Q: When would you time that more or less? Was there a specific time? Would you say that it was at Tet in 1968 or was it before then?

HARKINS: I think it was right before then, because all the things you get from the press and the TV and everything were horror stories.

Q: Right.

HARKINS: And the bloody war. It was really gruesome as a matter of fact, and that turned the attitude of the people and in particular the youth who didn't want to go over there and get into that mess. Then people stopped asking me to speak because the war - because we went over there to help a country stop communism and we were asked to go over there. We didn't go over there on our own. We were just asked as defense if we would help, and we did. Like we've done for so many other countries. But it didn't sit right with the American people, and I just stopped talking about Vietnam because I only had the one story.

Q: Looking back now - and I'm sure you have many times - what seemed to you to be the significant personalities, the significant turning points or changes in policy? Were there any crucial points when the thing could have turned around and wasn't?

HARKINS: I think the first upsetting thing was a visit by Senator [Mike] Mansfield around Christmas in - what was it, 1962?

Q: I think that's right.

HARKINS: He came over, and he didn't leave Saigon. I was there, so - and he had been there once before in 1954 or 1955, and he talked to Diem. Now, when you talk to Diem you've got to listen an awful lot.

Q: That's my information, too, yes.

HARKINS: And Mansfield liked to talk, and this first visit he had was for about four hours. And he couldn't get a word in edgewise, I mean, Diem did all the talking. Well, on this visit, the second one, he came back and he didn't leave Saigon. He went to see the President, Diem, and there was a six-hour meeting. I wasn't with him. I don't think the Ambassador was with him. So he came back and reported to the President there had been no change in seven years from his visit in 1954 to this visit he made then. And I don't think he meant it the way it sounded. I think he meant it that he didn't get a word in edgewise. But the changes that had gone on in Vietnam were really terrific: the schools, the villages, the roads, the airfields. Oh, there were tremendous changes, the harvest, the crops, and all those things. Really, the five-year plan was really going, but the way Mansfield put it, there'd been no change in six years. And it really was the beginning of "we've got to have new leadership."

Of course, then the Harriman-Hilsman thing [happened] in August and trying to overthrow the government when the message came to Lodge, and Lodge showed it to me and he sent Conein over and Big Minh wouldn't see Conein. Then Lodge went back to Harriman and Hilsman with this message saying that they wouldn't accept it unless there was somebody in authority. Then the word came for me to do it. Well, I had got nothing from the Defense Department; these were all State Department messages. So I put a flash on the wire for General Taylor saying, "I have been told to go to see the generals to overthrow Diem." I said, "This is from the State Department. I have no advice from the military, Defense." Taylor was playing tennis at the country club, McNamara was out of town, the President was down in Hyannis Port, and none of them knew the telegram had come. President Kennedy said, "Who is running this country?" And he had a meeting at nine o'clock from them on Vietnam and what was going on out there, and that was another very upsetting thing.

Q: Well, now, I've heard versions of that story which say that Hilsman did get the telegram cleared before it went out.

HARKINS: He did not. He got it cleared by [Michael] Forrestal, and he had it cleared by Harriman. But Hilsman didn't last long after that, you know.

Q: I think he left in February of 1964.

HARKINS: Well, I think it was sooner than that, wasn't it?

Q: No, he stayed on for the first couple of months of the Johnson Administration and left in February of 1964, although I think the decision was made before that time.

HARKINS: Well, he was a West Pointer - class of 1941, I think - and when he first came out to visit me, he said he knew all about guerrilla warfare. He had been in Burma, I think, during his career. And he said, "The only one I have to see - Mr. Kennedy, the President, said, 'I want you to see Harkins and talk to Harkins, and see how things are going.'" So that's really the only time I met him personally.

Q: What were your impressions?

HARKINS: Well, I didn't know his background, but I don't think he was the expert he said he was on guerrilla warfare.

KENNETH N. ROGERS
RSO General and Staff Aide
Saigon (1962-1964)

Kenneth N. Rogers was born in New York in 1931. He received his BA from Ohio State University in 1953, and his UJD from George Washington University in 1958. His career includes postings abroad in Hong Kong, Saigon, Luanda, Kingston, and Tangier. He was interviewed on October 21, 1997, by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You left there in January 1962. Where did you go?

ROGERS: Vietnam. They said, "Here is a guy who knows about Vietnam. He was just there. Ship him right back."

Q: There weren't many in those days. 1962 was not high Vietnam.

ROGERS: Not at all. I was assigned to be the number two person in the two man Consular Section. When I arrived, I got off the plane and learned that the two men from the Consular Section were on that plane leaving. Frank Malloy's brother, Ian, was one. He drowned in Mexico some years later. I never met him. Another fellow's name I can't remember. I never saw them. I was there all alone. They actually departed on the same Pan Am aircraft on which my wife and I arrived.

Q: This was in Saigon. In 1969, I was consul general in Saigon. We had a booming Consular Section. You were in Vietnam from 1962 to when?

Q: What was Saigon like in 1962?

ROGERS: The people were very, very sweet. We had an old building down the street called Ham Nghi deep in the downtown. It was very insecure. When I arrived, I was the Consular Section. Then, a fellow arrived, Harland Eastman, who became the consul. I was his assistant for a while. Then another young man named Anthony Lake came in. So, I always tell Tony Lake, the immediate past National Security Advisor, that I was his first ever supervisor in the Foreign Service. He agrees. It was great fun. William C. Trueheart was the deputy chief of mission at that time. He was a wonderful person. I was very active and very vigorous in this consular work. At that time, the Vietnamese government required all military personnel to have a visa before they came there. They had to fill out this elaborate form. So, I drafted a diplomatic note from William Trueheart saying, "Our soldiers are coming here to help and protect you. I don't think they should have to have a visa." I presented that to him. He said, "You can't do a diplomatic note like that. It's got to be elaborate, full of lavish embellishments with a lot of depth and background." I said, "Why don't you try it? Let's see what happens." He did and it worked. So, he was very pleased. Then, a fellow named Dickson Boggs, who was the then staff aide to Ambassador Frederick Nolting, was transferred to Belgium. Bill Trueheart asked me to take over as staff aide to Fritz Nolting, which I did.

Q: Before we moved to the ambassadorial aide job, what was consular work like during this 1962ish period?

ROGERS: One part was shipping and seamen. A lot of sailors had problems, getting drunk, missing ship, that sort of thing. So, they took a little work. A lot of visas were for Vietnamese military going to the U.S. for training. We required them to have a visa. Occasionally, American citizens were very curious, wanted to know what was going on. David Halberstam was there almost every day.

Q: He was a "New York Times" correspondent.

ROGERS: Yes. I got to know him very well. The famous "Beat" poet, Allen Ginsberg, came to see me. I had read "Howl" earlier and he was so pleased that I knew about it. He stayed with us in the office a long time, discussing Vietnam. I can't remember what he was talking about now, but it was interesting to meet him. He died fairly recently.

Q: What about Americans marrying Vietnamese women?

ROGERS: There were a few.

Q: Of course, we didn't have the military...

ROGERS: We had a handful of military. Generally, it was discouraged. But if they really meant it... Let us say that sometimes an amorous drunken week-end would produce great affection and yet the Army would always say, "Give him two weeks to cool off" and darn if they weren't right. Usually, most of those faded away. But the sincere ones eventually got married. But some were just young, inexperienced, and frankly, in some cases, being taken advantage of. Usually, if made to wait a few weeks, it wore off.

Q: Was there any adoption of Vietnamese orphans at all?

ROGERS: Yes, I helped with a lot of those.

Q: Was it a problem?

ROGERS: No, I don't think so.

Q: In my time, the problem was bureaucratic. According to Vietnamese law, the President had to approve each orphan's adoption if it was with a non-Vietnamese. The President was kind of busy with a war on his hands.

ROGERS: We never had that problem. There was a merchant seaman who posed a very interesting problem. He was in love with a beautiful bar girl. She somehow became pregnant. He loved her dearly. He was a simple person, brawny, strong, and sweet. So, I said, "are you really going to keep this child?" "Yes, Sir, Mr. Rogers. That is my child and I really want to have it." I said, "You know, you're not married." "No." "It would be a wise thing for that child's future if you married before the child was born." "Okay." I said, "The baby is due within hours." "Yes." "Let's go." I got a U.S. missionary to go with me to the hospital. He was marrying them as we got to the hospital steps. They were pronounced husband and wife. Went in the doors and out came the baby, an American citizen. Sadly, that man was killed in a motorcycle crash later, but I gave the child a U.S. passport, to which he was then entitled.

Q: What about jailed Americans? Was this a problem?

ROGERS: Yes. One was a particularly difficult case. On the gangplank of a merchant ship, he hit over the head a fellow merchant seaman from the same ship and killed him, but as he killed him, he rolled back onto the dock. So, the Vietnamese claimed jurisdiction over him. He got five years in Chiwa prison. We had a lot of elaborate problems over that. He was still there when I left. Eventually, he got out.

There were a handful of merchant seamen... I hate to pick on merchant seaman.

Q: That's what you had at the time.

ROGERS: It was a pretty rough crowd, actually. They would get into all kinds of drunken brawls and trouble. But that was their style. That's what they wanted to do. We just let them sober up in jail for a couple of days and signed them onto the next ship if the captain would take them.

Q: When did you become Fritz Nolting's staff aide?

ROGERS: I would say well within six months of arriving.

Q: This would have been still 1962.

ROGERS: Yes. So, sometime in 1962.

Q: What was your impression of how Nolting operated?

ROGERS: I think he was a very kind and wonderful person. I really adored him. He was very good to everyone, very humane and thoughtful. He always found the best side of a person, forgave their errors and stupidity. He was not always in focus with all the elements of the country team, but he was the boss, so I think they all liked him very, very much.

Q: Now you were sort of sitting at the side of the ambassador or behind the ambassador. What was your impression of how the country team at that time viewed Diem?

ROGERS: Nolting's view was "We have to work with him. He is the leader of a nation state which we recognize." He was concerned that his brother, Ngo Diem Nhu, was influencing him too much, but felt that if we worked with him, gradually, things would be okay. He was concerned that Diem was out of touch with the reality or just didn't want to face some aspects of it. He felt that he had a distance, a sense of the traditional emperors, that he didn't feel for the people. I remember when Diem would drive around in town, a police car would go in front of him and everyone was required to turn facing the opposite way and not look at him. They really meant it. I peeked. That didn't apply to me, so I looked around to see him many times. Ambassador Nolting wanted to work with him, knew his shortcomings, but he was concerned that if anything went awry, the result would be more chaotic. Of course, he was quite right.

Q: Did you have any feeling for strong opinions contrary to this or just strong opinions on the country team? Did these surface while you were present? I'm thinking about the Political Section, the military, the CIA, etc. Did you pick up any feel for this?

ROGERS: No, on the contrary, my memory is that they pretty much supported him. A problem developed more from newsmen who seemed to feel otherwise. I am sure Halberstam was there during Nolting's tenure. They wanted to show drama and excitement and become famous by reporting what they felt would sell newspapers. John Mecklin was the USIS director in Saigon at that time. He wrote a book called "Mission in Torment." Nolting was on a cruise ship somewhere between Greece and Yugoslavia when he heard on the radio that he had been replaced by Henry Cabot Lodge in Vietnam. Nolting was sad, mystified, and hurt by that. He went back to Vietnam very briefly. His childhood friend was DCM Bill Trueheart. I think Nolting blamed Trueheart for Nolting's relief, but it wasn't Trueheart's fault. It had nothing to do with him. The main purpose was for President Kennedy to have a prominent Republican in Saigon to give the appearance of bipartisan balance. Fritz Nolting did a wonderful job and I was very devoted to him. Some weeks later, Henry Cabot Lodge arrived in Saigon with Freddy Flott and James Michael Dunn, lieutenant colonel, U.S. Army. Freddy was the friend of George Lodge, son of Henry Cabot Lodge. He needed a job, so George said, "Dad, could you give Freddy a job?" Mike Dunn was a very tough, hard person who got to know Lodge when Lodge was on two weeks' active duty for training in the Army Reserve. He hooked onto him and became his hatchetman. Dunn enjoyed hurting people and wrecking careers.

Q: How did the news of Nolting's replacement hit the embassy?

ROGERS: We were all very sorry. We all loved him. We got in his place a distant, rather arrogant, cold, famous person. Fritz Nolting would play the piano at his residence. Lodge was a totally different style. He was very aloof. I remained his staff aide until my normal time ran out, whereupon Tony Lake replaced me and sometime later, Peter Tarnoff replaced him.

Q: Did you get the impression or was it going around the embassy that Lodge had come out to get tough with Diem and we really had to push? This was the Kennedy administration. It was a pushy, hard-nosed... At least they liked to think they were a hard-nosed administration. Did you get that feeling?

ROGERS: Definitely. In fact, the first bump in this crescendo that developed was when the first Buddhist self-immolation, burning suicide occurred. Madame Nhu, Diem's sister-in-law, the so-called Dragon Lady, said, "It's just a barbecue." Lodge reacted with his first press statement. I was with him. He wrote, "It's terrible to say such a thing" and criticized her directly. Buddhists were trying to end the war either with communist influence, or on their own true peace initiative. They were being harassed by the central government and Lodge on the second or third day there (I was with him.) went to a famous Buddhist temple to demonstrate his reaching out to other sectors of the community.

Q: How did Lodge use you as a staff aide?

ROGERS: One traditional task was screening calls, listening to all of his phone calls to take notes. As an illustration, suppose either he or Fritz Nolting said, "Okay, I'll go to lunch Monday with you at 12:30." I would write all that down in his schedule book. That was one of my tasks to deal with all that. So, a great deal of his oral flow went through me. I also organized his papers and got there earlier than he so I would have all the cables arranged in a priority system so he would be sure to read the most important ones first, that sort of thing. I organized meetings for him. I was the "helpful hand."

Q: Did you get any feeling for the role of the CIA? Was there a difference between the time of Nolting and the time of Lodge from your observation?

ROGERS: Yes. My clear memory is that the CIA station continued to try to work with the Diem regime as Nolting had, but it finally came down to Lodge saying, "Well, I'm the boss and we're going to do it my way." I remember, symbolically, he took the residence of the CIA station chief and said, "I think I want your house." It was a message to the Vietnamese saying, "I can do this and he works for me." He literally kicked him out of his house and lived there. That was only maybe 10 houses away from me on the same street, Phung Khac Koan, so I remember it very well. It was, perhaps, not historically important, but symbolically, at the time, it was.

Q: These things send messages. How important was the American military as far as the Ambassador's action was concerned?

ROGERS: Lodge knew General Paul Harkins in World War II. Harkins was then the four star general who was the head of the military activities in Vietnam. They had actually served together in the same regiment, as I recall. Paul Harkins was his senior at one stage in an armored division.

Q: I think Lodge resigned from the Senate, served in North Africa, and then came back.

ROGERS: He know Harkins from that time. That was helpful. I think he got on alright with him. Lucien Conein was a CIA officer. He is still living in Virginia [Note: Conein died in 1999.]. I saw him at a funeral not too long ago. He was a lieutenant colonel, uniformed. He was Lodge's liaison with restive generals who were thinking of replacing Diem. My impression was he was involved a great deal with that task, more so than much of the rest of the CIA. Conein knew many of the senior Vietnamese officers when they were all in the French army in WWII.

Q: Did you gain any feeling about a growing impatience of Lodge with Diem after he arrived?

ROGERS: Oh, yes, and it gradually seemed to turn a corner and he'd say, "Well, he's got to go." How and when precisely that turn occurred, I don't recall. But it did happen. Unfortunately, Diem and his brother, Ngo Diem Nhu, were killed the following morning.

Q: Were you there at the time?

ROGERS: Oh, yes.

Q: What was the situation from your perspective just prior to the General's coup?

ROGERS: It was very, very tense. We knew of troop movements around town. We were aware of that. I'll never forget, on the day of the coup, to show you how much I was out of the loop (Even though I was the staff aide, there were some things I never knew.), I went into work one day and Lodge didn't show up. Then, the coup began. I called and he was having lunch with Mike Dunn. I said, "There is a coup underway." He said, "I know. I am staying here. You stay there." So, Bill Trueheart and I stayed in the office. We didn't know what was going to happen. I had a submachine gun on my desk. I didn't know if they were going to storm the building or what was going to happen. Mercifully, the embassy was not stormed. It became very dramatic. I was at the embassy all night long. I went out in the morning with Jim Rosenthal to walk over to the palace and we saw the damage that had been done to it as it had been attacked. I walked around the grounds and in the barracks of the palace guard. We didn't realize it at that time, but Diem had fled to Cholon and was eventually picked up and killed by an army captain who in turn was later killed. That was certainly an unforgettable and dramatic day.

Q: When you heard about these events, what were you getting from the junior officer mafia about this being a good thing or something else?

ROGERS: I would say they were more conservative on it, feeling that the devil you know is better than the devil you don't know, and that we'd better try to work with this system that we know, try to get his brother, Ngo Diem Nhu, out of power. In fact, Lodge once suggested to Diem, "Maybe it would be better if your brother took some leave in the Philippines or someplace" and tried to gracefully get rid of him. Diem wouldn't hear of it. From what I know about junior officers, in my view they're all very sincere, conscientious people who did the best they could.

Q: At that time, did we have much in the way of language officers and people who were out in the field or was it pretty much an embassy-centered operation?

ROGERS: The latter, although in approximately 1963, we began getting Vietnamese language trained people there. The only one I recall who spoke Vietnamese and was there immediately before I arrived was Lyle Brecken. He is still living and is a good friend. Then, six other Vietnamese-trained people arrived. But there weren't too many. Most of our work was done in French. I didn't speak Vietnamese.

Q: We did not have this vast network that later developed of officers out in the field.

ROGERS: No. We did have provincial reporters, but not as elaborate as the CORDS program eventually became. It was very small, nothing like was later there. One of those provincial reporters later became Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and the Pacific and for EUR, Richard Holbrooke [Note: U.S. representative to the UN in 1999]. He was one of those first provincial reporters. I remember distinctly when he came to the office and said, "I have to see the ambassador." I said, "Okay." I was not the doorkeeper. I wanted to facilitate communication. I said, "He's got some ambassador in there now making a courtesy call and he has somebody else coming later, but I'll hold that so you can get in and tell him your story." His point was that things were not as rosy as had been reported by the military in the Mekong Delta region. That was the first time I met Holbrooke. He was certainly very hard-driving, very determined to get his message across, which was a message in contrast to what others were reporting. He was out there in the field.

Q: Was there any concern that maybe our information was coming too much from sort of political circles within Saigon and not really reflecting the state of the country?

ROGERS: Yes. I used to call it "veranda reporting." You sit around with the usual suspects, the same old folks, in sort of an incestuous turnabout and you hear the same story.

Q: The veranda of the Continental Hotel.

ROGERS: That sort of thing, or homes. But I've seen that all over the world. Either it's the veranda or it's what the taxi driver told you on the way to the airport and that's the way the lazy people do their reporting. But hopefully, I'm confident, nowadays people are much more astute and professional about it.

Q: Was there the feeling that America's critical interests were at stake in Vietnam at this point?

ROGERS: No, I don't think so. There was some theoretical domino collapse nonsense, but I certainly didn't buy that. I didn't think it made any sense. That was that if Vietnam falls - to what? Into itself. Actually, the concept was, we were trying to help the people of Vietnam establish their own independent identity free from outside control (read China, Soviet Union). I think that if the Cold War were not underway, we would have taken no particular interest. Just as in much of Africa, our interest was sparked by East-West struggle, but it had nothing or almost nothing to do with our direct interest.

Q: What about after the killing of Diem and his brother, how did this hit the embassy?

ROGERS: I think that everyone was very tired. They had been up all night and were just kind of touchy, hoping that it would all work out. Lodge had me organize a dinner for what he called either the Council of Sages or the Council of Notables, some across-the-board group we tried to piece together to try to get people from all aspects of life - university, religious groups, business, and so forth - and try to get them collectively to see how best we should proceed to assist them in their development. I recall also that that didn't amount to much. It kind of sputtered away quickly.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese political class?

ROGERS: They were very much - I won't say francophone, but had a veneer of French style to them. They were certainly not pro-French in that all of them wanted independence from France. They were glad of that. I think that they had enough of the French. Some businessmen still stayed there and seemed quite content. There was a sense that "This is our nation and we want to do it our way." I'm sad to say that our position was, "Go ahead, provided China and the Soviet Union aren't involved," which they were. I suppose China historically did look upon Indochina as a former satrapy that owed fidelity to China. They had many conflicts. They had been occupied and had wars with China over the years. On the other hand, during the French colonial period, especially during World War II when the Vichy government controlled it, a lot of Vietnamese were inside China. A lot of the Vietnamese "democratic patriots," as they called themselves, worked within China in the hopes of eventually getting the French out. Of course, they didn't.

Politically, it's a Mandarin elitist culture from the old animitic times. It's my theory that Diem saw himself as a replacement for Bao Dai and that he was a regal personality. His family was very powerful. Ngo Diem Tuc was the Archbishop of Hue, the senior Catholic official in Vietnam.

Q: After the coup, you were still there when they started the series of revolving generals?

ROGERS: Yes. The coup was in November 1963.

Q: It was very close to the assassination of Kennedy.

ROGERS: It was about 20 days from that.

Q: So we're talking about November 2nd or so.

ROGERS: I remember, when Kennedy was assassinated, I had to look in a book to see how you make the black mourning wreath on the flag to put out in front of the embassy. All those little things. But shortly after that, my tour of duty ended in January. Tony Lake replaced me and I went off to my next assignment.

W. ROBERT WARNE
Assistant Development Officer, USAID
Saigon (1962-1964)

W. Robert Warne was born in Washington, DC on November 30, 1937. Mr. Warne attended high school in Tehran, Hawaii, graduating in Brazil. He then attended Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School. After graduation in 1962, Warne took a commission, spending two years with artillery in the Army. Warne then became a member of AID in the fall of 1962, to begin a diplomatic career spanning 24 years. Warne has also served in Buenos Aires, Brussels, Kingston, and Paris. The interview was conducted by C. Stuart Kennedy April 1, 1995.

Q: I like to get the stance. The first time you went to Vietnam, you went there as...

WARNE: I only went to Vietnam one time, and that was a two-year tour with my family- my wife Susanna, and baby daughter of six months, Robin. We arrived in Vietnam in December of 1962, and left in December of 1964.

AID was so anxious to recruit me and others like me. It was building up a program called Provincial Operations, which was assigning Americans to the provinces to administer local AID programs. I happened to be the first AID officer assigned to the Mekong Delta. It was an experiment. As an exception, AID allowed me to take my family along. The family did not want to be separated.

Q: What was the situation like in Vietnam at that time, as you were told before you went out? Obviously, you weren't told much.

WARNE: I really didn't know even what I was going to be doing, when I left Washington. Actually, the situation was fluid and contested by the Viet Cong. We were trying to get a grip on what was happening. We were assessing what our program should be. Our mission was "to win the hearts and the minds of the people." Our aim was to consolidate the Vietnamese government's presence and governance. The issue was how we could grapple with a civil war, or insurrection, and best respond to it. We were experimenting to see what would work with us.

When I arrived in Saigon, I went in to see my boss, Rufus Phillips, who, although I didn't know it, had had a career in the CIA. Rufus had now surfaced as an embassy officer and was coordinating the Provincial Operations program. He was highly effective, energized and dedicated and assessed conditions accurately.

Provincial Operations had a budget of, I'm not even sure exactly how much - it was twenty or thirty million dollars for this program. I was allocated about a million dollars and assigned to two provinces. Rufus called me in and said, "Well, Rob, I'd like you to go down to these two central provinces in the Mekong Delta, Vinh-Long and Dien-Binh." A colleague introduced me to the two province chiefs. I found a place to live and set up a program. I didn't have any other guidance. I knew that I was supposed to develop programs to respond to the province chiefs' and the communities' needs.

Q: I just want to get a little feel about how we went about this. How old were you when you went there?

WARNE: Twenty-three.

Q: So you're twenty-three years old. You're sent...

WARNE: Just out of the Army and college.

Q: And no particular training.

WARNE: Absolutely none at all.

Q: Did they hand you a volume of guidelines of what you were supposed to do?

WARNE: They only thing they handed me was a map.

Q: If I weren't a former government employee myself, I'd think that was incredible. Was there anybody before you went out you could talk to and say, gee, what are the options?

WARNE: No. I was required, once a month, to write a report about the program. From that, and from the various other reports from the provinces around the country, we developed common guidelines.

Basically I was a community-action officer who was trying to extend effectively the reach of the government into the countryside.

Frankly, I think the description that the U.S. military advisor used to describe the Provincial Operations program was quite apt: "Dynamic inexperience." We were very anxious to go out and do things. We had resources and were determined to show results.

There were three or four guidelines that I quickly developed myself. One was to complement the province governor. I did not do anything without his involvement or without his commitment that he wanted me to undertake it. He and his staff needed to be involved in the project and, most importantly, identified with it. I didn't want it to have a U.S. identification to the program. Our goal was to build the capability of the provincial and district governments.

The second guideline was that [I wanted to do something that would] impact on the local communities in the countryside. I found that there were five or six things that we could do that the people needed badly. These were impoverished, rural, rice-growing areas. I went to each community to determine what the communities needed and what the people would become involved in. I developed a flip chart that described how the province and the local people could participate together in community-action projects. From those discussions with each of the village councils and local communities, we would identify local projects.

These broke down into building schools, providing school supplies, digging wells, providing livestock, or poultry, fertilizer, building a bridge, providing a nurse and medical supplies.

Refugee relief was a major component. We had a number of people who were relocated out of areas because of the insurrection.

Military engagements occurred daily. A lot of people didn't realize that in that period, in the middle '60s, there was such a buildup of the Viet Cong. There was a V.C. regiment in each of the provinces. These were broken down into mobile platoons and squads. I have a map here that will show the pattern of military incidents. We had at least 30 or 40 incidents a month. Many of them were assassinations, bombings or sniper fire. I was caught in 40 or more incidents myself while I was there.

Q: Did you feel that your presence was a problem to the province people? I would think that the whole idea, on the part of the Viet Cong, would be to discourage aid coming from the United States.

WARNE: Yes, the Viet Cong systematically destroyed the projects whenever they launched an operation. Whenever there was an incident against my person, it was, I think, indirect. The American military picked up leaflets and other information that purported the V.C. had a price on my head. It seemed like a large amount of money at the time. But there was a price on everyone's head--the province governor and the U.S. military adviser and others--so I was not being singled out. I was exposed. I went throughout the two provinces everyday. I sometimes I preferred to go without a military escort. I never felt that I was a direct target. But I'm sure that if the V.C. had had the opportunity, they would have killed me. I had several vehicles mined while I was there. The closest incident I had was when the province governor and I walked into an ambush. The V.C. shot two of the soldiers with us.

The Viet Cong did not know what to do with me. I wasn't a hostile, in the sense I wasn't out trying to kill them.

They also exploited our activities. The V.C. used our grain (we had a lot of bulgur wheat and cooking oil) for their own purposes.

It was a discouraging effort. During those two years, we were losing the war. I could see it visibly. When I first arrived there were many remote areas I could go to and work in. By the time I left, many of these areas were insecure. Our schoolhouses and other projects were torn down. The security deterioration made it much more difficult to travel. Several of the roads to the district towns that I regularly used were blocked. One time, I actually had to persuade the province governor to let me use an antique tank and a platoon of soldiers to clear the road in order to get some supplies through. I was increasingly discouraged. My reports described the pattern of attacks of the Viet Cong. They were squeezing the province towns. They built roadblocks and took over the villages and transportation around the provinces.

Another discouraging feature was the uneven quality of the local leadership. One province governor, Major Minh, was particularly effective. He knew how to work with the people, and had integrity and honesty. But we had other province governors who did not measure up. There were five during the time I was there in just one province. The government also changed several times in Saigon. This dramatically impacted on our effectiveness. In fact, frankly, at some points,

I was really the province governor because I had resources and capability. The military advisors and I helped to hold things together during these turbulent times. But we were continuously losing ground to the Viet Cong.

I worked very closely with the military. That was one of the things that I made a point of doing. I'm not sure all of my colleagues did. I wanted the military to know exactly what I was doing.

Q: You're talking about the American military.

WARNE: Yes, and also the Vietnamese. At first, until my family moved to the province with me, I lived with the military. I was doing, and I tried to design programs with their participation. I think they appreciated that. I always had a good relationship with the military, in one of the provinces. In the other province...

Q: Which was?

WARNE: This was Vinh Long, which was the more prosperous and important of the two provinces. It also had a larger population - about 200,000.

Q: What was the capital?

WARNE: The city of Binh Long was the capital. And I have a map here I'll be glad to show you.

But I had an adverse experience, partly due to my inexperience. The province governor, who was a well-trained, French-educated colonel, exploited the population and his situation. I began to pull back from giving full support to him.

The province had a poorly conceived program of building strategic hamlets, essentially barbed-wire fortresses around villages. The purpose was to prevent the Viet Cong from night attacks and infiltration. It was not a well-conceived plan because the villages could not be protected in this manner. We put a lot of resources into strategic hamlets which remained vulnerable.

At that time, the government required each province to report the amount of hamlets that had been secured and the effectiveness of the security.

This governor wanted to look good. Instead of securing the individual villages, he built an immense barbed wire fence and mote around his province. Perhaps over 600 kilometers. This effort was not sensible. There's no way you could secure such a long barbed-wire fence. He also used forced labor to build the fence.

I objected.

This was not the plan. The aim was to develop the resources for the community, not exploit the people.

When I objected, the province governor became incensed. He reported to President Ngu Dinh Diem that I was not cooperating. The government undertook an official inspection.

[I told my boss about this situation, and he actually was called in by the president and asked who this guy was and what was going on.]

Well, my boss, Rufus Phillips, got a U.S. Navy plane to fly over the province and photograph the long barbed-wire fences, to demonstrate that the province was not following the instructions of the strategic hamlets. He gave the photos to the president's brother to respond to these accusations. My situation with the governor had come to a breaking point. I bid farewell. He was proud and rigid. I never developed a good personal relationship with him, although he was very kind to me. I stayed in his home a couple of times.

The last time I stayed with him, I gave him a bottle of scotch. And he insisted I open the bottle and take the first drink. He thought I was trying to poison him.

He told me to take this road out of town. A MAAG (Military Assistance Advisory Group) advisor, a captain, said, "Why don't you take an alternate road." I'm glad I did because I avoided an ambush.

The province governor was related to the president. He was protected politically. But they did transfer him six months later from that job. The Viet Cong continued to expand its control over the rural areas.

Q: Obviously, you didn't speak Vietnamese. How did you find out what was going on?

WARNE: I spoke a little French, and I did study Vietnamese. I had an interpreter. I did most of my business through an interpreter. This interpreter became a close friend. He escaped from Vietnam after the war. With our help his family and he now live here in the Washington area.

Q: Was corruption a bad problem?

WARNE: It was a serious problem and never controlled adequately. For example, we would allow expenditures for gasoline; there was no way to control vouchers. But corruption was not rampant. I didn't have all that much money. Much of the aid was in kind. I would buy uniforms, equipment or seed. I don't think anyone really made a lot of money over me.

I would always get equipment such as trucks and pumps from whatever sources would be available. Communications came primarily through the local telegraph. USAID/Saigon sent me a wire saying 17 rehabilitated WWII trucks were available. No one seemed interested in them. I said, "I'm coming to get them." They added to our transportation capabilities. The Vietnamese military used them more than I did. That didn't bother me; they needed the trucks. I did not draw a line between the civilian and military activities.

Regarding corruption, I had some problems. Two or three province governors were free-wheeling. I was careful about the release of funds, but some funds were misused. In one case, I had to halt expenditures because of malfeasance. Frankly the lack of effective government and commitment by our Vietnamese counterparts were our most troubling problems. The Vietnamese at the provincial and district [levels] in some cases undermined our efforts to win public support and cooperation for the government.

But for the most part, our programs had an impact.

Provincial Operations used to compare Defense Secretary Robert McNamara's visits to Vietnam to a division attack. He would just overwhelm us with requests for data and analysis.

I filed several reports about the difficulties to carry out our programs; and we were losing ground and lacked effectiveness.

These reports caused several confrontations with McNamara's senior staff. They called me up to Saigon. I disagreed with their conclusion that things were going well. I said, "I can only speak for the provinces I know, but conditions are exactly opposite from your conclusions. We're losing ground. It's just a matter of time before these provinces will be taken over by the Viet Cong." I illustrated with four maps. One map portrayed the Viet Cong activities in the province; every terrorist incident was marked on it. Secondly, a map showed the secure areas where we could operate. The third described the number of strategic hamlets and the number kept shrinking. Finally, a map located our programs and those which had been destroyed or abandoned. McNamara's staff questioned my analysis. They said that I didn't know what I was talking about.

They did make one credible point. Senior staff said, "Some of those early strategic hamlets were not well established, you didn't have effective presence, and the security program has now been consolidated. Perhaps so, but the area controlled by the government was shrinking and this contraction occurred during the entire period I was in Vietnam.

Another major effort that was not going well was the Vietnamese military directed me to relocate tens of thousands of refugees from areas that were Viet Cong controlled. We were trying to strip them of resources and population. Relocating these people was a terrible job, because I lacked the capability to relocate several thousand people from their homes and provide them with basic services, medical care and foodstuffs. A number of small, temporary communities were built. But the people returned to their homes at the first opportunity. Many were hardened Viet Cong by the time they left. I tried to discourage the program, but I often was instructed to do it. Large relocation as a retaliatory measure against the Viet Cong was a serious mistake.

A Special Forces unit was stationed in one of the most insecure areas. I used to fly in to see them and help with various programs. It was a very hostile area. We always received ground fire whenever we flew in or out. During my assignment, the Viet Cong gained control of the entire district, except for the immediate area around the Special Forces camp. The US team was a thorn in the V.C.'s side but did not check their insurgency.

I came to the conclusion that we just didn't know how to prosecute the war. We were in a civil war that called for a different approach. We had a weak government, a government that was not committed to prosecuting the war. For example, the Vietnamese objective was to avoid casualties. The military often avoided closing with the Viet Cong. The Vietnamese leadership was often corrupt and ineffective. There were some exceptions however. Some Vietnamese were very good officers. For the most part, we had an uphill battle. Unless we were really willing to commit millions of men to secure the countryside, we couldn't make the difference by presenting the war under those conditions.

Q: Were you there during the coup that took Diem?

WARNE: Yes, I was there, but I was not in Saigon at the time. Many expected a change because Diem and his family were being criticized and seemed ineffective.

Q: Did that have any particular effect?

WARNE: Yes, it did. It had a destabilizing effect. Most key positions were changed. All the old relationships were cut. New inexperienced people took over. It was a turbulent period. There was a noticeable slowdown in governmental leadership and programs. For the most part, key positions were given to cronies. The selections were not based on merit. Frankly these Mekong Delta provinces were given secondary priority. The best officers went to jobs in Saigon, other cities and major commands. This was a mistake I believe.

Q: Was John Paul Vann down there?

WARNE: Yes, he was. He was not far from me. He started in Long-anh, which was the province north of me. He had a different approach as a military leader. I did not direct the military operations. His experience in presenting was similar to mine. For example, the Vietnamese military refused to close with the Viet Cong in both operations.

We had two or three major engagements with the Viet Cong during the time I was there. We never had an engagement larger than company size, but we had several company-sized attacks. Several US military officers were killed. On two occasions the V.C. attacked the provincial capital in which we lived. Those were mainly skirmishes, however. Once a mortar round dropped near our home.

Q: You're speaking about Americans.

WARNE: Yes. The American military advisors were competent and dedicated but not the ebullient, strong leader and outspoken type that Vann was. I can remember sitting on the steps of the province chief's house when one of the majors was leaving as head of the advisory unit. He said, "Rob, I just wish I could say that I accomplished something during the year I was here. I didn't really make any difference."

When I left Vietnam, I was assigned to the Vietnam Desk. Actually, I was first assigned to go to Brazil. My assignment was changed to put me on the Desk. I returned a year later on a presidential evaluation mission led by President Johnson's Special Assistant Robert Komer. I went back to my old haunts. I reversed the course of Komer's evaluation. He started in the north, and I went first to the south. I covered many of the same stops, during the ten days of the visit.

One of the most heartrending experiences was in the visit to the province town of Vinh Bink-Phu Vinh. I had been there two years and knew people. The same province governor Colonel Tranh was in charge. The military advisor, Colonel, Muckerman, was also there. DoD had extended his tour. We discussed their plans. They said, "We're undertaking a new operation. We're going to secure Cau-Ke district. We have two battalions reinforced with so many armored personnel carriers and artillery. The V.C. headquarters were going to be surrounded. Permanent ARVN presence was to be established.

I said, "I participated in a similar operation with the previous province governor about two and a half years ago. I camped out in the district for several weeks; got eaten up with mosquitos and suffered from diarrhea. We lasted about three weeks before withdrawing. We lost so many men by booby traps and sniper fire that we gave up and pulled back. It was just a terrible experience. We thought that we had the forces needed to secure the district."

They said, "Well, it's different this time. We've got it organized."

I said farewell to them as they went off to lead their units.

I heard later that the province governor got out on one side of his jeep and Muckerman on the other. A land mine went off and blew the province governor's leg off and badly wounded Muckerman. That ended that operation.

We never learned. We never developed the experience and the know-how to prosecute the war. Our personnel were rotated every year. The Vietnamese commanders changed even more often. We never figured out how to combat guerillas and operate in a civil war. Perhaps we could not win the war. But operations focused on local areas in a concerted, comprehensive way would have slowed the V.C. down, if not reversed, their success.

Q: You're obviously looking with hindsight. But let's go back to the McNamara people you were talking to when you were there. Were these people who were resolved on a course and they wanted to have the figures that looked good to them? McNamara had this tendency...

WARNE: To quantify everything.

Q: Did you have the feeling that it had to be positive?

WARNE: Yes. It was an attitude that was cultivated by the way that we ran the military. Civilians were just as bad; I'm not saying it was just the military. We brought people over on short assignments, eleven months to a year. They needed to demonstrate accomplishment to get promoted. The President wanted to win the war. We were providing a lot of resources. We were determined to make it look good.

Saigon was removed from reality. As a result, fictitious accomplishments became the rule of the day. I'm not saying that everyone was being misled or satisfied with reports. I can remember Al Kromer talking to the President's advisor for Vietnam. He was a real terror, a tough guy. His nickname was "blow torch". In quiet moments, he said, "We really are dealing with a civil war." But no official would ever say that publicly.

I had an interesting experience when I first arrived at the Vietnam Desk. Komer called "Hey, Warne, I understand you've been out in Vietnam and you know the situation."

I said, "Yes, sir."

He said, "The University of Michigan is going to have a teach-in, and they want to have someone to tell the students about the situation in Vietnam. Would you do that?"

I have never been so scared in all my life. I was confronted by 10,000 screaming kids ready to tear me from limb to limb. I shouted over their yelling and I got out safely. Attending those teach-ins was not a good idea. We were a magnet to draw people in. Things went downhill rapidly regarding public support for the war. The president was caught in a difficult situation.

When I got back from Vietnam, Len Unger, a deputy assistant secretary, was in charge of Vietnam at the State Department. He called two or three recent returnees to ask us for advice. The issue was whether we should increase U.S. forces. This was early in '65. The president had a DoD proposal to send 50,000 more troops. The first major commitment of US forces.

I was the only one in the group who opposed a troop commitment. I said that, unless we were willing to commit major resources in the two provinces -- at least a regiment in each province -- we would not succeed in those areas. Even with a regiment in each province, it would be difficult to prosecute the war. Without being able to have dominant presence in each of the provincial districts we couldn't drive the Viet Cong out. Otherwise we could secure some of the roads and key communities, but the rest of the countryside would be controlled by the Viet Cong. My family and I had a unique experience setting up household in a town of 25,000 one hundred miles south of Saigon. My wife taught school until the principal asked her to stop for security reasons. At first, we were able to drive to Saigon, but shortly we relied on air transport for food, mail and travel. When we left, we flew out by helicopter. Suzy, my wife, would be alert for a plane to buzz the house each week. This was the grocery, mail run. She was the only Caucasian woman for much of the time. Life magazine did a four-page story on us just before we left. It was a major blunder to escalate the war. We committed US forces to an open-ended situation. We lacked the will to provide the troops and long term commitment to gain the upper hand. Without such determination, we should never have gotten involved in a civil war in which the Viet Cong had the upper hand.

Q: When you were back in Washington, how did you find the Vietnam working group you were on? You were in an AID working group.

WARNE: No, I wasn't. I didn't explain what happened to me. My appointment to the Foreign Service came through when I was in Vietnam, and on one of my trips up to Saigon I was sworn in. Since they were now assigning FSOs to the provincial jobs, I was converted from a reserve to a regular officer position. I continued on in the position same salary and grade. I made a mistake. I probably would have had a more successful career if I'd stayed in AID. I came in as an FSR-8. That's the lowest rung of the Foreign Service reserve. I was promoted one rung while I was in AID, and State picked me up as a seven. But AID had already put me in to be promoted to a six. I would have gotten ahead more rapidly in AID and was headed for program management.

When I was ready to return to Washington, the Embassy at Saigon said there was no reason to give me any training. I had already been in the field. The beginning A-100 Course was waived. I didn't have any language qualifications, so I couldn't get promoted above a six without passing the language exam. State was going to send me to Spanish, but it pulled me off to go on the Vietnam Desk. I ultimately took Spanish on my own in early morning classes.

I had orders to go Brazil. During transit, I offered to give a briefing to the Vietnam working group -- the inter-agency-level management of Vietnam.

I had an illustrative report on what went on in Vietnam from my perspective in the provinces. It had four parts: community action; the military situation illustrated by several maps of how the Viet Cong was taking control; the leadership in the local area; and finally an evaluation of progress issues. I had one series of photos of the results of U.S. bombing raids on a Buddhist temple that had killed several Buddhist monks. I explained how the Viet Cong had drawn us into the engagement.

When this incident happened, I went to the division headquarters and complained to the division commander. It had really set our program back. I lost effective relationships with two district chiefs because of it. I had gone to see the Dai-Duc Mekong, the Senior Buddhist monk, to make homage and apology. He allowed me to give restitution for the monks deaths and rebuild the temple. That was not the only incident, there were several like that. I tried to get across to the military that this was not productive.

There was an Air Force general at this working group briefing who got very angry at me for this description of what happened. So I got a little notoriety out of that confrontation.

Ambassador Unger asked me to stay on in Washington rather than go to Brazil. I joined the State Department's Vietnam working group. I was one of the five on the Desk. I spent about two years on the Desk. By the time I left it had more than doubled in size. During the entire period I was the most junior officer on the desk.

Q: You were there about '64 to '66?

Q: Did you find, with this working group, that there was an attitude that we have to see things in a positive light, Americans can do anything, we can do this? What was the feeling?

WARNE: No. The desk had the attitude that the Administration needed to do a better job of improving the capability of the Vietnamese government, and broadening its political base. We focused on political development through development of the National Assembly, and broader participation of the populace, and strengthening responsiveness. For Example, the Desk worried about the Buddhist demonstrations, and other dissident groups.

No, the working group did not have an attitude that we had to do anything to win the war, and that we were going to cover up the problems. The State People had integrity and were honest about developments. But the Desk was not in the driver's seat. The military was running the war. We could have done more, however, to explain to the administration what our problems were. We were dependent on the embassy and the AID mission for reporting. Everyone wanted to be positive and make progress.

Those involved knew the war wasn't going well. We ran an around-the-clock working group in times of stress in Vietnam. I happened to be in the operations center, on the phone to Saigon, during the Tet Offensive. I was the first one to get reports on how the country was breaking up. We all knew it was coming. We did not anticipate Tet; that took everyone by surprise. Essentially, what we were trying to do was hold a deteriorating situation together.

I was assigned primarily to follow developments in the Mekong Delta and coordinate activities with USIA and AID. I had never been in an embassy. I had an entirely different background than the other officers, who had all been in the embassy political section in Saigon. They had different skills. I learned a lot. If I was going to be a Foreign Service officer, that's where I had to start. For example, I prepared each week a worldwide assessment of developments in Vietnam which was used as talking points for all of our embassies and spokesmen.

When I returned from the trip to Vietnam in 1966, I wrote an extensive report describing how the war was not going well.

Komer, on the other hand had come back with a very positive report.

My boss, Ambassador Robert Miller, recommended that it be sent over to the White House. But it never went anywhere. In fact, I don't think Len Unger ever read it. I followed up a couple of times and asked if he'd had a chance to read it. And he said, "I've taken it home, but I was so tired, I didn't get it out of my briefcase." My views didn't make any impact at all.

I can remember my boss getting angry with me one time. USIA wanted to set up a TV network throughout Vietnam -- TV in all the local villages. This was to get our message across to the local population. The American military was anxious to get TV out there for the troops for entertainment purposes. USIA took excessive time to prepare its proposal. My boss kept getting more and more angry with USIA for dragging its feet. He worried that McNamara would say, "Let's do it. The hell with the USIA. The troops need it now." I just couldn't get USIA to move. It was one thing after another. Thus, all of us had difficulties in moving a lethargic administration. Washington was not on a wartime footing, although the Desk worked. We used to work around the clock when emergencies occurred.

The Department asked me to do a lot of public speaking. I was in nearly every major city and on numerous radio and TV programs. I described the AID program and the community action effort. AID also used me for recruitment.

One of my peculiar jobs on the Desk was to review FBI files on demonstrators. The FBI sent over regular reports on demonstrators, perhaps 10 to 20 a day. I just filed them. It was a waste of time. The agent would be sitting in a car on the corner; the suspect would be walking across the street. Great detail about nothing.

Obviously, the administration was struggling with a very strong civil uprising in our own country against the war. We weren't handling that well at all, either. We just couldn't cope with the justified public outrage about prosecution of the war. Eventually, the opposition knocked Johnson out of the White House. Fortunately, I had left the desk before the peak of the outrage. By that time the Johnson Administration had blundered seriously over Vietnam. Its leaders refused to accept reality -- the U.S. could not dictate terms that produced a favorable outcome for it.

MAXWELL D. TAYLOR
Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff
Washington, DC (1962-1964)

Ambassador

Ambassador Maxwell D. Taylor was born in 1901. He was Chief of Staff of the Army in the Eisenhower period from 1955 to 1959 and ambassador to Vietnam from 1964 to 1965. He was interviewed for the Lyndon Baines Johnson Library by Dorothy Pierce in 1969 and by Ted Gittinger in 1981.

Q: General Taylor, you are a very well known individual and I really don't feel that it's necessary for me to give your whole career by way of introduction. Since we are going to be dealing primarily with the '60's, I would like to make touchstones of your various services and assignments during that period. This is more for my benefit and to be sure that I have the times correct on them. You retired as Chief of Staff in 1959. This is, of course, under President Eisenhower. President Kennedy recalled you to active duty in 1961, and you served as the military representative to the President. From '62 to '64, you were Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; from 1964 to 1965, Ambassador to Vietnam; and since then you have served as Special Consultant to President Johnson on diplomatic, military, and strategic matters. Just this March (1969) you have become Chairman of the military-

TAYLOR: I became a member of the Intelligence Board at the same time I became a consultant. I then succeeded Mr. Clark Clifford as Chairman of that board when he became Secretary of Defense.

Q: Also, during your career you've authored two books, The Uncertain Trumpet and Responsibility and Response. General Taylor, before we begin I would like to find out if you have participated in any other oral history project.

TAYLOR: Yes, I participated in the recordings for the benefit of the Kennedy Library covering essentially the period of time during which I was associated with President Kennedy. As you have indicated, that was from April 1961 until the President's death.

Q: Have you any changes or corrections or additions to add to that tape here?

TAYLOR: No, I don't think so. I went rather thoroughly over the events which were included in that period with which I was associated. They're available on file under the terms of access to them in the Kennedy Library. I would imagine that if I changed them now, it would be for the worse.

Q: In an effort not to take your time and duplicate any statements that you have made, I will primarily pick up from '63, except for earlier associations with President Johnson and some overall pictures of the '60's which I'd like to get from you. Before we get into this, I'd like to just start with when you first met Lyndon Johnson and what the circumstances were.

TAYLOR: I'm sorry to say I can't pinpoint the exact time. It was during the period when I was Chief of Staff of the Army, which was in the Eisenhower period from 1955 to 1959. He, of course, was Senator Johnson and I saw him frequently in connection with the Preparedness Subcommittee of which he was chairman. I testified before him on many occasions. I got to know him in that sense of the word, which was not particularly intimately, but I did see enough of his work in the field of national security to form a very high opinion of his interest in national security and also the vast amount of energy he expended in becoming thoroughly knowledgeable with many complex subjects.

Q: Is there any particular time, or times, that stand out in your mind during the period?

TAYLOR: Yes, I remember very well an occasion -- the year of which I cannot mention without consulting my diary -- but it was known that the Joint Chiefs were very unhappy about the budget of that particular year. He [Johnson] called a full scale open hearing of his subcommittee and before klieg lights brought each one of the Chiefs, one by one, in front of the committee to testify on what they thought of their budget. It was somewhat humorous because the Chiefs, constrained as they are by the ethics of their position -- in other words not taking advantage of an open hearing to complain about their civilian masters in the Pentagon -- were in a very unenviable position. They had to tell the truth, yet they also certainly did not want to suggest disloyalty to the civilian leaders. It ended up something like this: that each chief would talk about his own budget and in response to questions indicate that he didn't think that budget was large enough. But then, at the end, the final question the chairman would ask, "Well, what about the entire Defense budget?"

'Well,' they'd say, 'We think that is all right.' This led one of the Senators to say, "This is the most unusual situation, where four insufficient budgets add up to a sufficient overall budget."

Q: Were there any other such occasions? [What was] did you think, the then-Senator Johnson's reasoning for bringing you in this setting?

TAYLOR: Well, it was public knowledge that there was great unhappiness at the Pentagon. I presume I was the prime villain because these were the days when, as the Army spokesman, I was fighting the cause of flexible response versus massive retaliation. This was known about town but had never been aired in a public sense. I would say that Senator Johnson recognized it was a highly important matter; that it was not really parochial inter-service bickering as sometimes it was described. But it was a question of two contending strategies of great national importance. To air the issue in this way would be a profitable and useful exercise.

Q: And did you air it, sir?

TAYLOR: Within the constraints to which I referred. I believe this was '58. The following year I retired and produced The Uncertain Trumpet, which was a formal statement of this issue in a more or less compact form.

Q: Are there any other occasions during that period?

TAYLOR: That stands out just because of its conspicuous nature, but I have nothing other than my recollection of many discussions with Senator Johnson, hearings before him, and his great interest, as I say, in the Armed Services and the problems of the men in uniform.

Q: Did you have many sort of private sessions with him?

TAYLOR: No, I don't recall any. I would see him occasionally socially around town. But again, this was far from being an intimate relationship.

Q: Did you formulate any opinions at that point as to the possible political career of -- ?

TAYLOR: He was known as very energetic and as a comer in the Senate. I would see his hand in the Pentagon in the form of questions, interrogations, expressions of interest on a thousand-and-one subjects which were conducted under the responsibility of the civilian Secretaries of the Pentagon.

Q: What, in your judgment, do you feel has been the major foreign policy, defense-related problems of the 1960's?

TAYLOR: I think the easy answer is Southeast Asia -- Vietnam, Secondarily, I suppose, the Middle East situation. That's certainly true today, and I think both of those problems, of course, have roots well in the past.

Q: This, of course, would cover part of the Kennedy period Just prior to this, the Cuban missile crisis was of course involved in that era.

TAYLOR: I might say that my first involvement with President Kennedy was as a result of the Bay of Pigs. I was in private life in New York at the time and was called down two days after the Cuban Brigade surrendered to meet with President Kennedy. Vice President Johnson was present at the time in the Oval Room. I was facing a very shocked new Administration [over] this serious disaster -- disaster from a military and political point of view -- and complete uncertainty as to what really had occurred. After about twenty-four hours of discussing it with President Kennedy, Vice President Johnson, McGeorge Bundy -- the principal actors of the White House -- I agreed to undertake a review of the Bay of Pigs. I was to be chairman of an investigating committee, the other three being Bobby Kennedy; Allen Dulles, the head of the CIA; and Admiral Arleigh Burke, who was CNO at the time. So it was through the Bay of Pigs that I was recalled eventually to active duty in mid-summer, and then stayed on until 1964 when I went to Vietnam.

Q: General Taylor, in President Kennedy's campaign in 1960 he did, of course, concentrate very heavily on defense problems and posture. Had he had any contact with you?

TAYLOR: No, I was living in Mexico at the time and looking at this election campaign very much from a distance. I did, however, receive a letter from him while I was still in Mexico saying he had read The Uncertain Trumpet, and congratulating me on it -- just a few lines. That was the only contact I had with him, and I had no idea that I would ever be associated with his Administration.

Q: When you did come into his Administration -- this sounds like a loaded question, but did you have any indication that you would be going into the Joint Chiefs position?

TAYLOR: No, not in the slightest. I came down first hoping to get back to Lincoln Center, where I was trying to build buildings for the Performing Arts in New York; and deliberately set up a very tight schedule for the investigation of the Bay of Pigs so that within a month or a month-and-a-half my report was ready to be filed. But at that time, when that work was drawing to an end, Bobby Kennedy, as a go-between for the President, started propositioning me, so to speak, about coming back to active duty. I had no desire to do so, but it's awfully hard to say "no" to a President, especially one that's in trouble, and he was in trouble at that time. After some negotiation it was agreed that I would come back with the title of Military Representative to the President assigned to [the position]. I had no idea that I would ever really go back into uniform, although I was technically on active duty. I worked in civilian clothes and was in effect military and intelligence adviser to the President.

Q: During this period did you have any dealings with the Vice President?

TAYLOR: Only occasionally. I would see him at NSC meetings, for example; special conferences on various things. But he was usually just in a listening role. He very rarely took a leading part in the discussions of that period. In October 1961 I was sent by President Kennedy to Vietnam with Walt Rostow and four or five other representatives of the government to examine the situation and make recommendations -- which turned out to be a rather historic mission because it was a turning point in our relations with South Vietnam.

Upon return, one of the first things President Kennedy asked me to do was to see the Vice President and go over the whole thing with him. I went down to the Capitol, I recall very well, and sat with him for an hour or more going over all my impressions; first my report which I was about to file with the President and all the circumstances and all the impressions related to it. We had a very warm discussion of it in the sense that he showed a great deal of interest and, I thought, a rather unusual understanding of the seriousness of what we were recommending: that this was indeed adding to a commitment which had for awhile seemed to progress favorably but had fallen into very bad times the previous year.

Q: This is of course taking on what we call the advisory role in-

TAYLOR: The expansion of the advisory role, I would say, because we'd had advisers in Vietnam ever since 1954.

Q: That's right. Do you recall anything about the meeting or his response or reaction to your report?

TAYLOR: Well, just about as I indicated -- great interest in all I was talking about. I would say - - my impression at the end -- that he acquiesced rather reluctantly -- didn't put it in formal words -- that there were many uncertainties in this course we were going down, but it still looked like about the only choice we had.

Q: Any other particular occasions during his Vice Presidency?

TAYLOR: No, I wouldn't say so. Nothing stands out.

Q: Of course, in 1963 when President Kennedy was assassinated, you were in the position of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. Were there any changes in your activities and your responsibilities when President Johnson took over?

TAYLOR: Yes, very much so. One of the first things the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs would think about at such a time was "Does the new President have all the information he needs in relation to a sudden surprise attack, nuclear type attack -- that sort of thing." He has a very complex role to perform, extremely serious decisions to make regarding even the threat of nuclear attack. They're all recorded in a so-called black book which is carried wherever the President goes. So one of my first concerns was to get time in his schedule, which was tremendously crowded, of course, with all the things he had to do, a new President suddenly carrying those heavy responsibilities. My task was to get to him and to take the black book and to go through it and remind him of what he had to think about in a crisis.

He at least had to know where the sources of information could be quickly found in the case of crisis. I made that explanation to him. It's not easy. It's a complex matter. I frankly didn't feel that I had been too effective in getting all the principal points across. [I] then sought another appointment, which I got some weeks later, to go over a second time -- the contents of the famous black book.

In those early months, also, I recall very well explaining to him a very important decision that President Kennedy had taken with regard to the functions of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. President Kennedy had been very unhappy over the support given him by the Joint Chiefs at the time of the Bay of Pigs.

One of the things which came out of that investigation was the feeling on the part of some of the Chiefs that anything that was not a strictly a military matter, they had no responsibility for. Hence they had no responsibility to warn the President if, for example, the Bay of Pigs -- which was being conducted by CIA -- looked like a dangerous and uncertain operation. That wasn't their business; and hence they took a rather detached attitude toward it. This was very apparent to the President, once he had a chance to see really what had happened in the preparation of the Bay of Pigs operation and its execution. He paid a remarkable visit in March -- I'd have to get the time -- to the Joint Chiefs in person and talked to them about his concept of their responsibility, and later confirmed it in writing.

Now, it was important because he emphasized that he as President couldn't consider just military aspects alone or political aspects alone of a given problem. He had a single problem and it consisted of many facets of many components. His decision had to take into account all factors. He looked to the Joint Chiefs not as military specialists, but as men of experience who had been about the world and had seen many aspects of foreign policy problems. He wanted the Chiefs to advise him in those terms as broad generalists in the field of foreign policy, not narrow military specialists.

To me that was a very important statement and gave a new and broader orientation to the task of the Chiefs than had any President before. It was so important that I wanted President Johnson to know that that was on the books. He listened very attentively. He neither approved nor disapproved, but with the knowledge that it was on the books he tacitly approved it because he never changed it. I'm sure if he were asked today, he would say, 'yes, that is indeed the kind of support I want from the Joint Chiefs.'

Q: When you first met with the President and reviewed the contents of the black book, did you feel that he had a basis on the information or were there areas he indicated he had not been informed?

TAYLOR: He had never seen the black book before. It was unknown to him.

Q: How well was he up to date on the -- ?

TAYLOR: I would say, he was not up to date at all on these particular things because actually -- . I wouldn't say they had been reserved for the President. All this information is for the President, and he, of course could have briefed the Vice President had he wanted. I got no impression he had ever done that. This was a new subject, or really a list of subjects as far as the President was concerned.

Q: Could you just briefly give me your assessment of what the most critical situations were at this period?

TAYLOR: Fortunately, these problems that I was concerned about, namely what the President does in case of an alert of nuclear attack never arose. So that this was just theoretical knowledge, but it could have been the most essential knowledge in the world under certain circumstances. I would say that he got to know all these things, but in the beginning we were throwing a lot of rather technical information at him in a hurry. I thought the first time was not enough and hence I asked for the second appointment.

Q: Did you feel particularly close to President Kennedy?

TAYLOR: Yes, I would say I did.

Q: Did you develop this type of relationship with President Johnson?

TAYLOR: Not to the same degree, although I had known him longer than I had known President Kennedy. It resulted somewhat from the different kind of work. I got to know President Kennedy best when I was in the Executive Office Building. I would often see him several times a day on many different subjects. In other words, it was as military representative that I really became close to President Kennedy. That closeness tended to diminish somewhat as I moved across the river into the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The physical distance from the President has a great effect. That's why the man who's outside his door is one of the strongest men in Washington. So I felt I had lost to some extent my very close feeling for President Kennedy just because I was farther away over there. With President Johnson -- I was never on duty in the White House with him. So I would say I've got to know President Johnson better as a consultant than I ever did in official life.

Q: You had just really a fairly brief period in there in which you concluded your position as the Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Did anything occur or happen during that period -- . I think it was about six or eight months in there before you took over your Ambassadorship?

TAYLOR: Well, nothing that really stands out in terms of our relations to President Johnson. We always had a tremendous amount of business going on, of course, between the White House and the Pentagon -- to include the Joint Chiefs. But nothing that I would say is conspicuous in recollection.

Q: I was thinking of the Gulf of Tonkin, but that happened later.

TAYLOR: That was later. I was in Saigon when that occurred.

Q: When did you first discuss with Mr. Johnson becoming Ambassador to Vietnam?

TAYLOR: Well, there was a sort of prolonged discussion of how to fill the vacancy that Cabot Lodge was creating in Saigon. Many, many suggestions for replacements were made. I was asked to suggest possible replacements; McNamara was; Dean Rusk, and so on and so forth. A great many people were looked at for the job. For one reason or another either the President didn't want them, or they were in positions like Bob McNamara -- who himself volunteered for the Job -- as did Dean Rusk. Obviously they couldn't be sent to Saigon.

I was asked, would I be willing to go if the President wanted me. I said the last thing I wanted to do was to go to Saigon. "I've finally reached the top of the military profession. Furthermore, I have some family problems, for a very long period of time." I'm enjoying what I'm doing. I couldn't be out of the country

But regardless of that -- McNamara was rather a go-between. A President never likes to ask anybody for something and get a negative answer, for obvious reasons. Bob McNamara finally said to me, "Well, I think it's narrowing down to you; now, what about it?"

I said, "Well, I'll just repeat, it's the last thing I want to do personally, but if the President really wants me to go over there, I will. But I'll have to limit it to one year because of family problems I have here in the United States." After that word went back to the President, he asked to see me, and then formally tendered the position, and I accepted. I didn't tell him it was the last thing I wanted to do, but I did say, "I'm sorry, I really can't stay out of the country for more than a year at this time."

Q: Would you say that anyone was particularly influential in your recommendation?

TAYLOR: Recommending me?

Q: Yes.

TAYLOR: No. Of course, I was on very close terms with Dean Rusk and Bob McNamara, they're good friends of mine, and the President. I don't know that anyone was particularly -- I was obviously in the group to be considered. The way I describe it -- the press asked me about Dean Rusk and Bob McNamara -- also Bobby Kennedy who had been mentioned. What did I have that they didn't have! I said, "I have the invaluable quality of dispensability."

Q: Did you see any reasoning behind this? Of course, you were a very capable and logical candidate.

TAYLOR: There were many factors you could see. First, the place was going to pot very fast. Diem had been overthrown, and the place politically was in a turmoil. It stayed in a turmoil all the time I was there. The place never got better until I left as I often say. So the President wanted to send somebody that was known around the country. In other words, he didn't want to get a good professional named Joe Smith who had never been heard of. To strengthen the team and also to meet the obvious criticism, "Look here, why are you sending a general over to this highly complex diplomatic post?" he then got [U. Alexis] Alex Johnson to agree to go as my deputy, which was a very gallant thing for Alex to do. He was the senior, professional diplomat in the government -- and to take a number two job after being ambassador to two or three different places and being a very valuable man around town! But he's a lifelong friend of mine, and it was a great source of strength to take him with me. But it permitted the President to state that he had a good team there, military experience and diplomatic experience, to deal with a situation which included both military and political factors.

Q: Was there at this early time the anticipation of the forthcoming build-up that, of course, did occur in '65?

TAYLOR: No. Of course, we didn't know we were going to have that build-up. The principal issue that I had in my year in Vietnam was how to get some political stability in the situation. I had five different governments to deal with in a year. Coup followed coup, and to stabilize the turbulence was the greatest problem. With that, there was the growing demoralization of the South Vietnamese at their own impotence, their own ineffectiveness.

My conclusions, which were based upon observations going back to 1961, were that sooner or later we would have to use our air power against the homeland of the enemy north of the seventeenth parallel. I hadn't been Ambassador more than a few months before I started recommendations to resume consideration of this course of action, which had been considered and rejected in the past. It was only after three terrorist attacks on American installations -- one, the Bien Hoa Air Base Just before the election; one, on the Brink Hotel in the middle of Saigon on Christmas Eve; and then finally the attack on Pleiku Air Base in February which fortunately took place when McGeorge Bundy was visiting Saigon.

After each one, I recommended air reprisals against targets in North Vietnam and was turned down the first two times. But along with Mac Bundy, with his reinforcing voice, we got agreement to retaliate for the attack on Pleiku; which really initiated the start of the air campaign which gradually expanded therefrom.

Concurrently, one of the arguments I had with the President was on the subject of our dependents. He was terribly worried about the American dependents. Even at the time I went over, he gave me a long talk -- "I think we ought to get them out Just as fast as we can." I asked him to please let me get on the Job and study this problem directly.

I hadn't been there very long before I developed a very strong feeling that there were many objections to taking the dependents out. It looked like scuttling and running to some extent. It would create added doubts in the minds of the South Vietnamese as to whether or not we were going to stay with them. There was great fear, great suspicion at that time that because of their inability to govern themselves, we were Just going to throw up the sponge and leave them at some point. If they saw all the American dependents go home, that would certainly increase their concern and probably increase their political instability, which was bad enough under the most favorable of circumstances. So that I held out against the President. He came back at me -- I first had filed a negative recommendation, and he came back, arguing the case back and forth. Finally it got to the point that I was urging, "Let's start bombing North of the seventeenth parallel in reprisal for these terrorist attacks." And he was saying, "You get the dependents out, then we'll talk about the air campaign." So eventually I put my protesting wife and all other dependents on air planes and sent them back to the United States.

Q: I remember hearing at about that time myself, personally, that it would have been very difficult had an attack been made on the city to safely evacuate all our dependents.

TAYLOR: Yes, if the city were under attack. Well, that is quite true. It was always a possibility that almost anything could happen in the city. Why they didn't have more terrorist attacks in Saigon in that period than they did, I don't know, because the place was wide open to terrorist attacks. The President was very much worried about it. But it was the fact that we evacuated and then immediately started the bombing campaign that nullified the danger of demoralization of the South Vietnamese from the evacuation, because one offset the other.

Q: When you think about your tenure there, that one year, what is your feeling about the relationship of the President with his mission in the country?

TAYLOR: Well, it was very close, extremely close. He asked me when I went over there to send every week a message to him directly, not to the State Department. It is a practice that has been going on with all the subsequent Ambassadors to Vietnam. I welcomed that. There's nothing like having the feeling you can talk to the President any time you want to. And I used it as a device to give him personal insights -- in addition to the cables which of course are the formal formalized reactions of the mission. It's a great thing to be able to get your own coloration into the reporting.

