concern later on in Cambodia, trying to shore up the military to do the fighting. But as time went on - and that is the difference between being a field commander and being a political observer - you see it differently when you are on the ground than when you are back in Washington looking at the global picture and wonder how it fits into the relationship with the Soviet Union or with China. Colonel Jacobson, who was the Deputy Head of CORDS, was a legend. He was a tough, likeable colonel who thought our mission was to have South Vietnam win. I came to CORDS with a reputation of being a negotiator. If I could have negotiated, I would have negotiated. But I could not. I was merely a small cog in a big wheel. But I always asked myself - and that was going to be a leitmotif in different periods of my life - on whose side is time. I fear that some policy makers misread that terribly. All I can say, I had great respect for all those who carried out their duty with candor, strength and determination. There were abuses, yes. There were abuses by Vietnamese and perhaps also by some Americans, but that is focusing on the warts.

Q: I am trying to touch various elements, including the overall picture and the warts.

DEAN: The overall picture was that in 1972 you could see a certain battle fatigue setting in both in the United States where the war demonstrators got more vocal, where people in Congress were beginning to criticize our policy as for example Senators Church and Kennedy, and in Vietnam where some elements were beginning to question whether President Thieu could withstand Hanoi's efforts to take over the whole country. Before leaving the subject of Vietnam, I would like to say a word about a great American: Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker. He was a fine human being, a great patriot, who saw the picture accurately. He was not afraid to criticize our military on "body count." He was not afraid to send candid messages to Washington in which he set forth his doubts about certain policies. Would we be loyal to our friends and allies to the end? I thought Ambassador Bunker, who came up to Danang quite often, was a loyal supporter of our policy, although he probably saw problems ahead. Ambassador Bunker knew whatever he was doing was for his country and not for his own glory.

Q: How did you work with the Political Section in Saigon? They would send their gallopers out to...

DEAN: I had very little contact; practically none with the Political Section in Saigon. We had a Consulate in Danang and that was its function.

Q: I was going to ask about the Consulate. Who were Consuls when you were there?

DEAN: I knew two. Fred Z. Brown and Terry McNamara. I had a perfectly good relationship, but their role was largely as observers for Embassy Saigon. CORDS officers were supposed to be doers. As I said earlier, Fred Z. Brown was in my helicopter when we both got shot down. Terry McNamara was a brave officer who later went on to become Depcords in Military Region Four where he made a name for himself.

Q: Did you ever run across John Paul Van?

DEAN: I worked with him. I also went to his funeral. I knew his girlfriend very well.

Q: Which one?

DEAN: who was there when he died.

Q: Were you...

DEAN: I saw him regularly once a month at the briefing session in Saigon. He was a strong personality, a military man with strong convictions about our role in Vietnam. He was in Two Corps, which was a particularly difficult region because most of the Hill Tribes lived in that area.

Keeping the Hill Tribes from supporting the North Vietnamese and have them handled in a way that they would support the government in Saigon was a challenging task. John Paul Van was certainly the most recognized personality in the CORDS program by the media for his outstanding service.

Q: Were the Koreans gone by the time you left?

DEAN: No. We had Koreans, but they were not in I-CORPS. We had two Australian advisers who received the Victoria Medal in our region. That was prior to my arrival in Vietnam.

MICHAEL E. TOLLE
Refugee Officer
Saigon (1970-1972)

Michael E. Tolle was born in Kansas in 1947 in Kansas and educated at Georgetown. He went to Vietnam as a Civilian in 1967 and as a member of AID in 1970. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: You went out to Vietnam from when to when?

TOLLE: I left in June, 1970. We took a fairly circuitous route including a week in Taipei in which we were ferried around and shown a number of agricultural projects and things. It was an orientation for the type of work we were expected to try to transplant into Vietnam. I spent some time in Hong Kong and fell in love with that city, of course. I brought my wife out to a safe haven. There is a long story involved in that which we can get to later if you think it is relevant. She was technically not supposed to go. Let me step back here. I graduated in 1969 at which point the woman with whom I was going out and in love with, who was a student at the language institute here, dropped out after her sophomore year. We got married. She then went to a local business school to learn to type and take dictation because her goal was to go to Vietnam with me. This, by the way didn't make my in-laws very happy...their honor student daughter dropping out of school to marry somebody and go half way around the world to a war zone. She accompanied me on the trip out in June, 1970. She stayed with my mother who had been living in Manila since 1966 and I went on to Taipei, Hong Kong and then Saigon. So I would have been there approximately from June, 1970 for a full two year tour.

Originally my tour was to be 18 months as they had thought that my wife would remain in the States. At that time there was a freeze on dependents going to Manila. I managed to circumvent that with great difficulty because there was no additional quarters, my wife moving in with my mother. At this point my tour was extended to a full two years. If you kept your wife in the States it was 18 months, if you brought her to safe haven it became two years. So I spent a full two years in Vietnam.

Q: When you arrived in Saigon did you know what you were going to do?

TOLLE: In a sense, not exactly, because unlike most of the young people who were to be DSAs, the civilians, I was not hired as a CDO, community development officer. I was hired from the beginning as an assistant relief/rehabilitation officer, refugees. From the very start I was in a different category and I was the only refuge officer in CORDS 20. So, I knew I would work with refugees. This was part of the deal in my own mind that allowed me to go there. Of all the people who needed help, clearly the vast number of refugees needed it the most and I felt I could work in this program without any particular problem. So, I knew I would be in refugees, I knew I would be assigned to what was known at the time as the War Victims Directorate in Saigon. However, as to my exact position, no, I did not know prior to my arrival. Immediately upon my arrival, and I emphasize immediately, I was rushed through two days in Saigon and then sent up to the central highlands to Nha Trang, the II CORPS headquarters at the time, specifically to be sent out to Lam Dong province for an anticipated refugee movement that they knew was coming and they needed someone there. Lam Dong is a beautiful place and one of the backwaters of the war. In fact, even in TET of 1968, I think it was one of the few province capitals that wasn't attacked. It was an out of the way place.

At this time we had at least acquiesced in Lon Nol's coup in Cambodia against Sihanouk. In the resulting turmoil, the Cambodians took advantage of the opportunity to expel ethnic Vietnamese who at that time were largely urban dwellers and constituted the petit bourgeois, if you will, and perhaps higher, the middle class, in Phnom Penh. It was these people who became known as the Vietnamese Repatriots from Cambodia who were to be brought to Lam Dong province for resettlement. I was told that we would be getting approximately 5,000, that they would arrive at about 200 a week, that it was going to be a fairly leisurely move. I was to be there for a little while, it wasn't to be that big a thing.

Within a very few days after arriving I was informed that instead of getting 5,000 we would get 10,000 and they would arrive in the space of three or four days. They were just literally going to descend upon us. So, I hit the ground running. There was simply no other choice. Within a week after my arrival the planes started arriving at the airport and the people started getting off. Now, as refugees go, these were a unique group because, as I say, they were not peasants, rural farmers rounded up, they were the urban middle class of Phnom Penh. They came well equipped. It was remarkable what they brought with them. An entire restaurant came with all the tables and chairs, for example. The waitresses came as a group. I remember an individual showing up with a motorcycle that I desperately desired. Rumor had it, although I never personally confirmed it, that a madam and her stable came with them. In other words, it was a truly remarkably well equipped group of refugees although by and large ill suited to rural living. Whether this was oversight, I don't know. I have no idea what happened here. But, the people arrived and it was a time of...it was probably the most fulfilling time, when you have an immediate crisis things...I live well in that environment, I don't have any problems when I am busy.

Q: What was the government structure of the area that you were plugged into?

TOLLE: In Lam Dong province..the province consisted of two districts. On the government side there was the GVN government, the province government, headed by a province chief, an ARVN colonel.

Q: ARVN being army of Vietnam.

TOLLE: Yes. His staff, both military and civilians who were representatives of the various ministries in Saigon. There were two districts. They were quite large. Much, much larger than you found in your average Vietnam situation because of the low population density in the highlands. In fact, the population of the province was grouped entirely along the QL20, which was the national route from Saigon to Da Lat. Not too far off that route there wasn't anything at all but various assorted animals and VC, etc. Administratively it was divided into these two districts.

We had on the American side attempted to duplicate the structure of the GVN. In other words, the provincial GVN officials were advised in many cases on a one to one basis by a provincial team. I was assigned to the province team, I was not assigned to a district. I was located in Bao Loc, which is the capital of the province. My assignment was to be counterpart to the director of social welfare for Lam Dong who was an employee of the Ministry of Social Welfare in Saigon, a civilian. So each of us in this team, we were advisory team 38, stationed at Bao Loc. The military lived in a compound outside of town. The civilians, and it varied from three or four of us, lived in the standard USAID compound with all the standard USAID billets and furniture in the middle of town. I very quickly got out of that compound and actually got into a house that USAID owned.

At that time our province senior advisor was a colonel by the name of John Thompson, an outstanding individual. Our deputy province senior advisor was a civilian, a man by the name of John Ford. After that it was all military. When I arrived there were no other civilians in the province with the exception of the police advisor, who was technically a civilian but certainly more warlike than any of the military there. I, in effect, became the third civilian in the team. Because the province was low priority, because it was low population and not central to what was happening, we did not duplicate to the extent that many CORDS teams did. We had our district team. The district senior advisor would be a major, of course, and the advisor to the district chief who was an ARVN officer, usually a captain. We had two of them. Now, keep in mind that one of the districts was located in Bao Loc, so we had three compounds. The American provincial compound military, the American civilian compound and the district compound. So, all of our district level people were military, there were no civilians, nor were there ever any district civilians that I was aware of in Lam Dong.

My work, although consumed with refugees, once the initial rush was over and things began to slow down, I asked for and very gratefully received the opportunity to expand my work into many of the other areas, what was known as the New Life Development officer at the time. We had not had one. All of the many other development projects were either not being monitored or being monitored by military individuals as much as they could. But, the team itself was your standard mixture. Some of the military were truly committed, sensitive people and some of them were stereotypical, quite frankly. We had a MILPHAP team which is a military public health advisory program. The MILPHAP team had their own little compound set up in there. Truly the navy lives well regardless where it goes, by the way. They really lived well.

So, the structure and advisory relationships varied on an individual basis. If you were the type of individual who could get along with the Vietnamese or who made an attempt to, then you tended to do so. However, if you came in with the attitude, then, of course, you didn't. One could find any number of examples of both of these.

My ace in the hole was the Vietnamese language, of course. No one else on the American team had anything more than what you might call a smattering of market Vietnamese. Now, this was not initially as much of a benefit as I thought it was going to be because my training at VTC had been by Vietnamese women, almost all of them from the Delta/Saigon area. So, I was trained to speak southern Vietnamese. I ended up in the central highlands where the dialect is different. But this particular community was dominated by northern refugees and northern Vietnamese is very different. It has very harsh tones in it. I recall being considerably shocked to show up at a meeting and not understand what they were saying. I had not expected that. Had I been sent down to the Delta, I would have, I think, fit in more quickly in terms of language capability. I actually had to bring an interpreter along in many of my discussions, which I did not anticipate doing. This was particularly a problem because Vietnamese interpreters were in short supply and I frequently had to use a Montagnard interpreter who would interpret from Vietnamese to English, and both were learned languages for him. So, that clearly didn't work. After a few tries I tended to use them as assistants and bodyguards, guides, etc. I, then, regardless of communication problems, attempted to do it myself.

Q: What were you doing when you were resettling this initial group of refugees?

TOLLE: Just about anything that needed doing. In other words I was an expeditor. The function really of the advisory effort was to plug into the various levels of the GVN and to have your own chain of command. Now, the Vietnamese government was characterized by a number of things, not the least of which was the influence of the French system upon which it was patterned, which we would joke was simply designed to do nothing. Let's say the social welfare ministry chief, my counterpart, would not go to the province chief. He wouldn't go to any of the other service chiefs. There was simply no communication. He would communicate up to his boss in Saigon and he would receive his directions. In other words, vertical communications in the GVN worked quite well, although somewhat one sided with everything coming down and very little going up, but at least it functioned. Lateral communications, let's say at the province level, which was my personal experience, was essentially non-existent. But the situation with the refugees was one that required enormous lateral communication. Each of the service chiefs, agriculture, etc., all had a part to play in this and initially in the reception of the refugees, they played an excellent part. However, if the province chief was interested the job got done, if he wasn't interested it stopped getting done. He was interested particularly because these were Vietnamese and weren't just refugees from the VC area. These were people that they expected to meld into the society and become supportive.

Q: It must have helped some that they had a bourgeois background, too.

TOLLE: To an extent I think that it did. I wasn't able to determine really the extent of this because being largely bourgeois the camp emptied fairly quickly and went to Saigon. They weren't interested in becoming farmers in the central highlands, which was a good thing because we never provided them with any land. But initially the effort was superb. Of course the Vietnamese are very good when they wanted to be at making a good show. When that first plane arrived we had the delegations and the students were there and the banners were there, the whole nine yards. My counterpart, with whom I established I think a fairly good solid working relationship because he spoke essentially no English and the fact that I spoke Vietnamese and he spoke southern Vietnamese, helped, did his job and the province chief made sure that the others did their jobs. I can still recall meetings that he laid it out in no uncertain terms, very much for show, of course.

So, for the first few months the initial resettlement period was handled quite well. My job tended to be filling in those little gaps in one way or another. When something didn't work, something wasn't ordered, something ordered but wasn't received, you could always go to your American counterpart and he would use his vertical channels to get it done. So, I was an expediter. I can recall, for example, having one of the girls rush up to me about the first day of the arrival exclaiming that there were no can openers for the canned food to be handed out to the refugees. Not a single can opener had been provided. So, of course, the way you found can openers was to go out to the local market in Bao Loc where the American P-38s were always available by the hundreds, so I peeled off a few of those piaster funds we had and she went out and came back with a big bag of can openers. That is a small example, but an example.

I could get through to Saigon, but it was very difficult, so we had to work through Nha Trang and I have very little good to say about the efforts of the region in this American structure.

By and large, it was get done what has to be done. If I have to go somewhere to get it, do it. At the same time, I from the very beginning, because I had seen this earlier in my trip, tried to shy away from the classic American reaction to people in need, which is to just take care of them. That was not our job. The job was to get the Vietnamese government to take care of them. So, I would not, unless it was absolutely necessary and a matter close to life or death, intercede and do something for someone, myself. We had a couple of engineer battalions, for example, in the province. It would have been fairly easy to go down and get them to do the road clearing instead of going over to the public works chief and get him to do the road clearing. There are countless examples of this kind of approach. As long as people weren't starving or dying of disease or open to exposure, my policy was to stand in the background, talk to various people and get them to do it. I took this very, very seriously to the point where I tended to stay away from these constant public events. Everything involved in the process was always a big event and they always wanted their American up front. I never did that, I absolutely refused. We would have the "receiving of the rock" ceremony and they would want me to pick out which pile to measure to see if the contractor delivered it, and I consistently refused to do those kinds of things.

I was as self effacing as possible. When you are the big tall white American standing around you don't exactly blend into the scenery. But in terms of the work that I attempted to do, I was very, very careful to do that. It endeared me to the members of the team who understood what we were supposed to be doing, primarily Colonel Thompson, our PSA, but not to others because most of the other members of the team were lieutenants and captains, many not planning on making the military a career and had the attitude of let's spend a year there and get the hell out of there...

Q: This was typical of the military who said going back to the States was going back to the world.

TOLLE: Yes, they referred to it as the world, no question about it. And, if you were short, you were dying to go. I do recall a running conflict with one of the officers in the engineer battalion, which is course...now this is USARV, not MACV, building the main road here. Several times this colonel in charge of that saw all of these refugees coming and he said, "Ah, ha! Labor! I can get work for my projects." So he would come thundering down in a truck and wanted to drive into the camp and start hiring people. I said, "No, you will not do that. We will go to the various and assorted service chiefs and you will follow the process, so it will be the Vietnamese government hiring Vietnamese refugees, not the Americans." We went round and round on this any number of times. Once he ignored me and went down and I went to the colonel and had the boom laid on him. So, I was continuously involved in this type of thing.

Q: Where you in that area the whole two years?

TOLLE: No, I was only there for about nine months. The project got off to an excellent start. The reception was well done. Two things then became apparent that were going to hamper the long run. One is that the vast majority of the people had no background and no intentions of being farmers, so they left, and thus the numbers dropped fairly steadily. And secondly, as was common with the GVN, initial reception was good, long term follow up was poor. We could not get any useful land for these people and without that there was no viability to what had been planned as a rural farming village. So with the precipitant reduction in refugees and the slipping of the program into doldrums, I attempted to be appointed the New Life Development advisor in Bao Loc. I intended to spend my entire two years there. This, however, did not come about. Apparently I was not high enough ranking to become a new life development officer and I was also hired as an assistant relief /rehabilitation officer. So, this was short circuited...There was a labor day event where wives were allowed to come into the country that September, 1970. My wife came in, had had previous correspondence and landed a job while there with Control Data Corporation in Saigon. She stayed to work for Control Data, which caused no end of troubles because she was supposed to have left and I began to run afoul of the government bureaucracy there.

Q: Whose government?

TOLLE: Our government. So by about eight or so months into my time in Lam Dong, it became apparent that as refugee advisor I was not being employed. Since my desire to become a development officer was thwarted, I was reassigned to Saigon and I ended up remaining in Saigon with the War Victims Directorate for the balance of my two years.

Q: Before we leave this area, could you tell a bit about your problems with Nha Trang?

TOLLE: Nha Trang's problems were two fold. One of them being strictly communication. It was very, very difficult to communicate. The telephone was truly an adventure to try and one found that you began to question the need for these people. There was a fairly large number of Americans located there. They were ostensibly backstopping the individual province people, for example, but they had a very difficult task because the central highlands, II CORPS, comprised the largest single area of Vietnam. It was extraordinarily under populated, mountainous, and communication was a problem. But, the function of the region was never really made clear to me. I communicated directly with Saigon, because I was closer to Saigon, and the people at the region level seemed to be people who largely came in to visit so that they could write their reports and ask me for information. I spent an enormous amount of my time giving dog and pony show tours to Americans. In fact, our particular refugee settlement because it was Vietnamese being repatriated by Cambodia, was a fairly high priority event. General Collins showed up, any number of one and two star generals, the names of whom I forget. Colby showed up and I briefed him. Everyone showed up. So, for a while it was a very intense thing. I increasingly found myself fighting, if you will, two wars. One was my job with the Vietnamese with the government, which was fraught with frustrations and delays, etc, but was rewarding because you could get things done, could see physical results of your efforts in the betterment of people. However, the other war, was the war behind my back. It was fought entirely with Americans and almost entirely with the personnel branch. This was when I began to discover...this really dates back to my arrival in the country and my wife accompanying me...I try not to over state this, I appear to be one of those individuals who (and I concluded this by 1972), could not function in a government bureaucracy.

Q: I think that is a very important point to make. I had thirty years in the government and I found towards the end I would break out in what I call my bureaucratic sweat, when all of a sudden I would find I was running across a personnel problem. This gets to you after a while.

TOLLE: In the long and short of it, that is exactly what happened to me. It happened to me in a two-year span of time. Personnel lives by rules, everything is in this AID book as far as they are concerned. But, rules can never cover reality. Reality is infinitely complex. If you experience reality that lies in the gray margins between the rules, you are in trouble and I seem to be one of those who continually found myself in this grey area.

Q: Also, there is the tolerance level which if you don't have, you really should get out. Now Saigon. This was not the Saigon that I know, I was consul general in Saigon and had minor responsibility for Da Nang's consulate from 1969-70. But you are 1970-71 in Saigon.

There had been a major troop withdrawal. What was the atmosphere, both American and Vietnamese, that you found. Coming from a small province all of a sudden to Saigon is something I would like to capture.

TOLLE: Almost total difference in atmosphere. It must be kept in mind, it can not be emphasized too much, that this was the heyday of pacification, the time of our success. TET of 1968 had wiped out largely the indigenous insurgency. At no time was security better. For example, as I said earlier, I hate to fly, but if you were leaving Bao Loc you had to fly to Nha Trang and then you had to fly to Saigon. You had to overnight. Well, we had just built this beautiful new road from Da Lat to Saigon and I could get to Saigon driving and I was the first and only American civilian ever to do that from that area and it was a shocking thing when it first happened.

I had heard talk about the high life that was going on in terms of the military at that time. When you arrived in Saigon you then discovered a climate that had several different interwoven aspects to it. But to this day I refuse to refer to Saigon as the field. Someone in Washington may talk about field officers out there in Saigon, but believe me Saigon was not the field. Saigon was a collection of some of the most fascinating personalities I have ever known in my life. It was the frontier. It was Dodge City. As you made the comment earlier, the people who came out there either couldn't make a living in the regular work-a-day world, didn't want to any more, wanted adventure, maybe the shady ones...we had crooks, we had the idealists, we had...

Q: This was my clientele because part of the job of being consul general is being in charge of American prisoners and I had ones who had earned their first brush with the law in 1944 in the black market in Paris.

TOLLE: It was just a self-contained world. I don't think I have ever lived as well since I lived there. You couldn't spend any money. Your quarters were paid for. I had a vehicle from the GVN, a jeep, but I had it. I had a motorcycle and I lived in a beautiful apartment with my wife. Food was cheap. I could buy bourbon for about $2 a quart. We used to have champagne parties. It was absolutely unbelievable.

Now, within the War Victims Directorate, I enjoyed that work to a large degree because we by and large had the dedicated people in there. Within that Directorate I found some of the most worthy Americans who served there. I think I was happier there than I would have been anywhere else. To an extent I could spend my working day thinking I had accomplished something. Now mine you, I was essentially a paper expediter. I think I had been promoted to R-7 by that time, but up until that time I was told by personnel that I was both the youngest and lowest ranking American in Vietnam for a number of months. My job ended up entailing a lot of field work and I ended up flying to all 44 provinces of Vietnam one time or other, spending various amounts of time. I literally covered the entire country, most of it while I was in Saigon. So, I would get out of the city often enough to make it worthwhile, but the atmosphere you found among the large number of Foreign Service officers there was one of just serving their time until they could get out.

We had an increasing number of USAID individuals being sent there because USAID was being cut back worldwide. These people would show up without a clue and without an interest and because they ranked higher, they got their jobs. This began to be an increasingly large problem. I was youngest and lowest ranking and within a few months after arrival I became deputy chief of the operations division of the War Victims Directorate, which in effect was 90 percent of it. Through the remaining year we kept getting people in and some of them were excellent people, but by and large they were people in the wrong place. They were invariably older than I was and higher ranking. I was given an FSO-3 as my assistant and I was a 7. I think to our mutual credit this was not a problem. I was very conscious of this and made it a very careful point to work this out. So, I was given the responsibility, and I think I demonstrated ability, to, in effect, run the division, because my superior, Ray Fontaine, who was the head of the Victims Directorate at that time, was also given the additional responsibility of working with Dr. Phan Quang Dan, the minister of state, who was quite an energetic individual and was in many cases working on very different projects.

So, the balance between the two wars I was fighting began to shift very heavily against me. In Saigon, in a bureaucratic isolated world where we lived well, we partied among people who didn't seem by and large to give a great deal of a damn, and the increasing dissatisfaction with this in the first place...what am I doing here, what am I accomplishing? I like to live well, I have no problem with that, but I would much rather be out doing something and accomplishing something good. Gradually the good that I felt I was accomplishing was taken away from me and I just kept getting into these bureaucratic scrapes, primarily over my wife. To bring a wife to Saigon, when all the dependents had been evacuated in 1963, was an extraordinarily difficult thing to do. I took the advise of a vice consul, "Noran Ivanchukov," a Mongolian.

Q: Oh, yes. He worked for me. He was part of the agency.

TOLLE: I rather assumed he was being a Mongolian. I hooked up with him, I think it was in Hong Kong, and explained my situation. He said he was going to be a vice consul and I asked how I could get my wife over to Saigon. He told me he would take care of it, but he didn't, and I ended up in unknowing violation of all sorts of regulations. Cables flew back and forth. It is a long painful story. I have kept all the documentation on this and last night I looked over a journal that I kept. There was an official reprimand, for example, in my file for bringing my wife over. Every one of these things I did on the advice of those people who told me what to do and within my understanding of the rules, I just didn't do it the right way. I fell into one of those grey areas that is not covered by the regulations and I was very intolerant of that. I am not that type person, and I still am not, that can get along in that world.

Q: You left there when?

TOLLE: I left in 1972. Another one of those odd things. I debated a great deal of time as to what I wanted to do. Did I want to stay? It is a long, complex process that eventually resolved itself down to my saying that I could no longer continue to work in a cause in which I did not believe, for an agency which I despised. I think had I remained out in the field my decision might have been very, very different. I don't want to guarantee that, because it was very frustrating to work in the field also and have to fill out these reports and send in a voucher for expenses and have it come back two months later because I sent in three copies instead of four copies and this sort of thing. Be that as it may, I was recruited to stay. Jacobson wrote me a letter asking me to stay. Colby, who had taken a personal interest in me because he was a friend of my father's and I had met him when he visited my refugee projects urged me to sign on for another tour.

This was a major decision because for all of my life from puberty on I had aimed towards a career in the Foreign Service. Although the option of joining it was still there, this was about the time I could have taken the exam again, it began to be apparent to me that this was not for me. What I had prepared all my life to do, if you will, I was good at: on the front war. I never had a problem with the Vietnamese in the sense that I worked with the corrupt and the lazy and everything else but managed to work with them. I had a great deal of tolerance for other cultures, but almost none for my own.

So, I made the decision to leave and ran into another one of those personnel regulations. If you were terminated, you got better travel arrangements than if you resigned. So, instead of resigning

I applied for a position in Latin America, knowing full well that I would never get it. Thus I am terminated instead of resigning and I got better terms, etc.

RICHARD FUNKHOUSER
CORDS
Saigon (1970-1972)

Richard Funkhouser was born in Trenton, New Jersey and was educated at Princeton. His career included posts in Moscow, Paris, Libreville and Saigon. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1988.

Q: What did you do? You went to Vietnam in August or something, 1970.

FUNKHOUSER: I was one year in Africa, and one year was fine. One year's enough. I was offered what they called the DEPCORDS position in the Saigon Military Region, which went from the Cambodian border through Saigon to the delta. We had what was a "Pacification Program," so-called, where we were trying to win the minds and the hearts of the people. It was a very serious operation in which, the fighting military aside, all of the rest of the infrastructure of Vietnam was subject to American pressure to run the country well. Now this means we had responsibility for the roads, for the schools, for the hospitals, for the local militia of old men, old women and children who were left alone in the exposed villages when the young men went off to fight with the ARVN. There was a General in each of the military regions. A three-star General, Mike Davison, was my boss.

Q: You're talking about American generals?

FUNKHOUSER: American generals. We're only talking about the American side now, but it was a bipartite, layered operation: American three-star general, State Department ex-ambassador or FSO-1, two-star so-called. Then an American General one-star, and then a State Department Minister, Counselor or Foreign Service Officer, Class 2. Defense and State were layered in each of the military regions. Perhaps the most unusual feature of this command structure was that the civilian Depcords also served as Senior Advisor to the Commanding General in each of the four Military Regions in South Vietnam. When the Commanding General of Military Region III (Third Regional Advisory Command), Lieutenant General Wagstaff, was on leave for five weeks in late 1971, I acted in his place with the assimilated rank of Major General, officially in charge of some 90,000 Free World Forces (U.S., Australia, Korea). I, of course, deferred military decisions to the military officers under me, but signed all orders as "Acting". I presume that civilian control of the military, e.g., Presidents, Secretaries of Defense et al, provided the precedent, but the role and responsibility was to me unique for a Foreign Service Officer. John Gunther Dean was in one area. Charlie Whitehouse was my predecessor. And each of us had something like 1800 Americans working for us trying to keep the country moving, operating and reasonably democratic on a year and a half assignment. I went from being in charge of an Embassy with ten or eleven people to an operation with 1800 Americans and an equal number of Vietnamese trying to build the infrastructure of the country. (Cf. my article in the 7/97 issue of the Foreign Service Journal, "Speaking Out," which contains the excellent advice of how to run an organization of thousands which I sought from the former Deputy Under Secretary for Administration, Idar Rimestad.)

Q: How did you feel about it? Let's put it back at the time in retrospect. Sort of the American way of trying to remake a country, a foreign ideology. You know, it was just a different country, different people.

FUNKHOUSER: Well, all I can say to that was I was fully supportive of what Dean Rusk was trying to do insofar as foreign policy and the Pacification Program was concerned. Helping the country; the hospitals, the roads, the schools. It had to be done. Trying to protect the villages. Getting the local militia to defend the villages. I would attend the military meetings, of course, with General Abrams and see that we always knew what the armed forces were doing. But it was very easy to identify with the fact that the job had to be done, as long as the policy was what the policy was, i.e., to stop "dominos" from falling to the communists.

At the end, I had a really serious difference of opinion with my superiors in Saigon. Not with the Embassy or Bill Colby, who had left as the Ambassador in charge of the Pacification Program, but with some of the military. I, having been there a year, made the strongest possible pitch with my Saigon bosses, with three-star General Mike Davison's support. "Start getting the Americans out of the country. Leave one advisor per Province, but don't have 50 colonels, some of them retired and "double-dipping" their salaries, advising a Vietnamese District Commander how to run his war.

Our Vietnamese commanding officers were at that time extremely good in Military Region Three. They didn't need advice. They needed guns and ammunition, what not, but they knew how to fight the Viet Cong just as well as we did. And I almost got removed from Vietnam by the top military brass, because I refused to put in a budget for 50 advisors where we only needed one. As reported to the State Department inspectors February 15, 1972, General Davison and Ambassador Colby, my two immediate superiors, fully supported my May 15, 1971 recommendation for immediate reduction of American advisors. In Military Region III I cut the Cords organization from over 1700 civilian employees as of January 1, 1971, to under 500 twelve months later. Unfortunately, Davison's and Colby's successors changed this policy.

Q: Was this for bureaucratic reasons? I'm talking about the impetus from our military. Or is it they didn't trust, have confidence, in the Vietnamese, or is it just the way we do things?

FUNKHOUSER: It's the way we do things. More was better. If we're not winning, put more in. It was quantity, not quality. Military Region Three stood up best. We did remove a bunch of the advisors. It also destroyed me spiritually to see the American cornucopia being poured into a rathole, basically.

My budget was one paragraph. I got anything I wanted. I didn't want it. "Just write a figure in." It was 'anything goes.' And to a Foreign Service Officer who is used to saving money - in the old days by writing out longhand on one-time-pads to make your phrases more succinct. I couldn't understand it, and I didn't want to see the waste continue.

Q: So, you left Vietnam after a tour of a year and a half? Did you feel that things were going wrong by the time you'd left or not?

FUNKHOUSER: Oh, I did some reports on that for the Department. Marshall Green asked me to summarize where we stood, and I did it in terms of a football game. Letter to Assistant Secretary Green 1/20/72,

"OFFENSE: North is clearly 7-14 points stronger...DEFENSE: Both strong but neither has been truly tested in a one-to-one match-up. that is, without involvement (of outside powers)...SPECIAL UNITS: here the North has an established 12-point advantage... publicity...media... unsportsmanship conduct and foul play...In summary, South remains a 2-4 touchdown underdog in any head-to-head match today..." Three months later Marshall Green asked me for an update he could show to President Nixon which would answer his question, "Can the GVN hack it?" My conclusion dated 3/10/72, assuming continued U.S. material and military support, was "a fragile affirmative."

They were in our territory, but we were holding our own. I thought that the ARVN, the Vietnamese military, would stand up much better. They stood up extremely well in our area. And I really thought that the Vietnamese could hold their own if we pulled out gradually. Start the movement out soon. And I thought that they'd hold. But we didn't pull out really that fast. And I was relatively confident and, as it turned out, wrong.

Q: Well, Region Number Three was certainly the last to hold out.

FUNKHOUSER: South Vietnam collapsed from the top, Regions One and Two.

Q: How did you find, here was a case of the State Department, the CIA and the Army working together.

FUNKHOUSER: Excellently under Bunker, a great Ambassador.

Q: At your level you were saying really with the military, not the military you were working with in Region Three, but the military from the top, that was trying to force more support on the Vietnamese.

FUNKHOUSER: Individuals on some individual basis. That was it. Who knows? I could be wrong. But we all worked extremely well together under Bunker. My only doubts about the superior U.S. diplomatic and military leadership during my tour in Vietnam was how they could not have convinced Washington to get out sooner. Of course, they may well have except for the impossible question of how to do it with minimal loss to our national interest. I was not privy to their personal advice to Washington. I became convinced we just were in the wrong war at the wrong place and never should have been there. Once having gotten in, we were in a hopeless position without winning it. And the television, of course, made it too graphic to the American public what it was like there.

The one argument in support of our role in Vietnam which never failed me in later speeches and conversations was that I hoped America would always be on the side towards which women and children ran in terror. Refugees never ran north!

Q: Did you have problems with the young officers? I'm speaking of Foreign Service Officers coming out to CORDS, which certainly was not exactly what they had thought of diplomatic life being like.

FUNKHOUSER: On an individual basis, some officers were so opposed to the war that I didn't think that they could do their job properly. It's not your job to make policy. You're out here, you've got to do the best you can. Report anything you want, were my instructions to all my staffs anywhere, particularly in Paris. Jack Perry, for example, was strongly against the involvement in Vietnam. I wasn't. I was a "hard hat."

My formative years in diplomacy were molded by successful U.S. policy of resisting Communist expansion globally, e.g., Marshall Plan, Berlin airlift, Cuba. In Korea, Communist tanks invaded the South; in Vietnam, Communist aggressors moved more subtly, by osmosis. I believed the "domino theory." I said, "Anybody on the staff, write what you want. You sign it. I'll send it in. I don't have to agree with you." And Jack Perry wrote a brilliant dispatch from the Paris optic on why this was a most unfortunate policy. He sent it in. Same in Vietnam. "If you don't agree, put it down in writing, but don't let that change your job. You're here to do the job." The trouble with most of the State Department officers in Vietnam, I didn't feel this way because I volunteered and was in a top position, was that they felt that they had done something wrong or they wouldn't be in Vietnam. In other words, if you're expendable, go to Vietnam.

Q: Particularly at that time of experience. It was found that this was not the road upwards.

FUNKHOUSER: Although some of us who were DEPCORDS: John Dean, Charlie Whitehouse went on to a couple of Embassies. John Dean went on to four or five. At the lower level? Those that had studied Vietnamese, of course, and we had some brilliant officers, were in paradise. They had all the best sources. They were listened to. Four-star Generals would listen to Third Secretaries (language officers).

HOWARD H. LANGE
Pacification Program Officer
Hue (1970-1971)

Political Officer
Saigon (1972)

Howard H. Lange was born in 1937 in Nebraska and educated at the University of Nebraska. His career included posts in Hue, Saigon, Manila, Taipei, Beijing and Warsaw. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You served in Vietnam from when to when?

LANGE: From '70 to '72.

Q: What was the situation when you got out there

LANGE: I went first to Hue. When we arrived in Vietnam, we had some orientation in Saigon. We had a meeting with William Colby, who was in charge of the “pacification” program. We had this notion that during this meeting with Colby, we were entitled to express our assignment preferences within country. He must have been impressed with our Chutzpah, but he didn't express any annoyance. He had the weight of a lot of problems on his shoulders, and he would have been entitled to put things in perspective for us. This illustrates that we still didn't quite appreciate the reality of what was happening on the ground in Vietnam. We knew a lot about the Vietnamese culture and language and all that, but the connect between that and what was actually taking place hadn't quite been made. We knew something of the big picture, but we were soon to learn about the little picture.

I was assigned to Hue, which was an interesting place. That was only a couple of years after the Tet Offensive in 1968, which was so devastating in Hue. The mood among the Vietnamese was still very much one of apprehension. Emotionally, they remained hunkered down. The central Vietnamese are a little more reserved anyway. With Tet 68, many had withdrawn into a shell. We had a Vietnamese assistant in the Hue City advisory office who took some pains to limit the number of Vietnamese who knew that he worked for the Americans. He reasoned, correctly, that the fewer who knew, the less likely he was to be denounced as a collaborator and counterrevolutionary if the city again fell under Viet Cong or North Vietnamese control. In 1968, many of such people had been taken to the countryside and executed.

Some members of the advisory team had been captured or killed in 1968. I lived in a house that had been occupied by one who was killed, and there were still a couple of bullet holes inside the house. The maid stayed on at the house, and she erected a small shrine on the north side of the house to propitiate the angry spirits still about.

I didn't spend much time on our military bases. I did see our kids driving through town in their military vehicles. Based on that occasional contact alone, it seemed to me that morale and discipline were very iffy. This was the era of “fragging” incidents, and there were persistent stories about drug use. Incidents in Hue involving U.S. soldiers were rather frequent. During traffic backups at the approaches to bridges over the Perfume River, Vietnamese “cowboys” would steal from Americans in their vehicles; shootings ensued. In the countryside, American soldiers reportedly shot, maliciously and randomly, water buffalo from the roadside, which was of course a terrible thing to do, disastrous to the livelihood of the owner. People-to-people relations were not good.

There was in early 1971 an incursion by regular Army of Vietnam (ARVN) units into Laos, an operation that was named “Lam Son 719.” It was an attempt to disrupt North Vietnamese supply lines, but it was a disaster. Armored units rumbled through Hue in the dead of night headed for Laos and limped back not long thereafter. It was meant to be an ARVN operation, but it came to depend heavily on U.S. air support. A lasting image was a photo, carried the U.S. press, of ARVN soldiers desperately clinging to the skids of Huey choppers as they escaped the fighting. So it was a pretty grim atmosphere in many respects.

The security in the province right around Hue wasn't so bad, but the westernmost district was mountainous and provided sanctuary for the Viet Cong. Our advisory team in that western district was quartered in a bunker. From that district, we once a month got exactly three rockets into the city just to remind us that the Viet Cong was out there, and this obviously kept people on edge.

Q: What was your job?

LANGE: There were two of us on the Hue City advisory team, and I was also economic advisor on the province advisory team. In retrospect, much of our activity was meaningless. For example, I did studies on potential for tourism and for handicraft industries using the indigenous bamboo. This was stuff that was interesting to do as an economic development person, but we had no chance of getting it off the ground without conditions of peace and security.

Q: Hue had, of course, suffered badly during the Tet Offensive, when the city was taken over by the Viet Cong. Was it the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese?

LANGE: It was the North Vietnamese Army that took the city, though VC agents in the city surfaced thereafter and helped to identify targets for purges, and worse.

Q: A lot of people were taken out and killed. Was there a serious gap in the intellectual, administrative structure of people who'd been killed?

LANGE: One figure is a total of 2,800 killed. A first wave of executions, after the NVA established control, focused on civil servants, teachers and religious leaders. Subsequent purges were aimed at community leaders, intellectuals and those connected with the U.S. You can imagine what this did to the social and political infrastructure. The civilian apparatus was pretty much gutted; it had all been militarized by the time I arrived. All the provinces acquired military governors. We had a good one the year I was there, Colonel Than. But there were stories about his wife, and in fact there were stories about most ARVN military wives at that time, who were making the most of the short time they had to insure the future of their families. I think our province chief was more honest than most; his wife was probably average. The populace was just trying to survive. They didn't have many illusions about their government or political leadership. We would get upset because, for example, in one of the programs to construct community facilities, they had mixed a lot of sand with the cement to make concrete so they could sell the leftover cement. Of course the concrete didn't hold together. So the projects were often falling apart, literally! But the Vietnamese were probably acting quite rationally in those circumstances, where the future was totally uncertain.

Q: I would have thought it would have been sort of difficult to work up enthusiasm for doing the things you were doing, with the situation being such that the future was not really sure. You didn't know where things were going, and the idea of looking at tourism and crafts and all that. I don't want to say rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic, but at least it was certainly an uncertain future. Was that the feeling or did you feel that things were moving ahead?

LANGE: I guess the concept most of us had was that we were acting on a contingency basis; nothing was going to be possible unless there was some certainty about the future, which there was not at that time. The best you could hope for was to identify some opportunities that could be put in place as it became possible to do so. Some of the guys on the team were more cynical than others, but most of us were just trying to do our best to make something work. Certainly the military guys, they were busting their chops trying to train the regional forces. And maybe there was some residual benefit. At least it would be nice to think so. I haven't been back for a visit, but I understand that tourism is flourishing in Hue.

Q: Did you get any feel for how the people in Hue felt about the Thieu government, the government down in Saigon?

LANGE: Well, there was a lot of unhappiness within the Buddhist community. In fact, we tried to maintain contact with the leaders, because they felt that ever since the Diem government of the early '60s, Saigon didn't have their interests at heart. I don't know if there was any feeling about Thieu that was different there than in any other part of the country. I think a deep-seated resignation had set in that no matter who was in the presidency, they wouldn't have much chance to survive. Elections certainly didn't fire people with much enthusiasm for any particular candidate. I think most individuals in Hue were fatalistic. The psychological climate was negative and depressed, and the physical environment reinforced that. One of Diem's villas on the outskirts of Hue had been destroyed at one point, possibly in '68, and it remained a bombed-out hulk. The former U.S. consulate, closed after it was damaged in Tet '68, was occupied by squatters. People had little faith in Saigon's ability to defend them, as they showed when they jammed the roads to the south during the Easter 1972 NVA offensive.

I have some notes from my first year in Vietnam, in Hue. They pick up in January '71, so it was soon after I arrived, which was approaching the third anniversary of Tet '68. It was very much on people's minds. Several people in the CORDS program there in Hue lost their lives - nine Americans and five Vietnamese. Of course as we now know in retrospect, the Viet Cong kind of shot their load in Tet '68, but that wasn't obvious in 1971, and there was a lot of anxiety. We still had no clear idea of North Vietnamese or Viet Cong intentions. In January 1971, there had been a mining of the railroad - not an uncommon occurrence - in Phu Loc district, which was about a 30 minute drive south of Hue. It killed nine Vietnamese. Two rockets had landed in Hue over the weekend, but they landed harmlessly in the water. South Vietnamese forces responded with three to four hundred rounds of counter battery fire, which of course was symptomatic of the whole Vietnam scene - massive but militarily ineffective response, undertaken largely for psychological reasons.

Some early impressions: A) I sensed Vietnamese hostility in Da Nang when I came through en route to Hue. Lee Graham and I had arrived together (he was on his way to Quang Ngai), and as we walked along the river a few blocks from the "White Elephant" - headquarters of CORDS for MR I - two kids on a motorbike ripped his camera off his shoulder. That was typical of petty crime, but they added insult to injury by taunting us as they rode away. B) The U.S. military was at that time in the process of drawing down. Morale was pretty bad. I didn't have a lot of direct contact with the military, but having been in the military, I could see the signs. The kids showed no pride in appearance and they weren't disciplined. I saw written in the dust on the back of a truck in Da Nang, "Get me out of this hell." C) On the other hand, in Hue, I visited the Tien Mu Pagoda, which is well known, up the river from Hue. It was very peaceful, but with a background of artillery fire in the distance, the overall effect was bizarre. D) There was a wonderful restaurant in Hue, with dining on a veranda over the river. It was a great place to put the ugliness of war out of your mind.

Again, referring to my contemporary notes, we first became aware of Operation Lam Son 719, the incursion into Laos, on January 27th, 1971. We didn't know what was happening at the time, but in the middle of the night the tanks and APCs started rolling through town. We speculated on what it was about, and basically we had it right. It was a last big push to give Vietnamization a better chance. A couple of NSC staff came through at the end of January - Don Webster and Paul Droge. My impression at the time was that they wanted to be hopeful that something could be done about attitudes and about our relationship with the Vietnamese, even at that late date, but that they couldn't shake their skepticism.

In those early days of my Vietnam assignment, I was preoccupied by what seemed to me the almost universally unpleasant interface between the two cultures - the Americans and the Vietnamese. I was, as were most people who visited Vietnam during that period, particularly dismayed by what the conflict had brought to the country, as evidenced by the prostitutes, hustlers, pimps and thieves. Then there was the despair of our own military, who saw the war in the bitterly memorable phrase as "unwanted and unending, pursued by the unwilling, for the ungrateful". It was a grim picture. I had a talk with a soldier; I don't know if he was special forces or what, but he'd come down from the hills, had been rewarded for a successful ambush by a trip to Australia. What particularly struck me about this fellow was how he'd become desensitized to loss of life and his part in it. Who knows how he later put it together, but at that time he was proud of the technical aspect of how he had carried out his orders, and he described it to me in very clinical detail.

By February in 1971, we still didn't know exactly what was happening in Laos. Then I think there was an official announcement about it on February 9. Part of the operation had to do with Vietnamese troops who had been lifted by U.S. helicopters into Laos, four of which had been shot down. As of the third week in February there was a lot of upbeat talk among our military as to the success of the operation. That it was a disaster was soon to become evident.

In that same month, I went to a local organizational meeting of the Rotary Club. Is this American or what? If we can just help them to establish a Rotary, we'll have the first step down the road toward civil society. This meeting was six months after it had been formed, and there were five Vietnamese and six Americans. The Vietnamese who wanted to carry it forward had been to the United States - not surprising - but there was obvious uneasiness within the Vietnamese group. They talked about having a dinner meeting but noted that security would be a problem. They concluded that they didn't dare get together over dinner. The meeting took place against the backdrop of rumbling and flashes of artillery in the distance.

There was a memorial service near Hue on February 20, 1971, for the victims of the Tet '68 massacre. It was organized by the government; and Pres. Thieu came up from Saigon to deliver remarks. There were several banners. One said, "It is better to die embracing one another than to have a wandering soul." Another: "We are encouraged by the president's decision to enter Laos." The bereaved family members had gathered on one side of the mass grave under a cargo parachute, where microphones amplified their weeping and wailing. Incense burned and food offerings to the deceased included orange soda and French bread. Thieu seemed somewhat awkward; he had senators and generals flanking him, including leading generals of the time - Lieutenant General Quan and Lieutenant General Lam, neither of which made much of an impression on me except for their physical weight - unusual for Vietnamese. The thrust of Thieu's address was that the central provinces would never be bargained away in discussions with the north.

There was an American in Da Nang who was building, as a demonstration to the Vietnamese, a ferro-concrete boat. I visited his project, and he was apparently carrying it forward with some of his own money. This was not common, but it was not unknown in Vietnam. There were Americans such as this one who were so dedicated and so wrapped up in the whole effort that they essentially turned their lives over to their project. He was at the time wrestling with the question of whether he should present the first boat to the local commanding general, to boost his chances of continuing his project with the goodwill of the military.

In March, 1971, I visited District 2 of Hue, which was one of the poorer districts. It included Hue's boat hamlets - people who lived on boats, were not well educated and really the poorest of the poor. They were believed to be among the first to guide the Viet Cong in their looting during the Tet Offensive. This belief was another manifestation of the distrust and bad feelings existing among the Vietnamese.

I was particularly upset by a story that was making the rounds in advance of a visit by Ambassador-at-Large Kennedy. He was a former secretary of the treasury. I don't recall his mission, but he reportedly had expressed an interest in the mass graves, and the order was passed to locate some human bones and bury them at the site so they could be discovered during the visit. I don't know if the story was true or not, but it was definitely considered plausible at the time.

Corruption seemed to be pretty pervasive. It was said that after Tet '68 victims didn't get government benefits unless they paid kickbacks. Even those who did not need assistance were encouraged to make claims so the officials could skim off the top. A teacher told me that a student could pass the high school exam by paying the grader between 300 and 500 Piastres. None of this particularly surprised me, even though I was still relatively idealistic. An account of how things got done came from a Vietnamese businessman. According to him, woodcutters paid a tax to the Viet Cong in order to get their wood out of the forest. Everyone ended up winners: Woodcutters weren't harassed; local officials got their cut because they issued permits to cut the wood; and the market demand for wood for construction purposes was satisfied.

The psychological effects of the failed operation into Laos started to emerge in April. The son of our assistant in the city advisory office was a helicopter pilot. He couldn't eat or sleep after he came back thinking about the killing he had seen. A barber said that many people died including the brother of a barber who had previously been in the shop. But he said that without U.S. air support it would have been even more of a disaster. Imagine what confidence this showed in Vietnamization of the war. Dan Southerland, an excellent reporter for Christian Science Monitor, became very depressed during this period.

For some reason, probably because we were advisors to Hue City, we sometimes mediated incidents involving the U.S. military and the local population. There were frequent traffic backups at the bridges crossing the Perfume River. While sitting on the back of a truck at the so-called Railroad Bridge, which carried north-south through traffic, a GI had his watch taken by a kid, and the GI shot him dead. We were expecting a demonstration. We heard reports about the same time from the district south of Hue that GIs on a U.S. truck had fired M-69s, grenade launchers, at some friendly regional forces, killing them, just for the hell of it. Newsmen were coming up from Saigon the next day to look into discovery of some new graves, and we thought they were going to be on to this story. I visited the family of the kid involved in the bridge incident, and they were boat people. The entire family lived on two adjoining boats. His survivors - who were his father and mother, two brothers, five sisters, wife and two children - the family was anxious to show that he had a job, and he was not a thief. They wanted to pass on stories that they heard at the scene that he was just driving his bike. According to one version he wasn't even involved in a theft. But unfortunately he didn't have a very savory record. He had previously had his teeth knocked out when he had fallen from a truck while stealing from it. The family showed no overt hostility, and as it turned out, there were no demonstrations. A full cup of human tragedy, but no demonstrations.

There really wasn't any terrorism in Hue City. I think that was the case in all sizeable cities in that period; that is, after Tet 68.

Q: I was 18 months in Saigon, and there was the rocket or two that would fall from time to time, but those were aimed at the city.

LANGE: In Hue, it was peaceful enough that we once arranged to hire a sampan for the evening. We anchored out in the middle of the river and enjoyed a meal with wine. We could imagine how it used to be without people firing back and forth. But the downtown area was bracketed by two major bridges, and it was clear that most boats didn't dare venture beyond those bridges. Because of that it was impossible to get out of earshot of the loudspeaker at the theater, which was always blaring. And there weren't any other boats out in the river.

In April 1971, we had a demonstration in Hue. The Buddhists had called the police chief to task for some of his earlier arrests. Then there were counter charges against the Buddhists, including by a group called the "Corps against Communism" for being soft on communism. They alleged that the province chief was soft on Communism, and they even charged that the chairman of the City Council was a Communist sympathizer with well-known Communist associates. I wondered at the time if we were ever going to fight a common enemy.

On April 17th there was "victory" celebration for the Lam Song 719 operation, but there was precious little to celebrate. Most of the people seemed curious to see gathered officials and military demonstrations. Even at that time, there was deep skepticism that the ARVN had caused any meaningful damage to the supply system of the North Vietnamese, which was the target of the whole operation. That skepticism was well placed.

In June, I again got involved in mediating a dispute. An American vehicle crashed into a house. No one was hurt, but the confrontation went on all afternoon, and there were plenty of weapons around. I had a U.S. military policeman on one side and a Vietnamese policeman on the other. There was impatience and deep distrust, but eventually, both sides backed off.

The Vietnamese really had a love-hate attitude toward us. I once took a boat out on the river, and I thought I sensed dislike, even hate. Some people repeated an insult that they had obviously learned from the GIs – “F___ you!” Then in the next moment I was exchanging waves and smiles with other people onshore. The inner conflict they felt toward our presence was understandable and troubling.

On one occasion, driving from Hue to Da Nang for the weekend I passed a train that had been blown up the day before. It was loaded mainly with Coke and Pepsi, cases of which were cascading down the embankment. I think that commodities for the GIs were the main cargoes for the railroads at that time. The symbolism could hardly be missed.

We once had dinner with a group of Vietnamese expatriates living in various places abroad, back for a visit. They reported that not even their relatives were urging them to return to Vietnam for good, and they did not intend to. Another vote of no confidence in Vietnamization.

I once had a lengthy conversation with me a Mrs. Tuy, who worked in the personnel office in CORDS,. She tried to explain why she continued to be concerned that there could be a repeat of Tet '68. She had 11 children. They had 18 people at their house, when Tet '68 started, and they lost no one. The family took refuge in three different Catholic churches. Family members encountered the Viet Cong or the NVA twice. Once her son was fingered, possibly for execution, but one of his students, who had surfaced as a VC, spoke up for him and he wasn't taken. Another time her son and son-in-law were pressed into labor, but they escaped during an American attack. They finally got to the university apartments and then to Phu Bai, which was an American base south of Hue, and from there to Da Nang. She was very proud of what she had accomplished with her family, giving them all a good education and getting them all through Tet. But she was still very uneasy about the future.

Q: Rightly so.

LANGE: She thought that another Tet or a political sell-out by Saigon was quite possible.

I took a trip in July 1971 to Quang Dien, which is a very poor district along Highway 1 north of Hue. It's located along a lagoon leading to the Street without Joy, made famous by Bernard Fall's eponymous book. The land is very poor - poorly drained and sandy. Still there are a lot of people trying to make a living. They had once accumulated enough to build concrete houses with tile roofs but those had at one point been so damaged that they were no longer useable. People were living in shacks with tin roofs. Their lives had really not changed very much for generations, except for the added burden since the 1950s of the uncertainty of war.

There was another a district, Vinh Loc, along the coast southeast of Hue. Since '68 we had characterized it as a pacified area. But in a three-day period in 1971, there had been five assassinations with no retaliation and no one coming forward to say who had done it.

In August there were anti-U.S. demonstrations by students in Hue. The immediate cause was a traffic fatality in front of the University of Hue student union in the afternoon. A student on a Honda had fallen under the wheels of a U.S. tanker truck. It happened that there were activists from Saigon present, so the reaction was almost immediate. Banners were out within a few minutes. A vehicle belonging to RMK (Morrison Knudson) -

Q: It was a major construction firm, Pacific Architects and Engineers.

LANGE: Well, PA&E, Pacific Architects and Engineers, was another company. RMK-BRJ was a consortium of four large international construction firms: R for Raymond International, MK for Morrison-Knudson, BR for Brown and Root, and J for J.A. Jones Co. Anyway, a vehicle belonging to this contractor was burned, and the Vietnamese driver was beaten. There were some other attempts at firebombing. The authorities dispatched some PFF – Popular Forces, sort of paramilitaries – to keep the peace.

Q: Popular Forces? Regional Popular Forces?

LANGE: As I recall, the military hierarchy started at the top with Army of Vietnam main force units (ARVN), under Saigon's command; then Regional Forces, under the province chief; and at the bottom in terms of training and equipment, the Popular Forces under local commanders. Anyway, some Popular Forces were posted at the compound because there were numerous rumors of the imminent arrival of rioters. Tension was pretty high at the compound, but nothing happened. A colleague and I had scheduled a lecture presentation at Hue University - I don't remember what that was on - but that was obviously canceled. One reason that the demonstrations died out was that most of the students were away at military training.

In September there was another incident at the end of the bridge where a GI had shot and killed a thief. The students were better prepared this time, and we were told they had been waiting for such a cause. Students who had been at military training had been released the day before. Firebombing was attempted on three vehicles, including two military police vehicles and one belonging to a contractor. One truck was burned.

Q: Did you change jobs while you were there?

LANGE: Yes; I was in Hue for a year - 1971 - and then I went to Saigon in the embassy political section.

Q: You were in the political section in '72 then?

LANGE: Yes, that's right.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

LANGE: Ellsworth Bunker.

Q: What were you doing in the political section?

LANGE: I was in the internal unit. There were six or seven of us, compared to three or so in the external unit. My specific areas were the lower house of the legislature and the Sino-Vietnamese community. I also covered Military Region Two (MR II), which was the central coast and Highlands.

Q: What was the situation in Military Region Two? Was that Da Nang?

LANGE: No, it didn't extend that far north. Da Nang was in MRI. MR II was pretty quiet in terms of terrorist or guerrilla activity. But the Easter offensive of 1972 really shook confidence. Bunker's wife, Carol Laise, was ambassador to Nepal, and Bunker from time to time flew up there on a U.S. military plane. There was a sign-up list in the embassy, and I got on the flight, in April I think. We were there for about 24 hours and had to turn around and come back when we got word of the NVA offensive. The offensive was beaten back, but it seriously shook confidence, especially in the Highlands and in MR I. A couple of times during the year, 1972, I visited MR II. It was a familiar picture: The countryside was pacified in the daytime, but after dark, only the cities were relatively safe.

I have some contemporary notes, yellowed with age, made after the 1972 North Vietnam offensive -- the Easter Offensive. You recall that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was more influential in those days than it is today. A couple of staffers - Lowenstein and Moose - they used to travel there with some frequency, and their reports were always anticipated either with foreboding by the people who were in the Administration or eagerly by those who were critical of the war. I traveled with them to Hue, Qui Nhon and Pleiku. This was in May of 1972, so it was not long after the Easter Offensive. In Hue, which was our first stop, it was quite clear - this is May 26th - it was quite clear that in the early days when the offensive took place that there was a real panic, and most civil servants or professionals abandoned the city. Even the CORDS employees had decamped and stolen three cars from the CORDS compound. There was only one way out, which was the highway south to Da Nang. The general picture was that there was a lack of control, a lack of leadership, with one bright spot. For reasons I can't identify, the national police, who were much criticized -- denigrated as the "white mice", after their uniforms -- had stayed at their posts and done their job. But overall it was a thoroughly dispiriting demonstration of Vietnamization. The picture was that the Americans, while they were there, managed to pull services together and get the military and the civilians working together, but this had fallen apart during the Easter Offensive. When we arrived, maybe 75% or so of the civil servants had returned. About a quarter of the population as a whole had returned by that time. The hospital was staffed again, but all the big retail stores were closed. A few small shops were open. The big central market near the river had been looted and burned. It was a huge conflagration, and the ruins gave the whole city a shocking aspect. It was obvious that Hue had gone through another terrible time. The only signs of new activity were some decorations and preparations for the celebration of Buddha's birthday, which fell toward the end of May.

There were numerous refugees who had come in from the northern districts; the estimate of the officials in Hue was 19,000, which was up 5,000 from the weeks previously. More were coming in, because they just didn't have confidence that security was going to hold. In fact, the North Vietnamese at that time still occupied the northern part of Huong Dien, which is one of the northern districts. In Phu Loc District, which is between Hue and Da Nang, the railroad had not been operating since early April; the bridges were out. As for the territorial forces, their performance had been mixed, depending on their leadership. No one was making any predictions as to what the North Vietnamese were going to do at that time, but there was at least some confidence in the defense of Hue by the territorials.

The general scene in the city was pretty depressing. Children wandering. The cowboys were everywhere - young kids on their motorbikes looking for prey.

Q: Snatching purses and that sort of thing.

LANGE: Right. There were very few old people, children or girls. At the university, there were still some radical slogans and posters in evidence from earlier days. Some of the bunkers and guard points had been rebuilt. Trucks and APCs were everywhere. At the city market, the center part was still a ruin; there were some small stalls that had been rebuilt around the perimeter. These were fairly busy in the morning. There was a small black market in foods. There were wreaths and flowers on sale.

The people we talked to - both civilian and military officials - their families were all out of the city, in either in Da Nang or Saigon. A Vietnamese major said that overall in the city maybe 30 to 40 percent of the people had returned. He thought maybe people would start coming back after Nixon's summit in Moscow. He thought that once it was clear from the Moscow meeting that there was no "sell-out," which was always what people in the central region were afraid of, that people would start coming back. A civilian said that some families would never come back. His family was in Da Nang and had taken most of their furniture. Everybody was ashamed of the market fire. The offensive was one thing, but the destruction of the market was something that had been carried out by Hue people. Most of the intellectuals - the teachers and the businessmen - had gone, but the Chinese (i.e., Vietnamese-Chinese) had stayed. One person said of the Chinese, "They have nothing to fear from the Communists."

Q: Had the Easter Offensive stopped by the time you were making this [trip]?

LANGE: The offensive had stopped, but some areas were still occupied by North Vietnamese at that time, some distance from Hue. Quang Tri, South Vietnam's northernmost major city and some 35 miles from Hue, I think was back in the hands of the South Vietnamese. But it had been a terrible scene up there in Quang Tri. Air power had played had played a large role in turning back the offensive, but there were the usual mistakes. One of them involved B52s; they had made a mistaken raid on a fire base that was occupied by friendlies. Such events of course added to the general sense of malaise and depression.

Q: What were you getting from Lowenstein and Moose? Was this what they were expecting to see? Was this confirming it?

LANGE: I think they were not surprised. One of our stops was Pleiku. John Paul Vann was still there, and he prefaced his briefing with the remark, "You're not going to like what you hear." In other words, he was previewing a very upbeat picture of the military situation. This sort of confrontational meeting between the American establishment and Lowenstein/Moose was well-established by that time. I don't know how many visits they had made.

Q: A good number. Jim Lowenstein has been interviewed and Dick Moose - I've finished sort of Vietnam and he goes on forever. So I'm still working on it with Dick.

LANGE: I didn't keep a copy of the report from that visit.

Q: They'd be in the records.

LANGE: In Qui Nhon, briefers were Tom Barnes. Lieutenant Colonel Brown, Colonel Grist, Dan Leaty and Cliff Stanley. Did you ever interview Tom Barnes?

Q: I have to check. Where is he now?

LANGE: I don't know. One of the principal topics at this meeting was the performance of the Koreans. I don't remember their areas of operation in Military Region 2.

Q: Well, they had a district below Da Nang, around Quinhon or something was it. There was a certain concern that they were under strict instructions, "Don't take casualties." However if they took any, they were quite brutal in responding. I think everybody steered clear of them.

LANGE: They were feared by the South Vietnamese certainly. I remember I took one of my leaves and visited a friend in Korea. I talked to some Vietnamese about my plans to go to Korea, and they were just dumbfounded. They were amazed, shocked that I would voluntarily visit a country where everyone was Korean. They thought that the Koreans were really quite brutal. A question from Moose and Lowenstein was, "Are the Koreans worth $350 million a year?" I don't know where that figure came from. The response amounted to "Probably not, but what's the measure of value over here?" Which of course was a key question - how could you put a number on it? Colonel Grist said the Koreans took high casualties to retake An Khe - 116 killed and 400 wounded. He also thought their presence was psychologically important. He agreed that they were "mercenaries," but he went into the difference between them and classical mercenaries. Cliff Stanley, one of the briefers, was obviously dispirited, and at one point lamented, "No one has accomplished a goddamned thing here."

Q: He must have been civilian.

LANGE: Yes. We went from there to Pleiku. The conflict was still alive in the highlands.

Q: Pleiku being the major city in the highlands, in Military Region Two.

LANGE: That's right, and command post for John Vann. He opened with this quote I mentioned earlier, "You're not going to like what I'm going to say." He said Kontum could go either way; that it was still in contention. But he said the North Vietnamese didn't press their advantage after Dakto and that error has been hurting them a great deal. Vann said the ARVN 23rd Division, which had always been a question mark in the highlands, was getting better daily. They were now knocking out tanks on their own, and he thought that the North Vietnamese tank resources were just about cleaned out. He thought that it was quite possible that within six months there would no longer be an enemy threat in the highlands, though continuation of an advisory role was necessary for air support. Even if Kontum falls, he said, Pleiku was still defensible. He said that the other side had underestimated the U.S. response. Vann addressed the Korean role: They could not be brought up into the highlands, because of an agreement. If they were to be brought up, the agreement would have to be renegotiated and it would carry a healthy price tag. In any case, Vann said, we labored under a general misconception that the Koreans could get along better with the Vietnamese than we could.

Q: You were accompanying Lowenstein and Moose?

LANGE: Yes, I was part of the Embassy political section, with reporting responsibility for Military Region Two.

Q: Both Moose and Lowenstein were at this point working for the Senate mainly for Senator Fulbright, but they were both former foreign service officers and later came back into the state department. So they're these inner/outer people. How did this go? Did they tell you what they were trying to see? Or were you trying to control them? Or were they on their own and you were just around? How did that work out?

LANGE: They were veterans; they had clearly in mind who they wanted to see and what they wanted to do. They had no problem with access. As for the embassy and the political section, our posture was to help them as much as we could - to facilitate the visits and help them see as much as they could. The military was very apprehensive about their visits because generally their reports were downbeat. Military reports are upbeat. At that time, the attitudes had been established on both sides. Their agenda was pretty clearly in the direction of deflating false optimism. They were as much insiders as I was, and my role was to facilitate their inquiries where possible and to debrief people in the mission on their findings.

A couple of additional notes on my experiences in MR II. I visited Nha Trang one time and called on Tom Barnes, who was the regional deputy for CORDS. I was planning a drive from Nha Trang to Tuy Hoa, which is 70 miles up the coast. In retrospect, it was a foolish thing to do on my own. I later heard that on the same road a few months earlier, someone had taken a small arms round through the top of the car. But Tom interposed no objection, and in fact pulled out a report that he had made years previously when he was posted in Vietnam, written after a drive on the same road. Some people carried their reporting around with them wherever they went.

I spent the night in Tuy Hoa, where a revealing episode took place. You may recall the monthly HES report – the Hamlet Evaluation System – an elaborate attempt in which we invested terrific efforts to quantify the various elements of security in the countryside. Very McNamarian. Some on the Tuy Hoa advisory team, including FSO John Finney, had arranged to spend that night in a hamlet, as I recall as sort of a demonstration that it really was safe and deserving of a higher HES rating. Bad decision. Shortly after dark, we received a tense report over the radio that they were taking fire, then... silence. We didn't know what had happened until daylight, when the guys reported that they had spent the night in a ditch, maintaining radio silence to avoid detection. So much for that secure hamlet.

In daylight, I visited the remains of a tower on the edge of the city left by the Cham civilization. Similar remnants of the Kingdom of Champa are sprinkled along the central coast of Vietnam, and then there is the excellent collection of Cham sculpture in Da Nang, which was started during the French period. While I was there, it was stored on the south edge of Da Nang, on the road to the airport, under sort of minimum, barbed-wire security. But it survived the war, and I understand is now situated in a handsome museum.

Sometime in 1972, another embassy officer, Jim Nach, and I paid a visit to Tay Ninh City, capital of Tay Ninh Province, on the occasion of a funeral for a prominent Cao Dai elder who had been assassinated, presumably by the Viet Cong. The Cao Dai religious sect was the anchor for a strong social structure, and the Cao Dai was renowned for its resistance to inroads by the Viet Cong. The city is about 75 miles west northwest of Saigon, and about 12 miles from the Cambodian border. We drove out in Jim's Honda, the first car that Honda made. It was a fairly flimsy affair and was powered by a motorcycle engine. I bought one myself – paid about $800 new as I recall – but only had it for a couple of weeks before it was stolen, from in front of the embassy. Anyway, the drive seemed safe enough, though we did see a Vietnamese Air Force plane making a bombing run a mile or so off the highway. In Tay Ninh, the funeral proceedings involved thousands, and it seemed a prime target for terrorist activity. None took place, however, and as far as we could judge from talking with people, the Cao Dai's anti-communist resolve had not been shaken.

Q: What about the other area of your responsibility, the lower house? Was there much political activity there? Was it significant?

LANGE: Well there was a lot of talk. It was a very active legislature in terms of discussing issues, but one couldn't expect that it would have much influence on the course of events.

Q: Did you get a different feeling toward the central government, the Thieu government when you were down there?

LANGE: Different than when I was in Hue? I don't think so.

Q: How about at the embassy at the time? What was the spirit of the political section as far as how they viewed what was happening?

LANGE: One of the features of life in that office was the relationship with the huge U.S. military presence. There was a degree of conflict between the embassy and the military structure when it came to reporting on the internal situation. This had a history: It went back to existence in the embassy of a “provincial reporting unit”, which challenged a lot of the rosy progress reports coming out of the military. That unit had been disbanded and replaced by the internal unit, which had less resources to devote to provincial reporting. There was a formal clearance process for our reports with MACV (Military Assistance Command, Vietnam), and Joe Bennett, who was the political counselor, had to fight those battles. We thought that Bennett was excessively optimistic about prospects and tended to curb “negativism” in our reports. After one of my trips to the central region, I wrote a report and Bennett edited it. It came back from MACV eviscerated – lots of strikethroughs and additions. Even Bennett was outraged. It was in our view a denial of reality by MACV. It was unfortunate that even at that point, there was failure to face up to reality, to live in denial.

Q: You say the military seemed to be in denial?

LANGE: Well, that was our view anyway. They wanted to believe that things were a lot better than they were. The military’s “can do” attitude can be a wonderfully empowering approach, but things go haywire when it substitutes for objective appraisal.

Q: You were part of it at one point. There is a military culture. If you’re told to do something, you say “Yes I can sir,” then you do everything you can to make it come true even there’s a damned good chance it won’t work.

LANGE: I think the military was struggling internally with the problem. We had a visit by a ranking general when I was in Hue by the name of Weigand.

Q: Weigand. He was chief of staff at one point, but he was very much involved.

LANGE: Anyway he got a briefing from our provincial advisory team. On the military side, there was a lieutenant colonel out of armor, in charge of military training for the team, who briefed on the South Vietnamese regional forces. At one point Weigand asked a very pointed question about how a particular pacification goal could be attained, given the bleak objective picture of constraints and problems. The poor light colonel didn’t expect that sort of question from one of his own people, much less a ranking general. After an awkward silence, he said, with all the determination he could muster, “Sir, we regard that as a challenge.” And as you say it reflects this notion that you do it – failure is not an option and it doesn’t matter what it takes to accomplish the mission. Declaring the mission objective as unrealistic is also not an option.

Q: How about the CIA at that time? Was there much talking back and forth? They had one floor of the embassy.

LANGE: I had no contact with them. I can’t shed any light on that.

Q: Were the peace talks going on while you were still there?

LANGE: Yes. The agreement was signed about a month after I left, in December 1972.

Q: What was the feeling towards what was coming out of this, for you and your colleagues?

LANGE: I think most of us saw it as trying to make the best of a bad situation. It was clear that the U.S. citizenry would not support what was necessary for a military solution. The notion that Vietnam would hold together, would be able to defend itself was very doubtful but nevertheless there was no choice. I don't know if there was any credible intelligence at that time with respect to the intentions of the North. But I think there was little illusion that if the North launched a military offensive the South would hold. The American military was demoralized and wanted to get out of this limited war that was draining its confidence. As a nation, we wanted to get out "with honor." Kissinger was doing what he could to deliver that.

In December, shortly before I left Vietnam, Ambassador Bunker had me in for a farewell meeting. He had just finished a long dictation session with his secretary, Eva Kim, and as we spoke, rockets were slamming into the airport at Tan Son Nhut. Bunker was involved in the final stages of the cease-fire negotiations, and he was both tired of the war and frustrated with the difficulties of trying to bring it to a close. According to my contemporaneous notes, he said that President Thieu was being "too rigid". He thought that Thieu had violated the negotiating principle of never establishing a public position from which you cannot retreat. Bunker said that, "This war has gone on long enough, and it's time it should be stopped". The ARVN would have lost 50,000 soldiers by the end of this most costly year of the war, he said, with three times that many wounded. There were 130,000 killed on the North Vietnamese side. Bunker said that the South Vietnamese naturally have some objections to the cease-fire, but he thought that they are in very much better shape than before, such as when Bunker arrived six years previously. He said that the Vietnamese had to surmount their internal differences, and he recalled, "That old poop, Senator Hien, once concluded a discussion with the comment that 'that's the way we are!' Well, that's tough, they've got to put these differences behind them."

Ambassador Bunker seemed tired of dealing with Thieu. "I once told Thieu that this question of corruption would one day destroy him, just as it has Chiang Kai-shek." I asked if Thieu recognized the importance of the problem. "He appreciates it intellectually, but the execution is something else." He cited the case of Hoang Duc Ninh, who as Bac Lieu province chief was documented by Colby for 69 clear cases of corruption. He was removed, but five months later, Hoang was the commander of the 44th Special Zone, which was a mecca for smuggling from Cambodia. Bunker contrasted this with the case of Truong (FNU), who if he died tomorrow, the government would have to pay for his burial. His troops know this, and that is why he is such a good commander, said Bunker.

In those December days of 1972, we leaned on South Vietnamese deputies and senators to lend their weight to signing a cease-fire. Our message was not subtle: If South Vietnam fails to sign and is seen as obstructing peace, they Congress would be unable to sustain a robust level of support for South Vietnam. It had to be a bitter pill for the South Vietnamese to swallow, but it was clear that we were determined to withdraw.

Q: Had you met your wife while you were in Vietnam?

LANGE: I met her when she was working at our consulate general in Da Nang. We can't agree on the date, but I think it was at the 4th of July reception at the consulate in 1971. In any case we met during my year in Hue. After I left Vietnam, we maintained contact over the years. She came to the U.S. in '73, but we didn't marry until '79, seven years after I had left Vietnam. We have a son, who is pursuing a career in the arts.

Q: Was Terry McNamara the consul in Da Nang when you were there?

LANGE: He was the consul general when I arrived, and Fred Brown was the consul general after that.

Q: I may have met your wife because when I was consul general, I was supervising consul general for all of Vietnam, but mostly my sway was very tepid. Terry was technically put under me - I wrote his efficiency report - but there was no real control of him.

HARRY HAVEN KENDALL
Economic Policy Officer, Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1970-1972)

Harry Haven Kendall was born in Louisiana in 1919. He joined USIA in 1950 and served in Washington, Venezuela, Japan, Spain, Panama, Chile, Thailand, and Vietnam. He was interviewed in 1988 by G. Lewis Schmidt.

Q: What month in '70?

KENDALL: In July of '70.

Q: You were going to Saigon just as I was leaving Thailand where I had been for three years.

KENDALL: So I sat down and thought about it. I asked myself, do you want this or not. I had two choices, accept or resign. Finally, I said to myself, "Harry, that's where the action is. Why don't you try it."

So I did. I accepted.

Q: Were they only requiring you to stay for a year or a year and a half at that time?

KENDALL: It was two years.

Q: Two years.

KENDALL: So I went back to Washington, settled my family in our house in the Wood Acres section of Bethesda, and took off for Saigon. I got there in October of 1970.

Q: Before we go to your assignment in Vietnam, I think you had been speaking about another experience you had in Santiago. So why don't you cover that now before we go on to the Vietnamese assignment?

KENDALL: This concerned the Vietnam War. We talked of the anti-American, pro-American attitudes there. Talking about these things one begins to recall other things. Each little incident, each little conversation brings up new recollections. The Vietnam war was in full swing at the time. One of our major problems in the information program and getting across an image of an America knowing what it stands for, what it is doing, and where it is going revolved around the Vietnam war.

One of the programs we conducted in the effort to convince the Chileans America was on the right track in Vietnam was sending journalists as well as our own officers on visits to Vietnam to see for themselves. We sent our public affairs officers, we sent journalists, the ones who would go. Some of them wouldn't. I recall that Santiago's leading journalist at the time accepted our invitation and was really looking forward to the trip. To give him an advance orientation, I got hold of a prize winning combat film on the Vietnam war produced by a French team. It was really far too effective. He looked at that film and decided he didn't really want to go.

Q: Scared him to death?

KENDALL: Really scared him. I don't think he had any idea about the ferocity of the combat before seeing that film. But there were other aspects. One of the hotbeds of communism was in the University of Chile's Institute of International Studies. We had good contacts there and worked with their people. But they were one of the most articulate anti-U.S., particularly anti-U.S. action in Vietnam, groups in the whole country. They were very articulate and very effective. They wrote prolifically, denouncing U.S. Vietnam policy as American imperialism on press, radio, and television, repeating the same theme over and over again, so that it would have been difficult for any ordinary listener not to question American motives for being in Vietnam. Of course, many of them were communists and were supporting the official communist line. How many of them were speaking out of their own convictions or simply parroting the communist line it's difficult to say.

As I said, we worked with the University of Chile and brought a number of visiting American professors there to lecture and to interact with the faculty at the Institute of International Studies. Jim Echols, our PAO before Carl Davis, went to Vietnam on the Agency's program designed to help our field officers to tell the Vietnam story and appeared before this group when he returned. I regret to say they tore him to bits. He had learned much but not nearly enough. Another much more effective presenter was Douglas Pike, whom you must certainly know.

KENDALL: Doug is now my colleague at U.C. Berkeley. In fact, he works with me in the Institute of East Asian Studies and heads up our program of Indochina Studies. He had been a USIS officer in Vietnam since 1964 and had published a definitive book on the Viet Cong, so USIS sent him on a world lecture tour meeting with groups like we had at the University of Chile. He had all the information at the tip of his tongue and could mobilize his facts and information into convincing arguments. So when he came to Santiago we took him to the Institute of International Studies. He answered all of their very emotional, heated questions in a factual, non-emotional manner. But even Doug Pike with his great ability didn't win anybody over. He gave them satisfaction because he answered their question, but he agreed later that he hadn't won any converts.

This was an example of the type of work we were trying to do. But we simply could not make any impression. So as a result we just had to withdraw from the arena. The essence of the whole thing is that we finally decided that Vietnam was a losing issue for us. We just had to stop talking about it in our official output because we got nowhere. Every time we said something they used it against us so we finally just responded to questions when asked. It was a definite decision on our part. Ambassador Korry agreed with Carl Davis and me that this was the best way to handle that particular issue. Just don't talk about it unless you absolutely have to. Don't deny it, but certainly don't volunteer to talk about it with the news media.

These are some of the factors that conditioned my response to my own assignment to Vietnam. I am ready to move over to that arena if you wish to do so.

Q: Let's go on now to Vietnam. You went when?

KENDALL: October of 1970. My assignment was to JUSPAO, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office. There was already a very large contingent of USIA officers there.

Q: Was that the time that Bob Lincoln was JUSPAO? Barry Zorthian, I think, had left just shortly before.

KENDALL: Barry had left and Ed Nickel was there. Maury Lee was his deputy. Lincoln succeeded Nickel.

Before leaving Washington, I asked the personnel officer, "What is my assignment? What am I going to do?" "Oh," he said, "you're going to be an economic policy officer."

"What do you mean, economic policy officer, I don't know anything about economics."

"Oh, you'll learn, you'll learn."

I suppose that being a Foreign Service Officer means you're supposed to be capable of doing anything. I went there as an economic policy officer and stayed two years. My family, of course, was back in Washington on separate maintenance allowance (SMA) as it was called, and the girls were in school. You were allowed three weeks leave for family visitation every six months. So during the two years I was there I was able to come home about three times to visit my family for three weeks. It was a long hard trip but certainly worth it to see your family. My kids got along surprisingly well. When I came back my daughter Nancy said, "Mommy, we'll have to change our whole pattern now. When Daddy was away we were doing fine. Now we've got to adjust to him again." She was a teenager just beginning senior high school.

The Saigon job was interesting, but I felt we were grossly overstaffed. We often think of an ambassador's problems in getting to know his own staff, but there the Public Affairs Officer, the head of JUSPAO, had a staff larger than most embassies. I didn't really feel that during the time I was there that I got to know Ed Nickel very well although we had good relations. I knew Maury much better because I had worked with him in Japan. He was a branch PAO in Yokohama when I was in Takamatsu.

Q: Was John Clyne there at that time or had he gone?

KENDALL: I think John was there for part of my tour, but most of the time I was there, he was not. I knew John quite well in Washington. I'd be hard pressed to name all of the people who were there with me. There were many. John Hogan was in Da Nang; Forrest Fischer was in Hue; Jerry Novick was up in Nha Trang. Brian Battey was in Saigon as were many other USIS officers. Many of my co-workers were military officers with whom I had no previous or subsequent contact. They were intermingled with USIS officers in Saigon and in the countryside in the four corps areas, First, Second, Third and Fourth. Our ambassador was Ellsworth Bunker, one of the grand old men of the Foreign Service. God rest his soul.

Incidentally, Douglas Pike is currently editing Ambassador Bunker's private telegrams to President Johnson for publication by the University of California Press. We obtained them from the State Department under the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act. They are a very illuminating set of papers.

My job was to maintain contact with the AID and to prepare policy guidances for information output on its various programs, particularly land reform and economic development. Imagine writing guidances for a USIS staff. You ought to be able to just tell them what the policy is and they can follow it, but we had so many people spread around the countryside that it was necessary to communicate to them in writing. I prepared these. They would go out over the PAO's signature, of course.

I remember one project of which I was quite proud. It was a survey of Vietnamese labor leaders to determine what their main concerns were and what approaches they wanted the Vietnamese government to take towards resolving them. I did it over a period of several weeks, traveling up and down the country with my Vietnamese assistant, a man named Ha Quoc Buu, who is today working with Douglas Pike in our Indochina archive. Buu and I traveled to most of the provincial capitals around South Vietnam interviewing local labor leaders in depth. Then, on the basis of these interviews, I prepared a report which Ambassador Bunker commended for use by his staff.

One of the things that astounded me when I first arrived in Saigon was that we were not conducting a standard USIS type program. We were, in fact, running a ministry of information for the Vietnamese government. We were publishing their newspapers and magazines for them and operating their radio and TV stations.

Q: Were the magazines and newspapers published in Vietnamese or in French or what?

KENDALL: Publish in Vietnamese and English.

Q: In English?

KENDALL: Yes, in Vietnamese and English, mostly Vietnamese. Most of it was written in English and then translated into Vietnamese. Because of this I suppose I was very skeptical about the whole approach.

I went to Saigon thoroughly convinced that the United States was doing a marvelous job and this was exactly what we should be doing. I came away feeling that we had missed the boat.

I felt we really had made some horrible errors in our foreign and military policy, and that many of our top leaders in Washington and Vietnam had made some very serious mistakes in judgment. We were trying to run a government of a country where we not only didn't understand the language, we didn't understand the culture, we didn't understand the people, we didn't understand the history. We knew very little about them yet we were trying to run the country for them. We were fighting their war for them. We were conducting a horribly expensive program in terms of money and lives and effort based at times on what I would call sheer ignorance, though undoubtedly out of conviction that we were doing exactly what was needed to be done.

On a more personal basis, I got to know the Vietnamese people quite well. I developed quite a few friends among them. I got to know the country and personally derived a great deal of benefit from my experience there. In terms of my contribution to the total effort, perhaps I added a grain of sand to that huge sandy beach of a sterile U.S. policy. I don't know. I didn't really feel good about it.

I still continue my interests in Vietnam and Indochina after these many years. I conducted a small research project on Vietnamese attitudes toward the Soviet presence and published an article about it in our institute's journal, Asian Survey. I helped a Vietnamese professor write a book which we called After Saigon Fell: Daily Life Under The Vietnamese Communists. It was published by our Institute of East Asian Studies and sold out two printings. It was also translated and published in the Korean language. I work with Douglas Pike in his Indochina Studies Program. I feel good about my own personal experience. I feel very sad about the American experience in Vietnam.

Q: Would you care to be a little more specific about three or four of the serious errors that we made without going into too much detail? Would you indicate where the areas of our greatest mistakes were, what they were?

KENDALL: Are you talking about nationally or are you talking about USIS?

Q: Well, I suppose both since the two are pretty well inextricably interwoven. But you said that you came to feel that we had made very serious mistakes in several fields, and I didn't know whether you were talking specifically about the U.S. information program or whether you were talking about our policy generally or a combination of both.

KENDALL: I was referring to our policy generally. We plunged that country into deep war. I'm reminded of a comment by Professor Robert Scalapino who is director of our Institute of East Asian Studies. He was lecturing in Vietnam in 1974 or early 1975. He said a very thoughtful Vietnamese officer stood up and said, "Now, professor, when the United States forces came into Vietnam in 1964-65, you came without our knowing you were coming and it took us a long time to adjust to it. Now, you are leaving us and you're doing it without our knowing it and we don't know why. We have difficulty understanding what United States policy is all about."

Professor Scalapino said, "I couldn't respond to that comment."

We sent our people to run their government who didn't know the language or the history of the country. I think the grossest error was the whole raison d'etre for intervening in that war. We were intervening to keep the Sino-Soviet alliance from taking over Southeast Asia. We were trying to protect the Vietnamese from China. The Vietnamese have been fighting the Chinese throughout history and have thrown them out on various occasions. Our leaders didn't seem to know this. We were afraid of the Moscow-Beijing Axis and they can't get together.

Q: They had already shattered that Axis ten years before.

KENDALL: The decision to go into Vietnam was to prevent monolithic communism from moving down into Southeast Asia, the domino theory. As history has since taught us, communism is no more monolithic than capitalism. That was one basic error. Another was trying to tell the Vietnamese how to run their own government. We manipulated Ngo Dinh Diem and all of his successors. We have enough difficulty running our own government let alone trying to run somebody else's for them. We imposed decisions upon them which they couldn't carry out, didn't have either the will, the means or the ability to carry out.

The murder of Ngo Dinh Diem was in part our own fault even though our people didn't pull the trigger. We didn't tell them to do it but we didn't tell them not to either.

There is an interesting episode from the 1954 Geneva conference which divided Vietnam in half. After the conference Zhou En-lai extended his hand to John Foster Dulles in a gesture of friendship. Dulles walked on past and left Zhou standing there. Here was an opportunity for our leaders to talk to each other to try to achieve some understanding, but Dulles refused on the basis, I suppose, that he considered Zhou En-lai to be evil. It's the same inflexible ideological outlook that inspired Reagan's remarks on the evil empire.

In Vietnam we based our policies on the sense of morality that not only condemns communism as evil, but even the people who live under communism as evil. As we see now, they are desperately trying to get out from under communism.

These are just some of the thoughts that come to mind. I would say mainly that the United States had some, very few, experts on Vietnam, but their counsel and advice was not sought and if given, was not listened to. The decisions made by people ranging from President Johnson on down were made on the basis of American attitudes, American reactions to given situations which did not or could not apply to people of the Vietnamese culture. I just think that our country has not really organized its top level decision-making to be able to take advantage of the knowledge and information that is available to us.

Q: Do you think that our information program in Vietnam had any effect at all, or a very minimal effect, or that it was pretty much useless?

KENDALL: It had a great deal of effect on persuading the Vietnamese people that they really wanted to live like Americans. It had its greatest impact on the literate Vietnamese.

Q: On the literacy?

KENDALL: On the literate Vietnamese. I think the ordinary Vietnamese, the ones who had no access to the informational media, were not affected by it except secondarily through their leaders. But yes, we had significant effect on persuading the South Vietnamese that they should modernize their economic and social system. You must remember there was a great deal of travel back and forth, not just Americans to Vietnam but literate and well educated Vietnamese to the United States for training purposes under programs operated by JUSPAO, AID and especially the U.S. military. The Vietnamese are a very intelligent people and they quickly learned to appreciate the benefits of a modern technological society.

The primary influences brought to bear were the military. But when the crunch came, we just simply withdrew and left them high and dry. We trained them in the use of our technology and our military equipment and taught them to depend on the United States as a source of supply, I think improperly so because they were fighting a war in which the heavy firepower we brought to bear was relatively ineffective. But when we withdrew they didn't know where to turn. We had built up a series of leaders who were entirely dependent on American support, and when they didn't get that support in the final hour they became completely disheartened.

They didn't lose to the communists because they didn't have the equipment, they lost because they had lost the will to fight when their source of primary support withdrew. Maybe we lost the war for them. Maybe they lost it for themselves. I don't know.

Q: Probably a combination of both. It would be interesting to know and I suppose there is no way of determining now, whether or not there is any residue of feeling about governmental policies about way of life or anything else left in the country as a result of the American presence there for so many years. Most of them seem to have become disillusioned with the communist takeover and the communist government, even those probably who felt sympathetic toward it before it took over South Vietnam. Do you think probably more of that is due to the insensitivity and stupidity of the communists themselves, the government that took over, then it is to anything that the Americans did while they were there?

KENDALL: You have to give much credit to the arrogance and stupidity of the communists and their self imposed policies since the end of the Vietnam War. They had developed their whole system on the basis of military action with everything done for a single cause, which was to gain independence and unity of Vietnam. Once they achieved this purpose they were insufficiently flexible to be able to change over to a peacetime mode of life. The people in power were the same people who had conducted their 30-year struggle for independence. Having attained their initial purpose they did not perceive the necessity for change to conduct a peacetime economy. They overlooked the Chinese saying that "You can conquer an enemy from horseback but you can't rule the people that way." It will probably take a new generation before they will be able to change around completely.

Q: But do you think it's primarily the communists that did themselves in with their own people rather than any residual effect that the American presence may have had?

KENDALL: Yes, there is no question about that. I think for the benefit of your series, it might be well for you to talk to Doug Pike.

Q: We will talk to Doug Pike. I don't know whether I'll get to interview him or whether Earl Wilson will try to do that when he comes back through here in February. But one or the other of us will do it.

KENDALL: He is by far the most eloquent, most knowledgeable about our whole experience in Vietnam. He went there in 1964 as a films officer with the idea of studying the Vietnamese method of field communications and developed that into his classic study of the Viet Cong. He has been working on Vietnam ever since and certainly the most knowledgeable in that field.

Q: I think we have probably milked your experience in Vietnam to the extent that is worthwhile on this tape. You went from Vietnam then back to Washington for a time?

FRANK E. SCHMELZER
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Tuy Hoa (1970-1972)

Frank Schmelzer was born in Massachusetts in 1927. He joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and served in India, Germany, Afghanistan, and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Michael Springmann in 1992.

Q: Today is December 8, 1992 and this is the second interview with Frank Schmelzer.

SCHMELZER: I thought it might be interesting to say a few words about Vietnam where I served in the CORDS program. I was there from the end of 1970 through the late spring of 1972. This particular organization was sort of a parallel government in that there were teams of American advisers attached to their Vietnamese counterparts, as they were called, at all levels of the government, from the district level through the provincial level and, of course, up to the nation's capital in Saigon. There was an American team in each one of the provinces of Vietnam. The chief of the team was either an American military officer, usually a Colonel, or an American Foreign Service Officer, usually a grade 4 or 3, in the old grades.

Initially I went to Nha Trang, but only for a short while. From there I was assigned to Tuy Hoa, which was on the coast of one of the provinces. I was there for about two or three months, just sort of getting used to the system, the so-called pacification program. I think the things that I remember best there are a couple of attacks we had. The VC were more interested in the military side of the compound than they were in us civilians.

I remember the first time a attack occurred: There was a great deal of commotion and suddenly somebody came running around and got us all in a bunker nearby, slapped helmets on our heads and gave us each a rifle. We were peering through slots waiting for the VC to come after us. There was a lot of ruckus, on the other side of the compound and I think one of the Marines got wounded that night.

The second time that the VC attacked, some time later, I slept right through the whole thing I am happy to say.

Q: How did you actually get things done there? You had to deal with the Vietnamese army, with civilians and the US Army.

SCHMELZER: You would have a huddle among yourselves and decide what you wanted the Vietnamese to do or what you would suggest they should do. Sometimes they would follow your advice and sometimes they wouldn't. If you felt that the matter was sufficiently serious and they were dragging their feet too much and something should be done, then you would kick it up to the next level.

Since the Vietnamese in each level knew that your line of communications with your own superiors was at least as good as theirs and that if your superior decided to push this thing that he would go to his level, the Vietnamese knew he might get a rocket, get kicked by his superior. So we certainly were influential.

This structure, by the way, this quasi-parallel government, if you will, was an outgrowth of our experience in China during World War II where we had a lot of goodies to pass on to the Chinese but our own structure was not very effective. So this was designed to overcome some of these problems. I thought in general the organization was pretty good.

We were also dealing with the Vietnamese civilians. I spent most of my time in Vietnam in Ban Me Thuot up in the Central Highlands. One of the big problems there was the relationship between the Vietnamese and the Montagnards, the indigenous people. The problem was that the Vietnamese were coming in and taking the land. Their style of agriculture was intensive and quite different from that of the Montagnards. It was reminiscent of the English colonists here in the United States and their attitude toward land settlement and the American Indian. The Vietnamese, of course, would go in and take the land and work it very intensively. The Montagnards would look upon the land quite differently. They would cultivate one area for two or three years and then move to another area near by; after another few years they would return to the first area. They wouldn't cultivate the whole area solidly as the Vietnamese would do. But, of course, over time this meant that the Vietnamese were gradually taking more and more land away from the Montagnards. So there was a lot of trouble there.

Towards the end of my stay, we had come up with something that was really rather effective. We had decided to persuade the Vietnamese government to give title to the Montagnards to specific tracts of land. This was made somewhat easier because so many of the Montagnards had been moved from their traditional villages into protective, fortified areas. The idea was to give them title to those fortified areas and the lands adjacent, so that they would be protected from the Vietnamese encroachment. This also had the additional benefit of making the Montagnards more willing to support the common war effort. This, by the way, was a very serious fracture point. In the spring of 1972 when the North Vietnamese attacked in force, in the Central Highlands, one of the people that I was working with was a deputy in the provincial government who was representing the interests of his Montagnard tribal group. He had suggested to Saigon, through his political leadership, that two divisions of Montagnard be created, armed and trained in order to fend off the North Vietnamese. In fact this request was made before the North Vietnamese attack. The answer from Saigon was no, certainly not. Then it was one division? No. Two regiments? No. One regiment? No. Now had such a Montagnard force been available in the spring of 1972, and later in 1975, the result would have been quite different.

In 1972 the North Vietnamese were held because the South Vietnamese fought quite well and the Americans were still there with air power. But in 1975, of course, they punched right through that area. In the spring of 1972 Ban Me Thuot was the headquarters of one of the South Vietnamese divisions...they had three regiments. One was destroyed by the North Vietnamese army. So another regiment moved North to a pass, about 40-50 miles north of Ban Me Thuot. The North Vietnamese got into that pass and this was rather serious because communications between Ban Me Thuot and the northern provinces had been cut. So the B-52s came in to dislodge the North Vietnamese. They bombed that place for five or six days. On the next day, this particular South Vietnamese regiment went in and got "creamed."

The speculation at the time was that somehow the North Vietnamese would sense when the B-52s were coming and they would run out of the pass. The B-52s would bomb the hell out of the place and then the North Vietnamese would move back in. This went on and on. On the sixth day when that regiment went in the North Vietnamese were back in the pass and the South Vietnamese got slaughtered. So then they decided to move the third regiment North. Just about at that time we got news of North Vietnamese tanks being sighted due west of us -- that was 15 miles away on the other side of the river. The river was the boundary between us and Cambodia. So that made some of us a little nervous.

Q: As well it might.

SCHMELZER: Well, one of the military members of our team had been in the American calvary, as he called it, the Tank Corps, for some 25 years. So I called him in one day and we went up to the map in the office and I said, "Billie, I think it would be nice if you could get into a chopper and see just how much of a barrier that river is." "Ah, Jesus Christ, don't bother me with that stuff. I have been in the Tank Corps for 25 years and I tell you there is no way the NVA can get tanks across that God damn river." I said, "Well, look Billie, you are probably right but I would appreciate it if you would just take a chopper and go and look." "All right, but it is just a waste of time."

Well, he went out and took a look. About an hour later he stormed back in and said, "Wow, that river is no problem at all. Come look." And he dragged me over to the map. He said, "Gee, with 10 tanks I could take this God damn town and reduce it to rubble. Look, here is where you come across, the river is only a few feet deep." Billie really got carried away, he was so excited.

Of course, everybody was screaming for various things. One thing that everybody wanted about that time was the "LAWS." It was sort of a bazooka thing that you put to your shoulder to knock out a tank. Suddenly we started to scream for them too. I put in an order for a 100 of them. It took a little while to get them, but I finally did. After that I had three of those damn things in my desk.

The other thing I used to keep around was a carbine. I always had it near me when I went to bed at night.

Q: You didn't trust that your diplomatic passport would protect you?

SCHMELZER: No, no. My hearing improved quite a bit. I got so I could hear a cat walk down that alley outside. And there were a couple of VC attacks on Ban Me Thuot while I was there. But I would just go upstairs where there was another civilian on our team who had been through the wars...he was married to a Montagnard and had a good balcony of solid cement. We would crouch down behind that and wait for the noise to dissipate, which it normally would.

Our organization was essentially a good one. The basic problem was that we were trying to build a nation in one half a nation and it just wasn't going to work. The South Vietnamese, I think, occasionally had the will to fight and when they did they could do a good job. But, somehow the psychology of the whole thing was wrong. It was their war and we made it our war and that was the biggest mistake. We were just there passing out the goodies and to a certain degree trying to tell them what to do and sometimes they would respond and sometimes they wouldn't.

Q: How did other Foreign Service officers think? Were they telling Washington what worked and what didn't? Or were they told to shut up, this was policy and you will carry it out?

SCHMELZER: Quite a few of the people were disgruntled. I remember one young man in Nha Trang who had been there a short period of time, and he was assigned to one of the districts. He decided after about a week that he was not going to take anymore of this nonsense. He didn't agree with the program. So he just decided that he was going to quit. He came in and fortunately the man in charge of our operation in MR2, military region 2 which included one-fourth of the country...a big chunk of the Central Highlands and a big chunk of the northern coastal areas...that man was a Foreign Service officer and he understood the problem. He talked to this young man and found another job for him in which he did very well. He had a contingent of four or five Vietnamese who would go out and interview people...do in-depth interviews on various aspects of the pacification program on rural development, civilian guards training, etc. It was a very valuable product that he came up with and he enjoyed doing it. It was more similar to a regular Foreign Service activity, so he didn't leave the Foreign Service. In fact, he has done fairly well since.

In one of my great moments in Ben Me Thuot I was able to use some diplomacy...I say this with tongue in cheek, of course. While I was there initially there were still some American troops, the drawdown had not been completed. So the PX was there and there was a collection of whore houses. The complaint was that the ladies were charging too much for their services. And a lot of these little plastic vials that drugs come in were being seen all around the outskirts of this compound where the ladies were. So it was decided that something had to be done about this. The good colonel in charge of our team decided that this was a problem for the State Department. So I organized a little convoy and we went down there. There was a jeep with MPs, a jeep with translators, etc. I think there were three jeeps that went, with no flags flying. We went there for a prearranged meeting with the madams. They were very polite. The girls were tittering around the corners watching this. I told these ladies that there were complaints about the prices and that it was not right to have drugs on the scene. If there were anymore complaints on either of these two points, we would have to declare the place off limits. Of course, that would put these women out of business. So things were rather quiet there for a while thereafter.

Q: Were the Foreign Service positions in Vietnam sought after or were they regarded as a punishment detail?

SCHMELZER: I think it is fair to say they were not sought after. In fact, as you know, some of the younger officers resigned rather than go to Vietnam. The Department of State was always trying to keep 100 Foreign Service officers in Vietnam. Most were in this CORDS program. That meant that there were one or two in each province. In Tuy Hoa I was the only one, but in Ban Me Thuot there were two of us. No, these positions were not sought after.

Some of the older officers, of course, the FSO-3s, who saw that their careers were not flourishing, decided to go with it, to roll with this punch. There were some advantages to this. For one thing it was occasionally rather exciting. It was interesting. You learned a lot. You had a chance to see this great bureaucracy in motion. You were learning a great deal about the major problem of the day. And, of course, the Director General would come through every now and then...I think he tried to make it once a year...and would make promises that your next assignment would be a good one.

I remember that in my case the Director General came through and he asked me where I wanted to go. I said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, I would like to go to Paris." "Well, Frank, how would you like to go to French-speaking West Africa?" Then I said, "Well, I would like to go to Rome." "Well, Frank, how would you like to go to French-speaking West Africa?" I had been working on my French and had used it during the tour. I said, "Mr. Ambassador, I would like to go to French-speaking West Africa."

ROY T. HAVERKAMP
Area Development Advisor, USAID
Saigon (1970-1972)

Roy T. Haverkamp was born in 1924 in Missouri. He served with the Air Force in World War II and later earned degrees from Yale and Cambridge. Mr. Haverkamp joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and has served at posts in Korea, Sweden, Japan, Cambodia, Congo, Benin, Vietnam, Guinea, United Kingdom, Jamaica, and Grenada. He was interviewed on April 11, 1994 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Oh, indeed it does. Well, then it looks like you got yanked out for Vietnam?

HAYERKAMP: My name came up around the time of the invasion of Cambodia. Some names came up and a friend in the office of the Director General happened to be an old friend from Kinshasa and said, "Oh, Haverkamp would like that." So I was sent to Vietnam.

Q: This was from 1970-72.

HAYERKAMP: Yes. I did not like to go because I felt I was letting the ambassador down and he had been very good to me in taking me there even though he didn't know me very well., and I enjoyed it. Anyhow I went. It was kind of funny because the Dahomians would ask, "Oh, are you going to be the ambassador?" But I learned a very interesting thing. One Dahomian newspaperman said to me, "You know it is too bad, you are going at the wrong time. Foreign diplomats always think they are looking at us, but we also look at you to see if we want to know you and can trust you. And it takes about a year to do that and now you are leaving."

Q: When did you get to Vietnam and what did you do there?

HAYERKAMP: I got there in 1970 just after we invaded Cambodia and after Sihanouk was overthrown. It was in the summer after some training at the Vietnam Training Center. It was August or September of 1970. I was supposed to be an adviser to an office which was to look out for the welfare of what they called the Khmer Krom, Cambodians living in what was then the south of Vietnam. In several provinces they were a majority of the population. They had a special office in the government which was supposed to look out for them. Believe me, trying to talk to the Vietnamese about treating the Cambodian minority compassionately and with consideration was like going into Mississippi and telling Senator Bilbao that he was doing the wrong thing to the Blacks in the South.

Q: We are talking about Bilbao's figure during the thirties and forties, particularly in the South.

HAYERKAMP: It wasn't a ministry, it was an office and not in Saigon but in Can Tho, which was the site of the IV Corps headquarters in the Delta. It was run by an old fuddy-duddy, nominal colonel in the Vietnamese army who was often tipsy and who had almost no influence. He lived in constant fear of the Vietnamese government. As the Corps advisor, it was my job to try to persuade the government to give the Cambodians their fair share of aid goods and reach out to them. But getting a high up decision really to engage the Cambodians in support of the government was a dead loss. Many of the Vietnamese rangers were Cambodians. At one time I saw a group of military prisoners in a Ranger camp. I was walking by and they were speaking Cambodian. I looked around and I said to one, "Oh, are you Cambodian?" He said that all of them there were Cambodians. I don't know what they did or why they were there.

The Vietnamese government gave up on them. They wanted to use them but not accept them. They wanted them to fight for Vietnam. Strangely enough, several Vietnamese generals I met had Cambodian bodyguards because they were very rarely Viet Cong supporters.

When I got to Vietnam they said I was going to be in Saigon because they didn't know where the office was. The Cambodian monks in Vietnam were demonstrating and they were having trouble with their Cambodians.

Q: I remember in Saigon I got caught in a traffic jam and everybody was screaming about the damn Cambodian monks who would get out in the middle of the road and sit down or something.

HAVERKAMP: The only method the Vietnamese had was to buy them off or suppress them in some way or other. I traveled around the various areas with a significant Cambodian population and met with the U.S. advisors. Then the U.S. general in IV Corps, Major General John Cushman had me sent to Chi Lang on the Cambodian border where the U.S. military had a Special Forces training camp training Cambodians and a special element of an advisory team coordinating military operations across the border and also training Cambodian officers in map reading and other skills, elemental skills. There were also officers from the Cambodian Army participating in air operations in Cambodia staged in Vietnam. It was a center where U.S. military coordinated all of our operations in the adjacent Cambodian Corps area. We had meetings between the Vietnamese and the Cambodians to try to promote understanding at least to the extent where they could operate together. That was all pretty interesting and a little more effective than working with a government not intending to make any changes in the appalling treatment of its Vietnamese minority.

So, I had those two jobs but spent most of my time at Chi Lang.

Q: How was our military commander, John Cushman, who I knew later in Korea. He used to do a lot of war gaming and he struck me as somebody who is innovative and thinking ahead. How did he strike you as the commander?

HAVERKAMP: Well, he was a man who left a very strong impression. He was very able, very hard working getting up at 5: 00 in the morning to study Vietnamese. He was indefatigable. I got on very well with him, liked him and with his support was able to do things that I would not otherwise have been able to do. He was extremely hard on his military staff. His staff meetings were excruciating because if anybody tried to bull his way through or made a statement without any back up or threw out some numbers without checking them, he was merciless. He brought several military careers to an end and was not exactly popular but was feared and I must say it worked. As IV Corp commander he was adviser to the Vietnamese general in charge of IV Corps, General Ngo Van Truong who was one of the most honest and able officers in the Vietnamese army. He is now living in the United States. He was very hard working, he wanted to get on work with the Cambodians. I could talk to him and General Cushman would go with me to see him. But Cushman saw his relationship to his Vietnamese counterpart as one of a management consultant. He would send a weekly or monthly report letter of things that went right or things that went wrong. The letters I saw were clear, direct and unvarnished. That that was not quite the best way to deal with the Vietnamese who were not from an open society and operated in a society where loyalty was uppermost and trust hard to gain. With us, these kinds of open communications are understood. That being said, after my experience with other Vietnamese generals and Americans who worked with Vietnamese generals, Cushman and Truong were the best. At the end Truong was in II Corps. After the 1972 offensive by the North he had to fold because the general in the Corps above him, I Corps, which was on the North Vietnamese border, bugged and his troops ran. But it was a very good experience working for Cushman.

I also worked for John Paul Vann.

Q: What was your impression of him?

HAVERKAMP: Since I read the book, I didn't know...

Q: It's called the "Bright and Shining Lie" by Neil Sheehan.

HAVERKAMP: Yes. Sheehan interviewed me for the book.

John Vann was sharp and had a better understanding of what was going on in Vietnam than any American or foreigner that I knew. He had influence with military, with politicians. I can remember going to his office to see him and sitting from maybe 10:00 at night to late at night or early in the morning when he would come in and put his feet on his desk and say, "Well, if you came here to bullshit I haven't got time. What do you want?" And then he would talk for an hour and a half or two hours. But while you were there the telephone would be ringing and it would be his girlfriend who owned a pizza parlor, or some general, politician, correspondent or some governor or another girlfriend. The Vietnamese knew that Vann understood them. I never saw the Vann that is portrayed in the end of the book, somebody who allowed himself to be disillusioned or became disillusioned into thinking they could win. One thing I can clearly remember him saying to me was -- we don't know how this thing is going to turn out, but one thing they can't say is that we didn't give them every chance.

He was a guy who was a hands on manager. He would go to an outpost that was being attacked. Sometimes I think he must have worked 36 hours without stopping. But he really knew the situation on the ground. He knew the strengths and weaknesses of both sides. He was very, very well informed and a very influential man with the Vietnamese, the U.S. government and the press. Yet, he was a great guy to work for. Bill Colby, who was then head of CORDS was his boss. I went to Colby through Vann. If Vann thought your idea was worthwhile he would make a good presentation for you and you would get an answer. You never lacked an answer. He was never afraid to take up something out of fear of the reaction of the person above him. If he thought it was worthwhile, he would suggest it and make a good case for it. A great boss and a truly unique and brilliant man in Vietnam. I know of no one else whose views were more sought after or listened to.

Q: How were things going at IV Corps, the Mekong Delta, at the time?

HAVERKAMP: Well compared to I Corps, II or III Corps things were pretty well under control. Cambodia was very worrisome because the Cambodian army was ineffective and much of their leadership was hopeless. To be sure, like the Vietnamese there were outstandingly loyal and brave officers who operated successfully despite handicaps on their own side that would have discouraged most. We also had outstanding professionals in CORDS, the U.S. military and other agencies. One Foreign Service Officer assigned to CORDS as his first post was captured and held as a prisoner in a cave for years.

Q: And it was pretty much run by the Vietnamese wasn't it?

HAVERKAMP: Yes, with U.S. advice and help.

Q: This was not a place where we had to put many resources.

HAVERKAMP: In the military sense U.S. troops were mostly in an advisory role. There was a large civilian effort and commitment of resources. There were still areas of strong Viet Cong control in the U Minh forest area and considerable activity in areas such as the mountains in Chow Duc province.

Q: Was there any liaison with the Cambodian army at that time?

HAVERKAMP: Yes. When I was a liaison man in Chi Long the Cambodian Army had six or seven officers who flew with the U.S. light fire team. I lived in a hut with them. The US 9th Division Advisory team was there. We were officially a part of the team but separate because we had official liaison with Cambodian III Corps which was on the other side of the border. The U.S. military brought Cambodian officers down to train them in map reading and on how to use U.S. air assets available to work with them. Requests from III Corps for B-52s or Cobras or air strikes of any kind of support came through that center. They were very naive and would ask for B-52 bombing of some village because Cambodian military prisoners were believed to be there. They would be told, "Well, we have already learned in Vietnam that it is not a good idea to do that to your own people." These Cambodians from the Cambodian military would go along on C&C ships to be the liaison with people on the ground. I did that from time to time myself.

There was a special training camp for Cambodian troops who had been sent down to be trained by our Special Forces. They would round up people and send them down. There would be some little kid there and if you asked him how old he was he would say, "I'm fifteen" in a high pitched voice.

There were also meetings between the Vietnamese and the Cambodian military to try and get them to plan and work together. The Cambodians were always accusing the Vietnamese of robbing and raping and pillaging, burning and looting. Some of which was probably true. At the top level, the generals got on all right.

Early on when General Cushman asked, "Well, what do you think?" I said, "Well, with the Cambodians we are lucky in some way that the enemy is the Vietnamese". This was before we really knew the extent of what the Khmer Rouge was doing. The Cambodians had tremendous confidence in the U.S. military. It is really heartrending when they end up as the Cambodians did by being killed for having worked for us. But they were very loyal and very supportive.

I tried to get our military intelligence people to take what the Cambodians said seriously and to teach them how a good intelligence officer was demanding, objective, and suspicious.

Q: Did you get any feel about our embassy and how it was taking information, or was this just another world?

HAVERKAMP: After the invasion in of Cambodia in 1970 it became, I gather, within the embassy, a source of disagreement between the MAAG team and the ambassador on the one hand and the DCM and the Cambodians about how much equipment to give them, particularly sophisticated weaponry. But when you look at what they were doing, when Lon Nol was running their war for them, the way he was just leading them from one mass ambush or defeat to another, it was very sad.

Q: Did you have much contact with the embassy?

HAVERKAMP: Only through the military attaché when he would come down with the Cambodians for meetings that we had at Chi Lang. At times an Embassy political officer would come with him. I went up there once to see the deputy prime minister, a man named Son Ngoc Than, who was a leader of the resistance to Sihanouk, at one time. Then we had something called CIDG forces that were trained by our people before we went in, before seventy. They were very effective. They were well trained and disciplined. They had some of their pay with the rest of it going to the monks in charge of the pagoda in the area where they lived in South Vietnam who gave it to their families. They were used for various penetration operations, etc.

When Sihanouk was overthrown we gave up that support. Son Ngoc Than had headed all that group. I met him when I was in South Vietnam and then some time after the invasion he went up to Phnom Penh to be deputy prime minister. When I went up to see him at his invitation, I went to the embassy first and nobody I asked for was available to see me. Afterwards I came back to tell the embassy what had happened and the Political Counselor went wild. "How dare you do this without seeing us beforehand?" That was my only contact.

Q: How about our embassy in Saigon?

HAVERKAMP: I used to go and see the people there. They were always very helpful. They moved in a different world, I think, than those of us in CORDS because they were dealing with the national government. I gather they were having some trouble with the military because according to my friends in the embassy General Abrams censored everything that went out on the military and if it was critical it was most likely edited. And I saw the ambassador from time to time. He was interested in hearing from Foreign Service Officers in CORDS and was always open and cool. He seemed to be a man who knew how to go from the details to the conceptual and to concentrate on what was important. With his entre to Presidents Johnson and then Nixon, he was unusually influential at home and in Vietnam.

Q: The ambassador at that time was who?

HAVERKAMP: Ambassador Bunker.

Q: You left there in 1972. What did you feel about Vietnam when you left? Wither Vietnam in your opinion at that time?

HAVERKAMP: Well, again I didn't see it ending up the way that it did. From the beginning I never felt comfortable with the idea of all of us running around telling province chiefs, district chiefs, and others, how to run their country. Some of whom had been fighting the communists for years. Moreover, in a nationalist war you have to have nationalist credentials and I was always uncomfortable about the effect this had on the Vietnamese government's nationalist credentials. Not so much what we were doing with the Vietnamese and Cambodian military, but with the civilian government in Vietnam. At the same time it was exciting telling people how to run their government rather than reporting on how they were doing. I could never figure out anything in all of Vietnam that was worth the price we were paying. I still can't. We had absolutely nothing there that made it worthwhile for us to make the effort that we made. I wasn't disillusioned when I left. I didn't think it was hopeless for the South Vietnamese.

I would like to say something about the build up of the Khmer Rouge while I was there. We had intelligence reports from various sources on the Khmer Rouge. And the things they were doing were startling. For instance, killing monks which would have been inconceivable even in a novel in Cambodia a bit earlier. Khmer Rouge control was spreading. Reports began coming in from places all around the border areas with South Vietnam and farther north. The loss of control of the countryside was so quick. The terrible mismatch was that you had the incompetent Lon Nol government and you had a ruthless enemy who was taking advantage of his incompetence to reduce the area he controlled. The whole time I was there the dominance of force was on the side of the government, but they were outmatched in tactics and dedication by the enemy. There were, of course, some outstanding, brave and loyal officers whose units performed very well.

ANTHONY C. ZINNI
Company Commander, Marine Divisions
Vietnam (1970-1974)

General Zinni was born and raised in Pennsylvania. After graduating from Vallynova College he joined the Marines, which became his lifelong career. His distinguish career took him to Vietnam, Okinawa, Philippines and Germany, where he served in senior level positions. Attaining the rank of General, Zinni served as Commander-in-Chief of CENTCOM, where he was deeply involved in worldwide missions including Somalia, Iraq and Afghanistan. General Zinni was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

ZINNI: Those two pieces were never in place in my mind, so by 1970 when I was a company commander, I began to have real serious questions about how this was going to work out. I just didn't see how we were going to "win" and, of course, I was wounded there and evacuated.

Q: When you went back, you went through an experience very few military officers would have and particularly in something like the Marine Corps. You must've been the odd guy out. People who are used to going together and a whole group of like-thinking Marines and all this and all of a sudden you're seeing it from a different perspective. Did you find that people kind of looked at you a little bit askance or were you a problem?

ZINNI: No, just the opposite, I think, in many ways. Not only did I have that first experience, but when I came back between tours of duty they valued that experience. When I was at Quantico training second lieutenants, I was teaching counter insurgency, I was teaching some of the unusual things that nobody had experience in, like river operations. Since I had a connection to the people, the language, and the South Vietnamese forces are much more interested in that. We ran a mock Vietnamese village that we ran the troops through. I was put in charge of that so I don't think they looked askance. They saw it as a valuable set of experiences that they wanted to capitalize on so I found myself, in the two years that I was back, the 2 ½ years that I was back, that I was concentrating more, studying the insurgency, reading about it but people were coming to me and other advisers. There were a few of us and drawing on that because that was much different than the vast majority of experiences elsewhere. We knew parts of Vietnam that no one else did because basically Marines were concentrated in the north. Obviously, the language and the experience with the people was very valuable to them so that by the time I came back, people recognized you had a set of skills and experiences that was additive to everybody else's and valuable.

Q: Did you have any contact while you were with the Marines with the State Department, the CORDS (Civil Operations and Rural Development Support) program?

ZINNI: Only peripherally. In some of the areas where we operated, they were there. We would meet them. What always struck me was when we would take prisoners, we could obviously communicate with them right there on the spot and deal with them and sometimes, as a matter of fact, some of the North Vietnamese and mainline Viet Cong prisoners we took had actually gone to military school with some of our officers and had relationships there. One place we captured a regimental field hospital and the doctor had gone to school with our battalion doctor and they knew each other. So, in talking with the people, it always seemed to me, with the revolutionary development cadres that came into the villages, the CORDS program, those things were more feared by the enemy than were combat units and they were more highly prized and targeted because obviously, that could undermine the basis of the insurgency. I really came away with the impression that we put too much emphasis on winning the war militarily and that stuff, despite the rhetoric that was more marginal when it should've been more balanced, because what I saw is like I said, you couldn't win this war unless you had the people willing to sacrifice for it. We didn't give them anything overall that they could sacrifice for and, secondly, if you weren't taking the war to the door of the North, you know, they were getting a free ride. They chose the time and place. And even at a tactical level I think something like 80 to 90% of the engagements were initiated by the enemy so they chose the time, the fight, usually the place to fight and how they wanted to fight and I don't think you can win a war like that. I even became convinced -- because there's elements of fighting and war activity but it's in the context of a larger conflict that has a political, humanitarian, social, economic element to it -- that we weren't paying as much attention to that I thought we should.

Q: When you came back you were with a unit. Where were you?

ZINNI: In the north, in I Corps, outside of Da Nang in the west. Most of our operations were in the mountains.

It just seemed that everything was just going through the motions at that point. We had committed to withdraw. One of the Marine divisions were out, we were on a downward slope, we were the remaining Marine division and they were planning to remove one of the regiments so it was, the war was winding down for Americans. The South Vietnamese military units seemed to be at that stage of the game well equipped and I think conventionally capable. This was before we pulled the plug on support of, you know, they had a 50-50 shot of fending off any major attacks and of course, they did in the first eastern attacks and then in the second offensive, you know, when they didn't have the wherewithal for full funding. But I think the whole idea of a free-market economy, democracy, all the words that we were saying, the rhetoric of free South Vietnam that had seemed to have worn thin. It didn't seem to be there anymore. I don't think anybody was seeing a clear way out of this by then other than we were going to leave and declare victory and, you know, people were talking about maybe a decent interval. But to me, it would be a matter of time. I felt the South Vietnamese as long as they were given the wherewithal militarily, could fend off defeat but I think over time they couldn't sustain it because nothing was happening in the South politically, economically, socially to make the kinds of changes that struck at the heart of the people.

Q: Did you find with the Marines being an elite unit, were they feeling some of the problems that certainly our Army felt?

ZINNI: Oh yes. I mean there was a draft. The Marines also had to receive draftees as the Army did during Vietnam so it wasn't the all volunteer Marine Corps that it had been in the interwar period and obviously, there were issues back here, the racial issues, the drug culture and everything. I mean, all militaries are a reflection of society, so those issues were washing over into the military too. I mean, arguably, we didn't see it as bad as the Army but certainly we had our moments that were very bad and you could see it. I think still the camaraderie and still the sense of duty and pride was there. It amazed me watching the courage of my troops and their performance in combat when clearly we were out. This was an unpopular war. We had gone from anti-Vietnam to antiwar to anti-military back here and so no one was under any illusion that they weren't going to come back, couldn't wear a uniform. What you saw or what you tend to see is troops performed for each other. They performed for the unit, they performed for the military organization, they performed for their buddies and there was no sense of we were here doing the same kinds of things we were doing at the beginning of the war.

Q: Did you have problems with the racial problems?

ZINNI: I didn't in Vietnam but when I was wounded and I was evacuated I spent 30 some days in Guam and of course, in different hospitals in Vietnam and the Philippines. I was sent to Okinawa to finish out my tour and so I spent a number of months in Okinawa. I commanded a headquarters company and then a guard company there and the racial problems were really bad there. I mean, we reacted to race riots. Of course, at that time the Okinawans had Okinawan communist groups and they used to attack our posts and so I saw as much combat in Okinawa dealing with race, there were racial gangs out there, Mau Maus, bushmasters and actually, KKK's on all sides and my guard unit was reacting to all this. I think we averaged about every third night we had some sort of major confrontation. I learned a lot about riot control and all the measures that the police use when they have to deal with major riots. So that was an interesting experience.

Q: To move on, after you had an education of a future general dealing with these matters, you had a pretty good education, didn't you?

ZINNI: Yes, and of course, in the years after that. The marine corps tends to be an organization with a lot of deployments. I counted up, I served in over 70 countries in one fashion or another; made deployments in the Mediterranean, the Caribbean, the Pacific and was in Europe for several years with my family based there, in Japan and so you really got this tremendous exposure to a whole number of different cultures. And of course, in reacting to crises, different crises, humanitarian missions, security crises in the Philippines and elsewhere and as a general to the Kurdish situation, at Darfur, in Somalia three tours of duty there and so on and on.

Q: Well, I want to, in these various deployments, I mean obviously we'll come to the Kurdish thing and the Somalia thing but prior to that, did you have any what you might call significant education as far as what you were doing and also what you processed when you were deployed in any of these foreign countries?

ZINNI: Well, I think besides the military sort of evolution of your experience, the war colleges and schools and command at different levels all the way up, I think the most significant thing was the exposure to the different cultures. Living overseas, operating in a number of different environments, working with forces from different nations, so being involved in their environment and in their culture so I think this whole exposure. I mean, we had a mission during the Cold War to go to Norway so we had cold-weather training. We continued our jungle training, mountain training, desert training and exposure to those environments out there so it was sort of this global environment, being exposed to that. And then not only commanding a unit in Okinawa, but I commanded a camp, so then I was required to interact with the local community.

Q: This was on Okinawa?

ZINNI: This was on Okinawa. I had to work with the mayor of Kin, a town that my base was located in and the assembly and so that gave me more exposure to, you know, interaction of working with them and, you know, the social aspect and all that, going to their funerals and to their weddings and everything else and getting to know them on a personal basis, too. And the same thing in Europe and elsewhere and so I think the most significant thing beside the military experiences during that time was the exposure to such a variety of cultures.

Q: Speaking of cultures, talking about the higher education in the military, the war colleges and all that, I have interviewed many Foreign Service Officers who have gone to various war colleges and almost invariably when I asked them to talk about their impressions of the of the armed forces they come up and say to me that the Marine Corps officers who reached these higher institutions of military learning were always the sort of intellectual and thoughtful and I was wondering, can you give any reason for this?

ZINNI: The Marine Corps is unique in several ways, in my experience. I spent a lot of time in the joint world and that's not to take away from the other services to produce magnificent officers. I think that first off you have to understand that we grow up in an environment that puts us constantly around the globe. I think until recent years the other services tended to be base-oriented. We're not. We're in small units scattered around the world, make frequent deployments. I think you're much more, you adapt and are much more comfortable in that environment. I think because of that, too, you see the non-military dimension more and so you get a greater appreciation for the other things that you need to understand. You need to understand economics, politics, you know, cultures and history. I also think in many ways the Marine Corps is much more tolerant of mavericks. I mean, we tend to have a history of mavericks and a history of people who are outspoken or their drummers are a little different than most others. Despite the fact that it's almost a contradiction of being such a highly disciplined organization, there is that tolerance for people and so you can probably get a group of senior Marine officers in a room and be amazed that there isn't a cookie-cutter sort of dimension to who they are.

Q: You know, looking at it from the outside one would think while, you know, jar heads, you know, I mean. Who was the general in Central America in the '20s and '30s? Yes, Smedley Butler.

ZINNI: The Marine Corps has always, because its existence isn't automatic and it's always been under challenge and under the gun; it's always had to ensure it could clearly articulate what it contributed. I mean, there were debates after World War I whether we should become more like the Army and large conventional forces, whether we should focus on amphibious operations, whether we should focus on the kinds of operations we were doing in the Caribbean and the Philippines. Basically, we focused on the amphibious operation because I think we were pressing enough and there were mavericks in the Marine Corps that saw the war coming in the Pacific but we never left any of these. We tried to stay balanced enough to deal with all of these. Plus, the Marine Corps has always been innovative, not only in tactics and organization but technology. I mean, we were the first to really develop use of the helicopter, amphibious tractors, amphibious operations, special organizations within the military, very adaptable structure, the air ground task force organized at a very low level. Even now with the Osprey and the amphibious, which are very controversial, it tends to be where we are. We tend to stay on a cutting edge in all these things and we are highly willing to experiment, not only in terms of organization, tactics and equipment but, I mean, in terms of thinking too. When General Cray was the commandant, he actually generated a revolution in military thinking for the Marine Corps, sort of a renaissance in looking at what was then called maneuver warfare but it was not so much what the term might imply in terms of movement of military. It was how you think about things, how you maneuver mentally and mind set as opposed to thinking in terms of attrition, you know, where we had sort of evolved to in the U.S. military to an attrition based thought process, where you processed terrain and enemy troops. He wanted to think differently about that. It exposed us more to thinking about, again, the non-military aspects of conflicts you might face.

DONALD MCCONVILLE
Economic Officer
Saigon (1970-1974)

Mr. McConville was born and raised in Minnesota and was educated at St. Mary's College in that state. After service in the US Army overseas, he joined the Foreign Service in 1962. Specializing in Economic and Trade issues, Mr. McConville served in a number of posts abroad, including Panama and Vietnam as Economic Officer and as Economic Counselor in Korea, Malaysia, Mexico and the Philippines. In Washington, Mr. McConville also dealt primarily with International Trade and Economic matters. Mr. McConville was interviewed by Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

McCONVILLE: I arrived in about July of 1970 and I left in January of 1974, so I was there about three and a half years.

Q: A good, solid tour.

McCONVILLE: At the time that I arrived, they didn't have an economic section in the embassy as such. It happened to be just coincidental with my arrival there was a named Chuck Cooper, who was an extraordinarily bright and able fellow, a doctorate from MIT (Massachusetts Institute of Technology). He had been at the Rand corporation, he worked for the Council of Economic Advisors and so forth, and he'd been involved in the whole Vietnam operation for some years by that point. He was still only in his upper 30s, I think. He had just come back out there again. He was very well connected within the White House and so forth, and he had come out there on the condition that he would be Minister Counselor for Economic Affairs in the embassy but he'd have no staff over there. He had one staff assistant whom he would put on special kinds of tasks, but other than that the Joint State/AID Economic Office would serve as his staff. We would also serve the AID director. Cooper had been out there before and had been out there within the AID structure. That had left him very unhappy, and he wanted to pursue economic policy with the Vietnamese government independently of the AID operation per se, so that our Joint Economic Office, which probably had at least 10 officers or more - two of us were State Department people assigned there; the others were all AID officers headed by the office director, who was an exceptional guy Cooper had brought back out.

Q: Who was that?

McCONVILLE: His name was Bill Sharp. Sharp had a doctorate from Harvard and so forth in economics. Cooper had very strong convictions about persuading the Vietnamese to adopt very dramatic economic reforms, which were basically going to be far more market-oriented. That was his objective, and he had strong backing from very important people in the administration. Sharp was one of his close allies, and Sharp was placed at the head of the Joint State/AID Economic Office. Most of the AID people in there were all either doctorates or masters' degrees in economics. Here I was with my economic background consisting of primarily this FSI course, although I had a little training at the University of the Philippines. But it turned out to be an enormous opportunity for me in many ways. First of all, one of the problems was, when you went through this FSI economics course - it was an intensive course - but for a lot of people who then went on to fairly ordinary economic assignments somewhere else in the State Department operation, they really didn't have a lot of opportunity to develop and apply this breadth of economic training that they had acquired, so you tended to lose it fairly rapidly unless you got it in such a concentrated dose. Well, I had this great fortune of finding myself working with professional economists, and while I was at a disadvantage to some extent in that I didn't have the depth of economic academic training that they had, still I had enough that I could, by being very desirous of acquiring more, be able to develop this and work with professional economists and get an enormous amount of on-the-job training. Unlike most economic jobs in the State Department, which were reporting on what was going on in the economy and so forth and a lot of other things that didn't require a great deal of in-depth economic background, the Joint Economic Office, State/AID, and I, we were in fact the advisors to the Vietnamese government on running their economy. We worked extremely closely with the Ministry of Economy and Ministry of Finance and so forth, and we in effect were working with them on running the Vietnamese economy. It was an extraordinary experience. Because of that FSI economics course, I had enough background that I could fit into this, and I continued to get an economic education while I was doing it. Now, my first job in the State/AID Economic Office was as what was known as the rice man. It turned out to be a job of pretty considerable consequence. In Vietnam during this period, much of the countryside had been taken over by the Vietcong and all the people had fled to the cities, so the production of rice had fallen dramatically so that in the mid-'60s they had begun importing rice from the United States. In the United States, of course, we had this PL-480 program. They were importing it under PL-480, and that was not the cheapest rice in the world, by any means, but the US government had an interest, and if you're going to import rice, you import it from the United States under the PL-480, because of the political weight of the rice people and rice industry in the United States.

Q: Louisiana and California and Arkansas.

McCONVILLE: Right. You know, almost all rice produced in the United States is exported. At that time we weren't very competitive with anywhere in the world. Much of the rice being grown in the United States was being grown to export to Vietnam. At the same time, what was happening then, more and more of the countryside was indeed becoming pacified, and that was particularly true in the delta where most of the rice was grown, partly as a consequence of the Cambodian incursion. That, and also the fact that the AID effort there had put a lot of resources into developing the high-yielding energy rice varieties down there, and so as a consequence, rice production was growing again rapidly in Saigon. They still at that point hadn't had enough yet to be able to supply the central and northern parts of South Vietnam, Danang, and those kind of areas up there, but they were at least accounting for a substantial amount of the rice in Saigon. Some of my predecessors, they'd first gotten extremely pessimistic about getting this rice out of the delta and they'd been giving forecasts about how much rice was needed for the upcoming year. As I say, much of the rice being planted and was growing in the United States was actually just being grown for this market and wouldn't have been grown otherwise. So they were forecasting that there were going to be ever increasing amounts needed. Well, at some point this leveled off, and so suddenly the forecasts had proven to be excessive overestimates of the need, and rice was piling up everywhere and they had every possible grain storage in Vietnam filled with rice. Some of it was being eaten by rats. Of course, the price of rice was practically on the floor, and all this sort of thing. So it would have been a big fiasco. Then they went from that circumstance to one in which now they were growing all of this rice in the delta, and one of the big issues with the economic policy was getting the Vietnamese government to raise the price of rice, which they considered to be a big political issue, so that there would be more incentive for the farmers down there to grow it. That was a big issue we had with Vietnam, and that was one of the reasons why all of this was being centered in the economic office rather than the agricultural AID office, because it was so much an economic issue. My immediate predecessor had gone through the circumstance where, between he and the AID agricultural office, they had become overly optimistic about how much rice they were going to get out of the delta and they kept telling Washington they didn't need any more rice. Washington was under all sorts of pressure from the people who were growing it there saying this was causing a calamity in the U.S. rice production, and so forth. It turned out that some of this rice that they were expecting to come out of the delta didn't materialize and suddenly they had rice shortages. The Vietnamese government was panicking because they were fearful that, if rice prices shot up too much and there were rice shortages, this could of enormous political consequence. So they used some of their cash reserves, which had largely been supplied by AID, to go buy rice in Taiwan and in Thailand. This caused a political explosion in the United States because of the fact there was an excessive amount of rice in the United States in storage there because of the expectations that they were going to need more in Vietnam. So this then had been the other side of the coin and there had been tremendous brouhaha about that sort of thing. So as I stepped into that job these were the sorts of things I had to avoid, and I had to come up with realistic projections about two things: first of all, about how much rice we were going to need for the upcoming year and, secondly, to work with the Vietnamese government on rice price policy, finding ways to persuade them and to increase the price of rice to be able to stimulate more domestic production.

Q: How did you find your Vietnamese counterparts?

McCONVILLE: The ones that we worked with were, for the most part, very good. There was a very limited pool of them, particularly on the economic side. AID had been sending people back to the United States for economic training and various other kinds of training, and these people were beginning to return to Vietnam at this point. They had had very good educations and were very young and bright, doctorates and so forth from top schools in the United States, and very much imbued with U.S. and Western attitudes towards economics as opposed to the old Vietnamese style, and so forth. These people were the ones that Cooper was counting on to be able to bring about the kind of economic reforms that he was espousing, and he had enormous standing with them. They had built small cadres around themselves of people who were like minded, and these people were of exceptional quality. Now, once you got beyond them, then there was practically nothing. The caliber of the typical civil servant was abysmal. Many of these people only showed up for work about once a week or something. So this small handful of people would have to do so much, but those people on the whole were very capable and very gifted and they were a pleasure to work with. In any event, this was one of the big issues I dealt with in the first year over there. Again, I used a combination of some of my economic training. For instance, the agricultural group, which is very, very large, in our AID mission, they had brought in large numbers on, TDY and so forth, of agricultural economists and so forth, who would devise all sorts of elaborate schemes for forecasting, none of which were worth a damn because the input that they had into it, the data, was so bad. But on the other hand, I had dug into this deeply enough to be able to accommodate those with that data. I knew what data actually did have some significant and which didn't. I put together my own little supply-and-demand curves, which by the standards of these guys were pretty primitive, but in fact they worked. So they were of some help to me. I went out and saw rice merchants and farmers and so forth and I traveled a great deal in the delta, going down with the people from the Vietnamese Ministry of Economy - we traveled together down there - and coming up with my own assessments of just how much rice was going to be available. I would send in this report once a month, the rice report, and I would keep everybody informed back in Washington what was going on. In fact, I got to be very, very good at it.

During my tour, we were always pretty close to the mark; we never had another fiasco. But then we went through this series of efforts to increase the rice price, to get the Vietnamese government to do it and then how to deal with that, and I learned things about that. For instance, when you raise the price of rice, one of the most important things was to have rice plentifully available. People were more prepared to accept an increase in the rice price as long as they were confident that they could get the rice. So every time we went through one of the rice price increases, we would work with the Vietnamese to have rice available widely. With any hint of any sort of shortage, they'd get more rice into the market right away and stabilize it at that price. By doing this, then we were getting increasing amounts from the delta, and by the time I actually got my first year done, we were actually making the first shipments up to Danang of delta rice, which was the first time they'd had it up there in probably a decade or something like that. So it was a success story. I was getting an awful lot of practical experience, but at the same time we worked long hours in that office. Only some of the very senior people had their spouses there. The rest of them that were married - I wasn't married myself - had their wives in places like Taiwan or Bangkok or the Philippines and would see them a couple times a year, two or three times a year. So we were all bachelors in effect and we lived near where we worked, so we typically would start very early in the morning and wouldn't usually get out of there until at least seven or 7:30 in the evening, and we routinely worked Saturday mornings. It was standard; you were expected to be there on Saturday morning. Usually about midday on Saturday. Sometime around 12 or one o'clock you'd get off, so you'd have Saturday afternoon and Sunday. But this also stimulated a great deal of camaraderie amongst us. All of this time while I was doing this rice job and was earning a very good reputation for it - and I got a lot of confidence from Bill Sharp and Cooper and the other people in the office - I was also absorbing an awful lot of what these other people were doing. I was particularly fascinated with the financial work, working with the financial aspect of the economy. So I was learning this on the side. After about a year or so of the rice job, an opening came up on the financial side, and they agreed to put me in it.

Q: Before we leave rice, was rice being used when you were there as a form of payment to civil servants and people like that?

McCONVILLE: The civil servants did have some right to buy rice - I think they got a 100-kilo sack a month or something like that - so that was one of the benefits of being with the civil service. But rice was so readily available at that point that I'm not sure that that was anymore a major factor. But, yes, the civil servants did get some rice.

Q: Did you run across the rice buzzsaw from the Senators from Louisiana and others? If the Delta was beginning to produce its own rice, and a more palatable rice than we were producing in the United States, I take it, I would have thought that people from California and Arkansas and Louisiana would get kind of annoyed that....

McCONVILLE: They were annoyed, and this was, of course, one of the pressures I was under. I, at all costs, avoided a situation like my predecessor had gotten into where we had been underestimating the needs. At the same time I couldn't overestimate or it would depress the market there. But the amounts coming in from the United States that we needed kept falling. We stuck to our guns and we were right. By that time, there had been a greater appreciation in the U.S. that this simply was coming to an end, there wasn't going to be this huge market in Vietnam anymore, and if the rice was there in Vietnam, that era was coming to a close. They hadn't been happy with it, but by this time they had shifted their eyes elsewhere to some extent. It was still always in the background. If you miscalculated and you suddenly ended up with not enough rice in Vietnam and they brought in something from Taiwan or something, the consequences would be profound. There was a lot at stake in this job. Anyhow, after I got through with that, I actually got into the financial side, and before very long I was the head of the financial unit. There were three of us. The other two were AID people, both of whom had come after me, but one had a doctorate in economics and the other a master's in economics, and here I was the head of the unit, and I earned their respect. I had learned an awful lot, and I was fascinated by this. You know, there was always a war going on. By this time the number of American military involved was dropping dramatically. When I first arrived in mid-'70, I think the total number of troops in the country was down to 150,000, and they kept dropping.

Q: And it had been up to a half a million.

McCONVILLE: And then they were scheduled to keep dropping even further. Then, of course, by '73 or the end of '72, the truce was signed and we were down to 50 uniformed military in the country including the Marine guards. So during most of the time I was there, the American troop presence was either falling and the American troops were not involved in that much more combat themselves. It was in this Vietnamization process, so it wasn't quite as devastating in that way as it may have been earlier on. But the war was still going on all this time. At the same time on the economic side of things, the reforms that Cooper had pushed so vigorously and which the Vietnamese adopted in a series of two major reforms were having an extraordinary impact. It was just absolutely fascinating for me to see firsthand what these kinds of policies could do. A big problem, for example, was the exchange rate had been fixed at 118 piaster to a U.S. dollar through most of the war years because of all the hyperinflation. Inflation had been 30/40 percent; it hadn't been hundreds and hundreds of percent like it was elsewhere, but it still was grossly overvalued. Well, one of the major reforms was to get the exchange rate up to a sustainable rate, and over a period of two reforms they got it up to around 400-and-some pesos to the dollar, and then the black market disappeared, because at that level the black market just didn't have any reason to exist anymore, so the black market in currency disappeared. And they had consolidated customs, tariffs, and so forth, so again black marketing in that sense, because tariffs were dropped dramatically and so forth, was no longer a major factor. Exports had been zero during most of the war years with this greatly overvalued Vietnamese currency - they'd only had about 10,000,000 dollars a year, which had all been rubber, which had been subsidized because of the influence of some of these rubbers growers. But with this new exchange rate, the exports went up the first year like 10 or 15 million; then it was up 20; and the next year it was heading up to 100 million - and to see all these things working, and suddenly because when you had a market working.... AID had a study commission some years earlier on post-war policy for Vietnam, so they had written this enormous volume, volumes - it was probably 10 books - on exports from Vietnam post-war. They had predicted they would get so much for tea and so much for some of these traditional exports. The fact is that, once they got the exchange rate up to a sustainable level and it became economically legitimate and economically rational to begin exporting and to bring in some products and do some work on them and re-export them, and so forth, there was a whole range of things being exported from Vietnam, small manufacturers of one kind or another that nobody had ever mentioned in these books. None of the things that they talked about as being exports ever really emerged. This was going on in places like Korea and Taiwan and so forth, this whole process. This is in fact where some of these economic policies had first been developed. It was just extraordinary to see how this worked and the way that it stimulated all sorts of entrepreneurship, how the Vietnamese people, once given the opportunity, would respond to the market forces and that the economy would become as dynamic as it did in a very short period of time. Then there was the '72 offensive when the North committed 13 divisions and so forth. That was a tremendous shock.

Q: The Easter Offensive, or something like that?

McCONVILLE: '72 was the offensive, and as a consequence of that, that really sort of stunted the economy again because of all the political concerns this raised, plus the fact that, from the point of view of any kind of economic aid, the U.S. Congress now was sort of reluctant to give any more aid, plus you had the tremendous commodity prices at the time and the oil crisis, so that our aid in that last year or so that I was there was being used entirely simply to fund the oil imports. There was nothing left for anything else. But it showed me just what you can do with sound economic policies and how people respond to that, particularly people with the kind of cultural attitudes that most of Asia have. So that was a lesson that I came away from Vietnam with, was struck with profoundly. But the whole experience - this was part of it - I was enjoying the work so much, even though again there was always this overhang of the fact that the war was going on. They wanted me to stay. I wanted to stay, was tempted to stay longer, but at some point I figured I just had to get out of there if I was going to continue a career. One other sidelight during that period of time - it was again in '72 or early '73 - Cambodia was coming into crisis during this period, and the Khmer Rouge were running over more and more of the country. Of course, this was in the post incursion period. As more and more of the country was overrun by the Khmer Rouge, Cambodia which had been a rice exporter, was suddenly facing shortages of rice. Well, the first year that this happened, in fact it turned out to be a false shortage. They didn't have an economic section in the embassy as such. The AID mission was the economic section of the embassy in Cambodia, and they didn't have anybody over there who'd had any experience with rice and so they had sent of these panic cables to Washington about the need to get rice right away. There wasn't any available right at the moment from the PL-480 or anything they could get there fast enough, so they had to use some of the AID funds and purchase some from Thailand and Taiwan. Of course, this caused a political uproar in that context. Then what happened was the shortage proved to be inaccurate. In fact, there was a good deal of rice around and they didn't need this rice and it got wasted. It had been a big embarrassment. Well, the next year the same thing happened again. Suddenly the Cambodians were saying that there was this acute shortage of rice and they want to go buy rice. So Washington, this bunch of people who dealt with rice and such topics in AID and the Department of Agriculture and so forth, they were extraordinarily skeptical of this reported shortage and they wanted somebody to go over there and find out what the situation truly was, and they wanted me to go over there because they had confidence that I was someone who could find out what was really going on there. So I was asked to go on a TDY (temporary duty assignment) over to Cambodia, so I went over there. Cambodia was getting increasingly insecure at the time. The capital of Phnom Penh was relatively secure, and some small area around it, but then the only other major place that was secure was Battambang Province up near Thailand, which is where most of the surplus rice was produce. In fact, a lot of it was produced commercially up there. They had some big holdings that had produced rice on a commercial scale up there. So I would fly up to Battambang, went with a Cambodian official there, and tried to get at the bottom of all this, and I came to realize what had happened. In fact what had happened was that - you know, since the Lon Nol takeover, the throwing out of Prince Sihanouk, prices through this period had gone up dramatically. To back up just a bit, after all this involvement in Vietnam, when we reestablished an embassy in Cambodia and had a very modest AID mission and it was just the economic section of the embassy, half a dozen people or so, the by-word was supposed to be that we weren't going to get involved again like we were in Vietnam, that we would give these people some resources, they'd largely decide themselves how to handle it, and then we'd just wash our hands of it.

While most other prices had gone up by a factor of something like 150 or 200 percent, the price of rice was actually no higher than a couple years earlier. The Cambodian government had taken great pride in the fact that they had managed to keep the price of rice stable, and, you know, all the other prices were rising. What this means in economic terms is that the price of rice was deflating dramatically relative to all other prices, and what happened as a consequence of this, and particularly because so much of the rice up in Battambang was being raised on a more or less commercial basis, the people who had been raising it commercially had absolutely no incentive to raise any more rice. They'd lose money raising rice. So there were huge areas up there that had gone out of production. They had also been allowing them to export it previously about a year or two year earlier. The government had decreed they wouldn't allow any more exports, so they had this fairly significant surplus and it had taken a year or so to draw this down. In addition, it was complicated by the fact that there was a significant drought that year. In fact, they were almost literally out of rice up there. There was still some rice up in Battambang, but it wasn't going to last more than a couple of months at most.

I talked to the rice merchants in Phnom Penh again. I had come to learn how to deal with these rice merchants; I had a lot of respect for these Chinese rice merchants. They were very clever and they were very shrewd, but one thing they almost never did, they never lied to you. They wouldn't tell you anything more than you asked. I also found out that if you went around to enough of them, if you kept hearing certain things, they were probably true. So after seeing a lot of these people, they had kept telling me that there really is no rice out there. And in all these areas where people were saying that the Khmer Rouge were occupying the area, and then once the price of rice gets high enough, it will suddenly mysteriously come out of the woodwork. "There is no rice out there. I have cousins and so forth that are out there. There is no rice out there." So I finally came to the conclusion that indeed there was no rice out there, that there was enough to last for a couple more months and then they would literally be out of rice. As you got nearer and nearer to the bottom, suddenly rice would simply disappear because it would become so valuable. So you wouldn't get all the way to no rice before you start having a real crisis on your hands. So I came back and pronounced what my findings were, and nobody wanted to back it in the embassy there, and the AID mission insisted I send out the cable all on the basis of 'McConville says'. So the cable literally went out "McConville says," not the embassy or the AID mission, "McConville says." I wrote this report explaining what happened and the consequence of the fact that the rice prices had been artificially kept so low for so long, what was happening there, and I said that within a couple of months they were going to have a very severe rice crisis, that right now the only rice left was in Battambang and they were still being able to transport it down there but that could be interrupted too. Then I went back off to Saigon, and within about two weeks of my getting back to Saigon, the road was cut between Battambang and Phnom Penh, so that rice that was up in Battambang now could not get down there. And within days, they had a terrible rice crisis. Soldiers were breaking into rice stores and stealing rice and there were riots, and Washington panicked. "We've got to get rice over there right away." We had some rice in Saigon, so we were able to get the Vietnamese to agree that some PL-480 rice that we still had there, would be flown over to Phnom Penh, and some of it we arranged to ship on small craft up the Mekong River. We had an amazing guy there in the AID mission who could deal with all these little small craft captains and pay them enough to get them to take this chance to take it up there. Suddenly then I was the guy who had told everybody this was what was going to happen. They wanted me to go right back to Phnom Penh and to oversee this operation of getting the rice rationed and so forth to people and to get the rice prices increased and get something done about it. Two weeks earlier, as I say, nobody wanted to have anything to do with my forecast; it was all my forecast, not theirs. I came back and I was king of the roost. I told everybody what was happening. It was a couple weeks of the weirdest thing, getting that rice out there. That experience in Cambodia was something else. At that time the ambassador was in Washington, on home leave or something like that.

Q: Which ambassador is this, Graham Martin or...?

McCONVILLE: No, he was in Saigon. I'm talking about the ambassador in...

Q: Oh, John Gunther Dean?

McCONVILLE: No, that was long before him. It was a guy - I can't remember his name now - who was a career foreign service officer. His whole attitude had been we won't try to tell these people what to do in this kind of thing. So he was off in Washington for some reason, and Tom Enders was the deputy chief of mission. Enders was a diametrically opposed sort of personality.

So when I came in, Enders was all, "What is it we have to do? I want to know," and I told him. Of course, my whole report had explained that so much of this had to do with the price and one of the first things you had to do was get the rice price up to some kind of realistic level so there would become incentive to plant rice at least for the next year, and there was still some possibility they could get some rice in the tail end of that year. I still remember this meeting. Enders was about six foot seven inches tall. He's sitting in this meeting and he's got the AID mission director, his economic counselor, and he's sitting in the room, and he looks at me and says, "What should the price of rice be?" I said, "We've got to do a good deal more analysis for that before you can say specifically what it should be, but it has to come up dramatically." He said, "Name me a price," so I said, "Twenty-five" whatever the currency was, and he turns to the AID director and says, "You go over to the Ministry of Economy and you tell that's part of the agreement. We've got to have that price up to 25." Then I told him, "First of all, if you're going to raise that price, you've got to have plenty of rice around." I said, "I can assure you from my own experience that people will be more willing accept an increase in the price of rice as long as they feel confident there's plenty of rice around. That's what really panics them when they don't think there's any rice around." So indeed that's what they did. Then Enders wanted me to stay over there and he wanted me to do the whole financial. He wanted to get involved dramatically with getting their economy back. So I told them I really didn't have the depth for that, and we ended up sending one of our really well-qualified analysts to go over there and work there for a year or so. Then I had to keep going back from time to time to keep helping with this rice situation. I did about half a dozen two- or three-week TDYs in Cambodia during this period, and it was getting dicier and dicier over there all the time. In fact, before I sent off this cable in which I stuck my neck way out, I had to somehow reassure myself that indeed there wasn't going to be rice coming out from these areas around Phnom Penh, that these rice merchants had convinced me would not happen. These areas were shaky as far as security was concerned, but some one from the Ministry of Economy in a UN vehicle would go out into these areas. I persuaded them to take me with them, and we went out and toured around, because I had my neck out so far, and I came away reassured that indeed there was not going to be any rice coming out of those areas. When the ambassador there at the time learned that I had done this, he gave me a bit of a lecture for having done it. He said, "I appreciate your professionalism, but..." but it was my neck going out there. But whatever, I did this, and in fact there was a lot of consequence involved to what I had done. But the irony of all of this was there was almost no one in the State Department working on economic issues in Vietnam. They had one FS-05 or something like that, and he was of no consequence. So all of the people who were aware of all this were people in AID, people in USDA (United States Department of Agriculture), people at the National Security Council and the White House and so forth, but no one in the State Department. I recognized that within the State Department I was going to get almost no credit for this, because no one knew about it, and they certainly didn't know of the stakes that were involved or appreciated it. Like those people in USDA and AID and so forth, when they had a crisis, I was the guy they wanted specifically, and in fact I did the job, but it really wasn't going to be doing me much good in the State Department. So I finally accepted the fact that, if I wanted to get somewhere in the Foreign Service, I simply had to get another assignment out of Vietnam. I did, and I'm going to Korea, Seoul. That was my first tour there, '74 to '77. When I first arrived there, it was a joint State/AID economic office, but AID was phasing out, and during the second half of my tour it was totally a State operation. But again that experience in Vietnam, particularly working with all the professional economists, was a terribly enriching experience. It didn't do me an awful lot of good in my State Department career except in the sense that I learned more economics out there.

Q: Well, this is the great fun of the Foreign Service. Well, this probably is a good place to stop. So we'll pick this up in 1974 when you left Vietnam. By the way, when you left Vietnam, how did you feel things were going in Vietnam at the time you left?

McCONVILLE: Well, unfortunately it was pretty clear things weren't going well. The truce had been signed, of course. I left in January 1974. Like most of us who had been there for a while, I had a network of colleagues, some from AID, a few from State, but many of them had been there quite a bit of time and they had spent an awful lot of time in areas all over Vietnam. They were extremely knowledgeable, and most of these people, who I had enormous respect for, were very despairing of the way things were going, that the idea that the Vietnamese government would be able to sustain this long after the truce, that things were going downhill. And the economy was suffering too as a consequence, and the fact that the only economic aid we were getting at that point really was to buy the petroleum because of the huge increase in the price of oil at that time. I left in January of '74. It was April of '75, of course, when Saigon collapsed. I think when I left in '74, I expected that was likely. It always troubled me deeply, particularly the economy, because after those reforms were enacted I came away convinced that, had they been able to stop the war, South Vietnam had the kind of people around in some of the economic policy positions, they had the economic reforms in place, and just the entrepreneurship and the work ethic of the Vietnamese people was such that, had they been able to stop the war, Saigon or the South Vietnamese at least had all the makings of being another eventual economic miracle and that you could have another repeat of a Taiwan and a Korea there. I still believe that's true, if they can ever get rid of the communist and socialist government they have. They tried to open up a bit to the West, but from all I understand, most of the bureaucracy, the communist bureaucracy, has never really been willing to do anything more than fairly superficially for them. They're doing better now than they were before. They've opened up some, but it's still a big disappointment. I have no doubt that, had they been able to stop the war and pursued those kind of policies, if you're looking now 25 years later, Vietnam would be another one of the Southeast Asian success stories from an economic perspective.

ARTHUR MEAD
Foreign Agricultural Service
Washington, DC (1970-1975)

Arthur Mead was born and raised in Wisconsin and educated at the University of Wisconsin and American University. After service in the U.S. Army in World War II, he joined the U.S. Department of Agriculture and was involved in its overseas relief and grain storage operations, including the administration of Title I, Public Law 480. During his career Mr. Mead dealt with many overseas programs, including those concerning India and Vietnam. Mr. Mead was interviewed by Ray Ioanes in 1994.

MEAD: Rice production in Vietnam was not fatally hurt by the war but there was great difficulty getting it from the Delta to Saigon partly because of interdiction. Also, much of the time the farmers had rice but had little incentive to turn it over to the government since the economy was not producing goods for them to acquire. When I was in Vietnam in the early 70s, mainly to meet with the country team charged with determining the import requirements, I was invited by the Minister of Economy to go to the Delta with him as he tried to squeeze more rice out of the farmers. This was a periodic chore on his part to try to get more rice moving to Saigon. I did fly down to the Delta on Air America, but with USDA personnel.

We continued to have rice programs with countries such as Indonesia and Korea who had to stay in line behind Vietnam, but usually there were enough funds and rice to go around. That was true until the early 70s when world wide commodity difficulties arose as they seem to do every decade or so. The price of rice and grain rose sharply and the administration worried about domestic problems and inflation. A special decision making group was formed to ascertain the priorities of countries for a reduced program and to settle on the amounts of commodities to be made available. USDA took the position that it had no problem with arriving at a figure but since the commercial demand was strong, it did not want the funds made available for this assistance to reduce funds for other programs administered by the Department.

It was somewhat of a problem to determine availabilities of rice and grain but that was taken care of partly by reducing traditional carryover quantities (untested quantities that didn't come into play enough over the years for a rigorous review of their validity) to more realistic levels. This becomes a bit technical but the so called carryover amount was an important part of the computations to determine commodity availability. For example, the traditional carryover for wheat for years was 600 million bushels, which was the annual domestic use of wheat. It may have involved some creativity, but quantities were made available in 1973 and 1974, but at greatly reduced levels. I should say here that some of what I would call modernizing of carryover stocks took place during the problems in the mid sixties.

It was clear to me that the eligible recipient countries would find hard currency to fill much of their requirements if Title I was not made available in sufficient quantities. This was the substance of an impact statement requested by the ad hoc group. Thus it became a matter of who would finance the requirements and the decision was to let the recipients carry the load. Our Economic Research Service stated it could not do the impact statement so we were able to punch it out with the informal help of individuals in that service who we dealt with regularly.

One incident illustrates the concern the Administration had over prices and inflation. I received a call from the Assistant Secretary saying that he was negotiating with the National Security Council (it may also have been with the Treasury group dealing with possible price control) asking what minimum quantity of rice could we get away with in taking care of Vietnam and Cambodia. I asked him if I could massage that a little and call back. No, he wanted an answer right now. So it was my estimate of 600,000 tons, which turned out to be adequate but cost about $300 million. That plus wheat and other commodities to Vietnam resulted in that country getting a high percentage of shipments for the year quantitatively, but especially high in terms of value.

This led to great concern on the hill and legislation about 1975 provided for a large set aside for countries, under Title I, which were less developed. I believe it started out at 75 percent being reserved for these countries and then changed to 70 percent. Those provisions prevailed for a number of years. The provision used World Bank criteria for categorizing poorer countries; fortunately for Title I, Egypt fell into the eligible group.

While we did ship 600 thousand tons of rice to Vietnam and Cambodia under Title I because of their high profile, we shipped only 800,000 tons of wheat world wide; that's a dribble compared to ordinary Title I annual shipments. We did, however, keep the donations programs at more reasonable levels for direct feeding and other projects.

Another problem associated with Vietnam was the difficulty caused by the imminent fall of Saigon. Ships carrying Title I cargo were docking in other countries because of the risk of going into Saigon. This was some time before the Spring of 1975, of course, and the ships nestled themselves safely in the Philippines, Korea, Thailand and other havens. Our problem was that legally we had passed title to Vietnam at U.S. ports so that with the proper documents Vietnam representatives could take charge of the rice, wheat, tobacco, and cotton etc. at the safe havens.

We obtained legal authority through the Treasury to take the goods. Since time was of the essence we authorized the agricultural attachés to sell the commodities under certain guidelines and we did pretty well under the circumstances. At first the foreign affairs agencies wanted to donate some of the food to Asian countries but we convinced them that we didn't have the time to make such transfers and proceeded with the sales. I don't recall the values involved but it may very well have approached $100 million or may have been substantially more. The only major selling problem we had was in Korea where the offers for wheat were much too low and I called the Economic Minister in Washington to make it clear that we needed a better response. It worked. The other downside came a bit later when the GAO speculated that we should have had a greater return. That inquiry didn't take up much of my time.

If I didn't say so earlier, I now say that rice took up a good deal of my time; the factors included the high profile of the recipients such as Vietnam and Korea, and the high profile on the Hill in the few rice producing states. For example, I received a call from the Deputy Administer of AID (the agency that naturally caught the heat from the Hill's foreign aid appropriations people) asking that we issue a purchase authorization that day for Vietnam, the device to get sales started. The problem was that we had no agreement with Vietnam to apply a purchase authorization to, but we would have one the next day when an agreement was scheduled to be signed in Saigon. I told him I would not order our operations people to issue a PA since it was not legal. To make a long story short, we ended up issuing a press release saying that an authorization would be issued the next day when the agreement was signed. They, whomever they were, couldn't wait one day.

Q: I think in this case it was the Vietnam War.

MEAD: So there was a heavy White House involvement then. Vietnam, of course, got special treatment during LBJ and continued through Nixon. There was not much difference because that was the high priority, and in terms of assistance, food aid was secondary only to bullets. You just had to maximize shipments to Vietnam.

MELVIN R. CHATMAN
Senior District Advisor, USAID
Cuchi and Bien Ho (1970-1976)

Mr. Chatman was born in Oklahoma and raised in California and Michigan. After graduating from the University of Michigan, he pursued theater interests before serving in the US Army in Korea and Vietnam. In 1970 he joined AID and spent the rest of his career with that agency. His overseas postings include Vietnam, Malaysia, Bangladesh and San Salvador. He also had assignments with AID in Washington and New York City dealing with refugee, rice imports and training issues. Mr. Chatman was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

Q: You were there until when?

CHATMAN: The 29th of April of '75.

Q: 1970 is the beginning of the Vietnamization program.

CHATMAN: Also too I went down to AID when they found out that I could speak Vietnamese and they said we will get you on with AID. So that was an easy transition. I went back to the States for like two months for my security clearance to process because they wouldn't accept a military so they had to do some more investigations. So I had to go back to the States for two months. After waiting two months I was back in Vietnam.

Q: Then where were you?

CHATMAN: Do you remember a place called Cuchi?

Q: Is this when the tunnel oh no...?

CHATMAN: Right, I was in the district next to Cuchi; I was in Trang Bah, which was considered the worst of the 54 districts in Vietnam it was considered like the 53rd or 54th worst one security wise.

Q: Well this is...there were the tunnels and there was a horror sale wasn't there, I mean plantations or...?

CHATMAN: Yeah, plantations.

Q: And the Viet Cong were doing very nicely there.

CHATMAN: Right, that is where they did the [inaudible] and all that stuff.

Q: So what were you doing?

CHATMAN: I was a district senior advisor, which meant that I was the civilian that worked with the military in that district. That was my first assignment. I was there for six months and then they sent me to Bien Hoa and I started working out of Bien Hoa headquarters doing fuel work, different kinds of projects and things like that on behalf of USAID.

Q: Let's go back to the time you were in Cuchi. What were you doing, I mean what...?

CHATMAN: District senior deputy...

Q: But what does that mean?

CHATMAN: The districts, the advisory team for each one of the districts, were considered as military MAG teams (military advisory teams) and each one of those teams had a person who worked with a civilian, a civilian who worked with a civilian. I was the civilian who worked with a civilian there but all the other people on the team were military. I was the only civilian.

Q: What was the situation there? In the first place were you aware of the activity underground and the tunnels and also out in the plantation area?

CHATMAN: All you had to do was just wait until it got dark and you'd hear the activity. They would shoot up and run through the village. You could hear firefights outside the wall where I lived. All the time there was something going on, just a very bad place.

Q: Looking at it was there the possibility of moving significant military strength either American or Vietnamese in to clean it up or was that...?

CHATMAN: They did that but they had significant determination by the...like I said that was the worse, if they ranked the districts in order of the security problems the districts of Cuchi and Trang Bien were like 53, 54 out of 54 districts. So the VC (Viet Cong) there was a lot of American presence, the 9th division was there but there was also a very, very determined effort on the part of the VC to not allow that to stop their activity.

Q: Well I would think that dealing with the civilians there they must have been hold up in their bunkers and staying out of sight weren't they, because they would be the principal targets of all this VC activity?

CHATMAN: You know about the RD cadre, the rule development cadre?

Q: No.

CHATMAN: They had those people all over the place; they were getting killed like everybody else was, the soldiers. I can remember one day when one of their compounds was raided while thirteen or fourteen of them got killed in one night. They were young kids; they were like a self-defense force.

Q: Yeah.

CHATMAN: And, of course, they were all kids and not soldiers.

Q: Yeah, it was almost like a Peace Corps.

CHATMAN: All the Peace Corps wearing rifles, a little worse. Their mission was security it wasn't...

Q: I mean security but they took young kids without much experience.

CHATMAN: Right, young totally inexperienced kids. It was unfortunate.

Q: After a while what was your attitude? Did you think my God if they can't clean this place up then they aren't going to clean any place up? Or what did you think?

CHATMAN: I think I had sort of a little bit of an innocent optimism for a long time and it took me, because I guess I was a stubborn and too much of a flag waver, a lot longer time to realize that that whole idea was not working out than it should have. I think in my last several years there I was convinced the war was over and that we weren't going to make it.

Q: Well then when you moved from Cuchi where did you go?

CHATMAN: I went to Bien Hoa.

Q: There that was a very large American base; it was a main supply base, wasn't it?

CHATMAN: Right, but that area had, it was called region three and it included Saigon so our headquarters that I worked with was a USAID headquarters for region three. While it was actually the military region three we had a...I can remember his name was Robert Funkhouser, he was embassy.

Q: Dick Funkhouser?

CHATMAN: Yeah, Robert or Dick?

Q: I think maybe it is Robert but I've interviewed him a long, long time ago.

CHATMAN: But we had the ConGen (consulate general), we had a ConGen system and he was the ConGen for region two.

Q: Well then what were you doing there?

CHATMAN: Various types of projects that were sponsored by AID to get the civilians involved in a democratic system. I can't remember all those, but it was all kinds of things.

Q: As you were working with these people did you feel we were trying to impose something that wasn't going to last? You spoke Vietnamese, were you getting any feeling it was a nice idea but they just, it's just not part of the Vietnamese system?

CHATMAN: Yes, the answer is yes. But I did as I said before I think it took me a longer time to admit that than it did for a lot of other people. It was probably my fourth or fifth year before I even stated entertaining that because I was gung-ho. I had come out of the military I was gung-ho for the flag and we're going to do this. I stayed that way for an abnormally long time.

Q: Then after Bien Hoa where did you go?

CHATMAN: I went to Da Nang.

Q: You were there...?

CHATMAN: Until the end of it.

Q: Until the end?

CHATMAN: I was there until one month from the end because Da Nang fell one month before Saigon did. I was in charge of the evacuation from Da Nang and then I was in charge of the transportation for the evacuation out of Saigon.

Q: Let's take Da Nang. When you got up to Da Nang this was before all hell broke loose wasn't it?

CHATMAN: It was really started then during the prisoner exchanges. Remember the peace was supposed to be there and all these plans and such, that is when I arrived in Da Nang which was about '72ish.

Q: How did you find Da Nang?

CHATMAN: A little scarier than Saigon, there was a lot more VC activities up in that area closer to the north. I was in Quong Nam, have you ever heard of Quong Nam?

Q: No.

CHATMAN: One of the provinces, an old very historical province with a lot of historical villages and stuff like that. I got into studying Vietnamese artifacts and things like that so it was very interesting to me. But it was closer to the north so you felt a lot more threatened. The possibility of something actually happening was there, it was definitely there.

Q: You were there when I guess the initial attacks were well one was up in the...

CHATMAN: Quong Tri.

Q: Quong Tri.

CHATMAN: That was the northerly most...that is where it started.

Q: I think didn't they pull out what was the Vietnamese First Division or something.

CHATMAN: I can't remember the details.

Q: What was in Da Nang? I mean were you and your compatriots seeing it falling apart?

CHATMAN: Yep, it was falling apart.

Q: What was your impression of AID as an organization in Vietnam.

CHATMAN: It didn't have the whip that it needed to have. It had the money to give everybody, which we gave everything away, but when things did not work right we had no ability to punish or correct the situation so it wouldn't happen again. So something would happen, they changed the Vietnamese and the next guy would come and be a bigger crook than the guy before. Our military career performance system dictated that if you wanted to get ahead the system that you worked with the Vietnamese had to show some improvements or otherwise it reflected on your performance. When you got to that level everybody made sure that the system at least report wise functioned a lot better than it did when they started, because that was part of the deal. Very seldom did you see a guy say, "Well look in the year that I've been up here the situation is worse than it was when I started." That was not heard of and if you multiply that by everybody in the system each one having his part of the pie then it was a corrupt system, we weren't getting the truth out of them. I think what's more is he exhibited the lies that he told were criminal, that he had some of those bags.

Q: You were involved in the evacuation of Da Nang?

CHATMAN: Very much so.

Q: I've seen pictures, of course, of the airplanes pushing people off and all.

CHATMAN: There is a book called The Fall of Saigon that describes a lot of my participation in evacuations.

Q: What sort of things were you doing?

CHATMAN: I was trying to organize everything. Quong Ngai was in one of the southern provinces of region two.

Q: Quong Tri would be region one wouldn't it?

CHATMAN: Excuse me let me get myself together. Region one, it was a southern edge of region one. I was in Quong Ngai.

Q: It's not Quong Tri?

CHATMAN: No, no, no Quong Tri was the north. It was next to the bottom of North Vietnam. It was the southern district, the southern province of region one which was, I can't remember...

Q: Well we can pick that up.

CHATMAN: Quong Ngai, whatever it was it was a southern part but it was one of the worst provinces as far as the Viet Cong military presence and I was evacuated out of that up to Saigon. I was sent down to that province because there was no American down there. I was down there for about two weeks and the place got overrun. When I was evacuated out there were bombs being dropped, or mortars being dropped onto the airstrip. As the chopper was taking off I could see these things being blown up around us. We took off and that was the end of it. Then I was in Da Nang for about a month after that and then the same thing happened in Da Nang and we were put on the barges, they had a whole bunch of barges that came out of Da Nang and they had all the problems and things. Then when I got down to Saigon because of my experiences up there they said, "Look you've got to help with the evacuation of Saigon." So I was in charge of the embassy transportation, all the buses that took people from the liaison pick up points to the planes on time. I was the control officer and every day I set that thing up, that was my parting thing. I did that until the last night.

Q: How did you get the buses from the embassy to Tan Son Nhut Airport? I mean there must have been mobs all the time around the embassy.

CHATMAN: There were mobs around the embassy but they never picked anybody up at the embassy. There were staging points throughout the city that the buses were told to go by. Every day they had a meeting and at the meeting the various organizations would say I have so many people that I need to have picked up and taken to the airport. We would have the staging points, let's say there were ten staging points and we would say okay you have 15 people at point number one, which is on the corner of this. You have them there at six o'clock in the morning and we will send a bus. We did that for ten or twelve different places and had the buses come by, pick the people up and take them to the airport. The Vietnamese were unexplainable, did not get involved with these buses. The Vietnamese did not take American hostages for some reason, which I swore they were going to do up until the end of it and they just let this thing happen. I do not understand why they didn't interrupt them.

Q: Were you involved in getting Vietnamese employees, or government, and of course the families were terribly extended?

CHATMAN: All these people were whatever they said to be there I had no control over who was going to be there. I had the control over saying so many people had to be at this point and that was what we could pick up with the bus and the bus would go to the airport and that's the end of it. They told me the numbers that would be from each agency and I would make sure the bus was there on time and got out to the airport.

Q: You must have...if you were told 15 there must have been more than that.

CHATMAN: Yeah but surprisingly we did not have many problems with the buses and I'm not sure for the whole reason. I think a lot of people maybe did not still think it was going to happen.

Q: Did you find that there was a problem getting people out of there just personally saying I don't want to go?

CHATMAN: Big problem and that was one of the biggest problems. There were a lot of Americans. We had probably three or four days where we could not fill up the airplanes simply because there were Americans saying they did not want to go. We kept begging the Americans to get on the buses and go. There was a period where the buses went out to the airport from these rally points probably one quarter full, that's it. A lot more people could have gotten evacuated.

Q: Were you finding I know a number of people I know came back to Vietnam from Washington to get their wives or their families or their girlfriends, or what have you out? Was this...did you get involved with this?

CHATMAN: Yeah but I wouldn't know, I mean I didn't care what the name of the...the organization had to have the people there whoever they chose to be there that was up to them whether it was one of their hookers or one of their mother-in-law or girlfriend or what, that was their problem. I just had to have the bus there and then make sure the bus got to the airport and cleared it when it got back.

Q: Were your drivers reporting problems of Vietnamese authorities not allowing people on planes?

CHATMAN: Yes they were. The way that they solved that was that the guys said, "Here is $200 thousand, you put it in your pocket, you get out to the gate and you just make sure you get through." They just bribed them, the guys who were causing the problems were, that I am aware of, were the guys, the PFC, one PFC at the front gate at Tan Son Nhut who could sit there and say, "No you can't go through, and everything was stopped. So he said we will take care of him and they did.

Q: Did you get the drivers out?

CHATMAN: The drivers were mostly Americans until the Americans all ran out, then the problems started to become a little more sensitive because they were Vietnamese drivers and obviously they were taking advantage of the system, but it never fell apart, it never fell apart.

Q: So how did you get out?

CHATMAN: Helicopter about two hours before the ambassador left.

Q: Did you sense the concern that in the days that the ambassador was almost fighting the evacuation? He was...

CHATMAN: In a matter of sense that he was, he was totally against the evacuation because he believed there was panic and I also thought that for us to start taking massive amounts of Americans out very visibly so would have really panicked the Vietnamese and it didn't. Why it didn't I do not know? All it would take was a couple of ARVN soldiers in the middle of the street to stop the whole operation and it never did, it never did. I was out wandering around by myself at night before the final evaluation, I was always worried about somebody pushing me up against the side of the wall with a gun and saying you've got to get me out of here or I'm going to kill you. That was my one of my biggest worries and I was never bothered.

Q: I'm just trying to think of...did you have any particular friends or something in the Vietnamese community that you were getting out? Was there a problem of getting the Vietnamese to face up to the situation too?

CHATMAN: No, there were plenty of Vietnamese that wanted to get out of there. The biggest problem with the Americans is they didn't want to go. There were plenty of Vietnamese that wanted to leave.

Q: Were GIs, I understand that there was a significant number of essentially deserters from American military units had gone maybe even years before into the depths of Cholon or something in the black market and all that.

CHATMAN: I don't know anything about that.

Q: That wasn't an issue?

CHATMAN: Never an issue, there may have been some but I never heard that, if there was an issue there never was a problem. If you were American, if you were white looking you could get on the buses with no problem. You are supposed to have some documents or something but if somebody stopped and you were white looking they'd put you on the bus and say don't worry about it, just get out of here.

Q: Well then where did you go? You say you left just shortly...

CHATMAN: I went to Guam. I was on Guam to help with the refugees who were coming into Guam. There were several boats full of refugees that I was evacuated with. We ended up in Guam and I helped process refugees in Guam for a while. Then, where did I go, I went back to the States and worked as a coordinator for resettling refugees in the state of New York, still working with the Vietnamese.

ROBERT H. NOOTER

Assistant Administrator, USAID
Washington, DC (1970-1975)

Robert H. Nooter was raised in St. Louis, Missouri. He attended one semester at Purdue, joined the Marines during WW II and was assigned to a V-12 Unit. However, he graduated from the University of California with a B.S. in Industrial Engineering in 1947. He was called back into the Marines in 1951 to fight in the Korean War. In 1961, he attended courses at the Harvard Business School. He became interested in government service during the Kennedy Administration, and international affairs during his service in the military. He also served in Liberia and Uruguay. He was interviewed by W. Haven North on January 6, 1996.

NOOTER: John Hannah came to AID early in 1969, and somewhere around the latter part of 1969, he offered me a position as Assistant Administrator to run the Vietnam operation since Jim Grant was departing. I accepted in spite of the fact that I had serious reservations about the U.S. Government's Vietnam policy at that time. It seemed to me obvious that the people of the United States weren't prepared to support that war anymore, and our best policy was to get out. However, it was the Nixon administration's policy to withdraw from Vietnam, and therefore I thought I could work on the Vietnam program in good conscience. I didn't think it was a bad idea that we would give the South Vietnamese, who had taken a lot of their current positions because of the U.S. role, a chance to run things themselves if they could, if they had proper equipment and training. Therefore turning the war over to them in an orderly way in a reasonable period of time was a sound policy and one that I could support.

So with that in mind, I accepted the job as Assistant Administrator for Vietnam. I started working on it about February 1970, although my clearance and confirmation process still had to go forward, but I nevertheless began running the program. Just a word on the confirmation process might be interesting. In all administrations Presidential appointments had to go through the White House. Some administrations took that down even to mission director and lower level positions, but in any event all of them required political clearance for Presidential appointments because that had to go through the Senate and be cleared, among others, with the Congressmen in the states where these people came from. So my nomination went forward sent by John Hannah. John had two presidential appointment selections that were not career, but because he was relying so much on the career staff, he was having trouble getting his clearances through the White House, who wanted to put a number of political appointees into the system. To my experience the Nixon administration was not as insistent on this as the Kennedy administration, and the Johnson administration was quite good on career people also. I thought that actually the Kennedy administration was more political than either of the other two.

Q: That's interesting because certainly the Johnson administration was very supportive of the bureaucracy and the staff of professionals and career people. The Nixon administration in my exposure to it was much more political, and pushed much further down the line in terms of being sure people were political.

NOOTER: Now that you remind me, it got more political the longer the administration went on. Now most administrations are the most political up front, then become less political during their tenure. But in the Nixon administration, maybe they were just a little bit sloppy at first, but they were fairly loose at the beginning, then toward the end it became more difficult.

Q: I got caught up in the subsequent period I guess...lower levels.

NOOTER: In any event, when they looked at my background, of course I had come in at a fairly high level in the Kennedy administration, and my whole record didn't look so politically pure to the White House. So they held it up for some time, and finally after about six months of John Hannah pushing and pushing trying to get it through, a senior political person, I think his name was Bell, in the White House, called me up one day. He said they were reviewing the request for my clearance and he asked how I had voted in the 1968 election. I didn't hesitate very long before I told him that I had voted for Hubert Humphrey, thinking this was pretty much the end of my appointment. For whatever reason, my nomination was approved the next day. Now a lot of things happen in the government that I don't understand, but this is one of the most puzzling.

Q: Maybe he already knew who you voted for, or thought you were an honest man.

NOOTER: I don't know whether he gave me credit for honesty or what. I don't know, but for whatever reason he approved it, and it went on up to the Senate and I was approved with no particular problem.

The Vietnam operation was enormous. I think we had some 2200 people in that Bureau either in Washington or the field, most of them of course in Vietnam. AID provided staff for two kinds of programs. One was the more or less regular economic programs: agriculture, various kinds of technical assistance, and infrastructure programs. The other program was the staff that we provided to the CORDS organization in Vietnam. CORDS was a mixed military/civilian operation and it was headed up by someone in Vietnam who reported to the ambassador. He was not under the military and he was not directly under AID although roughly half of his personnel came from AID. AID wasn't directly responsible for the CORDS operation in the field, but we nevertheless kept an oversight of it and were kept informed about it, and played some role in it. It also did link to some extent with the more traditional AID programs that we had such as in agriculture and refugees because the CORDS people in the field would be actually involved in working on some of these programs in the field.

During the course of the next several years the staff size came down immensely. I don't remember the exact numbers, but we were in a phase-down mode. I think we had 400 people in Washington when I first started and in a couple of years we reduced that to less than half, and the same in the field. I don't remember the exact numbers. As I mentioned, the policy of the government at that time was that we were in a withdrawal mode, that we were helping the Vietnamese get on their own feet to take over the war in a military way, and we were trying to help them straighten out their economy with the notion that the U.S. would withdraw in some period of time.

I ran the program from 1970 to 1974 when AID reorganized, and I'll get to that later. It was run as a separate Bureau until 1972, at which time the program had been reduced in size to the point where there was a reorganization and all the programs that were funded with what was called Supporting Assistance were merged into a single region. At that time it included Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos and also a program in Jordan. I don't think we had a program in Israel yet, but if we did that also would have been included.

Q: So it was an economic support bureau?

NOOTER: It was called the Supporting Assistance Bureau. It administered the money that had a political motive -- an economic purpose but a political motive -- and it was a separate line item in the foreign aid bill.

Q: But it was not regionally oriented?

NOOTER: It was not regionally oriented. It was administered on a world-wide basis, but the only areas we were involved in at that time were southeast Asia and a little bit of it to the Middle East. Then occasional bits of Supporting Assistance went to other places such as Malta under a base agreement that I'll talk about later.

But between 1970 and 1972, which is the period that I'll cover first, I was running just the Vietnam program. Of course what I found when I started going to Vietnam on visits, and I did visit every part of that country over the next several years, was that the atmosphere was dominated by the U.S. military upbeat style which doesn't really brook the thought of defeat. While there was no explicit rule about this, one quickly got the sense that things were off limits. It was simply an unspoken atmosphere which partly, I guess from my own military experience and partly from experience in general, I sensed immediately when I came out to Vietnam. Things that were thought of as going badly or not working maybe could be mentioned but always in the context of how they could be improved to make them work, never in the context of the fact that you shouldn't be doing them at all. And this led to unreality in some parts of the Vietnam program. When people go back and wonder what happened, this atmosphere, which has a lot to be said for it in a situation where you are winning, was one of the reasons that created some unrealistic situations. I thought the Best and the Brightest by David Halberstam and A Bright and Shining Lie by Neil Sheehan capture this very well.

I also met John Vann, who was almost a larger than life character, very well described in the Neil Sheehan book. I don't know if the audience to this oral history will know who he was, but he was a military man who had been in Vietnam up until 1963, I believe as a Lieutenant Colonel. John became an outspoken critic of the tactics that were being used in Vietnam because he thought they were ineffective. He resigned from the military as a protest. He had been a close friend of Daniel Ellsberg, who released the Pentagon papers. And John left Vietnam and the military in protest to the policies, and became an outspoken critic of the program. He worked for Martin Marietta for two years, and then was hired by AID in about 1965 and went back to Vietnam as a civilian in the CORDS program.

By this time he had some audience of people who listened to the things that he said, and he did have some influence on the policies at the time and caused them to become more effective. But ultimately, John also was committed to helping the South Vietnamese to prevail. I think John never could quite accept that the South Vietnamese weren't going to prevail as a separate entity from the North.

But anyway, he was quite a charismatic character, and in many ways very unlike me but oddly we hit it off very well. And I must say I learned a lot from John. I went on tours of the countryside with him in his area. At the time I came out he was in charge of the CORDS program in the Delta. There were four regions of the country, and he was in charge of the Delta region. I remember I shocked him and all of his staff when I first went down to the Delta. They began doing what was standard procedure there, which was to take you into a Quonset type hut and give you a military-type briefing with statistics of what was going on. And after the first briefing I said to John, "No more briefings on this trip, John," because I felt I wasn't seeing anything. I was seeing the inside of a Quonset hut and seeing some figures, but I wasn't seeing the countryside, I wasn't seeing the people, I wasn't getting a feeling for what was really going on. And so while that threw the schedule into a turmoil initially, John could appreciate my response, and he spent the rest of the tour showing the Delta to me in quite a different way.

He liked to take you in his helicopter, which he piloted himself most of the time. The way to see how good the rice harvest was was to fly about 20 feet above the houses in the helicopter and look down in the yards to see whether the piles of rice in the yards was big or small. I had a lot of admiration for John, his views and what he thought, and I learned a lot from him.

Q: He obviously had a very definite strategy he followed in what he was trying to do. Can you describe that, what he was trying to bring about?

NOOTER: I can't remember so many of the details about the program, but I think for one thing the earlier policy had been to have villages that were encompassed in barbed wire and were cut off from the surrounding country, making them into enclaves. John didn't agree with that, among other things. He believed in his CORDS people being out in the countryside and not simply letting the Viet Cong take over at night, but being out where they could dominate the landscape at night as well as in the daytime.

I recall he disagreed very much with the Agent Orange program which was an attempt to defoliate the forests so the Viet Cong couldn't hide in them. In retrospect this was one of the most stupid things you could imagine doing, not to mention the environmental effects that have come from it. He thought that it was absurd, and was one of the few people to say so at the time. Other than being enormously energetic and trying to get down to the grass roots and understand what was really going on, and working with the people at the level where they lived, I can't remember anything else.

Q: Do you have a sense he was trying to understand the Vietnamese frame of mind or attitude or culture?

NOOTER: Yes, that would be true, and trying to support them and get them to take the lead in running things and securing their own defense. Of course ultimately I think he would have been unsuccessful had he lived. He died in a helicopter crash just before the collapse. He was at that time in charge of II Corps, which is where the North Vietnamese principal invasion came through. I always used to say, half in jest, that Vietnam would never fall so long as John Vann was alive, and in retrospect, that's about the way it went. It collapsed not so long after John died.

Q: He wasn't responsible for all of the CORDS operation but just one area, is that what you're saying?

NOOTER: Actually, in his last tenure in II Corps, when the U.S. direct military involvement had decreased and we had less U.S. military there, he was put in charge of not only the CORDS people but all of the military people who were in that Corps. That was considered kind of a revolution to have a civilian in charge of military units, even though he'd been a former military officer.

Q: Okay, we can continue with Vietnam.

NOOTER: Ellsworth Bunker was the Ambassador at the time that I was there, and he was in charge of the CORDS program as well as the AID mission there. I found him to be a most remarkable person. I guess he was about 76 at that time. He had the natural instincts of the true administrator, to my mind. He never seemed to get involved in unnecessary detail, but he always seemed to know the important things that were going on and what to become involved in. He had an ability to separate the wheat from the chaff in a way that was more profound than any executive I'd seen. I thought he was also extremely sensible, level-headed, and never had any illusions about the job that was there to be done, but also did everything he could to carry out his assignments in the best possible way.

Bill Colby was in charge of the CORDS program. He later became head of the CIA, and we'll go into that some more later. Bill also was extremely reasonable and sensible and good to work with. But as I say, nobody wanted to hear anything out there about how things weren't working or how they might not succeed.

Q: That included Colby and Bunker too?

NOOTER: Less so, but it permeated the whole atmosphere. I recall as the withdrawal was going on, in 1972 I was out there on a visit and Colby had arranged a dinner for his senior CORDS staff. There were about 20 of us sitting around a table and at the end of the dinner I suggested we go around the table and ask each person at the table what they thought would happen after the U.S. withdrawal was complete. They did this, in this case in a very frank and open fashion, and two things of note stand out: one, at that time both Colby and I were reasonably optimistic about the chances of the South Vietnamese pulling it off by themselves. But I noticed that the people who were the most pessimistic were the ones at the lowest levels who were out in the countryside and had the closest contact with the people. It was more possible to be optimistic in headquarters than if you were out in the hamlets. And of course they were the ones who were correct. The other thing was that after the meeting one of the people at the dinner came up to me and said "This is the first frank and open discussion I have ever heard in Vietnam the whole time I've been here." I guess maybe with the U.S. withdrawal having reached the stage where it was, it became more acceptable to be open and candid. Colby had no reservations about this openness whatsoever. It was not he who was imposing this lack of openness in the prior period.

Q: What were the people from the lower levels who knew the hamlets, what were they saying about the situation there being pessimistic -- what did pessimistic mean?

NOOTER: I can't remember the details, but I guess they were aware that while a lot of Viet Cong had been killed in the TET offensive, the Viet Cong sympathizers and the North Vietnamese were still there, they were in the countryside, and once the U.S. pulled out they doubted the South Vietnamese ability to pull it off, to retain the leadership.

There was one incident that convinced me that it was going to fail, and that was a military exercise later in 1972 when the U.S. by this time had fully trained and equipped the South Vietnamese army. They were all ready to go and so the U.S. military and the Vietnamese army planned an attack by the Vietnamese army up near the 39th parallel to cut the Ho Chi Minh trail. They were to go in and do that with some U.S. air support, but the ground forces were to be entirely South Vietnamese. They would actually be going into Cambodia, I guess, and/or Laos, but it would be Vietnamese troops.

I happened to be up in Hue at the time, near the 39th parallel, when we got the reports of what happened in that engagement. It was clear that the North Vietnamese, when faced with a threat to the Ho Chi Minh trail, mounted a stiff resistance that completely beat up the South Vietnamese troops, who left their equipment and came running back across the border. I remember seeing General Abrams, who was in charge of the U.S. military forces at that time, shortly after that in Saigon. He was another realist. I liked Abrams very much, a very sound fellow, which was certainly not true of all of the military that had been there. He confided to me that the South Vietnamese had been soundly whipped. It seemed to me that if they couldn't sustain themselves in the face of a real confrontation with the North Vietnamese troops when they were fully armed and equipped by the U.S. and still had U.S. air cover, they certainly weren't going to do it after we left.

In any event, we did spend a lot of time during '70, '71, and '72 on the economic program. Charles Cooper was working in State on the economic program for AID and State, and later went out to live in Saigon running the economic program on the U.S. side. He was quite excellent.

We had a good Vietnamese counterpart, the Minister of Economy, named Ngoc. He was very sensible. I give the credit to Chuck Cooper and Ngoc, who developed a good macroeconomic policy, where they devalued the exchange rate enormously, even though this meant that temporarily it reduced the flow of U.S. financial resources that the U.S. military had to pay for its operations there that were being bought at an overvalued exchange rate. But nevertheless it was healthy for the economy to change the exchange rate and put it on a sound basis. And believe it or not, even with the war going on, the period following the TET offensive was relatively stable, and the Vietnamese economy began to respond and we began to get some good results. This came from the countryside, that is at the rural level. But of course ultimately that got disrupted as the political and military situation deteriorated.

Q: Who was the AID director during this time, do you know?

NOOTER: First Don McDonald and then Bob Mossler. They were both extremely capable people. I think it was in that order. Anyway, those were the two in the time I was there. They were both very competent and ran good programs.

We had one interesting program there in the Mekong Delta. It is a rice-growing area where rice is grown as the flood of the Mekong River recedes. Once the rice crop is grown there's a dry season when nothing was grown traditionally until the next flood. The AID mission introduced a crop of sorghum that could be grown in the dry period, and within two or three years an enormous quantity, it seems to me like several hundred thousand tons a year, of sorghum was grown in the Mekong delta at a time when nothing had been grown before. I thought if one wants to look for interesting and startling successes in the AID program, that would be one example. I would be fascinated to know what happened now that the North Vietnamese have taken over, whether that sorghum crop remains as a cultivated crop. My guess is that it did but I don't know for sure.

Q: What about, we were involved in doing any of the rice developments at all?

NOOTER: Yes, we introduced the IR-8 rice variety. We spread the use of IR-8 rice, but that was already in place when I took over. I think the big issues had to do with the pricing of rice, the availability of rice markets, and how the South Vietnamese collected the rice. Sometimes the rice wouldn't come to market before the exchange rate was devalued; prices were unduly depressed, and so the government was inclined to go out and collect it at the point of a bayonet. We argued that that was not a good way to run an economy.

I think the issues related to rice at the time I was there were more related to policy issues and marketing rather than technical issues. Part of the recovery of the economy was in rice production. As the rice prices rose, more rice was grown and came to market. If the price is reasonable, farmers will grow it and sell it. But under wartime conditions, the South Vietnamese first instincts were not to handle it on a market economy basis. But Minister Ngoc understood that and agreed, and went along with us to implement the policies that brought things around.

Q: Were there other programs of significance? We spent a lot of money. What were we doing mostly?

NOOTER: A lot of the program was what you would call just general program support -- providing foreign exchange so that goods could be imported, which doesn't really promote development. In fact, it can be an impediment to development under certain circumstances even though it will keep people fed and clothed in the short run. There was a big balance of payments component to the program. The technical programs were heavily in agriculture.

Q: What were the AID people doing who were out in the rural areas?

NOOTER: Most AID people in the rural areas were CORDS people. They were involved in rural development programs, for example. If there was a sorghum program they would help see that the crop was introduced and that farmers understood how to grow it.

Q: So were the AID people kind of backstopping the CORDS effort?

NOOTER: The AID mission located mainly in Saigon supported the economic part of the CORDS program in the field. Generally it worked reasonably well even though the organizational arrangement was not very centralized. But the cooperation was pretty good.

Q: What was your sense of the Vietnamese people that you worked with?

NOOTER: As I said, the fact that they could produce a minor economic miracle in the middle of the war convinced me that they had the potential to be another economic tiger once that economy got straightened out if the war were ended. And I guess the present Vietnamese government is beginning to loosen things up and let some market response take place. If they carry that far enough, I have little doubt we'll have another tiger in east Asia.

Let me add one more thing. In this whole period we had a series of refugee programs. It was a very major and active part of the program, feeding and housing and dealing with the refugees that were generated by the war, and of course that varied from time to time. Actually it would be better to talk about this in the context of Cambodia and Laos, when I took over those programs, because the refugee programs were even more important in Cambodia than in Vietnam. But that was one activity of the AID mission that was important.

Q: How about the dealings with Congress on Vietnam, and the public opinion about that at the time? Were you caught up in the general hysteria about the situation?

NOOTER: First, on Congress let me take a minute to talk about that. I began testifying before Congress in 1969 after John Bullitt had left, when I was acting Assistant Administrator. Within the AID system, the Assistant Administrators always went up to defend and try to justify their portions of the program to various committees within the Congress. John Bullitt was a master at testifying. He'd been a New York lawyer and was a good judge of human nature. He was more successful in dealing with Otto Passman than anyone had ever been before. I had the advantage of John's counsel and advice before I had my first testimony before Otto Passman, who was in charge of the Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance of the Appropriations Committee in the House.

Otto was alleged to hate the foreign aid program, although perhaps he didn't hate it quite as much as his reputation alleged, but he certainly used his chairmanship position to humiliate all the witnesses who came before him. In 1962 when I had just joined AID, Ed Hutchinson had just been made Assistant Administrator for Africa. Ed was a rather feisty, very dedicated, very serious individual and very competent. But Ed refused to take Otto Passman's bullying and would try to fight back. The result of that was that he was up there testifying for 28 days for testimony that would normally take one day or two days at the most, because Passman simply wouldn't let him get in the last word.

On the other hand, John's counsel to me was simply to not fight the problem. Just accept the fact that Passman was going to dominate the situation, and the best thing to do was simply to make it as brief and painless as possible, although not letting him put something totally erroneous on the record, but short of that, to simply get on with it, because much of what Passman dealt with was minutiae and details that were part of what he wanted to build as a record but wouldn't affect the overall appropriation level much.

I followed that advice reasonably successfully. From those experiences I developed the Passman five-to-one rule: that is, what I learned was that whatever you said favorable about the program, Passman would put five times that much on the record that was unfavorable. If you talked for a minute he would talk for five or maybe ten. If you talked for an hour he would talk for five hours. So you might as well save your breath. The ratio would always remain the same. And that's what Ed Hutchinson had trouble accepting.

On the other hand, my first testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee was a high point. That committee was quite a serious and sensible committee, and was trying to learn something as well as paint records. It had quite a diverse membership from all the spectrums of the political scene, and they were prepared to enter into a serious dialogue with a witness and have some sensible dialogue that would reflect facts and opinions and had some value. I had an extraordinarily good session with them during my first major appearance before a Committee.

Q: Do you remember who the Chairman was at the time?

NOOTER: Clem Zablocki, who was a fine man. He was kind of a Chicago ward healer, but in the Harry Truman sense of rising above his background when he got into a responsible position. And Zablocki had a serious interest in the AID program, which didn't mean he was in favor of everything but he wanted to do it in a responsible way. He ran a good committee with a good staff and good membership. That got my Congressional testimony off to a good start, and while Congressional testimony was always difficult, I enjoyed it with the exception of Otto Passman or Clarence Long who succeeded him and who was just about as bad.

Q: Did you get involved in any public debates on Vietnam?

NOOTER: Yes, one of the difficulties, of course, of being in charge of the Vietnam program was that popular discontent was growing by leaps and bounds. There were frequent demonstrations in Washington against the war. I had five children at that time, most of them teenagers, who were all actively against the war, as were most of my friends. So it was an extremely difficult period on a personal level. My family was all very good about it in many ways, I guess, because they knew I was against the war, too, even though my job caused me to do certain things in connection with it, which I hope I did in a responsible way, but that didn't mean that I favored our being there. What I favored was our withdrawal, and I guess that fact made it a little easier within the family. I don't think my children ever resented my role in it, nor did my wife, who was equally as much against the war as my children.

I do remember some good friends coming from St. Louis for an anti-war demonstration once and asking if they could stay at our house. In fact, there was a big crowd of them and we let them sleep in their sleeping bags in our basement. I remember saying they were perfectly welcome to do that, and some of my family went to the demonstration, but the only thing they couldn't do was put a Viet Cong flag in the front yard.

Q: What about the public in general and the press? Did you have a lot to do with them?

NOOTER: I didn't have many dealings with the press but I did have one or two press conferences at the request of State. I remember one of these. I was naive in dealing with the press. The economic situation at the time, probably in 1971 or 1972, was coming along pretty well and State thought it would be useful to give a briefing on the economic situation. So there was a press conference arranged in which I made a statement and then answered questions. The whole thing went on for 45 minutes or an hour. I remember after it was over when I came out everybody was very pleased with the way it had gone and what I had said and the impression it had made. I said, on the other hand, that I was horrified because out of that 45 minutes or an hour I realized that the reporters would pick one or two sentences and that would be their story, and I didn't know which ones they would pick.

And it turned out that the only thing that made any significant story was a reporter from one of the wire services who had asked about the level of aid that would be needed over the next ten years. I think at that time it was $750 million a year, and he interpreted something I had said to mean that it would be necessary to maintain that level for ten years, which I hadn't said but that was his impression of what I'd said. Therefore, he quoted me as saying that seven and a half billion dollars more in economic aid was needed for Vietnam. When I saw the wire service story and called him to try to get him to correct it, he refused because that would mean he would have to admit he had made an error. And so that was the story that was generated out of this wonderful press conference. Generally I took a low profile with the press, which was fine with me.

Q: Did you do any speech-making? Were you asked to go out and...?

NOOTER: I did not actually; I was spared that. I didn't have a role in trying to make a public case for the program.

Q:presenting the administration's position to the public and all that?

NOOTER: At a personal level I remember helping to arrange a meeting one time with some anti-war people. One of them had been a shipmate in World War II of Bill Sullivan who was the senior person in the State Department running the Vietnam program, to talk about it, but I didn't make any public appearances in that respect.

Q: Did you have any direct dealings with the White House at that time?

NOOTER: Henry Kissinger was the NSC chairman, and the economic and military programs were really run out of the White House. Within the State Department, Kissinger's link to the State Department was Bill Sullivan who was a Deputy Assistant Secretary. They didn't go through the Secretary; they didn't even go through Marshall Green who was the Assistant Secretary. It was a direct link to Bill Sullivan. There was a committee that met several times a week of which I was a member which Bill Sullivan chaired, and there were several people from Kissinger's staff who came over along with people from the military and the CIA as well as myself from AID. This was the nucleus of the planning and the policy implementation within the government for the Vietnam program.

Q: Was it simply a strategy for withdrawal that you were talking about?

NOOTER: That came, of course, out of the political campaign. It was Nixon's policy even before and certainly after his Asian mission with Marshall Green, the whole policy of withdrawal and more restrained U.S. commitments abroad.

Q: But the assumption there was you withdraw, at the same time the aim was the South Vietnamese would be capable of carrying forward independently without us...

NOOTER: Exactly -- it was to give them a chance to make it on their own by helping to arm them and equip them and helping strengthen their economy. Then we would pull out and it would be up to them to make it on their own.

Q: And they presumably had the capacity to do so?

NOOTER: That's right, or if they didn't that would be the end of it, which of course is what happened.

Q: And there was a recognition at that time that that was a real possibility?

NOOTER: I believe that only became a realization as things got farther along, especially after the attempt of the South Vietnamese army failed to carry out a successful military operation on its own. In a way I was surprised the North Vietnamese held back as long as they did after that particular engagement, which was about 1972. They didn't really mount much of a serious attack until about '74. I guess they decided it would be less costly in lives to wait till the U.S. pulled out and they'd be able to take it as a pushover, which of course is what happened.

The thing for me personally that was uncomfortable was that while I was comfortable with the policy of withdrawal, the rate of withdrawal was so slow. It was slower than I anticipated when I took the position. I came to believe, though I never had any proof on this from anybody, that the withdrawal pattern was set to be sure there was not a collapse before the 1972 election. There were enough U.S. ground troops there until 1972 that it would not fall before that time. I am fully convinced of that although, as I say, you have to accept that only as my opinion. I can't quote statistics or even direct quotes from anybody to say that that was the basis of the policy. But certainly if you saw what was going on and the rate at which withdrawal took place...

Q: And you were involved in the strategy session...?

NOOTER: Not in everything. We really weren't involved in the rate of the military withdrawal.

Q: Not on the military side, but I would think on the economic side there would be certain assumptions about what you were trying to accomplish?

NOOTER: There was no question that on the economic side the Vietnamese could handle it at any time. They had gone through their changes in macroeconomic policies in 1971, and they were able to handle it after that.

There was one ironical event when I was away on a trip somewhere -- a mission to Vietnam or a vacation somewhere in about 1972. I came back and everybody was in a tizzy because the Defense Department had sent a letter to the Secretary of State saying that while the military program seemed to be progressing well, they were seriously concerned about the state of the economy, and couldn't State do something to fix that. In fact it was totally untrue, but it caused an enormous flap. It was generated by some economist the Defense Department had hired to look at Vietnam and work on it, and who had somehow put Secretary of Defense Laird, who had been a congressman from Wisconsin, up to writing this letter to the Secretary of State.

Q: Did you have any meeting with Kissinger or any dealings with...?

NOOTER: That's interesting. I was going to mention that while I met regularly with this working group, I never did meet Kissinger until about 1972 when President Thieu came for a visit to the United States. The agreement was that he would meet Nixon at San Clemente, and so all of us involved in the Vietnam program went out to San Clemente, Nixon's residence in California, and met with the Vietnamese there. And there I met Kissinger for the first time. I came back and told my wife that it was an irony that I'd been working in the program for two years and had never met Kissinger, and finally met him in the men's room. The meeting at San Clemente was interesting in that I remember Kissinger telling us ahead of time that by all means don't bring up any economic subjects because Nixon hated economic discussions, and the fact of the matter was that all the Vietnamese wanted to talk about was the economy.

The other thing I recall was Nixon talking with us ahead of time, making the rather cynical statement that the substance of the meeting was absolutely of no importance whatsoever, the only thing that was of importance was that Thieu and Nixon be seen as meeting by the press and by the public. And that was his perhaps absolutely correct but cynical view of that meeting.

I haven't given a real flavor of the tenor of those times. It was during that period when the Pentagon papers were leaked, when demonstrations were frequent and volatile and Washington was swamped with demonstrators.

Q: I get the impression that you were a little bit isolated or insulated from this somehow...that you weren't directly attacked or confronted on this.

NOOTER: It was certainly all around us - demonstrators out in front of the State Department and so on. When I first joined AID, the State Department was completely open, there were no guards, anyone could come in off the street and walk the corridors of the State Department. It was only when there were some bomb explosions, maybe a bomb blew something up on the first floor, that they began putting in guards. After that it was quite a different Government, and it was in fact quite a bit more enjoyable previously. I remember somebody saying how surprised John Bullitt was when he heard I accepted the Vietnam job, I guess because I'd been vocal in my opinion that we should pull out of Vietnam well before 1970. But as I say, I felt I could support the withdrawal policy, but I would have done the withdrawal in two years rather instead of four years or five years.

Q: What about the attitude of people within AID toward the Vietnam bureau and that operation?

NOOTER: There was enormous pressure for AID people to go to Vietnam at the time when there was a huge staff there. Many of them didn't want any part of the war, and had joined the Agency because they were interested in economic development. They didn't see Vietnam and certainly not CORDS as economic development but as war support. When I was in Liberia, for example, people would be called to go to Vietnam and they would deeply resent it and try to find ways not to go. AID actually had to have a policy of forcing people to go at the threat of dismissal because the requirement for staff was so huge compared to the amount of people who would be willing to go without being forced.

Now the ones with whom I worked, once they were assigned to it, to my knowledge all did their jobs as earnestly and as conscientiously as they could. There was no holding back or anything like sabotage or anything even approaching it, nor do I remember people complaining about it once they had the assignment. Once they were there and working, they did their job.

But there was a lot of tension and a lot of feeling in the Agency about Supporting Assistance, that this was really more political than economic. I'll talk about that later when I get into other Supporting Assistance programs. My own view, not so much on the Vietnam program but in general, was that if we could get Supporting Assistance, it could be used for economic development. It didn't make any difference to me whether it was called Development Assistance or Supporting Assistance, we should use it as best we could to achieve economic development. And if it was easier or better to get it by calling it a different name, that was all right with me. At the same time I did feel an obligation that it be used in a serious way and not, for example, for buying fake opium.

Q: What, maybe this will come later, did the Vietnam situation have an impact on AID, or its perception of what AID is about in terms of congressional views or support? At that point we had, what 18,000 people on the rolls, and Vietnam was a factor that took a large staffing, and then it started going down as we phased out, but what was the image of AID or was it affected, did you have any sense, by the Vietnam domination of the AID operation?

NOOTER: My view is that the development part of the program went forward pretty much the same, although later, for somewhat other reasons that don't necessarily just relate to Vietnam, certain political programs got protected at the expense of the development program. But I don't think that was so true in the Vietnam years.

Q: There was the Fulbright view, or other view, that economic assistance got us involved in a country and in a situation which we then...and therefore he set up these limits, that only so many countries could have only so much of this and so on?

NOOTER: I guess you're reminding me of a view that became popular. I didn't think it ever had any credibility but the fact that Mr. Fulbright thought so was of some significance.

Q: There was the issue there of having economic assistance and development assistance in the same country, and people were very upset because development assistance, I think, was being used in Vietnam for purposes that were not development. I've forgotten the issue now but...

NOOTER: My view at that time, and I remember saying this in staff meeting, was that 80% of the support for the foreign aid program was for cold war reasons and 20% was for humanitarian reasons. And if you had to rely on the humanitarian alone, if you want to use that term for the purest kind of development assistance, you would get about 20% of the funds you would get if there was a communist threat in the world. I remember believing that at that time and I am inclined to think that it was true.

But now what has been interesting to me, as things have developed now with the breakup of the Soviet Union and so on, is that in a sense aid has become more enconced in our thinking than it was in 1970 because I think in spite of the fact that the aid budgets are being cut, there is a recognition that there is a U.S. role providing foreign assistance even in spite of the absence of a communist threat. And this support is somewhat larger than I would have anticipated 25 years ago. We haven't seen this fully played out yet. We don't know what it will look like in 5 years or 10 years.

What I'm saying is that the support even for the development assistance part of the program was based on political reasons to a fairly large extent anyway. It was just that Supporting Assistance was more directly related to a situation that was politically important than the average situation in the developing world.

Q: Well, we'll come back to that later. I think the specific point, and I can't remember precisely...did you ever meet with Senator Fulbright?

NOOTER: Oh yes, many times.

Q: Was the view that economic assistance particularly was getting us in situations where we had then to get more and more involved, and that therefore certain legislative restrictions or processes were starting to be built in, limiting where we could provide this Supporting Assistance, and you couldn't have it in the same country where there was development assistance and so on. Because there was something at the time trying to use Supporting Assistance in a way that he thought was contrary to what Congress' intent -- I can't remember the issue?

NOOTER: Yes, I do remember that but I don't think that was very broadly accepted except by Fulbright himself. What did happen was that before Vietnam, aid was something that liberals would support and conservatives would be against. And out of Vietnam did come liberal antagonism in some quarters to foreign involvement of almost any kind, including development assistance. For example, you had Fulbright, who had been a person inclined to support foreign aid, who turned against it, and then he became an ally of the conservatives who were willing to cut aid for traditionally conservative reasons. But I don't think the Fulbright view that aid would tend to get the U.S. involved in foreign entanglements was one that was broadly accepted. Certainly it was not by other aid supporters such as Hubert Humphrey or even people like Senators Stennis, Percy, Javits or Aiken.

Q: Well we can come back to that. We've covered a lot. (end of tape.)

NOOTER: In 1974 the Agency reorganized again. The AID management found Supporting Assistance was spreading to different regions in the world, and it was thought of as not very efficient to have this all managed from a single Bureau. I must say that I got a lot of sympathy in the years that I was managing the programs in Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Israel. It was kind of a running joke that one person would be burdened with all of these hot spots. But in fact it was all quite fascinating.

CHARLES HIGGINSON
Junior Foreign Service Inspector
Vietnam (1971)

Mr. Higginson was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard University. After several years in private law practice, he joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His service in Washington and in posts abroad concerned primarily economic matters, notably Fuels & Energy and Food. His foreign posts include Brussels, Algiers, Rome and Luxembourg, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Higginson was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1998.

Q: Tell me about how that came to be in 1971 and what your experience there was.

HIGGINSON: The Department was very worried over equal treatment of all new Foreign Service officers who were automatically sent to Vietnam and wanted to be sure that they were equally treated by promotion panels. Since some of the Foreign Service officers were assigned to very small villages in Vietnam where they had almost no contact with Foreign Service officers, it was thought that it would be a good idea to have the inspectors see every State Department employee in the country and do a very complete personnel report on each one of those. That being decided, it was realized that this was much too much of a job for the usual Foreign Service inspector team. Therefore, they decided to augment it and also to experiment with what was called junior Foreign Service officer, middle grade. So, Dan Phillips and I were selected to be the first guinea pigs for this experiment. We were sent to Vietnam. Luckily, I knew Dan from a prior work relationship. We were already good friends. That made it much easier for the whole assignment.

We went to Saigon in early June. As an economic officer, I was assigned to look at economic cone Foreign Service officers. Then the political officer saw the political officers. First, we worked in the embassy. That way, the leader of the team, Ambassador Sweeney, who was on leave from his ambassadorship in (Inaudible), I believe, could also review our role as neophyte inspectors and make sure that we learned all the ropes correctly. I remember, this was just after the Paris Offensive. I would say militarily, if we won the war in Vietnam, that was when we had most won it. It was really quite a peaceful time, at least in the southern half of the country. Vietnam was divided into four corps. The first corps was the northernmost; I did not ever get to the first corps area. The second corps had some fighting, but was reasonably peaceful. Some inspectors went out through that corps and through the third corps, which included Saigon.

Q: You saw officers.

HIGGINSON: Yes. First, as far as impressions in Saigon, it was very peaceful, quite comfortable, a very large embassy and a mammoth American presence. I'll get back to this later. I also remember clearly that every weekend, we all went over to the political officer's house. He had a swimming pool, and had large water polo games that were a long way from the hardships that one considers when assigned to Vietnam. I also remember, we thought we'd like to go swimming at a beach. Ambassador Sweeney asked permission and it was duly granted. We hadn't realized that it entailed an airplane ride up to the beach area. He had the equivalent rank of a four star general, so we had to have armed jeeps in front and in back of us to go to the beach. One soldier had to stay within 50 feet of Ambassador Sweeney when he was swimming. He would be holding his machine gun right over his head. They also put a machine gun location right at the top of the beach. It wasn't totally peaceful and it seemed excessively unnecessary.

The young American officers that I interviewed in Vietnam were very capable and dedicated. They really put their utmost into trying to bring the Vietnam countryside into 20th century democracy and a stronger economy so that, hopefully, it would exist on its own. I really want to give the highest praise to these individuals. They certainly colored my future thinking on the Vietnam situation. They really had gotten out into the country. I remember a lunch with one farmer and the local CORDS program village representative. He had just put his whole life into the Vietnamese. The whole village liked him and worked with him. The farmer expressed his gratification. It was also brought home to me quite clearly that there was quite a way to go when, as we were leaving, the farmer offered me his daughter.

Later on, I was asked by the deputy ambassador (We had two ambassadors in Saigon at that time.) to stay on in the Economic Section. I graciously declined. From my point of view, there was no chance that the Vietnam experiment was going to work. It worked fine as long as we were bringing in just billions of dollars into the country's economy. As long as that could continue, I expect it's part of Vietnam (and as far as Vietnam is concerned, I was sure it could continue), but I also didn't feel that we could continue to put that sort of money in there and assume that the money started to be reduced. I saw the economy in Vietnam going to shreds very rapidly. I didn't want to have anything to do with it. Plus, of course, you couldn't take your family out there. It was less than attractive to me.

Q: Who was the Deputy Ambassador at that time?

HIGGINSON: Ambassador Sam Berger. He was an elevated DCM. But I believe he was also confirmed by the Senate. So, it really was an ambassadorship.

Q: And the number one ambassador was Bunker?

HIGGINSON: Yes.

Q: The focus of your activity there as an inspector was on the junior Foreign Service officers, evaluating their work, rather than a program that they were doing. Or were you involved in both?

HIGGINSON: It depends on what you call the "program." We were involved in the program of the operation of the embassy as a Foreign Service mission. We were specifically told not to involve ourselves in whether we should be in Vietnam, or we shouldn't be, or we were doing everything wrong as far as the Pacification Program was concerned. That we were told not to be involved in. I believe Ambassador Sweeney treated that in his cover memorandum to our report. Basically, our report was to look at the operations of the embassy and, more specifically, Dan and I were meant to make sure that each junior Foreign Service officer got a thorough efficiency report out of the inspectors.

Q: I assume there were some junior Foreign Service officers in the embassy in Saigon as well as the many that were out in the provinces.

HIGGINSON: About half would have been in Saigon itself or over at the CORDS headquarters. Less than half the embassy was scattered around Saigon itself.

Q: And you evaluated them.

HIGGINSON: Yes. One of the things I had to do was the communications. I remember wondering about some of the mail expenses. But again, that was too close to the heart of the whole matter and I suggested that that issue not be raised further.

Q: When you say "communications," you mean the communications process within the embassy?

HIGGINSON: Yes, the airplane flights and things like that, which were, in my opinion, a little excessive.

Q: How long did this last?

HIGGINSON: This lasted three months. It was a chance of a lifetime. I was and still am very pleased to have been out there, to have seen what the U.S. tried to do out there. I came back some years later during the difficulties over Vietnam and the demonstrations in Washington and I agreed to be a monitor for the Department of Justice to make sure there wasn't police brutality in Washington. Therefore, I was down in the center of the demonstrations. I and a lawyer with the Department of State, Jerry Carter, kept together and watched and were extremely impressed by the care that the police took in not being too aggressive in controlling the crowd. Then just towards the end when everything got tear-gassed, the crowd started throwing rocks at the Department of Justice and the organizer of the march with extreme bravery stood up on the wall between the building and the rocks to try to keep down the rock throwing. One person next to me picked up a rock and fired it at the building. I stopped him and asked, "What did you do that for?" He said, "Look, I took a bus for three hours to get here for some action. There's nothing going on and I want to see trouble." He couldn't have cared less about Vietnam and what we were trying to do there.

I just mentioned that because of the conflict in my mind and the dedication of the U.S. team in Saigon trying to really rebuild this country and then back home where the whole issue was being lost, the real total lack of interest in the Vietnam issue per se, but one of really youth demonstrating and trying to assert itself against the government.

Q: But you also said that you really wondered whether South Vietnam was viable, whether it could really work without the billions of dollars in money, commitment, time, military strength that the United States was pouring in there. So, you really didn't see that it was a winnable situation when you were there that summer.

HIGGINSON: I'm not talking about a military point of view. I really was not involved in the military aspects. They simply provided helicopter flights all over. I just thought that the economy was so dependent upon U.S. aid that there was no way that we could sort of extract yourself without the South Vietnamese economy failing, which I assumed would bring on a greater communist progress in taking over the country.

Q: Let me ask you to sum up a little bit more about your experience as a mid-level officer as an inspector for three months. In 1972, I was sent on a similar program to Copenhagen. So, the situation was very different. I thought my main reason for being there was not so much to evaluate junior officers, but simply to add some more manpower to a small inspection team to make it possible to finish their work there in a reasonable period of time. I felt that it was very useful for me to sort of look at a different embassy that I had been serving in in terms of all its dimensions. I thought that was an experience that, even though I never was an inspector again, was very useful. I don't know if you felt similarly or whether you were so specialized in terms of the great numbers of junior officers that that had to be your primary focus.

HIGGINSON: Certainly from a time point of view, writing up all those efficiency reports took up a lot of time and attention. But I think I commented earlier that an aide to an Assistant Secretary was a wonderful way of seeing the Department and training for junior middle grade officers. I thought the junior inspector program from that point of view was very successful. We had a meeting every morning, all of the inspectors, and you saw their view of what they were worried about and what they had seen at the embassy. It's a wonderful opportunity. The two areas that I was responsible for, communications and the Economic Bureau, were certainly of interest to me. I am a special case in that I had never been in a real embassy. The Mission to the European Communities does not have a communications section, an administrative section, a consular section. It is purely a political and economic division stuck off in a separate building which the embassy completely serviced. So, it was especially good for me to see the service end of foreign service.

LILLIAN E. OSTERMEIER
Secretary to Ambassador Bruce
Paris (1971)

Ms. Ostermeier was born and raised in Illinois. After graduating from Business College she worked as secretary and administrative assistant with a number of organizations in the private and government sectors. From 1956 to 1969, she was assigned to the United States Embassy in London as Secretary, first to Minister and Deputy Chief of Mission Walworth Barbour and subsequently to Ambassadors John Jay Whitney and David Bruce. Her final overseas assignment was as Secretary to Ambassador Adolph Schmidt in Ottawa. Ms. Ostermeier was interviewed in 2002 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Oh. Well, you went with Ambassador Bruce to the peace talks. What were the peace talks?

OSTERMEIER: They were going to try to settle the war in Vietnam. I think we had one previous – whatever his title was. It was quite an international announcement when Bruce was going to go to the peace talks. I didn't participate. I didn't really know what was going on. He would go. He was more or less a figurehead, because the embassy had its speakers, the representatives. Because of his prestige, he was a very important person.

Q: Were things going to his office that you were dealing with, concerning this?

OSTERMEIER: Very little, very little. He spent a lot of time on some personal things. These were personal diaries he brought up to date, and what have you. But, he would go to the meetings. What was his name? The Foreign Service office, who is now dead, was the principal representative. They would go together. But Bruce was really the name. I'll think of the man's name.

Q: Did you feel that Bruce was feeling a little left out, or beginning to get bored with the whole diplomatic business, or not?

OSTERMEIER: I don't know. He did something for UNESCO. What does UNESCO stand for?

Q: Social organization; United Nations Social and Economic Organization, I think.

OSTERMEIER: He had some dealings with that in Washington. Then, he had a great tragedy in his life. His daughter was killed.

Q: Yes, terrible.

OSTERMEIER: I think he was probably glad to get back into a more active life, but he only stayed a year. He knew he was only going to be there a year when he took the job.

CRAIG DUNKERLEY
Consular/Political Military Officer
Da Nang (1971-1973)

Ambassador Dunkerley was born in Wisconsin and raised in several states in the Midwest. He was educated at Amherst College and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. In 1970 he entered the Foreign Service, serving abroad in Da Nang, Tokyo, Yokohama, Fukuoka, Brussels and Vienna. During his career Mr. Dunkerley became a specialist in NATO and International Security, Disarmament and Arms Control matters, and served as Special Envoy for Conventional Forces in Europe from 1997 to 2001 with the personal rank of Ambassador. He also had several tours of duty at the State Department in Washington, DC. Ambassador Dunkerley was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: When did you come in?

DUNKERLEY: I came in very late in 1970, actually coming on duty in the A-100 course at FSI, the Foreign Service Institute, in the first few days of a cold January.

Q: How did you find your basic officer course?

DUNKERLEY: Obviously quite different than it is now. It seemed much more abbreviated. There was, at that time, very much a focus on practical preparations for the basics of traditional embassy jobs, how to draft a political memcon or economic reporting cable, how to prepare a diplomatic note. It all seemed geared in that direction. Of course, at that time most people were being shipped out to consular duties as their initial assignment. After initially being slotted for a consular job in Curacao, I was invited to apply, and ended up being paneled instead for a posting with the Consulate in Da Nang, Vietnam. I did six to seven months of Vietnamese language training in Washington and arrived in country in November of 1971.

Q: Back to the A100 course, what was the group like in terms of women, men, minorities, backgrounds etc.?

DUNKERLEY: All of the above. As I think back, there was a fair amount of diversity and mix among my classmates. Good folk. It certainly wasn't exclusively white males from Eastern schools. But I am not going to be particularly memorable in coming up with any special insight from that far back. Although I do recall now one of the questions put to me at my oral exam: How did I think world history might have been different had the horse been indigenous to America instead of Asia. I've forgotten how I ever got through the answer.

Q: How did you find Vietnamese?

DUNKERLEY: As a tonal language, it was difficult.

This was a period in which the American presence in Vietnam was shifting since most of our military forces in country were in the process of being drawn down. As a consequence there was an increased emphasis in my Vietnamese training towards the economic development assistance work and political/military functions that would be performed by the U.S. people going out there for CORDS - civil operations and rural development support. That is to say, the emphasis related to work out in the countryside in the provinces and hamlets and such like that. I was in a slightly different situation by being assigned neither to that sort of work nor to our quite large Embassy in Saigon, but rather to the then small Consulate in Da Nang, the second largest city in Vietnam and located in regional Central Vietnam with its own politics and problems.

I was there at the Consulate for about 18 to 20 months. The first half of my tour I was assigned primarily consular duties, but those increasingly became related to political/military reporting. That turned out to be what I was doing full time for the latter half of my tour there.

Q: When were you there?

DUNKERLEY: From late 1971 and through all of 1972 – which was the year of the Easter Offensive by the North Vietnamese Army when they came through Quang Tri City, just to the north. I was there through the first six months of 1973, following the Paris Cease-Fire Accords. During that latter time, I was involved in following local developments and the international monitoring group that was observing adherence to the Cease Fire Accords.

Q: Who was consul in Da Nang when you were there?

DUNKERLEY: Frederick Z. Brown was the Consul. Immediately following the Paris Cease-Fire Accords, when the post was upgraded and enlarged to become a Consulate General, he became Consul General. He was a very able, energetic individual. He was an excellent first boss.

Q: He has been teaching at George Mason.

DUNKERLEY: Yes, I believe so.

Q: Let's talk a bit about vice consular duties, what were you doing?

DUNKERLEY: Obviously, since this was still a war zone, consular duties were devoted to a fair amount of American Services-related work. We had an ebb and flow of American contractors and merchant mariners who would have a variety of problems. We also did a lot of adoptions of local orphans and the like – and I recall a fair number fiancée visas for U.S. servicemen. But, given that this was a region amidst war-time conditions – a highly artificial situation, I didn't face the full panoply of consular duties and visa work that you might usually have on a first tour assignment at a big embassy.

Increasingly, however, I was taken up with political/military reporting on developments throughout the region. As I said, this was a time when the American military presence was being drawn down significantly. It was still present with specific units and in smaller numbers, but the exercise of American military power by this time was increasingly by air. At the same time, the South Vietnamese were seeking, with our considerable assistance, to develop their own military strength, in both regular units of ARVN - Army of the Republic of Vietnam - and those on the local level. But also on the political front, the Thieu regime in Saigon was attempting to build up new political parties, new political structures to support the country as the Americans pulled out.

All of this was tested severely in 1972 – after I had been in country a few months – during the major Easter Offensive launched by the North Vietnamese Army. They struck quite heavily in the part of Vietnam that I was in – that part of Central Vietnam which was known as I CORPS or Military Region One (MR-1). They succeeded in taking Quang Tri City in that spring, routing the ARVN Third Division that had been defending that town just to the south of the DMZ; they subsequently came quite close to seizing Hue City on the other side of the Hai Van Pass just to the north of the city of Da Nang. To the south of Da Nang, there was increased activity and attacks in neighboring Quang Nam and Quang Ngai provinces as well. There was at times intense fighting, air strikes, and massive refugee flows throughout these parts of the region. During this time the city of Da Nang itself and the military facilities around it were rocketed regularly.

(As I think back now on all of this, I can remember how some of those NVA rockets would sound coming in sometimes at night – oddly enough, it was like both sizzling bacon and fast sled runners on crusty snow when shooting overhead and then a loud dull-sharp crack as they'd hit a few blocks away).

So this was a six to seven month period during which the responsibility of the Consulate – the Consul General and the two Vice Consuls – was to provide a steady stream of reporting and analysis, from a Foreign Service perspective, on the efforts of the South Vietnamese regime, both militarily and politically, first of all to avoid collapse, secondly to regain lost ground and thirdly, to lay more viable foundations for the longer term. It was all a very close-run thing.

Q: What were you doing?

DUNKERLEY: We did a lot of reporting out of the city of Da Nang proper. Mike Owens, the other Vice Consul, and I would periodically go out into the provinces, visiting all the prefectural capitals in MR-1 like Quang Ngai City or Hue. We would meet with South Vietnamese figures: government officials and local politicians, local clergy, local businessmen, teachers and the like. We were seeking to gauge a sense of popular mood, track the effectiveness of local South Vietnamese government entities, determine if possible directions that some of these efforts might be going, and so forth. Though we reported how ups and downs in the military situation could have a decisive effect on all of this, we were not concentrating on straight military reporting because of course that was the province of the remaining U.S. military advisors with the ARVN units.

Q: On the non-military side, what was your impression of the South Vietnamese government, how it was reacting? Specifically, what did you think of the officials?

DUNKERLEY: It was a very mixed picture. When it came to the lessons learned as a young Foreign Service officer – from my months in Vietnam in watching the South Vietnamese government and army respond to the great military crisis of 1972 and then the first six months following the Paris Cease Fire Accord in 1973 – I came away with several disparate impressions. For example, I developed a much greater sensitivity to the tremendous complexity and ambiguity inherent in such a situation. It was not something that lent itself to straightforward black-white interpretations. War and peace in central Vietnam in '72-' 73 did not lend itself to overly-simplistic interpretations, let alone easy predictions – either of the sort that one would hear in the era of campus protest within the United States or, conversely, in periodic official assertions as to the strength and effectiveness of the Saigon regime.

This was probably not surprising given the nature of Vietnamese politics and society of the time. There seemed few clear-cut good guys-bad guys in that sort of situation, as evidenced on a daily basis in my working contact with a variety of the local South Vietnamese officials, politicians and average citizens. Some seemed dedicated and effective, others less so, circumstances would change, and initial impressions could be misleading.

The other thought that I took away from my experience in Vietnam was probably a greater appreciation for the pressures within government service (often indirect and implicit) that shape the performance of U.S. organizations and their reporting and analysis in such situations.

At the time, I thought this might be particularly true on the military side; there was such an investment on our part in ARVN and in the efforts in the various prefectures in MR 1, you can't help but think that that provided some incentive to accentuate the positive.

Q: What was your impression of the performance of the military up around Quang Tri?

DUNKERLEY: Again my impression was consistent with the theme: there was no simple answer. There was no monochromatic characterization that one could give of the South Vietnamese military performance that year. In some cases, there was great confusion and incompetence leading to very serious military setbacks, particularly initially. Some individual South Vietnamese military leaders and units failed. On the other hand, there were also a number of performances by senior South Vietnamese officers and their troops that were quite courageous, skillful, heroic, and indeed, in the end, they did succeed in 1972 against daunting odds.

Q: Was the Northern Army forced out of Quang Tri?

DUNKERLEY: Eventually out of Quang Tri City. I think some elements were still to be found the north of the Quang Tri River and below the DMZ. There were still significant portions of central Vietnam that were under serious North Vietnamese army control when, of course, the Paris Cease Fire Accords were signed in early 1973, ostensibly freezing the situation on the ground in place...

Q: Looking at the civilian side of things, what was the role of the Buddhists at that time?

DUNKERLEY: The A Quang Buddhists had been a major factor in political life in that part of central Vietnam in earlier years. We spent a great deal of time at the Consulate trying to understand their positions and to explain ours to them. So there was at the time some interaction with them.

Q: What was your impression?

DUNKERLEY: As the details were so long ago, I'll have to pass on that.

Q: How about working with CORDS?

DUNKERLEY: CORDS was still in place in 1972, but with the Cease Fire Agreement early the following year, its formal structure and much of its activities in MR-1 were subsumed into what then became the new Da Nang Consulate General and its operations. I recall that a number of the CORDS people still engaged in support and development activities in the countryside were then folded into a rather extensive reporting operation throughout the provinces following the Paris Accords – part of an immediate push to expand reporting. Additionally a number of FSO's with prior Vietnam experience were called back on temporary duty at the new Da Nang Consulate General. Similar efforts were made in other parts of Vietnam, the only difference being that there they were actually establishing new consulates. In our case of Da Nang, we were already in place.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

DUNKERLEY: I was there under Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker towards the end of his tour. I left in 1973 so I was not there when he was followed by Graham Martin.

Q: In your reporting, did you find either through Fred Brown or through the embassy that there were constraints on your reporting?

DUNKERLEY: No. I personally did not. For his part, Fred encouraged initiative in reporting.

Q: Did you coordinate early on with the CORDS people and the ones out in the field?

DUNKERLEY: There was always a fair amount of discussion with our CORDS counterparts. Of course, we were very eager to gain their insights. But prior to the consolidation in early '73, we both had separate reporting channels.

Q: How about our military presence at that time? We were withdrawing our troops as part of the "Vietnamization" program at that time. Were there military observers left?

DUNKERLEY: American military advisors were assigned to all the ARVN divisions and major units in MR-1. Also at the prefectural or provincial level, there continued to be significant U.S. military assistance – and advisors – to the local Regional and Popular Forces as part of the overall CORDS effort.

Q: Were you getting much feedback?

DUNKERLEY: A certain amount, but it varied in volume and quality.

Following Vietnam, I came back to the States and did a brief stint in the East Asia bureau.

DOUGLAS WATSON

Province Development Officer, CORDS
Saigon (1971-1973)

Mr. Watson was born and raised in the Washington, D.C. area and was educated at California State University at Los Angeles and Harvard University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1966, he served in a variety of posts throughout the world, including Cairo, Athens, Madrid, Saigon, Quito, Islamabad and Port au-Prince, Haiti, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission. He also served in the State Department in Washington, on Capitol Hill in the Pearson program and was a member of the US delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in 1991. Mr. Watson was interviewed by Thomas J. Dunnigan in 2000.

Q: When that pleasant tour ended, you went to Vietnam. Tell me how that came about.

WATSON: Well, I went to Vietnam for six principle reasons: to see if I could make any sense out of what our policy was by being on the ground; to make a contribution to our efforts there; to work with the U.S. military; to work for another agency (I was assigned to AID with what was called CORDS (Civil Operations and Rural Development Support); to get promoted faster (I thought that would be such an avenue); and to make more money (there was a pay differential).

So, from Spain I returned to Washington with the family. We got somewhat settled in to an Arlington apartment. I had training, about five or six weeks, only general orientation. Included in that training were 19 hours of early morning Vietnamese language training. That was the total, which didn't do you a hell of a lot of good, maybe enough to get you from the airport to the embassy.

Q: What did your wife think about your going to Vietnam?

WATSON: That is interesting, a very good question. I think that I was very inconsiderate of my wife and my daughters and their own needs. I was a fairly controlling spouse and father, without here getting into murky psychological issues. Since my "career", I believed, was ultimately for all of us, then if I got promoted and increased our earnings that was all to the good. Well, what about them? Where was the father? Where was the husband? So, my wife, I think, were she here during this interview, would say, "I went along with him. Those were things that he needed to do." But during my career she played "second fiddle" in so many respects. Of course, not until much later in our lives was I fully appreciative (and probably still am not fully appreciative) of everything that she did as a parent and, of course, as a spouse, and how much she gave to the family unit, how much she nurtured us all. As a matter of fact, once I was in Vietnam, and she ran the home and our daughters I could see she had done it beautifully, when I first came back on my first brief leave. Vietnam was an 18 month tour. You had to serve 90 days in country before you could come home on R&R, and then you had to serve six months before you could leave for your second stateside R&R. 90 days to the day I took my first R&R, six months to the day I took my second R&R. The first time I came back after having arrived in Vietnam in late September, if I'm not mistaken, and I was able to leave there perhaps on December 21st or so to come back to the U.S., at Christmas time. My wife had done a magnificent job with everything. Shortly after my arrival home, four or five days into it, I said I thought something ought to be a certain way.

She sat me down and said, “Look, I’ve been doing this now for three months. Can we reach an understanding?” This was a real eye opener for me on how unappreciative I had been in our relationship.

So, on initial arrival in Vietnam, I arrived and was processed throughout the Embassy and the AID folks. Vietnam was simply different. I stayed there as short a period as possible, 18 months to the day. I was assigned to a small province, Sadec, in the delta just north of Can Tho, which was our IV Corps a regional headquarters. I was one of three Sadec Province Development Officers (PDOs). I reported to the Deputy Province Senior Advisor, a Lt. Colonel, U.S. Army. He reported to the Province Senior Advisor, a civilian.

Q: A chain of command with civilian and military both?

WATSON: It was both. The composition of the MAC-V CORDS teams in any province (and I can’t even remember how many provinces there were, something like 17 or so), the bulk were mostly military. In Sadec, we had a small U.S. advisor military presence, maybe 30 or 40, but there was an attendant U.S. military assistance group also assigned there with whom we had a close working relationship. But it was not unusual to have a province senior advisor be a U.S. Army colonel and the deputy be a civilian or the reverse, where the civilian would be the senior advisor. After three months in Sadec, Wilbur Wilson, who was then the MAC-V CORDS main man, flew into Sadec one day and said, “You’re just the man we need to be the Deputy Province Senior Advisor in the adjacent province, Vinh Long.” (Frankly, I think I was a just warm body to fill a billet, not that I had yet demonstrated any particular talents.) This was a bigger province with a much larger team and a much larger U.S. military component, about 200 U.S. personnel total, and perhaps 30 Vietnamese employees.

So, I went to Vinh Long as the Deputy Province Senior Advisor (DPSA) to a U.S. Army colonel, Wally Veaudry, a fine officer. Consequent to that position, I rated four U.S. majors who ran district operations (District Senior Advisors they were called) and each of the U.S. Army majors and captains running a particular function - logistics and supplies, personnel, operations, intelligence, public affairs. I also supervised and rated one Lt. Colonel who largely oversaw administrative functions, and the NCO Sergeant Major. I recall that in Sadec, the previous province, I also, as a Province Development Officer who had some responsibilities for health matters, rated an Air Force captain who had medical advisor responsibilities. When I rated him after about ten weeks together, towards the end of my three month tour, I gave him a 65 on a scale of 100. The Lt. Colonel brought me in and asked me if I had any idea what I had just done. I said, “Yes, that is about where he fits, C-minus, D-plus.” He said, “You’ve just ended his career. He’s got to be in the nineties or he’s out.” I said, “Really?” and jacked his rating up (what did I know?) to some point where it was more acceptable to the reviewing officer, the Lt. Colonel. And in fact this young officer wasn’t in fact that bad. Then I found in rating the Majors in Vinh Long province, I learned from the lieutenant colonel who worked for me, overseeing most administrative issues, , and from the colonel for whom I worked, that really for a major, evaluations pretty well needed to start at about 92 and work their way up, anything else was death. So, advised, I took that seriously. One of the officers I rated, Major John E. Miller, a wonderful young officer, later became a four star general, retiring about 2000. There were a number of good officers. Certainly, the opportunity that I had sought to work with the military was certainly fulfilled. I learned a great deal. That served me well later on when I had to work a lot with Marines, military attachés and advisors, the intelligence community, and then as a sometime political advisor during the Haiti intervention, and in the Jamaica based interdiction of Haitian “boat people.”

Also, working with AID was interesting. Many AID employees, and probably a lot of us with State, too, were not in Vietnam because we particularly cared about the future of Vietnam. Vietnam was where the jobs were. The money was good. Oh, the waste of resources was evident, on the civilian side and the military side. So, I had a chance to work with AID and to see some nominal successes, and to have insights into the corruption on the part of the South Vietnamese, the military largely, and how things would disappear (rice, cement, bricks, rebar). We did make some differences in the quality of life. It was wonderful working with young Vietnamese in education, the teachers, the doctors, the nurses. To witness death from military attacks, the death of Vietnamese, the wounding of Americans, of being fired at, although it might just have been a couple of sniper rounds. I never felt I was really in great danger, although we all were to some degree. It was interesting to find myself initially acting as though I knew what it was that I was doing. I certainly didn't. I was flying by the seat of my pants in that whole area of working with the military, working with AID, and in the development area when I first arrived. When Frank Taylor, who had been the economic Counselor in Madrid, and whom I knew just slightly, came over as a part of the IG inspection staff to do an inspection and to evaluate my performance after I had been on the ground in Vinh Long for about two months, he was dazzled. He thought I knew what I was doing. It's not that I fooled him. It's just that so much of our work was Greek to him. The fact that I knew anything at all was for him probably impressive.

Q: As an FSO, what was our relation, if any, with the embassy?

WATSON: None, and all the better for it in my view. I was delighted not to have any relationship with the embassy. I visited it a couple of times. I had the chance to go to Saigon with our province chief, attend a dinner with him hosted by one of the DCM's and at which in attendance was Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker. Bunker was such a delightful man. From everything that I was able to ferret out, he certainly seemed competent. His senior DCM (there were a couple of minister counselors there) was a fellow by the name of Josiah Bennett, a very patrician gentleman with considerable Asian area experience. I was very impressed with him as well. I had the chance to meet as well Jackie Bong, a Vietnamese woman who had been married to a Vietnamese who was assassinated there, if I recall correctly. She later married a Foreign Service Officer, Lacy Wright. She too was at this dinner.

As things wound down in early 1975, I couldn't wait to leave in March, 1975, at my 18 month anniversary. But George Jacobsen who headed MAC-V CORDS out of Saigon, in his wisdom thought that what I ought to do was go down to Can Tho and extend my tour and be the political reporting coordinator. We were establishing these regional offices then as things wound down. His suggestion was absurd. I didn't even speak Vietnamese. How was I going to coordinate these reports? But I was able to go there and help a bit until I finally left the country. I spent my last couple of months in Can Tho working with several outstanding officers - Frank Wisner, Ken Quinn, Lacy Wright, Tom Barnes, a number of other capable officers. And I did get achieve from that Vietnam assignment the things I had sought: experience with another agency, experience with the military, a promotion, higher earnings (that pay differential having helped us substantially). But I never found sufficient reasons for us to be in Vietnam at that level of commitment.

Prior to the Vietnam tour, I remember as a part of our Vietnam orientation, our visit to the Central Intelligence Agency for briefings. Robert Komer briefed us on how important our role was in Vietnam. I asked essentially “why were we (the USG) there?” and he came up with some “democratic” pap, which most of us seemed to swallow whole, as I judged it. It was not a satisfying answer. I recall my “tour end” evaluation paper, in which I used an old Jimmy Durante quote “Did you ever have the feeling that you wanted to go and yet you had the feeling that you wanted to stay?” That was Vietnam for me. I had scarcely a clue during my 18 months as to how Vietnam really functioned. I wasn’t at a level like Ken Quinn or Tom Barnes, who understood much of the dynamics and the politics. I just muddled through.

Q: Were you ever in any personal danger from the attacks or the snipers out there?

WATSON: Not really. I recall going down a canal in a small boat and there were rifle shots. You heard the rifles and you heard the whizzing of rounds going through the grass. Then we were shot at aboard helicopters. I don’t believe the ships I was in ever took any rounds, and I traveled in helicopters frequently. It wasn’t necessary that I be on combat missions in most instances, but I felt I needed to go on some missions to learn, to be informed, to understand more fully what our military colleagues were doing, not just to rely on operations and intelligence reports and briefings. But it was also as much for the experience as it was to show my military colleagues, who were regularly in harm’s way, that I, too, was willing to take some risks. I thought that was critically important, especially in my relationships with the U.S. military officers. There were some positive relationships, some negative relationships. I had to brace a few military fellows. My “bracing” efforts were applauded by my supervising colonel. I learned a great deal about the military, particularly about the Army. I developed a substantial respect that I had not theretofore had. I think that knowledge and respect served me well over my career.

Q: Would you say that CORDS was a suitable program for an FSO?

WATSON: Absolutely. We had some competent officers doing our reporting, who often had access to a lot more information than embassy folks. To what extent that field information really fed into embassy reporting, or to what extent it fed into Agency reporting both in the field and in Saigon, I don’t know. My view increasingly was that our reporting wasn’t going to make a hell of a lot of difference anyway. Political policy had been decided in Washington and we were proceeding full bore. Now, 25 plus years later, with McNamara having revealed that everything was not always quite as crystal clear as had been pretended, my guess is that of those Foreign Service Officers who remained in the Foreign Service, who made a career of the Foreign Service, the Vietnam CORDS experience probably keenly broadened their understanding of the political process, and the key roles of the intelligence community and of the military. Vietnam for me was a significant experience and a very good one.

Q: You mentioned Ambassador Bunker. Did he ever visit your area while you were there?

WATSON: No, he didn't. I don't know how much field visiting he, in fact, did. I don't recall visits by embassy personnel. I remember Dick Holbrooke and other key Congressional staffers visiting us. Dick Moose, I think, also paid a visit.

Q: Your tour in Vietnam was certainly an interesting one, if perhaps a watershed in your career in some ways. When that was over, you finally got to Latin America.

WATSON: I did indeed, at long last.

ROBERT A. LINCOLN
Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1971-1973)

Robert A. Lincoln was born in New York in 1921. He joined USIA in 1955 and served in Syria, Ceylon, Turkey, Vietnam, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed in 1989 by G. Lewis Schmidt.

Q: You went out to Vietnam in 1969?

LINCOLN: I went out briefly on orientation in 1967 --

Q: I mean to be the head of JUSPAO.

LINCOLN: 1971.

Q: 1971.

LINCOLN: Yes, the middle of 1971. I had stayed in Turkey through from 1966 to the middle of 1971, five and a half years.

The main reason I was ever concerned with Vietnam was that I was one of the PAOs from different countries who went out on the special USIA-sponsored orientation trip. We went around the country and I recall particularly a couple of things. An officer of USIS by the Cambodian border said that if Disney had wanted to start a war, this would have been it.

Then there was another American officer -- these are quotes, and fairly common ones apparently -- who said that what we should do now is stop everything, build a wall around the country and charge admission. In one year we'll get all our money back. That was the way they felt.

When I went there on orientation in 1967, as I said, I filed a number of reports and made oral comments to the effect that I am not sure what we are doing is at all right. Again, you didn't question what the military was doing, or what the U.S. as a whole was doing, because even though if you did question it that wasn't really our USIS business.

We could speak specifically about the informational/cultural operation. I didn't think that we should be in the position of operating for a foreign government anywhere, but that is what had happened in Vietnam.

Shakespeare was one of the few men who listened to all of this. Here you have a man who was looked on as being very anticommunist, very right of center, and who therefore should have approved of everything in Vietnam. He had strong reservations about it. He was among those influential with Nixon as president in saying that we should find a way to get out. It would take time, you didn't do it overnight, you didn't follow recommendations of the New Yorker or the demonstrators or what have you, but nevertheless whoever became president should find a way.

Thus, in the middle of 1971 I went there to Vietnam as PAO.

Q: Had the old Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office organization been already abandoned, or was it still in existence?

LINCOLN: It was still in existence. I went out with flat-out instructions from Frank Shakespeare, first, to find a way of getting rid of the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office; second, to get all of the military out from under USIS control (we had a whole of a lot of military positions) and to change JUSPAO back to a normal USIS and to cut that back in terms of personnel and budget. Those were strict instructions.

Lionel Mosley was still USIA director of personnel and was marvelously cooperative. A couple of things happened when I first went out to Vietnam on assignment as PAO in 1971.

For one thing, the first full day I was there, USIS people literally -- that is, Americans -- lined up at the door wanting to come back to the U.S., saying their jobs were worthless and they shouldn't be there. One of them was Wilson Dizard, head of research and operations. Wilson thought we could immediately eliminate two of the American positions in his operation here in Saigon and Frank Scotton, could take over.

On the military side I found 102 American military positions in the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office.

Q: Wanting to leave, I presume?

LINCOLN: The way to get eliminate them was fairly simple. Whenever one was vacated you just didn't get around to refilling it, and pretty soon the Army took the position back.

Q: Military officers rotated about every thirteen months, I recall.

LINCOLN: It was fourteen, as I recall it. Within a year, there was hardly a military position left in JUSPAO. Where we had fifty-some civilian positions, we cut the figure back to thirty-some. Within a year and a half we had changed JUSPAO over to a regular USIS operation and thus, had Vietnamized the old JUSPAO.

The number of local positions we had was never known, really. When I was assigned to Vietnam, there were five hundred and some on the payroll. A lot of those were tombstones, people who didn't exist but the paycheck was being collected, et cetera, et cetera.

We cut that back in no time at all -- oh, I don't know, let's say to a hundred or something like that.

Now, in March of 1972, there was the immense invasion from the north called the Easter Invasion. This was one of the few which the North Vietnamese lost their shirts on, much to everybody's surprise.

One of the things that we did was a tremendous amount of VOA broadcasting. We were able to broadcast on medium wave eighteen hours a day. Ken Giddens was then the director of VOA and Frank Shakespeare, of course, was the director of USIA, and they coordinated but fast. Within just a matter of weeks we were broadcasting the eighteen hours daily to the north.

We had a number of hours per day, I couldn't tell you how many, coming off the IOU kW USIA transmitter in the Philippines, which was then the largest in the world. It broadcast over water to Hanoi. The result is that the signal boomed into Hanoi.

One really important listener in Hanoi was the British consul general. He had to come down and report to Saigon fairly often.

Q: He was operating -- he was in Hanoi?

LINCOLN: Hanoi, yes, the British consul general in Hanoi. He came down to Saigon once every month or two, to report in because, after all, his ambassador was in Saigon. We could then find out how the VOA signal was coming in.

Last summer, I wrote an article for the USIA Alumni Association News about the Easter Invasion, and I'd like to quote from it. "Whether you supported or opposed the creation and doings of JUSPAO, it is hard to question the effectiveness of a unified information-cultural operation when it came to the 1972 Easter invasion from the North..."

"The 1972 Easter Invasion...was supposed to be a blitzkrieg from north and west to Saigon. In a matter of hours after it started, all elements of USIS were in action. They would not have been if run by a variety of separate official and unofficial departments and institutes in Washington.

"Officers involved came from varied backgrounds but were responsive to one Agency, USIA. Policy Officer Frank Scotton, for example, once a public affairs trainee, found his talents in demand in radio.

"CAO Bill DeMyer, whose final responsibilities concerned the largest Binational Center in existence, saw to it that library distribution points and English language classes had the latest and most accurate information about the fighting.

"Research Officer Bill Gausmann, who had been a USIA labor information specialist, kept close track of the misinformation being supplied in and by Hanoi -- and Hanoi's reaction to information from USIS. The information section worked around the clock supplying material locally and to IPS in Washington. All obviously were coordinated closely with the government of the Republic of Vietnam.

"Did the broadcasts work? In a captured diary, one North Vietnamese officer recorded his reliance on VOA, not Radio Hanoi. The latter claimed his troops were in Hue in the northern part of South Vietnam. VOA gave what the officer knew were facts: the troops never reached Hue -- he was with them...

"Thirteen years later, a communist-oriented history, in emphasizing South Vietnam's military problems, said the Easter invasion nonetheless showed that the North Vietnamese army had not yet learned enough. On the spot and at the time, USIA in 1972 was equipped to give a far better account."

I would guess that about then, the early 1970s, was a glory period of USIA. You were PAO over in Thailand, I know. Who was PAO in Japan at that time?

Q: Wasn't Ned Roberts PAO in Japan then?

LINCOLN: No, Al.

Q: Al Carter.

LINCOLN: Yes. I liked Ned much, much better, I might add.

Q: Al was a big joke among the Japanese.

LINCOLN: He was the one who installed the program under which, let me see, they kept records on everybody and -- it was like the old and discarded Program Planning Budgeting System, which recognized only figures at the expense of human factors.

Q: Also, you had a clean desk. Every time the branch post knew Al was coming they would clean off the desks and put it all in locked files.

LINCOLN: Marvelous.

Q: They would have just a couple of papers on the desk all the time that they were working on. As soon as he left, they took all of the stuff out of the files.

LINCOLN: I hadn't heard that part of it. That is a lovely story.

Q: Well, what else do you have to say about Vietnam, now that we have had this diversion?

LINCOLN: I think Vietnam is a good illustration of the fact that the United States should never stay so deeply involved in a war when we don't have domestic support.

It is interesting to me that it was a Republican administration which finally decided to make the changes.

The second thing that it illustrated was that we shouldn't rely on our military to try to convince a people of the value of democratic governments or democratic ways of doing things.

It is not part of the military background, just as I don't know a darned thing canons, I don't expect them to know something about a parliament, but that is what was happening out there.

The military were, in fact, running almost everything in Vietnam and that was one of the reasons for getting rid of the joint U.S. Public Affairs Office. Too many people felt that by having a joint U.S. Public Affairs Office we therefore were bringing the military under our control, at least that aspect. We weren't -- just the opposite.

Q: Very often the military was the one that was in control of the regional area.

LINCOLN: I couldn't agree more. The military people we would have in individual areas would often be the senior people and the chief people and the U.S. civilian just another guy. We couldn't do anything.

There are all kinds of illustrations of this. I remember one of our USIS Officers, for example, whose name I will not mention, who was talking about the fact that where he was -- and he was a province chief -- the military really ran the province. He said, we tried to run the informational side but they were the ones who made the final decisions on it or, if they wanted to cancel something, killed it.

The fellow Funkhouser whom I mentioned in Syria earlier, came out to run III corps with the embassy. Although he was the civilian in charge of III corps, he wasn't really running things, not at all. (III corps was the one closest to Saigon.) Again, he wouldn't say an awful lot about such matters. He didn't get along well enough with civilians -- civilian Americans, that is, over at the embassy -- to ever criticize in that fashion.

Ellsworth Bunker often seemed to lean more on the U.S. military than on the U.S. civilian. Incidentally, he had two deputy ambassadors while I was there. Charlie Whitehouse was the last and before him it was --

Q: Berger, Sam Berger.

LINCOLN: Sam Berger, and Sam was brilliant.

Q: He was the political counselor in Tokyo when I was there years before.

LINCOLN: Then you knew him. Well, I worked hand in hand with him during most of the time that I was in Vietnam. I was more and more fascinated. I saw him back here --

Q: Sam Berger got sacked out --

LINCOLN: At any rate Sam had cancer back here. The point that I was about to make was that Ellsworth Bunker, as ambassador there -- a fascinating old aristocrat, of course, and an awfully good mind -- seemed to lean more heavily on Abe Abrams who was the chief U.S. military general, than on his civilian staff.

Q: They established a very close relationship and Julie (Abram's wife) thought the world of Ellsworth, and of course with Carol Laise, Bunker's wife, being up in Nepal and bouncing back and forth they saw each other an awful lot.

LINCOLN: Well, the civilian-military differences I found quite interesting, because you would have figured from the outside, if you were an American, that there ought to be American civilian control of U.S. operations. Even in the embassy sometimes there wasn't. We used to have weekly luncheons over at Bunker's house, everybody who was on the U.S. mission council. There were, let's see, twelve of us. At the end of the luncheon, time after time, Abe and Bunker would privately go off somewhere and spend fifteen or twenty minutes -- or longer -- discussing this, that or the other thing. You could see it and feel it all the while.

I found it very regrettable.

One of the times in which civilian control was maintained was in something I was involved in. This was after the invasion in 1972 from the north, when we formed a special task force, which was made up of the military who were there, the Seventh Air Force, one of the people from CIA, Embassy and AID representatives, myself and one or two of our people.

The task force was concerned with all informational activities toward North Vietnam. We met daily and really decided things. The task force was placed under USIS direction by Ambassador Bunker, which may have been unusual because I assumed that the Saigon station chief for CIA plus its people in the U.S. had worked their heads off to get it placed under CIA direction.

Back here in Washington the activities were under CIA direction, which was confusing. Whenever I discussed with Washington what we were doing locally, it was with a CIA man who was in charge of the task force here.

This was an anomaly, but in Saigon, we kept it entirely under USIS control. How did it happen? Through people like Scotton who were just much faster and had better information.

At that time one of the compromises we made -- and I hated to have to do this as a professional informational cultural operator -- was to allow the Seventh Air Force to increase the dropping of leaflets particularly over North Vietnam.

Most of us from USIS used to privately and quietly say that the U.S. has dropped enough paper over North Vietnam just during this one invasion to take care of all of North Vietnam's toiletry needs for the next ten years.

It was very costly for the United States and I don't think that it really had much effect, but in order to get other things we wanted, we had to go along, and we did. That was the compromise.

Q: The leaflets were practically all printed at the USIS Regional Service Center in Manila, too. The things were put together in Vietnam but they were sent to Manila for multiple printing.

LINCOLN: Yes.

Q: I have forgotten who it was in RSC Manila I was talking to. They said the stuff went out of there, thousands and thousands, every week.

LINCOLN: Another thing that the planes dropped -- and this was very expensive but may have worked -- were small radio sets.

The Seventh Air Force paid for the production of a number of these small units, about the size of a cigarette pack, which were pretuned to medium wave. They were not pretuned to an individual frequency. You could get the whole medium wave band, but only medium wave.

They were dropped in special styrofoam containers with parachutes by B-52s over North Vietnam. How many were dropped? Thousands, I suppose; I forget. I did, however, keep one of them, one that we used for testing purposes, with me for the next several years because it worked so well, an amazing little machine.

Q: Who put them out?

LINCOLN: The Air Force bought them in Korea from private Korean companies. We considered the dropping part of our medium wave broadcasting operation. The Seventh Air Force was very happy.

Q: How long did you stay in Vietnam?

LINCOLN: A year and a half. I left there in April of 1972, April 1 or thereabouts.

Q: Ellsworth Bunker was still the ambassador when you left?

LINCOLN: He was the ambassador.

Q: You weren't there when Graham Martin replaced him?

LINCOLN: No, but we at USIS Saigon had arranged beforehand to bring John Hogan down from the north to be Martin's press attaché. John was up there in Da Nang in charge of our operation. You know, you never know when you'll run into somebody you have known for many, many years.

I knew John back in the mid 1950s when he was in Cairo, Egypt. I knew the girl he married there. John I found up in Da Nang. The system while Bunker was Ambassador was to bring Hogan down whenever Ward Kirchwehm, who was the press attaché under USIS direction for the embassy, went on local or home leave.

We brought him down twice and the embassy thought the world of him. He had the Irish blarney, every bit of it. Among other things, he had a capacity for drinking.

Hogan did a very good job, and when I left the arrangements had been completed for him to replace Kirchwehm as the embassy press attaché. John had been in Saigon several months by the time Graham Martin came.

What else is there for me to recall about Vietnam? Well, a wonderful line from Ambassador Bunker. I had decided to retire toward the end of January in 1973, because I wanted to retire while Frank Shakespeare was still director of USIA. Frank, you recall, had made the announcement that he was going to leave USIA at such and such a time, I think it was February.

Q: February or March of 1973.

LINCOLN: Yes. So, at any rate, I called Frank, because we had phone service, fantastic telephones to Washington. I called Frank and said that the following day I was going to tell Ambassador Bunker of my retirement, but I wanted to be sure that he, Frank, knew about it beforehand. Frank could understand.

So I went to see Bunker the following morning saying I said I didn't want to let the USIS staff know because morale would be affected. Bunker thought for a minute and then said, "Well, Bob, sorry, we'll miss your wife Catherine."

Q: [Laughter.]

LINCOLN: She had worked on Episcopalian church affairs with him. End of conversation. Well, it wasn't ended that quickly. He did add in some detail that I'd be missed, too.

Interesting things that occurred out there -- now, let me see. Oh, yes. The whole scandal of Watergate was brought to Vietnam on such and such a day at about 11:30 a.m. or 12:00 noon through Stars and Stripes, the Pacific edition. They carried the first AP Wire Service story on it.

Over at our house, having a drink before lunch, at were Glen Garment from the White House and Frank Shakespeare. Both of them were visiting Vietnam at the time. They were old friends, as you know. As soon as Stars and Stripes appeared they took one look at it and, well, they weren't exactly ashen but they weren't happy.

They went off into a corner and talked for fifteen or twenty minutes and then came back. I will never know what they said, but I do know that within weeks Frank announced that he was leaving USIA very, very soon.

He was a straight-laced Catholic, as you know.

Q: Oh, yes.

LINCOLN: A very moral man. I don't think that morally and ethically he really approved of Watergate, but I don't know. He has never said he didn't. There is no way of our knowing.

Q: I don't think he did.

LINCOLN: I believe this, but I have nothing to go on.

Q: I believe it. The reason I believe it is because I think he was cut out of the plans by that time.

LINCOLN: His only contact by then at the White House was Garment. He didn't have other contacts there.

Q: I believe he was completely out of the inner circles at the White House.

LINCOLN: You are correct, I think.

Q: It started when he got cut out of the National Security Council by Henry Kissinger.

LINCOLN: When did that occur?

Q: I have forgotten when the time was.

LINCOLN: Approximately?

Q: Although getting a place at the Council, of course, he never was a member.

LINCOLN: Well, we have never had a director as a member. It has always been ex officio.

Q: True.

LINCOLN: One or two other favorite things. I remember once being brought in on -- since it has been declassified it is all right to mention, because I don't remember the subject -- one of the famous rocket telegrams from Washington. President Nixon wanted to know who had released such and such a piece of information.

Well, I heard in twenty-four hours from a correspondent that it had been leaked in a CIA briefing. I knew it hadn't been from us and I was pretty sure it wasn't from the embassy and I thought it was the military. Apparently, it was a CIA briefing; the correspondent who told me what was said, who said it, where, when, and how hadn't used it. He didn't know that we and Washington were concerned.

The journalists to whom it was leaked didn't know it was the specific leakage that Nixon had objected to. Rather, they thought that he objected to the CIA's constantly giving them information.

When the rocket arrived, the ambassador figured out pretty quickly who were the possibilities, including USIS, of course. He called me in as soon as he got it, within less than an hour.

I was supposed to double check all our people to see if there was a possibility of leakage from them. I reported back to the Ambassador twenty-four hours later that it couldn't have come from us. I didn't tell him that I had learned where it might have come from. I will never know whether he found out or not; there was an awful lot of leakage.

One well-known correspondent for a fairly well known newspaper said to me very recently in the last year or so, "I seldom discussed a lot of the operations with you. There was a simple reason: I could get more information elsewhere."

Q: The CIA ran its own press conferences.

LINCOLN: Yes, it sure did.

Q: Do you have any other comments about your time in Vietnam?

LINCOLN: I was fortunate in being able to review for the Richmond (Va.) Times Dispatch in 1987 the book In the Jaws of History that Bui Diem, former South Vietnamese Ambassador to the U.S., wrote about the war in Vietnam. Both in Vietnam and in the U.S., he was in the middle of what was going on. I'll quote from the review some of his principal points:

"One, the South Vietnamese people, especially the leaders, bear the ultimate responsibility for the fate of their country...

"Two, American intervention seemed a natural extension of such earlier American policy actions as the Marshall Plan in Europe, the Berlin airlift and the military move against China in Korea....

"Three, subsequent strenuous U.S. opposition to the intervention often centered on the matter of morality, but in Diem's view, it was not immoral to work with an 'admittedly flawed' South Vietnamese regime....

"Four, it was still all wrong for the Americans to come in and take over. The United States should not have taken the entire burden on itself instead of searching for ways to make a decisive impact while limiting its exposure.

It is in his further discussion of the last point that Bui Diem happens on the reasons the United States put little political or military trust in its ally. The financial and moral corruption Americans encountered in Vietnam was well beyond anything most had encountered before."

As an American, I had to say this about Bui Diem's views:

"Finding it practically impossible to rely on South Vietnam either militarily or politically, the Americans unsurprisingly counted ultimately on nothing more from Vietnamese leaders than a modicum of equilibrium...."

We could not rely on the South Vietnamese, and thus were in a hopeless quandary: to support South Vietnamese democracy, we had to rely at least to some degree on them to carry the ball; if and when they failed, we were not in a position to carry it ourselves alone. Vietnam was their country and we neither could nor should take it over.

Q: Anything else?

LINCOLN: Two among the major assertions I have been making should be repeated.

First, the United States should not get involved in an overseas war operation for which there isn't strong domestic support.

Second, the U.S. government should never accidentally or otherwise get itself in the position of turning over so much of a political operation to the military.

I believe we did both of those things in Vietnam. I think it was terribly regrettable.

Perhaps one other item should be underscored, and that is that as much as we criticize any number of things that Nixon may have done, he was after all the man responsible for finding a way out of Vietnam for the United States.

Everybody said that it wasn't perfect and of course it wasn't. But the idea of so many of the opposition here in the U.S. -- the demonstrators, the newspapers, et cetera -- that the U.S. should just pull out, I think, was all wrong. I feel that we had a responsibility to a whole lot of Vietnamese people and to a lot of other foreign people to stick it out and try to leave gracefully.

Q: I think the main thing --

LINCOLN: We did, after all, effect a peace conference and the Paris peace conference -- let's see, it was February 1973 that peace was declared. It wasn't perfect but what else could you do from the U.S. standpoint?

Q: The only other thing I think we might have done, once they were well along with that peace process, was to devise a better way to rescue a lot of the Vietnamese who had been with us and whom we knew would be left to the mercy of North Vietnam ultimately -- of course, we couldn't admit that that was going to be the case but we had to know it. I think we should have made better arrangements for them.

LINCOLN: I couldn't agree with you more, because there were any number of Vietnamese whom I knew very well who were, one way or another, faithful to the U.S.

There was one woman, for example, who was one of the more prominent Vietnamese women, who, when her husband was assassinated while I was in Saigon, worked for USIS at the binational center. She got out of Vietnam at the last minute. She got out through the quiet influence of the wife of the chief political officer, not through USIS or other people who were directly responsible. She was darned lucky to have gotten out.

Q: She sure was.

LINCOLN: She knows it. I have often talked with her since. I don't know where she is today, but I used to see her quite often.

Q: The Ambassador didn't do much to help the Vietnamese employees.

LINCOLN: No. John Hogan said, before he died last year, that he lays a lot of the responsibility for the difficulties at the feet of Ambassador Graham Martin.

Q: Lots of people feel that way.

LINCOLN: I didn't know Martin.

Q: I know him because he was ambassador in Thailand the first four months I was there.

LINCOLN: Oh, really?

Q: I had known him briefly before, but not well, just to say hello to.

LINCOLN: Mim Johnson, now heading the concerned USIA Alumni Association Committee, has come up with suggestions about how we should try to take care of some of the people who worked for USIS who were left in Vietnam. I am not sure that she has the answer, but this is an illustration of the problem we still face.

IRWIN PERNICK
Office of Political Military Affairs
Washington, DC (1971-1973)

Mr. Pernick was born and raised in New York City and educated at City College of New York (CCNY). After service in the National Guard he joined the Foreign Service in 1963 and was posted to Rome. His other foreign posts were in Thailand, where he was Public Affairs Officer and, in Yugoslavia, Political Officer. At the State Department Mr. Pernick held a variety of positions dealing with a variety of issues including Political/Military Affairs, Military Sales, and Press and Public Affairs. Mr. Pernick was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1997.

Q: Did you work on East Asia?

PERNICK: Yes.

Q: Because of your experience in the area?

PERNICK: We had a few people doing regional work. East Asia was the biggest thing and obviously Vietnam. I was pleased that I was able to work on that. It involved a lot of interesting work. We tried to anticipate needs, argued for certain programs, writing testimony for the Assistant Secretary or for the Director and even for the Secretary. The last year we starting doing more congressional stuff when it became clear that we had to provide a lot of the bulk of the testimony that the Secretary would give before the committees on the Hill.

Q: I was involved in some of the Security Assistance programs a little later and certainly the congressional aspect was very important both in terms of testimony but also in providing information and sometimes even negotiating PERNICK: Yes. We didn't do too much of that but had to; of course, prepare the T document, the congressional presentation document which was the annual budget document.

MICHAEL G. WYGANT
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Pleiku (1971-1973)

Michael G. Wygant was born in New York in 1936. He entered the Foreign Service in 1959. He served in Southern Rhodesia, Togo, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, Australia, and the Federated States of Micronesia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Then you left Moscow and spent a short time in INR. And then you mentioned Vietnam. Off you went. How did that come about?

WYGANT: Well, I was at a point in my career where I felt that I needed to get overseas again. Vietnam was certainly the great issue of the day, and, I felt, basically the issue of my generation. To have had an opportunity to go there and then not taken that opportunity, I felt, would not be good. I got a great deal of support from Lee and the family on this, because it was considered a rather unusual decision to make.

I was not forced to go; in fact I volunteered to go. The CORDS program sounded like an interesting program. It looked as though, if South Vietnam were going to make it, the kinds of things that you could do with the CORDS program were the sorts of things that would stabilize the political structure and make it possible to develop a non-Communist government in South Vietnam which would function and be able to provide services and economic opportunities to its people. So it was for a mixture of reasons that I volunteered to go.

Of course I had no idea that I was going to Pleiku when I left Washington, but I did know that I was going into the CORDS program and that I would be in one of the provinces.

Q: You went out there in 1971 and you stayed until '73. What was the atmosphere in the department, sort of both the training and the people who were sending you out?

WYGANT: It was a very controversial period. There were a lot of FSOs who were being forced into Vietnam assignments who did not want to go. This eventually developed into a confrontation between a few of the officers who flatly refused to go and the Foreign Service, which said: "The needs of the service say you shall go; otherwise, resign." The upshot of it was that officers who refused Vietnam did not resign, or at least were not forced to resign. The "needs of the service" effectively passed into history around this time we're talking about.

Having served in the Soviet Union, I had a very clear idea of what Communists would do in any country that they controlled. That wasn't anything that I would ever wish on anybody. So, therefore, I frankly was not all that sympathetic to the strong movement in this country that felt we shouldn't be involved in Vietnam and that we should just pull out and let events take their own course.

But this was a very turbulent time in the Foreign Service, both in terms of what Foreign Service involvement would be, and whether State Department FSOs could be coerced to go into a program that they didn't really want to be a part of, or coerced to go to Vietnam at a time they didn't want to go to Vietnam.

Q: Was there a feeling of hope, cynicism, or is it difficult to characterize?

WYGANT: All of the above, I would say, when I arrived out there in the fall of 1971, there was a feeling that the South Vietnamese military forces were getting better, and that the North Vietnamese were at least not any more difficult than they had been, in military terms, and that perhaps we were beginning to make some impressions through the civil operations programs in CORDS, in some of the provinces anyway.

For example, shortly after I went up to Pleiku in September 1971 (by plane) a group of us were actually able to drive all the way from Pleiku down to the coast and then down along the coast and into Saigon. And that was the first time American civilians had been able to make such a trip in several years.

Q: This was that famous road that twice was cut.

WYGANT: There were several famous mountain roads that could be easily cut, yes. But the roads I mention were open and we were able to do it. We drove in two cars, eight of us, both American and Vietnamese who came down and then also drove back. We observed only one firefight (at some distance) near a river crossing north of Saigon. We were obliged to wait for about an hour for ARVN to clear out some Viet Cong on the other side of the river. So the security situation was improving to a marked extent. And of course this was also at a time when there was a tremendous drawdown of U.S. forces; President Nixon was pulling out the forces in large numbers every month.

Then we got into the spring of 1972. Everybody talks about Tet '68, but there was another major offensive during Tet in 1972. It didn't get nearly the same headlines. Tet '72 certainly didn't have the same political impact that '68 had. But, in military terms, the South Vietnamese acquitted themselves reasonably well. The provincial capital just north of Pleiku, Kontum, was surrounded by a couple of North Vietnamese divisions in March, 1972 and it looked like we were going to lose this province. In fact Kontum is all of twenty miles north of Pleiku city. But the South Vietnamese dug in. And with a little bit of help from what was left of the U.S. forces but very largely on their own the South Vietnamese forces, finally dislodged the North Vietnamese and forced them to withdraw back into Laos, which was right next door.

This was typical of what the North Vietnamese would do: hang out in the border areas of Laos and Cambodia and come in to South Vietnam when it suited their purposes.

By the time that offensive was over, which was in the early summer of 1972, in my opinion the South Vietnamese position was as good as it had ever been. Throughout the rest of that year there was a very strong American movement for negotiations. The negotiations almost came to a conclusion at the end of the year, and then, as people may remember, they broke down and Nixon ordered a bombing of the north once again. Eventually the cease-fire agreement was signed on January 27, 1973.

I was part of the small civilian CORDS group in Pleiku that saw the last of the U.S. forces pull out in March of '73. By that time the only U.S. military forces left in Vietnam were a small but still substantial number of military advisors down in Saigon at the MACV headquarters. During my last few months in Vietnam it was strictly a civilian operation, and we were watching what was going on and trying to get a feel for the place.

Q: Could you explain, you were in what in military terms is known as Two Corps, in the highlands, and Pleiku was the major city of..

WYGANT: Pleiku was the military capital of the Second Military Region, yes.

Q: What were you doing?

WYGANT: When I first arrived, our team was composed of about 150 men. Six of us were civilians with the other 144 U.S. Army. Our Province Senior Advisor, as the team leader was termed, was Chris Squire, a Foreign Service officer and good friend from Moscow days, and I also served with him in Australia. Unfortunately he passed away shortly after retirement a few years ago; a fine man. His deputy was an Army lieutenant colonel. The way it worked in CORDS was: if the Province Senior Advisor was a civilian, his deputy would be military; if it was a military Province Senior Advisor, a civilian deputy.

We civilians were basically advising the South Vietnamese provincial administration on the whole range of civilian services. We had a sanitarian on the team who was dealing with public health issues. We had an education specialist who worked with the director of education for the Province of Pleiku. We had a logistics expert who was dealing with some of the civilian supply problems. We also had a police advisor. In those days we had police advisors in each of the provinces. This man had been a state trooper from the Los Angeles area and he was the advisor to the provincial police.

My immediate deputy and I were basically involved in all kinds of programs that were being supported by AID for relief in the provinces. We spent a lot of time on refugee relief, because there were a number of Montagnards (the population of Pleiku being largely Montagnard not Vietnamese) who were short of food and had other basic human needs.

Q: There had been a major resettlement program, bringing them into areas where they could fortify.

WYGANT: Where they'd be safer.

Q: How was this working?

WYGANT: There wasn't a great deal of this going on when I arrived in 1971. But then, when the offensive broke out in the early part of 1972, we immediately began to have enormous refugee problems. The interesting thing was that, whether Montagnard or Vietnamese, the population always moved toward the government side; they never seemed to move into the areas controlled by the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese. So that whenever fighting broke out, you had enormous numbers of refugees who were trying to stick with the South Vietnamese administration.

And this was the problem we faced that spring. We had to close the schools in Pleiku and re-open them as refugee camps. We often had as many as 15-20,000 refugees in a town that only had a population of about 40-50,000 at the best of times. We also were moving them as fast as we could down to the southern parts of Two Corps, which were considered safer and further away from the heavy fighting.

The fighting during the 1972 Tet Offensive was pretty much fixed battles between division-size units. It wasn't hit-and-run terrorist stuff, it was North Vietnamese divisions battling South Vietnamese divisions, in a Korean War type of classical military confrontation. Moreover, in Pleiku we didn't have the problems that still existed in some other provinces of an indigenous Viet Cong that remained active and dangerous. Most of Pleiku's indigenous communists were wiped out as a result of Tet '68.

Q: I'm interested in relationships. One of them is just sort of an internal one. I mean, here are Foreign Service officers working with military. We don't even speak the same language and often don't have the same outlook. How did this work, looking back on this?

WYGANT: Well, there were a lot of strains. I think in some respects it was probably more difficult for the military to try and figure out who we civilians were and what we were trying to do. I remember the lieutenant colonel, the deputy Province Senior Advisor once said, "I never know what you guys are. You're just Sam, Tom, Dick, Harry. I don't know whether I should salute you or whether I should..." I mean, they had a hard time figuring out who we were and what we did.

But the other side of the coin was that most of us had had some kind of military experience ourselves, so that the military way of doing things and the military outlook was not alien to us. If we get into these kinds of situations in the future, frankly I don't think there would be the same basis for understanding between the Foreign Service and the military, because so few Foreign Service officers, let's say under the age of forty, have had any military experience.

Q: I served in Saigon from '69 to '71, and I had four years in the barracks as an enlisted man. I wasn't wild about it, but I knew the lingo and there was this common understanding.

WYGANT: And I think that was our case too. For instance, the administrative officer for our CORDS team was a former Army chief master sergeant. He was wearing civilian clothes, but he sure knew the Army backwards and forwards. And I can't think of anybody who was with that group of mine that hadn't had prior military experience of one kind or another. So therefore we used to kid each other a lot and there was a certain amount of rivalry, comradely rivalry I guess you could say, but I think we basically got along pretty well. Occasionally you would get either a military officer or a civilian who really had a difficult time dealing with the other group, but that was the exception, I think, rather than the rule.

Q: What about dealing with the Vietnamese? I suppose I ought to really say dealing with the Vietnamese and the Montagnards, because these were two quite different groups. How did you deal with the Vietnamese? You know the definition of expert in the United States is: "A son of a bitch from out of town." And you were kind of the son of a bitch from out of country. How did this work with the Vietnamese officials?

WYGANT: My principal counterpart was the deputy Province Chief. In those days all the province chiefs were military officers, and the principal counterpart for the Province Senior Advisor was the Province Chief. The deputy Province Chief was always a civilian, so he was my principal counterpart. And I used to spend several hours a day with him and we'd go over what was important, what was going on.

Q: Using French?

WYGANT: I had two different deputy Province Chiefs. One spoke good English, so he and I used English. But his successor was a somewhat older Vietnamese who spoke excellent French and very little English, so with him we used French. I could speak a few words of Vietnamese, but I never really studied the language all that much, so French was very useful.

Q: How did it work?

WYGANT: Generally I think it was a good cooperative effort. The bottom line was that a lot of the resources and the money was obviously coming through the AID pipeline, and therefore the civilians on the team were the ones who could turn the tap on or turn the tap off and could help in those ways. But I don't want to be too cynical about this. We had a genuine rapport there, and I think the civilians had worked out particularly good relations with their counterparts on the Vietnamese side.

Obviously there are enormous cultural differences between Vietnam and the United States. The Vietnamese have an ancient culture and are justifiably proud of their history. They are an efficient, hard-working people, but a people who have not, at least in the Western sense, been able to organize themselves politically in ways that would bring the nation together. The Communists have done it, through hard-headed totalitarian tactics, but those who were not Communist were never able particularly to bring this together. So therefore you got a great variety of attitudes.

A number of the Vietnamese, in fact I would say probably the majority, were more involved with family and clan and class concerns than they were with a more general nationwide concern. And their concept of efficiency and getting a job done can be quite different than the American concept thereof. The prevalent feeling seemed to be that you looked out for your own and you didn't have to worry too much about those who were not affiliated with you either by class, clan or family.

And that was difficult, because we were trying to administer a program that would provide for the people of the province regardless of their backgrounds.

The Montagnards were considered to be almost subhuman as far as the Vietnamese were concerned. They are an aboriginal people who had been in Vietnam long before the Vietnamese started coming out of China two thousand years ago. They are Montagnards because the Vietnamese had chased them up into the mountains out of the valleys where the Vietnamese could grow rice and do the things that they wanted to do. The Vietnamese never cared too much for living up in the mountains.

I think, unfortunately, the Montagnards were treated the way a rather unsophisticated indigenous people can be treated by a much more sophisticated outside group which comes in and wants to take over land and property that belongs to an aboriginal people.

Q: Did you find yourself in the position of being the intermediary?

WYGANT: Oh, yes. The CORDS program, in fact the whole U.S. program, had to deal with South Vietnam's population in ways that made sure that the Montagnards were properly taken of. And the Montagnards basically saw the United States, as they had seen the French earlier, as their protectors from the Vietnamese.

Q: There has always been this relationship of the Montagnards, and one can also talk about the Bedouin and other groups, that people from outside take to them very well. They're sort of an attractive people...gentle, I guess is the term. Did you feel resentment from the Vietnamese: What the hell are you doing?

WYGANT: I don't think so. I think the Vietnamese that I dealt with had had enough Americans around to know the way we were going to behave anyway, and so if they had any reservations, they didn't voice them.

The one great distinction that you could make (it's terrible to make generalizations, but I think I will in this case) between the Montagnards and the Vietnamese was that the Montagnards were fairly simple and straightforward people, and, the way an American would look at it, an honest people. You would ask one a question, and he would give you a straight answer. If a Montagnard said he was going to do something, he would do it. Because they were unsophisticated, they were quite easy to deal with. And they were men of their word; they would do what they said they were going to do, or not do it if they didn't want to.

This was not the case with the Vietnamese. The Vietnamese are much more complex. It was often difficult to find what the real motivation was behind a particular course of action. If you felt that you had a program that was successful and that things were working and so forth, you might find after a while that it really wasn't going well and that it wasn't working, because the kinds of commitments that you thought you had from the Vietnamese administration sort of melted away. Without putting value judgments on this, I think it's just two different ways of approaching things. The Vietnamese are far more inclined to do things from their own inner motivations and their own approach to life, in ways that might be considered devious or underhanded by outsiders. But basically it just takes a long time to find out what's really going on with the Vietnamese.

That was not the case with the Montagnards. And I think that's why a lot of Americans, as the French had before, found the Montagnards to be so pleasant to deal with.

Q: What about corruption?

WYGANT: Corruption was of course an enormous problem in South Vietnam. I'm sure a certain amount of it was going on in Pleiku when I was there. I never saw any blatant examples of corruption. The Province Chief, who was a Montagnard by the way, lived a fairly simple lifestyle. He didn't have a grandiose mansion or a lot of visible personal property. Certainly the provincial administration seemed to be living in fairly modest circumstances. There were indications that some of the ARVN generals at Two Corps had a lot of extra material goods and were skimming things, but that was more of a general impression than hard evidence. I would say that blatant, out- and-out corruption and misuse of property and money and so forth was not a problem in Pleiku when I was there.

Q: How about direction from the embassy?

WYGANT: The embassy didn't really have much to do with us. We reported to the AID administration in Nha-Trang. Two Corps actually had a bifurcated capital. The military headquarters was in Pleiku, but the civil administration for the region and all of the civilian offices plus AID headquarters were in Nha-Trang down on the coast. So we basically were following the directives of the AID mission headquarters in Nha-Trang. I guess, in the two years that I was out there, I got to Saigon maybe a half a dozen times, and usually I'd go by the embassy and have a chat with some of the political officers whom I knew, but there was very little involvement of the embassy in what we were doing, until the last few months of my tour.

Once the peace accords had been signed and our military had gone, then indeed we did become more responsive to directions from the embassy. Nha-Trang was designated a Consulate General with an FSO Consul General assigned. We had one up in Da Nang for the First Military Region, and one over in Bien Hoa for the Third, and down in Can-tho. So then it became a more traditional Foreign Service setup. From that point we were dealing a lot with the Consul General down in Nha- Trang.

Q: You left there when?

WYGANT: I left in May of '73.

Q: What was your impression whither South Vietnam?

WYGANT: When I left in 1973 I felt that South Vietnam had a real chance to make it. I would guess that in the spring and early summer of that year the South Vietnamese were in about the best shape they'd ever been in. Things obviously began to fall apart rather quickly thereafter. And I guess there was a general deterioration into 1974, to the point that when the North Vietnamese made the decision in '75 to make another big push, that was enough to carry them to victory. Of course you had to understand what was going on back here in the U.S. regarding the tremendous upheaval in the U.S. political structure, the lack of support on the part of the American public and the Congress for the South Vietnamese administration, and the demoralization that I think must have set in rather quickly. Entering 1974 the South Vietnamese must have felt basically that the Americans were going to abandon them and that they would have to do it on their own, but with a feeling of inadequacy in being able to do it on their own. The optimism attending the cease-fire in the early part of '73 rapidly deteriorated.

Q: Were you at all concerned about the American presence being, my God, you know, the equivalent to almost at the county level in a foreign country?

WYGANT: The surprising thing was that I did not feel, or did not sense, any real resentment on the part of the Vietnamese toward that degree of American involvement. I guess we had been there so long and they were so used to having Americans around that basically, at least in Pleiku, there was not much resentment.

For instance, we mixed all the time with Vietnamese and Montagnards, to a far greater degree than the military did. My wife and family were not in Vietnam with me, so I was on my own most of the time and I'd often go out to dinner together with my Vietnamese counterparts. Both professionally and socially we were pretty close, so I did not feel that there was a resentment.

Of course, I would imagine that the CORDS experience varied tremendously from province to province. I know that in one or two of the coastal provinces in Two Corps there was much stronger support for the Viet Cong and for the North, and, there, perhaps there would be resentment of Americans or what Americans were doing. But that wasn't the case in Pleiku.

GARY L. MATTHEWS
Da Nang (1971-1973)

Gary L. Matthews was born in Missouri in 1938. He graduated from Drury College in 1960, Oklahoma State University in 1961, and Columbia University in 1969. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1955-1958 and joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in Germany, Poland, Vietnam, Malta, and Washington, DC. Mr. Matthews was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: What happened then after 1971 when you left the Soviet Bureau?

MATTHEWS: In late 1970, I think it would have been, I was delightfully informed that I would be assigned to embassy Moscow via a year in Garmisch, that was then the Army language school, or whatever they called it, Detachment A or R, and which you can appreciate, was wonderful. And I began to think my way into that. At about the very same time, I was rung up by the chap who was handling assignments to Vietnam, who asked if I would come by and talk to him about taking up an assignment in Vietnam. I went by to talk to him, and to make a long story short, I decided to abort the assignment to the Soviet Union, Garmisch, etc., in favor of going to Vietnam.

Q: Looking at it from a career point of view, the Mecca for anybody involved in Eastern European affairs, and particularly going to the Garmisch thing, would be Moscow. Vietnam by '71 was beginning to go down hill.

MATTHEWS: It was the beginning of the Vietnamization program, a real turning point, and that to me is what it was. Of course, I had long thought about Vietnam. It had been a consuming experience, as you know, for many during the '60s, and I just felt I wanted to be a part of it one way or the other. In my case it was indicated that...and I also wanted to go up where there would be action.

Q: In old Civil War terms, it was known as seeing the elephant, which is exactly what I did.

MATTHEWS: I hadn't heard that, that's a good term. I was given fair assurance that I could be posted up to I Corps near Da Nang, the northern most part of South Vietnam. And, in fact, all of that came to be. Of course, everyone in the office of Soviet affairs thought I was mad to do this, but I did it. So I eventually took some training at the Vietnam training center, located in Rosslyn.

Q: It was in the garage?

MATTHEWS: No. It was in a separate building at the time. And I had a minimal fast course, very fast, in elementary Vietnamese, and shipped out and got to Vietnam in August of '71.

Q: I always like to put at the beginning of a section, you were in Vietnam from when to when?

MATTHEWS: From August of 1971 through March of 1973. So I arrived in Saigon, hot and humid, all those well known attributes, the sounds, the smells, and sorted out the initial confusion of their not being quite sure of who I was, when I was arriving, but that was sorted out. I had been somewhat anticipated, so I was eventually sent out to Ton Son Nhet airport, put on a DC-3 or C-47, the military version of the old DC-3, and flown to Da Nang up in the northern part of South Vietnam for assignment to Hoi An, which was then and now the provincial capital of Quang Nam province, slightly south of Da Nang, sort of surrounding it, a very hot action area for especially Viet Cong at the time, although also including North Vietnamese regulars. The adjoining province was Quang Nai, of course, where the My Lai incident took place. I was assigned as assistant province senior advisor for Pacification. Indeed, there was a lot of pacifying, and I primarily worked with Vietnamese military people for the most part, but also some civilian people across the range of programs. I found it utterly fascinating. It had its unpleasant moments, we were being shelled and mortared, mostly mortared, but we were out in the field a lot which I liked.

I replaced a fellow who had been killed when his jeep ran over a mine in a little village. This was one of the same villages where I went in periodically to check on this and that. I always thought of that chap when I rode over the same roads. He had the bad luck to hit the mine. It was a time, speaking about Vietnamization, when all of the main force units, US main forces were being withdrawn. We had essentially an advisory effort for pacification throughout the province, which had maybe eight districts, with small teams of US military personnel. I had a lot to do with that because, being the senior advisor in charge of pacification, I dealt a lot with those programs that were administered by the district team, so I was out all the time either by helicopter, and also often by road. I always felt that I should be out there on the same roads that I would tell other people were more or less safe to drive, at least during the daytime. I would have quite happily finished off my time in Quang Nam. I got to know a lot of the Vietnamese officials, including Buddhist officials who had a number of criticisms of the South Vietnamese regime to say the least.

But then I was asked in early 1972 to transfer to Thua Thien province north of Quang Nam, to be the deputy province senior advisor. We had a somewhat larger advisory team there. Not too long after my arrival the North Vietnamese army sprang a surprise attack, the so-called Easter offensive. Strong North Vietnamese forces came storming down highway 1, across the demilitarized zone, wrapped up all of Quang Tri province which was the northern most province of the demilitarized zone, and came on across the provincial border into Thua Thien, heading toward Hue with Soviet-made armor, armored personnel carriers and all manner of heavy artillery. This was major combat, and of course being deputy at that point, I worked directly with the province chief who was a colonel, and was charged with provincial forces in all of Thua Thien. Well, when the North Vietnamese invasion took place, mostly coming due south from the north, as well as some elements of North Vietnamese guerrillas coming in from the west from the mountains off the Ho Chi Minh Trail, the main line South Vietnamese forces, the first infantry division plus the South Vietnamese also had a Marine division, those troops were all thrown up against the North Vietnamese regulars, along with a number of our regional provincial forces. And eventually we fought back the North Vietnamese and they were all but decimated, those that would be caught out.

Q: In a way this helped lead to the peace accords. I mean it was a time when they tried a real main line attack, battle attack, and it didn't work.

MATTHEWS: And, of course, the reason the North Vietnamese were eventually beaten back is we brought in massive air power, B-52s flying out of Thailand, which we called Arc Lights, to bring against those elements, we also had Tac Air mostly flying out of Da Nang and elsewhere in Vietnam. And also I think we still had one squadron of US helicopter gunships which we could call on for support. We essentially had beaten back the North Vietnamese by the end of April-early May. The rest of my time there was marked by incursions, usually by North Vietnamese forces because the Viet Cong there as elsewhere up in that part of Vietnam had really been quite severely decimated during the Tet Offensive of '68. A lot of their infrastructure had been destroyed. So there were Viet Cong elements but most of what we had to deal with were North Vietnamese regular army forces, making incursions into the low lands coming out of the mountains off the Ho Chi Minh Trail. This is subsequent to the big Easter offensive. At that point they weren't trying to get down across the DMZ anymore. But my memory of my service there was mostly one of being either on the ground or up in the helicopter with my counterpart, the Vietnamese province chief, the commander of sector forces while we were responding to whatever incursion there had been the night before on the part of North Vietnamese forces.