Q: What is your reaction to the charge that the handling has been too much in Washington as opposed to there on the scene?

TAYLOR: I don't agree. This is a criticism made with regard to military operations. There was no interference with the military operations in South Vietnam when I was there, other than those which are obviously necessary. You couldn't let the military commander go running across international boundaries into Cambodia and Laos and various places -- not that the military commander wanted to -- but necessarily there have to be guidelines within which to conduct military operations. President Johnson and his government provided, I thought, very reasonable guidelines for the ground war.

Where Washington control became very exacting, and properly so, was in the attack of these targets in North Vietnam. Because here was the use of a military weapons for a political and psychological purpose. We were attacking those targets for three reasons. One, to give the feeling in South Vietnam that for the first time they were being allowed to strike the homeland of the enemy, the enemy that had been making their lives miserable for twelve to fourteen. Second, to restrict and make more difficult the infiltration of men and supplies from North Vietnam to South Vietnam. The third reason was both psychological and political. It was to remind Ho Chi Minh and his council that were sitting up in Hanoi running a war at no expense that they were going to start to pay a price, and an increasing price as long as they continued.

Now, that being the case, the President then had to take into account the dangers of the expansion of the war. When we started bombing, we didn't know how China would react; how Russia would react. I think most of us didn't fear this, but you couldn't eliminate the possibility of an extension of the war resulting from the bombing.

So great prudence at the outset, I think, was entirely justifiable. That meant control back here.

The President is Commander-in-Chief, and he has the responsibility. If he wants to do it himself, that's his right. I didn't feel that President Johnson ever exceeded what normal prudence would dictate in controlling this very potent weapon, but also a weapon that entailed certain hazards.

Q: As Ambassador, what differences did you find in that capacity from your previous military career?

TAYLOR: Not very much, as a matter of fact. First, there was a very heavy military component in the task there, increasingly so as time went on. Also, it was a question of organizing a team of people representing various governmental activities to work as a unit, work as a harmonious group. That problem exists in the military profession. Also, it required an intimate knowledge of government here in Washington. I insisted on returning home every other month so that I could be here personally and talk to the President and talk to McNamara and talk to Rusk and the people around town. Something which my successor didn't do, and I would think he would regret it because there's nothing like getting right back to Washington to get the feel of the home front and also to bring a sense of reality of what's taking place overseas to the decision-makers.

Q: General Taylor, from the events that happened I'm wondering if there are particular things like Bien Hoa and Pleiku that you just recall the events as they occurred while you were there. I'm wondering how you ever got any sleep on that job.

TAYLOR: It was a seven-day a week Job; always has been; and still is. But it was intensely interesting just because there were so many things going on, and so many things going on very badly. I think most people would say that period was the trough of our policy. It was the black year. The fifth government I dealt with was the Ky government, from which has sprung the constitutional government today. Things got better after I departed. But it was a very strenuous year because of the uncertainty of whether you could hold the Vietnamese government together and get the Vietnamese people behind this war to a greater extent. So my problems were not military. The war itself I never worried about, but rather the political aspects of the problem.

Q: It was during this period, wasn't it, that there was a growing Buddhist uprising. So you were also dealing with that?

TAYLOR: Well, really, the Buddhist problem -- very much misinterpreted at the time here in Washington -- had its most serious consequences in the year of '63 when it resulted in the overthrow of the Diem government and his assassination. But that same group of radical bonzes (Thich Tri Quang, etc.) were still running around the country, were a tremendous problem because having tasted political success in overthrowing Diem, they wanted to continue to be a political force without any responsibility, but pulling the rug from under the recurrent governments. They were pretty successful a couple of times. But by the time of the end of 1965, we rather closed in on them, and also, on some of the generals who had been collaborating with these Buddhists. We got some of the trouble-makers like Khanh out of the country -- who are still out of the country, I'm glad to say.

By the end of that year, the South Vietnamese themselves were so discouraged by their bad political performance that they were getting to the point where they were willing to put national interests ahead of their minority factionalism, which had been the great curse of the previous period.

Q: You said that you felt that this was misunderstood in Washington. Were they placing too much emphasis on this?

TAYLOR: In '63 misreporting, twisted reporting, had created an impression that the Diem government -- Diem being a Catholic and his brother and his immediate family very devout Catholics -- was guilty of religious oppression of Buddhists. Well, it never was.

It was really a small wing of the Buddhists allied to some of the generals who were anti-Diem in a -- really a conspiracy, which created a series of events including the burning of bonzes, which unhappily is not an uncommon thing in the history of Vietnam but to us in America it looked like a horrible thing. I can still remember the picture of the burning bonze on the front page of one of our weekly magazines. It shocked our entire country and created the impression that something must be seriously wrong in the relations between the great religions in Vietnam for this to take place.

Well, there wasn't anything seriously wrong. The religion versus religion issue did not exist. But it was rather the political groups, which included certain segments of Buddhists and certain segments of the Catholics who were vying for political advantage. It was a political game of alliances and of groupings based upon religion.

Q: Did you have any feeling that there was any Communist undermining or motivation in these Buddhist uprisings?

TAYLOR: We always suspected it but never proved it. Some of the Buddhists leaders were certainly following a course of action in parallel with what the Viet Cong, or Hanoi, would certainly have liked them to follow. But whether that was just empathy or whether it was actual conspiracy, no one ever knew. We never were able to prove a direct link between Thich Tri Quong and his people and the Viet Cong.

Q: General Taylor, did you cover the assassination of Diem in the other tape with the Kennedy Oral History?

TAYLOR: Yes.

Q: Could I just ask you one for one statement on that just to be sure that it's in there?

TAYLOR: All right, and then I'm going to have to break off. It's three o'clock.

Q: There are many, many stories and charges that there was of course, U.S. involvement in that assassination. What is your view of that?

TAYLOR: There was a schism here in Washington between the senior advisers of the President on the whole question of Diem. We were not together in Washington. There were two groups.

One group said, "you can't win with Diem." That was their slogan: "you can't win with Diem! He's a tyrant, a dictator. He has a bad brother and a bad sister-in-law" and that was true; "They have come between him and his people. He can't communicate with his people. His leadership is deteriorating. We must get rid of him."

The other group, which I belonged to said, "Well, most of those things you say are true, but if you get rid of him, then who?" Well, nobody had an answer to that. They hadn't the foggiest idea of how to answer that. So Group B would say that it was a great folly to do anything that would encourage an overthrow of Diem unless we had a better solution, or at least even a solution, which was not the case.

That split existed all through '63 with differing interpretations of what these events meant that we were seeing in Vietnam. But, meanwhile, President Kennedy did not take a personal position. He was still unconvinced by either side. But he also favored doing what Ambassador Lodge recommended, that various sanctions be imposed upon Diem -- holding back aid, various things to remind him he'd better see the Ambassador and listen to his advice--something that Diem was not doing at the time, or was resisting at the time.

Well, you can't do the things like that without it being public knowledge. Just the very fact that the United States government was showing disenchantment with Diem, disapproval of him publicly, was great encouragement to the people who had been plotting against him for years; so in that sense our actions encourage the plotters. Simply by seeing that we disapproved of Diem's actions we certainly encouraged the elements that eventually overthrew him and assassinated him. Beyond that I know nothing. I know nothing of any direct American intervention, and I don't even know who killed Diem. I don't know who knows, as a matter of fact. He and his brother were found shot in that personnel carrier.

Q: General Taylor, this is our second interview, and today is Monday, February 10. We are again in your offices. We had been talking about Vietnam in our first interview. I would like to continue with that area and ask you, first, about our bombing of North Vietnam. Of course, this begins with the Gulf of Tonkin incident. I'd like to have your assessment of it and your activities regarding the bombing of North Vietnam.

TAYLOR: Well, with regard to the Gulf of Tonkin incident, my role was really nothing. I was simply a very interested by-stander and observer from Saigon, where I was the Ambassador. Also, of course, I was impressed with the Congressional resolution which followed the Tonkin Gulf incident with the very sweeping authorization it gave to President Johnson in the use of American military forces in Southeast Asia. But I had no part in it other than observing it.

With regard to the bombing of North Vietnam -- going back to my visit in 1961 at the behest of President Kennedy, the report which I submitted upon my return to Washington included a reminder that the day might well come when it would be necessary to strike the source of aggression, which was North Vietnam. We did not recommend it in 1961, hoping that we could settle the issue of aggression within the confines of South Vietnam without going to the North. However, by the time I got there as Ambassador, following a disastrous political upheaval in the wake of the assassination and overthrow of President Diem, I became convinced early that bombing of the North should be undertaken fairly soon -- I thought about the fall of 1964 -- in order to pull the country together; give it a feeling that they did have a chance against the enemy of the North who had been at their throats then for some twelve or thirteen years. So as Ambassador I began to recommend that this be done following an evacuation of our American dependents in South Vietnam.

Then in the fall -- November 2, as I recall, of 1964 -- the enemy mortared our big air base at Bien Hoa with considerable damage to our airplanes and some loss of life. This was the first time the enemy had deliberately attacked an American installation, and it indicated a clear change of tactics on their part. I immediately recommended a reprisal strike against appropriate targets in North Vietnam. This was Just on the eve of the American presidential election. It was a most untimely recommendation as viewed from Washington. I'm sure it was received with very little enthusiasm.

Q: How did the Vietnamese leaders feel about this? Were you receiving their -- ?

TAYLOR: They, of course, were anxious all through this period to start striking North Vietnam, even though many of them were Northerners themselves. After the bombing started I would take around the target list to show the then-Prime Minister Quat where we were going to strike to get his concurrence. He would say, "Well, that's interesting. That's only about thirty-five miles from my uncle's farm." But he was perfectly happy about it. In fact, he was convinced that it was indispensable that we use our air power against the North.

After the Bien Hoa incident, on Christmas Eve the Viet Cong blew up the Brink Hotel in the heart of Saigon -- again an attack at the Americans. Again I recommended reprisal. It was not accepted. But in the meanwhile the debate was getting very intense in Washington. It was quite clear that they were going to have to take this step, reluctant as the leadership was to do so.

It was actually in February -- February 7, I believe -- that the next major attack on our installations took place. That was in Pleiku, again with considerable loss of life and damage to American planes. By pure chance McGeorge Bundy was visiting me in Saigon at the time so that both of us got on the telephone to Washington and reported, "Now this is the time we feel we must strike back." Plans had already been made, and strikes were off in the course of the next twelve hours against military targets in the southern part of North Vietnam.

President Johnson announced why he did it. He had three reasons. They were valid then, and I think they're valid now. The first was the point I've already mentioned -- the need to raise the morale of the South and give the people of South Vietnam the feeling that for the first time they were striking the homeland of the enemy. Second, to use our air power, insofar as air power could be effective, to limit and slow down and restrain the infiltration of men and supplies from North Vietnam to South Vietnam. And then finally, to remind Ho Chi Minh and his advisers in Hanoi that they were no longer sitting in a sanctuary directing a war without paying a price for it. And that little by little, by the graduated use of our air power we could destroy everything of military value in North Vietnam which was above the ground. That was the story of the initiation of the bombing and I think the general reasoning behind it.

Q: There has been a lot of controversy around the bombing as it has continued over the years. What is your assessment of the effectiveness of it?

TAYLOR: I think the greatest testimonial has been the screams of anguish from North Vietnam, and the fact that they mounted a worldwide campaign for over two years to get the Americans to give up the bombing. To them it was a catastrophe. From that point of view I would say that it met generally the three points which I indicated as being the justification.

I think most of the skepticism has been directed at the fact that obviously it did not stop the infiltration. The answer to that is that the infiltration would have been much greater, much easier, much cheaper, and much faster had it not been for the bombing. So I have no question in my mind that it was justified, was necessary, and I regretted very deeply that we gave it up so cheaply.

Q: This is for the negotiations as of recent date?

TAYLOR: This is under the present conditions.

Q: We had several bombing pauses in there-

TAYLOR: Yes, I know that, and I was against those for the reason that it turned out that they failed. They failed, but at the same time they gave the enemy the hope that, if the Americans can be talked into a pause, they can be talked into a suspension. And if they can be talked into a suspension, they can be talked into a cancellation."

Your next question bears on very much of a related matter -- the introduction of American ground forces which took place just a month later. We started the bombing in February of '65 and the first troops -- the first Marine element -- landed in Da Nang in March. That was a very tough decision also, and I must say that I had doubts. I had no reservations about recommending the bombing. I did have reservations about the introduction of ground forces because it was quite apparent that once we started, no one could predict what would be required -- how far we would go. But it was the judgment of our military leaders in South Vietnam that by the spring of 1965 the military situation had changed so adversely, that General Westmoreland could no longer guarantee the safety of the great base at Da Nang against attack.

It was in December 1964 that for the first time, so far as we know, North Vietnam began to send to the South the tactical units -- regiments and divisions -- of its own Army. Our commanders in the north sensed the fact that they were being hit by forces well beyond the strength of those which had been present previously. General Westmoreland became very much concerned about Da Nang. It was for the purpose of defending that base that the first Marines came ashore.

In the course of the next couple of months the whole situation was seen more clearly as more critical than we had anticipated, and General Westmoreland also asked for troops to go into the Saigon area to protect Bien Hoa and the many installations in the Saigon vicinity. There were three purposes -- three missions -- given those troops. The first was to be responsible for the close defense of important American installations. The second was to control the immediate environment of these bases so that they could not be mortared -- or at least mortaring would be made more difficult; and finally, to provide some mobile reserve of combat troops that could be moved by our helicopters quickly to enter the ground battle to assist the South Vietnamese when they had engaged an important target.

The necessity for it was the fact that if we hadn't done something, we would certainly have probably lost the northern three provinces. After that loss we'd either have had the harder task of rooting out the enemy after they got in, or conceding the North to the enemy. And that consideration accounts, I would say, for the troop build-up through '66 and '67. It was really to match the increasing escalation of the other side.

Q: Did you at the first introduction anticipate the number it would go to?

TAYLOR: I beg your pardon?

Q: When we first committed our ground troops there, did you anticipate the size of the commitment it would go to?

TAYLOR: No, I did not. I don't think anybody could. Nobody did. Always, as is appropriate, the military staffs in Saigon and in Washington had contingency plans -- in other words, the plans to put in ten thousand, twenty thousand, fifty thousand, a hundred thousand, and so on -- simply a catalog of plans so that they could be implemented rapidly if the decision were taken. But no one undertook in those days to try to estimate what the requirement would be because it depended so much on how far the enemy was willing to go.

As to the appraisal of the military leadership and strategy in Vietnam I'm not sure whether you refer to the American, or the Vietnamese, or a combination.

Q: Primarily the Americans, but I'd like to know the Vietnamese, too.

TAYLOR: I would say that the American forces performed well beyond what anyone had a right to expect when they were thrown into action in a distant country against a very elusive enemy. But fortunately, beginning in 1962 under President Kennedy, our Armed Forces had been directed to prepare themselves for this kind of combat. Hence they entered Vietnam with an excellent training ground preparation for this kind of war.

I think their performance over there is testimony by itself. I don't have to praise them. They've achieved far more with fewer forces than anyone ever anticipated in a guerrilla war where the enemy has open frontiers and the possibility of retreating into sanctuaries to which we cannot follow him. Our American leadership, I think, has been superb. I don't know of any improvement that anyone could make to the general tactics and the strategy, under the ground rules which have been decided for the Armed Forces.

Q: What about the Vietnamese leadership and the -- ?

TAYLOR: The Vietnamese leadership was very spotty, more or less as was the case in Korea where, as in Vietnam, we had the problem creating an indigenous army on the battlefield. Leadership is hard to come by in these Oriental countries, particularly a country like Vietnam where leadership was deliberately retarded or suppressed by the occupying foreigners -- the Japanese and the French and the Chinese before that. So it has been difficult to find promising young leadership, to cultivate it and develop it in order to meet the very arduous requirements of combat.

However, I think the record, when it's all over, will be good, considering the great handicaps of training forces in time of war. So they've been getting better all the time, but they're still far from being a modern or a sophisticated armed force.

As to the cost of Vietnam or the value of Vietnam, I suppose you would say -- I have not doubt in my mind that the historians twenty-five years from now, provided we end this in consistence with our objectives, will say it was a painful but necessary course of action on the part of our government.

As to how to regard Vietnam -- whether it's a civil war or a limited war -- neither describes it. It's a war of liberation, a people's war of the kind which has been announced by Peking, by Hanoi, and by Moscow as the favored technique for the expansion of Communism because it is relatively cheap; it can be disavowed; and it's not risky. It does not risk escalating into large conventional war, or a nuclear war. The spokesmen of all three capitals, Khrushchev, Kosygin, Lin Piao, Giap, Mao, all of them have proclaimed openly: "This is the way we're going to do it." So this is the real test of whether or not this technique, the "war of liberation", will succeed and become available for use elsewhere, or whether it's a disastrous failure -- which I hope it will be.

Q: Do you think Vietnam could be considered a mistake in terms of where it was, the political situation -- ?

TAYLOR: It's awfully hard to move Vietnam, you know.

Q: Well, for instance, perhaps it might have been in Thailand, or Indonesia, or-

TAYLOR: You go where the trouble is. In other words, we didn't pick this place. This is where the crisis occurred. It either had to be met there, or not met at all. If it hadn't been met there at all, then Thailand would have gone. Laos would have long since followed, and I suspect the Communists would still be in charge in Djakarta.

The negotiations, of course, represent a new development since last year. I personally think we made a mistake in showing overeagerness for negotiations, feeling that there's something miraculous in sitting down at a negotiating table. Having observed the long two-year session at Panmunjom, I was far from convinced that it was timely to start negotiations with Hanoi until the conditions were sufficiently unfavorable to the enemy that he would come to the table more or less compelled to negotiate in good faith and with some celerity -- without foot-dragging.

I think we have the assets now in the negotiations to come out successfully in the sense that we will eventually get a solution which allows the South Vietnamese to choose their own government, and some kind of, at least, a cessation of hostilities.

The real question, I think, will be whether the of a settlement will be such as t encourage the hoped-for continued stability and peace in the region. It depends upon our own determination here in the United States not to get tired, not to get impatient, and to throw in the hat Just because this business gets dull and boring and unpleasant.

Having made a hundred-and-forty-nine speeches on the subject of Vietnam, I'm quite prepared to go on for another hour or so in this discussion, but I think that probably hits the high points of the Vietnam situation.

Q: Let me just ask you a few more things regarding this. I think one thing that has occurred so much is the speculation of how much the President was running the war -- what the communications were back and forth. Could you give me an idea of how much, while you were Ambassador, you were communicating with the President?

TAYLOR: Well, one communicates all the time with the President in a certain sense, because a mission such as ours in Saigon sent off hundreds of cables to Washington each day. In a certain sense of the word, they were messages to the President -- not that he read them all, nor should he read them all. I was charged, when I went there, to write the President each week my own summary of the situation, which I did, and which I always welcomed because I had a chance to be sure I was dealing directly with the President and not with the many officials that lie between the cable head in Washington and the addressee.

In terms of his control of military operations, there has been criticism, I think largely unjustified, that Washington exercised too much control over military operations. I would not agree with that because insofar as the ground war was concerned -- the operations within the confines of South Vietnam -- I know of no case where there was anything which I would call undue civilian interference in the conduct of the military affairs.

But the bombing of North Vietnam was a different thing. It was moderately risky because we didn't know at the outset just how the Communist world would respond. Conceivably this could have broadened the war in a way that certainly would have been undesirable from our point of view. It didn't turn out that way, but responsible leaders in Washington naturally wanted to proceed cautiously to sense the enemy reaction. And they did.

Actually the bombing of North Vietnam was the use of a military tool for political purposes. We were trying to influence the mind of the conduct and behavior of the political leaders in North Vietnam. That was the primary purpose. Hence it was only reasonable that the President would want to know just exactly how we were doing, what kinds of targets, and so on. So there was detailed control of the air war in North Vietnam, but no place else as far as I have ever observed. And I felt, because of the sensitivity of that air campaign, that a large degree of control was justified. I think perhaps there was too much control, but that's clearly a question of judgment. The fact that control came from here was entirely justified.

Q: We've had growing dissent and criticism of the war, and think it was topped off with the TET offensive of last year.

TAYLOR: Because of a complete misunderstanding of the TET offensive. The TET offensive was the greatest victory we ever scored in Vietnam. We said so at the time, but there are too many people here who wanted to find defeat. They wanted to drag defeat from the jaws of victory.

Q: What do you think has been the effect of all the criticism and dissent in the United States?

TAYLOR: I think it's very unfortunate. It made it awfully easy for the enemy and encourages him to hang on. It's exaggerated in the press. The impression is greater than the actual fact. This all works against the interests of the United States. There's no question about it.

Q: I have read that President Kennedy did not believe in the domino theory of overthrow in that area of the world. What do you think Mr. Kennedy would have done in this situation? That's sort of speculative, but do you think we would have gone this far? Would we have committed troops? Would it have developed the same way?

TAYLOR: I think you should go back and read what he said in the time he was President. He made some very, very strong statements over and over again. I often quote as one of the most eloquent of his statements -- one made in 1961 to Congress -- where he points out that "the hopes of the people of the emerging nations are going to be resolved in Asia, and, for that reason, in the struggle for freedom in Asia (and he was talking about Southeast Asia). We Americans cannot afford to stand aside." Over and over again he made very strong statements on this subject. Just go read the record.

What he would have done -- I would never attempt to say I have been very impatient with some of his former friends who now pontificate on what Mr. Kennedy would or would not have done. I think it's unjust to his memory to undertake such speculating.

Q: Just one more question on this area. What has been your assessment of our pacification efforts there?

TAYLOR: It's not our pacification effort. South Vietnamese which we assist. It's the pacification effort of the South Vietnamese which we assist. It has been very hard, very difficult, because pacification, which really means rebuilding the nation in the rural areas, depends upon the degree of security. We found that in our frontier days we couldn't plant the corn outside the stockade if the Indians were still around. Well, that's what we've been trying to do in Vietnam. We planted a lot of corn with the Indians still around, and we've sometimes lost the corn. So there've been ups and downs in the whole pacification program resulting largely from the ebb and flow of security. As security becomes greater, as it is now, pacification will move along much better. But it necessarily lags behind; in point of time, the military operations which are necessary to attain security.

Q: Do you think we still could have a military victory in Vietnam?

TAYLOR: I beg your pardon?

Q: Do you still think that we could achieve a military success in Vietnam?

TAYLOR: What does that mean?

Q: Stabilize politically and militarily the country with a military force.

TAYLOR: Not with military force in itself, but you can't do it without military force. This is a combined effort in which we utilize our military resources, our political, our economic, our psychological resources. All have to be used. No one will do it by itself. No one ever suggested the possibility of a pure military victory. This is a straw man that the opponents of the Vietnam policy erect over and over again for the pleasure of knocking down.

Q: I think I was thinking in the terms of there not being negotiations.

TAYLOR: Yes, it's entirely possible, but that doesn't mean a military victory. You can have a tacit peace in which the other side simply fades away and never admits he has been there. They still deny in North Vietnam that they have any North Vietnamese forces in the South, although we happen to know that they've had seven to eight divisions. We have prisoner-of-war stockades filled with their troops, but they still deny it.

Q: What do you think has resulted in the U.S. standing in world opinion with our commitment in Vietnam?

TAYLOR: In the immediate vicinity in the countries which have the greatest stake, our standing has gone up enormously. In those countries that have no stake, it has become a political football in which we've been unjustly criticized. Although I must say that many times the criticism of the foreigners has simply echoed the criticism of our own press here at home.

Q: The phrase "credibility gap" has so much centered around our Vietnam war, and the public's lack of understanding of it. To what would you attribute this?

TAYLOR: I'm never quite sure what it means, but I assume it means the uncertainty as to the accuracy of reports we're getting on the Vietnam war. I quite agree that some reports are highly inaccurate, but most of them do not come from official sources. I don't say that necessarily critically of the press and the publicity media, for the fact is the country is divided into forty-four provinces. In every province the situation is somewhat different. So a thoroughly accurate report in Province A may paint one picture which is correct, and a different report in Province B may also paint a correct picture. Both are reported to us, and we don't know which to believe. We assume somebody is misleading us, yet both happen to be telling the truth. It has been a very difficult war, from that point of view, to report accurately, without bias, and avoiding dangerous generalizations. It is easy to acquire one or two facts and then assume they apply everywhere, where actually they do not.

Q: Do you think the fact that we've had such massive coverage of this has perhaps increased the dissent and criticisms?

TAYLOR: Oh, very much so. Because the very magnitude and the volume of the reporting add to our confusion. We turn on our TV. We get a sequence of pictures all different and apparently talking about different things. I think most of our good citizens are not necessarily pro or anti-Vietnam policy. They're just confused, and just give up trying to understand something that seems incomprehensible.

Q: That about covers -- I know very superficially -- what I had in mind on Vietnam unless you have any further-

TAYLOR: No, as I say, I can hold forth for some time, but I think you've brought out the principal points very well.

Q: Did you have any activities regarding the Dominican intervention?

TAYLOR: Not in the slightest. I was not involved. I was away most of the time.

Middle East -- again, I had no role to play. While focusing my attention largely on the Far East as a consultant to the President, I was very much interested in the Middle East, but I played no part in it.

The Pueblo incident you might want to talk about. There again, I was very much an interested observer, particularly in my role as a member of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. I was, of course, thoroughly aware of the kind of ship the Pueblo was, the kind of mission it performed -- a very important mission that needs to be done. And that was about it.

When I read about the hijacking, I was, of course, surprised that North Korea had engaged in piracy of this sort, and had a strong suspicion -- which I don't think has ever been verified -- that it was related to the TET offensive which occurred about the same time. In other words, that they were making signals to us that if we weren't careful that there would be a new front opened in Korea. As I say, this connection has never been established, but that was certainly a suspicion I had at the time.

With regard to the Intelligence loss of the equipment, I thought it was very serious. As to the conduct of the crew, I would not make any comment. There's a court-martial going on at this time to determine the facts.

Q: I'd like to go into some more general areas. As you said, you've primarily been working in the Far East, but I did want to ask you about over the years about our relations with Russia and Colonist China -- perhaps emphasize Communist China.

TAYLOR: Well, those subjects are so broad really I can't do justice to them in this short period of time. Communist China, of course, is the dominant power in the Far East in terms of manpower and potential. The cultural revolution, which seems to be dying down, has certainly set back the progress in Communist China to a great degree. One of the China watchers in Hong Kong, whom I talked to only last week, feels that they're about where they were now at the start of the Great Leap Forward. In other words, they're now lagging six or seven years behind what might have been called a normal schedule of development had the cultural revolution not taken place.

Q: You mean the first Great Leap Forward they had?

TAYLOR: Yes.

Q: That was in '57?

TAYLOR: Approximately. I'd have to check my figures.

Q: And they would be five or six years behind that now?

TAYLOR: Well, they're about back to that point in terms of gross national product per capita, levels of food stocks, and things of that sort.

Q: I know this is your area. What brought about this cultural revolution, as they called it -- this upheaval in China?

TAYLOR: It was, so the experts say, primarily Mao's feeling that the revolution, of which he was the father -- that its purposes were being nullified by the new generation which was moving somewhat in the direction of the Soviet relaxation and readjustment of attitude. He felt that the goals of the revolution were being sacrificed and would be lost unless he intervened and threw the rascals out, which he proceeded to do -- the rascals meaning many of the senior Communist leaders who had been his associates throughout many of the years before.

He did this by an alliance between his own power group in Peking, the Armed Forces which have been rather surprisingly loyal to Mao -- in other words, there have been no internal splits within the Armed Forces; and then the militant youth have been utilized -- the Red Guard. The result has been a turmoil, a turbulence, a chaotic condition which certainly must be a matter for deep regret on the part of Mao, who is an old man and undoubtedly wants to leave his country better off than when he found it.

I think that we outsiders, we simply have to watch these developments, hoping that we can domesticate Red China to some extent -- bring it back into the family of nations; but certainly that objective is relatively far off now.

Q: Sir, in your career, have you ever had occasion to speak with Communist Chinese leaders?

TAYLOR: Never. Now, NATO is a subject in itself, and I think you'd better drop that.

I'll just comment on SEATO. The Southeast Asian Treaty Organization was established, you'll recall, in 1954 at the time of the Geneva Accords. It reflected our lack of confidence in the Geneva Accords and in the ability to tranquilize Southeast Asia on the basis of those Accords. It has been a target of criticism during our involvement in South Vietnam because as a treaty organization it has not taken part. This results from the fact that its membership does not coincide with the realities of national interests in that part of the world. You'll recall that the United Kingdom, France, and Pakistan are members of SEATO. No one of the three has any intention of making any commitment of any value to the support of the present objectives of SEATO in Southeast Asia.

On the other hand, the fact that we've had the treaty has allowed us to work freely with as important a country as Thailand in connection with our operations in South Vietnam. So it has been of indirect value, although certainly as a coalition it has done nothing directly to assist our purposes in Southeast Asia.

Q: Do you think that it's going to have a future of strength?

TAYLOR: I would hope that in the review of foreign policy which I am sure Mr. Nixon's Administration intends to make that we would look SEATO over and decide whether we need that particular coalition. I doubt it in its present form. Or whether it would be possible and desirable to put together a new coalition of those countries that really have a commonality of interest and are willing to put something on the line; in other words -- a changed membership.

Now I'm afraid I'm going to run out of time if you're not careful here. Again, national security is such a broad subject I wouldn't be able to deal with it here.

Q: Let me just ask you then -- what do you think our position should be on deployment of ABM systems?

TAYLOR: That, again, is a matter that I would have to study a great deal. I've not believed in the so-called "thin" deployment against the Chinese threat. I think if I restudied the arguments and examined the technical feasibilities that I would still feel that there is a justification for an anti-ballistic missile system and deployment, but one primarily directed at improving the deterrent capability of our strategic forces rather than that uniformly thin kind of protection which is implicit in the present plan.

Q: Part of this proper mix of nuclear and non-nuclear capabilities that I was asking about, of course, reflects some of your own work on which you-

TAYLOR: Well, that's very true. The answer is that we need both. It's a question of judgment just where the right balance lies. I certainly felt that under the Eisenhower Administration the emphasis on nuclear capabilities was out of balance -- over-balanced -- in that direction. I felt that the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations brought it back into about as good balance as I personally could recommend.

I think we're losing the idea that we can talk in terms of superiority in nuclear forces. Some of our public men still seem to think that we can say we're superior or inferior in strategic weapons. I don't think so. I like the term sufficiency. If we get enough, we ought to stop regardless of what that number is in terms of the number we think the other side has. But the question of how much is enough is perennially the most difficult question for the Secretary of Defense to answer, and also for the President -- not only for nuclear weapons, but for non-nuclear weapons, for anti-submarine warfare, for all the categories of military forces.

Q: The phrase 'massive retaliation' is being brought up again in terms of perhaps we should have more massively, if not nuclearly, committed ourselves in Vietnam.

TAYLOR: Who said that?

Q: I think I've just been reading it in the papers. What is your impression of that?

TAYLOR: I think there's a very good point for a part of the question. I mentioned that we used our air power slowly, gradually, giving Ho Chi Minh ample time to reflect on consequences. There was a certain logic in support of that gradualism. On the other hand, the military commanders would certainly say that's not the way to use air power or any other kind of power. Once you decide to use your military weapons, you should use them rapidly with maximum effect and with the benefit of surprise. I think there's a real question of whether we might not have achieved our end of shocking Ho Chi Minh into submission had we had all our bombing in one month rather than in three years. However, with regard to unclear weapons I would say I know of nobody with any responsibility ever suggesting that this was a place for nuclear weapons.

All right, what would you like me to speak on next here?

Q: I'd like to ask you what you think the future trouble spots have been, perhaps incorporating in this what have been, besides Vietnam, the major defense-related problems of the '60's?

TAYLOR: I think the history book is pretty clear on that. Today, and throughout most of the decade, in addition to the Far East -- Korea and South Vietnam -- we've had the problem of the Middle East, which is still there unresolved. It's one of those areas where even with the wisdom of Solomon and the power of Caesar, it would be very difficult to know exactly what to do. I'm afraid that problem's going to carry over for some time to come.

Meanwhile, there are endless possible trouble spots. We never know where they're going to turn up. The Dominican Republic Affair nobody ever planned; nobody ever anticipated. All the volatile new nations may conceivably become spots for concern. I think one of our great questions that we'll be faced with in the next decade is when to intervene and when not to intervene overseas. Where is there a true American interest, where there is not.

In a certain sense of the word we have some interest in every square foot of the globe reduced in size as it is by modern communications. On the other hand, we've discovered what it is to try to stabilize one small part, namely South Vietnam -- the cost in men, treasure, and effort, national and international standing. So I think we'll be much more prudent following Vietnam, but still that problem will be with us.

Q: Do you think it has made us wary of this type of commitment?

TAYLOR: I think so, very much so. Having said that, I will then point out that after Korea we had the cry, "Never another Korea," and that was in '53. In 1954 President Eisenhower signed a letter to President Diem offering him aid in South Vietnam. In other words, even while the cry was still in the air, "no more Koreas," we were laying the foundation of our commitment in Vietnam.

Q: Sir, some of your earlier works and writings have talked about Defense Department organization, and of course during Mr. McNamara's tenure there was a reorganization and changes. I'd like to have an assessment of that related to your previous-

TAYLOR: I generally have been a great admirer of Secretary McNamara. I didn't necessarily agree with all the things he did, but he did so many fine things. I think that his balance sheet is very strongly on the plus side.

Mr. Clifford was not in office long enough to leave a lasting imprint on the organization. He kept it the way he found it and left the detailed operations to his very experienced deputy, Mr. Nitze.

Q: Can you offer me a comparison of these two men, having worked with them?

Well, they're quite different. Mr. McNamara is an organization man, a doer, the operator type. Of course, he had been a Ford official -- a Ford president -- and was used to handling large organizations. He'd had a good training in cost analysis and systems analysis and that sort of thing which he put to work -- perhaps some will say overworked -- in dealing with the military problems.

Mr. Clifford's a lawyer -- a very able lawyer. He's an expert in public relations. He had very, very friendly relations with Congress, with the public, with the press, and worked at those things leaving the operation of the Pentagon largely to Mr. Nitze.

Mr. McNamara was the other way. He was oriented inwardly toward his own shop, and was reputedly brusque and metallic in his public relations and that sort of thing. So they both had their strengths but in different categories.

Q: Do you think the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has changed and improved?

TAYLOR: Changed and improved. I don't like to say exactly -- improved against what? I would just say the Joint Chiefs of Staff role was, and should be, a very strong one under any Secretary - - in spite of the undeserved reputation of Mr. McNamara of downgrading the military, as the press would put it. I didn't agree with that at all. He was a very sympathetic listener to the Joint Chiefs. He gave them their day in court. They had a chance to argue their case. He didn't necessarily follow their advice, but he certainly gave them a chance to be heard. How the Chiefs-Secretary relations are at the present time, I'm not really close enough to the present officials to Comment.

Q: I was thinking in terms of your book, The Uncertain Trumpet, where you had talked about the weakness in the system of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

TAYLOR: I would say things have improved since then. The great weakness then was that there was no Secretary of Defense during most of the time that I was Chief of Staff of the Army who was willing to decide different issues. So the result was it left the Chiefs wrangling all the time with their disputes unresolved. Important issues were pushed under the rug, as we say, and left there for years at a time.

One of Mr. McNamara's great qualities was he insisted on these things being brought up to him, and he would decide them if the Chiefs couldn't. That's all to the good for the general business of the Pentagon.

Q: Do you feel that there is good communication between the Secretary of Defense and service organizations?

TAYLOR: I don't observe that relationship. You're talking now not about the Joint Chiefs, but talking about the Secretary of the Army, Secretary of the Navy, etc. I'm so far away from that area I haven't observed it. Even when I was Chairman, I was only in the JCS area, and not in the service channels, so I was not a direct observer of what went on.

Q: Your position now to President Johnson as his special consultant, was it primarily on the Far East? Could you tell me just a little bit -- ?

TAYLOR: I received a letter from him that made the world my oyster, but I necessarily decided to bite that oyster in digestible quantities. I spent most of my time on the Far Eastern questions, generally on Southeast Asia. Also, as soon as I got back in '65, I worked on the organization of the federal government for overseas operations. That work has resulted in the so-called NASM 341 organization that set up the Senior Interdepartmental Group and the regional interdepartmental groups, and made the Secretary of State the President's representative for overseas affairs. That was consummated in March 1966, and has been in effect until the present time. They're tinkering with that now to adjust it to the requirements of Mr. Nixon.

Q: And could you tell me what other activities highlight -- ?

TAYLOR: Oh, I think that's about all. After that reorganization was accomplished, I attended largely, as I say, to the Far Eastern affairs, making occasional trips out to the Far East; meanwhile trying to run a private business, which has made for a rather complicated life.

Q: About how many trips did you make to the Far East in this position?

TAYLOR: I'd have to get out my diaries. I would say four, perhaps five.

Q: Were these in terms of seeing the situation as it was; or was it communicating -- ?

TAYLOR: Really keeping abreast. And on one occasion I went with Mr. Clifford. We went for the purpose of visiting the other countries who were contributing forces to South Vietnam to carry a Presidential message to them, and also to review the situation in Saigon.

Q: Could you offer me any sort of a comparison, having worked both with Mr. Johnson and Mr. Kennedy during their presidencies? What is your opinion of how these men compare, or do not compare?

TAYLOR: I wouldn't compare them in terms of -- . It's impossible to compare them in terms of the effectiveness of the Administrations, and so on. We're all too close to these events. As individuals, of course, they were quite different in personality; different in age, background, and outlook on life. I wouldn't say one was better or worse than the other. They were just quite different.

President Kennedy had a great personal charm and, I would say, instilled a great loyalty and inspired team play on the part of his associates. President Johnson was more difficult to get to know, but once you got to know him, you could see what a strong character, what a determined man he was, and I acquired a great admiration for him in my association with him. He had the reputation, as you know, of cracking whips over his subordinates. I never saw that. My relations with him were extremely pleasant. And I valued my association with him. Of course, I had a particularly warm affection for John Kennedy and all his family.

Q: I'd like to Just go to this last area of the Johnson Administration and your assessment of it. I think primarily because the Vietnam war has been such a large part of his Administration that it's almost attached to Mr. Johnson and his resultant unpopularity. I'd kind of like to get your ideas on that.

TAYLOR: I think we're going to find a great change, and a surprisingly quick change, in the public attitude toward President Johnson's Administration. I thought even in the last weeks of his Administration that the editorial comments and the attitude in many quarters which had been consistently hostile to him throughout his Administration were moderating. I think we all recognize that he carried a tremendous load, almost alone, in adhering to our policy in South Vietnam, which he was convinced was correct. I'm convinced he was right. I think ten years from now you'll find that the history books given him a very high rating, Just as they have given a very high rating to President Truman for his great courage in the Korean War.

In his domestic accomplishments, the Vietnam war so over-shadowed the public attention that we've missed the fact that his domestic program was one of the most extensive, the most comprehensive, of any President in modern times.

Q: General Taylor, do you have any further comments?

TAYLOR: No. Just thank you for allowing me to contribute, and I hope this will be of some use to the record of the Johnson Administration.

Q: General Taylor, were you satisfied with the forceful response of the United States to the North Vietnamese attacks in the Gulf of Tonkin in August of 1964?

TAYLOR: Well, first I would say that in Saigon we did not get an immediate interpretation from Washington as to what had happened. However we intercepted the same information that Washington got and none of us questioned the fact that our ships had been attacked by North Vietnamese boats on both days. I can't say we made an analytical study of the evidence, but it seemed an obvious fact that attacks had taken place. True, it had done no real damage to our ships, but nonetheless it was an act of defiance of U.S. Navy to rush out into international waters and attack our ships, even if they didn't do a good job of it.

I was surprised and disappointed we didn't retaliate for the first attack and waited till the second. But I was happy that some retaliation took place, bearing in mind that it was really a symbolic kind of thing that didn't do any great damage to the enemy and wasn't expected to.

Q: Would you have preferred the attacks be more extensive, perhaps, or the targets different?

TAYLOR: I didn't feel strongly about it because I still didn't know really how the navy felt about the extent of the attack, so I accepted it as a reasonable decision.

Q: Now, there were other incidents in the fall and early winter of 1964 which many authorities also felt invited retaliation. There was the attack at Bien Hoa against the B-57s. There was the bombing of the Brinks Hotel in Saigon around Christmas. And we didn't retaliate for those. How did you feel about that?

TAYLOR: Well, I recorded my views in Swords and Plowshares in considerable detail. I felt the attack on Bien Hoa was a turning point because it was the first case where the Viet Cong had directly attacked an American installation. It seemed a warning that henceforth the Americans were going to be targets just as were the South Vietnamese. Hence I recommended at once a retaliatory strike in North Vietnam. Now bear in mind this question of the use of air power had been under discussion for a year at least, so my recommendation wasn't hitting Washington cold. I had cabled several times that I thought we were playing a losing game since the fall of President [Ngo Dinh] Diem and all the chaos which had followed, and that, sooner or later, we were going to have to avail ourselves of this weapon which had never been utilized, namely our air power.

So I'm sure the President would have said he wasn't surprised to get this cable from me recommending retaliation for Bien Hoa. But as you may recall, that was about two days before the presidential elections at home. I knew that my cable was going to be an unwelcome message to get in the White House. I don't know that I bet with myself, but I was not surprised when it was turned down. But it was clear in my mind that we should be ready to retaliate for any future incident of this sort. I should remind you that this retaliatory use of air power was a different issue from the larger question of using air power to reduce the war-making, war-sustaining capability in the North.

Then on Christmas Eve, the Brinks incident occurred -- a clear case of terrorist action against an American officers' billet. It was very fortunate that the damage was light. But I recommended retaliation again despite the nearness of Christmas. I was much less sympathetic in this case with the negative I got in reply; we should have retaliated then.

Finally when the attack on Pleiku came along, I think I had softened up Washington to some extent by the two previous rejected requests. I had the good luck at the time of Pleiku to have McGeorge Bundy as a visitor from Washington, the first time he had ever been in Vietnam. I had a high regard for McGeorge personally and also knew he had great influence with the President^t. So when the attack occurred with him on the spot, I discussed it thoroughly with him and he agreed to support my request for retaliation. We got on the telephone and called Washington, got Cy Vance on the telephone, told him what had happened and that we both joined in recommending retaliation. He said, "I'll call you back." To my amazement, within relatively few minutes, less than an hour I would say, an approval came back authorizing our first overt retaliatory action against the North with air power. Again, it was a symbolic response. It wasn't expected to do much damage, but it started something.

Q: That was a rather short reaction time from Washington.

TAYLOR: Amazingly so, probably because this had been a current matter of debate for weeks and months before.

Q: Did you get the feeling that someone in Washington had said, "All right, if they do it one more time we're going to go"?

TAYLOR: I don't think that happened, but certainly they were ripe for a decision.

Q: Now, you have elsewhere documented the fact that you were among the more reluctant officials concerning the decision to send American combat troops to Vietnam. That's borne out in the cables in the Pentagon Papers, and in Swords and Plowshares and elsewhere. I have the impression from some of these documents that Washington on this issue was moving ahead of you in the spring of 1965. Is that true?

TAYLOR: Well, I think that is true. It had been like pulling teeth to get the President to agree to the use of air power, but strangely enough, he was more inclined, to use forces on the ground. The former seemed to me a much less difficult decision to make although both were hard. To go back a little, the attack on Bien Hoa had led to the question of how to defend other airfields, and the President had shown a surprising willingness to entertain the use of American forces to guard these airfields. Well, I wasn't for that. I thought it would have been a very bad decision, and won my case by indicating to Washington that an airfield is so big that, if the purpose is to keep mortar fire off it, we would need about three battalions of infantry to defend the perimeter. So counting the principle airfields, we would need a very substantial American force for the job. So that killed the matter.

But nonetheless, the President had revealed an attitude which was to reappear later. He readily approved our recommendation to put ashore at Danang the two battalions of Marines which had been afloat off that port. Shortly thereafter, he displayed eagerness to bring in troops faster than had been agreed in recent conferences in Washington. In Saigon, I was caught by surprise to find that warning orders were going out to army and marine units around the world, which indicated that the President was thinking much bigger in this field than I was or than the tenor of recent discussions held in Washington.

Q: What do you think was the decisive argument for committing troops?

TAYLOR: For me it was Westy's insistence that he could not guarantee the safety of Danang without the marines who were offshore. It was Westy's judgment, plus Collateral evidence of ARVN weakness entirely consistent with that judgment, that led me to support it.

Q: Well, that would explain the motive to defend American installations with American troops.

TAYLOR: Yes.

Q: But it seems to me that there was also an idea right from the first in some circles that we were going to carry out some kind of counterinsurgency activity with these troops as well. I believe that decision was taken as early as April 1.

TAYLOR: I'm not sure I get that clearly.

Q: Well, can we distinguish between a defensive mission for these American troops and an offensive one?

TAYLOR: Not really. I never tried. It may be true that Washington was slow in explaining to the American people why American troops were required. But there can be no question that the first Marines landed to defend Danang. But no thoughtful person would have expected them never to have another mission. When the first army troops came in, it was to improve the defenses of the Saigon region, but again with no inference that they would never pass to an offensive. There was nothing deceptive in the business that I ever perceived.

Q: That's pointed to among commentators who were trying to talk about the credibility gap, that officials in Washington sort of used the defense of the airfields as a subterfuge. The nose of the camel

TAYLOR: Really? I'd never encountered that. In fact, I never heard that charge made.

Q: That the Johnson Administration intended to commit American troops all along and this was an excuse to do it.

Concerning the bombing, which of course is its own controversy, there seems to be a difference of opinion among responsible officials as to what the bombing was supposed to accomplish, even what was the target supposed to be?

TAYLOR: Well, there was absolutely no excuse for anyone near the President in the decision-making field for not knowing exactly what he had in mind. I stated the purpose of the bombing repeatedly in cables from Saigon. When I came back from being ambassador, I made a hundred and thirty-odd speeches on the Vietnam situation and repeated many times the three reasons we had for initiating the bombing of the North, in order of ascending importance.

The first was to raise the morale in South Vietnam, to give the feeling to the people for the first time they were able to hit the enemy in his home territory who were ravaging the South. I would say the bombing was successful for this purpose at least for a period of time, but no one expected that high morale would last forever. But the bombing was a good thing from the point of view of morale. But that alone did not justify it.

The second purpose was to use air power, to the degree that it could be effective, not to stop the infiltration from the North -- we had no illusion in the world that air power would entirely stop the inflow. But we also knew our aircraft could make it a lot harder for Hanoi's reinforcements, more expensive, more time-consuming to crawl down the trail and not come marching down with bands playing. We accomplished that purpose.

The third purpose was the most important in my judgment. It was to carry out a slow but inexorable barrage of air attacks advancing to the North, capable of convincing the Hanoi government that everything in the Hanoi area was going to be destroyed unless the leaders mended their ways. Unfortunately, we didn't do it in that way, at least not until the Nixon Administration.

Q: What about the argument that we hear from some high-ranking military officers that gradualism, as you have suggested, was quite the wrong way to approach it?

TAYLOR: Yes, that's correct. From a strictly military point, there was little to recommend the hesitancy with which we used our air power -- a series of short advances of the bombing interspersed with pauses of several days to see how Hanoi would react. It was a far cry from the massive attacks we made against Germany to destroy the enemy and his war-sustaining means just as rapidly as possible.

Yet I supported the gradualism at the start, to feel out the reaction not of*Hanoi but of Moscow and Peking. Dean Rusk, by no means a timid man, emphasized the possibility that these great communist powers might be committed by treaty to send forces to the aid of North Vietnam if attacked by a third party. Hence, there was good reason*for us to go slow with the bombing at the outset.

But it took only a month or two of a slow advance to convince me at least that neither Peking or Moscow were paying much attention to it. From that time on I was in favor of increasing the magnitude of the attacks and eliminating the pauses between them. That might give the impression of inexorability that was so important. But it didn't turn out that way because there was a strong group of advisers to President Johnson who kept urging the importance of pauses to give Hanoi a chance to send us a signal -- of what sort I was never sure. We didn't need any signal. We didn't need anything, but capitulation. But each time we stopped the bombing, even for twenty-four hours, we lessened whatever psychological value was in the operation.

Q: Do you think it would have been possible to destroy Hanoi's ability to support the insurgency in the South?

TAYLOR: We could have flattened everything in and around Hanoi. That doesn't mean it would stop the war, but it would certainly have made it extremely difficult to continue it effectively. North Vietnam was a highly centralized communist state, and we could have certainly scattered the leadership into the jungles from which it would have been very difficult to conduct their war in the South.

No one ever asked me the question, but of course, our strategy was always militarily unsound. We should never have been fighting the war in the South; we should have been fighting it in the North to begin with.

Q: Of course, politically that's another story.

TAYLOR: Now don't bring in these details.

(Laughter)

Q: Red China is not really a detail, I guess.

TAYLOR: Many times in post-war years in the course of lecturing at war colleges, students have questioned the quality of U.S. strategy in Vietnam. It's hard to defend. At the time of my visit to Vietnam in 1961, why didn't I foresee a long, drawn-out guerrilla war and, to avoid it, recommend a declaration of war against Vietnam and an amphibious operation directed at Hanoi?

I have to admit that it never occurred to me to make such a recommendation. We didn't foresee the toughness and endurance of the North Vietnamese or the ineptitude of the South Vietnamese leaders in unifying their own people and in using the many forms of aid the U.S. would give. Nor did I anticipate the domestic divisions in the U.S. that eventually forced us to abandon our allies and come home in humiliation.

Q: Walt Rostow has said that the bombing was more effective after March 31 of 1968 than it was before because it was more concentrated. Would you agree with that?

TAYLOR: I don't recall that March 31 marked any great change in that.

Q: The time when the bombing was limited to the 20th Parallel in 1968.

TAYLOR: Well, I never felt in that period the bombing was doing any real good although it was better than no bombing at all. It was never really effective until the Nixon Administration, when our air force had their new bombs and much greater latitude in using them.

Q: The smart bombs?

TAYLOR: Yes. Creating the impression we could take out any target and do so quickly and with little pilot exposure.

Q: Were you able to keep track of the bombing after the Johnson Administration had left in any way except through the newspapers?

TAYLOR: I followed the entire situation as best I could. And there's very little you can't follow in the American press. Of course, you get plenty of contradictory bits of so-called information about many events. Since retirement, I think I know about as much about the military problems of the country in a broad sense as I did when I was chairman of the Joint Chiefs. I am ignorant of a tremendous amount of detail, of course. But what I know is the kind of knowledge the decision-maker needs, whereas as chairman I had to have as much of that as I could assimilate, plus detailed knowledge of the technique, capabilities, and administration of the armed forces.

Q: Were there, in retrospect, any crucial personalities, decisions, turning points that you look back on and think, gee, I wish this instead of that? That you wish things had gone another way?

TAYLOR: Now it's all over, I would say that the following decisions and actions on our part are the most regrettable: a) the dispatch of the August 24, 1963 cable from Washington to Saigon without proper clearance, which resulted in the overthrow and murder of Diem; b) our failure to exploit the victory of Tet and, instead, to treat it as a national defeat; c) our failure to declare war instead of being satisfied with the Tonkin Resolution; d) acceptance of the 1973 cease-fire in Paris which, coupled with subsequent congressional actions, obliged our U.S. forces to withdraw prematurely and thus lost us the war.

I have explained the reasons for my views either in our interviews or in my writings and lectures on these matters.

Q: Can I interrupt you right at this point, because chronologically I notice that you didn't mention Laos.

TAYLOR: Laos was not that important. It's true that, as I indicated in my report in Laos, the settlement we accepted there was a great discouragement to the South Vietnamese because they thought it was a sell-out. I was very unhappy at the time because I didn't think that triad of leadership called for in the settlement could possibly work. Yet actually it didn't turn out badly. Laos was never a major problem to us in Vietnam, except as a territory which we could not enter to prevent it being used as a highway from the North in reinforcing the South.

Q: May I posit a thesis with you? Now I'm freewheeling a little bit, but some things that you've said have brought some things to mind. I have seen it said that if the CIA had been allowed to operate in Vietnam the way they operated in Laos, they could have won the whole thing without a commitment of troops. Now, I think I know what your answer to that might be, but I'm going to put it to you anyway.

TAYLOR: It just makes no sense at all. Whoever said that couldn't have understood a) what the CIA did in Laos; b) what the complexity of the overall problem was in South Vietnam. I never heard a CIA representative ever make such a claim.

Q: Well, I'm not sure they said it at the time either. In retrospect it's always easy to.. .

TAYLOR: That sounds like [Lou] Conein. Have you been talking to him?

Q: No, I haven't found him, but I'm going to. Well, General [Edward] Lansdale has told me he's going to put me on to Conein.

TAYLOR: Well, it will be an experience to meet him, but for God's sakes, don't believe all he says.

Q: Oh, well, the people who read the transcripts will have to make up their own minds about that one.

TAYLOR: He's a character. He's worth meeting.

Q: I understand he's in the area. He's in McLean.

TAYLOR: Really?

Q: I think so. I think so. Well, General Taylor, I think we have covered the few things I thought we needed to go back over. Is there anything you'd care to add?

TAYLOR: No, I'm holding nothing back that I know of. I've told you all I know, and that's the time to give up, isn't it?

Q: You've been very forthcoming.

Q: General Taylor, can you tell me the reasons for your trip to Vietnam in 1957?

TAYLOR: By that time, I was chief of staff of the army, and I had not returned to the Far East since becoming chief in 1955. Hence I naturally included Vietnam, which had a growing military mission, on my schedule. I was particularly interested to see my old friend General Sam Williams whom I'd picked for the job for several reasons. One, he was a very fine soldier and a man of great character, also he'd been extraordinarily successful with the Koreans. The Korean army swore by him in the critical last days of the war when they were fighting off the last Chinese attack. So I had the feeling that Sam, while not looking like a diplomat, had something about him the Oriental military men would appreciate.

Q: Was that the battle of the Kumsong salient?

TAYLOR: Kumsong salient, yes.

Q: How did you find the country team state of affairs?

TAYLOR: Well, I found it was doing very well indeed, just as I expected. I spent, I think, only a day and a half, something like that. I couldn't pretend to know too much about the details, I didn't expect to.

Q: Was that when Ambassador [Eibridge] Durbrow had come, or had he not come yet?

TAYLOR: I don't know. I saw him on one trip. I believe that was the one. Incidentally, this was my second trip to Vietnam. I'd been there in 1955 when J. Lawton Collins was the de facto ambassador.

Q: I see. Was there anything particularly that remains with you from that trip? The earlier trip?

TAYLOR: Yes. That was a very impressive thing. I came down from Korea. I'd been following the war from a distance. Then my war in Korea ran out, and I was very anxious to go down and see on the spot what was taking place in Saigon. Well, that was the time just after the exchange of populations; about a million anti-communists came down from the North and were settled in and around Saigon. There was just one mass of temporary camps, and I could see the kinds of people and get some idea of what the future problem would be in absorbing vast numbers of refugees.

Q: So there was a tremendous refugee problem, obviously.

TAYLOR: There was, indeed.

Q: Did you have any part in trying to deal with that?

TAYLOR: Well, we didn't have the means. We had no MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group] of any size at that time so our means were not very great, but certainly General Collins in his capacity was doing what he could and reporting to Washington any needs that might be met.

Q: What was your overall impression of the job General Williams was doing? Were you satisfied?

TAYLOR: Oh, very much so. Very much so.

Q: There has been a lot of controversy about the kind of training that we were giving the South Vietnamese forces.

TAYLOR: I don't recall whether it had come up at that point or not. You see, the JCS viewed Vietnam always within the context of the defense of Southeast Asia, as they should, at least up to a point. And what they were thinking about was, "What should we do in case of a massive attack from the Chinese, perhaps combined with the North Vietnamese?" That concern had been lying around for a long while as one of those, call it a worst possible case if you will which needed serious attention. So that was the JCS point of view. They wanted the Vietnamese forces to be able to participate in the defense of Southeast Asia against a heavy conventional attack from the North. So that gave the initial orientation at a time when the Viet Cong threat was only a nuisance, certainly a serious nuisance, but had not taken the dimensions which it assumed later on.

Q: Were there any voices in those early days trying to tell us that we ought to be doing something other than that?

TAYLOR: Not that I recall, certainly not at that time.

Q: A related issue concerns not the type of training perhaps, perhaps the Joint Chiefs are not faulted for looking for a conventional threat from the North, but rather for attempting to equip and train the South Vietnamese as a sort of image of the American army.

TAYLOR: I would say that no American soldier would ever admit to doing that deliberately, but don't think it doesn't affect him, because you teach what your experience has taught you to a large extent. So the American influence certainly followed the path, generally, of the experience of the officers who happened to be the instructors on the spot.

Q: Were you aware at the time of any dissension in the mission over this particular issue?

TAYLOR: No.

Q: Are we still talking about the time in 1957?

TAYLOR: Yes, sir. The 1957 visit.

Q: Did you visit Saigon again before 1961?

TAYLOR: No.

Q: Of course that brings us to a very big year, in 1961.

TAYLOR: Which I recorded very thoroughly in Swords and Plowshares.

Q: Yes, sir, and I've made a definite effort not to rehash that insofar as I can, but I feel like I have to touch on some aspects of it. What was particularly interesting to you, that you were particularly looking for when you went to South Vietnam?

TAYLOR: My interest was guided exclusively, or virtually exclusively, by the directive I had from the President, which sent me on this mission to look at the situation in South Vietnam and to determine what was needed to be done to make our program successful. It was not to raise the question, "Is there a national interest in continuing our efforts?" That had been determined by the National Security Council the last time in May of 1961. My task was purely a matter of studying a situation which had been reported to Washington by several responsible officials as being deteriorated, and deciding what to do to reverse that trend.

Q: There have been stories of problems within the mission in Saigon at the time. Did you discover evidence of this?

TAYLOR: No, I did not. Now bear in mind, visitors like us going to a place like Saigon or any other Station of that sort, even though we were there I believe around ten days and worked very hard, each one of us -- we couldn't verify anything like the rumors that might be floating around Washington. As a matter of fact, I don't recall that it was [Frederick] Nolting's mission that generated the reports of the kind that were in Washington. It certainly was not on my checklist to investigate rumors. Later on, the internal state of the embassy became a serious question.

Q: I have heard that one of the more colorful members of your mission was an old Southeast Asia hand by the name of [Edward] Lansdale. Was he -- ?

TAYLOR: He was not a member of my mission.

Q: He was not?

TAYLOR: No, indeed. Never was.

Q: Well, then [David] Halberstam's story is -- TAYLOR: He was just getting a ride on my airplane.

Q: Oh, I see.

TAYLOR: No, he was not a mission member.

Q: Well, what was he doing?

TAYLOR: He had had considerable experience in the country. It was well known that he knew many of the personalities. He expressed a desire, I think, and as far as I know it was his request, to have a chance to go back and get a feel of things. And I welcomed his presence, because I realized that here was a man who to some extent at least was an expert, and [I would] be glad to hear anything he had to say.

Q: Well, did he report anything to you?

TAYLOR: No, he didn't come back with us, as a matter of fact. But he had made one of the reports that rather shook up the White House some months before, and I'd read that and I was very much interested. So I looked forward to seeing him when he got back. I don't-recall weever sat down and really talked over what he saw on the trip. I saw his cables so I had a pretty good understanding.

Q: So he didn't go to Baguio, then, after the mission?

TAYLOR: I don't think he came to Baguio at all. As a matter of fact, I had to intervene with the ambassador to get him to be allowed to go into Manila.

Q: Really?

TAYLOR: Yes. He was viewed by that particular ambassador as being, well, not dangerous, but as having contacts that might be misinterpreted if it were known that he were about town. I replied to the Ambassador, "All right, then none of us will come to town if Lansdale can't." We all went.

Q: Oh, really? That's interesting. I hadn't heard that. That's interesting.

As long as we're on Lansdale, let me ask another question which comes up in this context. Didn't President [Ngo Dinh] Diem ask that Lansdale be sent as some kind of a personal adviser or something of that sort?

TAYLOR: You mentioned that in your questions. I'm not sure that's the case. I really don't know but it has a certain familiar note. But then the question is, "Well, why didn't he go?" I certainly had no part in deciding one way or another because I didn't know at the time the request had been made. Of course, if Diem asked for Lansdale or anybody else, certainly if Washington were on the ball -- and they should be -- they would then ask Nolting, "Did you concur in this?" and if Nolting said yes, he'd probably go, and if he said no, he definitely wouldn't.

Q: So you're suggesting then that if he didn't go we might look at the embassy to see why.

TAYLOR: Well, have you talked to Nolting, by the way?

Q: No, sir.

TAYLOR: You ought to talk to him. He's right down in Virginia.

Q: He's on my hit list.

TAYLOR: Well, I'd be interested to know what he says.

Q: What was the relationship between Laos and Vietnam in 1961 when you first served there?

TAYLOR: I would say that from the point of view of Saigon, there was great concern in Saigon about Laos, both in the embassy and among the senior officials of the Vietnamese government. (Interruption)

Q: But the connection was primarily, from your point of view, a military [one]?

TAYLOR: No, it was the impact of Laos, the negotiations there, on the South Vietnamese. Their feeling was that the kind of solution with scotch tape being negotiated in Laos was going to break down, and the commies would eventually take over -- they had a way of doing this kind of thing. That feeling had a definite impact on the morale of Saigon, of the officials, to which were added the big flood of the Mekong and the assassination of the Vietnamese liaison officer with the Americans. This combination of things happening at about the same time as I arrived had created a great cloud of gloom over the whole official front.

Q: Now, when the so-called Taylor-Rostow report of this trip was written, you and Dr. [Walt] Rostow apparently both believed that it might become possible or necessary to apply some kind of military pressures against the North to cut off their support and encouragement. What kinds of pressures were envisioned at this time?

TAYLOR: Well, that was simply a warning we put in to the President, that we were giving him a long list of recommendations which represented in the aggregate something of a change of direction in policy. Actually, it was rather an intensification of effort toward the current policy, staying in roughly the original direction. But we also saw -- and we didn't have to be very perceptive to see -- that the real source of the danger of Vietnam was from Hanoi. While we had at least a chance to be able to build up the internal defenses in South Vietnam to the point of restoring normalcy to South Vietnam, it might not work. So don't think, Mr. President, we were saying, that we guarantee that this is all we have to do. We have a weapon that we've never thought much about using, namely an attack at the source. If this problem had ever been given to Leavenworth [Command and General Staff College] or the War College to resolve strategically, the choice would have been an attack on the North.

Q: This is a fundamental question, I think. In what ways did we see Hanoi giving concrete support and encouragement? Was it by infiltration or -- ?

TAYLOR: Well, I can't tell you just what the state of our intelligence was at the time except that it was very inadequate. I would say that perhaps that the most important message my mission brought back to Washington was that the intelligence we'd been getting on South Vietnam was so unreliable that we'd better start over again and try to erase any impression we had formed until we had reasonably reliable information to replace it.

Q: What was wrong with our [intelligence]? What kind of wrong impressions were we getting? Were we getting too good, too bad -- ?

TAYLOR: Well, it was essentially the weakness of the intelligence system of the Vietnamese. Bear in mind, we had a relatively small U.S. mission of only a few hundred, so that our intelligence people could do little more than ask the Saigon authorities to answer the very tough questions being fired at the embassy from Washington. Our people would get a question, thoroughly legitimate in most circumstances: "What was the Vietnam rice crop last year? How much was harvested and how does that compare to the last four years?" For a question like that, we didn't have [the answer] in the embassy, so our people just walked over and gave it to the prime minister or the minister of agriculture saying, "Please give us a reply as soon as you can." Well, [the] minister didn't have the answer either, although he wouldn't admit it. So he either went out and hastily collected some figures, or just guessed a figure and sent us a reply which we then fired back to Washington. Meanwhile our colleagues here in Washington recorded such data on graphs or charts, and assumed they knew the true situation.

Q: Who was our primary intelligence gathering agency? Was the CIA at that time primarily responsible?

TAYLOR: Yes, but State was responsible for political reporting. The military mission contributed nothing. For years there had been an unfortunate directive out to MAAG chiefs: "Don't use your people for intelligence purposes." So the embassy military attachés couldn't go over and talk to their military colleagues across the hall and ask them for intelligence regarding the armed forces they were advising.

Q: Isn't that rather unusual?

TAYLOR: It's worse than that, it's stupid. I discovered it as army chief of staff and I sent orders out to stop all this nonsense right away. Obviously a MAAG officer doesn't want to go around looking like a spook or anything of that sort, but every bit of knowledge he gets that's helpful to the government, he should report to Washington.

Q: Can you recall about when you took this action?

TAYLOR: No, I just remember my action when I discovered it.

Q: Is this when you were chairman of the Joint Chiefs?

TAYLOR: No. Sometime when army chief of staff. Apparently the directive never got to Saigon.

Q: Oh, I see. [When you were] chief of staff of the army. Oh, I see. Okay.

Of course, everyone talks about the bombing which later became such a big issue.

TAYLOR: Rostow and I weren't talking about bombing targets in our 1961 report. We were just saying to the President: "Bear in mind that the real enemy, the real trouble is in Hanoi. If we can't accomplish our purpose down here, we're going to have to do something in North Vietnam."

Q: Okay. When did General [Paul] Harkins go out, do you recall?

TAYLOR: He replaced [General Lionel] McGarr.

Q: McGarr was there at --

TAYLOR: McGarr was there when I visited in 1957.

Q: Oh, no, that was Williams.

TAYLOR: Oh, Williams, yes.

Q: McGarr would have been there when you and Mr. Rostow went, was he not?

TAYLOR: I guess that's the time.

Q: Because General Williams came back in the fall of 1960.

TAYLOR: I guess that's right. Yes.

Q: So McGarr would have been there just about a year. Why was [he replaced]?

TAYLOR: Well, we decided to upgrade the MAAG to MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] and to put a four-star general there. The question, "Who?" I nominated Harkins because I knew him well. I'd known him in Europe when he was [George] Patton's deputy chief of staff. I had him as commandant of cadets at West Point when I was superintendent, and I'd seen quite a bit of him after he took the command of the army component in CINCPAC. So he not only had the rank, he had broad experience and he was geographically near the spot in Honolulu. He was a natural. I nominated him without any question.

Q: The information from Saigon, intelligence reporting and so forth, did that get funneled through him on the way to CINCPAC, would you say, so that he had a feel for the situation?

TAYLOR: Oh, yes. It should have. He was at CINCPAC headquarters.

Q: Another recommendation of the report was that certain kinds of improved equipment be furnished to the South Vietnamese, including increased numbers of aircraft, I believe.

TAYLOR: And helicopters.

Q: And helicopters. And some armored personnel carriers, I think.

TAYLOR: Well, I'd forgotten about the armored personnel carriers. In fact, I don't recall them.

Q: Well, I have seen in various reports -- I'm not even sure where now -- the new M-113 --

TAYLOR: Not at that time.

Q: Not at that time? Okay.

TAYLOR: I'd say no.

Q: How did that work out? They did get this new equipment.

TAYLOR: Well, first bear in mind that it was expected that the light helicopters would be gradually fed in to the Vietnamese as they could fly them -- but not in the early phase. It gave our local commander great leverage to have helicopters and then loan them to the Vietnamese when he wanted to and thereby control their operations as necessary.

Q: This was leverage that could be used, then?

TAYLOR: Oh, yes. It was a secondary advantage.

Q: Did we get evidence in succeeding months after the dispatch of the helicopters that this was working out?

TAYLOR: Well, I'll just say that for the year thereafter -- we're talking about 1962 -- everything seemed to pick up. We followed in Washington, as best we could, the reports on the various things that we had recommended, how were they going. It took about a year at least to get a noticeable improvement [in] the intelligence connection. But in general, I had the satisfying feeling that we were moving along not badly. That was generally true up until 1963 and the Buddhist upheaval.

Q: Vice President Johnson visited Saigon, I think, in 1961 also. Did you have anything to do with that?

TAYLOR: He preceded us. I'm not even sure whether I ever saw his report as such. I was told parts of it, at least. One of the first things I did when I got back in 1961, at President Kennedy's direction, was to go to the Vice President and tell him everything I found, and frequently he'd say, "Yes, I saw that, too."

Q: So he didn't call into question anything that you observed?

TAYLOR: Not that I'm aware of. He seemed to be quite favorable to everything I recommended. I know of nothing to contradict that impression.

Q: At the time that you went to Saigon with Mr. Rostow, there were rumors that there was trouble in the country team. The press was carrying stories. There were beginning to be hints that all was not well between Ambassador Nolting and General McGarr, for instance. But you've said that you didn't have time to look into that, or if it was true-

TAYLOR: No. But I got an unfavorable impression of McGarr, myself, while I was there. I thought he was, say, throwing his weight around. For example, he was quite irritated that I wouldn't let him go with me when I talked to President Diem. I told him frankly that I had met President Diem, we would be speaking French, and I always had the feeling that in such an interview the smaller the audience, the more you get from your opposite number. He was very huffy about it.

Well, I discovered that if he'd been huffy to me, he'd been even more than that to other people. I think that professionally he performed well. But his time in Saigon was about up anyway, so I was very happy when the occasion came to relieve him and put Harkins in.

Q: Well, now, he'd only been there about a year, I guess.

TAYLOR: I thought it was more than that. I'm not sure.

Q: MACV was formed --

TAYLOR: I'll just say I felt very happy when [he left].

Q: All right, we'll leave it at that then.

Had you ever had the same impression with General Williams, that there was any problem between him and the Ambassador?

TAYLOR: No. Let me say this, though. Whenever you have a MAAG in a country, especially a small country, inevitably the head man in the local government tries to play him off against the ambassador. We found it so world-wide. It depends then on how good the ambassador and the general work together and don't allow themselves to be misused. Diem was always saying, "I can't get along with the ambassador," whichever ambassador it happened to be, "Ah, but General so-and-so, he's fine."

Q: That was Ambassador Durbrow, I think.

TAYLOR: Of course the reason is, the general has things to give that the country wants. He has tangible ways to help the country, whereas the poor ambassador, as I soon discovered when I became one, usually brings only bad news. So it's inevitable that there be an effort made [to divide them], and whether it's successful or not depends upon the character of the two men involved.

Would you agree that press relations tended to get worse after 1961, more or less progressively?

TAYLOR: I wouldn't say 1961. I would say it wasn't bad when I was ambassador, because the interest of the American people in Vietnam was [not as great at that time]. The press had some representation there, but nothing resembling the size after our troops came in. That's when the flood came.

Q: Now 1963, I seem to remember, was a bad year with the press because that was when we had the Buddhist troubles.

TAYLOR: That's right. And the media were magnifying everything that took place. Yes, that was a bad year.

Q: Right. That was before [you became ambassador].

TAYLOR: That's why I don't have a direct feeling as [to] the intensity of relations with the media.

Q: I think you said in Swords and Plowshares that some members of the press had a vendetta against General Harkins.

TAYLOR: They developed one primarily because Harkins committed the offense of saying repeatedly that things weren't going to pot, we weren't losing the war and so on, and that contradicted everything most of the reporters were sending back. And they didn't like Harkins for professional reasons and frequently for personal reasons.

Q: Personal reasons?

TAYLOR: Well, in the sense that Harkins got and exhibited a very low opinion of them.

Q: Oh, I see.

TAYLOR: Bear in mind that up until the army got helicopters, the press men, no matter how they tried, couldn't get any place around the country on their own. They wrote the dispatches at the bar of what was the famous hotel in Saigon?

Q: The Caravelle?

TAYLOR: That's it. The Caravelle Hotel. You could make a much better story there than you could sitting out on a hot log someplace in the jungle. So life was hard for reporters. They were very disgruntled and tended to hold Harkins responsible. Actually, neither Harkins nor the ambassador could do much for them, because until helicopters came, nobody could get around easily.

Q: Now there was a notorious case after the helicopters came -- I think it was in January of 1963, early January -- a battle at the village called Ap Bac.

TAYLOR: I remember there was such a battle, but I don't remember anything about it.

Q: Well, the gist of it was that people like Neil Sheehan and David Halberstam got out there, John Paul Vann was the adviser, and it was clearly a botched battle no matter which side you were on. Halberstam and Sheehan reported that General Harkins told them it was a victory when they saw clearly that it was not, and that seemed to have set everything in concrete after that. General [Earle] Wheeler came back from a visit about that time, I think. Do you remember him saying anything about the affair?

TAYLOR: I don't remember the incident at all.

Q: Okay.

TAYLOR: There were so many incidents in the course of this thing, that one I missed.

Q: Was the mission in Saigon as bad about leaks to the press as we hear it was?

TAYLOR: Well, you never know how to count leaks, or to be sure that something that certainly sounds like a leak is one. Yes, there were all sorts of reports and I have no doubt some leaks came out of the embassy, but again, you never can know for sure how many and who did it.

Q: Can you recall any particularly distressing [incidents]? I don't have one in mind, I'm just-

TAYLOR: No. Of course, the press was full of it. If you had brought -- the newspapers around here, I could perhaps remember the incidents. But there was certainly the strong indication that there were elements within the mission itself that were not loyal to the ambassador. That was my overall impression.

Q: How about the Vietnamese side? Was that pretty leaky?

TAYLOR: They were infiltrated constantly by the Viet Cong. They didn't have to leak.
(Laughter)

Q: I was going to ask you about that, but I'm going to save that-

TAYLOR: Again, you can't prove that. Now, there were just enough cases that you did identify, and it was so easy for the enemy to infiltrate the government in that sort of civil war, that one had to assume the enemy sooner or later would get anything you gave to your local colleagues in Vietnam.

Q: Can you think of any operations that were compromised in that fashion?

TAYLOR: No.

Q: Okay.

TAYLOR: I have been talking about very small operations, not a D-Day kind of thing in which a leak could be truly disastrous.

Q: You've anticipated one of my questions about intelligence and the problems that existed with it. Can you remember how or when, if ever, you first noticed that it was getting better, that you had more confidence?

TAYLOR: You can't measure the quality of intelligence by a thermometer. Little by little you find you are getting credible answers to questions which previously went unanswered. All the while, we were putting a tremendous effort into this thing. Our electronic surveillance of the radio nets of the VC eventually -- and I don't recall what year -- reached a very high peak of effectiveness. And while you could never read the messages, just by the study of the shift of the location and numbers of headquarters, you could infer a tremendous amount of fact which was extremely valuable.

Q: Now, you came back to Saigon in 1963 with Secretary McNamara, I believe.

TAYLOR: I've made numbers of trips, yes.

Q: Was this a subject of concern at that time that you recall? The quality of intelligence?

TAYLOR: Well, we had a long list of matters to check every time. As all my trips were similar, without seeing the trip agenda, I couldn't be specific about any one of them.'

Q: I would have sent you some, but this is before our Library has documents and I didn't have access to the Kennedy [Library's].

TAYLOR: I never had access to any of these when I wrote Swords and Plowshares. I had a rather limited collection of copies of my own cables and things of that sort -- also a fresher memory than now.

Q: The reason I bring that trip up is because there's been speculation about the fact that John Richardson, who was then station chief of CIA, was recalled or came back just a few days after the mission left. Was there some connection between those two things?

TAYLOR: You'll have to have [John] McCone about that, because he relieved Richardson -- it didn't affect me in any way. I had plenty of other trouble without nosing into the cause of his relief. I'd met Richardson; he acted and talked like a good man. I think his record with CIA was very favorable, but I gathered he had got in a jam with [Henry Cabot] Lodge and that led to his relief. That's adequate reason, because an ambassador certainly ought to be satisfied with his principal intelligence officer.

Q: Was there some dispute between agencies at this time over who was supposed to be the prime intelligence gatherer?

TAYLOR: No, none that I know of. You see, CIA is an unusual situation. It is a collecting agency itself, and yet its director has a coordinating responsibility for all the other agencies in intelligence. Its representatives in the field don't really command. They're supposed to coordinate, supervise, and be sure one agency doesn't get in the way of another. When there are tasks to be done and one or more agencies that might undertake it, the local CIA man is supposed to say, "Well, give it to the army or the navy or I'll take it," or whatever it happens to be. The fact that Washington may get several channels of intelligence has never been viewed as necessarily bad. That's supposed to be reconciled in Washington. CIA does the shaking out, but they're supposed to report -- and as far as I know they usually do -- that "we're interpreting the matter this way, but we should tell you that the army interpretation is different" Which is fair enough.

Q: Was there effective coordination between our advisers at that time and the CIA?

TAYLOR: Advisers? You mean those in the field?

Q: In MACV, yes.

TAYLOR: In the field?

Q: Yes, sir.

TAYLOR: Well, I don't know how they [coordinated in the field]. I would know how they coordinated at the local level in Saigon. So far as I know, it was all right. Very good.

Q: Okay. Of course, when Diem was overthrown, our intelligence has been faulted for not giving us very much warning about that. You say you were surprised, for example. You said -- I think I'm quoting you -- that you were as surprised as anyone.

TAYLOR: Well, Harkins will tell you that he sent a cable about twenty-four hours [before the coup], that he had a rumor to that effect. But he'd sent probably a half dozen other cables, giving similar reports of impending coups at different times, which didn't come off. It was the old business of the dulling effect of too many cries of "Wolf!" It didn't make any difference in this case; we couldn't have done anything about it had we known it was about to occur. But it is true that the day the news came in to Washington, we were certainly surprised.

Q: Oh, yes.

TAYLOR: Because of the absence of any action following the dispatch of the famous cable of August 24, we became convinced that the generals were never going to get together and do anything.

Q: Was the Diem coup a mistake?

TAYLOR: Oh, it was a disaster, a national disaster.

Q: For both sides, do you think? Both for the Americans --

TAYLOR: Yes, both for Americans and South Vietnamese.

Incidentally, when I was in Saigon as ambassador, the period late in 1964 was the lowest point of the situation until the very end when everything collapsed in 1975. I've been asked, "Didn't you ever think of suggesting we pull out in this period? Why didn't you recommend that we Americans come home?" I said, "Yes, I thought about that. But I had at least three awfully good reasons not to do it, not even to be tempted to do it." The first was the Tonkin Gulf Resolution where all of Congress except two senators had said in effect, "This is a vital operation involving the American interest. We must be victorious in South Vietnam." That to me was a message: "Taylor, you've been doing all right, you're on the right course, but pull up your socks and do better." Next was the fact that we'd never used our air arm in a way to get the most from this asset. Finally, we Americans had in large measure created or were responsible for the chaos by our action in the case of Diem. The situation was certainly in part our doing.

Q: I would like to try to reconcile two views of the effect of the fall of Diem on the military situation. One view is that the Viet Cong military units very soon began to attempt to reap the profits created. Another view is that the NLF as a whole, the whole infrastructure, the whole front organization, actually lost about a third of its membership because the new government, while it was extremely weak, was very popular, maybe for the same reason.

TAYLOR: I doubt the latter. If the Vietnamese government was so popular in this period, why did they keep turning over -- five times in one year?

Q: Well, I would imagine because these were generals' coups and not necessarily representative of the population.

TAYLOR: Who could say that, to the peasant out trying to grow a little rice, any Saigon government was ever popular? It never was popular. As the seat of central government, Saigon was necessarily bad news to every peasant. That's where the tax collectors came from. On the other hand, the evidence of a new level of activity on the part of the Viet Cong and Hanoi following the overthrow of Diem was very apparent. It showed in all the records.

Q: Now Secretary [Robert] McNamara went out, I think, in December of 1963, which would have been about two months after the Diem coup. And he came back with a report-

TAYLOR: Was that the time I went out with him and we took [Nguyen] Khanh around the provinces raising his arms in the air?

Q: No, I think this was before Khanh. I think this was just before the Khanh coup. I think [Duong Van "Big"] Minh was still in.

TAYLOR: The Khanh coup came in December. The Big Minh coup, the one that overthrew Diem, didn't last but a week or so.

Q: Well, in any case, Secretary McNamara reported that the country team was having problems. Do you remember what he found.

TAYLOR: From Washington we had been seeing signs for some time that Lodge and Harkins didn't get along -- a surprising development considering their past association.

Q: What was at issue between those two?

TAYLOR: Well, there was no specific issue as far as I [could see], in a way. One of the things I have forgotten to mention was that Harkins had been an old friend of Lodge's. They'd both served in the National Guard together, I believe it was. In any case, they had been together before and when I mentioned to Lodge that we were thinking about Harkins to go to Saigon, he seemed very happy. So it looked like a very good pair to have there. Well, we soon discovered that wasn't the case. I don't recall that Harkins ever complained to me early in his assignment to Saigon. However we chiefs in the Pentagon began to notice that State was getting information from the Ambassador which we never received from Harkins. Raising the question with Harkins on the private cable, I learned that he wasn't getting the information either. The trouble was a lack of communication for which I felt Lodge was responsible. Harkins was not the kind to hold back on information if he had any. But Lodge turned out to be a loner who didn't communicate easily.

(Interruption)

Q: Let's go ahead with General Harkins' difficulties then with Ambassador Lodge.

TAYLOR: Well, this developed into a rather serious schism between the Ambassador and the General. Not over any specific issue, as far as I knew. Neither one ever mentioned a difference of substance. When McNamara and I made the trip to Vietnam we talked to both men about the failure of communications. Both agreed to do their part in correcting the fault but Lodge's performance was never entirely satisfactory, in my opinion. Sharing information was just not Lodge's way of doing business. And we found that his civilian subordinates in the embassy complained about the same thing. He continued to run-

Q: A one-man show.

TAYLOR: Yes, a one-man show. He never had a real country team in the embassy.

Q: Now, this brings up an interesting incident about which we don't know very much. Secretary McNamara also included in this report a ray of hope. He said that a young man by the name of David Nes was about to organize the country team under Lodge and correct all of these faults. And about six weeks later, David Nes came home, having been there only a couple of months. Do you know anything about that?

TAYLOR: This McNamara paper, what form is that in?

Q: Well, it was a report.

TAYLOR: Report of our trip?

Q: After the trip.

TAYLOR: I can't believe I didn't see it, because we always passed our papers around. The name Nes is familiar but I don't recall exactly the connection.

Q: Let me tell you what I have and see if it -- this is a paraphrase, but he said Nes was a bright young man who was then working on an executive committee below Lodge to coordinate mission activities. Now I have indications that shortly after this that Nes got the sack from Lodge.

TAYLOR: I'm sorry I can't recall this episode if I was ever acquainted with it.

(Interruption)

Q: Secretary McNamara's report also said, and I think this is a quote, "U.S. resources and personnel cannot be usefully increased at that time, but we should prepare for more forceful moves if the situation does not show early signs of improvement," unquote. Do you know if he had anything specific in mind or if this -- ?

TAYLOR: No, we were recognizing the game was going against us, starting to turn at least. And we saw the disorder which was following the murder of Diem.

Q: Soon after this come the first big battles I guess you would call them, in 1964, the spring and early summer of 1964 when --

TAYLOR: Well, there were several.

Q: I'm not referring to any one in particular, but there were a number of large-scale engagements, I think, battalion and maybe even regimental size.

TAYLOR: In the North.

Q: Well, I think there was one at a rubber plantation and several other places, and the ARVN just took a beating in these. What was your feeling?

TAYLOR: First I was anxious to get a clear picture of the situation. So the next time McNamara and I returned to Vietnam, our first question was -- what about the ARVN? And we got a very bad report from Westy [William Westmoreland] and also from some of Westy's officers, including [General William] Depuy, who was G-3 at the time.

Q: He was the counter-insurgency man, wasn't he?

TAYLOR: Yes. He described very clearly the misbehavior of several ARVN units, complete failure of units which had been, we thought, among the most promising.

Q: What was the explanation?

TAYLOR: The picture we received was a general decline of the ARVN, especially in the North. This situation made the safety of Danang a primary concern of Westy in 1965 and led to the decision to bring in U.S. combat troops.

Q: I see.

TAYLOR: The deterioration of the performance of the troops in the North went on for some time. I don't remember what else --

Q: What did we see as the chief cause of this?

TAYLOR: I talked repeatedly to our people on the subject but they had no precise answer. The general feeling seemed to be we may have been pressing them too fast, expecting too much of them. And there was always the question of leadership. If you have a good division commander, you have a good division. Well, that's usually true, unless he happens to be the only good officer in the division. "Well," I would ask Westy, "can you get Diem -- or his successors -- to replace inadequate commanders?" Westy always said he could, but that took a little time. He couldn't just go around ordering, "Can Jones tomorrow."

That raises the collateral question of whether Westy had enough command authority or not. I always doubted it, based on my experience in Korea where the U.S. commander had operational command authority over Korean forces. Most senior U.S. officers in that war felt that such authority was indispensable. But Westy felt that it was not necessary, indeed was undesirable in Vietnam. He had such close relations with, first, the head of state -- whoever it happened to be -- and then the senior generals that he could get what he wanted while retaining an advisory role. If necessary, he could look any high Vietnamese official in the eye and say, "You'd better do this if you are to retain the confidence and support of the Americans." He had the added argument, it would be a blow to the pride of the ARVN forces to change a well-established advisory system and such action would create hard feelings and a loss of morale that might be reflected in troop performance.

Q: We had a system of blending Korean trainees in with American troops, didn't we?

TAYLOR: We had the -- what did we call [them]?

Q: KATUSAs? [Korean Augmentation to the U.S. Army] Was it the KATUSAs?

TAYLOR: That's right. The KATUSAs. They were invaluable, but their purpose had nothing to do with what we were talking about. The procedure was to introduce into each American infantry platoon, or squad, two or three KATUSAs who stayed there permanently. They never got rotated, and thereby became the veterans of the Eighth Army. Most of them couldn't speak English, although it was surprising how well they could acquire a soldier patois after a while. Since they were always there, they knew everything that needed to be passed along to arriving American replacements. A tremendous value to us. The only thing was they got spoiled and pretty soon they too liked their cold beer at the end of the day. (Laughter) It's amazing how the American standard of living can attract adherents very quickly.

Q: So it wouldn't work to try to send them back to a Korean division?

TAYLOR: Well, that's what worried the Koreans. A Korean senior official would say, "Look, you have Korean soldiers that have unusual experience, yet they remain privates with you. Return them to us and we'll make them sergeants. And furthermore, if you keep them too long, they will be no damn good to us at all." (Laughter) And there's a great deal in that. To get KATUSAs back to their own army, you'd have to drag them out kicking, and not only they'd kick, but so would the American commander who had to give them up. But when you added it up, the KATUSA was a very valuable way to use a small part of Korean manpower. Well, Westy knew about it and I called it to Westy's attention, "Don't you think a KATUSA system would be of value to us in Vietnam?" Well, the answer was, "No, I don't think so."

Q: Did he elaborate on that part at all?

TAYLOR: No, not to me.

Q: Okay. Now at about this time, there were some changes in the State Department which I'm not sure if you want to address or not. It's important in the whole total picture. The development I'm thinking of is the formation of the interdepartmental task force on Vietnam which was formed right about this time. Do you know anything about how that came into being?

TAYLOR: No, there was no special reason of any sort as far as I know. The way our committee-infested government tends to operate, when you have a problem affecting several departments [you tend] to have an interdepartmental ad hoc committee. Well, the task force you mention was ad hoc, but it did have the merit of staying in existence for a considerable period of time. My impression was that it was a very useful clearinghouse for interdepartmental matters at a fairly low level.

Q: Do you know what effect this had on the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern affairs, Roger Hilsman?

TAYLOR: I wouldn't think it would have any. I don't know why it should. It was chaired by State, and bear in mind it didn't make policy, it didn't make decisions. It planned, it followed up on plan execution -- at least it was supposed to -- and I know nothing to believe that it wasn't a useful committee.

Q: Now I know that during 1964, the task force, as you say, was considering all the options, considering everything relevant. Were you consulted on the military options? You were chairman of the Joint Chiefs.

TAYLOR: No, but I'm sure I had a military representative on the committee.

Q: I want to ask another question about the bombing at this time, because the overall picture seems to indicate that some change in attitude toward a possible bombing campaign took place, and I want to see whether that is true or not. We know that there were suggestions made that this committee war game, as it were -- the bombing at this time -- do you know anything about that? Did they go to you?

TAYLOR: The committee?

Q: Yes.

TAYLOR: No, they wouldn't be competent to war game the bombing.

Q: Okay. In case of a bombing campaign, one of the relevant questions was what kind of response can we expect from the other side? What can the other side be expected to do? What did we see as their options? What seemed to us to be particularly worrisome?

TAYLOR: Well, the only worry -- worry may be a strong word -- was that bombing might have some effect on Moscow and Peking. This was the concern at the level of the President and the Secretary of State. [Dean] Rusk was the one who particularly voiced this fear. He said in effect, "We know that both of these communist states have mutual defense treaties with North Vietnam. There may be something in such a treaty that says if North Vietnam is attacked by an outside party, the Soviet Union and/or China will have to respond in some way and we don't know what that 'some way' may be."

primarily in those two countries. Which we did. That was the early justification for extreme gradualism in the bombing program. The trouble was that once we got in that habit, we never got out of it. I would have said that after three or four months it was pretty clear that the Soviets had no real stomach for participation in this war. It was far from home and they were getting no gain from it. It was becoming more and more costly. All they accomplished was to fly communist flag at least as high as the Chinese did since they couldn't afford to let the Chinese look like the leader of the communist world: in the Far East. So I would say that there was very little ground to fear retaliation from either the Soviet Union or China after a few months of the bombing.

Q: I have seen most of the speculations on the kinds of retaliation that were open or seemed to be open to the other side, and I saw one the other day that I'd never seen before, and I want to ask you whether you had heard of it. A man fairly high placed in the embassy said that there was considerable fear that the Chinese would retaliate against the Seventh Fleet with submarines.

TAYLOR: No, I never heard that.

Q: You'd never heard that one before? Well, he wasn't a military man, so that may explain something.

Now you went, I think, to the Honolulu Conference in June of 1964, is that right?

TAYLOR: Probably. I went to several.

Q: That would have been just before you were named ambassador. Do you recall anything of any moment at that conference?

TAYLOR: No, I don't remember exactly why we went at that time. Again, if I had the agenda, it would come to mind.

Q: I know that the bombing was discussed, but that's all I know. Perhaps it was always discussed.

TAYLOR: We were always discussing bombing and the troop requirements of Westmoreland, things like that. They were always on the agenda. I don't recall anything particularly pressing at that time.

Q: Well, the agenda is not in our files. Most things are, most things have been opened, but that apparently has not. So I wasn't sure.

Did you know when you went to that that you were going to be named ambassador?

TAYLOR: I don't know whether I knew my luck at that time or not. I don't think so.

Q: I was going to ask you if that influenced your advice at the conference?

TAYLOR: No. Of course, I became ambassador roughly the first of July, and this was in June, wasn't it?

Q: Yes.

TAYLOR: I don't know whether it was in the bag then or not. I'm reasonably sure that it hadn't been determined at that time.

Q: It was clear by then that Mr. Lodge was coming back, though, was it not?

TAYLOR: Yes, and we were casting around for a replacement. A lot of nominations had been going in to the President, and I thought the President had plenty of choices to pick a really good ambassador.

Q: Robert Kennedy had volunteered, hadn't he?

TAYLOR: Well, that was in the press. What happened was LBJ probably played some tricks. He never worked directly on me; he always worked through Bob McNamara. He was expressing great distress over the problem of replacing Lodge and he said the names submitted by State never satisfied him. That apparently led to either Rusk or McNamara saying, "Well, Mr. President, I'll go if you want me to." The other one would beat his chest, "Count on me, too." And the Bob Kennedy, so I'm told, got into the act and he came forward to volunteer.

One day Bob McNamara said to me, "You know, the President really hopes the people around him will show willingness to go out there," and then he described what was taking place. Well, he looked at me and I said, "I don't want to go. I have had too many war years away from home already." "Well, do you think that's right? I think the President would feel easier about this if you'd put your name in, too."

I wasn't entirely happy with this. I smelled at least a small mouse. Nonetheless, I said, "That's all right with me. Put in my name," and then thought no more about it until Bob McNamara reported shortly thereafter, "Well, they're narrowing it down, and the President doesn't want to take either me or Rusk." I replied, "Well, of course he wouldn't. He'd be crazy if he did." He dropped the subject and went off leaving me a little uneasy.

He returned a day or two later with the word that the President did feel that I was the man they wanted, and would I take it? Meanwhile, the President had never said boo to me. But I'd been thinking it over so I replied, "it's the last thing in the world I want to do." In the first place, I hadn't wanted to come back to active duty in 1961 and had declined a couple of jobs that they wanted to give me in the Kennedy Administration. I had told President Kennedy that I would decline any job except one that was really a major military assignment that obviously needed to be done. Since the country had spent a lot of money making a soldier out of me, I wouldn't feel free to reject such a position if I felt qualified. Incidentally, one of the jobs that I had turned down was ambassador to France. (Laughter)

Q: Why did you turn that down?

TAYLOR: I had had enough overseas service in military life and my poor wife was worn out from moving. So now, faced with assignment to Vietnam, I told Bob that I'd been five years away from my family in two wars and that the ambassadorship in Saigon was nothing that appealed to me. Further, it seemed to me that with all the foreign service officers we'd been training over the years, there must be a professional that could do the job adequately. But if the President really felt as described, I would take it but for one year only. At that time my mother was still alive. I was the last of the family; I was the only one to look after her. I had plenty of family reasons not to go, and if I went, to return soon. So that was the basis on which I took the job. I pointed out, also, that it was the wrong way to fill it, because that was too important a job to put in a man just for one year.

Q: I don't know why I think of it, but what was your opinion of the one-year tour for combat troops in Vietnam?

TAYLOR: From a military point of view I didn't like it at all, but it was the same problem we had in Korea. Should the government ask a young man to go to Vietnam and stay the duration of the war? We did in World War II. But Vietnam was a limited war requiring limited manpower. Whether a one-year tour was the right length or whether we could have lengthened it without too much damage to morale, I don't know.

Q: Why do you think President Johnson picked you? Now, I know that you've said because you were expendable, and you will excuse me when I ask.

TAYLOR: I really was dispensable. I would say I never had a very warm relationship with LBJ, but I think we both looked at things regarding Vietnam about the same way. Incidentally, we shared a joint honor along with General [Omar] Bradley. We were honorary elders of the National Christian Church of Washington, and once in a long while we'd meet in church. We came from roughly the same part of the country. I'd known him quite well when he was a senator and very active on the Senate Armed Services Committee. There we met when I was chief of staff, off and on. So we'd been together. Certainly from the national defense point of view he was an ideal president, as I saw it. But I never felt that we were warm friends, perhaps because I knew he had one strong thing against me. I had had a Robert Kennedy son named after me.

Q: Do you really think that was a handicap?

TAYLOR: I know it did. I don't think in the sense he really distrusted me, but every now and then he'd say, "How is that Kennedy boy named after you?" (Laughter) I wasn't sure he was joking. The Kennedy-Johnson animosity was very real and very deep. And I must say it seemed to me he tried everything under the sun to be friendly with the Kennedys and bury the feud.

Q: It wasn't reciprocated?

TAYLOR: Not that I perceived. But I told my wife, "That's what I get for the honor of having a namesake."

Q: Well, it's not an honor you can decline very gracefully, is it?

TAYLOR: I would not have been inclined to do so. I'm proud of young Max.

Q: President Johnson never spoke to you about the ambassadorship? This all came through Secretary McNamara?

TAYLOR: Never did.

Q: That's a little unusual for him, isn't it?

TAYLOR: Well, not necessarily. A president doesn't like to be told no to his face, and he shouldn't be put in that position. In other words, he ought to know when he formally presents something that it will be accepted. I had no feelings that the procedure was wrong in this case.

Q: Now, you received a letter of instructions from President Johnson which I'm not an expert, but I interpreted it as being a very strong letter of instructions-

TAYLOR: That's right.

Q: -- naming you specifically, for example, as the chief officer in the embassy for all affairs, civilian and military. Did this make your appointment somewhat different than it might have been otherwise?

TAYLOR: Well, I think the President's directive to me was unique, as far as I know. As you might suspect, I wrote it myself. But I wrote it as I did because the President had said in effect, "I want you to be responsible for everything that happens there." I asked, "You mean that literally, Mr. President?" He said, "I definitely do." So I drew it up that way.

It was unique in the sense that it put the MAAG and all military activities completely under the ambassador. The ambassador's relation to the head of a MAAG has always been somewhat uncertain, although since the ambassador represents the president, he has a certain amount of ex officio authority. Every ambassador used to get, and I presume still does, a letter of instructions which charges him with representing the president. With that authority any strong man can take it as justification to do almost anything to and with the agencies the government represented in his mission. But he has to be sensible about it. If he tries to go into the military business and do things that affect technical or operational matters. he's way off base and will soon get in trouble, as he should. But he certainly has broad general authority. He is responsible for anything that will affect U.S. relations with the government to which he's accredited.

While every ambassador has a certain amount of authority, I never saw it written so clearly as in my directive. I knew exactly what it meant and how it would be read by the Pentagon and CINCPAC. So when the President had approved it, I sat down with all the Chiefs and explained it to them. Then when I got to Honolulu on my way to Saigon, I repeated the explanation to Admiral U. S. Grant Sharp, who had succeeded Admiral Felt as CINCPAC. Oley Sharp was an old friend. I explained it to him and then of course I explained it to Westy when I got to Vietnam. I assured them that, being a military man, I would know enough to keep out of military business with no bearing on my broad responsibilities. However, in the case of Westy, I wanted him to understand the extent of my responsibility and see to it that anything that affected national policy was discussed with me. He would clear it with me if necessary, and in any case, would furnish me copies of his cables bearing on the subject. As far as I know he always followed this procedure. I had no complaint whatsoever.

Q: No back channel problems?

TAYLOR: None. There were plenty of purely military matters about which he could have back channel conversations to the Joint Chiefs and should. But I did not want to be bypassed on issues which might go to the President for decision or cause me trouble with the Saigon government. He never gave me cause to complain. As a matter of fact, I only know of one or two things that he brought to me for clearance that I didn't support.

Q: Can you recall what those were?

TAYLOR: Well, one was the first landing of the troops in Danang.

Q: The marines, the first marines?

TAYLOR: Yes, initially I withheld this concurrence. I don't recall how long in advance of the actual landing Westy had been urging it. My position was that this was the last thing we should want to do. This would be the nose of the camel coming into the tent. We would be starting something, the end of which we could not foresee. Before I would agree, I told Westy that he would have to come in here, look me in the eye and say that "I cannot guarantee any longer the security of Danang without the marines." Meanwhile, there were a number of incidents of failure of ARVN units which shook our confidence in them. This was in the spring of 1965. Then it was that Westy came to me and asked for the Marines in these terms. I finally concurred; we joined in a recommendation to Washington and the marines came ashore.

Q: Someone has noted that when General Harkins -- to regress for a minute -- took over command at MACV that he was given a very strong letter of appointment, which you wrote.

TAYLOR: Oh, yes. I worked that out for him and Ambassador Nolting who concurred in it after considerable discussion.

Q: And then they draw the contrast saying that when you get to be ambassador, you write yourself a very strong letter.

TAYLOR: The letters were not identical nor was the situation. What's wrong with that? It's like when I left the White House to go to be chairman [of the JCS], the President asked me whom I recommended to take my job in the White House. I said, "Nobody."

Well, the answer was that Nolting didn't like the language of Harkins' letter of instructions which the Joint Chiefs had prepared and cleared by me in the White House. Nolting thought that this gave him [Harkins] an independence of action which was not intended. As he was in Washington, I went over the letter with him word by word, and we made, I believe, some minor changes. Meanwhile I explained all the military jargon in the letter and the way Harkins would interpret it. I promised that in case of any deviation from the text by the military, I would support him if he objected. Then I assured him I'd known Harkins for years and he wasn't the kind that would go hunting on someone else's turf.

Q: Did Nolting and Harkins get along well in fact?

TAYLOR: Yes, yes.

Q: No problems?

TAYLOR: No problems I ever heard of.

WILLIAM G. BRADFORD
Administrative Officer
Saigon (1962-1964)

Administrative Officer
Saigon (1974)

Ambassador William G. Bradford was born in Illinois in 1925. He entered the Foreign Service in 1952. An administrative specialist, he served in Germany, Italy, and Washington before his Saigon assignment (1962-1964). He briefly returned to Saigon as an inspector shortly before its fall. He later served in Africa and was ambassador to Chad. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: In 1962, you went to a very interesting assignment as administrative officer in Saigon.

BRADFORD: There is a definite relation between the two. As I say, Bill [Crockett] had a great deal of respect for my management ability. He was taken with the fact that I had come into the Foreign Service as a regular Foreign Service officer, rather than someone from the management side. When Saigon became vacant, they actually nominated three different officers to go there, all of whom refused because of the war. At that point, one night, on the third refusal, I put a note to Bill. The position was two grades above my personal grade at the time. I said, "If nobody else will go, I'd love to go." So the next day, in Crockett-like fashion, he sent me to Saigon. There was some correspondence with the embassy of why were they sending such a junior officer, and I don't know what the answers were, but the ambassador acquiesced, and I went as the administrative officer to Saigon, a great assignment.

Q: How did you see the situation in Vietnam at the time?

BRADFORD: I think we have to put it in the time frame, which was 1962. I went to the second counterinsurgency class. We were addressed by Bobby Kennedy, who explained to us that we knew all the things the French didn't know, and we would have no trouble winning this war. All we had to do was study the people and all of these good things. By and large, most of us thought we could do it. There wasn't any great doubt about Vietnam at the time.

Q: This was before the great protests in the United States.

BRADFORD: Absolutely.

Q: Really before the military buildup, too.

BRADFORD: It kept increasing when I was there. I was on leave when the Gulf of Tonkin occurred, and then we started the really big buildup. That was about the time I departed.

Q: When you got into Saigon, how did you find the operation of the embassy at that time?

BRADFORD: Actually, the operation of the embassy at that particular point, in the widest terms, was excellent. We had a very, very fine ambassador, Fritz Nolting. He was the ambassador, he was in charge of things, he delegated well. The American military were not running the country in any real sense of the word; he was running it. The embassy itself, from the management standpoint, I think there were some improvements to be made. It was too divided. This is one that I pushed throughout the Crockett era, and even later, was that I felt that management was a tool of the ambassador, and, therefore, a single administrative section was always desirable. We worked towards that and made a great deal of strides. We were taking in part of the military, which was much smaller in those days, for a good many administrative responsibilities and taking in most of the AID responsibilities.

Q: How did this work? There must have been a lot of opposition.

BRADFORD: There was. I found that initially, you could get over most of this opposition by increasing services. We found, at that time, there were certain things the State Department people got administratively that AID people didn't get. Conversely, there were certain things that AID people got, which State Department people didn't get, whether it was the number of air-conditioners per house, or who got a stepladder and who got garbage cans, and so forth. By pushing everything up to the highest common denominator, if AID got stepladders and we got garbage cans, I gave garbage cans to everybody and stepladders to everybody. This increase in services made it palatable, at least for a while. There are built-in problems in it, problems of prerogatives of the AID chief, who, when he has his own AID section, is top man. If he's part of an embassy section, he may be second or third man. They're human and don't care for that.

The big problem in this, a problem that was never completely resolved, is what do you do about the personnel? The State Department people say the AID administrative staff is over-graded. Therefore, if you fold them in, it's unfair to fold them in. There's no way to put them together and cut out people's jobs, unless you take the people in. This was one of the biggest problems.

Q: Were you able to get anywhere with this?

BRADFORD: I think later on, when we come to the African time, we were able to get someplace. I didn't get very far in Saigon, but as I say, we had an excellent ambassador who believed in controlling these things. It was to his advantage, and therefore, he gave me a great deal of support, and we were able to get some of the things done, despite opposition of the staff and the AID director.

Q: How did the events of this period reflect on your work? Were you there in November of 1963?

BRADFORD: Yes, I was there in '63.

Q: This is when Diem was killed.

BRADFORD: Yes, I was there when Diem was killed.

Q: Lodge had taken over by then. From your point of view, could you compare and contrast Lodge, as far as dealing with the administrative work?

BRADFORD: Yes. I have to be careful of this, because dealing with any work was beneath Henry Cabot Lodge. He didn't like to work. (Laughs)

Q: He had that reputation.

BRADFORD: Therefore, administration was something that, "Just please don't bother me with any of that nonsense." I have two or three favorite Lodge stories. One is when he got there, the first thing he did administratively was to have the ambassadorial plate taken off his door and replaced by one that said "Mr. Lodge," because that meant more. That's enough. I did not like Mr. Lodge particularly, nor did I think he was a very good ambassador.

Q: How did this reflect, though? We are looking from a historical and operational point of view. What did this do to you? Did you find that you no longer had the clout to work because he didn't pay attention? Or did somebody else help?

BRADFORD: We had two very good DCMs who were career men, both of whom got hurt by the situation, but both of whom were willing to take the brunt of the punishment and let things go on. It didn't affect administration much, as such, because he was uninterested in it. Therefore, things that had been set as a pattern went on pretty well as that pattern, except for one small field, which was the ambassador and how he was treated. He got so much more and demanded so much more than anybody else, it was difficult.

Q: How about the Vietnamese staff that you had there?

BRADFORD: They were excellent, just incredible. They learned so rapidly, they were so able. One story that I like to recount is that I was there at this time, and then I went back 11 years later. When I was there, we had an emergency generator in the embassy, and to put it in, we had to fly in Filipino help, because the Vietnamese didn't know anything about generators, hadn't had occasion to learn. When I was back 11 years later and was at the embassy, there was a section in the embassy that rebuilt generators, not only for Saigon, but for all the Far East. They were the finest generator workmen in the world, and there was only one expatriate there, and he was only there part-time. In these 11 years, they had learned so much, it was incredible.

Q: There was a rather bad bomb blast. Were you there then?

BRADFORD: No, I was not there at the time of the bombing of the embassy. That was a little after I left.

Q: How did the officers that you were dealing with feel about the events, particularly of November '63, and the overthrow and killing of Diem, his brother, then the coup and the beginning of the rotational governments in Saigon? Did that have any effect on you?

BRADFORD: It made me feel like a great prophet, because I sent the ambassador a paper the next morning, saying this was one of the greatest defeats of American foreign policy in history, and that we would now go through a series of military governments. I think we were all disappointed. We had been disappointed in Diem, but nevertheless, there was a case to be made for Diem and for his government. It was one we had supported for several years, in fact, and thought, maybe falsely, that we were making some progress. I think we all thought that if we were going to get into a military situation, where the military kept changing governments, we were going to be in a very fragile situation that we couldn't do much with.

Q: This is an important time. There was not a sense of exaltation, of, "Now we've gotten rid of this guy. Now let's really get to work." I'm talking about the officer corps of the embassy.

BRADFORD: I'm sure that there were a handful that had been caught up in the Buddhist thing and thought, "This is great. Now we're rid of him," particular the brother and Madame Nhu. By and large, though, I think it was sort of, "This is the situation we face. Where do we go from here?" Neither tremendous depression, although there was some, or elation.

Q: The administrative section often has to deal more with the workings of the government where they're attached than any other one. Did you find any difference? How was it during and after the Diem rule?

BRADFORD: It was more difficult after Diem, because no one knew who was in charge, where they stood, or what their authority was. Under Diem, people were well entrenched, the customs people knew what they could and couldn't do, and so on throughout the government. Afterwards, it was much more difficult. Everybody felt they had to get a clearance from somebody, and it ended up with some general who was either too busy or who didn't know which way to go.

Q: You mentioned that three people of American staff had turned down the job you had before you went there. I can recall in 1969, I was at a reception to meet the new head of the administrative section, and he was supposed to fly in that day. Halfway through the reception, they said he got off the plane, took one look, turned around, and left.

BRADFORD: I know. (Laughs)

Q: Were you having trouble getting competent American staff?

BRADFORD: I think, actually, during the time I was there, this changed. Originally, yes, they were having a lot of problems getting people to go to Vietnam. It was not on the front page of the American papers. It was a place where a war was going on, a lot of shooting going on, and one wondered, "What kind of diplomacy can you conduct in this kind of a war atmosphere?" During the time I was there, I mentioned that the Kennedys got very strongly on board in counterinsurgency, here was a war we were going to win, and it became clear that career-wise, this was a way to get ahead. Sharp, young officers, therefore, decided they wanted to go to Vietnam, rather than not wanting to go to Vietnam.

It was also during the days that you took your family to Vietnam. I had my wife and three children. My father died while I was there, so my mother joined us. My grandmother had lived with us, so my grandmother joined us. So we had four generations of family out there.

Q: So you felt that you were getting a good staff?

BRADFORD: Oh, yes.

Q: How about after our commitment towards Diem? Was there a change?

BRADFORD: Actually, I was there so briefly after the buildup started, that I couldn't really comment on it. The kind of officers that went out were officers who later did very, very well career-wise, so I can't see that they suffered. I think there was a change in the nature of the staff, in that with the buildup, there was suddenly this tremendous upgrading of jobs in the embassy. Jobs that had been held by 03s were all 01s. After all, we had an ambassador and deputy ambassador in those days, unheard of in that situation. In my own job, I was replaced by a very experienced admin man, a good admin man. He came out, and we went over my work for two days, and he said, "You're just the administrative officer." I said, "That's right. That's what my job is." "I don't want to do that. I did that years ago." So I was an 03 at the time, he got an 03 to come out as his deputy, who replaced me. So we had an extra 01 on hand.

Q: You moved from trouble spots. You left Saigon, and then you went to the Congo. It was Congo then, Leopoldville, then it became Zaire.

EDWARD L. ROWNY
Saigon (1962-1965)

Lieutenant General Edward L. Rowny was born in Baltimore and attended West Point from 1937 to 1941. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II including a special assignment to Liberia. He has also served in Vietnam, Tokyo, and Korea and participated in NATO Military Committee and the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks. Lieutenant General Rowny was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Back to Vietnam, early on you got involved with that from 1962 and variously involved up to 1965. Were you getting reports back of disquiet about our involvement there?

ROWNY: I didn't in the early days. There was what we considered a one-sided view of the press. Halberstam and others were writing from Saigon that the Vietnamese and Diem would never be able to succeed, and we shouldn't be backing him. After the assassination of Diem in 1963, everything went downhill. We never recovered from that. Once he was gone, there was no one to rally around.

Some of us who had been in Korea thought it was similar to the events that happened there. Syngman Rhee was unpopular in some circles in the U.S. but America backed him. Our original thought in Vietnam was that we'd better work with Diem. There was, even in those early days, what turned out later to be a very great opposition to our involvement in Vietnam.

Q: It wasn't felt very greatly in those early days.

ROWNY: No, it wasn't.

ROBERT H. MILLER
Deputy Chief, Political Section
Saigon (1962-1965)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1965-1968)

Area Director, Southeast Asia Affairs
Washington, DC (1974-1977)

Robert H. Miller was born in Port Angeles, Washington, in 1927. He graduated from Stanford in 1949 after taking two years out for the Army. He developed his interest in foreign affairs at Stanford. He received his master's degree in international affairs from Harvard. He entered the State Department through a junior management program. He also served in France, Malaysia, and the Ivory Coast. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 23, 1990.

Q: You then go from one place where you are very much involved to another place which certainly was gaining more and more attention. You went to Saigon from 1962 to 1965. What were you doing there?

MILLER: I was the deputy chief of the political section. It was a huge political section at that time -- I think it had 16 or 17 people. I was newly promoted to the old FSO-3, the First Secretary level, and was helping the political counselor manage the work of the section.

Q: What was the situation at the time you arrived in 1962 as you saw it?

MILLER: The guerrilla war, in terms of terrorist incidents, was heating up. This was about a year and a half into the Kennedy Administration. By the time I got there the US Military Advisory Group had been transformed into MACV, Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, and the Advisory contingent had already grown to about 10,000 US military personnel who were advising the Vietnamese armed forces, sometimes under combat conditions, but were not participating in combat. Fritz Nolting was still Ambassador there when I arrived. I had known Fritz as well as Bill Trueheart, the DCM, at NATO in Paris, as I had Mel Manfull, the political counselor.

We were still trying to encourage Diem to broaden his political base in order to compete politically with the Viet Cong internally in South Vietnam. We had little, if any, success in encouraging Diem to do that. But that was the situation. It was a growing guerrilla war. We were also puzzled as to how to give growing support to the South Vietnamese government without breaching the Geneva Accords even though we didn't like the Geneva Accords -- at least John Foster Dulles didn't like them when they were signed in 1954. We were still trying to find ways to abide by their strict limitations in terms of our military assistance and support. We were trying to get Diem to broaden the base of his government. Nobody foresaw the problems that came up in the spring and summer of 1963, namely the Buddhist revolt which ultimately burgeoned into a situation which caused the Kennedy Administration to withdraw its support from the Diem government -- leading to his overthrow and assassination.

Q: What were the feelings among the officers there in the political section?

MILLER: Most of us felt that we were engaged in an important and constructive effort -- and that it was possible to achieve our objective, which was to preserve the right of South Vietnam to determine its own future. And most of us believed that the Diem government was worthy of our support even though it was to say the least, flawed. Most of us believed that (Communist) North Vietnam was committing aggression against South Vietnam and that this was part of Moscow's and Beijing's effort to extend their domination, weaken the "free world" position wherever the opportunity arose. South Vietnam was one such opportunity. When the Buddhist revolt came in May of 1963 and began to grow into something that got out of control, then there were a lot of different views within the mission. There were those who felt we ought to go all the way with Diem. There were those who underestimated what the Buddhist revolt was going to build into. There were those who felt that Diem was not able to cope and the issue became one of should we stay in South Vietnam and help somebody who was not able to help himself or should we not continue our effort there. Of course, the decision was to brush Diem aside and try to continue because the general judgment in Washington was that the stake we had in preventing the communist takeover in South Vietnam was great -- almost greater for us than it was for the South Vietnamese. I think that was the beginning of the controversial aspect of our effort in Vietnam. I mean it was controversial in the press already and domestically it was somewhat controversial, but I think that within the US Government it began to get controversial after the decision was made to pull the rug out from under Diem.

Q: Here you were in the political section looking at Southeast Asia. How did you see the threat to the United States of Diem going and the North Vietnamese winning?

MILLER: I think we were all taken with the domino theory argument -- that all of Southeast Asia, with the exception of Thailand, was newly independent and that a number of Southeast Asian countries had already had their bout with communist insurgencies -- the Philippines, Malaysia and of course while we were there Indonesia was having an increasing problem with internal communists -- not necessarily with insurgency, but nonetheless a threat of a growing communist party. I think the way it looked to us as a government, and to most people in the mission in Saigon -- there were exceptions, there were critics -- was that if South Vietnam went, other countries of Southeast Asia could go as well. Therefore, since no other country besides the United States could help South Vietnam prevent this from happening, this was our job to do. This may seem in 1990 to be a mistaken way of looking at the situation, but I think that was the way most people looked at it at the time -- including most people in Congress, and including many of those who became opponents of the effort.

Q: Things could have happened quite differently had we pulled out at that time. This was not just a made up theory.

MILLER: Well, you know, nobody can rewrite history, but there was a coup attempt in Indonesia in 1965 which failed by a hair. I think what is going on in Cambodia today is a continuation of the historic pressure by Vietnam, communist or non- communist, to dominate its weaker neighbors to its west, which in the long term could put pressure on Thailand. If the great Soviet empire indeed collapsed in 1990, I think we will have a different perspective on that problem than we had in 1962 and '63 or even 1965 or '67 and '68. One of the things that sort of boggles one's mind today is that, if you read the record, one of the reasons the decision was taken in the Kennedy Administration to pull the rug out from under Diem in addition to his apparent inability to deal with his Buddhist crisis, was information that his brother Nhu was putting out feelers with Hanoi. We were convinced that this was not in the US interest. That was an added factor in the decision to pull the rug out from under Diem. How dare they negotiate a compromise of some kind with Hanoi! Today that seems almost unbelievable.

Q: When you arrived at the embassy in the political section you were obviously going out and collecting information, how well did you find yourself in communication and being helped by our American military there and the CIA?

MILLER: We had in the embassy a small group of so-called provincial reporters who were Vietnamese language officers -- a group of 4 or 5 young officers -- who were traveling all over the provinces. They were greatly aided by all of the other elements of the mission -- the military, the CIA, AID, the USIS people -- no question about it. My impression is that we were greatly helped by the military and I hope that the military felt we helped them in terms of giving them political insights into what was going on. We sometimes had different perceptions. I think we in the political section always felt the military over-assessed progress and the military felt that we were always too pessimistic and undermining their effort by suggesting that maybe progress was not as great as they thought. And of course this was one of the terribly difficult things. We developed all these statistical ways of measuring progress, like evaluation systems which were program- directed. You know, the number of fence posts installed, number of privies built or the number of hamlets put behind fences, etc. But none of those statistics captured what really was going on, which was the ability of the VC to come in at night and intimate the peasants behind the fences by lobbing a grenade over the fence, etc. We never really, in our good old American way, were able to capture what the real problems of the insurgency were: which were 1) intimidation by the Viet Cong; 2) a lack of conviction on the part of the non-communist Vietnamese that our side was going to win and 3) that basically the US had replaced the French as, if not a colonial power, a sort of neo-colonial power -- something we never understood or wanted to believe.

Q: How were you seeing the Buddhist revolt?

MILLER: The feeling in the political section was that the situation was getting out of control. On the other hand, there was also a feeling that it was a mistake to withdraw our support from Diem. There was some feeling that if we felt that we couldn't achieve our policy objective with Diem maybe we should liquidate our involvement there. But that from a political standpoint at home didn't seem to be possible. I think that Kennedy probably felt that after the Bay of Pigs fiasco he didn't also want the criticism that he had pulled out of Vietnam which was under such communist threat. In other words, we were sort of caught up in a no-win situation. But it seemed to us that Diem just didn't understand how serious problems were internally in the country because he and his brother acted in a repressive way rather than in a way to try and solve the problems. We were kind of stuck with doing things their way or deciding to get somebody else. And of course that was a disastrous decision.

Q: As far as the political section worked -- Diem-US relations, I assume, was carried on by the US ambassador. Did you have much contact with the rest of the Vietnamese government at various levels?

MILLER: We worked under very great restrictions during the Diem era, because he did not want us to see any opposition figures, he only wanted us to see those who supported him. So we had a lot of contacts at the working level, at the National Assembly and in the government. And we knew a few tame dissidents, people who had spent some time in jail, etc. I suppose the CIA had contacts with the latter as well. I can remember, for example, when there were National Assembly elections in September of 1963, Diem promised Fritz Nolting that he was going to broaden the base of the government and allow more people to run for the Assembly. All the information we were picking up from our contacts showed that it was going to be the same old National Assembly. I remember doing a wrap up report on the preparations for the elections which basically said that there wasn't going to be any more broadening, the same old candidates were appearing and if opposition candidates were allowed to run they certainly wouldn't win. I can remember that Fritz called me up to his office and went over that report with me very carefully because it was so different from what he had been told by Diem. I went over the material with him and he let the report go out, but he kind of shook his head.

Q: What was your impression of Ambassador Nolting -- how he dealt both with the embassy and with the situation?

MILLER: He was a fine human being. He had no background in Southeast Asia -- like a lot of us. He, I think, was convinced that we had to back Diem. Those had been his instructions. We would make a mistake if we didn't. He was very bitter about his experience there and how he was replaced by Lodge. I guess my basic feeling is, and I think in his book he says this too, he should never have gone on home leave in the summer of '63. In other words, he felt this Buddhist revolt was a flash in the pan and he could leave the embassy with Bill Trueheart in charge and, of course, that ruined their personal relationship. I think that Fritz had an impossible job and he probably wasn't flexible enough in seeing what was really happening in South Vietnam. I suppose the Kennedy Administration decided they wanted somebody with a high profile and political moxie and also a Republican to sort of give a bipartisan sheen to the policy and the problem out there and they sent in Henry Cabot Lodge. Anyway, I liked Fritz very much as a human being, but I think he may have made some misjudgments.

Q: What was the difference between Nolting and Trueheart?

MILLER: When Fritz came back after home leave to say goodbye, he was there for a matter of two or three weeks. He felt that our increasingly pessimistic reporting in his absence had misled Washington to deciding to pull the rug out from under Diem -- that we had misled Washington about Diem's ability to govern the country. I think Bill Trueheart was convinced, and most of us in the political section were convinced, that Diem was so isolated from reality that he was not really aware of how bad things were getting in terms of his ability to govern. On the other hand, he was allowing his brother, Nhu, to use actions which were increasingly alienating not just the rank and file of the population, but also members of his own government. The sons and daughters of government bureaucrats and military officers were being rounded up and beaten, etc. because these protest demonstrations were spreading. But Fritz felt that somehow our reporting should have been -- the glass should have been half full rather than half empty. My own feeling was that the embassy was reporting things as they saw it -- that Diem had lost control.

Q: Getting sort of into the internal workings of the embassy -- did you feel at the time Nolting left that you had been under a certain amount of -- the lid had been on and now we can report, or had the situation changed so much that it was a natural evolution?

MILLER: When Lodge came, he was under instructions to determine whether or not we could solve the situation with Diem and if not to encourage the generals around Diem to understand that we were prepared to see a change. Because everybody then understood we were contemplating a change, a lot of different assessments began to appear. General Harkins, who was commanding MACV at the time, was reporting that the war was being won, etc. The embassy was reporting growing unrest and opposition to the Diem government and the body politic. That became the issue for the Kennedy Administration. Which of these reports is correct? The thrust of Lodge's instructions were if we have to do it we are prepared to dump Diem. Therefore, there wasn't the lid on reporting the growing unrest of the political situation. Nevertheless the decision to dump Diem was a very controversial decision even within the political section. There were people who felt that if you did this you didn't know what you were getting in for. There was nobody who had the strength of leadership that Diem did. And even though he may not be doing so well, we would make a great mistake to dump him. Where the truth lies is still very difficult to say. Certainly after Diem went things deteriorated.

Q: What was your impression of Harkins? One gets in reading books and all that Harkins was way over his head in a very complicated situation. From your feeling at the time, did he understand the type of war?

MILLER: My feeling is that neither Harkins nor Westmoreland understood the kind of problem that the US military faced in South Vietnam. My basic bias after all these years is that one of the biggest mistakes we made was to take the war away from the South Vietnamese. They became a subordinate command in their own war and therefore we took away their stake in their own survival. The next question is, "Was it possible to save South Vietnam in any case?", and I don't know the answer to that. On the other hand, I think in a sense everything we did, and I think both Harkins and Westmoreland, and maybe all of us, contributed to reducing the stake of the South Vietnamese in their own survival as a non-communist entity. On the other hand, if you look at Southeast Asia today, we achieved our larger objective -- that of preventing the other dominoes from falling.

Q: What was your impression when Lodge came? How did you and the political section feel about the arrival of Lodge?

MILLER: It was kind of exciting because he was a national personality. Lodge was a highly political animal. I don't think that he was really interested in objective analysis of the situation. He came convinced that we had to get rid of Diem and I am not sure that he thought very much about the consequences. And, of course, he didn't stay around long enough to live with the consequences. He went back to run for President in 1964. He came back at a later time. As I say he was a highly political animal, not analytical in the least, and not cerebral. I suppose he was looking at these things always more in terms of Henry Cabot Lodge and his role in history.

Q: I assume from time to time you would go up and brief Lodge. Did you find him listening, but feel that you were not making a tremendous amount of connection about the nuances of the situation?

MILLER: We would go up and brief him and very often end up listening to him more than briefing him. I had a lot of contact with him, but I don't think I know how to answer that question. I think that he had his mind made up by other sources of information because he came out with two or three people who were his eyes and ears and I am not sure he really listened to the political section very much. He knew what he thought he had to do to carry out his instructions and what was important to him was Henry Cabot Lodge. The reporting did go out. He fired one DCM for thinking that he could run the mission except for those issues he had to take to the ambassador. Lodge didn't like that.

Q: Who was that?

MILLER: David Nes.

But I think he had his own agenda. We didn't feel constrained by that necessarily, but on the other hand neither did I feel that I or my colleagues had great impact on his thinking.

Q: How did the events of October 1963 impact on you?

MILLER: I was generally aware that there was a coup coming. I was given one specific task to do which I guess made me aware of that. It had been determined at some point that we should have contact with Diem's Vice President, Nguyen Ngoc Tho, to express the hope that, if change was coming, it would be in accordance with the constitution. I went over and delivered the message. He, I think, got the message and responded very little. Of course, what happened was that he was swept out when the generals took over. The day of the coup, October 31, I became aware of firing when I was home for lunch. I hopped into my little Volkswagen and went down to the embassy and saw that there was concertina wire spread around at various parts of the city. I had no trouble getting to the embassy, but then it was confirmed that a coup was going on. Basically we were just there to observe, take reports and do what reporting we could. We spent the night there. I can remember being concerned about my family and trying to get through on the phone. I got a constant busy signal all night because my wife had talked to somebody during these proceedings and the phone had not gotten back on the stand correctly. Anyway we watched the final stages of the coup and the attack on the Palace from the roof of the embassy all night long. Once in a while we heard a zing which would cause us all to duck down behind the parapet of the roof. There was a great feeling the next morning of euphoria when it was all over and some feeling of remorse when the news came through that Diem and Nhu had been assassinated. I don't think that anybody, at least on our side, intended that. I gather that Kennedy, himself, was rather shocked at that news.

Q: Did you have problems keeping up with who was in power? I mean, the generals came in very quickly and the situation turned in to what has been described as a revolving door. How were you operating in this very difficult situation?

MILLER: Once the coup took place and the generals came in, everyone was hopeful that the problems that led to the coup, namely the growing unrest and instability in the body politic, would finish and everybody would pull together and get back to fighting the war. Of course that didn't happen. The generals began squabbling among themselves. One of the generals who had been left out of the coup group, General Khanh was pouting and he managed to overthrow the first coup group. He was a disaster. Meanwhile the progress of the war began to deteriorate with the VC gaining ever greater control over the countryside until Thieu and Ky. By then we had long since sent in our own combat troops and had taken over the war for good.

Q: You were there until '65 so you were there during a great deal of the revolving door. Did the reporting sort of move over to the military side?

MILLER: We constantly tried to encourage whoever was in power, usually a general, to get some kind of constitutional base and some kind broadened political base. There were two or three hopeful experiments in that direction, but they didn't last. At this point I would have to delve into the record to be accurate as to why they didn't last, but basically they didn't last I suppose because the South Vietnamese had no experience in a democratic form of government and we kept hoping they could somehow build on it under the pressure of the war. And of course it turned out not to be possible. Then there were all these rivalries among the military. One group would get tired of not being in power and felt it could do better and would toss out those in power and then eventually they would become the target of a third group. Until the thing sort of settled down first with Ky, and then Thieu outmaneuvered Ky and Ky became vice president. Then it settled down for a long time, but by then our own body politic began to get impatient with the problem.

Q: How about within the political section? What was your attitude as you saw this thing happening?

MILLER: I think we all got very frustrated at the games the Vietnamese were playing among themselves. Good, bright eyed, bushy-tailed Americans couldn't understand why the Vietnamese would play all these games with each other instead of fighting the war and achieving the common objective of keeping South Vietnam free from a communist takeover. My considered judgment is that we provided the South Vietnamese with the wherewithal to indulge in the luxury of these kinds of games because basically they knew that if it was going to be won it was going to be won by us. That in the end turned out not to be the case. We finally got tired of it ourselves. But I think the atmosphere in the political section was 1) we were very busy trying to keep up with events, but 2) we all did get very frustrated with the Vietnamese who kept blaming us for a lot of things and yet were not able to get their own act together to run a government and to prosecute a war in the way that we thought was in their interests to do.

Q: Were any of you sort of thinking "Well, okay if this doesn't work what will happen"? Did you think the equation within Southeast Asia was changing? Was the domino situation still uppermost in your mind?

MILLER: Yes. At least, for me personally, until I got home and became director of the Vietnam Desk in 1965. I think we were so absorbed by developments in Vietnam that we probably didn't think a great deal about the impact elsewhere in Southeast Asia, other than to be concerned that if Vietnam went the rest of Southeast Asia would be in danger.

I think that my own doubts really didn't set in until I was caught up in the war in Washington as head of the Vietnam Desk and saw the growing protests here. I got caught up with the atmosphere here with LBJ trying to develop negotiating positions and sending out feelers, etc. We tried bombing pauses to try to encourage negotiations. I was doing a lot of public speaking, explaining our Vietnam policy in the increasingly strident atmosphere in this country between hawks and doves. I think that was where my own doubts about how this was all going to come out and whether it was all worth it in terms of US interests and costs began to building up. But while I was in Vietnam, no, we were frustrated with the Vietnamese but I think we began to feel that Thieu and Ky were beginning to get things back under control -- at the beginning of their rule.

Q: Were you there when General Maxwell Taylor came out?

MILLER: Yes.

Q: What was the impression when he came out? It turned out to be another one of those interim things, but did...?

MILLER: I didn't feel that Max Taylor, either, was the right man for that job. Again, a lot of things were going on that the political section, or at least this person who was the number two in the political section, wasn't privy to. Taylor, if you read all the books since then, including the Pentagon Papers, resisted the idea of US combat forces without consultations with the Vietnamese. He got very frustrated with the internal political revolving door governments and was very imperious with the Vietnamese generals. They resented that and at one point tried to get him recalled. I suppose the role of any US ambassador at that point would have been a very tough one. I think that Taylor had a military rather than diplomatic approach in terms of getting the Vietnamese to do things that we wanted to see them do. He tended to be too imperious, I think.

Q: You left there in 1965 and came back to be what, the director of...

MILLER: The Vietnam Working Group.

Q: Which was essentially the Vietnam Desk. What were your functions there?

MILLER: I would say that the function of the Vietnam Working Group was to keep on top of daily developments in Vietnam so that we could brief our superiors, handle queries from the public, and make analyses of the internal political situation in South Vietnam. In other words, we dealt with the mass of routine problems in terms of our involvement in Vietnam without really getting involved in the policy process.

There was a lot going on in the policy process that we were not privy to. I can cite one example. I was asked by my bosses one day to brief a congressman about a certain peace initiative which I knew absolutely nothing about. That was exactly why I was sent up to brief him -- because I knew nothing about it. He could tell within two minutes that I didn't know what I was talking about. He said, "Mr. Miller, I thought that you were an expert on Vietnam, yet you obviously don't know and can't give me the information that I need." "Mr. Congressman," I said, "In the US government today there are many levels of expertise on Vietnam." He said, "Well, you go back and tell Secretary Rusk that I am leaving for my constituency this afternoon and unless he tells me what is going on with respect to this peace initiative, I will no longer be able to support him." I conveyed that message and it got to the Secretary very quickly. I understand he did call the Congressman, and the Congressman stayed on the reservation. We were constantly dealing with this kind of problem where we didn't really know what the Administration was doing, either on the negotiating front or, to some extent, on the internal front as well. So we were really managing the store and doing the routine business and briefing governors, giving speeches -- I went over to brief the NATO Council on what was going on in Vietnam. Just doing the routine business made for very long work weeks.

Q: Obviously this is the period of time when the questioning was getting greater and greater. I suppose in some ways for the first time you were up against the real challenges of not just being involved but also getting outside... How was this affecting you?