Q: I'd like to go back first when you're in Hue, and then move to the other. Can you tell me what a pacification officer...what did you do? Talk about maybe a day, the type of things and more details.

MATTHEWS: Well, it's hard to explain. This was the CORDS program in revolutionary development support, it was the pacification program. Bill Colby helped set it up. Bob Komer was a big wheel in that. These were high officials. There was a very fine gentleman, Colonel Jacobson, who worked out of the embassy in Saigon. Colonel Jacobson was a heck of a nice guy. He'd had a prominent role in defending the embassy during the Viet Cong attack during the Tet offensive. CORDS was a panoply of programs, with liberal doses of US funds to further civic development. It was everything from building school houses and clinics, and providing tractors, to trying to train village peasants to guard their own perimeters at night. I came in just at the transition point when the Phoenix program which was designed to identify and capture or kill members of the Viet Cong infrastructure when that was being transitioned to the same program with a Vietnamese name, Phung Huang. There was much less US involvement with it, although there were some of us who did work in that area.

The pacification program, at least as it then existed up where I was in Vietnam, had its very distinctly civil peaceful purposes and aspects, how to provide equipment--tractors, maybe even miracle rice seed to peasants who were trying to develop their rice paddies, or their lands, to new school buildings, new clinics, to the other end of the spectrum which is where you were trying to deal with the quite significant military threat, and terror as a threat, on the part of the Viet Cong and up where I was more often than not the North Vietnamese regular army. So it encompassed a wide range of programs. When I was in Hui An in Quang Nam province, that tended to be more towards the civilian side of the spectrum. We would certainly get involved periodically in the military aspect, and we were shelled, mostly mortared, periodically at night by the enemy. But it was more of a mixed civilian and para-military operation focused on aid programs and counter-insurgency programs.

Once I transferred from Thua Thien to Hue, it moved quite quickly and significantly towards the military side of the spectrum because of the enormous enemy threats that we had there.

Q: Before we move to the military side, how effective did you find the South Vietnamese government, problems of corruption or direction, or what have you?

MATTHEWS: I have to say, and I've thought about it a lot, that obviously there was corruption. This was not only, if you will, the Southeast Asian way of doing certain things, but there was a war going on and you had all the elements that create fertile ground for that kind of thing. On the other hand, I must say I often was operating in very hostile territory with just Vietnamese colleagues and I never had any reason to doubt their effectiveness, their dedication, and the like. I worked almost all the time with Vietnamese, not with other Americans, and with the benefit of hindsight after the fall of Vietnam in '75, it always struck me, even when I was there, but later after I left--perhaps you shared this too--that we had the great luxury that we could go in and however long we stayed, there was a finite end to our tour, even on the part of those of us that were there more than the eleven months-thirteen months, whatever it was the usual military tour. But those guys, whether they were colonels or buck privates, they were there forever, no matter what happened.

Q: And the war had been going on...

MATTHEWS: The war had gone on forever.

Q: ...more than a decade.

MATTHEWS: So I could never fault them if we were going out on a patrol in an area of the province which was appropriately notorious for being dangerous, you could never really fault the captain, or whoever it was on the Vietnamese side for choosing a path that was less likely to bring him into a booby trap or to an ambush, because two months down the road, or a year later, he was going to be on some path where that probably would happen.

Q: When you were dealing with a situation during the Easter offensive, and that period being on the military side...here you are, you're a civilian, what were you doing on the military side? I'm talking about specifics.

MATTHEWS: Well, I really wasn't a civilian in many of my duties. We must be very candid about the hierarchy of the CORDS operation. My boss was a full colonel. I was his deputy, a lieutenant colonel, and then the officers working for me were majors and lieutenant colonels. When I went out on military operations, as I did with the province chief and others, I put on a green suit...I certainly wasn't out there in a suit and tie. There were no distinctions. None of us in the advisory effort at that point were commanding troops in the field. For that we relied on our Vietnamese counterparts. But the US colonel, whose deputy I was, had his family safe-havened in the Philippines, so he traveled there quite regularly. And, of course, I became the acting senior advisor and it seemed more often than not every time that happened some big enemy incursion would take place so we would be up there shooting and getting shot at.

Q: What would you do? I mean specifically.

MATTHEWS: Well, specifically we would help with the communications and logistics. Obviously we had our regular radio nets, etc., but we still had some helicopter gunship assets which I could call for and usually get if there wasn't a higher priority elsewhere in the province, and bring those in in support of say an operation to retake a village. That happened quite regularly. If it was really a major concentration of North Vietnamese forces you could ask for US tactical air to come in for air strikes. Although by the time I was up in Thua Thien those tactical air support assets were already quite diminished over what it had been a year earlier in Quang Nam. We had, as I recall, some role in bidding...you actually bid on B-52 strikes, but that was in the mountainous portions of the province. Not that many miles removed from where you were, but that was more against suspected major concentrations of North Vietnamese forces, and those requests would perhaps come from the province chief who got it from one of his commanders that there was a North Vietnamese main force battalion at such and such coordinates, say west of Hue, and we would go through our military advisory channels and try to get air strikes. The sort of normal week in and week out stuff would involve our essentially being lips and teeth with the Vietnamese forces to show solidarity, and usually they sustained the effort on their own part. I was in a number of fire fights together with my Vietnamese colonel where there were no US assets to support us. When we could, we would support them with air, including flying in their troops.

Q: Did you find yourself using weapons?

MATTHEWS: Oh, yes.

Q: At the level you're dealing with, your bag is diplomacy and this is...

MATTHEWS: This bag was never diplomacy.

Q: But there is something about being a professional military man who has gone through the whole training, so by the time you get to lieutenant colonel you've got somebody who understands infantry, air tactics, the whole thing. And you had some military experience, didn't you? But like most of us, it wasn't at that level of sophistication or experience. How did this translate?

MATTHEWS: It seemed to be no problem because at that point where I was in Vietnam with the nature of the challenges we faced, we were sort of all in it together. As I say, it was not a question of commanding troops in the field. That's a military prerogative as it should be, but because of the peculiar and unique situation that prevailed in the "advisory program" there were few distinctions between whether you were a serving US colonel or a serving US Foreign Service officer holding the billet of a colonel. The bane of our existence I should say, or certainly mine but I can say ours, once I transferred up to Hue was related to the North Vietnamese Easter offensive, that was eventually broken and thrown back, but related to that was that the North Vietnamese had brought off the Ho Chi Minh Trail Soviet heavy artillery, 122 millimeter and 130 millimeter artillery, and put them in caves and other well concealed spots in the mountains overlooking Hue, from where selectively they would shell us several times a week. And unlike the notoriously inaccurate 122 millimeter rockets, which I was quite familiar with from Quang Nam, or even the 81 millimeter mortars, the artillery, of course, is deadly accurate once you have your marking rounds in the box. So my memories of my assignment there are probably especially vivid from the shellings, especially when the shells killed and injured people around me.

Q: How did you find the morale of the South Vietnamese during this period you were there?

MATTHEWS: Coming back to what I said a moment ago, that all things considered and given the fact that they were going to be there until the end no matter what, it was astonishingly good. The major exception to that, which was a real catharsis for all of us...I shall never forget this, was as a consequence of the Paris Accords which would lead up to the cease fire in February of 1973. I recall going over to province headquarters, this was in advance of the public announcement, to present to the Vietnamese colonel, I can't remember if the province senior advisor, the US colonel, was there with me or whether I was acting but I was with a couple of other Americans. And I'll never forget how shocked and bitter he was when we briefed him on what all was to transpire, and, as you recall Stu, a major provision of the agreement was that North Vietnam was allowed to keep its forces that it then had within South Vietnam. The province chief exploded into, I'd say anguish, more than anger, but there was certainly some anger there. My God, he said, this will be the end of us for sure because there's no way in the world that you can have a deal with Hanoi which leaves in place, as it were, massive numbers of North Vietnamese troops, and not think that whenever they choose, they will strike us again. And I remember we had talking points, the usual this and that to mollify him, and I said no, no, the US will be very much watching this and we'll be quick to react if there should be...

Q: Was that close to the end by the time you were leaving?

MATTHEWS: That's right. In fact I had the unique experience of going out to the Hue airport...we were asked to make ready, and at this point I had been appointed the province senior advisor, the senior person, and on very short notice we were to make ready billeting arrangements for the North Vietnamese party which would arrive from Hanoi to take over its role in the cease fire peace deal. So among my last experiences in Hue was going out to the airfield, the main one outside of Hue, and being there that night when a US C-130 flew in and out of the plane stepped 30-40 North Vietnamese officers in uniform. Of course, we had security all over the place to get them safely to where they were being billeted.

Q: You left there when?

MATTHEWS: I left right around the first of March. Suffice it to say in the strange and wondrous workings of things, I had no idea of what was to become of me following my assignment to Vietnam. I would happily have stayed on in Vietnam. I found it fascinating, loved Southeast Asia then, still do. To my utter astonishment I got a telegram. One of those things where they actually paste the words across the yellow piece of paper, informing me that I was being directly transferred from Hue, Republic of Vietnam, to Leningrad, USSR, via Russian refresher training.

Q: So we'll pick it up next time, but first when you left in March 1973, in your impression, whither South Vietnam?

MATTHEWS: My impressions, which were very much affected by the anguish of the province chief, were that we certainly had not seen the end of this. I never had any sense that the US would not follow through and stand up and be counted if the North Vietnamese did not observe the cease-fire for their part. I was shocked when it happened and the US did nothing to help.

JOHN A. BUSHNELL
Program Analysis, NSC, The White House
Washington, DC (1971-1974)

Mr. Bushnell was born in New York State and educated at Yale University and McMurray College. An Economic Specialist, he served primarily in senior level positions at Latin American posts, including Bogota, Santo Domingo, San Jose and Buenos Aires, dealing primarily with Economic and International Trade issues. An assignment to the Staff of the National Security Council was followed by tours as Deputy Chief of Mission at Buenos Aires, Chargé d'Affaires at Panama City, and subsequently as Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. Mr. Bushnell was the recipient of several awards for outstanding service. Mr. Bushnell was interviewed by John Harter in 1997

Q: This is Monday, February 23, 1998. When we broke off, John, you were getting your family moved from Geneva to Washington and settled in a house in the Washington area.

BUSHNELL: I went back to Geneva but wasn't there for long. Of course, the people at the NSC [National Security Council] were eager to get me back. A replacement was designated for me in Geneva, and he arrived on TDY to attend a conference, but his visit gave me a chance to introduce him around. After two or three weeks I came back to Washington and went to work at the NSC.

Q: Whom did you check in with?

BUSHNELL: Wayne Smith headed an office in the NSC called Program Analysis. The NSC had a small staff, 50 or 60 officers and about an equal number of support people. There were three or four people for each region of the world. Then there were specialized people of various sorts. Finally, there was the Program Analysis Office which had been created by Kissinger. Its purpose was to handle major issues or problems in which Kissinger was directly involved and where he felt a need for independent and, as he put it, more advanced and more intellectual detailed staffing than what he was getting from the various bureaucracies in the government. We had eight officers in the "Program Analysis Staff." Its main task was SALT [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks], the strategic weapons negotiations with the Russians and other negotiations with the USSR. Most of the staff was devoted to that. However, we also had the Pentagon budget and the various issues of US force structure. Wayne and one other staff member worked on that. Then, because Vietnam was a big issue, and especially a big issue with Kissinger, Wayne was tasked to provide analysis and intellectual guidance on Vietnam, not on political matters but analysis of how the war was going, what the accuracy of intelligence was, and such matters. He maintained high level contacts with the military and intelligence people. John Holdridge [Foreign Service Officer seconded to the NSC] was the chief East Asian person along with John Negroponte [another Foreign Service Officer on secondment to the NSC]. They handled the political aspects of the Vietnam situation. There were military intelligence people on the staff who did the briefing on Vietnam. Program Analysis basically had the military and intelligence analysis.

There was an economics office headed by Fred Bergsten; Bob Hormats was also in that office. Fred was more interested in general international economics than in Southeast Asia issues, and such issues were soon transferred to me. When I joined the NSC staff, the only White House coordination of international economic policies was through this NSC office, but, while I was there, a separate White House office outside the NSC was established to coordinate international economic matters. Of course the President's Council of Economic Advisors had considerable interest in international economic matters, but the Council was not given a coordination role. Kissinger would frequently say he did not understand economics and was glad to have others handle economic issues. But when there were major issues such as price controls, an embargo on soybean exports, and the 1973 oil crisis, Kissinger saw economic matters had great political impact, and he then became very active on these issues.

Q: I thought that Bob Hormats replaced Fred.

BUSHNELL: Fred was the senior person until sometime in 1972. I believe Ernie Johnston was still there and was then senior until Chuck Cooper took over the office in the spring of 1973.

Q: He left some time right about then.

BUSHNELL: Soon after Chuck Cooper replaced Fred Bergsten, I switched over to that office. When I started back to work at the NSC in April 1971, the Indonesian job was essentially completed. Although I had a watching brief to see that the President's decisions were implemented, that did not take much time. What took most of my time was the re-equipping of the Vietnamese military, so that they could do more, and eventually all, the fighting. I also dealt with intelligence; I set up an analytical system. We had maps showing each of the provinces of South Vietnam. Using various indicators, we did a monthly review of the situation which went to Kissinger and the President. We were basically trying to win the war, province by province. We developed a model of the South Vietnamese force structure and a list of the forces which were the most efficient, so that one could try to make the best use of them. Doing that job absorbed most of my time into 1972. Of course, during this time, unbeknownst to me, Kissinger was already involved in secret talks with the North Vietnamese. He would go to Paris to meet with them.

Q: So what were the principal issues you were working on?

BUSHNELL: I was working at first on military intelligence and military assistance and then on economic matters. In terms of the military, I was not involved in following what US troops were doing on the battlefield but in trying to equip the South Vietnamese military forces so that they could discharge their responsibilities. I did attend frequent briefing which covered all aspects of the military situation.

Q: Presumably, you had to go to Saigon to see the situation on the ground.

BUSHNELL: Oh, yes, I made numerous trips to Saigon. The first trip was in July, 1971. On that first trip I went by myself. I tried to take some home leave, which I was entitled to, in California, where my parents lived. I took my family with me to California and, after a few days leave, I left them there and continued on to Saigon. I spent about 10 days in Saigon and then came back and had a few more days' leave in California.

Q: So tell us about your mission in Saigon. Whom did you see, what did you do, what did you observe, and what were your conclusions? I take it that this was the first of several trips.

BUSHNELL: Yes. In Saigon I spent most of my time in the Embassy and at MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam], talking to people.

Q: Who was the Ambassador?

BUSHNELL: The Ambassador was Ellsworth Bunker.

Q: You had known Bunker from your time in the Dominican Republic.

BUSHNELL: Yes. Kissinger sent a message, which I drafted, to Bunker indicating I would be coming out and urging I be educated on several things. A Colonel, who was assigned to Ambassador Bunker, took care of me and handled my logistical needs. He arranged for me to call on Ambassador Bunker the first day I was there. I think this Colonel was absolutely flabbergasted because, when the two of us walked into Bunker's office, the Ambassador looked up from his desk and said: "John, it's about time you got on board for some real work!" I spent quite a bit of time talking to Bunker. As you say, I had known him well previously. Ambassador Bunker had an excellent overview of the situation. Of course, and this was no secret at this point, what really drove policy was Bunker's monthly cable on the situation to President Nixon. The cable went through the Secretary of State and then to the President. The cables in this series were fairly long. In them Ambassador Bunker dealt with those issues and developments which he considered of special importance and those matters needing Washington attention. He did a masterful job of integrating different matters together.

Q: Did Ambassador Bunker draft this series of cables mostly himself, or did members of his staff prepare drafts, and he restructured them, or...

BUSHNELL: It was a combination. Basically, he drafted the final product, but various people in the Embassy and in our military prepared pieces to go into it. I read these reports for years. There was an occasional paragraph which one could see had been excerpted from a cable or paper prepared by someone else. Generally, this monthly report was prepared as though Bunker were speaking to the President. He took whatever inputs he got and added to them. I never saw too much of that process in Saigon.

Q: Who were the principal people in the Embassy who would have contributed to this cable?

BUSHNELL: Oh, I don't remember. Most of my time was spent with the US military officers, not with the Embassy. The only part of the Embassy where I spent a considerable amount of time was in the Economic Section, headed by Chuck Cooper who was the Minister for Economic Affairs.

Q: Cooper was in Saigon at that time?

BUSHNELL: He was the Minister for Economic Affairs. Ambassador Bunker had brought him to Saigon.

Q: Hadn't Cooper been working for RAND [Research and Development Corporation, a private research organization which had contracts with the federal government]?

BUSHNELL: Yes. Bunker had recruited him after he had done some Rand work on Vietnam. He was the Economics Minister, and he was trying to develop reasonable economic policies with the South Vietnamese. He had a large State Department staff and a much bigger AID [Agency for International Development] Mission, a gigantic AID Mission. This was another element where I spent a lot of time. Bunker and Cooper convinced me that the U.S. needed to do much more to develop a viable economy in South Vietnam. This became my big issue. It was not sufficient to train and equip the Vietnamese military; without a strong economy to support the military, the South would not be able to defend itself.

The South Vietnamese economy could produce some things for the military, both their's and our's, and I worked to change policies so the U.S. was prepared to buy as much as possible in the South Vietnamese economy. For years we bought a lot of services from the South Vietnamese economy, but we bought almost nothing in terms of material or equipment from the South Vietnamese economy. They could produce uniforms and all kinds of other things, including simple equipment. There were factories that produced these things, but there was no system for us to buy things from the South Vietnamese economy. We bought almost everything through the military system in the United States. I pushed the idea of buying from the South Vietnamese economy. Ambassador Bunker raised this idea with the President in his cables. The President endorsed it. The military assigned Brigadier General Wickham in MACV to follow up. General Wickham, who went on to become NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] commander in Europe, was an up and coming general officer who was assigned this task of finding places where the military could buy materiel and equipment in South Vietnam and make this system work and quickly. He could get people out there to follow up. He had a big staff and really dug into this matter. I spent a lot of time with him on all my subsequent trips to Saigon and also worked with him when he would visit Washington. Of course he had many problems with the military bureaucracy. Often I could help cut through these problems, particularly by getting my colleagues at OMB to talk with Defense or issue budget instructions.

I am getting far beyond my first visit. When I got to Saigon, Bill Colby [later Director of the CIA] was still there, but I do not recall whether I saw him on the first or on some subsequent visit. My recollection of trips to Vietnam is dazed. First, I suffered from the time change.

Q: Saigon is halfway around the world from Washington.

BUSHNELL: All of my trips were fairly short; I never really got acclimatized. Then, of course, since I was assigned to the NSC, my work schedule was absolutely packed every day, from breakfast through the evening. I just went from one appointment to another. I had a dozen or two dozen issues that I was looking at. I went from one thing to another, and people became a blur. There were all of these military people, and we had all of these Province Senior Advisers [coordinators of activities] in the various provinces. Most, but not all, of the Province Senior Advisers were military officers. There were also Deputy Province Senior Advisers, who were usually civilians. They made reports, which were put into a system. I spent a lot of my time on this because of the province maps which we prepared for the President. I wanted to see how they were preparing their situation and incident reports, based on what criteria, and how confident they were in their evaluations. They had perfected these military dog and pony shows [briefings, with audiovisual support] which were translated onto charts until the cows came home. The purpose of all of this was to try and make some sense of the situation.

Q: Could you basically summarize what impressions you obtained, recognizing that there was beginning to be a great controversy in the U.S. over all of this?

BUSHNELL: It wasn't beginning. The controversies had been going on for at least a few years.

Q: But what impressions did you have about the whole Vietnam "mess"?

BUSHNELL: By the time I got involved with South Vietnam in April, 1971, the basic decision had been made by President Nixon that we were going to pull out of the country, gradually, and turn the situation over to the South Vietnamese. As a result, we were downsizing our military effort, and that decision had already been made. The main policy questions were how fast could we withdraw troops and what economic and military assistance should we give South Vietnam to allow the South Vietnamese to win the war, while reducing the US presence. Thus essentially the parameters of the policy were set. Although there was great controversy about whether we should pull troops out of South Vietnam immediately, it wasn't as though the issue itself was undecided. There were times when we accelerated this process by attempting to disrupt the North's logistics. Bombing would be extended to additional areas as well as other military measures. However, these apparent escalations were still in the context of moving our forces out. When I first visited South Vietnam, we still had the power to negotiate with Hanoi. Saigon was a dynamic, bustling city. There were real problems involved in moving around the country, although there were still a lot of Americans there. The South Vietnamese economy was doing reasonably well.

Initially, I visited IV Corps, which included the Mekong Delta area South of Saigon - the rice basket of the country. Most of my later trips to South Vietnam took place in a different context. During my first trip I went out on my own and set my own agenda. It was generally a get acquainted program.

Q: How many trips did you make to South Vietnam?

BUSHNELL: I made nearly a dozen trips to South Vietnam.

Q: From the summer of 1971 to...

BUSHNELL: My last trip was in the first half of 1974. Thus I visited over a three year period. I was going to South Vietnam almost every other month in 1972. When Kissinger was in Paris, negotiating with the North Vietnamese, he would send General Al Haig, who was his Deputy National Security Adviser, to hold the hand of the South Vietnamese, so they would be able to understand what we were doing in Paris. I would go with Haig on his trips to South Vietnam. This was a good way to go, because he had his own Air Force plane, and the logistics of this kind of travel were easier. I reached the point where I could get a lot of sleep on these flights, Haig permitting.

Haig was a real work horse on these trips. We would generally work a full day in Washington. Then, about 7:00 PM, we would go to Andrews Air Force Base, get into a KC-135 jet [military version of the Boeing 707], take off and have dinner on board. Then we would have a meeting with Haig to plan the program we would follow in South Vietnam and what each of us would try to accomplish. We generally didn't have time to do the preparation before we left the office. We would review whatever we were planning to do, develop talking points, and discuss where each of us would go. If we were lucky, we would finish that meeting by, say, 11:00 PM, Washington time, when we could go to sleep. The aircraft had bunks, so we could actually sleep. Once I actually slept through a landing and takeoff in Alaska on the way to Saigon. Thus we had a fair chance of arriving in Saigon reasonably rested even if our body clock was 12 hours behind local time.

We would usually be in Saigon for two days. Then Haig would go North to the border area and look at the military situation with our troops there. That was where most of our troops were stationed. I would go South and look at the economic situation and see how things were going in the Delta. That's where most of the South Vietnamese industry and agriculture were located. MACV would provide a helicopter to fly me around. Other people on the Mission would visit other areas, often in connection with various counterinsurgency issues, especially near the Cambodian border. Then we would all fly back to Washington. Usually the trip was little more than a long weekend; almost always they were over weekends.

One humorous note. My brother-in-law, who was an FBI [Federal Bureau of Investigations] agent in New York, was known to have a few beers on a Saturday. Often, if we arrived for a visit on Saturday afternoon, Bob would not be home. His wife would say, "He's gone to the Glenview," the local pub. He came with his family to visit my family over a weekend. They arrived at our house and were told: "John is not here. He's gone to Saigon. He left on Friday night and will be back on Tuesday." My brother-in-law said: "Well, that's the damndest thing I ever heard! My wife keeps complaining when I go to the Glenview for a few hours. Here John goes to Saigon for the whole weekend!" [Laughter] I made a half dozen long-weekend trips to Saigon when I was assigned to the NSC staff. Most of these trips were secret; we did not even learn of them until a couple of days before and could tell our families only the minimum.

Q: Did you participate in Haig's meetings with senior South Vietnamese officials?

BUSHNELL: Generally not. I did my thing, and that was more than enough to occupy my time. For example, I never went to see President Nguyen van Thieu. When Ambassador Bunker and Al Haig called on South Vietnamese officials, they was generally accompanied by John Holdridge from the NSC staff. I usually met with the Economics Minister and other senior Vietnamese economic officials, usually with Chick Cooper and some AID officers. In the Delta I met with the senior political, military, and economic Vietnamese as well as with our advisors.

Q: But you did get fairly well acquainted with the situation in Saigon during this period?

BUSHNELL: I attended the meetings on the plane going to Saigon and many other meetings. Little time at those meetings was spent on issues I was concerned with. Senior NSC people didn't really care about the details of what I was doing. Haig wanted a strong economy and the right mix of military assistance, but he did not have time for the details. If I needed help, he was always prepared to make a phone call or send a memo. Most of the time on the plane was spent in preparing Al Haig for his calls in Saigon. These preparatory meetings gave me an insight into the things that were going on in Saigon and in the Paris negotiations. When I was in Washington, I wasn't as much involved with the political issues.

Q: So you were concerned to some extent in the issues Al Haig was handling in Saigon and a little bit more about the matters you were concerned with.

BUSHNELL: The big issues Al Haig handled involved trying to convince the South Vietnamese Government that we weren't going to sell them out when we dealt with Hanoi. However, at the same time, he emphasized the South Vietnamese had to be serious about pulling their own weight. This was the line that had to be emphasized. The South Vietnamese had to control their corrupt bureaucracy, and they had to get serious about their programs to draft people and train and equip them properly for the Vietnamese Army. There was a whole series of things that the South Vietnamese needed to do better than they were doing to get their own act together, as Haig put it. But we needed to avoid pushing them so hard that we would seem not to be fully behind them. We needed to leave their pride intact.

Haig had an additional set of issues regarding South Vietnam which, at first, I was not involved in, although I became very involved in later on. These dealt with the rate and nature of the withdrawal of US forces from South Vietnam. He had to consider which military forces would come out and how many of them, and when. This could create tensions among the commanders in South Vietnam. The commanders always wanted more, not fewer, forces. In my experience all military commanders always want more forces. Certainly, there were things to do and places where we were not adequately staffed. However, the main thrust of our efforts at this point was to withdraw our forces. There were great tensions between withdrawing logistical support people and bringing home front line troops. The great majority of our forces in Vietnam were always support. Haig's view was that we should really cut back on the logistical tail, leaving our combat forces in South Vietnam to do their job. Our military didn't seem to know how to cut back on our logistical forces. At the time President Nixon was deciding how rapidly our forces in South Vietnam should be drawn down.

About every three months the Department of Defense presented a paper which basically gave the President three options on our force size in Vietnam. These options were usually increase our forces, keep them at the same level, or reduce them a little bit. These were not real options as far as the NSC staff was concerned. I was assigned the task of preparing real options. That was very difficult to do because it was hard to get real cooperation from the Pentagon in terms of what the real priorities were and what could be achieved. Kissinger didn't want the President to say: "Pull out 50,000 troops" and stop at that. Kissinger's staff was concerned about withdrawing front line divisions, as the logistics people wanted to do. What Kissinger wanted to do was to withdraw logistics people as much as possible while keeping the fighting forces.

We finally came to drafting National Security Decision Memoranda which would say we would withdraw this or that quartermaster detachment or close this hospital or that aircraft maintenance shop in order to direct the withdrawal in a way that we thought it should be directed. I did most of this staff work. I found this very difficult because it required so much work to find out just what various units did. I had detailed print outs on what units were assigned to South Vietnam. Then the question was what some of these people did.

Q: Was that what you were trying to do when you were on one of your trips to South Vietnam?

BUSHNELL: No. It was never very important on these trips. I remember getting some of the information on duties of various units when I was in South Vietnam, but that was really never my central focus. I was doing this force planning in Washington.

Q: What was the quality of military intelligence? You were plugged into it, I assume.

BUSHNELL: Yes. The intelligence on military targets was good. The problem was that basically we were fighting a guerrilla war. It wasn't a matter of one army fighting against another army.

Q: It was like the American Revolution.

BUSHNELL: Something like that. Even troops that came from North Vietnam didn't necessarily operate in large groups. At times they would go into action as squads, which would try to recruit new troops.

Q: Essentially, it was a godawful, political mess which we construed as communism versus something else. However, it was really a very complex political, military, cultural, social, and ideological problem. It was all mixed together, and you can't categorize those things in purely military terms.

BUSHNELL: It was an awkward situation for us to deal with because our military is pretty good if the target is another military force. Find their tanks, their planes, and their troops and attack them. That's what our military knows how to do.

Q: I've been reading John Keegan's "History of Warfare," which goes way back to the earliest, neolithic societies. The thing is that the nature of warfare has constantly evolved, and it has always been different in different areas and at different times. I think that for the military people currently serving it is a question of trying to apply the lessons of the past to the present situation.

BUSHNELL: Really, it wasn't so much applying the lessons of the past. Rather, our military tried to apply the structures, skills, and equipment which they had.

Q: Which were designed to meet the problems of the past.

BUSHNELL: Yes. They certainly were not well designed to meet the sort of enemy they encountered in Vietnam.

Q: Again, I don't think that any military force can do that.

BUSHNELL: It wasn't really the military aspects of the situation which were the problem. There were times when North Vietnamese military divisions invaded South Vietnam. There were times when there were fairly large scale, military battles in Vietnam. Against that sort of thing I think our military was pretty good.

Our intelligence apparatus, whether military or civilian, was weaker. This was a guerrilla war which, in effect, went on in virtually every hamlet in South Vietnam. In any given hamlet there were some people who were somewhat sympathetic toward the communist side or somewhat against the existing government or power structure. The mix was different in each hamlet. Some hamlets would fight against the Viet Cong. In other neighboring hamlets people would give the communist forces food and shelter if they came through. Support for the Vietcong varied not only from hamlet to hamlet but also from time to time. Some might be willing to do something for the communist side if they were sure that they could get away with it. If it looked as if the communists were gaining strength in the area, they might help them. If the communists weren't gaining in strength, they might not be willing to help them. Essentially, each Vietnamese family was trying to figure out how to survive. The struggle had been going on for years in many ways.

Q: Or at least for a number of years.

BUSHNELL: In the long course of history the tendency was for the more dominant culture and power from North Vietnam to have a great impact in the South. Often, this meant that North Vietnamese forces moved into South Vietnam, and even into Cambodia and Thailand. There were also many people who favored the communists and who had been in South Vietnam for a long time. Ideology was only one of the factors in the Vietnamese struggles. It is an agricultural society, and there was a continual battle for land, especially fertile land where rice could be grown. In the mountains the local residents, acting sort like tribes, either fought to retain their land or struck deals with one side or the other; quite a few threw their future in with us when our troops were in the area, but they had to consider other alliances once our troops departed. We found it hard to convince the government in Saigon of the necessity to provide real support to these mountain peoples.

The Mekong Delta, which includes the most southern provinces in Vietnam, is a very rich agricultural area. Rice, in particular, can be grown there fairly easily; two or even three crops a year. Then, for a thousand miles to the North of the Mekong Delta, people have to try to scratch a living out of the land. The soils are often poor, and the area is not always well watered. Maybe there are a few areas that are fairly good. However, it was often difficult to grow food crops in these places. You have to recognize that this was a basically agricultural society. Thus the tendency was for people from this thousand miles to the north of the Delta to move to the Delta and take over areas where it was easy to make a living. Some from the north had lived in the Delta for generations. The people who live in these southernmost provinces have good crops almost every year. They are not faced with as many challenges as people in other areas were. I guess that is why they became soft, as many in Saigon put it, and therefore were easy prey for people from North Vietnam.

Q: These people are not really military people.

BUSHNELL: No. And military intelligence didn't really deal well with this situation.

Q: How about the people who worked for the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency]? Did you become aware of what they were doing? What was your impression of them?

BUSHNELL: There were a lot of them in South Vietnam.

Q: One of their problems was that there were too many of them.

BUSHNELL: I don't know whether there were too many CIA people in South Vietnam or not. I don't think it took any genius to figure out that the military didn't know the Vietnamese culture and the Vietnamese language very well. The military found it hard to fight this kind of war. Often, our forces didn't know who the enemy was. That's why we had incidents like the one at Mi Lai. The enemy turned out to be the bus boy or the kid who was shining your shoes. A couple of the senior economic officials with whom I worked turned out to have been Vietcong all along; one I remember as quite a good economist who seemed to support what we were pushing to strengthen the South Vietnamese government. When you don't know who the enemy is, things become very difficult. When you move from one place to another, you don't know who may attack you. When somebody sticks his head up, you don't know whether you should shoot him or not. If you don't shoot him, he may shoot you. This was a difficult situation for our military to be in. There was a broad recognition of this situation, and that's why we tried to use intelligence people to try to sort this out. However, CIA didn't have the resources to handle this problem. I think there were no resources in the United States to handle this problem. We were too culturally and linguistically limited to handle it.

Q: Of course, I think that we never should have gotten involved in South Vietnam. However, that's another problem.

BUSHNELL: The intelligence people were able to develop sources of information, people who would sell them information. In some cases we got good information on where people were moving and where there were communist staging areas, for example. In a Vietnamese family struggling to survive someone was often available to sell information. They may have had some ideological reason, but maybe they didn't. It didn't matter. They may have sold honest or dishonest information. With the usual short America view, we would check out information for a few weeks or months and then determine this was a reliable source. The Vietcong, on the other hand, would often leave resources dormant for many years at a time.

Q: Exactly.

BUSHNELL: The intelligence people were sophisticated in some of the questions they asked. However, we never got to the point where we could really paint a comprehensive picture of what the situation was with any confidence. We had bits and pieces of information. That is why at the NSC we tried to develop a province evaluation system that was based more on statistics that could be measured, such as reported incidents, flows of refugees, market prices. However, I soon found that much of the data we used as supposedly actual measures were in fact just guesses prepared by province advisory teams or others at the end of each month.

Q: I think it was certainly up to the State Department or political and economic analysts in the Embassy in Saigon to evaluate this situation. Their judgment should have been sought and relied upon. What was the quality of our work there?

BUSHNELL: By the time I got into it, I think some of the people in our military and in the Embassy had really stopped trying. That's the impression I had.

Q: I think so, too.

BUSHNELL: They tended to report on what the high muckety mucks were doing in Saigon. Of course, there were a lot of State Department officers in South Vietnam. That's because we had people out in all of the provinces. What we were trying to do was to...

Q: Win the hearts and minds of the people.

BUSHNELL: Well, yes. That was the right thing to do. However, the situation was a bit different from what most people think of in terms of hearts and minds. What the State Department officers assigned to South Vietnam were trying to do was to get Vietnamese who were in power, that is, who were in charge of a province or part of a province (or for that matter the national government) to discuss with us what the real problems were, that is, what was going on, and then try to deal with it and gain effective control. However, many senior Vietnamese province officials were not even from the province and did not themselves really understand the local forces at play. Sometimes their main interest was only to get funds or material. As you got down to officials in lower ranking positions, there were many people who were just trying to survive. It was hard to persuade these people to side with the Saigon Government, which was certainly no model of an honest or efficient government. In the Delta I tried to encourage tax schemes to provide support for the central government, but most farmers in the Delta were opposed to paying for the Saigon government. I think the Vietcong did a better job of raising funds in the Delta, but, of course, their tool was the threat of violence. Finally, we resorted to having the government buy most of the rice; it could then sell the rice in the cities at a considerably higher price and in effect collect taxes that way.

It was hard for State Department officers, let alone our military, to appreciate that we were dealing with people who were fantastically skilled at supporting both sides at the same time. A number of really hard core Viet Cong held positions under the Saigon Government. They would give the impression that they were the most dedicated people in the world, but they were 100% on the Viet Cong side, as we later found out.

Q: Exactly.

BUSHNELL: The war among the Vietnamese was a very long war. One of the great asymmetries was that we were always under great pressure to make it a short war. Americans wanted to finish it and go home. Whereas the Viet Cong view was that this was a very long war. It had already been a long war for them lasting generations. As a result, they could go for months or years at a time, lying low and doing nothing. I think the South Vietnamese also knew it would be a long war probably lasting beyond their lifetimes. This was one reason we found it so hard to get any urgency into South Vietnamese actions.

Q: I guess Vo Nguyen Giap [former North Vietnamese Army commander] will always be considered one of the great military geniuses. He understood the nature of this war better than we did.

BUSHNELL: I'm not sure one had to be all of that much of a genius to understand it. I think there were quite a few people in the Government, like Henry Kissinger, who came to understand the nature of the war. He understood it and was able actually to influence it. Most Americans dealing with Vietnam were much more constrained in what they could do. Even for those who would go out to a province and develop a pretty decent understanding of the situation, it wasn't clear, in that culture, how they could change things. To people who wanted to have a foot in each camp there was nothing decisive about the situation. There was no clear reason why they should take their foot out of the other camp.

Q: We can discuss all of these things, which is old stuff. How about our AID [Agency for International Development] programs?

BUSHNELL: AID was traumatized by the situation in Vietnam.

Q: It's just not the kind of situation where an aid program really makes much sense.

BUSHNELL: It's hard. The situation in South Vietnam did not fit the normal pattern of AID activity. AID would go into a province and teach people how to handle health oriented projects and how to implement health programs. By most criteria, AID handled this sort of program fairly well. However, the AID people did it by the numbers, that is, mechanically. There was nothing wrong with the health projects implemented by AID. They were just as good as any other health projects handled by AID elsewhere in the world. But AID exercised no control over the system. After prolonged efforts by AID, government officials, and the people who were assisting them to build a health clinic, there might never be a doctor or a nurse available to work there. There would be a building, but that's frequently all that there was. In fact, the result was often a big minus, in my view, because, when people saw this building being constructed, they thought that they might get some health services out of it. When they didn't get improved health services, they would feel that they had been let down. AID usually takes a long view, but in Vietnam most AID people were as eager to go home as everyone else. Some AID people told me it would take decades to bring about real change in the economy, but no one in Washington wanted to hear about such basic programs.

I spent much time with Chuck Cooper [Minister for Economic Affairs in the Embassy in Saigon] who was responsible for large amounts of AID money supporting the Vietnamese economy through the Vietnamese Commercial Import Program [CIP]. Through this program we provided all kinds of imports which were sold in the commercial market and the government could then use the funds obtained for the war and development efforts. We were, of course, involved in trying to eliminate corruption and administer the money committed to Vietnamese programs properly. Problems like corruption were always hard to handle.

Q: Did you actually have a hand in determining how the appropriation requests were structured?

BUSHNELL: Yes, that was part of my job, on the economic side.

Q: Did you have flexibility there? Was there scope for imaginative recommendations?

BUSHNELL: Generally, what we would get through the regular bureaucratic process would be too little money for Vietnam. President Nixon wasn't prepared to increase the total of aid worldwide. If we needed more money for Vietnam (as we regularly did), we had to obtain it by reprogramming from wherever we could. I became sort of a scrounger. Where I could identify an AID program that was not moving on schedule or where the political priority had been reduced, I would work with OMB and AID management to reprogram for Vietnam or Cambodia for which I also had responsibility. I was continually trying to capture money from every place I could find in the world to put it in Vietnam. The same problems arose in the budget process. AID would ask for too little money for Vietnam expecting that the White House would increase it and thus increase the AID request in total. I would work with OMB to find places to cut the request to increase Vietnam within the same, or a smaller, total request. The Government in Saigon would ask for more money every time we reduced our forces or it looked like we might be reaching an agreement with the North. Thus in some respects increasing economic assistance became almost a part of the peace negotiations. Personally I hated to see good AID programs cut to fund Vietnam, and I was often able to defend a good program. I was surprised how many weak AID programs there were when I became engaged in this scrounging.

Q: Did you have to figure out some way of diverting funds that should have gone to AID programs in Latin America, for example?

BUSHNELL: The Bureau of Latin American Affairs didn't have much money at that time. What was available was not in the supporting assistance category. The toughest fights were with programs dealing with the Middle East, which were substantial. What happened on the budget was that, finally, at the end of the budget cycle in December, say on New Years Day, I would have to be in the office and write an option paper for the President to decide whether he would fund Vietnam programs at the levels we wanted and, if so, where would the funds be taken from. He always approved the full amount for Vietnam. These option memos were hard. There were strong arguments for some of the Middle Eastern programs, including domestic political arguments. However, they were the only sources where the amount of money we needed for Vietnam could be found. Kissinger would make clear to the regional NSC staff that they should help me find funds in the programs for their countries, so my personal relationships around the NSC staff were not complicated. OMB also received guidance from Kissinger and, I suspect, the President, so OMB officers were solid allies. After awhile many people in State and AID would not talk to me about assistance programs because they identified me as a threat.

Q: You mean that the NSC [National Security Council] staff actually got into that process? I would have assumed that this would be handled by AID or the OMB [Office of Management and Budget].

BUSHNELL: OMB was quite helpful. Technically, OMB would prepare the main memorandum for the President dealing with the foreign assistance budget. I would work with OMB to get the Vietnam programs as high as possible. In fact, they were quite effective in scraping up money from various programs which were fairly marginal or questionable. Typically, if we needed an additional amount, say, $450 million, to take an arbitrary figure, the bureaucracy would agree on about $250 million. Then OMB would prepare a memorandum and add an additional $50 or $75 million to the recommendation. Then, when they sent their memo through Ken Dam, or whoever it was, Kissinger would sign a memo which I would draft. This would say, in effect, that even OMB is short of recommending the amount needed and suggest a couple of options to reach the target amount.

Q: This is Side B of Tape 8 of the interview with John A. Bushnell. What kind of recommendation would you make?

BUSHNELL: There were several rounds in this process. I don't think we ever recommended increasing the total amount of the budget for AID or PL 480 [surplus agricultural commodities]. If we were going to increase the OMB mark for Vietnam or Cambodia, we had to obtain the funds from somewhere else. In effect, we had to say where we would reduce the budget elsewhere. Sometimes we would wind up with some arbitrary figures, say, taking $50 million from Latin America and $50 million from African programs. We would leave it to others to figure out how to allocate these total cuts among the various countries. Sometimes my colleagues at the NSC would give me indications of where to regenerate funds. Kissinger would then approve this.

Q: What did you think of the USIA [United States Information Agency] program?

BUSHNELL: I don't recall having anything to do with that in Vietnam or with the worldwide effort to build support for our Vietnam policy. I was vaguely aware that part of the public affairs effort involved trying to persuade the Vietnamese Government in Saigon to act like a democratic government that wanted to be supported by all of its people. Instead, some people who worked for the Vietnamese Government often acted like little dictators. They ran things and used the structure of the government to keep the benefits largely for themselves. Part of the problem was that we tried to use public affairs, broadly speaking and beyond what USIS [United States Information Service] was doing, to try to build support for the Vietnamese Government. In effect, we were trying to do their job for them. I don't think that we were very effective at doing this, but I didn't have much exposure to this effort. I know some of my colleagues on the NSC staff regarded all of this as a tremendous waste of time and money.

Q: As long as Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker was there, he was central to everything, right?

BUSHNELL: He was central to anything within Vietnam that might be described as a big issue or big decision. However, an awful lot of things went on without his knowledge, especially in the military and intelligence areas. The scope of the Embassy's activities was so immense. Very little went on that he was actually opposed to. Of course Kissinger was in control of the negotiations with the North. Washington decided big military issues such as the bombing of Hanoi.

Q: Of course, President Johnson wanted personally to control too many things himself, which was insane. That was before you worked on South Vietnam.

BUSHNELL: Kissinger had a broad, strategic overview. He was able to take everything into account without getting into the details except where his staff showed him details that were interfering with what he wanted to do. However, when he got into detailed problems, for example, of redeploying forces in South Vietnam or bringing our troops home, he was quite capable of handling complex issues and even making them seem simple.

Q: It's easier to get into a war than it is to get out of it.

BUSHNELL: That's right, even from the logistical aspects alone. One of the continuing battles I had was that logistical lead times were too long to meet NSC targets for drawing down forces. The logistical tail is so long it takes months and months to ship out equipment and forces, get rid of a facility, and deal with all of the other things associated with the withdrawal. A year after you begin a withdrawal of a unit you still have a lot of its people in country who are still engaged in the process of the withdrawal. That is very frustrating when you are trying to reduce the number of Americans in country without overly reducing fighting forces. I was continually pressing to reduce logistical personnel and units and turn these functions over to contractors or the Vietnamese. We knew that our forces were going down in numbers. The question came up: "Why didn't we stop sending out new equipment and material?" By the time you order material from the U.S. and put it into the pipeline, a year and a half goes by before it actually gets there.

Q: And we frequently need replacements.

BUSHNELL: Yes, but it still takes a year and a half. The problem was, since we were doing this withdrawal in three-month increments, we never knew what the situation was going to be twelve months later. The logistical structure of the armed forces at any given time seemed to be working on the basis that we had virtually the same force structure that we had had in South Vietnam a year and a half earlier. Thus equipment and supplies ordered long ago were being delivered, even if the units originally needing them were no longer in Vietnam. We knew the President wasn't going to stop the withdrawal, but the military acted like he might reverse course. Thus, a lot of stuff that had been ordered would be shipped to Vietnam and then would have to be re-packed and shipped back. It took a lot of soldiers to do that.

Q: Wasn't it [name indistinct] who said that the way we could get out of Vietnam was by sending ships and planes out there to move the stores and equipment out.

BUSHNELL: That's true, but it's not what we did. The ships that went over were full of new supplies. It would have been easier for us to get out if we turned over to the South Vietnamese much of our equipment. This was generally what Kissinger and other people in the NSC thought we should do. The South Vietnamese were to replace us, so why not give them our equipment. Our military argued that the Vietnamese were not prepared to maintain, and in some cases use, our sophisticated equipment. Moreover, we did not want some things to be at risk of capture by the communists. Also in many cases there was no new equipment in the pipeline for the redeploying units. My problem was to sort out where the military had sound arguments and where they just didn't want to give something to the Vietnamese. It was a case by case struggle. Fortunately some military officers like General Wickham helped make sense of it.

Q: Did you meet Graham Martin [last Ambassador to the Republic of Vietnam] in Saigon?

BUSHNELL: Yes.

Q: Do you recall the circumstances under which you met him?

BUSHNELL: The first time I met him was at the NSC [National Security Council] in Washington, as he was preparing to go to South Vietnam. Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker had had an official airplane which was provided for him in Saigon in part to travel to and from Nepal to visit his wife, Ambassador Carol Laise [who was Ambassador to Nepal during part of the time that Ambassador Bunker was Ambassador to the Republic of Vietnam]. Ambassador Martin decided he wanted to have an airplane dedicated for his use and asked the NSC to arrange it. There was quite a humorous discussion about where he might want to visit at one staff meeting. I think Brent Scowcroft was the Deputy National Security Adviser to President Nixon by that time. He said: "No. We gave Ambassador Bunker a plane because the President really wanted to keep him in Saigon far longer than one could expect someone to serve, but now we are phasing down." However, it was finally decided that the Air Force would provide a Special Missions plane to fly Ambassador Martin out to Saigon when he first went to post. He would arrive in the big aircraft marked United States of America, even though it would not stay in Saigon at his disposition after that.

Phil Odeen, who had replaced Wayne Smith, said to me: "It's just about time for you to go to Saigon. You can fly out there with Ambassador Martin." I said: "Fine." I called up the State Department, said I needed to go to Saigon, and asked if I could go out on Ambassador Martin's plane. I was told Ambassador Martin was not taking any passengers on his Special Missions aircraft; there were many people who wanted to fly to Saigon with him, especially those who were on recreation leave in the States, so the Ambassador was solving the problem of choosing by not taking anyone even those on official business. I told Brent Scowcroft, and he said: "I arranged for the plane for Martin. Consider yourself on that flight." The same State Dept desk officer later called me and said: "John, you've done it again! You're on the plane." I went to Andrews Air Force Base at the appointed hour. Ambassador Martin was traveling with two staff aides and his dog. There were only the four of us, not counting the dog, on a 707 aircraft, and there were not the several hours of work I was accustomed to when traveling with Al Haig.. We flew first to Honolulu, to CINCPAC. Ambassador Martin spent some time with CINCPAC [Commander in Chief, Pacific], but I didn't sit in on his meeting. I don't think he wanted me there, and I got a lot done with the staff relevant to my work.

Ambassador Martin had a fairly distant manner. I never got to know him well. I had worked day and night for weeks with Ambassador Bunker in the Dominican Republic so I had a long standing close relationship with him. He was a very warm individual. I only had a few trips to Saigon while Ambassador Martin was there. I never established the kind of relationship with him that I had had with Ambassador Bunker, who always wanted to sit down and talk about serious matters.

Q: I don't think anyone had a close, personal relationship with Graham Martin. I knew him fairly well in Bangkok. Did you have any particular impression as to how Ambassador Martin operated?

BUSHNELL: By the time Ambassador Martin went to Saigon in mid-1973 as chief of mission, our military withdrawal was completed. Our policies were really pretty well established. There were only details of economic and military assistance to the South to be worked out. At this point I don't recall reading any Martin to the President cables. I think he operated like other State Department chiefs of mission. All aspects of our involvement in South Vietnam were being phased down. Wherever he looked, people were leaving. Also I was spending less and less time on Vietnam myself after the cease-fire and the withdrawal of the military.

Q: He had a fairly ignominious tour of duty in Saigon.

BUSHNELL: The end for South Vietnam came quicker than anybody that I know expected.

Q: Do you have any further comments on Vietnam?

BUSHNELL: I might add one footnote -- an unusual experiences I had in December of 1972 when President Nixon decided to resume bombing of Hanoi. The purpose of the bombing was, of course, to pressure the North to reach agreement at the peace talks. However, in preparing for the NSC meeting on resumed bombing, potential targets had to be chosen. Phil Odeen, a military officer on the NSC staff, and myself spent several hours in the Pentagon targeting center. It was easy to agree to avoid targets close to prisoner camps, but there was then a lot of disagreement on what to hit. Kissinger had instructed us to choose targets that would really get the attention of the leadership. The military seemed to prefer targets that might disrupt the supply of materials to the South. Of course, in North Vietnam it is hard to identify many really lucrative targets. They weren't an industrialized society. They didn't have ball bearing factories, and what factories they had were dispersed. Thus the selection of targets was difficult. We drew up a paper with a few agreed targets and two or three sets of potential additions for the NSC principals to consider.

Q: Was this in December, 1973 -- the Christmas bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong?

BUSHNELL: No. It was 1972. The bombing lasted 12 days. Most of the targets selected in the NSC meeting were hit. Peace talks resumed. On January 27, 1973 the cease-fire agreement was signed. I didn't attend the NSC meeting at which the decision was made on which targets to attack. However, later the same day or the next day I departed with Haig and a few others on another secret mission to Saigon. This trip we flew first to Hawaii. Then, after a visit of a couple hours with CINCPAC, we took the shortest route to Saigon, which required a refueling stop in Guam, which was where the B-52 bombers were stationed. We arrived in Guam, and Al Haig was able to make an appearance at the final briefing for the pilots who would initiate the bombing of Hanoi. We saw the air crews get into their planes and saw them take off. Very seldom do diplomatic officers participate in such strategic decision-making and then see the decision being implemented. Watching these B-52s take off gave me an eerie feeling. Almost as soon as they had taken off, we left for Saigon. The President and Kissinger thought these bombing raids on Hanoi and Haiphong were going to make a fantastic difference. They certainly brought Hanoi back to the negotiations in Paris, but I don't think that they made much of a difference to the situation in South Vietnam.

DAVID LAMBERTSON
Spokesman
Paris (1971-1973)

East Asia Bureau, Regional Affairs
Washington, DC (1973-1975)

David Lambertson was born in Kansas in 1940. He received his BA from the University of Redlands in 1962. He entered the Foreign Service in 1963, and his assignments abroad included Saigon, Medan, Paris, Canberra and Seoul with an ambassadorship to Thailand.

Q: Yes, how do you get, when does that cable come in that says here's your next job?

LAMBERTSON: I honestly don't remember what I did or exactly who I was in contact with to make sure that my next job was the Paris Peace Talks. I don't know that I actually went after that job with great fervor or whether it was offered to me, but I was happy to have it. I would have preferred to have gone there directly from Saigon in 1968, but going there in 1971 also interested me. I was surprised, I suppose, that the Talks were still going on in 1971. I left Medan in the spring of 1971, and traveled to Paris by way of Tunisia where I visited Arch Calhoun, my former boss in Saigon. I got to Paris, it must have been in April of '71, although I then went back to the United States and then turned around and returned to Paris.

The Paris Peace Talks by then had been going on for three years and not a whole lot had been accomplished. The American delegation by that time was led by David Bruce who I came to respect and admire, a very fine gentleman I thought. His deputy was Phil Habib. So, I was once again in familiar territory. Steve Ledogar was the press spokesman, Peter Collins, who had been with me in Saigon, was a liaison officer and that is what I also became. I was also the admin guy for the delegation the first year I was there, which entailed occasional arguments with people in the embassy in Paris over such issues as whether we could continue to use their spacious library. If you've ever been in the embassy in Paris you know they have a marvelous paneled library - a wonderful room. We used that library again in 1989 when I was in Paris for a conference on Cambodia. In any event I had some administrative responsibility, but not that much. Then we had a change in leadership in the delegation after I'd been there a few months. David Bruce left, and William Porter, the former deputy ambassador in Saigon, former ambassador to Algeria and at that time ambassador to Korea came from Seoul to replace Bruce as head of the delegation.

Q: That change representing?

LAMBERTSON: Then Phil Habib went to Seoul to replace Bill Porter as ambassador to Korea.

Q: Is that a normal rotation of people?

LAMBERTSON: David Bruce was a high-profile political appointee on the order of an Ellsworth Bunker, and appointing William Porter, however distinguished his career might have been, represented a slight diminution in the status of the post. I suppose that's because by then Henry Kissinger was engaged in his own line of negotiation and really didn't much care what happened in Paris, except that it was an operation we had to keep going because the North Vietnamese themselves demanded that it continue. So, Porter became the chief of the delegation. Phil left. Heyward Isham replaced Phil and became the deputy. Steve Ledogar left and I became the press spokesman for the delegation - a far more interesting job for me than being liaison officer and general factotum.

I might add that something else happened at about that time which was somewhat significant in my life - I married Sacie and acquired three wonderful stepchildren. Whatever success I enjoyed subsequently, I owe to her, at least mostly. That was in the summer of '72.

So for the last year, roughly, that I was there I was the spokesman for the delegation. That meant participating in a four-way, on-the-record press conference following each plenary session of the Paris Talks, which always took place on Thursday afternoons at the Hotel Majestic near the Arc de Triumph.

Q: Four way, so American...?

LAMBERTSON: North Vietnam, South Vietnam, Viet Cong - called the "Provisional Revolutionary Government" - and ourselves.

Q: Of course, this is a big thing for the press, especially American...

LAMBERTSON: That's right. The Paris press corps during the Vietnam Peace Talks was much larger than before or since in terms of American representation and probably in terms of other foreign representation also. When the Peace Talks ended in January of '73 an awful lot of American newspapers closed up shop in Paris. Many of the correspondents there had been with the subject since it began in May of 1968 and at least some of them had a very good knowledge of the way the talks had developed, the history of what had gone on, in a way that I really did not. Therefore, they could be formidable questioners in a press conference situation.

Q: Actually it's a daunting job to handle the press. Richard Boucher seems to have permanently ensconced himself into that. As you say you must have gotten some tough questions or slid off the podium once or twice?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, because the press corps was inclined to be highly skeptical of any of our claims and critical of our position. Certainly that was true of the foreign press and also true of some of the American press. What made it especially difficult was that I was not an "authoritative" spokesman because Henry Kissinger was doing secret negotiations while we were having our open plenary sessions and the two could quite often diverge. The subject of our plenary sessions sometimes, often, had nothing to do with what Henry was talking about. Our talks had basically become exchanges of polemics, which as I mentioned the North Vietnamese considered very valuable. This was a weekly opening to the world for them. That's why they wanted it to continue even though the real business was being done between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. As 1972 wore on and Kissinger's activities became more and more open, or less and less secret should I say, my job as spokesman got harder.

In the beginning Kissinger would come and go into Paris, and no one would know he'd been there except perhaps the head of our delegation. His travels were arranged by the defense attaché in Paris, who later became chief of the CIA, General Walters, Vernon Walters. He handled Henry's clandestine movements in and out of Paris.

By the summer of '72 it was well known that Kissinger was engaged in these talks. By the fall of '72 his arrivals in Paris were no longer a secret although they weren't advertised, but people knew he was there. Still later on there were motorcycle paparazzi chasing him around as his motorcade moved from one point to another. It became gradually more and more an open thing. As it did, and as correspondents were clued in at least in a general way from briefings in Washington and elsewhere about what was going on in the private talks, I'd get interesting questions directed at me on these Thursday afternoon occasions and I seldom knew any more than the journalists did about what might have happened.

I was really under a constraint. I was not supposed to say anything about Henry Kissinger's activities - how dare I. On a few occasions when I did, my wrist was slapped and I was told not to do it again. I once ventured to characterize, for example, the "tone" of Henry's meeting the previous day. I was informed that Kissinger was displeased, and that so was Le Duc Tho, and that I should desist. It was an untenable position for a press spokesman, when you don't really know what's going on and you're not even allowed to say what you do know - and you're dealing with a press corps that knows about as much as you do.

I would also often get into exchanges having to do with American military operations in Vietnam – for example, whether or not a flood control dike with an anti-aircraft position on top of it was or was not a legitimate military target. One of my worst hecklers was the Australian communist writer, Wilfred Burchett. I was frankly relieved when my press spokespersonship ended, although I had appreciated the temporary notoriety it gave me. My mother occasionally saw me on the nightly news.

Q: It certainly must have been different, given the initiative and challenge of being in Vietnam and then to be totally circumscribed. I mean you can't get two more different ends of the whole Foreign Service experience.

LAMBERTSON: I suppose that's right. It was just a function of the fact that the real negotiation was taking place elsewhere. The press was constantly probing to see if they could get any insight through this one channel available to them into the still essentially secret process. I may have been circumscribed, but the job most certainly was challenging.

Q: Speaking of insights, you were saying at one time Kissinger came through town and he briefed a group of Embassy officers?

LAMBERTSON: Kissinger and Dick Smyser came through, and I suppose Winston Lord must have been with him also. He met with our delegation and he talked with us about his visit to South Vietnam, during which I think he was trying to get Nguyen Van Thieu to agree to more forthcoming formulations that he could use in his secret talks. He also discussed at some length his stopover in Pakistan and briefed us on the situation on the subcontinent, in which I had no interest. I couldn't understand why he felt it necessary to talk about that subject. Then he left. He neglected to mention that he had also gone from Pakistan into Beijing, secretly. William Porter was in on his secret, but nobody else in the delegation was. Vernon Walters probably knew about it also. We read about it in the papers a couple of days later.

Q: The talks finally do come to some resolution though, right?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, in October of 1972 Kissinger had his "peace is at hand" press conference. One of those brilliant performances he was capable of. There were some snags between that point and the final agreement, which caused us to unleash B-52s over North Vietnam at Christmas 1972. We got an agreement then, finally, in January of 1973. William Rogers, our Secretary of State, came to Paris to sign the agreement. Kissinger had earlier initialed the agreement with Le Duc Tho. We had an elaborate ceremony on, what was it, January 25, 23, something like that, 1973 ending American participation in the Vietnam War. Our withdrawal began immediately and POWs returned within the next month. South Vietnam was more or less on its own.

Q: In fact, did you leave Paris shortly after this? I mean that must have been the end of the Peace Talks delegation.

LAMBERTSON: Porter left, but the delegation was to become the core of a joint economic commission. I don't know if you remember that about the Vietnam Peace Talks. We were going to give them lots of aid had this agreement worked out, and a joint commission was to be established as part of the agreement and was to begin its meetings immediately in Paris. So the delegation remained more or less intact, but as I recall I had very little to do. By early April my family and I were on a six week tour of Southern Europe, and shortly after we got back, I left Paris. Needless to say the joint economic commission, if that indeed was the name, never amounted to anything. My work ended essentially in January.

Q: You started working on landing the next job. Did you call them or did they call you?

LAMBERTSON: It was time for me to go back to Washington. I hadn't served in Washington in a real job since that disastrous first assignment. Again, I can't remember whether somebody asked me to come back and be a sort of junior policy officer in EA/RA (Office of Regional Affairs in the East Asia Bureau) or whether I knew it was available and lobbied to get it. Maybe a little of both. By then I was comfortable with the East Asia Bureau. I had begun to make a name for myself within the Bureau and it's possible that I knew enough about the flow chart that I was able to identify that job and maneuver myself into it. In any event, I went to EA/RA in the spring of 1973.

Q: Who was the head of regional affairs?

LAMBERTSON: Bob Martens. His deputy was Dick Nethercut, another China guy, right? Both good men.

Q: Yes.

LAMBERTSON: Oh and Louise McNutt was in the office. Do you know her or do you know who she was?

Q: She was there forever, wasn't she?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, forever. She was the daughter of Governor Paul McNutt of Indiana, who was one of FDR's great political rivals within the Democratic Party and had been sent off to the Philippines as Governor General to sort of get him out of FDR's way. So Louise spent her girlhood in the governor's mansion in Manila, at least a few years of it. A wonderful woman with an office piled high with every UN publication that had ever been cranked out. One time our Pentagon liaison told her he had hidden a secret document in her bookshelves, and she would have to find it. Louise was wonderful.

Q: But isn't that the point, the regional affairs office in the State Department bureaus, I don't want to say was the "pick up" office, but they covered the broader, intra-regional issues.

LAMBERTSON: It was a collection of very disparate functions. Louise was our United Nations officer and I think was pretty good at knowing what was happening at the UN and how it might affect what we were doing. There was a POL/MIL function - the guy in EA/RA kind of liaised with PM as well as with the individual country offices. Harriet Isom was in the office, in fact, I replaced her, and one of my functions was "SEATO affairs".

Q: Oh, goodness.

LAMBERTSON: We had a vault, the "SEATO vault," as if something secret had been produced that required being kept in a vault. I think during my tenure that job ended and the vault was cleaned out. SEATO was officially put to rest.

Q: What are your responsibilities? You're a fourth tour officer now?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, my title was "policy officer" and I did have an actual policy-related job, which was to design and disseminate to the field - and hope for cooperation from the field - annual policy analysis and resource allocation documents. Do you remember those things? PARA was one acronym for them and they had others as the years went by. They were taken seriously by some posts and not at all seriously by others. It was my job to put the thing together, to get it out to the field, to keep track of who had responded and who hadn't and to do whatever we had to do with it when the submission was made. Dave Osborn was the ambassador in Burma at that time, and he really took it seriously. He thought it ought to be redesigned, and he reportedly spent hours with his office floor covered with papers and flow charts, and he sent in something that was quite interesting that I'm sure nobody really looked at. He probably had time on his hands in Rangoon.

Then, as 1973 moved into 1974, Vietnam was beginning to fail and the frailty and the flaws in the Paris Agreement on Vietnam were becoming more and more evident and the North Vietnamese military had moved into the South in a big way. They were putting pressure on Saigon on many fronts and it was pretty clear that things were headed down the drain. This continued to be a major preoccupation of the bureau, of course, and I got drawn back into the Vietnam business from my EA/RA position. I was interested in what was happening and put myself forward and was increasingly involved in writing papers related to the situation and writing congressional presentations, all that sort of thing. By the second half of 1974 I was probably working on Vietnam more than anything else.

John Helbe was Phil Habib's special assistant. Phil being the Assistant Secretary at this point. One of my more vivid experiences while in EARA was attending the 1974 chiefs of mission meeting in Honolulu, December of '74. I went there, I guess technically, because I was the policy officer and we were supposed to be talking to ambassadors about those PARA documents.

Q: Now a chiefs of mission meeting, isn't that where the ambassadors from that region all get together and share their experiences hopefully with the thought that one person's experience is going to improve the others' performance.

LAMBERTSON: That's right. For years it had been traditional to do it in Honolulu in December. That was still the practice when I was in Bangkok. I'm not sure whether budgetary or other things have interrupted that tradition, probably so. In any event I went to that meeting. As I said, I had a faint excuse theoretically because of my titular job as policy officer, but I really went there because of the Vietnam aspect of it. We knew that Vietnam was going to be an important agenda topic and John Helble was good enough to make sure that I got on the airplane.

I remember it quite vividly - at least I remember the tenor of the exchanges that took place on the subject of Vietnam. Particularly at a Sunday morning discussion we had at a private estate right on the ocean, on the North shore of Oahu. Some rich person's place had been given over to us for the day. We went out there by helicopter and sat around the pool and the subject was primarily Vietnam and Cambodia. Although the day started with a briefing by a guy from the EB (Economics) bureau - Mike Ely maybe - on the 1974 trade act, an important new piece of legislation. When the discussion turned to Vietnam there was a lot of tension in the air because of the bitter feelings of Graham Martin toward Phil Habib and toward Washington.

Graham Martin was quite sure that Washington could and should be doing more to help our friends in South Vietnam. Phil Habib was explaining to him and to the others assembled around the pool the political realities of 1974 in the United States, particularly after the election of an overwhelmingly more Democratic, young and very anti-war House of Representatives - the so-called "class of '74." So, I was aware of the problem that existed between Graham Martin and Phil Habib because I guess it was semi-public, but John Helble also kind of kept me up to date, describing the occasional telegram that I wouldn't have seen from Graham Martin to Phil. Martin seemed to be convinced that Washington generally and Phil in particular could be doing more than was being done to stem the tide. John Gunther Dean was also present and he had equally gloomy things to say about the situation in Cambodia.

Q: I wonder about some of the other observers, I think Kintner would have been there from Thailand and Ambassador Unger would have been there from the Republic of China.

LAMBERTSON: I don't recall what they had to say in the Vietnam discussion. I don't remember details of the discussion - just the atmospherics of it. I do remember Ambassador Unger arriving with a briefing book that must have been six inches thick, literally. Such a detail guy. A very nice man, but I couldn't believe it when I saw this thing he was carrying around with him.

Q: The China God does its work.

LAMBERTSON: He didn't want to leave anything to chance when it came to having what he needed with him.

Q: So, actually, what you're really saying here is that domestic political changes have occurred that will impact on the conduct of foreign policy or what one can do in foreign policy?

LAMBERTSON: Oh, absolutely.

Q: It goes back to Clausewitz, if the public doesn't support you, you're in trouble.

LAMBERTSON: That's right, and by then the public had generally stopped supporting this effort.

Q: Your vantage point is regional affairs. The public support stops and still that's a hard thing to watch. I mean you had been there. You had Vietnam experience, but now you're working with the Hill, you're doing papers.

LAMBERTSON: Yes, as I said, in 1974 there'd been an influx of new almost exclusively anti-war Democrats into the House. I went with Phil Habib one afternoon to a large room in the capitol building where we met with the House Democratic caucus. It couldn't have been all of them. I don't think there were 250 people in the room, but there were an awful lot, including people like Phil Burton of San Francisco, Bella Abzug and Patsy Mink. Just outrageously outspoken people. It was a very tough meeting. I wasn't doing the talking, Phil was. I was just his spear-carrier. It was a kind of an eye opener to be in the same room with that much anti-war sentiment all at one time. It felt good to escape from it. That was indicative of the atmosphere. We were asking, incidentally, for $750 million more in military aid in the spring of 1975 for Saigon. In 1975 that was real money, you know. Congress was not inclined to provide any.

Q: That's certainly one of the lessons that you ultimately learned in this business: whatever policy you're pursuing has to be publicly acceptable, but most Foreign Service Officers to a fourth assignment don't get a real live exposure to those political currents.

LAMBERTSON: We were all exposed to those currents with respect to Vietnam, at least after I left Saigon in 1968 and as the situation worsened. You couldn't be unaware of the political reality surrounding the Vietnam issue. But it was interesting to brush up against it first hand as I did quite a lot in the spring of 1975, going up to the Hill with Phil and also a couple of times as part of Kissinger's entourage for those huge hearings of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees.

Q: Ultimately Saigon falls April 30, 1975.

LAMBERTSON: Right, I was in the Ops Center that night.

Q: Coincidentally or...?

LAMBERTSON: I'm sure it was not coincidental. The bureau must have had some kind of special watch going on.

Q: You could see it coming. It wasn't just that day.

LAMBERTSON: It wasn't just that day, but a number of days leading up to it. I remember sitting in a small room with Phil and with Larry Eagleburger that night, and I have a copy someplace of Saigon's last telegram, signing off. Also, during that period when it became evident that Saigon was going down the tubes, there was a lot of preliminary work that got underway on the refugee front and I was in on some of it. Frank Wisner was a prime mover in that. I forget where Frank was working at that point. A number of people were involved. I met with them a couple of times, and we were talking in a preliminary way about how this likely large influx of people was going to be handled, before it became an official government project. Then after the fall of Saigon, I remember going with Phil and Wisner to a hearing before Ted Kennedy's subcommittee. He had a subcommittee that had to do with refugee issues. Do you remember that?

Q: No, because I always have refugees starting with...

LAMBERTSON: He had a guy by the name of Jerry Tinker. Do you remember that name?

Q: Yes, that sounds familiar.

LAMBERTSON: Jerry was a classmate of mine at Redlands and he was for years Kennedy's staffer on refugee issues. Kennedy chaired a hearing on...

Q: We had Cuban refugees and all that sort of stuff.

LAMBERTSON: ...on preparations for handling the exodus from Vietnam. Then about the last thing Vietnam-related that I did and about the last thing I did in EA/RA – that must have been within a week of the fall of Saigon - we got a memo from Brent Scowcroft, a Scowcroft-Springsteen memo in which the Department was asked to provide the White House a paper on the “lessons of Vietnam.” I became the chief author of that and I collected a lot of views from people in the bureau. Everybody had things to say. I wrote that memo, Bob Miller cleared it and Phil signed it and it went back through the Springsteen-Scowcroft channel. I got a copy a few years later and have since acquired a legitimate declassified copy through the FOI process. It's a good memo - the sort of thing we might have done well to read carefully before our latest adventure in the Middle East.

Q: Let me take you back to a couple of things that you've mentioned. Planning ahead for refugees. There's a tension here between it-ain't-going-to-happen-and-even-if-it-is-you-don't-want-to-make-preparations-because-you'll-make-it-happen and the need to plan to ahead.

LAMBERTSON: Yes, and so there were these informal meetings that took place, and I was kind of on the margins of those as I said.

Q: There wasn't a refugee bureau at that time.

LAMBERTSON: Is that right?

Q: I'm fairly certain. It comes to me as a result of all this.

LAMBERTSON: It probably came about in the Carter administration, right?

Q: Yes. I think so. One of the things that...

LAMBERTSON: After 1977.

Q: This is tape three. We were discussing post-fall of Saigon refugee thinking. You were saying that policy initiation was at a different level than you. You were on the side, so who was thinking refugees?

LAMBERTSON: Well, not necessarily on a different level, but I wasn't as intimately involved as people like Lionel Rosenblatt and I think Frank Wisner and a few other guys who really did a lot to lay the groundwork for what became a plan.

Q: Now the ultimate circumstance they faced was rescuing people at sea, getting them to the Philippines, arranging for countries of first asylum to accept the refugees. I mean that was a major effort there, but yet let's see you actually come out of regional affairs shortly after the fall of Saigon, so?

LAMBERTSON: I shifted gears very soon thereafter, and I was never directly involved in the big refugee program, other than that we had a Vietnamese refugee family living with us for a few months that fall and winter.

Q: You were saying you were in the Ops Center with Larry Eagleburger when the news comes over. What did the room feel like?

LAMBERTSON: Well, it wasn't a "you could have heard a pin drop" type situation. Everybody knew what was happening and undoubtedly everybody had their own thoughts on the subject as that last telegram came in. I remember Phil and Larry Eagleburger reacting quite normally to the evening's events, as they both were inclined to do, with very little phasing them. To me it was a huge thing.

Q: It brought down the curtain.

LAMBERTSON: Yes. It was a very moving and emotional evening for me and I'm sure for lots of people.

JOHN WOLF
Consular Officer
Da Nang (1972-1973)

Ambassador Wolf was born in Philadelphia in September, 1948. He was educated at Dartmouth College and graduated with a degree in English and American art. He joined the Foreign Service in 1970. He has served in Perth, Western Australia, Da Nang, Vietnam, Athens, Greece, Islamabad, Pakistan, and several high-level positions in the State Department. He was Ambassador to Malaysia and Assistant Secretary of State for Non-Proliferation. Ambassador Wolf was interviewed by Kenneth Brown in 2014.

Q: And you transferred to Da Nang.

WOLF: To Da Nang directly.

Q: And that was an unaccompanied tour I assume.

WOLF: No, Mahela was with me.

Q: At that time --

WOLF: I remember I was walking down the St George's Terrace talking to Carl Jacobson, the commerce officer. And they were building one of Perth's first major, skyscrapers. I was saying that by the end of my tour (in six months) they would have topped out that building. And I arrived at the consulate to find a telegram saying, "Before transferring to Da Nang, you should request permission as a key new officer on Ambassador Bunker's staff for, Mahela Wolf, spouse, to accompany you to Da Nang."

So the first message was, "Who's going to Da Nang? Wolf has another six months."

Back, "Oh sorry, we forgot. We meant to call before, but..." Eventually my CDO (career development officer) called up and said, "Oh, I'm so sorry, I sent the telegram before we had a chance to call. But I assume you'll agree to this transfer."

And you know, I sort of thought about it for all of a second and thought, "Career continues? Career ends."

Q: Yeah, right.

WOLF: So I said yes -- but apparently two people had said no beforehand.

Q: Really?

WOLF: I guess I wasn't the first choice. And that comes back to when I went to Perth I remember Mr. Lacey had apparently fought against having a young first tour officer. He said, "I need somebody with experience because, I don't want to have to spend all my time supervising." And I'm not sure they didn't do the same thing in Da Nang. I went, and Mr. Appling, too went off to be the deputy ambassador in Saigon, which was really cool because he had become a friend and mentor.

Q: But he was in -- when he was in Australia as DCM working for the ambassador, who was the ambassador at that time?

WOLF: What was his first name? Walter Rice.

Q: Rice. Was he a political appointee.

WOLF: Yes.

Q: Did he -- but it seemed to be a pretty well run embassy and, and its contacts with the constituent posts were pretty well conducted?

WOLF: I suppose, but my range of vision from Perth was pretty limited.

Q: Yeah, it was above your pay --

WOLF: That was super above my pay grade. I was an FSO-8.

Q: Yeah, so no great --

WOLF: I was one of six professional diplomats in West Australia, which made me an object of curiosity.

Q: (laughs) Well, when did they change the rules about families being able to go to Vietnam?

WOLF: Most families were not there. They were safe havened in Bangkok. But Mike Owens, who was my predecessor in Da Nang, had his wife Jane with him. I guess Da Nang was a reasonably safe place. Some of the AID (Agency for International Development) spouses were there as well.

Q: So if you were willing to --

WOLF: If you had no -- I mean there were no children.

Q: Yeah, no, yeah, OK.

But when having spouses come to a place like Da Nang, they weren't requiring that the spouses be employed there at the post?

WOLF: Mahela had worked as a teacher in Australia, but there were no schools and no military schools or anything in which to teach in Da Nang. So she helped to run the commissary and she volunteered -- she taught English to Vietnamese women.

Q: But it wasn't a requirement --

WOLF: No.

Q: -- to be allowed to be at post.

WOLF: No, no, no, no.

Q: Because that's essentially -- I hadn't realized that that would have been permitted at that time.

Q: So you didn't get home leave.

WOLF: Between Australia, no, I was deferred. I went as a direct transfer We flew to Hong Kong for a couple of days. And then we got on an Air France plane. I remember walking down the steps at Tan Son Nhut only to see smoke rising at the end of the runway. Mahela stayed onboard, since she was going to the US to be naturalized before coming back to Vietnam (She was Trinidadian by birth).

Q: Mm-hmm, mm-hmm.

WOLF: I was taken in by Josiah Bennett? Do you remember --

Q: I remember the name.

WOLF: He was the minister counselor for political affairs, and Mrs. Bennett was his spouse -- what a whirling dervish she was. She was my hostess for those first days in Vietnam, while I was going into the embassy, but the rest of the time she was taking me around. She had been born in China. She was the daughter of a Mandarin family and she then married and moved off to the U.S. But she was just this dynamic, probably tiger mom.

Q: Mm-hmm, mm-hmm.

WOLF: I remember that was a great way to start. And then I went off to Da Nang and Fred Brown -- did you know Fred?

Q: Yes.

WOLF: And Fred Brown was the consul and, you know, I couldn't have asked for a better consul. Fred was amazing. And again, very helpful.

Q: How many people at post?

WOLF: You mean how many Foreign Service people at post?

Q: Well, who made up Da Nang?

WOLF: So there were Fred Brown, Craig Dunkerley, one Foreign Service secretary, and me. There was an AID CORDS (Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support) mission and there was a very large regional affairs office.

Q: Mm-hmm.

WOLF: And there was still a residual military presence when I got there.

Q: Mm-hmm, mm-hmm.

WOLF: Marines? A few army on our side of the river, and I believe Marines across the river.

WOLF: I arrived in Vietnam right after the US election -- indeed the day Dr. Kissinger announced "Peace is at hand." (I had the chance to joke with him many years later that I was pretty certain he was not referring to me).

Shortly after the ceasefire, the consulate was upgraded, and Fred became the consul general. We moved into what was known as "the White Elephant" which had been the AID mission right on the riverfront. So we had this amazing combined mission, with all kinds of resources, including aircraft, helicopters, and even two beach houses on what then was known as "China Beach."

Q: And a beach house.

WOLF: Actually the regional affairs guys' house was nicer, and they had Filipino FSNs working for them, supremely good cooks. They'd host weekly cook-outs where they'd roast a pig or whatever. Parties with those guys was great because when you'd show up at a party at their core house, you know, in the front room there was like a square coffee table and people were asked to deposit their weapons.

Q: (laughs) There'd be a pile of -- WOLF: A pile of all kinds of guns, rifles, whatever.

Q: Sounds like the Old West.

WOLF: It was, it was Da Nang.

Q: And what were your responsibilities?

WOLF: So I the consular officer; in addition I was responsible for the U.S. contractors who back-filled as the military departed.

Q: American contractors.

WOLF: American contractors, they managed communications and a variety of other things for the Vietnamese. This was new territory for me, but the Embassy left me to work out coordination procedures. I do recall tho' one visit by the U.S. Brigadier General in charge. At a point, we needed him to come and crack heads, which he did. I did the consular work, which was largely protection work and a few visas -- often for fiancés of soldiers. I remember too that was the first time I saw somebody deceased when I was doing citizen protection work, collecting and protecting his possessions--

Q: First time in your life to have seen some --

WOLF: First time in my life. Fortunately, there weren't that a lot of those cases, but I graphically remember that room. There was a lot of work related to adoptions and registrations of births. Registration of births was pretty difficult because you had to do a certain amount of detective work to establish the validity of the claim. And if I'm not mistaken decisions may have been approved in Saigon or Washington because it was pretty controversial stuff.

Q: These were usually military with Vietnamese women?

WOLF: Yes. We also did a very limited amount of visa work, mostly immigrant visas. Every case was complicated and I had a great resource in Saigon, Laurie Peters, who provided a lot of telephone support. We also issued a few non-immigrant visas, mostly to third country contractors who wanted to go to the United States and generally didn't qualify, and fiancés generally from departed soldiers...they required scrutiny since a number of these arrangements were shams. "How long have you known Cp'l xxx...fifteen minutes!"

As in Perth, where there were a variety of third country nationals who applied for visas, but didn't qualify under the Immigration and Nationality Act presumption of intending resident.

Q: Going to be a detour along the way.

WOLF: It was really complicated in Da Nang. Fraud was rampant. So my daily caseload was a consular work, a little bit of contact work, like with people who ran operations on the pier -- a little bit of political work, but Craig Dunkerley was the political officer and, with his Vietnamese, he did most of the substantive stuff. Mine was mostly just networking in order to be more effective when I needed to find somebody who could help with whatever.

Q: Then you didn't get involved on the reporting side?

WOLF: I didn't do a whole lot of reporting. One substantive thing I did do was the post E&E plan (emergency and evacuation)...that was the real deal, and a plan that the post had to use several years later as Da Nang was falling to the North Vietnamese. I remember one, early iteration suggested we use helicopters flying from the courtyard of the consulate general. That idea was shelved quickly when the military liaison reminded me that helicopters have a transition time, after they rise and before they move laterally, and that our helicopters would be an easy target. We settled on boats down the Han River.

After I had been at post for about 10 months we had corralled the contractors and things were working pretty well. Also, the consular work had fallen off to nearly nothing -- except I still was doing a lot of authentications. In the old days, you know, you used to authenticate that it was the signature of a foreign, qualified foreign official.

Q: Exactly.

WOLF: And you used to do it in like 10 copies, you'd sign them all. And I just remember that, as my workload -- as all the other things sort of tapered off or disappeared, the authentication work continued relentlessly to the point where I'd be sitting in my sandbagged office with no windows, sitting behind a big desk that we had commandeered from the army when they left Vietnam. My consular assistant would come in and hand me piles of authentications, but I was so starved to do work and I'd start signing quickly. And I actually got down from John S. Wolf to John Wolf to J. Wolf to JW to J-line. That would cut the stack of these things to 30-40 seconds of work, but then I'd think to myself, "Great, I've done my whole morning's work," (laughs). It's about then that I started lobbying for a transfer, pointing out that what the post needed was another reporting officer, somebody who spoke Vietnamese. French was not exactly that they wanted to speak in Central Vietnam. Eventually the director-general visited Da Nang on a tour of the new consulates and Fred let me host the DG for lunch so that I'd have a chance to lobby him after lunch when I was driving back to the consulate general. Good that it was on the way to the consulate vs. return, because when I was returning home a tire fell off my Jeep and I ended up in a drainage ditch. It probably would not have helped my case if the DG had been there, but he wasn't. Anyway, the effort paid off and a few weeks later we were transferred off to Athens.

Q: Well, was your work there -- because you mentioned the sandbagged office -- was your work there very much affected in terms of security, in terms of --

WOLF: It was constant. You could drive in the city, but if I went for instance to Hoi An one of my consular assistants would drive, and I remember he use to keep a loaded revolver under a pillow on the front seat. We couldn't drive north to Hue. When we went to there, we went in one of our short-landing/take-off aircraft. That recalls my one war story -- well there are several war stories, but my only close escape... Mahela and I were up in Hue looking at the imperial capital which had been badly damaged in the 1968 Tet offensive. The royal palace was in bad shape. We flew up and stayed at the AID compound. The compound had a tall radio mast right in the center of it. And that night as we were sleeping in our trailer the Viet -- North Vietnamese or Vietcong or whoever it lobbed three or four rockets at the encampment. And they used the mast as their aiming point, so --

Q: Oh Lord.

WOLF: -- the rockets landed 40 or 50 feet away, on the street just outside the compound and on the street. One killed several Vietnamese. I remember when the first rocket hit we were asleep. But as we had been briefed on what to do, so we dashed out to one of the revetments they used as bomb shelters. When we got there, and it was only a few seconds, we found an AID guy there who had on his Flak jacket and his boots were laced up, he had a helmet.

But one of the two -- one of my two or three best Foreign Service memories came from Vietnam...fast forward 20 years and I was going out to be ambassador to Malaysia. I was being briefed at the Pentagon after a luncheon they had hosted. Back in the early '90s they did briefings in a dark room using viewgraphs in place of Power-Points. I was falling asleep. It was like an after lunch class and I was kind of dozing, but I vaguely heard from the back of the room someone speaking about how 20 years before, a young vice consul in Da Nang...had helped his wife and him to adopt their Vietnamese orphan daughter. And he was said, "I just wanted to come today to say thank you."

Q: Oh.

WOLF: -- Special moment!

Q: That's a nice story.

WOLF: And I've always remembered that. You know, in the Foreign Service we say we think about a lot of big things, and I suppose we do sometimes. But also among our stakeholders are people like those whom I helped, people who every day turn to State. I had a chance to do something that changed a family's lives. We made a difference, and Foreign Service officers do that every day in ways that maybe only they knew. And it had taken me 20 years before I realized it -- I mean I had a few tears in my eyes because I thought this is what we do, this is why it was such a great career.

Q: At the end of our careers I think we look back and say, "Did I make a difference?" And that's a clear example, your case, where you did.

WOLF: Yes. It happened in 1973? So I was 25-years-old. So you know, for me that was cool.

Q: Well, that's, that's a good example of what a consul does. You also mentioned your experience with the first dead body, and I remember mine as well. Were there other cases, sort of consular cases, either in Perth or Da Nang that sort of stand out in your mind? Sort of things you had to deal with as a consular officer?

WOLF: Perth. Not in Perth. I mean people got locked up and, and we got 'em out of the lock-up --

Q: I'm sure they were glad to see you.

WOLF: I suppose. As I said, in Vietnam, there were a number of other things, adoptions and recordings of U.S. citizens' birth that that we did. There was one other story that didn't have quite the same happy ending. I mentioned Mahela taught English to Vietnamese women. And she became good friends with a young lady whom she was teaching. After Vietnam fell, the woman's husband, who was in the ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam), was rounded up - - I think she got out on the last plane or a boat or whatever. But he ended up in a re-education camp and it was only some years later that he was reunited with her in France. So --

Q: They did get back together.

WOLF: They did get back together eventually. But that was one of countless stories about the war's messy end. We felt badly about our friends, but there were thousands of people left behind, many who had worked for the US. I was in the Operations Center on the night that Saigon fell. And I remember Washington was frantically messaging Ambassador Martin to leave, but he was trying to get as many people out as possible, until finally the Secretary Kissinger told him "Get out" ('cause delay was causing inordinate risk to the American troops running the evacuation.)

Q: Well, Da Nang later became quite a hotspot at that time, didn't it? I mean after you left.

WOLF: Well, when we were there it was really quite safe -- in the city. There were three divisions around the city. And it was not until 1975, in the spring, when they pulled one of the divisions out of the line, that it created a big hole, and the North Vietnamese swept through, straight down to Saigon. But I remember our house -- our next-door neighbor was General Trong who was the core commander or area commander -- he was the military officer in charge of Military Region 1. So, his house was protected by a reinforced squad and tank. The mayor was right behind us. He was protected by a similar group. And then on the other side of us was a family of American Baptist Missionaries. And we always knew that if the end came maybe the right way to go was towards the missionaries as opposed to the two places where the ARVN was. The city was 5-6 miles from the airbase. It was regularly rocketed. They rarely rocketed our part of the city. But, every night, we heard rockets or artillery on the other side of the hills. We had a radio in the bedroom, one of those big military style radios that was constantly on...and all nights we'd hear the Consulate General's marine guards warning re various threats. The SOP (standard operating procedure) was if they said -- "Players" (group name for ConGen employees) -- there's an attack underway we were supposed to go into our reinforced bunker. The trouble with our reinforced bunker was it was the porch off of our bedroom. While it had been sandbagged and reinforced on the sides, they left the glass door --

Q: Oh Lord (laughs).

WOLF: Just put some tape. So --

Q: Where was Mylar when you need it?

WOLF: So, our SOP was rolling under the bed, which seemed a lot safer.

Q: Was that from where Terry McNamara evacuated the --

WOLF: He was the consul general in Da Nang, and yes he took a boat down the river and out into the harbor where I think the Navy picked them up

Q: I think he had to sort of scramble to assemble a little bit of a convoy. We've got his account you might be interested in.

WOLF: I returned to Da Nang in 2012 for the first time since the fall of South Vietnam. It was a remarkable experience. I started out in Hanoi staying at the Metropole Hotel. I was actually there on the day that they were commemorating reopening of hotel's wartime bomb shelter. And they were very proud that this was the place where Jane Fonda and other American activists used to take cover from American bombers over Hanoi. They asked me if I wanted to attend. I passed on it. The next day, I went to Da Nang and I went to 12 Le Than Ton, which was where our house was. But the whole block, indeed whole city, was transformed. There were seven new bridges across the river and on the China Beach side, on the ocean side, the whole area had been developed with industrial estates, and resorts, including golf courses. And downtown Da Nang looked much, much, much different. There were no refugees sleeping in the streets; there'd been 400,000 when we were there. And our street had been completely redeveloped; six properties had been turned into a dozen or 16 properties. And when you stood outside of our gate it was a little shop store -- shop downstairs and house upstairs.

Q: Is there anything you want else to say about Da Nang before we move on?

WOLF: I was glad to have done my tour in Vietnam. As you'll recall, for a generation of Foreign Service officers, service in Vietnam in essence checked a box. But it was more than just that. I think it was valuable to have seen up close what was a seminal moment for a generation of Americans. I realized that there were many thousands of people who were trying very hard to make our effort work. Perhaps it was misplaced idealism, or indeed misplaced realpolitik. But whatever our many motivations, clearly there the Vietnamese on whom we depended weren't working hard enough. So the message is you can't lift up by the bootstraps somebody who doesn't like wearing boots.

But, during our time there, we worked with many interesting people, well intentioned -- good people. And we left friends behind. And the interesting thing was to go back 40 years later because very little of what we feared in the Seventies had happened. Yes, there was a communist government, but I spent some time talking to communist leaders, including two deputy prime ministers. And others. Several were "communists," but a different brand than we had feared. I recruited six or seven Eisenhower fellows after we launched our program there in 2013. Several, especially from the south, were free-market businessmen who supported continuing reform of the system. Who would have thought...!

Q: Exactly.

WOLF: So that was Vietnam. I left and I went on --

Q: When did you leave?

WOLF: In the late fall of 1973?

J. RICHARD BOCK
TDY
Bien Hoa (1973)

J. Richard Bock was born in Philadelphia in 1942 and educated at the University of Washington and Princeton. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included posts in Bremen, Bien Hoa, Saigon, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Berlin and Melbourne. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: You went out to Vietnam for a while. Why did you go out?

BOCK: When the cease-fire negotiations were finally coming to fruition, they required a very rapid withdrawal of virtually all American military forces. We still had a defense attaché and that kind of thing. The U.S. government determined, I think fairly early on because I picked up rumors of this, that they wanted to have people in the field, “cease- fire watchers,” to replace all these various advisory teams that had been out there and which were going to be withdrawn – not replacing, they wouldn’t be anywhere near the same numbers. So, the idea that eventually came up was to recruit people who had former experience in Vietnam – if possible, Vietnamese speakers – anywhere they could find them in the Department or in embassies elsewhere and send them off as soon as this thing kicked in. So, I was among the many people who were asked to go out on a TDY to Vietnam to do this and I said, “Yes.”

Q: You used the term “recruit,” but it was more than recruit in some cases, wasn’t it?

BOCK: It was more than recruit. It would have been very difficult for an individual officer to say, “No, I won’t go.” However, there was a balancing act in terms of where they were coming from because their current offices were often in a position to say, “No, we simply can’t spare him” and that was particularly true at embassies abroad. So, not everybody who was on the initial list went and often because of that.

Q: But you were in Washington... Somebody could come charging down the hall from the higher reaches and say, “What do you mean you’re stopping this man?”

BOCK: Yes. But I was very willing. I think most of the people who came up for this were also willing in the sense that they had had their Vietnam tour. It wasn’t like three years, four years earlier when you had these junior officer classes coming in and being dumped willy nilly into Vietnam, which caused a great deal of heartburn. This was people who could see what it was about, who were also thinking, “Cease-fire. This is a big deal.” Trying to see if the cease-fire is going to take hold is also a big deal.

Q: When you heard about the agreement, what was your initial reaction?

BOCK: I’m having to guess because my memory isn’t that clear on it, but I think I was pleased that they finally reached an agreement coupled with a certain amount of skepticism as to whether it was going to work or not. But it was clear to me that the only way we were going to be able to settle Vietnam was through some kind of an agreement. I had no way of knowing whether this one was going to work or not, but I was pleased that people higher up seemed to think it was.

Q: You went out and were there for how long? Where were you?

BOCK: The assignment was for six months, although I only stayed for four. I was assigned back to Region III, which was now a consulate general rather than a military region. It was the consulate general of Bien Hoa. I was assigned initially to the same province I had been in before with responsibility for a second province, Binh Long, which was up along the Cambodian border and had only isolated pockets of government control. It was largely forested and to some extent rubber plantation area which had been overrun by the North Vietnamese in 1972 during their big offensive and was still largely under their control. So, there were only limited things one could do.

Q: What was the situation in your two provinces?

BOCK: There was the difference between Binh Duong, which was largely under government control, and Binh Long, which I just described. There were liaison offices being set up between the South and the North Vietnamese. These existed in Binh Long. The International Control Commission to monitor the cease-fire was being formed and eventually they had a couple of teams in this area, one in Binh Long and one down in Binh Duong. These were the Poles, Hungarians, Indonesians, and Iranians, at least initially. So, in terms of monitoring what was going on, part of the task was to see how these ICC teams were working and, if they were having difficulties, to report back to a higher headquarters and make sure that somebody got on it and tried to work through the problems.

Q: Who was your consul general?

BOCK: Bob Walkinshaw was the consul general. I think he was relatively recently arrived, but I'm not sure.

Q: How did you get about and what did you do? What did you see?

BOCK: Well, I was again going out and talking to Vietnamese government people, to any sort of non-government people that I could identify. There were some political party representatives around that I could see. I tried to gather as much information as we could on attitudes towards the cease-fire, whether there was any low-level fighting going on. And then talking to the International Control Commission people. How did we get around? My memories of that relatively short period are not as good as my earlier tour. In Binh Duong, I drove pretty much around like I had before. To get to Binh Long, however, you had to fly. That was a bit of a challenge because one result of the cease-fire agreement was that all the military transportation was pulled out as well. During my previous tour, if you wanted to go somewhere, you'd place an order for a helicopter and you'd get a military chopper to come and pick you up and take you where you wanted to go. Well, those were all gone. That responsibility was turned over to Air America, which was flying fixed wing for a while and was now flying choppers as well. I do have a very specific memory of going into Binh Long the first time and realizing that this Air America pilot didn't know where he was going. He was taking me to some place I definitely did not want to go. He was guiding himself by the wrong road. I had to sort of set him straight.

Q: What would happen if you landed in the wrong place? Were there places that you just couldn't go? Supposedly, if it's an open country, you could go anywhere you wanted.

BOCK: Yes, that wasn't open country. It wasn't anywhere near an open country. On the road leading north from Saigon through Binh Duong Province, once you got to the north end of the province heading up into Binh Long, there were Viet Cong checkpoints there. No American would go through them. No Vietnamese government official would go through them. I don't know what would have happened, but I'm sure if you ended up in a situation like that, you would at least have been held and there would have been problems resolving it, so it was something that we were very much under instruction not to try to wander our way into non-government held territory.

Q: What were you getting from the people you were talking to about the situation? Here we're looking towards setting up a country and the situation is such that you've got major foreign troops in that country hostile to it.

BOCK: Yes. It was all pretty tentative during the time I was out there. There was no major fighting that I can remember anywhere in the region, certainly not in my area. Getting the cease-fire mechanisms set up was slow and difficult. There were all these nice things in the agreement which said "These liaison offices will be established in such and such. The ICC will be established in such and such." None of that worked particularly well. So, during the four months I was there, I would say most of the focus was on just trying to get the mechanisms to work. My role was not to get them to work but to try to find out where they were breaking down and to describe the situation so that people could do something about it.

Q: Was the ICC in place when you were there?

BOCK: They were in place in Saigon. They were very slow in getting out into the boonies, but they were getting there. They were certainly everywhere by the time I left.

Q: How were they seen?

BOCK: I don't think they were considered all that effective. They were useful in the sense that they were a restraint or a constraint of some sort on hostile activity on either side. But it's the same kind of situation with UN peacekeeping. If you've got a peace to keep, these people would serve a useful purpose. If you don't have a peace to keep, they're not going to help much. That was pretty much what you had in Vietnam and we didn't know whether we had a peace to keep or not; it was that tentative.

Q: Among people that you knew, was this cease-fire seen as a fig leaf to get us uninvolved or was it considered to be serious?

BOCK: It was increasingly seen as a fig leaf. You will remember the context here, that Nixon as part of the cease-fire tried to include a very large military aid program to South Vietnam and that was overruled in Congress, so that we went into the cease-fire with the signal from Congress that South Vietnam was to a considerable extent on its own. There were supposedly real constraints in terms of weapons and ammunition, something I can't really judge. But there was certainly a strong psychological component to this where the Vietnamese tended to more and more think that they were on their own. Of course, once probes by the North Vietnamese forces started toward the end of '74, or maybe the summer of '74, that led to the fairly rapid collapse, at least the psychological collapse, of the military. That all happened after I left, but I began to see the beginnings of that psychology there.

Q: Were you able to be a dispassionate observer to this or was there a problem speaking the language, getting out and all, identification and all this?

BOCK: I think that I was hopeful that the thing would work. To what extent that colored my views at the time, I don't know. It might have. Having spent that much time in Vietnam, I really wanted to think it would work.

Q: You left there a little early? Why? What did you do?

BOCK: Well, there was this massive sending out of people. Then after a while it became clear that maybe not that many people were needed. Rumors started flying that they were going to draw down this- (end of tape)

I was planning on getting married that summer. At this point, I knew I was going into language training immediately thereafter. So, I had an incentive to get back in enough time to arrange the wedding, have time for a honeymoon, and begin language training. So, when word came out that they were going to be draw people down, I said I wouldn't mind leaving a month or two early.

MICHAEL W. COTTER
Vice Consul
Can Tho (1973)

Ambassador Michael W. Cotter was born in Wisconsin in 1943. He graduated from Georgetown University in 1965 and received a JD from the University of Michigan in 1968. Postings throughout his career have included Saigon, La Paz, Can Tho, Quito, Ankara, Kinshasa, Santiago, and an ambassadorship to Turkmenistan. Ambassador Cotter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

COTTER: Anyhow, I went back to Vietnam in January 1973. There was a Consul in Can Tho, who was Frank Wisner. We were assigned as Vice Consuls. Although there were fewer of us than there had been earlier, I was originally living in Kien Hoa, back in the province I had been in before. I was responsible for Kien Hoa and Gocong provinces under the general supervision of another Vice Consul, one of two officers who were in My Tho. We reported on the cease-fire. This was interesting. That was the... What was the name of the Commission? I can't remember, but it was composed of Poles, Hungarians...

Q: I think it was called the ICC.

COTTER: ICC, yes. I think there was an "S." International Commission of Control and Supervision, something like that. It was comprised of Indonesians, Canadians, who were, in theory, the pro-government people of the Commission, and Poles and Hungarians who were the pro-Viet Cong element. The government, the Viet Cong, and the North Vietnamese were all supposed to participate in this Commission. In fact, in the six months I was there, you only met a couple Viet Cong, as they were not trustful enough of the system to actually participate in it. The North Vietnamese maintained that they had nobody down in the Delta, so there wasn't any point in their participating. These Commissioners from the other countries moved into military installations and held lots of meetings and wandered around aimlessly. I must say, they were not able to do much. The cease-fire may have been negotiated in Paris, but as with most of these things, the devil is in the details, and actually implementing any kind of a disengagement on the ground was much more difficult, particularly when there really hadn't been any engagement. This kind of thing works much better if you have set piece armies, and you can identify a front line. But, it was very hard to do it in the Delta, where there were no front lines. The Viet Cong were skeptical enough that they really weren't going to expose themselves again. The North Vietnamese, as I said, were not really willing to admit they were engaged in this.

I remember the great difference between the Poles and the Hungarians. We were all briefed on this, of course, as to who were actual military and who were military intelligence types. The Hungarians were quite a sophisticated group, most of whom were language officers and most of whom were assumed to be military intelligence. The Poles, on the other hand, tended to be regular Polish Army officers with an interpreter attached, who was usually identified as the political officer. There was another difference. The Poles arrived in Polish Army uniforms, which were wool. The Hungarians had very nice, dress cotton uniforms, that they wore. The poor Poles just suffered unimaginably in the Delta.

Some things wouldn't change. While we were there, at one point, Polish National Day came up, so I put my suit on. It was probably the only time in the six months I was there that I wore a suit. I went to the hotel in My Tho where the Poles celebrated their National Day at midday, of course, because you couldn't do this at night. We had warm Vodka. It was 100 degrees, with 120% humidity. You sat there in this non-air-conditioned hotel, wearing a suit with the Poles in their wool uniforms, drinking warm Vodka. You would no sooner drink it, than it would explode out of all of your pores.

It was an interesting time period. As I said, I think the most difficult part of it was that part of our role was to be there and to assure the Vietnamese we were committed to them forever and a day, when by 1973, of course, the writing was on the wall. It was quite clear we weren't going to be there. Anyhow, for three months, I was back in Kien Hoa. Then, the two officers who had been in My Tho left after three months. One of those officers was Desaix Anderson, who may have just retired. He was the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Asian Affairs. I can't remember who the other officer was. At that point, I moved up to My Tho and had responsibility for the three provinces, Dinh Tuong, GoCong, and Kien Hoa. I was there for about six months total, during which we were given one leave, one vacation. I had, somewhat foolishly, agreed that if they got my successor out to La Paz early, I would take my leave and go back to Bolivia, and introduce him to my contacts. So, I had a ten-day vacation. It was about 36,000 miles that I flew back to Bolivia for a week. I turned around and flew back to Vietnam. It was an incredible flight, across the Pacific, to California, and then down to Miami.

Q: You were there, looking to see that the North and the South Vietnamese stayed in their proper places, is that it?

COTTER: Well, that the cease fire would be implemented, that fighting would end, and to observe how the ICCS was doing its function. Now, it may have been that this was somewhat more successful. The first six months, of course, were chaotic. Again, down in the Delta, where I was, there wasn't organized fighting. It was guerilla war, to the extent. There really wasn't much of that, even when I was there earlier. There were no set battles, and every day you would have casualties, primarily from night patrols, and people would run into mines. There would be an occasional fire fight, but not much conflict. As I said, in Kien Hoa, in particular, the 1972 Tet Offensive had really emasculated the Viet Cong. By the time we got back in 1973, there were not very many Viet Cong. The same was true in Dinh Tuong, which was the province that My Tho was the capital of. The six months I was there, almost all of it was spent jockeying around the various people, trying to arrange meetings, that the government and the Viet Cong would both come to, and endless negotiation with the ICCS, and under what terms such a meeting would be and where people would sit, and where it would be. Nine times out of ten, the meeting would be held, and no one would show up. Some of them would come from the Viet Cong headquarters, but there wouldn't be any local officials there. Enormous amounts of time by the ICCS were spent again on simply their own housekeeping, getting food, getting mail, getting organized, sorting out where they were. I don't know, because I lost track of it when I left, whether this ever succeeded. My sense is that it never really did, that it sort of floundered around, but the North Vietnamese or the South Vietnamese didn't have any intention on making it work. As a result, it very quickly degenerated. The Indonesians, as I recall, pulled out even before I left. I can't think who replaced them. They didn't stay in it for more than six months. As I say, it was never really successful. You had some meetings where you actually had a Viet Cong officer, usually from somewhere else, who participated. You would go visit a village to determine who actually controlled that village. But, by and large, it was a somewhat fruitless exercise.

After that, I was assigned back to Washington. I sort of had the anomaly in my career, except for Vietnam to Bolivia of never having two overseas assignments consecutively. I would have an assignment overseas and then back to Washington, and almost always back to desk jobs.

Q: While you were this truce commission, again, when you were talking to your fellow officers, what was the feeling about this, at that time, this whole cease fire business?

COTTER: The feeling was that we were bailing out, and that the Commission was essentially there to provide cover for us to leave. I certainly didn't anticipate, in 1973, what ended up happening in 1975, that the whole thing would collapse like a house of cards. As I say, one was fairly confident about the Delta, that the war had been won, in most parts of the Delta, that the Viet Cong presence was minimal, and the North Vietnamese presence was increasing, and in the long run, in a guerilla type conflict, North Vietnamese regular army presence was not going to win. The government had its act together considerably. We had done an awful lot to improve the life of people. It was really in 1973, rather than earlier, when I noticed the impact we had on raising pigs, for instance. The first ten months I was out there, we were working on this. When I went back in 1973, you saw practically none of the swayback, fat, traditional Vietnamese hogs. Some industry had come down to that area, shrimp fishing and other things, with the decline of the war, which had declined considerably down there, simply because the government had consolidated its hold on most areas. When the government fell, I guess, like a lot of people who served in the Delta, the perception by this time, and I was far away from it, was that once Central Vietnam fell, the government pretty much gave up the ghost. They never had any interest in the Delta. There was never any effort by the government to leave Saigon and move down to Can Tho. Once the game was up, they all fled and left the Delta pretty much to defend for itself. Ted McNamara, who was then Consul General, escaped on his famous trip down the Mekong River, I think, after the Embassy in Saigon fell.

Q: Terry McNamara.

COTTER: Terry McNamara, not Ted. He had tried to get, as I recall, assistance and was unable to. They finally commandeered a river boat and put everybody on a river boat. As I recall, it was a few days after Saigon fell.

Q: A few days after, yeah, something like that.

COTTER: There was never any effort by the South Vietnamese government to regroup. I think there would have been some potential. There is not much potential for doing that, if you have North Vietnamese troops with tanks coming down the pike, and you have no military assistance to counter it. But, I felt very badly about Vietnam because, as I say, I think it was a winnable war. I remember feeling that when it did fall in 1975, and I was back in Washington, having terribly conflicting feelings about that. Friends of mine and colleagues of mine were going back and taking in refugee families, something that I really wasn't prepared to do, which again, conflicted me, because I sort of had the feeling that I should have. A couple of colleagues actually went back against flat orders not to, returned to the country, went on their own hook and helped people...

Q: Lionel Rosenblatt

COTTER: I can't think of who it was either who went back with Lionel. As someone who believed in what we were doing when I went out there, who saw nothing in the time I was in Vietnam, to lead me to believe that what we were doing was not the right thing. I was very conflicted when it ended, and for a long time, years afterward really. Then, when you saw what happened in Cambodia, it sort of led one to think that, again, we had made a mistake in not sticking with what we were doing.

RICHARD W. TEARE
Deputy Principal Officer
Nha Trang (1973)

Richard W. Teare was born in Ohio in 1937. He received his bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1948. His career includes positions in Barbados, Philippines, Vietnam, Laos, New Zealand, and Australia. Mr. Teare was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in July 1998.

Q: In '73...where did you go?

TEARE: That was to Na Trang and I was Deputy Principal Officer.

Q: You were there from '73 to?

TEARE: This was a TDY. I was there for in the end just about seven months, which was the longest of anyone in this first wave of TDY people. But we had an enormous amount of talent in that group of 44 including Frank Wisner, Parker Borg, Richard Mueller and others who have gone on to greater prominence in the Service. Frank was my counterpart, Number Two in Can Tho. I think the Principal Officer there was Tom Barnes and somebody said Teare ought to go to the Delta, that's what he knows! Where I had worked best during my regular tour. Somebody else said, "Well they've already got Wisner down there and we have to spread the talent around" and so forth. Well there were ten Provinces I think in Two Corps and we had one Officer in each and everyone at least for a little while. We got very good coverage of what was going on, particularly in the Highlands. Jim Mack, now Ambassador to Guyana, was our man in Dien Bien.

Our job essentially was to monitor the effectiveness of the cease-fire and on the Government's side its efforts to build itself up as a political force or to develop a system of political organization that would equip it for the hypothesized peaceful political competition with the Communists. So we worked very diligently on that. We got some very good stuff. Most of which however only went back to Washington by Airgram I think, in fact I know what we prepared was almost entirely Airgrams so it would take three or four weeks to get there and get distributed. But we got some beautiful reporting and we really knew what was going on, what the Vietnamese were doing at the Corps and Division and Province level.

Probably the best of all the Officers I had was Richard Mueller who started up in Can Tho Province. His reporting was absolutely beautiful. Not only was it succinct and nicely worded and full of good insights, best sources and so forth, but it was beautifully typed!

Q: This was before the word processor!

TEARE: Oh way before. He was using a portable typewriter on his knees or on a table in the mess hall in what had been the Advisory Shop in Can Tho. We used a variety of means, couriers, Air America pilots would carry this stuff back. We had processors in Nha Trang if need be just putting it on Airgram mats and shipping it off to Saigon. I was the Reports Officer and the Coordinator of what all we were doing. Anyway we nominated Richard Mueller for the Director General's Award for Reporting which had just been instituted a year or two earlier. Saigon nominated Cal Mehlert, one of its Officers who was assigned there on a regular tour and Saigon I think was very confident that its nominee would win, certainly would beat out anyone from the provinces.

Well as it happened this TDY program was the baby, the pet of the Director General, Bill Hall then. Alex Johnson as Under Secretary for Political Affairs had been involved in putting it together. So that maybe gave us a little leg up. Anyway Mueller won the Director General's Award that year. Now the TDY program had such attention focused on it that as I said that was probably a leg up but we were particularly satisfied that we had beaten out Saigon's candidate whose reporting in our view had not been anything out of the ordinary. Furthermore we thought that Saigon was complacent about it all and deserved to lose.

Q: What were you seeing here in Two Corps?

TEARE: Well in general we saw a Government of Vietnam and armed forces that were more sinned against than sinning. This is not to say that they were perfect. Indeed they launched air strikes a couple of times when they shouldn't have. But in general they were behaving themselves pretty well and they were of course essentially in a defensive posture. That is the nature of the Government's responsibilities in guerrilla warfare. You are the one who has to keep the roads open and the other guy can come along and close them at times and places of his choosing. That is easy to do. Keeping the roads open is hard.

Furthermore we had a pretty good sense of military capabilities and vulnerabilities. In Da Lat Province, around Ban Me Thuot there were no RVN units at all.

Q: RVN being the Army of the Republic of Vietnam?

TEARE: Right, these were the regulars. There were a regiment in Pleiku and I think at least a couple of battalions in Ton Tun, but no RVN whatsoever in Da Lat which is a very large province with only a couple of lines of communication in a pretty scattered population. There were only regional and popular forces. But it was wide open essentially. Jay Blowers, our man in Da Lat, wrote a report in which he said "I believe that if the North Vietnamese ever decide to launch a major countrywide offensive they will begin it here, in Da Lat Province." And that is precisely what they did two years later, in 1975. They came in through Da Lat, they quickly took Pleiku, they worked their way down to the coast effectively cutting the country in two and they moved North toward Da Nang and South down the coast eventually reaching Saigon.

The Two Corps Commander as I recall was quite corrupt, certainly no better than he needed to be but I think we also had some influence on him in the direction of observing a cease fire. First of all we wanted the cease-fire to work, we believed or hoped that it would. But we wanted the onus for breaking it to be on the North Vietnamese and to the extent that that could be pinned down I think there were more violations by the North Vietnamese. They went on essentially with what they had been doing which was building up their supply system, their lines of communication, developing their intelligence. They were simply somewhat less blatant about it than they had been before.

So it was a heavy time with all this talent reporting through me. Now not too many people lasted out the full six months. Some people started being pulled out earlier. Parker Borg I think was working for the DG at that time. He left after three or four months so we moved Richard Mueller down from Can Tho to Pleiku to cover both provinces from report headquarters in Pleiku. Similarly I lost a couple of others along the way.

Meanwhile the Department was finding people to come out on regular tours of duty, the staffs of three new consulates and Da Nang and to keep Saigon going. Those people began to show up. Meanwhile Jim Engle, who was the Principal Officer in Nha Trang, was pulled out and sent over to Phnom Penh to be DCM. He never actually assumed that position because Tom Enders was there and didn't want to leave and Ambassador Swank didn't want him to leave or something. Anyway supernumerary...I think Swank left, Enders became Chargé, Engle was still there as DCM, I don't know what happened to his assignment in the end.

But I was Acting Principal Officer in Nha Trang, so I was the one who got to fly around on the airplanes all the time and do the odd ceremony. Through the AID people, or the remnants of CORDS, I had a force of more than 2,000 Foreign Service Nationals (FSNs). Although I didn't direct their daily operations or try to, nevertheless we were involved in feeding people and helping build roads and that sort of thing. So it was quite a little empire.

I shared a house with Steve Johnson, the son of Alexis Johnson. Steve was originally sent out to be the liaison with the Canadian contingent of the ICCS, because as he liked to say he spoke Canadian already. But that turned out to be not much of a job and then the Canadians pulled out with our blessing, I think, because they found the tactics of the Poles and Hungarians so frustrating, the obstruction. The Poles and Hungarians could never be mobilized to go out and investigate a violation if it had been headed by the VC, whereas the Canadians wanted to go out in a big way and energetically document violations no matter who was responsible. They didn't mind at all catching the VC or the NVA in the act. So the Canadians pulled out and Steve became surplus in Saigon and so came up and joined us in Nha Trang.

He and I shared a house and the house had been the one that John Paul Vann occupied during his time as Director of CORDS and MR 2 and is where he kept one of his minor wives. It was quite secluded. It was down on the south end of the beach in Nha Trang. It was comfortable. We were only there a few hours each night. We were working dawn to dusk and beyond. I think the whole time I was there I only swam in the ocean, which was just across the road from my house, a few times.

It was all work and it was really intense and begging the question what was being done with all that we were reporting I have never felt more engaged or more productive I imagine at any time in my career.

Q: Well what was the feeling of your group, whenever you had a chance to talk, whither Vietnam and what did the Peace Accords mean?

TEARE: I would say we concluded that they didn't really mean very much. We saw the pattern of violations going on which were let's say two thirds of them committed by the other side. But more to the point we saw Thieu and people on the non-Communist side were not making good use of the time that the Paris Agreement had bought for them. Thieu's idea of political organizing was to declare the existence of a Government Party and then have everybody join it. If you were a civil servant your pay would be docked if you didn't. Well that is not how you build loyalty or political support. But that is the way Thieu went about it. And the Party was I think heavily Catholic which he was himself and if anything it probably resembled the Diem-ist organizations more than it did anything else. The loyalty was skin deep at most.

Was there another election along there? Probably there would have been one in '75, I don't know if they got around to holding it before the collapse but anyway it was not impressive. There was coercion; there was no spirit in it. So this was a Government that was essentially a tenuous structure with little popular support. The main thing that kept people on the Government's side was fear of what would happen to them in the event of a Communist takeover and not all of them were so terribly afraid of that. Life was not easy. There was some prosperity. There was more profiteering in the cities I suppose but the countryside was pretty much what it had always been. No fertilizer, no good system of irrigation, no assurance that you could get your goods to market or that you would get a decent price for them if you did, constant risk of death or injury from stray military action even after the cease fire.

Q: What about the Montagnards? I mean these were always sort of our...I mean particularly our military loved the Montagnards.

TEARE: True enough.

Q: Did you have a large group of Montagnards in your area?

TEARE: We did but I can't recall that there were any special military programs anymore involving them. I think the civilian AID side, the remnants of CORDS the AID element, had some special programs in the highlands for the Montagnards but it was nothing that I focused on particularly. I think they were no happier under lowland Vietnamese administration than they ever had been and maybe less so. But in those months in 1973 they just didn't seem to be a major factor. I'm sure we reported a bit on their doings.

Q: Were we looking, I mean were you seeing reports on the Vietnamese military?

TEARE: Oh yes.

Q: How were they doing?

TEARE: Generally rather badly when they had to go into action. I remember just from my own non-professional observations worrying about things. I made one trip I've forgotten the purpose now within Bin Vinh Province. We flew in a helicopter, a Huey belonging to I suppose the Air Force or maybe the 22nd RVN Infantry Division and I noticed that a couple of the lights on the control panel, the gages on the control panel, had been covered with black electrician's tape. I asked the pilot why and he said "Oh...red light came on. We don't like red light so we cover it up." I decided after that I would not fly with the Vietnamese Air Force ever again.

The equipment was falling into disrepair. Guys were getting sloppy in their uniforms. They were sleeping at outposts in the daytime the way they always had down in the Delta. There was not any sense of commitment, of discipline of esprit, but by definition under the cease-fire they weren't involved in too many actions so we didn't have any great opportunity to observe them doing what they were supposed to be doing.

I remember though going to visit the ICCS outpost in the town of Minh Hoa which was one District North of Nha Trang. I remember that the Indonesian there, a major I guess pulled me aside and said "How much you Americans spending on this war?" I said I think we are spending about thirty billion dollars a year, which was roughly the figure at the time. He said, "If you give us, the Indonesians, ten billion dollars for one year we will clear out all the North Vietnamese and Vietcong.” And I said that was a tempting offer but I don’t have the power to do it. I’m sure of course that was braggadocio but I think it did represent the sense that the Indonesians believed they knew how to deal with Communists or to deal with anybody who got in their way. Certainly that spirit was lacking in the Vietnamese. Not that they couldn’t be cruel, torturing prisoners and that sort of thing. But they just didn’t have the get up and go of the Indonesians.

Of course nowadays, speaking in the middle of 1998, we see some reason and have for some time to second guess the Indonesian forces but that’s another story.

DOUGLAS R. KEENE
Temporary Duty, Monitoring Peace Accords
Saigon (1973)

Mr. Keene was born and raised in Massachusetts and graduated from Colby College. He joined the Foreign Service in 1967, serving first in Vietnam and subsequently at Middle East posts including Jerusalem, Karachi, Cairo, as well as Amman and Muscat, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission. His Washington assignments also concerned primarily Middle Eastern matters, including the Arab-Israel problem. Mr. Keene was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

KEENE: But in ’73 after the Paris Accords were signed with the Vietnamese, they sent me back to Saigon on a TDY (temporary duty) to monitor the cease-fire. They sent 44 of us, I think there were, back, and I think I got that honor because I was the only officer they had who spoke Polish and Vietnamese, and the Poles were on the ICCS (International Commission on Control and Supervision). And so they set us up—me and the other guy who spoke Polish (but not Vietnamese), in I think what was the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) safe house down by the Saigon River—it was great. We were supposed to have the Poles over you know and entertain them and subvert them.

Q: Where were you assigned now?

KEENE: Saigon.

Q: What were sort of your feelings as you went out there about the peace accord?

KEENE: We worked in the embassy that time, and they set up something called provincial reporting in that time. We were all given a corps to follow, and every day—and you know they set up those consulates in all the corps. They were reporting, and we were supposed to—four of us--put together a daily report, and then do some longer term think tank things. So, they gave me I Corps, probably because I had never been there before.

Q: That’s the one to the north.

KEENE: Yes, so I went up, traveled and visited several times...trying to figure out what was going on. That's what we were supposed to do.

Q: You were there from when to when?

KEENE: That was just three months. I guess January through March.

Q: Was much happening at that point?

KEENE: No. There was a momentary lull. Our troops were leaving, and it was a little surreal. Under the accord, the North Vietnamese were allowed to set up offices or little compounds in the South, in the provincial capitals. You'd walk around Da Nang and see this guy with a red star on his helmet—it was kind of weird. There was a little lull in fighting then, and it's when the POW's (prisoners of war) were released during that period. We were on tap to help out with that, though it didn't prove necessary. And some South Vietnamese prisoners were released. I remember I was up in Hue at the time and saw the truckloads of POW's drive past as they came out.

Q: Did you get any feel for how the South Vietnamese government viewed this development?

KEENE: Not well. They thought they were being kind of abandoned...or at least a step toward that, which is how it turned out. I don't know, within the embassy you could get every view possible, from the "it's hopeless," to people who still believed with great fervor. There were some people who stayed there forever. They really got into it.

Q: Did you have any desire to hang on there, or was this just something to get through?

KEENE: I always liked Vietnam, when they weren't shooting at you. But it always meant separation, and that was a problem.

Q: You left your wife behind in Warsaw?

KEENE: Yes.

Q: Let's go back to...again, when you left Vietnam the second time, did you feel the peace accords were going to hold?

KEENE: No, I didn't. It seemed to be more for domestic political reasons than a good, solid agreement to me.

SAMUEL B. THOMSEN
Principal Officer
Saigon (1973)

Liaison, Joint Military Commission
Hue (1973-1974)

Samuel B. Thomsen was born in Minnesota in 1931. After serving in the US Army from 1952-1954 he received his bachelor's degree at University of California Los Angeles in 1956. During his career he had positions in Vietnam, Laos, Washington D.C., Botswana, Nigeria, and an ambassadorship to the Marshall Islands. Mr. Thomsen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 1996.

Q: Sam, why don't we stop at this point, and we'll pick it up. You were slated because of your Vietnamese, back to Vietnam. One couldn't get away from that particular tar baby, could one?

THOMSEN: In fact I wanted to go back, Nick Veliotis was by then special assistant to the deputy secretary, and invited me to apply for the junior special assistant position, and I decided instead to take the levy back to Vietnam and see what had happened in the time I'd been gone, which may or may not have been a good choice. Another one of those career decisions that may or may not have been the soundest.

Q: Well, one never knows. As we do these things, talk to people, we all look upon career decisions, but there's more to life than a career. The real fun of the Foreign Service is the fun of the foreign service, and going where the action is, and where you're interested in. And not just moving up the ladder.

THOMSEN: Thank you for saying that because I've often second guessed myself. But that was my decision at the time to go back and see and be a part of it and help finish what we'd been involved in seven years before.

Q: Just to put on the record. You went out to Vietnam when? And you were there from when to when?

THOMSEN: I went back to Vietnam from February '73 to July '73.

Q: Okay, and we'll pick it up at that point.

Today is the 12th of November 1996. Sam, you have written some notes so I'll start this off and ask you a question or two and then you may revert to reading from notes, and I may interrupt you from these which were taken from what, a diary?

THOMSEN: A diary.

Q: But I want to get what you were doing in some detail because I think it's important. You got to Saigon, was there any briefing, and what sort of things were you told you were supposed to do? Or what did you understand you were supposed to do, and how did you get assigned?

THOMSEN: I was assigned because I was in a pool of officers who had served in Vietnam and had Vietnamese language skills. Not all of them had Vietnamese language skills, but almost all of them had served in Vietnam. Some staff supporters, I have Jean Ronchetti was a GS and she came as a secretary. Other than that we were officers who had served previously in Vietnam, and were just pulled from wherever we were.

Q: What were your marching orders?

THOMSEN: Our marching orders were that we were going to establish four consulates general and report on the post cease fire in great detail. In the absence of the MACV, which was phasing out, we would become the primary source of information about what was going on in the countryside. Subsequently the defense attaché office was established to take on some of the MACV responsibilities and by about halfway through the six month TDY had a small office in the consulate general and were doing their own political-military reporting, and, of course, CAS was doing its own political reporting.

Q: CAS was CIA.

THOMSEN: Right.

Q: As you went out there, and when you first arrived, what were you getting from your colleagues when you're talking about whither South Vietnam at this point?

THOMSEN: We just didn't have any idea. Most of us had been away. Those who had been there were not any more familiar with what was expected than we were. The Kissinger negotiations in Paris, which had resulted in late January in the signing of the Paris Accords, didn't know the parameters. In fact, just doing a review for this interview, clearly no one except Henry Kissinger had any idea what was expected, and even Henry didn't really know what would come out of it except that it would put an end to the fighting, and we would have an opportunity to withdraw the last 20,000 American troops.

Q: Was there any of the feeling that what you were doing was sort of a fig leaf or bugout?

THOMSEN: Not at all. Of course, domestic politics played an important role in this, and Watergate later on, clearly had a decisive role in the final outcome. But at the time of the Accords there was a substantial hope that something could be pulled off. In fact, a lot of our reporting...we were there from February to July, toward the middle of the period, we started looking at what looked like a "third Vietnam" being formed in the west in the mountainous area. At the end of my tour Don Colin who was head of the reporting unit in Saigon, actually put together a substantial airgram which drew on reporting from all the consulates general, which was called the "third Vietnam," and was to hypothesize that the Viet Cong, the PRG, the People's Revolutionary Government, might establish itself in a political competition in the west in the mountainous area. That wasn't to be ultimately but certainly that thread was going through, and we were seeing ourselves as watching something that was not a foregone conclusion.

Q: Well then if you want to...I'm going to turn you loose. I may stop you from time to time, but if you want to use the notes that you've made from your diaries, and expand and go along with them, and then if you have any questions to me. Expansion is the preferable term.

THOMSEN: One of the reasons I'm going to do it this way is because there are a lot of names that I think are worth putting on paper for future reference.

The Accords had been signed finally on the 27th of January, and on the 28th of January the cease fire began at 8:00 in the morning, local time in Saigon. I and elements that were ultimately 50 other Foreign Service officers arrived in Saigon on the 2nd of February on very short notice. Almost immediately were taken into a briefing which started with administrative in processing, then with political section briefings, calls on Joe Bennett who was the political counselor and on Ambassador Whitehouse who was the deputy ambassador, the title unusual they were still using in Vietnam. In the afternoon we were briefed by CORDS, that was the civilian, I don't even recall what the acronym stands for. Do you recall, Stu?

Q: No...civilian something revolutionary development.

THOMSEN: Essentially it was an amalgamation of CIA and AID stuff, and I think some military put in to provide province by province support for Vietnamese. It had been established just as I was leaving in '66 so I really didn't get to know it very well. The major in-country field operations coordinator, Jake Jacobson, was responsible for it and he briefed us in the afternoon. He, I think, expected that he would have a major role in the management of the Consulates general. He became established in the bureaucratic issues as to who ConGens reported to. Our purpose in Vietnam, as I indicated, was to observe the post cease fire situation, and we learned more about what that meant later on. We did meet Ambassador Bunker that afternoon as well.

Q: How did Ambassador Bunker strike you at that point. How did he look upon this? Positive, or neutral...

THOMSEN: ...conservatively optimistic, of course. He said that our purpose in being there was to get information one way or the other and to "call them like you saw them" because there was no other way to get a good judgment. If we came out as optimists, or came out as pessimists, we would not be doing our job properly. That was his approach, and it was kind of balanced. As you know he was very patrician, and very urbane, and very low key but that was the approach.

The next day was awakened. We met old friends. John Helble who had been my predecessor as consul in Hue back in '64, Tom Conlon, Shep Lowman, folks that had been involved before. That afternoon had a lunch with Steve Winship who was the political-military counselor, whom I had not known previously. That evening I saw Bob Shaplen whom I had known previously. Bob Shaplen was the well-reputed correspondent for the New Yorker magazine. His long, long thoughtful pieces during the '60s were some of the best reporting out of Vietnam. I don't know if I mentioned it earlier but Bob would come up to Da Nang, or to Hue in 1955-66, and share his information with me as much as I shared with him. I did everything with him off the record but he was always very helpful to me. Bob was unexpectedly optimistic about the possibilities, and knowing Bob I thought that was a very, very positive sign because he tended to be very skeptical. One of the rumors was that his chief stringer was in fact a senior Viet Cong official. I actually got a few insights that might not otherwise have been available from him, and some of what he had to say in retrospect suggested that he had some access to information not otherwise available.

On the 6th of February, I flew to Da Nang. We were still in the dark regarding most of the arrangements. We had no idea, for example, who was going to do our ERs...

Q: Efficiency Reports.

THOMSEN: ...what our per diem was going to be, how we were going to be maintained, all this was still being looked at. We were just kind of flung out into the outer darkness to make our way. In Da Nang we were met. I argued successfully for being given the titles of consuls (detached) rather than simply as political reporting officers. We needed some sort of if not diplomatic, at least consular titles even on a short term basis, and that we were finally given.

Q: That reflects a little bit when I was consul general in Saigon, Terry MacNamara head of the consulate there, which was considered a detachment from the consulate general in Saigon. It was sort of peculiar, sort of a Vietnam response.

THOMSEN: Maybe that was right, I didn't understand it but I felt that was a fine approach but that we needed something. That is, we couldn't just be up there as civilians. Those who came with me to I Corps were Hal Colbaugh who had been with me in '66. Hal was a superb language officer and had been sent to Da Nang in the spring of '66 by political counselor Phil Habib to help me out because of an incredible amount of political activity which in addition to being political advisor to the Marines I was trying to cover. Lee Graham, Bob Carroll, George Moose who has gone on to bigger and better things. Together we were supposed to organize ourselves to cover what was called I Corps, the first military region which consisted of Quang Tri to the far north, Thua Thien province which held the former imperial capital of Hue. Quang Nam province. Da Nang city. Quang Tin province, and Quang Ngai. My first impressions of Da Nang were of the many refugees there. Da Nang was a frenetic place, my notes say that thoughts of an end of an empire. The Marine construction that had occurred while I was there in '65-'66 was beginning already to deteriorate, and of course the American military was almost vanished. On the other hand the Vietnamese I met seemed much more self-assured and competent, better trained than they had been back in the mid-'60s. It was an interesting change in that respect.

One of the implications of turning the consulate into a Consulate General where John Wolf had been the vice consul, and Craig Dunkerley had been the third officer as a political-economic officer. Now it had exploded because Fred was the consul general and instead of being a small consular office it was now the principal U.S. installation in central Vietnam. So Fred as consul general was now going to be supervising an FSR-2 AID officer who had been the senior person in that region as the head of CORDS. That was a very painful change. All of a sudden seven new officers were involved to try to do the political reporting, and Craig Dunkerley, who had been the political officer, was now a part of a large section that included Hal Colbaugh was going to be the head of the section in Da Nang. I was going to go to Hue, along with Bob Carroll. George Moose went to Quang Ngai, and Lee Graham went to Quang Tin. This was an incredible shift, and the small side street French bungalow that had been the consulate was now out of the way, and Fred moved into the biggest office in what was called the White Elephant right on the Strand on the river, taking the office of the CORDS director. A lot of drastic actions were taking place. A lot of feelings were hurt but there was no way around that.

In my own case I felt a little out of place. I had been the principal American in central Vietnam as a consul, as an FSO-5. And I was returning to Hue in a subordinate position. Gary Matthews who had been the PSA (I think that's provincial senior adviser) and an FSO-4 or 5 now, later became head of the Senior Seminar. Gary was to be in charge of our operation until his departure which was not far away. And then subsequently Phil Cook an FSO-3 came in. Phil had not been in the initial levy, but he showed up, he was an FSO-3. So we had Sam Thomsen, an FSO-4, the former principal officer and Consul, with Gary Matthews, an FSO-4 or 5 in charge, and Phil Cook, an FSO-3 not very happy with the anomalous situation he was in. Part of my problem was that a lot of people remembered me and paid their respects to me as the consul at the same time I was trying to position myself appropriately among my colleagues. However, that whole process didn't last all that long.

The PSA was established in what had been the AID director's residence, and across the street was a huge warehouse and a new lodging for TDY folks. But I walked to the what had been the consul's residence which is now the USIS building. I went there to recall memories. My older son Sam was born there, and a lot of happy memories for my family were in that building. I was seeing old friends from the various parties and the religious groups, people who I had worked with before were making their way to say hello. One of the things, for example that happened was that the senior Buddhist from the Tri Quang faction, the faction of "radical Buddhists" as they are called who helped overthrow Diem, made a special point to see me and spend some time to assure me that his group was very much in support of the government, were very hopeful for the success of the cease fire. So I was beginning to get this kind of feedback which was very, very useful.

Another couple of things. The old consulate, which had not been destroyed, was now the city hall. And the residence of the vice consul had become the provincial council headquarters. As I said, the consul's residence had become the USIA, and the bedroom where my son was born was now the USIS library. So things had changed in Hue.

Among the good things that we saw were boy scouts cleaning up. The boy scouts were Buddhists, interestingly enough, as well as Catholic. And there was quite a movement to kind of restore order, and allow peace to return to Hue. We were very struck by that.

One of the former consulate employees, Joe Nghia, had been drafted into the military, was now a senior corporal, and a TV producer of all things. And just to bring the story up to date, we believe that he's still doing TV productions under the new government in Hue. And I certainly wish him well in that.

One of my responsibilities in Hue was to be as principal liaison with the Joint Military Commission--which was the North Vietnamese-South Vietnamese; PRG, the old Viet Cong, and the United States Army. I was also to be a liaison with the ICCS, the International Commission of Control and Supervision, made up of Canadians, Indonesians, Poles and Hungarians, which was to be the guarantor of the cease fire.

On the 14th of February, this is now almost three weeks after the cease fire, the province chiefs hosted a dinner and the North Vietnamese showed up. The North Vietnamese had arrived to be a part of the joint military commission, but PRC had not arrived, and in fact would not arrive for some time. On the same day, on the 14th of February, 175 North Vietnamese and Viet Cong prisoners of war were released in Quang Tri, the province next to the DMZ, and allowed to go across the river.

We were still having to make our own way as far as lodgings were concerned. I, for example, contracted with the former Vietnamese information officer to lodge in his home. We essentially took over his residence, and he moved over to a cousin's. But we were doing kind of our own contracting ad hoc. We didn't have FBO around, or anyone else to help out.

On the 19th of February, that's just less than a month after we arrived, Gary Matthews left. Phil Cook was then put in charge of the three of us, Phil Cook, Bob Carroll and myself. Bob was doing reporting on the Quang Tri situation, I was doing the ICCS and the political situation in Hue, and Phil was supervising us and doing refugees. That was how that little unit was working out.

Q: Let's stop here. You'd been there about a month. What were you getting? What you were finding now at this initial stage what the ICCS was?

THOMSEN: First of all, the Joint Military Commission was not working. The PRG, the Viet Cong, were simply not being helpful. And we'll see a little later on, they actually shot down an ICCS helicopter. So there was really a lot of resentment toward the PRG. The resentment was widespread in all parts. The ARVN and the government of Vietnam, couldn't stand the idea of allowing the Viet Cong to be free in the city. So they kept them under very close restriction, which of course was counter to the agreement. But finally a modus vivendi was worked out where they could go certain places, but they had to have escorts.

Q: Were the government of Vietnam able to send their observers into where the Viet Cong were?

THOMSEN: No. That did not happen. That was not a part of the agreement. It's an interesting question to look back on it, but everything that was going on was going on in what was government controlled territory.

Q: That sounds like a recipe for disaster.

THOMSEN: Well, eventually it was, yes. But the ICCS with Canadians and Indonesians, Hungarians and Poles, was also not working very well. It was clear that the Poles and Hungarians were both given instructions not to be cooperative. Their practice was to go to where there was a purported incident. They would be asked to go and observe it, and to identify that the cease fire had been broken at point A or point B. Now the Viet Cong were never going to call on the ICCS to come to their territory. That just didn't happen. But when the GVN called for them the Canadians would be willing to go, and the Indonesians would be willing to go, but the Hungarians particularly would find a reason for not going. And normally, the way the Canadians explained it to me, they would just get into a long discussion of procedures. They wouldn't say, no, we won't go, but they would talk about what vehicles to take, and who would ride in which vehicles, and how long they'd be gone, and what the limitations would be. And they'd finally talk themselves out of going. That really almost was the uniform practice all the way through. Later on I'll get into one incident where the Canadians essentially tricked the other two parties into accompanying them on an observation of an incident. But by and large there were just so many problems in trying to get the ICCS to work. As I say, the Joint Military Commission just never operated.

Q: I assume this was all being reported that it wasn't going anywhere. Was this having any affect on sort of the spirit of the work by the Vietnamese, and by you all?

THOMSEN: Well, we kept trying to find ways to make it work, and I think probably that goes way beyond where we were. But my guess is that we were making representations in the capitals of the various governments concerned. We were still expecting that we could find a way to make the ICCS work. What was really going on, and the important thing in responding to the question that you asked, the public opinion in Hue, which is a pretty good bell wether, because there were a lot of oppositionists in the government there. There were a whole range of attitudes which I guess we could say was a positive thing. There were those who were very optimistic, and there were those who were very pessimistic, and there were those who had a wait and see attitude. But it wasn't entirely pessimistic which was a good thing. There was a lot of skepticism, and particularly a lot of skepticism about North Vietnamese ultimate intentions. How long they would go along with the game, and at what point they would return to the battlefield, which is ultimately what did happen.

In the meantime...I've got a little note here. Hue had been restored to the '64-'65 period. A lot of what had been destroyed during Tet '68 had been rebuilt by 1973. For example, the Citadel, which had been almost totally destroyed during house to house firing had occurred, much of it had been restored. The bridge that had been dropped, as they say, had been rebuilt. A new hospital had been built. It was much more modern than the one that I had known. Hue was again an attractive city. Now I understand that today it's even more attractive.

Q: You say you were in Da Nang, but Hue. Were you really working out of..

THOMSEN: I'm in Hue now. Canadians begin forcing the ICCS to operate. The U.S. still has enough military in place to support efforts to move people around.

A Buddhist Bonze visited and provided assurances that Buddhists were not communists. He also recalled helping to hide the Bullingtons during the Tet '68. Jim Bullington, who was my vice consul in '65 and '66 and stayed on, and married my senior local, Thuy Cam, who came from a prominent Hue family. During Tet '68 Jim hid in the rafters of the home during the entire occupation. Now Jim weighed about 200 pounds, was about 6 feet 2. Jim has written this up I think either in the Foreign Service Journal or in State's magazine of about five or six years ago, it was a fascinating story. This Buddhist was a member of the group that had opposed the government during the mid-'60s, and helped bring down Diem, coming to volunteer the assurances that the Buddhists are very much in favor of what's going on in supporting the government. I was surprised at that, because they were never willing to put themselves on the record in the '60s.

On the 23rd of February I was called to Da Nang to replace Hal Colbaugh who had been in Haiphong. I would stay in Da Nang and take over the political reporting. That would allow Phil Cook to be in charge in Hue. I mentioned already that Da Nang was reorganizing. The AID/CORDS compound, which was big enough to be an embassy, was now under Fred Brown's control and responsibility. The compound contained apartments, a club, a swimming pool, a commissary. When I had been there previously there was no American civilian presence visible at all.

We're beginning to do extensive sitrep reporting, and I was responsible for...

Q: Sitrep, means situation report.

THOMSEN: Officers from all over I Corps would send in reports on different days; we'd be able to edit them and on a weekly basis, on Monday, we'd send in a comprehensive report. My responsibilities were to be the head of the political section, to be the principal ICCS liaison for I Corps, and to be in touch with the political activities within the city of Da Nang. Fred was still fighting with AID as to whether he was really in charge or not, or whether they were going to be a separate entity. Finally it was agreed that the AID director would be the deputy consul general for reconstruction and resettlement, and I was the deputy consul general for political and consular affairs. As I mentioned earlier, the AID director was very upset, very put out by all of this.

But what was interesting and I'll just make a very general statement on this is that most of his AID subordinates were delighted at having Fred take charge, and it created a different atmosphere for a lot of them because they felt that they were going to have a little more freedom of action.

A number of Vietnamese with whom I was beginning to meet had been very young officers in the '60s, now in the early '70s they were in positions of lieutenant colonel and major and colonel, and were becoming province chiefs, and were very impressive. Most of these people now were fluent in English, where before it was necessary to use either French or Vietnamese. They had been to various senior military schools in the United States and they were coming back. This is the cadre, or the core of the Vietnamese military that many people have commented on as having made an almost...almost made the necessary reforms to become a very effective fighting force.

John Helble came up in early March from Saigon. I was with him as he went to the ICCS. John was responsible in the embassy for liaison with ICCS. So his coming up gave him a chance to give them strong assurances of U.S. support. They gave him complaints ranging from communication problems to lack of a beach, everything from the ridiculous to the sublime. I urged Fred, and we gave them access to the American club at the consulate general and that helped with some of their morale problems.

James Jones, who wrote From Here to Eternity was at a party at Fred's, so we are getting a variety of visitors now coming through, unofficial as well as official.

Q: With the ICCS, I assume you were able to sit down and talk to the Canadians. Did you make contacts and have dealings with the Indonesians, the Poles and Hungarians?

THOMSEN: Yes, I did. In fact, I may just make reference to a few of the various social events, but I was in touch with all of them on a regular basis. And the Poles, although they wouldn't admit explicitly that they were under a tight rein, the relationship developed to the point where they at least be able to give me some innuendos, or some implicit comments that indicated that they were not free to be as cooperative as they might like to be. The Canadian, Ernest Ab was a Foreign Service officer and who we later ran into him in other countries. He was a very fine officer, and he was able to give us a lot of insights into what was going on within the ICCS. He was a little bit more pro-active than one might have expected in trying to get the ICCS to do certain kinds of things, and he was very critical of the Poles and Hungarians for not being as active as he'd like them to be. The Indonesian was willing to go along with whatever the Canadian wanted to do. He had no particular certain restriction of what he could do. He was not very pro-active but understood whose side he was on, so to speak, and was willing to do what he could to encourage the Poles and Hungarians to go along and be as helpful as they could.

At this time I had begun attending the I Corps military briefings. The U.S. military is still there, they wouldn't leave until the end of March, and AID was there in its own right. But I was beginning to assume the role of a kind of principal observer of the military scene, and sitting at the head table at the briefings. The briefings were very interesting. We were trying to get a sense of how much information was accurate. As far as we can tell the incidents were beginning slowly to decline in the I Corps area although the I Corps apparently had the highest level of incidents in the country.

Q: When you say incidents, could you...

THOMSEN: Well, actually both ways. First of all firing of artillery going back and forth, no military contact, but firing from one area to the other. And secondly, from time to time actual attacks by either the North Vietnamese against a friendly unit or the other way around. They didn't want to admit to us attacks by friendlies against the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong. The I Corps was probably the most active Corps as far as friendlies regaining territory after the cease fire, and that was illegal. It was not supposed to be done.

Q: Were you getting any intelligence of what was going on on the other side?