MILLER: I was getting very tired. Physically and emotionally it was an exhausting job. I guess that I was rapidly being convinced that we ought to find a way to negotiate an end to it. I was relieved when LBJ [actually by then I had gone off to the Imperial Defence College in London] found a formula for stopping the bombing in the North and getting involved in negotiations with the North Vietnamese. This led to the cessation of the bombing, and paved the way to negotiating some kind of solution which, hopefully, would allow us to withdraw.

Q: Did you get a feeling of where was the driving force between our continued military effort and going all out in Vietnam? Was this coming from the White House, or Rusk? Were their different voices, some saying let's negotiate and others saying....?

MILLER: I didn't have much contact even as director of the Vietnam Working Group at the time with the top levels of the Department or the White House, but it is my understanding from everything I have read and heard that basically LBJ was determined to be victorious, and victorious in a way that would not endanger his Great Society goals. Dean Rusk was pretty much with him on that and it was McNamara who began to have serious doubt. There were plenty of people who had doubts. George Ball, Dean Rusk's deputy, was always trying to argue the other side and saying we ought to liquidate this commitment because we were in a no-win situation. He felt our objectives were wrong. There were plenty of people within the Administration and outside of Administration, and certainly growing numbers on the Hill who were trying to persuade the U.S. government to turn around. I think it was the President, himself, who found it very difficult to turn around. The final blow, the straw that broke the camel's back, was Westmoreland's request in March 1967 for 125,000 more troops in addition to the half million he already had in order to finish the job. The Pentagon said it couldn't do that without going to full mobilization.

Q: Did you have any problems keeping your officers on the Vietnam Working Group on the reservation?

MILLER: No, I don't recall that. Whatever their personal views were...no, I think they were all disciplined people.

Q: You were in EA from 1974-1977. What were your responsibilities?

MILLER: I was responsible primarily for Southeast Asia.

Q: Which included what?

MILLER: For the political and politico-military developments of Southeast Asia which included the Philippines through Burma, south of China and down to and including Indonesia.

Q: Australia?

MILLER: No. Australia and New Zealand and even Papua New Guinea were outside of Southeast Asia. They were dealt with by someone dealing with the South Pacific. Actually in my day the economic deputy had responsibility for Australia and New Zealand and the South Pacific.

Q: Phil Habib, of course, has been around for a long time as one of our ace trouble shooters. How did you find him?

MILLER: I am very high on Phil. He is a unique combination of street fighter and integrity. He could be as irritating as hell, very rough, but underneath he had a heart as big as a watermelon. He was a great guy to work for. I really loved working for him. When I got into that job, 99 1/2 percent of it was the final stages of Vietnam and Cambodia. In fact, I was absolutely stunned when I got into the job about September of '74 to find that we were actually counting the days of supply of ammunition for the non-communist forces in Cambodia, and whether we would be able to provide ammunition with AID monies we had. And of course the Congress was getting more and more restive about providing any money at all. They stopped the AID money and the ammunition stopped as well. All of this came to its end within 6 months in Cambodia and 7 months in Vietnam. Then we began planning for the evacuation of the mission in Vietnam and were concerned about the evacuation of the Vietnamese who had been associated with our effort. So it was a very busy period. When we got through that stage, we got involved with refugee programs and worrying about what was our policy in Southeast Asia post- Vietnam. That was an interesting period.

Q: When the AID money stopped was it the general feeling that for all practical purposes we had written Vietnam and Cambodia off?

MILLER: There was a sense in the Administration that it was not writing Vietnam and Cambodia off; that if anybody was writing them off it was the Congress, the Democratically controlled Congress. But the Congress got to the point where it was determined not to provide any more aid even if the consequences were dire -- namely, even if the country went under. I think they had gotten to the point where they thought it had done so much damage to our society that this was the lesser of evils. But the Administration, to the very end, wanted to make sure that if this happened it was clearly as a result of a Democratic Congress and not as a result of the Administration.

Q: How did you feel about the reporting that was coming out of Vietnam under Graham Martin? This has been a very controversial thing.

MILLER: There is no doubt in my mind based on a visit I made to Saigon in October 1974 that Graham Martin ran the most tightly controlled embassy of any I have ever had any association with. I attended, for example, a country meeting while I was there. Nobody was allowed to speak at that meeting if it hadn't been programmed with the Ambassador before hand. That is not the answer to your question. But I am not sure I can answer the question the way you want, namely that reporting was managed or distorted. Graham Martin's modus operandi, as far as I could figure out, was that only he had access to the full range of information. He made sure that only he had access to all that information. He would not let information be generally broadcast. Therefore, only he had the full picture and could make judgments about what was really going on. If Joe Blow in the political section reported that this was the situation, Graham Martin would say that that was not the situation at all because, "I happen to know things that you don't know about it." Did that distort the picture? It probably did.

Q: When you were back getting these reports, did you have the feeling that we were almost out of it?

MILLER: As I recall our estimate in the spring of 1975 was that the situation had deteriorated to the extent that the North Vietnamese were likely to capture I Corps and most of II Corps.

Q: These were to the north of Saigon?

MILLER: Yes, that's right. But that III Corps around Saigon and IV Corps could be held. But that was on the assumption that we would continue to provide aid. In a sense the reporting from Saigon was important as supporting or undermining those assessments. As soon as it became clear that the Congress was not about to provide any additional aid, all bets were off. Then we began really concentrating on how to save our people.

Q: Was there a problem with Graham Martin in trying to get this evacuation going?

MILLER: Martin's legitimate concern was not to contribute to the collapse. He was concerned that if we gave signs we were starting to evacuate our people it would show the Vietnamese that we were convinced it was all over and they would, therefore, stop fighting. He was also concerned that if we started evacuating Americans our South Vietnamese allies could in effect turn on us and start shooting down our evacuation planes out of bitterness that we were bugging out. So he had a lot of legitimate concerns about the safety of Americans and about trying to prevent having American actions contribute to the collapse in South Vietnamese. It got to the point where he had to be ordered to prepare for evacuation by providing us with the information we needed in order to organize the logistic support to get people out. Washington had to sit pretty hard on him to get him to do that. Then he had, I think, an idea that he might stay behind and somehow negotiate through the transition. He was ordered not to do that but to get out on at least the last plane. He was always a curmudgeon and he was curmudgeonly until the very end. Then I think he was concerned that he was somehow going to be made a scapegoat for who lost Vietnam. He wanted to have his record clear so he could defend himself. But, to the credit of Nixon and Kissinger, no one was looking for a scapegoat at that point unless they were wanting to blame the Congress for contributing to the final collapse.

Q: I might point out since we are putting this on the record that evacuating Americans in any situation is always a very tricky thing. If there is civil disorder and you say don't come in that can be a body blow or an insult or what ever you want to call it -- a political act, not a minor little matter.

MILLER: That is what I wanted to say -- that Graham Martin had some legitimate and difficult concerns that he was trying to deal with. One, the collapse of the government that we had been supporting for so many years, two, the safety of Americans. And how to manage all of this without some massive tragedy taking place.

Q: How did Kissinger get along with Habib?

MILLER: He liked Habib, although I have heard them shout at each other. I think he felt Habib was one of the few career officers that was worthy of Henry Kissinger. He trusted Habib and felt that he was a disciplined career officer who would carry out instructions with class.

Q: Going back to the Vietnam and Cambodia when we were pulling out in the spring of 1975, before it actually happened what was the prognosis of the future of Vietnam and Cambodia?

MILLER: Our assessment, and this was an operational assessment, not a long term assessment, was that probably the Mekong Delta which was the most populous part of South Vietnam could be held indefinitely, provided we were willing to continue aid. My recollection is that we were less concerned about Cambodia, although Cambodia being next to Thailand, with which we have an ongoing security commitment was of concern. But our principal concern was whether or not the southern part of South Vietnam could be held.

Q: When it became apparent that it was really going to go, what did we think? Did we think Vietnam was going to be a blood bath?

MILLER: There was concern about that and therefore there was concern that we provide a lot of shipping to allow Vietnamese who were trying to escape a blood bath to get away and save themselves. So we did have a lot of ships positioned off the coast. We were concerned about a blood bath. We were certainly concerned that those who were associated with the joint US-South Vietnamese effort were very much in danger if they stayed behind. And we know that many who did stay behind or couldn't get out got put into re-education camps and were treated very badly for a long time.

Q: Were you able to do any coordinating beforehand about what to do with refugees?

MILLER: Yes, in addition to planning for evacuation, we began to plan how to handle up to a million Vietnamese refugees and it very quickly became apparent that this was a job too big for the East Asian Bureau because so many domestic US agencies were involved in terms of setting up camps, etc. So very early in the game an interagency task force was established as an adjunct to the Operation Center which plugged into the White House and into domestic agencies and also voluntary agencies who were called upon to provide clothing, shelter, organize family sponsorships, etc. This effort was underway pretty quickly after the collapse if it wasn't started before the collapse. Julia Taft was named as the first permanent head of the task force. She was excellent -- a real mover and shaker. She had people like Bob Keeley who had come out of Cambodia, and Frank Wisner, who had come out of Vietnam as her senior deputies and they were plugging into all the agencies and we were getting appropriations to be devoted to this. What the legal situation -- getting them into the country -- was I don't recall. We set up camps around the country and proceeded to get voluntary agencies to find sponsors for refugees. It became a very major effort.

Q: What about Cambodia?

MILLER: Well, Cambodia was important, but secondary to Vietnam. It was kind of Vietnam's flank. I visited Cambodia in 1974 while on a trip to Vietnam and remember coming back feeling pretty good about South Vietnam but that Cambodia was really on the ragged edge if it couldn't get ammunition from us. My recollection is that we really focused much more on what would happen to Vietnam than we did on Cambodia, because Vietnam was the prize really. Cambodia was important but really secondary to Vietnam. It was clear that Cambodia was going to collapse sooner than South Vietnamese would collapse. I think what we overlooked with respect to South Vietnam was the psychological impact on the South Vietnamese regime and people when they finally realized that the Congress wasn't going to provide any more aid; the place then collapsed like a house of cards.

Q: Cambodia collapsed, South Vietnam collapsed, what did your organization do then?

MILLER: We continued to deal with the refugee problems although the basic action responsibility had gone to the task force. We had a fairly immediate problem with Thailand because we had about 40,000 troops there, mostly supporting our military operations in Vietnam. The question was, would they stay or go? We had an negotiation with the Thai where we ended up taking out all the troops except for the military attaché and military assistance group. We would have preferred to leave a small residue of people there, about 3,000, but we couldn't get agreement with the Thai on that. The Thai were very sensitive, once we failed in Vietnam, and did not want to irritate the North Vietnamese anymore than necessary. It was a fairly quick negotiation.

And then we began to try and think further ahead about what our policy should be toward Southeast Asia in the aftermath of Vietnam. In the East Asian Bureau, we were anxious that the U.S. government not make any rash decisions to "turn tail" and ignore Southeast Asia. We spent some time on policy papers and thinking about our relations with the new regional organization - the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), which includes the Philippines, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia and now Brunei. So a lot of our attention was focused on how to preserve a constructive relationship with that remainder of Southeast Asia.

There was another set of problems we were dealing with -- residue problems concerning Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. One, would we maintain an embassy in Laos, and we finally did, at the Chargé level; two, we imposed trade and finance embargoes on Vietnam and Cambodia; and three, we had to testify before the Congress on a number of issues. There were many Congressmen who felt we had made a mistake in imposing the embargoes. I testified on our rationale on imposing these embargoes. Then there were people who were pressing us to provide humanitarian aid to Vietnam and Cambodia. That was a policy decision that Kissinger had to make. The issue was work-intensive because he wanted to look at every request, every Band-Aid, etc. that humanitarian agencies wanted to send to Vietnam. It was a busy post-Vietnam period.

Q: While you were there did you see any possibility of developing relations with the new Vietnamese government?

MILLER: When the Carter Administration came in, which was shortly before I left, they would have developed relations with Vietnam very quickly if it hadn't been for Hanoi's gluttony in insisting on the alleged 3 1/2 billion dollars in aid that Nixon had "promised them" for signing the Paris Agreements. When Hanoi insisted on getting its 3 1/2 billion as a price of diplomatic relations, even the Carter Administration, which was eager to overcome hatreds and tensions of the Vietnam era, could not agree to that demand. I suppose you could say that Hanoi outsmarted itself in that regard. So there was a point when relations could have been quickly established with no conditions attached, but the Vietnamese attached such impossible conditions that it just fell apart.

Q: How did you view the role of China, the People's Republic of China? The rationale for our being in Vietnam for a long time was that we wanted to keep the communist Chinese out. As the Vietnam war wore down did we see China becoming a non problem in the area?

MILLER: In my view, we over-interpreted the Sino-Soviet bloc as a monolith and in doing so we almost made the Sino-Soviet bloc a self-fulfilling prophecy. The more I think about this question the more I am convinced, with the great benefit of hindsight, that the first strategic error was made by the Truman Administration in allowing General MacArthur to go to the Yalu in Korea. This triggered a major Chinese military confrontation with US forces and made China an adversary twenty years beyond what might have otherwise been the case. If you read the record, after the fall of China in 1949 there was consideration given to nearly reconciliation with China; there even was some consideration of this after the Korean War during the Eisenhower/Dulles era. But the fact that the Chinese had become military enemies of ours in the Korean War, I think, so skewed our perception of this Sino-Soviet bloc that we didn't exploit the tensions and potential tensions between Moscow and Beijing. Had we done so, we might have been able to put the problem of Vietnam into a much more limited perspective. We may have done the same kind of things and made a lot of the same kind of mistakes. But if we had done it as a problem limited to Vietnam, rather than making of Vietnam the front line between communism and the free world, we might have avoided some of the mistakes that we made. It might not have become such a vital interest to us that we felt it was at the time.

LEONARDO NEHER
Commercial Officer
Saigon (1962-1964)

Leonardo Neher was born in Ohio in 1922. He received a BA in 1948 from Green State University and a MA from the University of Chicago in 1952. From 1943 to 1946, he served in the U.S. Army overseas. He joined the State Department in 1954 and his overseas posts included Morocco, Vietnam, Syria, Zaire, Chad, Dominican Republic, and Burkina Faso. He was interviewed by Charles Kennedy on October 18th 1989.

Q: Let's move on then to your next assignment. You went to Saigon and worked with what could only be called interesting times. You were there from '62 to '64, which covers basically probably the most critical period of the time there. Could you explain how the assignment came? What you were doing?

NEHER: It came unexpectedly. The cable came and said, "You're assigned as Commercial Officer to the Embassy in Saigon by way of the Mid-Career course." Did you go through that yourself?

Q: No, I never did.

NEHER: It was very much like the Senior Seminar but aimed at mid-career people. The quality of the speakers, and presentations, was exactly the same. They were the leading sociologists, and journalists, editors, politicians, Ambassadors from foreign countries, academicians and politicians. The format was very much the same. They'd come and they'd talk for a couple of hours in the morning, and then we'd take them out to lunch, with an ad-hoc committee as the host, allowing us to continue the conversation. It was very nicely done, three or four months, as I recall. But the Saigon assignment came because I had had, in Tangier, really very little to do. Then, when a Department of Commerce trade mission came through I had a perfect program for them. I had it laid on just right. I had the lists of all the people who would be in the group discussion with them, and I had the recommended languages to speak. The reason for this excellence was that I had plenty of time and very little to do. I could give it all the energy and time it needed.

Q: This is one of the little tricks of the trade. Talk to the person who has time and can really set things up, and give a much greater and better impression than somebody who is so busy they can't spend the time.

NEHER: And unfortunately for me, I made such a good impression that the Department of Commerce grabbed onto me and wouldn't let me go. So they got me for Commercial Officer in Saigon. You can imagine what commercial affairs were like in Saigon at the time, when the Diem government was falling, there were coups and demonstrations, Buddhist monks self-immolating, changes of Ambassadors, the CIA everywhere, terrorism attacks. It wasn't the right place to be. It may have been the right place to be, but it was the wrong job.

Q: What did you think about going there? I mean to Saigon at the time, '62?

NEHER: I welcomed it because my purpose, again, was to see the world. And if you've been in Turkey your first assignment doing consular affairs, and then you go to Morocco and do economic affairs -- and in the second two years in Morocco I did economic and political Affairs - - then you're going to go to the Far East and do commercial affairs, not bad. I didn't care much for commercial affairs, but it was the Far East so I welcomed it because it would allow me to see more of the world.

Q: What was your view of the situation in Saigon? This is '62, before you went. What did you think about it. What were you getting from your colleagues?

NEHER: Well, you know everybody now is saying, "I was always opposed to the U.S....," but, in fact, I was. I was very much opposed to the U.S. approach to Vietnam, to the current assessment of the U. S. interest there, and the kind of investment we should put in to protect that interest. I thought it should be proportionate. I argued as much as I could against direct and open involvement in Vietnam. The last dinner...I guess it was when Bill Trueheart was leaving, we had a dinner at the home of head the head Economic Section, and I remember arguing vociferously there that we really didn't understand the problem, that the Vietnamese understood it better than we, that we didn't have an important stake in the country. One of the reasons probably...well, I'm not sure it's a reason, whether it was a cause, or an effect, but because I was fluent in French, having majored in French as an undergraduate, I had the literary background as well as the conversational, I had a number of friends in the French community that I think other people in our Embassy didn't have. Some of them were cooperants, somewhat like our Peace Corps volunteers. They were people who were serving as teachers, social workers, and so forth as an alternative to military service. I saw many of them, and both their immersion in Vietnamese life and their consciousness of the French military failure, convinced them that our efforts were destined to fail. Some of that certainly rubbed off on me. But rationally I really could not see an outcome to that involvement that would satisfy the American government, American planners, the military, the political leaders at home, and the American people. Because there was no clear agreement, as far as I could see at the time, on what the goals were. If it was democracy and freedom of choice in Vietnam, what were we doing with Nhu and Diem? I mean his family didn't have any commitment to democracy at all. And if it was stopping monolithic communism, well, it was not monolithic at that time. China and the Soviets were very much at odds.

We had one young officer there in the Embassy, Bill Beachner, whose job was reporting on north-south relations. And nobody wanted to read what he was writing, but it was good stuff. He was not an imposing person. I think he didn't have the family and education, an elitist kind of background that most of the other young officers had. Most of them were Ivy Leaguers from all the right families, and so he was not one of the "in" people. But he kept looking at the tensions between North Vietnam and China, for example, and the traditional animosity that continued to exist. Nobody wanted to hear that. I mean, you had to talk about communism, and you had to lump together China and the Soviet Union, and North Vietnam, and not look for nuances at all. Not look for tensions or changes. And once you had the military there, all those not aligned with the government of Vietnam became simply "Charlies," short for Viet Cong.

Q: How did you find the atmosphere in the Embassy as far as the relationship between the officers? We have a large Political Section and were they pretty much unanimous, on how they felt on the situation?

NEHER: The new officers coming in, the young ones coming in, who had been trained in the language, and who were going to go out and work in or with the provinces -- although we didn't have any CORDS at the time, or any U.S. structure in the countryside, were reporting back to Saigon that there were problems. They were not happy with military assessments of one kind and another, with the statements that supported our effort and were uncritical. They were quite critical, but the top levels in Saigon had to reflect the policy emanating from the White House. And that policy, elaborated by the White House, the Pentagon and the CIA, and by very hard liners at the top in the State Department, and supported by strong Congressional interest, was very hard line. It's a little like the people now who are shouting about Noriega.

Q: You're thinking about the dictator in Panama.

NEHER: That's right. You have one enemy, let's get rid of him. You can't even ask at this time, suppose we had put our forces in there, and they had met the full Panamanian army, and you had a war. You can't even ask it. You have to give Jesse Helms honor and respect even though he's completely nuts on this issue.

Q: This is the Senator from North Carolina who is extreme right -- who is continuing mini crises with Panama should we intervene and oust this dictator or not?

NEHER: At any rate, at that time there was no way to find an audience for the observations that Beachner was writing. Nobody wanted to sit down and do thoughtful analysis, looking at the forces in play and then recommend where to put our efforts and our resources in order to improve our prospects. We were going to solve the problem. We were prepared to force a solution on Vietnam. We were going to solve the problem by calling in the military. But with the military, who have to distinguish between friend and foe, all nuances would be lost. It would now be us and them. And that was an oversimplification that would not allow for thoughtful analysis and indicate diplomatic means to deal with the problem.

Q: Did you have any contact with the American military at the mid-level or something? What were they thinking about?

NEHER: Not very much. I did have one colonel -- colonel or lieutenant colonel, I think he was a full colonel -- who was a little like John Vann. I didn't know Vann, but my colonel was a little like that. He was out in the boonies all the time, had candy in his pockets for the kids, and he knew them by name in some of the villages. Did you read Vann's...

Q: Yes. A book called A Bright and Shining Lie.

NEHER: A Bright and Shining Lie, John Vann. This colonel's attitude was very much like Vann's was at the outset. He saw the complexity of the problems, the ambivalence of our goals, and was skeptical about the ability of a military force to accomplish very much. At that time we had no combat troops in Vietnam. We had 17,500 advisors who helped with planning, training and who accompanied Vietnamese troops into the field. Another military contact was my own brother-in-law, well, the brother of my brother-in-law. He came out as a young Captain, as an advisor on his first tour, while I was there. He came back later on at least once occasion as a commander of a unit there, and finished his career as a full colonel. When he was in Saigon he stayed with me, so we had a lot of good talk about the military operations. He, too, was skeptical about the effectiveness of the military's role in the conflict.

Q: Just trying to get a little of the atmosphere. Say the younger officers trained in Vietnamese affairs, were sitting around saying "Sam has to go," or something like this. Or were they saying, "If Diem goes, what happens after this?" obviously speaking before November 1963.

NEHER: The loudest voices were those echoing the official policy of the U.S., taking a hard line in support of more vigorous U.S. involvement. Henry Cabot Lodge came to replace Frederick Nolting just before the coup against Diem, in the summer of 1963, and he came with a mandate from President Kennedy to do something, or so it seemed to me. You know, get the show on the road. Tell me what you need. At that point the people who moved to the top and were closest to the Ambassador's ear, were those who were saying, "Yes, damn right, right on, let's go." I remember hearing at one of Lodge's first staff meetings an embassy officer saying, "Give us 50,000 Green Berets, and we'll clean up this mess." And those who said such things got the applause. Not literally applause, of course, but that was the "right" thing to say.

Q: That was the Kennedy thrust. Special forces were the answer to really everything.

NEHER: And another expression that I heard there that I'll never forget, was when we were talking about dependents, whether they should stay or be evacuated. One of our embassy officers in the meeting said they should go. "We've got to clear the decks for action." That, it seemed to me, was what the U.S. leaders, both at home and in the embassy, wanted to hear. What they didn't seem, to want to hear was, "Yes, but...." The speaker might not be invited to the next meeting. I was duty officer one Saturday when the Embassy was preparing its hottest, most comprehensive report, the weekly status report when we got a cable, probably flash or NIACT, to change the title of the report from that to the weekly progress report. I often joke that that was the turning point in the war.

Q: This gives the...

NEHER: The wave was rolling and it was going to go its course and I don't think these young officers who may have had doubts about the wisdom of that policy, or the possible success of it, were heard very much. And they didn't have much success in getting their doubts conveyed to decision makers.

Q: What about the CIA? Again, this as an unclassified interview. Did you find that the CIA had any particular influence in the discipline, in the atmosphere of the place that you were aware of from your own perspective?

NEHER: I knew a number of the CIA people very well, and went to parties with them where I was sometimes one of the very few non-CIA people at the parties. They were gung-ho because they were having the time of their lives. They had resources, they had everything they wanted; they had access to Ngo Dinh Diem and, especially, to his brother Ngo Dinh Nhu, and to the family. They didn't need the Embassy. They were doing a lot of things that nobody really needed to know about, and they were really having a ball. They were pilots doing air drops and rescues of one kind and another in Vietnam and the neighboring countries; they were under covers as varied as film and drama producers and industrial salesmen; they were trainers, weapons experts, merchants. Theirs was entirely an operational role, not an analytical one, as far as I knew. They had people on the payroll, agents they were running. They had unbelievable funds. Only one of them, whom I knew quite well, was given to much doubt about the wisdom of the involvement. The others were not thinking about doubt so much. I think maybe at higher levels they were, but at the lower levels they were in a full court press. That was not a time to be thinking about anything except the game. That's what they thought about.

Q: How about...did you have much contact with the Vietnamese at the time -- government or otherwise?

NEHER: Not so much with government, but socially very good contact with Vietnamese. That is, professional people, lawyers, doctors, scientists. I had very good contact with them.

Q: What was your impression? Did you feel that we were sustaining an elite, or did you feel this was a group dedicated to building a nation, or how did you feel about that?

NEHER: I'm not sure I remember how I felt. I'm certain I must have had pretty clear feelings about it, but looking back on the individuals that I knew, I generally liked them as individuals, they were very meritorious people. I respected and admired Vietnamese on the professional and social levels. I think that was the feeling I'm searching for, not so much, can these people maintain an independent country? are they the ones for whom the government should take action? is this where the future of the country lies? I don't know. I really don't remember what I thought about it to be perfectly candid.

Q: I was in Saigon five years later, and I don't think it really was a relief. There they were and this is a nice people with whom we were dealing. Let's come to how did you see the events -- it was November of '63 wasn't it? Again from your perspective.

NEHER: November was the assassination of Kennedy.

Q: I mean October of '63. How did you see this at the time, I mean the situation just prior to it within the Embassy, and afterwards.

NEHER: Well, having very early in my tour of duty there I thought that we really didn't know what we were doing in the country, and that we were in fact replacing Vietnamese judgments, analysis, thinking and programs with our own. We wanted Vietnamese officials who would be cooperative with us, officials who would say "yes" instead of "no". It was my understanding that the overthrow of Ngo Dinh Diem signaled that an impatient U.S. was going to push recalcitrant Vietnamese out of the way and get in and do the job by itself. It was my impression that we'd just lost control of it entirely. Now, of course, we still didn't have military forces in the country, and the debate was raging at the time as to whether we should and, if so, how many, what types, how soon, and where. Big Minh had been in power only a short time before he was overthrown by Nguyen Khan, and not long after that Cao and Ky came on the scene. I had certainly not been unhappy to see Diem and his very authoritarian family, including his brothers and Madame Nhu, to leave the scene. I wasn't happy to see that they had been killed in a coup that was, if not sponsored by us, at least condoned by us -- I mean, encouraged. I think it was inevitable they were to go. But I had seen enough of Vietnam by this time and decided that I would leave at the first opportunity.

Q: Just one thing. How about the American community? I assume there was an American Chamber of Commerce?

NEHER: No.

Q: Because when I was there five years later there was a very active American Chamber of Commerce. So American commercial interests were sort of minor?

NEHER: Yes. They were, or they were being handled at a level other than mine. For example, some of the key people, the representative of PanAm, had direct access to the Ambassador. And the big trading companies, those people knew the Ambassador and they didn't even pass through the Commercial Section in the Embassy. If they had a problem they discussed it directly with the Ambassador, and very often if there was any kind of political intervention necessary, or pressure to bring on somebody, or an interest to defend, very often it was defended elsewhere in the embassy or the huge aid mission, and I didn't even hear about it.

Q: One of the things, at least during the time was, that there were all sorts of reasons put forward why we were in Vietnam in all of this. We kept changing our stance. But from the far left, a sort of democracy interpretation, at least at one time it was, that we were in there because -- I think it was tungsten -- Vietnam as a source of important material, or something. So I'd like to ask you as a Commercial Officer in the Economic Section, did we have much of a strategic or economic interest in Vietnam?

NEHER: None that I could see at all. We had very little activity there. Most of the activity had to do with the importation of goods paid for with American aid -- materials of one kind or another, supplies, food, and so forth. There was a lot of big business being done, but most of it was under our own commercial import program run by AID.

Q: That was so, I mean we were paying for imports so as a practical measure, our interest in the area, your rather important viewpoint had nothing to do with the economics of the place.

NEHER: I would dismiss out of hand any thought that even a small part of our motivation for being there had to do with protection of commercial, or financial, or industrial interests. It did not at all. I remember one amusing event there. I got a visit of somebody from one of the clothing manufacturers in the United States. He'd come to the Commercial Section because his company, the manufacturer of Arrow shirts, was thinking of filing a suit against a local Chinese shirt manufacturer. The Chinese manufacturer was producing a similar dress shirt, and I went out and bought one as part of my little investigation. The name was ALLOW and running through the logo was an arrow. The Arrow shirt representative said "This Chinese is selling Allow shirts. So when you go into a place and you ask for an Allow shirt, that's what you get. You get his instead of ours." I advised him to forget the case. How was an attorney going to enunciate and differentiate "allow" and "arrow" in a courtroom where nobody could tell the difference.

WILLIAM R. TYLER
Washington, DC (1962-1965)

Chief of Mission
The Hague, The Netherlands (1965-1969)

William R. Tyler was born to American parents in France in 1910. He received both his undergraduate and graduate degrees from Oxford and Harvard University respectively. He joined the Foreign Service in 1945 and worked in the Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs for three years. His subsequent assignments mostly dealt with European affairs. He served as ambassador to The Netherlands in the 1960's.

Q: I'm skipping around a bit, but I would like to go back to the problem of Vietnam, which was boiling up, of course, both during Kennedy and the Johnson Administration, and the impact on Europe. I wonder if you could speak on it?

TYLER: I can wrap that up very quickly. I, through my wartime experiences, came to be on very friendly terms with General -- later Marshal de Lattre de Tassigny, and he used to bend my ear on Vietnam. I saw him just a day or two before his death in 1952.

Q: He had been sent out to Vietnam earlier for a while when the French were in Hanoi.

TYLER: But also, he went out again as military commander. He asked to see me, and I didn't realize then that he knew he was dying. He died within a few days after we saw each other. He talked to me at some length, saying, "The last thing I have to tell you, you are going to get bogged down. Don't get involved with a large territorial military force in Vietnam. You won't be able to come out of it." And he said, "With your massive organization and military power, it's not possible for you to fight the kind of war necessary to achieve a military solution in Vietnam."

Q: In dealing with Vietnam, in the first place, as the Assistant Secretary, you must have been tasked with selling the need for us to be there.

TYLER: Yes.

Q: But the European governments, for the most part, didn't want to see more, not out of theory, but, basically, they saw . . .

TYLER: A dilution of the American . . .

Q: Dilution of American power. Actually, we were taking arms from Europe.

TYLER: We were squandering our military effort.

Q: Did you find it difficult . . .

TYLER: Very.

Q: . . . to sell the . . .

TYLER: Impossible. I went on selling, but nobody was buying.

Q: Was this a dual thing? Was Assistant Secretary Tyler sold on this, or were you selling it because you were a good soldier?

TYLER: Because I was a good soldier. I can't say I foresaw how it would end, but I feared that it would end badly for us. It was difficult to be giving talks to groups, and to sound convinced and optimistic. However I did my best. I would invite young students to come and talk with me about Vietnam, which was about as popular as finding a skunk in your bedroom. I talked in Rotterdam and Amsterdam and in The Hague, and got nowhere, because people were just firmly convinced that things were already pretty bad. Well, after all, an ambassador isn't only there to give out good news and take popular positions. When Clark Clifford came over . . .

Q: He was Secretary of Defense at that point?

TYLER: Yes, then he was at CIA afterwards for a short time. But he and Mrs. Clifford came over to Holland and stayed with my wife and me at The Hague. One evening when the ladies, Mrs. Clifford and my wife had retired, he and I left alone, had a very candid talk, in which he asked some straight questions and I gave him straight answers to the effect that I could see no way for us to come out whole out of this thing. Not that I had any particular knowledge; I just felt absolutely sure. This was in April 1963, just before I left the Hague. I said, "I think that it's a hopeless proposition, and I think we've got to drink the cup to the dregs. I don't think there's any way out. We can't retire defeated on the battlefield of our own volition. If we have to get out then let us get out in time and salvage what we can. But I see no way in which we can ever have the West with us on this, nor can we, from what I gather from a military point of view, look forward to any other outcome." And he said nothing, but he nodded. I said, "That doesn't stop me, obviously doing all I can to explain our policy as convincingly as possible". I think that was the only time I spoke to somebody at that level in that way.

In my mind, I heard the words of de Lattre de Tassigny ringing: "Don't commit yourselves militarily overwhelmingly..... Your concept of warfare is not valid in these circumstances. You can destroy, you can burn, you can shatter, you can bomb, you can do 1,000 things, and you'll still find the enemy everywhere." This was what was being said just before his death in 1952, 16 years earlier by perhaps the most brilliant military leader that the French had.

FREDERICK W. FLOTT
Special Assistant to Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge
Saigon (1963)

Frederick W. Flott was born in Chicago, Illinois in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included positions in France, Iran, West Germany, Switzerland, Vietnam, and Indonesia. Mr. Flott was interviewed by Ted Gittinger on July 22, 1984.

Q: Mr. Flott, could we begin with the first question: what were the circumstances of your assignment to Saigon in 1963?

FLOTT: Well, it was a position as a special assistant to Ambassador [Henry Cabot] Lodge. I was brought out there by him at his choice and his decision. Mind you, if I had wanted to decline the assignment, I probably could have, but I was very interested in going; I was honored that he asked me, in part at the suggestion of his son George, who had been the assistant secretary of labor and with whom I'd worked. Ambassador Lodge knew that I'd traveled in the Soviet Union with Bob Kennedy, who of course had defeated his son in their Senate race in about 1962, I guess. He thought -- partly because of the duties he had in mind for me, which we'll get to later -- it would be very useful to have somebody who had good personal access to Bob Kennedy and was a known quantity to him and President Kennedy, and also whom he knew to be loyal to him, Lodge, both on Republican Party grounds and family friendship grounds.

Q: How were you contacted? Did he call you, or -- ?

FLOTT: His son called me and said, "Look, the old man is worried about staff, and I think you ought to go out there with him." And they invited me up to the family home in Beverly, north of Boston -- I was in Washington -- to go sailing with them on his yacht. Some of this is a little comical, but Lodge had me take the wheel of his yacht, which I guess is how New Englanders analyze character. I didn't drive the boat into any rocks or anything. But, more seriously, we talked about the mission and his plans, and I think it was largely just a question of being personally acceptable to Mrs. Lodge and to him. But it was that kind of appointment. It was based on all of those things.

Lodge said he had had very bad experience with the State Department and with the Foreign Service -- he thought it was bad experience any-way -- when he was up at the United Nations. And so his first inclination was to choose his own staff, when he had the clout to do it. President Kennedy did tell him he could take anyone to Saigon who was willing to go, and he could send anyone home whether he was willing to leave or not. And so he thought, "Well, anyone the State Department assigns to me may be hopeless, so therefore I will pick my own people among the State Department crowd," and he was making his own decisions. Later he learned and adjusted to the fact that the State Department assigns some very able people, and that, all things considered, he would do just as well by their assignments as by his own selections.

He told me when he was interviewing me for this position that he was very disturbed by what he saw in Paul Kattenburg, who was the country director for Vietnamese affairs, who's presently a professor at the University of South Carolina, after early retirement from the department.

Q: What was he disturbed about?

FLOTT: It was sort of ad persona observations; the guy seemed to him a little bit flighty, a little bit fuzzy on the mission -- you know, not hard-line mission oriented, and he just wasn't comfortable with it. He didn't think he was especially wise or especially committed to the goals of the administration, which he, Lodge, as a Republican appointed by a Democratic president, was about to serve loyally and well, and more gung ho than anyone else. It was that sort of reaction, I think. I know Paul Kattenburg personally and have high regard for his knowledge and judgment, but I can see how Lodge might quite honestly have had some concern -- and of course, this was in July of 1963. I suppose it would be fair to say the State Department had not quite yet put in its first team on Vietnam. It did later, but at the time, there were there some people who were available for assignment to what at that time was something of a backwater, or at least a place that traditionally had been something of a backwater.

Q: Did you know Ambassador [Frederick] Nolting?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Was there any kind of feedback on how the job he had done was being received back in Washington? Was he in bad odor or good odor or -- ?

FLOTT: Like many of these things -- because Americans high in public life are usually very decent people; they don't want to hurt anyone, but also they tend to think that anyone that disagrees with them just doesn't understand the problem -- there were a lot of reservations about whether he understood the problem, whether he was too committed to [Ngo Dinh] Diem and [Ngo Dinh] Nhu, whether it was time for a change, whether he was hard-charger enough; there was all that. And on the part of people like Averell Harriman and [Dean] Rusk and all, I'm sure it was handled with total gentility. With Lodge there were some rather abrupt incidents in dealing with Nolting.

Q: Really?

FLOTT: Yes, at CINCPAC [Commander in Chief, Pacific], when we were on our way out to Saigon, we stopped in Honolulu and Nolting was there and offered to brief us. He was on his way back to Washington, and it was very much understood that he would be out of Saigon before Lodge got there. But it's common practice to do that; that was certainly not an ad persona phenomenon. But at Honolulu, Ambassador Nolting very graciously offered to be debriefed and to talk at any length that Lodge might want, and Lodge simply remarked that he had nothing to learn from him and was not seeking the interview, and I'm not even sure there was a polite handshake for the photographers. If there was, that was all there was. That was the Ambassador coming back from Saigon on his way back to the department.

Q: That's a little abrupt, isn't it?

FLOTT: Yes, abrupt, and to my mind, unwise, because even if you thought Nolting was a failure and totally wrong in everything he ever did or said, you'd still want to get a feeling for the guy for damage assessment, if for nothing else. But it was Lodge's manner, in cases of that sort -- but again, there was some purpose in his method. He thought he was on a game plan, too. which was to convey very dramatically that it was a new team taking over and new emphasis, A lot of things he did where people thought he was insensitive to other people's feelings and all, there was perhaps that more than an extenuating set of circumstances, a very real game plan and purpose that he thought he had a charter to do.

Q: What sort of charter did he think he had? Now this is before the famous August 24 telegram from Washington.

FLOTT: Yes, this was when he was on his way out to Saigon.

Q: Yes. Was he supposed to convey to Diem that we were getting tougher or that policy was changing, or what?

FLOTT: That the American ambassador was no longer so committed to Diem, and that Diem had to fly straight and level and meet our policy requirements, and that he could not presume that just because somebody was the American ambassador, that Diem already had him persuaded and in the bag.

Q: Which, I take it, is what the opinion of Ambassador Nolting had been.

FLOTT: Well, it was a certain perception of Nolting. I have enough respect for Ambassador Nolting and Paul Kattenburg and Bill Trueheart and all these good people to think that they probably knew the pros and cons of Diem and the limits of his government. The truth of the matter is that a career foreign service officer in an ambassadorial position does not operate in the same way that a former member of the U.S. Senate does.

He operates under different footwork and different rules. So I would hesitate to evaluate just how much Nolting or any of the others knew about the limitations of Diem, but by and large my personal view was that anything that was apparent to me was surely apparent to any of these other players, who are just as perceptive as I am and who had had a lot more time in country, and whose judgment and patriotism were just as high as my own.

Q: What was the nature of your specific duties when you got to Saigon?

FLOTT: I suppose I should begin by saying what the concept was for which I was recruited, and what we were supposed to be doing. I must say -- to tell the end of the story first -- it did not turn out anywhere near what we had planned, partly because the contingencies that we had anticipated didn't quite arise in the form we thought and then the whole coup made a new ball game of it.

But what Lodge really chose me for was the following, and here he was drawing on his UN experience and experience with other countries. And I must say the concept was realistic; I'm certainly not criticizing him for having seen this as a worthwhile mission, and I certainly liked the idea as he spelled it out to me. There were a number of things. One was he understood that there was a significant emigre community of Vietnamese who'd fled Diem, who were living in Bangkok, Hong Kong, Washington or Paris. Now Lodge knew, and he was very disciplined about what the rules of the game are for an ambassador, that an ambassador accredited to a friendly government cannot flit around spending long hours being spoken to by opposition types, and cannot seek them out, at least not aggressively, and that sort of thing. And he was going to have me do some of that for him. And it made sense, because at my level, coming from his office, I could credibly do that and they would have talked to me. I know what my skills and limitations are, and I would indeed have been the right person for that kind of a job. So he came to the right person, and he had a real job in mind.

I think another part that's inseparable from this -- and this gets back to almost Lodge lore -- was that he hated to fly transatlantic or transpacific or to fly in airplanes, even, and I think he thought, "Oh God, Vietnam is a hot spot. They're going to want me back there in the White House about once a month. I hate jet lag in planes, so I'm going to have a guy who is of confidence to me and privy to all my affairs. who can go back and answer their questions, at least part of the time."

Well, for one thing, I'm not sure that would have been acceptable to the administration anyhow, but maybe for some things it would have been, conceivably, because I did indeed have good relations with Bob Kennedy, and Lodge knew this. So he thought that if he did take the route of having a leg man whom he could send back to brief on what was going on, viva voce, that I would be personally acceptable to them. That was certainly true and correctly perceived, that I'd probably be the right one to do it, that I was personally loyal to him, that I would be loyal to him in my reporting to them. All this was correctly perceived. The only thing is that as things turned out, there didn't prove to be a great need for that function. When I mentioned earlier the emigres -- as you may know, on the Taiwan scene, which was recent history, there was the whole third-force phenomenon. Somebody has to talk to the third force, which was neither Chiang Kai-shek nor Mao Zedong-oriented. But if Lodge couldn't do it, well, he had me on tap to see these people wherever they might be.

But in general, it was special missions and in-house advice, sort of an in-house counselor of his choice and in his confidence.

Q: No administrative duties.

FLOTT: I personally did not. Mike Dunn did. It was very clearly understood that Mike Dunn was going to be the honcho for administrative affairs, for mission management and for liaison with the U.S. military. And I was the honcho for non-routine political affairs. Now Lodge did, of course, have a counselor of embassy for political affairs, but he wanted somebody closer to him, of confidence to him, a known quantity to him. And again, one of the reasons my mission changed direction was that Lodge saw that the State Department had put a thoroughly competent fellow in as political counselor, and continued to, and continued to do so.

Q: This was who?

FLOTT: That was Mel Manfull, when we got out there. But he had a good team of people, even then. And Lodge gradually thought, "I don't really need my own private political counselor. I've got a perfectly good political section in the embassy." So he encouraged me to integrate my efforts with the embassy political section as quickly as possible and become another line officer, another first secretary in the political section. This arrangement made sense in the eyes of all concerned.

But it was also true that anything I did had the imprimatur of Cabot Lodge. The Vietnamese knew that. When we got out there, I lived in the Lodge residence for some weeks, and I had arrived on the same plane with him and Mrs. Lodge and Mike Dunn. So there were certain things that I was personally well situated to do, in part because of the imprimatur. For example, as a modest first secretary, I was routinely in direct contact with the foreign minister of Vietnam, and could have access to the vice president of Vietnam when I wanted to. Also, I had been assigned by Lodge to handle the whole French account, and had very friendly collegial access to the French chargé d'affaires. For most matters at my level, anything where it was just a question of getting something done, the French were perfectly willing to deal with me, because they knew -- and I'll mention this later -- that Lodge had established me as his honcho for all French affairs. I could give you more detail on how that came about and all, but that was one of my duties. and if Lodge assigned you to any duty, people accepted you at it.

For example, Lodge was invited to join the Rotary Club. You may know that the top rule of Rotary is you've got to be the number-one man in your profession, and only one man from each profession can be in the local Rotary. Well, Lodge was simply too busy to do it, and it was basically a French-speaking, French-oriented Rotary, and since I was bilingual in French, he said, "Fred, why don't you take on this chore and represent me there?" And the Rotary people were delighted. They would, of course, rather have had Lodge himself, but they knew that wasn't realistic, and they knew I was very close to him and had lived at the residence and all and came out with him. The fact of the title of special assistant to Lodge enabled me to do things that other first secretaries probably could not do. I also did virtually all of the French-language interpreting, with the GVN and for high-level American visitors.

I wouldn't suggest at all that my mission fell apart once we got there; it's just that things evolved, things changed, and of course the biggest thing was the coup comparatively shortly after we got there. We were no longer receiving entreaties from emigres about how the Diem government should be changed.

Q: How would you characterize the state of affairs in the embassy and the country team when you arrived? Was there dissension, was -- ?

FLOTT: Oh, yes. There was a strong diversity of opinion and sharp disagreements among various elements of the mission. All of this was handled, for the most part, very professionally; nobody was attacking people ad persona for their views, or very rarely. But some people disagreed sharply with the views of the situation held by others, and different people had their own "clients" among the Vietnamese, their own sources, and some thought, "My source is better than your source and more reliable." But they worked as a team. I would say there was no flagrant leaking of Stuff; the embassy didn't leak like a sieve. It was occasionally seething with disagreement and dissent, perhaps, but it wasn't leaking like a sieve.

Q: The disagreement was over what should be done about Diem?

FLOTT: Among other things. But also about the Special Forces, about --

Q: You mean Diem's Special forces?

FLOTT: -- Colonel [Le Quang] Tung -- yes -- his special forces regiment or whatever it was, and what should be done about the Nhus, whether we should avoid the Nhus; whether we should cut so-and-so off at the knees, or whether we should not, and all of that sort of thing. Different people had many different views.

Q: Could you draw lines between the agencies on these things, or was it strictly -- was it between field operators and mission headquarters?

FLOTT: I would acknowledge that I suppose the conventional wisdom might have been -- and I characterize it as the conventional wisdom because it certainly wasn't something I knew, because I'd just gotten there -- was that yes, the CIA was perhaps more for Colonel Tung and his group, and MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] was very much for the ARVN [Army of the Republic of Vietnam]], and MACV was very loyal to Diem, whereas the political section would be characterized by some as being fuzzy, and perhaps not as tough as they should be. All of these were very superficial perceptions that I'm not even sure were well founded. I think the CIA people -- history would tell us -- knew what they were talking about, and not much escaped their gimlet glance. Now, that doesn't mean that the case officer who was handling Colonel Tung didn't think that his little project was the best game in town, but I'd say all the agencies had good and responsible views of the matters with which they dealt. The station chief was Jocko [John] Richardson.

Q: Right. Did he have a position in this debate?

FLOTT: You know, I wouldn't really pretend to know, because the CIA people, wherever they serve, report to the ambassador directly; they're responsive to command, they do what the executive branch, the White House, tells them to do. I certainly wouldn't want to suggest that Jocko Richardson was following one line and Lodge another. It wasn't that at all.

Q: But he got sent home.

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Do you know what was behind that?

FLOTT: I think it was, very frankly, because at that point in time, Lodge wanted to convey, "Look. A new team has landed; we're performing in a different way; we're pursuing different lines if not different objectives, and if Nhu thought that he had Jocko Richardson's ear to the exclusion of all others, well, now he can digest the fact that Jocko Richardson's no longer in country and Lodge has moved into his house." Which Lodge did. But I think Jocko Richardson was sent home as a device to convey an impression and to make a statement. I happen to know that Mr. [John] McCone, who was the director of CIA, waited for something like three hours to get a minute alone with President Kennedy at the time that took place, saying, "Look, this man's a very good officer. He's coming home in what outwardly is a cloud, if not disgrace. I won't say it's outrageous, because maybe it's being done for a worthwhile purpose, but this man has been a very good officer and is a great patriot and should get a commendation from you directly." And Mr. McCone waited for three hours to get President Kennedy to agree to do that. But I elaborate on that in some detail because there were a lot of decisions of that sort made, where nobody was evil, nobody was bad, nobody was necessarily wrong, but it was a question of projecting certain images in order to serve a perceived political purpose.

Q: There was a shift in the tide.

FLOTT: Yes. Yes. And they wanted it symbolized, and all the more so when this person had been working very close to someone who was perceived as a big obstacle, namely Ngo Dinh Nhu.

Q: Right. Well, now, you've mentioned that there was a lot of dissension -- well, maybe that's the wrong word -- disagreement, within the embassy, and that the embassy was not leaking like a sieve, although when you have that sort of disagreement, the likelihood of leaks, I suppose, increases. What was the status of our relations with the press in Saigon at this time?

FLOTT: I think the mass of the foreign press in Saigon thought that Ambassador Nolting, and probably Jocko Richardson, were too uncritically pro-Diem, and even pro-Nhu. Again, I personally would challenge whether these two very able people would be very far off the mark on anything they looked at, and I would also question whether some of the press people who were there at the time knew anything any better than these people did. But anyway, that was the perception.

The press was also -- as it so often is -- in an adversary role. People were trying to keep some things secret; the press was trying to penetrate these secrets. The press traveled around the countryside more; they knew a lot of horror stories, and they knew a lot of fantastic things that they felt others in Saigon didn't know as well as they did. They thought the U.S. government was blind to certain weaknesses of the GVN, the Government of Vietnam, and perhaps the press was not as conscious as it should have been of the fact that an ambassador accredited to a friendly government has to deal with that government within the accepted lines of diplomatic behavior. And even his staff will do the same, which doesn't mean they're any less perceptive than the press who think they've missed the mark.

Q: Was there a press policy for your guidance or the guidance of the embassy?

FLOTT: The press policy, I would say, was very clear and it was enunciated by Cabot Lodge. He said he was his own spokesman. Among your telegrams there, there is one when he agrees to the assignment of Barry Zorthian to Saigon. He said, "I want him to understand that he will not deal with the press or be the spokesman, that I'm the spokesman and I deal with the press myself." Now, whether that's really possible, that was certainly Ambassador Lodge's position. And again, I'm not suggesting that that was a mistake on his part. He wanted to deal with the press: he'd had a lot of experience with the press in his various political campaigns and as a senator and at the UN, and he was very skilled at dealing with them. As I recall, and correct me if I'm wrong, he had not had a particularly favorable press back in the United States.

Q: Lodge?

FLOTT: Right?

Q: Perhaps not.

FLOTT: My impression is he had a very good press in Saigon. I would say in general he did, yes. Was that due to his skillful handling? He worked on them very hard. I don't know if this gets into more detail than you're really interested in, but you may know that he allowed Keyes Beech and one other journalist to fly with us and arrive with us when we first flew into Saigon. In fact, if it doesn't interrupt your planned chronology, we could do the chronology of our trip out, because it illustrates things that -- I'll get back to the subject of the press on this in an anecdotal way as we move toward Saigon.

We left Washington, whatever the date was, and Lodge was concerned about jet lag and being tired, and he wanted to be very fit and up to form when he arrived in Saigon. He'd heard that the climate was very tiring. So we crossed the Pacific in very gentle laps. First of all, he flew out from Boston to San Francisco, stayed a day or two, recovered those three hours, then went on to Honolulu where Mike Dunn and I joined him. He spent a couple of days there, two or three days recovering, and then we flew the leg by jet from Honolulu to Tokyo, which wasn't backbreaking. And there the plan was we'd rest for several days in Tokyo. Mind you, this was not all resting. We consulted all along; we consulted with CINCPAC in Honolulu and we consulted with our embassy in Tokyo and with the regional military commands in Japan. The plan was to spend several days in Tokyo, and this was not frivolous time: Lodge had in mind seeing a lot of his old friends, distinguished Japanese ambassadors or foreign ministers from the United Nations period. Lodge would have been putting in many good licks for the administration's programs with all these stops. Then, not to move too fast, go from Tokyo down to Manila and Hong Kong, possibly even Taiwan. I'm not sure Taiwan was on the list, but do it in small bites, not to get too much jet fatigue, and then eventually fly into Saigon, when all the ducks were in line and with proper notice.

Well, we got, with this program, as far as Tokyo. We arrived in Tokyo, at 5:00 p.m. Japanese time, had a meeting with some former Japanese ambassador to the U.N. who was a personal friend of the Ambassador, and Mike Dunn and I sat in on that. And because we'd had a long flight and all, Lodge soon excused himself, took a walk, and about seven o'clock in the evening, Tokyo time, retired. And the plan was, we were going to have several days there, and one thing he was going to do was he was going to interview the Buddhists the next day. Now, there were a couple of Vietnamese refugee Buddhists there, and the political section of Embassy Tokyo had arranged to bring them in, and Lodge was going to have a leisurely talk the next day with them.

That's all I remember of the plans for several days in Tokyo: talks at the foreign office, the embassy, the military, all that. Well, Lodge went to bed about seven o'clock, and about nine o'clock I got a call from the embassy. We were staying at the Okura Hotel, which was right next door to the embassy, and they called me over and said we had an immediate telegram from the White House, and to charge over and get it. So I got over there quickly, and it was from the President to Lodge, informing him that there had been one more egregious development on the Buddhist thing; I forget whether it was one more immolation -- no, I guess Nhu had raided the pagodas. The pagodas had been raided and President Kennedy said, "Lodge, cancel your step-by-step plan; get down there tomorrow. Leave Tokyo tomorrow morning. However, do not leave Tokyo without first talking with the two Vietnamese Buddhist monks and nuns who you're supposed to see in the next few days anyway. See them, then leave, and the military will put a plane at your disposal." We'd been traveling commercial jet until then.

Q: Why was he supposed not to put off the meeting with the Buddhists?

FLOTT: Because it was a statement that President Kennedy, to whose political instincts I'd certainly defer, wanted to make. He wanted to make it very clear that the incoming American ambassador was touching base with the Buddhists, and that the United States of America was not having any part of kicking around Buddhists or raiding other people's churches.

Q: Okay.

FLOTT: It was a good Kennedyesque statement that Lodge agreed with completely. They were both sort of on the same wave length in terms of political footwork and conveying impressions.

It was then about nine-thirty in the evening. I had the job of belling the cat, and that at great risk of getting my head lopped off: I had the job of waking up Ambassador Lodge at nine-thirty in the evening and telling him that. He was grumpy at first: "Why are you waking me up in the middle of the night?" And I said, "Well, sir, it's a telegram from the President with instructions about what we're to do tomorrow morning early." So he reluctantly acknowledged yes. I was probably right in waking him up. Mrs. Lodge was very gracious, saying, "Fred! How delightful to see you! Won't you come in? Won't you have a glass of orange juice with us?"

{Laughter} That sort of thing. She, as usual, was delightful and treated me almost like one of her sons, trying to get me off the hook. So, we agreed on certain things. Then I went back to my room.

Mike Dunn in the meantime was putting a plane together, making arrangements to get a plane. We had a -- what was the old four-engine Lockheed called? Lockheed Constellation. It was a good turboprop or prop plane, and this was a VIP-configured Lockheed turboprop. I think it even had a few bunks in it. And that was made available to us to fly down to Saigon. When Lodge heard that, he objected: "Well, this is a prop plane. Why do they give me a prop plane when all those Democratic politicians (the Kennedy cabinet) are flying around in jets?" That was his observation to me; I don't think he made that as a general statement. I explained to him that the Lockheed was a very safe, proven plane that had been around for a long time and maybe it was safer after all. Well, he agreed that that might well be right and that was certainly the way to go.

{Laughter}

So after establishing to his satisfaction the airworthiness of the Lockheed Constellation we went back to bed. Mike was working very hard, making all kinds of logistics arrangements. The next thing was I got a call about three o'clock in the morning. Lodge was getting more and more irate with all these interruptions of his sleep, and Mrs. Lodge was running out of new bases on which to be cheerful and seeming delighted to see me. So about three o'clock in the morning Mike Dunn came in and said, "Fred, there's a problem. It's in your department. Two press people, the UPI guy and the AP guy -- the wire services -- have learned of Lodge's trip tomorrow, and they want to ride down with him on the plane, but they have to know, so they can phone their offices and all. Will you please go in and get Ambassador Lodge's permission?" So I had the honor of going in and waking him up one more time to ask him for something that might have been controversial. But Mike was right; that was in my area of responsibility, anything that was political operating or judgment of that sort.

I went in and said, "Mr. Ambassador, sorry to wake you up, but the UPI guy and the AP guy have heard of the trip, and they would like to go down and they asked if that would be possible." Lodge was very relaxed and he said, "Fred, I'm glad you came to me with this; you showed good judgment. I think it's a good idea. Yes, we will take them. But tell them this. Tell them this very firmly: two and no more! If anyone else comes around saying 'I want to go on the Ambassador's plane,' the whole deal is off. These two and no more. It's up to them to keep it under their hat and not to tell anyone about it. But yes, we can go with it." That was about three o'clock, three-fifteen.

Then about five o'clock in the morning I got a frantic call from the press attaché, or the chief of USIS [United States Information Service] there, whoever he was, who said there was also a very respected writer for the Chicago Daily News, Keyes Beech, who had heard of the thing and wanted to go. In the meantime I think there was also a television crew. Let's see; I guess the first group that wanted to be added on was the television crew, and I went to Lodge with that, and he was again very cordial and friendly at the idea of getting some press, and he said, "Look, I thought I told you clearly no more." And I said, "Yes, sir, but this was presented to us by the press attaché." And he said, "Well, I don't care. I'm the ambassador." And I said, "Sir, the press attaché is a black. He's doing his job. I don't think we'd be serving the administration well if we failed to support a black officer trying to do his job and represent his country well." Lodge said, "Quite right, Fred. Tell them they can come. But that's it, no more. Besides, I don't want them bringing a lot of heavy cameras and stuff on the plane. I don't want that plane to sink."

"So no heavy equipment, but they can come themselves and talk to me." I said, "Well, sir, could we agree that it's all right for them to bring cameras for their personal use?" "Yes, that's right, keep it light, cameras. I don't want to sink the plane." We already were up to about eight people on a four-engine transport.

So I went back, and then the last person to get in on the thing was Keyes Beech, who'd heard of it, and I found some reason why -- again, the press officer had felt he owed him one or had promised he'd get him on, or something, and Lodge very quickly agreed to that. So we had a television crew, plus Keyes Beech, plus AP and UPI, and Mike Dunn and I talked to them all the way down, and they of course talked with Ambassador Lodge as well. And from their point of view, and indeed from our point of view, it was good government all around. They got a very good story; they got eight hours, because the prop planes mercifully fly slowly so we had eight hours elapsed time from Tokyo to Saigon. They knew Lodge's staff; we'd had drinks with them, we'd had meals with them, and Lodge had told them everything he wanted to tell them. They got the feel for the thing and sent in stories that certainly did not deserve our mission.

I get around to that long story, which also gets us to Saigon, as to how Lodge was. He knew the power of the press; he took it seriously, and he wanted to deal with it properly. But he also wanted to do it himself.

Q: What if a reporter came and talked to you? Did you have any guidance on what you could tell him, or did you have to report on press contacts, anything of that sort?

FLOTT: Well, there's always a discipline of reporting what you say. In my case it was on again, off again, sometimes yes, sometimes no. Like if Dave Halberstam would come around to the residence -- Mike Dunn and I lived at the residence, at first -- and Dave Halberstam would come around and, for example, if Ambassador Lodge had received him for a drink or tea or a chat, and then Lodge got called away on some emergency, he'd say, "Fred, will you talk to Dave while I'm away?" If I were doing it on direct instructions, that would be all right, or if Dave Halberstam, say, were to have sought me out for something that was appropriately of my competence, or if I had told the Ambassador, "Look, I'd like to talk further with Dave, just to see what makes him tick, what bug he's got in his bonnet, and to hear his story," sure, that was fine, pursuit of my mission. But in the long run, I don't think Lodge would have wanted anyone other than himself being the spokesman. It was just not his style of working, and again, like so many things that Ambassador Lodge did, and so many ways in which he approached his mission and how best to serve the President, he did it with the style of a senator or a very political ambassador in a very political place, like the UN.

Q: This next question is not in this vein at all, but we can pursue it. Were you involved in any way in the [Victor] Krulak-[Joseph] Mendenhall visit in September of 1963?

FLOTT: Yes, I saw them when they were there. Joe Mendenhall was a colleague, a career foreign service officer. And I knew of, I guess it was General Krulak, as a very knowledgeable marine corps general of whom they spoke highly at CINCPAC. We'd also looked forward to meeting them all, and we did. I didn't go out in the field with them on all their visits or anything, but I had a number of occasions to talk with them in Saigon. I eventually got back to Washington the day of the assassination of President Kennedy, and one of the first people I talked to when I was back there was Joe Mendenhall. First I talked with Bill Sullivan, who is, again, a very dear friend and colleague, and Joe Mendenhall.

Q: I was wondering if you had any insight into the way they developed what were apparently two very differing reports on the general direction that things were going in Vietnam, that prompted President Kennedy to ask, "You two did visit the same country, didn't you?"

FLOTT: Yes, I remember that incident, and it's true. There -- at the risk of sort of opening a long-winded parenthetical remark -- I would make this observation about General Krulak, but more generally, it's an observation about the American military in general. And that is, without wanting to throw stones. First of all, I know this first hand, because I went to a military prep school myself, and I was an officer for three and a half years, an infantry officer in World War II. I know something about how the machine works and how the mind works. I know, for example, that as a young cadet and as a junior officer, I was taught what every single cadet or junior officer would say, "I'm commanding the best damn platoon in the best damn company in the best damn battalion of the best regiment of the U.S. Army, which of course is the best in the world." These logically are rather uncritical judgments, because not everybody is necessarily commanding the best platoon, and people of a more inquiring mind might even admit logically of the possibility of luck of the draw. You get good troops, good replacements out of the repple-depple or bad, but not necessarily everything is the best just because you're in command of it.

The military, on the other hand, seems to have a way of equating unquestioning, almost irrational optimism with loyalty and with suitability for command. That is one of the characteristics of the type, and having been trained that way myself, I know that's how they're trained. I do not question the fact that if your most important task is to take that hill with these thirty-six tired soldiers, that's not even bad training. I'm not questioning how the military trains itself; I am questioning their suitability as a group for making political assessments. Some of the military would acknowledge that, at least to the limited extent that one did in your telegram of General [Paul] Harkins saying that, "My officers know what's going on in the countryside" -- one might question that, parenthetically, but he said, "They know what's going on in the countryside, but I'm not suggesting they know what's going on in the palace. They aren't experts at palace gossip." Well that, indeed, they were not. So General Krulak comes out there, reporting to the Commandant of the Corps and to CINCPAC - and with his particular orientation he would see set of things, whereas I would that Joe Mendenhall, as a personality, was perhaps even more analytical and even more inclined to critical judgments and weighing both sides of a question than would even the average foreign service officer or civilian be. So naturally there's a gulf between the two.

Q: Did you talk to Mr. Mendenhall about this?

FLOTT: Sure.

Q: What were the things that bothered him about the situation in Vietnam?

FLOTT: He just thought that seeing what he could see, it just didn't strike him as inspiring confidence or looking very good. I probably shouldn't try to say what he said, because I don't remember it all that clearly and I don't want to put words in his mouth. But my guess would be that that would be the range of his comments, and General Krulak would have figured that he ran into some guy out in the boondocks who also thought he was advising the best ARVN battalion, and his brass was well polished and his shoes were shined and his shoulders were back and his stomach in and chin in, and head up, so General Krulak would report with confidence that things looked good out in the countryside.

Q: When that party went back, John Mecklin and Rufus Phillips went back with them. Do you remember any of the background of that, why they went? Did they go at the instigation of Ambassador Lodge, or what was behind that?

FLOTT: I may be wrong on this, but I know that Mecklin very simply was fired from one day to the next, told to leave. That might have been the occasion on which he went back. Or he may have been returning from that trip, before he was fired. I forget which was which.

Q: What was he fired for?

FLOTT: I would really characterize it as a firing very much like the firing of Jocko Richardson. It was just a way of making a statement. Lodge did not do it with personal vindictiveness, but he wanted to make clear a new team was there, and the message came through louder and clearer if the guy left the next day. But I know in a personal way, the Ambassador and Mrs. Lodge invited both Mrs. Richardson and Mrs. Mecklin to dinner the nights of their respective husbands' departure, and these ladies understood that there were perhaps reasons for doing things the way they were being done, and personally everybody took it reasonably well, or as far as outward appearances went, anyway.

Q: Did you know Rufus Phillips?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Did he talk to you about the opinions that he expressed later in Washington when he got back?

FLOTT: You know, I just don't remember in that much detail. We had so many things to talk about. I knew his wife; she was an old friend from Washington, and when Rufe was away on the trip, one of the first meals I had out of Ambassador Lodge's residence was when she and I went to have lunch at the Caravelle Hotel, if I'm not mistaken, or the Brink or someplace, and we just talked about mutual friends and family. When I saw Rufe, if I asked him anything, he would have, I'm sure, replied in giving me his best judgment on anything I asked him. But I just didn't have many substantive dealings with him, and I retained the impression that he was regarded as being very well informed. He'd been out there since 1954, and considering we were only off the gangplank since about four days, he came on as quite a regional expert. And I'm sure by any standard he was.

Q: Do you know where he tended to come down on this debate that was going on?

FLOTT: I don't happen to be all that clear on it.

Q: What about the [Robert] McNamara-[Maxwell] Taylor visit which followed almost on the heels of this one?

FLOTT: Yes, well, I worked very closely with them; I interpreted for McNamara when we went in with Diem. Lodge and Taylor spoke adequate French and understood most of what was going on in French. Secretary McNamara did not, and for that reason I was there as an interpreter. We also had CINCPAC with us on some of these meetings, too. CINCPAC, Max Taylor, Lodge, and myself, talking with Diem. And my memorandum of that conversation is a matter of record. That was my first interpreting job for McNamara, and I interpreted for him on many other occasions.

FLOTT: That was taken when Lodge presented his letters of credence, some days before the McNamara-Taylor visit -- that was the first time I met Diem. See him shaking hands.

Q: You're shown shaking hands. Was this in the presidential palace?

FLOTT: Yes. That was several days after we arrived, whenever Ambassador Lodge went to present his letters of credence. And Diem was wearing that white suit that, I guess -- well, I have seen him in mandarin garb, but I think every other time I've seen a picture of him, he's in a white suit.

Q: Now again, nine people went with Lodge; Lodge plus eight others, and that was clearly the totem pole of the American establishment in country, and quite properly, the Ambassador, the deputy chief of mission -- That would have been Ambassador [William] Trueheart?

FLOTT: Yes, subsequently Ambassador Trueheart; then Minister-Counselor Trueheart. And the political counselor. The head of AID [Agency for International Development] was there, and General Harkins. We were all going from the residence at ten o'clock in the morning. We all arrived with our protocolaire white suits on, and General Harkins was in his white uniform, and all ready to go, and Ambassador [Lodge] called him by his first name and said, "Look" -- whatever his first name was-

Q: Paul, wasn't it?

FLOTT: Paul, yes. "Paul" -- or he might even have said General -- "my plan is for you to stay here. I want one of us to be outside in case the phone rings or there's some message" -- he didn't say, "If the phone rings," but that was the tone -- "or in case something comes up or there's some message. And I want a senior officer outside the palace for any contingency, and I'm asking you to do that."

So, again, it's sending signals. The next thing that was very clear was that General Harkins was not in the group that was with Lodge when he presented letters of credence. And I don't think this was petty; I don't think it was personally vindictive. They were, after all, friends and neighbors in Massachusetts. I don't think it was wrong. What I would say was that it was Ambassador Lodge using the tools that he was used to using in pursuit of his mission and what he understood to be the requirements of the situation.

Q: I think General Harkins and Ambassador Lodge were schoolmates, weren't they, at Boston Latin?

FLOTT: If they're not -- in prep school -- yes, something like that. I knew they were good friends, and both came from the same side of the tracks up in Massachusetts and all. There is so much ad persona criticism of Ambassador Lodge about having been vindictive or putting down people on purpose or something; it wasn't that at all. He knew what he was doing; he was doing it with the tools he was used to using in the way he was used to doing it. Now, admittedly, a different ambassador would have proceeded in different ways with the same problems, but that doesn't mean one was wrong and the other was right.

Q: Did this cause strained relations between General Harkins and the Ambassador?

FLOTT: It made it very clear, if it was necessary to make it clear, that General Paul Harkins was not an independent theater commander or anything even resembling it and that he was about one notch above a military attaché, about which I could give you another anecdotal account.

Q: Please do.

FLOTT: You probably know that in every embassy, every American embassy anywhere in the world, they always have the service attachés, sometimes more, sometimes fewer, but basically all three services have to have a piece of the action. So there's an army, navy, and air force officer, and the senior of the three is designated the defense attaché, depending on how well he fits into the local situation, which gives the United States the most weight where it's needed with the host-country government and military. And I suppose of all things in life, the thing that was most unheard of was having an embassy without having military attachés. Well, one day Lodge was sort of wondering to himself, "Why do we need these military attachés, who take up office space in our embassy chancery?" The office building of the embassy was very small, and there was a shortage of space. The attachés, for good and proper reasons, had good and proper office space. They had their own requirements for what are loosely called code rooms, the communications centers and all, and they had staff and they had cars and all, and they were entertained. Lodge said, "Why do we need this? We have all these sixteen hundred advisers, however many we have; we've got enough military in the country. Why do we need these people?" He just raised the question, and it was slowly being disputed and shot down.

My office was in a small office right next door to Ambassador Lodge's big embassy office, and he could open a side door in his office and pop right into my office. Mike Dunn's office also opened on the Ambassador's, or you'd go through the deputy chief of mission's office to get to Mike's. I think on this occasion Mike was out. But anyway, this all happened, say, roughly two weeks after we got there. And at two o'clock in the afternoon, Mrs. Lodge was alone back at the residence. We had no proper security arrangements at the time; there was a retired Vietnamese policeman, perhaps, pulling guard duty at night or something, and a gardener during the day. It was very relaxed, and no real security around the embassy that would guarantee the well-being of anyone. We were constantly getting death threats, and CIA was getting messages from sources to which they attached some importance, at least, saying there was a plot to bump off Ambassador Lodge, Bill Trueheart, Mike Dunn and myself, and one other person. Everybody who wasn't on the list had their nose somewhat out of joint at not being included! I must say, I didn't lose a lot of sleep over it, but on some nights when Mike Dunn and I thought of how insecure the whole setup was, Mike and I took turns guarding the door to the Ambassador's personal quarters.

The way the embassy residence was, in the sleeping quarters on the second floor, there was what could be described as a private apartment for the Ambassador and Mrs. Lodge, with a big sitting room and two bedrooms, all off at one end. Mike Dunn and I each had very adequate rooms and baths near the stairs. And Mike said, "You know, Fred, I think you and I ought to guard this place, just to make sure," and I agreed. So we took turns sleeping on a rug, for four hours on and four hours off, in front of the door to Ambassador Lodge's private apartment, with a submachine gun or a carbine or something, just in case. Because you never knew what might happen. We were getting so many reports about how the government of Vietnam itself might try to assassinate Lodge, or how Colonel Tung, or how somebody thought they'd heard some generals were going to do it. There were all kinds of rumors, and the only way that Mike Dunn and I could proceed in good conscience was just to make sure that there'd be some noise before they got into Lodge's apartment.

Q: Did you mention a Schmeisser submachine gun before we began?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Where in the world did you get that?

FLOTT: I didn't bring it out to Saigon with me. There was a time, as you know, when the American military involvement in Vietnam was supposed to be nonattributable. So I suppose it was the CIA that was doing it, or the very earliest stages of the advisory effort. They had a lot of non-attributable weapons, including Schmeissers in prime condition. I had used the Schmeisser before and was familiar with it, and they had lots of ammo for it, and it was heavy but I didn't have to carry it anywhere. Lou Conein was an old friend, and kindly offered to give me any weapons I wanted. And I didn't bring any weapons with me from Washington, because I knew I might as well leave my own at home and collect more out there and subsequently perhaps acquire them. So Lou said, "What kind of weapons would you like?" This was in the day when you had to be a politically important province chief to rate an M-16, what was then the AR-15. So I didn't ask for that; it wasn't fair for a garrison soldier to draw down one of those. But I said, "Well, I'd like to have a Schmeisser, and I'd like to have a folding stock paratrooper M-1 carbine, without the selector on it." I never liked the carbine with a full automatic selector.

Q: That was the M-2 carbine, I think.

FLOTT: Yes. Anyhow, this was an M1A1, with a folding stock for paratroopers. That means you could do aimed rifle fire at up to three hundred yards, if that was what the situation called for, or you could make lots of noise with a Schmeisser and if you had the fire-control discipline of shooting short, five-round bursts, it's a very good weapon. It's not a good weapon for an untrained man; for a trained man it's good. And I was used to it. So I had one of each, and we'd take turns, and Mike or I would sleep there in front of Lodge's door. We only did this a few times. Gradually we got much better organized, because it was clearly not the way to run a railroad. But I thought, and Mike felt, that if by sleeping on a rug in front of the Ambassador's door, if I can do that and the American Ambassador, who's in command of the whole effort in Vietnam, gets a good night's sleep because he trusts us, there's no better way to earn your pay. So we did it. And soon, of course, they had the marine guard shacks, and marines inside, and marines on the roofs of the adjoining buildings, the works!

Q: I was going to ask, the marines traditionally guard embassies, don't they?

FLOTT: Yes, they guard embassies, more exactly, chanceries -- the embassy office building - but they did not traditionally guard residences. At this time the embassy security guard people -- there was a good marine complement, I'm sure, but they were spread pretty thin. Some Buddhist priests had taken refuge in parts of the embassy, so they had to give them almost bodyguard protection around the clock; that made claims on their resources. There had been a threat to the AID compound, because that's where one of the Buddhists was hanging out, and Lodge had visited there. So when it became high profile, the thought was, "Gee, we'd better put a couple of marines over there," which means you've pulled six men off the complement, even on a surge basis, and it finally got to the point where that meant there weren't any for the residence. The first time around, Ambassador Lodge said, "No, we want to be a perfectly open mission. I don't want policemen standing in front of my house. We don't need marines here." Then when these death threats came in, and good CIA serious telegrams that people whose judgment we trusted thought something was afoot and that an effort might be made to bump us off, we didn't want to suddenly put a platoon of marines there. We didn't have a platoon in country. So Mike and I improvised. But quickly other arrangements were made, in two or three days.

But anyway, to get back to the story about this day; I was in my office at two in the afternoon. I've given you the atmosphere in terms of security at the residence: there was none. And the naval attaché came in. The attachés were very inclined to do lots of busy busywork, and make themselves very busy. One came in, and he had such a hot piece of information that he felt it was appropriate to tell the Ambassador immediately. He rushed into his office and said, "Sir, we've just received a telephonic report that there's a mob out in front of the Ambassador's residence and that the mob is charging the residence." So Lodge said, "Okay, take off." Lodge came running into my office, said, "Fred, I've just got a report; there's a mob in front of the residence," which was two miles away. He said, "Emily's there alone. I want you to go there with me." I said, "Yep, off we go."

He said, "How do we hit this kind of thing?" because he regarded me as being good at emergencies of that sort. I said, "Okay, the first thing we do, take off your tie so nobody has anything they can get hold of. Secondly, if there's a big mob there, we'll hit them: I'll go first, you follow behind. Don't fix anybody with your eyes. Use your elbows and just steamroller right through to the door. Don't talk to anyone or argue; just plow through and don't fix anyone with glance, and we'll hit it that way after the car has driven us as close to the epicenter as we can get. Don't fix anyone with your eyes, and loosen your cuffs and loosen your collar." That was while we were driving over there. We got to the residence; there wasn't a soul there. (Laughter) He and I really prepared to hit the line. (Laughter)

And so he went back to the office and said, re the attaché who had reported the mob, "This guy should be fired. And as a matter of fact, all these attachés should be fired." Then he was able to make an even stronger pitch. Secretary McNamara, guided by staff, demurred as long as he could, but ultimately Ambassador Lodge prevailed, and for the first time in history, as far as I know, a military attaché post was terminated. So that's the kind of fun and games we played.

Q: That's a good story.

FLOTT: That's what I mean about anecdotal stuff that isn't strictly jokes; it illustrates an atmosphere.

Q: Can we talk about the coup of 1963?

FLOTT: Sure.

Q: You mentioned Lou Conein already; you said he was an old friend. How long had you known Lou Conein?

FLOTT: Oh, I think I'd known Lou Conein since 1947. My first diplomatic post was in Paris in 1947, and like all beginning young diplomats who came out there as a vice consul, I was put in the consular section. Lou was already a legend in official circles. Well, this was my first contact with the legend of Lou Conein. Later, on trips up to Germany to see diplomatic colleagues up there, I met Lou Conein and heard all his stories and got to know at first hand this colorful person. So I guess I met Lou first in 1947.

Q: He would have been in the army then, I suppose.

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: But was he detailed to CIA, or -- ?

FLOTT: Something like that. He was probably seconded to CIA. I'm not sure of that, but I wouldn't be surprised to learn that such was the case.

Q: Right. Was that the last time you saw him until the Saigon days?

FLOTT: Oh no, I saw him frequently on other occasions. And during World War II I had been very peripherally involved with the Free French, and I'd been technically -- I don't want to exaggerate this at all, but I'd been behind the German lines in occupied France, very much toward the end of the German occupation and for a comparatively short time, and not with great, great hazard to life and limb. But of course, Lou Conein had done heroic things for two years before in occupied France. So we had this bond, or sorts.

Q: He had enlisted, hadn't he, in 1939?

FLOTT: He'd been in the French Foreign Legion, among other things, so we had in common the fact that we knew France well, we spoke French well, and were interested in things French, and each had war stories to tell the other. Lou had many, many more stories, of course. And as you know, subsequently, after he was through with getting the French Forces of the Interior through the war, he went out to Hanoi and dealt with Ho Chi Minh and all that.

Q: That is interesting. Now, back to the coup. The reason I brought up Conein was, of course, he is one of the central figures; as far as I know he was, anyway. There's a lot of uncertainty in my own mind about when a serious coup plot was under way. Some people date it as far back as July of 1963. When were you aware that there was really something afoot, more than a rumor?

FLOTT: Immediately on arrival in country and perhaps even from our stay at CINCPAC. I wouldn't swear to it. But I was certainly aware of it the minute I got in country. But again, I'd like to qualify that response. And that is, if somebody asked me today, "Did you know that the coup was coming?" really, and without trying to talk out of both corners of my mouth, really, with equal sincerity and honesty, I could say I did not know it was coming, or I did know it was coming. You could cut it either way. There were so many coups talked about by so many different groups, including some that talked to me, that we certainly knew that the idea of a coup was not being mentioned for the first time. We'd been hearing nothing else for weeks or months, and from many different and disparate groups, even. But I did not know an hour before it happened that it was going to happen. In fact, one of the times I interpreted with Diem was an hour before the coup started-

Q: Was that on the occasion of Admiral [U.S.G.] Sharp's visit?

FLOTT: No, Sharp came later. This was the Admiral Harry Felt, CINCPAC, visit. Yes. Admiral Felt and FSO Ed Martin, who was the POLAD [political adviser], the career diplomat official at Honolulu.

Q: What was that last name, sir?

FLOTT: Ed Martin. The political adviser, the State Department adviser to Admiral Felt, accompanied him and sat in on the meeting. The meeting was about ten o'clock in the morning. This was October 31, 1963, and as you know, Lodge was planning to go back to the States then. He'd only just arrived in country, but he was going back to consult, and had an airplane out there for him. And in the limousine riding over with Lodge to our meeting with Diem and Felt and his POLAD and Lodge and myself, on the way going over, I said, "Mr. Ambassador, you're going back; I've just received a message from my family that my mother" -- she was eighty years old -- "has had a severe attack of phlebitis. If you're going back and flying right back here in fairly short order, I'd sort of like to ask for a hop on the plane. I'll fly out to Chicago, see my mother, and get back and help you in Washington." He said, "Yes, that's all right; that makes sense. Touch base with somebody in the embassy, but, yes, you can come along with me. That's fine." So I asked the political counselor if it would be all right for me to absent myself because of this family illness, and also making clear that the Ambassador had said he had no objection. And the counselor said he thought he could spare me for five days. It was all fairly relaxed.

But anyway -- I don't know what got me on that subject.

Q: We were talking about the meeting with Felt and Diem.

FLOTT: Oh, yes. So at this meeting various things came up, and to catch a plane or to keep an engagement, Felt and his POLAD had to go over and meet some Vietnamese generals, and actually, they were trying to be polite to the generals before they left the country. And the generals, who were all up to their neck in the coup, found it very embarrassing that they had to be polite to this CINCPAC. But they did; they waited for everything until he shook hands with them, and everybody made their salaams. And when Lodge and I were left alone with Diem, Diem said, "Look, I'm very disturbed at the behavior of some of your junior officers. There are all kinds of rumors about a coup and movements of troops against me, and all. You know, there's nothing to this. My army's completely loyal to me; nobody would raise a hand here without my approval. These are vicious rumors that are being spread by junior officers of the CIA." He was very categorical about that. And Lodge said, "Look, if you can find any officer of my country team that is saying disparaging things, things that threaten stability, I promise you I'll fire him out of the country that same day. Just tell me who it is and prove it and they're on their way. That kind of stuff clearly doesn't go. But I can assure you that no one on my instruction is doing anything like that."

Well, we discussed a few other things, and took leave of Diem. And as the junior man of the two of us, I was the last to shake hands with him, and I was probably the last person to shake hands with Diem in his life, because the coup started an hour later and he was dead the next morning.

Q: And nobody was shaking his hand in between times.

FLOTT: Vietnamese practice and deference to a mandarin personage is such that it's safe to say that nobody was.

Q: Yes. That's fascinating, especially in light of what Lodge knew was going on at the time. Were you privy to any of the information that Lodge was getting from Conein about the progress of the plot, and so on, in October?

FLOTT: You know, in a way I can really honestly say that while I was privy to bits and pieces of a number of things, I didn't have a really complete picture of anything, and I'm not sure anyone else did, either. I knew, sure, that Conein would report, "So-and-so said such-and-such to me," and he and Lodge would develop a telegram, and the telegram would go back to the States -- all the reporting from the embassy or to the embassy I was generally aware of. That doesn't mean I was in the back of the brain of all the Vietnamese generals who were doing it.

Q: I don't think anybody was that.

FLOTT: And I wouldn't claim that I knew all the beasts that ran in the jungle, either. But I knew a lot was going on; I suppose I realized that if the United States had really wanted to stop it, it probably could have. On the other hand, maybe not. I know that the United States avoided direct action originating involvement, did formally at least avoid that. I knew that Lou Conein had a close personal relationship with General Tran Van Don and Big Minh and others. I personally did not, at that time. I knew them socially; I'd see them whenever there was a big reception. I'd pay my respects to all of them as senior officials and all, but I didn't really know them. So Conein was regarded as the man who handled that group.

Q: Were you present when Conein would brief Lodge about the --

FLOTT: No. No. Typically enough, Lodge liked to deal one on one; he'd do it that way, with Conein alone.

Q: Did Conein talk to you about what was going on?

FLOTT: More or less, yes. If Lodge had said, "Look, I don't want you to mention this to anyone, including my own staff," I'm sure Conein would have obeyed. But just because Lodge talked to him privately doesn't mean he would duck telling me something. It also doesn't mean he would. The situation was moving so fast and we had other things to talk of; I'd really be much more inclined to talk with Lou Conein about where we'd have lunch and who some interesting Vietnamese women were, or what kind of a gun he could scrounge for me next.

Q: I hear he had quite a collection.

FLOTT: He did, at his house, at his little in a little pavilion outside his house. And we'd go there, and over some good bottles of authentic San Miguel beer from the Philippines, he'd say, "You like the AR-15? (It was still in very short supply in Vietnam.) Well, this is mine. I've got one, and we had five others, but we gave them to five key province chiefs as a prestige piece -- like getting a two-inch barrel .38 Police Special, with a concealed hammer, no visible hammer, hammerless model."

Q: I think General [Nguyen Ngoc] Loan had one of those, didn't he?

FLOTT: Yes. In the photo. Lou would say, "I'm sorry, I can't get you one of these right now. Actually you aren't missing much, because I don't have much ammunition for it. It's very hard to get caliber .223 ammo." And the ammo at that time was all marked "Remington UMC commercial-experimental" ammo. I was in the palace one minute after the cease-fire the morning after the coup, and there was all kinds of stuff around the floor. I remember filling all my pockets with cardboard boxes of twenty of these .223 caliber rounds, because I knew my old buddy Lou was short of cartridges for his "weapon," so I was picking it up -- I didn't think until later on that there were probably better souvenirs one might have picked up in the palace!

Q: This was ammo that the palace guard had had? They were armed with these?

FLOTT: Yes, the palace guard, these Nungs from Nhu, as a very elite force, did indeed have M-16s, yes. And there was a lot of ammo; not buckets and buckets of it, but if two hundred men had been in a firefight for eight hours, there's bound to be, say, a thousand rounds still in boxes of twenty scattered around. And I busily picked up all I could hold, because I understood it was in short supply and I didn't like waste.

Q: Where were you when the coup took place? When did you become aware that the thing was under way?

FLOTT: There was an old friend who was leaving the country, from whom I got a butler, named Larry Connel, C-O-N-N-E-L. And again, I had known him from -- he had been a colleague at the Laos conference, in the conference on Laos in Geneva, where I had interpreted for Governor Harriman and Secretary Rusk. So he was an old buddy from that conference, and I knew him when I arrived in country. He was one of the comparatively few people that I knew personally, and I just happened to be having lunch with him the day of the coup, up in his apartment. I'd been busy with Lodge at the palace, and I was going off to the States, I thought, the next morning, flying with Lodge when he went back to consult. And I had just moved out of the residence, got a place of my own, my own apartment very near the residence with line of sight for commo [communications]. And Larry Connel, who was leaving, very kindly agreed to supply me with his old servant, Nam. So we had to get together and have a working lunch up at his apartment to plan logistic details, because I was going to be gone for a week. And Larry suddenly got a phone call. I think some of his people notified him that something had started. About one minute after his phone call all hell broke loose with shooting of twenty millimeter and forty millimeter and .50 caliber anti-aircraft guns; all the Vietnamese Navy ships along the harbor were opening up, without anything at all to shoot at. But they just wanted to prove that they were on the side of whoever might win, and there was a terrific barrage going up from the ships, although they were not under attack.

So we rushed into the embassy, and I went in, went up to the top floor, in this very old, rickety apartment building with the usual sort of colonial outside passageways, these walkways outside the glass windows, then walkways inside the glass windows to keep you out of the rain. And all the secretaries were running around watching the big shoot-em-up down at the river. And I said, "Look, the most important thing you can do is get in your offices and shut your doors and get away from the glass. Because the one thing that is really disfiguring -- if you get a five-hundred-pound bomb with a near miss, and you're standing near a plate glass window, you may have scars for life." So that was about the one useful thing I did. Of course, nothing happened; we didn't get any bombs, but the first thing that occurred to me was get the troops out of the hot sun as far as being near glass.

Then I was in Lodge's office when he had the telephone call from Diem, that four-o'clock-in-the-afternoon call that you probably know of.

Q: Has that been accurately reported, as far as you know?

FLOTT: What, in a nutshell, is your version of it?

Q: That Diem called and asked what the attitude of the United States was toward this coup, and Lodge replied that he couldn't possibly know because it was four o'clock in the morning in Washington, and no one could have formed an opinion, and that he understood that Diem had been made an offer of safe conduct and he was concerned for his personal safety. Diem said that he was trying to restore order. And Lodge, I think, said, "If there's anything I could do to secure your person, let me know." And that, as I recall, is about it. Is that accurate?

FLOTT: That's very accurate; it's not quite complete. I'll perhaps add one thing. But that's exactly what happened. Diem called in and said, "What's the explanation for this?" And Lodge said, "I don't know." And Diem said, "What would be your advice?" Lodge said, "Well, you are a chief of state; I cannot give you advice, but personally, and as a friend, and as somebody who is concerned about your health" -- probably about his getting a good night's sleep and all -- "my suggestion would be you think seriously of getting away. Now, if I can be of any help on that, I'm prepared to send my driver with an officer of mine -- "

Q: Meaning you.

FLOTT: Yes -- "to escort you to safety. And we can get you on my jet aircraft, and I'm sure I can deliver on that. One of my officers will ride in the front seat of my limousine with the chauffeur." And of course, I was known as Lodge's special assistant and as an interpreter at the palace. I think that both the military and civilian staff around the palace would be rather likely to defer to American diplomats and the people who were occasionally seen with the President, as I had been in my interpreter role. So I think it is perhaps quite fair to say that there was indeed a very good chance that I could have talked the car into the compound, even though it was under siege. And who knows, maybe something more orderly could have been worked out in the meantime, like getting both commanders to agree to a safe conduct departure in advance or something of the sort, although Lodge had told me he didn't anticipate that they would.

But he had in mind my doing that kind of thing, and occasionally made flattering remarks in contexts that weren't quite clear, such as, "Well, Fred, you're a very brave man, and I'm sure you'd behave well under pressure and under fire." I said, "I hope so, Mr. Ambassador." But then when the question was of assisting President Diem to get out to the airplane, Lodge said, "Now, this is what I have in mind. I want you to ride in the car, and it'll have American flags. You go up to the gate and go in and get him and bring him out if he agrees to being evacuated." So I was definitely tabbed to do that, and that in fact was why I happened to be in the Ambassador's office at the time Diem telephoned Lodge.

And who knows, you know, there might have been some other game plans as well. For example, it might be that General Harkins could have gotten permission from the generals to get in there with a helicopter. But there was a plan and a well thought-out effort by Lodge to save Diem's life. If Diem had accepted our good offices to assure his escape to security, Lodge was prepared to assist and was prepared to have me up in the front seat of his automobile while doing so.

Q: But the upshot of that would have been that Diem would have left the country.

FLOTT: Yes. And Diem said, "No, I cannot agree to fleeing, because this is all a tempest in a teapot; it's a couple of hothead generals who don't speak for the army, and I know that the real troops are loyal to me and will soon have this all straightened out." And Lodge said, "Well, Mr. President, that is your decision, certainly. I cannot advise you one way or the other. But as I've said, if I can ever be of any assistance in looking after your security, I would certainly do so." Then Diem said, "Well, I want you to tell Washington that this is being done, and that I want them to land the BLTs [battalion landing teams], the two marine BLTs on the aircraft carriers offshore, I want them to land and protect the palace." And Lodge said, "Well, you know, it's four o'clock in the morning in Washington; we can't do that." Sort of a Lodge-like answer! He was always concerned about getting a good night's rest and allowing others to do so as well.

Q: Were you interpreting?

FLOTT: No, no. Lodge was speaking with Diem. I was just listening. You see, Lodge spoke very good French, but because of his position he could not interpret for CINCPAC or other visitors, which was why I did it.

Q: I understand, I was just wondering how you knew what was coming from the other end. Was this a radio conversation or a telephone-

FLOTT: No, it was telephone. It was not one of these old French phones with an ecouteur, where you could pick up another headpiece and listen. No, the phone was far enough from Lodge's ear so I could hear Diem. Of course, I was used to his voice. I didn't get it all, and I didn't make a transcript, but I could certainly hear everything that Lodge said to him and much of what Diem was saying. Like many people, Diem sort of shouted over the phone; Lodge would hold it away from his ear, and I was seated right beside him, so I pretty much heard him. Lodge filled me in currently, and later, too.

Ambassador Lodge was perfectly willing to send his car and driver and you to -- I think there's no doubt about it, that Lodge was willing to do anything he could to get Diem out of the country alive, if Diem wanted to do it. I also think Lodge could have delivered on it, and I know he no doubt had other plans, but one plan he had was for me to go in the front seat of his limousine, which was a big old Checker Cab, and go to the palace with the American flag, and talk our way through the thing, or hopefully with arrangements already having been made between the commanders of the coup.

Q: Do you think you would have been let through?

FLOTT: On balance, I do, yes. Taking Vietnam as it was in October of 1963, I think there was a good chance, yes.

Q: You say you got into the palace only an hour after it was taken.

FLOTT: That was the next morning.

Q: I see.

FLOTT: Roughly at 6:00 a.m. I stayed up all night at the embassy, watching as the situation developed, and incidentally, hearing Lou Conein reporting in from the coup's command post about every five minutes.

Q: Could you judge his state of mind from what he was saying?

FLOTT: Not so much. Now there -- I wouldn't swear. Where I actually heard him, I went down to wherever the CIA office was in the embassy, and the acting chief received me there, and said, "We're getting all these reports from Lou." They might have been sort of broadcast within the office by a loud-speaker system on the phone. I may have heard him directly. Maybe I was just getting secondhand accounts from other people; I didn't spend much time with them anyway. But there's no doubt about it, Lou Conein was with the coup leaders and giving the embassy excellent blow-by-blow accounts of what was going on, timely and accurate.

But the embassy had good reporting, too, of junior officers in the political section who'd been caught out by all the various fire fights going on, and the movement of troops and all, and would call in saying, "On such-and-such street crossing, and the following is going on: three APCs [armored personnel carriers] going this way," and so we had a pretty good feel for what was going on in town.

Then there was a lot of practically bombs-bursting-in-air stuff, because the palace was brought under fire by some, I believe, 105s, and maybe 155s, from about six or eight miles away, out toward Bien Hoa or something, and the Vietnamese were good artillerymen, just as the French were traditionally good artillerymen. They'd learned that, and they were lobbing shells right into the palace there, practically on the front doorstep. We were watching that from the roofs of the embassy, and sometimes there would be a lot of shooting and a lot of fireworks. And I stayed up more or less all night doing that.

One time in the middle of the night, another officer, Jim Rosenthal, who's presently our ambassador in Conakry, and I got into his little Volkswagen bug, and we drove about four blocks out from where the embassy was, and got to a square where there was an ARVN tank, and it turned its turret around and pointed the gun right at our car, and we decided we'd better get out of there. So we, with slow, deliberate speed, moved out.

Then the first thing the next morning, I forget even who I went with, but some other guy wanted to go over and have a quick look at the palace the minute the cease-fire went into effect. I went, and I thought if I ever had to justify why I did it, I had a good excuse, which was that because I was known at the palace and the guards were used to seeing me and all that, and if there were some kind of situation where one side or the other were going to start shooting their prisoners in the back of the neck or something, with luck I could perhaps have talked them out of it. I wouldn't want my own fate to depend on that, but with luck and right timing I could have perhaps done something useful. So I thought I'd go in for that, and of course I was curious just to see what it was like.

I walked in one minute after the cease-fire, with the first wave of Vietnamese marines who entered the place once the firing had stopped. I thought I was pretty early in the process, when I looked up and coming down the marble staircase from above was New York Times correspondent David Halberstam, carrying an ivory tusk about ten feet long that he was hauling out. And I contented myself with picking up some M-16 ammo from the floor that Lou Conein needed, I thought he needed for his gun. And besides, it was U.S. government property anyway. And I did take a couple of souvenir ashtrays, which I still have.

Q: Where is the best account of the coup?

FLOTT: Oh, and incidentally, one other thing at the palace: while walking into the palace up the steps to get up to the second floor, I also saw the body of the first man I ever saw who was shot in the head with the M-16 rifle, and it looked just like a tomato that somebody had stepped on.

He was being hauled downstairs at the time. And there were soldiers doing a little bit of looting, but there was also some semblance of discipline. They'd looted a real good Austrian hunting rifle, a high-priced type Mannlicher, and somebody offered to buy it from the soldier. He said, "No, we can't sell weapons." Somebody grabbed a bottle of wine and I think the guidelines were if you tried to buy it, they'd say no.

If you said, "I want to drink it right here with you," they'd say, "Well, since you insist," and they'd drink it. But it was pretty well-disciplined.

Q: You said these were marines, primarily?

FLOTT: I remember marines being there, but there were various units.

Q: [Nguyen Van] Thieu's troops were there, were they not, also?

FLOTT: Probably. I don't remember the order of the battle exactly, but I thought there were. I do remember about an hour later -- well, I'll give you the whole personal chronology. Five minutes later, walking back to the embassy from the palace, which was close by, we came to one building which was pretty well shot up. It was, say, on the periphery of the palace, where there had been some shoot-'em-up, and there was a totally burned out APC, M-113. It must have had about six jerrycans of gasoline on the back, and got a tracer in it or something, and everybody in it was just completely incinerated. And I remember walking around the outside. It blew up, I guess, and was partly blown open, and probably a lot of people were burned inside. But I was walking around sort of looking at what had gone on, and I remember hearing a priest with a Very Irish brogue, behind me, saying, "Watch where you're going, mister, you're walking on human remains." Very sternly, he was saying [it]. He meant business, and he was right. I just didn't realize it, but there were small fragments of human remains on the ground and I was walking over them, with no disrespect intended. I just hadn't even noticed them. You know, pretty well burned, but not completely powder.

I went back to the embassy, saw Lodge --

Q: What was his reaction to all this?

FLOTT: Shock at the fact that Diem and Nhu had been killed in the way that we had just learned they had been, and certainly no gloating over it. Just shock that this man who had done so much for his country for so long a time had been killed, and especially in that manner, as part of the succession process. I told him I'd picked up a couple of ashtrays from the conference room in the palace where he and I had worked so many times before. I asked him if he wanted an ashtray. He definitely did not. He said, "Well, Fred, my trip to Washington is clearly off now," his planned departure on that plane on which I was going to have a ride. He said, "I've released the plane; it's going to wheels-up in two hours. If you want to fly back to Washington, you are certainly free to go on it. I've given you leave, and you can take it if you want." And I said, "Well, I appreciate that very much." He said, "This thing is all over. It's over." Well, I said, "Are you sure you can spare me and there's nothing you want me to do here now?" because it wasn't a good time for me to be leaving. And he said, "No. It's all over. It's all over; it's finished. Go back and see your mother and get a hop back here as quickly as you can." I said, "Okay. I certainly appreciate that, and I'll do so."

Just at that time, there was a sustained burst of small-arms fire. Some machine gun, some rifle; clearly there were several participants. And I said -- you know, I was very close to his sons and all, and they had asked me to look after their parents, and I said, "Mr. Ambassador, I just can't quite be sure that this thing is over yet. It doesn't sound -- who knows what's going to happen next. I think I'd probably better stay around." He said, "Well, my boy, that's your decision to make. Do as you wish," and he brushed it off. And so I said, "Yes, I'll do that."

He said, "Well, go home, get a night's sleep." This was about ten in the morning.

So I went home and went to bed, not having had any sleep that night. And as you might imagine, woke up in about one hour, unable to get back to sleep. And then I began to think, and I began to kick myself for not having gone back to Washington. I thought, "Good God. I would have seen Bob Kennedy; I would have renewed my contact with him, and everybody would have been picking my brains and I would have been the first guy back from Saigon after the coup. How crazy can you be? I really zipped when I should have zagged."

So I went back to the embassy; there was no reason to hang around my apartment with insomnia. So I went back to the embassy to see what was going on and get up to speed on what all had happened, and when and how and where do we go from here. So I was there about five in the afternoon, just at dusk, and Lodge came into my office and said, "How are you feeling, Fred? Did you get some sleep?" I said, "Well, I have the most awful feeling that I've made a big mistake. I should have taken you up on it when you said go back to Washington. But now nothing's happening here, and I should have gone out on that plane. We could have done some useful work in Washington and I would have seen my mother." He said, "Well, my boy, don't come to me with your problems. I've got enough problems of my own," and very breezily went out of the office. He said, "Why don't you come and have supper tonight with Emily and me, and we'll talk about all this," because I was no longer living at the residence; I had my own little apartment nearby.

So I went there, and had dinner with the Lodges. We just talked about things and what was going on. The next morning, I went into the office, and about five o'clock in the afternoon, the day after I'd missed my plane, Lodge and Mike Dunn came in my office saying they had a mission: they wanted me to fly back to the States. It was a totally different airplane; the big bird from the White House, the KC-135, had left, but the following had happened, Lodge explained. This shows how he operated and also shows how he doesn't draw a picture of something he wants you to do; he doesn't even admit that he would want you to understand what he wanted you to do. He said, "Look, the following has happened. Madame Nhu" -- was in Los Angeles with her eldest daughter, Le Thuy. Her two sons, who were younger, and one baby daughter had been up in Dalat. And the people who were responsible for protecting them in Dalat had sort of hid them out in the woods nearby for a day or so, and then brought them down to Saigon. Lodge said, "I prevailed upon the generals to get these children back to their mother. And what I want you to do is, one hour from now -- you've got an hour to pack and get out to Tan Son Nhut. The children are out there. We've got General Harkins' C-54, which will fly you to Bangkok, and then I want you to fly commercial with them to Rome, and turn them over to Archbishop [Ngo Dinh] Thuc? the brother of Diem," and he gave me a couple of other errands to do. It was the time of the ecumenical conference at the Vatican, and whoever the archbishop of Boston, or cardinal -- was it [Francis Cardinal] Spellman, or -- ?

Q: [Richard Cardinal] Cushing?

FLOTT: Cushing, maybe it was. He said he was there. And he said, "When you're in Rome, after you've given your press conference and explained the situation here" -- without telling me what to say, of course -- "call on Cardinal Cushing, give him my respects, and tell him that I asked you to stop in to see him and brief him on the situation." Well, there Lodge is, a good politician who didn't want to be misrepresented by possible detractors as a man who'd got a couple of Catholic statesmen assassinated, and he figured he might as well set the record straight with Cardinal Cushing in Rome. And he said, "Explain to him what the new junta's like."

So I got out to the airport, pitch dark, curfew, and the driver I had had difficulty finding it. I probably wasn't much help, because I wasn't used to driving around myself at blacked-out airports. Got out to a special military hangar and got on this C-54, and there were the Nhu children. The CIA station chief had designated one embassy wife who was a nurse to ride with us as far as Bangkok on General Harkins' C-54, and I had the option of taking her all the way to Rome if I had wanted her help with the children. But she was working part-time as a secretary in their station, I think. So when we got to Bangkok, this lady would have been glad to go on to Rome, but I said, "Look, I really don't need any help, the way this thing's handled now. Mission accomplished; go back to your post." Which she did, and took it in good spirits. It was the only decision to make.

Anyway, we got on the plane, and there was the eldest son of Nhu, who looked just like him, who was a kid, say, of eleven or twelve. Then there was his younger brother and the baby sister, and they all had, of course, different levels of awareness. And they'd been hiding out in the jungle for about a day or so, just as the first precaution that the people with them took, and once they saw that the coup was successful -- they were just army officers who happened to be detailed to protecting the family up in Dalat, so they brought the kids in and reported in to the generals. And Lodge did make the pitch, "I want to rejoin those kids with their mother in Rome." Well, of course the consequence of that was hopefully it would draw the mother out of Los Angeles, which, as you've seen from the telegrams, there was some desire to do.

So we flew immediately to Bangkok, two hours by prop, or so, hardly had time to talk to anybody, just collecting my wits, and looking at what I had in my musette bag, and we got there. There arrangements had been made. They had a public health officer who gave the kids a quickie physical, made sure they had no fever, gave them the usual antimalarial prophylaxis and all that stuff. And they were in perfectly good shape.

We'd rushed out of the C-54 and were just about to load them on the Pan Am commercial jet going on the milk run Pan Am route that stopped everywhere, Bangkok, Rangoon, Calcutta, Delhi, Karachi, finally getting to Rome. Again, the Pan Am station manager was very cooperative and handled it very well, and the Bangkok embassy was supportive, and all the right players were there and did all the right things to get the kids on their way with minimum trauma. They did put us all in first class, four of us had seats in first class, and the younger brother, the nine-year-old kid, sat with the baby sister and I sat with the eleven- or twelve-year-old, who was -- they were all bilingual in French, except the baby, and the twelve-year-old kid I really had a lot of respect for, because he rose to the occasion very well. He wasn't crying, sort of an Asian outward passivity or composure on the thing. And once we got rolling, our main concern was for nobody to notice them, and I didn't get off the plane until we got to Rome and they didn't either.

And I remember with the elder son of Nhu, reading the paper, and there was already an English-language paper in Bangkok that somebody had picked up, maybe in India, with accounts of the coup. And the kid read the account of the condition in which his father and his uncle had been found in the back of this armored personnel carrier, with their heads squashed by rifle butts, and all kinds of bayonet wounds in them and everything else, all cut up, and their heads squashed. And he was reading this with complete calm. He read English quite well, although we talked in French. But he didn't understand the word "squashed," so he said to me in French, "What's the word for squashed" I said, "Ecrabouille." I said, "It means squashed, but you don't want to pay too much attention to the details, because the reporters probably didn't even see it, and it's the way they write their things." And he took it very calmly, went on and talked and eventually I got them to Rome, having avoided the press and the public along the way.

Archbishop Thuc met us there, at planeside. He was very hostile, because he knew I was sent by Cabot Lodge to accompany the children. There were about a hundred and fifty Italian newsmen there and other press people. I went up to the Archbishop to pay my respects, pay my condolences, and tell him I'd been asked by Ambassador Lodge to deliver the children to him, so they could rejoin their mother, so their mother could rejoin them. He wouldn't speak to me, wouldn't shake hands, nothing. Total distance, total ice treatment. Packed them into the car, not a word of thanks, nothing. No attempt at courtesy to the crew of the Pan Am plane. I had told the captain of the aircraft what our trip was about. He probably knew from his channels, anyway. And we had protected these kids from all possible trauma; there had been no scene, nobody came up and talked to them during the whole trip. But not a word of thanks to Lodge, to me, to Pan Am, or anybody. Archbishop Thuc packed them into a big limousine he had and tore off.

Well, then the press of course wanted to talk to me. I was very glad to answer their questions. They said, "Are you the Scarlet Pimpernel? Have you saved these children's lives?" I said, "No, not at all. The children were in no jeopardy at all. Their guardians took understandable immediate security measures the minute the coup started, but the officers who were charged with their safety in Dalat knew that the officers who were behind the coup were responsible officers like themselves, and they quickly turned the children over to them. Ambassador Lodge suggested to the coup leaders that the children should be allowed to rejoin their mother, and the generals in the coup, responding to the same humanitarian concerns themselves, said 'Why not?' And simply because I'm one of Lodge's staff, he asked me to accompany the children here to make sure they didn't have any problems along the way. But there's no Scarlet Pimpernel; they were in no danger in Saigon, either." And I answered questions in that vein. Well, of course, Madame Nhu hated my guts for that. She hated my guts for working for Cabot Lodge, for that matter. There was no love lost between the Nhuses and Lodge.

I got there, if I'm not mistaken, about on a Tuesday, in Rome. We thought Madame Nhu was coming, but I waited around until Friday, and she hadn't come. She just wasn't leaving Los Angeles. But she, in the meantime, continued her tirades, saying that Lodge was a monster with blood dripping from his hands, who had arranged the murder of her husband. And I was explaining to all the press, and it got quoted in the New York Times and everything else, that this was a Vietnamese coup, that the generals were certainly not ogres; they thought they could run the war effort better than Diem and Nhu, that they seemed to be taking things pretty well in hand, and we were optimistic about the outcome, and that Lodge's only concern was a purely humanitarian one of getting the children back to their mother. And having it emerge, "Well, why doesn't the mother come to the children?" And I said, "Well, we did the best thing. Pending her return, they are in the hands of their uncle the Archbishop, which is fine."

Then finally after waiting four days, because of my instructions, if you can call them that, I left. I had been told by Lodge to go and do whatever is necessary and proper. The way I interpreted my mission, I would have waited a few days for Madame Nhu, to pay his condolences, to touch whatever bases could be touched, not with any illusions about it being well received, but just to extend the courtesy I'd wait three days. She didn't come back, so I eventually went back to the States and joined Lodge there.

I flew first to Boston and stayed overnight with his two sons and their wives, and had a good talk with them. That was mid-November. Later, George Lodge had a business appointment in Washington, so we flew down together on the shuttle. I'd arrived without any overcoat or anything, and his wife gave me an old overcoat that George had had in prep school. Since George is six feet six, it was about six inches too long for me; it fit like a tent. But I took it; I was glad to have a coat in Washington in November. We got down to Washington about noon.

I went over to the State Department and just on the way up in the elevator, somebody who'd heard of the assassination told the tragic news. I remember there was a secretary standing next to me in the elevator, and a girl friend of hers who'd just heard the television told her that Kennedy had been shot and dead, and this girl let out a loud scream of grief. So I walked into Bill Sullivan's office, and he was watching the TV and getting the word that President Kennedy was indeed dead. I tried to engage Bill Sullivan in a serious discussion of the situation in Saigon, but he was so sickened by the loss of President Kennedy he said, "Fred, this afternoon I'm afraid I really can't talk shop very well." So I had nobody to talk to.

The next day I gave Joe Alsop a call, because I'd had a lot to do with Joe Alsop in Saigon. He was sometimes a house guest at the Lodge residence when I was living there. When Joe came to be house guest, Mike Dunn and I would double up in one of our rooms and Joe would take the other one. So I called Joe on Saturday morning, and he was a good newspaperman, figuring well, the world goes on. So he said, "Well, I suppose we shouldn't do this, but why don't you come over and have lunch and have a talk?" So I went over to his house in Georgetown and had a talk.

But another interesting vignette from that period was: I stayed in Washington while Lodge was there, and he was going back just the opposite way I was. I'd come from Rome and was going back to Saigon through the Far East, partly to buy some furniture in Hong Kong for my house and all, and I also had things to do in Japan, and I was making my way back that way. Lodge was going through Europe. So we were together a few days in Washington, then went our respective ways.

I got out to Chicago to see my mother, and went into a friend's office, who was a businessman on La Salle Street, and asked if I could use his typewriter, because I wanted to send a letter of condolence to Bob Kennedy. So whatever day Kennedy was killed, it was about five days later. You can imagine all the things going on in Washington in the life of the Kennedys. I wrote a letter of condolences to Bob Kennedy, and mailed it. In Saigon about eight days later I had an answer from him, in his own handwriting, which you can't mistake; it's a very small scroll in black ink, and a copy of the mass card and all that. Just a few words acknowledging my condolences. "Many thanks, Fred, for your condolences. By the way, keep your head down and watch out for yourself over there." And this got to me about eight days after I'd mailed my letter in Chicago. Of course, the APO [Army and Air Force Post Office] to Saigon was fabulous, but it just shows how well organized the Kennedys were. Obviously their staff had screened tons of mail; they thought, "Well, this one sounds like someone who knew Bob, and who had met the President" -- because I'd met with him. Lodge took me in with him to the Oval Office to meet President Kennedy when Lodge finally took leave of him, going out to Saigon in August, because I was supposed to be a possible liaison channel, or as a legman-courier, basically. And Lodge wanted me to meet President Kennedy and he wanted it known to the White House staff that he brought me in to wire me in with the President, too. I had met the President before, with Bob, after our trip to Russia, and he knew I was Bob's interpreter going through the Soviet Union. And President Kennedy -- this was in early August of 1963 -- looked me up and down in mock shock, said, "Hey, you were with my brother [in Russia]. What are you doing coming in as the chosen instrument of a Republican who picked you because he trusts you? What's going on here that I don't know about?" or words to that effect. He made a little joke out of that. And again, pat on the back and kick in the tail, and good wishes, the best possible way.

So in late November we went back to Saigon and started seeing how the country was going to be governed by the MCR, whether the Military Council-

Q: Oh, gosh, I can't-

FLOTT: The CMR, the Consell Militaire de la Revolution.

Q: Revolutionary Military Council.

FLOTT: Yes, whatever. And then I started meeting a whole new set of players, and seeing more of different people, and this goes on. If you have a thought or a question-

Q: No, no. I was just going to ask if the changed situation in Saigon put new requirements on you.

FLOTT: Yes. It was, well, a number of things. All such things as dealing with the Vietnamese third force, dealing with emigres, flying back and forth to say what we were up to and all; that was clearly not needed now. To some extent it would have been overtaken even in the normal course of events, but it was all the more overtaken because of the coup and the new government, so I concentrated on other things.

I must say, further to these memories of the coup -- I mentioned how after the coup I went home, had insomnia, thought I'd zipped when I should have zagged by not flying back to Washington at once. So I went back to the office about five in the afternoon and started reading telegrams. This concerns the French embassy, and I'll get back to how I was dealing with them, but the French embassy was pretty much cut off from information about the coup. Because after all, they were rightly or wrongly regarded as closer to Diem somehow, and the presumption was that they were well wired in. But immediately after the coup the French just didn't know who was in the new government, etc. at that time, that particular day after the coup. And the French charge, who had been told by Cabot Lodge that he could do this when he had an emergency, came over to the embassy, called on me, and said, "Look, I just don't know what in hell is going on. We hear all kinds of rumors, but do you know anything?" And I said, "Yes, we're pretty well informed."

We had a pile of telegrams -- it was literally a foot high -- of reports to Washington that had been going out every five minutes or so, and they were all of low security classification, unclassified or restricted, maybe. Almost press bulletins, announcements, etc. All stuff that -- for one thing, was all overtaken by events, it was by any common-sense criteria no longer secret, but it was a blow-by-blow description of everything that had happened, in the public record, in the past two days, plus a lot of Foreign Broadcast Information Service, everybody's monitoring of everything. These were my copies; I routinely got individual copies of all the traffic.

This French chargé d'affaires came in, and he wanted to have sort of a collegial, tour d'horizon, discussing who was on what base and what was going on and what did we think of all this. And I discussed it with him and answered all his questions; he really was in the dark that day. He claimed all his sources were out of touch, which I'm sure they were, while they were waiting for things to be clarified. I said, "You know, I've told you as much as I have time to discuss, but I have here a pile of telegrams which I'm not going to be reading tonight. If you want to borrow them, I'm afraid I have to ask to have them back, because I may need the copies. But you're welcome" -- this was, say, at two in the afternoon -- "you're welcome to take them home with you and peruse them, and then try to bring them back for me sometime tomorrow, if you can." He was very grateful, because the French, who were temporarily completely cut out from everything, were thus enabled able to know what was happening. What I was doing was essentially on instructions from Cabot Lodge. So I gave him all this stuff, and he brought it back the next day, with his visiting card and with the note, "Avec mes tres vifs remerciements personnels," "With my very warm personal thanks." It was one of the more useful things that I did, because it made him look good in Paris; it didn't cost us anything. His name was Georges Perruche, P-E-R-R-U-C-H-E, and he died about six or eight months ago. He later became the French ambassador in Mongolia and Kabul. He did many things to repay the favor in the years that followed, and was a good and wise colleague indeed.

The background of the relation with Perruche was that when we first arrived in Saigon, when I was living in Lodge's residence, everybody had tales to tell, horror stories to tell, about the French, accusing them of all sorts of things. One French military attaché remarked to me that the French were really in a difficult position, "Because if the Viet Cong fight well, they (those who blame the French for everything) claim they're getting French advisers, and when the ARVN fights poorly, they say it's because they were French-trained. Logically, they can't have it both ways!" (Laughter)

But the French were blamed for being in cahoots with the Viet Cong and all that, and there were all sorts of lower-level French types in Saigon, who thought the sinister Americans were really there to take their place. I didn't see many Americans who wanted to stay there and rival some Corsican over who was going to be in charge of a small restaurant or something. And there'd be complaints about noise from American generators and complaints about MACV trucks and everything else.

I was still living at the residence, and one Saturday, when we weren't too busy -- this was about two weeks after we got there -- the French chargé's wife was absent from country at the time, but Lodge invited him over to lunch. And of course he was delighted to come. It was just Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Lodge, and myself, and of course the French guest. The fact that both Lodges spoke excellent French helped set the stage. And Lodge said, "Now, look. As you see, Fred is very close to me; he's a friend, he lives in the house with us, and all. I want you to know that I am pro-France. I know Fred is very pro-France. Now, that doesn't mean I agree necessarily with everything General de Gaulle would say. I don't like some things General de Gaulle has done. Perhaps you do; perhaps you don't. In any case, you can't say, and I can't say.

"However, I would like to, as much as we can, avoid any unnecessary damage to longer-term Franco-American relations because of the situations in which we both find ourselves here in Saigon. So I have asked Fred to sort of honcho the French business, and if ever any French person has any complaint about anything the American military are doing, the American civilians are doing, commercial people, anything, they go to him with it and he will refer it to the proper authorities within the country team. And by the same token, if you ever have to see me -- as you might imagine, I'm very busy: try to solve most of your problems with the American embassy directly through Fred, but if ever you feel that you absolutely have to talk to me for something -- I can imagine how some cases might arise -- then he is well situated to get you in to see me, and my instructions to him are to do so." So Perruche was delighted at that, and that was why he felt it was not out of bounds for him to come to me and say, "What do you know about this?" and, "Please fill me in." We had a very good working relation, thanks to Lodge's initiative and to Perruche's reception of it.

As a result of my ties to the French, really, because I was handling that French account, months later, when the American Embassy got blown up on March 31 of 1965, I guess it was, I happened to be out of my office. That day I was going out to visit a French plantation; it was up-country, well behind the Viet Cong lines, to whatever extent anyone had lines, and the deal was that these French plantation types were going to be there -- the European Frenchmen who were there -- would know who I was. Well, they'd know I was an American who spoke French and was a friend of theirs. The Vietnamese employees would not know that I was anything other than a Frenchman from the company headquarters in Paris, who was visiting in Vietnam and for whom a luncheon was to be given.

So I went out from Saigon on a French airplane, an old bucket of bolts, a single-engine biplane, one of those puddle jumpers the plantations had. The pilot who flew it -- about nine o'clock in the morning -- had such shakes or DTs that he couldn't get the ignition key into the switch. So he took out his flask of whiskey, had a shot of whiskey to pull his nerves together a little, then put in the key. We flew first to one place where we visited one plantation, then we went over to the one where they were having this luncheon.

While we were there, we first got the word over their plantation wireless that there'd been an incident in Saigon. "On a plastique l'Ambassade des Etats-Unis." Plastique can mean anything; it can mean one set off a light explosive, or made a racket, or set off a big firecracker, or small explosion -- at the American Embassy. We sort of laughed a bit, and they said, "Well, everybody's going to blame it on the French, and they'll blame it on you, and they'll say a day was picked when you weren't there. And that'll prove you're guilty and that your sinister French contacts have done this." We sort of joked about that, not yet knowing how serious it was, and then we had a good lunch. One of the officers of the plantation who'd been in the Foreign Legion mentioned that there was an old Foreign Legion mess hall nearby -- left from the 1954 war, and we went over to look at it and read the graffiti and all, and came back for a siesta in a little air-conditioned bedroom. I had a nice siesta, for about half an hour. When I got up from that they said, "Look, we've got bad news. This embassy thing sounds as though it's pretty serious. It was quite a big bomb and all, and apparently some people were killed and injured." I said, "Well, look," -- I had planned to spend the weekend with them -- "in that case, I better ask you to fly me back to Saigon." So I got back to Saigon an hour later.

Q: In that same airplane?

FLOTT: Yes. And got in to the embassy, and went into my office, and I had a big leather upholstered chair in my room where I usually sat; at my desk there was a big leather chair. The windows were all blown out and there were three big chunks of plate glass about a foot and a half by a foot and a half stuck right in the chair where I would have been. Or more likely, when the embassy got blown up, like everybody else, I would have rushed to the windows, and there I would have got a whole face full of glass. It just shows that sometimes you're lucky and sometimes you aren't. That's all for the moment.

Q: Now after escorting the Nhu children out of country, you were gone then for how long?

FLOTT: Oh, I was out of country for about two and a half weeks. I went from Rome back to Washington; as I mentioned earlier, I arrived there the day of the assassination of President Kennedy in Dallas. Then I went back via the Far East, stopped off and saw our embassy in Japan and the people in Hong Kong. [Henry Cabot] Lodge went to Rome, and I got back to Saigon, oh, I would guess it must have been about the tenth of December. Well, now, Kennedy was assassinated on the twenty-second, was he not? Okay. Well, then I got there about the tenth of December. I got there about two weeks after the assassination.

Q: Okay.

FLOTT: When I got back to Saigon I obviously had a lot of catching up to do because I was out of touch, you might say, with the members of the new military council, and the atmosphere was definitely one of being supportive of them. The embassy was doing everything they could to be supportive, to help them both image-wise and substance-wise, advice, support, everything, and there was some question about how well they do their job, and at the outset the impression was positive. Big Minh [Duong Van Minh] was perhaps a bit phlegmatic, but he commanded a lot of loyalties. and our impressions were positive.

Q: How long did that last?

FLOTT: Well, as long as the group did, as far as we were concerned. We were quite surprised by the [Nguyen] Khanh coup on January 30 of 1964.

Q: Well, before we get to that, can we talk about the [Robert] McNamara visit of December 1963?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: From what vantage point did you observe this? Were you interpreter for him?

FLOTT: Yes, I was, but perhaps more importantly, I was sitting in the office with Cabot Lodge and McNamara and one or two other officers, and we were discussing what we were going to do on various subjects. I do remember definitely a little bit of a number game. They were very much interested in being able to announce that the number of advisers was dramatically reduced from sixteen thousand to fifteen thousand, because at that point in time it had been up to sixteen thousand, and they sent back to the States certain categories of advisers, saying their mission was completed and they can leave country. And there was the usual talk about improving the Vietnamese war effort and getting them to have a draft and that sort of thing. And then, of course, we also had conversations with the Vietnamese, for which I interpreted in French.

Q: What was McNamara there for? Was this just one more fact-finding trip or -- ?

FLOTT: Yes, I think so, and of course MACV, the military people, were the main hosts -- well, not the main hosts for his visit, but they had a heavy claim on his time. There were lot of things that went on, I'm sure, between McNamara and his military constituents that I wasn't privy to or just didn't happen to rub elbows with.

Q: One of the telegrams I think I sent you has Lodge asking McNamara for one hour of his time alone. Do you have any idea what transpired between the men? There have been reports that Lodge was trying to convince McNamara that the military reporting was not what it should be.

FLOTT: That would be very plausible. It could easily be the case. The one hour alone might have been that meeting I sat in on because it was a pretty small group, and I could imagine how Lodge might have got him alone and then invited in, say, Mike Dunn and myself. Or Lodge is a very courteous, attentive man on most matters, and it's quite possible that he figured if he had to give McNamara any bad news, he'd give it to him one-on-one, and it's quite possible there was indeed such a meeting. I know all of us felt that the military, as I mentioned at the outset, had this way of equating unquestioning and unreasonable optimism with being the equivalent of loyalty and suitability for command. And that, however good it is for taking hills, isn't the best way to deal with delicate Asian political equations, and that inherent failing of the military, I suppose, was made all the more harmful because of the nature of McNamara's own background. He was essentially an engineer, and now he'd be a computer whiz and a managerial whiz, and he was very much out of his element in Southeast Asia. You know, I have the highest respect for his integrity, intelligence, ability, everything else, except that if there was ever a fish out of water, it's the decent, forthright, hard-working personality of McNamara dealing with the opportunistic, self-serving leaders of successive Vietnamese coups.

Q: Someone said that Mr. McNamara was the smartest man he had ever met but he had no wisdom.

FLOTT: Yes, I saw that quote somewhere. I wouldn't go that far. I'd just say he was very much a fish out of water personality-wise, temperament-wise, and especially background-wise, in Southeast Asia.

Q: Some of the cables from this period refer to Long An province and province representative Earl Young and some reporting that was coming out of there. Did you have any insight into that?

FLOTT: I'm sure I must have at the time. That doesn't ring a bell, and I don't recall that. Long An, I went down there once myself. It's south of Saigon, isn't it?

Q: Yes.

FLOTT: I went down there once, and that for a while seemed to be a more hopeful place, if I'm not mistaken. Or at least we hoped it would get better, but it was just par for the course, and I don't remember the details.

Q: Okay. Anything else on the McNamara visit that we need to get into the record?

FLOTT: No, I don't think so on that one.

Q: Okay. Did you at the time have some evaluation of the performance of the new junta?

FLOTT: I thought they were -- it was our impression, because basically most of my impressions were secondhand, a condensation of what other people had told me -- I thought they were doing rather well, yes.

Q: What vantage point did you have to observe the events of the Khanh coup in January? Let me ask a specific question first of all. Did you have any hint that the coup was coming?

FLOTT: Oh, none at all. And that was one coup during which I did not happen to be duty officer. I was peacefully at my apartment, came into the office at seven o'clock in the morning and learned that there had been a coup. Even Mike Dunn had only learned about it about half an hour before himself because Lodge called him for some arrangement with the military or something.

Q: How was it possible for Khanh to keep such secrecy? Surely some Americans must have known. The American advisers to the troop units, perhaps?

FLOTT: Not really. First of all, the American military advisers, you might say, were also fish out of water in that environment. I'm sure they were doing a very good and conscientious job of advising, giving perhaps tactical advice or training advice and all that, but my inclination would be to doubt that they would really get through to and establish buddy-buddy relationships with conspiring Vietnamese who'd talk to them. In other words, the military did not have a Lou Conein in its quiver of arrows, which may be one reason why the military don't like Lou Conein.

Q: Do you know who Khanh's adviser was?

FLOTT: Yes, and that was a personality. There was indeed some American general -- I'm sort of backing down from what I've just said now, when you mention his adviser. If I remember correctly, there was some American officer. It may even have been a young general or colonel who was very close to Khanh and with whom -- I wouldn't say Khanh leveled with him on the preparation -- but whom Khanh sought out the minute the fat was in the fire, yes.

Q: You don't recall the name, do you?

FLOTT: I don't, but it's a matter of public record. It was in the press at the time.

Q: Was it Jasper Wilson? Does that name ring a bell?

FLOTT: It doesn't, but I wasn't very good on American military names so-

Q: Okay. What was Ambassador Lodge's reaction to this development?

FLOTT: Well, in the first place, I don't know all of his reactions. I think like any man with an inquiring mind -- one of the main burdens of Khanh's argument was the reason, the justification, the apologia pro vita sua for having the coup was because the four generals were about to betray everything to the French. Lodge approached that, I think, with some instinctive skepticism, just wondering, "Are things really that simple?" and "Okay. Fine. You say that's it. What are the proofs? It would be very helpful to have evidence in support of these things."

It just happens that that day, that same day for lunch, I was invited to the residence of the French chargé d'affaires, Georges Perruche, and I went into Ambassador Lodge's office just before going off to lunch with Perruche, and General [William] Westmoreland was there. Westy had just fairly recently arrived in country and was just meeting all the players, and I told him, "Well, this is a funny, fortuitous time. The luncheon invitation has been planned for about a week or ten days, I guess, but it's a funny coincidence that I'm having lunch with the French." And I sort of got my last-minute instructions, which probably weren't any instructions because they figured I already knew what I was supposed to do. I said, "Well, it's really going to be fun going over all these charges." Because Khanh had already gone on the air with flagrant charges against the four generals for selling out the country to France and alleging that France was behind the plot and all that.

And you know, in a way, where there's smoke, there's a little fire. But the way I would situate that is, of course, that some French instinctively resented the American pre-eminence in Vietnam, which had been their turf. In an emotional way they resented it. Now, to carry that to say the French government was planning coups is, I think, ridiculous and untrue. But you can see, in terms of generally known attitudes, where somebody had a straw to grab on in embroidering on this issue and making these allegations, even if it weren't warranted or not fully warranted and not even 3 percent warranted.

But anyway, when I remarked I was having lunch with the French charge and it was going to be fun seeing what he had to say in reaction to Khanh's remark, Westy's remark, which I remember was, "Boy, this is going to be quite a lunch. Your host doesn't realize yet just how bad a luncheon this is going to be." He thought that was a good joke, and I went off to lunch and, of course, had my conversation with the French charge. And as usual, we just were awaiting more information and more facts, and nothing of great significance came out of that luncheon. I think from his point of view, if I can presume to judge what he was trying to do, he, I'm sure, was trying to look to see if the Americans were beating anti-French drums, which we were not, and I think I may even have had authority to tell him that Lodge had asked for proof of all these allegations and was willing to look at evidence, but so far we had none. I would imagine that Perruche was relieved to see that the Americans -- especially Lodge -- were not uncritically accepting the line of the Khanh coup about French intrigues.

Q: You see this French involvement or alleged involvement. It crops up over and over again in the Vietnam story, and you get the impression that people were using it like a red herring.

FLOTT: Yes. On balance, I don't want to be accused of being soft on the French or anything, but I think I am objective, and I think I know as much about it as anyone because that was one of my principal responsibilities, that and Free World Assistance. People were using it as a red herring, and some military adviser who wasn't very effective with the Vietnamese he was advising, perhaps through no fault of his own -- but it was very easy for him to blame his difficulties on the alleged fact that all the French rubber plantation managers were selling information to the Viet Cong and that sort of thing. There were a lot of allegations made at a low level, and on the French side, there were a lot of low-level types who thought, "Well, the Americans want to take our place here and take over our pizza parlors and things," which of course was not the case.

Q: Let me ask you a hypothetical question on the French business. If the French charge or the ambassador could have written his own ticket for Vietnam's future for a resolution of the conflict and so on, what do you suppose it would have looked like?

FLOTT: Well, I think it would have been the Quai d'Orsay line, leaning towards neutralism. But, as Ambassador Lodge pointed out wisely many times, you can't settle for neutralism when your military affairs are going downhill. Lodge mentioned many times, "If the French had had a conference on neutralism with the Germans, who were occupying France in 1943, it wouldn't have been so good." It was not the moment to do it. But I think the French had a feeling, which ultimately proved to be correct, that real national fiber in South Vietnam just wasn't there. The human qualities, the will to sacrifice, the ability to forge a popular political base, just weren't there to win the thing, and that rightly or wrongly, all things being relative, the communists were the more attractive party to many of the people whose views would be determinant, namely potential recruits for the Viet Cong and the highly motivated North Vietnamese army. And of course the French attached great importance to a continuing French presence, cultural and economic, in Indochina.

FLOTT: The French were closer to that reality, and the Americans still had a sort of ebullient can-do, which impression was enhanced by all these bright, young military advisers who had learned at West Point that any platoon they commanded was the best in the world and all that sort of thing.

Right. Okay. The Khanh coup generated a rather unique problem, and that was the problem that was referred to as the "plight of the Dalat generals," I think, in a few places. What is that all about? Well, the Dalat generals, the first thing that should be said about them is that they were the artisans of expelling [Ngo Dinh Diem in the November 1 coup] ...

Q: Except that Big Minh was not with them in Dalat.

FLOTT: Yes, but Big Minh was sort of a sacred cow, and the Khanh group simply isolated him. He was so passive anyway that they didn't have to put him under house arrest. They could just shove him off to a side and not give him copies of all the telegrams, and he was just as much out of action playing tennis in Saigon as he would have been under house arrest in Dalat. The other four were more active, and they were accused of having French ties.

Now these are all men who, from their previous military history, had indeed been close to the French, but they were not pro-French to the extent of being anti-American. I very much doubt that they were engaged in any plot with the French, but it depends on what you mean by plot. They might have had a drink with some Frenchman who subscribed to this sort of neutralist line, or the theory that rather than bleed the country white, you should make an agreement or settle something, but that doesn't mean the French were pushing an agreement. What I am saying is, there were a lot of Frenchmen who were, perhaps, inclined to seek to foresee that kind of a solution. These generals might indeed have talked to some such persons without necessarily buying what they had to say, even. But that would be my gut feeling about what the extent of the problem was. But from our mission point of view, these Dalat generals were highly persona non grata to the Khanh government, to which we were trying to be supportive because after the January 31 coup it was the government in power.

Q: But did their plight present some kind of a problem, an attitudinal problem for the mission or -- ?

FLOTT: Yes, Lodge was very concerned that these four men, good men with whom he had been dealing the day before, were suddenly under house arrest. And Lodge made the predictable representations that any high American official would have made: well, these men should get a fair trial, and if they're accused, the evidence should be presented, or if there is no substance to the evidence, that they should be acquitted and released. Lodge did that, as much as he could, without running into problems of intervening in Vietnamese internal affairs.

Q: Was there fear that these men might be done away with, executed?

FLOTT: No. Not quite, because Khanh wouldn't have dared go quite that far. In fact, the following Christmas after it all happened, I happened to have Christmas Eve dinner with them and with the French charge, in Dalat. Now, again, he drove up to Dalat two days before Christmas of 1964 and offered me a ride to go along with him. It was a chance to drive through about three hundred kilometers of country that embassy officials didn't usually get a chance to drive through, so I touched base with the appropriate people. Ambassador [U. Alexis] Johnson and General [Maxwell] Taylor were there. They approved it. I asked colleagues like John Burke, who was another first secretary in the political section. I said, "Do you see any reason why I should not do this, any perception that it would be misunderstood or misinterpreted?" I just touched base with everybody, and everybody was for it, so I went up with this French charge, who, in a very thoughtful way, brought to the Dalat generals the appropriate trappings for a French Christmas Eve dinner and all -- buche de Noel and champagne.