THOMSEN: The intelligence we got was mainly aerial. We'd get a few reports from the Vietnamese and from CIA, with on the ground observations. Francis Fitzgerald who wrote Fire in the Lake, one of the kind of anti-policy folks, we thought, and still do think, she sneaked into Viet Cong territory and stayed with them for several days, and wrote a number of articles. She reported on life in Quang Ngai in the west, VC controlled area. She and a couple of others, all said that the Viet Cong propaganda in the villages was their intention to fight a political battle, and to put down their arms for at least the time being. That there appeared to be a good deal of relief that the war was over, at least for the present. That peace was peaceful. The implication being that they were preparing to deal in the political level, rather than back to the military.

Q: You keep referring to the Viet Cong. What about the North Vietnamese army?

THOMSEN: Well, the North Vietnamese army was still present. In fact, they had reinforced in I Corps. And apparently half of the North Vietnamese military in the south were in the first military region, some 80,000 was the order of battle that they gave. They're still there in their areas in the mountainous areas, but the areas that Francis was in had some of the so-called cadre who were from the north. She felt her Vietnamese was good enough so she could detect a northern accent in some of those who were so-called political educators. But they are ostensibly South Vietnamese.

I've indicated that we are now beginning to do a lot of political reporting, a lot of military reporting. I'm bringing back information from each of the morning briefings. The rate of incidents is going down, but I Corps still has the highest level of incidents in the country. The area north and west of Hue, and the area of Quang Tri near the DMZ are areas of fairly high activity which is indicative that the North Vietnamese are still moving troops south, and are still active militarily in the south.

In the middle of March NVA pressed hard against the airborne division in Thua thien, west of Hue. The NVA developed a salient between the Airborne and First Divisions south of Hue. In the area west of Da Nang itself, and south, ARVN were pushing out beyond the cease fire line and reclaiming territory that they felt was wrongly taken from them. The far west area of Quang Nam was extremely active. In Quang Ngai the enemy was seen improving roads in the west, strengthening supply lines and manpower against a widely dispersed Second Division. This is where George Moose was reporting.

A very critical area was Sa Huynh on the Quang Ngai - Binh Dinh border, and that was an area where the North Vietnamese came in just before the cease fire, and occupied an area down to the water's edge. If they had been allowed to retain that territory they would have had water access to their territory. But either at, or just before, or just after the cease fire, the South Vietnamese regained the community of Sa Huynh. This was one of the few incidents which the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong claimed was a government violation and asked for an ICCS intervention. Actually as I said, the entire Lao border in the area from DMZ was being improved. Triple A was being installed, that was anti-aircraft was being installed along the border in the west and south Vietnam. I visited Sa Huynh and the town was totally devastated but the damage looked like post cease fire, that is, like more recent battles. It looked like the North Vietnamese had captured the town which would have given them sea access. Some days later the ARVN retook it. People had come back and were rebuilding. This opened Route I all the way from Saigon to Hue.

I drove from Da Nang to Sa Huynh which was probably 100 miles south. I noticed the countryside bustling with activity, small shops with everything from tennis shoes to Coca-cola.

Q: What were you getting from the people who came from Saigon about how the central government and the opinion of the analysts, and political reporters who were dealing with this sort of at the center of the thing, how things were going? This is March-April?

THOMSEN: This is towards the end of March of '73.

Q: What were the people coming up there saying?

THOMSEN: The sense in Saigon was that the Thieu government was taking hold in the peace time era. There was criticism of Thieu. Thieu began forming a party called the Democracy Party. He tried to outlaw other parties, and was getting from my contacts in Da Nang and Hue that the old VNQDD, and the Dai Viet, these were the old non-communist nationalist parties, their old diehard leadership is absolutely refusing to go out of existence to allow the Thieu party sole possession of the right. But in spite of that, they were trying to maintain their identify and to retain their support for Thieu, and the government. They were in an anomolous situation. But from Saigon we were getting, I think general supportive sounds about Thieu. I think the embassy's marching orders were to support the government. And, although our friends were skeptical, or a little cynical, they were generally hopeful that the government is succeeding in establishing its authority. The military is holding its own pretty much countrywide. There was more pressure in I Corps, than in other parts of the country.

Q: What were you getting in Da Nang? I don't know, maybe this is after the fact, but I kept hearing reports in other interviews about whether it was General Lam, who was the I Corps commander...

THOMSEN: Oh, he was long gone.

Q: Because he was considered a crook. A crook is the only term for it.

THOMSEN: He'd been the Second Division commander in the '60s when I was there, and I read of his exploits from Laos as he became Corps commander. He was quite a clever politician and he clearly took advantage of his senior position to be ruthlessly self-aggrandizing.

Q: A plunder practically. Was there military corruption when you were there?

THOMSEN: Well, maybe we ought to do is drop this and go into your questions because I find myself being bogged down a little bit. The Corps commander, General Truong, had been First Division commander, and was regarded by most Americans as the finest general in the South Vietnamese army. I was just glancing at Westmoreland's book before coming here, Westmoreland says there are American military officers who said that Truong was the only Vietnamese military officer who they would have entrusted with an American division. He had a tremendous reputation which was never sullied, even to the end. And Truong was responsible in '75. He was still I Corps commander, and he was the one who was whiplashed by Thieu and contradictory orders that caused the loss of Hue, Da Nang which began the roll-up from north to south. And Truong is in this country now, he's a computer programmer or something. Truong was an honest man in everyone's eyes. He was a total 180 degrees from Lam.

Now I got to know Truong fairly well. I had not known him before. He was probably only a lieutenant colonel when I was there in '66. Fred Brown the consul general who had been there longer and knew him better, had the same feeling. Truong was imposing a level of honesty that had not previously existed. In fact, there are a couple of incidents in which province chiefs were relieved during our stay for so-called corruption, or even the hint of corruption.

In one case there was as much evidence in one province that he was not corrupt, as that he was, but Truong relieved him because he had to be cleaner than he was. So I Corps was much better off that way than it had been under Lam in the late '60s. Truong was a man who was not suspected by Americans of that kind of thing at all. It was really a much different situation.

At the end of March, which was so-called 60 days after on the 29th, X plus 60 as they call it. The last military departed Da Nang...

Q: You're talking about the American military.

THOMSEN: The last American military departed Da Nang that day. An American Marine colonel, Homer Walker, was the commander of the last plane to leave Da Nang, on 29th of March. The last American POWs were scheduled to leave Hanoi. Colonel Walker was waiting for word that they had departed. And then he would board his DC-8 and fly out. The PRG, the DRV, the Poles, Hungarians, and Canadians were all standing on the tarmac waiting for the last American military to leave. Fred and I popped a bottle of champagne at the foot of the stairs leading up to the aircraft. We had a toast with Colonel Walker. And I remember the story if you recall it in August of 1964 my meeting the first young Marine captain intelligence officer who flew in a helicopter from Task Force 77 in the Gulf of Tonkin to ask me where the safe secure area would be for an American military installation. I hoisted my glass to say goodbye to the last American Military to leave.

Q: Did you notice any disquiet when the Americans pulled out among the South Vietnamese whom you were dealing with?

THOMSEN: It's a very complicated question. There was a lot of self-confidence on the part of the Vietnamese that they could carry their own weight. But at the same time there was a feeling, especially on the part of some of them, that the departure of the Americans meant not just the departure of the military, but the departure of American support which they knew was absolutely critical to their survival. Here I'll tell a story that I don't know fits exactly here.

But it helps answer your question but I was now going to the I Corps daily briefings as one of two or three Americans.

Q: I Corps being, of course, Vietnamese now.

THOMSEN: It always was the Vietnamese I Corps, but in the mid-'60s there would be as many American military in the briefing room as there were Vietnamese, and the briefings were all in English. Now the briefings were in Vietnamese and it was a Vietnamese briefing with a couple of Americans watching. But Colonel Dang, who had been the First Division Chief of Staff when I was there in the mid-'60s, would only speak French or Vietnamese to me in that earlier period.

He almost typified the xenophobic attitude that some attribute to the Vietnamese. He was cold and distant, and not very cooperative in terms of giving information. Then in 1973 it was entirely different I was the last American left briefings. Colonel Dang now the I Corps Chief of Staff, he takes me aside and in fluent English says, "what is Watergate?" And I tell him that Watergate is a function of the American political system. Colonel Dang who by then had a son getting his Ph.D. at MIT, and clearly had a total change of attitude, says to me, "I predict that Watergate will be the death of Vietnam." This was in the middle of my six month tour around mid-April 1973. We were all looking toward a bright future and this colonel who has changed from a xenophobic Francophile to an American slang-speaking officer with a son in school in the United States, was telling me a truly prophetic statement. I believe today the he was absolutely correct. Watergate was a critical component of the final act in Vietnam. So I would say there were some mixed feelings on the part of the Vietnamese, and some real confusion as to what our ability would be, or our intentions were to stay the course with them. I think that anecdote probably is a powerful statement of the complexities of what had happened over the previous years, and was going to be happening.

In a similar vein, Bob Shaplen and his stringer, whose name was Buong, came to Da Nang and took me to dinner. Now, Shaplen had a totally different perspective by now. Buong, his stringer, was saying the VC were stronger than ever and that if we suspect, what I had mentioned earlier to be true, he was probably speaking with some good knowledge. He claimed that they would win a political struggle, and that there might on the other hand Shaplen felt be a major military attack in the near future. This was mid-'73. That did not transpire that early. It was clear that Shaplen's views had changed much since February.

I have now been given authority to brief the Indonesians and the Canadians on certain situations, and I did brief them on a weekly basis. When I was briefing the Indonesian Colonel Wardinan, he fed back to me that the Indonesians in Saigon were very pessimistic about the situation. At the same time the Canadians were beginning to talk about pulling out but they stayed as long as I was there although they left later. But they were beginning to talk about the ICCS being so ineffective that they didn't feel that their presence there was useful.

I've already mentioned that Francis Fitzgerald had been in Viet Cong hands in Quang Ngai. That incident created quite a political flap. It suggested that the PRG did intend to contest in the political arena.

I had lunch with three young Vietnamese administrators, deputy province chiefs from Quang Ngai and Quang Tin, and the deputy mayor of Da Nang, all bright, competent. These were all young military officers. They were very cynical about the formation of the Democratic Party, the Thieu party that they were supposed to be giving that their full attention, and they were being very unenthusiastic about it. In other words, the mid-level of the Vietnamese bureaucracy was not fanatically supporting the Thieu efforts.

On the 7th of April the PRG/VC shot down an ICCS helicopter near the Lao border in northern Quang Tri, and after a long toing and froing it became clear that the chopper was off course and that the PRG/Viet Cong, shot it down. The PRG were by this time in town. They were now participating in an inspection to a site to a distant observation post. The consulate general became a kind of a coordinator to help with the rescue mission. There were two helicopters flying in tandem, one was shot down, the other one landed to try to rescue the others and was captured by the PRG. This is in the far distant west, and these are people who are out of touch.

Q: Were you having any contact with the North Vietnamese...

THOMSEN: Very little. They were keeping very much to themselves, and they were very hard to get to see. They came out once in a while to either a Joint Military Committee meeting, or a diplomatic reception, and you could try to talk to them but they were not communicative at all. Hal Colbaugh was telling us what was going on in Hanoi where they were, I won't say effusive, but very interested and approachable

Q: ...impression of the caliber of the Polish and Hungarian representatives.

THOMSEN: They were older, mediocre officers. They were certainly not sending their best and brightest achievers to be a part of this. My feeling was that they were reluctantly participating. They were not eager to make any mistakes that could cause them irritation. Their personalities as well as particular instructions might have been responsible for this.

Q: Sort of mid-level communist apparatchiks of the military types.

THOMSEN: Yes, majors and lieutenant colonels. They were not young spitfires who wanted to make something happen. I don't know whether this is deliberate personnel policy on assignments, or whether it was the caliber that was generally available to them.

About this time General Truong was generally upbeat. He was more than content with the refugee resettlement in Quang Tri and he was happy with the way the Buddhists were cooperating with the government. He was giving me a general appraisal which was positive enough so that he could point to specific problems, and also point to real successes. He felt reasonably good about the situation in what is probably the most active military corps in the country. So things looked pretty good. It was about this time that the concept of a "third Vietnam," or the Viet Cong government in the west was beginning to take shape.

Q: Up in the highlands?

THOMSEN: The highlands and the high Piedmont, and in one conversation some of the Vietnamese are concerned that the "third Vietnam" might start encompassing part of Cambodia. In other words, they might really kind of carve out a larger communist entity in the southern part of Indochinese peninsula that would include part of Cambodia. The Vietnamese themselves were beginning to discuss this possibility, and it suggested that there was a kind of upbeat expectation that there might be a reasonable outcome to the conflict.

In the middle of May there was a consuls general meeting in Saigon. Fred was on leave, and I went there and gave a briefing on the I Corps situation which, as I said, indicated more military activity than in other parts of the country, and as a severe refugee problem as anywhere. Rice prices and inflation were beginning to be felt, this became a problem, at least later on even after I left.

Buddha's birthday, the 17th of May was celebrated with a lot of festivities. Again, there was a sense of some relaxation. The government forces had established a good level of security. There was little immediate concern about VC activity in the populated areas.

At this time, Hal Colebaugh returned to Thailand from where he'd been called. The political section was beginning to be a little short staffed. We were starting to lose people unexpectedly.

Q: I was just going to say, here you're reporting on this, and we've been used to having very good coverage of Vietnam, of any country in the world. Yet, at the same time did you feel that you report and the State Department gets it, and they know, and in a way, so what? Did you think Congress has the power and this is being fought on other fronts. Did you have any of that feeling?

THOMSEN: Lately in '73, when I had the Lao desk, the Vietnam working group was right next door and Watergate had completely incapacitated the department on the Vietnam issue. It was tragic to watch the desperate efforts on our part to get Congress to approve anything. The two links, I think, of the tragedy of Vietnam were Watergate and the oil embargo which doubled the price of petroleum products. Together, our inability to meet our commitments coupled with Vietnamese paranoia about us in the first place which was not inactive. Created an atmosphere where Thieu made very conservative decisions regarding his POL (petroleum-oil-lubricants) and ammunition.

Q: The oil embargo came after the '73 war between Egypt, Syria and Israel.

THOMSEN: And doubled the price of oil. It meant that all of the money allocated to Vietnam, which was for POL and if you look at the budget, again my friends next door later on were able to show this to me in detail. It destroyed our ability to give them a level of support that they needed. That's afterward at the moment we were still marching ahead. The Viet Cong was acting in its own area as if it might intend to stay there. We were seeing school buildings, hospitals, and what looked like airstrips being built. We were seeing movement during the day which didn't occur during the combat period. We were seeing things that looked like there had been an attempt to return to normalcy in the occupied areas. So, we were reporting in that way with a lot of detail. There was no grand overview that we were to give Saigon or Washington that the situation was improved. We were trying to make the point that the local situation was pretty stable. I think that would be a very shorthand way of saying it.

Q: The critical element in this became Congress in a way. Were you getting Congressional visitors, and could you tell us about the ones that you...

THOMSEN: The one I recall is one of Senator Kennedy's staffers.

Q: In other words, Vietnam disappeared from the Congressional radar in a way.

THOMSEN: Well, maybe they didn't want to have a report on the record on the way things were going. Journalists were present regularly, from Time magazine, from the Baltimore Sun, the Washington Post came through and were perceptive, and thoughtful, and maybe critical or skeptical, but they were basically balanced.

Q: But you were also getting professional people as opposed to the youngsters in Vietnam during the height of the war. I mean, there were an awful lot of very naive young people going out to win their fame being war correspondents.

THOMSEN: I had lunch with a Hungarian colonel, who was even more hardline than the Poles. At this time a critical area between Hue and Da Nang was in friendly hands. This situation goes back to '64; in July '64 when I first arrived in Hue an anthropologist from Cornell was there and gave me a first hand report on a major NVA attack on a Special Forces camp there. Now in '73 the friendlies had just taken Bachieu, this 4,000 foot hill, back from the North Vietnamese, having lost it a few days earlier. The I Corps chief of staff, Colonel Dang, was sending his twelve year old to Virginia to Annandale. Dang is the one who had earlier referred to Watergate as the "death of Vietnam."

I called on the Polish colonel, who made it clear that his instructions remained to prevent full effectiveness on investigations. Now what he meant by that was not absolutely clear, but essentially I think what he said to me was that he's been told that "every i must be dotted and every t must be crossed" on all the procedures before they're allowed to accept an investigation.

May 26th, had the lowest military activity since the cease fire. The ICCS was not moving in spite of a new Polish head looked like he might be more interested in doing something. The GVN was reforming its province level forces, the traditional parties were refusing to go out of existence. Al Francis arrived. Al had been my successor as political advisor to the Marines in 1966. Hewas assigned to Saigon as political internal chief. He revived the political reporting system.

A lot of activity was now going on in the development area. The new head of the Agency for the Development of the Danang area was trying to upgrade the Danang infrastructure. In spite of the rice shortages, in spite of refugees there was a kind of economic rebirth going on. Not just in the countryside, but in the cities too.

Al Francis was able to drive to Nha Trang, I don't know what it was like in the late '60s, but in the mid-'60s you couldn't drive anywhere. In the same time frame a young officer drove from Saigon all the way to Da Nang. So security had really improved.

On the 2nd of June I helped inaugurate a spur track through the main trunk between Saigon and Hanoi. A trip to Hue was 25 cents. The line to Saigon was not yet fully repaired but would be very shortly.

Q: You were saying that the Lao desk was next door to the Vietnam Working Group.

THOMSEN: It was a super office . A large part of their time was spent on the Hill, which responds to your question about congressional interest. They were up on the Hill almost every day fighting for support.

Q: Were they talking about lack of support from congress and did they see it at that time.

THOMSEN: Right. They were concerned that...I'm trying to get my chronology right. It was during this period when the oil embargo affects hit hardest, when the price of oil...

Q: We're talking about the oil embargo which was a result of the '73 war between Egypt, Syria and Israel.

THOMSEN: Right, and the outcome of that was that OPEC, the oil consortium raised the price of oil substantially. I'm not sure whether or not they also restricted the production of oil. It meant essentially that that portion of our aid, military assistance to Vietnam, which was devoted to POL...

Q: The petroleum, oil and lubricants.

THOMSEN: Right...was cut in half. The value of that money was cut in half, and that made a significant difference in terms of our support, and they were trying to get the difference back. Trying to convince congress that to maintain the level of support we had committed ourselves to, we needed more money, and congress was very uninterested in that approach.

Q: Who was your boss at this time?

THOMSEN: Mike Reeves, M. Lloyd Reeves, but Mike...

Q: I've interviewed Mike. And the head of Far Eastern Affairs?

THOMSEN: I don't recall who was the Assistant Secretary. Monty Stearns was the DAS, the Deputy Assistant Secretary, who I spent a lot of time with. Monty had been the DCM in Laos while I was there so we were very much in sync on a lot of the issues that I was dealing with, and a lot of times Mike would simply send me to see Monty on various issues. I know Mac Godley was supposed to take the Assistant Secretaryship but I think he got dumped. ...a Japan expert and I rarely saw him.

Q: This was Robert Ingersoll.

THOMSEN: Right, a political appointee.

Q: So he just didn't hit your radar very well.

THOMSEN: That's right. Monty was really on top of the Southeast Asia issues. That makes sense to me now.

Q: Were there any major incidents or problems other than what you've mentioned dealing with Laos in this period?

THOMSEN: No, it was just a matter of continually working to prevent Defense from seeking reductions in critical supplies like 75 mm howitzer ammunition. Fascinating small things ways in which they were trying to do what they thought they were being instructed to do. I would use every bureaucratic trick in the book to keep their feet to the fire. Used to call out to Vientiane to generate cables that would tell us one thing or another and would force DOD to respond.

Q: It was sort of an interesting interplay that often gets lost in somebody looking at the record, and that is the desk officer, particularly the telephone now, calling up the embassy and saying, look, if I get a cable such and such I can wave this in front of the Pentagon, or wherever in any case. But anyway, the solicitation of reporting from the field that often gets lost when one looks at how the foreign affairs system works.

THOMSEN: And today, of course, its even more dramatic. The use of E-mail to solicit responses is something that I'm not even fully cognizant of. I just imagine how valuable it is because essentially I can see the desk E-mailing out a full text of an message they want sent in. I know this is what is happening now. It's the way the bureaucracy operates at its best. The only other thing of any significance is that we did have, and I can't remember what the acronym stands for, WASG, Washington Action Group, did a study on the future of Indochina for which I was the rapporteur. That too took a lot of time mainly with CIA, AID and Defense. I kept the same theme that we better maintain our support strongly in Laos if we were going to have any chance at all of pulling it off, particularly in Vietnam. And we did prevail in the study.

MARSHALL BREMENT
Public Affairs Officer
Saigon (1973-1974)

Ambassador Marshall Brement was born in New York in 1932. He joined the Foreign Service in 1956, studied Chinese, served in Asia, the Soviet Union, and Spain and was ambassador to Iceland. He was Public Affairs Officer in Saigon (1973-1974). He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Then it fell your due at some point to go where our main problem was at the time. You served in Vietnam in Saigon from '73 to '74. How did this appointment come about?

BREMENT: I was a Public Affairs Officer, one of the USIA's key public affairs officers in East Asia. And my predecessor in Saigon, Bob Lincoln, decided that he wanted to pack it in. He had been there a year or so, and so they needed somebody to replace him and they couldn't think of a USIA officer that they could send, or who wanted to go there. Anyway, they thought of me as the right person for the job, partly because of my Soviet and China background, partly because one of the things the director for East Asia, a fellow named Kent Crane, was very interested in was the psychological program directed against North Vietnam. He thought I would be good at that. You would have to ask him why he thought I was the right person, but he certainly did. He twisted my arm.

Q: What was the situation in Vietnam at the time as you saw it?

BREMENT: I got there on what they called x plus 60, March 29, 1973, which was the day that supposedly all North Vietnamese troops got out of the South as part of the Paris agreements. And indeed peace was supposed to descend on Vietnam at that point. The government of Vietnam was treated by the embassy as a government that was going to be maintained forever and ever. It received major economic and other aid from the U.S. And when I got there the supposition was that it was going to endure.

Q: Was it the feeling that this was a pretty good peace accord? Were we getting what we wanted? or was it a matter of buying time?

BREMENT: I think everybody knew that it wasn't an ideal peace accord, and everybody doubted whether the Vietnamese would live with it. And of course there were carrots and sticks in there for the North Vietnamese. Their invasion of 1972 had been brutally beaten back with lots and lots of casualties. I really didn't know what I was going to find when I got there.

When I got there I certainly wasn't an expert on Vietnam. I was an expert on the international ramifications of the Vietnam situation. But I had never focused on the internal situation in Vietnam, except for a couple of relatively brief trips in 1969 and 1971. As I say, I didn't know much about the country. So I approached it with an open mind, with no preconceptions. I wouldn't say I was optimistic when I arrived, but I would say I was open-minded. I knew what the embassy line was -- that this was a viable, going concern, that indeed if you counted up all the people in South Vietnam who were anti-communist, anti-North, starting with 800 thousand refugees from the North, one million school teachers and others who worked for the government, and then added the one million in the army, and you added all their dependents and so forth, you got a very heavy percentage of the population that was anti-communist. There is no question about that. That was true. But the question was whether a majority of the population being anti-communist was enough, when you are up against an army that is going to attack you.

As I looked around as a political observer, I quickly reached the conclusion that all Vietnamese, of whatever political persuasion, were convinced that the Vietnam situation was not going to be settled in Saigon or Hanoi. It was going to be settled in Washington, or perhaps in Paris. Indeed that seemed like a reasonable assessment to me. And as long as the U.S. government was committed to keeping a government in Saigon, I thought there was at least a chance, good chance, that the government in Saigon could be maintained. In retrospect, I would probably say that I was wildly optimistic, but not because of the situation in Vietnam. It was Washington I misjudged.

Q: Of course Watergate had not happened.

BREMENT: I was just about to say that. In fact, I can remember very well a luncheon with Huang Duc Nghia, who was their Minister of Information, and Thieu's cousin, and his most trusted advisor in some respects, and Tom Polgar, who was the station chief for CIA. Watergate was just happening, and I remember Polgar saying to Nghia, "look, in the United States in 1923 we had the Teapot Dome scandal, and in 1924 we elected a Republican. And the Teapot Dome scandal was the worst political scandal we have ever had. So this is important, but it will blow away. It's not going to have any influence on Vietnam at all." I sort of looked at everyone to see if Polgar meant it and if Nghia accepted it. I kept quiet, but I was thinking at the time that this was a good line to take but who is kidding whom? Watergate was the death-knell of South Vietnam, it seemed perfectly apparent to me. And indeed, when I went home to get married, we had a conference with several people, including I remember, Scoop Jackson, who...

Q: Senator from Washington...

BREMENT: Senator from Washington and certainly in foreign affairs a staunch pro-defense, anti-Soviet figure for years and years. And he said to us, South Vietnam is doomed. No matter what happens, the United States government is not going to do anything about it. At that point I thought, well, it looks pretty bad.

Q: Well, what sort of activities were you carrying on then?

BREMENT: We had enormous USIA activities. I had 170 local employees and 35 American officers. We had a cultural center in Saigon with 20,000 students and a couple of thousand teachers. We had libraries. We had four cultural centers throughout the country, and libraries throughout the country. We had a big publications program, we had an enormous educational exchange program, and a big information program. That is what I was personally doing more than anything else. I was on the information side. There was also a press attaché who functioned as part of the embassy. He wasn't really under me, but he was a USIA officer, and sort of contributed. So we did everything in the whole information and cultural area -- lots to do.

Q: Looking at it in retrospect, did it really make any difference what we did, as long as there isn't an army to back it up?

BREMENT: Well, I think there are probably an awful lot of Vietnamese in this country who got a good education in English from us, to start with. I think, yes, you have a certain effect, but you are not going to change the world by teaching people English, or by educating them, or by giving them the right information on a given subject. If you are dealing with a military threat you have to handle it militarily. Once you get enough people who are willing to carry guns and shoot you, there is only one answer, and that is you have to defend yourself with other people who have guns who are willing to shoot them back. And if you don't do that you are going to give up your liberty.

But there was always a chance, anyway throughout the entire period I was in Vietnam, which was only 15 months. I left in June '74. I remember at my departure there were lots of farewell dinners with various correspondents, very good American correspondents and other correspondents, who were much more skeptical than I was about the future of South Vietnam. Nobody was saying things were inevitable. But it did look bad. Things were getting pretty somber at that point. It did look like it wasn't going to last, not necessarily because of what was going on in South Vietnam. But the country was so dependent on the United States, not only for its economic wherewithal, but also in its military operations. I mean we had unfortunately, I think, in retrospect, taught them how to fight our way. Fighting our way meant you had an awful lot of ammunition that you used. Firepower was our God of war. And if you are going to all of a sudden take away ammunition, therefore you don't have firepower and have a lot of army officers who don't know how to fight under those conditions. All these tactics, all the way that they had been taught how to fight, was no longer any good. And that is indeed what happened. They simply got rolled up. But I left. I left in June of '74.

In January of '75 when I was in Moscow and I read that a remote provincial capital had been taken over by the North Vietnamese and there was just no reaction from Washington whatsoever, then I knew that it was finished. It was just a question of time. I was surprised that it went as quickly as it did, but it was just a question of time. Once the South Vietnamese realized that the Americans weren't coming to their aid, as they had in a similar situation in 1972, it was all over.

JOHN N. IRWIN, II
Ambassador to France, Paris Peace Talks
France (1973-1974)

John N. Irwin, II was born in 1913 in Iowa. He was Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense in the Eisenhower administration, Under Secretary of State in the Nixon administration and ambassador to France. He was interviewed by Gordon Evans in 1991.

IRWIN: In the negotiations to end the Vietnamese war France was very helpful. Most of the negotiations took place in France, secretly by Secretary Kissinger himself dealing with the Vietnamese representatives in France. The embassy had practically nothing to do with that as it was directly out of Kissinger's office when he was National Security Advisor and later, of course, when he was Secretary of State. Again the duality of the French views came forth, some circles in France were happy to see the United States humiliated in Vietnam, others were concerned because they knew that it was essential for a strong Europe to have strong outward looking America who would be willing to cooperate with Europe and not retreat into isolationism, which Europe remembers as a former strong feeling in the United States, certainly at the beginning of World War II.

I spoke earlier about President Giscard D'Estaing's approach being less ideological, but even there he had certain inhibitions because Jacques Chirac was a strong Gaullist and he was his prime minister. All of that limited to some degree Giscard's ability to move away from the Gaullist doctrine although he and his foreign minister, Savigard, became the architects of what could be termed a more benign foreign policy towards the United States and towards the world and accordingly our relations improved.

The embassy in other contexts continued to work with France, criticized French views but presented French views to the United States in a way we could understand the French point of view and not just as a confrontational issue. We tried to oppose voices in Washington that appeared to be confrontational and looked at French views of the French government primarily with pretension and ambition other than trying to get a working agreement together. We tried to point out to both sides that we were in favor of a strong France, economically and militarily, because it would complement the United States' power, not only in NATO and Europe, but throughout the world. That was the approach that Giscard and the U.S. administrations following the time I was in Paris really adopted and worked quite well together with.

HUGH BURLESON
Program Officer, USIS
Saigon (1973-1975)

Q: Then, where did you go after that?

BURLESON: I went to Vietnam. One of the reasons that I had opted for War College rather than CAO Jakarta in 1972, was that in 1970, I had been on an inspection team that went down to Jakarta, and the PAO there was a State Department officer on loan to USIA, Marshall Brement.

Q: Oh, yes, I knew Marshall Brement quite well!

BURLESON: I wasn't particularly enamored of his style of operation, and felt that I wouldn't be too happy working under him. That's another reason that I went to the War College instead. Then, when I got to Vietnam, the PAO was Marshall Brement. So, I got him anyway.

Q: How long were you there?

BURLESON: Vietnam from July 14, 1973 until about April 15, 16 of 1975.

Q: You had gotten out just before the great departure from the roof of the Embassy.

BURLESON: Yes, I flew out on one of the last commercial flights.

Q: Graham Martin was your Ambassador at that time?

BURLESON: Right, and that's one more interesting story.

Q: I would like that story a little bit. I knew him a bit.

BURLESON: Right. Well, this was, of course, the so-called armistice period and we were supposed to, I mean, the so-called JUSPAO Operation had been deactivated and transformed magically into an ordinary USIS-type of program.

Q: Was Lincoln your PAO?

BURLESON: No, Lincoln had left before I arrived. I think he left in Spring or something, in March. Marshall Bremont hadn't yet arrived. We had an acting PAO, Bryan Battey. But he was having some problems. I don't know what the pressure was about, but he was medevaced for mental strain, or whatever it was, perhaps.

Q: He was a very brilliant officer.

BURLESON: Yes. He was a great guy but...

Q: He did have these periods in which he exhibited some mental disorientation?

BURLESON: More like severe depression. He was separated from his wife. It may have been something that could easily be treated now by medication, but at that time it really inactivated him and apparently was getting very bad. So, for a time, we had just the DPAO. I was in the Policy Officer job there for the first few months; but things were still fairly unsettled, partly because of the lack of a PAO.

Just about the time Marshall Bremont arrived, which was I guess, August/September 1973 the Program Officer (in charge of all the program planning) left. Bremont asked me to switch to the Program Officer job. So, I was then in the position under the DPAO and PAO, helping to plan programs nationwide -- whatever there was of a nation there in Vietnam.

We had a whole series of American speakers coming out and trying to address issues that the Vietnamese were interested in. They were obviously still distracted by the instabilities in the whole country. One of the big assets we had, of course, was the Vietnamese-American Center there, our main program base in Saigon.

We had occasional smaller cultural presentations, but the one big thing in that 22 months that I was there was that the Martha Graham Dance Company came out (December 1974). Because of the staff situation at the time, I got the job basically of being producer for that whole operation. It actually worked out quite well. It was well received. The two performances were the cultural event of the year in Saigon.

So, there was a lot of USIS work to be done. Yet, we were dealing with a very thin remnant of intellectuals. Obviously, leaders in the society -- their main concern was survival, and trying to avoid letting the situation deteriorate due to the Viet Cong (VC). But from October 1974 it was essentially downhill -- all was shaking apart. There was a big Viet Cong raid on the oil tank farm just down the river from Saigon. It burned for four or five days, with a big pall of smoke billowing and rising above the city. That kind of set the mood for what was to happen in the next six months. That summer, too, Congress had banned any more arms for the Vietnamese Army.

Q: Did you have any feeling that Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese were beginning to close in on you?

BURLESON: Well, yeah, later on. Whenever we were going out of the city, we always checked with Embassy security about conditions, whether there might be incidents in the direction we were going. More and more we got warnings, whether we were going there or not, of there being raids or VC sightings just outside the city and so on. We felt the tension; a sense of instability was rife.

Q: You mentioned earlier about a large number of people coming in from the United States, speakers and various people in the cultural and intellectual fields giving lectures. To what extent did those have to be interpreted to the Vietnamese listeners?

BURLESON: Not much. Not very much because we were dealing with elites in Saigon. Elsewhere in the nation, they did interpret some programs; but it was not done with the elaborate conference interpreting set-up that we had already been using in Japan for quite a while. A lot of the Vietnamese from, I guess, the 1950s onward had been involved with our military, many had been to the States to study, so that the ones we most wanted to deal with had enough English ability that interpreting wasn't that essential.

Q: You left in '74 or '75?

BURLESON: I left in April of '75.

Q: How many months was that ahead of the rapid evacuation?

BURLESON: Just a couple of weeks. By March, we were already shipping people out, early. I was scheduled to leave in July. Because of the deteriorating situation, we were getting advance transfer orders for people. I already had my transfer orders and could leave any time. My wife went in early April. There was the disgruntled Vietnamese Air Force officer who flew a bombing raid on the Presidential Palace just a mile from our house. My wife had gone through bombing in Yokohama in 1945. We arranged to transfer her out to Singapore where she then waited for me. I had to finish getting our things packed up. So I left about 7-8 days after she did.

Q: It was really a couple of weeks before the great debacle.

BURLESON: That's right; I went on a commercial flight. At that time, I guess, at least a third of the other USIS officers had already left.

THERESA A. TULL
Deputy Principal Officer
Da Nang (1973-1975)

Theresa A. Tull was born in New Jersey in 1936. She received her bachelor's degree from the University of Maryland in 1972. Her career included positions in Brussels, Vietnam, Washington D.C., Philippines, Laos, and ambassadorships to Guyana and Brunei. Ambassador Tull was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November 2004.

Q: Okay, today is the 31st of January, 2005. Terry, Da Nang, you were there '73, in the first place how long were you there?

TULL: From '73, August '73 to the collapse in '75.

Q: What were you doing in Da Nang?

TULL: I was the deputy principal officer at the consulate general there.

Q: Who was the principal officer?

TULL: Initially Paul Pople.

Q: When you got there in '73, what was the situation in Da Nang?

TULL: It didn't seem to be too hairy. Of course, the peace agreement had gone into effect. We had some people in country who were monitoring the peace accord that had been reached in January in Paris of that year, 1973. It was a little iffy. There was a not strong feeling that the accord was going to hold, it was well worth a try. Our military was gone, except that under the terms of the peace agreement the U.S. had been allocated 50 slots for military personnel for logistics work. They were under the DOD office in Saigon, but each of the consulates general had a little DOD office, too. We had a small group in Da Nang. It was headed by a sergeant; he might have been a retired sergeant. There were two or three people in his office. I don't remember initially that the military situation was particularly horrendous. Around the edges there were problems.

One of the things that made my tour extremely interesting is that Paul Pople was determined, because of the fact that we were into a new phase of our situation in Vietnam, to reduce the high profile American involvement in the activities of the region. Whereas in the past the consul general had attended the I Corps commander's daily military briefing at I Corps headquarters every day. Pople decided that I would do this Sunday through Friday. On Saturday he would attend the briefing and would have a meeting afterwards with the I Corps commander.

Q: Now the I Corps commander at this point was a Vietnamese?

TULL: Oh, yes, definitely. He was a three star Vietnamese general, a superb officer named Ngo Quang Truong. I was introduced to him and he agreed that I would attend his military briefing every day. Every morning I would begin my work day at 8:00 at I Corps headquarters and go in and listen, sit right next to the three star general while he received his briefing from the staff, the military activities that had occurred during the night. I was really quite impressed by his acceptance of this change, to have this relatively young American woman sitting there as the senior American presence at his briefing. I wasn't quite sure how to play it initially. I thought I am not going to pretend to be something I'm not. I'm not going to try to put up a masculine front and wear khakis and slacks and all that routine. I wasn't sure what the correct approach was, so I just decided I would dress as I would for the office and I would wear dresses suitable to the Southeast Asia situation, frequently a light colored flower dress. I thought that's the way I am, guys. I'm not a military officer and I'm not going to try to be the Sally of the Jungle or anything,

I would just go as myself. That seemed to work nicely. It took a little while for the other officers to figure out who was I, what was I doing, but the fact that General Truong had me sit at his right hand and the fact that I deferred to him, I always made certain that I got there before he did and when the officers rose upon his entrance I also rose, and I gradually developed a very good relationship with him and with the officers at I Corps headquarters. I would go back to the consulate general and report on what had happened in the region overnight. If there were particular serious military developments I would certainly pass those on. I would maybe seek additional information. I would consult, maybe, or pass additional information on or check with our CIA personnel there who also were following a military situation. A key element of my work in Da Nang was attending that briefing every day. I gradually developed as I say some pretty good working relationships with the Vietnamese officers at I Corps Headquarters.

Q: To get the timing, there had been a major North Vietnamese offensive against Quang Tri. Had that happened before your time?

TULL: April '72.

Q: So, this was before your time?

TULL: Before my spell there yes.

Q: How had the effects of this impacted on all of you? I mean I think they had, they had taken Quang Tri and eventually pulled out again?

TULL: They were pushed back out of Quang Tri, but not all the way. General Truong and his people took back, definitely took back, the capital of Quang Tri and pushed the North Vietnamese back. It's been so long, but I think there was a river and I think the North Vietnamese had been pushed north of this river. They had not ceded all the land that they took, but the provincial capital, the northernmost provincial capital of Quang Tri had been retaken in some miserable difficult fighting principally led by General Truong. Now, I don't know whether at that time he was I Corps commander or the commander of the First Infantry Division. I believe he was I Corps commander and supervised all of that. That was a year before I had arrived. The peace talks were going on and it was in January of '73 that this so-called peace agreement was concluded in Paris. Eventually, as you know, Henry Kissinger and his North Vietnamese counterpart shared a Noble Peace Prize.

Q: For non-peace.

TULL: For that non-peace. Right. There was continual sniping around the edges of I Corps, which I could see, every day in terms of North Vietnamese incursions. The fighting continued around the edges, it definitely did. It was a difficult situation.

Q: Were you worried about Viet Cong I mean in other words, insurgent forces within or was the problem one of organized North Vietnamese troops in the South?

TULL: From my perspective, it was North Vietnamese organized units. The map in I Corps showed their locations with the name of their divisions and units and things like that on it. They slipped back and forth into Laos, using Laos for safe haven. They were definitely still a presence and it was rather iffy, more than rather iffy, that this peace, the cease-fire arrangement would hold. The effort was definitely being made I think on the part of the South Vietnamese, but the North Vietnamese only viewed it as a temporary stepping stone towards the ultimate effort to take over the South.

Q: How, when you first got there, what were you all seeing as far as the rule of Saigon up in I Corps and in Da Nang?

TULL: Well, I Corps was very fortunate. You are going to find me a very prejudiced observer in favor of General Ngo Quang Truong, who was the finest corps commander the Vietnamese had and one of the finest if not the very finest general that they had. He was not a corrupt person. He was a fine military tactician and he just did an extremely good job there. He was well liked by the people of I Corps. How could I find this out? Well, by talking with opinion makers, some of the politicians. I remember having a conversation with the archbishop at one point, the Catholic Archbishop who was just praising General Truong to the skies as a fine moral man; he said it was too bad he's not the president. Truong was apolitical. He never had a political bone in his body. He was very loyal to the government in Saigon. Saigon was represented in I Corps by him and he was not a political general. He gave good service. I remember he cared not only of course about the military situation, but he was responsible for the economy and dealing with natural disasters and things of this nature.

I remember feeling that I had been fully accepted by him when I had been there a few months and at the I Corps briefing, we were briefed on a really serious flood that had occurred in Quang Ngai Province. General Truong decided he would go down and check it out and as I was leaving the briefing he stopped me and said, "Do you want to go down to Quang Ngai and check out the flood?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Okay, be back in half an hour." I scooted on back to the office and told the consul general that I had been invited to go and he thought it was a great opportunity. Now, I didn't have time to go home and change. That's a time when I would have slipped on some slacks or something, but I'm there in this light blue flowered dress. I remember that. I beat it on back to I Corps and we flew down. The general was piloting the helicopter. When we got to Quang Ngai we flew over the areas that were heavily flooded and then stopped in one of the villages. The military brought up a tank -- it wasn't an APC, an APC might have been too low -- for us to ride on. The general helped me up on the tank and I was with him side by side standing on this tank and bracing myself as we went down the rutted, water logged road. The villagers and the farmers were just astounded. They recognized the general right away and they were waving and smiling and looking kind of astonished. Who was this white woman in a blue dress with him? It definitely showed his concern and care for the people there in that situation.

Q: Well, did you get down to the embassy much or not?

TULL: Not too often. I don't know, yes, I don't know whether we had a pouch run. I don't recall whether we had to carry a pouch down or what was what. I got down occasionally, yes, I got down a few times, but not that much.

Q: A different atmosphere down there?

TULL: Very different. One thing that I remember distinctly and was astounded by at the consulate general was the total control of Graham Martin, who was ambassador.

Q: You mean at the embassy.

TULL: No, the consulate general. At the embassy, the ambassador exercised total control over constituent posts. We could not send any cables directly to Washington. They all had to go to Saigon and then be sent on or not sent on as the embassy decided. Airgrams, everything had to be sent down there and cleared, too. You couldn't just do a normal cable and send it out, as in most posts. Everything had to go and get cleared by the embassy. Paul Popple was the consul general and he believed in I think in being as straight a shooter as he could with regard to the situation. I think he had worked with Graham Martin before. I don't want to say he was a dissenter, but I think Martin was interested in having him there as kind of a fresh set of eyes, but then they gave us a hard time about getting our reporting out. It was a little frustrating as well. At that time most of what we did was cleared and processed through Al Francis who was the political/military counselor in Saigon and he had been very close to Graham Martin. I would occasionally get a phone call from Al asking a question about a cable or whatever. The feeling was that he was the sort of a temple dog for Martin that if it got past Al, fine, but if not, that was the end of it.

I remember one key piece. Popple was there. I got there in August of '73. Around Tet of '74 Paul wanted to have us prepare a really big comprehensive overview of the situation in I Corps with a view to determining whether the cease-fire was working? Was there viability for the whole process? How was the situation going economically, commercially, in agriculture, militarily, morale, regarding local dissidents, things of that nature? I should probably amplify this to say that during the bulk of our time in Vietnam we had large CORDS offices, provincial offices staffed largely by AID personnel. With the cease-fire, the peace agreement, those offices were trimmed down considerably, but we still had an office in each of our province capitals. It was a difficult transition for some of the AID people to switch over from what had been their traditional AID and military monitoring roles into an observer role. Paul Popple wanted them to start viewing themselves as ConGen officers looking at the overall situation. We weren't giving out new aid and we weren't running the show, we were not the hand-in-hand advisors to the Vietnamese provincial officials any more. We were more of an observer and reporting force you might say. That had changed and this didn't sit too well with some of the AID personnel. It was a transition that was difficult for these folks to make particularly since Paul said I was the deputy principal officer and they would report through me. Well, this was a little difficult for some of the folks who were older than I, higher in their personal rank, than I. Anyway, we gradually worked it out. His plan was that I would supervise putting together this really comprehensive look at what the situation was in I Corps. I would draw on reports from all of our provincial offices which were in Quang Ngai, Quang Nam, and Hue. I called our provincial officers in and we had a brainstorming session, to determine what should we look for, what were the indicators that would most suggest how things were going in various fields, and we developed an outline. I drew very heavily on their input because these folks had been working in the provinces for quite a while. We put together this outline and then I asked them with Popple's authority, of course, to put together a draft report for me about what was happening in their area, following this outline. I met with them once or twice more. All of their drafts came into me.

I remember it was shortly before Tet of '74. I then used the Tet holiday, we had three days, the ConGen was closed plus the weekend and I worked and worked on these reports trying to put them together coherently and come up with conclusions and summaries and where did we stand and actually came up with I thought it was pretty thoughtful airgram. I was not a, let's say, a bomb thrower, but I was a political officer and proud of it and you assess the situation and if something isn't going well, you say it isn't going well or something is not going too badly, you say that. I put together this report, but on balance the conclusion of the report was that this was really not going to be viable situation in the longer run. This was a very iffy, difficult situation and it did not look good. Paul approved this and as he's approving it he says, something along these lines, "It's a fine job, Terry, really a very good job. It will never get out of Saigon, but I'll sign it off and send it down" which he did.

He was right. It didn't get out of Saigon. He was told about it on his next trip to Saigon that no way could something like that be sent onto Washington. It was too negative, etc. Now, Popple wasn't the type to send it backchannel, so that was the end of that, all that work. Nor would I bootleg it to friends in the Department. We had put together what I thought was a pretty sensible piece. But it went nowhere.

Now, that was '74. By the time the airgram was finished it was probably mid-February in '74. Vietnam fell the following year. In January or so of '75 I remember the director of the Vietnam working group Jim Bullington came to Da Nang. He was checking out our files and he came across my airgram and he said, "Why didn't this go in?" I said, "You'll have to ask Saigon about that." He said, "This is exactly what we should have had." I said, "Well, we did it here. We all have bosses."

Q: You know in a way its remarkable that it didn't go in because usually somebody somewhere who will take something like this and mail it personally.

TULL: Yes, but I wouldn't do it. Maybe I should have. I just wasn't the type. I thought, well, I've done what I'm supposed to do here. Jim thought it would have been very helpful to have had it. It didn't happen.

Q: What were you getting from the political leaders of your area during the time before all hell broke loose?

TULL: This was so heavily a military environment that I don't have a strong recollection of say political party people. We had a very good Vietnamese local national employee at the ConGen who did have contact with some political party people and with the Buddhists. The Buddhists were very politically active as you know in Vietnam as a whole. I guess that type of opinion was also folded into this message that I did.

Q: At that time where was the feeling? Was it just that we didn't have the military force to hold them back or that the will wasn't there or what?

TULL: The feeling that permeated, I think, was that the U.S. had quit. The U.S., by pulling out all our military despite our pledges that we would continue aid, was the handwriting on the wall. I think that the Vietnamese felt that the North Vietnamese would not be deterred except by a U.S. presence. Since the U.S. presence was gone it was just a matter of time before the North Vietnamese despite their commitments under the Paris agreement, launched a major invasion to finish their takeover. I think it was the fact that the U.S. had pulled out. Basically pulled out, pulled the rug out, that convinced the North to continue their attack. Also the U.S. renege on our aid commitments to the South Vietnamese military.

Q: How long, did Popple stay the whole time you were there?

TULL: No. I'm trying to remember when he left. I got there in August and he hadn't been there very long himself at that time of August of '73. I don't think he was there more than a year.

Q: What was his background?

TULL: A Europeanist I think. He had an Italian wife. He had served in Italy.

Q: It's probably where he ran across Martin.

TULL: I think so, maybe in Rome. He was a very intelligent man. I ended up with a mixed opinion of him. The man is dead now. He was very bright. Initially I was quite impressed.

Q: Vietnamese, the Vietnamese context is not the Italian context. Did he seem to understand sort of the culture and what worked and what didn't work?

TULL: I think he was a pretty smooth diplomat in that sense. He was a small man and I think that helped, although I was a tall woman and I had no difficulty. He had a good relationship with General Truong, treated him with respect and liked him, generally liked him. I don't know that he had a great deal of contact outside of the military establishment.

Q: Yes. Well, when Popple left, who replaced him?

TULL: Well, interestingly enough it was Al Francis who came up from Saigon. He had been political/military counselor and was very close to Graham Martin. I thought, we're going to see how we get along. He was dispatched I think because I suspect Martin didn't like the tone of the reporting that was coming down from I Corps and he wanted someone who was gung ho with the policy there. But, I don't know. I always took the attitude that I had to get along with the person who was sent to be the boss and also that I had to give them the benefit of my very sincere honest opinions on things. I definitely made an effort to get along with Al and yet I told him what I thought about things. Al had served in I Corps on a previous tour in Vietnam. He knew the commander of the third infantry division, General Hinh, and he told me that he wanted to pay a call on General Hinh. I told him that he should call on General Lam, the deputy commander at I Corps who outranked Hinh, first. (He had already called on General Truong, the commander.)

Al insisted that he and General Hinh were friends. I said, “Yes, but there’s protocol here. You really should see General Lam first.” He insisted that he would see Hinh first. I said something like, “You can see whomever you wish, but I’m telling you you’re making a mistake. You really need to call on the two star deputy commander first.” But he didn’t, he went to see General Hinh first, and, of course, the two star was upset. To Al’s credit after a few weeks he came back to me and said something like, “Well, you know, General Lam has been really cool towards me. You were actually right to recommend that I call on him first. I’ll have to make an effort to make it up with him.”

We got along and in fact he hadn’t been there too long when (we can put this on the tape and then we can decide later whether it can stay or not) Al decided he was going to go to Hue for the weekend. It was a Saturday. I was to be in charge for the weekend. Saturday morning we got a frantic phone call from one of our airbases in Thailand that one of our reconnaissance planes, I used to think it was a U2, but I really think it was an SR71.

Q: The blackbird.

TULL: It was a blackbird. It was having engine trouble and had to make an emergency landing in Da Nang. This was, of course, against the peace agreement, it was definitely a no-no that we would have this happen, but by the same token, we weren’t going to let the plane crash.

Q: Let me just stop here.

TULL: So, Al and I went out to the airport. We first notified some Vietnamese. The head of the Vietnamese Air Force called Truong and told him what was happening and then we raced out to the airport and saw this plane coming down. It was noontime, the time when the flights to Saigon were loading up. This plane comes in and it definitely needed some help, needed some work done. What I appreciated about Al was that he met the pilot and introduced him to me and said, “Now, I have to go to Hue and I want you to understand that Terry is in charge here and whatever she says goes.” In the meantime the pilot had gotten in touch with our base in Thailand, and they sent over another plane, again against the cease-fire, a plane with a repair crew and replacement parts. Al proceeded to go to Hue, which I thought was a note of confidence in me. I had quite an interesting 24 hours babysitting that airplane.

Q: Those things are odd looking, you know, we’ve all seen the things and it’s a most impressive plane and it certainly isn’t the run of the mill. It’s not tiny.

TULL: Well, fortunately here’s where your longstanding relationships work out. I had become a good friend of General Khanh who was the head of the Vietnamese air force in I Corps. I knew him quite well from briefings and social events. He was quite upset. I said we have to get a hanger quickly. He came to the airport right away and we got the plane into a hanger. They emptied the Vietnamese aircraft out of the hanger and got it into a hanger. Of course he was anxious, and I don’t blame him. He said, “We’ve got to get it out of here.” I said, “We will, there’s a plane coming over with a crew. Yes, they’re bringing the parts. They’ll be here. I won’t let them off the base. Don’t you worry. They’re going to be here in that hanger working on this plane.”

At this time they were having a shortage of automobile fuel in town and I said, "There's one problem now. I've got to have gas for my car for the ConGen vehicle. Do you know any place I can get gas?" He said, "I'll take care of it." He ended up getting some gas for my car.

We had a couple of political officers, good young fellows, David Harr and Gerald Scott. The three of us were there and in comes the other airplane with the crew and their attitude was hey, isn't this exciting? We're in Vietnam now. Isn't this nifty? I hustled them all together and I said, "You do not leave this hanger, I don't want any uniforms seen out on that tarmac. You must stay in this hanger working on that airplane. This is a serious violation of the cease-fire. It's necessary. I'm glad to do it. We'll do whatever we can to facilitate your stay, but you must stay in here."

They were not too happy about that. I ended up having one of the fellows go out and get them supper. We got sandwiches and sodas for them. I said, "Look, we'll even get you some souvenirs. Would you be interested in maybe having some carvings from Marble Mountain?" "Could we?" I sent another one of the men down, to the market and he came back with miscellaneous souvenirs, which the airmen paid for. They worked all night on the plane.

Meanwhile, I've got the two pilots, one who had brought the plane in and the other fresh one from Thailand. They're in these bright orange jumpsuits and they were estimating to me that it looked like the way the work was going that they would be ready for a dawn takeoff, but in the meantime they had to have some sleep. I decided to take them to my home for a meal and a night's sleep. I left the two political officers with the airplane. I asked the pilots to lie down on the floor in the back because I didn't want these two orange-suited American pilots to be seen riding in the consulate general vehicle. They understood completely. When I got to my residence I got them inside and I woke my cook up and she fixed them a nice dinner and then they went to bed and got some sleep. About 5:30 a.m. I guess we got back in the car, same procedure, and went out to the airport again. By that time the plane was repaired and they thought they would be able to take off safely, which they did. I've never seen anything like it, to see that airplane take off. It practically goes straight up in the air. It was incredible.

Q: It must have woken up everybody in Da Nang up.

TULL: It had a nice little kick to it. I knew the planes existed, but I'd never seen one, these huge black wings, but then when it started up, as you know it looked like it went a few feet and then went almost straight up into the air. It was incredible. A few days later, a funny note to this, I went out for supper with a friend to a restaurant along the river in Da Nang and they had, I guess you would call him a deaf mute, who helped direct parking at this place. He knew who I was. He sees me and oh, oh.

Q: You're motioning with your hand going straight up.

TULL: The deaf mute was mimicking the take off of the airplane. What was interesting, I knew at the time that members of the International Control Commission, which at that time was Polish, Iranian, I think Canadian, were at the airport Saturday noontime getting ready to go down to Saigon. That was when the plane first came in so they must have seen the plane arrive. But nothing ever came of it. Never saw a word about it. I told my ConGen staff, my staff, don't ever say a word about this. I don't know whether this is still classified or not. Thirty years ago. That's how I babysat the Blackbird.

Q: How did sort of the collapse come about from your perspective? This would be in '75, really it happened and it started in the highlands, but very quickly hit Da Nang.

TULL: Well, the very first indication and again I'd have to go back and read the history books, but the first indication I got that it was really going to be over was there was a provincial capital in IV Corps in the Delta that was captured by the North Vietnamese and no effort was made to take it back. When I saw that I thought, oh boy, you know, here we go. Of course I knew about all the North Vietnamese divisions that were in I Corps. I'd known that from the first briefing I went to.

Q: You're talking about the North Vietnamese.

TULL: The North Vietnamese divisions were in the western region of I Corps. Then as you mentioned in the mountainous areas of II Corps, collapse was beginning around the edges there. I was due to leave Da Nang the end of February 1975. Shortly before my departure Al Francis, who was the consul general, got gravely ill and he was hesitant to go to the States or whatever was required and I said, "Al, I'll stay as long as I have to, you go. You have to go take care of yourself. If necessary I'll delay my departure until you are able to come back." That's what worked out. He was medically evacuated to the States and I was in charge of the post. In the meantime the arrangements were continuing for my departure. I was home packing out and it was early in the morning and it was the day that the movers were there to pack up my personal things and I got a phone call from the chief of staff at I Corps headquarters asking if General Truong could borrow our airplane to go to Saigon. He had to see President Thieu. I said as far as I knew it would work, but let me just double check because the myth was it was our airplane, but it was really CIA's so I checked with the station chief and I said, "Truong wants to go to Saigon. Any other uses for the plane?" He says, "No. Let him have it. No problem." I called back and said yes we'd be happy to have him use the plane. It was a very nice little Lear jet or some little executive jet.

The station chief asked to see me when I went into the ConGen. I went in and the station chief came to my office. He had a draft report they were just about to send out, reporting that President Thieu (President Nguyen Van Thieu) had gotten in touch with General Truong and had ordered him to send some of the forces in I Corps to Saigon. Thieu wanted to pull the Marine Division to Saigon, and perhaps, I think, the Airborne as well, and pull back elements of the First ARVN division, pull them back closer into Da Nang.

Q: These were the top units.

TULL: Absolutely. Just about the top in the whole military establishment in Vietnam. The Marines had been north; they had been in Quang Tri. The Airborne was based outside Da Nang, in the Da Nang area. The First Division and the Marines were north of the Hai Van Pass, near Hue and Quang Tri. Basically, as I read this message, what Thieu was planning was to develop enclaves near Saigon and protect these enclaves, and he wanted to have these military units from I Corps to do it. But to me, as I read that, Thieu was basically writing off I Corps. So that's why General Truong wanted to go down to Saigon and argue face to face with Thieu to see if he could get him to change his mind or at least to change part of his plan and leave some of the units in I Corps. That's why he went down.

Okay, so, I figured that's it, I'm sitting there in Da Nang and I figured it's over. There's no way I Corps can hold if this plan goes into effect. I Corps is going to fall even if you do leave some elements in place. The Third Division which was not very good, that was going to be left in place and maybe one element of the Airborne, maybe one of the First Division. So, basically the Thieu plan was saying everything north of the Hai Van Pass is written off. I thought if that happens it's chaos, there is no way it is going to hold.

I learned either that night or the next morning from our CIA team that Thieu had refused Truong's request for reconsideration of the withdrawal. I decided that we had to develop a plan to evacuate our staff and their families from Da Nang. Step one, I pulled out the mission's emergency evacuation plan which was, as I read it, totally worthless. It had no provision for a phased collapse of the country. It had no provision for doing anything for our Vietnamese employees. It was all geared, as I recall to a one fell swoop evacuation of the country of Americans only, and I thought we cannot do that to these people who worked for us. I got all our heads of section together, consular, the AID leader, our political officers, a representative from the CIA to discuss our approach. Going into the meeting to be quite frank I had a pretty good idea of what I wanted to do, but I thought let's talk it through here and let this come up from everybody. What emerged was a consensus that we had to put the existing plan aside and forget about it. We had as a matter of conscience to do something for our Vietnamese employees. Given the huge size of Vietnamese extended families we decided that what we could do would be to take our employees, their spouses and their children and try to get them at least to Saigon, and then, from there, see what would happen. We couldn't take brothers and sisters or parents. I mean it was going to be harsh and awful, but as it was it was going to be massive. Everybody agreed with this approach, which was what I went into this meeting thinking was all we could reasonably do.

Then, with this general agreement I drafted -- I'll never forget this. I'm sitting in the consul general's office, which was a nice office. It was a beautiful day and the sun was dappling on the river outside, the city was peaceful -- and I drafted a telegram which I basically said that if the plan President Thieu has adopted pulling out these units from I Corps is accepted and followed through on there's no way that I Corps can hold, it's going to collapse, and therefore, I want authorization to begin a phased evacuation from the region. I said I want to gradually pull in my Americans from their offices at night in the provinces, bring them in at night to Da Nang and let them go back in the morning again, to avoid panicking the Vietnamese as long as possible. I needed aircraft to move our families and our Vietnamese employees and their families down to Saigon. I got it all drafted, showed it to section chiefs, and took it over to the Station Chief who was a good guy, we got along very well. His people had been in the meetings. I showed him the cable and I said, "What do you think of this? Do you think this makes sense?" He read it and he says, "Yes, and if you want you can put a sentence in there saying the Station Chief concurs." I said, "Thank you, I will do that just so there will be no doubt in anybody's mind." I sent the message to Saigon

Well, the break that we had was that Graham Martin, the ambassador, was in Washington getting dental work and I imagine he also was trying to shore up some support for help for the aid that we had promised the Vietnamese but that congress had decided we weren't going to give. He wasn't in country so the charge d'affaires was Wolf Lehman. I sent this cable off and what was really strange, I had just drafted it and my secretary had typed it up and I signed it and I said, "Okay, here we go. Either they give me what I'm asking for or there's going to be a demand that I leave post immediately and I'll be back to Washington with my career in shambles." There's a knock on the door and who comes by but Al Francis' darling wife. She was so sweet, Mary Francis, and she had planned to have a coffee that afternoon for the women of the post. Al was gone. Al was in Washington and of course I couldn't go and neither could my secretary as it developed. So, very sweetly she came by and said, "You two need a break. I've brought you some fortune cookies. You just relax and have these and I won't hang around" and she left. I sat down and my secretary brought us both coffee and we both sat there. I opened up the fortune cookie and the fortune said "You've come a long way baby." We both laughed at the appropriateness of those words.

In this cable I had also said, I figured if I'm going to get thrown out I might as well go out for the whole hog, I said I recommend that we start repositioning units from the Seventh Fleet in the Pacific to the waters near Vietnam because there will be a massive evacuation from the country and at least we could get our people out of Saigon. I got a phone call just a couple of hours later from Wolf Lehman saying you'll get what you need. We'll send the first plane out tomorrow. He approved with no questions, nothing. We started ferrying our people out. The first thing I did was go over and meet with General Truong and tell him what I was doing because we thought there was a possibility at the time that if the Vietnamese citizens saw that we were cutting and running, there could at a certain point be a backlash against us. I also had been asked by our provincial office people if I could get General Truong's approval that the Vietnamese military personnel who worked with our provincial people as translators could also be evacuated with their families or would he expect them to go back to their Vietnamese army units? They were viewed as very close to the Americans. I explained to General Truong what I was doing regarding a phased evacuation. He thought it was a very wise move, which confirmed me into thinking that a) he had failed to get what he wanted from Thieu, and b) that I was right in thinking the whole thing was collapsing. I explained our thinking with regard to the Vietnamese military who worked with us in the provinces. He agreed that he would not be an obstacle, he would authorize them to be evacuated with our consulate general office staff, and so that's what was done.

Q: How about the civilians involved in this because anyone who is watching this from the States eventually was seeing what I think was the head of the airline or something who is loading people on and all. I mean American civilians, not directly connected to the consulate general. Were you telling them to get out, too?

TULL: As I recall, there were very few American citizens in I Corps who were not affiliated with the ConGen or the U.S. government. The scene you recall came much later in the process, and involved Vietnamese not Americans. We got the Americans out on the aircraft provided by the Embassy and via Air America.

Let's move on a little more. I remember before we get to that point I was concerned about the members of the International Control Commission who had offices in Hue as well as Da Nang. I don't think they were in other places, but I remember talking with Wolf Lehman about that and asking what should we do about the ICC? Should we get them down to Saigon, too? He said, no don't worry about them. That's not our concern. It wasn't nasty or anything, he just meant we didn't have to devote our resources to them. There will be other ways for them to deal with that.

That was quite a time. Not all elements of the U.S. mission in Saigon grasped what was going on. There was a lot going on elsewhere, but I Corps was going to go down fast once the troop transfer occurred. Wolf Lehman understood this. I developed tremendous respect for him. He understood completely and he didn't second-guess me. He supported me. Other elements in the embassy just didn't get the picture. I remember at a time when we were using our helicopters to bring our staff and the Vietnamese staff and families from our office in Hue to Da Nang to get them on an aircraft and send them down to Saigon, I got a phone call from the head of USIS in Saigon. I forget what his name was, but I had no respect for his comprehension. He calls and says, "Terry, I've just been talking with the Director of the Imperial Palace Museum in Hue and he wants to get the imperial treasures, the porcelains and things of that nature, and jades down to Saigon. I told him you would take care of that. Just get them on a helicopter and get them out." I said, "No, I'm using my air assets for people. They are not going to be used for museum pieces. I can't do it, it's more important to get the people out." He was outraged. "Well, I don't know about that" etc. His personal rank was far senior to me, but I was the senior American in I Corps at that point. I said, "No, the decision is, it's more important to save the people. I don't have the assets. If I had an abundance of air assets, yes, but I said, no it's more important to get the people." Well, he was huffing and puffing, "I will see about that. I'll talk to Wolf Lehman." That was an indication he didn't quite understand what was going on. Of course, I was not overruled on this.

Shortly thereafter, I got through the military a request from a colonel, who was visiting from Washington who wanted to come up to I Corps. His trip had been in the works a month or two and he had made it to Saigon and he wanted to come to Da Nang and check out the scene. I told the folks in Saigon, "I don't have any air assets for him. There's no reason for him to come. He can read our cable traffic and find out what's going on, but gradually the whole region is imploding so there's no reason for him to come." Well, apparently he had some clout in the Pentagon or something so I get another phone call, "Terry, couldn't he please just come up to Da Nang? Won't you authorize him to at least come to Da Nang? He knows he can't get out of the city. That you don't have any air assets for him or anything of that nature, but if you can get him to Da Nang and see the city?" I said, "All right, but make sure he understands he doesn't get out of Da Nang. I don't have a car for him. I don't have an aircraft, I don't have helicopters." I had been provided with aircraft, but it was for the purpose of getting people to Saigon.

Okay, the next day I get a frantic call from one of my staff who is at the airport, one of the former USAID guys, a good guy and he's saying, "Terry, there's this colonel here and he's insisting that we have to give him our helicopter because he wants to fly to Quang Ngai and he wants to fly here and there and I told him that we can't do it and he's just being really obnoxious." He gave me the name and I said, "You're doing exactly the right thing. He cannot have that chopper. You just hold that line. You use it for what we're using it for which is to evacuate our staff." He said, "Well, this guy, he's just so obnoxious. I told him that Miss Tull said we can't do it and he said, 'Who is this Miss Tull?' We made sure because I just wanted to be sure because he's really throwing his weight around." I said, "No, you're right, you cannot give him anything." And we didn't. There was another indication you see that we're supposed to stop evacuating our personnel so this guy can tell his children, oh I went down to Quang Ngai a couple days before it collapsed. I don't understand that. So, anyway, he didn't come in to see me, I'll say that. Apparently he cooled his heels and took a plane, one of the Air America flights, back to Saigon. I never heard another word about it. I was very pleased that the staff didn't allow themselves to be intimidated.

Q: This is, well, what was happening up in Quang Tri and all? Was there heavy fighting going on?

TULL: Yes, the fighting had started. The fighting had started. As soon as the Vietnamese units were pulled out and sent south then an element of chaos set in. General Truong whom I dearly loved made what some military people think was a mistake in that he told the soldiers of the First Division up there that they could get together with their families and could move south with the families and apparently that broke down unit discipline. He recognized that no more fighting could take place. It couldn't happen. That's all there was to it. So, that was north of the Hai Van Pass. So, that kind of confusion was starting to seep down, but I am very proud of the work of our Consulate General. We got the support we needed out of Saigon, thanks to the fact that the ambassador wasn't there and our good staff really rallied together: The young officers who worked with me at the Consulate General and the former AID people who had worked in the provinces. They were frisky from time to time before the crisis, but they were just as supportive and capable as can be regarding the evacuation, really good. So we got our Vietnamese employees, their spouses and their children down to Saigon and I believe most if not all of them eventually got evacuated to the States.

Now, a couple of days before the final collapse Al Francis who was still very sick came back to Da Nang. It was killing him to be in the States and be sick and see what was happening. He came back, and now I fought Al a little bit. I mean it was very brave of him to come back, but he came back and he wanted to undo some of the things that I had started. For example, I was bringing our people in from the provincial offices. I was having them come in and stay and sleep in Da Nang at night and go out by chopper to their offices in the morning because I was afraid of what was going to happen. He came back and the first night he's there he tells them they can stay overnight. Well, apparently there was some pretty nasty fighting near one of the offices and he only did that the one night. He realized that he couldn't be there. Then he wanted me to leave which was okay. I knew it was getting very close to the end and technically my replacement had arrived.

Q: Who was that?

TULL: Another protégé of Graham Martin. Oh, in later years he became ambassador to Haiti, tall, thin fellow whose first name starts with a Brunson McKinley. Anyway, he had been cooling his heels in Saigon and then I told the embassy, if you want to send him on up you can. He can help us out in Da Nang. Al's view then was well, he's here and you might as well go. I left Da Nang. To my knowledge I was on the last regularly scheduled Air America flight from Da Nang to Saigon. When I got to Saigon II Corps I think had collapsed. We were in the midst of the collapse in I Corps. I ended up spending a couple of nights sleeping in the ambassador's office because George Jacobsen who was Mission Coordinator at the time, was scrambling to try to get air assets to Da Nang and to the other posts and I ended up kind of being the go-between between him and Al Frances. Al got extremely exhausted and I was the one who would talk to him on the phone and say all right, we're trying to get that for you. We'll see what we can do, but then they would ask me in Saigon where can we land this particular aircraft? Where's the helicopter pad, things of that nature. I was there as I said literally sleeping on the ambassador's sofa and I think this was Easter weekend, I'm not sure. It was the last weekend in March; it might have been Easter. It was wild, but Al was so tired that it was useful I think for him to be talking to someone who knew him and he was very brave, I'm not knocking that. He eventually left Da Nang on a boat. In the meantime, we were trying to discourage independent non-governmental types from getting involved, such as sending in the aircraft you just mentioned. I believe it was from World Airways I thought Ross Perot was involved, but I may be mistaken. Anyway they wanted to send a plane up and we told him not to do it. We said it's too late. There's no control. Its over as far as taking a large airplane into Da Nang. But of course they did it anyway against our instructions and that's where you saw the picture of people clinging to the struts of the airplane and yes, it was just a nasty sight, probably several people were killed in the process of that aircraft taking off. No, that was terrible, but we knew it was finished by then. We could not safely put an airplane in. I saw something recently on television I think a television reporter was on that plane and it might have been someone who just recently died, but they reshewed the film which I had never seen. Apparently the plan was to be a flight to take women and children, but when the plane landed the soldiers just apparently knocked the women and children down and forced their way on the plane. We had told them not to go at all because we knew it wasn't safe. This was another example really of how out of touch or how unwilling to accept reality some elements of the embassy and public were.

After Ambassador Graham Martin came back from the States, I found out that he had been saying in Washington, that I had obviously overreacted and when he got back he would square it away. Really weird. So, who do I meet outside Martin's office one day shortly after Martin's return but the official White House photographer whose name escapes me and he blithely tells me, "Oh, its good to see you. I'm going up to Da Nang. I want to take some pictures." I remember telling him, "Da Nang doesn't exist as a U.S. post anymore. It's finished." "Oh, no, well I want to go up there and see it and the ambassador is going to make a plane available." I said, "You can't land a plane at that airport. The North Vietnamese have taken it over, okay? You cannot go, its over." He looked at me like I was crazy and he ended up flying over to Cambodia which I think gave him a couple days of taking pictures before it collapsed." That was another problem we had, getting the assets we needed in terms of aircraft and in terms of shipping to pick up the refugees because Cambodia was collapsing around the same time. It was really bad.

Q: Yes. Well, what was even before, let's say you're still in Da Nang, but things are beginning to happen, what was the impression that you had and maybe others in our establishment up there had of Graham Martin because you get the feeling that he was trying to either, either he was trying to keep some wishful thinking or he just felt well, if he did something it would pull the plug and everything would happen.

TULL: I never had a particularly high opinion of Graham Martin. I think he was unrealistic in his expectations for what was going to happen in Vietnam. I felt that the fact that we were so muzzled in the Consulate General that we couldn't send a cable to Washington without having it cleared first through Saigon showed an excess of control or concern that, good grief, what do those people know and I will control the information flow. That concerned me. I also wondered if the fact that his own son had been killed in Vietnam had perhaps made him determined that this was not going to be a failure, that we were going to stick it out and that somehow it would work out because he wouldn't have wanted his son to die in a vain enterprise. I don't know. I think he wasn't liked by the American staff. But he was in Never Never land.

Q: Towards the end I mean from your perspective of almost dismissal of this man, you know, of his judgments? He had power, but he was considered a bit off the wall.

TULL: To me the fact that he allegedly went to Washington for dental work at a time that was critical was bizarre so I suspect he was doing more than that. At this point our pledges of aid were unraveling and maybe he was actually trying to talk to Congress to have them give the aid that we had promised at the time we made the commitments there in January of '73 in the peace negotiations. Toward the end the feeling was he wasn't getting it and I know when I went, when I got to Saigon the political counselor was Josiah Bennett who was a good guy and was with the program and the whole thing, but of course this is a month before Saigon fell. I went to see Joe and I was practically afraid to say what I believe, you know, but I say, "Joe, it's over. This place can't last. Vietnam cannot, South Vietnam can't, hold with I Corps gone. The imperial city is Hue. If you take I Corps out it's gone. Then you see it's crumbling around the edges. I don't give it 30 days." I thought here we go. He looks at me and says, "I'm afraid you're right." But whether anybody was saying that to Graham Martin I don't know.

I got to see Martin because when the end was approaching in Da Nang, I was due to leave, my tour was coming to an end anyway, so there were certain farewell events, farewell parties given by officials for me, and one of them was a dinner offered by General Truong. This was at a time when it looked very bad in Hue and I remember I had my radio with me and I was occasionally having to talk on the radio to our people in Hue, I wanted to be sure that they got out for the night. It was very bad. At any rate General Truong's wife asked me in Vietnamese, not in front of her husband, "If the country falls to the Communists, will you take our children?" I said, "Yes, I would." Later at the dinner table our station chief was sitting on one side of the general and I was sitting next to the general. I said in Vietnamese which was deliberate because our station chief didn't speak Vietnamese, "You know, your wife has asked me if the Communists take the country will I take your children to the United States." He looked at me. I said, "I have told her that I will." He said slowly, "Thank you very much." This was all the confirmation I needed that everything I had been saying about this country is falling and I Corps can't hold was absolutely right. When everything collapsed and Truong made it down eventually to Saigon on a boat I wanted to see him to work out the details to get his children out of the country. The word from Martin was that nobody could see any Vietnamese officers from their previous posts without checking with him first. So, I asked to see Graham Martin to get that permission. He said, "Well, you know, this is a problem, Terry. There's rumors that General Truong, that people want General Truong to replace General Thieu to be president of South Vietnam. There are rumors of a coup that would put him in Thieu's place." I said, "Unfortunately, Ambassador Martin, he's not the type." That was the phrase I used: Unfortunately, he's not the type. He looked at me. I said, "I am taking his children out of the country and I would like your permission to go see him in the hospital." "Yes, all right. You can go see him." I went to see General Truong and eventually got three of his children out of the country. They became my kids for a few years. We are still very close.

I'll back up a little bit. Toward the very end there in Da Nang, this was something I think worth mentioning. As I say at the time of the peace agreements in January of '73 the U.S. I learned made substantial promises of aid that, although we would withdraw our military, we would continue substantial military and economic assistance. But as time went on Congress decided they weren't going to appropriate that money. Within the last two weeks of I Corps existence, and Al Francis was in the States, we had three congressional delegations come to I Corps. Two with congressmen and one with staffers, but they were all kind of high-powered folks. I remember this one day I was at the I Corps briefing and there was all sorts of fighting going on around the edges and even closer in to the city than it had been and they reported one of the South Vietnamese helicopters had been shot down in a certain spot and the VC were still in the area. General Truong was going to take me and the congressmen that I put up in the Consul General's residence out because they wanted to see what was happening in the region. General Truong pilots this helicopter and I'm with him and the congressmen were there and I know where we're flying. We're flying right over to the area where they were fighting four or five hours before. At a certain point I looked out, and we were right over that helicopter that had been shot down. I've got a helicopter full of congressmen and I called up to General Truong. I said, "General, I know where we are." He started laughing. Then we flew over other areas and I remember this one congressman who had been a marine in I Corps several years before and he was astounded by what he saw, how peaceful certain areas looked because when he was there, there were no rice paddies in certain areas. There was much more land under cultivation. It just looked so good. He couldn't believe all the improvements that had taken place since he had been there before and I said, "Is that an indication then that maybe we're entitled to the aid that we promised?" He said, "It's too late. The American people won't stand for it." He was quite impressed with what he'd seen. (Note: This Congressman was Mr. Murtha of Pennsylvania. End note)

Q: Terry, how did you get out and how did you get the kids out?

TULL: Well, as I say I got to Saigon on the last regularly scheduled Air America flight and the children were down there. They had already gone down with their mother. They had a home in Saigon as well as in Da Nang. I had met these children at the general's home. I can't say I had actually met them. I had gone there for dinner once and at a certain point after dinner, the little girl, the tiniest little thing, cutest little thing, came out and played some Beethoven to knock your socks off on the piano which was wonderful, and then the older girl played something nicely, too. I had seen them, let's put it this way. I should also add that it was not uncommon at that time to take children out of the collapsing country. In this case I agreed to take these children because I never in my wildest dreams thought that General Truong would get out of the country. I thought that he would go down with the ship. When I agreed to take these children it was forever. I mean it was adoption, ultimately. Other people came to me and all of a sudden asked could you take my child, just get them out of the country and I had to say I couldn't, that I was already committed. I didn't say for whom. I was already committed.

At any rate I'm in Saigon and at a certain point Ambassador Martin decided we had to thin out the ranks and get people out because I think even he was maybe starting to see the handwriting, although I doubt it because the word that came to me was that he was finding it a negative impact on staff morale to have the shell shocked officers and staff from Da Nang and II Corps wandering the corridors looking for something to do to help out. At any rate, I left, but in the meantime it had been arranged then that I was to have the three children who were 9, 11, and 15, two girls and a boy. When I went to see General Truong at the hospital, he said he had met with President Thieu. I guess Thieu had come to see him in the hospital and wanted to know if there was anything he could do for him and Truong said yes, give me passports for my children. I mean I knew in the background from what I'd heard from Graham Martin that Thieu was fearful of a coup and some people wanted Truong to replace him. He got passports for his children without jumping through multiple hoops. I took those passports in to see the Consul General in Saigon, a nice guy. I went in to see him and I had these passports and I said I have these three children whom I'm going to take to the States and they're going to live with me. If the situation here stabilizes, they'll come back. If it doesn't, they'll stay with me. I said I will support them. There will be no problem with that. I need visas. He looks at me and looks at the passports and says, "Yes, sounds like a B2 to me."

Q: I had that job, you know, when you say, oh well, what the hell.

TULL: Right. Sounds like a B2, you know. Anyway I got the visas for the kids and then I went to see the kids at their home and that's when I actually met them and shook their hand and learned their names and all that. I made arrangements because at this time the ambassador is saying get out of country and I had already, I had long made plans for a long vacation trip with a friend who had been with AID and retired and came back to Saigon and we were going to travel for about two months. When this happened I was going to get the kids I figured well, I'll just cancel that, but I had to leave the country before the kids did. I sent a cable to my brother on the West Coast. He lives in Washington State and he and his wife were just super people. He's a retired naval officer and they had a large family. They had a huge house and just a couple of kids were left at home. One of the things they had done because they were that type is that they had taken in a Colombian girl under the Rotary Club live abroad type thing, whatever it was. I knew it would be no problem, so I just sent them a cable saying I have to leave Saigon. I have acquired three Vietnamese children ages 9, 11 and 15, may I send them to you? I got an answer back right away, yes of course, by all means send them to us so that's what I did. I typed basically a statement for General Truong and his wife to say, I, so and so hereby give control or whatever of my children so and so to Theresa Tull and blah, blah. Then I gave them a letter saying this is the person they're going to go with, my brother in Washington State near Seattle, and then I had to leave the country. My brother by the way insisted I take the vacation because by this time we had gotten through on the phone and he called me in Saigon and I said, I'm going to cancel my trip.

He says, no, your life is changing; you don't know how much your life is changing. You take that vacation; you'll need every minute of it, particularly to recover from what you're going through. You get the children to us. We'll take care of them. It will be no problem. Anyway, that's what I did. It did work out. I left nervous as a cat, when were the kids getting out? I went to Bangkok and on down to Pattaya and I just chilled for a few days. I kept calling home to find out what was what. The children did get safely to my brother. I had them for two years. They're just the greatest kids. They're my family. They're wonderful.

Q: Terry, this is a good place to stop and we'll pick this up, I mean your adoptive three children have arrived in Washington State with your brother. You have left. This was in?

TULL: Its April of '75.

Q: April of '75 and we'll pick it up at that point.

TULL: Okay.

Q: Today is March 31st, 2005. This is one day after the was it the 30th anniversary of the fall of Da Nang.

TULL: I think it was.

Q: Not a date we want to particularly over remember.

TULL: Yes, that's right.

Q: Anyway, so you went to Bangkok. Then what happens? I mean we're talking about April of 1975.

TULL: I was pretty shaken up as you can imagine and I had made plans, long-standing plans with a friend that at the conclusion of my tour in Da Nang I was going to take a really long leave. I had leave built up for a long time and we were going to in effect take a trip around the world. Of course all of this happened before I acquired the three children. I told my brother who had agreed to receive them that I would cancel that trip and come home and he said no. You do the trip, your life is changing because when I took the children the idea was they'd be mine forever if that's the way it was going to work out. One didn't know. Everything was uncertain, but they were given to me forever, if necessary. He insisted no, take the trip. I went down to Pattaya and just mourned for a few days just tried to get over things. I'm not over it even now. Then my friend joined me in Bangkok and we then proceeded to have a most interesting trip. At each stop we made I would communicate with the Department to try to find out what was happening with my children and found out that they had gotten out and I got in touch with my brother and yes, he had received them. Then I remember being in Nairobi and I submitted an offer to sponsor the children's father and mother so that they could get out. I did that at various stops along the way, checking to see what was what. Anyway, I got myself back to the States. It was a fascinating trip. We spent a week on a houseboat in Kashmir. When I think of all the troubles in Kashmir in recent years! This was like being taken from hell and placed in heaven, in a Shangri-La type situation. We did a photo safari in Africa, in Kenya and Tanzania, so we had quite a trip. By coming back that way and through Europe it concluded the trip around the world for me because I had gone out via the Pacific route when I went to Vietnam. So, I got back in the States and then discovered that thank God against all the odds really in my view the children's father and mother had gotten out of the country. Apparently Vice President Nguyen Cao Ky had gone to the Vietnamese military headquarters where General Truong had become by default by the departure of other senior officers the senior official in the military. He was acting Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He was going to go down with the ship, I knew this, this is why I got the kids out. On the very last day, however, Vice President Ky went out to the headquarters and told General Truong he had a spot on his helicopter for him. He told him the U.S. Ambassador had left, and he in effect ordered General Truong to leave with him and gave him a spot on his helicopter. They flew out to the Blue Ridge; a U.S. ship called the Blue Ridge.

Q: The Blue Ridge was a command ship, yes.

TULL: Yes. They flew out there. They ended up in Guam initially.

Q: How about his wife?

TULL: She had gotten out a few days before. She didn't want to go. I learned that they had five children. I took the three middle children. I didn't even know there was an older boy who was a teenager, I guess he was maybe 17 and he was in school in Saigon and they didn't tell me about him or I would have taken him. Apparently later his father said, no, he felt that the boy should stay and fight like he intended to do. He didn't get out right away. Then there was a three-year-old whom I had offered to take, but the mother could not bear to be parted with the three-year-old. I think they were being practical, too, figuring I was going to work and these three kids would be in school. If I had a three-year-old it would be a little difficult.

As the situation deteriorated they did take me up on my offer and they sent that little boy to my brother, but they sent him with a non-American employee of the embassy. It might have been someone who worked with the CIA, I don't know. But the way it developed from my point of view, and I may be being totally unfair, I had the feeling that that person viewed that little boy as his ticket out and his ticket into a better situation because he was able to persuade the authorities not to release that boy to my brother. That little boy ended up having a very traumatic experience in a refugee camp instead of being taken immediately up to where he had a sponsor and to join his brother and sisters. He spent several weeks in a refugee camp with this older man who thought hey, I've got the general's kid, I'm going to get out of this camp. That's me being a little cynical, maybe that happened, maybe it didn't, but I know that child did not join my brother.

Then a few days before the final collapse, the general agreed with others who were saying, look get your wife and boy out of here, the older boy. The defense attaché's office in Saigon was running some flights and Mrs. Truong and the teenaged boy, they were flown to Guam. They got out, so the only one out left in country was the children's father.

My brother and his wife told me that about 2:00 a.m. in the morning one day they got a phone call, and it was the children's mother calling from Guam and they said it was Christmas and Halloween and Easter and Tet. Those kids were so excited that their mother had gotten out of country.

At any rate, there we were. I got back to the States and discovered that other U.S. officials including some high ranking military officers had also been lining up offering to sponsor General Truong, as I had. So the person who actually did succeed in getting him out of the refugee camp was Lieutenant General Cushman, John Cushman. At that point Cushman was the commandant of the Commanding General Staff College at Leavenworth, Kansas. I was told this so I got in touch with him. My thought was, okay, he wants to sponsor the whole family and I have three of them sitting out in Washington State. Obviously this man's a three star general, I'm not even a mid-ranking officer -- let's say mid-ranking to put a bright light on it -- but I mean financially and everything else he had much more to offer. I called him, a very nice man.

Q: I knew him in Korea.

TULL: Yes. A good man. We were talking and I said, "Well, I guess you want to make arrangements to take the children. I have three of them. They're with my brother in Washington State." He says, "Now, wait a minute. The general is very fond of you and just so impressed with the fact that you have his children. I have seven children. A couple of them, two or three in college and coming up the line. I want to help as much as I can, but" He, in effect basically said it would be really helpful if I would keep those three children, and the general wants it that way, too. By this time he had gotten the general and his wife out of the camps and the two boys, the oldest child and the youngest child. I said, "Well, you know, I'm just a low ranking State Department officer" but I didn't even know the kids. I had seen them, but I was all prepared to love them. I loved them instantly because I had taken them on, but I said, "I would be happy to do it, this is what I was going to do, but are you sure it is best for the children?" He said, "Well, I would think so. Why don't you come see us all and we can talk it over with the general, but I know he wants you to have those children because he was so impressed and so fond of you." He wasn't putting this on. You had to see it in the context of the times.

In the meantime, my brother, God bless him, he and his wife, they were so wonderful to these kids and, one of their daughters, Suzy, was getting married. Of course, I'm in the States and I got in touch with them. I said, "I'll come get the children and bring them back." They said, "Theresa, they're really looking forward to Suzy's wedding." They had really gotten integrated with the family; they'd been with them at this point for about two months. "They're really eager for the wedding. Why don't you take your time in getting yourself set up in Washington and then when you come out for the wedding we can talk about when you take them to DC." I agreed. I stopped and spent a couple of days in Leavenworth at General Cushman's residence on my way out to the West Coast for the wedding. The Truongs and I had a bittersweet reunion. It was quite clear to me that the general really wanted me to have those children.

Q: General Truong.

TULL: General Truong. That was fine with me. This was the commitment that I had made. He was every bit as honest as we always said he was. He got out with absolutely nothing and was just one wonderful person. His wife was going along with it, too because I think the way it worked out was General Cushman, I think he kept the oldest boy, Diep, kept him with him for a year or two and then another General Hal Cooksie, was back in Washington and both of these men were trying to get General Truong work. Well, what ultimately evolved was the Department of the Army established a historical project where they engaged some of these generals to write their impressions of the war -- particular aspects of strategy and tactics and the like -- and that gave them some employment and got them back to the Washington area. So, General Cooksie and his wife were very helpful, too. I think Cooksie, between them Cooksie and Cushman, they got Truong into this project and befriended them, and helped in various ways. In fact when they came back to Washington initially they stayed for a few days with Cooksie who at that time had a beautiful house on the National War College grounds. I went over and visited them there, visited the Truongs. Then he helped them find a little place. Well, they ended up renting a very modest little apartment in Falls Church and I rented a house for me and the children.

At that point I owned a one bedroom apartment, the one we're sitting in here now in Foggy Bottom, Washington, but I rented a big old house on Ellicott Street, N.W. This apartment was rented. I had a good renter at the time when I was overseas. He was with the International Monetary Fund, so I just kept it rented and I found this big house that I could afford and it was right off of Wisconsin Avenue so transportation was good. I got my things out of storage and moved it in and got ready for the kids.

I had been wiped out in Vietnam. Anything I had in Vietnam was gone. All my linens. Oh, it was a mess. Linens, cutlery, private pictures, the whole thing. So, I'm here, I've got three kids and I don't have a sheet or a towel to my name. I don't have a cup or saucer. I had to start from scratch and get the place squared away. Get it ready to receive the kids. I got the sequence wrong. I didn't do the renting of the house until after the wedding, after I had visited in Leavenworth and was convinced that this was what the general wanted. Then I went to Washington State. Then I came back and did all this so they could stay there and have a wonderful time with my brother. I mean he and his wife had a big house and they only had two of their nine children left at home and there was a horse and they just had a wonderful time. This wedding was something they really wanted to be a part of. I went out and that's when I got to know the children, when I went out there for this wedding. They were just the greatest kids. They were so good. It was quite an experience and, we had a good time with the wedding. I remember the boy who was 11 at the time, very serious looking. In a picture you never see him smile. He's always very serious. He came over. I could play the piano a little, not much. The two girls were wonderful. They could play beautifully. I could play a little, so I was playing my brother's piano and he came over with his book of music that his sister had and he turned to this page and pointed to this particular piece and I said I don't know if I can do that, so I tried that and he liked that and he said his uncle used to play that in Vietnam. I said okay. Then the next thing I know he's come downstairs and he has two shirts in his hand and he wants to know which shirt should he wear to the wedding. I thought well, I've made it with this boy. He's accepting my role, so the two of us talked about the shirt. It was great. The girls were much more outgoing and forthcoming and smiling.

I'll bore you with one little anecdote my brother told me when I was out there. It occurred when I was there, but the youngest girl was nine and she looked to be about six. She was very small. On the day before the wedding, most of my brother's kids had come from parts of the country.

They're all zipping around having a good time. They've got to hop into a car and drive into town and check out something. They all hop into the car and there's no room for little Tram, and she was heartbroken and she stands there. This whole group of lively girls is going to go off to town and she starts crying. Well, my brother stops the car. He had been a pretty strict person. He says, "What's going on?" "Well, we don't have room." "Take another car and take Tram. This child has been with us for two months going through everything she's been through and she's never shed a tear. I'm not going to have her crying because you're going off to town without her." "Oh, okay." I thought that was sweet. They had a good time. Anyway, I came back to DC and that's when I rented the house and got everything squared away for them. One of the benefits of all of this which I had not realized at the time was a benefit was I had been assigned to the Southeast Asia unit in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research which I did not want. I did not want INR under any circumstances, but as it turned out it worked out well for me personally because it was a routine job. You know what I mean? The other jobs I'd had at State, I never knew when I was leaving. When I was on the Vietnam Working Group, 7:00 p.m., 8:00 p.m., whatever, but this was a routine job in terms of hours and it proved to be much more interesting than I had expected. I enjoyed it. Enjoy is maybe the wrong word. I think I learned a lot from it by stepping back from the action oriented things, doing the longer think pieces. It was useful.

FRED CHARLES THOMAS, JR
ICCS Liaison Office
Saigon (1973-1975)

Fred Charles Thomas Jr. was born in Arizona in 1927. He served overseas with the Army for two years before graduating from Bucknell University in 1951. He has served at overseas posts in Korea, Pakistan, Germany, Vietnam, and India, as well as the Office of Strategic Research in Washington DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: You served in Vietnam from when to when?

THOMAS: From '73 to '75. I got there, and I was, first of all...

Q: When did you get there in '73?

THOMAS: Spring of '73. They not only sent me to learn French, but they also sent me to the consular course here in the Department. I was to be the supervising consul in Saigon. I didn't look forward to that.

Q: You're talking to the man who was the consul general in Saigon.

THOMAS: Is that right?

Q: Yes. I was there '69-'70.

THOMAS: Is that right? I was to go there at that time. It was a "rule or law based" job, and I didn't want it. Then suddenly it was changed to my being one of a group of officers to replace those assigned to the ICCS liaison office. They'd had a group in there on TDY, four officers, to handle this function, and the last of them was leaving just as I got there. He was the only one left. I got there and had a week's overlap with him.

Q: Could you explain what the ICCS is.

THOMAS: The ICCS was set up by the Paris conference in February of that year to oversee the keeping of the peace. It had four member states in it, each headed by an ambassador, with a general officer. Each delegation consisted of about 200-250 people. We're talking about 1,000 people in total. It started out with the Canadians and the Indonesians being the Western representatives, and the Hungarians and the Poles being the Communist representatives in this organization. You know, Communist. The guy I was replacing, he wasn't much help to me. He was too busy going to parties in his honor and leaving. I was not to be the boss man. The boss I awaited was a man named Pratt Byrd. I don't know if you know Pratt.

Q: Yes, I do.

THOMAS: Well, Pratt was to be boss; there was also to be a junior officer assigned, total of three people and a secretary. Pratt was leaving his wife in the States. I'd left my wife here. On the way out there, I had heard that there had been one officer in the political section, who was a Chinese linguist, who was leaving just as I was arriving, who had been allowed to keep his family on Taiwan. But Taiwan was a place where only AID people were generally kept. State people were kept in Bangkok. I wanted to keep mine, for Chinese-language reasons, on Taiwan. If I was going to run back and forth, it'd help my Chinese. My wife spoke Chinese. It'd be just more pleasant. On the way out, I stopped at the embassy there in Taiwan and went to the AID people and tried to talk them into letting me be there. They didn't want to do it. The embassy in Taiwan wasn't much help.

I arrived in Saigon. We had an acting ambassador at the time. He was leaving, and our new ambassador hadn't arrived yet; everything was in limbo until Martin arrived.

Q: Graham Martin.

THOMAS: I went to see him about trying to put my family in Taiwan, and ask for his help. He said, "Well, wouldn't you like to bring your family here?"

No families with school age children had been allowed.

I said, "Why sure."

He said, "If you can get your kids in this local school, I'll let you bring your family."

This was a breakthrough.

I went around to see the Phoenix school people. It was a little school run by the missionaries, and they agreed to let my kids in. The minute I got there, they said, "We can't handle very many, but we'll let your children in." I got a piece of paper from them saying so.

Thus the ambassador authorized the Department to cut orders for my wife and children to come to Saigon. I went to Hong Kong to meet them on their way out.

In the meantime, Pratt Byrd arrived. But he wasn't bringing his wife; she was going to stay in the States. We were just starting to roll.

First of all, you have to understand that the ICCS office there was not popular. We were given what had been the administrative counselor's office, on the first floor of the embassy because we had to have access to these four delegations. Also, they didn't want them to go where there was anything classified. So the first-floor big office suite for the administrative counselor was turned over to us. Pratt and I shared those quarters. There were four offices: three smaller offices and the big office, which was also a conference room. The secretary had the office between mine and Pratt's, the junior officer had the office behind mine and Pratt had the big one, the conference room.

We stocked the refrigerator with booze. It was a different type operation than you usually have because the Hungarians and Poles drink in the middle of the day.

We decided to throw a party. Pratt asked me if I could finance it. At the time, I thought I could, until we got paid off by the embassy. He said, "But if we go ask permission, they're not going to give it to us because you know what they think about us."

First of all, the ambassador didn't like the ICCS; he made it very clear. He didn't like the concept of the ICCS; he didn't like these Communists who were there. It was that type situation. He had arrived subsequent to the arrival of each of the ambassadors who headed each of the ICCS delegations. According to protocol, he's to call on them; they're not to call on him. He was damned if he was going to call on any of them. You can understand the problems, from a diplomatic standpoint.

Q: Oh, yes.

THOMAS: And then you had four generals.

We had a military attaché, Colonel Charles Wahle. I got to know him well, and we became good friends. The air attaché, Colonel Garvin McCurdy, and I became friends.

At the first party we held, we invited the diplomatic corps, the press corps, or a big percentage of it. We invited every officer from the ICCS, both military and civilian, that was available, and all their female clerks. We invited a smattering of people from various sections of the embassy. And, of course, other diplomats from all the embassies. We borrowed the military attaché's house, which had been Westmoreland's mansion. If you know Saigon, you know that big mansion Westmoreland had.

Q: I never went there.

THOMAS: You know it sat on a... It had a porte-cochère and big rooms, and it was great for throwing parties. We borrowed it to throw this party. We hired a dance orchestra that played Myer Davis... style music. I enlisted the guy that ran the ICCS club to cater it, on the basis there was not to be any profit. I'd help him, look after him, but no profit. He agreed to this. You didn't take a loss, but no profit. In the end, I think it cost about $1,250 for this party of about 300 people.

I submitted the bill, but nobody was willing to pay it. They gave us $200. I was out $1,000 at this point. You know, I just sat there on this $1,000. I said to Pratt, "You got any money?"

He said, "No. You know, I've got kids in college."

I said, "Well, maybe I've got to swallow this one."

In the meantime, the party was a real success.

As a matter of fact, the New York Times correspondent who was there made the crack to Pratt Byrd that he never saw so many spooks dancing with so many spooks in all his life. You know, the place was just loaded with all these people spying on each other.

Then the chief of station came around and wanted to know when we were going to throw another party like that one. So did the Colonel Wahle the senior military attaché, come around. I said, "I can't afford to throw parties like that. Nobody's paying for it."

Our boss was Joe Bennett, and Bennett said, "Well, I can get you $200." But, what's $200 to $1,250? Joe was the minister for political affairs.

It was interesting, in the end, the military attaché tried throwing a similar party, and none of these people would come to his party. We're talking ICCS Communists.

The CIA station chief tried to throw a similar party; none of these people would come to his party. I mean a few, but just the top. And they wanted more than the top.

When they had their parties they fell on their faces. They made it so obvious that they were targeting the communist delegations... nobody came except the usual senior types.

So then they came to us, both of them, with a chunk of money, and said, "Here's your $1,000. When are you going to have another party?"

I said, "I want it up front."

During our tour there until the fall of Saigon, we threw, I think, two or three of those big parties, which got people together that you couldn't get out of the woodwork otherwise. You never would have met them.

Q: What was your impression? Here was this outfit, the ICCS, which was supposed to make sure that the truce held and that...

THOMAS: Oh, it was a spying mission for the Communists. In the end, the Canadians backed out, and the Iranians came in and took their place.

I had to travel frequently, going around to all these different bases. Out of this, I received quite an education as to what was really going on in Vietnam. In the evening, when I'd be out at these various places all over the country, I would go to the local American sponsored bar where the young men (because everybody was there alone pretty much) hung out, these State, AID, and CIA people all there, and talk to them about what they were doing and what was happening out there. You know, things weren't going well; it was pretty obvious, talking to these young people.

For the record, there was one major incident which fully illustrates the extremes we were willing to go to kid ourselves about the truth of the situation in Vietnam. There was a report of a mortar shelling of a grammar school yard full of playing children down in the Canto area. The South Vietnamese government blamed the communists. The ICCS investigated and said it was the South Vietnamese Army which had been responsible. The embassy took the position that these children' deaths were due to the communists. The pressure was on our office to give the ICCS hell. Pratt was drafting a memo to that effect. In Germany my wife and I had become friends with a couple who worked for the CIA through my wife's involvement with the local women's club. This CIA officer was by then in Saigon. Because his wife wasn't there, we would invite him to our home for diner occasionally. We were working late the evening that all of this was happening when he dropped by my office. Off the record, he told me he had just been with a high ranking Vietnamese agent who had told him that the mortar shell had been fired by mistake by the South Vietnamese Army. None of this ever came out at the country team meeting. The embassy continued to insist that the communists were responsible. Pratt Byrd and I shut up on that topic fast. We quit blaming the communists.

We paid all the bills for the ICCS through our embassy liaison office. These countries weren't paying for this; this was part of the agreement. Other people were supposed to kick in money, but nobody was but us. Since it was Kissinger's idea, we, in the end, put up all the money. We contracted for more airplanes from Air America than CIA did. I think about two-thirds of Air America was under contract to ICCS.

Q: Air America was renowned as being a CIA operation, although it was a commercial operation.

THOMAS: But we leased and had the ICCS insignia on these airplanes. More of their airplanes were flying missions for ICCS than were flying for AID; they also flew for AID. There was an AID office responsible for air operations, and the same for CIA. But we had most of them.

Q: But, as a practical matter, the North Vietnamese knew what was going on in South Vietnam. Obviously, they were getting good information.

THOMAS: Yet they were using these Communists delegations for quick passage of information.

Q: But I'm just trying to figure out what a Pole or a Hungarian could really contribute.

THOMAS: Communication facility. Speedy communication. That was really what they were contributing. Admittedly, they didn't know. They were like a lot of Americans. But they could move information (because they had the right to move information) much faster. It'd go to Europe and come right back.

In time, we had a situation grow up there in which the ambassador's daughter became a close friend or knew... Well, let's put it this way, the Iranian ambassador, an older man in his '50s, had married a younger woman, a British young woman, who had been working for the British Embassy in Rome where they met. She was a pretty blonde; she was his third wife, I think. Martin had, I think, been posted to Rome.

Q: He'd been ambassador to Rome, and, I think, had also been administrative officer in Rome. So he was an old Roman hand.

THOMAS: That's right. Well, his daughter had become a close friend of this young woman when she worked for the British Embassy in Rome while they were there. And she had been working for MI6 in Rome.

Q: Which is...

THOMAS: British secret intelligence. She then married this Iranian ambassador who was sent out to be ambassador to the ICCS for the Iranians. Here she was running around with the ambassador's daughter in Saigon. The Iranian ambassador wanted to socialize with our ambassador, but our ambassador refused. He didn't want to set a precedent, because he didn't want to do any business with any of these other ambassadors, especially the two Communist ambassadors.

An Indonesian ambassador, who'd been there since the beginning, wanted to socialize with our ambassador. He couldn't call on him, because for protocol reasons, he couldn't do that. He made it pretty obvious to me that he felt that this was wrong. He wanted to have a party in the ambassador's honor and have me and Pratt Byrd there.

First of all, the word got around through the ICCS that Pratt (whose wife wasn't there; he was running back to the States regularly to see his family; he spoke both Hungarian and Indonesian) was a spook. Therefore, people were more willing to deal with me, in terms of the diplomatic problems, than they were with Pratt. He was in and out of there, and so I was in charge a for extended periods regularly.

Q: One of the big problems in Vietnam was the fact that we had these R&R trips out, and people's tours were relatively short, so it was a little hard to keep a contact with anybody there.

THOMAS: That's right. I was there, and I was doing all the entertaining for the office in my home, the dinner parties and all that stuff. The ambassador wasn't entertaining any of these people. Any entertaining of their ambassadors, we did.

Q: Moving away from the social side...

THOMAS: But it made a difference in terms of who got to know what and who got to hear what. In the end, the social thing made for who was telling who what, and who was learning what was going on, and what, in the end, happened as we got further into the problem of the ICCS; what it ended up being able to do for us, which was never clearly understood by the ambassador or by the embassy as a whole. The communist delegations were there doing what you could expect them to do, from the Communist side. They were acting as a communication link for their espionage systems back to Saigon, and a very good one.

In the meantime, one learned a lot about these Communist people, and you learned many of them weren't very happy with the Russians. If you got to be friendly with some of them, got to know some of them, they could be helpful to us, in an informal, but very important, way. And that's, in essence, what happened in the end.

But I was starting to tell this story because the social things that occurred caused many problems, and it had an effect on my relationship with various people in that embassy.

Consequently, I sat down and wrote a memo. Pratt was out of the country. The Indonesian ambassador was pushing me for this dinner party for our ambassador. Our ambassador sent word back to me that, no, just have him come in and call on me. Well, I knew I couldn't say that, because you just couldn't do that. It was against protocol. Anybody doing the calling would be our ambassador. I wrote a memo explaining all this to our ambassador, and sent it through Joe Bennett, and a drop copy to the then deputy chief of mission, who was a quiet sort of man who didn't like rocking the boat. He was Wolf Lehmann's predecessor.

Then the ambassador decided he wanted to have a meeting. Pratt got back, and he wanted to have a meeting with the two of us. Since Pratt didn't know about my memo, the ambassador asked me, about the word he sent down to me "What about this meeting that I suggested you have him come in and call on me?"

I said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, didn't you get my memo?"

He said, "What memo?"

I looked at the DCM and the chief of the political section, "Didn't you give him my memo?" Never got past them. They were scared to send it to him.

I explained what was in it.

It became obvious that I couldn't go through these guys and get anything done because they were scared of the ambassador.

Q: He was an interesting person, let's put it this way. A very difficult person.

THOMAS: He turned to me and said, "You're right. I can't do that."

When I explained what was in the memo, he agreed with me.

Nothing came of it all. But because of his daughter's relationship with the Iranian ambassador's wife he started seeing the Iranian ambassador on the q.t. This caused all type problems for us with the Indonesian ambassador. But he'd only see him once in a while, because he said this was going to cause too many problems.

Most of the information that we were getting about what was happening in the ICCS came from the Iranian ambassador who was a smart cookie. At the same time, through contracts the ICCS had, its own communications net, a telephone system that was separate from both the military and Vietnamese civil systems, both micro wave and regular land lines had been installed by a contractor. ICCS had its own logistics system and its own air system. It gave our office a great deal of independence. It was all connected into and coming through our office, as was the money for support of the ICCS coming through our office. That meant we had a lot of leverage. But we had very little leverage with the front office in the embassy. This become clearer all the time to all of us. We were frustrated because we weren't getting any moral support. The money was there, and we were paying it out. We could do anything we wanted on our own. I saw advantages, not just disadvantages, in this situation.

At the same time, I got to know many of these Communists. One of them was a Pole. We had him for dinner, just alone, one night at my home. He became tight not drunk. He started talking about his youth and how the Nazis had killed his whole family. He then became a Communist. But became fed up with the Jews, because, in Poland, the Jewish Communists were just looking after other Jews. You couldn't get into a university if you weren't Jewish. It was a special game for them. He went on a lot about that. It turned out he was a very devout Catholic. I listened to all this. Over time, we got to be closer and more friendly; he'd tell me pretty much anything I'd ask for.

In the meantime, Pratt was home on leave. A young man, who was a West Pointer, had been brought out there by the ambassador, whose son roomed with this West Pointer while taking a Master's Degree here at Georgetown. This young man, named Ken Moorefield, met the ambassador through the ambassador's son.

Q: He was killed in Vietnam.

THOMAS: Moorefield had been decorated in Vietnam. He'd become a captain, had left the Army, and was looking around for something to do. The ambassador offered him a job, to come out to Vietnam as his personal aide. Ambassadors can do this. Ken Moorefield ended up in the ambassador's office, and got bored stiff up there. It was over-staffed with people; I think two or three secretaries. He just sort of ran around... We met, got to kidding each other; although, I was older, he liked me. He said he'd like to come to work as the junior officer in the section which he did. Pratt was away, and he and I got to discussing my frustration with the damned system, that nobody was paying attention to us, we were just third wheels there, and yet this was a function that had to be done.

He said, "What the hell. You know, you've got to make a political play sometimes. Why don't you just go and walk into the goddamned country team meeting and sit down?"

I said, "You know, I think I've got a good mind that I'll just do that."

They had a country team meeting once a week. When the country team meeting came up, I walk in and sat down. Joe Bennett looked at me with a stare of astonishment. But I just smiled at him and nodded. Nobody there knew whether the ambassador had invited me.

Q: Of course, you've got to take into context that the ambassador was known by some as almost a spider king. He played things very close to his chest, so you never knew what the ambassador had in mind.

THOMAS: That's right. I had this in mind when I did it, because the ambassador had seen me say, "You didn't send my memo?" So the next time Pratt was out of the country, I made this move. The ambassador greeted me pleasantly that morning. It soon became obvious, because I kept going to these meetings, that there were three people in the room that he treated with respect. I mean, he didn't cuss them out. Because he'd just cuss people out in front of each other. He'd give the AID director hell or the director of USIS. All these people had worked for him before. They'd all been brought there by him. They all sort of cowered in front of him. The only people he didn't pick on were Tom Polgar, who was the CIA station chief; Colonel Wahle, who was the senior military attaché there, who was the true military... (we had a general out there, for logistics reasons, but he wasn't running the intelligence side of it); and me. He treated us well. But the rest of the people got treated pretty badly in those meetings.

Out of going to those meetings, I started listening to all this stuff going on, from this fellow who was a friend of Moorefield's, Frank Snapp.

Q: He wrote a book, Decent Interval, which was very controversial.

THOMAS: Snapp was the briefer for CIA. And listening to these briefings once a week, I thought, Christ, this is 180 degrees out of phase with everything I hear when I go on these trips. If they believe this stuff, everything was fine; everything was rosy out there in the provinces. It was just the opposite, when you went out there and talked to the junior officers doing the reporting.

Q: When you arrived there in the spring of '73, how did you see the situation? What was going on in Vietnam?

THOMAS: My first trip out to the provinces didn't come until late summer of '73 because I was waiting for Pratt to arrive. We had to divide up the functions. He said, "I'm going to be traveling a lot, going to the States to see my family. I'll sit here in the office. You travel and come back and tell me what the hell's going on."

So I did an awful lot of traveling out to Hue, to Canto, and to all these different places where they had these stations for the ICCS. I got to know all the ex-master sergeants that had been hired to manage these places. I came to understand the communications net they had. I had a telephone installed in my office that was right on that communications net so that I could pick it up and be into that net immediately. I had one put into my home, separate from the regular telephone system, so that I could talk and be in communication with these various bases and the Americans that were hired there, on my own, and find out from them what was going on. In essence, I had a chain of information that was separate from the embassy's. I had a transportation system, with the Air America bit, that was separate from the embassy's. I could move around without having to bother the embassy much. Since they were treating us pretty much as separate anyway, until I got myself going to the country team meetings, why...

Because ICCS controlled so much of Air America, we were on the evacuation committee. In other words, there was an evacuation committee that had been set up as part of the standard embassy, with the air attaché being the chairman of it, and the administrative counselor, the military attaché and myself being on it. This comes in later in the story.

From the time I got there, things were not going too badly, in the fall of '73. You didn't find the negative aspects of the reporting that I was getting later on. But, at that time, I wasn't going to country team meetings; so I didn't know what was being said there. But things weren't so bad out in the provinces. There had been a lull in the fighting. There seemed to be plenty of munitions arriving. Everywhere I went were big ammunition dumps full of stuff for our side. Everywhere. You'd go up near Pleiku, and there were just fields of supplies and munitions. You found, let's say, up through '73, things seemed to be going all right, relatively.

But, as we got into '74, I was going to the country team meetings. Let's say early spring '74, things were starting to turn around, and they didn't look as good, in terms of the pressure being put on. Not that they were losing any ground at that point, but there was more pressure, more fighting. From what I gathered at the time... we were reporting, and I was reporting back with all I was learning... One of the problems was that much of what I reported back I reported to Pratt, and then he would write it up in cables. Well, we made an agreement that, if the cable never got out of there (in many cases, it never did; it never saw the light of day), we would keep the unsent cable form on file in the chron file...

Q: You're talking about from the top. Graham Martin kept a very tight lid on what went in and out.

THOMAS: I kept saying that this stuff should be going to Moscow, because Moscow was as responsible for everything going on there as anybody. He wouldn't let us send a drop copy of anything to Moscow.

Q: Our embassy in Moscow.

THOMAS: Our embassy in Moscow. He wouldn't let us write anything to Moscow. I felt that this was wrong. I believed that Kissinger's detente policy with the Soviets was being falsely oversold as a part of a strategy to help Nixon who was under attack over Watergate. Thus, nothing could be said that might indicate that the Soviets were blatantly undermining the Paris Accords which they were doing.

When I first got there, only two members of the political section were what you'd call liberal in political thinking (we're talking American politics), and that was Pratt Byrd and me. There were 30-some officers in the political section. That's a pretty big political section.

Q: Oh, yes, biggest in the world, at that time.

THOMAS: I remember this was the fall of '73 and winter. They had a party for the total political section that was hosted by the chief, Joe Bennett. I'd gotten to be friendly with his wife, because she's Chinese and we talked Chinese. My wife did too, because they took Taiji together. Joe liked me, but he was a milquetoast, if you know Joe.

Q: I don't.

THOMAS: Well, he was a very milquetoast fellow. Anyway, everybody was standing around at this Christmas party, and, about this time, the whole Nixon thing was the rage.

Q: We're talking about Watergate.

THOMAS: Watergate was the rage topic. I made a bet with Joe Bennett in front of everybody that Nixon would be out of office by the end of the next July. Everybody there was for Nixon -- oh, he was a great guy.

A flashback comes to me re Vietnam; if I've told this story, stop me. The flashback came right now that's important in all this, in terms of my approach to Vietnam, in being there and having talked about it.

At the time of the Geneva Conference in '54, there were certain people in the embassy wanting to send me to Geneva, to be there for the... because Korea was part of the...

Q: I think you did mention this.

THOMAS: All right. When I went off to language school and learned Korean at the Army Language School, right after I got home from there, in '54, I met some of my classmates from West Point, who had been in the Army and had been captains. We'd sit around and drink at the officers' club (they were bachelors), in the evening, and I'd preach the concept that, in Vietnam, we need special forces. We need, not regular Army, we need support for them. But they've got to fight their own war. We can't fight that. This is too nationalistic. It's not going to work, etc.

The thing that hit me, when I got to thinking about what they said, these young captains said, "Look, Fred, what you say I think is true. But it'll never happen, because of the military/industrial complex..." (You've got to remember, this is the Eisenhower period.) "The military/industrial complex is too important in our country. They will never let this happen, an American war will be fought American style, with big tanks and all of that. The concept of special forces and what you're talking about will never fly. It will always be American style, because you can't sell big tanks to special-forces outfits."

Here we were, we got into Vietnam, and we were in the same old thing, but this time, we were trying to teach them, much too late, to fight their own war. And they weren't doing so well at it. The real trouble was that the leadership were creatures of French colonialism and lacked the will to fight; they were too corrupt.

The thing I wanted to say was all the cables that we didn't get to send were filed in with the cables we did. They were never torn up or thrown away. And this was an agreement Pratt and I had. So that when we boxed everything up to be shipped out of there, there was no time to go through anything. I didn't want to go through anything. I wanted everything saved, just the way it was. So we boxed it all up, at the end, and shipped it out. All that stuff was shipped. If historians are interested, what we wanted to say, but never got out of there, might be somewhere in archives.

Well, I'm trying to think of where we left off here. By the next spring...

Q: So we're talking about '74.

THOMAS: Through early '74, things were not as bad as they became in '75. But, in going into the fall of '74, you could see things turning downward.

Q: When you say "things," what are you talking about?

THOMAS: When you went out to the provinces and you got to talking to the junior officers, they would say, well...

Q: These were Vietnamese junior officers.

THOMAS: I didn't deal with Vietnamese junior officers, because, the Vietnamese wouldn't have anything to do with me. The only Vietnamese who were allowed to deal with me were General Hiep and a small group of people that were supposed to deal with the Communists. They were allowed to deal with the North Vietnamese, and they were allowed to deal with these delegations. But we were sort of pariahs, because we supported the ICCS which was not popular with the South Vietnamese government.

Q: So the officers you were talking to were American observers.

THOMAS: Observers who were at the grassroots level.

Q: With our consulates general as part of this.

THOMAS: Sometimes I would go to places where there weren't consulates general, but there might be an AID guy out there, or there might be a CIA guy out there. I'd just hook up with anybody that was there, that spoke English, that was around. Usually I'd find a place to stay; maybe it'd be a local hotel, whatever. But, generally speaking, I'd stay right on the ICCS base. The sergeant in charge would have a place for me to stay. They had these little bases they'd built out there for the ICCS, and you had four different groups there.

Out of this, it was kept running, kept reporting. But it was frustrating, because, as you say, Martin didn't tell anybody anything. You had to guess at what was going on.

I feel, from being there at the time, that he himself was partially responsible for the speed with which Vietnam fell. However, as I said before, the basic fault was with the Vietnamese leadership, their corruption and lack of will to fight. As for Martin's responsibility, a lot of people didn't understand this, but a lot has to do with psychology. He understood a lot about psychology; therefore, he refused to request orders for people to get them out of there because he didn't want to scare the Vietnamese. That was his argument for not getting orders for the wives and families.

Even before he did that, he made a major error. The major error came when he returned to the States to lobby for more armament for South Vietnam.

There was so much armament (and I knew this from reading stuff and talking to the military attachés, because I'd become very close, socially, with them), tremendous amounts of military supplies in the pipeline, and there was so much money sitting around waiting and stuff to be shipped, that even if they cut off the budget to nothing immediately, it would take two to three years to finish off all this stuff. Talking about where they were going to cut the budget for the South Vietnamese army this year wasn't going to have any immediate effect. It was academic, really.

But Martin was back here, making this big fight in front of Congress, publicly, which was being read in South Vietnam, talking about giving up on our Vietnamese friends. Of course, he was hoping to get the Americans involved, but that wasn't going to happen, but it had its effect on Thieu.

Q: President Thieu.

THOMAS: By the winter of '74, things had gotten much worse. I felt that everything I was hearing up at the country team was all pipe dreams.

Q: I sort of keep coming back to this, but you keep saying things were getting much worse. Can you be specific? What are you talking about?

THOMAS: There was much more pressure, and the Vietnamese weren't handling it as well.

Q: When you talking about pressure...

THOMAS: Military pressure.

Q: In other words, were the places...

THOMAS: Little places were starting to fall. Little places. People were starting to pull back. Not in a big way, but in little ways. The North Vietnamese were getting much more aggressive in the way they were handling things; you saw this aggressiveness.

Around the first of the year, '75, a province north of Saigon, Phuoc Long that was up next to the border, fell. Anyway, the first real move came up there, on the part of the Communists, I think it was in early January, and the Communists took over that area. But everyone said, it's not too important; it's not like a major victory. Everybody was down-playing it.

Right after it happened, I walked three French nuns to see me. They said that in the past, during the Tet Offensive (and I'd been out there at Tet in '68, on a TDY), their people had been shot and killed in this town, and they didn't want a repeat of this. They'd had two nuns who'd been captured by the Communists up there, and was there anything I could do to help them?

I thought a minute, and I said, "Yes, I think so. Just let me make a phone call."

I called the Pole who I'd gotten to know personally, and who was said to be, by our intelligence people, the chief of what is the equivalent of the Polish KGB in Saigon. I explained what was going on to him about these French nuns, and would he be willing to help them?

He said, "Yes, send them over right away."

I sent them over to see him.

I guess it was maybe two or three weeks later, in came the French nuns, with two more, and an American with them, to thank me.

I said, "Well, you don't need to thank me. You've got to thank that Pole."

They said, "We wanted to thank you first."

The Pole, I remember, was a good Catholic. These two French nuns spoke fluent Vietnamese. They said they'd been terribly treated by the Vietnamese. Suddenly everything changed. They overheard one of the guard saying that some orders came out of Warsaw that they were to be given the VIP treatment. Everything changed, and suddenly they were infiltrated back through the lines and let go. But it was all due to this Pole.

I thanked the Pole, and they thanked the Pole. It showed you some things can be done in those situations, if one has made the right personal connection.

That was the first evidence that things were not going well, in a big way.

Q: Was the ICCS doing what it was supposed to be doing in this thing?

THOMAS: Our side was reporting back to their own governments, etc. For instance, in the fall, before the Iranian ambassador left, he predicted the fall of Vietnam by the summer of '75, and explained why and what was going on, from his own observations with his own people there. I wrote this all up for our ambassador. It was a big long report, concerning his own observations.

Ban-me-thuot was the next place to have trouble.

Q: Which was a major military center.

THOMAS: Up in the mountains, the south end of the defense of the central highlands. It was easier to attack than Pleiku and Kontum to its north and much less fortified. It had been the center of the area where the U.S. special forces had worked with the Montagnard tribe to defend the area. When it fell, a delegation of American missionaries called on me and asked for help. They had a group of medical missionaries there. At the time of Tet in '68, all of their staff there had been machine gunned by the communists. I immediately got in touch with this same Pole; he made sure no Americans were killed. He gave me periodic oral reports on what was happening to them. He told me they were being moved out of the area of combat for their safety.

The first thing that happened after the fall of Ban Me Thuot and during the time Martin was back in the States... It was on a Saturday morning.

Q: When are we talking about?

THOMAS: March, I think. Maybe mid-March.

Q: March '75.

THOMAS: (It was 15th March) I got a call from this retired master sergeant up at Pleiku, on this direct line I'd had put into my own home, on a Saturday morning at about lunch time, saying, "What do I do? I've got all these Poles and Hungarians and everybody here in this base. The senior American here is an AID official. He's quietly come around and told me and all the Americans to come with him and get the hell out of there, and to tell only the Indonesians and the Iranians that they were leaving, but not to tell the Communists, that there's a pullback out of Pleiku."

I said, "No, don't do that. You stay there with those people. Your orders are to stay there. Don't leave. And don't tell anybody anything at this point. I want to know about what's going on. We're not going to play favorites in this situation." (The retired American sergeant later was given a decoration by the Hungarians for remaining there.)

I knew the thing was getting hairy. Ban-me-thuot had fallen. The military attaché said, "We haven't got long here. This thing doesn't look good." It had to do with the Vietnamese leadership's lack of will to do anything. They didn't want to fight. At Ban-me-thuot, our own military said, "No reason for this, except they just didn't have the guts to fight."

I went immediately to the embassy. Wolf Lehmann, who was...

Q: Who was chargé at the time.

THOMAS: I went into Wolf's office and said, "What in the hell is going on up at Pleiku?"

He said, "I just found out. Yesterday or the day before, President Thieu went up to..." What was that place on the coast there? You know, the place that had the naval base.

Q: Oh, yes. Cam Ranh.

THOMAS: Cam Ranh Bay, that area there. He'd gone up there and called the CG of the Second Corps. The Second Corps headquarters was at Pleiku. First Corps was up at Hue, up in that area, but Second Corps headquarters was at Pleiku. He called the commanding general down there, from that Corps Hq., and told him he wanted him to make a strategic retreat out of Pleiku-Kontum and bring all his troops back to the coast with an ultimate objective of protecting Saigon. He hadn't consulted with the embassy. He hadn't consulted with anybody. But he'd been listening to Martin back in the States scream about cutting aid, and he got cold feet. There was ammunition galore up there; there was plenty of stuff to fight a war with. But he ordered this, and this rout had started before we even knew it was happening.

The embassy got a message from Pleiku, from this AID official, who said he'd been told by the general that he's pulling out and told them they should get out. And then he went to the ICCS guy, who called me. This was how this whole episode started.

When this happened in this way, I told my people to stay, for the time being. The others were all pulling out, and had pulled out. The rout was on. They walked away from the big ammunition dump full of stuff up there in the highlands, and moved back towards the coast, starting that morning, without our even knowing it was going to happen. All because Thieu lost his nerve.

In the meantime, we received orders to call, and only call, the Indonesians and Iranians. This was Wolf Lehmann giving me these direct orders, in his office. Kinsolving, the other ICCS liaison officer, was there, too. He was departing that afternoon for a family visit and would be gone for several weeks. We were not allowed to call anybody else.

I said, "Christ, this thing is falling. These Communists, I've made connections with them, and they can be of help in this situation in terms of saving American lives. The American Marine Corps is not going to come in here and save lives. We have Americans spread out all over this country."

Wolf Lehmann was going to be a tough guy. Of course, like in the Army, you say, "Yes, sir."

I wasn't about to give up yet. I went down the hall (this was on the top floor) to the other end, to see the chief of station. I said, "This can't be. You've got to go in there and talk him out of this idea. You've got some connections in the Hungarian Mission."

Q: Was it Shepley then?

THOMAS: No, it was Tom Polgar, a Hungarian Jew who spoke Hungarian. He said, "I know the orders. I got the same orders."

I said, "Will you go in and ask him for permission for you to tell the Communists that this is happening, so that we get some leverage with them out of this goddamned situation."

Q: You're not going to hide it.

THOMAS: I said, "First of all, you're not going to get the Communists to attack the Poles and the Hungarians. They're not going to get hurt. The only people, out of playing this little game, that have any chance of getting hurt are the other two sides, plus the Americans. These people are the friends of the Communists. What's the sense in this? This is just stupidity." Polgar tried but was turned down.

I heard later, through the grapevine, that my whole arguments were not just played out in that office; they were sent to Washington, via back channels, saying, you know, I don't agree with this either, but here's what my orders are, and here's what I... What happened to this argument was this ICCS liaison officer suggesting this same thing. Polgar was told again by Lehmann that he couldn't tell them.

That night, I got a call from the Hungarian, who was a real Commie son of a bitch of a young man, accusing me of just what Wolf Lehmann was trying to cause happen, get them killed.

I said, "What do you mean? I notified the Indonesian ambassador, who was chairman..." They had a chairman for the month, every month, and it changed every month. That month, it happened to be the Indonesian. I said, "He didn't tell you? Why, I took for granted he'd tell you." I shifted the whole goddamned blame, right then and there. Of course, I didn't tell him not to tell anybody, but it was taken for granted he wouldn't, and he didn't. So I shifted the blame, because I wanted to have access to these people.

From then on, I never went back to see Wolf Lehmann again, ever. I never went near his office. I started doing my own thing.

Moorefield and I started a pool betting on what day the place was going to fall.

Frankly, the ICCS people were out of Da-nang a week before our embassy started to pull the consulate general out of Da-nang. Da-nang had to go out by sea, and people nearly got killed there. It was so bad that, when I was getting the ICCS out of there a week earlier, I was on a phone directly to the Air America people who were landing planes at Da-nang to get them out. They didn't dare stop the airplane. You had to be loaded on the run, because this plane would be swamped with people. The planes would go down the runway, and we'd pick them up out of Jeeps. I was on the phone, talking to the pilots when all this was going on. We were getting people out of places when that's as bad as it is, while the embassy hadn't done a damn thing at this point about getting anybody out.

Because we got all these people out and nobody was hurt, I was somewhat of a hero to the ICCS people. But I hadn't brought a damn word up to Wolf Lehmann or anybody else. I just did my own thing.

Moorefield was close with Snepp and a fellow named Don Hays. Hays was a young officer in the Foreign Service who had done some duty temporarily as third man in our office. He'd been rotated through there. These young guys came to me, and said, "Look, you're the only senior officer in this whole embassy who seems to realize this place is falling."

That was in early March. By mid March, towns had fallen. From the fall at Pleiku in March up until nearly the end of March, my time was spent getting ICCS people out and worrying about that, paying bills, and just doing my own thing, and not talking to anybody else about it. I figured this would be useful.

In the meantime, the Pole was looking after and keeping me informed of what was happening to the Americans the Viet Cong had captured in various points around the country, this the chief of Polish intelligence, who was very helpful.

It was the last week in March. I was embassy duty officer starting at noon on a Thursday 27 March.. That gave me certain power in the embassy because you see everything that's coming in, and you've got the right to originate cables and send stuff out. The air attaché called a meeting of the evacuation committee, as chairman of it for Friday afternoon the 28th. Martin had arrived back early that morning at about 3:00 am. Martin was "playing it cool" and paying no attention to reality, he was just off in his own dream world, he refused to admit that this place was falling around him. I arrived at the Air Attaché's office expecting to find the whole contingent of persons present who were listed as members of the evacuation committee. I was by far one of the lesser lights on the committee. Only three people were there: the Air attaché Garvin McCurdy, the military attaché Chuck Wahle and me. Missing were the Administrative Counselor, the Embassy Security officer, the Admin officers for USAID and for USIS, no one from CIA and forgotten others. McCurdy asked if I had been able to get up to the Ambassador's office. It seemed that the two attachés had tried to see the ambassador but had been stalled. I'd been up there; it was unreal. I said that it was my opinion that the only hope for a successful evacuation to come off at all was to do it without waiting for the embassy and the ambassador. I suggested we confer with General Smith at Thon Sonuit Air Base. Col Wahle called the General and we were on our way. General Smith heard my views on the situation in the embassy; his response was supportive and positive. It was agreed that they would begin bringing in military flights which would take any unofficial Americans and their dependents out as soon as possible. The flight that crashed with the orphans was scheduled at that time. The action officer was Smith's deputy an Air Force BG, Richard Baughn. This was being done strictly through military channels. The flights were sent to Clark Air Base in the Philippines without U.S. Embassy, Manila clearance. Our ambassador in Manila, Sullivan was livid. General Baughn took the fall for this end run and was sent home because of Sullivan's raising hell. This, however, was the beginning of the evacuation of Vietnam - despite Martin's views.

The coming Sunday was Easter, 30 March. My wife, our children and I had invited the army attaché, Chuck Wahle and his wife to our home for Easter dinner. I was still the duty officer, as I say, duty officer. I said something about the situation to Chuck who said, "Get your wife and children out of here as fast as you can. This thing is not going to last much longer."

I said, "Yes, I think you're right. Everything's falling." We had already shipped our dog, a black Labrador to my sister and her husband in California. I noted that I would probably have to pay the fare for my family to leave because the ambassador wasn't willing to send them out on government orders. Wahle said do it.

It was then a matter of gambling on the day that it was actually going to fall. Monday morning arrived and I got a call from the code room, my orders had come in from the Department. We were leaving early. I started to think about all those security clearances I carried from my earlier assignment. They weren't taking any chances of my being captured. The packers came in on Tuesday. My 15 year old son who loved to go to the air base to play basket ball came home early that day and said he wanted to leave. He sensed the danger. I knew these younger fellows Moorefield, Hays and Snepp wanted me to stay on; after conferring with my wife, I went to Joe Bennett and volunteered to remain. Joe said "No, I have four consuls generals walking the halls now with no assignments - forget it." The ambassador said leave but tell no one you are leaving.

Q: How about these country team meetings? Was it still a rosy picture?

THOMAS: By then, no. As a matter of fact, by then, I don't think they even had them. There was too much pressure for that type stuff. You know, that was over with.

I said, "There's no reality to what's going on."

All these young officers knew it, including Snepp, as did the chief of station. But you couldn't convince Martin. He was going to save the day. They were going to stop before they took Saigon. They wouldn't want to give up American aid, and all that sort of... It was not believable.

My duty officer stint was up on Thursday noon; I was scheduled to depart on Friday 4 April by commercial aircraft. I turned over my personal car for shipment on Thursday.

Since I was ordered not to tell anybody I was leaving, any Vietnamese. General Hiep, who was the ICCS general, was suddenly going to be made transportation minister, under a temporary government. He came to me and asked me if I'd be his unofficial advisor; I didn't dare tell him I was leaving. However, there was one hold on my departure, I had to await the return of Kinsolving from family visit to take over the ICCS function. During this period after all of the ICCS personnel had been pulled back into Saigon, it was necessary for me to reassure the American contractor who ran their mess that he would be paid - just feed them now. This was all done orally. No paper work. I didn't have time to tell Kinsolving of my oral commitment. Later, in Washington I had to go to bat for this man in order for him to be paid.

The fall came, as you know, suddenly. By then, we had a pool going as to what day the place was going to fall, and I think I was off by three days. The evacuation of Saigon started early enough, and that's why we didn't have more Americans caught there, but it was done without Martin's permission.

Q: I have a long interview that I did with Terry McNamara, who was the consul general in Can-tho, and essentially he was left alone. The CIA took care of their own and left, and he more or less had to line up things. So he got out on his own.

THOMAS: I'll tell you why. I was at the embassy at the time; I pulled the ICCS out of Can-tho long before... The only reason they didn't want to pull anybody out was because it would look like the place was falling. This was Martin's own doing, so he insisted everybody stay in place. You couldn't even ship your wife out unless you did it with your own money. The place was seething with anger because people wanted their wives and children out of there. Mine were the first to come in, but then they allowed others in. It was a terrible situation.

Q: You left when, and when did it fall?

THOMAS: I left on April 4th, and it fell on the 28th.

Q: Where did you go?

THOMAS: I flew to Hong Kong and stayed in Hong Kong a while. I was so worried about friends there and people there, you know, Americans and other people, that I just didn't want to leave. But I'd been ordered to go. I even volunteered to stay, but wasn't allowed to. Hong Kong was a little too expensive, so we then went on to Taiwan, and stayed there for a while. Nobody was pushing to get me back to the States.

Q: They had too many people.

THOMAS: Laos had already fallen, and there were all these people out of Laos. I stayed in Taiwan for a while. I think we spent three weeks in Asia, until the fall. I saw some friends, I think, in Tokyo, who had gotten out as it fell. Then we came on back to the States and stayed for a while on the West Coast with my brother-in-law and sister. I talked to people who got out right at the end, but it didn't get any better. The realism.

Thank God for a few people there like Snepp, Moorefield, Hays and Lacy Wright. I think they received some medals out of it. They deserved them because they were the ones who really organized to get things moving.

Our effort was the first, the attachés and my meeting with General Smith started the airlift that moved non-official Americans. Without that early start many Americans would have been endangered. But, there were still a lot of people left behind, who paid the price for our inept policies.

CHARLES LAHIGUERA
Peace Accord Monitor

Bien Hoa (1973-1975)

Mr. Lahiguera was born and raised in New York. After graduating from Georgetown University and serving in the US Navy, he entered the Foreign Service in 1963. Though he served outside the South East Asia, his primary duties concerned the Vietnam War and its aftermath, particularly refugees. His overseas posts include Germany, Curacao, Vietnam, France, Hong Kong, Thailand and Swaziland, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Lahiguera was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Then you're saying towards the end of this, by '73 it's getting a little bit boring? So, what did you do?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. Well, at that time when we signed the agreement, the peace accords, they were looking for officers to monitor the transition. I happened to talk to personnel on the phone and said that I wasn't going to volunteer because that would cause some problems at home and in the delegation perhaps, but if I were drafted I wouldn't oppose going. So, not surprisingly, we got a telegram asking that I be transferred back to Vietnam.

Q: Okay, back to Vietnam. You went where and you were there for how long?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. Well, I returned in the summer of '73. I was initially assigned on temporary duty for six months with the task of monitoring the peace accords. I was assigned back to the third corps. I asked to be assigned back to the third corps because I knew that area and I'd wanted to see how things had gone since my departure and that's where most of my Vietnamese contacts were. Political officers don't have friends, they have contacts. Anyhow, they were very good about assigning me there. CORDS, the development program had been abolished and had been replaced by a consulate general, four consulates general and I was assigned to a consulate general in Bien Hoa.

Q: Who was the consul general there?

LAHIGUERA: Walt Crenshaw. He was a labor specialist. He was there I guess for about six months. My TDY more or less coincided with that period. Just an amusing point: when I arrived at the Bien Hoa airport, they forgot to send somebody to get me. So, I had to hitchhike. There was no transportation from the airport in any commercial vehicle, so I had to hitchhike to the embassy. I got a ride by some army chaplain who happened to be traveling by. When I got to the embassy they were very red-faced. There was an administrative officer by the name of Bob McCallum who had been assigned to take care of me. Mr. McCallum had the misfortune of then being assigned to me later on and I have never let him forget that.

Q: Well, then you were in Vietnam in Bien Hoa for half of '73 to when?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, well, then after my TDY assignment, they made me political officer in effect the deputy consul general.

Q: In Bien Hoa?

LAHIGUERA: In Bien Hoa. So, I went on home leave because I hadn't taken home leave yet. Then when I came back I came back as a permanent officer.

Q: So you were in Bien Hoa from '73 to when?

LAHIGUERA: To the end.

Q: To '75?

LAHIGUERA: To '75. I left off the roof of the embassy the evening of April 29th.

Q: Well, when you got there what was the situation in the third corps?

LAHIGUERA: There was sporadic fighting still in almost all the provinces. We had skirmishes. My principal job was preparing a daily situation summary that we sent in as did all the consulates general saying what had happened in the last 24 hours. We sent this in everyday. The first task I had in the morning to put this thing together. I was just one of the five persons who did this. We went out to the different provinces. In the third corps there were about 10 or 12 provinces. We had AID officers. We had a presence in every province. So, we would talk to them on the radio or on the telephone if there was such a thing. We then would put together where the attacks were through this day, how many hand grenades were thrown and how many casualties and just monitoring the behavior. We tracked the continued violations by the communist forces of the peace agreement. That's what we did for six months. I traveled all over. I saw all the provinces. I saw old friends and majors who had become colonels and that kind of thing.

Q: Was there a great degree of cynicism among you all or during the monitoring of this?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, well it was very clear that the communist had no intention whatsoever of maintaining any kind of cease-fire. So, we tried to support the local people, the local forces and hoped that they were able to consolidate their position. We didn't have any military of course. Our teams were changed. We couldn't rely on any American forces. The military presence was just the defense attaché's office, which was engaged principally in Saigon in logistics support. But each consulate general had a defense attaché office. They had hired contractors to run their offices and these were military intelligence collection operations. I personally felt they were somewhat amateurish. We also had the CIA present and they had about four or five officers in Bien Hoa. They had what was called a base chief at the consulate general. There was a gentleman by the name of Orrin DeForest who was the CIA operative there who has written a book called Slow Burn so I'm not saying anything that isn't already published. We also had another CIA officer who wrote critical articles for the Post. So all that was far more documented than what I am going to describe.

Q: Well, what was the Republic of Vietnam, South Vietnamese government. How were they responding to these attacks?

LAHIGUERA: They would try to consolidate their position. They would try to build up their strength and the training of their forces. They would try to protect the communities. There wasn't any major offensive of any kind, it was trying to consolidate and improve what you had. I thought they had for the most part very good officers. I met all the province chiefs in the third corps. They had meetings every Monday with the commanding general of the third corps and his staff. He had two deputies, two brigadiers I guess. They were very professional. I was very impressed by the quality of the officers that they had.

Q: Were we making any attempt to stop the South Vietnamese to responding to attacks by the North Vietnamese?

LAHIGUERA: Well, certainly if the North Vietnamese initiated any actions in the third corps the southern forces were free to get rid of them. They weren't supposed to be there. I can't speak about anything outside the third corps.

Q: Well, what was happening in Phuoc Long?

LAHIGUERA: Phuoc Long. My friend, the district chief, Major Yen, had become the province chief. He was then a colonel. Unfortunately one still had to fly to Phuoc Long. The road was still very dangerous to drive though I understood they did start some sort of bus operation. I did go up there. I used to stay there overnight. I loved the place. I didn't want to convey the impression before that it was a place where I didn't want to be in. It was beautiful. The country itself was beautiful. Southeast Asia in general is more beautiful in the countryside than it is in the cities. Phuoc Long really was a collection of refugee villages. The Montagnards grew highland rice and they lived on it. There wasn't a great deal of industry. They cut bamboo shoots into other things, but it wasn't rattan. They didn't have a lot of things. We had helped build a Montagnard training center, sort of an orphanage. I used to go up and bring them powdered milk for baby formula. There were some nuns up there that helped train Montagnards to do things, teach them handiwork and sewing and that kind of stuff. So, Phuoc Long was at that time when I returned in '73 was reasonably stable and seemed to be getting along without the presence of the American military. We hadn't lost any of the district capitals and I felt very secure in Song Be itself.

Q: Well, now I assume one of your jobs in the military, I mean this whole intelligence apparatus sounds like they, everybody must have been almost tripping over each other on this, but one of the things you'd be doing would be monitoring the spirit of the ARV. How is the, what was your impression when you got down to the change of the South Vietnamese army?

LAHIGUERA: As far as tripping over each other, we had lots of jurisdictional problems with the CIA and the defense attaché people. But, as far as the ARV was concerned, well we had regular forces. We had regional forces, RF they were called. PF popular forces something like a militia. Initially when I was there the morale was pretty good. They had a lot of support logistically. There was some optimism, but there was certainly an awareness that support for the war was eroding in the United States. That was a concern by everybody including the ambassador. Our ambassador was Graham Martin at the time. I must say that the entire time I was in Bien Hoa in the third corps, I'm not aware that the ambassador ever entered our consular district. His wife came for lunch once, but he never came. We had a very fine leadership in the third corps on the Vietnamese side. We had three major divisions in the northeast we had the 18th division, which was ably commanded. He was an extraordinary officer, very impressive. He used to entertain his troops, he'd play the electric guitar and sing rock and roll. Oh, he could do everything. He was a very dynamic, charismatic figure and proved to be so until the very end. He was in the area of Xuan Loc, which is route one going northeast, and then directly north of us we had another division. I think it was the seventh. That was a difficult area. Loc Binh was there on route 13. That command seemed to be well run. Then we had another division, the 25th division, on route one going toward Cambodia. The 25th division commander, General Ba, who was one of the biggest Vietnamese I ever saw. He was certainly over six feet and also a very inspiring guy. I think they all had a very positive attitude.

One of the cynical observations I had heard while I was there was that well you know these generals who run Saigon have to be selected for political loyalty rather than for their competence as commanding generals. I certainly didn't find that to be the case. They may well have been loyal to President Thieu, but they were certainly competent commanders. My impression was that they were highly respected by their fellow officers, by their staff, and by the province chiefs who were all military officers. So, I thought we had a very good team and I had a very good relationship with them.

Q: How did things start to go downhill? I mean what were you seeing when you talk about that?

LAHIGUERA: Well, I think as things progressed there was an erosion of our support. This led to questioning about how long we were going to give them stuff and how much we would give them, arguments over the budget and all this kind of thing. It projected the idea that we wanted to get out and then we had the unfortunate Watergate business, which I think really hurt us. This distracted the nation. I think it was a big problem for Vietnam. There was corruption in the military. My friend, Colonel Yen used to tell me about this. He eventually became province chief of Bien Hoa so I saw him quite a bit since we lived in the same town. He would tell me about the problems with what we called ghost soldiers and flower soldiers and units. In these units if a man was dead or gone that they continued to collect his pay and rations and not replace him. Flower soldiers were enlisted and were actually members of a unit, but were allowed to go home. They collected their pay and rations as well. Colonel Yen used to tell me about surprise inspections on weekends. How in the boondocks they would muster and count everybody and call to account why people were missing. He wanted to see the paperwork. So, undoubtedly there were problems and everyone admitted that, but certainly not any worse than things I've seen in other parts of the world including the United States. I felt that the Vietnamese forces had competence as long they felt they could count on our support. Over the two years I was there they started to doubt whether they could rely on us anymore.