Q: Wasn't that contested country at this time?

FLOTT: About half of it was, yes, that we drove through. I flew back. You see, I figured it was quite safe to drive up if the plan to do so was kept under wraps -- and then presuming that, if we had been stopped by a Viet Cong patrol, I could have successfully passed as a Frenchman. I had no weapon, no American clothes or papers on me. The Viet Cong wouldn't have questioned it. I figured it was reasonably safe, but once I was there and once the secret was out of the bag, so to speak, I would come back by plane. Arrangements were made for a plane to bring me back.

Q: But the Viet Cong would not have bothered a Frenchman if they knew he was a Frenchman?

FLOTT: That's right. At that point in time and that stage of the game, a Frenchman, even if stopped, would simply identify himself as a Frenchman, and they would probably wave him on. That doesn't mean that the French were helping them. It simply means that the Viet Cong had enough of a fight with us and didn't want one with the French as well. As it turned out, we weren't stopped. I had worked all night and the night before, and going through the worst part of Zone D or the hairiest part of the road, I fell asleep in the front seat of the car through much of it, I was so tired from being up all night before translating something for General Taylor.

Q: Who drove the car?

FLOTT: The French charge.

Q: So there were just the two of you?

FLOTT: Well, we had his two servants in the back seat, but one was Chinese and one was a trusted Vietnamese. They had no advance knowledge of my plan to travel with Perruche. I did not feel in great danger, but I prudently would not have driven back because the word could have gotten out, "There's an American from the embassy up here. You can catch him on the road back," so I flew back. But the first pass at a target you can get in for free, and I did.

Q: So what transpired at Dalat then?

FLOTT: Well, we had this very pleasant Christmas Eve dinner, and they had talks, and I'm sure that Perruche, the French charge, did, from his point of view, some good political reporting. He heard out these people who were, after all, under house arrest because of being accused of plotting with him. Again, the fact that he took them a Christmas cake and had this Christmas Eve dinner and took me along sort of suggested the relation was something less than conspiratorial or sinister.

Q: Yes.

FLOTT: And these four generals were behaving in a very collegial, buoyant way among themselves, getting on very well and being very nice to everybody. But I'm sure Perruche heard everything they had to say, and my guess would be that they probably concluded that Khanh was just sort of a low-level opportunist, who had to accuse these people of something. There is a French proverb, "Qui veut noyer son chien, l'accuse de la rage." "Anyone who wants to justify drowning his dog says he has rabies." And Perruche, who was very concerned about improving my French and making it more distinguished and literary, taught me that expression in that connection. I think it was probably a point well taken as far as Mr. Khanh went.

Q: Was that what Khanh was, a low-level opportunist?

FLOTT: Essentially, yes.

Q: What was he trying to do?

FLOTT: Put Khanh in power and then get the Americans to win the war for him. Well, that certainly puts it in a nutshell.

Q: Did we intercede for these generals in any overt way?

FLOTT: Yes. Ambassador Lodge, with a very fine sense of style and integrity and the art of the possible, made all appropriate representations, and Lodge did this just enough to convey the impression that they had better not go off the deep end and really hurt these people, and their conditions of captivity were certainly not terrible if they were hosting dinner parties and things up in the most pleasant part of Vietnam.

Q: Right. Okay. Did you know these men personally, Tran Van Don and -- ?

FLOTT: Yes, I happened to know all of them quite well.

Q: Would you characterize them for us?

FLOTT: Tran Van Don is now living in Orlando, Florida, and eventually became vice president of Vietnam and all, very French-oriented, very smooth, very sociable. He was the kind of person that a French-oriented American would like very much, as I did, because he was easy to talk to. He spoke perfect French. He was pleasant socially and everything else. Having said that, I would say he was not a man of iron will or driving commitment to duty. He did his duty, he put in his time on his watch, but he wasn't the kind of driving force who could weld a nation together.

Let's see. Le Van Kim was his brother-in-law. Le Van Kim was a really brilliant man by any standard. He would have been Phi Beta Kappa and top of his class at MIT if he had gone to it. Offhand, I don't remember if Le Van Kim spoke English, but he was very, very bright, and his son graduated at the top of his class from one of the best universities in France, one of the so-called grandes ecoles. Kim was just a brilliant man who saw all the problems, I thought, pretty well, but again, he could not really lead the country.

And Ton That Dinh was sort of a Mexican jumping bean, pod-of-pepper who had been attacking the Americans before the anti-Diem coup, then who was sort of the last man to join the October 31 coup against Diem. He was sort of an amiable lightweight, unpredictable, but perhaps with some leadership qualities. As inspector general of training, he probably would have been all right to that extent. He would have made sure the platoon leaders had fire coming out of their nostrils, at least, although a great intellect he was not.

Mai Huu Xuan was a more withdrawn figure, who had been the chief of the Secret Police in the old days. When we had this dinner with them, there was a field generator in the villa -- the generals were under house arrest -- one of those that you turn with your hand knob, and as you may know, there have been allegations that such generators had occasionally been used to facilitate interrogation. I made a crack to Perruche that "out of deference to the presence of Mai Huu Xuan, the other three generals didn't ask anyone to use the electric generator." (Laughter) They thought that was very funny. But Mai Huu Xuan did have a Secret Police background, and-

Q: Did he have a Surete background as well?

FLOTT: Yes, whatever it was. I don't know the names of those intelligence agencies exactly, but it was that kind of thing. And there were stories going way back to 1952 where there was a problem in some marketplace, and he left fifty dead people there as an example that he was not a man to be trifled with, and if that may be partly apocryphal, it is perhaps not entirely apocryphal.

Q: I see. So he had something of a sinister reputation?

FLOTT: Yes. Yes.

Q: Do you know what became of him?

FLOTT: I don't. Offhand, I don't.

Q: What finally became of these people?

FLOTT: Oh, they were eventually released, and Don, when Lodge came, you remember -- this is getting ahead of our chronology -- but Lodge came back to Saigon in March of 1965, and he was going to be -- well, history shows that three months later he was reappointed ambassador. That was for his second term. But he came back on a visit, and Ambassador Taylor, typically of his good sense of organization and style, assigned me as an aide to Lodge for that visit, knowing of our past relationship. I was sort of running Lodge's temporary office and running his message center and facilitating his mission on his visit there, which had many facets. This is all in roughly March of 1965, and among others who came in, Don wanted to come in and see him.

Don by then had been released, and when they met Lodge apologized, so to speak, or explained the circumstances to Don of why he had not been able to be more active on his behalf when he was under house arrest, which Don understood perfectly well. Everybody understood, and I had already covered that ground with the four generals, making sure that they knew of Lodge's goodwill and protective instincts for them. And Don said that he wanted to get back into a job; he absolutely had to be doing something. He wanted to get into the war effort in any way that he could be fitted in, and Lodge said, "I know how you feel. I've been out of office myself, and it's just like giving up smoking. It's terrible, but my advice is, don't make waves. Wait two weeks. Wait until they find something. Make haste slowly." And Lodge gave him good and friendly advice which Don accepted in the spirit in which it was offered. I was present at that meeting with them.

And the others, in one way or another, were fitted into something. I don't remember the details. And Don, of course, eventually became vice president of Vietnam.

Q: Right. I heard that Xuan lost his mind.

FLOTT: Yes, Mai Huu Xuan. Maybe he did. I don't know.

Q: What shall we move to now?

FLOTT: The third from last line there.

Q: Okay. David Nes. You know David Nes, of course?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: What was his position in the embassy? It seems to me that he was in a rather ambiguous spot.

FLOTT: Well, his formal position was very clear-cut. He came out as deputy chief of mission (DCM), appointed by various official telegrams, and they rushed him out there after he had been chosen and everything. One of the problems he had was he was used to being number-two man in a clear-cut situation where the number-two man is the alter ego of the ambassador and has instant access to him and can discuss everything, and, in private, can disagree or suggest to the ambassador alternate courses of action. That's the normal position of a DCM. He found himself cut off by what he probably regarded as a whippersnap lieutenant colonel, Mike Dunn, who clearly not only had the confidence of the Ambassador but perhaps even more, had a charter from the Ambassador to screen people. It's hard to tell just to what extent Mike Dunn was acting on instructions or to what extent he perhaps overdrew on a vague guideline; these things are awfully hard to adjudicate. But rightly or wrongly, Mike Dunn at one point apparently told Nes that he could not see the Ambassador without first getting Mike Dunn's permission, and that was not David Nes' old-line foreign service officer notion of how a number-two man has access to his chief. I think that was the inherent difficulty, and I'm not in a position to judge either of them because I don't know to what extent Mike was acting on Ambassador Lodge's instructions.

Q: Neither man confided in you, I gather.

FLOTT: Well, I got peripheral observations from both of them, yes, but nothing that would add anything significant to what I've already said.

Q: Okay. Well, what was Mr. Nes given to do exactly?

FLOTT: Well, on paper he was functioning as a DCM, and he did indeed become chargé d'affaires when Lodge was absent from the country. Cables went out in his name and that kind of thing. When he had less and less access to Lodge, he took up other duties like dealing with Cambodian-Vietnamese relations and things like that. He supervised all the career foreign service bureaucracy in the embassy, which Lodge certainly did not supervise directly. Nes, as far as I could tell, was a man of good, professional conscience. I recall an incident where there was a need for somebody to go out and represent the United States at some major dedication of a bridge that was symbolic of a reconstruction effort in a province and all. This was something that he thought the United States should be represented at, and everybody did, and he had a fever of 104, went out there for two days doing that, at some risk. He was a very conscientious officer. Now he may have somewhat missed the boat on how to deal with Ambassador Lodge, or it may have been a hopelessly intractable thing.

Q: I've heard that he was supposed to be the chief administrative officer, that he was going to run the mission, and Lodge was going to be the man-

FLOTT: Well, that to a certain extent is always the case with a DCM.

Q: But this is supposed to have gotten him in trouble with Lodge. Lodge was not willing to relinquish his control over AID and so on.

FLOTT: I'm sure there's something to that, and I would also submit that David Nes would have been as good as any foreign service officer I know, you know, to handle these complex relations with other constituent parts of an embassy, of a country team. I did the same job myself in Indonesia, and I know something about what a DCM does. I was acting DCM out there for about nine months. Yes, logically, that would have been part of his duties, but by then, the AID mission, instead of being a group of twenty-seven people who specialized in water pumps for irrigation or something, suddenly was a massive force in the thousands dealing with pacification and things in support of the GVN [government of Vietnam]. And they had prima donnas at the top who wanted direct access to Lodge, and maybe Lodge wanted direct access to them to make his own judgments.

Q: Right. When did you learn that Ambassador Lodge was leaving Vietnam?

FLOTT: Putting all this on whatever day it was on Saigon time, I believe he told the press the story in confidence at 6:00 p.m. By then, I'm sure the President had been notified and all that. I did not see those telegrams at the time. They weren't my business directly. I was busily working on Free World Assistance, the More Flags business, and there was no good reason why I would have seen those telegrams.

I think when Ambassador Lodge discovered that I did not know about this, or hadn't known it, he very thoughtfully called me up about one p.m., about five hours before he talked to the press and said, "Look, old man, you came over here with me. I just wanted to take leave of you and let you know that I am going home very quickly for political reasons that I have already discussed with you in some measure," as he had over, say, the previous two weeks, his view that it would be very unfortunate for the Republican Party if Barry Goldwater were nominated candidate.

He would have preferred, I am sure, to have seen Governor [Nelson] Rockefeller named, but [William] Scranton, he thought, was the better choice, and he was going back to campaign for Scranton. Then the next morning, he got us all together -- you know, a staff meeting of his principal officers -- told us that he really felt as a question of conscience, that he had to go back and get into the Republican convention to see to it that the party of Abraham Lincoln did not become the party of Barry Goldwater, and he would be leaving in a day and a half. He was going to have a farewell reception that night, and I was very much involved in making the arrangements and last-minute guest lists and making lots of last-minute telephone calls to get people there who might not have received their invitations by messengers.

Q: I can imagine.

FLOTT: Mike Dunn and I both worked very hard putting that together.

Q: How did the Vietnamese react to Lodge's sudden departure?

FLOTT: I think they were puzzled by it, but in a way, it figured. When a man of that background, a very political background, goes back to help one of his political friends, not only did the Vietnamese understand it pretty well but LBJ understood it very well.

Q: There was some talk that Mr. Lodge was wanting to run himself.

FLOTT: Well, it wasn't a question of that at all. He was not a candidate. I remember once there was this volunteer primary effort on his behalf at some point, and people were running through the hills of New Hampshire voting for him. I remember one day he had flown on a prop plane -- he'd flown up to Hue and back in one day and came in the office about six o'clock, soaked in perspiration, covered with dust, which was all the more visible because he had on an open-collared, white shirt just covered with red mud dust. And there was a telegram, just a report, a wire-service report about how he had won the New Hampshire primary without even running in it, and he said, "There's a lesson for you, my boy, in this. There are two lessons for you in this. One is, stay out of your country and keep your mouth shut!" He said, "This time I did not campaign, and I was nine thousand miles from home, and I won. It makes me think of all those hard, cold winters when I tramped around in the snows of Massachusetts or New Hampshire trying to get votes, and here I stay away and keep my mouth shut, and I win a primary." He just made that sort of an in-house joke, but he was clearly touched by the outcome.

Q: Well, I wonder if the press had anything to do with that. We've already mentioned that he seemed to have had a very good press in Vietnam, but he had not had a good press in the United States when he was a candidate.

FLOTT: Yes, that's true. I know all those horror stories from the Nixon-Lodge campaign, but, well, I think the press did very much respect the job he was doing in Vietnam -- trying to do. They respected certainly his patriotic motivation in being there, but I am certain he did not go back to the States to run. He went back to shore up what could be called the Rockefeller-Scranton wing of the Republican Party. And that he had discussed with me over a period of perhaps two weeks before, just as an informed citizen observing, without tipping his hand at all that he was going to go back.

Q: Well, what effect did this have on your situation, on your personal position?

FLOTT: Well, the duties he had given me some time before this, the duties I had sort of drifted into, were -- my main jobs were responsibility for this Free World Assistance. It was originally called Third Country Aid or More Flags. I think LBJ put the More Flags name on it. He was very keen on the project. He literally sent out telegrams of guidance, or prodding us, or kicking us in the tail about once a day, and I was made officer in charge of that. That figured because of my closeness to Lodge and everything. Lodge obviously had to delegate the nuts and bolts to somebody, delegated it to me, and that was a full-time job. I also had the secondary duty of keeping track of the French community and handling our relations with them. And that was enough on my plate, and when he left, I continued to do the same. Lodge very thoughtfully helped arrange this. As you know, Ambassador Johnson, U. Alexis Johnson, arrived there three hours before Lodge left, and they had a quick meeting, and after the meeting was over, Lodge called me in and said, "Look, I've got everything fixed up with my successors. You're going to continue to be in charge of these same programs." He then called me in to introduce me to Alex Johnson and sort of pass on the mantle in his presence and with his blessing, and my transition with the new group was perfectly normal. Two days after he arrived in Saigon, U. Alexis Johnson was flying up to Dalat to see Khanh, and people in the embassy had recommended me as the best person to go along to be his interpreter, which I did. When General Taylor got there, he said, "I understand your French is good. I speak some French myself. Whenever I make a mistake, I want you to make a note of it and correct me. Teach it to me correctly when you get a chance." And General Taylor really meant this.

Q: And he prided himself on his linguistics skill.

FLOTT: Oh, yes. Well, he was a good linguist. Considering that he had also been chairman of the Joint Chiefs and doing other things than speaking French, he spoke very good French. It was the kind of French that was so good that what I did was: if I saw that he was systematically, repeatedly making a rather important type of mistake, I'd say, "Look, you consistently do this wrong. The way you should do it is this, this, this," and I'd solve the problem. If he just mispronounced some little thing or something or had the gender of a word wrong, or something, I wouldn't bother him with that, but Taylor was a very good man to work with. He worked me very hard. If he'd received a long, detailed instruction from LBJ to raise certain points with General [Nguyen Van] Thieu, who, at the time -- or Khanh or whoever it was -- I forget the older man who was president for a while, he used me to help get the message across.

Q: Gosh, there were so many.

FLOTT: Yes. Anyway, so a lot of these people didn't read English, and in the diplomatic business, there's such a thing as giving a person what's known as "a piece of paper" -- "un bout de papier" -- and that is in effect you give them an outline of your talking points, so they can remember them and get it straight. So if there was a twenty-page telegram message from LBJ to give the President of Vietnam, Taylor would come into my office at 6:00 p.m. and say, "Fred, I've just received this from the President, and I wonder if you'd translate it into French so I could leave a copy with President" -- whoever it was -- "tomorrow morning?" And I said, "Yes, sir." And he said, "I'm going to see him at seven-thirty a.m. I'd like to have it by six-thirty. Why don't you come and have breakfast with me then, and we can discuss it?" Well, he was decent enough to invite me for breakfast. He kept me up all night and I'd sure be hungry by then, and also, I was really honored to be asked to stay up all night working for Max Taylor. He had kept other people up all night before in his career, and I was glad to be part of the distinguished group. That was the nature of our relation. And if he ever had a sudden cancellation at one of his official dinners, he'd very often call me to fill in and fill up the table. He was a very good man to work with, and he occasionally took me back with him on his trips back to the States.

Q: How would you compare or contrast his style as ambassador with that of Mr. Lodge?

FLOTT: He had all the best qualities of the American military and applied them to his work. He was also a man of unusual intelligence and breadth of interest and that sort of thing. And Lodge had all the best qualities of the United States Senate. The two types operate in a different way. A senator, at most, commands perhaps as many as fifty people, whereas if you are chairman of the Joint Chiefs, you are commanding more than that, and your modus operandi reflect it.

I remember there was one incident. There was a certain friendly ambassador to whom Lodge personally had been very close during his tour. When Lodge came back on this March of 1965 trip before being renamed, when Taylor was still ambassador, Lodge remarked that this friendly European ambassador had complained to him that he didn't have the same kind of close relation with General Taylor that he'd had with Lodge for the simple reason that Taylor didn't really have any important business to do with him and spent his time on things that were directly related to his mission. Lodge said, "You know" -- he told me privately; we were riding somewhere in the car -- "You know, it's a pity this difference came up between the two. It's not important, but it's a pity because Taylor could have handled this differently. You know, when I was up at the UN, there was always a certain body of information that was not really secret. There was no real national security reason to keep it secret, but I didn't release it. I didn't throw it out on the open market. Why? Because I'd save it as tidbits to give from time to time to people just to improve my relation with them. And now Taylor could have done that. There are a lot of things he could have told this particular ambassador with no harm to security and all, just to maintain a better relation with him. Taylor didn't realize that. He doesn't know that." Then Lodge threw his arms up in the air and said, "But, of course, I don't know how to run an airborne division!" (Laughter)

That was, I think, a pretty good illustration of the difference between the two. I respected both of them, and I liked both of them.

Q: But I think you're saying that it's very hard to compare them.

FLOTT: It is indeed. Yes. But they were both first-rate in their ways.

Q: And both effective.

FLOTT: Yes. As much as you can be effective at nailing jelly to a wall, which is trying to do such things as making South Vietnam into a cohesive force with fire coming out of its nostrils.

Q: Well, in that vein, let me ask you this question. It's not on the paper, but it's certainly relevant, and perhaps you won't mind addressing it. I think Taylor tried to nail the jelly to the wall in December of 1964, didn't he, when we had the coup that -- ?

FLOTT: Where they said they wouldn't deal with Taylor? Oh, yes.

Q: He was almost declared persona non grata.

FLOTT: He almost was, and that was, of the telegrams I saw, that was the only time I saw a telegram from the State Department, possibly from Bill Bundy or [Dean] Rusk -- I don't know who, one shouldn't speculate on the actual authorship of those things -- but there was a telegram from high places in Washington saying, in essence, "Look, if the Vietnamese keep up this business of having a coup every two weeks, it makes it impossible to win the war, and we may have to conclude that the thing can't be won and that we shouldn't participate in it any further." It was the only time that I saw a speculation of the cut-out-losses-and-get-out sort that was in print from high places.

Q: Were you present when Taylor called the generals in and chastised them?

FLOTT: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. That was one of these Sundays when I was duty officer. We'd just had another coup, and he was getting tired of it, and he called them in, and as the popular story goes, dressed them down like a bunch of West Point cadets. And I think that was probably pretty much what he did. I was ten feet away from where he was doing this. I was not in the room and quite properly not. He wanted to have it a meeting among equals or peers, but I was going in and out of the office, and I was sitting at a little desk right outside his office doing my command post function of being duty officer, keeping track of where which armored column was as of that moment sort of thing -- we were getting reports, but nobody was systematically trying to keep us informed.

Q: Yes, but you could overhear, more or less?

FLOTT: Well, yes, Taylor told me what had gone on, and I, of course, saw his written reports of the thing. I was generally very much up to speed on how he was conducting his mission, and again, I thought he did a first-rate job of it.

Q: The Vietnamese did not react well or take this dressing down very well-

FLOTT: Well, they don't like it. They'd much prefer to have a soft boss rather than a tough boss, and if they had some gullible American who was very concerned about respecting their sovereignty and all, they'd rather have that than have a tough-minded partner. I wouldn't fault General Taylor at all for the way he handled that. I'm just glad he handled it the way he did.

Q: Mr. Flott, what was the nature of your responsibility for the Free World Assistance side of our operation?

FLOTT: This was a program that went into very high gear in about May or June of 1964, and it was a program in which President Johnson himself was personally very interested. We literally got three telegrams a day from the White House giving his latest advice on areas in which he could bring support to bear to help our efforts. The program was originally called Third Country Aid, and it was basically aid from other countries, other than the United States, to help the government of Vietnam. It was very open-ended. The more aid we could get the more we liked it. I changed the name of the program from Third Country Aid to Free World Assistance because of the obvious favorable political connotation. The U.S. government welcomed it and the Johnson Administration welcomed it, because it was a way to show that what we were trying to do in Vietnam was not just an American idea, or an American problem, but also it was a concern of the whole free world, and that in some measure -- and taking into account their different resources or levels of involvement -- just about all of the free world countries were trying to do something to help Vietnam.

My job on the Saigon end of it was what we call generating requests for aid -- to get the government of Vietnam, which was spread very thin, to request aid from countries that we were in a position to know would be willing to help them if they received requests for aid. Then we would make representations to these friendly governments that had embassies in Saigon or if not Saigon, at least in Bangkok, telling them that the U.S. government very much hoped they would see fit to do something to help Vietnam. I made a few trips not only to Bangkok to see embassies for countries that didn't have embassies in Saigon, but also went out to Iran and Paris, Israel, trying to get aid for Vietnam.

And as I say, President Johnson was personally very much interested in the program, and if he had a visiting head of state from a potential donor country coming in to see him in the Oval Office, he'd ask us, "Just what should I ask this fellow for?" He was trying very hard to help.

Q: You mentioned Israel. Were there any special problems associated with getting Israel to contribute something to the effort?

FLOTT: Yes, with every country there was a special problem of one sort or another; either the political forces at home didn't like it or something. In the case of Israel, the biggest problem was that the government of Israel did not want to be seen as doing something that would antagonize the Russians unnecessarily and therefore compromise even further the position of Soviet Jewry. The main concern of the government of Israel, of course, was to get their people out of the Soviet Union.

Q: Right. So did they eventually give some aid to South Vietnam?

FLOTT: Almost nothing. Rather than adopt a posture of totally saying no, they offered at one point -- just to show how far this was from being useful or supportive -- to teach agricultural subjects that the Israelis of course are first-rate in, very knowledgeable on. They offered to teach desert or dry soil agriculture to trainees who would have to take their training in Israel of course that posed problems of how do you get draft-age young men out of Vietnam to go to Israel anyway, especially if it's to learn something that's not really relevant to most of Vietnam. But even that limited offer we were willing to talk about at least, hoping we could get more from them. And they took the position that with two or three million Jews sort of hostage in the Soviet Union they couldn't do much more than that. I pointed out that the Federal Republic of Germany might be excused for thinking that there were seventeen million Germans hostage in the German Democratic Republic, and nonetheless the West Germans sent us all kinds of hospital ships and hospitals and civic programs and everything else. But the Israelis just made the minimum of a token offer just to avoid saying no categorically.

Q: Right. How about the Filipinos?

FLOTT: The Filipinos put in a large program. They sent a lot of people there. Mind you, the people they sent were on per diem and there were perhaps other incentives than fighting the fight for freedom. But the Filipinos did have a large program and of course the Filipinos had many very skilled people and people who worked well in the English language and interfaced well with our own people.

Q: Was there a problem with Asian countries not being particularly interested in helping?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: What was their position?

FLOTT: They just didn't quite see the urgency of it in the same terms that we did. I think a lot of them probably had the feeling that the Viet Cong did after all have a popular base of a sort and that they just didn't want their country in the long run to be associated with having fought against the Viet Cong.

Q: I see. What was the attitude of the Thais on this question?

FLOTT: The Thais sent a lot of people, but of course we were able to make very direct representations to the Thais and ensure that we got delivery of quite a bit of aid from them because they wanted things from us. So our leverage with the Thais was pretty good.

The Japanese of course always begged off from anything with military implications, but they sent some aid and hospitals and things like that.

The French, who would never say that they were doing this in response to the Free World Assistance Program, nonetheless sent an awful lot of aid to Vietnam. They had four hundred high school teachers or whatever the number was there.

Q: And the Koreans, were you involved in that?

FLOTT: Yes, the Koreans were big in that, too.

Q: Of course, they also had a lot of troops there.

FLOTT: Yes, and there was also lots of reimbursement for what the Koreans did, and Koreans are very willing to do things if they are reimbursed for them.

Q: The Australians, the Anzacs [Australian-New Zealand Army Corps]?

FLOTT: Yes, the Australians and New Zealanders both had first-rate medical programs and did very good things, and of course they also had troops there.

Q: Right. Were you also responsible for handling any problems that might arise in the course of the aid being given?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Can you think of anything in particular which posed a problem for you in this regard?

FLOTT: Well, we were, for purely political and image-building reasons, so glad to get any aid that we could point to as broadening the base of our effort there, that almost anything they gave us was welcome. But even though we were very inclined to be thankful for small favors, some people were worse than others about not wanting hands showing. The Greeks, for example, offered to give us what I think was an acquisition value of a hundred dollars worth of surgical equipment that was rusted and they would give it to us as long as we didn't say that they had done so. Well, that was I guess the lowest point of those who said reluctantly yes to joining the effort.

There were problems of that sort. There was also the problem that once these people arrived, foreigners like Spaniards, Iranians, it was a problem to support them, but it was usually solved. It was something we had the resources to do. We'd fix them up with housing and all. I suppose one of the worst problems was that the government of Vietnam itself, which obviously should have been interested in getting all the aid it could, both for material reasons and also for image reasons, didn't push the program as much as we did.

Q: Why was that?

FLOTT: It was just simpler, they thought probably, to get everything from the Americans than it was to be nice to a wide group of foreigners. And again, saying that, you have to take into account that their government was stretched very thin and already had very much on its plate.

Q: Yes. Is it possible to describe a typical or prototypical sequence in which a decision was made to ask a country for a certain kind of aid and then I suppose he would go to the Vietnamese government and say, "Why don't you ask for this?" Is that the way it went?

FLOTT: Yes. First of all, we limited ourselves to that which appeared to be positive, or possible I should say, and secondly, we looked, quite frankly, for those things that had the most psychological and political impact. But typically a country like Iran, for a variety of reasons, did not see fit to send armed troops there. On the other hand, the Iranians, as part of their close relation with the United States, were willing to send a group. So we said, "Okay, supposing you send a medical team or a small hospital team and we'll put it out in one of the provinces," and they did. The Iranian equivalent of the Red Cross Society is called the Red Lion and Crescent. They sent a good group commanded by a retired colonel and did medical work. The Spaniards did the same thing. For their own domestic reasons, they didn't want to get too involved with sending troops or anything, but they sent a military medical team and they'd be put out in a province.

Anyway, when we determined that they were -- see, President Johnson was leaning on all our embassies around the world to be supportive of this program and to try to find donors. When we learned for example that Iran would be willing to send a team, we'd generate a request, that is, stimulate the bureaucratic and paper process of getting the government of Vietnam to request the aid. Then I'd follow up on the project with the intended donor country's ambassador in Saigon, to ensure that it moved forward.

Q: Was there any problem with providing security for such teams?

FLOTT: Yes, but not unmanageable. They'd have two or three Vietnamese bodyguards living around their house, maybe.

Q: I think some Germans at Hub were scooped up at Tet.

FLOTT: Yes, they got caught up in the Tet offensive, but that was an extreme case.

Q: Was the Filipino -- what was it called? -- Operation Brotherhood, was that still extant at this time, or had that been terminated before your time?

FLOTT: I think the specific Operation Brotherhood was over by then, but the Filipinos sent stuff in response to this request for free world assistance. And of course the minute they were doing something useful and the minute the Filipinos themselves saw that the U.S. government wanted something from them, there were a number of enterprising individual Filipinos that arrived at my office in Saigon saying, well, if you can make such and such a contract for barges or floating cranes or something from my firm, or if you can buy so much San Miguel beer for sale on the PX or whatever the line was that they were touting and the special interests that they were representing, they'd say, "We, of course, can be very influential and we'll certainly see to it that you get the free world assistance." But that happened. I remember particularly the Filipinos in that connection. On the other hand, the Filipinos did send some very able people there. They had a good counterinsurgency sense: they'd had relevant experience in their own country. And, you know, because of our close ties between the two countries, a Filipino medical team would proceed very much like an American one would, so it was much easier to integrate them into our effort.

Q: I see. How did you deal with these offers of assistance involving the purchase of San Miguel beer or a floating crane or whatever?

FLOTT: I would tell them that from my dealings with their government it was not my impression that their government would wish to proceed that way and while I was certainly going to look into their remarks and share them with their government, that I could not promise them anything.

Q: That would end it?

FLOTT: But that if their country knew what was good for them in view of President Johnson's strong interest in this program, they'd be well advised to cooperate on sending aid. That usually worked. It was very simple. We had a clear charter to lean on them hard and twist arms hard, and with LBJ behind you on this thing, it was very easy to be persistent and get tough with people.

Q: Right. Any instances of initial refusals followed by acquiescence as a result of pressure?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Your pressure? LBJ's pressure?

FLOTT: Ultimately certainly LBJ's. I could occasionally select targets for his wrath, but I couldn't apply any pressure myself in the same way that he could. It's not even entirely fair to describe it as putting pressure on them. It takes more than one conversation and one go-around to make a case on what's obviously a complicated and difficult and sometimes expensive effort.

Q: Right. How about the British? Did they send -- ?

FLOTT: They did a lot of very good things.

Q: Did they? But the war was not popular in England.

FLOTT: No, but the British were of course committed to their special relationship with the United States and they were always willing to send medical aid and surgical teams and that kind of stuff.

Q: You mentioned last time -- I don't want to leave Third World Assistance until you're satisfied that --

FLOTT: I can't think of anything more I have on it.

Q: When the Pleiku incident took place in February of 1965, you said that you had lunch with [John] McNaughton at that time. Do you recall that?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Was McGeorge Bundy there or was he out of the country?

FLOTT: No, Mac Bundy had actually gone up to Pleiku, and I had lunch with McNaughton and with Chet Cooper. They were the two on the Mac Bundy party who for various reasons stayed in Saigon. I think McNaughton had business at MACV headquarters and Chet Cooper was doing something. Chet, whom I'd known for a number of years, said, "Look, I'm free for lunch with McNaughton. Let's go together." We just went over to one of the officers' clubs or bogs and had lunch and talked. That was at noon that fateful Sunday and then Mac Bundy came back from Pleiku and didn't even leave the airport. He landed from Pleiku at Tan Son Nhut. McNaughton and Cooper and I were out at the airport and McNaughton and Cooper flew back to the States with Bundy.

That was the point at which Mac Bundy said, "In view of these shellings of American installations, we'd better get the dependents out." Then LBJ made a very categorical order that all dependents were going to be out within a week. The biggest no-no in that theater of operations would be for wives or other dependents to come back into Vietnam once they were evacuated.

Q: They'd been discussing whether they should evacuate the dependents, hadn't they?

FLOTT: Yes, but the straw that broke the camel's back, I suppose, was the Pleiku thing.

Q: Yes. I know some of the arguments pro and con were what impression this would make on both the South Vietnamese and their enemies.

FLOTT: We were conscious of that and we figured that we could represent it as being battening down the hatches and clearing the decks for action. It was done in that context.

Q: Is that the way the South Vietnamese interpreted it, do you think?

FLOTT: Yes, I think it was pretty much, yes.

Q: Okay. Did you talk to McGeorge Bundy about his conversation back to Washington during the Pleiku incident or immediately after? Because it's known now that at that time he also recommended that we begin the bombing.

FLOTT: Yes. I think out at the airport on the tarmac just talking with Mac Bundy and McNaughton and Chet Cooper, Mac Bundy took the position that we clearly could not take attacks of that Pleiku sort or of the earlier Bien Hoa sort lying down, and we had to study ways off reprisal in kind.

Q: Well, how do you interpret his later and rather cynical remark that's been cited in a number of cases when he was asked about what it was that triggered his recommendation. He said, "Pleikus are like streetcars," meaning there's one by every ten minutes; you just pick the one you want to use as your excuse and you go ahead and do what you want to do. That was not the way he seemed, though, at the time, is that right?

FLOTT: I wouldn't claim to have any really valid insight into what was going on inside his mind. It might well be that he meant to say he would not allow one incident to rush him into premature or unwise action, timing-wise.

Q: But that was not the impression that you got, I gather.

FLOTT: My impression was that he quite lucidly and correctly figured that if the Viet Cong were going to bring American installations under attack that we would have to make reprisals in some suitable form.

Q: Right. When you came back, you were given duties involving trying to explain our Vietnam policy; is that right?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: What sorts of places did you go to in this effort?

FLOTT: The most basic underlying guideline and square one of the whole effort was that this was done in the context of the Department of State supplying a spokesman in those situations where a sponsoring group had requested a State Department spokesman.

Q: I see.

FLOTT: Now, just about anyone could request it. Any university could request it, and I went to many universities. Also, public service groups like the Louisville, Kentucky Rotary Club would request it, and I'd go out for that. The State Department made it very clear that the sponsoring organization paid the bills. For example, my plane fares were always paid by the sponsoring organization. My travel expenses were kept to the modest level covered by government per diem, but the host organizations were always billed and had agreed in advance to pay for the per diem of travel as well. Admittedly, they did not pay for my time. But the State Department feels it has a public policy obligation of a sort to make speakers available where it's something they're willing to do. As a practical matter, most of my work seemed to be on Saturdays and Sundays anyway when it was my own time and not the department's.

Q: I see. Do we conclude that most of your audiences were at least neutral on the subject, or -- ?

FLOTT: They varied widely. I had some audiences in California right at the time of the Cambodian incursion that were very hostile, and where literally there was some concern about my physical security, I mean making at least contingency plans for what you do if you get a mob scene. Other audiences would be more friendly to our policy in Vietnam.

Q: Did you ever feel that you were in danger, or apprehensive?

FLOTT: I think if I had played it very stupidly and had angered a big crowd of anti-war people and if I had added to normal differences of opinion by making them want to take it out on me personally, I could probably have gotten kicked around, yes. But I avoided that. I had occasion to speak at the student union at Berkeley.

Q: Well, that doesn't sound like a very friendly place to me.

FLOTT: No, but after Berkeley I went out to California two weekends in a row at the time of the Cambodian incursion, which was 1970 or 1971, during the Nixon Administration. But first I went out to California once during the Johnson Administration because the State Department had a request for a speaker for Berkeley and the public affairs office -- the bureau that more or less managed these speaking engagements -- advised me not to go into this one, because it was a really violently hostile audience.

Q: I can imagine.

FLOTT: I talked to Governor [Averell] Harriman and said, "Governor, it seems to me we ought to talk to the people who disagree with us on this thing." And he said, "Well, I see no reason why not to do it. If you're willing to do it, it's your neck." So I went out. But even there, there were some positive situations. I mean there was the good thing that on an American campus there's still enough sense of fairness left, regardless of how high the passions ran, there was a feeling of, "Let this fellow be heard. Let's hear another viewpoint and see what he has to say." I had a couple of things helping me. The local regent at Berkeley was Tom Sorensen, the brother of Ted Sorensen, and Tom, whom I'd known from the East Coast and who had served in USIS, knew that I had been the escort officer and interpreter for Supreme Court Justice [William] Douglas and for Bob Kennedy in 1955 when they went to the Soviet Union. So I told Tom Sorensen that I would agree to come out to Berkeley and talk to their five thousand students in the student union at high noon, if it were made very clear to the audience that I'd come out there in response to their invitation. Tom picked it up from there and said, "Yes, and what's more, when I introduce you I'll tell them that you were Bob Kennedy's interpreter," and that of course was a big plus.

I think on the part of the real hard core of troublemakers, not just ordinary citizens who for their own reasons were angry with our policy but people who really deliberately wanted to make trouble, they tended to wait until -- they were waiting for me to make some bad mistake to slip or stumble on something, in which case they could pile on and have the audience with them. I said a lot of things they didn't like and a lot of things that they almost decided to lower the boom on, but they kept waiting for something a little bit better and more clear-cut. In time, of course, I got the audience to listen to what I had to say and addressed all kinds of difficult subjects and got away with it.

Q: That's remarkable.

FLOTT: Things like napalm and that kind of thing they asked about.

Q: What was the concern about napalm? We'd used it in World War II; we'd used it in Korea.

FLOTT: Well, we didn't use napalm in World War II until the very end against the Japanese, but if we'd had napalm in World War II for the Normandy landing, things would have gone much better on Omaha Beach. We didn't have it. In Korea of course we did. It just lent itself, I think, to almost symbolizing hellfire and damnation and big fire and of course the horrible wounds it inflicts. Rightly or wrongly, it was a big emotional issue. The troublemakers in the audience would figure they had a good enough case just saying, "What about napalm?" And I'd say, "Okay, let me tell you about napalm." I said, "Napalm is, first of all, a rather limited weapon. It burns up everything within a hundred-yard radius, but it doesn't do much beyond that. If you're attacking, advancing, and you're held down by a hostile machine gun nest, there are a number of ways to take out a machine gun nest. You can storm it frontally -- in which case you'd lost twenty GIs dead on the ground -- or you can maneuver around it and maybe lose time and two or three people trying to get a bangalore torpedo or a grenade into the thing. Or you can pull your company back three hundred yards and ask for an air strike with napalm, kill the crew inside and save all of your side's lives." Then I asked the audience, "Now, if your brother were to be in the rifle company in the attack, which approach would you prefer that his company commander took? All I'm doing is supporting the choice of weapons of these company commanders who knew what they were doing. Incidentally, whoever it kills, it doesn't kill them any deader than one bullet or one grenade would kill them anyway." With a basically objective audience, even an audience that was hostile to the war and all, they would reluctantly agree, "Well, this guy seems to make sense on that point."

Q: What other kinds of questions did you tend to get from an audience like that?

FLOTT: Oh, arguing over just exactly what the historical record was, the agreement to hold elections one year after 1954. That would be hashed over a lot. Then the fact that it was their country; it was all one country. Oh, yes, the biggest thing other than napalm, I guess, was that we were supporting colonialism. You'd usually get a question from some black African exchange student from somewhere in sub Saharan Africa drawing on his country's experience with their struggle for independence. And I said, "Well, my dear fellow, you overlook the fact that South Vietnam has had its independence since 1954. A communist government is invading them and trying to deprive them of that independence, which certainly hasn't been put to any vote, the communist incursion. So it has nothing to do with your country's glorious struggle for freedom and independence." That would usually settle the matter.

Q: How long did you perform this duty? How long did that go on?

FLOTT: Off and on for two years. Let's see, I got back from Vietnam from what had been three and a half years out there. I got back in the late fall of 1966. I was immediately put on the road with the program of the Federal Executive Service. There are around the United States twelve major centers, sort of Civil Service Commission branch offices, which are also regional headquarters for the U.S. government civil service. I believe Dallas was one, Denver was one,

Kansas City was one, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Seattle come to mind. LBJ had issued instructions that he wanted the top levels of the federal bureaucracy to know more about our effort, to be brought up to speed on the whys and wherefores, so he sent a team out, and I was the State Department man on the team. There was a man from the Pentagon, a man from the Agency for International Development, AID, and myself, and we went around and spent a couple of days at each of these places. Then after that I, oh, seven days a week, thirty-one days a month, I was accepting speaking invitations all over the country.

Then something happened. Hubert Humphrey, as vice president, was in Brussels, and he got booed because of the Vietnam War. Humphrey's friendly conclusion was, "Anyone who's booing me must just not know what the problem is, or doesn't know why we are doing this." So he said, "You people in the State Department should do more about telling our story abroad." Well, of course the State Department had been making herculean efforts for two years to tell our story and USIS had and everybody else. But when Humphrey said, "I want you to do something more," quite rightly the Department of State was responsive to command and sent me over to Europe on a roving mission of visiting European foreign offices and parliamentary foreign affairs committees and any student groups or interest groups that they suggested. I based myself in Geneva, partly because of the favorable image that city gave, and frequently visited the Paris peace talks and Embassy Saigon.

Say I'd get a request from the embassy in The Hague to come up there. I remember how the embassy in The Hague under Ambassador William Tyler, I thought, made particularly good use of my time. They all made good use of my time, because it made them all look good with the administration, after all. Any American embassy wanted to be responsive to the administration, to LBJ's guideline of "tell our story and tell it effectively." They'd set me up with programs and I found my time was fully scheduled and very well used, with good sense of priority. Then I did some of that in North Africa as well. I made a number of trips back and forth to Saigon, to keep up to speed on the subject.

Q: How long did this go on?

Q: All of 1968?

FLOTT: Yes. Then after the Vietnam peace talks started, although I was not a member of the peace talks delegation as such, Governor Harriman asked that I be brought over to Europe again to resume that speaking mission. There I had the job of going around basically to people that Harriman wanted to inform about what his delegation to the peace talks was doing, but didn't have time obviously to do it himself; he couldn't be every where at once. So I was given the job of traveling around briefing these foreign affairs committees of the European parliaments and foreign offices.

Q: Did you have to work with Bill Jorden a little bit on that?

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: Yes, I see.

FLOTT: And I would talk with Bill Jorden and tell him what kind of questions we were getting, and he'd give me any late juicy tidbits -- information that might be of interest to these friendly governments.

Q: I see. And you were doing that until when? Until the team changed over there?

FLOTT: Until about March of 1969 or so. Yes, until the change of administrations.

Q: Well, on these missions of explication, if you will, were you booed like Humphrey was?

FLOTT: Oh, on occasion. I would say not when visiting friendly foreign offices and friendly parliamentary foreign affairs committees, no, there'd be no booing; there'd be maximum courtesy, understanding and decorum. With European students generally or political parties and things, I can't remember any outright booing. There was some very hostile questioning.

Q: What was the source of the hostility? Who were the hostile groups?

FLOTT: Well, the hostile people were people who were otherwise perfectly normal people who disagreed with our policy and thought we were killing a lot of Vietnamese needlessly and that we should stop, and people who thought that they had the answers and that the United States government had it all wrong.

Q: Did you go to Sweden?

FLOTT: Yes, and that was a very difficult situation. That was one case, for example, where the embassy did not schedule me to talk to students because they were afraid it would have been counterproductive and would have been a donnybrook. But I did talk to the foreign office and sometimes we did briefings in the embassy, too; they'd invite people into the Embassy to hear our story.

Q: The Swedes were out of sympathy pretty solidly, weren't they?

FLOTT: Yes, yes.

Q: Okay. Did this coincide with the instances where the deserters were given sanctuary in Sweden?

FLOTT: Yes, there were deserters there at the time I was doing this in some countries.

SAMUEL B. THOMSEN

Political Officer
Saigon (1963-1964)

Consul
Hue (1964-1966)

Samuel B. Thomsen was born in Minnesota in 1931. After serving in the US Army from 1952-1954 he received his bachelor's degree at University of California Los Angeles in 1956. During his career he had positions in Vietnam, Laos, Washington D.C., Botswana, Nigeria, and an ambassadorship to the Marshall Islands. Mr. Thomsen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 1996.

Q: So you arrived in Vietnam in April of '63. You had this period of three months of study there. How did that work out?

THOMSEN: The embassy was in the business section near the river, and a compound which later became the compound where the new embassy was constructed was the home for about five bungalows, and Tony Lake and his wife, and Judy and I, and Joe Luman were in three of the bungalows, and the fourth bungalow was reserved for the language training. The compound was large enough so we had almost a football field size play area. I remember one day breaking my little finger on my left hand trying to catch a pass from Dick Holbrooke. We were engrossed in our studies, and getting to know the community. There was no war as we got to know it later in the late '60s. Saigon was a beautiful city. It still had all the trees on the main thoroughfares. Not a lot of traffic, the cyclos were the major vehicle. It was an attractive place to be.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when on this tour?

THOMSEN: April '63 to July '66.

Q: What were you getting before you got absorbed by the embassy. What sort of contacts were you able to make with your language, and how well did you use it? What type of people would you getting in touch with?

THOMSEN: At first we were limited to our own tutors. Then we became involved with the Vietnamese-American Association which was bringing Vietnamese in for our English primarily, but college students and small scale entrepreneurs who for good capitalistic reasons were trying to learn English. So we developed a relationship with a cross section of the private sector. But not much in the way of the bureaucracy or the military at that time.

Q: What was the American military presence like at that point?

THOMSEN: It was modest. In Saigon it was noticeable but not certainly as overwhelming as it became. Then if you moved past my training into my provincial reporting duties in the provinces the provincial sector advisory team would be a colonel, a couple of majors and a few captains. Well, I shouldn't even say it that way. There would be a colonel, lieutenant colonel, a major and a couple of captains, and a lieutenant, a total of six officers, and maybe four or five NCOs to support them. That was a very small presence even in those days. And that was about it. Military units at a battalion level would have a captain and maybe an NCO. I visited the Ranger battalions because I covered the area south and west of Saigon, and there were a number of Ranger battalions and the Americans serving with them lived pretty exciting lives.

Q: Let's move to the time when you finished your language training. You were assigned where, and who was your boss?

THOMSEN: First of all I should say that during my language training from April until July things started falling apart. The first Buddhist riots, demonstrations I think probably initially, in Hue occurred in early May. By the time I'd finished my training, my first reporting assignment was to cover the declaration of martial law by the capital district commander, General Ton Thuc Dinh. I sat and listened to him deliver in Vietnamese a long diatribe about the "damnable Buddhists", and how the righteous government had to protect itself and freedom and democracy, and so had invaded the pagodas the night before, and had arrested Buddhist Monks from all over. And two of the prominent Bonzes, Tri Quang and Tam Chou had sought refuge in the embassy. Part of my job was their care and feeding, along with Jim Rosenthal, and Lyall Breckon. In any case, Jim Rosenthal was head of the provincial reporting unit in the political section. Bob Miller was the deputy chief of the political section. Mel Manfull was the chief of the political section. Bill Trueheart was the DCM. It was a first rate team. In addition to that provincial reporting unit, there were folks like John Burke in political external. Dick Holbrooke was next door with USAID as a special assistant. Tony Lake became Lodge's staff aide. Joe Luman took the job of the press attaché which was an O-1 job, and Joe was an O-7, but did a superb job at it--put a cot in his office and a bottle of whiskey in his desk drawer, and was a buddy of all the press from then on. But that was kind of the structure.

Q: At that time how many people trained like yourself in Vietnamese were there around?

THOMSEN: I would guess under ten that had the full training. Tony Lake and Dick Holbrooke, and Joe Luman and the others had had only six months of introductory training. Ralph Moore, Doug Ramsey and I had the nine months. Then there were others like John Helble Ted Heavener and Tom Barnes, who had preceded us over the previous years also were Vietnamese language officers. But it was a small cadre at that time.

Q: What was your initial assignment?

THOMSEN: The Third Vietnamese Army Corps, around Saigon to the north and west. In the north, Binh Dirong and Tay Ninh, the area closest to Cambodia and the environs in the capital area itself, was kind of my beat. The way I would execute that would be to travel to the provincial capitals on a fairly regular basis. I would stay with the U.S. sector advisers. I learned over time, the lieutenants and captains were probably the best sources of information available to me in the whole province. I would certainly call on the province chief. I would call on the sector commander, I'd call on some of the subordinates. I'd get to know the Chieu Hoi (Viet Cong returned) people...

Q: Chieu Hoi being?

THOMSEN: The returnee program.

Q: This is the people who were in the Viet Cong and surrendered under, you might say, honorable terms, came back and they were reeducated, or whatever you want to call it.

THOMSEN: Those were very interesting programs, and the people who ran them were often returnees themselves and had tremendous insights into what was going on in the province. But it would be the young American lieutenant who was the sector S-2 adviser, that is the intelligence adviser, would have tremendous understanding...

Q: This is an American?

THOMSEN: This is an American. I'd spent time with them in the evening and it would be as useful to me as anything else, because in some cases what they would tell me in the evening would be 180 degrees from what the sector official report to MACV would say. The embassy would get this report, then I would be able to come in and make comments about it, and tell them the true story. It was really an important job.

Q: Why did this happen? I mean, both institutionally, but within Vietnam where you often have this split between the top people within any organization, and the people who were actually doing the work.

THOMSEN: Anecdote, and this comes from what was then a young S-2 lieutenant.

Q: S-2 being...

THOMSEN: The intelligence. When Paul Harkins leaves, his last order...

Q: He was the commanding...

THOMSEN: Commanding General of the military assistance command Vietnam, MACV, his last instruction was: I want you to give me the 25 indicia of why we're winning. So all the people down the chain of command are put through their procedures, and it ends up at the lieutenant level and he's got to write down 25 ways we can tell we're winning. And that goes back up the chain of command as amalgamated and compressed, and summarized, and finally Harkins before he departs is able to give a speech in which he gives the 25 indicia of victory. Then Westmoreland appears on the scene and the first order he gives is, I want you all to give me the 25 indicia of why we're losing. So the order goes down through the chain of command and ends up at the lieutenant level, the lieutenant has got to figure out, actually somewhat easier, how you can identify the problems that we were facing and causes not to be a success for us. So that goes back up the chain of command, and Westmoreland says, I just started my new task here in Vietnam, it's an enormous task all the things I've got to overcome, but victory is assured, our hearts are pure. Well, that's why, because of command requirements. And the Army in those days, and those of us who kept track of friends, the Army I think has changed a great deal, but essentially it was the management style. It was called the management style, the Army was managing itself instead of leading itself, and it was a victory through management. I think they learned their lesson. I hope they did. But that's why...

Q: In the first place, your reports and were the other officers getting more or less the same type thing?

THOMSEN: Yes, pretty common. I had direct access to the ambassador. When I'd come back from a field trip, Tony Lake would call me and say, come on up, Lodge wants to spend a few minutes with you. I would just give him anecdotally my reaction to what I'd seen in the past several days in the field. Now, that seemed to have some influence in the way Lodge saw that war, for better or worse. And that was what Kennedy wanted. That was his original intention. He had a bunch of people who had no axe to grind, who had independent thought, who could get their views known at the higher levels.

Q: Essentially what was the story that you were bringing back?

THOMSEN: From my area, the story I was bringing back was that there was arrogance and aloofness on the part of most of the GVN authorities, but that was a cultural thing. It was kind of built into the system. There was a true war going on, it wasn't a sympathetic Viet Cong subverting an imposed upon populous, protecting them from a totally evil government. The governor could be well intended generally, but not very effective. The old story of the the emperor's writ ends at the village wall, which goes back to ancient Mandarin times, was still true in Vietnam. And again the government's structure was such that traditionally the central authorities went only to the village level, and the village wasn't just a little hamlet, it was a series of hamlets, but that the village was its own self contained unit, and that a group of village elders, traditionally the land owners and the prestigious, would make decisions if there was a levy on people, they were the ones who would call out the young people to go out and dig the ditches. If there was a tax, they were the ones who would collect the tax.

The Viet Cong system was essentially to destroy that authority system, and to replace it with a younger, merit based because it was essentially based on the young dissatisfied who would run off into the bush and find a way to counter its elder leadership. And the Viet Cong were able to profit by that.

But by and large the population was willing to go along with the government as long as the government could provide security. That was to me the equation. When the government could not provide security, then the Viet Cong would assume authority.

Later on, when I was back home, I spoke at colleges in the '65-67, 66 period. I was at Brown, I would say, you're at college, you've got a president in your university, you've got deans and faculty, you've got a small security force, you've got professors who you like, some you don't like, and you're a student population of about 6,000. Now if 60 of you, one percent, if 60 of you were given arms, the first thing you did was kill the president, and the next thing you did was kill the chief of the security organization, the third thing you did was kill the most popular professor whose views you didn't like, then you issue an edict, saying anybody who opposes what we're doing is going to be killed. How many of you would voluntarily organize yourself and go out and hunt down those 60 people with guns, and you knew there was 60 of them, not 2 or 3, but 60. How many of you would do that?

Bernard Fall was one of the great French Journalists and really a great analyst. I had a few opportunities to be with him. He asked me a question one day, "what is the most important and pervasive element of a national government to the private citizen?". I scratched my head, the police and the medical. He said, the postman. The guy who delivers the mail in any culture, in any situation. He said, who are the Viet Cong popping off? They're popping off the people who are the communicators between the central government and the villages. He said, when you go into an area if you want to know what the security situation really is, look for the medical deliverers, the guys who are doing the DDT in the huts, look for the folks who are delivering the mail. If they're gone, then there's a problem. If they're still doing their job then there's no problem. It was a fascinating analytical tool for me.

Q: Were the other provincial reporters reporting more or less the same type of thing?

THOMSEN: Within broad parameters, yes. It would vary from province to province for a variety of reasons including geographic. But in some cases it was the effectiveness of the province chief. A tremendous security factor. I mean the question of what had happened in '54 was a very important question. I had one province which was fascinating, Tay Ninh. I don't know if you ever got to visit Tay Ninh, but it had a fascinating religious organization called the Cao Doi, an eclectic religion which included Jesus, Gandhi, and Buddha in its Pantheon of holy ones. They had a gaudy temple in Tay Ninh City. They had pretty strong support from their followers, and the Viet Cong were simply not effective within those regions. Where there was really a strong counter philosophy. But in say Binh Long which was almost next door, around the Parrot's Beak corner...Earl Young, a friend of mine, was the AID provincial guy there, Earl did some really fascinating analysis early on in the early '60s. Binh Long had historically been Viet Cong, or Viet Minh. The government was losing the war as early as '62 in that province. So it depends a lot on the geography and the history.

Q: What was your impression...let's take it up before October of '63. What sort of reaction were you getting by body language, facial expression, or by talking, that you were getting from Ambassador Lodge on what was happening?

THOMSEN: Lodge was a pretty, I won't call it simple, but like many successful senior folks he like to categorize things fairly much in black and white. Good guy, bad guy, winning, losing. Part of the problem of giving him fairly subtle stuff was he'd pick it up and then throw it in one can or the other. It wasn't a matter of being willing to put it in one of the sub-cans. So if I told him I'd spoken to a couple of Vietnamese lieutenants who were from Catholic families that had been refugees in '54, and they were afraid that Ngo Dinh Nhu was negotiating with the North Vietnamese over a neutral solution, which I did pick up at a Vietnamese Army headquarters, that resonated with him real quick. And, of course, he didn't like Nhu anyway. Now that just one more big piece of information to throw into his bad guy can, and probably right. But I might have been a little more careful with it. But that's kind of the way he was. He made decisions and then he went with them, he didn't question, or he didn't get subtle with them.

Q: Did you have the feeling that you in this reporting unit were almost against the American military advisers. I mean, what was coming out although you, of course, had been using information from down below. But did you find yourself almost an adversary?

THOMSEN: We were in an adversary relationship with the senior MACV leadership. I remember, I think it was before Harkins left, I attended a briefing at MACV for a senator--I've forgotten the name of the senator--in which Harkins briefed the senator absolutely diametrically opposed to what Lodge was saying. Telling that senator a story about Diem, I think it was in that time frame, maybe September-October, that was diametrically opposed to what Lodge was saying in his cables and publicly. You can imagine then when I got back to the embassy, and reported this to Tony, and was immediately ushered into the Ambassador's office, he was not happy with what he was hearing. But there was a strong struggle between the military...I don't think it ever ended actually. It was at the senior level, even the colonel on down level, were grateful for us because we could get the story out that they couldn't get up through their system.

Q: Could we talk a bit about the events. I guess its October of '63.

THOMSEN: November 2nd.

Q: Because that all fits together with the Kennedy assassination. Could you talk about the events that preceded it, and how you at your level and your colleagues were seeing the situation, and then how things developed? First, before I get to that, again a little bit chronological. What was your feeling about the Buddhists? And the suppression of the Buddhists?

THOMSEN: First of all, the Buddhists came to us, and we had Tri Quong and Tom Chou, the two leaders were in the embassy on the fourth floor, and Lyall Breckon and I and a couple of others were responsible for making sure they got fed, and passed notes to them and got notes out. They were comfortable, but they were not in any kind of luxury situation. We felt that the government had been pretty stupid to create a situation like this. We didn't regard the Buddhists as being communists. We'll get into this later but I was accused both face to face by Colonel Loan, who was later Ky's national police chief, and by Ky himself in his book (although I'm not named) as being a Buddhists lover. We regarded the Buddhists as being a significant political force that ought to be dealt with reasonably rather than simply dismissed, and put upon. We'll get into this substantially later in '65 and '66 when I was the consul in Hue and POLAD for the Marines in I Corps when we had some real hairy things going on. But this time, the Viet Cong threat was really more incipient than real for a lot of the country. Saigon certainly was not yet a city at war. My wife had gone to the market and a hand grenade had exploded probably 50 feet away. I shouldn't say we're not a city at war. In February of '64 there was a terrorist attack on the Army movie theater, two Marines died heroically to get the doors closed and (it was a kids matinee) and to protect the kids. So there were some events like that happening but they were pretty spread out, one every few months, it wasn't something happening at all times. And the hand grenade was not aimed at Americans, we're not even sure it wasn't a drunken Ranger.

But leading up to the coup, I got more and more signs of disaffection, and finally even in the mid-October period, even young Catholic officers were expressing tremendous concern to me at what Diem was doing harm for an anti-communist victory. They were mainly mad at Nhu, but that Diem was really tearing the country apart by his actions, and by the way they were prosecuting the Buddhists. I had one young Vietnamese captain, whose younger sister had been thrown in jail. She was a Catholic, she'd been with some friends and picked up and thrown in jail. He said, I had to go on leave from here...this was in Binh Tuy way out in the boonies, to go back to Saigon to get my sister out of jail. It was that kind of an attitude which was developing. Real pessimism that Diem could carry it off.

Q: You were of course passing this basically on to Lodge, you and the others.

THOMSEN: We were doing cables and airgrams, and certainly briefing Lodge.

Q: Was there a feeling that if we're going to get anywhere, we've got to get somebody new in?

THOMSEN: No, I don't think we would go that far. We would have said we've got to get Diem on the right track more than anything else. Until I began reading some of the retrospective accounts of the coup, I would not have believed that we were as deeply involved as we were. Clearly we sent the signal. A guy named Conning, you may have done your reading too. I knew Conning, I would never have guessed...I won't call him a slob, but this guy was in a position to be making these decisions, not making decisions, but passing these decisions on to the senior military and the Vietnamese. But apparently we were. A kind of a pregnant thing did develop. The guy who led the military into Saigon was Colonel Nguyen Van Thieu, who later became president Thieu was then a colonel, he was the Fifth Division commander. That was my area. I knew the senior advisor, he gave me his own biographic report on Thieu. That bio said that "Thieu is so ambitious it probably wouldn't matter to him which Vietnam he became head of state of, if he could become head of state. That his driving ambition." It was certainly a prescient statement. I later gusted in my biographic report on Thieu.

The day before the coup I was in Bien Hoa at division headquarters. The advisers told me...you know I haven't really thought this through up until this moment. The advisers told me that the Fifth Division was moving out to Vieng Tan which was from Bien Hoa across the Saigon road and then on to the coast. And the advisers were not going to accompany them. The Vietnamese had forbidden them from accompanying them. I flew back to Saigon in a helicopter and reported this to the embassy. I said the Fifth Division is moving out to the coast without its advisers. And a few people kind of looked at me and nodded their heads with a serious look on their face. The Fifth Division turned on to the Saigon road and moved into Saigon. That was the lead element, the Fifth Division tanks were the tanks that stormed the palace.

I got back to Saigon, spent the night, the next morning a guy from an investment company came over for lunch. I remember at lunch with him hearing what sounded like someone walking on the pebbles in the driveway next door, and I knew it was small arms fire. I got a taxi and went back to the embassy and halfway back to the embassy I was watching T-28s strafing the naval headquarters.

Q: The T-28 a small training aircraft.

THOMSEN: The T-28 was designed as a trainer but it was also used...we give it to the Vietnamese to be used as a small tactical support aircraft, it had machine guns. Got back to the embassy to discovered that the coup was in process. I made my way home because my wife didn't have a telephone, and I was concerned about her. So I had to drive through Cholon and all the way around to come in the back way and got home. My wife was hiding in the closet with our daughter because she had seen red things flying over the house, and they were tracers and she didn't know whether they were tracers or artillery coming over the house. But there was no danger because they were way, way away from us. There was a small American compound across the street.

Q: Where did you live?

THOMSEN: We lived on Ba Huyen Thanh Quang, on the way to the airport but just off of...the name escapes me, but just off of the main artery to the airport. We were a little further out than the USAID mission and not too far from the Xa Loi pagoda, which was the main Buddhist temple. In any case, I then went back in, and spent the night watching the artillery going against the palace, and then about 4:00 in the morning Jim Rosenthal, who was an ex-Marine officer said, let's see what's going on. So we went out to the main street and watched the first tanks go by. We stood out where we could be seen so they wouldn't be confusing us with someone trying to resist. The first tank stopped, and an officer popped down and we said, where are you coming from, and he said. Bien Hoa, I said, oh, you didn't go to the coast after all. And then shortly after the palace was taken, Jim and I went in and kind of looked around at the damage.

Q: What was the feeling among you, Jim Rosenthal and all, about this coup? I mean, as it was going on, did you think, oh God, we don't need this.

THOMSEN: Oh, my feeling, we don't need this. No sense at all that we'd had anything to do with the...that there had been any U.S. involvement. We were devastated by the death of Diem and Nhu the next day.

Q: What were you picking up from the ambassador's office?

THOMSEN: Nothing, pretty silent.

Q: Tony Lake being very quiet?

THOMSEN: After it was over Tony kept this to himself too, and we were very close in those days. So he was doing his duty. It was obviously very close hold. If you know the evolution in retrospect, it was Roger Hilsman who actually triggered it in Washington. There was still not an absolute decision to go until with Rusk in New York, and Kennedy in Hyannisport, and MacNamara somewhere else, a cable was kind of pushed through the system with everyone else thinking that everybody else had already approved it, that said go.

Q: Roger Hilsman, Assistant Secretary.

THOMSEN: He was the director of INR at that time.

Q: He, of course, was an old OSS...and kind of a reaction oriented, don't stand there, do something, which is a rather dangerous thing.

THOMSEN: The antithesis of a diplomatic process. He was, I think, a former military too, don't just stand there, do something. Whereas the diplomats would say, "don't do something, just stand there."

Q: I think these things are important to get out, the spirit of the times. I think in many ways, you might say the problems...this is my personal opinion, many of the problems we've had, particularly CIA covert action and all, have been as a result of the generation that grew up in World War II where no matter what you did you could run around with a jeep and blow up things, and do something. I mean it was a great feeling of doing stuff where I'm not sure how much that really helped. It was really the Army in the field that pretty well settled the problems, but it was a great feeling, and you were almost immune from anybody saying, that was a stupid thing to do.

THOMSEN: I think that's right. I think Vietnam was one of maybe the last echoes of that attitude, although I think it's still with us to some extent. There are no Foreign Service echoes that you kind of grew up with as a child, and are inculcated with, but I think we do tend to be more prudent, maybe over prudent sometimes. But I think by and large you don't have to do something. And sometimes it is better to do nothing and let the dust settle, and let the situation revolve itself. In the case of Diem, I don't know what the alternative would have been. I do know that the day after the coup Saigon was in total disarray. The police were totally disarmed, literally and emotionally. The young people were running wild, and it was a good thing the military kind of got control again. But in doing my notes, I noted there were probably nine different governments within a about a 19 month period in South Vietnam after that. The disorganization in retrospect was almost total.

Q: Well, one of the things you must have been doing in the political reporting section was, were you trying to figure who is in, who is on top, what does this mean. Could you talk a bit maybe both what you experienced, and also the process.

THOMSEN: Well, it became clear very quickly that Big Minh, as we called him (and we had a lot of respect for Big Minh. I don't know if you remembered this, but he was a big guy first of all) and the group around him Don, I had a lot of respect for Don. Some of the others were pretty heavily tarred with various kinds of corruption and in fact as they were all involved in various activities that we call corruption. But the Army quickly reestablished itself, and it became quite clear very quickly what was going on. We didn't have to spend a lot of time hypothesizing or trying to understand how it was going to work out. I mean, it was over pretty quickly.

Q: Was there a feeling once it was over that, okay, now let's get on with it?

THOMSEN: Yes, absolutely. And that emanated from the top down.

Q: Did you continue this work you'd been doing?

THOMSEN: I did until July of '64. And let me just comment because you mentioned the Kennedy assassination connection. "Where were you when Kennedy died?" I was in the sector's advisor's compound in Tay Ninh City at about five am. I think this is really important. The first thing I did after finishing cleaning up, was to call on the province chief, and inform him that my head of state had been assassinated. On the way to see him, I walked, it was a couple of blocks, and it was a beautiful fall morning. A little boy, could not have been more than eight or nine years old, a little Vietnamese boy came up to me crying, saying in Vietnamese "your president has been assassinated, I'm so sorry." I've carried that with me ever since because this was a little kid, in a provincial town, he was not my enemy. He was not my country's enemy. He was not just waiting for the chance to bushwhack me, or to drop a hand grenade in my car. He was a little kid who loved my president, and who was devastated by his death.

Q: I was in Austria on leave, and I was told, and I went back, and I was in Yugoslavia and the whole God damn country was in mourning. Flags were at... It was a communist country. And people would stop me, I mean the guards and the custom people were shaking my hand, and looking mournful. It was a very emotional time for everybody. Was there any feeling...were you beginning to pick up any feeling of certain elements within Vietnamese society were saying, you're responsible for the death of Diem and all of that? Or did that come later?

THOMSEN: It was sparse. It existed, but it were sparse. There were a few people after Kennedy was assassinated who said it was the result of the curse falling on Kennedy's result of caused Diem's death. There was that feeling among a few. Mainly though the impression I had from November on was that, I'd said that the army reestablished itself, but there was a pick up in the war. The insurgents had become more effective. Maybe there was a loss of effectiveness on the part of the Army, but I think it was more an increase in emphasis, and increase in activity, increase in support from North Vietnam of events from South Vietnam.

MacNamara started visiting, which didn't help matters any, and around this time the provincial reporters became more and more editors and coordinators of the reporting from their areas. I spent a lot of time between December and June and July of '64, in meetings preparing for MacNamara's visits, and trying to come up with joint views on what was going on. We would disassociate ourselves sometimes. But more often than not we would find ourselves trying to create a mission-wide view on what was going on province by province.

Q: What were you getting from your American lieutenants and captains out in the field after the coup?

THOMSEN: Well, first of all there was a mixed reaction in the Vietnamese military ranks. There were those that had been desperately loyal to Diem, not to Nhu, but to Diem, who felt very, very badly about what had happened, and they had really bad morale. There were others who didn't feel as strongly but were pleased at it. They may have been the majority but they didn't have the strongest feelings, if you follow me. But essentially everyone continued doing their job pretty much as they had done in the past. There were no attempts at provincial level coups, and there was no rebellion in the ranks against what had happened.

I'm trying to recall. There may have a couple of attempts. We know there was an attempt coming in from the Delta. Some folks in the Delta had started moving towards Saigon as a counter coup, but that was squashed pretty quickly. From the time of the coup until I went to Hue in July of '64, my general sense is that I got more wrapped up in the bureaucracy of reporting. The kind of a Lone Ranger going out and doing his thing didn't stop, but it was kind of superceded by being more active in Saigon to make sure that the AID stuff, and the military stuff, and the CIA stuff was all making some sense, kind of an editorial responsibility. Which is good. I mean, it was good in its own way. It was a different kind of thing, but it meant that there was someone at the embassy level looking at this other stuff and making sure that the reporting going back to Washington made some sense. And at the same time things were going downhill, and MacNamara would come out and tell us what we need to do now. I remember one day, for example, with an AID/MACV/ embassy meeting trying to come up with the figures on how many armed Viet Cong there were, which was kind of like throw a lot of numbers at the ceiling and which ever one stuck out face up, is the number, and that sort of thing. There became...what was it called, the "critical province program" where you were going to get about a dozen provinces throughout Vietnam that really needed high level attention. I remember one of my great bureaucratic successes was getting Tay Ninh taken off the list, so they could go about their business and not have to worry about all the reporting requirements.

Q: This, of course, was MacNamara's approach to numbers, quantify everything. I mean, once you'd identified the problem you could overwhelm it with statistics. By the way, you had your Buddhist leaders sitting in your embassy.

THOMSEN: A couple of days after the coup they said, I guess we can go now, and we opened the door and they walked out.

Q: There was a feeling I suppose then among the Buddhist community that having gotten rid of this very strong Catholic ruler, Diem and his brother, that things would get better.

THOMSEN: Well, if you follow the history of that following period, the Buddhists kept getting upset with different things and putting the students on the street again, and the more often it happened, the more effective they got. And I think there was no question that there was Viet Cong infiltration and they began taking advantage of it. This I started seeing in Hue and Da Nang, and because it was so far from the capital, it became really out of hand. We'll talk about it when we talk about my time up there, but essentially they burned the USIS building across the street from my residence and they finally burned the consulate itself. By that time I was in Da Nang full time.

Q: We might stop at this point. One last question I'll put on tape and we'll pick up before you go off to Hue, and that is since you were doing this editing, and filtering, your impression of the reporting from CIA and information they were getting, and also from the military. Could you talk a bit about that next time?

This is the 30th of September 1996. Sam, at the end of the last tape I asked if you could...what was your impression of what you were getting from first the CIA, and then from the military as far as a product from your area?

THOMSEN: Stu, we got not much from the CIA. They gave us a little bit of operational support, and a little bit of intelligence on their views on the infrastructure. But the bulk of our material either came from our own eye witness, that is our interviews and on the ground stuff. And then the copious military intelligence operation reports from their provincial, or their sector advisory teams. We'd go out and confirm that material, but they really provided the bulk of the grist for the mill.

Q: What was your impression of what the military was reporting?

THOMSEN: The military, in reporting through channels, that is the product that would be seen in Saigon, was essentially a very filtered product to prove one thing or another.

Q: You say the things that came up were filtered to prove something really which would mean there would be a tendency...you'd almost have to deal with this the way you would in dealing with Pravda or Izvestia in the Soviet Union. Say maybe there's something here and learn to read between the lines, and say maybe we better check on this. If they reported great progress in such and such a sector, or something like this, that would mean you'd probably want to go and check the sector.

THOMSEN: Absolutely. But I would give it credit for being a little more on the margin than maybe Pravda or Izvestia. They were putting a spin on it rather than being totally dishonest. But the best way to do was always go out to the field and talk to the lieutenants and captains who had to generate the reports, and get the detail from them and then put your own spin on it, either confirm what had come up, or qualify it as necessary.

Q: So you went up to Hue when? And you were in Hue from when to when?

THOMSEN: I was the consul in Hue from July 1964 to July 1966, but from about September '65 I was in reality the POLAD, the political adviser to the Commanding General, Third Marine Amphibious Force, headquarters in Danang. They sent a third officer up to Hue. Finally Tom Corcoran who was a very senior officer came up to Hue, and stayed in Hue while I was in Da Nang. It was an anomalous situation since I was still the principal officer but Tom was on TDY in Hue and was running that show while I was working in Da Nang.

Q: What was the consular situation as far as posts in Vietnam in what we're talking about now?

THOMSEN: In '64 the only consulate was in Hue.

Q: And Hue was more of the focus than Da Nang at that time?

THOMSEN: First, it was the old imperial capital, and secondly, it was still the headquarters for the civil administration on the part of the Vietnamese, although the Army Corps headquarters was in Da Nang. When AID expanded it headquartered its I Corps efforts in Da Nang. So everything except the consulate and the Vietnamese civil administration was in Da Nang from before I arrived. So being in Hue was an anomaly. And when the focus of the consul's responsibilities became political advice to the Marines, it was clearly required that I be present in Da Nang. But the anecdote I think I should tell is, the old story. And this is a little bit jumping ahead but I was wounded in the embassy explosion in March of '65, and was on home leave and doing public speaking from then until July. Now the Marines had pretty well established themselves in Da Nang during my absence. When I got back and got myself sorted out by mid-August I had recommended in an "official-informal" letter to Mel Manfull, the political counselor, that I stay in Hue as the consul, but that a senior Foreign Service officer be despatched to Da Nang to act as political adviser to the Marines. And on the first of September Phil Habib had taken over as political counselor sent me a cable saying, go to Da Nang, and as your primary duty become the political adviser. I would retain the consulate responsibility.

Q: I'd like to bite this off in bits. You were in Hue, was it '64 to '66?

THOMSEN: Right.

Q: What was the situation in Hue at that time, both military and the political situation there?

THOMSEN: It was pastoral, I think that's the only way to describe it. My wife came with me, we had a daughter just 14 months old. My wife was pregnant with our second child, our son. She used to bicycle around Hue with our daughter on the back of the bicycle, swim in the Circle Sportif. At the same time we would see dive bombers dropping their pay loads in the far west towards the mountains. So it was an anomaly. My predecessor, John Helble was able to drive from Hue all the way to the mountains in Second Corps to tiger hunt. But within weeks after I arrived, I drove in the Consulate sedan with a driver to Quang Ngai province, and when the I Corps senior adviser heard I had driven without escort to Quang Ngai (this now is the fall of '64), he sent a helicopter immediately and demanded for security reasons that I return by air. He was doing it as a favor in a friendly way, but insisted that I was not safe on the roads, and probably he was right.

Q: Quang Ngai is in what direction from Hue?

THOMSEN: Quang Ngai is way south of Hue. Hue is only about 50 miles south of the DMZ. Quang Tri is the northern most province, then Thua Thien, which was the province that Hue was in, and then Quang Nam which was where Da Nang was located, and then Quang Tin and then Quang Ngai. Quang Ngai was the farthest south province in what was called the I Corps. That was my area of responsibility.

Q: You had that whole area. What were you doing while you were in Hue?

THOMSEN: Essentially, the consulate had been set up to be a provincial reporting platform, if you will. My primary responsibility was to cover the counter insurgency in the First Corps, with special emphasis on the farther north part of this north provinces. Not long after I arrived, the Buddhists, who had succeeded in toppling Diem, began their activities again. By the fall of '64 the Buddhists were becoming active again politically, and I was covering the Buddhist activity, but the students who were very strongly Buddhist influenced were also becoming active.

Q: Could you talk about your contacts? I mean how you went about your business. First, with the government, and what was the government entity that you dealt with in Hue? And then contacts, as you say you were covering the Buddhists and the students. How did you go about that?

THOMSEN: First of all, my primary contact in Hue was the provincial administration, a lieutenant colonel in the Vietnamese army who was both the sector commander and the province chief. We had rather traditional diplomatic/Consular relations. Hue had been the capital, they had a residue of the diplomatic life. The Nationalist Chinese had a consulate there. So we weren't alone. The French had a consulate in Da Nang. So we formed a very small consular community. There was social activity. We were always dignified by being on the platform at special events, and that sort of thing. I took advantage of the USIA, distributed books to high schools, conducted myself as a consul in many ways. Since I had been the escort of the venerable Tri Quang while he was in the embassy, I had a good basis for relations with him. He was the leader of the Buddhists, and who was from Hue. Tri Quang was essentially my point of contact with the Buddhists in Hue.

Q: Had he been released?

THOMSEN: He was released immediately after the coup. As soon as Diem was overthrown, Tri Quang and Tam Chou, the two venerables, were released from the embassy where they had been in asylum, and then went to their pagodas, and became active again. And Tri Quang would come to Hue, and when he was there I would be made aware of it, and I would be invited to see him and I would call on him. Actually that relationship remained reasonably friendly until I left, and he gave me a very fine going away reception, and gave me a Buddhist gong clacker that I keep to this day. In his own mysterious way he seemed to have something of an affection, or respect, for me. I found that fascinating.

Q: What were the Buddhists doing while you were there? Because earlier on which was almost the whole thing it was the Buddhists burning themselves. Was that type of thing going on, or was it a different type of thing?

THOMSEN: It wasn't that violent. Not long after I arrived, about the middle of August of 1964, the first Buddhist demonstration occurred in Saigon. And not long after that this spread to Da Nang and to Hue. This was the regime of Nguyen Khanh who had taken over and the Buddhists didn't like it. About that time I should say, Tony Lake...

Q: He's National Security Advisor.

THOMSEN: National Security Advisor to the President, and who had been staff aide to Ambassador Lodge, Tony as staff aide to Ambassador Lodge had created what would normally be expected a lot of bureaucratic enemies in Saigon. And when Lodge left, Tony had not fulfilled the two year assignment, but Tony was offered a transfer out of the country because Lodge knew how vulnerable he was. Tony chose instead to come to Hue as my vice consul. So Tony and I worked together until he finished his tour. Tony also spoke good Vietnamese. The USIA had a branch public affairs officer, Bill Stubbs, who spoke fluent French. The communicator who was a former Navy man, Joe O'Neill, who later became chargé in a couple African countries, worked his way up from an FSS-communicator to the senior Foreign Service. We kind of covered the town. Joe would get in his jeep and drive around late at night, and just make sure there wasn't any untoward movements.

Tony and I taught a class at the law school on international relations. We taught it in English, and we taught it both to...as English is a second language, and to talk a little bit about world affairs. But that put us in touch with the real student leaders. We knew them on a first name basis, and although I don't think they entrusted all their secrets to us, they were willing to share with us their concerns, and even be critical of American foreign policy. It was an attempt by us to get an insight into the student mind as much as could be expected in Vietnam.

So we were plugged into the Buddhists, to the students. We had a kind of a general overview of the city through Joe O'Neill. The MACV unit for the First ARVAD Division was just a few blocks from the residence and we would spend time with them, and I would spend time at First Division headquarters, and go out to the district towns and talk to people. I was fairly mobile, and we think we were pretty well plugged in. AID was very useful to us. One of the finest insights I got into the insurgency...remember '64 it hadn't really exploded yet. I remember one of the public health advisers for AID saying let's take a look at the villages in the geographic unit within which are hamlets, let's look at the village map of Thua Thien, and see where we have had to stop doing the DDT spraying. He said this is probably the best indicator of security that we've got. Think about it, and he was absolutely right. What was happening, is from the mountains, down toward the Piedmont, and then toward the lowlands, slowly village by village the Vietnamese DDT sprayers were refusing to go into the hamlets because of lack of security. In 1964, that was happening in the summer, and there was a deterioration in security, even as I had arrived in Hue. I arrived in the first week in July. I recall a Fourth of July party which was combined to be a welcoming party. It was outside in the garden of the public affairs officer, and we could hear small arms fire. I think it was about the 7th of July. The next morning we were told by the First Division advisers that two battalions of North Vietnamese troops had attacked a special forces camp southwest of Hue. Gerald Hickey, who was a well-known anthropologist/sociologist from Cornell was in the special forces camp, and I interviewed him a few days later when he got back. The evidence was absolutely clear that two North Vietnamese battalions had attacked the camp. The first multi battalion North Vietnamese attack had occurred in South Vietnam in early July 1964. Most histories don't reflect a North Vietnamese presence in South Vietnam until the end of at least the end of '64, maybe into '65. But it had really occurred in that month.

Another affect of that attack: John Helble was still the consul, I was reading in. John sent a normal cable the next day, once he had his facts straight, action SecState, info Saigon, a few other info addressees. Westmoreland had just taken charge of MACV in Saigon. The fact that a small consulate in the northern part of the country had been the first to report to Washington a multi battalion North Vietnamese attack, blew him away. He went to Lodge, and then to Taylor, and by the time I took over I had been prohibited from sending action messages to Washington. My only addressee was to embassy Saigon, and they would forward my messages to Washington as they saw fit. So it essentially had removed the consul in Hue from being a true reporting post, to simply being an appendage of the embassy, which probably fit the pattern for Vietnam the way it should. I always felt a little badly about it though.

Q: How about your relations with the local government, the provincial government?

THOMSEN: They were friendly. In early '65 after the USIA was burned I was given instructions to make a demarche on the province chief, sector commander, to chew him out for not giving us proper security. As a result they became a little more arms length. The corps commander, Nguyen Chanh Thi, who later came into national prominence was somewhat erratic, but I think a patriotic soldier, and he had good personal relations. But from time to time acting on instructions I'd have to take him to task. He was probably at least 15 years older than I was. For him to accept that, in the Asian pattern, from me was I think difficult for him. But when I was wounded in the embassy bombing in March of '65, he wrote me a fairly long personal letter of regret, and gratitude for the American presence, and for the sacrifices we'd made. It was an unnecessary thing; I was struck by it.

Q: Had troops been inserted in '64, we're talking about you arrived around July of '64 to Hue. Had American build up started at that point?

THOMSEN: No, the American build up, that is beyond helicopter units, began in March-April of '65. The Marines again were the first. I was aware of the beginning of the build up, in fact, I pull an anecdote Stu.

Q: That's what I want.

THOMSEN: In the fall of '64...remember this is a tiny consulate in an old French bungalow, all of a sudden Joe O'Neill comes to my door and says, "Sir, there's a Marine captain to see you." I'm sitting behind my desk with my flags, and this Marine comes in in full battle gear, and "Sir, I've just come from Task Force 77 in the Tonkin Gulf, and I've come to ask for an intelligence briefing." It was kind of curious, but that's the way the Marines are, as I later learned. So I gave him about 45 minutes or an hour of my appreciation of the situation. I had a map of I Corps and I went through the drill, and toward the end of the conversation he said, "sir, one of my basic missions is to determine the secure rear area where we might establish a permanent base if that's called for." And I must tell you, Stu, I chuckled and I said, "Captain, you left it when you left the aircraft carrier." And he said, "what do you mean?" I said, "there's no secure area unless it's established in this country." And he said, "I understand, and saluted and walked out." And when the Marines arrived they set up their main installation within the perimeter of the Da Nang airbase and they immediately established a significant security perimeter around that airbase. They secured themselves as my briefing had indicated they would have to do.

Q: Did you have at all the feeling that, God if the Marines are going to go here, I hope they're staying away from Hue? I mean, nobody wants a large military installation.

THOMSEN: In fact, I did say Hue would be the least appropriate place to put an American installation. They ought to isolate themselves. But, yes, in my briefing to him I made it clear that Hue was not a particular appropriate place to put Marines. When I did learn the Marines were coming a year later, I suggested they needed to be in the Delta. Marine activities in I Corps were kind of a contradiction in terms. In any case, that would come later.

But the first significant Marines arrived in March, a battalion and then later on a brigade, and then finally they built up to two divisions and two Marine air wings. They had a huge presence in Central Vietnam.

Q: You said the first ARVN division, was that it, was stationed where, was their preeminent division too, wasn't it? What were your relations with this? ARVN means Army of the Republic of Vietnam.

THOMSEN: Well, on a kind of a protocol basis I had a good social relations with them. I would entertain senior Vietnamese officers as part of our normal social life. I had good relations with the MACV folks, the Army colonel who was a senior advisor to the First Division, and with his subordinates, the intelligence advisor and the operations advisor primarily, and the civic action advisor. And I maintained this on a pretty much a daily basis. I would go to division headquarters probably twice a week at least, and just get a feel for what was going on. I would drive up to Quang Tri, and get briefings from the province chief there. Essentially I had face to face contact with most of the senior Vietnamese military in my region.

Q: You were in Hue. What about out towards the Laotian border, because that became rather than the North Vietnamese coming straight down against Quang Tri, which they did later on, but there was sort of flanking movements, and we had siege at Khe Sanh, in '68, but I mean in that time what about the hinterland. Was there mountain Montagnards out there?

THOMSEN: There were Montagnards in the mountains to the west, and there were special forces camps. Generally quite peaceful. I had been, as the provincial reporting officer around Saigon, I'd get to see special forces camps along the Cambodian border. So I had a sense that these kinds of under populated areas that were up for grabs, or under Viet Cong control because they essentially had no population to try to protect. When I got to Hue, some of these areas had rubber plantations, old French farming of some kind, Montagnard camps, a couple special forces camps, and then a few Americans who were there with the Summer Institute of Linguistics translating the bible. There were Americans up there, can you imagine translating, or creating Bibles in the native languages, creating even written languages in the first place, all the things that Summer Linguistics does. So it was again, the term pastoral is not too much of an exaggeration. The war had not yet hit its stride.

Now while I was there, within the first six months that I was there, things changed dramatically in the mountains. And as I think I mentioned earlier, the AID reference to using DDT distributors as a guide. Bernard Fall had said, in a conversation I had with him a year or so before, that the postman, the guy that delivers the mail, and if the guy stops delivering the mail, then you know there's a problem. Well, DDT in that sense was almost delivering the mail. This was what kept the lice out, mosquitos, and malaria down. Villagers knew that, and they accepted it. But when the DDT guy wouldn't come, it was because of lack of security. But that was beginning to happen in August-September of '64. And I recall the Summer Institute of Linguistic headquarters for that area was just a block away from the residence. And I got to know an American couple. They were beginning to get concerned, but they were just beginning to get concerned about their young people who were up in the mountains. And in September-October they began bringing them back, and by the end of the year it was vacated. Shortly after the beginning of '65, when we went north, we were evacuating civilian Americans from that area generally.

Q: You talk about these special forces camps. These were American Green Berets. They were sort of the apple of the eye of John Kennedy. Were you getting any impression of what they were doing, and any reports you were getting in from them. What purpose were they serving?

THOMSEN: I have a couple of stories to tell about the special forces camp. I have to tell one story about a special forces camp in Tay Ninh, near the Cambodian border. While in camp I needed a hair cut. So I went to the barber in the camp, and I asked him for a hair cut in Vietnamese. And he looked at me like my Vietnamese isn't...your Vietnamese isn't all that hot. But the problem was that he was a Cambodian. So I finally figured out...I went back to the camp commander, I said, do you know you've got ethnic Cambodians in your camp? He kind of looked at me as if I had discovered a dark secret. Essentially we were training the Khmer Serei. I went back to Saigon and reported it to Col Richard Stilwell, who later became the head of U.S. Army Forces in Korea. He was head of operations at MACV.

Q: In charge of operations.

THOMSEN: I think it was operations, in fact, not training but operations. I briefed him on this, and he expressed great surprise that this was happening in northern Tay Ninh province, but I'm not sure he was all that surprised. I reported that to Ambassador Lodge, and he was surprised. But that was the kind of thing that was going on. We were doing things in all sorts of funny ways out there. And for me to discover that was what I was supposed to be doing even though it wasn't necessarily what some people wanted. And sometimes I think that the reason they created a kind of bureaucratic requirement that we coordinate reporting was to try to keep us in Saigon because we were kind of troublesome when we'd get out and talk to captains and lieutenants, and even the Vietnamese.

Q: Well, there really was a real dichotomy wasn't there in the reporting? The military has a normal filter. I've watched their briefings where it starts off with a lieutenant giving the briefing, then a captain, then a major, and finally the colonel will give the briefing and it's a well rehearsed thing of which all of his senior officers will sit in on. So nothing untoward is said. And some reporting has somewhat of the same thing. I mean a lot of people are watching it. Whereas the State Department, in those days, things kind of come in and go right up to where they might be acted on without a lot of filtering. The people involved almost won't allow everybody to sit on top of a story.

THOMSEN: The judgement I came to finally was that for the military reporting is essentially operationally based. They want to know what's important for them to know to get the job done. So it's sort of a "can do" kind of reporting with emphasis on what works. Similarly when something doesn't work, they want to know that too. But essentially it's an upbeat kind of reporting. Whereas a Foreign Service officer should be skeptical when he reports. Not negative. It's the old story of whether you report the glass half full, or half empty. The military report the glass half full. I've always said that a good Foreign Service officer doesn't report a glass half full, or half empty. He reports it as being 50% full, or 40% full. He doesn't say it's half full, or half empty. He simply gives you the quantity, and then makes a judgement about it. And that's what our job was as far as I was concerned. And if I found out something that didn't seem to be generally known, I felt that was an important thing to make sure somebody knew. And a lot of that did happen. But that was the difference, I think, in our reporting styles.

Q: Was anything happening out in the Quang Tri DMZ area?

THOMSEN: No. It was very quiet. I recall around Christmas of '64 General Thi, the Corps commander taking a delegation of us, including the Chinese consul, the French consul, and we had a kind of a picnic on the southern bank of the river, the Ben Hai. There was a bridge across with a guard on either side, and we had a big picnic on the southern side and Thi had loud speakers set up with Vietnamese music playing. He once said he wished he had huge fans so he could blow the food smells across the river. It was entirely a peaceful situation. That was on Route 1 as it crossed the Ben Hai. Quang Tri city was beautiful, it was a small citadel, beautiful pastoral situation in '64-'65.

Q: Bernard Fall whom you mentioned was a reporter, then he was killed in Vietnam, but he had written his book, Street Without Joy.

THOMSEN: That was the area from north of Quang Tri to Hue. That was the Street Without Joy.

Q: What was the situation along the Street Without Joy?

THOMSEN: My experience was that it was safe, but that as time went on it got less safe. The heart of the war in Vietnam was the Communist Nationalist Party fight that had gone on throughout...I guess going back to the 40s. The Nationalist Party (VNQDD), which if you marked it out, is exactly the same words as the Kuomintang in Chinese: and there was a connection between them-- the VNQDD and the Kuomintang. If you go back far enough, as far back as the 20s or 30s, you find that Chiang Kai-shek was actually at a training camp where both Ho Chi Minh and VNQDD leadership were being trained. One of the stories goes that the Vietnam Communist Party was smarter than the VNQDD, and they would turn over photos of VNQDD returnees to Vietnam to the French security in Hong Kong. So that when the VNQDD trainees came back across the border, they were picked up immediately. This always to me has been a litmus test for whether the Viet Minh was just a truly nationalist party, or whether it had something more sinister. I think the fact that we were willing to betray fellow revolutionaries, because they were in a different party, was an important litmus test. The VNQDD had strength in Quang Tri province, and that was a part of the Street Without Joy issue. They also were very powerful in Quang Nam province, and in Quang Ngai province, and had created really by their presence almost like a toxin, a stronger Viet Minh. So that Street Without Joy was essentially a Viet Minh stronghold.

Q: You might explain what the Viet Minh...

THOMSEN: The Viet Minh was the Vietnamese Communist Party fighting the French. But in 1964, I could drive down to Quang Tri city in a black State Department sedan with a driver.

Q: Should we move to when you left? Is there anything more we should cover on this Hue time before you moved down to Da Nang?

THOMSEN: The late summer and into the winter toward the end of the year.

Q: Which year?

THOMSEN: '64. From the time I arrived in July through the end of '64 was the time of our beginning to think about building up and it culminated in the bombing of North Vietnam, and the Tonkin Gulf incident. That created a different situation for us. It was also a time of greater unrest among the Buddhists. And, for example, this is when they first burned the USIS. That called for the American dependents in Hue being brought into the MACV compound. At that time I was in Saigon and Tony Lake called me from Hue to report to me what was happening. I guess I'll just tell the anecdote--he said, Sam, it's your vice, it's your vice. And I thought he was saying, it's your wife, and I was terrified. But he straightened me out. He was telling me that USIS had been burned, and that all the American dependents were being evacuated into the MACV compound. I got back and that was when I was instructed to make a demarche on the province chief and sector commander. This is the first demarche I've made in my Foreign Service career. I knew how to spell it, but I wasn't sure what it was. But I did what I was told, and he was properly chastised and promised he'd improve the security. But the fact is the police weren't in a position to provide adequate security for any of our installations against students demonstrating.

Q: Why was USIA burned?

THOMSEN: What the Buddhists told me was a fascinating story. It had beautiful plate glass windows. This was after the time when USIA facilities being harassed in Latin America, and the Middle East. One of the students said that they kind of understood that the reason we put big plate glass windows in our USIA was so it would be a way for them to demonstrate, express their views to the United States government. They were trying to embarrass us, and trying to attract our attention. I think they thought they could have an influence on us by doing that, and bring us to be more critical, and heavy handed with the governments.

Q: Was there any aftermath to the burning of the USIA?

THOMSEN: It was rebuilt, that's one thing you can say. I found a charred book which I decided to carry with me as a souvenir called "Communism in Southeast Asia." It was a book written in the 40s, and it was almost naive attempts to kind of create categories. It was virtually worthless as a guide to the reality to the world, but it was a nice symbol of what had happened in Hue.

Our second child was born in Hue on December 28th. The reason I mention this, my wife was instructed to leave in late November to give birth in either Bangkok or Manila. That was the medical office in Saigon embassy. She refused. It was too close to Christmas, so we got the local hospital to provide us with an extra delivery room facility, a little table, the MACV doctor and a French trained Vietnamese doctor became the team, and on the 28th of December our son Samuel was born. Two weeks later the village chief and his village council came and delivered to us 13 copies of his birth certificate in Vietnamese, since the law said that he had to return to the village of his birth if he wanted another copy. Then six weeks after his birth all American dependents were evacuated from Vietnam. That was in January of '65, and that was an important event. Tony Lake did a superb job as...both of us on first assignments. We took control of the evacuation process along with the military, and Tony performed a wide variety of critical tasks. I just really want to make the point, he was a very fine Foreign Service officer in his time in the Foreign Service.

Tony and I were still trying to work with USAID, and working with the students, to try to find some way of connecting in a way that would allow us to really be communicating, and not just talking past each other. I went to Saigon in late March of 1965 to meet with Alex Johnson, the deputy ambassador, to try to get some money from AID to do a few projects that would allow us to really get close to the students to really begin talking to them. It was at that time on 30 March 1965 that the embassy was blown up, and I was wounded. By good fortune I wasn't more seriously wounded. I was sitting at a desk right next to a heavy plate glass window and I heard noise outside, ran to the window, saw a Vietnamese father throw his small daughter to the ground in the gutter and cover her. There were pops of pistol shots, and I went to the two secretaries who were in the room with me, and told them to go into an inner office. And as I followed them out the explosion occurred. The medal frame went right by my head, and I was hit pretty hard by a lot of the glass but I was just superficially wounded.

I returned to Hue but was given R&R leave shortly thereafter and returned to the United States, to Washington for briefings, and made some presentations in Washington, and then was allowed to go home on R&R kind of as a recuperation leave, and was told that I would have another day of leave for every day I made a public presentation. It was about this time that we were beginning to gin up a public affairs program on Vietnam. By July I was so tired of giving speeches I said I don't care if it is worth another day of leave, I'm going to go back to Vietnam. This is now '65, I'd spent my two years in Vietnam but had been asked to extend, and agreed. So that was the end of '65.

Q: When you were giving these talks on Vietnam, this is prior to the American student opposition.

THOMSEN: That's right...Before the major effort.

Q: So you weren't being heckled.

THOMSEN: Well, I was actually. It was an ambiguous time. This is now the spring of '65. I went on the David Frost radio show. David Frost did not have a TV show he had a radio show, and he was very friendly, and I was upbeat that we were going to make it, I could see the light at the end of the tunnel. But I said that we had the capability of maintaining ourselves, and that the Viet Cong who I had seen when they were only 25,000 strong, were not going to be able to push us out. At a Hollywood high school I was on stage with Congressman Brown. He brought six of his folks out, and the moderator said that each of them could have a go at me, and then I could respond. So it was six to one on that stage, and I must say I got a little bit of sympathy from the audience just by being so badly outnumbered. One day I was invited to speak at a college campus in East Los Angeles. A broadcaster from one of the radio stations called me...this was a different era, to say that he had heard me speak in Hollywood. He wanted me to know that a demonstration had already formed at the college I was scheduled to speak at, and he had been told by some of the leaders that they intend to harass me physically, as well as to try to intimidate me. He suggested that I not come. I called Washington and was advised not to go within ten miles of that place. They were right. They did not want a confrontation. But that was beginning, that's what I'm trying to get at. It was beginning in the spring of '65.

Q: When the families were evacuated, where did your family go?

THOMSEN: Sammy was the youngest evacuee. Katy, our daughter, who was now two years old, and had only been six weeks when she came to Vietnam, was now a young lady of two, she had a sign on her back saying, Katy Thomsen, which appeared in Time magazine. They went to Hong Kong first, and then flew back to Torrance, California where Judy's folks live, rented a house and stayed there until I came back in July of '66. So we were separated for about 14-15 months.

Q: You came back in the summer of '65?

THOMSEN: I came back in July.

Q: So you stayed until July of '66. Did you feel an intensification of pressures, incidents, or anything else like that?

THOMSEN: Oh, yes. It was now a different war entirely. By the spring of '65 the North Vietnamese were now present in South Vietnam in force, and they were destroying the South Vietnamese army. There was battle after battle where the South Vietnamese troops were being decimated. And that's really, if you recall, one of the triggers for bringing the American forces in. And yes, it was a totally different war now, one in which the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong were coming down closer and closer to the coast where villages east of Hue were now occupied...I shouldn't say occupied, but had significant infrastructure so they were not secure.

When I got back in August of '65 I made my fatal mistake and wrote the letter recommending that a political adviser be assigned to the Marines, and in September of '65 I was assigned to the Marines. I moved with a couple of bags to Da Nang, moved into the Marine compound, bunked in the General's quarters, that is general officer's quarters. They issued me two sets of utilities, combat boots, and I put U.S. Consul on the right side of greens. I later had a lovely and funny farewell letter from the senior Army advisor, General Hamblin in which he denounced me as a traitor for working with the Marines.

Q: Did you find working with the Marines something new? Was there a different way of operating? A different approach?

THOMSEN: Absolutely. I would get up at 5:30 and my first briefings at 7:00. If a political situation had developed, I would brief, but essentially I would sit through a series of briefings on intelligence, operations, supply, and logistics. I would get briefings from young majors who had just come back from long range patrols up to areas I had driven in a year and a half before, in which they would talk about the land mines, punji stakes, and booby traps. The Marines were beginning to move out of Da Nang, and their perimeters were broadening. It was a different war entirely.

General Lewis Walt had been a fullback at Colorado A&M, was 6 foot 2, and 240 pounds. One of the finest, nicest people I have ever known, he took me with him everywhere. He'd get in a Huey (and the Marines only flew with one pilot, so I could sit in the co-pilot's seat and look straight down). And Walt would be in the back with one of his aides, and we'd fly up to a special forces camp, or to a Montagnard village, or to some isolated place, and we'd drop down and he'd get a briefing. And I'd go off and talk to the Montagnard chief, or to the young Vietnamese special forces commander, and we'd come back and he'd ask me what I had learned. That was often more important than what he'd learned. So I was kind of his eyes and ears in a different way. I was also all over Da Nang trying to keep down anti-Marine...I shouldn't say anti-Marine, but I should say Marine depredations which resulted in anti-Marine demonstrations. I recall one day being informed that Marines had urinated in a Buddhist pagoda. I went out and visited the pagoda. I talked to the citizens who were around there. The Marines had dug their security trenches outside the pagoda, but when it came time to relieve themselves had gone in. When I briefed Walt the next day we flew into the Marine headquarters near Monkey Mountain. The entire battalion of which these two soldiers were a part, was on the tarmac at attention. The commander of that battalion later became a commandant of the Marine Corps, but in those days he was a young lieutenant colonel. They stood at ease while I addressed them on the importance of the Buddhist religion in Vietnam, and why you don't urinate in pagodas. And General Walt stood with me while I did that briefing. He gave me carte blanche as far as the Marines were concerned. They sent out their chief chaplain from Hawaii to spend a week with me. I briefed him daily on various aspects of Vietnamese culture. He took copious notes, sent back to me a field manual in draft for review before they distributed it to the Marines to tell them how to deal with the people in Central Vietnam. They took this very seriously. I was very impressed, and, of course, it kept me busy. Since I felt that I was being paid attention to, I worked hard at this.

Q: The Marines later, I'm not sure if it's later, or when, but more than any other of our military were sending, at some point, small teams out... platoons, CAPS. Did that have its genesis about this time?

THOMSEN: It did, in fact I knew the young lieutenant who started it, and maybe I even had a hand in encouraging him to try. But essentially the Vietnamese defense forces were at three levels. One was the regular army, the second was called regional forces--they had different names at different times. These were equivalent of a civil guard, or home guard, or a national guard recruited at the province level, under the province commander's command, and mobile forces, reasonably well armed. Then you had the so-called village defenders, and these were folks recruited from the village who would stay in the village. They were generally not as well armed as the Viet Cong, but they were the ones responsible for providing local security. Now, in the Marine area, this lieutenant started in one village to put his platoon in the middle of the village defenders. He trained them, and they stayed with them. And two of the critical aspects...training was very important, but also the use of the radio for both medevacs and artillery support. And the villages where the Marines began staying, where the villagers began feeling comfortable, that at night if there was an attack they'd have artillery support, and actually air support if necessary, called in by the Marines, but the Marines would stand and fight with them. That if someone was wounded, not just a Marine, but if a villager were wounded, there would be a helicopter to take him or her to a hospital. These villages developed tremendous reputations for being strong bastions. And in fact, in Quang Ngai province toward the west, the North Vietnamese started sending organized regiments against these, trying to destroy the Marine presence. There were really heroic, and sometimes terrifying stories of the Marines and their village defenders standing off incredible odds, while waiting for reinforcements. But they also did a lot of civic action. There was a medic with each of the platoons who would perform sick call every morning in the village. They would send home and send back care packages, and bring them in, books and pads and stuff for the little villages. It was really a fascinating experiment. The problem was you could not possibly cover South Vietnam with a platoon of American forces in every village. But where they were located, they were superb. And the Americans learned to speak a reasonable amount of Vietnamese.

Q: You were there early on when they started doing this. One would think the Marines would be the last to do this. I mean, the Marines usually are hard charging. Ten days on the ground, and then off and the Army takes over. Was this because of Walt, or was this something built in, or was it just happenstance.

THOMSEN: I might even have played a part in it. Let me describe Walt's senior staff. His chief of staff was Joe Platt, who was a colonel, later became a two-star general in charge of Marine personnel. Joe was a brilliant man who you'd never guess would be a Marine. He was tall and rugged, but essentially he was well read. John Chaisson, who was the "three"- operations, was a Harvard graduate, later became Chief of Staff of the Marine Corps. Lou Walt became the deputy commandant of the Marine Corps. They appointed a young lawyer judge advocate general corps, a lieutenant colonel, as their first J-5, their first civic action officer. That was at my suggestion. Chuck Kever was his name. Kever sat on the senior staff although he was a lieutenant colonel, and everyone else were colonels. But he would sit with me and with the chief of staff, and with the J-3 and the J-2, as a part of an inner circle for Walt, and advise him on civic action, on intelligence problems, operations problems, and everything they did had a civic action component integrated into it. I was invited to comment on all of this from a political-cultural point of view. Walt was very complimentary to me. He called me "one of the finest professionals" he'd ever known in his book.

Q: Did you find that you were having a problem serving two masters?

THOMSEN: Oh, absolutely.

Q: Could you talk about that?

THOMSEN: Sure, and we could go into the detail later on of what happened in '66. '66 was quite a national crisis. My instructions had been in September of '65, to report to Da Nang and take on POLAD as my primary responsibility. But if I wasn't doing political reporting, I would get shots from Saigon. In fact, I was called to Saigon a couple of times to help draft country-wide materials in the middle of situations which, in my own judgement, said I should have been with the Marines to help deal with one issue or another. But I was treated by the political section as being a part of the political section when they saw fit, and was called back to Saigon, or taken off what I thought were my critically important primary duties with the Marines. The epitome of this was, during one of the real crises...Da Nang was in chaos, troops which were more loyal to the Buddhists than they were to the leadership in Saigon had taken control of some of the installations. General Ky, who was the acting president, sent his T-28s to bomb the rebel installations. Some of them were right next to Marine installations, and in one morning at the briefing, we're told two Marines have been wounded, one seriously in the neck, by VNAF aircraft.

Q: VNAF means?

THOMSEN: Vietnamese air force. General Walt, with his wing commander at his left said, I want F-4s airborne immediately, and I'm going to call the...

Q: F-4s being?

THOMSEN: F-4s, are the best, the work horse of the Marine Corps- Phantoms. Walt said that he wanted the F-4s airborne, and circling above the VNF aircraft. He told me he wanted me to call Phil Habib. I called Phil and told him that there was a real dangerous situation, two Americans had been wounded. If an American is killed here, a serious situation would ensue. And I said the Marines have sent up F-4s above the VNAF aircraft. Well, Habib was a strong supporter of Ky, who was the head of the VNAF as well as the president. The person was causing all the trouble was Thi, who was my Vietnamese Corps Commander. He told me to tell Walt to get those airplanes out of the sky. And I said, "Phil, I'm not going to tell him to take his Marine aircraft out of the sky and stop protecting his Marines." He repeated the instructions And I said, "I can't do it, Phil." At the same time Walt was on the phone with Westmoreland, we were in the same room at opposite sides of the desk, and Walt was telling Westmoreland what he was doing, and Westmoreland was more understanding. He said he would tell Ky what the issues are, and how dangerous this is in terms of the alliance. So then I was able to say, Phil, Westmoreland has said it's okay, and then he's going to talk to Ky. And Phil said, he would talk to Ky too and see if they could resolve this. So that ended ok. But essentially, I was torn very badly in situations like that. On the other hand I had a lot of fun. I sent NODISs to Dean Rusk every night, as part of the Marine Sitrep. I wrote the first section on the political situation, and they wrote the rest. That went to two officials: the Marine Commandant and the Secretary of State. So I was able to say anything I wanted. I had a telephone conversation with President Johnson about General Thi. Johnson called one day and was talking to Walt about something, and Walt said something about "my political adviser" here has known Thi for a couple of years. Johnson got on the phone and said, young man tell me what you think about General Thi. I said "he's naive, not well educated, but I believe he's a strong anti-communist, he's fought against them for 30 years, and I think he's well intended. He needs good advice, and he needs support, but he's erratic and he can go off in the wrong direction." He said, "thank you very much."

Q: How did that thing resolve itself, with Thi, and Ky.

THOMSEN: By the end of May '66, Thi was invited to go abroad for study. Other people were exiled or moved around in different places, and the Central government finally installed control over Central Vietnam. At its height armed rebel forces were holed up in two or three Buddhist pagodas in Da Nang, the Vietnamese Marines finally went in with recoilless rifles, and put a couple holes through pagodas, and they finally came out, and gave up essentially, and were allowed to return to their old lives. There were no mass arrests or anything like that.

Without going into all the details, what was fascinating to me were two things. One, in spite of this incredible situation, partly because of the Marines being there, the Viet Cong were unable to take military advantage of this incredible dislocation. Secondly, no one, including the Viet Cong or the rebels, was able to generate any significant anti-Americanism among the population, although there were some attempts. Tri Quang made a statement about the foreigners, where he was alluding to us, that was interpreted to me as criticizing us. Third, there was in fact within the system a lot of...I won't call it flexibility, but a lot of ability to survive. The South Vietnamese system survived all of this. Other systems might have cracked and broken under this incredible strain. They survived and went on, this is in '66, to live for another nine years. And, in fact, to go from strength to strength in some ways.

I went back in '73 which will be a later chapter to tell how having seen the first Marines arrive, I had a glass of champagne with the last Marine to leave, and we'll go into that later. I think there were some very interesting implications of that really traumatic event, instead of events in mid-'66.

Q: How did Walt deal with Thi.

THOMSEN: Very respectfully, but very firmly. He ostentatiously treated him as an equal, but he made it absolutely clear when he needed something, or when he required that something happen. And Thi respected that on his side. We had some tremendously successful joint operations. Unfortunately, in one case an American general who was Walt's deputy had given bad orders resulting in casualties of dozens of Vietnamese and Americans. He was relieved by Walt and was out of the area in 24 hours. In other words, Walt showed the Vietnamese what happens in the American system when someone is responsible for a major failure. But that person, before he left...it resulted in the death of a Vietnamese lieutenant colonel...this general came to me, and asked what could be done to show his regrets at the death of this lieutenant colonel? I advised him to send something to the ceremony, and a letter of condolence to the wife. I helped him draft the letter. What he did was tremendously well received by the Vietnamese because they knew that he had suffered personally, professionally, from that, but that he hadn't overlooked the lieutenant colonel's tragedy. It was very interesting. Relations were oddly good between the Vietnamese and the American Marines.

Q: You were saying in part of '65 and in '66 the North Vietnamese were taking apart the South Vietnamese army, or was it the Viet Cong? What was the analysis?

THOMSEN: There were several pitched battles in early 1965, and I forget the names of them all but they're very prominent, in which South Vietnamese forces, in some cases they had to fly in the Vietnamese airborne. The three elite units were the First Marine Division...in those days it wasn't a division, it was a brigade, and the airborne brigade. These were their elite units. The First Division, of course, sat on the DMZ in the north, and then the airborne and the Marines were mobile forces operating out of Saigon. What you saw in the spring of '65 were units being mauled so badly that the airborne and the Marines were being flown in to try to save the situation, and these were pitched battles between North Vietnamese and South Vietnamese units. These were not Viet Cong units.

Q: What were you getting from the American military in looking at why the South Vietnamese were losing these battles?

THOMSEN: Mainly senior officer incompetence. They had a pretty good regard for the guy who carried the rifle, but morale was bad. It appeared not to be quite so much in central Vietnam because there were a lot of traditional ties associated with it. A part of the South Vietnamese problem in general...I'll get philosophic for just a moment. They operated under the old Mandarin system of putting both civil and military people out of their own areas, moving a person from the central area to the Delta, and not just military but even district chiefs who were critically important as far as being a communicator between the central government and the village or the villager, would come from a different part of the country. Now, this was not true so much in central Vietnam. They seemed to have some sort of...I don't know why they were able to maintain pretty much central Vietnamese in central Vietnam. But throughout Vietnam you'd find central Vietnamese. You'd find Catholics in Buddhist districts in the Delta, for example. Just a breakdown in communication from the highest levels to the lower levels. Whereas the Viet Cong recruited from the village. And the successful Viet Cong leader would be promoted up to the district. So your Viet Cong district chiefs were all from the district. It was a ladder to success. It was much more effective than the government. And the government was operating on that old traditional Chinese Mandarin system of you had a very strong central authority that delegated things out without regard to local circumstances. That may be too broad to answer your questions specifically. But you had good units, and bad units, and the good units had good leaders, and the bad units had bad leaders. There are notorious examples of South Vietnamese generals who were incompetent, disinterested, on the take, corrupt. You could buy your way out of a combat situation by paying them off. I know more of that by reputation, that is by story, than I do by personal experience.

Q: Later, at least in my time...I was there '69 to '70 up around Da Nang the Vietnamese general...Lam was it?

THOMSEN: Lam, one of the corrupt ones.

Q: He was notorious for being really corrupt.

THOMSEN: Terrible. Lam had been the second division commander and I had known him in that capacity, and when they finally resolved the situation in Da Nang, Lam was called from the second division to become the corps commander. That was June-July '66. Lam stayed as corps commander for I don't know how long, and stories of his corruption reached me in Laos. I was there in '67 to '70, and I was hearing stories about Lam all that distance away.

Q: What about when you were in Da Nang, also Hue, what about corruption? From your perception in your area of responsibility?

THOMSEN: First a comment on corruption. What we call corruption, and what might be understood to be corruption in that environment were slightly different. I remember a district chief, a captain, telling me, you call what we do being as corrupt, but let me just tell you. I get the equivalent of $40 a month as a captain. I've got AID officials, I've got you, I've got my counterparts, I've got people from Saigon coming to see me every day. I have to put on a lunch, I have to provide scotch, I've got to find income to do that. So I'm using some of the development funds to do this, otherwise it would be impossible to do it. Now, you call that corruption. He said, I've been in the Armed Forces Staff College at Leavenworth, and I know your definition of corruption. He said you tell me how to do my job without availing myself of some of the resources. You know the house I live in...this was a guy who I had fairly good respect for, you know how my wife is living, am I corrupt? Well, the answer is he's not living a corrupt life, but he is misusing government funds by our definition. That's one form of corruption. The fact is from the time you get any position of authority at all, you have to look for...and there's plenty of examples around as to how you do it, other sources of income. So at some point all of a sudden you do have a bigger house, you do start using the cement to add on a bedroom, and then pretty soon you're gone. The senior people, and Lam is a good example, were absolutely without any restraint on their use of what was available to them.

In Hue and in Da Nang, the mayors were civilians. The mayor of Da Nang, for example, had been a professor of medicine at the University of Hue Medical School while I was in Hue, and I knew him in that previous incarnation. He took advantage of his new position to enrich himself within boundaries I suppose of some kind. He wasn't flying off to Paris, and he wasn't driving a limousine, but he was certainly living beyond the means of a mayor's salary. It was endemic, I guess is the way to say it. And the only difference was how grossly you took advantage of your position.

Q: Apparently it remains today under the communists. Is there anything we should talk about in the '66 period, or not?

THOMSEN: Some of the kinds of things I did with the Marines: one stands out in my mind. In early August of 1965, Morley Safer, who was then a correspondent in Vietnam, came across what became a cause celebre story about the Marines burning villages. He had television coverage of a Marine holding a zippo lighter against a thatched roof of a village hut. That story has stayed the course. It was a kind of media example of the coarse, brutal American...I had only been with the Marines a couple weeks by now. But I discovered a notebook, a little thing you put in your breast pocket that I had decided would be the beginning of a diary I would keep and of course managed to keep for about four weeks before it got put aside. But this little event is in that notebook, and here's how it went. Cam Ne was the name of the village, it was about five miles off of Route 1 towards the mountains south of Danang. You had to walk in. On August 3 the Marines in Cam Ne with CBS television looking on, used a zippo lighter to torch a hut. The next day I visited with the J-5, Chuck Keever, I spoke to the village chief, and to the sector S2, this is a young Vietnamese lieutenant intelligence officer.

Here's the story that I got. In '54 100 men went north, they were Viet Minh and when the exchange occurred mainly Catholics came south, from various parts of South Vietnam really hard core cadre went north. Well, 100 men went north from Cam Ne. Six or seven had already returned by August '65. But they were just beginning to come back. The French could never enter Cam Ne. There are still secret cells and guerillas in Cam Ne. There were sniper holes in the huts for VC to fire from. Cam Ne was in fact a place where the Marines had gone in, had received fire, and had destroyed what they regarded as enemy facilities. And I think the Marines had a right to do that.

That's the report I took back to the commanding general, General Walt. I'd been on the ground, I'd seen the sniper holes in the ruins of the huts that were burned down. But Morley Safer never came back to do an after action report, and say, "By gosh, I talked about the defenseless villagers but maybe there was more to the story than that." But that's the story of Cam Ne. It's one in which I regard the Marines as having behaved responsibly and been judged unfairly.

I think probably, without trying to go into an awful lot of detail, that I've given you a lot of what was going on during that period. By July of '66 I was pretty beat, smoking three packs of cigarettes a day, getting to bed at 2:30 after writing the political section of that Sitrep, and getting up at 6:00 to start the next day. I was thin, I was wiry, I was tough. I'd gone through probably what is as intense an experience as most Foreign Service officers will experience in a good 30 year career, but I was ready to come home. Well, there are other stories too, a couple of them on the Marines that I'd like to tell.

One on Walt. In mid-May of '66 so-called rebel units really had become organized, and one fanatic Buddhist warrant officer with an engineer unit had mined a main bridge out of Da Nang to try to prevent the government forces from using it to come in. Walt was apprized of this by the American advisor to that Vietnamese unit which had done the mining, and he had decided that that bridge had to be kept open. It was a main logistic route (MLR). Walt's strategy was to walk to the middle of the bridge and ask the warrant officer to come to him. The warrant officer came to him and they had a consultation in the middle of the bridge. At the same time the American military advisor to the engineering unit slipped under the bridge and disconnected the wires to the explosives. Walt asked the Vietnamese engineer commander to please remove the explosives because of the bridge's importance to the success of the war, and to protect the people of Da Nang against the common enemy. The officer refused. He said, I will die on the middle of this bridge with you General if you try to prevent me from destroying it. By that time Walt had gotten the signal the wires were cut, and he told the engineer he had one minute to disperse his forces and to defuse the mines underneath the bridge. The warrant officer said no. They stood there for a minute. Walt said, you now have to leave this bridge immediately. The warrant officer raised his hand and lowered it as an instruction to his men to blow the bridge with Walt and himself on it. They pushed the plunger down and nothing happened. And Walt in his book says...he briefed me as soon as he got back. In the book he says the man shriveled up as a shrimp drying in the sun and slunk off the bridge and they had ended that.

There are about five of these episodes with various senior Marine officers, Colonel Chaissem, and General Walt, facing down either pro-government or pro-rebel units to stop them from confronting each other. The air force confrontations I've already described. The Marines used incredible patience, and incredible courage to dampen what could have been an incredible bloody situation in the Da Nang area, and they did it with quiet, matter of fact...Chaissem went out one day and landed his helicopter right in front of artillery pieces that were aimed at the air base, and told the colonel that he had to take away those artillery pieces. He was putting himself essentially in the path of the shells.

I really found that one year with the Marines a tremendously, exciting, and stimulating.

Q: Do you think when you would go back to the embassy, they were able to get the flavor of this? Because so often the Marines are looked upon as great people to attack a beach. But almost like big kids who've got a lot of guns. Do you think you were getting across to our people in the embassy and elsewhere the importance of the job the Marines were doing?

THOMSEN: I think at the Lodge-Taylor-Alex Johnson level I was. But as far as my political section colleagues were concerned, they couldn't believe some of the stuff I was saying. They couldn't believe the Marines were really trying to do this or that. I think Terry MacNamara won't believe some of the stuff on this tape because he came later with a different general who apparently paid little attention to him.

Q: This is it. Terry, whom I have interviewed has told quite a different...it really does depend on the generals as you were saying with the South Vietnamese army too.

THOMSEN: Oh, yes. Absolutely. We'll get to this later but by the time I got back in '73, the commanding general of I Corps was General Truong, who was probably one of their finest military leaders. I only had a short experience with him but he was superb.

Q: You left there when?

THOMSEN: July '66.

E. ALLAN WENDT
Operations Center, Watch Officer
Washington, DC (1963-1965)

Bureau of Personnel
Washington, DC (1965)

Ambassador Wendt was born and raised in Illinois. He was educated at Yale University, Institut d'Etudes Politiques (Paris) and Harvard University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1959, he specialized in international energy, Economic and Commercial Affairs at his various assignments in Washington DC and abroad. His foreign posts include Saigon, Brussels, Cairo and Ljubljana, where he served as the United States Ambassador to Slovenia from 1992 to 1995. The Ambassador was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

WENDT: I left there in '63. I came back to Washington and was assigned to the Operations Center—the State Department's around the clock watch office, which had just been created around that time.

Q: I think the Cuban missile crisis, more or less, in 1962, had spurred its creation...

WENDT: Yes. I remember, John Kennedy was president when I was in Düsseldorf. I think the Wall was built around that time, wasn't it?

Q: That was '61, I think.

WENDT: I believe it was while I was in Düsseldorf that the Berlin Wall was built.

Q: We're talking about the Berlin Wall.

WENDT: Right. Anyway, I came back to Washington and was assigned to the Operations Center in the summer of 1963 as a watch officer. The job was all right, but I can't say that I carried it out with any great enthusiasm. I fielded telephone calls at all hours from everybody and anybody. It was interesting for a while. Then, still in the Operations Center, I became a writer and then an editor of the top secret "Morning Summary" that was sent to the seventh floor principals, including the Secretary. That activity in some ways was more interesting and useful than just being a watch officer. You really learned how to write in a disciplined manner because you had to reduce a long cable, say, to three or four lines covering just the key points, and you had to edit other people's materials. Again, very broad exposure -- cables coming in from all over the world. You were responsible really for what information in capsule form went to the Secretary of State.

Q: Were there any crises that you particularly think of when you were either watch officer or editor that were really memorable?

WENDT: Yes. The coup against Ngo Dinh Diem in Vietnam.

Q: This was in October or early November of 1963.

WENDT: Yes. Actually, I was scheduled to take delayed home leave at that time. But I happened to drop by the Operations Center the night before I was due to leave. I was going out to the West Coast, to San Francisco, which I was excited about because I had never been to California. I had never even flown on a jet aircraft, believe it or not. In the early days, remember, we traveled by ship -- far more enjoyable than what we do today. Anyway, I stopped by the Operations Center -- I forget why -- to pick up some papers or something I had left there -- and I quickly learned there was a coup in progress in Saigon against the Diem regime. So, I was drafted into service on the spot. I recall I postponed my departure on vacation for a day or so -- those were the days when you could change an air reservation without penalty. Anyway, I pitched in to help the people on duty. That was very exciting, trying to figure out what was going on in Saigon.

I remember people streaming in and out of the Operations Center -- very high ranking people. When you're a junior officer, it's impressive to see all those people coming in and out. I don't think I saw the Secretary of State, but I saw just about everybody else. That's another thing I remember about my early days in the State Department, exposure to people of great stature -- at least, that's what I thought at the time -- people whom one could look up to, people whom one might emulate, people like Chip Bohlen, Averell Harriman, Livingston Merchant, Llewellyn Thompson. I sometimes ask myself if we have people quite like that in the Foreign Service today. Or maybe it's because I'm much older myself and they're contemporaries. This is an aside, but if there are such people, I have the impression some of them may have left the Foreign Service. I think one would be hard put to find the equivalent of people like Bohlen, Merchant, and Thompson in today's Foreign Service. For sure there are some—Tom Pickering and Bill Harrop come to mind. But that's another issue we might come back to.

So, there was the coup against Diem and that was exciting. It was interesting enough, my job in the Operations Center. I definitely thought it was worthwhile.

Q: I never served there, but I was told that sometimes this was really quite a good way to get ahead -- you were talking about the fast track. You kind of learn where things are done in the Department. And also there is a selectivity about getting the people who go into that area, which usually makes you sort of a slightly marked person or something like that. Did you find that to be the case?

WENDT: I'm not sure. I know that was alleged at the time, but I was never convinced it was really true, that it marked you for the fast track. I think that the whole assignments process was so haphazard, I'm not sure there really was a fast track. There were people, obviously, who did very well. Sometimes they did well because they really were talented and demonstrated their talents. Other people did well because they were lucky or had the right contacts. Some people who were very talented did not do as well as one might have expected. Other people who were not very talented did not do well and shouldn't have. But it was a very mixed bag. Anyway, I'm not sure that the Operations Center was the ticket to the fast track.

Q: Were you in the Op Center when Kennedy was assassinated?

WENDT: Yes and no. I was assigned there, but remember I said I was going on leave. I stopped by and the Diem coup was going on in Saigon and, as I said, they drafted me into service. After a day or so of doing that, I flew out to San Francisco. As I recall, this was deferred home leave. Anyway, while I was in San Francisco, I was standing on a street corner waiting for a cable car, and suddenly I saw some people clustered around a radio on the steps of the hotel that I was standing in front of saying Kennedy had been shot. So, although I was assigned to the Operations Center at the time, I was in fact on leave in San Francisco when the Kennedy assassination took place.

Q: When did you leave the Operations Center?

WENDT: I left the Operations Center in 1964—or maybe it was the beginning of 1965. I don't quite recall. I was there for about a year. Then you won't believe what happened to me after that. I was reassigned to the Bureau of Personnel.

Q: Oh, my God.

WENDT: Yes -- this time it was in connection with the buildup in Vietnam. They wanted somebody to work full-time on Vietnam. Somehow, they landed on me -- I suppose because of my prior experience in Personnel. So, I set about recruiting people essentially from within the Foreign Service to go to Vietnam.

Q: I invite you to talk about this in as much detail as you can because I think this is very important. We're working on trying to get a history of the Foreign Service in Vietnam and this recruiting effort in particular. In the first place, what was the attitude around there about getting people for Vietnam? Was it considered a good thing or a bad thing or was it just a job or what?

WENDT: On balance, I thought it was a good thing, although I experienced bouts of skepticism about it, about whether or not we should be involved in Vietnam in the first place and whether we were going about the whole thing in the best possible way. But I supported the program, and I thought it was a very good professional opportunity for people in the Foreign Service. I must admit I didn't necessarily think that at the very beginning. But after I had had a chance to talk to a few people who had been to Vietnam, I rather quickly reached the conclusion that we were doing the right thing. There was a massive buildup of the American civilian presence in Vietnam and there was, of course, the buildup on the military side that had begun in 1965.

Q: We can add that in. How did you go about doing your job of recruiting people to go to Vietnam? What were the criteria for selecting them?

WENDT: By and large, we looked for single people -- you couldn't send families at the time -- who spoke French. French was still quite useful in Vietnam at the time. So, personnel technicians would put together lists of people throughout the Foreign Service who spoke French and who were single, both in Washington and at overseas posts. We had carte blanche from the White House directly from Lyndon Johnson to take everybody and anybody we wanted. We landed on them like a ton of bricks. .

Q: How does one do that?

WENDT: It was very straightforward. I spent a lot of my time recruiting people for the rural pacification program. Most of these people, even though they were Foreign Service Officers, were actually detailed to USAID, which was running the program. These FSO's received something like 10 months of Vietnamese language training and some other kinds of training to equip them to serve in a war zone. Then they were sent out to Vietnam -- usually to the provinces. I was also responsible for staffing in the embassy.

We would simply send a telegram to the FSO in question. I'll give you an example -- Frank Wisner, who is today ambassador to India. Frank was a good friend. He was ideally suited to go to Vietnam. He was single at the time and knew French. But he had also been trained in Arabic and was serving at the time in Algeria. He hadn't been there very long. So, we sent a telegram out to him saying "Report for training prior to assignment to Vietnam." His ambassador -- I believe it was William Porter -- came back with a cable saying, "This is impossible. This makes no sense. Wisner has been trained in Arabic and hasn't been here very long etc..." But we had our marching orders as well as solid backing for what we were doing in terms of the Government's priorities. Our priority was Vietnam. That was beyond doubt. So, we sent a cable back to Ambassador Porter saying "Sorry, but you will have to take it up with the President if you're unhappy. We are operating under a White House edict." So, Frank went off to Vietnam. I don't think that he regretted it for one moment. He did extremely well there. He was involved in fascinating activities and assignments. So, that was the situation as regards Foreign Service personnel and assignments to Vietnam.

Believe it or not, just about everybody we approached agreed to go---some very reluctantly, but I can recall only one person who managed to weasel out of the assignment, and one person who resigned rather than go. That was the choice. Can you imagine trying to do anything like that today?

Q: It's ridiculous to even think about it. Did you have anybody coming up and saying they didn't approve of the policy, of our engagement in Vietnam?

WENDT: A few, but not many. I think a lot of people actually viewed the assignment as a very interesting and challenging opportunity. Here was a war going on -- maybe not a declared war, but manifestly a war. It was an opportunity for relatively young civilians in the Foreign Service to get involved in very interesting and often difficult and exciting work. I would say the majority of people saw it that way -- not everybody but clearly the majority.

Q: I went to Vietnam as a mid-career officer. I was also in Personnel. I got myself assigned later as Consul General in Saigon. I wanted to see the elephants.

WENDT: That's right. When were you there?

Q: '69-'70, just after...

WENDT: You were there when I was there! That's another matter we'll have to come back to. In any event I found this second assignment to Personnel a very interesting job. I not only had a chance to talk to people who were on their way out to Vietnam, but I interviewed everybody coming back, or people who had been there and who were maybe on home leave and then returning to Vietnam. Note that this was after the bombing of our embassy had taken place, which was a pretty devastating experience. That was in 1964, wasn't it, the bombing, or was it 1963?

Q: I believe so, something like that. What were you getting from the officers who were coming back from Vietnam? What were they telling you about what they were doing and how effective it was?

WENDT: If I could generalize, I think the majority of the people I talked with liked their work. There was some skepticism as to how much progress we were making in achieving our objectives in Vietnam, which was understandable. I think everybody shared a degree of skepticism -- or most people. But what I found interesting was that people liked Vietnam. They liked the country. They liked the people, although, as I say, there was a degree of skepticism and cynicism. But they all kind of got caught up in their work. They did it with more enthusiasm than one might have predicted. Certainly, in retrospect, when you consider the virulence and the bitterness in the anti-war movement, it's very hard to square that with what I experienced among the professional Americans who served there. Maybe the military was more skeptical or even cynical, I think, in part because of the way the military conducted the war. Also, for the military it was only a 12 month tour of duty, which I think was too short.

Q: Yes, very much so.

WENDT: So, the military, even those who were not in actual combat, tended to see the worst aspects of Vietnam. The civilians usually saw it in a more favorable light.

Q: I think also the military had a one year tour, but often that was reduced to only six months. So, they were sort of like tourists hopping back and forth.

WENDT: That's right. That part of it was regrettable. I had a chance to go to Vietnam for the first time myself in August of 1965, when Henry Cabot Lodge went to Vietnam to become our ambassador for the second time. The Far East Bureau wanted somebody to go with him as an escort and they chose me. So, I accompanied Lodge to Vietnam. I had never been beyond California at that point. It was fascinating because there was a White House aircraft at his disposal for the trip. We took off from Andrew's Air Force Base outside of Washington, picked up Lodge in Boston, flew to Travis Air Force Base in California, and then to Hickam Field in Honolulu, where he wanted to stop overnight and go for a swim. We stayed at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel. The next morning we flew on to Anderson Air Force Base in Guam. That was a SAC base, a Strategic Air Command Base. That was the first time I had seen a B-52.

Q: That was our major bomber at the time.

WENDT: Yes. That's where a lot of B-52's were stationed. As I recall, at the time they were used only against enemy targets in South Vietnam, not the North, and I think also in Laos. The Philippine Government wouldn't agree to let the B-52s overfly their country—so, the bombers had to fly way north above the Philippines and then back down towards the Indochinese peninsula.

From Guam we flew to Hong Kong for a day or so and then on to Saigon. For me, this was really a new world. I had never been to East Asia before. I had been working on Vietnam in the personnel area, but actually to see the country was fascinating. I was there a week. Lodge stayed on as ambassador, as you know.

I went all through the embassy interviewing people. Phil Habib was the head of the Political Section at the time. We talked about personnel, what kind of people he needed, where the weak spots were in the embassy. I found the whole scene very interesting.

Q: Did you get any feel for Cabot Lodge at the time you were with him?