Q: What were developments that you were seeing towards the end in '75? I mean were you seeing, was there a steady decline or was it rather fast?

LAHIGUERA: The skirmishes, the incursions increased. Particularly the North Vietnamese came in the area around route 13 to the north of Saigon and there was quite a bit of fighting there. The North Vietnamese must have taken a lot of casualties there, but they hung on and they kept some enclaves. The real test was ironically over my old province Phuoc Long. In January of '75 they mounted a major operation against Phuoc Long.

Six months into my job Walter Shaw left and Richard Peters who had been the political military chief in Saigon became the consul general. I was in effect his deputy. He was on leave at this point. I can recall there was a lot of pressure on Phuoc Long. I can remember going to the weekly meeting of the full commander and I knew we were in trouble when he felt like he was being overwhelmed in Song Be. He turned to me and said, "What should we do?" I had this terrible feeling that if he was asking me what to do then we didn't have a very good chance. I felt and I wrote that I felt that this was a test. They were going to take Phuoc Long and if they could get away with that and if there would be no American reaction that they knew they could do what they wished. In fact that's what happened. In fact, after the war, the general who commanded the invasion wrote an article in the Vietnamese press saying that that was the case. So, I felt quite vindicated on that. Song Be was the first capital to fall and they were able to take it. After that we were very concerned and then the activities started in the second corps which really caused the unraveling of everything.

Q: This is in the highlands up around Pleiku?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. We, as far as I understand, we didn't understand that they were going to attack. They moved some divisions and we were tracking them with signal intelligence according to what's been published. They were smart enough to know that we were doing that and so they didn't move their radios, they just moved their army. We had human intelligence saying there was going to be an attack, which we ignored and the signal intelligence showed that they hadn't moved. They attacked. The roads became flooded with refugees fleeing and the whole second corps caved in.

Q: When this was happening, what were you all doing?

LAHIGUERA: Well, we were just monitoring events in our own area. We were very concerned about any assaults that might take place. We were certainly looking at our evacuation plans and we weren't very optimistic about it. After Song Be fell I thought we were going to lose.

I remember General Weyand and some fact finding group came in. Ken Quinn, who was later our ambassador to Cambodia, was with them. I told them that I thought we would collapse by August. I was wrong, I didn't realize how much of a botch they would make out of the first corps. Things were really very bad there. We had troops moving both up and down the road at the same time. It was just a terrible mess. When the first corps fell we managed to evacuate the marines. The marines were evacuated and the families were left under the communists, which was a terrible situation. I was very concerned because they brought those marines into our corps and they were placed under the 18th division under General Dao and I didn't regard them as very reliable. Da Nang falling was a big shock for us. We had scenes of people desperate to get out of Da Nang and people forcing their way onto aircraft or helicopters at gunpoint and fleeing by sea. There was a lot of violence. We saw that and that impacted on our evacuation plan. We were very concerned that if we had to evacuate the Bien Hoa area we would have encountered the same kind of problems where people, armed units would try to take over the means of transportation. As a matter of fact that never happened. What we didn't understand, was that in Da Nang people were fleeing from the first corps to try to get down to Saigon and what was left of Vietnam. Most of the people in Vietnam when the end came, weren't that interested in leaving.

We had these evacuation planning sessions called by the security officer, a gentleman named Mark Garrett who was really a fine officer, a very capable guy and the backbone to the whole security business. I must say he kept his focus while everybody else and many other people were running around in circles. We discussed these problems. We were very concerned if we started initiating an evacuation that the army units could turn on us. There was this feeling that we might be in the ironic position of having to rely on communist troops to protect us against our former allies. Da Nang inspired this kind of thinking. We were particularly concerned about this marine regiment that was under the 18th, that was very close to the consulate general in Bien Hoa. When things went downhill, the first corps had to really decide about what we were going to do. The ambassador was just dead-set against any discussion publicly or any indication that we might leave.

Q: Was the attitude of the ambassador pretty well known? Was it talked about that he was out of touch?

LAHIGUERA: Well, I wouldn't use the word out of touch. My impression was that the attitude of the ambassador was that he wanted to hang on, that he didn't want to cause panic. I don't know if he imagined that we were going to have some sort of a commendation or that he was going to get the government, the American government, to finally support him. I think he was unrealistic. I think it was a hopeless case. I thought they had passed that stage. There just didn't seem to be any reason to believe that there would be much forthcoming from the United States. I think a feeling developed among the South Vietnamese forces that they didn't want to be the last soldier to die in a hopeless war. Once you get that feeling, it's very serious. The communist forces started coming down out of route 20, down from the Xuan Loc area and Major General Le Minh Dao was there to meet them. He was courageous. He decimated many of their people at the cost of at least a third of the division. He held for a long time. All of these divisions, all the generals had helicopters.

The evacuation finally took place on the 28th or 29th of April. They could have easily have gone out to the Blue Ridge or to any of the ships there at sea. None of them did. They all stayed. So much for the feeling that they weren't going to fight. The three army divisions fought. General Dao and General Ba were captured and the division commander of the staff swore that he would fight to the last minute. They didn't surrender. They were captured. I saw an article written by Dao later in the communist press, which were very cleverly written saying how he was disappointed at the United States. I said to myself, I'm sure you would have appreciated the return of the U.S. army. Nothing he said changed my view of him. I had met him several months before the end. He had a very bad eye problem which was threatening his sight. I think he had a detached retina. Anyhow we had him looked at and it was agreed that he could be evacuated to Hawaii for medical treatment. But when things deteriorated he gave up leaving and wanted to fight with his division. So he was captured. I don't know if he is still alive today, but he could have spent all that time in Hawaii if he chose to. [ed note. Le Minh Dao spent 17 years in a re-education camp. After his release, he received political asylum in the United States.] So, obviously these people, the South Vietnamese forces that did most of the dying in the war were in the end really quite courageous. They never were given the credit that they deserved.

Let me cite Frank Snepp's book, A Decent Interval. There are all kinds of imaginings in his account of these chaotic events. He has the details wrong. Everything that he said about the third corps was wrong. He claimed that when we left Bien Hoa that the South Vietnamese army fired on us, which was absolutely untrue. I was there and it never happened. He claimed that we had asked for helicopter gunships, hundreds. We never did such a thing. We never even considered such a thing. I was concerned that if we withdrew from Bien Hoa that they may have indeed fired on us if we had asked for such support. In fact they never did and we never asked them for support. When it looked bad the embassy arranged that we had these landing crafts sent to Bien Hoa up the Dong Nai River.

Snepp, in his book, described that the CIA was somehow involved in arranging for these landing crafts and that's completely untrue. I was personally responsible for them. I arranged for the landing craft to be anchored at a naval station on the Dong Nai River. I told that to the Vietnamese naval commander there. In fact I met him in the refugee camp later and he reminded me how cooperative he had been with us on the barge issue. We kept these barges and they would have certainly been enough to take our staff and our dependents including the Vietnamese. We had ten of them and they were huge. Anyhow, eventually we were instructed by Saigon to release the barges and that if we were going to have an evacuation that we would go by air. At this stage the 18th corps was still stopping the advance of the main enemy force. The forces were coming down from the northeast. Every time the road was closed, the 25th division under General Ba reopened it which I thought was amazing. I was impressed by this tremendously. We had a break in coordination. Typically we had a lot of AID officers under the consulate general. The AID director in Saigon started giving instructions to our AID people. So we had our AID officers being told at one stage that they were going to be taken out by boat and then I was given orders to move the staff to Saigon. I sent word to them and said, no, that's the wrong place. We'd move to a building called USAID 2 and we'll meet there and we will arrange for an air evacuation. Let me back track. The moment all of this was happening, DAO, the defense attaché's office, was Homer Smith who was in Saigon. He was the senior military officer there. They quietly closed and they withdrew from the provinces. What we didn't know, they never told us. I thought they were all going into Saigon. We arranged unilaterally to have aircraft take the defense attachés back, including the Vietnamese and their dependents, to the Philippines. We did this without the ambassador's authorization or without the permission of the Philippine government or as far as I know without the permission of the Defense Department. What they did was they would draw out their staff piecemeal. They had all of these big containers from the commissary in Saigon. Our political staff people loaded the people into these containers. Then they put the containers on a truck and they shut them and put them in an Air Force cargo plane. They got most of their staff out that way without anybody including the ambassador knowing about it. I understand finally some Vietnamese secretary managed to get to a phone and called her mother somehow. She got through to her mother and said, "Guess what? We're now in the Philippines and all you have to do is go down to the commissary and get yourself in a container." Anyhow, the word spread quickly, that all these Vietnamese were in the Philippines. I understand that the ambassador was quite upset. I don't have any personal witness to that but Homer Smith was fired after that. We had to explain to the Philippine government how we had brought many thousands of Vietnamese into the Philippines without the agreement of the Philippine government. That was an event. Anyhow in the meantime I was very concerned about getting the American community out. Then our staff which had worked for us for many years and their dependents.

Q: You're talking about Vietnamese staff?

LAHIGUERA: The Vietnamese staff. As regards the American community, I'd had a consular officer go around to all the American civilians we knew were there and notified them to please leave. The Americans had no problem leaving if they wished. We were running flights out of Bien Hoa and they could go with their dependents. We arranged for passports and visas for dependents, wives and children of the Americans. In the third corps absolutely anybody who stayed in the third corps after the first of April was there because they wanted to be there regardless of what they said after. We had one fellow who was working in a Vietnamese mental hospital and he elected to stay and the Vietnamese eventually threw him out. Then we had some contractors who just couldn't give up the good life. The contractors maintained aircraft and that kind of thing. We did ship home a few wives and children who were basically Vietnamese. Sometimes the Americans were already gone, but we had the weddings recorded in the consular section and we had documented the children. On a couple of occasions the wives and children went to the States to meet the husband and his American wife and children, but that wasn't my problem. That happened, too. So, on the evacuation front, the Americans weren't a major problem. But what was a problem was what we were going to do about the Vietnamese staff and their families. The ambassador seemed very, very hesitant to make a decision and then he was obsessed with this idea of peace. I was very upset about this whole issue. Finally we were given permission to start moving the Vietnamese staff. We all met in this building in Saigon. We were told to pass the word to the staff in Bien Hoa, both provinces came down. They were in Bien Hoa and they all moved to Saigon.

Q: How did you go, by helicopter?

LAHIGUERA: No. When we left Bien Hoa we drove in a convoy, but the Vietnamese made it whatever way they could into Saigon because they were coming from Phuoc Long. The staff that had been in Phuoc Long were already there in Bien Hoa from the various provinces around Saigon. There was a coordinating group there. A USAID officer named Anderson was given the job of coordinating the evacuation of the Vietnamese staff. Each one of us represented our corps. We'd get space, each corps was given so much space and then they were asked to allot their space to designate who was going to be on that aircraft. I called the Vietnamese staff of the first corps together and I told them that I was going to evacuate people based on who had been in the most dangerous places and who politically were the most liable to be dealt with harshly by the communists. I asked if anybody had any objections or any other ideas. They all seemed to accept my approach. Our policy was that staff members and their families could go and children under the age of 18. You couldn't take out boys of military age. That was the rule. You could take out their mothers and fathers. So, we started moving them and taking them out to the airport. We had to load them aboard. I had a lot of difficulty at one point. My admin officer fled. He was an American. He got on the airplane without telling me. From what I understand he got his wife on the airplane and she wouldn't leave without him, so he felt he had to go. I didn't have his records. I didn't know the pay situation and I didn't even know whether he was dead or alive. He could have been captured. So I was worried about this. He certainly didn't help any. He got out. The CIA base chief went as well and he left his staff hanging in the forest. His associates did very well and they stayed in Bien Hoa. I understand his excuse was that he was afraid that his wife would have a nervous breakdown. She was in Bangkok, so he had to leave. He was later made the head of some important industry somewhere.

It was interesting to see how people behave in this situation. Anyhow, back in USAID 2, we were trying to divvy up the evacuees. Things came to a sudden stop. I had all my guards show up. We had about 100 guards and they were armed with clubs. These fellows didn't want us to leave. They wanted to get paid. The administrative officer took care of all this. We had bags of piasters. I'd been given a suitcase full of piasters when we rode on buses and when we came to roadblocks we had these piasters to give to police at the roadblocks so they wouldn't harass us and we'd get to go through. So, a fellow representing the first corps, a fellow called Paul Dailey, tried to figure out how much he thought the guards were getting. They had two months back pay. We came up with a number and I had all the guards line up. We had a big list made out with all the names on it and each man marched up. We gave the first two or three thousands of piasters and they all smiled. So, we knew that the amount was okay, that we were obviously overpaying them and so we managed to pay off all these guards with the bribe money and get them out of our way. Then we could go back to arranging the evacuation. One lesson I learned from the first flight: we were allotted seats and I was given something like 11 seats for one family. The family didn't show up. What happened was the grandmother decided she couldn't leave without her sister and she didn't want to leave without her mother, whatever. So, one wouldn't go and then everyone else wouldn't go and then nobody went. They all just stayed behind. So, I developed a system of backups where we would either say okay, you are going to meet at a certain place and each person was told who was going to be there and from that location you would be loaded on a bus and taken to the airport. Then we had x number of backups. The backups had to understand that they would only get a seat if somebody else didn't show up. That system actually worked out very well and so I didn't lose anymore seats. Thank God. We were able to ship out a fair number of the staff and their families. I only had, I suppose, about 60 people who wanted to leave. Some of them had families and some of them didn't. I guess about half of them out. Then the communist forces started the rocketing of Bien Hoa and some marines were killed. So we had to close the airbase, the airport. It was too risky. So, we decided to go back to the barges to evacuate the people. On the 29th I finally got word that we were going to move them. It was difficult to get the word out to them but we got the word to as many of them as we could find. They all went down on this pier. There were probably several thousand people. We were loading them into barges. I can remember there was a Vietnamese military police officer. They have this emblem PC which is their MP. This was a huge guy, I think he was a captain. He had medals down to his belt and he was directing traffic. It just struck me how people did what they were supposed to do regardless of how hopeless things were. The police were still functioning on the streets; the traffic police. Things were reasonably orderly. We had this big mob down at the pier. Then we were loading them onto the barges. I can remember one very good province chief and his wife was there. He had two or three children, but he was in uniform. He's one that I really admired, very solid and he came up to me and asked if it was possible for him to get on the barge. He reached up and he ripped the insignias off his uniform, dropping them over the side.

That really struck me. Then there was one of my local employees. After he got done loading, I turned to him and said are you going to get on? He said, no, I don't want to get on. I want to stay here. I took a key from one of our staff vehicles and said, you can take that vehicle over there, it's yours, good luck. He got in the vehicle and drove off. Then there was another little militia fellow. He had a rifle and just standing there keeping order. We were just about finished and we didn't have anyone else who wanted to get on the barge. I said do you want to get on the barge and he just looked up at me and said, no, this is my country, I'm staying here. It was very interesting and a horrible experience. Obviously I was disappointed that some local employees didn't get the word and didn't get down to the pier. We could have gotten everybody out. Anyhow, at that point I went back to the embassy with this fellow Paul Dailey from the first corps. The embassy, the streets were very quiet and very orderly and the police were still functioning. There was a quietness about the place and I didn't feel the hostility. But around the embassy there were a couple of thousand people. We had these big iron gates. The marines had been flown in I think from Okinawa. The marines made me more nervous than anybody else because the crowds was yelling. The marines didn't know whether they were going to get popped. I was afraid one of them was going to shoot somebody. Anyhow, we got back into the embassy. We got word that the president had ordered us to leave, everybody out by a certain time on the morning of the 30th. So, there were to be no Americans by 6:00 on April 30th. That came from the president. Graham Martin had asked whether people would be willing to stay. I had volunteered to stay with other members of the staff, but that present direction canceled that idea. A general, Big Minh, had taken over as president. He was the third president in a week. I think we had conveyed the message to him that we were willing to leave a skeleton staff at the embassy to negotiate some sort of relationship or whatever. The communist authorities got word back to him that we were to all leave. After that we closed the operation. I never felt threatened by the communists. It was clear to me that they were going to allow us to get out. I think that they didn't want to give any cause for us not to move our forces out.. So, they had halted on the outskirts, but they weren't pushing in. They were going to let us get out. It was just obvious. So, I remember coming up to the gate and there was this huge mob surrounding it. The only place that there was any activity. We had to figure out how to get in. We had a couple of locals with us. We got the attention of the marines, hey, you know, we're Americans, we're on the staff. Okay, come around the gate on the side and we're going to open that gate up and we're going to let you in. So, we went around to that gate. We thought at the time that we might be able to get more people in, but we didn't. I can remember there was a huge marine sergeant, staff sergeant or a master sergeant, he had a lot of stripes and he was a big guy. They had this little side gate and he said to the Vietnamese employees, you tell all the people around there that I'm going to open this gate and I'm going to put my fist out and the first person to step through this gate that I don't authorize is going to get this fist down his throat. He's standing there with his fist drawn and we four marched in and he slammed the gate shut and nobody moved near that gate. That's how we got back into the compound and we went back to reporting. At this point, Mark Garrett, the security officer finally struck and, without the ambassador's authorization, cut down this damn tree.

Q: That tree, I know the tree.

LAHIGUERA: Yes. We got rid of this tree. They brought in this large helicopter to land. The Americans were being evacuated off the top of the roof. But the Vietnamese were being evacuated by these large aircraft on the ground. I went to the back of the compound with Dailey. We got up on the wall and we had all these marine guards on the wall. They were just kids and looking very nervous and making me nervous. We looked over the wall. There was this mass of Vietnamese people screaming and waving. In the crowd we recognized some of our staff. So, we pulled some of them up over the wall. We told the marine guards these were our employees. Then we went back and forth. We got several of them over the wall. Then finally the order came down that we had to leave. There was going to be a lot of turmoil. They forced us away from the wall. We went in and then that's when I was told I had to leave. I really felt shitty. I felt we were running away from a third rate government, a communist force. That was just something I never thought I'd see in my life. So, I stayed there until they finally told me I should get on a helicopter. I had some sort of a weapon. The drill was to throw your weapon on a pile before you got on the helicopter. I had an automatic revolver. I wasn't going to go anywhere without that thing, without some sort of protection. You didn't know whether the helicopter was going to be shot down. So we got onto the helicopter and I remember flying off, it was late on the 29th. I remember landing on the Blue Ridge.

Q: This is a command check spot off the coast of South Vietnam?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. I can still remember the flight. We went over the logistics centers near Bien Hoa. They were all burning. You could see the fires for miles. It was very awesome. When we got out to the ship. I only had the clothes I was wearing. I didn't have my passport. I didn't have any money. I had my ID card and my State Department ID card and a few dollars. Just the suit I was wearing. I remember they searched me when I stepped off. They extracted my automatic revolver. They said I had to register it with them and could come and get it some other time. I never did. I'd brought flags out from Bien Hoa. I also had some piasters. I was carrying them in case we had to bribe police to let our staff go. I still had the flags. I had four flags. I had them in a little cellophane bag. I have them at home now and the piasters. I still have them stuck somewhere at home. I went down to the war room and I saw General Ky. That really upset and infuriated me. I have nothing against any Vietnamese getting out, but he had been on the radio a couple of nights before calling on every loyal red-blooded Vietnamese to fight the communists invaders down to the last man. That no true Vietnamese would desert his country in its hour of need. I wondered how many poor kids listened to this bloke out followed his advice. Then he got on that helicopter and fled. I was pretty unhappy with him. On board the ship I was bunked with Tom Polgar who was the CIA chief and with this woman, Burke, who was the consul general in Saigon. We were all sort of stuck together in this room. I was exhausted. I remember somebody shaking me and saying the ambassador is flying aboard, would you like to come up on the deck? I asked him sarcastically, is it washed? I still remember when the ambassador came on board. He had his valet and his damn dog. Here I had lost a lot of my employees because he never got around to being able to decide when to get the staff out, but he could get his dog out. I tell you if I had half a chance to throw that dog over the side, I would have done it. I was pretty unhappy about his dog getting on and members of my staff didn't.

I remember eating dinner that first night. We were eating spaghetti. I had an AID officer with me, Joe Deveier, a very dedicated officer who was with the third corps. Mr. Polgar joined us and he was rather bald. Polgar started to tell us about the problems of this friendly police commander of the Vietnamese police force. This poor police commander had left and he hadn't gotten his art collection out. I had visions of spaghetti dripping down that bald head. I put my arm on my friend Deveier's leg to restrain him. We quickly concluded dinner and walked away. Here we had just left staff behind and this guy's worrying about some guy who didn't get his art collection out. This was part of the difference between the fellows in Saigon and the people out in the field. I didn't feel they had proper concerns for the Vietnamese staff. I remember I had one previous encounter with personnel about evacuating people. I spoke to the personnel officer at the embassy before we started the evacuation. I met this woman and I told her how many people we had. She said, "Oh no, you only have two regular employees, regular staffers, all the rest of those people are just contract." I said, to her, "You know the communists aren't going to ask about whether they were contract or not before they execute them." This sort of distinction just boggled me.

JAMES R. BULLINGTON
Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1973-1975)

Ambassador James R. Bullington was born in Tennessee in 1940, and received his BA from Auburn University in 1962, when he entered the Foreign Service. His assignments abroad include Hue, Saigon, Quang Tri, Chiang Mai, Mandalay, Rangoon, N'Djamena and Contonou, with an ambassadorship to Burundi. In 2001 Ambassador Bullington was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

BULLINGTON: Back to the Vietnam business. This was 1973, with the Paris Agreement. They needed lots of people with Vietnam experience to work both in Vietnam and on Vietnamese affairs in Washington. I ended up in the latter category, on the Vietnam desk in the State Department.

Q: Sort of like the tar baby, you couldn't get away from it.

BULLINGTON: Yes. After learning Thai and two years in Chiang-Mai, the idea was that I would move to the Embassy for the next two years. But that didn't happen because they decided they needed people with Vietnam experience and I was tapped.

Q: Now you were there from '73 to?

BULLINGTON: Through the fall of Vietnam, '73 to '75. It was called the Vietnam Working Group, basically the Vietnam desk in the State Department.

Q: Who was in charge of the group?

BULLINGTON: Bob Wenzel was the director. Ammon Bartley was the deputy director. There were seven, eight officers and three secretaries.

Q: What were you doing?

BULLINGTON: I was the internal political officer, looking at internal political affairs in South Vietnam. Elections, political parties, those sorts of things. We had an economics guy, an external political guy, a political-military officer, a few others.

Q: What was happening internally?

BULLINGTON: The main focus was on the evolution of the situation under the peace agreement. There was supposed to be a cease-fire, but neither side observed it very well, and each was trying to consolidate its hold wherever there was gray area, disputed area. We dealt a lot with Congress, the public and the anti-war movement. I spent a lot of time writing responses to Congressional committees. I wrote speeches for Ellsworth Bunker. We were also focused on the continuing negotiations in Paris, and supported the delegation over there. A lot of our analyses were about whether the South Vietnamese were going to be able to continue to resist in the situation that was brought about by the Paris Agreement.

Q: As you went in there and started looking at that, what was your impression of the strength or lack thereof of the South Vietnamese?

BULLINGTON: I had no strong opinions on it one way or another at first. I'd been off in Chiang Mai for a couple of years, and in Thai language training before that. I'd read the newspapers, but I'd really lost touch with what was going on in Vietnam. So I really hadn't focused on Vietnam for three years, and things had changed dramatically. I came to believe after a few months that the South Vietnamese could have held on and eventually a Korea type solution might have emerged; but as time went on and U.S. support declined they were getting weaker rather than stronger, and the enemy was getting stronger rather than weaker. Pretty soon the balance tilted, and it was clear that the North Vietnamese were not willing to settle for less than the whole of Vietnam. It also became apparent, particularly for someone in Washington working on Vietnamese affairs, twenty hours a day it seemed like, that the United States was no longer politically willing or able to sustain South Vietnam. That's eventually what happened. We assured their defeat by cutting our military and economic support to insufficient levels. I made a couple of trips back to look at the situation on the ground, one in December of '73, the other and more important one in December of '74, and again I spent a lot of time in northern South Vietnam where I had worked, but also in some other places including Saigon and the Mekong Delta. Putting together what I had learned in Washington with what I saw was going on in Vietnam, it became evident to me that the end was nigh. The Embassy would not admit that. Graham Martin was the Ambassador then, and was in my view out of touch with reality, both in the United States and in Vietnam. There was no indication that the Embassy realized the gravity of the situation and how near we were already to the total loss of South Vietnam, or the political impossibility of a U.S. rescue. I still can't understand why they didn't see it, why everybody didn't see it. It was clear if you looked at just the logistics picture. I got the figures from the Pentagon, of how much ammunition and spare parts and POL and everything necessary to fight a war, how much of it we were sending into South Vietnam, and how much they were using up, and it didn't balance. Even at the level of warfare that was going on in December of '74, the South Vietnamese were using it up at such a rate that you could see the end. Probably before late '75, or certainly by early '76, they would run out of bullets, quite literally. And if - as I saw to be almost a certainty - the North Vietnamese launched a major offensive as soon as they perceived this growing South Vietnamese weakness, then the end would come a lot quicker than that. The evidence of this was everywhere when I visited Vietnam in December '74. The artillery tubes that were limited to one or two rounds a night because they didn't have enough ammunition, the soldiers that went out on patrol with only one hand grenade because there weren't enough to issue them more. VNAF, the Vietnamese Air Force, was essentially grounded for lack of spare parts and POL. I put that together with the economic troubles and declining morale. And no army, no army fights to the last bullet, literally. The South Vietnamese officers that I talked to clearly saw what was happening. They said 'You, our allies, are not giving us the support we must have to handle the situation that we are facing. And if the North Vietnamese attack, we won't be able to contain them.' So what happens in such a situation is that morale collapses before they literally get down to the last bullet. That's what did happen shortly thereafter, in the spring of 1975, when the NVA launched a major offensive and the South Vietnamese army basically collapsed. I wrote a paper when I got back from that trip, this would have been the final days of December or the first few days of January in '75, and gave it to Phil Habib, who was Assistant Secretary for East Asia. Although I didn't know it at the time, he gave it to Kissinger, and Kissinger read it and apparently thought it meritorious, because in his memoirs published four or five years ago, the volume of his memoirs on his service under the Ford Administration, he quoted my memo at some length. I was proud of that. I was the only career FSO, I think, to have a paper quoted in that volume of his memoirs. He said something to the effect that at least a few people recognized what was coming and warned that South Vietnam was about to fall, and one of them was Jim Bullington. Then he quoted the memo. I was pleased that somebody heard my warning; but it didn't make any difference in the end.

Q: Were you working on this when Vietnam collapsed?

BULLINGTON: Yes.

Q: What were you all doing?

BULLINGTON: The main thing I was personally concerned about was trying to get the Embassy and others to take action to save the South Vietnamese for whom I felt we were responsible, especially the Foreign Service National employees. There were three or four of us mid-level officers, Lionel Rosenblatt was one of them, I guess he was in INR at the time, and somebody else, I can't think of his name, but this guy went to Vietnam with Lionel.

Q: Yes.

BULLINGTON: You know who I'm talking about.

Q: Oh, yes, I do.

BULLINGTON: Yes. He was in the Executive Secretariat, I think. Anyway, the three of us and maybe there was one or two others involved, but basically the three of us formed a sort of cabal, trying to get the U.S. government to do the right thing by the South Vietnamese to whom we had special obligations. We really worked on that as much as we could. Lionel and this other guy ended up just taking off and going back to Vietnam without authorization and trying to save our Vietnamese friends on a retail basis, one by one. I didn't feel like I could do that, but I did everything I possibly could to move the Department, to move the Embassy and Graham Martin, to get them to take action on evacuating these people. And it was like moving a mountain, I'll tell you. Graham Martin did not want to be moved.

Q: Was there any talk that you heard of getting them out of there?

BULLINGTON: We certainly talked about it. We literally thought that he had lost touch with reality. Not that he was insane, but what he said and what the Embassy was reporting was so different from our perception of what was actually going on, we seriously discussed whether or not he had lost touch with reality. We told that to a lot of people, and we worked with Phil Habib and other senior officers, trying to convince them of that. But of course they felt like they had to listen to their representative on the spot, as opposed to these midlevel officers in Washington. So I don't think our view ever prevailed, but we may have affected the situation a little bit at the margins.

Q: Was there an apparatus set before the final collapse as they were going to have a hell of a lot of people coming, are we going to do something about it.

BULLINGTON: I called for it in memos; I even came up with some numbers. A million people or more would be in immediate and grave danger with the collapse of the South Vietnamese government, people to whom we had a moral obligation. There was just a total resistance in the Embassy and the Department to, number one, accepting that it was going to happen. They would not believe that South Vietnam was about to fall. And number two, that we were obliged to do anything about these people even if it did. So that was a very, very uphill struggle. We left lots of good people behind, and we were slow in preparing to assist those who did get out, mostly on their own and with no help from us.

Q: This is one of the things that really struck me about all the touchy-feely who were concerned about our involvement in the war and all the people there, and all of a sudden when there was a real crisis, they washed their hands and went away, they washed their hands even before because once we stopped drafting college kids, the protests went down.

BULLINGTON: Absolutely. They didn't care about the South Vietnamese people. They were not their friends. I expected that of the anti-war movement. But I didn't expect it of the State Department and the Ford Administration, but that's basically the policy we got at first. Eventually they came around.

Q: Did you get involved? When the collapse came was there a moment when everybody says "It's gone?" I mean like when Da Nang fell or something like that?

BULLINGTON: Well, I had predicted in December it was coming. And so as it started, when the first province capital fell, I guess that was in February, and the South Vietnamese couldn't take it back, this to me just confirmed what I had said in my December memo, and I wrote that at the time. When Quang Tri and Hue fell, and the best South Vietnamese units, the Marines and a big part of the Airborne and the First Division, fell along with them, that should have made it as clear as it could be to anybody knowledgeable about Vietnam that the end was at hand. But Graham Martin kept talking about how they would draw a perimeter around Saigon and the Mekong Delta and defend that and hold on. That seemed to me totally out of touch with reality.

Q: Did you get any feel for how Kissinger responded to this?

BULLINGTON: No, I never did. I never talked to him personally during that period, and I didn't know what his real feelings were. I hoped that he could see what was happening, but I just didn't know. Of course they had to deal with Congress at that level. They were getting a lot of pressure from the Congress not to do anything, to even suggest that we were going back in to save the situation.

Q: Was there, I mean was anybody passing out in the State Department at some point an alert and say 'Here it comes. It's going down the tubes and we're going to have refugees, and we're going to have this and that.' I'm talking about sort of official..

BULLINGTON: Not beyond me and Lionel and a couple of others at lower levels. There was a guy in the Agency in Saigon named Frank Snepp who was giving some of those kinds of warnings as well. But at the senior level, no. Nothing. At least that I was aware of.

Q: Craig Johnstone is the other guy. Well, when the thing collapsed, what did your working group do?

BULLINGTON: We were just trying to focus on issues like setting up the refugee camps and moving the refugees off the boats to Guam, what would happen to the Vietnamese Embassy here, the government's assets, just sweeping up the mess basically.

Q: Did you get any particular part of it?

BULLINGTON: I worked on setting up some of the refugee camps, but I was approaching the end of my tour, and that summer, a couple of months after Saigon fell on April 30th, 1975, I left.

WOLFGANG J. LEHMANN
Consul General
Can Tho (1973-1974)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Saigon (1974-1975)

Wolfgang J. Lehmann was born in Germany in 1921. He joined the Department of State in 1949 and served in Switzerland, Austria, Belgium, Germany, and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Robert Martens in 1988.

Q: Wolf Lehmann went to Vietnam in June 1973, initially as Consul General in the city of Can Tho, which is located in the Mekong Delta. He then went to Saigon in March 1974 as Deputy Chief of Mission to Ambassador Graham Martin. For frequent periods he was Charge d' Affaires during that 13 months or so prior to the final fall of Saigon on April 30, 1975.

This period from the time that Mr. Lehmann arrived in Vietnam was one in which support for the war in the United States was declining. We were getting into the beginning of the second Nixon Administration. Watergate was opening severe wounds in the American body politic.

As time went on and as public support for the war declined, the difficulty of gaining material support from Congress for the South Vietnamese Government was increasing drastically, as well. This was a time, of course, when there were no American military forces in the country. These had long been withdrawn. This was a period when it was still hoped that somehow the South Vietnamese Government would be able to maintain its independence from the communist North Vietnam.

With that background, I believe we are in a position to begin the interview.

There were many opinions as to why South Vietnam -- that is, the Republic of Vietnam -- ceased to exist at the end of April 1975. Some people claim that the fate of Vietnam was sealed from the very moment that the Paris agreements were signed in December 1972 over the strong objections of President Thieu, and that all that really remained was the so-called decent interval before the end. Do you agree with that view?

LEHMANN: I think the Paris accords were severely deficient in several respects, but I don't agree that with the signing of the accords the end was preordained to be what it eventually came to be at the end of April 1975.

The agreement was, indeed, deficient, in certainly two major respects, the most important of which was that it allowed the North Vietnamese Army to remain in South Vietnam.

Another deficiency was the fiction that there existed something called the PRG, the People's Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam, and that we accepted the notion that this fictitious entity was a legitimate party to the Paris agreements. That, incidentally, is why we at the embassy, whenever we had to refer to the PRG, we always put it in quotes. We never let it stand on its own as we would for the DRV, which was the formal official title of North Vietnam.

Hanoi certainly considered the Paris accords to be a victory for them and publicly said so after the fall of South Vietnam. Nevertheless, I don't believe that the end was inevitable. Everything depended on whether the United States and South Vietnam were able and willing -- and I want to underscore "willing" -- and primarily the United States, would insist that the agreement be carried out as written.

It was particularly important that the United States show willingness to back up that insistence with some sort of force if that should become necessary. That would not necessarily have meant the re-introduction of American ground forces, but certainly the possible reintroduction of American air power was a factor in the background. Of course, that did not come to be.

Immediately after the Paris agreements went into effect, Congress, at the initiative of Senator Church, prohibited the reintroduction of U.S. combat forces into Vietnam. That bit of Congressional myopia -- or worse -- left us very little leverage to insist that Hanoi honor the terms of the agreement. In fact, our aid to the Republic of Vietnam, both military and economic, was progressively reduced very soon after the agreements came into effect, and U.S. intervention, of course, became increasingly remote as a political crisis developed in Washington, a crisis that eventually led to the Nixon resignation.

Q: I believe that, on the other hand, Soviet and Chinese aid was continuing, or at least Soviet aid. Could you comment on the extent of that support and the contrast between that flow of communist aid to North Vietnam and the decrease in aid by the United States to the Republic of South Vietnam?

LEHMANN: Both Soviet and Chinese, especially Soviet aid, was continuing at a very heavy pace. The agreement had a provision in it that both sides could replace military items -- ammunition, hardware etc. -- on a one-for-one basis in South Vietnam. We never did that, because we never had adequate budgetary facilities to actually replace military items lost by the South Vietnamese during that sort of lower-intensity period of conflict that went on in 1973 and 1974. Moreover, the restriction did not apply to North Vietnam.

There was absolutely no way of ensuring the other side's compliance with that particular provision. It was simply disregarded. Hanoi did not permit the ICCS -- the International Commission for Control and Supervision -- to exercise its authority in that regard even if it had wanted to. Hanoi did not agree to the requirement, also stipulated in the Paris agreements, that there should be established certain entry points through which this one-for-one replacement of ammunition and other military items would be monitored. So these were never established, except on our side.

Q: There may well have been two or three times as much as the authorized one-for-one level coming in, for all anyone knows, at least more than the mere replacement flow of materiel.

LEHMANN: Oh, it was far more than that. The magnitude of the amount of ammunition, military equipment, trucks and weapons was even alluded to by General Van Tien Dung, who was the North Vietnamese commander who eventually conquered the South. When you read his account, which was first published in Nhan Dan, the Hanoi newspaper, in serial fashion and later as a book, when you read his account, he speaks of thousands of trucks and guns being moved to the South on the Ho Chi Minh Trail Network. No, it was never honored at all by them.

Q: Going back to the broader course of the war and the situation in both Washington and Asia, you've been quoted as saying that the reason why the war ended in a North Vietnamese military victory at the time it did -- that is in April 1975 -- was Watergate. Would you comment further on that?

LEHMANN: Hanoi, of course, had never given up the idea of eventually conquering the South.

As far as they were concerned, it was a question as to when and how. We knew there were differences of opinion in the Hanoi leadership during the period of 1973 and well into 1974 as to what should be given priority. The question that was facing them at the time -- and we had a fairly good reading on that from our admittedly fragmentary intelligence, but a fairly good capacity for making an accurate estimate -- the question facing them was whether they should divert resources to deal with their serious, domestic internal problems, and put eventual unification of the country under their control on a longer term basis -- Asiatics think in long terms, very long terms -- or whether they should go for broke quickly and force an early solution. They had quite an argument about that.

President Nixon resigned in early August of 1974. That was followed within a week by a drastic reduction of U.S. military assistance to South Vietnam, mandated by Congress. In fact, the vote that reduced the amount down to $700 million, which was less than half of what we had been using earlier, and much of that $700 million wasn't really available, a point I will elaborate on later on, that vote was preceded by a vote on a resolution that all military aid to South Vietnam should be cut off. And 26 members of the United States Senate voted to cut off all aid immediately. These were the facts that led to a decision by the Hanoi leadership to undertake a large-scale massive offensive operation in 1975 in an effort to end the war on their terms.

Q: And take advantage of this situation?

LEHMANN: Hanoi's decision was based on its evaluation of the political situation in the United States. They concluded, that given the political situation in Washington resulting from the Watergate crisis, the United States would not effectively intervene. At the embassy in Saigon, in a message that I sent to Washington as Charge at the time, on August 13, 1974, we said that what had been happening in Washington -- primarily in the form of the drastic reduction of military assistance to South Vietnam -- would lead to a political decision by Hanoi to make an all out military effort to conquer the South. And we were quite correct in that estimate.

Q: You certainly were.

LEHMANN: As far as we were able to ascertain, the decision must have been made in early September of 1974. Subsequently, General Dung, in his account called The Great Spring Victory, confirmed publicly after the end of the war that the decision was made about that time and was ratified by a meeting of the Political Bureau and the Central Military Party Committee in North Vietnam in early October. So the full scenario which led to the political decision by Hanoi in early fall 1974 to make an all out military effort in early 1975 was precipitated by the political crisis in the United States in the summer of 1974.

Q: Was there any reaction to your message?

LEHMANN: No, nor, being cynical did I really expect any. Our message began with a summarized assessment of the military situation we were in because of the reduction in the DAV Program. General John Murray, who was the Defense Attaché at the time, worked out that part for me and sent it in in greater detail to the Pentagon. On the technical side there were some interesting points, including the fact that we thought the Vietnam program was being double charged for the procurement of F-5 aircraft for the Vietnamese Air Force and that the American military services had a habit of charging large amounts of the appropriation to overhead costs, usually designated as PCH and T -- which stands for packing, crating, handling and transportation -- leaving little for guns, bullets and training. But, the really important part of the message was that what Congress was doing was to signal to Hanoi that it could proceed with a military option to win the war and that the United States did not have the will to stand in its way.

Q: You mentioned that there was a conference in Hanoi during which the decision was ratified to enter into an all-out offensive against the South and try to complete the conquest. Did you find any further confirmation of that as time went on?

LEHMANN: We did, but only after General Dung published the piece I referred to before. That account includes a very interesting statement on how important Hanoi's appraisal of the political situation in Washington was in its decision-making process. It's a very revealing statement. He says, "The internal contradictions of the U.S. administration and among political parties had intensified. The Watergate scandal had seriously affected the entire United States and precipitated the resignation of an extremely reactionary President -- Nixon. The United States faced economic recession, mounting inflation, serious unemployment and an oil crisis. Also, the U.S. allies were not on good terms with the United States. U.S. AID to the Saigon puppet administration was decreasing." Then he goes on to say -- and quotes from the resolution that was adopted by that particular conference, which says, "Having already withdrawn from the South, the United States could hardly jump back in, and no matter how it might intervene, it would be unable to save the Saigon administration from collapse."

There are numerous other references in this account illustrating just how decisively the political crisis in the U.S. figured in the North Vietnamese decision-making process.

Q: Are you saying, in effect, then, that if it had not been for Watergate, the South Vietnamese regime would have survived, and South Vietnam would exist today as an independent country?

LEHMANN: Not necessarily. What I'm saying is the outcome would not have been what it was at the time that it took place. Certainly, that South Vietnam would have survived as an independent entity is within the realm of possibility, but no more than that. So all I'm really saying is you would not have seen that particular outcome at that particular time at the end of April 1975 that we did see. It would have been something different.

Q: You mentioned earlier that the Soviet Union and, to a lesser extent, I suppose, China was continuing to supply the North Vietnamese forces at a very high rate, in spite of the fall-off in support by the United States. Can you talk a little bit about the Soviet role more generally, in addition to the supply issue? Did the Soviet Union have an effect on the North Vietnamese decision-making process, for example?

LEHMANN: Oh, it certainly did. I don't think there is any question about that. There was historical precedent for that. In the spring of 1972, about a week before the North Vietnamese Easter Offensive kicked off in an earlier phase of the war, a large Soviet mission, headed by the then-Soviet Deputy Defense Minister, Mr. Vapiski, visited Hanoi. They played a role in the decision on that particular operation. There was a repeat of that in 1974, when the Soviet Deputy Chief of Staff, General Kulikov, who later became the Warsaw Pact commander in Europe headed a very large mission to Hanoi about a week or so before Christmas 1974. That followed an earlier trip by a big North Vietnamese military delegation to Moscow in November. Now, Kulikov didn't come to Hanoi to sing Christmas carols in the streets of the city, a phrase, incidentally, I put into a cable I sent at the time on that particular event. It was obvious that Kulikov came to Hanoi with that delegation to wrap up final details regarding the decision to proceed with the offensive which had reached the point of no return, and to wrap up arrangements for Soviet military assistance and support of the operation.

It is ironical that these events should be taking place at about the very time that President Ford and Secretary Kissinger met with the Russians at Vladivostok, in November, at about the time when the North Vietnamese military delegation visited Moscow and about a month before Kulikov reciprocated the visit with his delegation to Hanoi. One of the things that has always troubled me is that the word "Vietnam" was not mentioned by anybody at the Vladivostok summit meeting.

Q: You discussed the Soviet role. The Chinese role was less important, obviously. But I recall from my own time in INR a few years earlier that the Chinese, during the height of the Cultural Revolution, had interfered with the transit of Soviet supplies by rail overland to Vietnam. Can you comment on the way in which the Chinese were trying to counter Soviet influence by providing supplies of their own, the extent to which they might have been hindering the Soviets, and the degree to which the Soviets were bringing in supplies both overland and by other means, say by ship, to Haiphong or by air?

LEHMANN: Most military and other AID reached North Vietnam by ship and air, rather than overland. As near as we could tell, the Chinese were in somewhat of a quandary. On one hand, as you remarked, they wanted to preserve influence in Hanoi. On the other hand, they were quite disturbed by the situation. I believe, but do not recall for certain, that some Soviet items reached North Vietnam overland, but only after much delay. In the middle of 1974 the Chinese suddenly grabbed the South Vietnamese claimed Paracel Islands. That did not sit well either in Hanoi or Saigon.

Q: They were very much preoccupied with the Soviet threat on their northern border.

LEHMANN: That's correct. As to Vietnam, ideology said they should help the Socialist brethren but reality and history said the Vietnamese would be a problem. So, they decided to take advantage of the situation and enforce their claim to the Paracels.

Q: At one point you mentioned the International Commission for Control and Supervision, that is, the ICCS, and alluded to the fact that even if it had wanted to do something in regard to Soviet supplies, it probably couldn't, but the implication was that the ICCS probably didn't want to anyway. Do you want to comment a little bit further on the role of the ICCS? Mention what it is first. Some listeners might not realize its composition.

LEHMANN: The ICCS, the International Commission for Control and Supervision, was part of the Paris agreements. It was the kind of thing that Americans are generally fond of as a solution to problems. It had been tried in Indochina at an earlier stage. It hadn't worked then and didn't work in 1973 to 1975. It was composed originally of Canada, Indonesia, Poland, and Hungary.

The Canadians gave up when they saw that it couldn't work, that the North Vietnamese, the Poles and Hungarians wouldn't allow it to work. The Canadians left it in the fall of 1973. I was sorry to see them go, but I certainly didn't blame them for concluding that they would not be part of a farce.

In addition to being ineffective as a mechanism to enforce compliance with the Paris accords, the Hungarians and Poles - especially the Hungarians - played an intelligence role on behalf of North Vietnam. Regardless of whatever differences exist between the Hungarians and Poles on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other, there is very little doubt that their intelligence and security services cooperate very closely with the Soviet intelligence and security services - they are almost part of it - and by extension, in this case, with North Vietnam.

One of the most embarrassing things I had to go through repeatedly was to urge the government of South Vietnam to pay its contribution to support the ICCS. It was ridiculous, but I suppose one of the things that the people in our business are called upon to do from time to time.

Q: Do you think there might be some lessons in this experience in regard to other places in the world, maybe Central America?

LEHMANN: I think if there's any lesson in it, the one I would immediately urge is, "Don't do it unless you are reasonably confident that the parties really wish to observe the terms of whatever they agreed to." If there's no political will to abide by an agreement, a mechanism of this type cannot substitute for the absence of that will.

Q: Up to now, we've discussed the ending of the Vietnam War largely in terms of the lack of will in the United States, the effect of Watergate, and the subsequent changes in North Vietnamese strategies as Hanoi became more optimistic regarding the much lower degree of support that would be available to the South. Perhaps it's now time to shift to what the situation on the ground was within South Vietnam. And perhaps an area on which to begin would be the economic situation in the South.

LEHMANN: The economic situation in the South in the last two and some years, 1973-74 and early '75, and especially in the beginning, was certainly difficult, but also one in which the Vietnamese demonstrated extraordinary resilience. In 1973, the first year when the Paris agreements were in effect, the Vietnamese economy was hit by three developments. First, there were the economic repercussions of the withdrawal of all American forces from Vietnam. Those forces had, in a sense, been a boost to the economy by virtue of the money that the people spent in the country. It was largely eliminated by late 1972 and nonexistent from 1973 on. Second, there was the world-wide inflation, which drove up prices for the Vietnamese and cut down the purchasing value of every dollar of U.S. economic assistance and the smaller non-American aid projects being carried out in the country.

Finally, there was the 1973 oil crisis and oil shock which brought sharp increases in petroleum prices. That, in turn, had effects on agriculture, on transportation, on such other industries like fishing, where you use motorboats. It also substantially reduced the value of every United States military assistance dollar that went into POL for the South Vietnamese forces.

By the end of 1973 and January 1974, the South Vietnamese economy had hit bottom. The curve began to flatten out early in 1974. There were dire predictions at one point that there would be a rice crisis in Saigon in late 1973 and 1974, which would lead to riots in the streets. That did not come off. The government managed the rice supply situation rather well, with some advice and assistance from us, but they managed it quite well.

By the fall of 1974, the agribusiness and rural credit system, which had been developed particularly in the Mekong Delta was operating very well. There was indeed a good prospect that Vietnam would regain self-sufficiency in rice in 1975, and certainly in 1976. In early 1975, just as full scale North Vietnamese military operations began to get under way, we could look forward to a small rice export surplus for South Vietnam, had it not been for the military situation.

Along with that, there were other developments. There was exploratory offshore drilling for oil, starting in early 1974, which rapidly showed that the prospects for commercially exploitable petroleum were very good indeed. In fact, those operations had progressed to the point where in January and February 1975 the major companies involved in those exploratory projects wanted to discuss production arrangements with the South Vietnamese Government. Of course, all of that came to nothing because of the military situation.

Q: We've talked about the internal economic situation in South Vietnam. Why don't we continue now to discuss the internal political situation.

LEHMANN: The government of President Thieu was politically quite stable. Compared to some previous experiences during earlier periods in Vietnam, including earlier periods of our involvement -especially after the U.S. supported 1962 coup against Ngo Diem - it was a model of stability. The picture created and systematically fostered by the well-organized and well-financed anti-Vietnam lobby in the United States was that of a despotic regime which brutally suppressed all legitimate political opposition and the press and engaged in wholesale arrests and detentions of what were alleged to be tens and hundreds of thousands of political prisoners. But of course, this was not true at all.

Certainly Vietnam, nor any other Asian country, can be expected to run a kind of New England-style town meeting democracy - especially in war time - which is what a lot of Americans think foreigners ought to do. What existed in South Vietnam at that time was a rather free-wheeling, open society, complete with good points and some that were not so good. For example, there were 26 newspapers in Saigon being published at that time -- 26 -- most of them utterly irresponsible. That was reduced to one after April 30, 1975, and it indeed was fully responsible and was printing only what it was told to print.

Q: Yes.

LEHMANN: Of course, there were people who didn't like President Thieu. There were dissidents whose importance in the South Vietnamese political picture was vastly exaggerated by their American supporters. The groups with some real political underpinnings were largely sectarian, and they supported the government in some ways and opposed or pressed their sectarian interests in others. They were groups like the Cao Dai, the Dai Viet, the Hoa Hao and various Buddhists. The other so called "dissidents" of whom American liberals were so fond, and in whom they professed to see hope for "reconciliation" with the North, were usually people without any political base whatever. In some cases they were North Vietnamese or Viet Cong agents.

Q: Beyond the discussion of Thieu's position and stability, a lot of comments have been made in this country about the degree of corruption in South Vietnam. Was corruption as manifest as has been stated, and was it a factor that so severely weakened the South Vietnamese cause that there was not much hope for their being able to forestall the North Vietnamese?

LEHMANN: The answer to that, in short, is yes, there was some corruption in South Vietnam. There is corruption in many other countries. There is corruption in Vietnam today. Sometimes what we, according to our rules, call corruption is an accepted practice in Asia or other parts of the world where it doesn't necessarily go under that heading.

A wartime situation always exacerbates corruption to a certain extent. It did so in the United States in World War II. In Italy during World War II - I served there - truck loads, even convoy loads of military supplies such as food and gasoline disappeared into the black market at times.

In Vietnam, the fact that you had a war going on, even a relatively low intensity conflict in 1973 and most of 1974, didn't help the situation. But the notion that "corruption" in the South was the reason for North Vietnam's victory, or even a significant contributing factor, is sheer nonsense.

Q: Why don't we turn now to the South Vietnamese military. There is a picture in some quarters in this country that the South Vietnamese Army was really not very good. Corruption again is mentioned in this respect. It certainly did not have the reputation that the South Korean military had. The picture, if one goes back far enough, is of American troops having to do the whole thing in the days when we were involved, the South Vietnamese weren't so good.

On the other hand, there have been other reports to the contrary, that the South Vietnamese had built up their military, that they did have some very good troops.

What if the ammunition problem and the resupply problem had not been so difficult? What if the South Vietnamese had indeed been getting a steady stream of equipment and ammunition and supplies from the United States? Would they have been capable of sustaining themselves against the awesome North Vietnamese Army?

LEHMANN: The bottom line on that one is that the ARVN, as well as the Vietnamese Air Force and Navy, performed just about like other military forces including, incidentally, the ROKs during the Korean war. Some times the performance was very good, at times not so good and at others average. That, by the way is also the judgement of General Bruce Palmer in his book, "The 25 Year War." The most professional, authoritative account of the military action from January 1973 to the end on April 30, 1975, including the ARVN's performance is contained in a publication of the U.S. Army's Center of Military History entitled "Vietnam from Cease-Fire to Capitulation" written by former Colonel Bill Le Gro who was with us in Vietnam during my entire tour there.

Over the years of "Vietnamization", the South Vietnamese military had become increasingly capable of doing the job for themselves and confident of their ability to do so.

I go back now to the North Vietnamese Spring Offensive, the so-called Easter Offensive, in 1972, the one I referred to earlier when talking about the Soviet role. There was very severe fighting in Military Region I, up around Quang Tri. Initially, the South Vietnamese were indeed driven back and defeated, but they managed to recover the position eventually. Admittedly, they did so with substantial American air support, but it was only American air support. The ground fighting was done by the South Vietnamese.

From that time on until the Paris agreements came into effect eight months later, virtually all the fighting, again with the occasional exception of U.S. air support, was done by the South Vietnamese and very effectively.

When the Paris agreements were about to come into effect in January of 1973, the North Vietnamese attempted a major land grabbing operation in an effort to get control of as much key territory as possible. A major event took place in the northern part of the Mekong Delta, when the North Vietnamese attacked and briefly occupied the town of Tan Chau, which is an active agricultural rural and commercial center close to the Cambodian border in the northern part of the Delta. Well, that effort was dealt with entirely by the South Vietnamese, who defeated the North Vietnamese and reoccupied all South Vietnamese territory in that area.

After the Paris agreements came into effect, in that period of low intensity conflict throughout 1973 and at least for the first nine months of 1974, the ARVN basically contained the enemy, which -in theory anyway - was all they were permitted to do. Occasionally the North Vietnamese would make a little headway and occasionally the South Vietnamese would make a little headway. One place, for example, that I'm personally very familiar with were the Seven Mountains, an area very close to the Cambodian border in the Delta where the North Vietnamese had garrisoned a fairly substantial force in very rough mountainous terrain honeycombed with caves. Well, eventually, the South Vietnamese Rangers just about completely destroyed them, taking quite heavy casualties themselves. There are many other examples of that kind.

Later on, when the full scale North Vietnamese offensive finally began, there were repeated instances, all the way close towards the end in late April 1975, notably at Xuan Loc, where the South Vietnamese Army fought with splendid courage and determination.

The North Vietnamese militarily defeated the South in 1975, not because the South Vietnamese were unable or unwilling to fight, but because Hanoi disposed overwhelming military force, equipped with a panoply of modern weapons and transport, skillfully led with the aid of sophisticated command and control facilities and amply resupplied, in good part through Cambodia by courtesy of the U.S. Congress. In addition, the North Vietnamese had the advantage of the initiative. They could pick and choose and concentrate forces, while the South was forced to scatter its forces throughout the difficult topography from Quang Tri in the north to Ca Mau 800 miles to the south. Last, and by no means least, as the realization set in that they were being abandoned by the United States, the South Vietnamese military became increasingly demoralized.

Q: Because they were getting no support and were undercut by the United States?

LEHMANN: We shipped in a few artillery pieces and unloaded them with much publicity, but that was all too transparent as a ploy and made no impression at all on Hanoi. The all too evident reality was that Saigon was being undercut by the United States. There were certain things that happened at that late period that increased demoralization in the South by orders of magnitude. For example, sometime in March 1975, Senator Mathias brought in a resolution in the United States Senate calling for an immediate end to all further assistance of any kind to South Vietnam. That had a devastating psychological effect at a very late stage in the game. The Vietnamese, like many other foreigners, have some difficulty understanding our political system. All they could see was a Republican senator, allegedly on the side of the administration, bringing in that kind of resolution and coming at the very moment when the South Vietnamese were making their last attempt to try and save a truncated Republic of Vietnam. The Mathias Resolution was psychologically devastating.

Q: This interview is being conducted to interview Wolf Lehmann concerning the last few months of the American presence in South Vietnam. Mr. Lehmann was deputy chief of mission during this period, as well, of course, as chargé d'affaires during the absences of Ambassador Graham Martin. An earlier interview with Mr. Lehmann covered a longer period dating back to Mr. Lehmann's arrival in Vietnam in June of 1973 and was more of a broad perspective concerning his and the embassy's views of that entire period including analysis of the chain of events and policies that lead to the fall of South Vietnam. This interview, by contrast, covers the last month or two and focuses on the disaster itself and on the evacuation of Americans and others. The focus is on Mr. Lehmann's role and activities both as chargé and as deputy to the ambassador.

Before beginning my questions, let me state several major background facts against which this interview plays. As for Mr. Lehmann himself, he was initial consul general in Can Tho from June of 1973 to March of 1974, and DCM from March of 1974 until his evacuation from the embassy roof on April 30, 1975. The other facts briefly are: the fall of Ban Me Thuot in the highlands on March 12; the beginning of the chain of North Vietnamese victories in the rapid, final intensive; retreat of the ARVN from the highlands over the next two weeks; the fall of Da Nang on the coast on March 30; rapid NVA advanced south; President Ky's resignation on April 22; encirclement and attacks on Saigon's perimeter on April 28-29; and completion of the U.S. evacuation on the morning of April 30. Other dates and events can be cited, but the above skeleton is stated as a guide to the listener in following this final story. It is a period of only six or seven weeks.

Mr. Lehmann, you were a chargé from March 2 until March 28, a period that coincides with the successful North Vietnamese offensive in the highlands. Why was Ambassador Martin away at this time?

LEHMANN: As you mentioned briefly, we had had a very large-scale and extensive visit by the large congressional delegation beginning about February 24 with Congressman McCloskey and Bartlett. This was followed by a delegation headed by Congressman Flynn which included about half a dozen others including such luminaries as Bella Abzug and Congressman Fraser, who is the present mayor of Minneapolis. That delegation, which was a sort of last effort to secure some congressional support for what the President and the Executive Branch wanted to do, left late on the evening of Sunday, March 2, and Ambassador Martin left along with them to return to Washington. His main purpose in going back to Washington was to do what he possibly could in a last effort to try and salvage something out of the Vietnam situation.

Q: How unexpected was the fall of Ban Me Thuot and also President Ky's quick decision after that to withdraw from the highlands?

LEHMANN: First, it is significant to note that, while the congressional delegation that I mentioned was in the country, the North Vietnamese had in fact stood down their offensive operations. The military situation during the entire stay of that delegation was quiescent. The North Vietnamese offensive operations resumed two days after the congressional delegation left on March 4, 1975. The main effort of the new NVA offensive was in the central highlands. It involved not only Ban Me Thuot incidentally, but also Pleiku and Kontum which are somewhat farther north than the highlands.

As far as the operation towards Ban Me Thuot was concerned, it was extremely competently done by the North Vietnamese. Their security was excellent and the sudden attack on Ban Me Thuot itself came as a considerable surprise, especially as to the force behind the attack to both the Vietnamese and ourselves.

Q: Were any Americans or foreigners in Ban Me Thuot when this attack came?

LEHMANN: Yes. We had our provincial representative, an AID officer named Struharag [Phonetic], in Ban Me Thuot at the time. There were also a few other foreigners. I believe there were one or two Canadians and perhaps an Australian in addition, incidentally, to the ICCS detachment which consisted solely of a Hungarian and a Pole and none of the others. As I mentioned, the rapidity with which the attack on Ban Me Thuot itself took place did take everybody by some surprise, and the people I mentioned, including Struharag, were captured by the North Vietnamese. It took us several weeks, but the ICCS eventually effected the return of Struharag as well as the other foreigners there. What happened to the Pole and Hungarian I don't know. I presume they joined their friends.

Q: You mentioned that there were also North Vietnamese attacks on places further north in the highlands, notably Pleiku and Kontum. What was happening there?

LEHMANN: The North Vietnamese operations of that area were also within days after the congressional delegation left. Pleiku and Kontum -- places where we had Americans -- were, of course, increasingly in danger. We, for our part, did not want to take precipitant action, however, in moving both our American employees and our Vietnamese employees that we had there out too early because we did not want to be responsible for setting off panic and a change of events that would no longer be controlled. However, on Saturday, March 15, within about thirty minutes after I had returned from a meeting with President Ky at the palace, it became obvious from reports that I had from Consul General Monty Spear in Nha Trang and other information that we had at the embassy that we needed to get our people out of Pleiku and Kontum. Therefore, that morning I instructed Jacobson, our special assistant for field operations, and Spear in Nha Trang to remove our people immediately from both places, and that operation was completed before the day was out.

Incidentally, as far as Washington was concerned, all I did is inform Washington that I had directed the evacuation and it would be completed before the end of a day. I did not ask them for any permission.

Q: Did they comment?

LEHMANN: They made no comment.

Q: Wasn't there an ICCS group somewhere in the area as well? Did he take any action regarding them?

LEHMANN: Yes. There was an ICCS group. It consisted at that time only of Hungarians and Poles. It did not have any Indonesians or Iranian representatives in that particular location. The question of whether we should warn the ICCS group or not was raised in the embassy with me. After giving it some thought, I decided that no warning to the Hungarians and Poles was indicated, to just let them sit there and do the best they can when their friends would arrive.

Q: They presumably were getting better information than you were anyway, maybe.

LEHMANN: Perhaps they were.

Q: I understand that, on the basis of the sudden North Vietnamese successes in the highlands, particularly at Ban Me Thuot, President Thieu decided as early as Friday, March 14, that a total retreat out of the highlands would be necessary in order to shorten lines, particularly in view of the fact that American material and ammunition was no longer forthcoming. That was on March 14. You just mentioned that you met with President Thieu on the morning of Saturday, March 15, at nine o'clock. Did President Thieu say anything to you at that time concerning this decision?

LEHMANN: That's quite correct. The decision to withdraw from the highlands -- in fact, the decision to withdraw from most of the northern part of the Republic of Vietnam -- was made by Thieu and conveyed to his corps commander on Friday at a meeting in Nha Trang on March 14. When I met with President Thieu at nine o'clock the following Saturday morning, he did not directly inform me of that decision, but he hinted that a major decision was in the process of being made and that it had been a rather difficult one. I could not draw him out on the details.

However, what he did say set a slight alarm bell ringing in my head as I left the palace and returned to the embassy. It was on my return that I was informed by Consul General Spear in Nha Trang that Two Corps [Phonetic] had decided to evacuate its forward headquarters at Pleiku and at Kontum. That, in turn, precipitated my decision then to immediately evacuate the Americans and Vietnamese employees that we had in the area.

Q: Did you assume that the word from Consul General Spear connected with the incident President Thieu had just given?

LEHMANN: Yes, I did. I might ask something here. The question is sometimes raised whether that was a proper way for a president to deal with us and whether I was not considerably annoyed by the fact that he had not directly and clearly conveyed this decision to me that Saturday morning. My feeling about that is that, in light of the fact that we were letting the whole side down, he had a right to make his own decisions. Since we were nevertheless able to do what we had to do with regard to our own people and our own employees, there was no cause for me to be particularly resentful by that particular mission on the part of the president.

Q: There have been criticisms of the Thieu decision to withdraw. I won't go into that in any detail since we have covered that in our earlier interview -- covered that as the South Vietnamese belief that it cannot hold all of South Vietnam given the cutoff of United States material and ammunition. But, there have also been many criticisms of a more tactical nature on the disastrous retreat from Pleiku down to the coast and the alleged incompetence and irresponsibilities of Vietnamese generals. Do you believe that better preparation, including perhaps better briefing by President Thieu of his generals, would have made a significant difference?

LEHMANN: It might and might not have. There is no doubt about the fact that the decision was made very rapidly and implemented without any adequate preparation. On the other hand, if Thieu had left more preparation time between decision day and implementation day, there was a very, very strong chance, if not a likelihood, that all of this would have leaked promptly to the North Vietnamese through their very extensive intelligence apparatus that they maintained. I do not know the answer to the question of whether better preparations would have resulted in a more effective operation or not.

As it was, and as you said, there was little if any preparation. The whole move was set in motion literally from one day to the next almost from hour to hour. It involved not only the withdrawal of South Vietnamese troops but in many cases their families and, of course, endless numbers of other civilian refugees who also clogged the very limited roads and highways that led from the highlands down to the coast. So that was one of the elements that made it a very difficult operation.

The second element that made it a disaster or a near disaster was the inadequate state of the single road, Route 7B, that led to the coast and along which the withdrawal took place. The road was in bad shape. It was inadequate. There were places where ridges were missing and had to be reconstructed by engineers all of which took time. Meanwhile, all this traffic consisting of masses of withdrawing troop as well as masses of refugees was backed up. Clearly, had there been good plans and preparations, it would have included getting that road in shape and getting it secured.

Then there was a third element and that was the very highly sophisticated and excellent command control and intelligence system over which the North Vietnamese disposed in their attack. Contrary to popular impressions in this country, this was not a guerilla war. This was a main force war in which the North Vietnamese not only had excellent intelligence but excellent command and control communications. So they were able to observe all this, come to very rapid conclusions as to the state of the South Vietnamese forces, and take very effective military action in order to largely destroy those forces as they were deploying to the coast.

Q: We cannot affect the issue from the standpoint of material and U. S. assistance since that had already been denied from Washington. Was there anything we did not do that we might have done to influence South Vietnamese decision making? I'm thinking here not so much of Washington but U. N. Ambassador Martin primarily. Would Thieu have listened to you?

LEHMANN: I think the first answer to that question is that we were certainly in no position whatsoever to advise Thieu to make another decision rather than the one that he did make to in effect evacuate the entire northern part of the Republic of South Vietnam and attempt to hold a truncated South Vietnam along the line running roughly from Da Lat to the coast in the east. Would he have listened to us had we done so? I rather doubt it, but as I say we were in no position to give any advice.

There is one other point that ought to be made. The concept of trying to hold militarily a truncated South Vietnam along the line that I just mentioned from Da Lat to the coast was not one that was invented at that particular moment. That idea had been raised years earlier and it had occasionally been pressed by an Australian advisor to President Thieu.

Q: I think I know who that was.

LEHMANN: Yes. Desmond. So it was not a totally new thing.

Q: Let's switch now to embassy evacuation planning, organization, and morale. How good was the basic embassy E & E plan and also the plans of the four consulate generals? To what degree had they been updated to take into account the possibility of a sudden South Vietnamese collapse? It must have appeared increasingly likely as the perceived U. S. abandonment of its ally became clear. I am referring not just to the detailed written plan but to the very consultations between you and respective consul generals and also with the leading embassy players.

LEHMANN: I think the basic embassy evacuation plans were sound, in effect, in fact. We'll get to that later with the final helicopter rotary wing lift out of Saigon was option four on the embassy's evacuation plan. Other options in the plan were in general outline a while earlier. The evacuation plans are, of course, normally kept under more or less constant review. That review was intensified in our case early in 1975. As early as February 20, we had a couple of Marine colonels come in from the military side which was to support the evacuation in order to review the details for evacuation planning right on the ground and make any necessary adjustments that might be made. Of course, at that stage of the game, we kept this very, very quiet. We did not tell anybody -- didn't want to tell anybody -- for reasons which are obvious. We can get into them --

Q: And you didn't want to demoralize the South Vietnamese government.

LEHMANN: Into them later on. As I said, as early as latter part of February, the military began to review their role in the plans right on the ground.

With regard to the consulates, yes, the plans were also constantly reviewed. In one case, that of the consulate general in Can Tho, the plan was rather drastically changed.

Q: That's in the south.

LEHMANN: Yes, in the Delta where I had been previously to coming to Saigon as deputy ambassador. As a result of one of the reviews, Terry McNamara, who had replaced me, came up to Saigon at one point in March with a recommendation that in Can Tho in the Delta we switched from an air evacuation plan to a boat evacuation plan from Can Tho down the Bassac River into the South China Sea. After a review by us at the embassy, that change was approved and that is the way it eventually went, as a matter of fact, in April when Can Tho had to be evacuated.

Q: I assume also that at the same time you were in steady consultation with the other major section heads and other players in the embassy that were involved in emergency planning.

LEHMANN: Yes, of course we were. I was constantly talking to them. The situation we faced beginning with the resumption of large-scale North Vietnamese operations had, of course, several components. One of these was evacuation planning for Americans. A related one was evacuation planning for some third country nationals whose potential evacuation would support. A third element was our role in dealing with the massive refugee situation that was created by the resumption of North Vietnamese military operations.

Basically, I organized the embassy in the following way. I designated the deputy AID director, John Bennett [Phonetic], to be the principal focal point in the embassy for supporting Vietnamese efforts to deal with the refugee situation. I designated George Jacobson, who is well known to Vietnam hands and whose title was special assistant for field operations, to be the principal focal point for supporting evacuation planning by the consulates in our field operations. I designated the defense attaché, General Homer Smith, to begin planning for the control of overall evacuation from Vietnam, to begin planning support operations for an eventual overall evacuation of South Vietnam. That was done by establishing an evacuation control center in the defense attaché compound out at Tan Salute [Phonetic]. We ostensibly set up that control center initially to support the Vietnamese refugee problem, but we did it with full knowledge and intent that that control center would be immediately convertible into a center for controlling the evacuation of Americans and others from the country as a whole.

Q: Did you find the date?

LEHMANN: Yes. It was on April 1 that we activated the evacuation control center at the defense attaché compound.

Q: As we move through the latter part of March and into April and through April, the North Vietnamese forces are, of course, pursuing the demoralized South Vietnamese as they retreat out of the highlands to the coast -- not only eastward but southward. Could you describe the evacuations of the three consulate generals as they began to take place, starting with Da Nang and moving on through Nha Trang, etc. What happened at each and when did it happen? I remember descriptions of great chaos -- and also further north at Hue and Da Nang -- and considerable heroism as well on the part of a number of the Americans involved.

LEHMANN: To set the stage, on March 16 the ARVN evacuated Quang Tri in the far north. We had no one in Quang Tri. Immediately after the evacuation of Quang Tri, of course, the situation became critical in Hue, just a little bit to the south. At that time, Theresa Tull was acting principal officer in Da Nang and Francis was just about to return to his post. The initial step we took in Hue is that we removed our people overnight only and brought them back into Hue during the daytime. We did that for several days until the situation had clearly reached the point where we could no longer do that if we didn't want to risk them. Therefore, on March 18 I instructed Tull to move the people completely out of Hue and keep them in Da Nang.

Q: Were there many involved in this?

LEHMANN: No. There were not many involved in this. There were only a few Americans and maybe a small number of Vietnamese employees. In that little short interim period, in order to keep up appearance, we would bring them in in the morning, go to their offices, bring them back to Da Nang by helicopter at night -- until March 18.

On March 20 the ARVN organized their perimeter defense of Da Nang. The situation in Da Nang was, undoubtedly, the most critical one in this entire story. The ARVN on their part made a strong effort to evacuate the most effective combat units by sea down to the south and the Saigon area so that the units could be employed elsewhere in the war. As usual, the situation was complicated by, of course, the presence of large numbers of families that were simply part of the picture of the Vietnamese military. Then, of course, it was complicated by massive flows of panicky civilian refugees.

So the situation in Da Nang rather quickly got out of hand. The Vietnamese military lost control of the Da Nang airfield which was simply overrun by refugees and by some troops that had left their units. That, of course, eventually complicated our own evacuation problem. Bear in mind now, overland evacuation to the south was no longer feasible. It either had to be by air or by sea.

I considered in consultation with Francis, with whom I continued to have good communications until the very last moment and with whom I was regularly on the phone during the day and late into the night, the possibility of asking for support from the American military to assist us in evacuation of not only Americans and American employees but others from Da Nang. The specific proposal we had in mind was for the Pacific command to furnish helicopters to be based at Cam Ranh Bay for supplying and to, in effect, assist with a rotary airlift from the Da Nang area. I raised that with the Pacific command and it was turned down. The reason cited why they could not help with the operation was that all their assets were standing by and had to stand by for the evacuation of Phnom Penh -- "Operation Eagle Pull" as it was called -- and they could not divert it to assist us in our problem in Da Nang. So that was abandoned.

Q: They did not have the resources for both.

LEHMANN: That's correct. They said they could not do both and they could not divert anything from "Eagle Pull" as the Cambodian evacuation was called. So that one fell by the wayside.

We had earlier augmented the consulate general in Da Nang with several younger active officers to help Francis and the whole operation to our taking out of Da Nang, of course, the supernumeraries and others who could not be immediately employed in the immediate problem. By the evening of March 26 and early March 27, the situation was pretty well out of hand in Da Nang. The airfield was no longer operational because it was just overrun by mobs. On the evening of Thursday, March 27, I met with the prime minister regarding the situation. He communicated with General Trung [Phonetic] in my presence -- although it was in Vietnamese and I did not follow it -- to explore the possibility of using what remained of functioning military units, primarily ranger battalions, up in Da Nang to reassert control of the airfield so that some sort of airlift out of Vietnam could be continued. It became evident during the night and in the early morning that that could not be done.

My situation was further complicated that, during the night of March 27 to 28, Ambassador Martin returned along with General Wyatt [Phonetic]. They were supposed to arrive early in the evening of the 27th. Due to technical problems with the aircraft, they didn't arrive until three o'clock in the morning of Friday, March 28. I met them there. I had an early morning conference at four in the morning with Ambassador Martin to brief him on the situation, returned directly from there to the embassy with the situation in Da Nang completely out of hand.

Q: It must have been pretty exhausting as well.

LEHMANN: Yes, somewhat. I was running on adrenalin at that point. Up in Da Nang, meanwhile, while we knew where the few remaining Americans and some more Vietnamese employees were, we had lost track of Francis, the consul general. Sometime during that Friday morning or midday, I found out through Vietnamese channels that Francis, who had gone off to one part of the Da Nang perimeter, was apparently on board a Vietnamese naval ship -- a frigate or something of that kind that was also loaded with soldiers and refugees -- but no longer in touch with the rest of his people who, at this point, were on a barge in Da Nang harbor. This was the remainder of our staff and Vietnamese.

Q: That includes Terry Tull, I presume.

LEHMANN: No. Terry Tull had gone for some time. The fellow on the barge in charge was Brunson McKinley. Our communicators were able to patch me through to Brunson McKinley on the barge. Now, McKinley didn't know where Francis was and wanted to wait and get hold of Francis to get him back. I, knowing more about Francis' whereabouts, instructed McKinley at that time that, if he had all the rest of the people, to get out of there and leave. That was the end of the evacuation of Da Nang on Friday afternoon, March 28.

Q: What happened to Francis now that he's on this other ship?

LEHMANN: He stayed on that other ship which eventually came down to the south either to Saigon or Vung Tau. The people on the barge also made it out and came down, a few of them with nothing more than the shirts on their backs.

Q: What about Nha Trang which came next? That's where Monty Spear was as consul general.

LEHMANN: Yes. Nha Trang was, of course, the next place to be threatened. It was farther south, just midway down the coast between Quang Tri and the so called DMZ and Saigon. Again, in Nha Trang it was question of moving in time but not before time in order not to aggravate the situation and make it even worse. At one point around March 27, the station chief came to me with what he said was very hard intelligence that Nha Trang had, in fact, been surrounded and that we had to move out of there immediately. That was not confirmable by any other information that we had through other channels. So late one evening I had Spear fly down from Nha Trang to discuss the situation with me very quickly. Although the station insisted that its intelligence was correct, I came to the conclusion that it was incorrect. I turned out to be right because a little bit later I had a somewhat red-faced station chief come in to tell me that apparently they had been had on something.

However, within days thereafter the situation had reached the point where Nha Trang had to be evacuated and the evacuation was, in fact, carried out and completed on April 1 both by helicopter lift and some assistance from a Philippine ship offshore that took off some refugees.

Q: You said a helicopter lift. Was the Pacific command involved in this?

LEHMANN: No. All this time the only air assets that we had available and were used were our own Air America, both the small fixed-wing aircraft and the helicopters that we had. There were no U. S. military involved in any of these operations.

Q: How large a group of aircraft did you have?

LEHMANN: I don't remember exactly how many aircraft we had. We had both helicopters, Hueys, and some fixed-wing aircraft, porters. We had about 30 aircraft available to us in Air America. Of course, under the arrangement that I described earlier, George Jacobson was the one with overall supervisory responsibility for allocating those aircraft when we needed them to support the evacuation operations as well as other ongoing operations at the time.

Q: Of course, that is two of the consulates. Bien Hoa, which is not very far north of Saigon, would come up next as we see the North Vietnamese forces moving further south and threatening Saigon.

LEHMANN: Bien Hoa evacuation was basically handled through Saigon because Bien Hoa was rather close to Saigon. At some point in the game -- it was rather late [and] must have been around April 19, -- we had, in effect, closed down the Bien Hoa consulate and moved the people to be evacuated into Saigon and had them evacuated through the Saigon operation which was already in progress at the time.

Q: Who was the consul general there?

LEHMANN: The consul general was Dick Peters and I do not recall exactly when we had Dick actually leave. But, we designated Dick to go to Guam to assist in Guam with the handling of the Vietnamese evacuees, many of whom we were temporarily parking in Guam. We didn't have any authority to move them to the United States.

Q: Then there was Can Tho, of course, in the south and presumably less immediately threatened by the broad offensive but also vulnerable by the general collapse.

LEHMANN: It is important to note here that the ARVN and the Vietnamese governmental structure kept control of the delta right to the end. So the evacuation of Can Tho took place concurrently with the evacuation of the embassy in Saigon. They were given the word early on April 29 when we began execution of option four of Frequent Winds to complete their evacuation. Now, it is true that we had previously thinned out the staff in Can Tho already during the preceding weeks.

Q: And, as I recall from what you had said earlier, that evacuation was carried out by sea.

LEHMANN: The remainder of the evacuation was carried out by sea with the remainder of the staff -- Americans and Vietnamese remaining, going down the Bassac River and out into the South China Sea where they were picked up by the Navy.

Q: You mentioned Dick Peters having been sent to Guam to supervise the flow of Vietnamese refugees out of Vietnam already. Could you discuss a bit the degree to which this was taking place, the numbers involved, the pressures involved, and some of the issues that may have come up? Why were they going to Guam? Were they staying there and was there any prospect of their going on?

LEHMANN: We had, of course, various categories of Vietnamese whose evacuation we wanted to support. In some cases we were obligated to support. The principal categories were: our employees; people who had worked closely with us; people who were at very high risk if they were captured by the Vietnamese; and the large numbers of Vietnamese who had established -- with the many years of our involvement -- some sort of relationship with Americans, either through marriage legalized by civil authority or clergy, or through common law relationships. The Vietnamese extended family system -- that sort of thing translates immediately into fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, and cousins. So there was a massive potential problem here of evacuating Vietnamese.

At the same time, we had a situation where our authority to formally admit people to the United States was extremely limited and subject to the normal kind of consular procedures. We did not receive formal authority to exceed those normal procedures and, in fact, evacuate Vietnamese to the United States under the Attorney General's parole program until April 26, three days before the final evacuation. Yet, we had these other problems on our hands.

On April 17, for example, we already evacuated all Vietnamese employees of the defense-attaché system who were in sensitive jobs and who had to be gotten out. There were other folks in those categories. One of the main problems, of course, was where do you put some of these people that you had no authority for sending to the United States. Guam was, of course, a territory and so Guam was used extensively as a temporary holding area while Washington sorted out some of the legal and political problems that were involved. Shortly after we began really evacuating large numbers of people largely by C-130 aircraft from the military to Guam, it turned out that some of them wanted to come back because they had left their families behind.

Q: I might interject here that I was on a visit to Guam a couple of months after this with a large congressional delegation headed by Congressman Lester Wolf, and we visited the camps there. There were huge numbers. One thing that really struck me was that, in addition to those that were clamoring to go to the United States, there was also a sizable group that was clamoring to return to Vietnam in order to ingratiate themselves with the new authorities. The new Communist authorities were putting up slogans and making all kinds of anti-American statements in order to try to prove that they had credentials to get back and would not be treated harshly when they did return. It was a mess.

LEHMANN: Yes. I can imagine it was. At the time, somewhat earlier when we were still in Saigon and those last remaining ten days or so, the guidance that we gave to our people in Guam was, "If any Vietnamese wanted to go back, make that a matter of record and back-load them on the empty C-130s that were going back to Vietnam to pick up more."

Q: Talking particularly about Saigon but also the overall evacuation of Vietnam, I know there were considerable inhibitions in carrying out the evacuation because, in particular, there was the strong possibility that the South Vietnamese might look on this as the desertion of an ally and who knows what their reaction might be. Could you discuss these inhibitions as well as the degree to which they seemed justified in retrospect in the light of experience and the passage of time?

LEHMANN: I think there were basically three factors in considering the final evacuation and the process of getting ready for the final evacuation. The first was that we had to avoid at all costs a repetition on a much larger scale by orders of magnitude of the kind of mob panic that we had in Da Nang under much more serious and much more complicated circumstances which would have been the ones in the Saigon area. We were able to extract all our people out of Da Nang in the end including our Vietnamese employees because it was important that we were able to get them off on the ships, on the barges. We couldn't have done that in Saigon. We couldn't have gotten them on the ships down the Saigon River. In fact, we looked at that option in some detail. Hank Woodrow, an administrative counselor, and I went over that possible option in considerable detail including surveying an area at Newport in Saigon as a possible holding area right next to the port. We dismissed that one as not being practical. We had to avoid a mass panic in the city of Saigon because a mass panic in the city of Saigon would have made shambles out of the whole process and would have made it impossible to do what we finally did when we put into effect option four of Frequent Winds which was the final helicopter airlift out of the city and nearby area.

Secondly and related to the first consideration was the fact that we had some intelligence indicating that there were at least some senior ARVN people who were seriously considering taking action to prevent us from evacuating, thus having us go down with them. I do have one specifically in mind and I'm not going to mention him because I know where he is.

Q: Is he in this country now?

LEHMANN: He was at one point. He was a senior officer who seriously considered interfering with the American evacuation on the theory that, "If we're going to go down, you are going to go down with us."

Having this whole American experience in Vietnam end in some sort of a violent conflict between us and the South Vietnamese was, frankly, just too horrible a thing to contemplate. The most serious consideration was the one of things simply getting out of hand in Saigon.

The third consideration was a political one. We did want to keep open, as long as we possible could, the option of retaining some sort of official presence in the area in the event there would be some sort of negotiated settlement involving the North Vietnamese. This was a possibility that would have served the North Vietnamese interests very well had they decided to go through with it because it would have set up tremendous pressures in the United States to make good on what they've always alleged were commitments that Nixon and Kissinger made to them for assistance to Vietnam.

Q: Incidentally, Phil Habib and Bob Miller in that period asked me to write up a feasibility paper. I did that but I didn't think much of it. It was kind of hard. I really didn't know enough about it for one thing. I remember mulling over that a couple of days.

LEHMANN: Well, that's an interesting note, Bob, and to expand a little bit on that -- it was not only our own thought that this was an option, we had guidance from the Department to maintain that as an option including the possibility of a very small skeleton staff at the embassy which, had that ever come about, incidentally, would have probably been myself with about three or four other people.

Q: You'd be sticking your neck out, of course.

LEHMANN: That's right. It was just not our own thing. In the press and some political circles, a good deal was made of this particular consideration later on in a very distorted way. We were accused of dragging our feet and having illusions, etc. This is all nonsense. In any event, that thing never, never governed our evacuation operations at all.

Q: We knew in Washington that this was a far out option. We just wanted to be sure we looked at everything.

LEHMANN: It didn't drive our evacuation effort. That proceeded on its own. These were the three main factors that we had to contend with, all of which, of course, drove us to make what planning and preparations we had very quietly, often pretending we were doing something else and not doing what we were really doing. The trouble with this, of course, was that this exposed us to a lot of criticism from the press and some politicians. Oddly enough, usually the politicians were largely at fault, in any event, of getting us to the point at which we were. [Laughter]

Q: Perhaps it would be best now if you told in your own words the phases, more or less, by which people left -- a lot of voluntary departures, I suppose, exiting of dependents, phasing down. How practical was that in light of the posturing you needed to convey to the Vietnamese as well as the willingness, I gather, of many Americans, especially unofficial Americans, to leave.

LEHMANN: As I mentioned, on the first of April we activated the evacuation control center at the defense attaché compound, ostensibly at the time to monitor the refugee flow situation. But, it was in full recognition and with the intention of getting this facility ready to control the evacuation of Americans and Vietnamese in the end. We began to draw down people in the first two weeks of April by encouraging contractors to depart by sending out a number of dependents, family members, and some nonessential personal under various pretexts of one sort or another. In fact, we began in a sense ordering the evacuation on about April 3 or 4. One of the things that was done -- it was not the only one -- was that we had the so called orphan lift beginning at that time. We designated large numbers of especially women and others -- not only women but other nonessential personnel -- as escorts for the orphans, far in excess of what was really needed but that was just a subterfuge to get them out. Of course, one of the great tragedies of that particular situation was that one of the very first flight [Inaudible Portion] crashed on April 4, 1975, with substantial casualties of both the orphans and the so called escorts. It was a very sad thing and one of the saddest moments of my life.

With regard to official American personnel, I had already requested earlier in March two things from the Department. One was not to have any additional family members come into the country of people being transferred into the country. You must remember that we had an American staff country-wide of all U. S. agencies of about 2,000 people. That was granted, incidentally. That was approved and there was no trouble on that one. But, the other authority asked for was authority for us in Saigon to determine who should go out immediately without further reference to Washington. I never got that. That apparently doesn't fit the bureaucratic system, but it was the kind of leeway that we needed. In Washington they kept insisting they had to approve each thing which was a nuisance to put it mildly.

However, to get back to the main point. We used the subterfuges such as I've mentioned. We tried to encourage people to leave and reduce the number of Americans in the country. On April 15 our evacuee holding facility at the defense attaché compound went operational. As I mentioned earlier, on April 17 a number of sensitive local employees -- most of those with intelligence agencies and related operations including the defense attaché -- were evacuated. On April 21 we began around-the-clock C-141 and C-130 flights in and out of Tan Son Nhut going mostly to the Philippines and to some other destinations. Between April 4 and April 27 about 27,000 people were actually moved out of Vietnam. Most of these were moved by military MAC flights to either Guam or the Philippines.

Q: These were mostly Vietnamese.

LEHMANN: These were a mixture of Americans and Vietnamese and this is an important point. One of the greatest difficulties that we had was the considerable reluctance of many Americans to leave, especially American contractor personnel. There were a lot of military retirees who had settled down with Vietnamese "families" over the years. All of these people were extremely reluctant to leave without their families. Now, in many cases these family relationships were not legally blessed. They were simply common law relationships but still very strong. But, there was no legal authority under which we could evacuate or take these people into the United States. Moreover, the family relationships were extended ones because they not only involved the common law wife and the common law children but also the mother, the father, the brothers, the sisters, and often cousins. Nobody wanted to leave without the other. Yet, we had no way by which we had any authority to bring these people into the United States and, of course, none to bring them into the Philippines who happened to have an independent government. This was the kind of problem that we were faced with. When we're talking about an average family here, we're probably talking of a family of at least a dozen and sometimes more.

That was only part of the problem. The additional problem was that, while we wanted to send Americans out, Americans kept coming in and there was no way to stop them. Americans kept coming in including, incidentally, some official Americans and some Foreign Service officers. They kept coming in and looking for their friends and acquaintances or their relations. In many of these cases they had North Vietnamese wives and now they were coming in because they wanted to do something to get their wives' parents, brothers, sisters, etc., out under some sort of expedited procedures. So we were having a situation where we were keeping track of the number of Americans in country and we were moving out Americans, but the total number at any given day wouldn't really go down because others would come in. This was a situation which is probably of somewhat unparalleled difficulty. At least, I don't know the precedent for it.

Q: There's probably no country where we've been so closely involved over such a long period of time where the numbers of Americans were so great. Therefore, the number of involvements were so great. You didn't have this in the Iranian evacuation, for example. They were limited. This is a kind of unique experience. In fact, you didn't have this in Cambodia. It is totally different.

LEHMANN: That's right. The Cambodian evacuation, I think, consisted of less than 400 people.

Q: Yes. You knew it was a much cleaner kind of thing.

LEHMANN: Yes. Possibly.

Q: Incidentally, what was happening with various third country nationals? There must have been a lot of South Koreans, Japanese, British, French, etc. Were they making arrangements for themselves or were they asking us for help, and to what degree could we help them?

LEHMANN: Most of them were making arrangements for themselves. However, they were in very close touch with us daily during those last weeks and last month and a half. I had either DCMs or chargés or ambassadors contact me wanting to know what our view was and getting our appraisal so that they could decide what they would do. The British moved out on their own at the time. So did the Australians as well as the Israelis, the Belgians, the Dutch representatives and the Germans. They moved out on their own.

There were a few left that we took out with us on the last day including the Italian ambassador, a very fine fellow. We were good friends. We brought him out along with some U. N. people and a couple of other third nationals. Just who they were escapes me. The Japanese made a decision to remain although they cut their staff down very much. They remained which turned out to be rather helpful. The Chinese -- that's the Taiwan Chinese -- left on their own. The Koreans left, and it was a problem because there were a number of South Koreans that were left in the country on April 29. We evacuated some of them. Unfortunately, a number of Koreans were in that very last batch of evacuees along with some Vietnamese that we had in the embassy compound when it was shut down and they remained behind. That is always something that made me feel very badly, but we were simply told that we had no more and that was it. Eventually, that problem was solved with the help of the Japanese who had remained. The French also remained.

There was one amusing incident with regard to third country nationals, incidentally. I believe it was in the early afternoon of April 29 when we were already in the process of executing the final evacuation. I had a call from the Polish ICCS representative in Saigon who was very concerned about his situation and asked if we might do something to help him. I was sorely tempted at the time -- like an attractive auction -- but there was real difficulty which was due to the fact that he was located some distance away from Tan Son Nhut and the embassy. At that particular time the situation in the city was beginning to get chaotic. I would have had to tell General Smith to dispatch some sort of detail, including some Marines and some transportation, to go and pick him up. That was too much of a risk under the existing situation. So I told him there was nothing I could do for him. He'd just have to stay where he was and await the arrival of the North Vietnamese.

Q: Before the final evacuation on April 29 and 30, were there any significant problems between the mission in Saigon and Washington or other agencies in Washington and the field?

LEHMANN: There were a number of problems that arose. Some were of lesser significance than others. One of the early problems that arose was when, on March 25, I requested authority from Washington to move dependents to safe-havens in Manila, Bangkok, and other places on our own authority as I saw fit in Saigon. Well, that was never granted. The Department insisted on bureaucratic review back in Washington. That kind of thing is not suitable to this sort of situation. However, we managed to live with it.

I suppose a more serious problem arose during the latter part of April because of tremendous pressures, political pressures in Washington for us to speed things up and to do things which we on the ground knew would have catastrophic results if we did so. Obviously, the Department and the rest of the Executive Branch was under considerable pressure from politicians up on the hill and others. We felt that pressure, but we just simply had to resist it. But, that was a rather serious problem.

A third problem, of course, was one I mentioned earlier regarding the evacuation of Vietnamese. We did not receive authority to move any Vietnamese under extraordinary procedures to the United States until April 25 or 26. Up until that time we were theoretically constrained to those who were eligible for visas which, of course, was wives and children of American citizens and that was all.

Another category of problems arose on a couple of occasions when there was a need for urgent action -- really urgent action. The main problem that arose in that connection was when sometime in early or mid April -- and I cannot remember when -- the FAA regional office in Honolulu, without a word to anybody, suddenly declared Tan Son Nhut airport no longer safe for American commercial aircraft. This came just at a time when I was still heavily engaged in trying to hold Pan Am's feet to the fire to keep flying. It was also quite unjustified because, when that was done, the situation in the general area of the airfield had not changed from what it had been for a couple of year before that. Apparently, the FAA decision was based on some questionable intelligence assessment which they received from PACAF, Pacific U. S. Air Force Command, in Honolulu. This was just the kind of thing, the moment it became public, that would set off a panic. If I had called the State Department, a committee would have met the next morning and started discussing this. So I just simply bypassed it. I called the NSC staff in the White House directly and demanded the rescission within hours, and I got it. There were a couple of instances of that kind.

In connection with other agencies, I mentioned that Pan Am, fairly early in the game, wanted to discontinue their operations and Hank Woodrow and I had to put a good deal of pressure on the airline to have them continue. I admit they had a real problem because they would be way overbooked on their daily flights out of Saigon. Then, when flight time came, there would be a lot of empty spaces because there were simply no shuttles, or people were booking seats on the airplane that didn't have the exit documentation. Nevertheless, it was important to keep them flying.

I had a similar problem with Flying Tigers whom we also had to pressure to keep flying. They did not respond and stopped when they decided they had to.

One last problem, not a significant one, that arose was with the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital. That hospital provided basically medical support for the whole American community. I was told at some point -- I think it was again around mid April -- that they wanted to pull out. So I along with Woodrow and Dustin who was our medical officer went out to see the Seventh Day Adventists and persuaded them to remain. That was very important to us because there was in the background, of course, always the possibility of casualties and that was our medical support. But, that problem was resolved satisfactorily.

Q: They stayed right up to the end?

LEHMANN: They remained very close to the end, and even on the last day they were still functional, although largely with a small Vietnamese skeleton staff.

Q: This was obviously a time of considerable distress on the staff. How did the staff perform as a whole? Were there any particular problems that arose?

LEHMANN: Let me say first of all that the overall performance of the staff was great. It was just terrific. Everybody worked hard, long hours under great personal stress and did a great job. We tried to recognize that in an awards program that, in fact, was not completed until early 1976. I think we generally managed to do so. One omission about that program that bothers me to this day is that after I, acting as chairman of an awards board here in Washington -- I came back from Frankfurt for that purpose with several others -- had completed the program, I gave to Director General Carol Laise a well-considered, small list of senior staff officers who had not been included in the program. They had, along with me, constituted the board. I pointed out in that note that I gave her that any omissions on that list were quite deliberate but that I thought the performance of these other officers -- I had them by name across the mission, not just State -- ought to be recognized. That was never done. I was told later on that someone else took it up with the director general and was told that considering awards for those senior staff officers would raise the questions of the ambassador, the DCM, and that those were political issues. So that never took place.

As regards to the staff performance as a whole, whenever you have a tremendously large number of Americans on the staff as we had in Vietnam under conditions like that you are bound to have an occasional problem. We did have to rather promptly relieve one fairly senior military officer and had him depart because he jumped the gun and disobeyed instructions. We had problems with two or three other people throughout this very large staff. That's very minor, really -- one or two who simply couldn't take it and had to be ordered out.

We had one problem with one member of the senior staff who had been a disruptive influence in the mission for some time before that. I will not go much farther than that. In retrospect, we should have sent the gentleman on back to the United States some months before that since he was the subject of complaints to me of virtually every other member of the senior staff at various points. But, we did not do that. That, I think, is a lesson for the future. If anybody is ever in a situation of that kind, he should identify personnel problems of that nature early in the stage and, no matter how tough it is, take action.

Q: Were these substantive points of difference or were they related to rough personal relationships to people?

LEHMANN: They were partly substantive in nature and they were in large measure related to ways of operating and running the mission.

Q: Before we continue with discussing the evacuation, it might be useful to record just what happened to President Thieu. When did he resign? What was our role? What did we do?

LEHMANN: After some exchanges of communications between ourselves and Washington, Ambassador Martin went to see Thieu on April 20. The details of that conversation are recorded in the traffic and I don't know to what extent that traffic has been released or not. However, in general I can say that what he told Thieu was that the decision as to what to do was, of course, entirely up to him. But, if he should decide to resign, we would assist him and get him, his family, and a small number of his close assistants into a safe-haven. Thieu resigned on April 22, two days later announcing that resignation in a very bitter speech. I do not blame him for being bitter, incidentally. He had a right to be. He resigned that day. Two days later on April 24 we had arranged for a special U. S. aircraft at the airport to take him and his family and a few assistants to Taipei.

Q: We discussed the situation regarding the evacuation of people -- American, Vietnamese, and third country nationals. What was done with regard to sensitive materials -- classified records, etc.? I understand there also was a problem regarding the nuclear research reactor at Da Lat.

LEHMANN: We began packing and sending out embassy files and records at the beginning of April or maybe it was even early March. This was the kind of thing that we could do quietly. Nobody would see that. Things could be packed up in the communications room and shipped out.

Q: They were going all the way back to the United States?

LEHMANN: They were going all the way back to the United States. We also, for example, had the bubble that had to be gotten out. That's a rather large and unwieldy thing and, of course, that was a visible act. Most people really don't know when they see big pieces of plastic lying around in the courtyard, so that was sent out. Whatever documents that were not sent out at the time or taken out by us individually along in our briefcases towards the end were destroyed, including some during the night of April 29 to April 30. In any event, everything was either sent out or destroyed. Nothing fell into anybody's hands. This was not a Tehran situation. [Laughter] I get rather upset every once in a while when I still read stories about the situation in Tehran having the greatest intelligence loss since the evacuation of the embassy in Saigon. We didn't lose anything.

Q: Was there anything lost in the consulate generals?

LEHMANN: No. Also the same applies to the consulate generals. The consulates had either sent back or, in their cases, mostly destroyed all their files and records. That's true for all four of them.

Q: And then Da Lat?

LEHMANN: There was a research reactor in Da Lat, so called Triga reactor that had been part of the USAID program many years before. After Tet 1968, there was some nervousness in certain circles in Washington about fuel elements of that reactor. I recall distinctly then when I was director of the office of atomic energy as well as others in the State Department being approached by the Atomic Energy Commission to get those fuel elements out of at the time. Ambassador Bunker quite correctly just ignored that nonsense. In any event, we did want to get the fuel out in April of 1975. Again, it was one of those things where we wanted to act in time but not before time.

For about a week before we finally decided -- and I did -- to move those fuel elements, there were a couple of special C-130 aircraft standing by at Clarke Field in the Philippines with technicians and the equipment necessary to pull the fuel elements out of that small reactor. I finally permitted them to come in and go ahead with that. I believe it must have been around mid April. Then we did preserve the proper forms in all of this as much as I asked the Vietnamese government to give me a formal letter requesting that we remove the fuel elements, and they did so. It was a slightly hectic operation. The NVA was beginning to approach the area. This was in the highlands, of course. It took all night, but it was done and properly done.

Q: We are now coming down to the final period before the evacuation and, particularly, to that last weekend. This is the period of Friday, April 25, to Monday, April 28. How did the situation evolve during those days, and what were you doing?

LEHMANN: First of all, let's keep in mind that at this point we had been operating around the clock C-141 and C-130 flights from the airport since Monday, April 21. In the middle of that week and the latter part of that week a kind of a lull set in on the battlefield. There wasn't much by way of North Vietnamese offensive action.

Q: They were close to Saigon.

LEHMANN: But, they were beginning to approach Saigon. It was shortly after that a rather tough battle at Swan Loc [Phonetic] where the ARVN had really distinguished themselves and fought very well, indeed. At that time there was, of course, some speculation as to the reason for that lull. There are two possibilities. One was that it reflected a political decision in Hanoi to have the whole business end in some form as an ostensible government of national reconciliation which they always said they had wanted. This would have been, of course, a complete farce --

Q: With the idea of negotiating with people who were neutral or had that reputation.

LEHMANN: With the idea of negotiating with Minh who had replaced Thieu. He was, therefore, from their standpoint the ideal candidate with whom to negotiate this charade or farce.

The other possibility, of course, was that, having conducted extensive offensive operations, they simply had a logistical problem and needed to regroup and reorganize. There is still a third possibility that it was a combination of both of those things. In any event, the first option I mentioned, if it was ever considered, was dismissed. In retrospect it is probably evident that the lull was due to a need to regroup, reorganize and look after their logistics.

Q: If they had had some resistance from the ARVN elements that had fought a bit more than people thought, perhaps.

LEHMANN: Yes. That certainly is so. However, none of this affected our evacuation operations which, as I said, continued. On Thursday I decided that the time had come for us to evacuate the last of the wives which were simply the wives of a senior officers including my own, Hank Woodrow's wife, Nancy Bennett, the wife of the political counselor, and one other lady and two children which we still had. They were the children of the divorced consular officer, Peter Orr, whom we had to retain because we needed him in our operation. I also had Mrs. Martin on that list but her name was deleted by the ambassador. In order to do this we had the Army send in a U-21 from Thailand because we didn't want to have the departure of the senior wives noted out where most of the evacuation was taking place. We also needed to maintain the fiction that they were simply going to Bangkok for an extended weekend. That was done on Friday, April 25.

The lull, as I mentioned, did continue through Sunday, April 27. Beginning on Monday morning, April 28, it became quite clear early on that the North Vietnamese were actively resuming their offensive operations. At about six o'clock in the late afternoon on Monday, April 28, a number of A-37 aircraft, obviously manned either by North Vietnamese or defecting South Vietnamese pilots, attacked the flight lines at the Tan Son Nhut airport.

At the time that occurred, I had just gone out of my office and gone out into the second courtyard of the embassy in the area where the swimming pool and the snack bar was located. I had gone there to straighten out the problem that was reported to me about having buses with evacuees leave from there to go to the airport. This was an area where we were assembling evacuees to bus them to the airport. I was told there was a problem of a delay and I had gone out to look after that just at the time that that air strike in Tan Son Nhut took place. Now, there have been some rather lurid accounts of that particular event. When the strike took place, it precipitated a certain amount of quite unnecessary rushing around and a bit of upset. I might note parenthetically here that, being a veteran of the Italian campaign of World War II including the Casino Line, the Anzio Beachhead and quite a few other events, I can differentiate between the difference of unfriendly high explosives coming down in your immediate vicinity in which case you would have a very strong, direct personal interest, and something that is happening a mile or two away. In that case you can afford to take a detached professional interest in what is going on. This strike out at Tan Son Nhut, lurid descriptions in some books to the contrary, was in the latter category. It was quite a distance away. There was no immediate danger to the embassy or anybody in the embassy. This did not prevent our very solicitous, protective Marines from immediately surrounding the minister with weapons drawn in order to protect him. This was very touching but it was somewhat overdone.

Q: This brings us to a side question of what was the system on assembly areas and movement to the Tan San Nhut airport for final evacuation? Obviously, you've indicated that the chancery itself was an assembly area and that buses were picking up people there. Were there other assembly areas and what was the plan of movement?

LEHMANN: On April 15, sometime earlier, we had activated an evacuee holding facility out at the DAO compound. The system was that anybody being evacuated by fixed-wing aircraft -- which, as I mentioned, were operating around the clock beginning April 21 -- would come out there or be bussed out there either from the embassy itself or from some other designated locations in town, notably staff housing areas.

Q: That system was still continuing at this late date?

LEHMANN: That was continuing at that late date until the air strike on the flight line at Tan Son Nhut on Monday evening. The attack on the flight line in which at least one C-130 was destroyed in effect ended the fixed-wing airlift.

Q: This was about what time?

LEHMANN: The air strike took place at six o'clock in the evening. After we had rather quickly assessed the situation and in the course of the next hour, a decision was made that it would be too risky to continue fixed-wing operations out of Tan Son Nhut because of the danger that we might lose an aircraft full of people.

Q: Were people then brought back into the housing areas that were already out there assembling?

LEHMANN: The people that were out at the DAO compound remained there. The people that were in the embassy at the time remained there for the time being. After we had made the decision to discontinue fixed-wing operations, the rest of the evening was taken up with reviewing the final plans for the increasing likelihood but not yet a decision that we would have to go to a helicopter evacuation -- which is technically known as option four of Frequent Winds" -- the following day.

That went on throughout the early evening. Shortly after midnight -- the night from Monday to Tuesday morning -- the ambassador decided that he and I should return to our residences and try to get some rest in view of the likelihood that a lot of major and crucial decisions had to be made the next day. I got back to my house between one o'clock and two o'clock in the morning. I tried to get some sleep.

Q: As you know, I'm involved in going to embassies on crisis management exercises. One of the things that I've stressed is -- and this comes up in the exercises -- the extreme importance of fatigue in desperate situations or critical situations and the need for people to consciously put aside time to recharge their batteries no matter how the man is. This is reflected in the last point that you were making about the ambassador's decision that you and he needed to get some sleep and for some of the others, too. I know earlier, too, at one point you mentioned having been awake for some huge number of hours. It must be all through this that there must have been the question of physical exhaustion confronting quite a number of people but particularly the senior staff that were so heavily engaged in the operation. Do you have any comments on what was done?

LEHMANN: I quite agree. That's important for all concerned to get some sort of rest. Otherwise, they become useless. With regard to most of the staff, we had earlier worked out a shift system. Because we had designated certain elements of the mission to worry about various categories of potential evacuees -- the defense attaché to worry about the Vietnamese military, the political section to worry about politicians, and other people to worry about relatives of Americans, etc. These things had gone on a shift basis somewhat earlier so that nobody would work more than about twelve hours or so. That was the attempt that was made.

For the absolute senior staff, it was on a more irregular basis. You got what rest whenever you could.

Q: This was an attempt to get it.

LEHMANN: Yes.

Q: There was a good deal written at various times about the large banyan tree that was located in the embassy courtyard and which became a symbol of what was to be done. There had been a number of rather lurid press accounts, for example, on the refusal of Ambassador Martin to agree to the removal of that large tree. It indicated to some that the embassy was out of touch with the realities of the situation, that the refusal to take down the tree meant that they did not understand the evacuation might have to occur and, obviously, the tree would have to come down if the helicopters were to come in. The situation would be amenable to evacuation. What was the real story?

LEHMANN: The helicopter evacuation plan called for some of the helicopters to land on the roof helipad and others -- notably the rather heavy CA-53s that the roof pad could not support -- land in the courtyard of the embassy where this famous, beautiful banyan tree was located. It always was obvious that, when push came to shove, the tree would have to come down. One of the problems here, however, was that the tree was not only large but it was also very visible from the street. The streets were getting increasingly crowded as panic was beginning to slowly develop in the city of Saigon. The removal of the tree would be a visible act that would undoubtedly spread like wild fire throughout the city.

As I was returning from the outer courtyard and surrounded by my solicitous Marines to go back to my office to assess the situation and try to find out just what had happened out at Tan Son Nhut, I was passing the tree. As I was passing the tree, one of our Seabees was vigorously but somewhat ineffectually chopping away at the tree with an axe in what was quite clearly a self-initiated attempt to clear the area for use as a helicopter landing zone. As I entered the embassy chancery building, I billed the security officer [Inaudible Portion] to promptly have the Seabee cease and desist from the rather ineffectual and somewhat premature efforts, to bring in some power tools such as chain saws, etc., have them ready, but not to take any action regarding the tree until instructed and until the time was right. I then forgot about the tree and turned on to other things that we discussed in response to an earlier question.

As a matter of fact, I'm not sure that Graham Martin ever knew anything about the tree.
[Laughter]

Q: You've had your sleep now and are fairly rested. We're brought up now to the early morning hours of Tuesday, April 29. What took place then? When and how were the crucial decisions made?

LEHMANN: I didn't really get any sleep. I got to bed between one and two and dozed off for a while. At about 4:15 A. M. I was roused from my dozing by a series of explosions out in the direction of the Tan Son Nhut airfield and the defense attaché compound. About ten minutes later at about 4:30 A. M. the phone rang and the report -- I don't recall now whether it was directly from the defense attaché or from an officer at the embassy chancery -- was that there had been a rocket attack on the DAO compound and that two of the embassy Marine security guards out there had been killed.

That, of course, ended the rest period. I got up, showered, went down, and Mr. Tooee, my major domo and butler, gave me some breakfast. I packed some extra underwear, an extra pair of socks and a couple of little things in my briefcase. I had a last conversation with my butler who had previously told me that he did not want to leave and wanted to remain. He was an elderly man. I made some final arrangements with him to get some money to him in addition to money he had already been given -- that's dollars, not piasters. That money, incidentally, was delivered later by Brunson McKinley and Bob Martin to him. After having a little breakfast, I went back to the chancery. Ambassador Martin arrived from his residence just a little bit later on. We jointly began to review the situation, getting reports from General Smith out at Tan Son Nhut as to the details of the rocket attack which intermittently continued throughout the area.

Q: Did they seem to be targeting the American compound there or was this a general attack on the airport?

LEHMANN: Other facilities were also being spotted, but it was the first time at a little after four that morning that an attack appeared to be targeted specifically on an American installation. The cause of the death of the two Marines was a direct hit on the sandbag emplacement in which they were. It was just one of those things.

Ambassador Martin decided to go out to Tan Son Nhut and review the situation out there personally with General Smith. While out there, he had a telephone conversation with General Scowcroft back here in Washington which, however, did not result as yet in a definite conclusion on whether or not we would continue fixed-wing airlift rather than go to option four of the evacuation plan.

Q: He was with the NSC?

LEHMANN: Yes. Fred Scowcroft. Ambassador Martin then returned to the embassy. Meanwhile, it became very clear that damage to runways at the airfield and other things made it quite impossible to continue a fixed-wing airlift. Ambassador Martin then got on the telephone again, this time from the chancery, with General Scowcroft. A decision to go to option four of Frequent Winds, the helicopter airlift was made between 10:30 and 10:40 on Tuesday morning.

The initial moves by helicopter directly out to the fleet were by Air America helicopter. We were using Air America, our own helicopters, first in the morning to move people from the assembly areas either to the embassy or to the DAO holding facilities out at the airfield. Later on, we initially were using the Air America helicopters to move evacuees directly out to the fleet. The plan called for the Marine ground security force to arrive at the DAO compound at Tan Son Nhut -- which had priority on the evacuation under our plan -- one hour after the option four execute order was given. To illustrate that plans would go wrong, the ground security force arrived three hours later and not one hour later. Of course, the first helicopter evacuees, using fleet and Marine Corps helicopters, were those same choppers that brought in the security force and then would lift evacuees back out.

Q: This was sometime in the afternoon.

LEHMANN: This was between one and two in the afternoon. That delay cost us something at the end of the whole operation. I found out much later that the reason for that delay was that there had to be some cross-loading out at the fleet to marry the Marines that were supposed to come in to secure both the DAO compound and the embassy compound and were not the same ships as the helicopters were. They had to move people around.

By early or mid-afternoon, the embassy was surrounded by masses of people -- mobs. The security situation became increasingly risky. It was only with some difficulty that we managed to get into the compound. Some people for whose evacuation we had really special responsibilities -- for example, Trang Kon Gu, the leader of the Vietnamese Labor Federation, and his people; Mu Vien, the minister of the interior; Tran Van Lam, the former foreign minister who had signed the Paris agreement. Nonetheless, all this was accomplished, but the security situation was really getting touchy. I, therefore, telephoned the General who was out at the DAO compound and told him that we urgently needed about a platoon of additional Marines in addition to our embassy guards in the compound in order to maintain the security. These arrived about an hour later. The famous tree, incidentally, had been removed and gotten out of the way well ahead of time.

I was not in Ambassador Martin's office when he had the conversation with Washington which resulted in the decision to execute the helicopter lift, but several of the other senior staff people were. I was busy in my own office doing various other things on the telephone. After the decision was made, Hank Woodrow walked over into my office, told me the decision was made, and I went back to see Graham Martin to have it confirmed to me directly. I then walked out and told the security officer now to chop down that tree. The tree was chopped down long before anybody was ready to arrive by helicopter in the embassy courtyard. Timing was, indeed, quite adequate.

Q: Incidentally, now that we're at the point where the mobs are outside and the additional Marines are being brought or had just been brought in from Tan Son Nhut, what was the situation in regard to the dispositions of the American community? Were they all in the embassy compound? Were some in the compound, some at Tan Son Nhut, and some in the housing compounds, or what?

LEHMANN: By the time we're talking about, all Americans still in the area were either at the DAO compound or in the embassy compound. A little bit earlier some of the last ones, including some journalists, had arrived at the compound and gotten through into the compound only with some difficulty to get through the crowds. I should be quite accurate here. All those who wanted to leave -- there was one fellow, a contractor who turned out later on to somehow not get the word. It was his own fault. He was left behind. Then, of course, there were a couple of journalists who stayed on deliberately.

Q: By this time now we are getting the helicopter airlift going. As I understand it, the people were being removed by helicopter to two locations, both at Tan Son Nhut and from the embassy compound. Presumably, in the latter, since the banyan tree was cut down, you would have the larger helicopters landing in the courtyard and the smaller types landing on the embassy roof. Is that correct?

LEHMANN: The priority was evacuation from the DAO compound at Tan Son Nhut. So most of the initial lift by helicopter went out of the DAO compound. That operation was completed by 2000, 8:00 in the evening on Tuesday. On its completion, General Smith and the few remaining DAO staff left a few minutes after eight that evening. That ended that phase of the operation.

Up until that time, we had relatively little lift out of the embassy compound. It is correct, of course, that that lift -- which was really only beginning in the mid-afternoon out of the embassy compound -- did involve the lighter helicopters, the CH-46s -- from the roof. The heavy ones, the CH-53s, were from the courtyard where the famous banyan tree had previously been. We were putting as many as 70 people into a CH-53 which was overloading it somewhat. Since many of them were Vietnamese, they were rather small --

Q: Given the fact that you had these crowds -- mobs, even -- outside the embassy gates and a great deal of pandemonium and confusion going on, was there any effort by the mobs or people in them to interfere with the landing of the CH-53 aircraft into the compound?

LEHMANN: Not in any significant way. All these poor people were desperately trying to do was to try to get into the compound with the hope that somehow they might be taken out. There was an occasional shot fired from outside the compound, but we could not really determine whether that was directed at an incoming helicopter or not. In any event, it did not in any way interfere with the operation. At this point, we did have enough Marines to secure both the inner and the outer embassy compound, although occasionally someone might have slipped in who shouldn't have. It did not affect anything.

In the course of the evening -- and I can't remember exactly when it was, but I suspect it was around 8:30 or 9:00 in the evening -- the military suggested that we suspend further helicopter operations for the time being and resume them at first light the next morning. The ambassador and I vetoed that very promptly and insisted that we would have to continue the operation throughout the night. That insistence was based on both what the intelligence were still able to gather about the North Vietnamese -- and there were some that were still available to us -- and on a judgement that the situation around the embassy, even with the larger Marine detachment was becoming increasingly untenable.

At that point we may have had somewhere between 1,000 and 1,500 people in the compound, both American and Vietnamese with a heavy preponderance of Vietnamese. During the night, therefore, the lift continued although at times there would be long intervals which, in our view, were excessively long intervals between arriving helicopters from the fleet. I understand, and I think we understood then, that there were deep problems of refueling, fatigue of the crews, etc. But it was clear that the operation definitely had to continue and could not be stopped and resumed the next morning.

Q: Were you able to set up lights so they could see their way in?

LEHMANN: There was no problem about that. They could see their way in. The situation in the courtyard was dealt with by having embassy cars parked around the perimeter of the courtyard with the headlights on. That illuminated the courtyard situation which was a tricky thing for the pilots. It was very tricky because of walls and antennas and other mass nearby that they had to get over before they could clear the courtyard with their heavy loads.

One of the things that became a matter of some concern is that sometime during the time around midnight or a little bit later it began to rain just very lightly. Remember, we were now in April and now at the beginning of the monsoon. It began to rain very lightly, and the mere fact of water on the hulls of the helicopters added to their weight. So we had one very critical moment where a pilot with a load full of people tried to lift out of the courtyard and could not get enough altitude. He had to put back down and they had to unload some people off before he could get out.

Q: They probably didn't want to get off.

LEHMANN: No. They did not want to get off. So that was a moment of great concern because, if we had an accident in the courtyard with a broken helicopter, that would have finished the lift out of the courtyard and we would have had to rely entirely on the smaller choppers coming in on the roof.

Q: How many could they take out? Was there quite a difference?

LEHMANN: There was quite a difference. As I said, we could put as many as 70 people in the CH-53s, and I think the maximum number of CH-46s might have been about 40.

Q: That was about a two-to-one difference.

LEHMANN: Close to two-to-one difference. At the same time, we were also destroying a few last documents by burning up on the rooftop.

Q: We continue on with this process. I guess the only thing to ask before we get into the final last withdrawal is were you getting any panic among the Vietnamese and also the Americans -- all the people that were still waiting their turn to leave as time went on? Were there priorities among them? Were they waiting orderly, particularly since I know that some people were left behind at the end? In other words, was this anticipated by some of them?

LEHMANN: No. There was no panic among any of the people. We had people waiting in the courtyard. We had people waiting in the stairwell of the chancery building to go up to the rooftop, but there was no panic. At one point, when we had reduced the number still waiting to a more manageable proportion, we abandoned the outer embassy courtyard -- the area where the swimming pool, the snack bar and the administrative section was -- and removed everybody into the inner courtyard which gave us also a smaller perimeter to protect against the crowd outside.

As to priorities, well, you know, your priorities as far as we were concerned -- the first obligations, of course, to Americans. Certainly, the second was to any high-risk Vietnamese, to our employees. But, we did not have a priority question as such arise. The small group that in the end was left behind that I mentioned earlier, largely due to the fact that the entire lift operation began about two to three hours later than it should have, was a mix of Vietnamese and Koreans.

Q: Let's get down to the final hours and deep into the night. I guess the final pull-out you mentioned was about six o'clock in the morning. I recall that Ambassador Graham Martin went out before you, apparently because of a direct order from the President to do so. Can you get into the last few loads, you might say?

LEHMANN: At about four o'clock in the morning, the ambassador and I went to the remaining communications setup, the last one. We sent our final message. The date-time group of that message was 291215 Zulu which, of course, is Greenwich time. The message said, "Plan to close mission about 0430, 30 April local time. This is the last message from Embassy Saigon."

After that message was sent, the communicator disabled the communications setup. He did whatever he had to do to protect the remaining [Inaudible Portion]. He got in line to leave. We were not, however, out of communications because we still had a link all the way back to Washington through the MACPAC radio of a Marine with the Marine security force and the major commanding that force. After we sent the message, there was really nothing much else for us to do. We waited while the operation was continuing to try to get as many people out of the courtyard as possible.

At some time a little later -- it might have been around 4:30 -- a very peremptory message did come through direct from the White House where they were monitoring the situation directing the ambassador and the remaining staff to leave by the next helicopter. We considered that for a while and let the operation continue still for a while longer. Finally, after some consultation between myself and the Marine major, decided that the time had come for the ambassador and the rest of us to leave. Initially, through an error we all went downstairs rather than upstairs because the thought was we were going to leave on one of the bigger helicopters. But, that was not to be. The ambassador and remaining staff trooped on up to the rooftop where one CH-46 was just landing and another one was hovering not far away. As the CH-46 landed, Ambassador Martin along with George Jacobson, Tom Holgar, and a few others started walking towards the helicopter. Some of the rest of us began to follow, but that crew chief knew when he had his man. What his orders were, as soon as he got the ambassador on board, all the people who have to be right along next to him. He waved the rest of us back and the helicopter took off.

Q: Not full, I gather.

LEHMANN: Not entirely full. It had some other people on it. It had some remaining mission warden guards on it who helped the control of all of this and a few other people, but it was not entirely full. Shortly thereafter, the next CH-46 put down on the rooftop, and the rest of us -- which included Hank Woodrow, Joe Bennett, Brunson McKinley, Jim Devine, an officer named Jay Blowers, and the last mission warden guards boarded that helicopter which became really very jammed and crowded. We stayed up on the rooftop for about twenty to twenty-five minutes because the Marine major, who was doing a very competent job of running things out in the courtyard, was using the helicopter's radio to firm up his final plans for extracting the Marine detachment which was the final step, of course. So we sat there for about twenty minutes while he was working that out over the radio. We lifted off according to my records at 5:20 in the morning.

Q: You don't know the Marine officer's name by any chance, do you?

LEHMANN: Sorry. I should, but I don't.

Q: How long did it take to get out to the fleet and what happened when you arrived?

LEHMANN: It took about a half an hour or a little bit more -- maybe about 45 minutes. As we were leaving the Saigon area, I could look out the helicopter and I could see the approaching North Vietnamese columns with their headlights out and beginning to enter the outskirts of the city. Our exit was covered by armed aircraft from the fleet. That had been the case throughout this whole thing.

Q: But, there was no interference from the North Vietnamese?

LEHMANN: There was no interference. There was no attempt to interfere. I think that was probably intentional. It took about 45 minutes to get out to the fleet. Our helicopter landed on the Denver, which was an LPD, a landing platform dock. It had Marines on it and assault boats and helicopters. The ambassador and those with him, meanwhile, had gone out to the Blueridge, so we were separated at this point. Arriving at the Denver, the first thing that the Navy made sure of was that nobody had any weapons on them. I was deprived of one little mace thing that I had with me. I think Woodrow was deprived of a revolver he had which I'm not sure he ever recovered. Except for that, they were very solicitous and gave us a lot of food to eat. They gave us an initially rather crowded place to sleep, but that was sorted out later on.

Q: You stayed on the ship until it got to the Philippines?

LEHMANN: The fleet stayed out. After the evacuation was completed -- the Marines, incidentally, were extracted from the compound by about seven o'clock in the morning or a little bit before, perhaps, moving up through the building gradually and abandoning the courtyard which was immediately taken over by the crowds. They took away typewriters and anything else they could find.

Q: There were no incidents in the Marine departure?

LEHMANN: There were no incidents, and there were no casualties of any kind throughout except the two Marines that were killed early on in the day by that direct hit which, I think, was quite an accomplishment.

The fleet did not move out. The fleet remained on station, anchored out in the South China Sea about 25 miles offshore or something like that for a number of days. They picked up additional people -- Vietnamese -- coming out on boats and barges. All toll, about another 60,000 people came out on boats and barges while the fleet stayed out there. They were largely put on some MSTS transports that were with the fleet. I have forgotten just how long we stayed out there. I think it was about three or four days before we sailed into Subic Bay.

Q: Wolf, I believe we've covered the entire sequence from the beginning, over a period of a month and a half to two months, up until the final arrival of yourself and Ambassador Martin and the others at the fleet. Probably, we've forgotten a few things here and there. One thing I remember, for example, that I wanted to cover and didn't and that we might clean up is how the warden system worked. We might also have another final point on the total number of people that were involved in the evacuation.

LEHMANN: The mission warden system worked pretty well. During the evacuation period, we used the Americans in the mission warden system, largely either to drive or escort buses -- often to escort buses -- that were bringing people from assembly points either to the embassy or to the DAO holding facilities. At the end, I mentioned earlier, at the end among the last to be evacuated were most of these American mission warden guards. Of course, the warden system also had a lot of Vietnamese guards that were under contract which, for example, provided the guards at my house, etc. On the whole it worked well. There was a fatigue factor at one point with the American mission warden guards. In fact, that played a role on the problem that arose with moving the people from the embassy to the DAO compound on Monday afternoon just before the 8:37 attack.

Q: What kind of people were these wardens? One thing that I found in a somewhat similar situation was -- and I always raise this in the exercise that we hold -- the importance of insuring that the wrong people were not made wardens. In other words, you have to be very careful that senior staff are not named wardens, people that would be occupied with other things. So you are trying to get people that have good heads, are stable, are not too emotional on the one hand but on the other hand also will have the time to do this and not be pulled off to do other essential jobs that are their primary responsibility.

LEHMANN: Yes, I see what you mean. Of course, the thing that I was talking about is a little bit different because these were full-time hired wardens that I was talking about. As far as the people detailed from the normal mission stand as wardens were concerned, we had that also, of course. We didn't encounter any particular difficulties on that score, but perhaps that was so in our case because it was a very large mission with an awful lot of people. We could insure that the right people were selected and there weren't these overlaps. The same kind of thing may not be true for an embassy or a mission of a much smaller size [as it was for] the immense mission that we had in Saigon.

Q: Why don't we go on now to the number of people that were involved.

LEHMANN: As to the number, we started with 5,886 U. S. Government personnel, U. S. contractors, and dependents at about the first of March of 1975. Between April 4 and April 24, we evacuated by commercial or military means a total of 27,000 people of all kinds -- Vietnamese and third country nationals. Between the April 25 and early on April 29 -- the crucial day -- in those four days we evacuated about another 27,000, mostly by military fixed-wing airlift -- by far the largest number. The helicopter lifts on the April 29 and into April 30 lifted about 7,500 out of the Saigon area. After that, another 14,000 -- almost all Vietnamese with a few Americans -- came out to the fleet by boats and barges generally in conformity with the plans for the use of boats and barges.

Q: Were these to a great extent out of MR-4?

LEHMANN: These were both MR-4 and MR-3, some from the nearby Saigon area. That made a total of 75,500 approximately evacuated under the plan, either by air or surface. In addition to those, another 60,000 Vietnamese came out to the fleet in the course of the 29th and a few days thereafter that the fleet remained anchored offshore. Those were largely by some form of surface transport -- a boat or a phalange, etc. Included in that number is a relatively small number, largely of Vietnamese military who came out with their own helicopters.

Q: Of course, we all know that in the years to follow enormous numbers came later, but that was a different situation. That was not a part of this final evacuation, but it was the escape after the North Vietnamese takeover had been completed.

LEHMANN: Yes, that was a completely different thing.

MONCRIEFF J. SPEAR
Consul General
Nha Trang (1973-1975)

Moncrieff J. Spear served in the U.S. Navy during World War II, and finished his degree at Cornell University when the war was over. Mr. Spear was accepted into the Foreign Service in 1950 and subsequently served in Germany, the Philippines, Yugoslavia, Thailand, the Bahamas, Vietnam, as well as several Washington, DC posts in the European Bureau, Country Director for Thailand-Burma Affairs, the OES and the Human Rights Commission in the House of Representatives. Mr. Spear was interviewed by Thomas J. Dunnigan in 1993.

Q: How did your role as consul general change when independence came to the Bahamas?

SPEAR: Well, I was chargé d'affaires there for a brief period, until Ron Spiers came down as Ambassador. Our main activity was trying to arrange negotiations on the military bases, most of which were left over from the World War II period, when they had been part of the old [1940] destroyers-for-bases agreement, which President Roosevelt concluded with Prime Minister Churchill. The Bahamian Government would be taking over a lot of these bases, and there were very few of them that we wanted to continue to use. So we had teams down from Washington and were carrying on very active negotiations right up until independence, when we were able to get these matters worked out -- or at least the ones we were most interested in -- and arrange for subsequent negotiations on the rest.

We certainly had a very active social life there, too. Prince Charles had come to represent Queen Elizabeth, as they used to say in those days "giving small islands away." What used to be known at Government House as the "flotsam and jetsam of Empire," which Britain was still trying to shed. We arranged to have the U. S. Navy "Blue Angels" [aerial acrobatics team] do an aerial demonstration for the independence celebration.

I was only there for a few days before the pressure began to mount to get on to my next assignment in Vietnam. Ambassador Martin, who was now our new Ambassador, had asked me to come and join his staff there.

Q: I see. And what position did you occupy on the staff in Vietnam?

SPEAR: Well, I moved on to another, larger Consulate General. This was the one at Nha Trang, on the coast in Vietnam, about half way between Saigon and Da Nang. It covered all of the Central Highlands area, the most mountainous areas of Central Vietnam. In fact, our consular district comprised almost 50% of the land area of South Vietnam.

Q: That was to be my question. Why would we have a post at a place like Nha Trang?

SPEAR: Because the Embassy and the four Consulates General set up there, one in each of the major regions of [South] Vietnam, really had inherited most of the enormous military assistance, economic assistance, public affairs programs, and all of the other things that were being carried on there to support the South Vietnamese Government and its forces, following the withdrawal of American military forces.

Q: Well, now, of course, when you were there, direct American participation in the fighting in Vietnam had ended, and troops had been withdrawn.

SPEAR: That's right.

Q: But that hadn't ended the North Vietnamese aggression.

SPEAR: No, indeed. The Paris Accords [of 1973] had been signed. The original idea when we went out there was that we were going to be monitoring the implementation of the Paris Accords. So we really went out there as a sort of peacekeeping force, working with the ICCS, the International Control Commission, which had been set up with the Canadians, the Indonesians, the Hungarians, [the Indians, and later the Iranians, who replaced the Canadians] to monitor the accords. My staff helped to arrange an exchange of prisoners of war between the Vietnamese sides. But the pressure which had forced me to break off from the Bahamas and get out to Vietnam right away was that a pitched battle was forming up there in the highlands around Kontum. That battle had ended just about the time I got there, but there was continuing fighting that went on during all of the 18 months I was there, from September 1973 until the evacuation in April, 1975. There was heavy fighting between division-sized forces of the South Vietnamese Army with North Vietnamese divisions which had moved into South Vietnam.

I should explain that these were really pitched battles between regular forces. This was no longer an insurgency.

Q: In other words, they had artillery, tanks, and all of the panoply of modern warfare?

SPEAR: Exactly, yes. The one thing that the South Vietnamese forces had which the North Vietnamese forces did not have was a modest Air Force.

I had people on my staff from the Defense Attaché's office [in the Embassy in Saigon], which took over some of the functions of the old MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam], a military assistance headquarters, handling all manner of military supplies to the South Vietnamese Army, Navy, and Air Force. I had about 100 Americans on my staff and about 700 Vietnamese. I had province representatives in each of the 12 provinces which comprised the consular area. In these offices would be a staff of anywhere from two or three to a half dozen Americans -- agricultural experts, community development advisers, highway engineers, the whole panoply of economic assistance there. Then we had USIA officers in the field of public affairs, carrying on the business of telling the American story abroad but also assisting the Vietnamese in some of their efforts, doing similar things to what we had been doing out in Thailand, trying to assist the government to win the hearts and minds of its own people.

Q: How many of you on the Nha Trang staff were actually Foreign Service Officers?

SPEAR: I don't think that there were more than a half dozen of us. Most of the people assigned to the Consulate General in Nha Trang were AID [Agency for International Development] personnel. The Defense Attaché people, of course, were civilian employees of DOD [Department of Defense]. We didn't have any regular military officers attached to the staff. They used to come up on temporary duty from Saigon. We actually had a small "air force" attached to the staff. We had an old DC-3, which I used to do a regular courier run around the 12 provinces, every other day or so. We had a fleet of about a half dozen helicopters and a couple of fast, propeller-driven, passenger aircraft to get around in. So it was a very substantial establishment there.

Q: These province reps you mentioned. Were they Foreign Service Officers?

SPEAR: No, most of those were AID people, though there were one or two Foreign Service Officers who came up on temporary detail and were sent out to the provinces. We used to do a great deal of reporting, including a certain amount of military reporting on the fighting still going on. We did political reporting on developments in the area and tried to keep our finger on the pulse, reporting the progress of various AID development programs as well.

Q: Did we expect the heavy North Vietnamese attack that began in January 1975?

SPEAR: Yes, as a matter of fact our intelligence had been quite good on that, although I must say that the [South] Vietnamese intelligence up in the Central Vietnam highlands left a lot to be desired. In strategic terms, yes, we had gotten from defectors and other sources the outlines of the North Vietnamese plans for the takeover of South Vietnam. It was to be in two stages. It was thought that they would try to break the back of the South Vietnamese forces in 1975. 1976 would be the year when they cleaned up and occupied the entire country.

In the II Corps area [Central Vietnam], which the Consulate General in Nha Trang covered, the North Vietnamese plans to cut the major highways and to cut the Central Highlands off from the coastal area had been obtained. And the South Vietnamese forces had done quite a good job in getting this intelligence. Then, when the attack actually started, things went exactly according to the [North Vietnamese] plan. But, unfortunately, the South Vietnamese forces were not able to break out and keep these highways open. The communists also did a very effective job of putting in a surprise attack on one of the capitals up in the highlands, Ban Me Thuot. They brought a several-division-sized force in there. They were able, consequently, to break the back and destroy one of the South Vietnamese divisions, as a result of which the military balance tipped very substantially, and the remaining South Vietnamese forces at the [provincial] capital in Pleiku were forced to carry out an evacuation down to the coast. But before this happened, our province representative, Paul Struharik, who had been there in Ban Me Thuot, was cut off from the outside. He and a group of American missionaries and others, about a half dozen of them, were captured by the North Vietnamese forces. It was not until after the fall of Saigon [in April, 1975] that we were finally able to negotiate their release through the International Control Commission.

We had also been asked if we could try to rescue some of the Iranians, Hungarians, and Indonesians [in the International Control Commission] who had some of their people captured at Ban Me Thuot, as well. But we were unable to effect that.

The major point however, was that the South Vietnamese and [their] commanding general in II Corps, went ahead and started evacuating out of Pleiku without informing the Americans. We didn't find out about their efforts to bring a column down to the sea until after the evacuation had started. At that point we became heavily involved, using our fleet of planes and helicopters to get our own people out. What proved to be a much heavier burden was getting our local staff of Vietnamese employees and their numerous family members out of various posts in the highlands which were coming under very heavy attack. A number of our people ran some very serious risks and were very courageous in the face of great danger as they tried to get their Vietnamese employees out. We did succeed in getting a very substantial proportion, a very high percentage of them, down to Nha Trang. But because the communists had cut off the main roads coming down to the coast from the highlands, the [South] Vietnamese forces under General Phu tried to come down over an old road which had been abandoned after the French had left Vietnam [in 1954]. It really was a dirt road trail that led down and then tapered off as it got below the escarpment that dropped off to the sea. So the North Vietnamese forces were able to catch up with the tail of this [South Vietnamese] military column, retreating down this old road. And the column had been followed by thousands and thousands of civilians. The [North Vietnamese] began shelling the end of the column there. And the whole thing became just an utter rout.

Meantime, I remember going up with my own people to where the [South] Vietnamese forces on the coast were trying to fight their way up to this column. And eventually, with some heroic work, [South] Vietnamese engineers bridged a large river that these forces had to get across, a sort of rag tag, bob tail, group was finally able to fight its way down to the coast. But the thing was a horrible tragedy, and thousands and thousands of civilians died of thirst and hunger on this horrible march down to the sea.

Q: By this time you had to be thinking about the danger to Nha Trang and the possibility of having to close the post there.

SPEAR: That's right. We had been trying to get people out because one of the things that I had learned during all of this was that the more people you got out earlier, the easier it was when push came to shove at the very end. One of the things that we had learned from the evacuation at Pleiku was that one of our greatest dangers was from panic at the airfields and other places involving armed soldiers or armed civilians from units which had completely lost their unit integrity and had become an armed rabble. They would try to seize planes and trucks and any form of transportation to get away. It began reaching the point where there were hundreds of these people. One of my colleagues in Saigon used to refer to them as "rattlesnakes." They were loose there in the town, in Nha Trang. And, of course, these young soldiers hadn't been fed or paid and were really desperate, trying to look after themselves. But, of course, they were prepared to do some of this at gun point, if necessary. It really was a terribly dangerous situation.

Under these circumstances we had been trying to put up a good front and to express our confidence that the [South] Vietnamese would be able to stabilize the military situation and establish an effective front. But in the meantime we were sluicing people out the back door as hard and fast as we could, evacuating them to Saigon. I'm afraid that our effort was so successful that there have been all sorts of charges -- and I've got half a dozen books about the fall of Vietnam up there [on my bookshelves], in which accusations were made that we were doing nothing at all to evacuate people. This simply reflected the success of our efforts to maintain calm and avoid setting off the kind of panic which would have made it impossible for us to get any of these people evacuated. It would have resulted in their falling into North Vietnamese hands.

We had been doing fairly well on this until about Easter time. And over that Easter weekend -- no, it was the weekend after -- we got orders to send all of the planes, which had been handling evacuations out of Nha Trang, up to I Corps, where Al Francis, who was the Consul General [in Da Nang] was in the last and really desperate stages of evacuation. So we had to stop [our evacuation efforts] just as the panic was reaching its height, and the [North] Vietnamese forces were approaching Nha Trang. We lost a whole weekend there by sending the airplanes up to I Corps to evacuate the Consulate General in Da Nang. But given the situation that they were in, they certainly should have had and did have the priority call. This resulted in the fact that on April 1 we finally had to begin evacuating ourselves. The province chief and the [South Vietnamese] Military Police forces lost all control of the city [of Nha Trang], and communist prisoners were released from the jails by communist sympathizers in the city. We started to evacuate people out of the airport. Well, it wasn't long before the situation got so bad, with gunfire around the city, that we had to give up evacuation by bus and by car to the airport, which was about a mile or so from the Consulate General, and start evacuating people by helicopter from its compound. This went on pretty much for the better part of one day, during which we were getting people out. The Consulate General had a fence around it and walls, but we discovered that all sorts of people who shouldn't be there were getting in over the walls. As we were drawing down on the number of Americans, we simply couldn't keep control of the situation there in the compound.

So finally, my deputy, Phil Cook, and I arranged that I would go out to the airport and take charge of activities out there. My administrative officer had previously been doing this, getting people on the planes. Phil would take the last small group and pull out of the courtyard at the Consulate General, where the helicopters had been landing. When I got out to the airport -- I had this walky-talky radio -- I received a desperate message from Phil that the helicopters were being fired on. At that point I could see that the helicopter going into the compound at the Consulate General was making its final approach. They did get Phil out, but I think that that was one of the worst moments I had during that whole damned evacuation.

Then we continued to get people aboard the planes there [at the airport], but at about 5:00 PM, as dusk was approaching, I got word that we were to pull out the last remaining Americans and get ourselves out of there. We tried to get back word that we still hadn't gotten many of our Vietnamese employees out, but the orders were that we were to go anyhow. At this point I discovered that the local Air America staff [at the airport], who had been handling the ramps and getting people up on the planes, and so forth, were no longer available. We all made a dash for the helicopters and pulled out. It was certainly a bitter blow to have to leave these Vietnamese employees behind.

Q: You spoke of orders coming, Monty. Where did they come from -- the Embassy in Saigon?

SPEAR: They came from the Embassy, from Ambassador Martin, yes. I believe that they reflected orders that may have come out of Washington. As we were leaving, we were able to get word back to the helicopter pilots. There were some American ships and barges that had come down from I Corps and stopped in the harbor at Nha Trang. We told the helicopter pilots that if they could evacuate the employees that we had left behind, without subjecting themselves to fire, they should get them out on the ships and the barges. It's a funny thing. I was convinced that we had not been able to get these people out. It was only when I got back to Washington, two or three months later, that I read a report which indicated that several hundred more had been able to get out onto the barges and ships and went down by sea to Saigon.

We had left a considerable group of [Vietnamese] employees at the airport. One of our senior Vietnamese employees had gone to the commanding general of the [South Vietnamese] Air Force, which was stationed at the air field at Nha Trang. He explained to him that they had been abandoned by the Americans. He prevailed on the general to evacuate a large number of them down to Saigon. A few days later, when I was in Saigon, I got an extremely bitter note from this Vietnamese employee about the way in which the Americans had "used" the Vietnamese and then thrown them aside and abandoned them. I think that that was one of the most painful episodes of the whole experience in Vietnam.

Q: Well, tensions were high, of course, in those days, and anger, fear, and many other emotions obviously were close to the surface.

SPEAR: Yes, of course.

Q: So you were evacuated to Saigon where, presumably, Lois had preceded you. What was her role during this period?

SPEAR: Lois had had all sorts of visitors from the time the offensive first began. The wives of some of the leading [South] Vietnamese officials around town would come around to see whether we were packing up and what we were doing. Lois had been trying to maintain a calm front and give the impression that we had complete confidence in the [South] Vietnamese and that we were not pulling out on them. After a while -- particularly after things got hotter and closer and we had all of these disorganized troops around town -- Lois said that she just couldn't stand it, sitting over there in the house. At this point the Consular Section, which had been registering Americans and getting the evacuation organized, had simply been overwhelmed. So both Lois and the wife of my administrative officer went over there and helped to register people and get the word out to Americans when the planes and flights were ready, how to get their baggage and effects ready to go, and so forth.

Lois had also been working prior to that time, teaching English, because she has a degree in linguistics, at the local community college in Nha Trang. Just before the [North Vietnamese] offensive [began], she had given one of her classes their final exam. We had had some visitors there -- old friends of ours, Al and Jill Stoffel -- who just happened to arrive as visitors just as the offensive kicked off. Lois had agreed to go on down to Saigon to help them get their flight. Then she came back up [to Nha Trang] and by this time had corrected all of the examinations. Again, as part of this business of keeping calm and trying to avoid panic she had gone out to the school and given all of the students their various grades on their examinations. She left [Nha Trang] the day before I did. Unfortunately, she hadn't been able to pack a small suitcase for me. Literally, I walked out of that office [in the Consulate General in Nha Trang] with the clothes on my back. I was very glad that she had been able to get down [to Saigon] the day before and get some things. Ever since I was married I thought that I had married the most wonderful person in the world. By the time that evacuation was over, I was absolutely certain of that.

Q: Well, I subscribe to that, Monty, as you know. Again, Lois is a wonderful example of what a Foreign Service wife can do in a crisis and what she does do. Now, how long did you stay in Saigon?

SPEAR: For a couple of weeks. My staff and I had been manning flights in the high speed, propeller-driven aircraft up over the area, trying to mark the advance of the North Vietnamese forces. I remember that on [April 2], the day after we evacuated [the Consulate General], Nha Trang lay there, more or less an open city, with no forces from either side there. But then, on the following day [April 3], when my deputy [Phil Cook] flew up there, the plane was fired on by anti-aircraft guns. It wasn't hit or anything, but at that point they knew that the North Vietnamese forces were in there. We continued these flights, then, charting the advance of the North Vietnamese forces down the coast, until it became obvious that they had overrun all of II Corps, our consular district.

Now, as I mentioned earlier, one of the things that I discovered was that the more people that you can get out in an evacuation earlier, the less hairy things become for you at the very end. A lot of my staff had been reassigned, trying to get refugees resettled and so forth. But after discussion with Ambassador Martin we agreed that I should set an example and try and get some of my staff, who were no longer being reassigned to other duties [in Vietnam], out of the country. We left [Vietnam] about the middle of April 1975.

Q: And you proceeded where -- back to Washington?

SPEAR: Yes, then I came back to Washington and went immediately to work on a task force which had been set up in the Operations Center to handle the Washington end of the evacuation out of Vietnam. Much of my experience, of course, was put to pretty good use on the Washington end of things.

FRANK G. WISNER
Deputy Consul General
Can Tho (1973)

Vietnam Task Force
Washington, DC (197?-1976)

Ambassador Frank G. Wisner was born in New York in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1961. He was stationed in Saigon, Dinh Tuong Province, Tuyen Duc Province, Tunis, Algiers, and Dacca. He later served as Ambassador to Zambia, Egypt, the Philippines, and India. Ambassador Wisner was interviewed by Richard L. Jackson on March 22, 1998.

WISNER: Called back to Vietnam twice.

Q: Called back? In that period?

WISNER: In that period. That's right. Once, as I noted earlier, as an inspector to review the performance of Foreign Service Officers in the embassy and in the pacification missions, notably in the southern part of Vietnam. And then my assignment was really effectively curtailed by the Paris Peace Agreement and the need -- as the last American military and pacification officers wound down -- to replace them and allow Washington to monitor the course of the Paris Agreement by building up strong Consulates General in Da Nang and in Nha Trang and in Bien Hoa and in Can Tho. I went out as Deputy Consul General in Can Tho in the fourth region with foreign service officers in the key provinces of the Delta following how the first months of the new post-peace, Paris Peace Agreement, were playing out in Vietnam, and that in effect was an assignment that lasted six months. But it ended my life in Tunisia, and it forced me into a new assignment -- which, as it turned out, I volunteered to look at in a part of the world I'd never seen that I figured by its very weight and substance would make it a player in world affairs and I wanted to understand more about -- took me to South Asia and to the head of the political section in Bangladesh in the time immediately following the independence of Bangladesh from Pakistan and the end of the Indian-Pak War over Bangladesh.

Q: Before we get there, there is a book just out by Terry McNamara on his closure of a consulate in Vietnam in that period and a dramatic escape. Did you have any close calls in getting out at that time?

WISNER: No. You see I left well before Terry's period. Terry came at the fall of Vietnam, Terry was our last Consul General in Can Tho and he led a riverine patrol with his staff down the Mekong and out to the sea. I monitored that from my position on the task force in Washington. But I had long since left Vietnam and was on my way to Bangladesh, where I was to serve just under a year and back to Washington and then the collapse of Vietnam which surrounds the events that set the stage for Terry McNamara's story.

Q: This was a transitional period then to the Secretary's Office? Those six months.

WISNER: Well, I was there for about six months and then, as I described earlier, Vietnam began to crumble, and Carol Laise released me to go up and be part of the evacuation effort, so I was really pulled free. By the time I finished that, I was remarried and or getting -- I was courting Christine -- not remarried but had been approached by Joe Sisco to join his office as his senior foreign service staff officer as part of the seventh floor effort. That's how I first appeared on the seventh floor, invited to join Joe Sisco's office, leave the task force, turn it over, and then start to work with Joe.

PARKER W. BORG
Member of Peace Agreement Monitor Team
Pleiku (1974)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Well then, off to Vietnam.

BORG: So we go off to Vietnam.

Q: This would be from when to when?

BORG: This was about January of 1974, and I stayed there through May of 1974. There were some 30 or 40 of us who went back. They divided the country up into consulates general and assigned each one of us to a separate province, and we were provincial political reporters. I think the conception was that the peace treaty had been signed - this was certainly the conception that I had - that it was very likely that the North Vietnamese would succeed in taking over the country within a short period of time, and they wanted people on the ground to observe just exactly what happened and how it happened and what sort of abuses of the treaty might take place. But I don't think there was much optimism that the government of South Vietnam was going to survive for very long with the departure of the American troops.

Q: What was the reading of the government of South Vietnam which you were getting from people at this time?

BORG: I guess I don't really understand.

Q: You'd been in the Director General's office and all. Were you still talking to your colleagues who were coming back from Vietnam and all?

BORG: Well, I was out in Vietnam. I was part of the group that went out...

Q: No, before you went out, or just when you got out there.

BORG: My impression before I got there was that the process of Vietnamization had continued to work quite successfully and that the things which we had put in place before I left were continuing to move ahead, that the Viet Cong was not a serious problem, that it was increasingly peaceful in many, many parts of the country, that there were economic projects and economic development activities going on, and that the problem was a political problem in the United States. I guess I had seen that there were two problems. There was the growing irritation over continuing the prosecution of this military action on the part of the US Congress and there was a disconnect between the senior levels of the South Vietnamese government and what was going on in the provinces, that Thieu and Ky, who were president and vice president, I guess, at about that time, were running things much the way they had before and that things happened in the provinces sort of irrespective of what they might have said and done.

Q: The group that you went out with, I take it this was an ordered group rather than...

BORG: Oh, yes, it was an ordered group. We had some of the best Vietnamese speakers in the country, people who had served in distinguished roles in the embassy or in provincial programs but who generally spoke Vietnamese, people like Frank Wisner, Paul Hare, Dick Teare, a lot of very able Foreign Service Officers.

Q: How about Tony Lake and Richard Holbrook?

BORG: They had been at the National Security Council, and Tony Lake had resigned in '73 over Cambodia and Holbrook may have left at about that time too, so they were no longer in the Foreign Service. They were not part of this.

Q: Did the people, although they were ordered, go...?

BORG: There was no hint that I ever came across of people objecting to this. I think all of us had a tremendous interest in what was going on in Vietnam and had followed the cease-fire talks and the end of the formal war with great interest. We were all genuinely curious about what might happen next. So I think it was a sense of great adventure for all of us.

Q: So what happened for you?

BORG: I went back. I was assigned to the province of Pleiku, a place I had never set foot in. Pleiku is up in the central highlands on the border with Laos, a largely Montagnard where a large number of foreign military units had been stationed there in the past.

Q: What was the situation there when you got out there?

BORG: I arrived and the American troops were still on the ground. I was there to witness the departure of the American troops. There was an organization called the International Control Commission, ICC. I'll have to check what the exact initials were, ICC something or other. This was an observation group of Canadians, Poles, Indonesians and Hungarians who were going to observe the cease-fire. They had not yet begun arriving. The situation within the province was reasonably peaceful. There was no regular hostility as we had seen throughout the time I was previously in Vietnam.

Q: Your consulate general was where?

BORG: The consulate general at the time was in Nha Trang with James Engle as the Consul General. There were six or seven of us in the different provinces doing periodic reports on what was happening. This was really my first intensive experience at any kind of political reporting. I had never done anything like this before, and suddenly I was supposed to go out and find out what was happening and send in reports.

Q: How did you operate?

BORG: I operated sort of by going out and meeting as many people as I could and talking with them and trying to figure out what the trends might be within any particular community. We went out to villages, kept track of what kind of incidents might have taken place, witnessed the last Americans to depart, saw the reaction to the last Americans departing, witnessed the arrival of the International Control Commission team members. We had one of the regional headquarters up in Pleiku, so I spent a lot of time hanging around with them to try and pick up what they were doing.

Q: What reaction were you getting when the Americans pulled out?

BORG: Again, I didn't have a very comprehensive picture, but from the few people that I talked with, most suspected that Vietnam would collapse right away. They felt that without their presence things would become very dangerous. I did not share that perspective. I had for some time felt that the presence of large numbers of Americans had been an incentive for the Viet Cong to attack in many places and that these people might be surprised when things don't collapse once they're gone.

Q: In your area was there a North Vietnamese military presence?

BORG: Not to our knowledge. There were communities that were supporters of the Viet Cong, and there was for a brief period of time sort of a war of flags after the last American troops had left. You would see Viet Cong flags put up on a tree in a certain area, usually not near anybody's houses, and there were some places along rivers that you could see the Vietnamese flags on one side and Viet Cong flags on the other side. But the idea that there were people who were Viet Cong, they did not emerge. They were not a visible presence.

Q: Was anyone saying the 32nd regiment of North Vietnamese is over there...?

BORG: No, no talk whatsoever. This would be in 1973.

Q: '74.

BORG: '74, sorry. This is early '74, that's right. There was no talk whatsoever of any kind of North Vietnamese presence anywhere in the Second Corps Region. There may have been a presence up in the northern part of the country but not along the Laotian border where I lived.

Q: You had this rather improbable collection of Hungarians and Poles who were part of the Warsaw Pact, the Canadians who were our allies, and Indonesians who were more friendly to us since they'd gotten rid of their own Communists.

BORG: The Canadians and the Indonesians were the two sides that we and the South Vietnamese had agreed upon, and the Poles and the Hungarians were the two that the North Vietnamese had agreed upon. They arrived. The Hungarians' and Poles' leadership were pretty much hard-liners. Their younger people were far more interesting when I became friends with some of the younger members of the group. The Canadians were very sympathetic and passed me a lot of information about what was going on. The Indonesians were incredibly pleasant and supportive of what the Canadians were doing. At least this is the way it was in Pleiku. The group operated far better than one could have anticipated during the Cold War, mainly because there weren't very many incidents that had to be investigated. There weren't that many serious issues that would divide them. They would hold meetings. They would discuss here's what seems to be happening in the different places. There wasn't much happening at this time. There wasn't much that would divide them, and so we frequently went out together. They took over one of the mess halls that was formerly an American mess hall, and they took over one of the American military camps, and I used to go up there and eat lunch every day. I made it a point of going up and eating and just hanging around, and everybody knew why I was hanging around and what I was doing, just to get to know people and talk with them about what was going on. But they went out to a number of ceremonies in which villages would perform dances or whatever it was, and they would all sit around. Everybody was very compatible for these particular occasions.

Q: Did you get any feel for the hand of the South Vietnamese government up in that area. This was mainly Montagnard up there. It was not a place sort of native to the normal South Vietnamese administrator.

BORG: The Province Chief was certainly somebody who was trusted by the leadership in South Vietnam, but I can't remember whether he was a Thieu person or a Ky person. I think for the most part they participated in ceremonial activities and attempted to direct local government activities to the extent that they could, but I never got the impression that they were either warlords in a classical sense or that they were stooges for authorities in Saigon. I think they shifted around the province chiefs sufficiently that none of them ever really got the handle on a place that they might have otherwise.

Q: Were you seeing, for example, South Vietnamese, particularly from Saigon, coming up and teaching and...?

BORG: No, no. Almost everything that was happening was happening locally, and the idea that people were coming from Saigon or anywhere else to provide some sort of new support now that the fighting had ended. I think the South Vietnamese government was equally stunned that things were reasonably peaceful. There were no efforts at any particular new initiatives. I think security was heightened for the possibility of some kind of attack. There were no particular attacks. There were a couple of skirmishes but nothing significant.

Q: Was there much of a South Vietnamese military presence up there?

BORG: Yes, there was a South Vietnamese military presence. I don't recall what unit, but I do remember approximately where they were. They were defending a perimeter rather than participating in pacification activities or any of these sorts of things.

Q: What sort of reports were you getting from your fellow observers? I assume you all went back...

BORG: We went periodically back to Nha Trang and talked. It seemed to be pretty much the same in all of the other regions. We were all observing a relatively quiet situation. At Easter of that year, one of the other observers and I, Richard Mueller - I don't know if you've talked with him; he was the political reporter in Kon Tum, the province just to the north of mine...

Q: His name's Richard...?

BORG: Richard Mueller, he was consul general in Hong Kong and he's now the headmaster at Northfield Mount Herman School in Massachusetts. Anyway, he was a good friend and we decided why not take a trip by road down to Saigon. Now, this was something that was inconceivable at the time when I was in Vietnam the first time, driving between provinces over a long distance. We drove down through some of the highland areas, not all of them. We went down to Dalat and other places, and then we came up along the coast, so we sort of did an inland route and an exterior route over a long weekend, a five-day weekend or something like that. What astonished both of us was how peaceful it was and the fact that nobody ever warned us that this might be dangerous or this was something we shouldn't do, that there were troops out there. When I had been there before, no one could have imagined a trip like this. So things were generally much more peaceful

Q: Did you get any feel for the Montagnards, how they were or what they were doing?

BORG: Montagnard is a collective term for a large number of different ethnic groups, and each one of these groups had separate experiences and separate relationships with the Vietnamese government. Most of them had a dislike for lowland Vietnamese based upon many, many years of discrimination, and many of them had looked upon the Americans as an element that protected them from the South Vietnamese, who they felt might exploit them. The Montagnards were probably more upset over the departure of the Americans than any of the local people on the Vietnamese side. I visited some communities where things were incredibly peaceful and quiet and everybody was living a very happy Montagnard life unaffected by anybody on either side. This would have been '74. There was certainly no foretelling of any particular doom.

FRANCIS J. TATU
Principal Officer
Chiang Mai (1974)

Francis J. Tatu was born in New York in 1929. He served in the US Navy from 1946-1952. Afterwards, he received his bachelor's degree from University of California in 1955. His career includes positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Taiwan, Philippines, Thailand, Washington D.C., Nepal, Vietnam, Indonesia, Malaysia, Brunei, and Australia. Mr. Tatu was interviewed by Susan Klingaman in October 2000.

Q: Today is Friday, November 10th. After your assignment in Kathmandu, you went as principal officer to the consulate in Chiang Mai. I believe that was in 1974.

TATU: Yes, correct. I went to Chiang Mai in July of 1974, precisely July 4th, leaving Kathmandu and proceeding direct, giving up home leave again for maybe the second or third time in my checkered career. I wanted to tell you one Vietnam anecdote here, a meaningful anecdote, I think, before it's lost. I think this is something that should be recorded in history. I mentioned earlier that when I had been posted in Bangkok one of my responsibilities was following developments in Southeast Asia, and in that capacity I used frequently to go over to Saigon primarily to keep track of the Khmer Krom, who were a Cambodian group, under the direction of CIA actually, conducting cross-border operations. On this particular occasion I proceeded with Ambassador Unger, who had other business, and I went about my own business on the border. That evening dinner was set up for me by a political officer in the Saigon embassy by the name of Andy Antippas had set up a virtual trap for me. It seemed that the Thai troops who were participating as part of the program of bringing in the so-called "Third Flags" were behaving there egregiously. I was quite aware of this from our side that the Thai troops proceeded to Vietnam carrying large amounts of narcotics, illicit narcotics, and in fact on one occasion, cooperation with BNDD, the precursor to DEA, we had sought to stop a shipment of APO mail, Army Post Office. The Thai had access to APO, and we had word that they were shipping heroine in this particular APO.

Q: Why did they have access to the American postal system?

TATU: They had access to everything. This was a payoff for the Thai participating in the Vietnam War. In fact, the word was that any Thai soldier who went was a corporate entity. They had to pay, in terms of about $5,000, to be able to go and “fight” in Vietnam and, once there, they had not only access to APO, they had access to the PX. The word was that when a shipment of large gear would come into the PX, such as refrigerators, stoves and so forth, the first ones there were the Thai, who arrived with six-by-six trucks. That evening for this dinner there were also present a number of military people up to ranking bird colonels. Their complaint was that the Thai were oppressing the Vietnamese to such an extent. They would come into a village, and our military would come across them coming out with severed heads on the antennae of their personnel carriers. The atrocities on the part of the Thai, according to these guys, were just incredible. There were maybe three or four of these people, and Antippas also was substantiating what they had to say. So I said, “Okay, gentlemen, we’ve heard all the other stuff, the PX and narcotics and so forth, but this is a new one, and you can be assured that I will report this in full detail.” So going back on the plane - we had our own little jet - I began briefing Ambassador Unger on this, and he expressed astonishment and chagrin. The follow-up on this was to find out who was at that dinner. In other words, the military wanted to get these guys who had reported to me. This is all back I feed to me from Antippas. No action was taken against the Thai, but action was taken against the informants, whistle-blowers, so to speak.

Q: Very interesting.

TATU: I think history should be aware of that.

Q: So this was the temper of the times, I guess - win at all costs.

TATU: That’s absolutely right.

Q: How large a post was the consulate at Chiang Mai?

TATU: Chiang Mai had a deputy, Linda Irick, who actually hadn’t arrived yet when I got there. It had an administrative deputy who was an ex-Marine captain by the name of Bruce something-or-other and a CIA guy buried in as a vice consul. The consulate was very curious little outbuilding attached to the residence. Incredibly I walk in there and I find the toilet that’s accessible to visitors is approached by a short hallway in which there is a refrigerator filled with morphine. You will recall that Chiang Mai is the “capital” of the Golden Triangle.

Q: For what?

TATU: For what - and needles, injection needles, piled up on shelves nearby. So I questioned, “What the hell is this?”

Q: This was the restroom in the consulate?

TATU: Yes. “What the hell is this?” There was no residual memory really. The Marine, Bruce, thought that this stuff was stocked because there was a concern that there was a rabies threat, and this was the way we treat rabies.

Q: Morphine?

TATU: Yes. So I checked this out through channels and found that this morphine, while it could produce some ill effects, had exceeded its shelf life. I then went about destroying it and had a couple of people witness me doing it. There was a DEA station there also, located separately, newly established, with a chief agent in charge and three subordinates. I had the SAIC come over, Special Agent In Charge, and witness me destroying this morphine. He said that, despite the fact that the shelf life had been exceeded, it would be worth about 40,000 bucks on the street. So that says something about something. It says something about the management of the post.

Q: Let me ask you: Who was your predecessor?

TATU: Jim Montgomery. I had known him in Bangkok, in my early Bangkok tour, and considered him to be a friend. At any rate, this later was held against me, the fact that I destroyed this stuff. It was considered to be an irrational act. I think the crunch came when I ran into a windmill here that terminated my tenure at the post, when the SAIC, again the DEA Special Agent In Charge, and wife were out on a motorcycle run, inexplicably on a road that was not open yet to the public, when two assailants stepped out of the bushes and fired a shot at them. She was hit, the wife was hit. The name of this SAIC, by the way, was Bud Shoaf - I don't remember his formal first name. The wife was hospitalized, and from that point on the whole thing became a circus. Everybody was covering up facts, but I was trying to investigate. The question was whether this was narcotics related, whether it was related to the insurgents. In other words, there was a threat to the American community, and that was my responsibility. The administrative counselor then, after I had been at this for several days, sent me a cable in which he ordered me to desist my investigation. Of course, he had no authority over me; I was in my own consular district. So this came down to a conflict, if you will, between me and the counselor with really no backing there in a good part of the embassy.

Q: Now, who was the DCM?

TATU: The DCM was Ed Masters, Edward Masters, who during this period was on home leave.

Q: So you really had no one to turn to, except the ambassador?

TATU: Well, even the ambassador was incommunicative, he was a political appointee. The first time I went to meet him in his office one morning he pulled out a bottle and offered me a drink. What I did - this was surely a mistake and something I may want to write out later - I appealed to the ambassador in Laos.

Q: Who was that?

TATU: Charles Whitehouse, do you know him?

Q: I don't.

TATU: Charlie Whitehouse, former CIA. Bangkok and Vientiane always worked very closely together. I, as you recall, had been stationed in Vientiane and there was some resentment there that Bangkok considered us, Vientiane, as being a kind of younger brother or something that they could order around. But there was close communication, so chance would have it Mrs. Whitehouse was leading a group of ladies down to visit Chiang Mai just as all of this blew up. I thought I could send Charlie a letter with his wife and see if he could be of any help. What he did with my letter was he sent it to Bangkok, so that made me seem insubordinate. As a consequence, I was removed from the post.

Q: I see. Well, it sounds like everything was all tangled up together, insurgency and narcotics and so on, very much like what seems to be going on in some of our posts in Latin America right now. So when actually did you leave your post in Chiang Mai - later in '74, I suppose?

TATU: If you can recall the date on which Nixon left office and Ford took over, it was right about then.

Q: In August of '74.

TATU: There you are.

Q: I remember, because I was on home leave myself.

TATU: And one of my actions, also an eccentric action, was to seek to get photographs of Gerald R. Ford to replace those of Nixon that were in the consulate.

Q: Well, his photograph did in fact go to all consulates when he became President. So that was a very short and difficult post?

TATU: Exactly, but considering my experiences and preferences, Chiang Mai was my dream post, and it broke my heart to have to leave it.

DAVID MICHAEL ADAMSON
Rotational Officer
Nha Trang (1974-1975)

David Michael Adamson was born in Connecticut and educated at Swarthmore College and Tufts University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1974. His career included posts in Nha Trang, Strasbourg, Paris, Panama City, Lisbon and Tegucigalpa. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: So, I suppose you got out toward the end of 1974?

ADAMSON: I got out there about October 1, 1974. I had a brief stay in Saigon to study the language. I had insisted on this, but the four weeks I was given was insufficient and anyway I did not take to the tonal nature of the language. Then I went to my duty assignment, which was Nha Trang, where I actually filled two positions, one as a consular officer and one as a political officer. It really turned out to be one of the best jobs I ever had in the Foreign Service, and one of the best jobs I could have aspired to as a junior officer. I was then, what was an FSO-7, I guess now that would be a five. Anyway, I went as a seven, and went into an FSO-4, political slot, as well as an FSO-5 or -6 consular slot. I had a Vietnamese translator and military analyst, working for me in the political job. I also had two Vietnamese consular assistants. So, there I was at 24 supervising three people and holding two jobs, and being involved in politico-military reporting from Vietnam, which was very challenging.

Q: So, let's go back. When you arrived out there, what was the situation in South Vietnam?

ADAMSON: The situation was that we were hanging on for dear life. Of course, I was pretty well schooled in Vietnam, because Vietnam was the foreign policy issue as I reached maturity in high school and college. I had read quite a few books about Vietnam, and was generally familiar with the history of our presence there. In fact, I was quite familiar, because I had taken courses in graduate school, too. I was very well versed. When I had my pre-departure interviews in Washington, including at INR (the Intelligence Bureau), I found quite a diversity of views. There were the positive thinkers who were on the desk, who were towing the line that somehow we would make it through Vietnam all right, and somehow the two regimes, in Saigon and in Phnom Penh, we supported would hang on - though there was certainly a perception that the regimes were under a great deal of pressure.

The other school of thought was what I heard in INR. A fellow by the last name of "Buck" (Ralph Buck?) briefed me there. He turned out to be prescient. He said that this regime could not hold on for very much longer. That it was an issue of months, not years, and that eventually a push would come from the North Vietnamese. This fellow was able to cite all kinds of weaknesses of the regime, and American assistance was already being attenuated. Watergate was taking place. By August 8, 1974, Nixon was gone. His level of support for the Thieu government could not be expected from Ford. Besides, the presidency had been weakened, and the Congress had passed legislation which basically tied the president's hands, in terms of air support. So, for these kinds of reasons, plus the somewhat putrid nature of the regime in South Vietnam - they did not have the kind of fundamental sources of strength that you would hope for - Buck and others were anticipating the regime would crumble. When I got out there, I got caught up in the "can do," positive thinking environment that Graham Martin was sustaining under the guidance of Secretary of State Kissinger.

Q: You got there when?

ADAMSON: I arrived, roughly October 1, 1974.

Q: You were in Saigon first?

ADAMSON: I was in Saigon for a few weeks for some abbreviated and accelerated language training, which, as I noted earlier, really didn't turn out to be very valuable.

Q: In the political section, were these true believers?

ADAMSON: Some of them were true believers. I recall that Graham Martin was a distant figure, so I didn't have a meeting with him, but I did meet with the DCM, Wolf Lehman, and with the political minister counselor, Josiah Bennett, who just died in the last couple years. He was an old Asia hand - China hand, I think. I think he was a smart guy, but had blinders on like Lehman, like Martin. He only saw what was most positive in the environment, and certainly he was very optimistic about the prospects of the South Vietnamese regime.

Q: When you went out to Nha Trang, what was the situation? Nha Trang was in II Corps, I guess, wasn't it? We no longer called it "corps" over there?

ADAMSON: Well, the South Vietnamese called it "II Corps," so we called it that, or military region II, I think. I might add, parenthetically, that although at the higher levels of the embassy, they were very positive about prospects of the regime, at lower levels, there was certainly greater doubt. I recall being briefed by the CIA's Frank Snepp, who later gained notoriety through his book, Decent Interval, and he was predicting that hard times were on their way. He was certainly seeing a lot of the signs that Ralph Buck was seeing. Perhaps Buck was reading Snepp's reports from Saigon. In fact, he must have been. Snepp was certainly dubious about the viability of the regime. When I got to Nha Trang, the consul general, Monty Spear, who I see occasionally at the officer's club at Ft. McNair, had the same Graham Martin/Wolf Lehman mindset of positive thinking. But, if you went under him, closer to the working level, people could see some of the tea leaves.

Q: What area did Nha Trang cover?

ADAMSON: It covered the two corps area. At that point in Vietnam, the U.S. had four consulates, which corresponded to each of the military zones. We had a consulate in Da Nang that covered military region one. In Nha Trang, we covered military region two. Military region IV was covered from Can Tho in the Mekong delta, and III was covered from Bien Hoa.

Q: These consulate generals were established to observe how the truce was going.

ADAMSON: Yes.

Q: Was that still the main job?

ADAMSON: At that point, no one, I don't think, was really thinking in terms of the truce existing. We had had a fairly substantial Foreign Service presence in the first year, I think, after the January 1973 peace accord, to monitor the accord. By the fall of 1974, that heavy Foreign Service presence had disappeared. We really just had a light Foreign Service presence. There were only three FSOs in MR-II. We were really covering the war, not monitoring a peace which didn't exist. Nobody thought of it, as I can recall, as covering a truce. I recall that every week I had to do a situation report that went to the Embassy. I wrote mine on the basis of reports that came from our province reps. We had a U. S. rep in every province. These people may have been USAID employees, they were not Foreign Service officers. They were sort of the residue of the very heavy presence that we had had in the 1960s and the early 1970s. My report went to the Embassy, which in turn wrote a weekly cable to Washington based on the inputs from the four consulates. One serious flaw in this process was that the weeklies did not look at underlying conditions and trends, only at what had transpired that week, as filtered from South Vietnamese military sources through the province reps and then the consulates and embassy.

Q: Also included in your consulate's area of responsibility, was the central highlands, correct?

ADAMSON: Correct.

Q: Where the whole thing sort of came apart.

ADAMSON: Correct.

Q: Did you travel around?

ADAMSON: Yes. In the end, I was only at that assignment from the 1st of November 1974, until the 1st of April 1975, when Nha Trang fell. In that brief period of time, four or five months, it had been my intention, and had been my marching order, to visit all the provinces. In the first four or five months, I was not able to visit all, but I did visit many. I visited Ban Me Thuot, Kontum, Pleiku, Qui Nhon and, and perhaps a few other province capitals. I visited, at least, the principal provincial capitals. Principal in terms of where Vietnamese military forces were deployed, and in terms of where the fighting was taking place.

Q: Did you get any feel for what was happening?

ADAMSON: Basically, the image that I had was that the South Vietnamese were fully engaged everywhere. They were fully deployed, and had no reserves to speak of, and were fully deployed against North Vietnamese forces that matched them in terms of manpower and strength. At that point, the South Vietnamese seemed to be holding their own, but they didn't have any reserve, they didn't have any residual capacity. So that if they were pushed in one area and succumbed, it's easy to see in retrospect how they could collapse. At the time, we were thinking in terms of a stalemate, rather than a potential collapse. I was caught up in this mentality. As I say, in retrospect, it's easy to see how a collapse could be forthcoming, once they were overcome in one area.

Q: With the Vietnamese that you were coming into contact with, how were they looking at the Americans? Did they feel we were selling them out?

ADAMSON: The South Vietnamese were nervous. You didn't get a sense of much confidence on their part, or for the most part even of much courage on their part. This varied, of course. Sometimes I would visit lower level officers, in the captain to major range, who were out on the front lines, and who clearly were men of great valor, and doing a very hard job, and doing it well. At the higher levels, you didn't get the sense that these were general or colonel officers who had a great deal of confidence, who had a great deal of conviction, who had a great deal of commitment. That was not encouraging.

Q: There was you and the consul general?

ADAMSON: There were just three of us. There was the consul general, Moncrieff J. Spear. There was the deputy principal officer, Philip Remington Cook, and there was me, filling two positions. Both jobs I was filling really got heavy when the North Vietnamese offensive began in March. So an FSO from Saigon, by the name of Dick Slott, came up and took over the consular job, and I continued with the pol-mil position. There was someone scheduled to come in and take the consular position permanently, but he never arrived, because the country fell before he could arrive. That was Edmund McWilliams, I think.

Q: Well, how did things develop, from your perspective?

ADAMSON: From my perspective, they developed quickly. One South Vietnamese province, Phuoc Binh, fell in January 1975. That was a bellwether. The North Vietnamese took a provincial capital to see what the reaction would be. There was no particular reaction from Saigon or Washington. The South Vietnamese were not able to take it back. The United States did not react strongly. That sort of set up in March 1975, what became the final offense by the North Vietnamese, which we had some inkling of, though we didn't have detailed information that it was coming.

Q: Well, the situation in the highlands, turned out to be one of the... Didn't the whole thing sort of begin to collapse?

ADAMSON: Yes, that is correct. That was where the North Vietnamese offensive started. It started in Ban Me Thuot around March 10, and BMT quickly fell to the North Vietnamese. I remember our province representative, Paul Struharik, was trapped there. The heaviest South Vietnamese troop concentrations, if memory serves, were around Kontum and Pleiku. So, even with Ban Me Thuot falling, there was theoretically some prospect that the South Vietnamese could counterattack. As it happened, in my initial report - of course, I was the politico-military reporting officer - I reported that Ban Me Thuot was falling and I wanted to add the analysis that there was no immediate prospect that the South Vietnamese would take it back. This turned out to be accurate. I guess I had a sense then of the state of morale among the South Vietnamese, that although they did have substantial forces in Kontum and Pleiku, they had no will to fight back. However, my consul general, Monty Spear, crossed out the language that they had no prospect of taking back the city. Instead he wrote something like "the South Vietnamese are clearing," the implication being that they would take it back. As it happened, the commanding general of MR II, Major General Phu, under direct orders from President Thieu, made what was a calamitous error in withdrawing the South Vietnamese divisions, and there were a good number of them, from the central highlands, and bringing them down to the lowlands. This was a grievous mistake, because they were not able to execute a withdrawal in good order and because it set a rout in motion. The withdrawal became a mad, mob race to the sea, in the course of which, even without much harassment from the North Vietnamese, the South Vietnamese lost most of their constituted military capability - not to mention civilian losses. By the time those divisions got to the lowlands, they were no longer militarily capable. The ability of the South Vietnamese to resist was virtually nil. Thus, we were swept up in a whirlwind, which we really didn't adequately anticipate, but in a matter of days, the region was gone. We evacuated on April 1, 1975. We evacuated after we learned that the South Vietnamese military staff had left. We learned this from the South Vietnamese province chief, who too was in the process of leaving, once he saw that his umbrella, in terms of military forces, had already left.

Q: What were you getting from Saigon? Were they telling you to hang on? Was there any direction there?

ADAMSON: Well, there was some direction, but unfortunately, Saigon was still shaped by the Graham Martin mentality of whatever happens, we're going to hang on to this country. So, we did not adequately prepare to evacuate. Of course, I was kind of raw at that time, inexperienced. I should have known better. I didn't prepare particularly well, either for my personal evacuation, or for getting the people out that we should have tried to get out. Once the South Vietnamese had abandoned ship, as it were, then there was no choice other than to evacuate. We did, quite precipitously, not in good order, and we didn't get all the South Vietnamese we should have tried to get out, out.

Q: How did you get out?

ADAMSON: What we did was, on the 1st of April, we went to work that day with our bags packed, after sleeping in our compounds that night. I remember I had my two male Vietnamese assistants with me that last night (I believe the female had already left, to marry an American I believe). I had a handgun, but there was no trouble that night, before the 1st of April. On April 1 as things deteriorated, we prepared an area for helicopters to land at the Consulate. Helicopters came in. The half a dozen or so marine guards that we had provided protection. At that point, we needed it, because the South Vietnamese were losing their discipline, and there were marauding gangs of South Vietnamese soldiers. In fact, I left my belongings, my suitcase in my car, which was not more than a few meters from the consulate entrance. I foolishly, however, did not take that into my office that day – probably because I didn't fully grasp we would have to leave that day. By the time we evacuated that day, which was some hours after the opening of business, I could no longer leave through the front door. I could no longer even go out in the parking lot. My car was looted and my belongings were taken away. So, I left for Saigon with the clothes that were on my back.

Q: Was there any move toward the sea? I kind of remember Nha Trang being on the sea.

ADAMSON: Nha Trang is on the sea. For the Americans, there were no ships that we evacuated to. We all just evacuated by fixed-wing aircraft, down to Saigon. The airbase in Nha Trang still had security, although I don't think that that security existed much beyond the 1st of April. We choppered to the air base, then went by fixed wing aircraft to Saigon where we were greeted cheerily by Americans from the Embassy who had no comprehension of what we had just been through.

Q: Was there any American liaison or military attaches, or anything like that, in your area?

ADAMSON: Oh, yes. We had a defense attaché office representative at our Consulate. Steven Mayfield was his name; I believe he was retired military. There were a lot of CIA officers. I don't recall what planes evacuated us, but I don't think they were U.S. military aircraft. I'm not aware that they were American military aircraft, perhaps they were "Air America."

Q: When you got to Saigon, what was the situation?

ADAMSON: Well, it was sort of surrealistic, because we were met at the airport by very kind Embassy people. I think they were probably dependents, volunteers, who very kindly took us into their arms, and helped us with whatever we needed help with. We were housed at a U.S.-run hotel, I think. We were treated very well. We were taken to the PX to get clothes, and so on. It was surreal in the sense that they didn't seem to have any sense of the gravity of the situation. I recall that when we got to the embassy, we were all received by Graham Martin, very cordially. He then was talking about Cochinchina as a viable entity, and about how attractive it should be to U.S. investors.

So, it was quite apparent that he was living in a never-never world - that he didn't realize the gravity of the situation. I was invited to stay and work at the Embassy. There certainly was a lot that needed doing, including planning for evacuation, though Graham Martin wasn't talking about evacuating at that point. I could see the handwriting on the wall. I could see that given this guy's mind-set, we were not going to do things the right way. I also was traumatized by the evacuation from Nha Trang. So, I wanted no part of this. I only stayed in Saigon for a week. I bailed out as soon as I could, and left on the 8th of April, on a flight to Japan.

Q: How did you bail out? What did you do?

ADAMSON: I was in cable communication with the Department. I think my counselor was still Gib Lanpher, who had actually assigned me to Vietnam in the first place. He very kindly sent me a telegram indicating various posts where I could potentially serve. Those included Angola and France. I was initially being pushed to Angola, because I had actually picked up Portuguese while I was in college, studying a couple summers in Brazil. My first inclination was to be led in that direction. But, when I got to Washington, I thought better of that, and opted for a calmer post, France; I cashed in my chips, as it were.

Q: When did Saigon actually fall?

ADAMSON: It fell on the 30th of April.

Q: Among the people who were not part of Ambassador Martin's immediate circle, did they understand what was happening?

ADAMSON: I don't recall, at that stage, having a whole lot of conversations with people. I think at some levels there was a very acute understanding. I think people like Frank Snepp, people like Ken Moorefield, who I just see was nominated to an ambassadorship in Africa, now in 2002. He was a young officer at that time. At that level, they understood very well the gravity of the situation.

Q: One hears stories of people plucking at the big tree that grew near the embassy. It should have been cut down in order to allow helicopters to land there.

ADAMSON: According to what I have heard and read, that sort of thing was only done at the very last possible moment, simply because Graham Martin didn't want to give any sign that he thought the Republic of (South) Vietnam was not viable, that he thought this country was going to collapse. Given that mindset, we didn't prepare adequately, obviously, for the evacuation.

RAZVIGOR BAZALA
Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Da Nang (1974-1975)

Mr. Bazala was born in Germany but immigrated to the United States while he was still young. He joined the Foreign Service in 1970 and served in Warsaw, South Vietnam, New Delhi, Belgrade, Jamaica, Macedonia, Bosnia, and Washington, DC including working as a special assistant to the White House for the Iran-Contra Affairs. Mr. Bazala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in July of 2011.

BAZALA: Serving as a branch public affairs officer (BPAO) was not, in the bureaucratic scheme of things, a bad assignment for a second tour officer. Branch PAOs are, after all, managers of USIS operations. While they report to PAOs at embassies they nonetheless occupy leadership positions in offices in cities in which there are American consulates. Da Nang, however was a hard-to-fill, less-desirable-than-most posting for obvious reasons. The U.S. was still heavily involved in Vietnam in 1974. It was the last place in the world I wanted to be with my family. The Paris peace agreement of January 1973 terminated military hostilities in Vietnam, U.S. armed forces withdrew from the country and a government supported by the U.S. remained in power in the south. Unfortunately the agreement amounted to little more than a temporary ceasefire, but U.S. foreign affairs agencies blithely concluded thereafter that there were no longer reasons dependents could not accompany officers on assignments to Vietnam.

Sylvia, who worked in the Pentagon from 1966 to 1970 where she dealt with Vietnam policy issues daily and had an in-depth knowledge of realities on the ground across South Vietnam, concluded there was very little that made civilian service there safe. We attempted to argue against an assignment to Vietnam, but because I had extended my tour in Warsaw so that an incoming officer could continue language studies in Washington, I was out of the routine overseas assignment cycle.

Desperate to find a qualified candidate for an out of cycle job opening, my personnel officer or career manager (colleagues called them career manglers) insisted that I accept the assignment and told me the Agency would accept my resignation if I did not. The only positive thing about it in my view was that it would provide early experience managing a USIS operation independently and supervising personnel. In the case of Da Nang, the post had a staff of six seasoned Vietnamese employees. Considering this against a range of other factors, personal safety first and foremost among them, we reluctantly agreed to go to Vietnam.

Before we traveled to Saigon I endured six hours a day of intense Vietnamese language training over the first seven months of 1974. Normally the course for tonal languages, of which Vietnamese is one, is one to two years to provide enough time for the learner to attain minimal professional proficiency. I recall that it took four hours to memorize dialogue number one in the FSI Vietnamese language textbook; there were only about twelve sentences in it. I reviewed it over and over again in my mind as I trudged from my sister-in-law's Georgetown apartment in Washington across Key Bridge to the Foreign Service Institute in Arlington, Virginia on an icy day in January. Almost 35 years later I can still recite it verbatim. Ironically, there is little else I can say in Vietnamese today.

After we returned from Poland, Sylvia and the children stayed with my parents in New Jersey. Because Sylvia was anxious to get away from my mother, I was under pressure to get the family back together and hastily picked out a townhouse condo that was still under construction in the Washington suburb of Annandale, Virginia. Sylvia hurriedly flew down to check it out and we quickly signed a contract. The only good thing to say about the place was that it was a new home immediately available.

Teaching the southern dialect of Vietnamese to an officer assigned to Da Nang was a mistake. The city was located just 60 miles south of the demilitarized zone (DMZ) that then divided North and South Vietnam. Most people in Da Nang, many of whom fled south after the fall of Dien Bien Phu in 1954, spoke the northern dialect, almost a different language. I was at a significant disadvantage and a fish out of water from our first day in Da Nang even though I tested out, barely, with a 2/2 rating in Vietnamese. Despite intensive training, I could not readily comprehend the language spoken by the people around me.

To be candid, excellent mimic though I may be, I was unable to master comfortably the tonal structure of a language that gives four different meanings to the syllable 'ba', for example, depending on how it is pronounced. For someone who communicated so well in Polish that proved a real downer. Incidentally my barber in McLean, Virginia who is from Saigon told me that she recently visited Hanoi and could hardly comprehend anything people there were saying, which confirmed what I had discovered much to my dismay 40 years ago.

We arrived in Saigon in September 1974 with nine suitcases, a Siamese cat, and two kids in diapers. We were exhausted after traveling almost 48 hours across the Pacific, including a layover in Tokyo. Fortunately, we were met planeside by an embassy vehicle and driven directly to our temporary apartment. South Vietnamese authorities apparently chose not to exert sovereignty over the arrivals of official Americans. We handed our passports to an embassy staffer who carried them into the terminal to be stamped. Dead tired, we were grateful to be whisked away from Than Son Nhut airport without having to encounter a single Vietnamese border or customs officials on the way out.

A week of orientation at the embassy followed. The Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) warned us not to convey a sense of faltering U.S. resolve to government of the Republic of South Vietnam in contacts with its citizens. The remaining U.S. presence in Vietnam was a stabilizing factor and any expression of negativity would raise doubts about U.S. confidence in the ability of the Vietnamese government to prevail. The administration maintained that the Paris peace agreement was intended to provide enough time to establish equilibrium between North and South Vietnam in order to prevent one side from imposing a military solution over the other. This meant we had to keep South Vietnamese President Thieu strong enough to withstand an invasion from the North.

The administration and the ambassador in particular also, for some reason, presumed that a way could be found to get the Soviets and the Chinese to pressure North Vietnam to reduce Ho Chi Minh's commitment to revolution. Assuming that a continued flow of U.S. military and development assistance would buy enough time for the South to build the strength to survive proved to be a groundless supposition. U.S. Ambassador Graham Martin seemed blind to the reality that these objectives were unachievable. His unwillingness to face this was a major factor that led ultimately to the flawed and chaotic evacuation of the U.S. embassy, unnecessarily risking the lives of several thousand Americans. In addition, more than 100,000 Vietnamese supporters of U.S. policy awaited the assistance of embassy staff members for evacuation but were left behind in Saigon. The Republic of South Vietnam fell on April 28, 1975, and the last helicopters carrying evacuees lifted off the roof of the U.S. embassy.

After our orientation at the embassy in Saigon, we flew to Da Nang on one of the two Vietnam Airlines jet planes that serviced the city. The day before we left, one of the planes was hijacked and exploded after an emergency landing at the airport. It took some courage for us to board our flight but the trip was uneventful. In Da Nang, we found a house with 12 ft ceilings surrounded by a high wall topped with concertina wire. We heard later that it may have once been a brothel. With no screens on the windows, three-inch long flying cockroaches occasionally passed through while I was listening to LPs (long playing 12" vinyl recordings) under headphones in the living room in the evening with the lights turned off. Talk about unpleasant surprises.

At first we slept under mosquito nets, but we later had screens installed. We also lacked a washer and dryer and relied on household help to do the laundry. The small American store supplied by the embassy commissary in Saigon offered almost nothing, nor did the commissary itself when it came to the needs of families with small children (think Pampers). We had to scrounge through local markets for cuts of meat of unknown origin, and Sylvia had to be creative in her cooking, even making mayonnaise.

A nice offset for the substandard food markets were the pho vendors who plied the streets of Da Nang nightly. A boy passed through our neighborhood rhythmically clicking sticks a block ahead of a vendor to announce that one was nearby. When we beckoned the boy to the door he took our order for what we soon discovered was a delightful concoction of broth, peanuts, hot peppers, pork, onions, nuoc mam (fish sauce) and a variety of other tasty ingredients. He ran back with our order to where the pho vendor was ladling out portions to fill a previous order. Minutes later the boy would reappear delivering a large piping hot container of pho to our door. It was not pizza, but it was home delivery.

Fortunately fresh seafood was also widely available and good. Single male colleagues did not have to agonize over menu planning when they hosted dinner parties. They just contacted vendors to line up their carts in the back yard and offer pho and other delicacies to their guests. We enjoyed several wonderful meals at the few such social functions we attended in Da Nang.

In fall 1974, ours was not the only American family at the consulate, and Sylvia quickly formed close bonds with several other unemployed mothers at post. In fact, despite the departure of U.S. armed forces the year before, there were still more than 7,000 Americans in country including civilian government and military personnel attached to the Defense Attaché Office (DAO), contractors, private company employees, and representatives of international non-governmental organizations (NGOs); many of them had Vietnamese dependents. The lifestyle at the U.S. mission in South Vietnam back then differed considerably from that of suburban Washington, DC.

The men who dominated the American environment in Vietnam for almost the entire previous decade were generally unaccompanied by spouses who were either left behind in suburban Washington or resided in safer nearby countries. They did not greet the few families that arrived in Vietnam after the Paris peace agreement with the most open of arms. Not surprisingly, many had Vietnamese girlfriends they did not want their wives to learn about through leaks along the social grapevine that new families were now being plugged into. There were awkward moments when we encountered them at movie screenings in the consulate accompanied by their Vietnamese lady friends. They saw us as intruders on their territory.

Some Americans, of course, had married Vietnamese women and started families in Vietnam. As the evacuation approached, they faced real problems scrambling to obtain necessary documentation for their Vietnamese dependents to qualify for entry to the U.S. The ambassador made no move to address that situation until late in the day causing unnecessary stress and tension as people moved with increasing urgency to get out Vietnam.

Our surface shipment of personal effects from the U.S. arrived a couple of months after we did but it was held in Saigon, which, as things turned out, was all to the good. It meant, however, we would have no items to decorate the house for the Christmas holidays. Fortunately the children were still too young to know much about the holiday and Christmas 1974 in the Bazala household was modest indeed. At a small shop catering to Da Nang's Roman Catholic population, Sylvia purchased a shiny somewhat garish four-foot, some-assembly-required, aluminum Christmas tree, the last one in the establishment. We set it up every year for the next two decades as a reminder of our experiences in Da Nang.

One day there was a massive explosion at a major arms depot that caused people to wonder for a while whether the war had resumed. It hadn't, but helicopter gunships flew over the house every night and armed guards patrolled the residences of all U.S. officials 24 hours a day. Da Nang was in the northernmost section of the four tactical zones the U.S. military had divided South Vietnam into. The city was the capital of Military Region (MR) 1 that bordered the DMZ dividing North and South Vietnam. The four military regions (MR 1 through 4) were also known as Corps, cited with roman numerals I through IV (with I being pronounced not as the number one, but as the word eye). Only the U.S. Army can tell you why. Vietnamese forces had begun positioning themselves in the central highlands for an offense planned for 1975 after the rainy season, but there was no conflict anywhere near Da Nang during the four months we were there.

I had a consular commission for Da Nang even though I knew little about consular work and had performed none in Poland. FSIOs rarely, if ever, performed any consular work whatsoever during their entire careers. The only consular function I performed in my career was in Da Nang. A young American who died in the U.S. specified that he wanted his ashes strewn among banyan trees near a school close to the base where he served while in army in Vietnam. He wrote that the voices of children he heard daily at play there set his mind at ease. Local Vietnamese authorities were sympathetic to his request and prepared to assist in fulfilling it. After all, where you choose to spend eternity is a critical decision. They provided a military helicopter to transport his cremated remains to the site he selected and I, in the absence of any other consular officer in Da Nang that day, accompanied the ashes to witness their release according to his wishes and submitted a report to the State Department confirming the event.

The flight into the central highlands began in a light early morning rain. Two South Vietnamese army machine gunners were positioned at the open doors on both sides of the helicopter with automatic weapons at the ready as we moved over areas of questionable security near the central highlands. The chopper flew at a low altitude that gave me a rare glimpse of rural Vietnam. The rice paddies below resembled an abstract assembly of stained glass windows in varying shades of green spreading out mile after mile. After we landed there was a brief ceremony before the release of the ashes and we flew back to Da Nang before lunch. That brief unique and spectacular experience made an indelible impression.

Sylvia took the Foreign Service entrance exam in Da Nang in early December. It was offered annually at all Foreign Service posts and I urged her to take it knowing that with her academic background and professional work at the Pentagon it was unlikely she would find it at all satisfying remaining a dependent spouse once the children started school. Only two applicants took the exam in Da Nang. Sylvia learned in February 1975 that she passed. Women's lib had come belatedly to the State Department, however; it was only two years earlier that the Department agreed to admit married women into the officer corps. Until then, female Foreign Service officers were compelled to resign when they married.

My role as branch PAO in Da Nang was not much more than babysitting a declining number of USIA information, cultural and exchange programs. My office was in a detached building set back from the street on a nicely landscaped lot only several blocks from the consulate. It contained small book and film libraries and was staffed by six capable, bilingual, experienced Vietnamese employees. I also administered programs for a few academic grantees at Da Nang University. I don't recall any American students there in the fall and winter of 1974, but I believe there were several American professors who passed through on short term research grants.

As BPAO I was also the chairman of the Da Nang branch of the Vietnamese-American Association (VAA), a binational voluntary organization that in Da Nang was primarily engaged in teaching English, mostly to dependents of South Vietnamese military officers. VAA board members coaxed me to become an instructor, something I had absolutely no desire to do, but as nominal VAA leader, what were my options? It turned out not to be all that bad. My class in the evening consisted of youngsters in their mid-teens who were a bit cocky and not very highly motivated. I had a good text, and running students through drills was not all that unpleasant or demanding a task. I was also getting to know other instructors and the parents of some of the students in my class.

By late 1974, there were few American or foreign journalists passing through Da Nang. Ambassador Martin prevented USIS Saigon PAO Alan Carter and branch PAOs from briefing the press, although were we able to we could have provided them useful background information they would not have gotten from the Ambassador's designated press spokesman. Carter had a real problem in Saigon; he was not a hand-picked Martin man and unlike the Ambassador he did not regard the press as an 'enemy'. On the contrary, it was USIA policy to be open and candid with the media regarding unclassified information. That was an important element of the job, and how effectively PAOs communicated with host-country and U.S. media abroad was a critical factor in performance evaluations. Given the Ambassador's policy of limited interaction with media, I felt USIS Da Nang was cooking on only three burners.

Ultimately there was no way to conceal the decline in American public support for continued involvement with South Vietnam. An early indication of how that was playing out in American politics was a cut in the 1975 USIA budget for Vietnam. To absorb the cut USIS Saigon concluded it would have to close its three branches at consulates and consolidate operations in the capital. Only one Vietnamese employee was to be kept on at each branch to assist with the few programs USIS would continue to conduct outside Saigon, academic and professional exchanges being the most significant. After closing down our posts, the other two BPAOs and I transferred to Saigon.

In January 1975, we left Da Nang for Saigon and the peaceful interlude that began with the Paris Peace Accord almost two years earlier came to a hurried and catastrophic conclusion. Early in the month, we hosted a farewell reception at our home in Da Nang. It was a bittersweet occasion. Our Vietnamese government, media and academic guests regarded the reduction in USIA's footprint in South Vietnam as a bad omen. They viewed the closing of the branch as a decrease in U.S. government confidence in the future of South Vietnam. That was a reality that simply could not be concealed as the second anniversary of the Paris peace agreement approached.

Looking back, however, closing the branches when we did was a good move. The situation in Da Nang began to unravel critically in early March 1975 when the total breakdown of the South Vietnamese military in the northern half of the country generated panic and chaos. Almost two million people fled into the city, an environment simply unable to accommodate them. People acted out of sheer desperation in attempts to get out of town once the embassy authorized the evacuation of the remaining U.S. Da Nang personnel at the end of March.

As Americans in Da Nang packed to go, they were surrounded instantly by throngs of Vietnamese grappling for positions that would enable them to tag along. Lives were lost as they clung to the wings of aircraft; others were crushed to death clinging to landing gear when they were raised after take off from the airport in Da Nang. Barges in Da Nang Harbor also evacuated personnel, and many Vietnamese lost their lives trying to jump aboard after they pulled away from the dock, falling in the water and drowning. We heard horror story after horror story from people we knew in Da Nang after their evacuation to Saigon, some with only the clothes on their backs. Two colleagues said they had to fire weapons to defend themselves, not knowing what damage they inflicted. One, however, was distraught because he was convinced that a shot he fired had killed someone.

One reason for the breakdown in MR1/I Corps was a decision to reposition South Vietnamese defense forces to the south under the “light at the top, heavy on the bottom” strategy that acknowledged North Vietnamese forces in the central highlands were capable of overcoming South Vietnam’s. Unfortunately Vietnam’s political leaders did not share that strategy widely and military leaders were incapable of implementing the strategy quickly in an orderly fashion. Most officers, many with families living on base, fled in panic when the strategy was announced. The shift in the position of defense forces degenerated into total disorganization. In short, the Army of the Republic of Vietnam disintegrated by the end of March.

More than two years after the Paris peace agreement South Vietnam began to unravel, and only three months later the situation degenerated into a chaotic evacuation of American citizens and their dependents from the country as the government collapsed. The way the Ambassador and the deputy chief of mission coped with events at the end was disastrous and characterized by the absence of transparency and accountability. It threatened the safety of dependants and the lives of hundreds of Vietnamese U.S. government employees and thousands of high value Vietnamese contacts without whose efforts the embassy would have been unable to operate throughout the war.

All this became clear only in retrospect. In January 1975, we were settling into a home in Saigon that was a great improvement over the one in Da Nang. It was a duplex that had an enormous banyan tree in the garden we shared with our neighbors. We received the shipment of personal possessions that had not been delivered to us in Da Nang. Alison entered the international nursery and made new friends quickly. Looking back, Saigon could have become one of our favorite postings were it not for the war. The city had its charms, and much of the French influence in architecture and cuisine remained.

We quickly fell into a routine in Saigon. Following local custom, the work day was 8:00 am to noon and 2:00 to 6:00 pm. The long midday break gave us time to lunch with friends and colleagues, shop, swim at the embassy pool and even take a nap. We visited local markets on Saturday and took the kids to the embassy pool on Sunday mornings followed by hot dogs and burgers at the embassy club where we met up with other families with children and began to make new friends.

I was chief of program development at USIS Saigon. Even at the height of the war we were able to conduct a wide range of substantive activities in the capital. But in the last three months before South Vietnam fell and the embassy was evacuated I had little to do other than provide support to a VAA that was far larger in Saigon than in Da Nang. In addition to a few brave souls who came in as short term guest speakers, the major program in the planning stage was an exhibition of the works of distinguished American artist Alexander Calder, best known for his mobiles, a form of abstract art.

After the fall of Da Nang at the end of March, we knew that circumstances on the ground would make it impossible to host the exhibition. The ambassador insisted, however, that USIA not cancel it because doing so would indicate to our Vietnamese staff that we no longer considered the environment in country stable or secure enough to mount it. Once they knew, they would leak that information to friends and family and before you knew it everybody else would know what everybody else except the ambassador already knew, namely that the gig was just about up.

As a result we gave the go ahead to have the exhibit shipped to Saigon even after all signs pointed to the eventual evacuation of the embassy. That left USIA holding the bag. At the last moment, the exhibit was diverted to another destination by the shipping line because commercial sea routes into South Vietnam faced closure, and USIA evaded the prospect of losing invaluable art work and having to face the consequences. The damage to the agency's reputation for safe and secure handling of valuable works of art would have limited its ability to present American art programs anywhere abroad in the future.

Against this background of uncertainty and tension, about two months after we arrived in Saigon we took a vacation trip to Thailand between March 9 and 20. We visited both exotic Bangkok and the beachfront resort of Penang where a monkey bit son Alex and he learned how to climb out of his crib. Reading the English language paper published in Thailand, we learned of the fall of Ban Me Thuot, a major city in the center of South Vietnam on March 8 and attacks on other locations in the central highlands about which we knew little because Armed Forces Radio and TV news in Saigon was censored and Saigon's English language paper was sponsored by the CIA.

The attacks, Sylvia knew from her work at the Pentagon, did not fit the usual pattern of enemy activity. She saw them as the final push by the north to take the south, something embassy leadership refused to acknowledge until the bitter end just six weeks later. This head-in-the-sand attitude hampered evacuation planning and endangered the safety and security of Americans in country. When evacuation was finally ordered on April 28 all hell broke loose and thousands of deserving Vietnamese embassy employees and their families were simply abandoned in places American embassy officials told them to gather for evacuation. The Americans waiting with them were summoned to board the last helicopters without any arrangements having been made to ensure the safe departure of the Vietnamese who trusted the good faith of their American supervisors and colleagues to the exclusion of other evacuation options.

During our trip to Bangkok Sylvia and I thought about having her and the children stay on there while I returned to Saigon, but ultimately we all returned to Vietnam together. From then on Sylvia worried endlessly about the safety of our family. The ambassador was simply unconcerned about that except in the most perfunctory manner. He authorized an update to the standard emergency evacuation plan that every embassy is required to prepare, but did so without regard to what was required to implement it on short notice or to ensure the orderly departure of more than 4,000 Americans and their dependents who were still in Vietnam in late April. Nor did he designate personnel to start mapping out a multi-stage process to get them out of the country until just days before the plug was pulled. The U.S. government paid a heavy price for the improvisatory and haphazard nature of the actual evacuation from Vietnam.

Ambassador Martin feared that the leak of any information about the embassy planning for evacuation would send the message to South Vietnamese leadership that the U.S. resolve to support the government was weakening. Instead he worked unrealistically to find an opportunity for some sort of accommodation that would leave South Vietnam intact. Martin's last weeks as U.S. ambassador to Saigon were a disaster. He simply failed to take responsibility for his most important obligation, the protection and safe departure of all Americans and the orderly evacuation of more than 100,000 Vietnamese who had linked their destinies to U.S. government policy objectives in their country over the past decade.

Since very little information was shared with embassy staff about what was really happening, we relied on rumors and unofficial information in our final weeks in Saigon. Our first clue that official Americans were taking seriously the deteriorating security situation was the absence of our children's playmates and their parents at the embassy swimming pool the Sunday after our return from Thailand. Inquiring as to their whereabouts, we were told they were on R&R (rest and recreation leave) in the Philippines or on a shopping trip to Bangkok. That all of them, mostly families of DAO or intelligence agency employees, split the scene within days of each other seemed an unlikely coincidence. A few days later the international nursery closed, indicating that many families, both American and foreign, were preparing to leave the country.

Our visit to a local veterinarian unexpectedly provided additional information about the approach of the final reckoning. We took our cat in for shots and the Vietnamese veterinarian told us that the wife of DCM Wolfgang Lehman had just stopped by to get certificates of health for their dogs because they planned to ship them out. That jolted us somewhat and maybe the vet as well who obviously hoped to learn more about that from us. It was a clear indication the DCM's family anticipated leaving soon for as attached as they were to their pets it was unlikely they would ship them out unless they also planned to depart. By late March, it was clear that officials at the top of the embassy hierarchy were preparing to pull their staffs out of Vietnam regardless of ambassador Martin's stalling on plans for an evacuation.

Finally, at the end of March, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger ordered the ambassador to authorize the departure of American dependents from Vietnam, but Martin told his section heads they could grant departure orders only for married individuals who requested them on a case by case basis. USIS PAO Alan Carter and heads of other agencies ignored that caveat and announced to their entire staffs that any dependents seeking to depart would be able to do so with embassy travel orders issued not for evacuation but for resettlement in the U.S. under "separate maintenance". Such orders provided for round trip transportation under the assumption that dependents would eventually return to post when circumstances warranted it. Everybody knew, however, that no one would be cashing in those orders for return tickets to Saigon. The authorized departures indicated Washington was aware the days of the U.S. in Saigon were numbered as were those of the government of the Republic of South Vietnam.

Before all this we entertained the notion of Sylvia leaving as an escort on a recently authorized 'Operation Babylift' flight to expedite the transit of more than 2,000 Vietnamese orphans that Americans had expressed interest in adopting. That way she could travel home at no cost to us to take the Foreign Service oral exam. Seats for escorts would enable dozens of female military employees and dependent spouses from other agencies to depart without evacuation orders and lessen the burden to DAO in dealing with remaining dependents. As an escort, she would be permitted to travel with our children. In the end, she did not take advantage of that option because USIS authorized her separate maintenance orders. She and the kids departed April 4 on one of the last Pan Am flights out of Saigon.

The first Operation Babylift flight departed via a reconfigured Air Force C-5 Galaxy, the largest cargo craft in the world, the same day Sylvia left on Pan Am. A cargo door blew off 12 minutes after take off depressurizing the cabin and severing several flight control cables. The plane crashed short of the runway after the pilot circled back to Saigon's Than Son Nhut airport. Some 138 people were killed including dozens of DAO spouses. Sylvia did not hear anything about the disaster during the four days she spent crossing the Pacific. Equipment failure on the Pan Am plane resulted in a two-day layover in Guam and an overnight layover in Hawaii. She did not want to burden her mother with the problems PanAm was having and therefore made no attempts to contact her en route.

Someone from the State Department, however, called her mother to let her know Sylvia had departed on April 4 without mentioning that she was flying PanAm. Needless to say her mother panicked thinking Sylvia was aboard the Babylift flight. She became frantic when she heard nothing from Sylvia the next day. My father finally called PanAm, got confirmation that she was a passenger and learned of the mechanical difficulties that had held up the flight so long.

Of the 52 pets on board confined to the cargo hold for four days, only two were alive on the baggage carousel in San Francisco, one of them being Princess, the Siamese cat we acquired five years earlier in Warsaw. The others animals died of dehydration because no one paid any attention to their needs during the delays despite assurances from Pan Am personnel. Princess lived with us for 12 more years; she died in 1986.

Knowing that Sylvia and the children were safe in the United States eased my mind considerably, but conditions in Saigon were deteriorating. Things surely would have gotten worse faster had Vietnamese police not been able to enforce limited entry into Saigon to only registered residents. That prevented a reoccurrence of the situation in Da Nang and created a period of relative tranquility that prevailed until just before the final evacuation less than three weeks later.

That tranquility, however, was dramatically shattered on April 8 when at 8:20 am a low flying, fast moving fighter jet roared over USIS headquarters and headed straight for the presidential palace less than a mile away. A minute later it roared over again and a massive explosion seconds later was followed by several rapid bursts of automatic weapon fire. USIS employees hit the floor and crawled under desks. Fortunately no one was injured because the windows had been sealed with Mylar, a synthetic material that prevented the glass from shattering inward. The mission warden closed the gates, and we prepared for the worst. Nothing followed, however. Little more than an hour later, the government announced a curfew. Damage caused by the bomb dropped on the palace was minimal, and no one was injured. President Thieu was elsewhere at the time.

Everybody started scrambling to get home. Traffic immediately became snarled, detours were set up everywhere and the streets were patrolled by soldiers in black jackets. Motor scooters drove on sidewalks disregarding frazzled pedestrians whose safety they threatened. I had the thankless task of patrolling the USIS annex a block from the embassy. Fortunately a colleague was there, and we chatted until the curfew was lifted at about 3:00 pm after which another colleague dropped by with sandwiches for the three of us.

The bombing hastened the downsizing of the USIS American staff from 16 to five. With no more programs to develop and no farewell functions arranged for my Vietnamese USIS staff or household help, I left April 18 on the last Cathay Pacific flight out of Saigon to Hong Kong with another former BPAO colleague. After decompressing there for three days, I flew to Athens, Georgia where Sylvia and the children were staying with her parents. A fellow faculty member of Sylvia's father at the University of Georgia asked to meet me after I arrived there. Sylvia's mother arranged a lunch for us in her home and I "briefed" professor of law Dean Rusk, who wanted to hear what I knew of developments in Vietnam. He was secretary of state during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and along with Defense Secretary Robert McNamara largely shaped the policies that ultimately required the presence of 400,000 American soldiers in South Vietnam. Our meeting occurred several days after I arrived from Saigon. There was little I could relate to him about events since my departure, but he expressed gratitude for the opportunity to hear from someone who had been on the ground in Saigon so recently; I think our meeting saddened him. Nothing I said offered hope for optimism.

Upon returning to Washington, I worked briefly as a member of the State Department task force assigned to relocate up to 130,000 Vietnamese President Ford authorized to enter the United States in the event of an evacuation. I do not know how many ultimately made it to the U.S. but the numbers were large. The work was fast-paced and stressful as the task force escalated rapidly into a multi-agency operation. I recall lengthy involvement in determining that the National Guard Training Center at Fort Indiantown Gap, Pennsylvania; Eglin Air Force Base in Florida; and Marine Corps Camp Pendleton in California would be the locations for Vietnamese refugee welcome centers. That was followed by exhaustive meetings to mobilize and organize U.S. agencies and NGOs to provide support required there.

I also recall lengthy conversations with a number of mayors from small towns in the Mid- and Northwest who called to say they were prepared to assist with the relocation of refugees. Most touching were their pleas for us to identify Vietnamese physicians who, their residents hoped, would be willing to settle in their out-of-the-way communities to compensate for the glaring lack of medical services around them characteristic of so many American rural areas. My tenure on the Vietnamese refugee task force and my involvement with U.S. policy regarding Vietnam concluded when I began 100 hours of Hindi language training to prepare for an onward assignment to New Delhi, India in July.

ROBERT A. MARTIN
Political Officer
NhaTrang/Saigon (1974-1975)

Robert A. Martin was born and raised in Philadelphia, beginning in 1931. His father was a Naval medical person during World War I and II. After finishing primary and secondary school in Philadelphia, Robert Martin attended Andover and Yale, where he majored in international relations. After graduation in 1954, he was drafted into the Army. When he was released from the Army in 1956, he entered law school at the University of Pennsylvania. He served in various positions in Washington, DC, as well as abroad in Belgium, Vietnam, Iran, and Germany. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on September 8, 1994.

MARTIN: In the early spring of 1974, we were assigned to Vietnam and went off there together to serve initially in Nha Trang. After about a month of that there was a need for an officer in the political section in Saigon so Joanna moved from Nha Trang to Saigon. About six weeks later, there was a need for someone in the Pol/Mil section in Saigon so I came from Nha Trang to Saigon and we were together again.

Q: Let's talk about Nha Trang, a port city. What was the situation when you went out in 1974?

MARTIN: We got out there in the end of May, 1974. We went from Saigon, after a couple of days, up to Nha Trang. Joanna was doing political work and I was doing political work, but they were quite different things. I spent much of my time going out and about the Military Region II area to the various other locations there to see what was going on with the people we had working as advisers. At that point there were very, very few military advisers, but the AID missions and that effort was ongoing. I also visited the South Vietnamese forces and the leadership in the various locations there to find out what was going on. One of the things I was doing was tracking the South Vietnamese forces and their losses on a regular basis. We got reports into Nha Trang from various liaison people we had in the key areas throughout Military Region II, and based on that I would put together a message each week on the number of casualties and what was going so far as these reports we got from our advisers.

Q: Was this a cease fire time?

MARTIN: It was after the major forces of the US forces had left, but there was still some military activity in this period. There had been an agreed cease fire before that, but that more or less broke down. At this time it was during a period when there were a number of engagements. It wasn't full war, but there was enough going on. There was a military situation between the two sides.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese forces that now had the responsibility of holding things together?

MARTIN: I must confess I didn't have much basis for having a very precise sense because I was so new. But certainly the sense I did get was that they weren't doing particularly well. Where they had a lot of men and matériel they were able to hold the situation, but they weren't making any particular progress in terms of expanding that situation or bettering their position. It was essentially a defensive effort, or so it seemed to me.

Q: When did you go down to Saigon?

MARTIN: In mid-September, 1974.

Q: What was your role then?

MARTIN: I was working in the pol/mil section in the embassy and was involved with liaison with our military group that was in liaison with the Four Power joint effort to try and add to the agreement and rein in the military activities. There was an Iranian group, an Hungarian group, an Indian group, and maybe Swedish, representation under the UN, if you will, that was trying to negotiate arrangements to tone down the conflict and to bring it more under control. There was also an effort to work out arrangements for solving questions of US missing in action and prisoners of war and I was involved in working with our military in that.

Q: Did we have much of a military contingent there at that time?

MARTIN: We had a rather sizeable headquarters military assistance group in Saigon, but we didn't have too much military out and around the country. It had by that point reverted really to the consulates general and the AID people in the field. It was mainly a civil representation on our part at that point. There were some military around and they got around the country to some degree, but the US presence was really almost gone at that point. Certainly in terms of fighting, it was all gone.

Q: What was the military's impression of what was happening in Vietnam at that particular time?

MARTIN: The US military was, I think, privately recognizing that the South Vietnamese were not very potent or very capable but they were doing everything they could to shore them up by providing them supplies. As you may recall, that was the period where support here at home for anything other than a complete pull out and stoppage of aid was very strong. Graham Martin was our ambassador then. He was doing a really noble effort towards maintaining Congressional support for funding the South Vietnamese following the peace agreement and the pull out of US forces leaving essentially the defense of South Vietnam and the military effort to the South Vietnamese. Ambassador Martin was very confident that if he could have gotten a mutli-year deal through the Congress that there was some hope that the South Vietnamese would pull of their socks and recognize that they did have support adequate to permit them to get on with defending and saving their country. Most of us thought that at the time and were somewhat abashed when that didn't come to past. But certainly in retrospect, it seems fairly clear that the South Vietnamese were never going to be able to do very much effectively to meet their own needs and that their defeat was essentially inevitable.

Q: How long were you there?

MARTIN: We all left, as you know, over the evening of April 29 and early morning of April 30, 1975. Joanna had gone off to Bangkok about ten days before that. The Deputy Chief of Mission, Wolf Lehmann, came to me about the middle of April and said, "You know we are at the point where we have to pare down more. I would like to send Joanna to Bangkok to help out with the embassy there in the preparations that clearly will be coming along before too long with people coming out of Vietnam." I said, "Well, I had understood that it was coming." Joanna and I talked and I took her out to Mehrabad airport about a day later and she went off to Bangkok. I stayed in Saigon.

Q: Going back just a touch. When did you at your level in the embassy figure that the game was up?

MARTIN: Well, certainly at the point when we began to draw down, it was more than clear. It had really become pretty clear several weeks before that that it was probably about over.

One interesting interlude that we had early in March, which would have been six or seven weeks before we finally all left, was a visitation by a group of former American POWs to Saigon, including now Senator John McCain of Arizona who had been a prisoner for over six years, and several others who had been imprisoned even longer. I don't recall that it included Admiral Stockdale of the last Presidential election political fame. But there were 10 or 12 of these individuals including a sergeant who supposedly was the person who had been held longer than anyone else among American POWs. That was really a fascinating visitation. I was involved with supporting that visit. The principal person, outside of the ambassador and the DCM, was one of the principal AID people, George Jacobson. I worked very closely with Jake and went around the countryside with this group of POWs over the several days that they were there. They even were taken out to the island off the coast where the infamous tiger cages were.

Q: This was a South Vietnamese prison island?

MARTIN: Yes. It really was fascinating days. The Vietnamese were very gracious and they had a lovely large dinner for them the last night they were there and treated them very well. I was surprised at the degree of steadiness and stability and under control that these people who had gone through these horrible experiences evidenced. They really were well in hand and did not give any indication that I noticed that their horrible experiences were preying on them, at least outwardly.

Q: What were they out there for?

MARTIN: To provide an opportunity for the South Vietnamese to thank them for their effort and as a gesture towards the United States, solidarity and all of that.

Q: When had the Highlands started to fall apart?

MARTIN: That was about that time. A little earlier there were several crucial losses up in the northwest portion of MR II. Certainly by mid-March it was pretty clear that things were going very, very badly and it happened very, very quickly. There were several occasions when the North pressed a large Southern forces pretty hard and the Southern forces rather than holding, split and high tailed it and therefore suffered greater losses than would have been otherwise.

In tandem with that was all the reports coming from Washington that the Congress was not prepared to play the game as Graham Martin was proposing, namely, providing multi-year package of support. So there didn't seem to be much heart in the Southern side of the equation at that point.

Q: There are many stories about Graham Martin's talking a game that things would hold and all. What was happening down in the political section?

MARTIN: It was fairly clear that things were going badly, but there was so much activity because...one of the things that was taking a lot of time was people in the United States of one sort or another, both American and Vietnamese who had got to the United States and had friends and relatives who were becoming increasingly at risk...there was a huge avalanche of inquiries about these people. People were coming from the States and other places trying to get involved and to assure the safety of this individual or that small group, etc. Of course, the Congress was getting involved in that as well and that compounded the difficulty. We didn't have much time to think about the military situation.

Q: Were your Vietnamese counterparts seeing what was going to happen?

MARTIN: I really didn't have any Vietnamese counterparts. So I can't usefully comment on that aspect of it. Although it seemed fairly clear generally that the Vietnamese were understanding that it was a very uncertain time and everything was a huge question mark.

Q: When were you basically packed and ready to go?

MARTIN: One thing I might mention in terms of the effort to do good works and save Vietnamese, etc., you will recall that about the middle of March that a C-5 loaded with children took off from (inaudible) airport in Saigon and very sadly had a problem before they even got fully airborne and crashed. A huge number of the kids on board were killed. The C-5, the largest transport plane we have was configured with two levels and all the people on the lower of the two floors were killed and most of the ones on the upper level were saved. It was a tragic accident. That obviously compounded the problem and atmosphere and the thinking of people at that time. Everything was going wrong.

We packed to leave some weeks earlier in terms of our household effects. The thought that we were going to be drawing down and probably leaving or at least be on a very limited basis had been fairly clear since about the middle of March. So the last half of March was a very frantic effort to pack up the things of the people in the embassy and get them on their way out of the country. Joanna was still there and we did that. We saw our effects off on a very rickety truck, piled up high and I thought as the thing turned the corner of the street we were living on that it was probably the last we would see of all that stuff. But happily our things did get out. Some others, particularly some of the people who had been up in Military Region I in Da Nang, did not have equal luck. One of our colleague officers, Theresa Tull, had her things packed up there and put together as a pallet and ready to go and then the pallet never got picked up and her things were just left. And there were other cases like that. Al Francis, an officer who had been involved on the pol/mil side in Saigon and then subsequently in the political section in Saigon was sent up to Da Nang to run the consulate general there towards the end and was involved in the evacuation from there of all the Americans, but unhappily not all the American people's effects, subsequently out of Saigon in advance of the actual final departure.

With respect to packing up in terms of when I left, I never did pack. You may recall that, I guess it was the night of April 28, there was a plane that took off from a local military airport and came into the center of Saigon and flew towards the Presidential Palace and fired on it. It did not attack further, but that caused a lot of confusion and people were pretty tense even before that. They got hugely tense at that point and the DCM, Wolf Lehmann asked me to go with him and have dinner at his residence, which I agreed to since my wife had gone about ten days prior to that. We were driven in his car to his residence, which took us quite a while to manage because of the tenseness and confusion in the city. We got there and had dinner and were chatting about one thing and another and Wolf got a call from the ambassador about some aspect of something and the thought was that I should go back home. The DCM's car took me back through town and dropped me off at our place. I went to bed and woke up the next morning to get a call to say that a car would be coming. Just a note in that regard that those of us attached to the embassy and the consulates general around Vietnam, did not have at that time our own vehicles. We were all transported around on the basis of a motor pool and those of us who had individual needs, especially at the consulates general, could borrow a motor pool car to drive around to do what he had to do. In Saigon, all of us had to call up the motor pool and a car would come and pick us up and take us to where we had to go.

So a car was coming to pick me up early the morning of the 29th. I went off to the embassy and about mid-morning it became clear that this was virtually it and I did get a car to take me home and managed to pack up a small attaché case with a couple of things and went back to the embassy. I did not see the maid that we had during that brief return to pick up a few things.

About mid-day the ambassador's secretary, Eva Kim, asked me to go with a colleague, Brunson McKinley, in two cars to go out around town to pick up some people that the ambassador wanted picked up and brought to the compound to participate in the departure. So Brunson got his car and I was to go in the admin counselor's car. We tried to get out one of the gates and we were unsuccessful. We had to go to the back gate to get out and come around the embassy compound and I met the driver of the admin counselor's car in the front of the embassy where it was parked. We took off and McKinley took off and went our separate ways to places around town to pick up some people.

It was not a very pleasant experience. I went to one location where there were all sorts of people and, of course, they all wanted to go. They all had dozens and dozens of bags and baskets and this, that and the other. I said, "Look, we can't possibly take anything like that. One item per person." The idea was to get this lady and two or three of her kids. It was just really bizarre. At another location I was to pick up this elderly couple and they wanted to take what appeared to me to be a bird cage that was supposedly the treasure of their life. We managed to fit this into the trunk and the car was stuffed. We finally got six people into the car with some of their belongings and went back to the embassy and thought we would try to get in the back in the back gate of the compound near the staff club and swimming pool.

By that time that was so congested that that turned out not to be possible. We were able finally to extricate ourselves from there and to go back around to the front of the embassy. The car had a radio in it and we were able to be in touch just across the grilled fence into the embassy itself. We were told to try to get in the pedestrian gate which was right near where we were parked and that a marine would come down in twenty minutes to open that gate to let us in. Well, of course, as soon as we got out of the car and all the luggage was unloaded from the trunk, people who were watching the embassy like hawks thought something was afoot and it was like the pied piper. We just had dozens and dozens of people.

So I said, "Look, gang, we are going to walk down away from this gate," which we did about 25 or 30 yards down the street to try and get the crowds away from the gate and wait. When I saw somebody coming finally to open the gate we tried to edge back along the sidewalk without being too obvious. But we were obvious and we just took everyone with us. We got to the gate and the gate was open and everybody wanted to come in. Of course, I was standing there sort of playing God, pushing people back and trying to get the people who I had picked up in, the ones that we were particularly interested in, and had people who had been former employees, Foreign Service Nationals who were no longer in the employ and hadn't been able to get in somehow asking to be let in. It seemed to me that if I once started doing anything like that, we would have a riot. So I kept pushing these people out and finally the marines pulled me in and we closed the gate. It was a terrible situation, not a pleasant one at all.

My colleague McKinley had been a lot smarter in some ways. He had recalled that there was a gate between our compound and the French compound, the two backed up to one another. So he had gone to the gate of the French compound and talked to the French, by then Foreign Legionnaires -- they had brought in about 75 Foreign Legionnaires to protect their compound and they were the biggest, toughest guys I have ever seen. He talked them into letting him in and he said that not only could they have the car, but there was a case of champagne in the trunk and they could have that too. So they let him in and he left the car and champagne there, got his group and went through the gate between the two compounds. So he had no problems. I hadn't been quick enough on that.

Q: And then what happened?

MARTIN: Then I got the people I had collected in the area back of the compound where I had been told to take them. I left them and went into the chancery, itself, and went back up to the ambassador's and DCM's area and told Eva Kim that my people were in the back with all the others. It was shortly after that that I was walking out in the area just outside the ambassador's and DCM's suite when I heard the telephone on the receptionist's desk ring. There was no receptionist sitting there so I picked it up. I almost fainted, because the voice on the other end was our maid. I just could not believe how she had happened fortuitously to call and it had come through on this phone just as I was walking by just about three or four hours after I had been home and got just a very few things. We had a chat about what I wanted for dinner and how were things going, etc. I told her what I wanted for dinner, knowing full well that I would never get there, and tried to buck her up a little bit. But it really was an eerie feeling to pick up the phone and have her at the end of it. I just couldn't believe that.

During the remainder of the afternoon, I helped out shredding papers and various things trying to get our paper supply down, and helped out in the ambassador's area in all the things that were going on. Subsequently, at the end of the evening somewhere between 9:00 and 10:00, I was told by Jim Devine, who was the pol/mil counselor and in charge of getting people on the helicopters off the roof as opposed to helicopters that were landing in the parking lot just outside the chancery, that it was time for me to go. So I picked up my attaché case and walked up to the roof and got into the helicopter.

Q: Where did you go?

MARTIN: I went off to the carrier Hancock which had been put back into service for this particular chore in the South China Sea. I was in a CH-47 helicopter, picked off the roof and they didn't close the back door entirely and I was sitting next to the labor attaché and the helicopter was chockablock. We started off and the labor attaché looked back and said, "Gosh there are helicopters chasing us, they are after us." I said, "Come on, that is more of the same kind of gang that we are." He was very antsy about it and I finally got him calmed down. We ended up on the Hancock and I was able to get in touch with one of the officers who wondered if we wanted any thing and I said, "Maybe it would be a good idea if we sent a message off indicating that this group had arrived." So I drafted a message which was sent off to the Department in Washington and I guess we sent it also informational to Bangkok and Manila, which were the two principal places that were going to be receiving the evacuees. I then found where we were going to be billeted on the Hancock and just went to bed. I may have had something to eat.

I have a story in terms of the departure from the parking lot. A couple of days before the evacuation actually began, one of the problems that had to be taken care of was a tree that was right in the center of the parking lot. The admin counselor decided that he would take care of that tree in advance. So he was out there trying to get it chopped down and Graham Martin heard about this and was furious and said to stop that. The reason being, of course, was that if the Vietnamese saw this they would recognize that something was afoot. So that effort stopped. When the tree had to come down, it turned out that our doctor, who subsequently became the head of MED in the Department, a very wonderful person, was the one who actually took care of the tree and got it out of the way. But, it was funny the idea of not taking the tree down in advance because everybody will know that something is going to happen.

Q: I heard stories afterward that people at the embassy would sort of go by and pick off branches little by little because they knew something had to be done.

MARTIN: In any event, as I say, Jim Devine and mission people were in charge of the evacuation from the roof, and the US military was running the evacuation by helicopter from the parking lot and other places around the town and from the military compound which was essentially co-located out at (inaudible) airport.

Q: What happened to you next?

MARTIN: We spent a couple of days just going in circles in the South China Sea waiting for others who might come. And, indeed, on the second day a helicopter came in loaded with Vietnamese. A Vietnamese military person had stolen a helicopter with his family and as many friends and relatives he could stow on board and landed on the flight deck of the Hancock. Because there was so much in terms of people and no storage space, they got the people out and pushed the helicopter off the Hancock, which was done just in order to save space.

Finally, after four or five days we went into Manila, into Subic and were let off there. We were supposed to be taken by helicopter to the chancery downtown, but somehow that got all fouled up and we went by bus someplace else. Ultimately we got back to the chancery. A colleague who had formerly worked for me was in the embassy in Manila at the time so I linked up with him. I knew the then ambassador, Bill Sullivan, quite well, so I called him. He was out at the residence and said, "Oh, come on out we are just sitting around the pool and having a drink. I have the Iranian Four Power people out here, the ambassador and the general." So my colleague took me out in his car to the residence and I sat around during the course of the afternoon having a couple of drinks and chatting away. It was at that point that Ambassador Sullivan said that he had been tempted, when the evacuation was underway, to send a telegram to Ambassador Martin in Saigon to commiserate with him but also to provide a reminder to insure that before he left that he turned out the light at the end of the tunnel. Sullivan chortled and said that he just didn't have the heart to send it. He might just have well, because the story, I am sure, has made the rounds many times since.

After a day or so in Manila, I flew off to Bangkok to join Joanna. From there, after a day or so, we began the trek back to the United States. We went through Hong Kong, Hawaii and finally through California and back to Washington.

LACY A. WRIGHT
Acting Consul General
Chung Tien Province (1973-1974)

Political Officer
Saigon (1974-1975)

Mr. Wright joined the Foreign Service in 1968 after earning degrees at Mendelien College and Loyola University. His foreign service took him to Vietnam both during and after the War. Other assignments took him to Milan, London and Bangkok as well as to the State Department in Washington, where he worked with International Organizations in matters concerning refugees, and UNESCO affairs. Mr. Wright was born and raised in Springfield, Illinois. Mr. Wright was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You left London in '72, and where to?

WRIGHT: I came back to Washington, and I was in the economics course. That was a three-or four-month course at that time. It began in the beginning of the summer, the one that I took, and I did not finish it quite because I was called back to Vietnam. And that, I think, was a very interesting phenomenon. You know, I would say that almost all of us who went to Vietnam initially went there kicking and screaming. That's the last place most of us wanted to go. In fact, a number of people, until they had gotten in the Foreign Service, I'm sure, had taken every measure they could to keep themselves from being sent to Vietnam. So there we all were, and most of us were sent there, and most of us didn't want to be sent there. However, in 1972, many of us were going to be asked to go back a second time, and I remember that we were called, those of us who were supposed to go, to the State Department Operations Center by U. Alexis Johnson, and he was the one who gave us our initial talk, briefing, about what we were to do and how this came about. I always have imagined that this presented the powers that were in the State Department with a bit of a problem. The whole idea was to send people to monitor the observance of the peace agreement, which was coming up and which, indeed, was signed in the beginning of 1973.

So as the signing drew closer and as the Department was preparing for it, it decided that it would send people out to do this monitoring. Well, it didn't make much sense to send brand new people to Vietnam to do this, they must have figured; they had to send people who had already been there. But how were they going to do this? They'd already asked people to go to Vietnam once; how were they going to ask them to go to Vietnam again? Well, I guess they must have thought, We will design a program that will be as attractive as possible. We'll only tell them they have to go for six months. They can have an R & R in the middle of that and either go back to their post or go to Washington, which meant in practice that you could go anywhere in the world that you wanted. And we'll give them the normal hardship pay of 24 per cent more than their salary. And then at the other end, we'll seal it off, however, by saying that if you're called, you have to go; this is not a volunteer situation. So having done that, they drew up a list of people, and they notified all of us, and do you know what happened? Something that I'm sure surprised everybody. Instead of having a hard time getting to go, people were coming out of the woodwork anxious to go back to Vietnam. In fact, the personnel bureau was getting phone calls saying "Hey, how come my name's not on the list to go back to Vietnam?" So the way it turned out, they had no trouble getting people to go back to Vietnam, so much so that those who really didn't want to go, as I remember it, were excused because so many people did want to go. And that is very revealing, I think, of the way that service in Vietnam grabbed on to people and turned people who were initially very reluctant to go into people who found the whole experience really fascinating.

Q: Also, I think, this is also at a certain point, having been through it once, and this is a new thing, and wanting to be—this is where the action was.

WRIGHT: That's true.

Q: But there is this attraction to that. You were there from really about '73, was it?

WRIGHT: Yes, the beginning of '73, January of '73, I believe, until the end, which was, of course, April 30, 1975.

Q: So this was not a six-month tour.

WRIGHT: Not for me, because I extended.

Q: What about family?

WRIGHT: I was not married then. I didn't get married until 1976, so that was not a consideration at the time. It was, of course, a consideration for a lot of other people.

Q: Well, when you went out there in '73, what was the word of wisdom within the State Department of the Vietnam hands about these peace accords that were coming up and all. What was the mood before you got out there?

WRIGHT: I think everybody was delighted that the war seemed to be coming to an end, did come to an end, at least temporarily. I think there was a lot of skepticism about how effective the peace accords would turn out to be, skepticism which proved very well founded. But I guess if you had taken a poll of the people who went out there, I'm sure you would have found a whole spectrum of views about what was going to happen, probably weighted on the skeptical side.

Q: So you got out there in '73, and you were doing what? Did you have several jobs, or--

WRIGHT: Yes, I had a whole series of jobs. I went back to Can Tho in the Delta, and we formed a new structure. At that point, with the signing of the peace accords, we founded consulates general in each of the four military corps, which became the focal point of our activities and replaced the CORDs structure which was there before.

So I went down to IV Corps. The man who was named to be the consul general was Tom Barnes. Tom Barnes was an extremely bright, very dynamic and idiosyncratic guy, who was, by the way, a close associate and admirer of John Vann. In fact he had been John Vann's deputy when Vann was killed up in II Corps. He was a terrific language speaker. He spoke Vietnamese and learned many other languages and was tough as nails and was probably an admirable choice for the job that he was assigned to. And I think that despite his having been a man who was really tough in his evaluations of people and in the way he did business—cold-blooded, I think, is the word comes to mind—he left that six-month stint held in very high esteem by those of us who worked for him.

I might tell you that one of the things that Tom Barnes did which I've never seen anyone else do in the Foreign Service—Barnes was, of course, a career Foreign Service officer—he had about 16 of us working for him, that is, 16 young officers who were his staff, as well as a deputy, who was Frank Wisner. And he first of all said that all of us were to be called vice-consuls. Well, this rankled some people who felt that that title was too low for them. Maybe they had had a higher one somewhere else. At any rate, some people didn't like it. He wanted everybody to be, first of all, on an equal footing and, secondly, easily distinguishable from himself, who was the consul general. But the thing that he did that really raised some eyebrows was in the way he evaluated people. He evaluated us against one another. That is, he would say, "I'm going to rank all of you. One of you is going to be first, one of you is going to be second, and one of you is going to be 16th," or words to that effect. And he carried that over, not totally but to some degree, to our written evaluations. He would say something like, "Mr. Jones did a fine job here. Among 16 officers, he was in the top half," or the top third, or maybe even better. I don't remember how he phrased things for people who were in the bottom half or the bottom third. He may have been silent on that, but I don't know. But anyway, he'd let all of us know where he thought we ranked among our peers. As I say, he carried it over into our evaluations to some degree, which I've never seen done anywhere else in the Foreign Service. And of course, you had to be an awfully strong character to have even thought of such a thing, let alone done it.

Q: Let's talk about Can Tho. What were you doing?

WRIGHT: Several things. At first, I was down in Chung Tien Province, which was in the middle of the Delta. I don't think I stayed down there for very long, several weeks probably, and I reported back what was going on on the ground down there. Then I went up to Can Tho, to the headquarters, and I was one of the officers assigned to headquarters. And I guess I must have traveled around some. I had already been in the Delta, unlike a lot of other people there, and so I knew the lay of the land better than most people, although some of the other people had also been there in different provinces. Desaix Anderson, for example, was one of the young officers. He had been in My Tho, and he came back. Then I became a kind of reports officer, I guess, for a while, working with Frank Wisner, and then, as the six months drew to an end, I decided to extend, and I became, at some point, the person who was going to stay and be the number two at the consulate general. I'm not quite sure when Tom Barnes left, probably June or July. I believe then that Frank Wisner was acting consul general for a while. In fact, he was until the arrival of the new consul general, who was Wolf Lehmann. And then I think Frank left soon after Lehmann arrived, and I became Lehmann's deputy.

Q: What were we doing there, I mean, all over? What was the idea of this group down in the Delta and, by inference, what the other ones were doing?

WRIGHT: Well, we were doing a certain amount of the same things that we were doing before in a diminished way, but first of all, we were doing a lot of reporting. We were trying to report on the observance of the peace agreement. We were reporting, for example, any outbreaks of fighting that occurred. We were reporting the movements of the South Vietnamese forces and, to the extent that we could, of the enemy's forces. We were reporting the activities and watching the activities of the ICCS, the International Control Commission, which was composed of the Canadians, the Polish, the Hungarians—it seems to me there were four of them, had to be—I'm forgetting somebody—Indonesia. And for them, the Can Tho area was Region VII. And so we got to know a number of them, and we were very interested in what they were doing. At the same time, a lot of the world development effort that we had been doing in the Delta for some years we continued to do with, however, very much diminished personnel. We still had a kind of "rump" CORDS structure out there. We had AID people in the different provinces. But as time went on, that became smaller and smaller, so that by the time that Wolf Lehmann, after he had been there a year or so, went up to Saigon to become DCM, which was in about April of 1974, I had become acting consul general, and there were about 100 Americans working in the Delta.

Q: Well, what was happening in the Delta? The peace accords had been signed. Immediately prior to the peace accords, had there been much enemy North Vietnamese-Viet Cong activity there, and during the time you were part of this team, what was happening? What were the South Vietnamese doing?

WRIGHT: It started off quite well. The South Vietnamese were going around trying to clean things up, which they should not have been doing if they had been observing the peace accords strictly. But both sides were violating it to some degree. The Communists, too, were jockeying for position, trying to stash people here and there. The main thing that happened, however, I would say, over that year and a half period, was the progressive disarming of our side, so that I can remember, when I became acting consul general, in April or so of 1974, we did a long cable from the Delta, which I wish I still had. I remember it was 16 pages, and it was an analysis of the situation, and it was a very pessimistic cable because by that time the arms and munitions available to the South Vietnamese army had really gone down to a worrying degree. There were starting to be a lot more desertions. Whereas before a platoon, say, in an outpost which had been used to expending a huge amount of mortars and rockets as a matter of course, in fact, wastefully so, they were now down to maybe a quota of one or two mortars per day. And all this was starting to tell on the morale of the South Vietnamese.

Q: Was this a deliberate policy on our part, or what was causing this?

WRIGHT: I guess overall, the US Congress was causing it because they were reluctant to commit more funds to the Vietnam War. And I guess in the winter of that year, 1974, November, December, a Congressional delegation came out to Vietnam to take a hard look at what our situation was, and a huge amount of effort was expended by Ambassador Martin and the whole embassy to try to convince them that this was doable and winnable and that we had to stick it out, and that was largely a failure. They went back, and they greatly cut down the amount of aid to Vietnam.

Q: What were you getting from these congressmen? Were they essentially saying, "They're not going to win, and so we might as well just not put money down a rat hole"?

WRIGHT: Well, you had a certain number of them, like Bella Abzug, I think was here, who were against the war all along anyway. I'm not sure I can answer your question with precision. I don't remember conversations of that kind with members, and so I don't want to mischaracterize them, but I think the overall feeling was that this was enough. If they can't do it now, with all of the huge amount of help that we've given them, then giving them more is not going to do the trick. Now, one of the things, also, that I'm sure some of them thought, because it was an idea that was floating around at the time and afterwards, was that the South Vietnamese were just playing possum; that is, that they really had a huge cache of arms of various kinds but they were doling them out in a stingy way in order to give us an impression that they were on their last legs. This idea gained a certain amount of currency, and it has been addressed, very forcefully, by General John Murray. John Murray was the second to the last American commander in Vietnam, a logistics officer who was sent there, frankly, to bring about our disengagement from Vietnam. And John Murray is still very much alive, lives not far from here, and has written a number of magazine articles and other things addressing this question of whether the South Vietnamese army was in fact fat with munitions but choosing to behave otherwise. And he says absolutely not. In fact, he believes that our failure to stay with them was totally shameful.

Q: What were your relations and your impressions with the Vietnamese commanders, civil and military, in the Delta, and their impressions of us?

WRIGHT: We had different relations with different ones. I think that overall there was a good deal of mistrust of us. On the other hand, they had nowhere else to go, so most of them could hardly say, "Well, we're going to stop seeing you." But there was a lot of mistrust, a feeling that we were, from the beginning, bending over backwards to play fair, to the benefit of the other side. And then, as things went on, that became more and more acute, so much so that when the final evacuation occurred, there was a great deal of fear that we would be shot at by our own allies as we departed the country. That did not happen, but the fact that the fear, the concern, was there shows you that there was a good deal of resentment on the part of many South Vietnamese at our policies and our behavior.

Q: Did the situation, while you were in the Delta, change?

WRIGHT: Oh, yes. It deteriorated greatly. You know, at the beginning of 1973, don't forget that we had come through a period of a lot of success for the South Vietnamese Government. I would say that from the time that I arrived there in 1969—don't forget that the last American ground troops left the Delta in 1969, that is, six years before the end of the war—and so all of the ground activity conducted in the Delta for the last six years of the war was done by Vietnamese troops. And there was a tremendous amount of progress made. There were big areas that were opened up to normal activity which had been under the control of the Communists. In 1974, when Terry McNamara, who has just written a book on this subject, came back to the Delta—

Q: It's called Retreat with Honor.

WRIGHT: That's right, and it's a very good book, I think. I've read about half of it, and it's excellent. But he describes his surprise when he came back in late 1974 at the degree to which areas that had previously been under Communist control were no longer so. So even that late, after all this deterioration near the end, McNamara could come back and see that things were still a lot better than they had been three years before. So what happened during that last year and a half was a very sad and rapid deterioration of conditions in the Delta, which of course, culminated in the takeover by the Communists in 1975.

Q: What was your and your colleagues' impression of the Control Commission during the time when you first started off there.

WRIGHT: Well, they were split along political lines, and that was very evident. The Communist members of the Control Commission were continually trying to see things in a way favorable to the Communist side, and the Canadians—who, by the way, dropped out after a certain point—and the Indonesians were on the other side.

Q: I know when we both were there in 1969-70, the feeling was the Canadians were pretty sound, I mean quite sound, and the Indians were wishy-washy and the Poles were agents of the other side, so--

WRIGHT: Yes, exactly right.

Q: --so that as a group this was really not an effective one at all.

WRIGHT: I guess that's right, and in fact, that's what impelled the Canadians to leave. They had been threatening to leave for some time, and I didn't think they would, but indeed they did.

Q: Were there any reflections of what was happening in Cambodia. I'm talking about the time you were in the Delta.

WRIGHT: Yes, there were. In fact, I would say in the second half of 1973, maybe early 1974—no let's say the first half of 1974 particularly—we were getting reports of killings—I'm not sure massacres is the right word, but killings—and people fleeing from Cambodia into Vietnam in northern Chao Duc Province. So much so that one of the people that was working in our consulate general, Ken Quinn, who is now ambassador to Cambodia, did a series of superb reports, which I think were the first intimation of what the Khmer Rouge were doing and would later do to a horrifying degree in Cambodia.

Q: Did you have American military observers around who were able to feed in information about the effectiveness of the ARVN, the Army of the Republic of Vietnam?

WRIGHT: Yes, I'm trying to remember whether we had military people attached to the consulate general. I know that we had people who came from Saigon, and I know, for example, that retired General Charlie Timmes used to come down from the embassy and talk with the commanders. His special job was to interface with the generals, the people that he had known before in Vietnam, and try to get their candid views of what was going on. So he would come down and make the rounds and talk to people and go back and write reports. So that's one way in which the embassy attempted to keep track of what was going on militarily.

Q: As you were seeing what you felt was a situation beginning to deteriorate, were you, or at least your group there, sort of making mental plans about what to do if the thing fell apart? I mean, were you feeling that that could come about?

WRIGHT: No, not at that point. We were worried about the situation, and in fact, in the cable that I told you about before, which gave a very pessimistic assessment... That cable went to Saigon but was never passed on to Washington. And Ambassador Martin, who ran things with an iron hand—that's the way he had the embassy structured. The consulates reported only to Saigon, and Saigon looked at it and decided what to pass on to Washington, and it did not pass that on to Washington. Once later, when I went up to Saigon to work, I was in a conversation with Martin in his office, I think I brought up why my cable had not been sent, and he was very much aware of it, and he said that he was reporting other things and he feared that that would have created—I forgot how he put it—a misimpression in Washington. Of course, that was very consistent with Martin's management of the news, which in the end did not serve him very well, because he became distrusted by the press and others for his consistently over-optimistic depictions of what was happening

Q: You're talking about this cable, and just to get a feel for this, often when you have something of this nature that somebody sits on, it gets back anyway. A friend comes along or somebody comes along and you say, "Well, I did this cable; it never went out." Did you have the feeling that what you were reporting, was this getting back to Washington?

WRIGHT: Well, I think it was. I remember, for example, that we were visited at a certain point by the famous Moose and Lowenstein team—I think it was Moose and Lowenstein at the point.

Q: Yes, it was.

WRIGHT: Well, you know later it became Moose and Meissner, but I think it was Lowenstein. They came down, and I talked to them, and in fact, they mentioned my cable in one of their reports. They didn't have the cable, but they mentioned it. So I think that, as a constant during the Vietnam War, Washington had a good idea of what was going on. You know, Daniel Ellsberg has written an essay on that subject, wrote it a long time ago, in which he contended that although many mistakes were made in decisions on the Vietnam War through the years by the various presidents involved, none of them emanated from bad information.

Q: Well, did the media come down to you? Did you see a difference in who the people were, superstars gone, and that sort of thing? What did you feel about it?

WRIGHT: They did come down. That's a good question. I did see various media people in Saigon. I'm trying to remember. Yes, Peter Kann was still there, and I can remember once that Peter Kann came to the Delta, Wall Street Journal. I knew very well Gavin Scott of Time Magazine, who came down there once, although it was after I'd left. But yes, people did come down, and because there was still a large press corps in Saigon. I'd have to think some more about your question to compare it to what had been going on, say, two or three years before, but I think the general answer is yes, there was still a fair amount of interest in what was going on in the Delta.

Q: You came up to Saigon when?

WRIGHT: In I believe it was probably early September of 1974.

Q: And you were there until, what, April 30th?

WRIGHT: April 30th, 9 p.m.

Q: What job did you come up to?

WRIGHT: I came up to the job of deputy director of the internal unit of the political section.

Q: How big was our embassy at that point. Let's look at the political section.

WRIGHT: The political section must have had 20 people or so, and it was divided into the internal unit, the external unit—or was it? I guess the external unit was small and had with our relations with different embassies. And then there was the Pol-Mil unit, which was probably three or four officers.

Q: Well, you think of this huge section with an ambassador on top who's trying to keep the news from going out, essentially, from accounts anyway, that he's essentially trying to create or control what news goes out, it's sort of an unworldly situation.

WRIGHT: Yes. Now don't forget that first of all, some of the people who were in the political section, at least—I don't want to overstate myself—were people whom Martin brought with him. In fact, a number of the people in the embassy were people whom Martin had brought with him and who were—I don't want to use the word loyal because that's probably over-dramatizing it and creating something that I don't necessarily think was true—but people that he had known for some time and who probably to some degree thought as he did. At the same time, the history of that last year or so has in it several instances of people who had a falling-out with Martin and left because of it. I can think of three or so right off the bat.

Q: Who were they?

WRIGHT: Well, one would have been the guy who was the head of the Pol-Mil unit after Danang fell and he came back from Danang: Al Francis, who was a long associate of Martin and had been brought to the country by Martin. He was a very strong personality. He became convinced, near the end, that there was no chance that the South Vietnamese could win. And I don't know any more what the specifics of his views were, but I think generally they were that we had to start to base our tactics on something other than the hope that the South Vietnamese could hold out. And he left some weeks before the end. Ken Moorefield, who had been aide to the ambassador and had very much distinguished himself in the final evacuation—again I don't remember the specifics, but I believe his transfer out of his job was accompanied by a bit of a falling-out with Martin. Another one, probably more dramatic, had to do with Lannon Walker, whom Martin had brought to Vietnam to be the administrative counselor. Lannon did have a falling out with Martin and left. Then there's the case of the Air Force general, whose name I don't remember, who jumped the gun on spiriting Vietnamese out of Vietnam who worked for him, who found himself on the next plane out, who was fired and attacked by Martin for having done that. I can probably think of a few others.

Q: When you got there in September of '74, did you find a different atmosphere in the internal political section than you'd felt out in the field?

WRIGHT: I suppose so, and particularly as the time approached for the evacuation. There was increasing tension and increasing worry, by myself too and others, that we were not starting preparations for the evacuation fast enough. Shep Lowman, head of the internal unit, was my boss. Shep felt the same way. Ken Quinn, by that time, was back in the NSC. He had been out, I believe, on a Congressional delegation. He too was worried. Some of these people were worried because they actually had families back in Vietnam, Ken Quinn being one of them, married to a Vietnamese so worried on that account and for broader reasons. But at any rate, Martin was very reluctant to begin overt preparations for an evacuation, and I think that, even though he's been greatly criticized for that, there were very good reasons why he should have been worried about that. We had just seen Danang fall apart in a horrible chaos. We had just seen more recently Nha Trang fall apart and its people having to flee at short notice. And I'm sure that Martin had to be greatly worried at the prospect that there could be that kind of chaos in Saigon, which would have endangered the lives of all of us, as well as lives of the Vietnamese. So I don't fault Martin for being very, very careful here, even though I was worried that he was leaving things until too late.

Martin did do another thing, though, that I think was ill-advised. Martin had a kind of divide-and-rule approach to management, and he would have two different people working on the same thing, or he would have people working on things whose lines of authority were not very clear, and I believe that he did that very much on purpose. And one of the results of this was that the evacuation itself suffered from this kind of thing. I can remember that on the night before the final evacuation, we were all called into the embassy very late at night, those of us who were involved in the evacuation—that was 15 or 20 people—and at that late date it was not clear who was in charge of the meeting, who was in charge of the evacuation. And I believe that the two people who were contenders were Jim Devine, who was at that point, I believe, the head of the political-military unit, and—I'm trying to think of who else. Maybe it was the former colonel...

Q: Oh, yes. I know who you mean. We can fill that in later. He was the colonel who was in—

WRIGHT: Jake Jacobson. It was those two, and it was not clear which one of them was in charge; at least it was not clear to me. So that's an example of what happened.

A much more serious example of this lack of coordination was what happened on the day itself. I think particularly of what happened with Ken Moorefield, who, like me, was out riding buses around trying to take people to the airport. Some time before, a couple of the AID people, Mel Chaplin being one—I forget the other one—had what seemed at first like a crazy idea but was not, and that is that, added to airlift capability, we should have some barges down on the river to take people out. And these two guys helped set that up. It was their idea, as I remember it, and they helped set this up. And by the way, thousands and thousands of Vietnamese got out this way, in the end. But not everybody knew about the barges, so Ken Moorefield was unable for some reason to get the people on his bus, at least at one point, to the airport, and he had to abandon them. Had he known about the barges, he could have taken these people there and they would have gotten out. So that's an example of a very poor coordination that had a very bad effect.

Q: Could you talk about how this developed, the collapse, and how you were seen and what were getting?

WRIGHT: The collapse occurred because President Thieu implemented a policy, or strategy, which had been talked about for some time, but he did it in an extremely poor way. The strategy was, as things became more and more dire, and as South Vietnamese capabilities diminished, to cede the northern part of the country to the other side and pull back and defend the rest. I heard that this idea originated with General John Murray. In the event—and by the way, nothing more dramatically shows the distrust between the South Vietnamese Government and us than this—what happened was that Thieu decided on his own to implement this strategy. Our chargé d'affaires (Martin was in the United States), Wolf Lehmann, was over at the Presidential Palace, if I remember correctly, on the very day that Thieu issued this order, and Thieu neglected to mention it to him. And Thieu, I believe, called his commanders down to Saigon and ordered them, within a day or two or three, to implement this pullback. And it turned out to be a horrible disaster, and as soon as it occurred, that is within several days, it was clear that everything was over, that it would only be a matter of a few weeks before the end would be definitive.

Q: Say, in the political section you had people out in the field all over the place. Were you making an effort without over-consultation with the Ambassador to get your people in and all?

WRIGHT: Well, I think events were taking care of that. I'm not quite sure of the time frames now, but I guess very early on must have occurred the fall of Danang, probably within a week or a shorter time of the decision to pull back. That occurred, I guess, as soon as General Ngo Quang Truong was drawn into this, and he had to reverse course on an instant's notice and lost his entire army. And I guess that must have involved the fall of Danang, so that it was events that were forcing all this. Now in the Delta, this was not occurring. There was no pullback there, for example, although I'm sure that as soon as this occurred this greatly heightened the need to prepare for their own evacuation. But I don't believe it involved the pullback of any personnel. But anyway, it was clear to everybody, I think, as soon as events occurred, what the dangers were. I guess one question is whether people started to be pulled back from Nha Trang at this time. I think that Nha Trang, if I remember correctly, was not overrun. I'm not sure about this; I don't quite remember that Nha Trang was overrun. I don't think so. I think that as the situation became very dangerous very fast, our people evacuated, if I'm not mistaken, but had to do so very, very quickly, not in much of an orderly way.

Q: Well, what was the atmosphere when all this was happening in the political section, and maybe from your CIA colleagues and others?

WRIGHT: Well, we were getting a lot of our information from our CIA colleagues. They're the people that at that point were getting reports from the field, mostly, so a lot of our information was coming through them. I was in a fair amount of contact with Frank Snepp at that point, and he was the source of a certain amount of our information.

By the way, one of the things that was occurring was that the South Vietnamese were, in a sense, the last to know, because their information was what they could get either by word of mouth or over official channels. And even though there was a great deal of alarm, I think it's fair to say there was not very good information coming out about all of this. And I remember at one point Ambassador Martin badgered Alan Carter to go on television and say, in effect, that things are under control. And Carter, I think against his better judgment, did this.

Q: Who was he?

WRIGHT: I'm sorry. Alan Carter was the head of USIS. And gained the opprobrium of a great many Vietnamese who later saw that this was not the way things were at all, but who, at the time, had a certain amount of faith in it because they thought, well, this is the official word of the American Government. It must be right.

But back to the political section, I think that once the retreat had been botched up, it was pretty clear to almost everybody that the end was near, and now it was a matter of trying to accelerate preparations for an evacuation and to move ahead like that and try to not delay things until it was too late. One of the things that we were doing that really sounds almost comical from this vantage point was to make lists of people—Vietnamese—that we were going to try to evacuate with us. The intention was good but the task was monumental. We were trying to look first of all at categories of people that we would try to evacuate—the legislature, the judiciary, the high-ranking military people, and so on, others who had been close to us, generally people who we felt would be in danger if they did not leave. And we had long lists of these kinds of people. I suppose that it was of some help at the end, and in fact, there was some order to the way we did things. In the final ten days, Martin put me in charge of getting out the Vietnamese families of Americans, and I did that, I and others, by choosing safe houses. We would get word to people, let us say, a mother- and father-in-law of an American officer and their family and tell them to appear at a safe house the following morning, and we would take them in a bus to the airport and they would leave. And we did this for about the last ten days, and I would say that we got out about a thousand people in that way. But of course that was only one of the things that was going on.

Q: Were you driving buses now, or did that happen later on?

WRIGHT: That happened later on. I usually stayed back at the safe house. Other people drove the buses, Phil McBride, for example, Art Cobler and several others who kind of came and went during that period.

Q: Were you having any problems with people like Lionel Rosenblatt and all, or problems with Foreign Service officers who had friends, family and all and just sort of took leave and appeared there. Did they work with you, or how did that work?

WRIGHT: Yes, they were there. I wouldn't call it a problem, although it was a problem for the embassy. I can remember Wolf Lehmann looking at me sternly and saying, "If you see Lionel Rosenblatt, you be sure to get back to me and tell me." I did see Lionel Rosenblatt. I neglected to get back to the DCM about it. Lionel did show up at least once at one of our safe houses, so I did run into him during that period.

Q: But they were getting his friends and family out, weren't they.

WRIGHT: Yes, not family, but people who had worked with him. I might tell you that years later I spent a day with Henry Kissinger in the refugee camps in Thailand, probably about 1986, so I had a long time to talk to him about the Vietnam War. And Kissinger said at one point, "You know, with regard to Lionel Rosenblatt and Craig Johnstone, when they came back, I had to lecture them about what they had done, but I privately admired them a great deal for having done it." So, yes, Lionel came, and I guess he was there for three or four days and then left.

Q: So how did this whole thing culminate for you?

WRIGHT: Well, we carried out our evacuation effort until the last day. As I mentioned, the night before the last day we had a meeting, and by then I guess the intelligence was such that we knew there was only one more day. And so we were told to pull out all the stops the following day. And then, as if to confirm that, that night—in fact maybe we already knew this at the time, I don't know—the airport was shelled, rendering it unusable by big fixed-wing aircraft. The Ambassador drove out to the airport, against everyone's advice, that morning about 10, and came back and definitively ordered the final evacuation. So on that last day, there was still a 24-hour curfew in effect, so there was nobody on the streets, or practically nobody, at the beginning of the day. I was in the embassy early. I only lived about a block away, so I just walked over. In fact, I walked over very early because I could hear the airport being bombed, which is a disturbing sound. So I got in at six or seven o'clock, and there were a number of people there already, so we started gearing up to make our final rounds. I guess we must have already, the previous day, let certain people know to be at what was on that day our safe house, because there were people there. And starting, I guess, about noon or so, maybe earlier, Joe McBride and I started going to the safe house and driving people to the airport.

I can remember poignant scenes from that day. One occurred as Joe and I were there I think together at one point and taking people out from the safe house, and I guess we made about three or four rounds, and on the last one—I don't remember whether we knew it would be the last one, but it was—there were more people there than could fit on the bus, and so the bus quickly became full. Excuse me, it was probably not a bus—it was a van. The van became full. And I can remember one Vietnamese man who, I'm sure, knew it was the last one, but who stepped aside and gave his place to a lady and maybe some children and said, "Oh, don't worry, I'll take the next one," I'm sure knowing there would not be a next one.

I also remember that at one of the houses there were some people there who were left. I can't quite remember who they were, but I made one last-ditch effort to go around and see if anyone was there. And at that point I was driving the van, and it was so crowded that I actually had one of the children sitting in my lap as I was driving, and we came to the house and there sitting on the steps, having been left, looking very forlorn, was a lady who had been one of our employees in the Delta and who had been told to come up to be evacuated, and her husband and her children, and somehow they all piled in, but had I not driven by there to see if anybody was left, they might still be there.

I also remember that at a certain point, probably about three o'clock, we were radioed to come in by the Ambassador's office, because as the day progressed, the city became more and more chaotic, and it was clear that as time went on it was more and more dangerous to be out there, although it did not really fall apart. And as you drove around to some areas of the city, it looked almost normal. For example, I made one last attempt, as I had during the previous days, to look for the brother-in-law of one of our Foreign Service officers, Al Adams, and I went down into the little pathway where their house was. To do that I had to park the van out in front and walk down there. And there in the midst of all this turmoil, life was going on. People were hanging out their wash, and they were doing the other things that you would do on a normal day. I didn't find him, so I left without him.

But anyway, then I went back to the embassy. Joe and I were in different vans at that point. And by that point, the embassy was surrounded by people desperate to get in and become a part of the evacuation. And I had a very hard time getting in. I had to be actually pulled in. One of the side gates was open, and I had to be pulled in by the marines, who were at the same time holding other people out. So I guess I got in there at three or four o'clock, and from then until 9 p.m., when I left, I was in the embassy, up in the Ambassador's suite mostly, watching things happen.

The telephones, by the way, were all still working. I can remember at one point I got a telephone call from a Vietnamese woman who said that they were at such and such a place and didn't know what to do and the buses that were supposed to get there had not come by. It was late by then. It was dark. So I said, "Well, look, the only thing I can tell you to do is to go down to the barges. There are barges." She said, "I'm afraid, I'm afraid to go down there." And I had no better advice. It was a very sad conversation, and we broke off. So it was really a dramatic day.

A little bit of comic relief occurred near the beginning of the day. Somewhere in the early morning, a Protestant missionary came up to the gate. Now at this point there was almost no one on the street, still deserted. I was called down to talk to him through the gate. He was an American, I believe, and he very politely said, "Listen, I don't want to bother anybody. I just want to see if everything's all right," or words to that effect. And I said, "Well, you know, this is probably going to be the last day. We'd be glad to let you join the evacuation. Why don't you come in?" He said, "Oh, I don't want to bother anybody." So finally I said, "Look, you better get in here." And he did.

But one of the saddest things that happened on that day was that the entire contingent from USIS, which was to have been evacuated, was instead abandoned. First of all, all the Vietnamese employees there had been told to stay until the end, and then they would be evacuated. And on the final day they were all told to go to one of their buildings and to wait, and somehow the buses that were supposed to appear there never did, and all these people were left. This was a terribly sad thing.

Alan Carter was the head of USIS, as I've already said, and one of the things that I remember was Alan was wringing his hands, going desperately around the embassy trying to figure out how to get buses to the people. At one point, early on in the day, he was wondering how to get his deputy or one of his officers back from there to the embassy, so I volunteered to go get him, because I knew from having just been out, that it was not dangerous at that point and that there were really very few people on the street. And I did. I went and got him, brought him back to the embassy. But then, none of the rest of those people were saved. And, you know it's amazing. We talked about Martin before, for whom I had a lot of respect, in some ways, but in other ways he could behave badly. And I can remember that after the evacuation Martin was on the ship and he was interviewed. He made some kind of a disparaging remark about Alan Carter and his failure to save his own people, or just enough of an intimation to let it be known that he faulted Carter for this. But at any rate, it was a very dramatic day, and as I said, I left at 9 p.m.

Q: You got out by helicopter.

WRIGHT: By helicopter off the roof, yes.

Q: What was your impression of the evacuation by helicopter?

WRIGHT: Oh, it was incredible. I mean, it was an incredible feat, when you think that—I think there were about—I don't want to over state this because I'm not sure of the figures—but a huge number of us were rescued on that day by those helicopters, which must have made hundreds and hundreds of flights. I think something like 10,000 people left in that way and were taken to the boats. Only one helicopter went down. I don't think any lives were lost. Those two pilots survived. And when you think of the complexity of that operation, the fact that this went on far beyond the time when pilots would ordinarily have been allowed to fly. Much of it was conducted at night. It was a phenomenal logistical feat.

Q: You ended up on what ship?

WRIGHT: I'm trying to think. Was it the Ticonderoga? I believe Martin was on the Blue Ridge. I think it was the Ticonderoga.

Q: I was just thinking, this might be a good point to stop, at this thing, and we'll pick it up, because I would like to get your impressions and all of once you're on the ship. So we've got you on April 30th on the ship the Ticonderoga, and we'll pick it up there.

WRIGHT: All right, great.

Q: Okay, today is the 30th of March, 1998. Lacy we're on the Ticonderoga. Can you describe the scene there and what was happening and what you were doing?

WRIGHT: Well, we seemed to be on there, first of all, forever. I guess it was several days that we were there on the ship before we landed in Manila. Although there was a lot of moving around and unsettledness, I think the mood was overall a bit somber, although I must say that my recollections of the ship ride are not very vivid.

I remember seeing some of the people on the ship that I knew. I'm thinking right now of a general whom I'd known in Vietnam for some time and who had been a province chief in Vietnam and was known as a very upright and charismatic guy who was always admired by the Americans because of his cleanliness and his zeal. He was not always liked by the Vietnamese that he served with. He later tried to go back to Vietnam. He was sent back by a group. This was well after 1975 was over. He tried to go back to Vietnam from Thailand; he was never successful. He was, however, a big success in the United States. I can remember reading newspaper articles about him after he went to California because he started out at the bottom and pretty soon had his own gas station and other businesses, as I recollect, and was one of the early examples of a Vietnamese success story. At any rate, he was on the ship. And I'm not sure that I can remember other people on there. Obviously, there must have been lots of Americans whom I knew and other Vietnamese.

Q: Were you at this early stage—I mean obviously you were terribly busy before, but when you had a little time to reflect—your initial feeling was, What went wrong? Why didn't it work?

WRIGHT: Well, I think we were, in a sense, beyond that. What I tried to do, what I did a little bit of, was write a few notes about what had happened. I think I did that on the ship. They were really very sketchy, though. I still have them, but they're not anything to brag about. I wish now that I had sat down and tried to do a better job of that, but I didn't. But I think that it was kind of a rest after a long period of exhausting work, because in those last two weeks or so we really had little time to do anything except work all day and go back home and go to sleep immediately and get up early the next morning with no time even to write down what you were going through. So it was really a very draining time, and this was a kind of forced rest that we had put upon us, a little bit too much so, as I remember, because, as I said, it seemed like that ship would never get to Manila, where it was supposed to be going.

Q: What happened when you got to Manila?

WRIGHT: I think we were there for two or three days. People then split up. You could go wherever you were going after that. We were processed through the embassy, and I guess we filled out forms and things like this. One of the things I remember—either on the ship or right after we got to Manila—we were asked if we wanted to send messages to anybody, so I asked that one be sent to my dad in Springfield, Illinois, telling him that I was okay, and then I assumed that it was sent. It never was; he never heard anything saying that I was okay, so he worried quite a bit between that point and the time when I finally got in touch with him.

Q: Was there any sort of bond between you—I mean, not just you, but the others, the people who came out of there. Us against them, or any sort of feeling, or were you all going your individual way?

WRIGHT: Well, there was certainly a bond, but I don't know it was as operative at that time as it would become later. I think everyone was probably worried about his or her own situation at that point. For me, and I guess for any of us, now that I think of it, who were in the Foreign Service or in AID or anywhere else in government, our jobs had just disappeared. And so that was one—I won't say preoccupation because I don't think anybody, at least not in the Foreign Service, was worried that he was going to be cut adrift—but we were uncertain as to where it was you were supposed to go next. What I did was to go first to Hong Kong for a few days, and then, because I had no ongoing assignment, I went to Paris, where I stayed for six or eight weeks and studied French and lived with some French people and had a very nice time there and then went back to Washington to work on the new entity that had been set up in the State Department to handle the resettlement of all of the refugees who had come.

Q: Well, you were dealing with the resettlement from when to when?

WRIGHT: The one in Washington?

Q: Yes.

WRIGHT: I guess it must have lasted six weeks or so. It wasn't all that long. This would have been, let us say, from sometime in June of 1975 until July or August.

Q: What were you doing?

WRIGHT: Well, I was a small cog in a very big machine, and one of the things that I did was to attend to the reports—I think we did daily reports to the White House and other parts of the State Department —on how the resettlement effort was going. At that point, the Vietnamese who came out had been funneled into camps in various parts of the country. There were four of them. These were Indiantown Gap, in Pennsylvania; one of them was in Florida, one in Arkansas, and one in California. And these were, I believe, all headed by people who had been in Vietnam, Alan Carter, the head of USIS, was the director of Indiantown Gap, I remember. So the refugees went to one of those places until they could be sponsored out by some American, either some American individual or some group. And that is the way it worked, and gradually all of them were.

Q: How did you find dealing with the White House then?

WRIGHT: Well, I didn't deal with the White House myself, but I think it's fair to say that the Ford White House took a very big interest in this. Needless to say, it was the biggest thing happening at that point. You also had people in the White House, that is, in the NSC, like Ken Quinn, who had been in Vietnam, who had Vietnamese family, who personally were extremely interested in what was happening. So there was, I don't think, any lack of attention from the White House. And actually, I think that one could say in retrospect, that that whole effort, with all its bumps, was quite a good one. There was a policy, an acknowledged policy, of trying to spread the new arrivals around the country in as equitable a manner as possible—equitable, that is, from the point of view of the states, whose social service systems would be burdened in many cases by these new arrivals. And I think that worked fairly well, even though in our country nobody can tell anybody else where to live. So many of the refugees who went to places that they, for one reason or another, considered inhospitable, sooner or later packed their bags and went elsewhere, either to California or perhaps to Texas, where there are a lot of Vietnamese, or to the Washington area. Still, however, to this day, I think you will find all over our country that there are Vietnamese living still from this period. There is a very large group, for example, in Chicago. I would say almost anywhere you go you will find Vietnamese.

Joining the Department of State as a Diplomatic Courier, his career took him to diplomatic courier centers in Washington DC; Frankfurt, Germany; and Bangkok, from which he serviced US Embassies throughout the world, collecting and delivering diplomatic pouches. His later assignments in Washington were of a senior managerial nature.

Q: And at the end of your Washington assignment, you went back to Frankfurt?

THOMPSON: I went back to Bangkok.

Q: Again as a traveling diplomatic courier.

THOMPSON: Yes.

Q: This would have been about 1974?

THOMPSON: Yes. So I went back to Bangkok. I had a total of four tours there, and this was my second tour.

Q: That was where you were the most, and in Frankfurt you were there twice?

THOMPSON: Twice.

Q: Four times in Bangkok. And this time, in the mid-'70s the Vietnam war was winding down or ending...

THOMPSON: It was winding down and I think I was the last courier to go in there.

Q: Into Saigon?

THOMPSON: Into Saigon. Yes. And also into Phnom Penh. I was the last, if not the last then certainly one of the last two to go in before it fell as well.

Q: Were either or both of those trips difficult for you to accomplish?

THOMPSON: No. It was a little bit stressful, because in Phnom Penh we had to circle in ever smaller circles to get down instead of flying straight down because the city was completely surrounded in those days at the last. But no, it wasn't difficult.

Q: You were on a commercial airline.

THOMPSON: Yes, it was Air Vietnam and I believe it was Thai International going to Cambodia.

Q: Okay. Those were just basically airport transfers I suppose and then you went right out on the same plane?

THOMPSON: No, if the plane went out, then we would have an airport exchange. I recall that the last two times that I went to Phnom Penh and Saigon I overnighted there.

Q: Because the plane left presumably the next day.

THOMPSON: Yes.

Q: Anything else about this second assignment in Bangkok?

THOMPSON: We interfaced with the Australian and New Zealand military to a great extent. We carried material down to Melbourne, Australia and handed it over to the Australians almost directly. We signed it over to a pouch clerk and in the same car he handed it over to the Australians. That was the first time that I experienced that.

Q: Did we do the same thing with the British? No.

THOMPSON: Well we might have, but I didn't actually see it. There was a cooperative military agreement where we actually carried classified material for them.

Q: And we would do the same for them. They would do it for us...

THOMPSON: No, to my knowledge, they never did it for us. We only carried our own material, but we carried things for them.

Q: Carried things for them and handed things over to them when we had gotten to the destination. So that was presumably that was arranged at higher levels, government to government.

THOMPSON: Yes.

Q: And then you would make sure that the person receiving it was the correct person and then that was it.

THOMPSON: Well, I would just sign it over to the Americans, and he would open the pouch and give it to the Australians. It was very interesting.

Q: And we would be kind of bringing material worldwide for them to Melbourne that they could pick up in various places?

THOMPSON: I don't know. This was just some kind of a special military intelligence material. What I'm telling you isn't classified because it was openly done.

Q: But you still had to go to Melbourne, to Australia, to Wellington, to somewhere in New Zealand?

THOMPSON: Yes, except that normally we didn't go to these consulates. Of course we had to go to Sidney because that was where the plane landed, and so we used that as kind of a central point. But normally we didn't go to consulates. But we did in this case just to move this material.

Q: Because of that special requirement.

THOMPSON: Yes.

CHARLES LAHIGUERA
Refugee Evacuation Officer
SS Blue Ridge (1975)

Mr. Lahiguera was born and raised in New York. After graduating from Georgetown University and serving in the US Navy, he entered the Foreign Service in 1963. Though he served outside the South East Asia, his primary duties concerned the Vietnam War and its aftermath, particularly refugees. His overseas posts include Germany, Curacao, Vietnam, France, Hong Kong, Thailand and Swaziland, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Lahiguera was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Today is August 8, 2000. You're on the Blue Ridge. What was sort of the word of the people there?

LAHIGUERA: People generally were very despondent. We had Vietnamese aboard the Blue Ridge as well as Americans. We realized we had just lost this long struggle that many of us were so committed to. I was at a loss to understand what it meant and where I was going to go at this point. The people I was with in large part shared these emotions. We went from the Blue Ridge into Manila. I had no clothing but what I was wearing when I got on the helicopter. We landed in the Philippines and we managed to get to Manila and they gave me pants and a pay advance. I stayed there and got some clothing. Then they directed me to go to Guam. Dick Peterson was the consul general in Bien Hoa and had been the senior State representative in Guam. He had just left and I became the senior State person there. There were well over 100,000 refugees. An admiral in Guam was the principal leader of the operations of handling evacuees. Each of the agencies involved had to attend staff meetings. I spent a lot of time getting families together. We had a lot of military. The Vietnamese military had left Vietnam with Vietnamese aircraft. We encouraged that since it would take military aircraft out of Vietnam. I spent a lot of time trying to get the military personnel and their families back together. There were three or four camps. There was the problem of a person being in one camp and his wife and children in another. In fact I ran into Terry McNamara, he was the consul general in Can Tho. David Sciacchitano was also in Can Tho. I spent a month there. I finally had enough of it and I called the Department and said would you please get me out of here. The next morning there was a cable stating that I was required back in Washington on urgent business.

Q: Well, there must have been people who'd been evacuated that said hell I want to go back. I mean, you know, when you make a decision like this, it's done in a hurry and I would expect that there must have been some people who wanted to go back to Vietnam who had left family behind and all. Were there any indications of that?

LAHIGUERA: I don't recall anything like that. Certainly with all those numbers that phenomenon developed later. I know people on the staff of the consulate general who wanted to go back, but that came several years later, not immediately. Overwhelmingly the people were very thankful to be out. No, I can't say, in those days immediately after the evacuation that I ran into anybody who wanted to return.

Q: No, I was just thinking I mean sometimes you know the families

LAHIGUERA: Second thoughts.

Q: Second thoughts and people have been left behind and all.

LAHIGUERA: I'm not aware of any cases although I wouldn't be surprised.

Q: How did the system work? Did there seem to be a developing system for moving the refugees on?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, we set up a camp in Pennsylvania, one in I think Florida and another one in Arkansas. There were three camps and we shuttled them from Guam into these camps. I didn't get involved in that operation. I just felt I wanted to get away from it at that stage. So, when I went back to Washington they asked me if I'd like to go to Hong Kong and be an Indo China analyst. They had originally intended to send me and Charles Twining to Bangkok. Charlie Twining just finished studying Cambodian and they were going to have him as the Cambodian analyst and me as the Vietnamese analyst. The Thais at that point were putting pressure on us and there was some cooling in our relationship. The Thais wanted some kind of guarantee that if the Vietnamese continued to try to expand that we would give them a commitment to come to their aid and that wasn't forthcoming. There was some coolness in our relationship. In any event, our ambassador in Thailand felt we should start to cut personnel and it was decided to move my job to Hong Kong. So, I was assigned to consulate general Hong Kong. I arrived in August of '75. Chuck Cross was the consul general. The place was heavily staffed by China watchers. John Anderson was the chief political officer and I worked for him. But I was the only person in the political section, which must have had six or seven officers, who wasn't working on China.

PARKER W. BORG
Assistant to Assistant Secretary Habib
Washington, DC (1975)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: This would be...?

BORG: This is was in April of '75. We had started right after Buon Ma Thuot, we had begun talking, and then when I left Kissinger's office I began working full-time. I went down and I offered my services to Phil Habib, the Assistant Secretary, and said, "You know, things are happening in Vietnam, but you don't have a staff that's able to work on it. Can I be your assistant to work on this thing?" He was delighted. He picked me up in a moment. Then we continued our regular meetings which became daily meetings. Al Adams was in there too.

Q: Craig Johnstone?

BORG: Craig was not in this, no, but Lionel was. Craig may have come to a couple meetings, but he was not a key player. So we began trying to figure out what are the problems related to security in Vietnam that are different and not being taken care of through other channels. So we would formulate actions from the Deputy Secretary - I can't remember who it was at the time - who would send it down to EAP and ask for a response of what we were doing about this, and then the same group of us would get together and formulate what the response was. So we were doing the questions and the answers in the same office but sort of routing it so it got the bureaucratic chops. And we were concerned about such things as preventing commercial airlines from halting their flights into Vietnam because it was so dangerous, and encouraging the embassy to think about possible evacuation scenarios, and these sorts of things. We also pushed for the State Department to organize a task force, a State Department task force, that would formally just look at these sorts of things. Actually we had been pushing for an interagency task force with other agencies involved, and the State Department didn't want to go that far, and so we stuck with our sort of seventh floor deputy secretary office action group. In the meantime, I think, Cambodia collapsed and I was very much in with the Pentagon's planning process for the evacuation of Cambodia at the end. This all happened very quickly in April. We succeeded in getting an interagency group formed, probably by the 25th, or something like that, of April. Dean Brown became the head of it, and we had representatives of all the different agencies coming over to the State Department to talk about the end in Vietnam. We all offered our services. We all left our jobs. We took leave from whatever it was we were doing and en masse joined Dean Brown as the staff for his new Vietnam group. I think Craig was the head of the line at the time, but Lionel was down there with us. Lionel and Craig were both sufficiently concerned about what was happening - you must have talked with Craig - that they decided that they would go out to Vietnam and see what they could do to bring back as many Vietnamese, to seek the evacuation of the people that they felt had been loyal to us but who would otherwise be lost in a Communist takeover. One of the real frustrations was that the embassy was not even thinking, refused to think, about evacuation.

Q: Was this Graham Martin?

BORG: It was Graham Martin.

Q: Were you able to in a way bypass the ambassador and say, "Forget him"?

BORG: No. We could make policy proposals here, and we got a message at one point sent out to Graham Martin saying that he had to begin making plans for an evacuation. The response had always been, “No. If we begin making plans for an evacuation, that would become a self-fulfilling prophecy. We can’t do that.” Finally we got a message out and we had the Deputy Secretary sign off on it, and Graham Martin went back with a message to Kissinger saying, “Some twerp, one of your subordinate twerps, is suggesting I’m not running my mission properly here. I work for the President, and I only respond to messages from the President,” just whole contempt for what was going back here. This is what, I think, provoked Lionel and Craig to decide that they wanted to go out to Vietnam and see what they could do to organize their own evacuation. If you’ve talked to Craig, you’ve heard sort of the details of what went on in the field. My job at this point, I was Lionel’s contact in the Department. Lionel was supposed to be working with us, but he didn’t want a call-back. He had various code names that he would use, because they would call in each day and talk about, “Here’s what we’re going, and here’s where we are.” The ambassador had found that they were there and was trying to locate them and get them thrown out of the country. People on the seventh floor were trying to find them and trying to figure out what had happened. One of my unofficial positions was to cover for them and say, “Well, I’m not quite sure where they are right now,” but in the meantime being in contact with them and keeping Lionel’s wife anyway informed of where he was.

Q: Was there any thought of removing the ambassador? It’s a little bit like the Caine Mutiny, you know.

BORG: I think it was happening too fast. This was all a matter of days that all of these things began tumbling apart. I don’t know if it crossed anyone’s mind that the ambassador was perhaps too emotionally involved. I know that the progression of collapse was, first, the South Vietnamese army had decided they could no longer support the various outposts that had been established by the Special Forces and so they pulled back from these. Again, we turned down a supplemental at about this time, so there wasn’t the money that was necessary to support these things that we had created in Vietnam, a huge military apparatus that required the same logistical tail that we had for our military forces, and suddenly we weren’t going to pay for that.

Congress had voted no on the supplemental, and so the Vietnamese, as one would imagine, would look at how their forces were deployed and say, “We can’t any longer afford to do some of the things we’ve been doing in the past,” so the first thing they did was abandon the Special Forces camps where there was pressure from the North Vietnamese. The North Vietnamese had decided in early ’75 to begin moving their units, their forces, in along the Cambodian border and from the north directly into the I CORPS in the northern part of Vietnam. After abandoning the Special Forces camp, they abandoned the highland provinces, Cong Tum, Pleiku, and then first the I CORPS and Da Nang, eventually moving down the coast, so that by the time Lionel and Craig went out there, all there was was the southern half of the country. I remember there was a message that came in a cable that came in from the embassy noting how Vietnam was a far more sustainable country now that it just had the agricultural heartland and didn’t have to deal with all of these highland places. We just sat there and thought this is ridiculous, these people have gone crazy. Now, what was Graham Martin’s perspective? I don’t know. I never met the man, but there were reports I think I’ve seen written somewhere that he had a son who died in Vietnam, and so I imagine that for him there was tremendous emotional strain. He had to win the war that his son had given his life for, and so he could not see that things were falling apart.

Q: You do have this. Here was an embassy led by a man who really at that point did not have the perspective that a true ambassador should have.

BORG: That's right. He was totally wrapped up, totally emotional, but again things were moving too fast for people to say, "You're out of there." If it had gone on for another month, perhaps, but it was a daily deterioration that was occurring.

Q: By this time did you have the feeling that Nixon was running - he wasn't out yet; he didn't leave until, I would say, around August...

BORG: That's right. He was President until August. This was '75. Nixon left in '76. Didn't Nixon resign in '74? So Ford would have been President. So was the White House involved? Things were happening so rapidly. Henry Kissinger was clearly in charge of foreign affairs. The action was with the State Department. To the extent it involved foreign affairs, it was with the Defense Department and CIA. I don't think the White House was a strong player in this. But Lionel and Craig returned, and I'm sure Craig told his story about meeting the Secretary and so forth, but we were the ones that put together the nomination for Lionel and Craig to be commended, because we knew they'd be in deep trouble, and a way to overcome the trouble was to receive some type of recognition. We were surprised that they won, actually.

Q: How did sort of the end game come about from your perspective?

BORG: In Vietnam?

Q: Yes.

BORG: The North Vietnamese moved gradually down the coast. There were no significant battles put forward by the South Vietnamese troops. It was an internal collapse, again attributed to the fact that there was no sense of nationhood within the country and no sense that people were fighting for something. The North Vietnamese had stronger forces, and the senior leadership of the South Vietnamese military was not so much a fighting force as a political force.

The regional forces and the popular forces that we had armed and trained weren't in any position to go against the North Vietnamese. I'm sure they hid their guns and pretended they had never been what they had been. So we knew that the end was near, it was just a matter of days, and I think we knew on the night of, I think, April 30th, that it was happening, that we were evacuating the embassy because we all stayed that night and we were in touch to the extent we could be with what was happening in the field. The helicopters were supposed to go in until midnight. They continued to take people off the roof until three in the morning. We were up all night back in Washington observing this.

Q: How did you find the Department of Defense, the military, responded?

BORG: I don't have any particular recollections of any difficulty. They had the ships that were standing by offshore. They had the helicopters that went in and picked up people. I had worked with them on the evacuation of Cambodia. I had gone over to a couple of the meetings on the evacuation of Vietnam, and they had a very clear plan of how it would be done and that it had to be done, and it was implemented. I don't recall any conflicts or any difficulties in the interagency relationship there.

Q: Did you get involved in the planning for dealing with this mass of refugees?

BORG: Yes, that was our principal concern after the evacuation took place. We then switched our focus to the issue of the refugees, and we tasked each one of the services to come up with a temporary holding place for the refugees that would be coming out and coming to the United States. The Marines came up with Fort Pendleton. The Army chose Indiantown Gap in Pennsylvania. There was Eglin Air Force Base in Florida. There was a place in Arkansas also.

Q: Camp Chaffee.

BORG: Fort Chaffee, that's right, in Arkansas. So the services came up with these locations, and we began the massive program of airlifting people, of organizing the legislation that would go through Congress to create the refugee program, and to convert our State Department task force into an interagency task force that was chaired by somebody other than the State Department, because once the refugees began arriving in the United States, we all thought very strongly that this was a domestic issue. I remember we sat around one night and talked about who can take this over. Dean Brown would be the State Department person, but we needed somebody to be in charge of it, and so we settled on Julia Taft, who was the representative of the Office of Health and Human Services. So we sort of selected her as a group and then informed her the next day that we were going to convert this State Department task force to an interagency task force and she was going to be in charge of it, and Frank Wisner agreed to be her deputy, stay on and be her deputy. Some of us, like myself, felt after two months or three months of this that it was time to move on, because as long as we stayed there doing the work, the domestic agencies wouldn't step in in the way that we felt that they needed to. There were others of us who felt that it was so important they should continue to work on the refugee questions. So I departed about June.

Q: So then what happened, June of '75?

BORG: Larry Eagleburger, before I had taken the job, said that when I left I could sort of have my choice of jobs at my level that were open and that I should identify a job that I liked. I had a terrible time over this and had a couple of meetings with him. He said, "Well, how about being a deputy economic officer?" I was in the economic cone. I hadn't known for a long time what cone I was. I was not very traditional in doing these sorts of things, but the system informed me at one point that I had been transferred from the administrative cone to the economic cone, and that was fine. As long as I got an interesting job, I didn't care what cone I was in. So I looked at all of these jobs, and I was perhaps sufficiently burned out that I looked at a place in Africa and I said, "I want to go to Africa." I decided I was not going to go back to China, that the world is much bigger than just East Asia, that I was going to try to expand my horizons, and I'd like to do it at a small post where I'm my own boss, in a place where there isn't much happening and I could just sort of meditate on all the things that had been going on for the last couple of years. So I selected Lubumbashi in Zaire, down in the southeastern corner, the former Elizabethville near the camp of what had been Katanga now, then known as Shaba. But that didn't open up for a while, so I was going to take an economic course and then I was going to learn French, and I thought that was just fine. I was very pleased with that.

ROBERT V. KEELEY
Deputy Director, Task Force for Vietnam Refugees
Washington, DC (1975-1976)

Ambassador Robert V. Keeley was born in Lebanon of American parents in 1929. He joined the Foreign Service in 1956 and served in Jordan, Mali, Greece (as an officer and then later as ambassador), Uganda, Cambodia, Mauritius as ambassador, and Zimbabwe as ambassador. He was interviewed in 1991 by Thomas Stern.

Q: I believe that after your short tour in Cambodia, you returned to Washington to work with the Indochina Refugee Task Force. Tell us a little about that.

KEELEY: All the Embassy staff from Phnom Penh were "over-complement;" in other words, the evacuation of a complete mission had not been anticipated and therefore there were no permanent positions for us to fill. To our surplus was then added the whole Saigon Embassy and the Department had a huge surplus of people all unassigned. It seems a little strange in retrospect that people hadn't anticipated the exodus from Indochina, but I guess the downfall happened rather precipitously. I was told, after my return to Washington, that Dean had recommended me for the DCM position in Paris, which, however, in the meantime had already been filled. I certainly would have been interested in that; that would have been a great assignment for someone with my background. But Eagleburger told both Dean and me that he wanted to appoint me to an ambassadorial position, which was also entirely acceptable, regardless of where it might have been, particularly in light of my age, rank and experience. In the meantime, he wanted me to become the deputy director of an inter-agency task force on the Indochina refugees. I wasn't thrilled about that at all, but he made it clear that I would have to take it regardless of my own wishes. Otherwise I'd be left "to swing in the wind."

That task force had been set up in April 1975 as the refugees began to pour out, particularly the Vietnamese from Saigon. There was a tremendous exodus of Cambodians and Vietnamese in the wake of events in Indochina. We had about 150,000 to deal with by the time it was all over. They came by plane, boat or any other way they could get out -- some even over-land. I knew nothing about Vietnam; I had never gotten there. I thought the refugee operation was primarily for Vietnamese and I knew that there were a lot of other people who knew a great deal more about Vietnam and its people than I did. I knew nothing about refugee programs; it was indeed an "out-of-area" assignment. In fact, it turned out to be one of the more fascinating assignments of my career. It was certainly one of the more rewarding in retrospect, although it surely did not appear that way to me when Eagleburger sent me to work there.

Strangely enough, I had great difficulties in subsequent years getting that assignment listed on my personnel record. It is still shown as "over-complement" for the East Asia Bureau, even though I worked in the job for nearly a year. The way the record reads suggests that I was unemployed and unassignable -- really in limbo; it looks terrible, as if I had done something wrong and had been put on a shelf. I complained in writing on a couple of occasions about this listing and would always mention it yearly when we were asked if we wanted our personnel records corrected in any way. It was explained to me later by Art Tienken, whom I knew well and who was at one time in charge of personnel assignments, that because I was on detail to another agency -- and there wasn't any code for that agency in the Department's computer programs, because it was a very temporary agency -- the computer could not record my correct assignment. That is just a footnote, but it tells you something about the condition of the Department's record keeping.

As I mentioned, I was the Deputy Director of this Task Force. I replaced Frank Wisner, who had been recruited by Dean Brown for it. Frank had had a lot of experience in Vietnam, and was the real spark plug of that operation from the beginning. He was particularly important to the evacuation from Vietnam. By the time I took the job in July 1975, the operation had begun to be primarily concerned with refugee resettlement. The evacuation was essentially over; those who had gotten out were the last. They had been brought to four camps in the U.S., and to Guam, the Philippines and some to points in between. Our job, as assigned to us by President Ford, who had set the Task Force up at the beginning, was to empty the four camps in California, Pennsylvania, Arkansas and Florida by Christmas. That was the specific time-table. The camps were populated primarily by Vietnamese; of the total number of refugees, less than 5,000 were Cambodians.

We succeeded. The camps were all empty by about a week before Christmas. Some people accused us of putting the last few in buses and driving them around the environs of the camp so that visitors could see that the camps were empty. That was a canard; all were resettled one way or another by Christmas. It took us several more months to close down the Task Force. The Director of the Task Force was Julia Taft; she was from HEW, which was really in charge of the operation because it was a refugee resettlement process working with voluntary agencies -- both religious and secular. They did the actual resettling: finding places for the refugees to live and jobs for them. They were all over the country. We had a lot of major problems, not the least of which was the fact that many communities did not want to accept these people. That was partly prejudice, partly fear. Rumors circulated that these refugees carried strange Asian diseases from which Americans had absolutely no immunity. People were saying that epidemics would ensue. There were stories that all the refugees were criminals of one sort or another. We had a major public relations problem.

On the other hand, there were many communities which really broke their backs to welcome the refugees. This was particularly true of church groups, who sponsored some refugees, took care of them, and in some cases housed them. I regret that there never has been a detailed write-up of that operation. We did some reporting on it, particularly to the Congress, which had established a number of oversight committees. The chief one was the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Senate Committee was the primary sponsor of the legislation authorizing the Task Force and it received a lot of interim reports as well as the final one. So there are documents available, but little has been written about the human side of the operation. There were obviously some press accounts, but I wish someone would have been assigned after the end of the operation to write a history of it, because it was interesting, with a lot of lessons to be learned which would indeed be very helpful if there were a similar crisis again.

Q: What was the State Department's role in this operation besides providing manpower?

KEELEY: That was the reason why I was assigned to it. The Deputy Director of the Task Force was a State officer. The Department was interested in three matters. The first was the success of the operation for foreign policy and public relations reasons. So it wanted someone at a senior level to keep an eye on the proceedings and to make sure that the process went smoothly, and to report back to the Secretary, through Eagleburger, who was the Under Secretary directly responsible for the operation. The Department was also interested in assuring that foreign policy aspects were taken into account. Furthermore, the original concept assumed that some of these people could be settled abroad in "third" countries, as we called them: France, for example, which had had long-standing ties with Indochina, perhaps even some countries in Africa -- we resettled a group of fishermen in Gabon, for example. My main job was to find these opportunities abroad. I worked through our Embassies, but I must say that this was not a very successful part of the operation. Very few countries were willing to accept any significant numbers. They would take them if they had had a previous connection with Cambodians or Vietnamese; e.g., if there were some relatives of now-established residents, who could sponsor the new refugees and provide for them. But very few governments volunteered to take any large numbers. It was a disappointment, but by this time, the whole Vietnam policy had become very controversial and countries were not enthusiastic about bailing the U.S. out. These refugees were seen as our responsibility, created by "our" war, and so on. The Task Force was made up of people from a large variety of agencies. Many came from AID, particularly people who had served in Vietnam, and people who had served in CORDS. There were USIS officers who handled the press and public relations. There were people from HEW who knew resettlement and social welfare issues.

Finally, there was also a specific problem that was assigned to me. Julia Taft asked me to take charge of it, which made sense because it was essentially a foreign policy issue. There is no record of this particular story, which was an interesting one. The problem concerned approximately 1,600 "repatriates" as they called themselves. It was a made-up term, but it had a real meaning. These were Vietnamese (and a small group of Cambodians, about 25 of them, whom we handled separately) who had left Vietnam in the panic exodus at the end of the war, involuntarily from their point of view. They had been swept up in the mass departure; they included crew members of evacuated aircraft or ships. Somehow whole units of people got swept up and fled with the rest, in fear for their lives. Once they had left Vietnam, they had second thoughts; they had either left involuntarily or left in a panic and changed their minds later. The Vietnamese, as well as the Cambodians, had a strong sense of family -- the extended family in the Vietnamese culture. These people went into a psychological depression; they felt they had abandoned their families. These were mostly single men, mostly ex-military (army, navy, air force), but not all. They had left their wives and children behind and also their parents, brothers, sisters, etc. They felt somehow that they had betrayed their family responsibilities and wanted to return to Vietnam; they were determined to get back to Vietnam.

When people of that mind-set turned up during the interview or resettlement process (and these incidents were already happening by the time I arrived on the job), they were all assigned to one set of barracks in a former army camp on Guam. There were, as I mentioned, about 1,600 of them. They were kept in a fenced-in area; well looked after from the point of view of food, health, recreational facilities, etc. But no one knew what to do with them. Since their requests were not being addressed in any meaningful way, they became increasingly depressed and increasingly angry and began to misbehave (to put it mildly). In fact, they began to burn their barracks to attract some attention; they hoped to get some results. The problem was a political one. The governor of Guam became very upset with these Vietnamese because they were causing trouble; he wanted them transferred from Guam. He also considered them traitors -- according to his sense of right and wrong -- because they wanted to return to Vietnam rather than resettle in the U.S.

So we were faced with the dilemma of having on the one hand a screaming governor, and on the other a rioting group of refugees who were threatening to tear down the fence and march into the city. Julia Taft told me to go to Guam to deal with the problem. She was going to go herself, but I think the White House decided it would be better if a lower profile official went instead, someone less "political" (Julia was a political appointee at HEW; her husband Will is the great-grandson of President Taft). It was clearly a nasty situation that no matter how it was resolved wouldn't do anyone much credit. I had never been to Guam. We had a local representative of the Task Force there, Colonel Herbert, a retired military officer. I conferred with him and with an American admiral, who was the senior military officer on the island. I spent several days looking into the situation and became convinced that the refugees had a valid position. They should have had the right to return to Vietnam if they so desired, although I and many others thought they were crazy for doing so. They would probably be killed upon return, since from Vietnam's point of view they were the traitors, particularly those who had been in the military services. They had fled and that would have been considered very disloyal. But the key element in my thinking was that these people were so determined that they had developed what I considered a fairly sensible plan. They wanted an opportunity to repatriate themselves without any assistance from us. There was a Vietnamese-owned cargo ship in Guam's harbor which had been commandeered during the Vietnam exodus. Hundreds or maybe thousands of people had arrived on that ship; it was anchored in the harbor. It actually had belonged to some Vietnamese trading company. The Vietnamese "repatriates" had organized themselves and had selected a crew, a captain and other ship's officers, from among themselves. Everything had been well organized and they presented their plan to me, as they had done to Guam officials previously. All they wanted from us was permission to board the ship and some supplies; they would then sail away.

Washington considered this a crazy idea. When I returned, I talked to Mrs. Taft and convinced her. She told me that I would have to convince the Secretary of State, who would have to approve the plan; it had to be done by someone senior to her. I wrote a much-too-long memorandum analyzing the whole problem, presenting various options, and concluding with the simple proposition that the U.S. Navy should be assigned responsibility and given the necessary resources to fix up the ship as a passenger ship by putting in bunks, galleys, toilets, an infirmary, and other facilities. The ship should be fueled and stocked with an adequate amount of supplies and charts so that it could sail back to Vietnam. I sent my paper to Secretary Kissinger through Eagleburger. A series of meetings were called to discuss the idea; I felt in a very lonely minority. Our intelligence people were unanimous in saying that my scheme was absolutely insane because the ship would become a modern day "Flying Dutchman." It would be sailing all over the Pacific for the next ten years; no country would permit it to land; no one would want these 1,600 people. Eventually the ship would run out of supplies or run aground somewhere. The plan would produce a scandal making the U.S. look sick as the country that went along with such a crazy scheme. They thought that Vietnam would not accept the ship and its passengers and if it did, it would kill them all and we would be accused of helping these murders. That was the position of the intelligence community.

The arguments went on and on. The paper finally got to Kissinger; it was probably much too long for him. I don't know if he read it. It was in the typical State Department format with the "approve" and "disapprove" boxes at the end, where the decision-maker could render his verdict with a check-mark. No boxes were ever checked; I got the paper back unmarked. The whole issue was then sent to President Ford; he apparently read my paper, and he didn't mark it either, but he did approve the plan. The word came down to us that the President had decided to go ahead. I had drafted the paper in such a way that I didn't think there was any way it could be disapproved because there were just no other valid options. The result of maintaining the status quo would be potential riots, and bad publicity stemming from a visit of the Governor of Guam to Washington to raise hell; there was no good escape for the administration.

Having obtained the White House's approval, we told the Navy to proceed. With their own existing resources and perhaps some of our Task Force money, the Navy proceeded to fix the ship up in a magnificent way. Dormitories were installed in the cargo holds, toilets built in along the gunwales, the new galleys were equipped with the finest stainless steel appliances, the Navy trained the crew (the ship was taken out to sea on a couple of trial runs), they checked the engines, they loaded it with fuel, food, and medicines. There were some nurses and doctors among the refugees who knew how to use the medical supplies. It was a major operation and the Navy rightly so was very proud of what it had done. I went back out to Guam to launch the ship on its voyage and to wish the refugees "goodbye and good luck."

Some people still had very cold feet about the whole operation. They were principally concerned by the possibility of a group psychology having developed among these people; some of them may just have fallen victim to peer pressure and had agreed to return to Vietnam although they may not have really wished to do so. They may have even been afraid to say "No." There was a lot of tension in the barracks and the potential for real violence. Our group of counselors -- a very fine group headed by Lionel Rosenblatt -- who has left the Foreign Service and is still working on refugee issues today (he heads up a Washington group called Refugees International) -- were sent to the barracks in Guam. We set up an elaborate scheme which permitted each refugee to go to a counselor in a private room for an interview in depth so that we could verify what he or she really wanted to do -- return to Vietnam or resettle in the U.S. Each of the interview rooms had two doors: one led through a hallway down some steps into a bus which when filled would take the refugees down to the ship; the other door led to a holding room from which we would take them to another site so that they would not need to see their former colleagues again. We would resettle that group in the United States. We planned to be scrupulous in following the wishes of each individual.

We conducted 1,600 individual interviews with six or eight interviewers on hand. It took us all day. All 1,600 stated that they wanted to return to Vietnam; not a single one of them wanted to stay in the United States. That relieved our fears, but also made us feel a little foolish. We had gone through a costly operation to assure that not a single refugee was being coerced to return to Vietnam. In retrospect, had we not done that, we would have had to live with a doubt in our minds that we may have forced a human being to take an involuntary action that might have cost his or her life. So we did the right thing, because we had no way of knowing what the eventual outcome would be.

I did have considerable discussions with the elected leadership of the Vietnamese group. They had elected their own leaders, although I will not vouch for the democratic nature of the process they used. We discussed all the alternatives, what might happen, etc. They made one major request, which was very intelligent on their part. They did not want any vessels escorting their ship; no American planes or ships were to go with them, because they were afraid that that would not be very well received in Vietnam. They wanted to sail alone; they were confident that they could make it on their own. They were well equipped; they had their charts and navigational instruments; they had been well trained. We warned them to avoid Philippine waters, which would have been the shortest route, but the Filipinos had heard of our plan and were not at all happy with the prospect that the ship would be coming through their waters, because they were afraid that it would stop there and the refugees would become their problem. So we advised the refugees to go around the Philippines, which made it a longer, but safer journey.

As I said, they wanted assurance that we would not accompany them. I so assured them. But my superiors thought that we should at least keep them under surveillance to make sure that they didn't stray from their objective, or that if they got into trouble some rescue effort could be made. We would observe them from a distance from the air and by other means. We did that.

We went out to see them off. They boarded the ship accompanied by their own cheers. They had earlier built a model ship which they had placed in a square in their barracks compound as a sort of shrine; I had seen it on my first visit to Guam; now it was lit up and they held services in front of it -- like religious services. I had a meal with the refugee leadership, at the end of which they presented me with a painting, done by one of their group, which had just been finished that morning. It now hangs in my house. It's a Vietnamese river scene with fishing boats and has in one corner an inscription that it was "honorably presented" to me by the painter "and 1,600 Viet repatriates. Guam, Oct 1st 1975" -- so I can't forget the date.

Colonel Herbert and I and the senior Navy officers boarded the Admiral's barge; we watched the repatriates' ship sail off out of Guam harbor. Within minutes of leaving the pier, they hoisted the Vietnamese flag on the stern of the ship, the North Vietnamese flag. The U.S. Navy people on the Admiral's barge were livid and they turned on me, wanting to know why we had let these Viet Cong people escape. They wanted to know how they got to Guam in the first place and why had we done anything for them anyway? The Navy people were very upset. I suppose the repatriates could have waited to raise their flag until their ship was over the horizon. But they didn't, and I suppose there was some symbolism in that, or perhaps they were thinking ahead and wanted it reported in the press that they had sailed away from Guam under the North Vietnamese flag.

I suggested to my Navy colleagues that they cool down. These repatriates were not likely to be Viet Cong; they were mostly South Vietnamese military people who had fought side by side with us, but they were returning to their country, which was now under the control of the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese. They were going to sail into a Viet Cong harbor; what other flag would we have them fly, besides their own? These people wanted to go back and be accepted. I told the U.S. Navy officers that I didn't know what the repatriates' true loyalties were, but they were probably very mixed. Their main concerns were their families and staying alive. It seemed to me that flying their own flag was quite natural under the circumstances. There was absolute silence; everybody was glum. The barge turned around and went back to the pier and that was the last we saw of the ship.

Everyone wants to know what happened to the ship; is it still floating around the Pacific? In fact, it originally tried to land in Cam Ranh Bay, which was the largest naval port that we had built in South Vietnam. The ship was turned away -- gunboats came out and chased them off. So they sailed down the coast and landed at Vung Tau, the port for Saigon. This time, instead of waiting for permission, they sailed right into the port and dropped anchor. They announced their presence and their determination not to move on. That created consternation and there was apparently a lot of discussion. We got much of our information through satellite intelligence and other means. Eventually they were permitted to land, but were taken immediately to detention camps. Later we learned, through some very sketchy intelligence, that they were sorted out into various categories: those who were fully released, those who were considered war criminals, those who needed "re-education," where some languished for a considerable period. In general, they were treated by the North Vietnamese, as far as we could determine, like most South Vietnamese, according to their records, their military rank, their prior performance, their service, etc. They were probably thoroughly interrogated and many undoubtedly suffered. As far as I know, none were killed outright and they were treated like functionaries and officials of a defeated regime -- no better, no worse.

There was no effort to involve either the American judicial system or the Congress. We kept the Congressional staff advised on what we were doing. They didn't object and probably viewed it as an Executive Branch responsibility. We did become involved in a peculiar problem. I was sued along with Julia Taft and a lot of others for commandeering the ship. The former owners or their heirs or some other company claimed ownership of the ship. We had sequestered it and had taken legal title to it because the U.S. Government viewed it as an "enemy alien" asset. We thought we were on safe grounds using the ship, because by the time we used it, it belonged to the U.S. Government. But a suit was lodged, although it didn't have any merit. I never had to go to court or testify, but that was the only judicial involvement, and that was on the property and not on the action itself.

I found the Task Force experience very useful, even though I was a Foreign Service officer and the resettlement was essentially a domestic operation. As I said earlier, it was one of the more interesting and rewarding assignments I ever had. It enabled me to learn more about my country. For example, one of my responsibilities, which I shared with Mrs. Taft and others, was to supervise the four refugee camps. I went out to Camp Pendleton, in California, Fort Indiantown Gap, in Pennsylvania, and Fort Smith, in Arkansas, on several occasions to observe the operations. I spent several days in each place, watching how the voluntary agencies did their interviews, how the refugees were being taken care of -- the messing and medical facilities, etc.

These are the kinds of experiences that very few Foreign Service officers have opportunities to have, so that my tour with the Refugee Task Force was very educational. It was a kind of social welfare effort in which I participated in a minor way, which was a new and fascinating lesson. I had an opportunity to travel around the country, to meet different people, to see different kinds of work; all of that I normally would not have experienced in a pure Foreign Service assignment. I was proud to be part of that effort; it was very successful.

One of the most unusual aspects was that we did not spend all the money that had been appropriated to us. We turned back a substantial amount of money. We may have asked for too much money in the beginning, because we were anticipating working for a year. Then President Ford said that he wanted all of them resettled by Christmas, at the end of six months. The fact that it was speeded up saved us money. I think our appropriation was somewhere in the $300-400 million range and we returned at least 10% to 15%.

JOHN HOGAN
I Corps
Da Nang (1976-1977)

Mr. Hogan was born in Maine, graduated from Mercer University, after which he served in the U.S. Merchant Marines. After World War II he went into the radio business in Portland, Maine before joining the U.S. Information Agency in 1949. He has served in a number of posts abroad including Cairo, Dar es Salaam, Nairobi, Tripoli and Saigon. He was interviewed by Michael Brown in 1988.

Q: You went from one quiet place to another?

HOGAN: Yes, Yes.

Q: Vietnam?

HOGAN: A lot of pressure.

Q: How long were you in Vietnam, John?

HOGAN: I was in Vietnam a total of five years. I served --

Q: You served in the jurisdiction of "I" Corps?

HOGAN: Yes, at Da Nang. There were CORDS and PsyOps representatives for the provinces up in "I" Corps Area, and for just about three years I held that job. Then I was transferred down to Saigon to take over the post as press spokesman for the embassy. That assignment was under Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, and later on, Ambassador Graham Martin. So, I stayed there a total of two years in Saigon, and three years in Da Nang.

Q: You were there in Saigon at the end, too?

HOGAN: Yes, that is right.

Q: What are your impressions of that--those last days in Vietnam?

HOGAN: Well, I will tell you they happened a little bit faster than we thought they would, frankly, but we were pretty well prepared for it. All day that last day which was the 30th, I believe, of April, we had to start evacuating a lot of the Vietnamese who came to the embassy.

We started the evacuation much earlier, really, of Vietnamese who had worked closely with us in Vietnam about April 4th, if not before then, and we were getting them out little by little.

I know I was responsible for the evacuation of all of the local employees of American news media working in Saigon, and their families. I managed to get out 598 of them before the whistle blew, and before they were caught. They would have been prime targets, I am sure, at the very least harassment by the Vietnamese communists.

Q: When you think of it now, 1975 seems like a long time ago, 13 years ago, but I am sure for all of you who were there in those days, in many ways, it still seems like yesterday, does it not?

HOGAN: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. That was the very busiest day in my life, that last day in the embassy compound. Looking back at it, I was so busy that now I cannot remember what I did. But I remember being on the phone a great deal, trying to round up more people to get them into the embassy compound and thereby get them out of the country.

We succeeded in doing that. In balance, I think, very well. Indeed, however, some were left behind. There is no question about that, and we were certainly sorry about that.

EDMUND Mc WILLIAMS
Desk Officer for Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam
Washington, DC (1978-1980)

A native of Rhode Island, Mr. Mc Williams was educated at the University of Rhode Island and Ohio University. In the course of his diplomatic career he served in several South East Asia posts including Vientiane, Bangkok and Djakarta. Other assignments took him to Moscow, Managua, Kabul, and Islamabad. In 1992 Mr. McWilliams was engaged in opening US Embassies in the newly independent states of Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan. While his assignments were primarily in the Political and Economic fields, in Washington he dealt with Labor and Human Rights issues. Mr. McWilliams was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005-2006.

Q: How did we view- the Vietnamese invasion was what? '79?

MCWILLIAMS: I'm trying to remember exact dates here. It was '79 because then of course it was followed by the Chinese invasion of Vietnam which was in December of '79.

Q: And you were at the desk at this?

MCWILLIAMS: Yes, yes.

Q: Well let's stick- we're getting confused here. We've got a war down south and a war up north.

MCWILLIAMS: Well, it was almost the same war. It was really a Chinese- the Chinese invasion was pretty clearly a response to the Vietnamese invasion of its ally the Khmer Rouge.

Q: Let's talk about how we viewed Vietnam going into Cambodia. I mean, we were saying was this ah ha, the domino has fallen or this was the Carter administration which had made a point of trying to distance itself from the Vietnamese war?

MCWILLIAMS: Well yes. There's a very important sequence here which I think we need to get into in the fall of '79. There was an attempt by Holbrooke to establish communications with Hanoi basically to begin to rebuild a relationship- to build a relationship with Vietnam. This was resisted in the Carter administration in part because also in the administration, particularly under the lead of Zbigniew Brzezinski there was an attempt to improve relations with China. And there was really a competition as to whether to move forward with Hanoi or to move forward with Beijing in the fall of '79. Holbrooke, because he was a very good political operator in part, was successful in moving and advancing the game with Hanoi even to the point where U.S. teams and Vietnamese teams were established to look at old- our old embassy facilities and where embassies might be established. There was a beginning discussion about establishing at least offices that would function as embassies and this is in the early fall of '79 and it was what was called the double track policy. That is, we're going to move forward with China and we're going to move forward with Vietnam. And that was the administration approach. And then of course came the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia and in December the Chinese invasion of Vietnam. And this essentially scuttled efforts by Holbrooke at that point to reestablish some level of communication with Hanoi, to establish it and say reestablish. So it was a very interesting and frenetic diplomatic period. I'm not sure if it's been very well covered in the literature yet but it was a very interesting time.

There was an attempt by Holbrooke to establish communications with Hanoi basically to begin to rebuild a relationship- to build a relationship with Vietnam. This was resisted in the Carter administration in part because also in the administration, particularly under the lead of Zbigniew Brzezinski there was an attempt to improve relations with China. Holbrooke, because he was a very good political operator in part, was successful in moving and advancing the game with Hanoi even to the point where U.S. teams and Vietnamese teams were established to look at old- our old embassy facilities and where embassies might be established. So it was a very interesting and frenetic diplomatic period. I'm not sure if it's been very well covered in the literature yet but it was a very interesting time.

Q: What were you doing when we were working on this dual track approach particularly on the Vietnamese side? What would the desk officer be doing?

MCWILLIAMS: Well at that time the really interesting work, of course, was being handled by Holbrooke himself and his immediate deputies. At my level it was essentially the scud work. I do recall I was involved in, as I say, the embassy questions as to what facilities might Vietnamese move into, what facilities might the U.S. team move into in Vietnam, looking at photographs from the air and so on of facilities and so. I mean, it was advancing quite well but we simply were overtaken by events, the Vietnamese invading Cambodia and as I say China-

Q: I mean, you were in the peculiar position of being a desk officer of two countries in which we had no representatives.

MCWILLIAMS: That's right, yes. And very little communication.

Q: Well, in a way did you feel that you had a hell of a lot of people with Vietnam experience around the department including Holbrooke, who had taken-

MCWILLIAMS: Sure, sure, Saigon experience.

Q: -amazed, I mean, he'd been a Vietnam hand, too.

MCWILLIAMS: And of course Phil Habib was, although no longer assistant secretary, still a very influential figure.

Q: He'd been deputy ambassador there.

MCWILLIAMS: Right. And he had been assistant secretary, of course, just before Holbrooke.

Q: Yes.

MCWILLIAMS: So he was, there were many people with deep experience on Vietnam and probably a greater assemblage of current knowledge and experience on Vietnam than we'd ever had. And also it should be noted that many of these people, like Holbrooke himself, had emerged to some extent as critics of our policy in Vietnam so that it was a very dynamic and a lot of fresh perspective was being brought to the issues.

Q: What were you getting about internal politics within Vietnam? Was it based on newspapers, broadcasts, the usual stuff?

MCWILLIAMS: Yes. We didn't have any particularly good knowledge of what was going on in Vietnam. We had that window in Vientiane which periodically was helpful. The embassy in Bangkok continued to watch Indochina very closely. I actually took a job in that capacity just a year later. I know we monitored the media very closely and that was helpful to us to some extent.

Q: Had there developed the state-of-the-art of criminology as we had with the Soviet Union? Or was- or maybe it wasn't the same dynamics that you could play. Who stood where?

MCWILLIAMS: There was, there was extensive knowledge, of course, of these players because we'd been watching them for over a decade but I think the fact was that there wasn't at that time a great deal of movement within the Hanoi leadership. It was a united leadership and there wasn't a great deal we could learn, I think, about what the inner leadership felt and were doing.

I should mention at this point and I failed to mention earlier a critical issue that really ran through all of what we did on Vietnam, to a lesser extent to Laos and Cambodia was of course the MIA issue. It was an extremely important issue in the congress, in the American people, among the American people and in the administration and I think there was a sense that the Carter administration had to continually prove that it was genuinely concerned about MIAs. And I think it was almost a defensive effort because there was a tendency to believe that the administration wasn't serious in its pursuit of the MIA issue. So that was a very important aspect of what we were doing as well.

Q: When it happened, in the first place there was yet any foreknowledge of the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia?

MCWILLIAMS: I think there were signs, yes, yes, yes. Yes, we did have some expectation because of course we were able to still to monitor Vietnamese military movements and-

Q: This was mainly by both radio and by satellite?

MCWILLIAMS: Intel, yes, Intel. But I do recall as it became clear that we were moving, that the Vietnamese were moving towards some sort of an invasion, some sort of military action, there was some frantic efforts on the part of the administration to get Hanoi to hold off making the point that if they were to invade it would be impossible at that time to move forward with any kind of a relationship, bilateral relationship, and I do recall efforts to communicate that to the Vietnamese. Obviously the Vietnamese felt that they had to address what they saw as a Cambodian problem.

Q: What was the- from the Vietnamese perspective what was the Cambodian problem? Why did they go in?

MCWILLIAMS: Well, it's important to remember the Cambodians, the Khmer Rouge were pretty aggressive. They had perceived Vietnamese living in Cambodia to be a threat to their national security, had forced many of them to return to Vietnam. There had been a number of skirmishes along the border over border questions between Vietnamese troops and Khmer troops. There had been a war of words of course. So it was a very bad relationship and quite clearly deteriorating for a couple of years. Almost immediately after the Khmer Rouge came to power the relationship between Hanoi and Phnom Penh was not good.

Q: Did- what were our concerns sort of? If the Vietnamese did this would they be, I mean did we see this as maybe putting an end to a really repugnant regime or did we see this as part of a- you know, we're talking about '79, a part of the occupation and Vietnamization of Cambodia?

MCWILLIAMS: Much more the latter. I think, once again, I don't think any of us really understood the extent of the horror of Khmer Rouge rule but much more important in our calculations in those days was the strategic question of whether or not Vietnam would come to control Cambodia and thereby pose a real threat to Thailand.

Q: When they went in did we do anything?

MCWILLIAMS: Well, of course it pretty much scuttled our attempts to establish contact with Hanoi.

Q: Yes.

MCWILLIAMS: I think, again, I mentioned earlier that the effort to establish some sort of contact with the Cambodians in New York I think that would have just preceded the invasion. So no, there wasn't much we could do at that stage. We were more concerned, I think, subsequently when the Chinese responded with an invasion. I'm just trying to recall if there was any effort to talk to Beijing to hold it back from what we anticipated might be a very negative reaction. I don't recall, I may simply not have known whether or not we were encouraging Beijing not to respond to this invasion forcefully.

Q: Okay. Well let's move to the other border of Vietnam. How did we view, from your as the desk officer and people around you, in fact well the whole bureau I mean, because China was the aggressor in this case, view the Vietnam-China, Sino-Vietnamese war?

MCWILLIAMS: With interest. Obviously we had no dogs in this fight in a sense. I think one of our concerns was the implications for the, for Soviet policy. Soviet-Chinese relations were not good. Soviet-Vietnamese relations had been good and I do recall, it's sort of ironic, we had had a massive snowstorm, I think it was just after the turn of the year, in other words January 1980, and 20-some inches as I recall, and I had fought my way in. I think I was in the bureau and I think Holbrooke was in the bureau and there was very few other people and a call came in from the desk that a Soviet diplomat was at the desk downstairs wanting to talk to someone about Vietnam. And this is, he plowed through the snow himself and the State Department was essentially not functioning that day. So as the Vietnam desk officer I was sent down to meet him and we had this long conversation. And then Holbrooke had told me I want you to come in and meet Lee and tell me what he says. And I gave him basically what he had said and that the implication was that the Soviets were not going to react to this Chinese invasion and Holbrooke was sort of taking notes and barely paying attention. And I said oh I should say also at the very end of his conversation Mr. Holbrooke, he said something about I am now speaking for my government. And Holbrooke obviously sat up and said well don't you know what that means, junior officer? That this is a formal message from Moscow that they are not going to intervene in this. And I said oh, I guess, yes, I guess so. Really feeling stupid, you know, I blew my great moment. But I recall that very specifically the Soviets informed us early on that they were not going to take a role in this. And I think at that point we just decided let it go on. I don't think we played a role at that moment.

Q: Okay. Well let's move to the other border of Vietnam. How did we view, from your as the desk officer and people around you, in fact well the whole bureau I mean, because China was the aggressor in this case, view the Vietnam-China, Sino-Vietnamese war?

MCWILLIAMS: With interest. Obviously we had no dogs in this fight in a sense. I think one of our concerns was the implications for the, for Soviet policy. Soviet-Chinese relations were not good. But I recall that very specifically the Soviets informed us early on that they were not going to take a role in this. And I think at that point we just decided let it go on. I don't think we played a role at that moment.

Q: Yes. Well, were we concerned at this point, I mean, while you were dealing with Vietnam, about I always think it was Camron Bay because, I mean, becoming a Soviet base.

MCWILLIAMS: Sure. Sure, that was considered and of course the Soviets did develop that base. And it was seen in the context of, you know, a communist threat to Southeast Asia, still part of old domino concept. But I don't recall us doing much of anything. I remember watching the issue very closely. I mean, we had satellite and so on, photos of, but I don't recall that we undertook any measures to deal with that question.

Q: Did offshore islands play any role when you were there?

MCWILLIAMS: Well, one of the territorial disputes that the Khmer Rouge had with the Vietnamese dealt with islands. And I had mentioned sort of the border dispute, indeed there were skirmishes. I think there were also some naval skirmishes between Vietnamese and Khmer. You recall that much of the delta of South Vietnam was regarded as Khmer Krom territory, that is to say originally Cambodian lands. And I think the Khmer Rouge in their bizarre approach to current politics were essentially very interested in reclaiming the delta, the Mekong Delta. So I mean, it was a bizarre government and I can't say that the Vietnamese were right to attack but I think given the circumstances, Vietnamese belligerence was not surprising.

STEPHEN T. JOHNSON
State Department, Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1984-1986)

Stephen T. Johnson was born in Tokyo, Japan in 1936. After serving in the US Army from 1956-1957 he received his bachelor's degree from Occidental College in 1960. He entered his Foreign Service in 1961 and his career included positions in Canada, Paris, Vietnam, Laos, Romania, and Kenya. Mr. Johnson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in January 1997.

Q: Well, then in 1984?

JOHNSON: In 1984 I became the Vietnam desk officer, back to the home country more or less.

Q: You did it from 1984 to what?

JOHNSON: 1986.

Q: Can you talk about relations, or lack thereof of relations during this 1984-86 period?

JOHNSON: We were now nine years after the war. There had been an abortive effort during the Carter administration, when my wife was on the Vietnam/Laos/Cambodia desk, to establish relations. That foundered depending on your point of view, on Vietnam's demand for reparations or our interest at the time in culling favor with the Chinese rather than the Vietnamese. In any case, we didn't have relations with them.

Needless to say, there was a lot of interest in Vietnam. By the time I got on the desk, the Vietnamese had been in New York for some time. They had an ambassador and a mission in New York, living rather austerely. Their budget didn't go very far. They were kind of the point of contact for lots of Americans. We, the Department of State didn't make use of it very much, but there were lots of private Americans who contacted them through that mechanism.

The big question when I was there (the idea of reparations had long since faded out) was the whole Prisoner of War/Missing in Action issue. This was still the Reagan administration and Mr. Reagan had made resolution of Prisoner of War/Missing in Action issue a matter of highest national priority. He never said "the" highest national priority. There was always a question in my mind of how many other things had "highest national priority," but anyway he would use those words.

The government was very active in trying to find out about missing people and also recovery of remains. We had a lot of contact with the League of Families of POW-MIA families. We worked closely with the White House and with the DIA. It was a very hot issue - and it took up a large part of my time as Vietnam desk officer.

Q: What was your personal feeling about this?

JOHNSON: Well, when I first came to the issue I hadn't paid that much attention to it. Over time, in reading all the reports and going to all the meetings, I came to the conclusion that it was highly unlikely that anybody was being held. It was the government's position, and may still be the government's position for all I know, that we were open minded, and that we didn't know whether there was anybody being held. There was no conclusive evidence that anybody was being held. Obviously, it is almost impossible to prove a negative, but it was extremely unlikely that anyone was being held by the Vietnamese, or the Lao for that matter, or the Cambodians. Even though I was Vietnam desk officer, I had to do it for all three of those countries.

But I think the government today spends about 100 million dollars a year on trying to resolve that issue. We were just starting to get a little bit more cooperation from the Vietnamese and the Lao at that time. While I was there we had the first excavations of crash sites and the like under agreements with them, so we were making progress at least in recovering remains.

There was a large part of the U.S. population which sincerely believed that people were being held. A slightly smaller part of the population thought that people were being held, that the United States government knew about it, that this had been kept secret - a great conspiracy, and that Mr. Kissinger had known about it all the time. This had started in 1973, I guess, when the other prisoners came home. Mr. Kissinger tends to be regarded as the "devil incarnate" by that kind of person. No activity is regarded as too base for him to be involved in.

Q: It later became a sort of a political issue of the Republican right. During this time was this more discreet rather than turning into an organized political movement?

JOHNSON: Well, there were different layers. Mr. Reagan, the President, obviously took it very seriously and harnessed the administration to do everything it could. Obviously, as far as I know, Mr. Reagan was not part of the silence within the government. Then, within the private community, the majority of the people in the League of Families, the most important group, though it is hard to say what they believed... In any case, the majority thought that the government was acting with good will, trying to do its best. They would prod the government to do more, but basically were pro-government.

One of the things about the League of Families was that because the way the war was fought, at least my impression from going to League meetings, was, that the people that were missing were mostly officers. In many cases, their fathers were also officers. So you had a kind of group of people who were predisposed to think well of the government, not entirely so but that was their general predisposition.

Then you had within the League of Families and outside the League of Families, people who thought that the U.S. government was being perfidious, that it really knew about prisoners of war and had left them - left people there and was working hard to cover it up. League meetings were very lively affairs, with the clash of these two basic philosophies and the nuances along side it. One of the things about the POW-MIA issue was [that] I never really heard anybody say that he disagreed with somebody else but respected their motivation and their right to say what they did. Everybody tended to accuse the other person of being a dupe or stupid or of the basest motivations. The amount of hatred that was generated at these meetings was really something, so it was an interesting area to operate in.

Most of kind of the really suspicious people I met with, well, like Ambassador Thunderburke back in Bucharest, saw the Department of State as the enemy; I am not sure why. So whenever I met them I would always say, "If the Defense Intelligence Agency tells us that someone is there, we will be galvanized into action and recommend to the President at the time whatever it seems wisest to do. But they haven't done so and therefore the question really doesn't come to the Department of State but to the Defense Intelligence Agency." There is within the Defense Intelligence Agency a large office which is larger still now and deals with this whole question, and which does the analysis of live sighting reports and other indications that come to them.

Q: What were some of the motives from the group that felt that the government was doing-was misleading or lying to them? What were the motives according to them of the North Vietnamese for keeping American prisoners?

JOHNSON: Well, they had lots of different motives. Well, the principal one was that they were to be used as bargaining chips, that President Nixon and Mr. Kissinger had promised 3.4 billion in aid or so and these people had been held back in order to get the United States to deliver on that promise. You could always reply by saying, "What are they waiting for? When are they going to bring these people forth to bargain?" It never happened. It had never been suggested. That was the principal reason that it was alleged.

There were others like revenge. Or [that] these were people who had particular scientific or technical knowledge that was being exploited or that there were wayward warlords off in the woods that kept these people around for one reason or another. But the principal reason thing was this idea of being held back to bargain about reparations.

Q: Did you run across during this time sort of professional con men?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. There were many exploiting these people. Two of my rules were that no con man, however, often exposed as the complete charlatan, never went away or was ever really disposed of. No story, however often shown to be untrue or a fabrication, ever went away. But yes, there are people who are con men who were involved in the thing, who bilked people out of a lot of money.

Well, while I was there, there was kind of a side issue. There had been an American oil drill ship, I think, doing exploration south of Hainan Island in Chinese waters. This must have been 1983. It had been overtaken by a typhoon and sank, with no survivors. But all the time I was on the desk, there were rumors that some of the people had made it to Vietnam and were being hidden.

I remember one gentleman who was a lawyer in Austin, Texas whose son had been lost on the ship. I guess he was a Yugoslav, maybe now we would say he was a Croatian. But in those days he was a Yugoslav who passed himself off as a KGB agent to this fellow and bilked him out of tens of thousands of dollars with a scenario which had secret meetings hither and yon with always the promise that a little bit more and the son would be produced. Finally the father turned to the FBI, and the FBI stepped in, arrested him, and brought him to trial. Even then the father said that he thought the FBI had bungled it. Even though they showed he was a Yugoslav con man, he thought this fellow really did have the KGB contacts he alleged to be able if they just had gone a little bit farther that maybe the son would be produced. But the mentality was all through the issue.

Basically you could go to the Nana Hotel in Bangkok, and if you announced in a loud carrying voice in the bar that you would pay money for evidence that Joe Smith was alive, evidence would be produced. You name it and it was forth coming. Bones, or dog-tags or pictures. There were these various pictures that arose as well. But yes, there were lots of charlatans operating.

Q: When you on the desk, did you get the feeling that there might be establishing diplomatic relations then or was this something that there was no point in particularly planning for?

JOHNSON: Well, when I came to the desk I was hopeful that we would be able to establish diplomatic relations during my anticipated two years. But it was apparent that wasn't possible, early on, so I didn't worry about it too much while I was there. We certainly talked with the Vietnamese. We had lots of official contacts. I myself went with a congressional delegation to Hanoi while I was on the desk.

But given the climate of the times, it just wasn't a possibility of having relations. They would have made sense. Our embargo was going to hurt us as far as trade was concerned, though from 1984-86, Vietnam really wasn't doing that well. It was still relying a lot on Soviet aid and its economy. They had just a few years before decided they couldn't just continue in a monolithic command economy and were breaking out of that. But they were doing pretty badly economically at the time. But you could see the potential was there. Vietnam is a rich country with an intelligent, hardworking population. Other countries were getting interested, and of course the oil exploration was going on and the exploitation was starting at the time. But it really wasn't possible to do anything about that. You would just been wasting your powder for no reason.

Q: What was your impression both looking at it from Washington and traveling to Hanoi of the Vietnamese government during this time?

JOHNSON: Well, I am just trying to remember when all these things happened. The government at the top had become a sort of geritocracy. One of the problems with communism is that there is no retirement program. I was just trying to remember when Le Duan died. He was the successor as much as Ho Chi Minh had a successor. But in any case when he died it didn't make that much difference. It was a rather lethargic government struggling with the contradictions between its ideology and what it saw that it had to do in an economic way.

At the lower level, it was a tremendously corrupt and feckless Third World government, made all the worse because the government had a lot more power than it did in other countries. I don't know if you could buy them, you could certainly rent lower level officials. Almost every official act required a bribe of some sort, which was understandable given their rates of pay. It wasn't doing very well at that period-1984-86 from an economic point of view and a governmental point of view.

At the time, of course, they still had thousands of former South Vietnamese government officers and officials in thought reform camps that were a problem. Although they were allowing people to emigrate and had the orderly departure program, we were trying to stop the boat people. Of course, the boat people thing was tremendously dangerous for those who went that way, both from the authorities and pirates and then from the weather. So the orderly departure program was going, and the Vietnamese government was cooperating - and pretty successful, I thought.

Part of that was that we had Amerasian mixed-blood children of soldiers and Vietnamese women that were coming out. So we were doing a lot of business with the government, but the country was in pretty bad shape at the time given the war and that kind of un-wisdom of the economic policies they were following.

Q: How did we look upon the integration of North and South Vietnam? How was that going?

JOHNSON: South Vietnamese communists I guess we can call them-those people in the Vietnamese communist party hierarchy who saw themselves as southerners were unhappy with how things were going. They had really been imposed upon by the north, and a lot of them had really thought that the South Vietnamese would have a more autonomous role than they were allowed. They were unhappy with how quickly the country had been jammed together and also [with] the positions they were given.

There were a lot of North Vietnamese cadres that came down and were given jobs as provincial this or post master that who generally saw southern cousins as slow and crooked and not too smart and kind of lorded over them. That obviously sat ill with a lot of the southerners. There was never a rebellion or anything like that, but there was a lot of friction even within the communist establishment, let alone of course the South Vietnamese who were part of that establishment, some of whom were hunkering down; others who were trying to get out.

Q: Were we making any representations to try to help any former South Vietnamese officials and army officers and all in these reeducation camps? I mean, many of them had been our friends and all that?

JOHNSON: We were. We had a program which allowed them to come to the United States if they could get out of these camps and, generally speaking, they were getting out at that time. So, yes, we were helpful. We did bring it up. Obviously, we couldn't put too much pressure on Hanoi. But what pressure we could exert, we exerted.

Q: How did you find the officials you talked to from Vietnam at this time? Did they look upon the Americans as the great Satan or were they pragmatic?

JOHNSON: Oh, they were very pragmatic. I guess more so than we were. No, they saw China as the great Satan at that time. They just had that border war with the Chinese, and I think they were worried because we were friendly with China than we were to them. But no, they were always very pragmatic, and whenever they got the chance they would try to exploit the liberal guilt of Americans who would visit there and tell them about their own problems and the like. But no; they were businesslike.

Q: In Congress, did you find a strong cadre that was basically unforgiving of the "Vietnamese" ("Vietnamese" may not be the right term), that we had essentially lost the war and the Vietnamese were responsible for it and damn them to hell?

JOHNSON: Yes. I think that was the underlying attitude of quite a number of congressmen and senators at the time. I think that was one reason that the POW-MIA issue got the play that it did and the people that strongly backed the view that they were holding people came a lot from that kind of attitude that they were evil incarnate.

Q: Were we concerned at that time about Soviet use of places like Cam Ranh Bay?

JOHNSON: We were. The Soviets were in Cam Ranh Bay. They had some smaller bases around. Yes, we kept a very close eye on Cam Ranh Bay and observed the comings and goings there. The Soviets were also involved in oil exploration; they had a large kind of colony - people working in oil down at Cap San Jacques, I guess, to the old timers. The Vietnamese generally had a low opinion of the Soviets. They called them "Americans without money."

When I was in Hanoi and I was walking around the [market], little boys came up and called us "Soviets." We said, "No, we are Americans." They became very curious. But yes, we were following what the Soviets were doing. They were still giving considerable economic and military aid. They had the base; the base was both a naval and an air base, and they did reconnaissance flights out of Cam Ranh. They obviously faced across the East China Sea or the South China Sea, the American bases at Subic Bay-Clarke Field at the time.

Q: Were we feeling any particular threat or was this sort of general Soviet expansion? What did we think they were up to?

JOHNSON: Well, there was general Soviet expansion. There was some question as to how subservient to the Soviets the Vietnamese were. During the war, the Vietnamese had always been very careful to kind of keep an equidistance between the Chinese and Moscow, between Beijing and Moscow. They really were independent. They weren't under the thumb of Moscow or under the thumb of Beijing, although I'm sure they had to take in the attitudes in those two places.

But this had eroded after troubles with the Chinese when they expelled a large part of the Chinese population of Vietnam. There were other problems. There was the Border War. They had signed a treaty with the Soviet Union, and the question was how much were they under the Soviet thumb? I think probably not that much. But the Soviets were giving them a considerable amount of aid - I think about a billion dollars a year at that time. So they obviously had to take it into account - Soviet sensibilities, and I assume the Cameron Bay place was a quid pro quo.

Q: Again, in this 1984-86 period, Vietnamese military any particular threat? Cambodia, Laos? Did you see Vietnam as an expansionistic power?

JOHNSON: I think we were still worried about it, but they weren't much. They still had some troops in Laos, and the Laotian government at the time was still pretty subservient to Hanoi. In Cambodia, there had been the December 1978 to January 1979 war in which they basically took over Cambodia. They set up their own puppet regime. There really was some concern, I think, in Thailand particularly, but by that time I think it was ebbing - the Thai pretty much taking care of their own communist insurgency. The Vietnamese had made pretty plain they didn't really have any ambitions beyond Cambodia.

By that time, I think they would really come to realize that they had a tar baby in Cambodia. It was expensive and was causing them lots and lots of problems. That was one of the most objective of our criteria for having relations with them if they get out of Cambodia. But they didn't know how to get out of Cambodia because if they got out any regime that resulted would likely be anti-Vietnamese. So we weren't really worried about them expanding at the time.

CHARLES H. TWINING
Office Director; Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia
Washington, DC (1988-1991)

Charles H. Twining was born in Maryland in 1940. He received his BA from the University of Virginia in 1962 and an MA from the School for Advanced International Studies in 1964. After entering the Foreign Service in 1964 his assignments included Tananarive, Dalat, Abidjan, Bangkok, Cotonou, Douala, Ouagadougou, and Honolulu with ambassadorships to Cambodia and Cameroon. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Ambassador Charles H. Twining in 2004.

Q: Well, you left there when?

TWINING: I left in 1988. In 1988, I received a call from the State Department and was told, "We need a new director for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Things seem to be evolving in that area. We need someone with experience in the region and who can help move things ahead in the future." I became the Office Director in 1988 for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Q: From 1988 to when?

TWINING: 1988 to 1991.

Q: How was your time working there? Could you look at each country in 1988 and summarize our relations and policies with each country?

TWINING: I think that is a very good idea. We almost have to think back as to what was happening in the world. You had three countries, all associated with the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union was clearly already weakening at that point. Vietnam and Laos had basically the leadership that had been in place since the 1970s and Cambodia since 1979. It was leadership that hadn't produced many results, and a leadership that was starting to wonder whether there should be some change in approach. I think you had a mood in the United States that was really starting to evolve as well. You had American liberals arguing that we have full relations with those three countries, treat them like anyone else, and let bygones be bygones. You also had people on the right who were convinced all of these countries were bad guys and we shouldn't be doing anything to help them.

There were several elements in the U.S. pressing for more involvement. There was the POW/MIA movement, especially the National League of Families directed by its dynamic director, Mrs. Ann Mills Griffiths. These were the people who wanted the fullest possible accounting of the missing Americans from the war. They realized that to do that, we had to be on the scene in those three countries. We had to have talks, relationships with them, to one degree or another. We had an active program of accepting refugees into the United States. That included an Orderly Departure Program office located in Ho Chi Minh City, staffed by American Foreign Service personnel. Pressure was on us to step up refugee processing as well as to deliver immigrant visas to immediate family members of former refugees who were now citizens. You had some people on Capitol Hill who were also saying that we needed to look at the future, rather than the past. In addition, some U.S. business sectors, such as petroleum, were anxious to begin working in one or more of the countries. Tourists wanted to travel to Vietnam.

Hanoi had evolved from occupying southern Vietnam and trying to reshape it in a communist mold after 1975 to realizing that that didn't work. By 1988 there was increasing openness and growth in the Vietnamese economy, both in the north and the south. Laos moved more slowly but was also trying to figure out how to become more open. At least we were able to talk with the Lao through our embassies, although not always very productively.

Cambodia was a very special case. The Khmer Rouge had been thrown out by the Vietnamese in late 1978 and beginning of 1979. But in 1988, there were still Vietnamese troops throughout Cambodia. What we considered a puppet government that the Vietnamese had put in place was running Cambodia. There was continued insecurity in Cambodia, particularly due to Khmer Rouge resistance, aided by the Chinese. We, along with other Western and Southeast Asian nations, were supporting two smaller non-communist resistance groups to make sure they at least didn't disappear. By 1988, all were wondering how much longer this sad state of affairs was going to continue.

Q: You were there from 1988 until when?

TWINING: On what the Cambodians said was a real good luck number, I went in on 8/8/88 and stayed until the summer of 1991. The office was small but very busy. I had a hardworking deputy – Michael Marine, then Marie Huhtala – and desk officers for the three countries, Don Stader and Frank Light on Vietnam and Harvey Somers for Laos and Cambodia. Mr. Somers deserves lasting credit for having come up with many of the ideas for the Cambodian peace agreement.

Q: What was the attitude within the Asian Pacific bureau toward your operation at that time? They had Japan, and Indonesia, and obviously, there was a certain country called China, which was taking up their time. Had you sort of slipped from the radar, or what?

TWINING: You know, I'm not sure we ever slipped from the radar. People who worked on my countries even in the early 1980s told me how busy they had been. It was more than they ever expected. It was equally true for my staff and me, when I came in in 1988. I would say the pace increased particularly when a very interested Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and the Pacific was named at the outset of the Bush I administration, Dr. Richard Solomon. From that time on, the Indochina and China portfolios were the two most important to which he devoted his time. We were often there at 8:00 at night, working on issue papers, working with him, working with the Deputy Assistant Secretary, David Lambertson. The China and VLC [Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia] offices would be there when the rest of the Bureau would have gone home.

Q: Well, let's talk about prior to your going there. What was this organization working so hard on?

TWINING: There was a panoply of things. You had close to one million Vietnamese refugees in the United States, creating family reunification issues. There were American companies which wanted to get more and more involved in Vietnam, such as those that had done oil exploration offshore, up to 1975. They wanted to get back in and complete that exploration. You had all the POW/MIA pressures. You would be bombarded by people from the American Legion to the National League of Families asking, "What are we doing?" They wanted to know how we were moving that issue forward. Cambodian-Americans and Lao-Americans pressed us to support the resistance. There was enough of a gamut of interests that, quantity wise, gave you a lot to do.

Q: Well, on the POW/MIA thing, this is 1988, thirteen years after we had left the area. Had, by this time, the focus gone more toward bodies or was there still a conspiracy cloud hanging over? That somehow or another, there were pockets of American servicemen being held in bamboo cages, somewhere out in the jungle?

TWINING: That is an excellent question. It was still a mixture of both attitudes. There was the feeling, increasingly that there were no live Americans any longer, and yet there were people convinced that there must still be some there. Senator Bob Smith of New Hampshire was sure there were Americans being held prisoner in Vietnam. There was a Congressman, who is still in the Congress, who basically didn't believe what we were saying. He knew if he went to Laos, he would find out where the Americans were being held. We encouraged him to go, and he returned home far less certain of his views.

Q: What was sponsoring this? Would you say this was delusional? Was this political? Was this belief? Did you get any feel for this side?

TWINING: I think there were people who truly believed there were still live Americans, truly believed it. I don't think it was political. I don't know that it was based on very much except hope. You still had the rumor mill going. In Ho Chi Minh City, entrepreneurs were still manufacturing dog tags of American soldiers. You would hear about these dog tags. You would get one, and the Pentagon had to track down whether this person was dead or alive. Then, you would find the person was living in Toledo, Ohio, but his dog tag had just surfaced, so there were those who thought it was evidence of either his remains or that he must be held prisoner. You had that kind of thing happening. People who believed that live prisoners were still there would look for the craziest things. You had to deal with all kinds.

Q: I would think this would be very hard. For anybody, in my opinion, the logic is what is the point of keeping prisoners just to cause trouble, it's going to destroy things, and what are you going to do with the prisoners? Slave labor, if you're going to keep darts on them... It doesn't really come out. These guys never really did good work. So, here you are, looking at this thing in a logical way, up against the true believers. This must have been very difficult for you to try to explain or to deal rationally with them.

TWINING: We had nonstop, inter-agency meetings; the Pentagon, the State Department, the NSC, CIA. We worked considerably with the Congress and with private groups. Mrs. Griffiths of the National League of Families received a security clearance in order to attend our meetings and read all the traffic, as we worked together to agree on how best to deal with the POW/MIA issue. Note that Mrs. Griffiths worked with all levels of State, DOD, and the NSC, particularly Mr. Richard Childress at NSC. We may not have always been in agreement, but she worked with us fairly. It was clear early on that you could never deal with the issue fully until you had a commitment from the three countries that you could go anywhere, any time of your choosing, to investigate a rumor of someone being held in a Lao cave, for example.

Q: When you took over this job, was this a proposal that was conceivable at that time? Did you think you would get something for this?

TWINING: You never knew. At that time, we didn't have any assurance that we could do that. Yet, we realized we had to keep pushing for openness, openness of access, openness of government archives. It was simply something that you had to push for in diplomatic conversations, with the Vietnamese, with the Lao. We hadn't started yet in Cambodia, but even then, we would talk to the Soviets about talking to their Cambodian friends, to try to get the kind of access that was important to have, if you were going to resolve once and for all, that there were still live Americans.

Q: How were the different groups responding? I'm talking about the government officials.

TWINING: We generally felt that Cambodia and Laos would follow the lead of the Vietnamese. If the Vietnamese seemed to be opening up a little bit, we then felt, especially with the Lao, that we would have a chance of getting them to open up a little bit. Yet sometimes, we would propose having a meeting with the Vietnamese, Lao, and the U.S. military, just for technical talks. Then, we would find the Lao, and later the Cambodians didn't want to do it with the Vietnamese. They felt they were sovereign, and why should they be seen to be looking like they were under the Vietnamese thumb. So you had to play this at different angles. But, there were opportunities to talk, and during my time as Director of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, we would work on this issue as we would work on other issues, either with the regimes themselves, or through intermediaries. The POW/MIA issue was declared by President Reagan, and the first President Bush, as our highest national priority. So, you always had to incorporate this issue in any contacts you had.

Q: Well, talking about contacts, were we under restraints, such as we one time had with the PLO, that you couldn't talk to them, or was this a looser type thing?

TWINING: You never knew, but the point was a valid one. Because we kept relations going with the Lao, we could talk to the Lao, we could deal with them as you would any other country, even though there would be some hesitancy on their side – Lao diplomats being the cautious types – and sometimes a little reluctance on our side. At least there we could have normal conversations when the atmosphere was right.

With Vietnam, we had to look for contact points. In the 1988 period, for example, the contact point was through the American Embassy in Bangkok, talking with the Vietnamese Embassy. We also used the Vietnamese Mission in New York increasingly as a point of contact. Just as we deal with the North Koreans today, it would be the East Asian Bureau which would say yea or nay to any or all contact with the Vietnamese Mission in New York. We would not pass through USUN. Rather DAS Lambertson or his replacement, Kenneth Quinn, or I or a member of my staff would speak directly with the Vietnamese Mission in New York to pass on messages, to receive messages, to hear about complaints, and so forth. We often traveled to New York to meet with them.

With the Cambodians, on the other hand, we simply had no contact with the regime in Phnom Penh. The Reagan and Bush White House felt very strongly that as long as Vietnamese troops were in Cambodia, the Cambodians should not be considered a dialogue partner, they were simply “puppets”. That really limited any approaches to the Cambodians. In hindsight, that was unfortunate.

Q: During this 1988 to 1991 period, let's stick to the missing in action type thing. Was there any progress made?

TWINING: A great deal of progress was made. Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Robert Kimmitt took a particular interest in this issue. He provided us the political support to help move things forward. Retired General John Vessey was named a special emissary of the president and traveled particularly to Vietnam to negotiate POW/MIA issues, work out the establishment of our POW/MIA office in Hanoi, and expand the extent of our POW/MIA activity. As a four-star general, he had considerable clout with both sides and helped end speculation in the U.S. that there were any live prisoners.

We also established a similar POW/MIA office of military personnel in Vientiane. Staff members weren't there as defense attachés, they were there for that one issue, only, to pursue leads and support excavation activity in areas of suspected losses. Slowly but surely we increased the number of search operations in Laos. After quiet contacts conducted by Chief of Mission Charles Salmon in Vientiane, the Bush Administration finally gave permission to our military specialists to have a non-political, quiet meeting with the Phnom Penh regime on this issue. But we had so few missing in action in Cambodia, military as well as civilians, that it wasn't quite the priority that Laos and Vietnam were. In all three countries, progress was made thanks to an increasing openness on their sides and a more flexible approach on our own. All three also wanted something from us: more normal relations. They saw POW/MIA activity as a kind of bargaining chip. I believe we can conclude that the POW/MIA issue helped drive the diplomacy leading to normalization of relations with Vietnam and upgrading of relations with Laos, as well as contributed to our determination to help settle the Cambodian conflict.

Q: Well, what were they doing? I mean, these missions?

TWINING: These POW/MIA offices that were formally in place in Hanoi and in Vientiane, were there to handle everything relating to POW/MIA. They would pick up and investigate rumors of missing Americans. Sometimes they would receive remains and get them back to Honolulu to a laboratory for examination. They handled investigations of dog tags. They handled whatever came up. Most importantly, they would seek permission from the Vietnamese or Lao for site surveys and excavations and provide logistical support.

Q: Did you get a feel for how the various Vietnamese/Cambodians/Laotians felt about all this? Did they look upon this as being an act of peculiar people, or did it fit with them? They have veneration for ancestors. Was this seen as almost a spiritual thing, or how would you say it was seen?

TWINING: It was truly a mixture of motivations. There were some who thought they could make money out of the operation, charging us two or three times the going rate for support of one kind or another, and pocketing the excess money themselves. You had people who really had sympathy for our guest, often reminding us that they would like to find out what happened to their missing and would like our help. This was true of the Vietnamese, in particular. Increasingly, we realized we needed to start looking in our own records to see where perhaps we buried the bodies of Viet Cong or NVA soldiers, to help satisfy their own search for their missing. Others thought that if they cooperated with us on MIAs, they would get visas. For many villagers in the three countries who actually did the digging for remains, it meant employment for cash.

Q: What about the dozen or so (you may know the figure, I don't) newsmen who were killed in Cambodia? I was in Saigon at the time. I remember going to the Continental Hotel where some of the newsmen resided, and packing up their belongings. Sean Flynn is one of the ones who stick in my mind. What about those? Any progress with those?

TWINING: They disappeared, as you remember, in Cambodia, killed by the Khmer Rouge. We didn't really start exploring around Cambodia until I was Chief of Mission, starting in 1991. With wonderful cooperation from Cambodian authorities – who indeed agreed we could look anywhere, any time, for remains – we launched POW/MIA investigations, site surveys, and excavations to look for people like Sean Flynn. Due to the turmoil and devastation during the Khmer Rouge's period, we never really got very far. We tried to investigate any leads we had. We knew where people like Flynn had disappeared. We talked to villagers. I participated in the effort myself. After we opened up in Phnom Penh in 1991, an excellent Khmer-speaking military officer, Captain Rich Arant, established a small POW/MIA office there. All of us traveled around trying to help find where some of these people disappeared.

I remember going out to eastern Cambodia, in one of the big rubber plantation areas near Memot. Villagers told us that Flynn and a couple of others were killed right in that area, and their remains were thrown down a well. I remember looking at that well. Indeed, our people came in and dug up that well. I don't think it proved to have anything, but we were always looking. We weren't just looking for the remains of military personnel, but any civilian personnel, as well.

Q: In other aspects of this, when you got there, was the Bush I administration talking about looking at ways to establish relations, particularly with Vietnam? Cambodia would almost be another thing. We already had it with Laos.

TWINING: I might go into the evolution of the Vietnam relationship. Even before the Bush I people came into office, there was some feeling of the need to move forward. Assistant Secretary of State Gaston Sigur was one of those, together with the career people, who thought we needed to advance the Vietnam relationship, though not quite knowing how. In 1989 the Bush administration took office and included a mixture of people who had been involved in the Vietnam war or were knowledgeable about Indochina. Some wanted to move forward only on POW/MIA but nothing else, particularly not until Vietnamese troops pulled out of Laos and Cambodia.

We realized we had to talk to the Vietnamese more than we had been doing. General Vessey was doing his thing, and he would tell us that beside POW/MIA, the message he was getting was Vietnam wanted more contact and more movement with the United States on other issues.

Q: By the way, had the Vietnamese long ago dropped the repatriation thing, which for a long time, was almost laughable? They thought we were going to pay them billions of dollars.

TWINING: Right. I think the figure they claimed they thought they were getting from President Nixon was something like two billion dollars. Yes, I think by my time, it had just been laughed off the street. But, there were converging interests. The Soviet Union was starting to fall. The Vietnamese were worried about Big Brother China, and yet also realized that they had to make peace with Big Brother China. I think they were a little worried about their Soviet backing failing, and with traditional enemy China on their northern border, perhaps they needed to find a way to improve things with the Americans to balance thing out. Indeed, if we Americans could just allow trade, they thought that would be very helpful. There were Americans who realized that our interests required more forthcomingness on our part. I would say that apart from POW/MIA, it was the Cambodia part of the equation that helped move things forward.

ASEAN, The Association of Southeast Asian Nations, was trying to find a solution to the continued fighting in Cambodia. It started organizing talks with all the Cambodian parties in 1988 following a December 1987 meeting between Prince Sihanouk and Hun Sen in France. But, somehow, this wasn't quite enough. We were pressing to get Vietnamese troops out of Cambodia. We too wanted to see an end to the fighting. It was draining for everybody, including the Cambodians. It was a source of divisiveness among the five permanent members of the Security Council, each with its own links to the various Cambodian factions. All were starting to get tired of this nonstop war. It was in July/August 1989 that the first peace conference on Cambodia was held in Paris. It was a month long conference. We knew we had to have discussions with the Vietnamese if we were going to make progress in Cambodia. That meant we had to persuade the Vietnamese that their troops had to leave Cambodia. We conveyed this message to Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach when Assistant Secretary Solomon met with him in Paris on the margins of the conference in July. At the same time we reiterated the need to advance our POW/MIA effort.

There were people in the Bush White House who even when the Vietnamese said, in September 1989, "Our troops have pulled out," didn't believe it. They would cite intelligence that proved the case, at least in their eyes. So, we had to keep finding ways to tell the Vietnamese that they had to get completely out of Cambodia, if they wanted to move relations forward. I accompanied a Congressional Delegation led by Congressman Stephen Solarz to Hanoi in the fall of 1989 during which he and other Members of Congress pressed Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach to get all Vietnamese troops out of the country. While I was not permitted by Washington to accompany the CODEL to Phnom Penh, it traveled there to tell Hun Sen the same thing. Secretary of State James Baker met with Foreign Minister Thach on the margins of the UN General Assembly in September 1990 to reinforce this message and discuss the POW/MIA effort and a possible settlement in Cambodia. Increasingly, the Vietnamese, interested in moving the relationship forward, complained to us, "You're always changing the goal posts. We are cooperating on POW/MIA." We told them, "We want more cooperation, and we want you to open your archives more fully so we can do our research on missing Americans. We want to have freedom of movement in Vietnam and to be able to verify that you have no troops in Laos or Cambodia." Finally, as we made progress in Cambodia, we sat down and said, "The Vietnamese are right. They need something in writing from us, what we will do if they do something."

We wrote what was called a "road map." It was a tough ordeal. It took full NSC cooperation and Presidential blessing. There were nonstop talks among the State Department, the Defense Department, the NSC, and the National League of Families, as well as a lot of contact with Capitol Hill to assess Congressional sentiment. Finally, in early 1991, Assistant Secretary Solomon and I went to New York City, sat down with the Vietnamese Ambassador and said, "We now have a plan that will lead to restoration of full relations. It shows what each of us has to do, reciprocally." While the Vietnamese reacted to a couple of points or requested clarifications, that got the process going. I must admit that there were a number of us in the State Department who thought that President Bush, as his last act in office, would announce the normalization of relations between Vietnam and the United States. By the end of the Bush administration, it was clear that there was a lot of sentiment in Washington that we were both moving forward well, and we could do this. Unfortunately, it did not happen.

I have to admit that I felt some personal satisfaction when I went to a reception 4-5 years ago at the Vietnamese Embassy here in Washington. The Ambassador, one of our most important contacts in trying to get the normalization process moving, Le Van Bang, was giving a reception for a visiting delegation for trade talks. The first thing he did at the reception was to introduce me. I was just there as a visitor, attending on the coattails of my son, Dan, who was working for Senator McCain. Ambassador Bang said, "I want everybody to know this is Ambassador Twining. He more than anyone worked quietly in the tough years to advance the process of normalization with us in Vietnam." Everyone applauded.

It was a nice diplomatic gesture. It was exaggerated. We all played parts. But I did feel a lot of satisfaction with that because we worked hard in that period of 1988 to 1991, with lots and lots of contacts, and lots of late nights. Just even doing the road map, I left the assistant secretary's office at 1:00 a.m., with my wife parked outside in the car waiting for me for hours. Dr. Solomon and I boarded the airplane at 7:00 a.m. to go to New York to present the road map. We all put a lot of time and sweat into trying to normalize our relations with Vietnam in accordance with the interests of the United States. We had to do it in a way that would fly politically, not just with the Congress, but also with veterans' groups and others.

Q: I would have thought that Congress and maybe the NSC would have feelings about this, because politics between them were a real problem. But, except for the fact that you were gobbling up resources, putting troops on the ground in the hills looking for bodies, I wouldn't have thought that the Pentagon would have any particular feeling about it.

TWINING: The Pentagon was more in tune with the sentiments of the various organizations involved in POW/MIA than any other part of the U.S. government. Every year, the National League of Families holds a meeting in Washington, D.C. The Pentagon participates fully, often led by the Secretary of Defense. Other veterans groups with often contrasting views have their respective supporters there, as well. POW/MIA is a very political issue.

We wouldn't move forward in relations with these countries unless you were really satisfied that the POW/MIA issue was moving forward. The State Department, I guess it is fair to say, had taken more of a multi-faceted approach. There has always been a sentiment in the State Department that you want to have relations with everyone. Henry Kissinger said that he would talk to the devil if it would bring peace to the Middle East. I think that is very much a State Department approach. The NSC was probably more on the side of the Pentagon than on the side of the State Department with respect to relations, but that is what made negotiating both time consuming and complex. Congressional views would be similarly varied.

Q: How did you evaluate, during the time you were doing this, there wasn't any development in this, the organization that represented the families? Because, it almost seemed to me that there is almost another agenda there, at least with some people, a conservative agenda, or not? How did you see it?

TWINING: The National League of Families was not inflexible nor unreasonable. Its members wanted to be sure the USG left no stone unturned in the search for missing Americans. Its position was a fact of life, and not one with which we who were involved necessarily disagreed personally. There were other groups strongly interested in the POW/MIA issue, as well, some like the American Legion more conservative in approach, others like the Vietnam Veterans of America more liberal, the latter believing that we could accomplish more with Hanoi if we normalized our relations. You had to deal with all these groups.

The National League of Families, though, was the most active of the groups, and seemed to represent by far the greatest number of the families of the missing in action. Therefore, you dealt with them much more intensely. You realized as you were dealing with them and their dynamic leader in particular, Mrs. Ann Mills Griffiths, that as you spoke and related to one another, you could help her see other items on the agenda that also needed to be accommodated. She could help you understand, as well, the intricacies of the whole POW/MIA effort. It wasn't a one-shot thing, you go find prisoners, and you find any bones, and then that's it. Maybe there should be some effort made to give the Vietnamese information about where their missing might be for instance. As we grew to understand one another, there was more of a collaborative relationship, regardless of some of the more conservative people in that movement, or in the other organization.

Q: Did you find there was a hard-core group of people who really didn't want to see this thing resolved, because as long as there was the thought that there were maybe POWs, it gave them a sense of fulfillment?

TWINING: This is all very true. From 1975 on, Capitol Hill often represented the people, who for their own political reasons, or emotional reasons would be the hardest to convince to open the doors a bit. It was only thanks to people like John Kerry, Bob Kerry, John McCain, and Pete Peterson...

Q: They're all Vietnam veterans. A couple of them, McCain and Peterson were POWs.

TWINING: That's right. These were the people who often were more far seeing in the need to put the past to rest, and deal with the present and the future. Some of the people, such as Jesse Helms, had never ventured near that area. You also had people who were enlightened like Stephen Solarz and Jim Leach on the House side, Senator Richard Lugar on the Senate side. Because of interest and their intellectual capabilities, they wanted to move things forward. Such support was so important in that period. Senators Kerry and McCain were part of a group in the Congress of House and Senate members who chaired a POW/MIA task force.

Frankly, through that task force, they were able to educate some of their colleagues about not only those three countries, but about how we move forward, not only on the issue, but also more generally. I have to give them a lot of credit for that.

Q: Well, one has to look at World War II, where there are hundreds if not thousands of missing in action in places like New Guinea, or Burma, of course at sea, but that is beyond the realm. Guadalcanal is one. Yet, there was never that movement. I still see firehouses, churches flying the POW/MIA flag, long after. It's been 30 or more years.

TWINING: I think the world had changed with the era of worldwide communications. The Vietnam War was the first war fought in the media. It was shown in the media nonstop. Also people were traveling more, and travel was easily done. Somehow, the mood in the world, particularly in the United States, had changed. We realized that we could find answers to questions. Explanations could now be sought as to the fate of soldiers who disappeared at Guadalcanal or in Papua New Guinea.

Q: What about some of the other countries, and the role they played? The French, for example. You mentioned the Paris means. The French have always maintained more cultural relations with the communists, Indochina governments than we have. Did they play a role, whether it be positive or negative, or not?

TWINING: Are you talking just about POW/MIA?

Q: No, I'm talking about over a broad range of issues.

TWINING: Oh, gosh. It's difficult, because you almost have to talk about each country and what our interests were in each country, and with whom did we relate, as we tried to advance those interests. For all of the countries, the ASEAN countries were important dialogue partners. The other four permanent members of the Security Council were important. The French were important, as you say, because of their historic legacy. They felt they understood Indochina better than we, better than anyone else. They also had contacts. But so did the Chinese, so did the Soviets. The Indonesians were extremely important. The Thai were important. I'd say the panoply of players really were our friends in Europe, our friends in Asia, Southeast Asia, plus China and Japan, and the Soviet Union. You would talk to one or the other of them on various issues of interest. The Singaporeans and we, for example, would talk about the economic sanctions that we had on Vietnam, and their own sanctions. That impacted on our thinking.

MARIE THERESE HUHTALA
Office Director, Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia
Washington, DC (1990-1992)

Ambassador Huhtala was born and raised in California and Graduated from Santa Clara University. Joining the Foreign Service in 1972, she studied Thai and Chinese languages and became a specialist in East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Her overseas postings include Paris, Quebec, Hong Kong and Chiang Mai (Thailand). In Washington, she dealt primarily with East Asia and Pacific Affairs. From 2001 to 2004 she served as US ambassador to Malaysia and, from 2004 to 2005, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Ambassador Huhtala is a graduate of the National War College and the State Department's Senior Seminar. Ambassador Huhtala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: You were doing Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia from 1990 to when?

HUHTALA: To 1992. And we were trying to help nurture the beginning of civil society in Cambodia. As if those issues weren't interesting enough, we had Vietnam. At that point we had still not re-established diplomatic relations following the war, which had ended 15 years before. There had been attempts in the late '70s to negotiate something but there were two problems. One was that the Vietnamese were demanding war reparations, which we never pay, and the second thing was that in 1979, Vietnam invaded Cambodia and that put an end to any interest on the U.S. side in normalizing. During the 1980s there developed a potent movement of the POW/MIA families, which strongly opposed normalization.

Q: Missing in action. These are people who were concerned that there might be military men still prisoners of war.

HUHTALA: Let me just preface this. After every major war there are huge numbers of people who are never accounted for. Their remains are never found and their families never know what happened to them. After World War II something like 400,000 men were never accounted for, and after the Korean War there were 88,000. Those were wars that we considered ourselves to have won, or at least to have come out all right on. In the case of Vietnam, of course, we did not win that war, and there were some 20,000 or so Americans in the three countries, Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, Americans who had been lost and never recovered.

As a result there was a strong movement led by the National League of Families of POW/MIA to demand accountability. Many in that movement believed that there were huge stores of U.S. remains that the Vietnamese had and were cynically withholding from us – warehouses full of remains, they believed. Others, kind of fringe people, believed that there were still live Americans being held in the jungles of Southeast Asia. As long as there were such powerful emotions churned up by these families, with whom everybody sympathized after all, the two governments couldn't make any progress on normalizing relations. During the 1980s, long before Washington and Hanoi were ready to do anything, President Regan sent his Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, General John Vessey, to Vietnam to begin a dialog on looking for at least the remains of our missing men. That effort took root. We were beginning to conduct joint operations for recovery of remains, not only in Vietnam but also in Cambodia and Laos. In exchange for that, which we had proposed to Vietnam as a purely humanitarian effort to address the suffering of family members in the U.S., the Vietnamese came back and said, "Well, we have humanitarian issues too. Our country was destroyed during the war. We don't have health facilities, and we're very poor." Thus the State Department was pressed into service to respond to Vietnam's humanitarian needs. The way that worked out, my predecessor as deputy director of EAP/VLC started this effort.

Q: Who was this?

HUHTALA: Michael Marine, our current ambassador to Vietnam. Anyway, he organized this effort to rally all the big American voluntary organizations, NGOs, and interested individuals to offer assistance to Vietnam. We worked with Treasury to simplify the process for getting licenses to give aid to Vietnam (necessary because the embargo was still in place) and then led delegations every year or so to meet with Vietnamese foreign ministry officials and describe to them what we were doing to fill our side of the equation. So that is the job that I inherited. I went with Michael the last time he went to Hanoi, right before I started on the job, in June of 1990, and saw how it worked. The President of the League of Families of POW/MIA, Ann Mills Griffiths, was also on the delegation. It was very clear what the quid pro quo was – our humanitarian assistance in exchange for their cooperation on recovery of remains. And many wonderful American organizations had stepped up to the plate with great generosity. We had veterans groups building clinics in Vietnam, Save the Children was very active there, and Operation Smile went to Vietnam regularly to perform operations on children with cleft palate. There was a lot to work with, actually.

Q: Also how about we had the Voluntary Departure Program dealing with boat people. How did that go?

HUHTALA: That had been going on all through the '80s actually, based out of Bangkok. This was a process whereby we were trying to effect family reunification for people whose families made it out as boat refugees, with Vietnam cooperating in the interviewing and credentialing of these people to come to the United States as refugees. This was a very long and drawn-out process. That had been our only link with Vietnam during all those years – first ODP and then POW/MIA work.

Q: When you got there in 1990 was there the feeling that okay, we're going to have relations, I mean you didn't feel that?

HUHTALA: No, there was more to it than that. There was interest on both sides in having diplomatic relations but I think both sides saw that there were huge obstacles, the largest being the POW/MIA issue, but also just a huge wall of mistrust on both sides. There were several things that happened. Vietnam had an Ambassador in New York accredited to the United Nations, so we had a channel for dialogue. One very important step was a congressional delegation that was put together of Vietnam vets in the congress. Senator John Kerry, Senator John McCain, Congressman John Rhodes, Congressman Tom Carper, and others (I can't remember all the names) -- about eight or ten members of the House and Senate travelled to Vietnam, the first Congressional group to do so since the war, to explore the possibility of having relations. They were well received, not lavishly but seriously. That kind of broke the ice. Then they came back and Senator Patrick Leahy put into law a provision whereby we could offer humanitarian assistance to victims of war, specifically prosthetics, in Vietnam and other countries. There was a huge need in Vietnam for prosthetics and assistance to adults children who were war victims, and Leahy set aside about a million dollars a year for Vietnam. That was a very positive step on the part of the United States government. Then Kerry and McCain created a Special Select Committee on Prisoners of War in Southeast Asia to investigate the reports of live POWs and withheld remains in Vietnam. It was a very big deal, highly publicized, it went on for half a year or more. The Committee interviewed everybody and anybody who had anything to say on this issue, including the people who believed in the tiger cages and people who believed in the warehouse full of remains. The State Department was tasked to provide boxes and boxes of documents on the issue, including years' worth of telegrams that we had to declassify and send over. We did, we just emptied out our archives. They went through every piece of paper and heard all kinds of testimony. At the end of this period, that Select Committee was able to declare that there was no reasonable evidence for any existing prisoners still being held in Southeast Asia and Vietnam was making (I don't remember the exact terminology) good faith efforts to help us find the remains, including the many, many joint recovery missions in which they had cooperated very well with us.

So because all this was happening, in the spring of 1992, the Administration – State, Defense, the National Security Council – together with the director of the League of Families, hammered out a road map to normalization of relations with Vietnam. By hammered out, I mean they were in the office of EAP/VLC till ten o'clock p.m. the night before the road map was presented to the Vietnamese Ambassador to the UN. It was the craziest document I had ever seen. It was quickly leaked by the Vietnamese so it's out there, it is public knowledge. It had four phases and each phase was very heavily weighted toward action on their part. For instance, in stage one, it said Vietnam shall do the following: open up their archives, conduct a large number of joint recovery activities, persuade the Cambodian government to sign the peace agreement calling for a United Nations peacekeeping force, and persuade Cambodia and Laos to cooperate in tri-lateral talks with us. In other words, these were huge things. If they did all of that then America would allow direct phone links with Vietnam. Then in phase two there was another long list of very difficult things for Vietnam to do in exchange for which we would allow American businesses to set up offices in Vietnam. Finally in phase three, we would stop voting against them in international financial institutions like the World Bank, and finally in phase four we would lift the embargo, establish liaison offices in each other's capitals and begin to normalize. I believe the opponents of moving forward were convinced we would never get past phase one or two. The Vietnamese, I think, swallowed hard and did all the things that were on the list for them to do. (By this time I had moved on to my next assignment. It was in 1994 that we had to lift the embargo, despite the political difficulties that created in Washington. In 1995 we established diplomatic relations with Vietnam.)

Q: While you were there were you running into sort of the bone trade in Thailand? I've talked to people who'd been involved particularly in Thailand but I mean there was a whole culture of swindlers essentially who were.

HUHTALA: Dog tags coming in. We had an office in the embassy in Bangkok that was devoted exclusively to that, just sifting through all this information. Eventually when they had our missions open in Vietnam they still get dog tags. People thought that if they presented a set of dog tags to the American authorities, they would get a reward or a visa. Unfortunately, many of them were faked, and in any case dog tags alone don't establish anything about the fate of a missing soldier.

Q: You still see the South Vietnamese flag flying here. Did you in your dealing with the League of Families and all, there must have been some people who were almost fanatics on the thing. Something like this, no rational explanation or logic will sway them.

HUHTALA: You have to feel sorry for these people because it is very traumatic to have lost your father, your brother, your son and never know what happened. This is really, really hard. So I always tried to keep that in mind. But some of them were just implacably refusing to ever agree to normalizing with Vietnam. We can't trust them they would say, we can't believe anything they say, don't give them an inch, they'll take a mile, we should never normalize. That's crazy. That just doesn't make sense. We normalized with Germany and with Japan after World War II. At some point you have to put it behind you for the sake of national interests. Some of those people I believe to this day are not prepared to see that happen. There was just a huge amount of emotion even as, through all this time, we were getting increasingly sophisticated forensic methods.

Q: DNA was really beginning to come on line.

HUHTALA: The U.S. Army has a Central Investigation Laboratory in Hawaii, CILHI. I visited it several times. It's fascinating what they can do. Even now they are getting 50-year old sets of remains out of Korea and identifying them using mitochondrial DNA. But if you're a family member and your loved one has been lost for 20 years in Vietnam and the Army gives you remains that they say they've positively identified but it's just a tooth or a finger bone, for example, that's not very satisfying emotionally. It's hard. It's just hard.

Q: Could you talk a bit about what you did, let's say we're coming up with the four points in that treaty, what was our role, your role?

HUHTALA: This was the most demanding job I had had up to that point. As deputy director I had to run the office, I had to make sure, that the three or four desk officers and two secretaries were working efficiently, make sure the work flow was proceeding as it should, make sure that papers for the Assistant Secretary or higher levels were tasked on time, and they had to be letter perfect. Unfortunately, I'd be kicking them back to the officers all the time for revisions. There was a huge amount of paperwork coming up because there was a lot of work to be done in supporting the Cambodian peace process which our assistant secretary, Richard Solomon was deeply involved in. The Secretary of State went to Paris with it for the signing of the treaty, as I mentioned. Then as the Vietnam normalization process came on line there was an increasing number of policy papers and decision memos to be worked. There was all of that mechanical stuff, plus a lot of dealings with the League of Families, and with Vietnamese diplomats coming through. Then I kept in touch with all of these charitable organizations and I travelled to Vietnam maybe two times a year to keep that process going. I also did a lot of public speaking, particularly to Vietnamese-American groups, most of whom were implacably opposed to normalization. A lot of them were former refugees, and they'd be flying the old Saigon flag in their hall, though I wouldn't go in there until they took it down.

Q: About once a week I go eat at the Eden Center here in Arlington and the South Vietnamese flag is everywhere, in fact a big one flying, there it is. It will be a cool day in hell before they put up the flag of the Republic of Vietnam.

HUHTALA: I imagine they never will. As a U.S. government representative I couldn't be there endorsing that. We had to draw a line, absolutely. All in all, it was really an exhausting job with very long hours, but oh man, I learned so much. It was great.

Q: The Vietnamese groups, will they listen to you really or?

HUHTALA: Yes, they would. These were the more responsible groups obviously. There were some sterling examples of people who'd come here with nothing but the clothes on their back and they'd become wealthy businessmen and made a life here. They wanted to have U.S. policy explained to them and they wanted to have a say in the shaping of it, in the best American tradition.

Q: Was there a push on their part to say, okay this is over we want to be able to go back and see our family?

HUHTALA: Some of them did.

Q: And be safe.

HUHTALA: And make money. There are huge riches potentially available for our large population of overseas Vietnamese in this country. Many do go back every year. Others didn't want us to ever talk to those dirty commies. Most people I met were somewhere in between.

Q: Were you getting any feel for what was going on in Vietnam at the time?

HUHTALA: Some. We had our ODP (Orderly Departure Program) people going in to interviews potential refugees. And there were all these NGOs travelling in and out. I was in frequent contact with them. There were left-wing political groups that were militating for the restoration of ties, that kind of thing. There were educational exchanges beginning. So we were beginning to get a good sense of what it was like inside Vietnam; it wasn't a mystery or closed off or anything.

Q: Did you have much contact with Vietnamese officials?

HUHTALA: Sometimes when they came down from New York to Washington for talks, and of course when I went to Hanoi.

Q: We weren't under the restraints that we had with something at one point with the PLO, Palestine Liberation or Cubans. Could you talk to the Vietnamese officials sort of openly?

HUHTALA: At that time, during those two years, it was still relatively constrained. In their official role it had to be arranged in advance. One thing that was really helpful was while I was in that job there was a Vietnamese Foreign Ministry official who came on a six-month program with SAIS. His name was Le Van Bang and he was just there as a student. We knew he was a Vietnamese diplomat, he was their Western Hemisphere guy. He'd been an expert on Cuba and now he was being retrained to be an expert on America. During his time as a student some of us got to know him in a non-official way. I once invited him to an office party at my house. He remembers it to this day because he eventually, years later, became their first ambassador to Washington. Now he is a vice foreign minister in Hanoi and the leading proponent of continuing to improve relations with United States. I really think that six months period was seminal in bringing him around, and his influence has been far-reaching.

Q: Was it difficult for him to get our approval as well as.

HUHTALA: No, we were giving visas at that point in the early '90s, particularly for educational exchange programs like those of the IIE.

Q: International Educational Exchange?

HUHTALA: Yes, and the Ford Foundation. They were bringing select Vietnamese over to this country as they do in China and in other places. It was so helpful because it was beginning to break down these walls of misunderstanding and ignorance, the mutual flaws that existed.

Q: Sort of looking at Vietnam at the time did we see, you know the Soviet Union was imploding, did we see sort of the communist glue beginning to lose its effectiveness or something in Vietnam?

HUHTALA: Oh gosh. The Vietnamese Communist Party was still pretty much a Leninist organization, very highly controlled, very hierarchical. As an Asia hand, I also quickly perceived the Confucian nature of the society and the strong continuity between Vietnam and China and Vietnam and Southeast Asia. Am I making myself clear? It still had the formal structure of a Leninist party and everything.

Q: Were we looking and sort of comparing the political situation in Vietnam with the last years of the Soviet Union saying okay the party in Vietnam is maybe got two or three decades and then it will go?

HUHTALA: No, I don't think we were making that leap. We were very interested when the Russians withdrew from Cam Ranh Bay and it became open again. It's a beautiful port. We've still not really gone and taken advantage of it. I think what really good observers were doing was comparing Vietnam with China. China, in 1990, had had 12 years of opening up, which was beginning already to transform the country and make it more economically successful. There they were already facing the contradictions of trying to open up economically and not open politically. We saw that Vietnam was beginning to go down that same path. I still think that's a more apt comparison really than with Russia.

Q: How did you see relations with China at the time?

HUHTALA: We had normalized by then. In fact we had been, we normalized at the end of the '70s. We had all those embassies and all those posts. We were still negotiating some very difficult trade issues for instance and human rights was becoming a big item on the agenda with China. Basically I think we were watching this transformation, unsure whether it was going to really hold and what was going to happen. The coastal cities were developing very, very fast, while the hinterland was very backward.

Q: Did we see China and Vietnam as being essentially antagonistic towards each other?

HUHTALA: They'd had a border war and that was in --

Q: The '80s wasn't it, no that was fairly close after we left, in the late '70s.

HUHTALA: No, Vietnam invaded Cambodia in '79 and then I think it was maybe '79 or '80 they had a border war. They had a thriving business trade back and forth. If you went into the markets in Hanoi back then, in 1990, they were full of plastic products and things like that from China. The architecture of northern Vietnam reminded me forcefully of southern China. The way the houses were shaped and everything, it looked so much like Guangdong Province and that region there, but also with beautiful French architecture. Really, it's a pretty city. It's got huge lakes in the middle of it, an interesting architectural blend.

Q: Cambodia, did that take a little of your time?

HUHTALA: It did also. Let me just add, before we leave Vietnam, a couple of things I was involved in especially the last year, were deliberate preparations for the day when normalization would come. We went and visited the old Vietnamese Embassy on R Street in Washington. It was in a state of great disrepair and we realized we were going to have to give it back. So we instituted some expensive repairs. It was one of those beautiful, old big houses. Then on one of my trips to Hanoi I was charged with trying to find where our old consulate had been in 1954 when we left Hanoi. There had been a little cultural center there too; I was able to locate both those properties. We were preparing for a very complicated property negotiation that would be part of the normalization process. Then I got down to Ho Chi Minh (Saigon), and saw the old embassy there and some of the compounds. The other thing I was doing was arranging for the first FSOs to come through Vietnamese training in FSI who were not for the ODP program; in other words people to go and be future political and economic officers in Hanoi. The language program here was very small and it was all southern Vietnamese, all the text books and the teachers, all using the southern dialect – not at all appropriate for people who'd be assigned to Hanoi. So we worked very closely with FSI and they found a northerner to come and be an instructor.

G. EUGENE MARTIN
Consul General
Guangzhou, China (1992-1996)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University. Mr. Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: What about Vietnam? While you were there, you would have been covering that border?

MARTIN: Yes, Guangxi Province was in my consular district. Relations were pretty frozen most of the time I was there. The legacy of the '77 war with Vietnam continued. It was still very icy. One of my favorite trips was going to the border of Guangxi Province and Vietnam, and visiting the Qing Dynasty era Friendship Gate, a very elaborate multistoried tower similar to those along the Great Wall, in the middle of Friendship Pass, a traditional trading route. The gate, particularly from the Vietnamese side, was riddled with bullet holes, absolutely pockmarked. And I thought this was an appropriate symbol of the state of Sino-Vietnamese friendship at that point. The Vietnamese had fired on it from their vantage points on higher ridges on their side of the border to prevent the PLA from using the pass to enter Vietnam. During my posting in Guangzhou, things did warm up enough for them to re-open the railway line that crossed the border into northern Vietnam. The problem was that Chinese and Vietnamese rail gauges were different. So they added a third rail so the train carriages could go to a border point where they were lifted up and transferred to a different width wheel unit. This is similar to what is done on the Mongolian border for trains entering the trans-Siberian railway system.

MARILYN GREENE
Reporter, USA Today
Washington, DC (1993-1996)

Ms. Greene was born and raised in New York State and was educated at Syracuse and Northwestern Universities. She also studied in France under the Junior Year Abroad program. In 1986 she joined Gannett World News Service and traveled with Al Neuharth on his worldwide JetCapade until 1989, when she joined the staff of USA Today as a reporter. Her first assignments included covering the White House and government Departments in Washington, DC. She later became foreign correspondent for the paper. Among her foreign assignments was the Gulf War, reporting from Saudi Arabia during the conflict and from Kuwait immediately after the War. In 1996 Ms. Greene joined the staff of the World Press Freedom Committee, serving as its Executive Director until 2003. Ms. Greene was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

GREENE: I was a reporter for USA Today until 1996. With another fellowship in there, in 1993. Back to Asia with a lot of writing and story-filing from Japan, China and Vietnam. I did a fair amount of reporting from Vietnam regarding the lifting of the embargo. Our willingness to lift the embargo was linked directly to Vietnam's cooperation in handing over information about POWs (Prisoners of War).

There was also the issue of our use of Agent Orange during the war, and the impact this had on Vietnamese civilians. I visited scientists who had jars in their labs filled with deformed fetuses that they attributed to Agent Orange.

Children resulting from the intermarriage of American soldiers and Vietnamese women posed another problem. These people, many of them, especially the children of black men and Vietnamese women, were often discarded and abandoned by their mothers and either not recognized or even known to their fathers. A lot of these kids ended up in orphanages with very sad lives. They were shunned by both Americans and Vietnamese. So there was a wealth of stories there in the aftermath of the Vietnam War.

Q: It's a very poignant situation there.

GREENE: It was. It was very touching. And then there was the political prisoner thing, too. Dr. Doan Viet Hoat, a dissenter, was in prison at that time. I visited his wife in Ho Chi Minh City. She took me around on the back of her little motorcycle to visit various other families who were involved in the effort get political prisoners freed. Dr. Hoat finally did get free, and he came to the United States and now lives in Virginia. He became quite a spokesman for free speech, and I think our stories helped to bring attention to that issue. Later on, the World Press Freedom Committee invited him to become a member of our executive committee.

Q: Well, on the issue of prisoners of war and not being released, I mean at one point this was a very political issue. In fact, the president, presidential candidates, Ross Perot made quite a point of this.

GREENE: Yes. Yes.

Q: It never made an awful lot of sense.

GREENE: Well, I don't think they ever came up with a definitive resolution of questions about POWs remaining in Vietnam.

Q: You know, there are still people who think that somewhere there's a prison full of Americans who don't know the war is over.

But it was very, very political.

GREENE: Yes.

Q: Did you run across people trying to prove their point to you?

GREENE: Well, mostly I heard about what happened to people, where the remains were. There was a major dig by the U.S. military while I was there. In one area they had found some remains and the remnants of an airplane that had crashed. They wanted information about what happened to these people. And I'm not sure that was ever satisfactorily resolved. It was presented as kind of a scandal. And I'm sure, you know, there were some situations in which that was the case. But I'm not sure to what extent.

Q: Yeah. It seemed that the awful thing was that -- I mean there were people, particularly in the right wing of the political spectrum in the States, desperately wanted to prove that the Vietnamese had stables of American prisoners, which they would go out sometime, and the Vietnamese -- the main thing they were doing was identifying the dead.

GREENE: That's right. And there were a lot of identifications made. And that partially satisfied the question. Still, it was a messy ending to the whole thing.

Q: How did you find traveling around Vietnam?

GREENE: It was lovely. It's a beautiful country. I traveled the whole length of it, visiting a lot of old war sites and talking with people who had worked with the Americans, or not.

There was a war museum in Hanoi that purported to show all the atrocities that Americans had committed, which was kind of interesting. And then, you know, the north/south divide was still pretty evident in terms of people's attitudes.

Q: Did you have any problem with the Vietnamese authorities?

GREENE: Yes. I wanted to see Dr. Hoat, and they told me they didn't know where he was. "Dr. Who?" And when Mrs. Hoat was driving me around she took circuitous routes because she was certain we were being followed.

I also attempted to visit another imprisoned dissident, Dr. Nguyen Dan Que, an endocrinologist and pro-democracy advocate. Dr. Que has spent more than 20 years in jail since 1978, and is imprisoned right now for advocating human rights in Vietnam. But the authorities stonewalled me on that, too, and they weren't particularly polite about it. They just pretended or asserted that I didn't know what I was talking about.

Q: How did you find the prisons? Did you go to the prisons?

GREENE: Well, of course I want to Hỏa Lò prison -- the "Hanoi Hilton" -- where John McCain was held prisoner for more than five years after he was shot down in 1967.

By then, of course, it was an empty building. And no, I was not allowed to go to any active prisons, and authorities denied that they even existed.

Q: Were people coming up to you and whispering, "Go see this," or "Go see that?"

GREENE: The people who were in that little dissident community were doing this, but generally speaking people were just interested in making money. The big issue while I was there was, "Please lift the embargo, we need your business." There were people selling t-shirts that said, "Lift your embargo," and it finally was lifted in February 1994. The people were interested mostly in economic issues. This is not surprising, as most Vietnamese alive today were not even born at the time of the war. The median age is now around 28. They were really wildly interested in making money. There was a lot of activity going on with businesses and so on.

Q: Well, really when one thinks about the whole situation, I mean here we are, enemies at not necessarily swords-point, but then all of a sudden the name had changed and they're out to prove something to us and we're out to prove something else.

GREENE: Right. And I guess you know Terry Anderson and some of the other people who had been prisoners or soldiers during the war fought very hard to get that embargo lifted. Louis Puller, Jr. was one of them. Also former Navy Secretary James Webb, who was a combat Marine during the war, and James Kimsey, co-founder of AOL. But there was a really strong and active community working toward reconciliation with the Vietnamese. And Admiral Elmo Zumwalt, the man who ordered the use of the defoliant Agent Orange and whose son died of exposure to it, advocated reconciliation and assistance to victims.

Q: Did you get any chance to cover any Americans who chose to stay behind?

GREENE: Yes. I met and interviewed George Esper, the tenacious Associated Press correspondent who covered the war and declined the opportunity to leave Vietnam in the final evacuation. Although he had been back to the U.S. in the meantime, he was in Hanoi as AP bureau chief when I met him and heard his stories about the final days of the war. [Esper died in February 2012].

Q: Were they beginning to talk about having diplomatic relations at the time?

GREENE: Well, that was something I covered on this end. At that time, they only had an ambassador to the United Nations, Le Van Bang. And yes, diplomatic relations was very much a topic. Vietnam wanted to establish diplomatic relations and eventually that happen, and Le Van Bang did become the first post-war ambassador. And I think that was a very positive step.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the Vietnamese who were dealing with us knew which buttons to push, and we didn't know which buttons to push on the American side?

GREENE: Probably. I think on our side we were dealing mainly with the domestic view of the war and its aftermath and people. The families who were still wondering what happened to their loved ones or who were bitter about the fact that we had been there at all. So on our side, there was a lot of domestic opinion to deal with. And on the Vietnamese side, I think everybody wanted to be friends with the Americans, no matter which side they'd been on in the war. They wanted to finally have it just be over, and to move beyond that horrible time.

You were stationed there for some time, weren't you?

Q: Well, I was there. But the war was going on. I was there in the early 70s.

GREENE: That must have been a really tough time for you.

Q: Well, not really -- I mean things were essentially winding down. We were pulling a lot of troops out.

GREENE: Were there a lot of Vietnamese coming to the consulate trying to get out?

Q: A number, yes. But we didn't have huge lines. That came later on. But it's hard to sort those times out, I think, for all of us at the time. I thought that Vietnam was -- it was before they really started to unravel and I thought it would hold on. And it didn't.

DENNIS G. HARTER
Director, Office of Laos, Vietnam and Cambodian Affairs
Washington, DC (1994-1996)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Hanoi (1997-2001)

Mr. Harter was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Georgetown University, Seton Hall and American University. He joined the State Department in 1966 and was assigned to the CORDS program of USAID in Vietnam. He subsequently studied Chinese and served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guangzhou, and Hanoi, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission (1997-2001). In his Washington assignments Mr. Harter dealt primarily with East Asian matters. He also served as Director of the State Department's Press Office in Washington and as State's Representative to the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle. Mr. Harter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: This is the 21st of July, 2004. Dennis, where were you? Still in Washington?

HARTER: Yes. I'm still head of the Office of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia Affairs. At this point, beginning actually with the fall of 1995, after an EAP Bureau reorganization, Burma and Thailand desks were added to the office, but in the early part of 1995, we were Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia (VLC). Normalization with Vietnam is on the table.

The Administration had decided to normalize relations with Vietnam but to do so in incremental steps rather than all at once. So as to minimize any potential opposition to this process, the strategy was to precede each step with a demonstration of improved cooperation on POW/MIA issues by the Vietnamese. The first formal step in this process was the establishment of Liaison Offices in Hanoi and Washington. Some months before opening the Liaison Office in Hanoi, we assigned some young Foreign Service officers to work in the U.S. MIA Office so they would assist us in getting the whole office opening process concluded more rapidly. But on one occasion, I think the folks in EAP went overboard in trying to keep things moving incrementally. When we established the Liaison Office in January 1995, I went to Hanoi to represent the Department for the opening of our new office facility. But then Jim Hall told me he had instructions from Peter Tomsen in EAP not to hoist the U.S. flag once we had completed our exchange with the Vietnamese. I called Peter and argued that this made no sense but he said "people" (not named) were concerned about the press coverage of the flag raising. I said the press who were there to cover the Liaison Office opening would be even more puzzled and were likely to write speculative stories if we did not raise the flag. I couldn't convince him and so we had our exchange with the Vietnamese and just entered the building. Shortly thereafter, I went to the airport and returned to Washington. The day after I left, Jim Hall went ahead and raised the flag and there was no apparent press concern about the event or the delay.

After the Liaison Office was opened, we assembled another DPMO team to talk to the Vietnamese on the MIA issue. This one was headed by Deputy Secretary for Veterans Affairs Hershel Gober who had also been actively working with us on the MIA issue and had helped build support within the various veterans' organizations. The delegation included key members of the VFW, the American Legion, and the League of Families. I accompanied the delegation for this trip and was expected to write the trip report. This trip report was to be the formal presentation of the Administration's argument to normalize relations with Vietnam. Once again, the chief audience was the Congress, but we also intended this report to be used with the veterans organizations and the public. The report concluded that we continued to make progress on accounting as the result of enhanced Vietnamese cooperation and that it was therefore appropriate to move forward to normalize relations. When we opened the Liaison Office, we wanted to demonstrate to the Vietnamese that we were indeed moving the process forward toward normalizing relations and my predecessor in the Office of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia Affairs, Jim Hall, was sent over to open up the Liaison Office in Hanoi in January 1995 and to manage operational activities until we could normalize relations. We augmented the small team of young Foreign Service officers with some administrative people who were sent to try to locate appropriate office facilities. Chris Runckle, the administrative coordinator for the APEC meeting in Seattle, had been lobbying for this position and he was assigned there. Chris located a recently constructed office building outside the old center of town which appeared to be the only reasonably modern facility that would meet our needs as a start-up facility.

As we were presenting our report on MIA progress to the Hill, the Administration was reviewing the next phase of the normalization process. The debate was over how we would open our embassy. The White House remained cautious and the Department was told to put together a memorandum proposing the establishment of diplomatic relations with the naming of a Chargé d'Affaires to head the Embassy. The White House believed that if we made it clear we were going to open the mission with a Chargé then the Vietnamese would do the same, not wanting to have sent a higher level official to the U.S. than we had sent there. This, they figured, would permit the U.S. to take an additional incremental step – and simultaneously show more MIA progress – and then move ahead to naming an Ambassador. So, even though we had now reached our objective of normalizing relations, the Administration wanted one more reassurance and our process continued to move forward at a snail's pace.

After the President approved the memo to establish diplomatic relations, he invited a large number of dignitaries to the White House for the formal announcement of the establishment of diplomatic relations on July 11, 1995. I was very pleased to be there to see the process finally concluded and to be part of what was clearly an historic change from our period of hostility with the Vietnamese during the war. All of the key players who had been involved in the process from the Congress, the Veterans Affairs Department, the Defense Department, the veterans and families organizations were invited and everyone was very positive about the announcement. Days passed and the newspaper commentary was also favorable and the public reaction was blasé – no big deal, no big protests -- it was all simply another step in a process that the USG had dragged out for more than a year.

The State Department had already selected a candidate for Chargé, a career Foreign Service Officer, Desaix Anderson. Desaix had previously been the head of the VLC Office and was working in the EAP Front Office as the APEC Coordinator. The White House, after looking at the proposal did not raise any objections. Uncharacteristically, the White House had already been looking beyond the Chargé period to determine who would be named Ambassador later in the year, although they still had not revealed anything to the Department. So, for the interim, Desaix was named to go to Hanoi to be our first Chargé in the middle of 1995.

And so, once again we did at least demonstrate to the Vietnamese that establishment of diplomatic relations meant something more than our previous step of opening a Liaison Office. We didn't just continue business as usual with the person who had been there as Liaison Office Chief being given a new title. We sent out a more senior officer to go with the higher ranking title and responsibility. The Vietnamese, for their part sent their Ambassador from the UN Mission down to open up the Embassy in Washington. And, as expected, they gave him the title of Chargé D'Affaires and not Ambassador, matching our own designation in Hanoi. Now, there were a couple of really interesting little sidelights at this stage which deserve mention.

The first interesting issue was the Vietnamese declaration on the establishment of diplomatic relations with the United States. You look at the text of the statement from Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet and there's nothing in it that says the Vietnamese have established diplomatic relations by recognizing the Government of the United States. Absolutely nowhere is there any mention of it! Prime Minister Kiet mentions the fact that the U.S. recognizes Vietnam, but there is no corresponding concrete statement that says Vietnam had recognized the U.S. So, after I had read the statement a couple of times, I called up the Legal Advisor's Office (L) and talked to Jim Hergen who had been our liaison in L throughout this period. I asked him if he had looked at the text of the Vietnamese statement. He said, "No." I said, "Look at it and see what you can tell me." After a few minutes, he called back and said "They didn't say anything. They didn't establish diplomatic relations." I said, "That's exactly what I thought when I read it. But, everything is all set. The statements are out and everybody has just assumed that it's happened and we've both established relations. There's no way we walk this back without a lot of problems." I said, "What are we going to do?" and he didn't have any response. I then proposed I call the Vietnamese Ambassador and talk him through the Vietnamese statement as it came out from the Prime Minister's Office and get him to say that this means they've established diplomatic relations. And then I said, "will that suffice?" Jim thought for a moment and he said, "Yeah, but you'll have to write it up." I said, "OK, I'll write it up as soon as we finish the conversation." A few minutes later, without letting anyone else in EAP know what was happening, I called the Vietnamese Ambassador and we talked through the Prime Minister's statement. At the end of the discussion, I asked him, "Is this then what you consider as your formal establishment of diplomatic relations with the United States?" And when he said, "Yes," I thanked him and hung up without indicating anything further about why I had called. I then wrote up the telephone conversation and with Jim Hergen's assistance made sure it was appended to the State Department's collection of legal documents associated with the establishment of diplomatic relations with Vietnam which of course included both President Clinton's statement and Prime Minister Kiet's statement. Those papers are all part of the formal diplomatic record. And that's basically how we made the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and Vietnam "legal." Outside of Jim Hergen and I, I don't think anybody else ever knew at the time what we had to do to "complete" the normalization process.

Q: Did you ever get a feel for why this wording? Was this just a legal problem?

HARTER: No. I have no idea, I have no idea what the Vietnamese intended. No one on the Vietnamese side ever came back to me and said, "Oh, we forgot to mention establishing relations," or "no, that's the way we always do it." There was just no exchange back and forth. I figured we were better off once it was done to leave it alone. The last thing I wanted to do was get a contrary explanation or get an explanation to cast doubt on what I had already put on paper and sent to the files. What I found most intriguing is that nobody in the press ever asked about it. You know how the press usually goes over everything with a fine tooth comb. But, in this case, they just completely overlooked it.

Q: Well, this could have thrown it back to Congress.

HARTER: Absolutely, absolutely. There was just no point in trying to go any further with it. I thought that was really a rather amusing way for the issue of diplomatic relations to end after all the concerns about making sure we did things in such a methodical way.

Q: Less than amusing at the time.

HARTER: Oh yeah. There was a mild sort of panic on my part, because I was afraid it would all come apart. But it was one of these things that come up from time to time in diplomacy and you just have to figure a way to deal with it. And, as long as can pull it off and nobody really complains about it, then it's fine and nobody is ever the wiser.

Q: Did the Vietnamese Ambassador understand your problem and what he was doing?

HARTER: I don't know whether he did or not. I did not try to make it clear to him that I needed him to say this for a particular reason. I just sort of walked him through it as though I was clarifying the text for the record. We knew each other well enough at that point and I probably could have asked him directly. But it was one of these things where I didn't want to get a different answer from the one I was guiding him to say. Therefore, my thought was to keep it as simple as possible. Once I got him to say what I wanted, I just wanted to end the conversation and create the record and let it go. I never really did go back to him and ask him about it afterward. Maybe sometime in the future I will do so.

Q: Where was the problem coming from about putting in an Ambassador? I mean, once both countries recognize each other and exchange Ambassadors, it doesn't strike me that an Ambassador is a big deal.

HARTER: Well, it shouldn't be, but we've had problems doing this before. Burma was a case in point. The Congress got all head strong over Burma. After we nominated an Ambassador in 1990, he got agrément and had his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But, the Burmese pulled agrément over things he had said in his Senate hearings that were critical of the Burmese Government. After “punishing” the Burmese regime for a while by not naming another Ambassador, the Department tried to nominate another person and the Senate refused to consider an appointment because of Burma’s human rights record. We haven’t had an Ambassador in Burma since 1990. The whole issue of Tibet was an issue of contention during our recognition of the PRC and whether the United States was recognizing the integration of Tibet within the greater sphere of China.

From Congress’ perspective as long as Burma was controlled by a bunch of military thugs who refused to accept the results of a national election in 1990, then the bottom line was we’re not going to have anything to do with them. Even when various steps took place a few years later that suggested the military leaders were opening things up, there was no one in Congress willing to bite and allow the State Department to move forward. This policy was all dictated by a Congressional staffer whose wife happened to be from one of the minority tribes in Burma. He was the one who dictated the policy to block the sending of an Ambassador. Opposition to the Burmese military broadened out after that because of the regime’s repressive policies, but that’s how and where it all started. Obviously we deal diplomatically with a lot of regimes that are repressive and don’t represent the way we would like to see things handled, but we still manage to accredit Ambassadors to those countries anyway. Burma is the big exception.

While we’re talking about Burma here, I should note a story from the latter part of my time in Washington when the desk added Thailand and Burma to its portfolio. As often happens in the Department, there was an effort to cut down on staffing and EAP had to find some places to cut personnel. I was asked if I thought I could also manage to oversee Thailand and Burma affairs if the two offices were combined and I said yes. The Bureau cut the Office Director position from the Thai-Burma desk and moved the other two three officers there into our Vietnam Laos and Cambodia desk. I decided we needed to come up with a functional abbreviation for the group, like we had used VLC before. I didn’t want to put one group ahead of another so I decided to alphabetize the listings and so we became BCLTV – Burma Cambodia Laos Thailand and Vietnam.

While I was Office Director, I had the occasion to travel to the two new countries to meet with government leaders. The Thai visit was pretty straightforward and focused mostly on the state of our cooperative efforts to bring about a new government in Cambodia that represented the people but did not contain much influence from the Khmer Rouge or the Vietnamese. The Burma visit was another matter. As I said, we had not had an Ambassador in Rangoon, or Yangon as they now called it, since 1990. Our relations with the Burmese military were standoffish at best. And our chief focus was support for the 1990 elected government which the military had refused to permit to take office. The head of that group, the National League for Democracy, was Madame Aung San Suu Kyi, the daughter of the founder of Burma. She had been under house arrest for most of the time since the 1990 election and it was not often any Americans had a chance to meet with her. I had specifically requested an opportunity to meet with her but there was no agreement for me to do so before I reached Burma. I had a couple of meetings with senior people in the Foreign Ministry and one of their development focused ministries. Both were former military men who had been seconded to the ministries. After my first day in Rangoon, I was told that I had been given permission to meet with Aung San Suu Kyi at her residence. We talked for a couple of hours and I found her a very impressive and determined woman. I also came away from the meeting feeling that it was going to be very difficult to get any kind of accommodation between her and the ruling military. Her positions were as stubborn and uncompromising as theirs were. She articulated no give or signs of willingness to negotiate differences despite occasional comments to western media which suggested she would be willing to talk to the military about a restoration of democracy in Burma. Because her “image” was so positive in the U.S., I did not feel I would have much of an audience in the Department if I revealed my thoughts that her attitude might also be part of the problem of a “negotiated” or “compromise” solution for Burma’s move away from military domination. As a result, I did not put those kinds of comments in my written report on the trip, but I did try to convey my concerns about her uncompromising position in my talks with others in the Department. I don’t believe they had any impact, however, and there was never any sign I saw that Department officials were concerned that backing Aung San Suu Kyi likely meant a continuing stand-off between her and the military who ruled the country and little hope to bring about change.

The month after we established diplomatic relations, Secretary of State Warren Christopher went to Hanoi for the first visit of a Secretary of State to Vietnam since the war [August 5-7, 1995]. I accompanied him on the trip and we signed two sets of papers confirming the normalization of relations and announcing the opening of our embassies. At that point, we made clear to the Vietnamese we would be opening with a Chargé and that an Ambassador would not be named for several more months. By that time I’m sure the Vietnamese expected no different given our long history of small steps and there was no negative reaction from the Vietnamese side.

Anyway, once the whole step of normalization was out of the way, we then went through the mechanics of getting the Vietnamese established in Washington. I think I recounted back when I had been serving as the Deputy Director of Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia Affairs in the late 1970s, I had gone into the then vacant Vietnamese Embassy and discovered that it basically was in the same state it had been when the South Vietnamese diplomats walked out and closed the door behind them in 1975. There were a series of problems with the building thereafter with the electricity off, and the heat off, and the water off, and there were holes in the roof. Subsequently, we fixed it all up using frozen Vietnamese Government assets and the Department actually used the building for a period of time. I think the office was used by the refugee affairs people. The Vietnamese officials at the UN came down and they were looking at it and trying to determine how best to utilize the facility. We, of course wanted to be very particular about how we were going to handle the property issue. The Vietnamese had returned to us the property that we had in Hanoi – the old site of the U.S. Consulate, and we did get back the old Embassy property in Saigon and a number of other properties. This was all a very detailed and complicated negotiation process with the Vietnamese. The only property that they owned was the Embassy Chancellery over on R Street, NW, just off Massachusetts Avenue.

Q: Did they have a residence?

HARTER: They did not, no. So, that was the only thing they physically owned. And of course, they had bank accounts and some other assets. We talked about that before and how we resolved the issue of the money that the Vietnamese had. This time, FBO handled all the property discussions and I didn't get directly involved the way I was supposed to have been back in 1979.

Q: What about our embassy and all in Saigon? I know it turned in to the oil ministry or something.

HARTER: Right. There was a period of time after 1975 when the Vietnamese used the building as a government office building dealing with petroleum issues. But, it finally was abandoned by the Vietnamese, because they couldn't repair it. They couldn't repair the air conditioning system and the other US equipment in the building and so it basically sat there derelict for quite some time. When we looked at the various properties we had owned, some were clearly more desirable than others. The Vietnamese were willing to give us back all of the properties except for our Consul General's residence building in Hanoi which they had provided to the Polish Government. So we made a number of trades and exchanges and the Vietnamese owed us money for all the property we gave up. They paid us through the bilateral Claims and Assets settlement for the property we didn't want to keep. The Claims and Assets agreement was one of those other hurdles we overcame enroute to a normalization of relations. Our big advantage over a lot of other such negotiations was that we had more Vietnamese assets under our control than there were claims against those assets. Our negotiators were able to achieve the best ever claims settlement from the Vietnamese – better than 90 cents to the dollar – simply because the Vietnamese knew they were going to come out of the negotiations with money they didn't previously control. In the long run, it was better to agree to settle the American claims and end up with several tens of millions of dollars than to fuss and haggle over the amounts. The property transfers were all part of that process and we deducted the values of the property we didn't wish to keep in Vietnam from their assets before returning the remainder to Hanoi.

Q: Like our Consul General in Da Nang and things like that?

HARTER: Right, although that particular property and most of our consulate properties were leased and not ones we owned. There was also a property in Hue that we couldn't even find because it, along with a lot of nearby buildings, had been destroyed and the buildings had been reconstructed so that it was impossible to determine where our property had been on that street. So, there was no point in trying to do anything with that issue and that property went into the "sale" column. The people at FBO (Foreign Buildings Operations) were absolutely adamant, based on their experiences and dealing with other governments and particularly Communist governments, we had to be very, very firm about what we allowed the Vietnamese to have. We didn't want the Vietnamese to get all the property they needed for an embassy or a residence or whatever they thought they needed until we also felt we had an appropriate piece of property or a building we could use for the long term.

The Vietnamese looked at their old building in Washington and decided it wasn't adequate for a modern office facility. They thought it was too small and too cramped. They considered using it as an Ambassador's residence, but thought they might only use it occasionally, perhaps as a facility for guests or for entertainment programs. What they wanted was office space. So, FBO agreed to let them lease office space just as we had done some months earlier with the office building in Hanoi, though we actually bought the building as part of the property settlement. The Vietnamese accepted that arrangement and agreed to find us a site in Hanoi for a permanent embassy compound within two years. Well, believe me, the two years came and went in a heartbeat and nothing was ever agreed to. We looked at a number of locations, but we could never make up our minds. Thus, a prime downtown location disappeared into another investment project. When I got there a couple years later, I was able to locate a number of places for consideration. Ambassador Peterson also located a very large empty space. Up until the time I left Hanoi in 2002, we could not get FBO to agree that any of the places we found were acceptable and the Hanoi embassy was just not high enough on the Department's priority construction list to require a decision be made within a certain period of time.

Q: What was it that they just didn't get around to it or did they have --

HARTER: They had too many other things on their plate, number one. Number two, they are probably the least decisive group in the State Department I've ever worked with. Finally, they basically don't like anybody else getting involved in the property business. When it comes to property, they want to do everything. And, if you have some ideas, it's the devil to try and get them to listen to you, let alone ever to agree to anything you think makes sense.

Q: I remember back in 1960, they put up some staff housing in Dhahran. And, despite the fact we pointed out the porches of these things were pointed in the direction of the prevailing sand storms. They said, we know better. Of course, there was a big sand pile in front of everybody's door.

HARTER: Yeah. I've already recounted my experience as Consul General in Guangzhou, China where we lived and worked in a construction site. And, going to Hanoi I went through the exact same thing in the office tower we had acquired. There we had no other facilities to use and so we did work in the building while it was being remodeled and adapted to diplomatic use. Moreover, the house we selected as a DCM's residence was a combination of two houses that had to be reconnected. We did most of that work through the owner and FBO didn't get involved in the construction effort there. But there were a lot of construction problems that emerged after we moved in so that we still experienced more construction work around our living space. FBO did not have the DCM property on its radar screen at that time, but it was heavily involved in redoing the Ambassador's residence, one of the building we had acquired from the Vietnamese. It was an historic building that had once housed the Governor of Tonkin, the northernmost of France's three Vietnamese territories. I'm obviously not a big fan of FBO. If there's a way to avoid dealing with FBO during your Foreign Service career, it ought to be avoided. I'd recommend anyone think twice about taking an assignment where you're going to end up having to spend a lot of time working with FBO.

Anyway, the property issue was a critical one and we did not, either during the time I was in the office of Vietnam, Laos Cambodia Affairs or the time that I was in Hanoi, ever come to a satisfactory resolution of the issue. The one property the Ambassador found was really an ideal property, but the Vietnamese were reluctant to agree to this site. It was 25 hectares and much bigger than they had permitted any other countries to have for their missions. Moreover, the Vietnamese by that time were pushing governments interested in opening new facilities to move into a diplomatic enclave they planned to construct outside of town on the road to the airport. We had no interest in that option, nor did anyone else while I was in Hanoi. The property

Ambassador Peterson found would have been large enough where we could have built recreation facilities along with the embassy building as well as some buildings for apartments to house the embassy staff. Otherwise, we would remain at the mercy of a very expensive housing market and most of the property was in the hands of members of the Government and Party elite.

When I was in Hanoi, for example, my residence was running five or six thousand dollars a month. It was a very big residence, ideal for entertaining, and really very nice in that sense. But, it was out of the question to be paying that kind of rent. When my successor, a bachelor, arrived, they dropped my residence. He went into an apartment, a very nice and expansive apartment over-looking West Lake; his apartment was still in the forty-five hundred, five thousand dollar a month rental range.

The property the Ambassador found was a difficult issue for the Vietnamese and FBO wasn't all that crazy about it either. I don't recall their objections, but we all suspected it was because people at the Embassy found the property instead of it being located as the result of an FBO survey. The Ambassador really wanted to get FBO to make a commitment and the senior staff at the Embassy had been kicking him from one end of the post to the other about the problems we were having in the office building we were using. But FBO basically sat on their hands and didn't do much about the issue. That was one of the bilateral negotiating issues that continued to plague people during my time in Hanoi. And, I suspect, although I'm not absolutely certain, it's probably still an unresolved issue today, knowing how long it takes to get things done with FBO.

The assignment then of a Chargé went forward and Desaix Anderson went out and the process then of looking for a new Ambassador was moved up to the forefront. The Department wanted to elevate Desaix, but that was not in the cards. By the fall of 1995, it was very clear that Pete Peterson was the Administration's choice for Ambassador. He was a loyal Democrat, member of Congress from Florida; he'd been a POW for six and a half years; he had a good relationship with other Vietnam veterans like Senator Kerry and Senator McCain and he had good relations with some of the more conservative members who were opponents, like Randy Cunningham. Peterson got along with all of them. He also worked reasonably well with Ann Mills Griffiths and the others among the veterans who were not supportive of normalization. But, he clearly supported normalization and was active on the Hill in tamping down criticism and misconceptions on the part of some of his fellow lawmakers. Peterson's choice was popular with most everyone. Once people met him and had a chance to talk to him they thought he was a good candidate for the job. From a Department perspective, if we were going to get a political appointee, this guy was OK. From the State Department's perspective we would have liked to see a career person like Desaix go there, because there were still a lot of tricky issues to handle. But, Peterson was a sensible, pragmatic fellow and the EAP folks, myself included decided he'd likely do OK. Well, as we talked through the process and the timing, the goal was to get Peterson to Hanoi as early as possible in 1996 and certainly no later than the spring, or early summer of 1996. Then, our idea was to follow his arrival by announcing the opening of the Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City toward the latter part of 1996, from September or October to the end of the year.

I went over this timing sequence with Peterson and he agreed the timing made sense. For some time, I had been meeting with him as we proceeded with the final steps for normalization and afterward we would provide him with material to prepare for his nomination hearings or we'd talk about plans for mission activities. I guess he felt comfortable with my background and work style and he asked me to be his DCM. I told him I would like that. However, based on the assignments schedule, I knew it would be possible for Jim Hall to stay in Hanoi until the early part of 1997. I was scheduled to finish in VLC during the summer of 1996 so I told Peterson I wanted to go to open the Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City first. My thought was that Jim could help bridge the transition in Hanoi while I set up the new Consulate General and put that in operation. Then, when Jim departed in January or February of 1997, I would go up to Hanoi as Peterson's DCM. Peterson thought that made sense assuming the State Department agreed it could be done. I got EAP/EX on board and they convinced PER that it made sense based on the timing sequence we had worked out for Peterson's nomination/confirmation and the opening of the Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City.

The next step was to get Peterson's nomination on the docket. As his name got floated for nomination on the Hill, somebody with an interest in the Constitution raised a question about whether Peterson as a seated member of Congress could be nominated to be an Ambassador when we've just established relations with the country? The question was posed in connection with Article 1, Section 6 and Article 2, Section 2 of the Constitution. In simple terms, the former says no member of Congress can be appointed to a position he had helped to create while the latter refers to the President's authority to appoint Ambassadors and other high officials. A legal opinion was requested of the Justice Department. I assumed this would be a brief formality and expected no problems. However, after a brief review, the Justice Department concluded the President could not appoint Peterson because he was still a member of Congress and he can't be seen as being appointed to a position that he helped to create." I immediately turned to our Legal Office and Jim Hergen and queried how the Justice Department could reach such a conclusion. What exactly did Justice think was Peterson's role in creating this position?

Q: He was at the Senate.

HARTER: No, he was in the House. Secondly, I argued, this isn't a new position; we've had Ambassadors in Vietnam before. Who did they think Ambassador Bunker was working with except the Vietnamese? I argued further there was never a one Vietnam or a two Vietnam issue involved here. Just because Bunker dealt with South Vietnamese, he was still the Ambassador to the Vietnam we recognized. I brought up the 1954 Geneva Accords, where one Vietnam was temporarily divided in half with subsequent elections to be held to reunify the country. When the elections didn't happen, countries around the world generally recognized one or the other of the Governments that were established in Saigon and Hanoi. But, they all were dealing with Vietnam. I said, "This is a crazy argument it makes no sense." But, Jim Hergen couldn't get the Legal Office to budge because it was unwilling to challenge the Justice Department ruling. I was still upset and took the issue to other offices in the Department, but I struck out with all of them. EAP, Congressional Relations, and the Secretary's office all concluded that we had achieved our objective by normalizing relations and if it took another year before Pete Peterson could become an Ambassador and go to Vietnam so be it. Even though it made no legal sense in terms of our history of Vietnam relations, nobody would challenge the Justice Department. But that decision turned the whole schedule of our next steps upside down and it prevented Congressman Peterson from being named as Ambassador to Vietnam until after his Congressional term ended in January 1997. That was the second of the unusual circumstances which arose with our normalization of relations with Vietnam.

Q: Well now does the White House, I would have thought the White House would have been interested?

HARTER: They didn't care either. They didn't care because we had normalized relations, and that was the objective. For the White House, the issue was over, it was done with, the rest of the arrangements were just paperwork. The White House didn't care. I said earlier, Tony Lake was ambivalent about the whole idea and for Clinton the goal had been achieved. So that ended it.

From the desk's perspective, however, the whole timetable was now off schedule. We couldn't propose opening the Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City without having an Ambassador in place. So, the whole process just drifted. We continued to send people to staff up the office in Hanoi. Since this had been an operation that had been planned for some time, we also had people in the pipeline scheduled to go to Ho Chi Minh City. They were learning Vietnamese or they were in consular training or some other training at FSI. Because we had no office in Ho Chi Minh City, we added them to the staff in Hanoi. Some we lost to other assignments. Those who went to Hanoi didn't have regular assignments or work there so they helped out where they could.

Ambassador Peterson had his hearings and there were no problems on the Hill and he went to Hanoi in the spring of 1997. But, I was also off schedule. I'd finished my two-year assignment as Office Director in the summer of 1996 and Jim Hall was still in Hanoi. So, I was put in Vietnamese language refresher training. Peterson was also there to learn some basic Vietnamese and so we continued to see each other regularly. In the spring of 1997 before he left for Hanoi, Ambassador Peterson told me he didn't think it made any sense for me to go to Ho Chi Minh City. Even if we could open Ho Chi Minh City immediately in the summer, it meant he would be without a DCM for several months and he did not want to do that. He concluded we were going to have to recruit somebody else for that position and that I should plan to go directly to Hanoi. As you well know, the assignments cycle is usually pretty much finished in the first couple of months of the year with everyone moving during the summer months. So, we had to go to PER and try to find out if anyone was available.

PER came up with an officer who had served in Vietnam in the military during the war. He had completed a military career of 20 odd years and retired as a Major. He then joined the State Department and had done ADMIN work, and had a decent ADMIN record. In his most recent assignment, he'd been a DCM in Africa. The Ambassador interviewed him and concluded his Vietnam service background and his service in Korea at least gave him an Asia connection and there was just nobody else even close to that. And that's how we got Charlie Ray assigned to Ho Chi Minh City. He's currently our Ambassador in Cambodia.

The person who was supposed to be the Deputy CG in Ho Chi Minh City was already in Hanoi so we knew we had a little bit of lead time before we dropped him in Vietnam. Thus we arranged to have Charlie start some Vietnamese language training at FSI in the interim. We figured that once we were able to open the Consulate General we could move the people who were over-complement in Hanoi down there and let the Deputy keep things running on the ground until Charlie had some basic Vietnamese to work with. The Ambassador ended up with a gap at the DCM slot after all, because Jim Hall left earlier than planned and I didn't arrive until late summer. We were still not ready to send people to Ho Chi Minh City and the Ambassador made it clear he still expected me to oversee and manage the set up of the new office. I should point out that opening up the office in Ho Chi Minh City was another of these low-budget/no-budget operations because we really didn't have a functional building to put all these people in. Under the Orderly Departure Program, we had been doing resettlement/immigration interviews for the previous few years in a small building complex that had been part of our pre-1975 property in Ho Chi Minh City. I think it may have been USIA property at one time, but I'm not absolutely sure. This became the hub for our new Consulate General operation and we slowly shoe-horned several more people into an already crowded space while we again went back to FBO --

Q: Did they have the old embassy or not?

HARTER: Oh, yes, the old embassy and its property had been returned to us as part of the property settlement. But, as I said earlier, the old building was in terrible condition and we had long ago decided it was bad symbol to plan on refurbishing it. It would have cost more to try and rebuild it than it would be to tear it all down and start all over again. So, that decision, strangely enough didn't create a great deal of patriotic fervor. Still, whenever we had visitors to Hanoi who intended to stop in Ho Chi Minh City they would invariably ask about the old embassy in the south. The official visitors would come to the Embassy in Hanoi and during their briefings they'd always ask to see the old embassy when they went south.

This was one time when we had some priority attention in the Department for our building needs and EAP was able to get FBO committed to the construction of a new building. But at this time, there was a new wrinkle, FBO claimed they couldn't provide us with all the money needed to set up a classified facility and they proposed we start with an unclassified mission. This had come up some time before, while I was still in Washington, and I argued we should not get into that two-step process. I had already seen how poorly it worked in China in some of the Consulates we opened and I didn't want to see that replicated in Vietnam. Just from a security standpoint, it meant we would be compromising a great deal and I knew as a reporting officer people were going to try to bend the rules. They'd be anxious to get some information reported and they'd say the subject was unclassified just so they could send it directly without having to wait and take a flight to Hanoi and prepare the message there in proper facilities several days later. Moreover, the Department had stopped using the "limited official use" message category so you either said something was unclassified or at a minimum confidential. I thought I had won the argument against the unclassified operation while I was still on the desk, but whatever I thought had been agreed was revisited once we got closer to the actual planning. The Ambassador was talked into the whole idea by our EAP Executive Office and FBO. They guaranteed the new building would be constructed in such a way that we could add a classified floor on top of the new building once there were adequate funds and more people available to be sent to Ho Chi Minh City. So, in addition to having to work in the Hanoi office while remodeling operations were underway, I soon found it necessary to visit the construction site in Ho Chi Minh City from time to time to ensure everything there was on track.

As we were getting the Embassy running, Ambassador Peterson and I discussed how we were likely to be getting a steady stream of visitors seeking to reconnect with the war-time experience and that there was a lot of potential for changing the American mindset about Vietnam. We knew there would be a lot of veterans coming back, official visitors wanting to see what we had just done with normalization of relations, and that over time we would be getting Vietnamese Americans returning to do business, visit relatives, seek connections to what they had lost two decades earlier. These latter groups could end up becoming problems if they could not cope or deal appropriately with the changed circumstances. We decided the best way to handle this was to have a completely open door for dialogue with anyone coming to Hanoi who wanted to stop by and talk to us. Our goal was to bridge that two decade gap with a solid dose of practical discussions about what we and the new relationship were all about. Having a former POW as the Ambassador made just the right image for that sort of dialogue and outreach. Anybody who wanted to talk to us, we'd talk to them. Anybody who wrote and requested a meeting or a briefing, we'd set it up for them. He would meet them or I would meet them and sometimes we'd do it together. We established a country team briefing package that was available to official visitors, providing presentations by all the mission elements. We also decided to be pro-active and go back to the U.S. on a more or less regular schedule a couple of times each year to meet with groups there and discuss our new Vietnam operations. During the two years I was on the desk dealing with normalization, I had started going out and talking to groups in the DC area and around the country about why normalization made sense and how we were continuing to make progress on POW/MIA issues. Before he went out to Vietnam, Ambassador Peterson had also gone around and spoken to a number of different veterans groups and to Vietnamese-American communities. So, we took turns going back to the U.S. to make these presentations in different locales.

When we wrote up our budget EAP was very generous in providing funds for this travel. They gave us enough budget that the Ambassador and I could come back to the United States annually. He sometimes went back more often, because he had to go back to lobby on the Hill when we had other issues to talk about that had Congressional interest. Congress was always interested in having him come back and testify. We periodically then would go back to the United States and travel to a variety of different places, speaking at academic institutions and at conferences. We also specifically targeted concentrations of Vietnamese-American around the country. I used some of the contacts I had from my previous work at VLC and also the contacts that I had from APEC. There was a large Vietnamese community in the Seattle area, in addition to the more well-known ones in California and Houston, Texas. Members of Congress who traveled to Vietnam told me about other groups and so I added trips to the Chicago and New Orleans areas to our more standard stops. On the east coast, in addition to the northern Virginia group, I added Boston and Philadelphia sessions.

Q: What sort of reception were you getting from these groups?

HARTER: It was always mixed. You'd get a lot of people, particularly older people who were still immersed in the war issues and they didn't see any value in dealing with the Communists whatsoever. Many of them thought we were naive and very ill-informed about the Communists' intentions. They exaggerated all of the stories of human rights violations, talking up poor treatment of prisoners and especially prisoners of conscience, mistreatment of ordinary people who opposed the government. They pointed to Vietnamese Government censorship, the lack of religious freedom, persecution of religious leaders who were trying to advocate greater openness in society. On the other hand, there was another generation of younger people who had come over as infants or ones who had been born and raised entirely in the United States. Most of them were much more open and they were much more interested in learning about their origins and the country that they had come from instead of just listening to the things their parents said. Now that's not to say that there were not also some younger folks who just took on hook, line and sinker the whole story that their parents had said about how terrible the Communists were. This group spouted the same line their parents had and they weren't willing to listen much to what we had to say. But for the most part, the generational difference meant a difference in outlook toward Vietnam.

I remember there was a young Vietnamese woman staffer for Congressman Tom Davis of Virginia and she fell into the group who got her beliefs from the older generation. Ambassador Peterson had convinced Davis to come to Hanoi for a visit since his district included the northern Virginia Vietnamese community centered around the Eden Center which has traditionally been very conservative. Congressman Davis agreed to come and promised to have an open mind about what he was going to see in Vietnam. He brought the staffer with him and she spent the entire time she was there trying to dig up negative stories to report to Davis' constituents in the Arlington area. And Davis, despite his promises to keep an open mind, got back to the States and denounced Hanoi's Government and society in his usual way. Congressman Randy Cunningham from California who was another of Peterson's Congressional friends who had served in the military in Vietnam also promised to come to Vietnam with an open mind and he did go away a lot more positive about things than Davis did. Cunningham was still not a full believer that we were seeing significant changes in Vietnam's behavior and in our ability to work with the Vietnamese but he didn't go all out to criticize them either. He probably didn't feel his re-election depended upon securing a lot of Vietnamese votes the way Davis did.

There were also quite a number of Vietnamese who grown up in Vietnam during the conflict and who later fled to the U.S. who had decided it was better to work constructively with the Vietnamese Government to achieve other objectives. Some of the people who worked the refugee issues or the family reunification issues decided it was better to be friendly and open and to develop a relationship with the Vietnamese government simply to make it easier to gain their refugee and family reunification objectives than it was to keep putting your thumb in the eye of the Vietnamese leaders. So, there were a number of well-respected community leaders, people in their late forties and early fifties who had this particular view and served as a bit of a contrast to the majority of the older generation. On the other hand, the leader of Boat People SOS was in that same age group and he was as rabid and active anti-Communist militant as any of the older generation who had been senior military or civilian leaders in South Vietnam.

On a couple of occasions, at the places I went to speak there were demonstrators and occasionally there were police outside the place I was speaking keeping the demonstrators at the required distance. On one of his first speaking tours, the Ambassador had run into a very vocal group in Orange County, California. The group was so vocal, so bitter and so nasty in their remarks in the auditorium that he could not deliver his remarks at all and he had to walk out. And of course for the negative audience that was a big victory. They had silenced "Hanoi's mouthpiece.” On many occasions, both of us were referred to as spokesmen for the Hanoi government or “the Communist regime.” Orange County probably was the most rabid anti-Communist, anti-Hanoi, and anti-normalization center in the U.S. Yet while I was in Hanoi, the elder of the two Sanchez sisters, Loretta, who represent that area in Congress visited Hanoi and she was far less doctrinaire about things than Tom Davis was. She didn’t go off half-cocked in Vietnam, but she didn’t pull any punches against Hanoi when she spoke to her constituents in the Vietnamese community in California who kept her in office.

While we were in Hanoi, a youngish Vietnamese businessman hung up a picture of Ho Chi Minh in the window of his video shop in Orange County. That action created a huge furor in the community and demonstrations were held. The young businessman was spat upon and pushed around as he left his store; his car was vandalized, and after hours his store was trashed. He got a certain amount of sympathy and attention from the ACLU and a number of other rights organizations, but then it turned out he was pirating videos in the store and was mass producing video copies of Vietnamese and Western titles that got him on the wrong side of the law. He compounded that by getting arrested on a wife beating charge, so it just turned into a total circus. But, it was one of those stories which demonstrated how very hostile some of these Vietnamese communities were about anything that had to do with Hanoi-run Vietnam.

Q: Well, we live right here within a mile of the Eden Center where I go eat from time to time. They fly the old flag. In many ways, the South Vietnamese flag is still the sort of symbol of Vietnam. It seems from my observance you can’t fly what I call the North Vietnam, I mean the regular Vietnamese flag.

HARTER: Yeah. It’s very difficult to do that, yes.: Well, it’s one of these things that I’m sure everybody on the Vietnam desk groans over, because every time it happens, the Vietnamese government sends the U.S. Embassy a protest and the Vietnamese Embassy calls up the Vietnam Desk at State and says, “What are you going to do about this or what are you going to do about that?” And, it’s usually just impossible to do anything about it, because the flag is flying on private property, it’s most often not an issue the State Department can affect. We’ve had this same problem with China and the Taiwan flag over the years. When I was on the China Desk, I had to deal with local officials in Los Angeles and San Francisco a couple of times over promotions which the authorities had agreed to that featured Taiwan’s flag. And, I had to deal with the old South Vietnamese flag issue when I was the Director on the VLC desk. In fact, on one occasion, the Vietnamese community in Houston had petitioned sub-city authorities for approval to construct a monument which would have included a statue of Vietnamese and American soldiers surmounted by South Vietnamese and American flags and bearing a plaque dedicated to the Vietnamese and American veterans who had “fought together, suffered and died at the hands of the Communist invaders”. This was not just a proposal for an out-of-the-way location, it was designed to be placed on a highly visible thoroughfare on public land and, by the time I learned of it from Vietnamese Embassy officials, the request had already received the sub-city administration’s approval. The Vietnamese Embassy naturally came to me to get this project stopped. I explained to the Embassy officials that all I could do was to point out to the local authorities how this didn’t correspond to our current policy of recognizing and dealing with the Hanoi Government as the Government of Vietnam. I made clear to the Embassy that it was still a local decision and not one the federal government could direct. But, I did make a trip to Houston, and I did sit down with people in the City Planning Office and I talked to other people in the Mayor's Office. I explained to them all the problems that might occur that would have negative consequences for the city if the memorial was built as planned on public land. As a result the Houston officials got the sub-city officials to change their minds and the proposal for a memorial on public land was abandoned. There was a movement to relocate it on private property but I don't believe that ended up raising much money.

Q: What were the problems if it had occurred?

HARTER: Well, for example, it could affect the Vietnamese willingness to cooperate and deal with business companies based in Houston. Vietnam was an up and coming oil exporting and exploitation site. Houston is a huge oil business center. The Port of Houston could have had problems getting its products or ships into Vietnamese ports. The Vietnamese certainly would not look favorably on Houston as a site for a Consulate. And, as you probably know, there is a little bit of a competition among cities in the United States to get foreign consulates established in their jurisdictions. It is seen as prestigious and more foreign consulates often means greater business connections. But the main argument I made was to get Houston to keep the project off public land. If local people wanted to put up a memorial on private property, the Houston authorities – and the State Department – would be off the hook. Ultimately, that was enough to convince them. The Houston City Government officials decided there had been some irregularities in the original vote to approve this project. The city authorities noted there were other competing community requests to use the public land for youth recreation. These plans would not work well with the installation of a monument and its associated walkways and seating. So, they were able to wiggle their way out of the whole issue. But, ultimately there's virtually nothing you can do to stop people from setting up their monuments, memorials and flags on private property. I shouldn't be so categorical. There's always the possibility you could make an argument about these memorials creating a public nuisance or a disturbance in a residential setting, but that's going to require more lawyers and more court actions to block those activities.

Q: Well, I may have this wrong, but we were talking about the Eden Center which is a big place. They had a ceremony there some years ago and I think some Vietnamese and Vietnamese veterans were there. A Vietnamese guy got quite drunk and urinated on a Vietnamese flag and he was killed. And, they never found out who did it. I mean, it was sort of a wild action.

HARTER: Yes, I remember that incident too. There are a number of Vietnamese-run organizations in this area that work with the disabled or with Indochinese refugees who counted on the Vietnamese community for their support. These organizations traditionally would also petition the U.S. government for funding and support. The groups would hold periodic social meetings and fund-raiser events out at the Eden Center or at some other big restaurant in the area. These events would all feature the South Vietnamese flag up on the wall. The program would start with the participants singing the old South Vietnamese anthem. Many of the attendees would wear their Vietnamese military uniforms and all their decorations and there would be patriotic speeches extolling the virtues of South Vietnam and attacking the communists. And, because the State Department and AID and other U.S. government agencies were all involved in these projects, we would also be invited. When EAP, or Refugee Bureau or AID officials attended these functions we were often asked to deliver remarks on refugee and aid policies for the Vietnamese community.

Once we normalized diplomatic relations I went to several of these northern Virginia organizations and told their leaders nobody in the U.S. government would be attending any of the fund-raising functions or anniversary celebrations unless the visible links to South Vietnam were dispensed with. There was to be no more South Vietnamese flag on the wall, no more South Vietnamese anthem being played or sung, and no more anti-Hanoi speeches if they expected a U.S. Government representative to participate in the programs. I told them as representatives of the U.S. Government we couldn't attend a program and make a presentation with all of this contradictory material in the background. Nonetheless, I also made clear that whatever their decision about how they dealt with my requirements, I told them we'd continue to provide funds for their organizations because they met our objectives to channel money and programs into resettlement efforts for needy refugees or to help the disabled still in Vietnam. I also didn't try to alter how they conducted their regular business meetings. My concern was the community-wide promotional efforts where they wanted an "official" U.S. presence. For the most part, the organizations in northern Virginia complied and they kept the old regime paraphernalia out of their public events. The flags and uniforms and anthems probably continued as part of the regular meetings and more private gatherings but that wasn't my concern. I just didn't want more arguments with the Vietnamese Embassy about U.S. officials taking part in events that glorified the old regime. I had some objections from a few of the American officials about this policy, but once I discussed it with them they too realized it was no longer appropriate, even if they didn't like the arrangements and had their own hearts tied to the former regime in Saigon.

Now, from time to time when I went out and spoke at meetings of Vietnamese associations around the country I'd get to a place and there'd be the South Vietnamese flag up on the wall, often right behind where I'd stand to speak so it would appear in any photos taken during my remarks. I didn't have any choice about that. I used to advise groups where I was scheduled to speak about not putting up the old flags, but it was difficult to control from long distance. And, of course, many of these organizations needed financial contributions from their local Vietnamese communities to continue to provide social services so it was difficult for them to cut off their base of support. But, I didn't walk out or refuse to speak until the flag was removed. I told people when I got up and spoke that I knew the flag and what it symbolized, and that I too had served under the U.S. flag and alongside that Vietnamese flag during the war. But I also made a point of emphasizing it was not the flag of the Government of Vietnam that we recognized today and I left it at that.

Q: And you were in Vietnam from when to when?

HARTER: Summer of '97 until the summer of 2001.

Q: You initially were working in Ho Chi Minh City?

HARTER: No. I did not go to Ho Chi Minh City at all. Because of the long delay for Peterson's appointment and subsequent arrival in Hanoi, we were too far behind schedule with the opening of the Consulate General for me to go there first. I was in Hanoi throughout my assignment. But, the Ambassador still put me in charge of getting the mission opened down there and asked me to handle all of the supervision and coordination activities until we actually got a Consul General on the ground. The Foreign Service Officer I had chosen to be the head of the Consular Section in Ho Chi Minh City was also to serve as the number two at the ConGen and she had already been in Hanoi for a few months. She went to Ho Chi Minh City with some of the consular and admin personnel to set up shop in the old interview compound and she held the reins in the interim until the Consul General actually arrived. She was not a member of the Senior Foreign Service, but certainly had a strong consular background and that was clearly going to be the main work for the operations in the south. As we had done with the Consulate General in Guangzhou in China, we centered all of our immigrant visa work in Ho Chi Minh City since all of our likely applicants were based in the southern part of the country. Once the office was open, I generally went down every six weeks or so to see how things were going operationally as well as to keep tabs on any problems that might have developed. During the early phase of operations, the cramped work space and lack of communications created a number of misunderstandings among the people assigned there that required a tempering hand from outside.

The majority of all the people that you're going to deal with for immigrant visas will be in the southern half of the country. But you still needed a Consular Section to cover the north. In Hanoi, the consular officers would provide services for Americans, handle official and diplomatic visas for Vietnamese Government personnel and provide visitors visas, the latter mostly for people who wanted to do business with the United States, and some student visas. But, the senior consular people, the ones with the most experience were assigned to work as unit heads for the Consulate General in the south.

Q: Could you give us a background in the organization of the Mission in Hanoi, main officers, and what you thought were the first problems to approach upon your arrival?

HARTER: When we opened in Hanoi, we committed to bringing in a standard mix of State Department functional elements – consular, political, economic, and administrative officers – and we had United States Information Agency, Foreign Commercial Service, and Defense Attaché personnel from other elements of the Government. The POW/MIA Office continued as a separate Embassy unit apart from the Defense Attaché Office. We also established a Marine Security Guard detachment at the beginning. After a few months, we added a medical doctor from the Center for Diseases Control in Atlanta to coordinate our medical assistance work in Vietnam. AID did not open an office during the initial phase of our set-up and it was only toward the end of my time in Hanoi that we had AID personnel coming into the country on a regular basis preparing to set up a permanent presence. The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) personnel went to Ho Chi Minh City once the new building was completed and we were fully operational. The Drug Enforcement Agency did not have an office in Hanoi until later on. I am not absolutely certain, but I don't believe the Foreign Agricultural Service (FAS) established a presence in Hanoi when the Embassy first opened, but they were there well before I left. After the main Embassy building had been in operation for some time, FCS and FAS leased office space in a separate office facility near the Embassy building. When we took over that space, we also acquired another floor in the building to handle our consular operations. Despite our thoughts we'd need only a limited staff in the north, the volume of student and business visas quickly surpassed our estimates and the Consular Section daily business activities outgrew the limited Embassy office space. USIA maintained its own separate facility in a more central part of the city.

Operationally, the first priorities for Embassy personnel were focused on making the office building into a functional Embassy. This meant upgrading most of the infrastructure, installing greater support beams to handle additional weight on the various floors. It meant reconfiguring space for public access for the consular unit until we were able to find a bigger facility for them to use. It meant installing all the basic security features needed to meet USG standards. As an office building on a main street, however, we had no setback, no gated entrance, no side or rear perimeter walls above six feet, and only about two or three feet between the perimeter walls and the building on the sides. We built a larger wall with a steel gate in front of the building, but the gate was probably only ten feet from the entrance door. At one point, one of our neighbors built a temporary structure up against our wall and also against our building. FBO and DS ignored our requests to install security barriers against this intrusion and the local authorities were deaf to our requests to have the structure removed.

Another early task required Ambassador Peterson and I to develop working relationships with many members of the Hanoi official community who were less open about the new relationship between our two countries than those we had previously been dealing with in the Foreign Ministry and the Ministry of Trade. But, by and large our efforts to get into contact with the national government officials went well. It was also very important to keep up momentum on the POW/MIA front. After Ambassador Peterson participated in the first few regular bilateral meetings between the POW/MIA Accounting Office and their Vietnamese counterparts, I regularly attended the scheduled sessions where the planning of future investigations and excavations was worked out. Ambassador Peterson and I also would go out to the excavation sites when the CIL-HI teams were working there and we both were always at the airport repatriation ceremonies when we boarded recovered remains on a U.S. military aircraft to take them back to Hawaii for identification. Our direct involvement in the POW/MIA dialogue often helped to smooth over disagreements and I believe it convinced the Vietnamese that the issue remained a serious one for the U.S. side even though we had achieved normalization of relations.

The biggest bilateral issue we had to deal with was to move from normalization of diplomatic relations to normalization of trade and economic relations. Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Manh Cam had made this the centerpiece of his own bilateral dialogue with the U.S. When he came to the U.S. for the UN General Assembly session and met with American officials in the mid-1990s up through his dialogues with Warren Christopher in Hanoi after normalization and his first official trip to the U.S. in 1998, on each occasion he pressed for the normalization of economic relations. As a communist country, Vietnam was prohibited from receiving most favored nation treatment without a regular annual waiver of the Jackson-Vanik provisions of the Congressional Trade Act – I think it was from the mid-1970s. These provisions required certification by the President that the country in question permitted freedom of emigration and President Clinton did make that certification for the first time in 1998. Now one would think with the operation of the orderly departure program to facilitate emigration this would not have been a problem. But this again was Vietnam, a war-time enemy, and so nothing was ever very straight-forward and easy to achieve.

But even with the annual waiver, this still didn't get Vietnam Most Favored Nation (MFN) treatment. The trade agreement negotiations were especially difficult because there were very few sophisticated economists in Hanoi who could explain to the old-fashioned communist leadership all of the ins and outs of modern economic principles or trade requirements. Most of these communist leaders saw the capitalist trade system as anathema and so we spent probably two years getting through the basics. We even had an agreement in hand in the summer of 1999 only to have the Vietnamese leadership sit on the agreement for over a year because there was no will to follow through and because we had not pushed the issue effectively. When we finally did reach agreement we still had to get the agreement through the U.S. Congress. Moreover the President's certification of Vietnam's freedom of emigration policies was also subject to Congressional review and so that too had created a few skipped heartbeats each time it came before the Congress. Nonetheless, we did reach an agreement on trade and the U.S. Congress and the Vietnamese National Assembly ratified the agreement and it went into effect at the end of 2001, shortly after I left Vietnam. At least I was there when we signed all the agreements in Hanoi so I was pretty sure everything would be finalized when I did leave the country.

Q: When you got to Hanoi how did you find, first place, how did you find the Vietnamese government, the officials you were dealing with?

HARTER: Well, the people that I was dealing with when I was in VLC and when I first got there were initially all Foreign Ministry cadres. The Foreign Ministry people I was dealing with were all people who had been working on U.S. affairs for a long period of time. Le Van Bang, for example, who moved from their UN Mission down to Washington, DC as Chargé and then became the Ambassador, had been working on U.S. affairs for 20 some years. The head of the America's Department, Nguyen Manh Phong, had been educated in Cuba, had served in Cuba, but aside from one tour in South America, I believe he had spent all the rest of his time in the Foreign Ministry working on the U.S. A number of people who had leadership roles in the America's Department were fluent in English. Some others were not so fluent, but the majority of the folks we dealt with were all people who had been trained in English with the expectation they would move into diplomatic posts in the U.S. once normalization occurred. And of course, as I've mentioned before, we had talked about normalization as early as the late 1970s. And so there was already this momentum within the Vietnamese Foreign Ministry focused on eventual normalization of relations with the U.S. and the Vietnamese maintained it over the intervening decades. Then when it looked like there was going to be a possibility to complete the process in the 1990s as Vietnam gradually wound down its Cambodia adventure they added new people to the mix to build up their cadre base with some younger officers.

But, like the Ambassador, I went around to meet people in a lot of different ministries and government offices. A lot of the people in those offices were very narrowly focused and many had a very limited education. A lot of the "educated" cadres who had Eastern European and Soviet academic backgrounds in what we would consider the social sciences did not have a lot of depth. Their understanding of "western" ways was very limited. The people who had had technical or engineering training, even from Soviet bloc universities, tended to be more open and much more interested in rapidly building up a relationship with the United States. A lot of the people who were more narrowly focused, as well as a lot of the people who had leadership responsibilities in party organizations were very narrow. There were also different cliques within the leadership. There were groups that were China-leaning; there were groups that were Moscow-leaning; there were groups that didn't want to have much to do with either China or Russia. But even those who were less ideologically-inclined remained very leery of us and very leery of what might come of a relationship with the U.S. Anything we did or proposed to do with the Vietnamese was always viewed with suspicion by traditionalist Party leaders. That group was also suspicious of any Ministers who were more open to western ideas and that's why we had so much difficulty with the Trade agreement. Nonetheless, even the old fashioned cadre shared the view the U.S. relationship was the key to modernizing the Vietnamese economy.

Once we had normalized relations, I believed it was important to keep up the semblance of momentum in the relationship. I was concerned once we normalized relations, most people in the Clinton Administration would have been just as happy to focus on entirely different issues and it would have taken us forever to get things done with Vietnam. So, right after normalization, I took advantage of the planned Asia travel of Secretary of State Christopher to attend the annual ASEAN dialogue meetings as an excuse to get him to Hanoi. Working with the Vietnamese Chargé, we worked out a "document" for Secretary Christopher and Foreign Minister Cam to sign which "formalized" the establishment of diplomatic relations. It wasn't necessary to do this but it was one of those things that we used to call a "deliverable", something you did which made the trip worthwhile because it created a symbol of activity and accomplishment. You'll recall I said the opening of the Consulate General in Guangzhou, China was a "deliverable" for Vice President Mondale. Nobody was quite sure how the relationship was going to evolve and on the U.S. side the only thing certain was everything was going to continue to move incrementally – find a building, send a chargé, find an Ambassador, wait to get him nominated and approved, etc, etc. So on the occasion of Christopher's visit, the head of the America's Department and I stood behind the two Foreign Ministers and passed the books for them to sign on the establishment of diplomatic relations and we had a very nice photo opportunity and a document to add to the normalization files in the Department. I don't think the photo got a lot of play in the U.S., but the signing shot was part of the Vietnamese History Museum's display of activities in the normalization of relations with the U.S. and it remained in a prominent display area in the Museum for a number of years.

I got off on this digression because I was talking about the trade issue and how it was important to the Vietnamese. During Christopher's visit, Foreign Minister Cam made the trade relationship issue the focal point of his discussions with the Secretary. And the trade dialogue became one of the momentum issues we were able to use to keep up a semblance of forward movement during the period when we only had Chargés in the two capitals.

Q: What were you observing there? You're saying that many of the ministers and people from the cadre looking with great suspicion on diplomatic or no diplomatic relations and the process of Americanization. You know, the jeans, the Coke, the clothing...

HARTER: When I got there, Baskin-Robbins (ice cream franchise) was already there – it had three locations inside Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City. Kentucky Fried Chicken was there. Baskin Robbins closed in Hanoi after only a short time, but I think KFC was still in HCMC when I left. McDonald's hadn't yet entered the market because they couldn't work out a steady domestic supply chain of acceptable beef and potatoes.

Q: Young people, well attuned to everything? Had the pirated movies and --

HARTER: Yeah, the movies were there, but they all came from China. The Vietnamese had not yet fully subscribed to what the Chinese called “reform and opening” of the economy. They were still far more conservative than the Chinese. In the early 1990s, the Vietnamese made a few steps toward opening up but they quickly retreated. After normalization with the U.S., they again took some tentative steps but they again pulled back. Vietnam had another handicap, and that was in limited computer literacy and computer use. During the normalization era, say 1995 through 1997 or 1998, there still wasn’t much evidence of computers in the government or even in businesses and schools. It was 1999 and 2000 before you started to see more widespread use of computers, particularly in Ho Chi Minh City.

The country was also security conscious. We regularly had problems with the Public Security Ministry. The Ministry wanted to be involved in the decision-making process about how we operated in the country. Our Embassy people were being watched and followed and there was occasional harassment. Embassy local hire personnel were employed by the Vietnamese Government Services Bureau and they had to attend meetings and report on what U.S. personnel did in the Embassy. Some of us, I suspect, probably were monitored all the time. There were probably monitoring devices directed at our building from outside and we could see someone sitting in a building across the street from us watching our building. He sat in the shadows of a doorway on the second floor of that building and just watched.

One of the big issues for the Embassy in Hanoi, much as it is elsewhere in the world, was to get our officers out into the country to talk to people and find out what was going on. In Hanoi, it was a little bit different because we were coming in cold or out of the cold after a long hiatus with no exposure to the Vietnamese people or the country. And while to a certain extent we were a “novelty”, we were also potentially a “hazard” because somebody was likely to follow up on wherever we went and whomever we talked to to see what we had asked about.

The Ambassador led the charge to get out and to be seen around the country. He set a goal of visiting all of Vietnam’s 63 provinces and provincial level cities. He may have missed four or five before he departed. Because he did so much travel, I didn’t get out to the provinces very often, except when I traveled to MIA excavation sites. I’d occasionally go to one of the resort or tourist areas, so I did get to Nha Trang, Hue, and Da Nang in the south, and Haiphong, Sapa and Ha Long Bay in the north. I spent most of my time out of Hanoi working with the staff in Ho Chi Minh City. I made sure we had a good travel budget from EAP so that our political and economic officers could get out and travel. Most of these people were language officers and some of them were fluent in Vietnamese. A few were older officers who had been in Vietnam during the war and had Vietnamese spouses. Some of the younger officers had been doing refugee interviews in Ho Chi Minh City during the early days of orderly departure and they knew the language of the streets. Virtually everybody had some level of FSI Vietnamese training before coming to Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City. Overall the officers assigned there were top notch.

Q: Did some from the street scene, which was seen in society in Hanoi and what you would see in Ho Chi Minh City, was there distinct contrast or not?

HARTER: Oh yes, there was definitely a contrast. In Hanoi, you still had a much more rigid, less open society. You had the start up of small businesses, street-side stalls and houses where the ground floor had been converted into shops with the owners engaged in some commercial enterprise. This was part of the Vietnamese economic modernization effort which permitted individual “capitalist” enterprise activity. In the South, you had private factories; you had large scale trading businesses; you had real entrepreneurial creativity and not just the basic, start-up street-stall or shop-house. You had a much more freewheeling and open society and people who sought out restaurants and places for entertainment and recreation. There was more money from business activity. And, very importantly, there were large amounts of remittances from Vietnamese relatives overseas. These remittances created a cash and investment flow that sped up that economic activity in the south. The south was also more prosperous agriculturally than the north. The north had some raw materials and a mining, extraction industry component which the south lacked until there was some development of the oil industry. But basic food supply for the population was a problem in the north and it was virtually never a problem in the south. Even if you had terrible floods and damage from typhoons, the southern provinces could still maintain self-sufficiency in foodstuffs. Subject to similar natural phenomena, the north was in crisis and even in the best of harvest years it had to count on the southern provinces for food staples. In the south, there was a more open appreciation and response to the presence of foreigners, not just Americans, but everybody. You had the opportunity to be more socially engaged with people. People were much more willing to initiate a conversation or to respond to questions about general issues and problems. There were occasionally people in the north who would do the same, but that was not very common.

One of the things that I tried to do while working in the Embassy was to identify a few people in responsible positions and different parts of the Vietnamese Government I could go to and talk to in an “off-the-record” manner to try to prep them on issues or to get a feel from them how certain actions might be perceived. I’d go in to a couple of these people and say “Look, we’ve got a potential problem coming up in our relationship. I need you to make sure that people on your side understand the U.S. approach and where we’re going with this proposal or what’s going to happen, or I need to get a feel for how you think the Vietnamese authorities will react to such and such.” There was a person I could talk to like this in the Office of the Government who proved to be especially important in this regard. The Office of the Government was an Executive Secretary type of office for the Prime Minister with a combined NSC and domestic policy focus. It provided policy advice and recommendations for the Prime Minister based on its own research work and on its tasking of various ministries for information. The Prime Minister in Vietnam held a much more important power position than the President. So, I used this contact to go back and forth on issues of importance.

I also dealt with a person in the Foreign Ministry in the same way. He looked at overall foreign policy issues, and another person in the America’s Department of the Foreign Ministry who I could meet with and give him a heads-up on an important bilateral issue that was about to break just to see how we could make sure it didn’t disrupt our relations and mutual understanding. I tired very hard to establish the same kind of contact with a military man in the Public Security

Ministry but he was much more elusive and very hard to pin down. I probably met with him alone on only two or three occasions during my entire tour. I suspect he had to be more cautious because of the Ministry he worked in. And, I occasionally met with another individual who was primarily a contact for other people in the mission, but he was still someone I could go to in that same vein and say, "You have a different set of contacts and different set of people that you work with, how is this going to play, or we've got a real problem coming up, what do you think?"

I found that using this informal system of contacts and pre-emptive discussion of potential problem issues did help to lessen misunderstandings and limit Vietnamese over-reaction to some of our activities. This was particularly important when we were dealing with the visit of President Clinton to Vietnam. I knew from previous experience there were certain things the White House staff would cram down our throats in terms of how they wanted things done and how they expected the Vietnamese to handle certain requirements. I was able to use this informal contact arrangement and go to a couple of key Vietnamese officials and say, "Look, you don't like this plan, I don't like it either, and a lot of us think this is a silly arrangement, but this is the only way "they" will let it happen – we just have to do it this way, because "they" (they being the White House staff) will not take no for an answer." I mean that's one of the reasons I guess the Clintons' visit was as successful as it was. By going through this back channel, I was able to make the Vietnamese understand that ultimately they didn't have a choice on how certain scenarios would play out if they wanted the visit to take place. Obviously, there were other issues where the Vietnamese wanted certain things to be done a certain way that we were able to compromise on. These were issues considered unimportant by the White House and by agreeing to those conditions when they were proposed by the Vietnamese it made it seem as though there was a bit of a balance.

Q: We're talking about Secret Service stuff aren't we?

HARTER: Well, no. Some of the issues involved the Secret Service, and their security requirements, but some of it is just -- it's the whole play of events and how they would be organized and how White House staff wanted to manage just about every phase of every activity. For example, one of President Clinton's events was a public address to the Vietnamese people, just like he had done in China on his first visit there. Embassy Hanoi sold this idea to the White House and the Washington bureaucracy. So, it was in the Embassy's interest to make sure it would work, even though the Vietnamese were really very, very hesitant about agreeing to his making the speech. But, after a lot of negotiating on how and where it would happen, the proposal worked. The President addressed a group of students at a prominent university and the speech was broadcast throughout the country – unlike in China where it did not go beyond the immediate auditorium audience. We worked through all the problems and the speech came off well and the Vietnamese in the end were not unhappy with it.

But in spite of all our efforts to create this opportunity to communicate with ordinary people, there was still a major screw-up as the speech was delivered in a language that most Vietnamese didn't understand. Language Services in the Department assigned a stateside interpreter to go along with the President, rather than rely on the Vietnamese-American interpreter we had in Hanoi. The interpreter in Hanoi was a State Department Language Services employee assigned to work with the Ambassador, just the way we had an interpreter working with our Ambassador in China. The man Language Services assigned to interpret for the President had virtually no experience dealing with the language then being used in Vietnam. His terminology was all wrong and he used old language styles common to the wartime era in the south. He didn't know the current northern terminology and he spoke in the southern dialect. This created a negative reaction among a lot of people when they heard the President's speech. The university audience and the majority of the Vietnamese, all born since the end of the war, did not understand a lot of the words he used and older people were unhappy that he was using the old terminology.

Vietnamese officials were originally upset by this but because we had worked on this issue for so long in advance of the visit, we had permission to distribute a printed version of the speech – something which again the PRC officials had not permitted for Clinton's China speech – and we made sure the printed version of the speech was translated by our interpreter at the Embassy. The Vietnamese Government left this arrangement entirely to us and there was no effort to censor or alter the speech. Once the text of the speech was out in print, the initial negative public reaction faded and the overall impression of the Clinton remarks was highly favorable.

Now, in fairness to Language Services, part of the problem was because the White House made the final call. The Ambassador's interpreter had been pulled into an earlier one of the President's bilateral meetings with no forewarning and somebody on the White House staff didn't like the way the translation activity worked out at that meeting. So, White House staff said, "we're going with our guy (the Washington interpreter) for the President's speech." The Ambassador never had a chance to tell the President or the staff why that was not a good idea. So, even with your best organized plans, with your best intentions, things can sometimes get messed up. In the end Language Services agreed with us, they should have been more attentive to the language differences and they instituted a plan to train their Vietnamese-language interpreters to better handle the current language. Fortunately too, as I said, the initial audience negative reaction quickly became a positive one once the speech text was widely circulated.

Q: Well, as long as it's terrible, I mean it's something we have all run into and that is after you have an expatriate community the language changes and people start picking, I mean it just doesn't sound right.

HARTER: No. To start with there is a distinct Northern and a distinct Southern pronunciation of the language. There's a whole different vocabulary set for a communist political and economic system. The U.S.-based interpreter had missed out on a 25-year evolution of his native language and he simply didn't know the current patois. Our interpreter in Hanoi experienced this same situation when he arrived to work for the Ambassador. He started out using the wrong words and some people were offended. Some of the people in the Foreign Ministry explained to him what was wrong and he adapted. He studied the new terminology and listened to the way the people in Hanoi spoke. When Clinton arrived, he'd already had a couple of years experience under his belt, but the fellow assigned from Washington to go on the trip came in cold and was at a terrible disadvantage which he didn't seem to recognize.

Q: Did you while you were there, I would think that this, you're talking about the rather rigid orthodox, nomenclature or whatever you want to call it of the governing party you brought up and strictly sort of Marxist principles and all. But changes have swept through Russia, Eastern Europe, China, I mean Marxism was no longer even an issue. And, here is Vietnam with a very clever; I mean these are not passive people as we all know. What was happening there? Were they questioning and asking you or anybody?

HARTER: When we were there, the top leaders were still the war-time generation leaders. The people who were in Hanoi and the party, in the government, in the military, those top people were all first generation war-time leaders. They were Ho Chi Minh's lieutenants; they were Ho Chi Minh's comrades-in-arms. The Prime Minister, Vo Van Kiet, had been the head of the underground political movement in the South. The most well-know Hanoi military leader, General Vo Nguyen Giap, who defeated the French at Dien Bien Phu and then developed the strategy to oust the Saigon regime was still alive, but he was actually becoming an outspoken critic of Party orthodoxy. He was generally kept out of sight. But, the military who had been commanders of the brigades and divisions that had launched the invasion of the South were the current military leaders. Party General Secretary Do Muoi, Presidents Le Duc Anh and Tran Duc Luong, and Prime Ministers Vo Van Kiet and Phan Van Khai all represented the war-time era.

The first change in office from this war-time leadership was the election of a man who turned out to be an absolute disaster as the Party General Secretary. Le Kha Phieu was from the security apparatus of the Vietnamese military. He was from the commissar or party side of the military. He started out trying to cultivate an image of openness for the Party and after his selection he went out to meet people around the country. He asked questions about issues of interest to the people in the cities and the countryside and he tried to appear sympathetic and understanding. But in no time, you could see he was totally insecure and uncertain about himself and he became more and more isolated within the leadership. Neither the Party nor the Government seemed capable of making a decision on policy issues with him in charge.

The Party and Government decision-making process had been in the hands of a collective leadership, but one in which the top leaders were expected to carry more weight than others. Le Kha Phieu carried no weight at all. He was clearly a last-minute fill-in as General Secretary because the collective leadership could not come to a decision on how to balance the two competing power blocs in the leadership, which one traditionally categorized as the modernizers and the ideologues. While the ideologues had kept the modernization process moving ahead at a very slow pace during the leadership of Do Muoi, under Le Kha Phieu things seemed to stagnate. The Vietnamese could not make concrete decisions to do much of anything. The foreign business community was totally frustrated. The U.S. and European governments who were trying to deal with the Vietnamese government on development assistance and the World Bank which was committing large amounts of money to assist the Vietnamese in developing modern economic institutions and some development projects were just running their heads into brick walls.

The international financial institutions (IFIs) had a major effort underway in Vietnam to assist in modernizing the economic operations and organizations in the country. The man who represented the group at large was the Vietnam Country Director of the World Bank. He believed the Vietnamese would not respond to criticism, so all he did was say how wonderful the Vietnamese were working at reforming the economic system and then suggesting a few tweaks here and there that might make it better. The donor community, the nations who put up the money that was provided for the Bank and other IFI groups, was increasingly frustrated, and both the Ambassador and I were very outspoken in these donor gatherings about how things were not just fine and that the Vietnamese were not getting anywhere on instituting reform measures. The Vietnamese happily basked in his praise but nothing was getting done. Money that had been allotted for projects years before was still unspent because the Vietnamese couldn't make decisions on finalizing the projects. Projects that were being identified as clear targets for infrastructure development and for which there was money, didn't get started on time. No decisions were made. I talked to a friend of mine a month ago about what he's been doing recently in Vietnam. He is a consultant to a big U.S. engineering firm. He said he's still working to try and get a portion of a World Bank funded hydro-electric power grid in the northern part of Vietnam for his company. That project should have been underway in 2000. It was postponed time after time, perhaps half-a- dozen different times between 2000 and 2001, while I was still in Vietnam. The Vietnamese leaders decided the first plan created a dam that was too big. They said they wanted something smaller. Then the next design was judged to be too small – it ought to be something in between the two previous designs. First it was an issue of the large dam creating too big of a flooded area behind the dam so that too many people would be displaced and too many hectares of land would be swallowed up by the man-made lake. Then there was a concern that the smaller version wouldn't produce enough electricity, even though all of this was being created against an estimated “potential demand” inside Vietnam and a good part of the project was initially being designed to provide electricity that would be sold in neighboring Laos. There was always a reason, there was always an excuse not to do anything and to put off making the decision. And, now here we are in 2004, and my friend is still working on getting a share of a project that should have been decided on and launched four years ago and now should already be producing electricity. This exemplified how the Vietnamese weren't, and in some cases still haven't been, making decisions.

Q: What was happening in the universities? One, did we have much contact with them and was sort of, the dead hand of Marxism dominating?

HARTER: The “dead hand” was there in the universities, but it really wasn't that pervasive. The schools and the universities were really teaching in a much more open way. The focus was on technology and economics without the Marxist interpretations. A lot of U.S. institutions, European institutions had come in and established relationships with various universities in Vietnam. They sent teachers and professors and they even sent students to the Vietnamese institutions. U.S. and European universities accepted Vietnamese students for extended periods of time. The schools in the south were also much more open than those in the north. The academics and students from abroad said they had the feeling they were involved in a more technological, more modern society than you would otherwise expect from what you saw day to day on the streets. Yes, they still taught the old ideology, Marxism and Communism classes and they talked about the role of the state in directing the economic operations of the nation. But, in fact the rest of what they did in the classrooms was pretty open. There wasn't much of a focus on Western literature or Western social sciences, but you still had a lot of programs focused in the technical areas, and on modern business practices and economic theory, and these elements opened up still more opportunity to learn about the Western world. That was very, very prevalent in schools. I mean, we had a lot of kids at the Embassy, and I say kids, because these were people who came to work at the Embassy and at the Consulate General who were in their 20s.

Most were high school graduates and some were college graduates who were very much more flexible and more open in the way they reacted to everything. They were curious, inquisitive about the kinds of things that were going on in the rest of the world. They saw working at the Embassy as an opportunity to learn more and to get a better understanding of what had been happening outside Vietnam. They didn't have any experience or direct impressions of the war and they were very certainly not looking backwards, they wanted to move ahead.

Q: The computer and the internet has become so prevalent almost everywhere.

HARTER: Yeah, and that was to be the case in Vietnam, certainly much more so after 2000-2001.

Q: I mean, this is almost the last barrier. I mean once it gets fully integrated into a system, it's very difficult to --

HARTER: But, see the Vietnamese had controls, even more effective and stringent than the ones used by the Chinese. They had official nets that filtered and screened all of the material that was available and restricted what was accessible before it got to the audience at the computer terminal. There were a very limited number of opportunities to go beyond the controlled net. Now, I know people at the embassy who said with a little bit of expertise you can get around anything. And, with a little bit of, you know, fooling around you can get around the firewalls and into the restricted sites. But, a lot of people didn't have their own computers. People went to cyber cafes or small shops to access store computers. The few times I went into cyber cafes or went into shop houses, I saw more people playing games and sending e-mails than actually studying and using the computers as a vehicle for learning. So, while yes internet use and access was growing and there was more opportunity to use it, the internet was still not the big revolution in Vietnam that it was in other parts of the world until the time I was about to leave Vietnam in 2001.

Q: How about employment?

HARTER: Employment was still largely government-controlled, but more and more people were able to go out and seek work on their own. Employment was an issue that the Embassy had to deal with right from the beginning. As in most communist societies, the government wanted us to hire people through them and their labor exchange, the Services Bureau. Initially the first few people we took, we did hire that way, because we didn't have time to go out and interview. But, as soon as that first batch was in and we got our first American staff organized, we started recruiting directly. We went out and we negotiated contracts with the individuals. We did not negotiate contracts with the State labor office. After I arrived in Hanoi, I spent a lot of time arguing with the Vietnamese security folks and those who ran the Services Bureau. Our Admin team dealt day-to-day with the official labor office and their security people, but every time it came down to the issue of signing the labor contract, I was the heavy. I would go to the meeting with the Vietnamese officials and tell them we were not going to hire exclusively through them. We agreed we would interview the applicants they recommended but we would not commit to hire any of them in advance. In addition, we couldn't stop the Vietnamese Government from requiring the people we hired to join their official labor unit, the Services Bureau, but we categorically refused to be forced to hire people from that labor unit to start with. Most of the employees at the Embassy and the Consulate General were individuals who applied directly to work for us when we advertised openings in the local media.

I also began a process to turn our Vietnamese local hire employees in a different direction. I began by organizing the Vietnamese employees of the U.S. Embassy in Hanoi and later those at the U.S. Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City into an employees association. Our first group of employees in Hanoi had put together a sort of a welfare association to provide mutual assistance to one another when individuals had financial problems. I expanded their focus so they could meet with me to deal with their interests as Embassy employees. They could talk about job mobility, wages and salaries, supervisory relationships. Then I took it a step further and started discussing their relationship with the Labor Department and the Services Bureau. I explained how we would deal with those offices for them and how we would protect them if they had problems with those units. Chris Runckle had started the first local employees selling Liaison Office Hanoi T-shirts as a way of earning money for their welfare association. I got them to expand this to coffee mugs and other Embassy Hanoi labeled items which were always a big seller with delegations and visitors to the Embassy.

I took that same idea from Hanoi and went down to Ho Chi Minh City where we had five times as many local employees and created the exact same type of organization. Strangely enough, in more liberal and open Ho Chi Minh City it took more time down there to convince people to create the association because they were actually concerned about how the Government would react to this sort of an organization. They hadn't created their own internal welfare organization and so I had to convince them to start that as the first stage. Once I convinced them it made sense to have a way to deal with employee emergency situations, the rest of the idea gradually coalesced and they too formed a more broadly focused organization. By the time I left, the two associations were working together. In addition, I got the more activist Hanoi employees to go out and liaise with their counterparts in other embassies in Hanoi. I urged them to organize among themselves for mutual support whenever there were different disputes or contentious issues with the Services Bureau. I then met with a number of other DCM-equivalent officials in the bigger embassies to create a dialogue on labor issues that affected all of us. The dialogue group included the Australians, the Canadians and Brits, the French, and the Dutch, and I talked with them about creating a new labor hiring operation that was independent of the government. Once they got into the idea of the association and its potential as an advocacy group for better employment conditions under the Vietnamese Labor Bureau, the Ho Chi Minh City employees became even more aggressive than the employees in Hanoi. Our Ho Chi Minh City employees went out and made the connections with the other locally hired Consulate staff and they started a similar dialogue there to the one I had begun in Hanoi.

Q: Well, I would have thought that the Vietnamese government would have stepped right in and squashed it.

HARTER: They didn't, or at least they didn't do it effectively. They tried to intimidate people, but they did so with old fashioned methods that people weren't going to put up with anymore. Society had changed enough so that their intimidation effort wasn't effective and it only built resentment against the government. The local employees were not afraid to step up and say no when the government pushed in a direction they did not want to move. This didn't happen immediately. It took time. I told the people in Ho Chi Minh City about the Hanoi T-shirt operation and pushed them to do the coffee cup design, pointing out how there would quickly be far more American visitors in the Ho Chi Minh City area than there would be in Hanoi. And, they did it and soon they were making a good deal of money for their employees' welfare association. Once they saw the benefit they could derive from working together, the Ho Chi Minh City employees really got into the whole idea of developing their own employee related initiatives.

Q: What was your relation with the other major embassies? I'm thinking of the French. I would have thought the French would have wanted to jump in with both feet. They'd been there the whole time.

HARTER: The French were a little bit of a problem in the diplomatic corps, but they had great Bastille Day affairs. The first French Ambassador Peterson and I dealt with was "old school". He was an older fellow, with white hair, and very dignified. His successor was younger, but more pompous than his predecessor, and very full of himself. His goal was to demonstrate that France was still an important player in Vietnam and a first-rate world power. While we were there, he organized a Francophone summit meeting in Hanoi. It was hilarious the way things worked out. All of the various Francophone countries sent their top leaders for several days and it demonstrated to the Vietnamese just how bad a big state visit could be. There were 30 or 40 different heads of government at this meeting. And, of course, it was de rigueur they had to do everything in French. But, the Vietnamese hadn't been doing much of anything in French since the 1950s. At the famous Metropole Hotel, an old-fashioned French owned and managed hotel in Hanoi, the story was the only person the French speakers could converse with was the General Manger because he was the only one who spoke French. Of course, he was the only one there who was French. So, the Embassy and the Metropole instituted a crash language program to train all of the employees to be able to say a few basic phrases in French. Every time a foreigner came into the hotel, someone tried to practice their French but few people understood them. As soon as the summit ended, all of the French phrases and greetings disappeared at the Metropole and people went back to speaking English and Vietnamese.

To give you a better idea of how little the language was in use, a Vietnamese newspaper in Ho Chi Minh City published an article about the number of students studying French. According to the paper, there were 140 junior high school students in Ho Chi Minh City studying French, all of whose French studies were paid for by the French Government. By contrast, as the paper pointed out, there were several tens of thousands of students studying English, most of whom were paying to study English in special language institutes. The U.S. didn't run any special language program in Ho Chi Minh City or in Hanoi except occasionally to provide some teaching materials. Our USIA team would also work with the various educational institutions to assist them in setting up their programs by providing advice and directing them to US academic institutions for other support and exchanges.

But, the French were really very adamant about creating the image of a strong bilateral relationship between France and Vietnam. The most useful Francophone Summit contribution to the city came from the French Canadians who contributed a lot of signage that went up around Hanoi. It was really very helpful, because it was in French and English and Vietnamese. And, it basically enabled a visitor to find any of the major places you might want to get to in the city. But, overall the Francophone Summit was a laugh, except for the monstrous traffic jams it produced. There were 30 to 40 heads-of-government motorcades running from one part of the city to the other with everybody flying their national flags and all trying to move from a handful of big hotels to a central conference point and back during the day. The French Government brought in a fleet of Peugeot automobiles to help the Vietnamese handle all the VIPs. Before the summit got started, the French and the Vietnamese authorities ran practices moving the motorcades in the city and, sure enough, the first day they were practicing, they had a huge traffic accident and three or four of the Peugeots were totaled in downtown Hanoi. The French left most of the Peugeots behind as a gift, so the Vietnamese Government did get some benefit. But, I'm convinced the biggest "learning experience" was in giving the Vietnamese a little bit of a feel for the kind of circus you have when the U.S. President comes to town for a visit.

Actually, I was quite fortunate in my relationship with the French. The DCM, Paul Jean-Ortiz, had been my counterpart as French Consul General in Guangzhou. We had consulted each other frequently in Guangzhou and we worked very well together in Hanoi as well.

Q: What about while you were in there was there a significant number of Vietnamese who had left Vietnam coming back to visit families and all that?

HARTER: Yes, there were a lot of them coming back, but not as many, of course, coming back to the north. Most of the U.S.-linked overseas Vietnamese had their family ties in the south.

Q: What was the impact of that?

HARTER: There were some problems. But, by and large everybody seemed to get along pretty easily. Even while I was still in Washington, there were always older Vietnamese-Americans saying, "Oh, the only way you can get into Vietnam is to put a twenty-dollar bill in your passport when you get up to the immigration window and then everything's OK. You'll get your entry stamp and they'll let you go about your business." Well, that was nonsense, but quite a few Vietnamese actually did it. Like every country, the Vietnamese had their hit lists and they closely scrutinized people who came back to the country, particularly those people who didn't just gravitate to Ho Chi Minh City or one of the other big cities like Da Nang, Nha Trang or Hue. People who were going into the Highland areas of the south were given closer scrutiny. Occasionally when someone returned from abroad the Vietnamese trotted out "crimes" that had occurred in the past and the people were detained. We had one such situation in one of the Mekong delta cities where an individual Vietnamese-American was detained by the military. I can't remember exactly how we learned about this detention, but it was certainly via the typical backhand way you find out about these situations. In spite of our consular agreement requirements for prompt notification in the event of a national's arrest, the Vietnamese by and large didn't notify us. So, you find out about an arrest or detention through a family friend or a friend of a friend who comes in or writes to the Embassy and informs you someone's been arrested. Or, some relative in the United States says so-and-so went somewhere in Vietnam and hasn't been heard from – though they usually add they believe the person is being detained in some specific location. So, you go through this whole process of investigation with the Vietnamese authorities trying to locate a missing American. And, 99 times out of a hundred, yes the friend's story or the relative in the U.S.'s information turns out to be accurate. In this particular case, the man had been detained directly by a military unit and the civilian side of the government didn't know anything about it. After the Consular Section got nowhere with the Consular Department of the Foreign Ministry and I got nowhere on a follow-up visit, I went to the Americas Department. But they backed up the Consular Department and said they had no information on the case. I then turned to my contact in the Defense Ministry, and, after some time, he arranged for me to meet with a more senior Defense official. Initially, the meeting produced another denial. The senior military man said "We don't know anything about this and you shouldn't be talking to us in the first place. You should talk to the Foreign Ministry, we don't have anything to do with this." Well, it turned out in fact they did have something to do with it. Several days later, I was called back to the Defense Ministry and the official told me the missing Vietnamese had been detained by a local unit and they supposedly had not informed other local or national government authorities. This supposedly explained the lack of information about the case in the Foreign Ministry or elsewhere in Hanoi. According to the Defense Ministry official, the local unit claimed this young man, his brother and father had killed people when they stole a boat to escape from Vietnam. The unit, part of the Vietnamese Navy, claimed this Vietnamese man was going to go on trial for robbery and murder. The Defense official concluded this was a heinous crime and I should not get involved in the issue because this individual deserved to be punished by the Vietnamese courts.

Nonetheless, I went back to the Foreign Ministry with the story and complained about notification and access and they promised to work on the case, though they too by then had learned enough to suggest this individual was going to be tried and likely sentenced to a considerable time in jail. Perhaps only a week later the Vietnamese-American in question showed up at the Consulate in Ho Chi Minh City. He said he was getting ready to go home and that the whole issue in the delta with the military had been "no problem." As he explained it, it was only a question of getting some money to the right people and the whole case was dropped. He further explained that the local military authorities demanded something like $150,000 or some such astronomical amount of money. The Vietnamese man said he kept talking the issue over with the authorities and he gradually got the local authorities to keep lowering the figure in question -- I think it finally was six or seven thousand or eight thousand dollars, something like that. The man was allowed to contact his family and friends in the U.S. and he got the money into the country and paid it to the local naval unit. Good to their end of the bargain, the Vietnamese Navy unit released him and canceled the prospective trial. The man seemed to think nothing of his experience and told our Consulate officers "I'm going to come back next year with my brother and my father." I told the Consular officers to tell him he was out of his mind to do so and that he shouldn't even think about doing that because the Vietnamese unit could decide to arrest the other family members for the same reasons just as they had arrested him. But, whether he or they returned or not I don't know, I never heard anything further about this particular story. One thing I'm more certain of is our "interference" in the process probably cost the local navy unit some of its US dollar payment. Once the higher authorities were made aware of the issue, I'm sure they also collected a share of the funds the Vietnamese American deposited with the local officials.

This was a particular Vietnam war-connected issue. But, by and large, the problems we had with Vietnamese-Americans or non-Vietnamese Americans were the kinds of problems you'd have in any American Citizens Services case file abroad. A couple goes abroad and they fight the same way they do at home and maybe there's an injury or a death involved. People get drunk and disorderly. People get into fights or get beat up on the street and robbed. These situations happen anywhere abroad. There was one situation involving American males in the south that was worrisome. We thought there might have been a gang operating in Saigon, giving people lethal injections after they robbed them. We had two or three people between their 30s and 50s who wandered out of a bar area in the city and were later found dead quite far away, suggesting they had been deliberately taken elsewhere. I don't recall the Vietnamese authorities solving this case, so I can't tell you whether anyone ever determined what happened or who was responsible.

In general, I think the Vietnamese-Americans tended to be pretty cautious. The younger ones who knew about Vietnam from their parents and elders started out being very circumspect because they'd grown up hearing how bad the communists were. The older Vietnamese arrived with that fear of being detained and they tried to make sure they didn't attract any unwanted attention. With all of the anti-communist rhetoric in the Vietnamese communities abroad, surprisingly you didn't have people coming back and trying to pass out anti-communist propaganda materials. Sure, sometimes people were detained because they were found with anti-communist literature when their baggage was screened but rarely did you have to visit somebody in jail who had been actively spreading the anti-communist message. There was one notable exception to this generalization. One Vietnamese-American who had flown over Cuba a few years earlier dropping anti-communist material turned up in Vietnam during President Clinton's visit. And, he did the same thing he'd done in Cuba. He hired a plane in Cambodia and flew over Ho Chi Minh City to drop his material. Well, the Vietnamese got him and put him in jail awaiting trial and more than a few Vietnamese considered this something that we actually intended. Embassy and Consulate officials spent a lot of effort over the next several months trying to convince the Vietnamese to let him go so we wouldn't have him as a long-term prison case. Eventually, we were successful in getting him out of the country.

Q: How did you work that out?

HARTER: We convinced the Vietnamese his actions were in no way connected to the Clinton visit and that he was really not all there -- he was not mentally sound. The Vietnamese did some investigating and they questioned him extensively, but they didn't go ahead with any prison sentence. They held a trial and he was convicted and sentenced but he was then expelled. His only punishment was the amount of time he spent in prison from the time of his arrest to the time he was released.

Q: How about missionaries?

HARTER: Foreign missionaries were generally not permitted to operate in Vietnam. But, we had a lot of folks who tried to do some proselytizing on the side, just like we did in China.

Missionaries who were active in Vietnam during the war were predominantly Protestants and they generally worked in the highland areas. The minority tribes in these areas were predominantly anti-communist and had worked closely with American military forces. After the unification of the country, they continued to resist Hanoi's intrusion into their lives and territories and they were targeted for special attention by the communist authorities. Former missionaries wanted to go back and work in those areas and this made the whole process seem more sensitive to Hanoi. You may have noticed in the newspaper just last week, there was a Washington Post story which alternately said, five thousand and then fifteen thousand Hmong were coming out of the refugee camps in Laos and Thailand to resettle in Minnesota. Well, this was one of those highland groups who had been connected to the U.S. military.

The highlands were considered sensitive areas, in part because the highland regions were close to the borders -- the Laos-Vietnam border, the Cambodia-Vietnam border, the China-Vietnam border. And, even before Vietnam invaded Cambodia and the Chinese got involved in support of the Cambodians by attacking the Vietnamese border regions in the north, Hanoi had to deal with Montagnard rebel groups, anti-communist Lao fighters, and a few South Vietnamese holdouts, all of whom were active close to the international frontiers. While most communist states try to suppress religious activity, there was still a good deal of Buddhist and Catholic religious activity in Vietnam. Neither of these religious groups were favorably inclined to Protestant missionaries, so this too helped to solidify Hanoi's stance against any resumption of religious activity in the highlands.

Catholic Church activity was quite interesting. Catholicism was still actively practiced in Hanoi. When the two separate regimes were established in the north and the south after the French defeat, most of the people who fled from the north to the south were Catholics. Nonetheless, there were Catholic churches in Hanoi that remained open during the war and other churches in the north had reopened in the 1990s. Traveling in the countryside in the north, you would see a lot of shuttered churches in the villages, and most of these were the ones that had shut down when whole villages fled Ho Chi Minh and the communists in 1955. The Ambassador and others in the diplomatic community would regularly attend services with the local Catholics in Hanoi, and he was married in the Catholic Cathedral in Hanoi. I don't remember whether we actually discussed that wedding before. It was interesting to see how the Vietnamese Government played this situation.

When he arrived in Vietnam, Ambassador Peterson was a widower. His wife had died of cancer some years ago. Shortly after he arrived, he attended a summertime dinner party at the Israeli Ambassador's residence, and he found himself seated next to a Vietnamese-Australian who was then the Australian Embassy's trade officer. She had gone to Vietnam a few years earlier as the representative of an Australian bank but had been recruited by the Embassy to promote Australian trade opportunities. The Ambassador and the Trade Officer soon were "the couple" of Hanoi. Vietnamese officials were very pleased because the American Ambassador was going to marry a Vietnamese woman and the whole idea of a big diplomatic wedding was thought to be quite wonderful. There was also a fair amount of public knowledge in Hanoi about the two of them being together. But, this public awareness also seemed to cause the Party and Government officials some concern. I think these officials thought it would suggest too close a relationship between the US and Vietnam if the authorities gave too much attention to the wedding.

When it came to the actual day of the wedding, there was absolutely no mention of it in any newspaper in Hanoi -- no photographs, nothing at all. And there certainly was no mention in the TV news coverage for the day. A very, very small number of Vietnamese from the immediate area near the cathedral, attracted by all the vehicles arriving there, did gather around the church. The cathedral is right in the middle of a residential and shopping area of Hanoi so it would have been very difficult for the activities there not to be noticed. But, the government certainly kept people from outside the immediate area of the cathedral from coming into the square. So, only a few local people were outside the church at the time of the wedding. And, for the most part, Vietnamese officials did not come to the wedding or the reception. One of the receptions held by the Ambassador and his wife did include a smattering of Vietnamese friends and a few medium-ranked “token” officials who were assigned to go. The vast majority of Vietnamese invitees were simply told they couldn’t attend.

While the Vietnamese did appear to have deliberately downplayed the wedding, the concept of “token” representation was a standard policy for foreign functions in Vietnam. When you had a reception, a national day function or some special visitor in town to introduce to Vietnam, Vietnamese officials had to get permission from their work units to attend the function. For most ministries or departments, people were designated to attend the function, even though they might not be the individuals who had the closest working contacts. When it came to a national day reception, it was usually the official who was in charge of the “friendship association” between Vietnam and the foreign country who attended as the “official” representative to present Hanoi’s toast to the foreign Ambassador. The other Vietnamese official attendees would be designated ministry representatives. At Vietnamese Government hosted functions, the ministry and department representation was much larger, but it was still based on the attendees being assigned to represent their offices.

Q: You mean even at a Fourth of July?

HARTER: Yes, or any other National Day or any big visit reception you had. Vietnamese attendees were authorized to go or told to stay home. You would have an event where, for example, we would invite all of our major contacts for the Fourth of July to the reception. We would deliberately hold the event in a hotel ballroom so nobody would be concerned about having to go to the Embassy or the U.S. Ambassador’s residence. It was always at a venue the largest number of people could go to. We would invite all of our working-level contacts in the Government, some people who were primarily Party cadre, as well as key ministers and other Ministry people you frequently worked with. If you got two ministers beyond the person who was officially designated by the Vietnamese to handle the toasting requirements, then you had really been blessed. Otherwise, you got only a handful of the invited contacts; interestingly though, you’d get more of the military contacts than the civilian ones. There was an established military attaché corps which interacted with a set group of Vietnamese military officials. And, that set group of Vietnamese military went everywhere, to all of the national day receptions. But, on the civilian side, on the party side, on the government side, it was not like that.

Q: I would imagine that attendance, then, became a political barometer of, who was doing what to whom, or even that they were loosening up? Do you know what I mean?

HARTER: Well, a lot of the problem was trying to figure out the relationships and the alliances and how the various leaders dealt with one another to get things done. It was very much the same as when I'd been a China watcher in Hong Kong and later in China -- looking at the national and local government leaders trying to figure out how decisions were being made and who was lined up behind whom. When this fellow, Le Kha Phieu came into office, he had clearly been a last minute choice for the leadership --

Q: This is the assertive-type guy?

HARTER: He's the Commissar, Political Commissar from the military who came in when Do Muoi stepped down as Party General Secretary. He'd clearly been a compromise candidate, he was not really known to very many people at all. He started out, as I said earlier, trying to make a public relations push for the Party, trying to establish himself as a man of the people. He talked about changing this and modernizing that and then went back into the Party headquarters and gradually retreated into a shell where he just didn't do anything. The Party and the Government started to open up things a bit more and the new leaders all began to talk about more changes. But, in fact, the decision-making process didn't get any better. The three elders -- the Communist Party General Secretary, the Prime Minister, and the President (a top military leader) -- during the previous period had agreed to step down simultaneously because none of them trusted the others or wanted them to have stronger roles in naming their successors. So this trio, more or less decided who would take over those three positions. And, although they all stepped down at the same time, they didn't remove themselves from decision-making. They sat behind the scenes and got involved in all of the decisions. And so, the new Party General Secretary and the new Prime Minister weren't the chief arbiters of policy. You got people elevated into positions of prominence but these younger, up and coming leaders got titles before they got power. The current Party Chairman is not even an ethnic Vietnamese, he is from one of the northern minority peoples. He had been a leader in the National Assembly and was a very impressive, very savvy fellow. But, I don't know that he has been given the freedom to reset things in a more open fashion, even though he is certainly so inclined. Foreign business people and those involved in the international aid programs were very frustrated by their inability to get the Vietnamese to make decisions.

Q: Were you seeing sons and daughters of the Cadre moving up?

HARTER: Yes. That's the norm, just as it was in China. The so-called "cadre kids" got opportunities the ordinary Vietnamese never had, entrance to the best schools, overseas study opportunities, options to start businesses which immediately had "contracts" to provide services to the Government or Party. And yes, you heard stories of corruption and cadre kids getting away with, in some cases, murder. An ordinary Vietnamese would have never been able to avoid prison or execution. On the other hand, there would be periodic crackdowns and some lesser lights and some junior cadre would get slapped on the wrist or, if the corruption issue was particularly egregious, they sometimes were severely punished.

Q: What about American business people who came in there? I mean, one thing they want to know is what are the rules and are the rules abided by? Was this happening?

HARTER: The rules weren't followed. But, even worse, the rules were constantly being revised and rewritten so it was hard to know what regulations you had to comply with. The Vietnamese never had a legal system which clearly established one law superseded another. So, the old law remained on the books along with the new one, even though they might be mutually contradictory. And, with those kinds of contradictory laws on the books you had to depend on somebody's interpretation of the law to decide, in each particular situation, which of the contradictory laws might be applied. American and many other foreign businessmen found this situation unacceptable.

Q: Well, one of the big reasons that we push for recognition was that all of our Western competitors and Japanese had gone in there and we wanted to get in there. But, when we got in there I take it, it wasn't that great a place to --

HARTER: Not at all, it wasn't a good place to do business at all.

Q: I mean, this would be true for our competitors too?

HARTER: Absolutely, absolutely. Deals did get done by a lot of these other businesses which did not have to operate under the terms of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. They were able to open some factories and produce products for the local market as well as for export and some of them made money. But, most of them didn't make a lot of money. What they did get was what the business world calls "market share" and "brand identification". For many of the Japanese firms, that was what they wanted. They tended to take a longer-term view of market opportunities than a lot of the U.S. people did.

We had huge problems with some of the companies that came in. I had worked with the Proctor and Gamble folks in Southern China when they opened up there and they had gone through a very exhaustive process of looking for a partner to work with. They had done a very good job of putting their business model together and they had been exceptionally successful in China. They came into Vietnam in the same way and with the same due diligence. They had to find a partner and they were given a number of suggestions on which company to choose by Vietnamese officials. P&G started relying on one consultant, a person who was related to a high-level official, and who provided them with a lot of "inside" information about how the company could get things done. This is the kind of thing a lot of the cadre kids got involved in, brokering deals for foreigners with Vietnamese partners. This particular consultant made the local P&G team feel they were on the right track. So, Proctor and Gamble got themselves set up with a partner. Once the partnership was concluded, P&G discovered that this partner was also the local partner of their chief international competitor and their chief foreign competitor in Vietnam, Unilever, maker of the original Lever Brothers products. P&G soon discovered their local partner was passing on all of the P&G plans to the local Uni Lever officials. Because the Unilever people weren't under the same Foreign Corrupt Practices Act restrictions, they were making under the table payments to the local partner for this information and, as a result, they were able to undercut virtually everything that Proctor and Gamble wanted to do.

P&G came to the Embassy for help and we had to assist them to arrange a divorce from their local partner. P&G wanted at that point to be a hundred percent foreign-invested company. This was not to the Vietnamese liking, because they had not wanted to have any fully owned foreign ventures. They always wanted partnerships, because in this way they would have an opportunity to help elevate local businesses, and to have an opportunity to pirate the information and technology that the foreign companies had. For the Vietnamese, it wasn't just a question of the foreign company coming in and paying some taxes for the benefit of the Government, but they would get the knowledge and the technology to help them modernize their own industry. For P&G, it was a costly procedure but they were finally able to operate independently, though I'm not sure it would have been possible without the interventions of the Embassy. Smaller companies without the financial clout or global reputation of P&G had a much harder time making things work so that they could stay in business and earn some return. They were constantly being pressured by one organization or another to do things that were not exactly legal. Some of them I guess did what they were asked to do, others didn't.

Q: Well now, the company was getting pressure, particularly a smaller company, in a way it couldn't take care of itself. Would they come to you and tell you about you it?

HARTER: Sometimes they would, yes.

Q: Could you do anything?

HARTER: We could basically counsel them, as we did in China, about the problems of staying within the lines of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. Without fail we would suggest they take a hard look at who they're using for advisors and consultants and to try to ensure they had more reputable people to work with. This was about the most we could do.

But, for the big companies that were trying to develop natural resources or to get involved in government projects, it was the decision-making process I told you about earlier that was probably more frustrating. During the time I was there, many of the U.S. oil companies that had hoped to resume their pre-1975 explorations finally give up and just left. They decided there was no possibility of getting anywhere. In spite of the total collapse of the Soviet Union and the fact there was no Comecon Bloc supporting them, the Russians were still very influential and dominated the exploitation of the Vietnamese oil resources. The U.S. firms and the Embassy kept telling the Vietnamese, "you've had declining production for years in these existing oil fields because neither you nor the Russians have adequate technology to exploit the fields properly. We have technology that will enable you to extract more oil from these fields. We know what's down there and you know what's down there and we can bring in the needed technology to exploit those resources." But, the Russians blocked it every single time. When it came to letting out new exploration blocks and encouraging the search for new fields, the only place the Vietnamese were willing to let American firms go was in the ocean areas between China and Vietnam. Sometimes, the Vietnamese would approve an exploration arrangement where a few lesser US firms had only a very small minority interest in a package primarily being handled by South Koreans and Vietnamese and other international partners. So, it was a very difficult for the big oil players and they finally gave up and closed their Vietnam offices. And, just as they had been once before in China, the oil companies had been the biggest U.S. investors in Vietnam; so when these companies left, the U.S. share of the Vietnamese investment market plunged dramatically.

Q: Today is the 14th of October, 2004. Dennis, let's talk about the Trade Agreement. Once again, you were in Hanoi from when to when?

HARTER: I got there in the summer of 1997 and I stayed there until the summer of 2001. I was Deputy to Pete Peterson and then for about the last four months I was chargé, awaiting the arrival of the new DCM and the new Ambassador.

Q: OK. Well now, let's talk, we've covered everything, I mean you said a long time convoluted trade things. Start from, how did this trade get in the works and how did it develop?

HARTER: When we first started talking about normalization of relations with the Vietnamese, the Vietnamese wanted political normalization, but what they wanted more than anything else was trade relations and most favored nation status. They wanted us to end the embargo and other restrictions which had been imposed as the result of their invasion of Cambodia. And, as we began the process of normalization, once we did make certain basic progress on their withdrawal from Cambodia and on MIA case resolution, President Clinton ended the embargo and we continued on with the normalization discussions. Once we had completed normalization the Foreign Minister said, "Now we have to go on to normalize trade relations and get most favored nation status." We set up a series of meetings and discussions for USTR representatives to meet with the Vietnamese so we could learn more about their economic system. As part of this process, I went on one trip to Hanoi with an officer from EB (Economic Bureau) in State to talk to the Vietnamese about their economic system and the rules and regulations they had in place regarding trade, investment, and business operations. And, that was ultimately the crunch test, we had to evaluate what changes were necessary in the Vietnamese economic structure that would make their system compatible with the rest of the world. The U.S. tried to create a set of standards that Vietnam would have to meet in order to make it possible for them to be a part of the international trading community. As we advertised it to the Vietnamese, everything you're going to do with us in a bilateral agreement to open up your trade and investment system will ultimately assist you in getting into the WTO, the World Trade Organization. Vietnam, of course, was not a member of the WTO and they knew they needed to take that step too to get into the global trading community. The Vietnamese acknowledged what we said and recognized that getting trade relations established with us would help to ease the problem of meeting WTO standards.

We had many discussions with the Foreign Minister and with the Trade Minister. Trade Minister Triet came to the United States soon after the normalization of diplomatic relations and had a series of meetings at the State Department, at Treasury, and at USTR and Commerce to review the basic issues. There was a considerable degree of difficulty in comprehension. The Vietnamese just simply did not seem to understand how much was going to be involved in getting their economic system into the mainstream of international trade. While part of this may have been a problem of translation, it was clear to me and a few others on our side that many of the Trade Ministry people, including the Trade Minister, didn't understand the concepts. Fortunately, a couple of more savvy people from the Foreign Ministry and from the Office of the Government in Hanoi had been included in the delegation. They had a much broader level of international experience and better understood the economic issues.

Q: What was his background, did you know?

HARTER: I don't know that much about his background. He was certainly a senior member of both the government and the party. He was only Trade Minister for about a year to a year and a half after normalization and he retired. But the new Trade Minister, Trade Minister Tuyen, who succeeded him was an absolute disaster. He was a political choice who clearly knew absolutely zero about trade and moreover, was basically dense. No one except a few sycophants in his own Ministry had any respect for him whatsoever.

But now I'm getting ahead of the story. After the first round of meetings for Minister Triet, it became clear to myself and a couple of others that the Trade Minister and his Ministry colleagues just did not comprehend the basic issues. This convinced me we had to try to set up another more private session for Triet to see if the issues could be simplified and presented more directly. Some of these earlier meetings had large numbers of people involved on both sides. And yes, the Trade Minister was the key person and was the head of the delegation, but there were so many other people involved in the initial meetings that it was very difficult to really focus the discussions. So, I went to the people we worked with in the Economic Bureau to ask Alan Larson to chair a smaller session with Triet and a few other Vietnamese delegation members. Larson at that time was the Under Secretary for Economic, Energy and Business Affairs at State [Ed: served from November 1999 to February 2005]. Larson had chaired the first State Department meeting with the large group from Vietnam and he too thought a smaller meeting made sense. I also went to one of the Vietnamese Foreign Ministry people and one from the Office of Government on the delegation who I believed really knew the issues and understood the western concepts better than anybody else on the Vietnamese side. Both of these people had been educated in the United States for extended periods with graduate degree level courses. They understood English and they understood western economics, and they had enough stature in the Vietnamese delegation that if they said something different from what the translator had said, they would be respected for both the translation and the substance of what they were explaining. And, once we got Minister Triet in that smaller meeting, you could almost see the little light bulb go off over his head. Larson did an outstanding job of simplifying complicated issues and you could tell by the different type of questions Triet asked he understood the concepts. You could see he was focused now on really what the key problems were going to be for the Vietnamese Government. He was beginning to conceptualize how the Vietnamese had to break down the State-managed system and open things up to competition and what this would mean, if in fact U.S. businesses were allowed to come in and set up joint ventures or fully-owned ventures in the country. At that session, the U.S. side gave Triet a draft outline of a prospective trade agreement.

The next meeting which was to take place in Hanoi did not occur as quickly as we had originally projected because Triet had such a big job to do to explain the depth of change and breadth of change that was going to be required in the Vietnamese economic system. The Vietnamese at this time were also transitioning in a new party and government leadership which meant not everyone could be fully devoted to the trade agreement issues.

As I've already related, the three top Vietnamese leaders had agreed to step down together and a new group of leaders would assume their positions. The three who were stepping down were key leaders from the Ho Chi Minh-era who had earned their status and stature through the war and their relationship to Ho. Anybody else who was coming up after them would have been minor or mid-level party, government or military men during the war-time era. They did not have any real stature, except perhaps locally or within a small bureaucracy. They could not directly assume a leadership mantle based on association with Ho Chi Minh or from their leadership roles in war-time service. Those of us who were watching the political situation expected there to be a period of relatively uncertain leadership and one that would be very cautious. That new decision-making apparatus turned out to be even more cautious, because the person who was made the head of the Party and hence primus inter pares, had no real understanding of international politics, let alone, how to get the country's economy going domestically. As a political commissar, his background was ideological, and, based on his public remarks you did not have the impression he was a person with a breadth of understanding of modern society, economics, or politics. So, a lot of getting him to understand the trade agreement issues was going to involve a basic education – it was probably more primitive than Economics 101.

When we started out the next round of meetings, we again had the large delegations involved. But, starting with our follow-on visit to Hanoi, these were large delegations focused on working-level people. We didn't bring ministers along for any of these discussions – no Secretary of State, or Secretary of Commerce. We had a USTR (U.S. Trade Representatives Office) negotiator as the head of delegation. Behind him we had people from Commerce and State and Agriculture and a number of other groups within the State Department bureaucracy, the Economic Affairs Bureau, people like that, who were part of this overall discussion. And they didn't all just meet together at the same time. They spread out and had smaller sessions on their own, exploring, from the U.S. perspective different economic operations so we too had a better understanding of the Vietnamese system.

Q: As you put this together, even the first set of meetings, but the second meetings, was the attitude, you know, this is really a two part or one. This is to get the Untied States and Vietnam going, but this really is to get Vietnam into the World Trade Organization. Was there a difference? Was there a discrepancy between these two goals?

HARTER: There was only in the sense that we, the U.S., didn't care about the second issue whatsoever. We weren't worried about that. That was something the Vietnamese were going to have to deal with and they were going to have to conduct their own negotiations with the WTO in Geneva. They were going to have to respond to questions from the WTO members about their economy. We simply explained to them that there wasn't anything that we were going to do bilaterally that was going to hinder that WTO entrance process and in fact, it would facilitate whatever they had to do to meet those requirements. So, we pretty much stayed out of that issue. We told the Vietnamese if they wanted help we'd be willing to provide it, but in fact they ended up going for help with their WTO membership to other organizations. They got help from the World Bank, they got help from the IMF, they got help from Europeans to facilitate their dealings with the WTO. Unless things have changed in the last year, Vietnam is still not a full member of the WTO. Their negotiations with the WTO were, as they often were with us, hard to comprehend. The Vietnamese would come in and lay out responses to WTO questions and they'd present a plan on how to meet WTO obligations and both we and the Europeans would sit there and say, "But this doesn't answer the question." At times, you had the feeling Vietnam was like a ship passing its destination in the night without any clear signal of where it thought it was going.

Q: What about China? I mean, China had, I realize the Chinese and Vietnamese aren't exactly on the best terms. Was there a Chinese, I mean China at this time was going through some of the same?

HARTER: Correct. They're still doing the same --

Q: Could there be any crossover?

HARTER: There may have been. I just am not aware of anybody saying the Chinese and the Vietnamese were ever really talking about this among themselves. Clearly the Chinese were getting a lot more help from us on the WTO and a lot more support from a lot of countries, because of its size and economic clout. Vietnam was basically one of the also-rans in the whole process. Internationally there was a feeling it would be nice to have Vietnam in the WTO to keep up the idea of universality. But if they weren't in not a lot of people would care much about it. At the time, in terms of its economic clout, the Vietnamese economy would barely match one of the major provinces of China. On the other hand, everyone wanted China to sign on to the WTO in order to better ensure that it operated more according to the international trading rules – though I'm not sure anybody has yet gotten China to play by rules other than its own. The Chinese and the Vietnamese may have exchanged some information about what they were hearing from the WTO just to make sure that we weren't fiddling them about what they had to do to meet international standards. But, beyond that I'm just not certain there was any real cooperation.

Q: Well then, you were talking about sort of the working level? What were some of the issues particularly as you got into the nitty gritty?

HARTER: The first basic issue was just simply a discussion of the Vietnamese system, finding out exactly how it operated, how trade worked, how companies were set up to do business, and how subsidies occurred, and how the government supported various industries. We actually still haven't sorted all of that stuff out. We're still objecting to the volume of Vietnamese exports to the United States on the grounds of them being from a non-market economy. Since they are not a market economy, we end up creating artificial models of how the economy operates to then measure how they are subsidizing their exports to the United States. Using these formulations, we have recently pretty much clobbered the Vietnamese on two basic seafood exports to the United States. One is shrimp, but the biggest one is catfish exports. The Vietnamese had managed a fairly substantial increase in their sales of both products to the United States, but they were still only a small portion of the overall U.S. market. Based on the U.S. analysis of their non-market economy model, we calculated such a high degree of government subsidy of these industries that we were able to impose stiff tariffs which severely cut into the Vietnamese export effort.

But, I'm off the track again. During the discussion round in Hanoi, the range of issues was quite considerable. Our delegation would split up and we would have some small agriculture-to-agriculture, commerce-to-trade ministry talks. And then, you'd have the plenary sessions where all of the visitors would follow the USTR and Trade Ministry representatives outline of issues as they tried to find common ground for an agreement. After three or four of these meetings, where we seemed to be reviewing an awful lot of very basic things, it seemed we were having to repeat discussions that had been held months before. There were still concerns about comprehension problems on the Vietnamese side. Some of us began to try to define the problems on the Vietnamese side and it all seemed to come back to the new leadership. We weren't sure the trade discussions were actually getting reported back into the hierarchy in a way that they could understand. There was also a possibility some of the trade people who were reporting back to the leadership were reluctant to talk about how big the gaps were between the two systems, fearing they might be told not to pursue the trade dialogue because it was so antithetical to the communist system.

Look at it from the perspective of this new leadership in Hanoi. They are inherently more conservative and cautious about breaking new ground. They're not very knowledgeable about the international system. Told about the changes that have to be made to meet the US expectations, they could just throw up their hands and say the Americans are trying to screw us again. It would not be illogical for them to simply walk away from the talks and to try to soldier on the way they had in the past. In fact, once we had completed the negotiation of the agreement, that's exactly where we ended up, with the Vietnamese not following through with the signing. But, again that's going a little bit ahead of the progression of the talks.

After one of my trips to Hanoi, I went over to see Joe Damond who was the Trade Representative Office designee to conduct the negotiations with Vietnam. I said to him, "We've already got a trade agreement process worked out with the Cambodians and we've been at this with the Vietnamese for a certain amount of time, but nobody has talked about doing anything with Laos. Why don't we take a look at Laos and see what's going on there?" He said, "Well, I suppose we could. It would be a nice package to get it all done and take care of the old Indochina or Vietnam War era countries, but nobody knows what the hell is going on in Laos in terms of the economy or anything else." I said, "Well look, I have enough flexibility in my travel time here and I have the State desk responsibility for Laos; I'll take somebody else along who's more knowledgeable on economic issues and we'll talk trade issues with the Lao and see what might be possible."

And so, along with an EB officer, Bill Heidt, I went to Laos and started talking with some Lao Ministry officials. We explained about how we'd negotiated a trade agreement with Cambodia and they knew we were talking with the Vietnamese. When we asked if the Lao Government was interested in a bilateral trade agreement they agreed, at the working level, it would be a good idea. Up the line, more senior Lao officials decided they should have a trade agreement with the U.S. since the two countries had never broken relations and they should have an agreement if the Khmer and the Vietnamese had them. So, as we started reviewing the basic issues and were getting answers to our questions about the Lao economic system, we learned that none of the obstacles that had to be overcome in the system in Hanoi existed in Laos. They didn't have any of the rules or regulations or any of the communist control systems. The Lao economy was just "functioning" without a lot of rules or regulations. There weren't any problems in the sense that everything had to be done a certain way that was inconsistent with the international trade regime. And, the Lao Government and Party regulations didn't set up a lot of absolutes which fixed how the economy was to be managed. So, I went back to Joe Damond at USTR and told him that Laos appeared to be wide open in terms of their economic system. They were interested in having a trade agreement, they would like to have us help them get into the WTO, and all it needed was for him to convince USTR to expand his authority so he could talk to the Lao. And, sure enough USTR did authorize him to talk to the Lao and I think it was less than nine months, maybe even less than six months of talks and exchanges and we had negotiated a trade agreement with the Lao. Everything was really going along quite smoothly.

Once it was all pulled together, there were questions in the Administration about the timing of when the agreement was going to be sent up to Congress for ratification. Unfortunately, we ran into a problem with Congress which made it very difficult to get anyone there willing to consider it. Some Lao-American highlanders disappeared in Laos while on a visit. The Lao Government claimed to have no understanding or knowledge of what was going on. But, it was believed this group was working with the resistance movement in the highlands against the Lao Government. The U.S. Government, human rights advocates, and certainly the U.S. Lao-American Montagnard groups believed the Lao Government killed them. So, as soon as there was some thought of sending this trade agreement forward for Congressional review and approval, the issue of the missing Lao-Americans was raised and the agreement was side-lined. As far as I know, the US-Lao Trade Agreement has still not been submitted to Congress on the grounds the Lao Government has still not answered “our requests for information and details on the disappearance of these individuals.” It’s unfortunate, because as I said, the Lao agreement was a snap. It was an absolute slam-dunk. The Lao wanted it, we wanted it, and there were basically no obstacles to negotiating it. Whether it would be an effective trade agreement was still to be determined. As I said, the Lao Government didn’t have a lot of sophistication and it wasn’t the most effective governing body. So whether they could have enforced the terms they had agreed to was still an open question. But, at the time, we certainly could have had a completed trade agreement with the Lao and wrapped up another of the wartime problems from the 1970s.

Going back to Vietnam, the Vietnamese kept saying to us, “Give us a draft, give us a draft.” And we kept saying, “You’re not ready for a draft. You still haven’t indicated a comprehension of the basic issues enough to be in a position to start altering your own rules and regulations – in fact, so far you haven’t even indicated you’re ready to alter them.” And the Vietnamese kept saying that, “If we don’t have a draft, we can’t get the ministers or the Party to focus on it. They’re not going to talk about changing this or changing that until they can absolutely see what is involved and how it stacks up against other things that we’ve done.” So, that was a bit of a problem for our side. It wasn’t easy to get USTR to give the Vietnamese a draft. Other agencies had some input, but USTR was the primary drafter and creator of this document. And, I believe Joe Damond actually did virtually all of the writing himself. With both the Vietnamese and the State Department working on USTR, we eventually did get them to submit a draft.

Q: Well, isn't there a basic standard that we can take off the shelf? I mean are these things that have to be handcrafted?

HARTER: I think there is a basic draft, but the agreements have to be hand-crafted and tailored to the individual country, because in fact they require countries to take away certain rules and regulations that are country-specific. And, as part of the negotiating process we try to determine from U.S. business and industry what the subjects are of greatest interest to them in that particular country and focus some of our requests for changes and modifications to meet their areas of greatest interest.

The trade agreements are in a sense standard. But the agreements have to be tailored so that you can alter the specific laws and regulations in a particular country, so they will meet global standards. In addition, the USTR and Commerce folks like to have a dialogue with U.S. business interests to determine areas these businesses find most appealing for investment or trade and, thereafter, tailor the agreement to reflect those interests. For example, one of the chief U.S. interests in Vietnam was the telecommunications sector. So, in negotiating the trade agreement we wanted to include a specific schedule of opening up of the telecommunications sector in Vietnam to foreign investment and foreign competition. We wanted some very specific things done with regard to the banking, finance, and insurance industries. These were all industries American companies were interested in and where we wanted to try and get some leg-up for American business to operate in Vietnam. Now, of course, while the trade agreement is designed to provide some boost for American business, in fact the new trade regime you create is not entirely U.S. specific. It is actually a global agreement. Because the global trading system is so inter-connected, when you open up the insurance sector in Vietnam for American business, Japanese and European and other nation's firms are also able to go in at the same time and under the same terms, because, for the most part, all nations have what is known as most-favored-nation trading/investment status with Vietnam in their own bilateral agreements.

Q: Well tell me now, how far, I mean in our analysis, how far had France, Japan, England, UK and others, how much progress had they made in agreements or were we kind of the point person?

HARTER: We were definitely on the point for trying to develop a full-fledged comprehensive trade agreement. But, a number of other countries had very basic agreements established well before ours. The basic agreements were enough to give them the MFN (Most Favored Nation) status that thereby applied to their trade relations whatever we specifically negotiated. It was very clear once we broke open, under very specific terms, various sectors of the Vietnamese market we were in fact opening it up all the way to the rest of the world. And, of course, this was one of the things we kept selling to the Vietnamese. Getting the U.S. trade agreement concluded would enable them to extend the same treatment to other countries and all of that in turn would enhance their WTO membership opportunities. One of our chief objectives was "leveling the playing field" for American businesses and American investors, because in some cases certain foreign trade partners with Vietnam had obtained special advantages which we could not tap into because we did not have MFN status there. But all of this "leveling" of opportunities for foreign business worried the Vietnamese. Throughout our discussions, the Vietnamese were very concerned about how the onslaught of international competition would swamp some of their basic industries, many of which were getting into a global market for the very first time. The trade embargo and the isolation imposed on Vietnam as a result of its invasion of Cambodia in 1979 had really shut down Vietnam's access to the international market system until the early 1990s. There just was no real understanding within the Vietnamese banking and finance and commercial systems about much of the international trade regime or international finance and banking. As a result, during the various negotiating rounds, the Vietnamese were trying to negotiate phased, and I should say long-term phased, opening of virtually every sector of their economy – the industries, the financial and commercial institutions – to global competition.

After a series of marathon negotiations, we concluded an agreement in the summer of 1999. A senior USTR representative, Ambassador Richard Fisher and the Vietnamese Trade Minister, Minister Tuyen, signed an “agreement in principle” in July. All of the elements were in place and the terms were as clear as they could be made. Once we had initialed the agreement, the Vietnamese, and we had a great celebration and everyone was feeling very positive. On the US side we said everything is all set and we can just proceed to a formal signing ceremony. And the Vietnamese officials initially all said, “Yes, that would be very, very good.” But the Vietnamese couldn’t follow through. Trade Minister Tuyen couldn’t really comprehend a lot of what was in the agreement and the agreement basically languished in the ether for several weeks. Nothing moved, and the Vietnamese trade officials were not responsive in follow-up discussions. The more we talked about it with the people on the ground, the more we talked about it with sources that we had inside the Vietnamese government who themselves were anxious to see the agreement move forward, the more we were convinced the Trade Minister just really wasn’t conveying the material in a realistic way to the leadership. He was mischaracterizing some of the elements of the agreement and, because many of the top Party leaders didn’t really understand what the international trade regime was all about, they were reluctant to move forward.

From the U.S. perspective, we believed we had talked through all of the elements and that moving forward should be straightforward. As a result, the US negotiators proposed putting the whole package together for signature as we approached the end of the Clinton presidency. On the U.S. side, we thought it would be fitting if we could wrap up the agreement by the time the President visited Vietnam in November 2000. But the Vietnamese still weren’t moving. We finally decided that we needed to make another direct push. The Ambassador, myself and a few others went to the Vietnamese Ministry officials and to other Party and Government leaders and said, “We need to get this trade agreement process back on track. President Clinton is interested in visiting Vietnam. The President’s visit and Vietnam’s re-entry into the international community could be a great symbol for our two countries to finally mark the conclusion of the entire war era antagonism. We ought to re-energize this negotiation process.” We convinced enough people in the Foreign Ministry and other Ministries and also some in the senior leadership of the government that this was the way to go. We resumed talks and there were some changes made in the originally concluded agreement, even though both sides had been satisfied with it a year earlier. After concluding the agreement once again, however, the Vietnamese still felt uncomfortable with some of the terms, and we conceded on a few additional issues they were interested in. None of the changes had much substance, but at least they made the Vietnamese a bit more comfortable. At this point, we made a tactical mistake; but we didn’t recognize it as a tactical mistake until it was too late to salvage the agreement for that year.

The tactical mistake was in pushing the Vietnamese to finalize the agreement quickly. There was to be an APEC (Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation) meeting in Wellington, New Zealand and both President Clinton and the Vietnamese Prime Minister would be there for the leaders meeting. We said, “This is the way to do it. We’ll get the President involved; you can get your top leadership involved; the two leaders will meet and we’ll sign this agreement. It will bring the relationship into a completely new era. It will be a great symbol, etc etc. And, of course, you realize this is only X number of days away, so we’ve really got to get going and get this arrangement confirmed.”

That approach and pressure set off all the alarm bells within the Vietnamese system that you can imagine. All they could think of was, there’s something in the agreement that’s a problem and the Americans are trying to slip it past us and push this thing through. Our leaders still don’t really understand what this is all about, and when they discover the problem, we’ll get blamed. So, even the Foreign Ministry and the Trade Ministry became hesitant about getting involved. In more or less typical American fashion, we didn’t slow down and try to work things out in a diplomatic fashion: “Well, tell us where you think there’s a problem or is there somebody we can work with in the leadership to help deal with these concerns. How can we help you make this approval process work? Is there some way that we can facilitate whatever it is you need to get approval to do this?” Instead of all those, expressions of concern to facilitate their process, we just kept saying, “It’s X number of days away, we really ought to get this thing signed and we ought to really commit. The President wants to do this.” The Vietnamese just sat on their hands; they just would not do it. After the APEC meeting, the White House was a little ticked off at the Vietnamese, and probably also at the Embassy and USTR because we’d been so certain we could get the Vietnamese to agree to highlight the APEC meetings with our own bilateral event. White House organizers were particularly upset because they were looking for “deliverable” events and ways to emphasize the President’s global responsibilities and his involvement with Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation nations. There were a couple of other APEC-related deliverables, but none that had quite the same kick as the US-Vietnamese Trade Agreement would have provided. But, as I said, it just didn’t work out and the agreement remained in limbo.

Fortunately, over the next few months, while the Vietnamese were still sitting on their hands, there was a decision to change some of the Vietnamese Government officials and change some of the leadership within the Communist Party. The man who had been at the top of the Party, and the man who had been appointed by him to be the Minister of Trade, both departed the scene. Finally, we had someone who was knowledgeable on trade and economics and global relationships running the Ministry. The new Minister of Trade, was previously a Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs. He knew the global diplomatic system; he knew about international negotiations; he knew trade issues. The Party hack who had been managing the Ministry before was shunted back to the local provincial administration where he had previously served and he was no longer in the national leadership councils. The new Party leader came from within the National Assembly leadership and thus he too had a better understanding of the economic issues facing the country – and certainly he knew national and international issues far better than his predecessor who only had a military commissar background.

Once again, the Vietnamese suggested it might be useful to have a few other changes to the agreement to ease their leaders’ concerns and also to make it more reasonable for us to move forward after this second delay. We fiddled with a few of the terms – though I don’t recall the specifics. The changes made it possible for the Vietnamese to suggest they had toughened their stance and had convinced the Americans to alter some terms of the agreement to Vietnam’s advantage. That was enough to tip the balance. Nonetheless, even then, there was still a debate among the elderly “advisors” who had previously been running the country directly about whether this was the right way to proceed. The former Party leader, Do Muoi, who had become an advisor, did not really understand the economics of the agreement and he was also the most conservative of the old leaders. The former President, Le Duc Anh, was also in this conservative group and it took the new Prime Minister, Phan Van Khai, the advisor/former Prime Minister, Vo Van Kiet, the new Party leader, Nong Duc Manh, and the new President, Tran Duc Luong to pull it all together and push the decision through. Prime Minister Khai and his predecessor, Prime Minister Kiet, were themselves both forward looking individuals from the southern part of Vietnam. They had a better understanding of where things were going economically and a better understanding of international issues in general. They were the ones who helped bring the agreement to a successful conclusion.

Stepping back from the negotiations, the trade agreement was not in itself anything particularly remarkable, and it did not immediately make things significantly easier for American businesses to operate in Vietnam. But, I think the process convinced the Vietnamese that we were sincere in our efforts to assist them to modernize and rejoin the world trading community. It probably also convinced the Vietnamese that they could continue to hang tough on issues and the US and other western nations would eventually meet their negotiating demands. When it came to signing the trade agreement, there was again some toing and froing about how high a level of leader might be involved or if we could tie the signing to some particular bilateral event. But none of that worked out and I believe the way it ended up we signed the agreement simultaneously in both capitals.

The Vietnamese, of course still had unrealistic expectations about what this agreement was going to mean in the short-term. They saw it as giving them a leg up on getting into the WTO. With the U.S. trade agreement in hand, the Vietnamese assumed WTO entrance would be a formality. So, even though they were conducting many dialogues with the WTO headquarters in Geneva during the period of our bilateral trade agreement negotiations, they thought all the WTO problems would disappear once they signed the U.S. trade agreement. The WTO, however, was not prepared to roll over because the Vietnamese signed an agreement with the United States. In fact, the WTO felt the Vietnamese had largely been unresponsive on most of the WTO standards they felt the Vietnamese had to meet.

The Vietnamese also seemed to feel they would immediately be shipping huge quantities of Vietnamese products to the United States as the result of this new trade agreement. But they found that, too, was not so easy. Throughout the negotiations, we had advised the Vietnamese there were many issues they had to understand in order to get into the U.S. market successfully. We talked about the lack of quality control in Vietnamese factories and farms, Vietnam's limited understanding of the U.S. market, and its inability, at that time, to design items for the U.S. market on their own. We tried to explain that even though they were selling product X in Japan or product Y in Europe, Vietnam couldn't just simply ship the same product to be sold in the United States. We tried to explain how there were different interests in product design, or there were issues of safety standards that differed in the various markets. For example, the Vietnamese were exporting all kinds of baby clothes to Japan. They expected to sell the same items in the American market, but they didn't meet fashion standards, design standards, safety standards.

All those issues were new to them. So, none of those immediate expectations were gratified. And, you soon got a lot of grumbling among the Vietnamese manufacturers who wanted to know what good the trade agreement was. In the initial phase of operation, the Vietnamese manufacturers weren't having any success at all. The ones who were successful were the Japanese and Korean firms that invested in Vietnam and immediately produced items to meet American standards.

On the other side of the spectrum, the people who were in the agricultural business as opposed to manufacturing had a sudden opportunity to supply products to the big Asian grocery markets in the U.S. and, soon thereafter to other U.S. markets where seafood and other products had a more universal appeal. Soon the Vietnamese fish industry got linked to the distributors who worked for the major seafood chains in the United States. Red Lobster, Chesapeake Bay Seafood, Long John Silver and other seafood chains were getting large supplies of fish from Vietnam. How it was labeled as a fish, other than that it was from Vietnam, varied from one chain to another once it got in to the United States. Within a couple of years, however, most of the focus was on catfish. Catfish had been specifically discussed and negotiated during the trade agreement. With the agreement of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the term "catfish" was extended to a Vietnamese variety of fish that looked in fact, like a U.S. catfish, a bottom dweller fish with "whiskers" and the sort of flattened head characteristic of the U.S. species. In actuality, it's not exactly the same genus of fish and our Agriculture Department thought perhaps it could be distinguished by calling it basa catfish. The Vietnamese thought that term was OK. This was an U.S. Agriculture Department suggestion and it was worked out during the trade agreement talks. Once the Vietnamese fish were marketed in the US, you could find it in the Asian markets and then in the U.S. supermarkets as well. I first saw it in the U.S., I guess it was 2000 or 2001, in live fish tanks in Houston, Texas in an Asian community grocery store complex. Houston has a series of Asian supermarkets that dwarf the Asian supermarkets in this region. They are almost the size of a Walmart and carry all kinds of Asian food products and cooking implements -- bowls, dishes, chopsticks, woks, charcoal burners, etc.

But let's get back to the catfish issue. Over the past few years, the U.S. Catfish Association spent a lot of time and promotional efforts developing the domestic U.S. market. Catfish became a really popular food item in the United States. The Association became very concerned about the Vietnamese catfish being marketed in the U.S. So, they put a request in to the Commerce Department – not the Agriculture Department – about the Vietnamese exports, charging that the Vietnamese were subsidizing these exports and they were undermining the local U.S. catfish market. The U.S. Commerce Department then was required to conduct an investigation. The case rapidly became politicized and it all went against the Vietnamese.

If it had been agreed Vietnam operated a market economy, Commerce could have conducted a direct investigation on the ground and determined if there were subsidies or not. But Commerce decided Vietnam was still a non-market economy, meaning the Government exercised a lot of control over and direction to economic activity. Because it was a non-market economy you couldn't just simply determine there were no subsidies involved in this particular industry. Commerce was required to compare the costs of raising the fish in Vietnam to other economies where fish are being raised for export. Commerce created some model of India or Bangladesh as a fish raising country and it looked at the costs there as compared with the costs in Vietnam. Commerce concluded Vietnam was subsidizing the export of catfish because the costs for raising the fish in this other "model" were higher than they were in Vietnam. The Commerce decision completely contradicted the survey done by our own USDA representative in Hanoi. He had gone out to the fish farm areas and prepared a very detailed analysis and report on the catfish industry, basically concluding there were no subsidies. Moreover, the USDA report concluded most of the farms that were exporting to the US were local, private entrepreneurs or groups of private entrepreneurs who had banded together to cut costs and export abroad. These farms were not being run by government-directed companies and they weren't getting any special incentives for exporting. Vietnam couldn't believe the Commerce conclusions. I think the catfish struggle began to sour the Vietnamese a bit on the whole value of the trade agreement and to bring some realism to their expectations of how they could exploit the international market. The end result was Vietnam could no longer brand it as catfish or basa catfish, and it had to market the fish under a different name. You'll still find the fish in U.S. Supermarkets, but it is branded as swai. And the U.S. catfish industry has been "saved."

Under the trade agreement, U.S. businesses going into Vietnam couldn't all just pour into Vietnam pell-mell. Each of the various sectors of the economy were opened up under a timetable and investments and individual business operations had to be approved by the Vietnamese Government. Moreover, the Vietnamese still were concerned that situations not tilt overwhelmingly in favor of an international presence and business activity within the country. The Vietnamese felt it was better to balance with some Europeans, some Asians, and some American participants in each of these various sectors. A prime example of this balancing effort in the early phase was the insurance industry. The Vietnamese approved the participation of a European company, a Japanese company, a Taiwan company and an American company to begin to do insurance business in Vietnam. And, each of the companies was permitted to operate in only one segment of the insurance industry. The Vietnamese then did the same thing in banking. Banking licenses were limited, some French, some German, some English, some American, some Japanese banks were permitted to open but the terms of their operations were all different. Some could be in Hanoi, but not in Ho Chi Minh City. Some could be in both. Some could do all types of banking business in Hanoi and more limited business in Ho Chi Minh City. Some were permitted to do all varieties of banking business in Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City.

Thus, even though there was a timetable when the various sectors of the economy would open to foreign investment and operations, in actuality it became a question of balance and staging by the Vietnamese Government. Just as the Vietnamese were disappointed by their inability to move quickly into the U.S. market, U.S. companies were disappointed to find business operations were a good bit more restrictive than they had imagined, even once they accepted the idea they would have to wait for various sectors of the economy to be opened over time. The U.S. had insisted on our companies having the option under the trade agreement of opening wholly owned businesses because of the problems U.S. companies had initially with their local partners – like the ones I described earlier concerning the Proctor and Gamble partnership. However, the Vietnamese are still not fully comfortable with the idea of foreign companies being completely independent as solely owned firms. And, as a result, they have delayed a number of such applications for such a long time that a number of firms either went away or agreed to operate in conjunction with a local partner.

Q: Did you find that at a certain point, you might say the entrepreneurial chromosomes started to kick in, I mean the Orient is a bit like also the Levant?

HARTER: Yes, very much so and particularly in the southern part of the country where there already was a capitalist and market-oriented tradition from the pre-1975 era. Manufacturing for the international market place was focused there as well. Provincial authorities in those areas picked up on the old Taiwan and Chinese models of export zones and special processing zones. They weren't anywhere near as successful in their efforts as either the Chinese or Taiwanese had been but the zones that worked the best were all in the south. The southern efforts were aided by a larger pool of labor, better ports around Saigon and good agricultural products to use in food processing industries. Once local authorities saw this was a useful model for development, every province and region tried to have its own export development or processing zone, whether it made sense to do so or not. The central authorities did not try to create any planned approach, at least not while I was there. As a result, there was no real sensible pattern of development in these zones. The PRC went through a similar phase after they had opened up the first three or four test zones in southern China. Once the Chinese authorities decided to transfer that model to other parts of China, there were lots of regions that wanted to set up the zones. But, the Chinese had a better system of control and didn't allow it to get out of control as the Vietnamese did. I think at one point, the Vietnamese had development zone projects in every province and in some provinces in the south there were more than one. As a result, most of them were doing very little business. Even the zones that were established in primary marketing and export locations, like Haiphong on the coast outside Hanoi, couldn't get off the ground. The zones created in the north often appeared to be the least well planned. They had very large spaces set aside for factories to be constructed, and they put in some basic infrastructure, but even in Haiphong only two or three companies were actually operating after several years of trying to attract investors.

Q: How about the overseas Vietnamese in the United States, particularly of France, but also Australia. Were they beginning to come in and bringing their skills they had learned, in France, United States, or Australia?

HARTER: There was a certain amount of that, particularly among younger Vietnamese. The older Vietnamese, particularly the older generation in the United States and Australia, New Zealand, Canada, – those who were adults when they left Vietnam – were much more negative about doing anything with the Communist regime. This was less of a problem for the Vietnamese in France who had left the country in 1954-1955. They had an additional generation away from the Communist regime and 35 and 40-year old Franco-Vietnamese had less of a direct connection to the Communist past.

Those among the older generation of Vietnamese-Americans who did return tended to focus on social welfare issues rather than trying to engage in commercial activities. Most of them were treated respectfully by the local authorities, but the Vietnamese Government tended to be suspicious of this group and watched them closely. Over time, however, many of them were given more freedom to operate and these Vietnamese-Americans gradually established a basis of trust among the local authorities. Certainly younger people did indeed come back to reconnect with their roots and to see if there was an opportunity to use their "overseas" expertise to make a good living. Some of the youngsters also got involved in social work and tried to focus on education opportunities to help the Vietnamese society to better deal with the outside world. I don't think any of the ones who came to Vietnam looking to make a lot of money actually did, but some of them certainly got some small business operations off to promising starts. Actually, I don't think anybody in the international business community was making lots of money in Vietnam.

Over time however, the Vietnamese successfully adapted to the needs of a market driven export industry and were able to get into the textile and other such basic industry markets in the U.S. They adjusted to U.S. and other global marketing requirements for style, safety, and produced different products for different markets. You can see today even major woman's clothes labels, like Jones of New York and Ann Taylor market products made in Vietnam. In the lower-end apparel lines, items that sell in T J Max or in Kohls or Walmart there is a much wider range of products made in Vietnam. You see a lot of handicrafts or household use items from Vietnam in stores like Pier One or Tuesday Morning. At this time, you don't see much in the way of Vietnamese made electronics or small appliances. Those products with the now well-known Japanese or Korean brand names are generally still made in the Chinese factories. That sort of manufacturing has not moved into Vietnam to any significant degree. Instead, you are seeing Chinese brand names competing with the Korean and Japanese brands, but the products are still largely made in the PRC.

The most specialized of the apparel manufacturers who came to Vietnam were the athletic shoe manufacturers, like NIKE or REEBOK, for example. Over the previous decades, these shoe manufacturers linked up with shoe factories in Asia – initially in Taiwan and Hong Kong, then in Korea, and finally in China – and gave them the designs and the production requirements and let these factories and foreign entrepreneurs make the NIKE or REEBOK shoe. NIKE, for example, generally did not have a direct involvement in the ownership or management of the factory in these overseas locations. Their big contribution to the production process was quality control and ensuring the factory product would meet their international standards. NIKE said, “Here's the shoe we want, the quality standard we want and we want X number of dozen pairs a month to ship abroad.” As the costs began to rise in Taiwan and Hong Kong, the big firms went to Korea. Then Taiwan and Korean entrepreneurs moved factories to China and set up new factory operations there with lower cost Chinese labor. While I was in Vietnam, some of the Korean, Taiwanese, and Hong Kong entrepreneurs started setting up these factories in Vietnam to produce for NIKE among others.

The NIKE operation in Vietnam created a big problem for the company's corporate image and the Embassy ended up very involved in the process of trying to smooth over the difficulties the company had with the Vietnamese Government. Some of the Korean and Taiwan Chinese factory managers were pretty rough with their local Vietnamese employees and it got attention from the local and international media. You'll recall this was the era when there was a lot of international media attention to clothing chains that had factories in Central America that resembled old fashioned sweat shops – poor working conditions, poor health conditions, abusive treatment of employees, underage workers, etc. Some major “name brands” and “celebrity owners” had to get a lot more involved in overseeing what was happening in the locales where they were doing their manufacturing.

NIKE wasn't so smart when the issue first got some public attention in Vietnam. NIKE's comments seemed like they were stonewalling any criticism of the Vietnam operations. As they got more criticism over what was happening in a couple of the factories, NIKE seemed to be more defensive and even less responsive. I must say, I have never seen a more ineptly handled public relations effort than the one NIKE tried in Vietnam. They just simply inflamed the overall issue in Vietnam for better than a year, making the situation progressively worse, rather than better. NIKE eventually “got the message” and took more responsibility for what was happening in factories that produced for the brand. But, the company had to commit additional personnel, tighter US supervision and oversight and finally had to revise corporate requirements for a number of its partners who were operating in Vietnam. The Embassy reported on the issues during several factory visits and helped NIKE deal with the Vietnamese authorities and provided advice on how best to overcome their negative image.

Q: What a major cartoonist, Gary Trudeau really hit them hard on this. It became, I mean it was very much in the forefront, because you had these big athletic stars of basketball and all and they were being castigated for being associated with sweat shops.

HARTER: I visited a number of these shoe manufacturing facilities, both in Vietnam as well as earlier when I was in China, and you could readily see where problems could occur. I’m not referring here to NIKE or any particular brand’s operations, but as you walked through a shoe manufacturing line each separate production stage had its own hazards and problems. In the area where they heated up the glues that held the different pieces of the shoe together the odor was really difficult to deal with. Lots of workers on the line just weren’t wearing protective masks and nobody was insisting they had to do so. In the places where machines did the sewing, or the assembly of various elements of the shoe, the production line was so crowded and the people so close together you wondered how people managed to stretch without banging into somebody else and upsetting the rhythm of the production. Lighting in some of the factories was often terrible and there were many areas with inadequate ventilation so that in the cutting areas there were clouds of dust and fabric particles in the air. Floors were often littered with all sorts of production remnants which were hazardous for safe movement.

Nonetheless, in Vietnam as well as in China, there were a number of factories that were much better and were a lot closer to proper conditions for worker safety and the operations were conducted in a healthy environment. There were fewer factories in Vietnam that had large worker dormitories as they had in China. When I was in China, much of the labor in the Guangdong processing factories came from outside the province. The workers, in many cases young women, were put in these big dormitories that were attached to the factories. A factory shift ran from 8 to 12 hours and the workers would move from production line to bunks which had just been occupied by the young women who were now starting the next production line shift. They did this all year long, with the exception of the two or three week break they got at the Lunar New Year holidays when the trains filled up with all of the workers taking home their gifts and money for the families they left behind in the rural provinces of the Central and Southwest regions of China.

China had big production-line cafeterias in their factories which provided meals on a regular basis all day long. The Vietnamese factories also had cafeterias because the workers needed a meal during their regular work shifts, but there were not many places that operated all day long with different shifts of workers. Over time, the factories began to install health and infirmary rooms with some trained personnel to treat illnesses or take care of minor worker injuries. These improvements were largely introduced by the international firms and Vietnamese firms soon found they had to copy these “benefits” in order to attract good workers. So even though there were some problems here and there, the opening up of the Vietnamese market did provide some real benefits to the general labor situation as well as providing opportunities for Vietnam to absorb new techniques and technologies.

Q: Well, sort to sum up Dennis, did you see this whole trade thing must have put tremendous strains on the Vietnamese government. It was an old style Communist government where it had all the controls and all this. You have to be competitive and almost to survive in the modern world, you pretty well got to accept these things. But, this is not to just say, OK fine, we'll have these rules, it means all sorts of things, including sort of bringing real managers into some of the party apparatus. Were you watching this?

HARTER: Yes, and the Vietnamese answer to that threat to their control was simply, in large part, to delay the whole evolutionary process. The Vietnamese government and the Communist Party still had to make the ultimate decision about what project or corporate operation was going to be approved. If project X was to build a large dam for hydroelectric power that would lead to opening new agricultural areas and new factory construction and development of a particular isolated area, the Government and the Party were involved in all of the individual decisions that had to be made about the project -- the financing package, the size and scope of the project, the composition of the international participants, etc. If the Vietnamese found it difficult to make these decisions, they simply postponed them or set up short-term obstacles that had to be overcome before anything else would be permitted to move forward. In some cases, major infrastructure projects that had adequate international financing to develop power plants or to utilize off-shore gas resources were just postponed year after year as the Vietnamese debated how to proceed. There are projects being looked at today that were originally on the books to be done in the 1990s. While I've been out of Vietnam now for a couple of years, my impression is this situation has not changed significantly and Vietnam's modernization and growth to date could have been a lot bigger and a lot faster if the Vietnamese leadership had really committed itself to moving forward.

Q: Was there a feeling that you got to wait for the war fighting leadership to almost die out? I mean, was there a feeling that the new people coming on board or maybe another generation or so that sort of the Gorbachevs of Vietnam had begin to come in or was it still, was the party still a pretty rigid and sort of narrow-minded organization?

HARTER: I think for the most part the Party leadership still was rigid and narrow-minded when I was there. I also think it was not so much a product of the war-time hardships as much a product of the ideology itself. The Vietnamese political and Communist Party leaders were remarkably tolerant of Americans. They showed very little hostility to us at all. There were occasions when you could see some hostility among the military men that likely was a holdover from the war. But, beyond those few occasions, the general population in the northern part of the country did not express resentment towards the US and Ambassador Peterson and his marriage to a Vietnamese clearly gave the US a positive image in Hanoi. But, you are correct, they needed to have a few more Gorbachevs to come in and shake up the ideology, to break the stereotypes and molds of communism. You needed people in positions of influence who had a broader range of education and an understanding of the way the rest of the world operated before things were going to significantly change. These people were ready to see change.

The people who were most anxious for and most understanding of the need for change were the people who'd had this international exposure. Many of them were technocrats, engineers, people who had had training in Eastern Europe or in the Scandinavian countries that had remained open to Vietnam during the embargo era. They were the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or Trade Ministry people who had been abroad and who had spent time in Western countries, not just within the socialist bloc. They had a better understanding of where things were going on the outside and what needed to be done for Vietnam to be a part of that process. Presently, there are people moving into middle levels of the government and business firms, people who obtained advanced degrees and technical training in Western countries, including the United States. These people are going to make the difference and give impetus to change. I think within this next decade, even the first years of the decade, those people will begin to influence the changes and the speed of development will pick up more rapidly. I think the changes will take place and I think Vietnam will soon be one of the Southeast Asian tigers.

Q: Now, here in Northern Virginia, where there's a significant Vietnamese population, it seems every other high school valedictorian is of Vietnamese origin. Were you seeing, was this manifesting itself in the home population?

HARTER: Yes, you were seeing some of that. The overall education levels of the Vietnamese were expanding, but the basic education for most Vietnamese, particularly in the rural areas, didn't provide for very much school time and didn't provide much real world knowledge. The domestic education system really stopped short of junior high school and you got narrower and narrower percentages of people going on to high school and to college within Vietnam. There is now greater investment in education but the brighter people are all trying to get out and go abroad to study. More foreign funding, more cooperative programs between Vietnamese institutions and foreign institutions are helping to improve the domestic education system, and that will show results in another several years.

Q: Well, you left Vietnam in 2001?

HARTER: Summer of 2001.

MARIE THERESE HUHTALA
Deputy Director, Burma, Cambodia, Laos, Thailand & Vietnam Affairs
Washington, DC (1996-1998)

Ambassador Huhtala was born and raised in California and Graduated from Santa Clara University. Joining the Foreign Service in 1972, she studied Thai and Chinese languages and became a specialist in East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Her overseas postings include Paris, Quebec, Hong Kong and Chiang Mai (Thailand). In Washington, she dealt primarily with East Asia and Pacific Affairs. From 2001 to 2004 she served as US ambassador to Malaysia and, from 2004 to 2005, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Ambassador Huhtala is a graduate of the National War College and the State Department's Senior Seminar. Ambassador Huhtala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Well let's then go to Vietnam.

HUHTALA: Okay, Vietnam. By this time we had completed the normalization process. One of the big efforts during my tenure in VCLTV was to get approval to open a consulate in Ho Chi Minh City. We already had our embassy set up in Hanoi. Ho Chi Minh is the major economic center in Vietnam, of course, and a very vibrant city.

Q: According to my lights I use to live there, it's called Saigon.

HUHTALA: Well a lot of the people there still call it Saigon too, but the official name is Ho Chi Minh City. It is amazing the hoops you have to jump through to get a new post set up, especially so in the '90s when we'd been closing so many posts and when the fiscal climate was so austere. But there was a real need to open up in Ho Chi Minh. We knew that the day it opened it would be number one or number two worldwide in terms of the backlog for immigrant visas. There were over a million American citizens of Vietnamese descent, many of whom had filed petitions for their relatives to come over.

We also still had the Orderly Departure Program going. And there was a new program for refugees; I use to call it Son of ODP but it was actually called ROVR, standing for something like Resettlement Opportunity for Vietnamese Returnees. It offered one more chance for people to apply for resettlement in the United States as refugees. The point of the Orderly Departure Program for years had been to interview people in camps in third countries, find out if they had any grounds to apply for refugee status, and resettle them either to the U.S. or France or wherever they wanted to go. Those who remained in the camps, those who had been effectively screened out, had to go back to Vietnam. By 1996 they had done so, and the camps in Southeast Asia were all closed. The groups who advocated for refugees with our Congress had persuaded the State Department to offer one more opportunity and it was called ROVR. It involved going out to the communities where Vietnamese had been resettled and asking them questions and giving them one more opportunity to show that they should be allowed in. The conditions had been relaxed greatly so it didn't take much. Basically they just had to say "I really want to go." I was shocked to find out about this. I had hoped that by then we would have been able to put the question of refugee resettlement behind us because we had invested many years of effort, and I believed the people who truly faced retribution upon return had been resettled. Besides, the Vietnamese authorities resented it and it was very intrusive; it had the potential to make all our other programs, including immigrant visas, that much more difficult.

Q: Had by this time the re-education camps been pretty well finished?

HUHTALA: Oh long ago closed.

Q: So I mean you didn't have people sitting around in barbwire in camps.

HUHTALA: No, no that was all finished. That was one of the grounds for coming to the United States. If you'd been put through that re-education process you could claim refugee status, and we were taking people who had endured that. In any event, ROVR wasn't proceeding too smoothly. The Vietnamese were very tired of cooperating with us on refugee settlement for their people. We had problems getting access to interview them, especially people who'd settled in remote areas and in the highlands. They needed to have a Vietnamese passport before they came in for their refugee interview and local officials were slow to grant those passports. Money had to cross hands, and this was viewed as an outrage on the American side. So it was a very tricky set of issues. We knew that having a consulate Ho Chi Minh with a refugee officer posted there would help very much in the effort. We also wanted, frankly, the demonstration effect of a consulate that was issuing NIVs and immigrant visas so that it would be clear to all concerned that there were other ways for people to come to the United States. If they had a brother or sister in the United States they could get a petition and they could get a visa. We wanted to move it away from the refugee platform to a more normal relationship. We also had growing commercial interests down there in the south.

It took me about a year to get the post opening memo approved. You wouldn't believe the page full of clearances I had to get from around the whole Building. But we did finally get the authority to open the consulate in Ho Chi Minh on the grounds of our old embassy in the middle of town. The first thing we did was to raze the old embassy building, which had been iconic, seen in so many images as a symbol of American failure in Vietnam. We still owned the property so we tore down the old building and made plans to build what was eventually a very attractive consulate on the property. Because of the fiscal austerity at the time, we were not able to get a classified post; it's only an unclassified post. I remember arguing, this is still a communist country; this is still a counter-intelligence threat country. It did not seem like a good idea to be without classified capabilities in the consulate. Every time we had any information to share with Hanoi we were going to have to send an officer up to Hanoi, which is what has happened. It was primarily for cost reasons that we didn't include classified communications. The idea was, if we find ten years down the road that we need to have classified operations there we can add on a story on top of the building. What has happened now, ten years down the road, is that the need for classified communications has become obvious so they are building a classified annex, rather than something on a top story. It has probably been much more expensive to do it this way.

Q: What was your impression of what were we getting from reports about whether the Vietnamese government was at this time still an elderly group of people and that where did it seem to be going?

HUHTALA: They seemed to be going down the same path that China had trod in the previous decade of opening the country economically but trying to maintain political control. I think they will have about as much success at that as China is having, obviously. The relationship with the United States was definitely warming. We were negotiating a bilateral trade agreement which I think was eventually signed in 2001. The negotiations were very serious while I was on the desk there. Attached to that too was the promise of our support for Vietnam's entry into the WTO (World Trade Organization). We were telling them that the draft trade agreement was a tough document (from their point of view) because we were applying WTO standards, which would make it easier in the long run. If they concluded the BTA (bilateral trade agreement) with us it would make it easier for them to get into the World Trade Organization.

We also began to normalize the military relationship during this time. A deputy assistant secretary of defense, Kurt Campbell, led a delegation to Hanoi in October of 1996, and I was on that delegation. It was fascinating. We met with the minister of defence on the Vietnamese side and all of his generals on one side of the table and Kurt Campbell and the ambassador and the military attaché and a Pentagon delegation on our side of the table. We began the process of moving towards formal mil-mil ties.

Q: What does that mean?

HUHTALA: It meant for instance, there was a whole menu or whole roadmap (dare I say) of agreed-upon steps that were going to take place. We were going to start with exchanging visits to military schools, for instance our National War College was going to send some students out the following spring. Then we were going to have experts go back and forth. At some point farther down the road there would be an exchange of visits of ministers of defense. We would have a U.S. ship visit at the end of it. It was all laid out. It was interesting, there is an English language newspaper that is published in Hanoi, it's a very thin document and it's not very interesting, it's of course government controlled. At the time it was the only thing available in English. On the very first day of our delegation's visit, a copy of this paper was delivered to our hotel rooms and lo and behold, on the front page was a picture of a big warship calling at Cam Ranh Bay, saying what a nice place this is for military ports of call. A very unsubtle signal, I think, towards our side. In any event, those were good talks. They were not very acrimonious. We talked about the POW/MIA effort ongoing because for us that's fundamental. The Vietnamese side promised to continue to work on that. Then we had a banquet. It was a good start.

Q: Tell me how much did, when one thinks about this, Cam Ranh Bay is a damn good place, the port of port. The Russians use it as a calling station on their way when they sent their fleet around in 1901, I don't remember, during the Russian Japanese war. I would think of all the places around it would be a damn good place to be able to use for our ships. Was that something that developed, that our military was considering?

HUHTALA: You know we never really pursued that. They were obviously dangling it. We did eventually have ship visits, I think we've had two so far, but I don't think either one of them was at Cam Ranh Bay. The first one was at Ho Chi Minh City and then I think maybe Da Nang. Is that near Cam Ranh Bay?

Q: It's above it. It's not really much of a port.

HUHTALA: I think our military's been trying to signal, thank you very much but that is not our main interest. Right now we are trying to negotiate an IMET (International Military Education and Training) agreement to train with them and promote inter-operability and coordination. That concept was still very far down the road back in '96.

Q: Well in '96 and '98 were things like the Spratly and other areas, I mean this is sort of in your bailiwick, kind of.

HUHTALA: The Spratlys and the Paracels, those islands in the South China Sea, are claimed by five or six countries but not by the United States. Our position has always been that we will support whatever settlement the claimants come up with. There have been little skirmishes every once and a while between the Chinese and the Vietnamese. But that is not an issue that directly affects us.

Q: It didn't?

HUHTALA: No. So that was a good development. That was the year, late 1996, early '97 that we finally reached the point of exchanging ambassadors. Le Van Bang, who I talked about before, was in Washington as Vietnam's chargé d'affaires when I came back on to the desk; he returned to Hanoi to be given the official portfolio as ambassador to the United States. The president nominated Pete Peterson to be the first American ambassador to the unified Vietnam. Pete Peterson was a brilliant choice. He was a Congressman who had been a prisoner of war, held in the Hanoi Hilton for six years along with John McCain and others; a verifiable war hero, somebody with every reason to be bitter towards the Vietnamese but who was instead very focused on the new, positive relationship. He was an outstanding first ambassador. His nomination was difficult to confirm because of holdouts in the Senate opposed to normalizing relations with Vietnam. It was a long and difficult battle and we didn't get approval until, my recollection is that it was around April of '97.

Q: What did you ascribe, looking at it the opposition to relationship with Vietnam, within both Congress and the greater body politics?

HUHTALA: It's the same old story. This is the war that we didn't win, it was a national trauma. And the country is still communist, so why did we want to have relations with them? Our answer to that was to note that for many years the Soviet Union was still communist but we had relations with them, we'd never broken off relations with the Soviets. Diplomatic relations is not a reward for good behavior. It's an agreement to talk to someone and to have exchanges. We made all of those arguments. Some of the people who were most adamant in opposing Pete were very worried still about the POW issue and were being fed arguments by the League of Families and others that Vietnam was still not cooperating fully.

Q: Tell me, I mean this whole area you dealt with from Thailand to Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam, what was your involvement with POW thing at that time?

HUHTALA: There was an office set up in the Pentagon called DPMO, Defense POW/MIA Office. We provided a lot of support to them, as did the embassy in Hanoi. There was a detachment in Hanoi that was still conducting many different recovery activities every year. We attended and spoke at the annual conferences of the League of Families who were still very resistant to the fact that we had normalized. The issue had taken up a life of its own. The search for remains was primarily a military activity, but it was also, always, the first talking point in any discussion we ever had with the Vietnamese. They understood that this developing, mutually beneficial relationship was founded on continuing cooperation on POW/MIA.

Q: Were they as well responding to or saying well you help us?

HUHTALA: Yes they were. They were saying that while the U.S. had 2,500 still unaccounted for, Vietnam had 30,000. Will you help us? We coordinated with the Pentagon and there was some information provided by DOD to the Vietnamese to help them locate their missing. In Vietnamese culture, if a loved one has died and you aren't able to find the body and bury it and pray over it then the soul wanders in limbo forever. That's what they believe. So this was a very painful issue for them.

They were also raising the issue of Agent Orange at this time. They were very unhappy that we had given compensation to our Vietnam vets who had been exposed to Agent Orange but we had offered nothing at all to the Vietnamese. They have a very high incidence of birth defects and problems, even now into the third generation, that they attribute to the use of Agent Orange in napalm during the war. We have never been prepared to provide any kind of compensation for them, but in the late '90s we were offering to set up a bi-national Science and Technology Commission to look into it. There was a need to figure out, if we could, what the baseline exposure to dioxin had been like in Vietnam before the war and then what, if any, had been the accumulated effects of our use of Agent Orange. More importantly, what could be the right treatment for the genetic damage that was claimed to have occurred in the population (it has never been proven). A lot of fundamental scientific questions needed to be answered; for example, there could be a lot of other reasons why children were being born with deformities. We didn't know yet. This became a big issue in the bilateral relationship.

Q: Yellow rain, was that a dead issue?

HUHTALA: No, that was dead. That was in the '70s. Claims of yellow rain or aerial poisoning had been pretty much debunked.

Q: Did you, when you were looking at Vietnam as an issue, how did you see the economy developing and what were we sort of predicting for the whither of Vietnam?

HUHTALA: The economy was doing very well. They had not been terribly affected by the Asian financial crisis because they still weren't very well integrated into the regional economy. I don't remember what the growth rate was but it was impressive, and the population was growing fast too. They'd gotten up to I believe around 70 million at that point. A lot of our companies were interested in investing. They were having problems, as they did in China, and that's why the BTA was so important. It was going to get us agreement on things like intellectual property protection and the rights of investors and the ability of foreign companies to come in and really participate in the economy. There was a lot of oomph behind the effort to get the BTA negotiated because it was seen as having tremendous potential. It still is seen that way.

Q: Were we seeing the same situation that, you know better than I, correct me if I'm wrong, that was happening in China where you had the government ruling but things had evolved into sort of almost corrupt money lords or something. Provincial rulers were allowing the economy to take a life of its own.

HUHTALA: I'm not sure how much of that took place in China but that's not my field really. In Vietnam there was certainly corruption. There were problems, but sense was that it was not out of hand. The country was going through a process they call "doi moi," which means renovation. They were trying to effect economic reforms and open up the country to the outside. They were buying American jet planes for their national airline. They were trying to come into the mainstream economically, not politically but economically. They joined ASEAN in this period (the Association of Southeast Asian Nations). In general, they were becoming good citizens in the region, both politically and economically.

Q: Last question, you were there when the Vietnamese set up their embassy?

HUHTALA: Yes.

Q: It's always difficult to set up an embassy. Did we help get them started?

HUHTALA: We had been managing their property for years. We had seized it during the war, so now we renovated it and turned it over to them in the mid '90s. It's a beautiful building there on R Street. They did fine by themselves. You have to respect the Vietnamese, they are smart and able and Le Bang turned out to be a fabulous leader for the first embassy.

Q: I'm just thinking, I'm off in a few minutes to meet a friend of mine and we're going to have lunch at the Eden Center where they still fly the South Vietnamese flag. Did you have a problem with, here in northern Virginia we have a very large, very active, the Vietnamese are a very capable group of people but they have certainly not accepted the new government.

HUHTALA: Some of them have, actually. There are all kinds of Vietnamese Americans here and some were very supportive of what we were doing. Others to this day have not accepted it. There's been a continuing problem of Vietnamese communities around the country passing local statutes calling for the flying of the old South Vietnam flag or giving grief to the Vietnamese leaders and diplomats that come through. They demonstrated against Pete Peterson in southern California. The Vietnamese authorities have a very hard time understanding why we allow this. Now that we have diplomatic relations they believe we should not allow anybody to insult them. They don't really understand our system and the right of free speech that people have in this country.

Q: But anyway you didn't find this as a group that you were particularly worried about security and all that, of the Vietnamese diplomats?

HUHTALA: Not here in Washington. They eventually set up a consulate in San Francisco and they've been the target of some problems there. California has a very high number of Vietnamese citizens.

Q: Although they don't abut on each other, there's Laos in the way, but what about with Vietnam?

HUHTALA: The relationship was warming when I was there. The Thais had always feared Vietnam as an aggressive nation and had always regarded Cambodia as a buffer state, which is why when Vietnam invaded Cambodia in '79 it was a huge concern for Bangkok. By the time I got there Vietnam was engaged in its own economic development and its renovation program called "doi moi" and had reaching out in the spirit of friendship to the other countries in the region. Thailand was taking them up on it. Not without some misgivings of course but I think, again, Thai businessmen were beginning to invest in Vietnam and they saw a lot of potential there.

Q: I mean Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos.

HUHTALA: It was a continuation of the previous trends that I have described. With Vietnam we had been forced to call them a "country of particular concern" in our religious freedom report, which was the first time that we had had to do a negative thing like that during the normalization process. Being designated a CPC can involve certain sanctions. Because we were in the process of negotiating this first-ever visit by the Vietnamese prime minister, it was very delicate. We eventually worked out a way to get them to agree to improve their performance on religious freedom under a so-called binding agreement, which is also provided for in the legislation as an alternative to sanctions. Having gone through such a laborious process to lift all of the sanctions resulting from the Vietnam war, nobody wanted to be back in the business of imposing sanctions on Vietnam. Nevertheless there are real problems with religious freedom there, they do have to be addressed, and they are being addressed. Although I saw that they were again named a CPC again this year. I guess they are not out of the woods yet.

Q: Did you feel that Vietnam particularly was beginning to feel the effects of actuarial tables getting rid some of the old guard?

HUHTALA: No, they are still trying to pursue economic liberalization without political liberalization. But what I saw in my visits there (I visited a couple of times in my last year) was that the political leaders are becoming a little bit irrelevant. With the bilateral trade agreement in force and American and foreign investment coming into Vietnam, there is a certain dynamic that is developing there that will eventually make that kind of political system obsolete. It will probably take another generation.

Q: Again, instant communications are in place.

HUHTALA: Sure. They've got the Internet, they've got cable TV. We're doing the right thing there; we're bringing a lot of their young people for education in the United States and then sending them back. Again, they remain very industrious, very intelligent people.

THOMAS R. CARMICHAEL
Vietnamese Language Training, FSI
Washington, DC (2001-2002)

Public Affairs Officer
Hanoi (2002-2004)

Mr. Carmichael was born in Iowa and raised in Illinois and Florida. He was educated at the University of Florida and Florida State University. In 1984 Mr. Carmichael joined the USIA Foreign Service and served variously as Cultural Affairs Officer and Press Officer in Madrid, Le Paz, Poznan, Kuala Lumpur, Ulaanbaatar and Hanoi. He also served several tours at USIA Headquarters and the State Department in Washington, DC. Mr. Carmichael was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: So you took Vietnamese. Is it five tonal?

CARMICHAEL: A six tonal language. I tell you, it was a struggle. We have good teachers over here, hard working, and they are proud of their language. It worked out OK.

Q: Was there a point in doing this where all of a sudden you could tell the difference between the tones? Did it just suddenly dawn on you?

CARMICHAEL: I would say that sounds too easy. It was more of a real struggle to internalize that sort of thing, and it was easier to understand eventually others than it was to speak. Americans don't speak clearly and the Vietnamese demand you speak very clearly with the tones and pronunciation, or they can't understand what you are saying. A lot of it is just like anything else; vocabulary work, vocabulary work, vocabulary work.

Q: I had just a touch of it before I went to Saigon. This was '69, '70 and I didn't make an inch of progress.

CARMICHAEL: I could get along a little bit on the street, and I could read and I could watch Vietnamese TV, and get basically what was going on which was quite valuable, because their TV represented government policy and government attitudes.

Q: You went to Hanoi and you were there from when to when?

CARMICHAEL: That would have been '02 through '04.

Q: How stood things with Vietnam at that point?

CARMICHAEL: We had our first ambassador just before I got there, Pete Peterson, and when he left and Ray Burghardt took over, and Ray was a long time Asia hand. I must say, I felt blessed to have had an ambassador that really understood the country and appreciated it for all of its complexities and difficulties. It had all been getting better. Things had all been moving well after President Clinton had left, the embargo had ended, and the Vietnamese wanted to be close to us in a balanced way, moving forward with the Chinese to the north, but they want to do things on their terms and, of course, when it has to do with human rights and religious rights, we just have to move them along slowly and surely. We were moving forward, and, of course, Americans want to go in there and move right ahead, and the Vietnamese, particularly because they have a structure with the Communist Party in so much control, when wanted to move sometimes results were unpredictable. It wasn't a consistent policy throughout the government to be friendly to us. Certain parts of the government got more advantages working with us; certainly the health sector for instance, and they were open to a lot of different programs – and USAID had a very good director there that was active and wanted to move forward.

The military was there for the first time. While I was there we had the first U.S. military ship visit since the war ended down in Saigon, in Ho Chi Minh City.

Q: What did people call it? Was it "Saigon" pretty much?

CARMICHAEL: They called it Ho Chi Minh City, but there is a port in Ho Chi Minh City that is called Saigon. Up in the North where I was, that was my perspective on things, and my folks would call it Ho Chi Minh City, but if somebody slipped and called it Saigon, nobody had any dire problem with that.

Q: I was there when Ho Chi Minh was not a word you bandied about.

Public affairs officers; could you explain what your major concentrations were?

CARMICHAEL: We have the biggest U.S. government-sponsored Fulbright program in the world there. There are other countries that have bigger programs, if you include host-country contributions, but ours had the largest U.S. government sponsorship. Plus while I was there, when things were getting better, Congress developed a fund called "Vietnam Education Foundation," which was another five million dollars a year for scholarships for science and technology studies. This was a congressional fund, a congressional program, not an executive branch initiative and so we had congressional visits and the Foundation's oversight board wanted to open up an office there, separate from the embassy, not supported by the embassy. You are thinking, "How could they do that?" And they had a hard time doing it. It was a difficult thing to do.

Q: What was the idea? They didn't trust the embassy or was this a power grab of somebody on a staff somewhere wanted?

CARMICHAEL: I think they just wanted the freedom to do things differently, and without the program restraints the executive branch must acknowledge, and I have no reason to think poorly of their motivation, except that no one wants to get involved in all the rules and regulations that executive branch must follow, but we have to live by them. We do get results, and others in the government should be able to acknowledge the validity of rules they impose on somebody else.

Like most places, we had plenty of speakers that would come over, often speaking on foreign policy issues, a question of U.S. activity, U.S. presence in Southeast Asia, our observations and our trying to explain our policy toward China and policies toward Southeast Asia, so the Vietnamese could understand our actions. With China on the north, the Vietnamese did not want their understanding of our presence to stand still with the Vietnam War.

I was in FSI when 9/11 occurred, taking my Vietnamese, so when I got over there, and there was the invasion of Afghanistan and then Iraq, those events took up a lot of media space in the government media. We could explain our policy there, but they weren't really interested in explanations. The government media found that it was a good time to hammer us pretty hard about going into another country.

Q: How does one counter that?

CARMICHAEL: You really have to counter some of truly rabid government sentiment through your programs and contact with institutions, because the press was pretty much closed to us. I could write letters to the editor, and I felt wrote some pretty good letters to the editor, but they were not going to get published; they're simply not going to get published.

What our thing was and what I started to do was to start being factual in terms of releases about what our two countries were doing together. When we brought in military advisers on mine sweeping or bomb cleaning or anything on training or disaster relief, we made sure news of this activity ended up in the paper -- and papers would accept factual releases on our USAID programs, on our health programs, and on our cultural programs.

But they wouldn't accept opinion pieces or policy discussions. For example, as I recall, USAID could do programs on HIV/AIDS and we could place releases on the programs, but when we sent a "letter to the editor" from the ambassador, talking about AIDS and the way we need to work together on the issue, speaking about our cooperation, they printed the facts of cooperation, but dropped the major text with our ambassador's words on our international AIDS policy. The piece hardly controversial, but they were not interested in a policy statement in the paper or were not permitted to print.

Q: You've been sort of around the block on this. How Communist was the country, you know the ideology and that sort of thing?

CARMICHAEL: The Party was still in control. I could have a program, my colleagues in the military and other places could have a program, and there could suddenly be an unexplained "complication" that would prevent it from going through. Most of the time that was because someone or some group in the Party would insist upon a cancellation, but you wouldn't know who had the objection or know where in the Party it came from. Someone could say, "This cannot happen" and it wouldn't happen. If you say, Vietnam is a Communist country, well, what is called the Communist Party makes those sorts of shots on things, modulating the pace of how our countries get together.

Some of the economic rights that the people could enjoy were increasing, so some of the things people there miss, we don't even think about here in terms of human rights - like being able to work in another part of the city than the one the government has specified for you. Those things were cleaning up and were changing. Economic rights were increasing, but in political rights, it was still considered a monopoly of the Communist Party.

One other thing about the ideology, in terms of being able to start your own business; I think one of my staff said it pretty well. That was, "Here in Vietnam you can start your own business now, you can start making your own money, but you just don't want to get too big because once you get too big and too successful, the Party or the government will look at what you are doing and say, "I'd like a little of that", "I want some of that." You would lose your business.

Q: It sounds as what has happened other places before really almost the revolution of turning down Communists that the real ideology was over and now it was a matter of power or a piece of the action.

CARMICHAEL: Some people feel that was the case that you saw there. There were still some people in my analysis, after all, in the Communist Party who could claim indeed that they had won a war, that they were the ones that brought independence to Vietnam, and we were the people they had been fighting -- among others. As you know, it was a coalition; it wasn't just the Americans there. They of the old cadre, the revolutionaries, they need to maintain that myth of their being about able to run the country. They led it down a pretty nasty economic road, before it was able to recover. Until they died off, they wanted to maintain their position as liberators of the country. They have to do that under a Communist ideology and the Communist Party, so they are going to always keep up that façade, even though it may be for their sons and their daughters. Their families are the ones that are really benefiting from this economic wealth.

Q: Who were the exchange people sitting in a big exchange program, Fulbright? What were we doing?

CARMICHAEL: They were perfectly happy, we had both master's degrees, and we had a full, open competition -- that was something which we held as a principle. We couldn't get the Vietnamese government involved in competitions, because they were not merit-oriented. Their merit is 'have you supported the Party lately?' The embassy didn't have a bi-national commission, because there was no partner there who could provide money, but, more importantly, could follow merit principles.

We also would entertain nominees from the different universities, but, once again, we couldn't just take those students that had been nominated by the universities themselves, because they didn't necessarily nominate by merit.

One of the things my executive director had to do was make sure when a teacher from a university applied for a Fulbright, that he would not be ostracized when he came back -- that his position was still there. There were some deans, some university presidents who understood that sending somebody over to the U.S. and ensuring they would have their position upon return was a chance to enhance their faculties. Other people saw that as 'I want to send the person I want to send, and if I can't send that person, then nobody is going to be going, because I am weakened. It seemed sometimes that the Communists were more interested in using access to the outside for their own internal political agenda. I saw that in Poland too. They use access to the outside as one of the perks of being a good Party member, being a loyal citizen to the Communist government. You know, that's what you earned for following the party line. It was a patronage game.

Q: One of the things I noted, this goes back to the early '60s in Yugoslavia for example, we would send bright, young people to the united states in exchange and they would come back ready to pass on their knowledge and their way of doing things and find they are completely frozen out because Herr Professor who was head of the faculty and probably studied in Austria during the '30s or so, that's not the way he wanted to do it because he'd lose control. It takes a generation to get rid of the old farts.

CARMICHAEL: It's not just under a Communist system but this is a country that is not very far from some real economic destitution, and university and student exchanges were a way to get hard currency and to reward people. In a way that is even a little bit different what happens in other countries where university administrators and entrenched faculty just don't want a Fulbrighter returning from the U.S. saying, "Hey, I just returned from an American university with some really new ideas about studies that can make a difference." – even the returnee can offer real insight in areas such as American Studies.

Q: Did you sense that Vietnam, here it is sitting in the middle of all these little tigers like Singapore and Thailand and Malaysia, all of whom with well developed electronics businesses, getting tied to the international IT technology villages' world. In a way I would think this would be kind of difficult for Vietnam to fit into that because of its ideology.

CARMICHAEL: In terms of being part of the manufacturing, I think what a company wants is a productive, reasonably well-trained labor force, and Vietnam could provide that. There was some standard that is used in shoe manufacturing that indicates how quickly the work force can meet world standards of quality. The Vietnamese reached an acceptable level much more quickly than the Thai, for instance. They can be incredibly detail-oriented and productive. In computer and other electronics assembly, this is more important than intellectual freedom.

Q: Yes, the Nike and CARMICHAEL: Yes, and I can remember this businessman telling us that what Thailand took five years to develop a skill level that Vietnam was able to do in three. So they are hard working, and there is still some Confucian respect for learning, that would do them very well. Most people, when they look at Vietnam, say these people work hard. I don't think technology in terms of manufacturing was a difficult thing for them to do.

One of the problems that you had, interestingly enough, was the Vietnamese were very, very careful where they would buy their electronics - whether it was a DVD or CD player - because if a Vietnamese had repaired, re-boxed, and resold it as new, it may work like a charm for a bit, but might likely fail in the long run. The Vietnamese could fix these things and put them back, but if they were really fixed – that would be a question. They were very, very nimble that way intellectually to do that sort of thing.

Their problem is that China is right next door.

Q: Was there when you were there, was the internet an issue, a problem?

CARMICHAEL: In terms of whether we could get access?

Q: No, I mean for the Vietnamese? Not so much the government, but the individual Vietnamese. Were they plugged in or not?

CARMICHAEL: They weren't plugged in to the extent that they could be. They had internet cafes, but when I was there, they were only reaching the point where more and more could own their own computer, and there would be a chance at some access, but most of the internet access was done at internet cafes with very narrow bandwidth. They weren't quick machines, but I remember I always checked to see if VOA website was blocked or not. There were supposed experts who insisted. "Oh, they blocked the VOA website." I would go to small towns, even up in the mountains on our vacation, and I would take a little time and go to the internet café and see whether I could get on eBay and also check if the VOA website was being blocked. It was really never blocked. There was access, but it wasn't the broadband access that is anywhere near what many others countries have and could support much work – but the government there had prosecuted their citizens for very basic access to U.S. government, and basic democratic thinking.

Q: It was a matter of more or less development rather than government policy that was trying to keep it down?

CARMICHAEL: Yes. They were very, very wary of the internet. There had been some cases of Vietnamese activists downloading USIA and State Department material, like the human rights documents. I forget if they downloaded our constitution or whether it was one of our human rights pamphlets, but the government ended up tossing this type of dissident in jail for quite a while for doing that. It was a big case, an important case but at the same time I could go down to the internet café and see that same document was still there, of course, on our website, available to anyone else who wanted to download it.

Q: Did you get any sense of a real generational change that was happening through the university and all with the college kids and early graduates sort of comparable to the other ones that you met elsewhere or were they more reserved?

CARMICHAEL: I would say that they were really just about as open. When I would take a speaker and, of course, that's what you'd do, you program a speaker in a host country institution. The goal for me was not to listen to our, but watching the young people and listening to their questions. The young people were reserved, but you would have one or two who would be more aggressive in asking questions. That would be pretty similar to anyplace else. I wouldn't say there was much more classroom aggressiveness. Vietnamese students are not a particularly aggressive group of people.

Q: Was there much sort of in a way, push back from Vietnamese here in the United States? We have a hell of a lot of them here and obviously they don't have too friendly feelings towards the government in Vietnam. Was that a problem or not?

CARMICHAEL: These things were always moving towards the more and more positive. I was there five years ago, so I am sure some things have changed, but there were some Vietnamese groups that were interested in coming back, interested in investment. Their families were buried there. Their religion says they should honor those graves, and so that access was an important thing. You would see more of that in the South, as you know, rather than in the North where I was. The Vietnamese government still was not as open, and saw the Viet Que, as they were called as "cash cows" for investment, rather than as another generation of Vietnamese. The government's attitude was 'We have nothing against these people. We can forgive their betrayal. All they have to do is say that they were wrong, that they are on the wrong side of things and that we can let them back' -- this without understanding those people fought for what they believed in too. They were just on the other side, that's all.

Q: How did Saigon or Ho Chi Minh City play? I imagine you had a branch post there? I would think that the people there had been brought up on Armed Forces Radio and American stuff that would have been a really active place.

CARMICHAEL: Yes, you know, under USIA the branch post, the branch PAO in Ho Chi Minh city would have reported to the country public affairs officer in Hanoi, but one of the arrangements they made when they moved USIA into State Department is that the public affairs officer in post reports to their the principal officer. So he reported not to me, but to the consul general in Saigon. All the cultural stereotypes which they talk about seemed to hold true; they lived in a culture that was more comfortable with free enterprise and entrepreneurial. They were a bit more open, more aggressive as individuals - the Foreign Service nationals and such. But they had their limitations down there in Ho Chi Minh City, as well, but their staff wasn't necessarily that much smaller than the staff in Hanoi. We had one more American. I was the public affairs officer, and I had a deputy public affairs officer in Hanoi, and the public affairs officer down there in Ho Chi Minh City had a junior officer trainee working with him. The staff wasn't that much smaller either. There was a lot of interest in Saigon on the part of Americans, because, as you would expect, there are more business opportunities; it is a more open climate and that sort of thing. The public affairs officer there was an active and real positive guy down there. Hanoi had more congressional visits that wanted to visit the president and the government up there in Hanoi.

Q: How was the ambassador?

CARMICHAEL: I thought he was great. We had an ambassador that was in a State Department officer class that was assigned to Saigon when he came into the Foreign Service. Afterwards he went back to Vietnam to work on negotiations concerning the demining process up in Haiphong. He worked in Beijing and was consul general in Shanghai and then the director in AIT Taiwan. He was an Asian hand with an appreciation for the culture. So it was very good. It is nice to have somebody who's got some depth of understanding. He knew we weren't going to solve everything with the Vietnamese while he was there. He had a long view on things.

Q: What was your impression of Chinese influence and reactions in Vietnam?

CARMICHAEL: What we always noticed is if we had a major visit of an American official or a Vietnamese president, or premier going to the United States, there would be a corresponding visit with China. They balanced their demonstrations of closeness and interests pretty closely. In terms of, I thought it was interesting, is the sort of situation that Chinese products have there. One would think the Vietnamese who could work hard and work for very little would be able to compete, but I remember going in looking at ties in shops and finding Chinese silk ties in Vietnam and, of course, they have their own silk industry. The Vietnamese had little Vespa-type and small motorcycles, but they really preferred Japanese over the Chinese products. I was told over and over, that the Chinese look nice, but they just don't have any real guts to them, they were not sturdy enough for their needs.

They're concerned about China – and they'd be nuts if they weren't concerned. The last war that the Vietnamese had was with China - they are naturally concerned about China. They are not going to be that open all the time with us – and they have a ready excuse to say 'we are doing this because of China.' They have to respond to geopolitics.

Q: The universities, did they have a defined American Studies program?

CARMICHAEL: Oh, no. We had one Fulbrighter who we were going to send to the United States in American Studies, and that was what you'd call a "triumph" for this fellow, and it is a long shot in terms of his returning to Vietnam and teaching or occupying an administrative role equal to his achievement – but we felt it was worth the gamble. American Studies is not an established field, and in a lot of countries and certainly in Vietnam, active interest in the U.S. would bring the questions, "Why are you studying about America? They are still our enemies."

Q: I can remember being in Germany and the Germans, I mean, for God's sake. We deluged the place with X and all that sort of thing but they really didn't fit in, you know in the 19th century when they drew up their thing, America didn't count for much and are still working on a 19th century schedule. That's a problem in Europe.

CARMICHAEL: I know in Poland and even in Mongolia, if there was any American Studies it was within American literature or in the context of English teaching. It wasn't in the context of sociology or international relations. It was all sort of down the totem pole in their minds.

Q: It represents a major problem really with our relations with the world. We study Europe and we study Asia but other people don't study us and we are an important factor in the world and what makes us the way we are is important.

CARMICHAEL: Sometimes you think they have this mistaken notion that the media provides them all they need to know. It is so silly, it is so wrong. But here, this was something where they could actually study the United States, but it was something that was very suspect, so it didn't develop. The number of wild ideas that foreigners have about the U.S. is astounding, as well as just factual mistakes, but I have heard too many times, “Americans are so isolated and ignorant. We know about the U.S., but they know nothing about us.” Well, we don’t know much about the world, but that doesn’t mean the world knows about us.

Q: In Vietnam. Did you run across were the scars pretty recent? Every once in awhile somebody say, “I lost my family due to your bombing” or this sort of thing come up?

CARMICHAEL: Oh, yes. We did not have, ‘You Americans, you’re animals and I lost my such and such during the bombing.’ I know that I had a one of our Foreign Service nationals tell me she could not use the word American in her house, in her father’s house on the other side. Most of them are not bitter -- they like Americans. Who did they have? They had the Chinese? Why would they like the Chinese? The Chinese are this dark cloud that hangs over them. Americans were quite popular. In fact someone made the point that we were probably more popular in Vietnam than any other Asian country. Most American visitors said that they were treated well by the Vietnamese -- which I personally think really was something that the old Communist Party cadre really had a hard time accepting, I would think. After all they supposedly had grabbed independence from the Americans, but now the Americans were increasingly popular. A pole had indicated that President Clinton was the most popular world politician in Vietnam when my wife and I arrived.

Q: How did our, President Bush, the Second and the going into Iraq, how did that play?

CARMICHAEL: That was a chance for the Vietnamese government to really hammer us. They hammered us on that constantly in the press and they really hammered us on Abu Ghraib.

Q: Abu Ghraib being the mistreatment of prisoners by our prison guards.

CARMICHAEL: Yes. When that happened they laid out a full anti-American propaganda package in the newspapers, but you can’t get upset about the editorials in the Vietnamese papers. That’s just what they do; they just sort of hammer us. I ran into many Americans and Vietnamese who’d say, “But nobody reads this anymore, because they are always so one-sided, that there is no nuance to them, and the Vietnamese don’t trust their own government, so most Vietnamese don’t really take into account those editorials.” I really never really believed all that. I believed that, eventually, that is how stuff somehow does stick. I would write a letter every once in a while when an editorial went over the top. You expect criticism. But in Abu Ghraib, after those pictures came out and such, the tone was really remarkably more vitriolic than anything we had seen before.

Q: How about the missing in action issue? Was that still going on in your time?

CARMICHAEL: Oh, yes, absolutely. They still have a very active program trying to find the missing in action at that time. The low hanging fruit was being picked, that is, the more easily found and accessed remains had been uncovered, but they were still finding them, they were still tracking them. There was still a separate armed forces element in Hanoi, that wasn’t inside the embassy, but had their own group of people that would search and recover remains. A lot of this had to be really logistically heavy; that is to say, for example, to locate a jet fighter that had crashed with bombs on it on the side of a mountain, or full of fuel, and send in an expert on a risky mission to search around in it. In some instances, and they would have to rent the land where the remains were located, and get permissions, which was costly, to excavate the site. They had to hire engineers. They would have to hire labor to dig through the property, and some of these caustic chemicals might mean that they had to wear special hazmat suits, so these were not just guys finding some remains; they were caring out mini-engineering projects. The helicopters that crashed in rice paddies have been found long ago, but helicopters that had crashed into the side of a tree-covered mountain might still not have been found. They required specialized U.S. crews to repel down the mountain to get their crash site. That's the type of really difficult stuff that they were still doing. The Vietnamese cooperated very well. They could not afford politically to not be cooperative in that mission. And they made good money too.

Q: I still see these missing in action flags flying around, particularly firehouses and all but it was sort of the issue of the right in American politics that somehow or another there were prison camps in the middle of the jungle with Americans there. It made no sense at all but CARMICHAEL: There might be somebody that said that, but I never got any sense that there was any chance, no matter how remote, that this was true.

There were though quite a number of Americans who had fought in the war and wanted to go back and visit the places they had fought and that sort of thing. Most of them were, trying to reconcile their memories and that sort of thing. It wasn't generally coming back with hostility.

Q: I read a book by a North Vietnamese soldier obviously in translation called, The Sorrows of War. Did you ever read that?

CARMICHAEL: Yes.

Q: Very powerful, an interesting book.

CARMICHAEL: That book came out finally in Vietnamese while I was there, but for a long time that author had not been recognized and the book was banned. He was not popular with the regime.

Q: He slams, he talks about war rather than, he talked about coming back. They were supposed to say the South Vietnamese didn't fight well and screw this. They did fight well.

CARMICHAEL: That book was banned in Vietnam, but while I was there, I'd go in the bookstores and just see what types of books were available to the Vietnamese public, and I happened to find the book on the shelves, with a different name, and I took it in to my staff. They told me it was the same book. One told me that this was a major step forward, because the book talked about the Vietnamese war, but didn't portray it as a heroic enterprise. Instead, it underlined that the Vietnamese people were deeply affected, and some soldiers didn't come back from the war full of gratefulness to the Party and their leadership. They came back traumatized and became drunks. They came back and not everybody at home was in support. They learned their wives had run off with somebody else -- and that sort of thing.

Q: Were you seeing an ability to have a more realistic view of the war, more memoirs coming around or was that?

CARMICHAEL: Somewhat, but it is a slow process. There was another lady who wrote a series of books that talked about the war in realistic ways. She still was not popular with the regime. On the other hand, I could still watch on TV or in the cinema contemporary programs, recently produced, about the bombing of Hanoi and the Vietnamese's great fight bringing down the American aircraft. And, of course, the Vietnamese had preserved for all to see a couple of U.S. jet fighters in Hanoi that had crashed landed in the town during the bombing. Those planes were upright, stuck nose-first in this little lake in the middle of town, maintained as a display. So there was an element that wants those things, the war, to be seen in the same way. It serves their purpose. They can say to their citizens, "Look, you may like the Americans now but this is what they did to us."

Q: In a way say, fair enough. We haven't let go of some things.

You left there when?

CARMICHAEL: That would have been in 2004.