WENDT: I had a favorable impression of this man. I knew him before only as a public figure. But what impressed me about Henry Cabot Lodge was that he had quite a good knowledge of the history of the region. I remember when we were flying over Cam Ranh Bay, he pointed it out below and told me about the whole history of Cam Ranh Bay and the Russian fleets and how the kamikaze...you know, this is where the term “kamikaze” originated—it means divine wind in Japanese---how this “divine wind” had saved the Japanese from Kublai Khan’s fleet...this was going way back to, when, the 13th century?

Q: Yes. This was when Kublai Khan’s fleet was coming out of Korea and it was wiped out by a typhoon.

WENDT: Which the Japanese labeled “divine wind.” And the “divine wind” in the form of kamikaze pilots was supposed to save them again towards the end of the Second World War. Anyway, Lodge, I thought, had a very good appreciation of the history of the area and the culture of the country. Beyond that, he was very nice to me personally throughout the trip—though I must admit with some amusement that he was rather capricious in some of his requests. In retrospect, I was essentially a personal assistant. For example, when we were in Hong Kong -- we spent the night there after leaving Guam -- all of a sudden he announced, “I need some toothpaste” and then he named a particular brand of Swiss toothpaste that I had never heard of. It was seven or eight o’clock in the evening -- maybe even later than that. Everything was closed. I thought, “How on earth am I going to get this toothpaste for him?” He didn’t want just any toothpaste. He wanted this particular brand. So, I managed to get hold of the assistant manager of the hotel, and I said, “Look, this is the situation. Can you help me out?” He said, “Well, there’s nothing I can do right now, but I’ll see if we can’t get somebody into the pharmacy early tomorrow morning.” We were scheduled to leave the hotel at 7:30 am.

You know how it is with military aircraft. You have to have your bags ready and right in front of your hotel room door. If it’s a VIP flight, the bags are set out ahead of time and you just walk from your hotel room directly into a waiting car, which takes you right up to the aircraft out on the tarmac.

So, with the cooperation of the assistant manager of the hotel, I stationed myself right in front of the pharmacy in the hotel at 7 am sharp. As soon as the girl came to open the place up, I said, “Ma’am, I’m in a very difficult situation.” I took 30 seconds to explain it to her. “I need to have the toothpaste right away.” She said, “Well, okay, let’s see.” She opened the door and fumbled around inside a drawer and miraculously came up with not just one tube of toothpaste but about half a dozen. I bought them all, raced back up, and stood in front of Cabot Lodge’s hotel room door. I didn’t knock on the door. I waited until he opened it, more or less at the appointed time when we were supposed to leave. I said, “Sir, here is your toothpaste.” Well, after that, he thought that I was pretty effective. In truth, I was just lucky they had the toothpaste in the hotel and that I was able to get into the pharmacy before it officially opened. Anyway, occasionally Lodge would come up with requests like that. It was always a challenge to see if you could accommodate him.

I stayed in Saigon about a week. It was a very useful trip. By that time, my responsibilities had expanded and I was no longer dealing just with personnel for Vietnam, but also for a number of other posts in the East Asian region as well. I was part of the Far East Bureau at State and responsible for all our posts in the region, though Vietnam was always the top priority. So, from Saigon I went on and visited our missions in Taiwan and Japan before flying back to the US.

Q: Did you get any feeling talking at the embassy in Saigon of any division at the embassy? In talking to the officers, often a personnel officer ends up as father confessor or brother confessor or something like that. Did you get any impression of any division within the embassy over how things were going or any problems?

WENDT: Not really. By and large, it was a very capable bunch of people who had gone out there. Most of them were quite positive about their work. There was, of course, skepticism about how well the whole war effort was going and whether we were going to achieve our objectives in Vietnam. But this was not an embassy where morale was low and people were at each other's throats. A good number of people had actually volunteered to go there. Vietnam was considered a top priority, as I said earlier. In a way, it was a badge of honor to serve there -- which is not to say that everybody we sent was able and well qualified. Some people got caught up in this dragnet who may have been marginal performers. But on the whole, it was a very good group of people. Maybe you recollect otherwise.

Q: No, not at all. Most went on and did well. These were people, for the most part, who were interested. They were inquisitive and intellectually challenged. If you've got a major foreign policy preoccupation, you don't wash your hands of it and say "I won't touch that thing." You want to get out and see it.

WENDT: Absolutely, though occasionally I thought some people were perhaps overly enthusiastic about the programs they were involved in, to the point where they just couldn't see any risk factors, and that maybe a measured dose of self-interrogation or a little more questioning of what was going on and how it served our objectives might have been appropriate. But better to be motivated than simply to be cynical about it. Vietnam was where the action was, and that's where a lot of people wanted to be. In a way, I felt sorry for people who struggled so hard to get out of the assignment and not go there. There was a war going on. It was fascinating professionally and personally. This was clearly the place to be.

Q: From the personnel, professional point of view, did you have problems with marriages, liaisons? I mean, most of our people were unmarried. Maybe you could talk a little about that because this was also, as we all know, a difficult place in a way.

WENDT: It was a difficult place because we were sending mostly men. That became a matter of controversy later on, the fact that we didn't send as many female officers out there as we might have. We did send some. But a lot of the men were there without their wives. I think that did generate problems because inevitably many of them got involved with the local women, even to the point where they weren't in a great hurry to go back home and they would extend their tours. I think these circumstances generated a lot of problems in people's family lives.

Q: Did personnel take note of this or get concerned about it?

WENDT: No. This was considered a private matter. We didn't get involved in it. I don't see how we could have done so productively.

Q: How long were you doing the whole personnel thing?

WENDT: I think for about a year and a half -- first concentrating exclusively on Vietnam and then branching out and covering other posts in the Far East area, as it was then called. I should say that I didn't just deal with Foreign Service personnel. We were also bringing in people from the outside, including a lot of people who had had previous exposure, but who were now doing other things. I'm talking about people like General Edward Lansdale. We processed his papers and got him onto the embassy payroll. I recall also Lou Conein, the famous CIA operative who had been there earlier during the Diem period. And Daniel Ellsberg. A lot of people came in from the outside. I got to meet most of them, too. So, my horizons were not confined to the Foreign Service.

Q: Did any of these strike you... I am thinking particularly of Ellsberg and Lansdale -- they both became quite well known--

WENDT: Were any of them controversial? The truth is, I didn't know much at the time about what Lansdale was doing. But I came to know more later on.

Q: He was quite famous, in a way, because he was the prototype of a character in the novel, "The Ugly American." It was a rather seminal book as far as American attitudes towards foreign policy went.

WENDT: Yes, indeed. I did occasionally think that maybe there were too many of these different programs and activities going on at the same time, and I wondered, "Who's pulling all this together? How is it coming together?" You know how America tends to smother a problem, just overwhelm it, and that's what we did. We had a huge number of people in Vietnam. Where I think, in retrospect, I became somewhat cynical was whether or not all these people were really engaged in activities that mattered that much as far as achieving our objectives was concerned.

Q: I think this is where I came out, too. It wasn't so much that I thought, you know, you could put a nation together. I mean, look at South Korea. But when I found young officers involved in beautification programs for Saigon, I thought, "Wait a minute."

WENDT: That was a problem. We overwhelmed the place. I think sometimes it was too much. It was more than the country could absorb and went beyond what we could usefully accomplish. But I nonetheless remained committed to the basic idea of the US being in Vietnam and preventing the country from falling to the communists. That was my view at the time, and I feel it very much today with hindsight. My view hasn't changed.

VLADIMIR LEHOVICH
Rural Affairs Program Officer, USAID

Saigon (1963-1965)

Provincial Reporter Saigon (1965-1966)

Vladimir Lehovich was born in New York in 1939 and received his Bachelor's Degree from Harvard University 1961. He was positioned in Saigon, Brussels, Bonn and Vienna. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Lehovich on March 25, 1997.

Today is the 2nd of April 1997. Vlad, let's start. You were in Vietnam from when to when?

LEHOVICH: From approximately May of 1963 until the summer of 1966 and then back again for a few months in early 1977.

Q: We'll come to that in time. What was the situation as you were told and that you picked up by osmosis in the corridors of the State Department in Vietnam in May '63 when you went out there?

LEHOVICH: The situation was depicted by and large in Cold War terms and was seen by people like me by and large in Cold War terms. The depiction was of a country that after 1955 had in the South created a non-communist government. The government was not painted in particularly rosy terms in anything I heard. Its main virtue was not being virtuous; its main virtue was that it was a non-communist government which had a chance of, one, surviving and, two, of reforming itself as time went on. Ngo Dinh Diem, who was the leader of the government and the President of South Vietnam, was a person who was described as somewhat aloof, somewhat isolated, generally a rather fastidious Roman Catholic bachelor in a non-fastidious Asian society which was not predominantly Roman Catholic -but nonetheless a man of high ethical standards and great person discipline and one who could lead a government that, it was recognized, was considerably less upstanding than Diem himself was. It was a government that was harsher and more corrupt. But the most important feature was that the situation was cast in terms of an effort to have, and maintain, a non-communist government in South Vietnam and stop a deliberate communist movement to destabilize and to take over the South. Those were the basic dynamics.

There was not an awful lot of false or naive worship of the Diem government. There was the policy that many of us remember under the slogan of "Sink or swim with Ngo Dinh Diem." I must say, I found a very, very great lesson here because I see us since that time quite often having a policy of sinking or swimming with somebody. My advice is, as soon as you hear that policy, be prepared to hear it reversed with no prior warning. "We're no longer sinking or swimming with them. He's sinking; we're swimming with someone else." That, of course, is exactly what happened with the Diem family, the Ngo family.

Q: When you arrived, what was the situation? You went to the embassy. Could you tell me what happened?

LEHOVICH: I and one other colleague of mine, Dick Holbrooke, were assigned to the Agency for International Development. We went to join its Rural Affairs Program. It was called "Rural Affairs Program of the United States Overseas Mission (USOM)," run by AID. At that time, already a very large AID mission. The Rural Affairs part of it, which I was assigned to, was very unusual and a very controversial operation within AID and within the American official community in Vietnam.

It was a special counterinsurgency program with its own budget. The budget came from the White House and was approved by President Kennedy and some of his closest advisors. It was run by a young man, 32 years old, called Rufus C. Phillips. Rufus Phillips was a young businessman who had been an athlete and a scholar at Yale. He had then taken part with Edward Landsdale, with Colonel Landsdale, later General Landsdale, in the counterinsurgency campaign in the Philippines against the Hukbalahaps when he was a young Army lieutenant, and, I believe, at that time seconded to the CIA - a CIA man with the assigned army rank of a lieutenant. In any case, Rufus Phillips was the young leader of this group of people with an almost unfettered budget of $10 million and a carte blanche to recruit.

He did his own recruiting, picked up a stable of people, some of whom were very gifted, a lot of whom were very unusual and original types whom one met in international work, and a number of whom were from voluntary organizations. At that time, the leading such organization was the IVS (International Volunteer Service), which in many ways is the predecessor of the Peace Corps.

It was a very fine organization. I'm still very fond of it. In a word, USOM Rural Affairs was a very unusual outfit run by some absolutely unorthodox and very gifted people - in particular by Rufus Phillips, who is one of the finest natural leaders I've ever worked with and who, at age 32, was able to lead us with great leadership skills, with great self-confidence and with great personal courage.

What we did, what the attempt was of that program, which was a precursor of the later counterinsurgency programs in Vietnam, was to seek to make local government work better, be more responsive, and be in a better position to meet popular needs than it was and to do so by working locally. We were a totally decentralized operation. We went to all 40 provinces in South Vietnam at that time, set up small operations there and worked with the local officials from that level. Some of that worked well. Some of it worked less well, but it was a very unusual effort at that time. It was a very original effort. It was probably conceptually the best counterinsurgency program that the US or South Vietnam had during that whole period. I could go on at length about this. It's a favorite subject of mine. But for our purposes here, let me just say that I think it was a very promising program. I don't think it could have changed the course of history. I think the long arm of history was evident in Vietnam over a period of time. But I think it could have done better and done better for longer than the intensely Americanized programs that followed afterwards.

Q: Let's get this down to your level. What were you doing? Any stories you have. I don't mind detail.

LEHOVICH: Absolutely. After several months of working on different programs in Saigon, I finally managed to get myself out to a province, which is what I wanted to do from the day I arrived. I went out in a car with a briefcase, checked into a hotel. There had been a US Army major who had been doing this before. He had been part of the 12 man advisory team in that province.

Q: Which province are we talking about?

LEHOVICH: I was in the Mekong Delta in the province of Vinh Long. At that time, an American presence in a large province was very small. This was a province of almost 600,000 people. The American presence was approximately 13 official Americans. Twelve of them were military. When I arrived, I made it the 13th. I was a civilian. I lived separately. The American military were my good friends, but we were not dependent on each other in any way. There were two and later three volunteers from the International Voluntary Service who also lived separately and worked separately on their own programs. Among the other foreign presence in Vinh Long province was one American missionary who lived some miles away. He was from the Christian and Missionary Alliance and had no connection with other American activities, which were either governmental or voluntary, supported by the U.S. government. The other foreign presence was a small Roman Catholic convent operation for what were called "fallen girls." These were very nice Irish sisters, also out in the countryside. Then there were a couple of French Jesuits who worked there, also far in the countryside. That was it as far as foreign presence in this province of 600,000 people, comfortably under 25 people, I think.

What did I do? I started working with rural school programs of a very simple kind which involved school construction. Does school construction guarantee education? No. But it requires a community commitment. It requires a concentration of interest, excitement. It's very good for complementing education. It helps it. It doesn't provide it.

Rural health. Rural health involved helping to organize clinics where traveling doctors or medics could come on a scheduled basis. That, again, does not guarantee medicine, but it can facilitate it and raise consciousness and make it a popular weekly or biweekly event in a particular place. We had limited refugee programs to the extent that there had been some people who had been relocated in the area where I was working. We had some other education programs. We did a little bit with vocational training, in trying to support it. Mainly what we were doing was working with rural programs in education, in health, and in some basic agricultural areas. The basic agricultural area was trying to supply certain good brands of rice that were not otherwise available in terms of seed, facilitating storing, trying to introduce some vegetable and gardening projects that were very profitable at that time, and offering a little bit of seed money to finance better ways of breeding pigs and composting pig manure and having a program that would raise corn as feed for pigs.

Now, what is a guy from New York who doesn't know a hoe from a hoot in Hades do in a situation like this? Well, the answer is you use a lot of common sense, you ask a lot of questions, you ask your peers, and you find the people locally, the Vietnamese, who know everything in the world there is about pigs and hogs and you get them to work with you.

Q: In a way, the question might be, if they know everything there is about hogs, what are you doing anyway?

LEHOVICH: We were helping them with a little money, a little attention, and with an idea that wasn't at all known or customary there. The idea was that one can work on a communal and voluntary basis, on a self-help basis, and pitch in a lot of resources locally on something that is locally popular; and that it's part of good local government to facilitate the kinds of programs that I was talking about. That second thing I did, and others like me in our program did, was work with senior officials in the province. The senior officials accepted us as people who had an idea that was perhaps good, perhaps not, but as people who couldn't be shoved away. So, if I spent five nickels on five different occasions with a senior official in Vinh Long province on the subject of pigs or rural schools, I wasn't thrown out. I was listened to with at least the appearance of a great deal of interest at my wisdom - I being about 23 years old at that time - and the merits of the programs that I was describing. Amazingly enough, within a few days, we very often got confirmation that the head of the province or some of the senior people working with him had gone around saying, "Why isn't such and such being done better with these important programs that the Americans are interested in." We would go in and say, "That's wonderful. We heard you were supporting these things. Maybe you could support them not as American programs, just tell people it's the right thing to do to produce better schooling or better health or better pigs." We worked as stimulators and catalysts, partly because we were the big important foreign presence at that time - America; partly because we had a good idea (it was an intrinsically good idea.); and partly because we had some money. In terms of cash and resources, I recall the first year, I had about $2 million. Most of it was in resources which was grain, cement, and certain other types of things, fertilizer, certain kinds of simple equipment. But a fair amount of it (several hundred thousand dollars) was in cash. This was not mine alone to dole out by any means, but it was very much for me there to stimulate, help, and advise, and then to say, "We have some funds if you're prepared to draw on them." Having a few hundred thousand dollars in a place where a low monthly subsistence wage was eight or 12 dollars, having a few hundred thousand dollars to help promote your ideas can make your ideas go a very long way. I thought we had a remarkably worthwhile and remarkably cost-effective program going there.

Q: What were some of the problems you had to deal with?

LEHOVICH: One problem we had was that as time went on, by the time we got into late '63 and 1964, it was pretty clear that a lot of what our program was doing was kind of built up by day and pulled down by night. We were getting into a little bit more of a guerilla warfare situation. We were also getting into a fairly coercive strategic hamlet program, an effort which preceded a lot of other similar things later on. In its crudest form it was an attempt to put some fences around villages, to train some militia forces within the village, and also to train some political action forces within the village. In its better, more evolved form it was the basic security plus other improvements in living. I wasn't involved in the fences or the militia or the political action forces, but we were very much involved in working to try to make these villages attractive and prosperous places. But it really was becoming pretty much of a polarized operation. Our program was not a program that stood purely on its own. It was part of a government campaign that was often physical, often repressive, against an organized opponent who was even more repressive, even more unpleasant. We were also in a situation where the central government of Vietnam was basically coming closer and closer to collapsing. Every province at that time was led by a direct appointee of the president of Vietnam, a person responsible to him, with direct control. So, what we were doing, like it or not, was a very political thing at that time. Standing back, I don't really think that it was adequate to do the kinds of things we were doing in a situation like that.

Q: The government wasn't?

LEHOVICH: Our program wasn't adequate and I don't think making it twice as big would have made it more adequate. I simply don't think that at a certain point, material benefits like education and better agriculture make a big difference. The real thing in that kind of a situation was that there was a fair amount of force being applied. The lot of the Delta, incidentally, certainly the part of the Delta that I knew the best, was pretty sheltered at that time from the civil war in Vietnam.

Q: What was the capital of Vinh Long?

LEHOVICH: It was Vinh Long City. It used to be the town on Sadec, but with some reorganizations, two provinces were merged into Vinh Long. It was not a terribly violent place. One could drive around all over, and "all over" means a couple or three hours in one direction until you got to the end of that province. Rarely would you have a problem and, if you did, you sort of knew the areas where it might happen.

I was shot at on two occasions. One was very tragic because I was with a group of civil guardsmen, as they were called, sort of local forces, who would always be in certain parts of the province accompany me if I was down there. Overkill by local officials. There were 80 or 90 of them that day. It was a company. Anyhow, one of them got killed by some assailant whom we could never see from some distant place a couple of hundred yards away across the river or from a swamp. A very sad story. I had to go see the fellow's family later in the day and talk to them. Very trying for them and certainly a very difficult part of the day's work for someone like myself.

The other time, a wholly different time, was driving from Vinh Long to Sadec with my Vietnamese associate, a man from AID whom I worked with closely who is still a good friend of mine, incidentally. My last contact with him was about a month ago. He's in America and runs a restaurant in Florida. In any case, this fellow and I were driving and we got fired at a number of times from what was called simply the "banana line." The banana line begins 50 or 80 yards to one side of a road and there are a lot of bananas growing there. You can't see through the bananas, so it was a good place from which to shoot people you don't like. What we did on the way back was, we drove very quickly. We did our business in the town of Sadec and we had to retrace our steps. We simply drove very quickly. At that time my Vietnamese associate, incidentally, asked me to do the driving. It was axiomatic that among two 24 year olds, the one who had started to drive at 16 was going to be the better driver than the one who had started to drive at 21. I was. So, I drove the car faster than it had ever been driven before. I had it repainted a different color. I thought that was just the beginning of wisdom. I did it out of my own pocket. I mention this only because a couple of months later, an AID inspector came down, inspected my operation while I was away on a field trip, made some judgments about whether I was doing a good job or not without having interviewed me, and left me a bill for having defaced government property without permission. That was repainting my vehicle. I'm simply mentioning this because it's prejudiced me ever since towards being inspected by anybody. I still don't like it.

Q: An inspector is often known as the son of a bitch from outside.

LEHOVICH: That's a very mild and statesmanlike way of putting it, Stu. I appreciate your gentleness.

Q: What about the problem of corruption from your perspective?

LEHOVICH: I have a couple of reactions about it. One, it was probably just about everywhere. Two, when it was the moderate, normal, expected level and way, it was not terribly noticed. It wasn't terribly shocking, and it didn't bother business. Three, I mentioned earlier that the subsistence wage might have been $10 a month. For a lieutenant colonel or major in the Army, the wage was much higher. It might have amounted to $30 or $40 a month, but not more than that. The families were large and that $30 to $40 a month would basically be there for a household of eight, 10, or 12 persons when you counted everybody from wives to children to servants who were part of the household. The lieutenant colonel making, say, $36 a month who was not trying to augment his income by alternative means was not doing his job as a father, as a family man, or as an intelligent local official. I had no moral compunctions then or later in that kind of a society about the kind of low-level corruption that is built in, that is moderate, is expected, and is actually necessary to survive. On a larger level, when it gets out of control, it gets out of control. It produces some bad effects.

Q: You had this several hundred thousand dollars. You had two million dollars you were playing with.

LEHOVICH: We had minor problems. We never had anything I remember as a terribly big one. Our stuff was popular. It was small. The aid was rationed out for small and rather well-controlled projects. We would frequently find instances where people would, say, build a structure and shortchange the structure on cement or certain other things that we were supplying and we'd complain about it. In one extreme case, a schoolhouse that was shoddily built, we took a hammer and hammered on a concrete floor and broke through it. We asked that it be rebuilt. No, we were not a particular target of corruption. I think the games of corruption were being played in bigger ways, on taxing, for example, entire regions on livestock and rice.

I had a case once when I was driving in town on a Sunday just to pass the time away. It was a beautiful town. I noticed a familiar truck that belonged to my operation. We had two fairly large trucks, army surplus trucks. A familiar truck filled with two and a half tons of goods leaving the warehouse in which we kept various of our food and other commodities, cement and so on. It was driven by two thoroughly familiar people, one of whom worked for the province with our programs and the other was a sergeant in the local military who also worked with our programs from a different vantage. Two very nice guys. I was very fond of both of them. I complained and they were later arrested. In a wonderfully personal way, the sergeant came to me at my little house where I was staying at that time. He said, "Look, they're going to give me a very hard time about this theft. They're going to send me to combat. I can't afford that. I have six children. I'm going to have to go into combat." I said, "Look, there's nothing I can do for you." "Can you intercede and have it changed? You're my friend." I said, "I can't intercede for you. You've got to believe me. I can't intercede for you at all. I can do nothing more than report what I saw. I'm going to stay out of the rest of this." He was very unhappy. This man cried and he asked me to help him. I said I couldn't help him. Very nice fellow. He went off to combat and, as far as I know, he performed some combat and was none the worse for it. Anyhow, those were personalized levels of corruption.

Q: What about the October '63 events in Saigon? Could you explain how that was reflected on what you were getting?

LEHOVICH: Absolutely fascinating. Let me tell you what happened there. It had become fashionable to talk down the Diem government by the time that-

Q: When you say "fashionable," with whom?

LEHOVICH: It was fashionable among people who are loud mouthed or like to talk.

Q: Are you talking about Americans?

LEHOVICH: We're talking about Vietnamese. It was fashionable to talk down the Diem government by those who liked to talk loudly about politics, not a very big majority in a country like that. When the news came that Diem was overthrown, there was absolute panic, very palpable panic among everyone. This was not a panic of people dependent on that government. It was a panic of people who were terribly concerned that a predictable order was seemingly collapsing. Shortly thereafter, the news came of Diem's death. There was a palpable outbreak of mourning not based on personal friendship or acquaintanceship with this distant, aloof figure of a minority Western religion in an Asian society, but there was wailing and weeping all over the place. Stu, this happens everywhere. It's what happened in Russia when Stalin died in March of 1953. People forgot about that, but there was mourning all over the place. People knew the guy was a son of a bitch - not everybody, but a lot of the people who were crying nonetheless. So, there was that kind of a thing. I actually had told myself from the time that things were getting tense in Vietnam that if and when there was a coup, I was going to go to Saigon to observe it and that's exactly what I did. I hopped on an American "Caribou" airplane which happened to land at the Vinh Long Airfield and went to Saigon and spent the next week up there observing these weird events.

Q: Could you talk about it?

LEHOVICH: I did not observe high politics. I observed what was going on in the streets. There was street fighting. There were some buildings that were shot up in many parts of town that had housed government activities. Some places were, I think, just shot up because people pulled on a trigger, not for any terribly rational reasons. I remember finding two kids playing with a mortar. These were kids who were somewhere between four and six years old. They were playing with a mortar, a beautiful mortar in excellent shape with just a couple of dents where it had landed. I took it away from them. I only later realized that I shouldn't be carrying this thing around myself, but I took it away from these kids, took it to where I lived. I had a little flat at my disposal in Saigon and showed it to an American Army captain who knew a lot more about ordinance than I did. When I did, he ran right out of the room!

Anyhow, Saigon was a different atmosphere within a couple of days after this coup. Initially, there was great tension and, similarly, an outbreak of concern. But within a couple or three days, it was a festive atmosphere, devil may care atmosphere, I'll be damned but I'm going to do what I want kind of atmosphere.

One of the things that I know personally from a number of young people that I knew at that time in Saigon and in the provinces was that the Diem regime sealed its own fate, in my opinion, by the way it dealt with student youth. This is my own interpretation. Student youth -meaning university or other higher education youth -tends to come from pretty prominent families. There are tens of thousands of pretty prominent families in a county of 15 or 20 million people. An awful lot of them are either senior civil servants or army officers. They're not enlisted men. They're army officers. My own sampling told me that an awful lot of the army officers had brothers or other relatives or, if they were older, children, who had either been arrested or had their best friends arrested. If they were arrested, they were in for some extraordinarily rough treatment, which some of them recounted to me in most unpleasant detail. As a result, because of the huge size of nuclear and extended families over there, you couldn't arrest one kid who was a college student without creating extreme concern in 10, 15, or 20 or more people who were close or extended relatives. There was no question that there came a certain point where the elite in the country had their families arrested. Does that sound absurd? Let's remember in Washington, DC, one eleventh of the entire population works for the city government of the District of Columbia. It is not surprising in a country that had an army of 500,000 Vietnamese, being a small country, that more or less your entire officer corps had somebody who had been arrested and mistreated.

Q: Why were they being arrested?

LEHOVICH: They were being arrested because the government had gotten fairly paranoid at that time about conspiracies or people who were disloyal. It's a pretty typical dictatorship-type of phenomenon.

Q: Was this concern about being disloyal to the ruling party?

LEHOVICH: Most of the time, although the communists were sort of an underpinning for this concern. Most of the time think it was concern about disloyalty to the Pope. Disloyalty to the Pope doesn't mean you have to work for the devil. So, anyhow, the coup of 1963 brought about, as we recall, years and years of changing governments. As far as I'm concerned, with the end of the Diem era there, we were basically heading downhill.

Q: Let's stick to the coup. As you came back, here you were, a province boy back in the big city of Saigon. What was the attitude among the embassy officers, particularly- I assume that you were more in contact with the junior officers who often were out in the field a lot more than the senior officers.

LEHOVICH: Absolutely.

Q: Can you tell me about how they saw this from your perspective?

LEHOVICH: They saw and I sort of associate myself - we saw - the Diem regime as something that, by the very end, basically had to go. We thought it had to go, we thought it would go, and, unfortunately, we thought it should go. We thought that there was no way to continue successfully. In that sense, we were probably a little bit ahead of our elders and betters, but a only by a little bit, maybe a few months or less. That's when the decision was taken at the President's level to get rid of the guy, to get rid of Diem. Interestingly enough, when you say that we're going to change a leader like that -and I don't think President Kennedy or his advisors knew it then - there only one thing that can happen. That means the man will die. I was told that the minute the coup happened by a very wise old American counterinsurgency expert called Colonel Bohannon. He said, "He'll be dead within a week." Of course, he was right. It's inevitable.

I think we were a bit ahead of our elders and betters. My friends among the Americans at that time in Vietnam included not only the folks in the American embassy and folks in AID. These were very, very close friends. They also included the American press - for example, Dave Halberstam was quite a good friend. I saw him fairly often. So were a number of the other reporters - Malcolm Brown, Neil Sheehan, various others who were really excellent correspondents. Vietnam produced a marvelous generation of excellent correspondents at that time including sort of most of today's T.V. anchormen and a lot of other very good folks. These people ranged from being skeptical about the war to panting with eagerness to watch, frankly speaking, the United States and the Diem regime lose. I have to ascribe that kind of a view to someone like Dave Halberstam. I was fond of the fellow, very impressed by him, but I think he wanted the effort that America was involved in to lose in the worst kind of way at that time. To make a long story short, the younger Americans who were out there basically thought the thing had to go.

Q: Was there a countryfolk - cityfolk sort of split with the embassy and working out in the provinces when you would check in either in AID or the embassy?

LEHOVICH: Yes, there was. Frankly, I felt very much at home in both of these communities. I got to know quite a lot of people in Saigon, Vietnamese, as well as Americans and a few French. I still am a member of the Cercle Sportif Saigonais.

Q: Do you still pay your dues?

LEHOVICH: No, I don't pay. They don't send me a bill.

Q: I haven't received a bill in years.

LEHOVICH: I don't pay my dues because I haven't gotten a bill, but I'm still a member as far as I'm concerned. I still have my valid Vietnamese driving licence. It doesn't have an expiration date. Frankly, when I save up a little money, I expect to go out there, rent a car, and take a swim at the Cercle Sportif. But I got to know a number of people there, younger people, older people, Vietnamese who were sociable folks by nature and would stand me a good meal once in a while.

Q: Did you feel that, at least from the field, you would be giving reports on what you were doing... In no country including the United States, did we have as extensive a reporting program of what was going down at not only the provincial level, but the district level by some very bright people. Did you feel this was getting adequately translated when it got up to where decisions were made? Not just you, but others.

LEHOVICH: I wasn't primarily a reporter at that time; I was later in a second incarnation in Vietnam. I wasn't primarily a reporter. I felt that I shaded my messages a little bit, not terribly much, but a little bit. But I also think that the senior listeners or the senior audience had two ways of listening. One, they would listen and understand very well that there were some terrific problems. Two, almost as a function of leadership, they would say, "Soldier on. It doesn't matter. You're doing the right thing." This was not just with the Diem regime. This was later on. There comes a point where one does the right thing and soldiers on, professing that we will never abandon someone -until we do. Then it happens again, and then it happens again. I certainly give credit to the senior people that I knew well there for listening on two levels at once, for understanding and for continuing nonetheless. It was a situation where, until the end, one continues boldly professing confidence that one is going to do well even when one has long since felt that one is not doing very well.

Q: The military buildup started while you were there, although the Mekong was not a prime area. Were you in the Mekong the whole time?

LEHOVICH: I was in the Mekong Delta for a couple of years. But I also traveled in probably 30 of the 40-odd provinces during that time as well. I took a lot of field trips both before I was assigned to Vinh Long and afterwards.

Q: We moved into one of these rather Americanized reporting programs. Can you sleep in the district capital at night? Is it safe in all sorts of embassies? I don't know if they started on that. But particularly on the military side (This was MacNamara) when you asked the military to report, at a certain point, the reporting becomes very important for a person's career and things get shaded and all that. Did you find there was a two-layer thing, that sort of the civilian not just foreign service, but the other side was reporting one thing and the military were out there sort of reporting another thing?

LEHOVICH: To some degree. Let me give you a couple of examples. Take something like the Strategic Hamlet Program. As I say, my job wasn't primarily reporting, but when I did, I did put down whether I thought something was working well or not. I could put down that we did x amount of work in the last six months of which the effectiveness is pretty limited or pretty good. My military friends who were working with some of the same programs and who were being asked to report on anything in the world at that point, so they were reporting on my programs after a while, they would put down things like "Completed, is a success, everything is working fine. Everything is proceeding according to plan." In fact, the phrase "The program is proceeding successfully according to plan" was a fairly ritual phrase. I saw it an awful lot of times. I didn't think it meant an awful lot. You can go as far as to say I think it's like a doctor saying "Haven't had a chance to look much at the patient, but I haven't seen an illness." But "Program proceeding well according to plan" is a fairly nondiscriminate type of reporting.

Q. How were your relations with the US Embassy and AID? What was the contact like?

LEHOVICH: I knew an awful lot of the American embassy at that time. I didn't know the ambassador at that time, but I knew most of the others. I was accepted pretty much. Some of them were with their family. Very friendly. They invited me to social affairs and I spent a lot of time with guys like Bob Miller, for example, who was a political counselor, and Mel Manfull, who was the DCM. He made us feel very welcome. Bob Miller is still my friend. This is 30+ years later. We're good friends. We never worked together in any other way. Other friends included Freeman Matthews, Jr.; Mel Levine. Folks who took the two Foreign Service officers who were with AID at that time very much in as family members. Their houses were open to us in the evenings. There were also good friends we'd known before, from learning Vietnamese or from, basic training, like Tony Lake and Bill Marsh and their wives. I had my own flat, as I say, in Saigon, so whenever I felt like it, I'd drive up there or fly up there and spend a little weekend time socializing.

With AID, we had some marvelous get-togethers. The most exciting were large USOM parties given by Rufus Phillips for all his people, Vietnamese and American, some of the finest parties I can remember anywhere. One event, a business affair, was a catastrophe. That's when the head of AID, a nice but not very successful gentleman called Charlie Mann, decided to gather together all 1,400 American AID employees in Vietnam. I still marvel at the figure of 1,400. He invited all 1,400 of us to Saigon for a meeting because he felt things weren't going right. He was right, of course. They weren't going right for reasons we found out much more about when the meeting started. There were so many of us that we had to rent a big movie theater downtown. I think it was the Rex Theater, one of the really big downtown movie theaters. Big. Most of the 1,400 people showed up for this meeting. Some of us had to fly in; some of us had to hitchhike in by Caribou airplane or something like that, or drive in. It was a real pain in the neck to get to a meeting like that. So, we got there and this man gets up with over 1,000 people staring at him silently. He says, "Before we begin the meeting, I want to ask who has been writing me those letters? Who? Who? Who has been writing me those nasty letters? Tell me! I want to know!" He says this as his opening remarks to 1,000 people in the room. You know what the answer was? From every part of the theater, the answer was "I did," "I did," "I did." Everybody yelled, "I wrote the letters." People had never heard of any letters. You know what happened to the meeting, Stu? The meeting ended! It was a total catastrophe. I've never seen anything like it. I am still awed when I think of it. It was also very funny.

AID was not a well-run organization at that time. Charlie Mann was not a strong leader. He was a very nice man. We had a guy called Jim Killen, who followed him, who was a very strong man but not a very nice man; he was a remarkably obnoxious guy. My own leaders after Rufus Phillips were several. The most gifted of the leaders who followed Rufe was a guy called Samuel Wilson, a very smart guy, a self-made man, Army lieutenant colonel from humble origins in Virginia, a gifted man. He had learned wonderful Russian in Army intelligence training, a marvelous singer and guitar player, and took over this large operation as a lieutenant colonel in civilian garb, and ran it magnificently, and gave us terrific leadership and later on became head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, a three star general, and all sorts of things like that. Other people who at one time or other ran the Rural Affairs operation were Ogden Williams, Leonard Maynard, and Bert Fraleigh. I still count them as close friends and we correspond very erratically.

But AID was not a well-run organization at that time. It wasn't a very happy organization. The hard part of it -the Rural Affairs part where I worked -- was probably the highest morale. We were viewed by the rest of AID as a bunch of pariahs.

Q: Why?

LEHOVICH: Because we were not specialists in hydrology or in medicine or in anything else. Because some of us were downright weird. All of us thought that we were going to go to the provinces and simply do whatever we wanted out there. A lot of us did. That's why inspectors would come out and not even see us and give us bad reports and bills for having repainted our cars. We would return the compliment by complaining about them without ever meeting them and saying, "Get these guys off our backs."

Q: Why don't we go to the time when you came back. When did you come back to Saigon to be a provincial reporter with the US Embassy?

LEHOVICH: That would have been in '65 and '66. I left AID in the early summer of 1965, went on leave, and returned soon thereafter for a year at the American Embassy.

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

LEHOVICH: The ambassador was Henry Cabot Lodge. I got to know him surprisingly well and there was a reason for it. Cabot Lodge was a very self-confident, quite lazy, selfish, bright, and rather cruel man. He liked young people because he trusted us (No reason not to), and because we liked him, because we laughed at his jokes like hell because he was very funny, and because we appealed to him. If you were 25 years old, your chances of getting along extraordinarily well with Cabot Lodge were very high. If you were 40 years old, your chances of getting along with Cabot Lodge bordered on zero.

Q: You were courtiers as opposed to being a challenger.

LEHOVICH: We were not even courtiers. We were just a great audience and to him we were kids. He loved us! We liked him and we were spontaneous. The other ones, who were older, were scared to death of Cabot Lodge and he was very mean with some of them. He was really mean. I mean, very, very, very nasty to some of these folks. I'm not talking about Phil Habib. Phil Habib was in a class by himself because his irreverence and exuberance were so enormous that they filled any room that he walked into. He was a total democrat. It didn't matter whether you were ancient or a kid. Phil liked or disliked people about equally.

Once in a while Lodge did a wonderful thing. Whenever there was a coup, and after a while, there were quite a few, and Lodge was in town, he would make a great show of taking the day off and going and sitting in a bathing suit at the Cercle Sportif the whole day reading newspapers and novels. Whenever anybody asked him what was going on, he'd say, "Oh, nothing much. As far as I'm concerned, everything is fine." His entire modus operandi was to project total nonchalance in these situations and to do it in an outrageous way. It worked perfectly well to the limited audience that really cared about it, but the limited audience included the press and the American military, plus a fair sampling of the Saigon elite.

By then, the embassy was dominated on the one hand by Cabot Lodge, who told us that our job was nation building, wonderful words. And it was dominated by Phil Habib on the other hand.

Q: From your observation, how did those two get along?

LEHOVICH: Spectacularly well.

Q: That's odd, isn't it?

LEHOVICH: No, they trusted each other. Neither feared the other. Cabot Lodge couldn't stand it when people were afraid of him. It was a very cruel thing because it's a no win situation. Supposing you are afraid of the guy? I was in a situation where I am aware of how Cabot Lodge treated one of the three most senior civilian Americans in his mission. He called him in and he said, "I don't like you, George (We'll call this man George.). Do you know why I don't like you?" George said, "No, why?" "I don't like you, George, because you're afraid of me, aren't you, George?" Poor old George was really left without a lot of options at that point and Cabot Lodge told George he was going to get him out of the country, but was going to fix him up with a very good onward assignment, and he did. Poor old George had to leave because Cabot Lodge didn't like George because George was afraid of Cabot Lodge. There was never a problem like that with a guy like Phil Habib.

Q: Let's talk about your view of the situation from the '65 to '66 period. Whither Vietnam when you came in there? I mean, you brought a lot of baggage with you obviously.

LEHOVICH: My job was as a provincial reporter in the embassy's Provincial Reporting Unit. There is no doubt that it the most exciting and most fun of any place in that Embassy. I went around to a lot of provinces and basically tried to see people that other people weren't seeing - monks or priests or labor leaders or doctors. I saw very few officials. I was bored by them and other Americans were seeing them. Also, a lot of businessmen, a lot of businesswomen. Interestingly enough, women run the show when it comes to business.

Q: Oh, absolutely.

LEHOVICH: The best businesses I knew were run by women and it was wonderful to deal with them. You'd sit down, get a cup of coffee, and get straight talk for an hour or two.

Q: All you have to do is go out to the places around here in Arlington and women still run the businesses.

LEHOVICH: I was very impressed. It was very exciting the first time.

I simply have to say, Stu, it was a very exciting atmosphere. You've got to remember, this is a remarkably beautiful country. It has very nice people who are gifted, who have a good deal of charm, and who very often don't work that hard, so that you don't feel that you have to sit around looking busy all the time. They don't look busy all the time. It's not a very nervous country. A very charming country with shockingly beautiful landscapes and seascapes and rice paddies and mountains and everything else. They have some of the greatest food in the world. They have beautiful women and they have nice men. It is hard not to be absolutely caught up by a place like that. A few of us who stayed there for more than a year or two had gotten caught up in it. All the good reporters, correspondents, were caught up in it, too. A very, very exciting place.

I had an uneasy feeling from the first time I started making trips around the country as a provincial reporter. I had a very uneasy feeling that the American military presence was going to be extremely disruptive socially, destabilizing, unpopular, and in a sense, self-defeating. Self-defeating because I was caught up in the notion that insurgencies had a strong element of popular support or popular hostility to them. I think that can be exaggerated, but some of that is still there.

I was very uneasy about the American military presence. It got bigger and bigger. In a few cases that I was connected with as an observer or somebody who went there and discovered something, that I was closely involved in, it was doing things that were absolutely untenable. Burning rice fields, for example. In a few cases, destroying some villages. Mainly, it was totally dominating what objectively was the anti-communist effort there. It became completely an American effort. I think when we made that thing completely an American effort, we not only pushed it to achieve more measurable successes; we also probably gave the communists a little bit more popularity later on than they would have had.

The communists were not very popular people. A lot of people said they were nationalists, not communists; or bandits, not communists; but they were. The leadership was, the structure was. I think we gave them a kind of lasting legitimacy that they still have. They still call Saigon Ho Chi Minh City. They wouldn't have if there hadn't been a big American buildup.

That was my concern. I viewed this whole saga of growing requests for troops, which I was very well aware of - We were pretty well informed in the American embassy of the big picture at that time - I and others viewed with utter frustration the notion that we were going to go to 200,000; 250,000; 300,000 forces. It became ridiculous.

Q: In your provincial reporting, did you have a particular area to report on?

LEHOVICH: I did the coast, the central highlands, and I could also drift in and out of other places. I was welcome to. That was the scene of some of the big buildups. It was a disturbing buildup.

Q: As a provincial reporter, what would you do and what would you bring back?

LEHOVICH: We were a fairly self-starting group of people, luckily. We weren't given a lot of guidance. We weren't given an awful lot of SOPs on what to do or where to do it or how to do it. We were encouraged to be out of town, to be full of good information and insights when we came back. We did, I thought, some very good reporting sometimes. I did some very good reporting from some of the coastal provinces, on what the actual political climate was. The two political groups that were doing politics there were lawyers and doctors.

The further you got out of the capital, the more it was lawyers and doctors who were doing it. It was also priests and Buddhist monks. It was lawyers, doctors, priests, monks, and a few others. At that time, there was a national assembly that was being started. There was a constituent assembly. There were deputies who would show up in Saigon who had been elected. We knew these guys. There were local provincial councils that were elected. We were watching, in a sense, democracy beginning.

I remember watching democracy begin in one place where I witnessed the local village chief asking the number two man in the province confidentially, and in a genuinely frank and friendly way, who on earth they were supposed to elect in these elections. When the answer was given to him that they should elect the best person, the right person (This wasn't being done for my benefit. I'm convinced it wasn't.), that answer made no sense at all. So, in a sense, some democracy we watched made sense and some democracy we watched made no sense whatsoever and was very rote stuff. But that was one of the things we were doing.

The other thing is, we were generally getting an impression of how the war was going, the counterinsurgency campaign. Pretty soon after I started with that program, we were urged not to be roving inspectors general. In a few cases, we created simply too much trouble. I was involved once in a huge clash between some of the senior U.S. military and the American embassy over something that I came back and said was going on there. They said, "That's just not true." I said, "Of course it's true." Anyhow, that type of thing. We were after a while encouraged not to be, as Phil Habib put it, "Don't be inspectors general" because it was making his situation untenable. So, it was sometimes a bit ambiguous what we were doing out there, but we were the people who were probably the best informed on what was going on in those provinces.

Q: Before we leave it, could you tell me a bit about what was the clash that you precipitated?

LEHOVICH: I precipitated a clash about the burning of a rice crop by an American unit. I was very upset by it. I was disturbed because I thought it was one hell of a way to work and I thought it was inevitably leading to the wrong legacy in that place. I came back and made a case about it in writing and soon learned through some very angry calls to me and some very angry calls to the American embassy from the US military that what I described had never happened. I had to repeat that it had. I was told then that it never happened. Some weeks later, back in the same area of Vietnam, I took time to go to the unhappy major with whom I had discussed this thing in great detail when I was out in the area where it happened and apologize to him because I had put him in an absolutely awful situation. The poor guy. "Of course it happened," in disgusting, great detail. I had to apologize to him for having made his life miserable. That wasn't our job, in a sense.

May I just add a very interesting story? It wasn't the job of the American press to be inspectors general either, by the interesting rules that had evolved. Let me give you a really grizzly story. Horst Faas was a great war photographer. I don't know if you remember Horst Faas, but he was the finest of the photographers that were there. He was running around chasing everything that was worth photographing. In one case, he was up in the coast in one of the coastal provinces. He witnessed an American unit playing soccer with the cut off head of somebody who had been decapitated, who was a Viet Cong. Worse than that, the company was commanded by General (Inaudible)'s son, Captain (Inaudible). Horst Faas had some of the same rules that I was playing with. He was not an inspector general. He had another job to do, which was to photograph the war. He did photograph this. He went back and gave the photographs to U. Alexis Johnson, who was deputy ambassador and who, at that particular moment, was the acting ambassador, was the ambassador. He came in and he said, "Here are some photographs. Either you stop this and guarantee that you'll stop it or the photographs will get published." He got authoritative guarantees that this type of thing would be stopped, authoritative enough for him to accept them, and he gave the photographs and the negatives away. It's an interesting story. The point there is that he had another job to do in a sense, and I had another job to do in a similar sense. So, when we found things that were truly disturbing, we did things about it. But our job was not to go around and –

Q: When I was there in '69 to '70, I think, by that time the first string of the press had left and what you had (At least my impression and I have to say, it was only an impression. I didn't deal for the most part with them.) was that you had very hungry young amateur reporters who were out really to prove how awful the United States was and to win a Pulitzer Prize, I think by exposing. I think, by that time, that was the atmosphere. I may be wrong.

LEHOVICH: No, I think you're absolutely right. There was always some of that. Sometimes it was a very positive thing. But there is a situation we all come across. If you're the White House press corps traditionally, your job is not to sit around exposing things at the White House that will cut off your access to the White House a week later. At least, that's the way it used to be played.

There were also some correspondents who began as colonial war correspondents and who still are in doing the same thing 1997. For example, Peter Arnett and Jonathan Randal, two guys I knew at the time. I was quite fond of both of them. They were delightful people. They're still doing the same thing. Where they get the energy to be war correspondents for 35 years I don't understand. I don't have that kind of energy. They love it.

Q: How did you feel your reports were received at the embassy by Phil Habib, Alexis Johnson, and the ambassador - yours and the others, but yours particularly?

LEHOVICH: Very carefully read, appreciated. They liked it. Frankly, we worked on making very punchy and readable things. These were not boring reports. It's some of the best writing I've ever done and I think my colleagues would have agreed at that time. I wish I could get the things right now, declassify them, and own them. Some are lost in the massive files of mankind.

Q: This was the time when President Johnson, who really was not somebody who was enthusiastic about this thing, viewed it as screwing up the nation's business. Yet he was caught in this thing and much of it was from the reports that were coming to him, how they were translated, and all that. Did you have any feel that there was a two tier system or two channels?

LEHOVICH: I don't know. I know that, for example, some of the stuff I wrote (I was told it) had been read carefully by MacNamara and carefully by Walt Rostow, who at that time was at the White House. I'm not surprised. These were very good reports that a lot of us were writing. So, what does it do? It doesn't make a big difference. The thing with Johnson, Lyndon Johnson is typical of people who listen on two levels. One, they listen to the bad news and they say, "God dammit, I didn't tell you to be depressed. Go out there and finish the god dammed job." On the other hand, they're listening and they're saying, "It's getting worse and worse all the time. How am I going to get out of there?" He kept this up until the very end. Whether MacNamara really believed in the summer and autumn of 1963 that the thing was finished forever, I'll never know. If he did, he had knowledge of the future that no mortal is supposed to have. That's my view.

Q: We're talking about his memoirs, which for many don't ring very true. They seem sort of self-serving, mea culpa-ish, way after the fact.

LEHOVICH: They're mea culpa-ish and, in some cases, completely in the wrong time frame. Mid 1963, why be mea culpa about it? What had happened then that was so awful, and was going to end so awfully, that he already knew that things were terrible? Maybe he knew; the rest of us didn't at that time. I certainly didn't. I am very skeptical and think he is working out guilt feelings at the expense of historical accuracy.

Q: What about the CIA when you were there? What was your impression of the CIA staff operations and all that you saw?

LEHOVICH: They were on two levels, Stu. The career people, they were the so-called "case officers." That's what they were called in the trade. They were extraordinarily good. I think they were comparable to the crop of Foreign Service officers we'd been sending over there, who were very good.

The other side of CIA personnel, however, was that they in a hurry recruited a bunch of people who were real oafs. I remember a bunch of these guys. I remember, I didn't like the way they walked or talked or spat or burped or drank or screwed around or broke crockery or woke the neighbors at night. They were a bunch of dodos who needed adult supervision. These were quickly recruited people for some of the programs that the CIA was doing, guys they picked up off some project somewhere and recruited indiscriminately. I didn't like these guys at all. I didn't think they were doing a good job.

But the professional clandestine services career people in the CIA were awfully good. I didn't always agree with them and I didn't like it when they pretended that they were doing my job for my organization, but they did it rather well. When I was in the provinces, they had a lot of Rolexes and Polaroids to give out. If they did their job intelligently, the Rolexes and the

LEHOVICH: Watches and cameras, that's right. But they weren't Timexes and Kodaks. We're talking about good stuff.

Q: Top of the line.

LEHOVICH: Good stuff. They worked well. I think some of the programs they were working with after a while were high risk programs, some of the real physically eliminate the terrorists kind of thing.

Q: The Phoenix Program.

LEHOVICH: That type of thing. This is a high risk program. As I know from later on, I have to admit, afterwards, I spent years and years being a serious scholar of counterinsurgency after that whole business. I've written on it; I've thought about it. That kind of stuff happens after a while in an awful lot of these wars. It's very high risk stuff. Sometimes it works.

Q: When you say "high risk," what do you mean?

LEHOVICH: First of all, you're dealing with people's lives, which should not be done lightly. Secondly, you're going to make some mistakes. Third, you may make your enemies create more hostility and do yourself more harm than intended. In one case, which was in the minds of the smart Americans at that time, it had worked surprisingly well. That was with the British in Malaya. For the serious planners in America in the Vietnam War, that and the Philippines were the two exciting examples.

Q: We were bringing in British, Australian advisors.

LEHOVICH: We were indeed. We were bringing in Australians; we were bringing in some of the very bright folks from the Philippines. One was Colonel Napoleon Veleriano, who ran a contract team of Filipinos, with some of whom I worked pretty closely. We had some of the very bright British from Malaya. I recall Sir Robert Thompson as one of them.

Q: I remember Colonel Sarong.

LEHOVICH: Colonel Ted Sarong, yes. I remember these folks, too. A couple of them I met. One of them came down and spent a day with me in Vinh Long province. I thought that he was going to learn from me, but within five minutes, I was learning from him. I learned from him for an entire day. A very gifted man, very experienced. Some of the CIA folks involved in these campaigns were, as I say, doing high risk stuff, but stuff that unfortunately is built in to almost any one of these serious counterinsurgency campaigns. Which is why the serious counterinsurgency campaigns ought to be approached with fear and trembling. Very serious stuff.

Q: Is there anything else we should cover, do you think?

LEHOVICH: In the Vietnam business - Let me just see if there is anything else. I want to cover one other thing because it's anecdotal and it's huge fun. We had a non-stop stream of important visitors out there. When I was at the American embassy for that one year, I was given some of the harder tasks of shepherding these people around, hosting them, being their control officer. The first one was Teddy Kennedy, who came with John Tunney, Congressman Tunney from California. The second one was George Romney. These were absolutely wonderful episodes.

The Kennedy visit happened when I hadn't been there for terribly long in my embassy incarnation. Suddenly, everybody began to move away from me a little bit, saying, "You really got the dirty job, didn't you" meaning I was Teddy Kennedy's control officer. I didn't understand why. First, the Mission Coordinator, a very senior officer and a very nice man called Phil Chadbourne, came up to me. He told me that "Kennedy wants one thing, he wants one thing only. He wants it every night," and my job was to see that he got it. It was so important, I was told by the mission coordinator, Mr. Chadbourne, that I would be expected to dip into my "private stock." I didn't know what he meant by my private stock, but he kept saying, "My boy, dip into your private stock. It's that important. Use your private stock." I didn't have sherry or whiskey or anything like that. I didn't know what the guy meant. I later learned. So, that's the advice about the private stock. This was the day that Kennedy was arriving.

As his arrival time grew closer, I met Cabot Lodge in the corridor, who burst out laughing. He said, "You really got stuck with the dirty job, didn't you, boy?" I laughed, too. I'm a nice guy. He said, "I'm leaving for Thailand so I don't have to meet the guy. I hope you'll survive. Let me tell you something about those Kennedy boys. Those brothers are all the same. They want one thing. They want one thing only. They want it every night. Your job? Make him crawl for it."

Q: We're talking about two people from Massachusetts who hated each other.

LEHOVICH: Absolutely. We're talking about Henry Cabot Lodge, who had been beaten out by Jack Kennedy. That evening, I went to the airport to meet Ted Kennedy. I was immediately mobbed by many senior Americans who got between me and him and covered him with attention. That evening, I went to the hotel to work out his program with him. I came to him and he opened the door. He was on crutches because he had a broken back. He had been in an airplane crash. Of course, all the people who had been telling me "He wants one thing and one thing only" didn't realize that we were talking about a man in intense pain. He opened the door. I introduced myself to him again and he said, "Can you do me a favor? I need something and I need it real bad." I was dreading this question. I knew what was going to happen. I said, "Senator, what do you mean?" He said, "I need some aspirin and some soda water from the downstairs lobby." That's what the senator needed. Very nice man, very nice man.

Q: For the record, particularly Senator Teddy Kennedy and his brother, the President at one point, Jack Kennedy, were known as swordsmen, so usually young ladies were requisite. That's what they were talking about.

LEHOVICH: Yes, and the "private stock" was a rather flattering presumption that I had a stable of my own lovelies who would come whenever I told them.

Q: You were saying after the Kennedy episode, you had another.

LEHOVICH: After the Kennedy episode, I had another professional challenge which was clearly thrust on me because somebody there didn't like me. I say that jokingly. That was Governor Romney.

Q: He was Governor of Michigan.

LEHOVICH: He was Governor of Michigan and he wanted to be President. That meant that a lot of people thought he was a good guy and a lot of other people thought he was a very bad guy simply because he was after someone's job.

Q: He was a Republican.

LEHOVICH: He was a Republican. Governor Romney came out there. I spent a couple of days with Governor Romney going all over the place, in town, by airplane, to villages, to other places, provinces, and everywhere this guy would gather up as many people as he could and then give a signal to the T.V. crews that had followed us. There were two planes. There was the plane the governor was in with a few other people, including me. There was the second airplane with all these news people. He only wanted the ones who had cameras. He would start his stuff. He would make the little boys squat down and do football locomotive cheers. The football locomotive cheers were when he would yell "Let's hear it for Saigon!" They'd yell. He'd say, "Now yell 'Down with the Communists!'" They'd yell that in whatever Vietnamese words they would have been asked to yell by the interpreter or local official. Then he'd ask them to yell these anti-communist slogans loud enough to hear in Hanoi and they'd yell that stuff so loud, certainly loud enough for the T.V. crew to hear. This was all being filmed and shown in America. It was okay the first time, but this happened two or three times the same day. It became rather weary. Anyhow, Romney was milking this thing for all he could so that he could come back with the strong aura of the anti-communist man, the tough man, the man who could deal with a problem like Vietnam.

Then a year later or whenever else it was, two years later, the guy says he was brainwashed. I was absolutely overwhelmed because I had spent a large amount of time with him. This guy said he was brainwashed. Then suddenly came one of the nastiest phone calls I ever got in the State Department. It was an official call from a guy that I knew reasonably well who at that time was running the whole Vietnam operation in the State Department. He calls up and asks me to write down everything I knew about Mr. Romney's visit for the record. I said, "I'll call you right back," which I didn't do. I called back a few hours later and said, "I'm not going to write down everything I know about Governor Romney's visit for the record. I'll be happy to discuss it with you if you like. But I'm not in the business of writing memoirs about American politicians." So, I didn't write down everything I knew about Governor Romney. I told him all about it. The reason, of course, I was being asked to do all of this was to prove that Governor Romney hadn't been brainwashed. I was perfectly happy to recount in detail how he gave locomotive cheers, but I frankly didn't feel for one minute that I wanted to start writing the Vlad Lehovich memoirs about

Governor-Trying-to-Be-President Romney.

Q: As a matter of fact, today, if you ask anybody of our generation about Romney- Hadn't he been president of a motor company, too?

LEHOVICH: He had been president of American Motors.

Q: American Motors. All that anybody remembers is that brainwash thing, which actually blew him out of the- LEHOVICH: Blew him out of the water. Made him look like a complete idiot.

Q: Yes. Now we can discuss this without having to write the memoir.

LEHOVICH: Of course. The reason I didn't like writing the memoirs, I knew it that day, it was unmistakable, I was going to be used on that one.

Q: Yes.

LEHOVICH: I was going to be put out in the wind on that one.

Q: Romney out there, was he asking questions?

LEHOVICH: Oh, yes, he was having a good, highly motivated, very high spirited, fact finding trip, which he was also using with almost no limits, using it to publicize himself. But he was having a very fine, extroverted time fact finding, asking. I don't think he was listening too carefully. I think he was much more interested in photo opportunities, but he was spending several hours a day talking to people who knew a lot, asking them things. But he was running the show. He had some people out there - not advance people, but he had people with him who were working on planning this trip, his people. The brainwashing thing was an afterthought. As you say, Stu, it backfired. It made the guy look like an idiot. But it didn't make him look like an idiot because people thought he hadn't been brainwashed but said he had been. People actually thought he had been brainwashed. That made him look even stupider.

Q: Of course it did.

LEHOVICH: How could you believe me when I said I loved you when you know I've been a liar all my life? Who wants a guy like that for President?

Q: How about with Ted Kennedy? Sort of his back trouble... Did he have an agenda when he came there?

LEHOVICH: My sense of his agenda and of the whole man was very decent. The agenda was to find out and to learn as much as possible and to see things. I was amazed in retrospect. You had a guy like Kennedy. His brother had been President. He had a much higher sense than some petty sense of a situation like this. I saw nothing petty in the way he behaved in his two or three days of fact finding in Vietnam. He was with his friend, Congressman Tunney, who was not in the limelight - in fact, he was almost invisible. But those two fellows had a very sensible trip by any standards of political junketing.

Q: What about some of the other junketeers? If we have such a commitment to an area, it's a damn good thing to have people come out from all elements of American society to take a look and see what we're doing. What was your impression of others?

LEHOVICH: I was briefly involved with Henry Kissinger during his trip in the mid-sixties, while he was still on the Harvard faculty and following which he reported to both Rockefeller and Nixon. It is a brief recollection but a useful anecdote because later Kissinger had the reputation of a "swinger" and a social lion. He certainly was not that in the mid sixties. On Kissinger's last night of a rather long visit -two or three weeks -Dick Smyser, a political section colleague who had spent much time with Kissinger, decided it was time for him to have a real night on the town. He asked me, as well as David Engle, to join and enrich the evening with our knowledge of Saigon and of Vietnamese. (David's Vietnamese was superb). We went to a fine dinner in Cho Lon and Henry was silent and introverted. We went somewhere for dessert and he was shy and awkward. Finally, we went to the Arc-en-Ciel, one of the truly fine night clubs in Saigon with elegant setting, excellent music and first-rate food, and magnificent girls. We wanted him to see an expensive and first-rate night club, even though it was one we did not frequent. The girls at the Arc-en-Ciel were not mere bar girls, as elsewhere in town. They were courtesans, very good looking, well educated, poised, sophisticated, and trilingual. Henry was still terribly reserved. We had some drinks and were about to leave. Finally, a girl came up to him. She was perhaps the only one in the place who wasn't a beauty, but rather a rather mangy wreck with lots of makeup and a fiery red dress. She may have been an interloper who came in from the streets. She came up to him and he stood up. She lunged against him in an embrace, flinging one arm around his shoulder and with the other giving him a surprisingly conspicuous and, it seemed, a very probing thrust into his private regions. Henry was reserved no more. He stood back, looked intently at the girl, and said, "Oh, my God, I've been discovered." For a while there was some indecision about whether to continue to leave, or to stay and savor the fruits of having been discovered. Our guest had changed from a retiring violet to an aggressive social animal. We invoked the late hour and the risk of disease to make the case for leaving, and the evening ended safely soon thereafter.

Back to the general subject of visitors. Vietnam was an intensely visited place. The other folks that I came across who were visiting were, first of all, just a lot of friends or family of people out there who would come out for fun. It was a very social thing to do at that time. We also had all sorts of gurus and pundits who used to come out there. I met a whole bunch of folks from the RAND Corporation who became lasting friends. I met the Alsop brothers that way and got to know Joseph Alsop fairly well through that beginning. Various other people would come out who were opinion-making people. What was fascinating was that until the late '60s and even beyond, opinion leaders in America as often as not thought it was a great thing. Some of them, in a very intense way. I mean, the Joseph Alsop treatment or the Roland Evans treatment of Vietnam was very orthodox: wonderful campaign, very difficult, very important, very high stakes, and so on. In a sense, it was very high stakes. I think you're right, Stu. I think people have to go out. People should visit these places. Political junkets can be excessive and ludicrous, but an awful lot of them are a very good idea and are necessary.

Another note, an uncharitable one, perhaps, but necessary for posterity. It has to do with Daniel Ellsberg, who was with the Lansdale group in Vietnam in the mid sixties, and who later, as a radically anti-Vietnam war activist, leaked the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times. I saw Dan a number of times in Saigon and at least once in the provinces, when I hitched a car ride with John Paul Vann and Ellsberg in the coastal provinces from one province to another. The interesting thing, and the one I want to stress, is how gung-ho Dan was about the war effort, and how hawkish he was. Dan liked to show photos to his friends. Sometimes these photos were of trips, or people, or himself. Dan was an exhibitionist and he occasionally had photos of girls he was seeing or dating and which were indiscreet photos and which his friends did not enjoy seeing because they were embarrassing and Dan was immature. He also had a lot of photos of himself and these, too, were sometimes exhibitionistic. Dan went through a phase in which he liked to wear and pose in marine fatigues while he traveled around the countryside. One photo, which was a shocker to his friends, had Dan in marine fatigues, with rifle in hand, posing with his foot on the chest of a dead Viet Cong. It was like a safari picture of the successful hunter and the game he had bagged. Dan was not involved in military action and had not shot the man, but he posed for such a picture. I saw it, as did a number of others, and it was unpleasant and was part of a pattern of behavior that led Dan's friends to distance themselves from him. I heard that the U.S. military who had been there when Dan posed found the action wrong and distasteful. In any case, Dan was every bit as extreme when he was a booster of the war effort as when he became its enemy. I have no doubt that something within him required these kinds of extreme, exhibitionistic attitudes and that his militancy and pacifism were ways to act out the same needs. I have respected some harsh critics of the Vietnam war, but I don't consider Dan to be a considered or plausible war critic and I do not respect him.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point? You left Vietnam when in 1966?

LEHOVICH: Summer of '66.

ERLAND HEGINBOTHAM
Economic Policy Officer, USAID
Saigon (1963-1965)

Vietnam Desk, USAID
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Erland Heginbotham was born in Salt Lake City in 1931 and educated at Stanford. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included posts in Seoul, Lagos, Saigon, and Jakarta. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: You left MIT in 1963? What came next?

HEGINBOTHAM: Right. At that point I realized the benevolence of the State Department personnel system because despite that I was still a very junior officer, I was offered a choice of three assignments. But, of course it was possible to be a little bit cynical about those, because the choices were Vietnam, Cambodia or Laos.

Q: You had asked for Asia!

HEGINBOTHAM: I asked for Asia. I guess we took a day or two to think about it, but it wasn't really too hard. I opted for Vietnam, which was a wise choice, because if we had chosen to go to Cambodia, our household effects would have been on their way to Nam Pen and we would have been evacuated the day we arrived.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

HEGINBOTHAM: I was there in differing ways from 1963 to 1967.

Q: 1963 was a rather crucial year.

HEGINBOTHAM: We got to San Francisco and discovered that Pan Am had not made the hotel reservations that we thought they would, so we wound up sleeping on benches at the airport that night because there was nothing available within 50 miles of the airport. An over-zealous guard kept coming around and waking us up and waking the baby up, so we would move and then try and find some place where he couldn't find us. We were in miserable shape when we got on board of our plane. When we picked up the newspaper, the headline was that martial law had been declared and that the Saigon airport was closed. We were alerted two and a half hours before we got to Tokyo that the hydraulic system was out and that the crew would have to use a manual breaking process; they gave us lurid description how we should protect ourselves on landing, in view of the likelihood of fire and all those good things. So, when we got to Tokyo we were not in excessively great humor and we had to cool our heels for three days.

Q: This was when?

HEGINBOTHAM: I guess it was June of 1963. I was in Saigon from 1963 to November 1965. In any event, we spent three days cooling our heels in Tokyo that were un-programmed. We finally left on either the same flight or the flight immediately after the ambassador's. It was Cabot Lodge who had just been appointed ambassador. I guess we were on the plane immediately after the one that brought Lodge. Things were not too cozy in Saigon at that time. American personnel was under such suspicion by the Vietnamese that they had been ordered not to associate or have any contacts with their American counterparts.

Q: Why was that?

HEGINBOTHAM: Because of suspicion.

Q: What kind of suspicion?

HEGINBOTHAM: The regime suspected that Americans were up to no good and were plotting against President Nguyen Van Thieu and his wife, Madam Thieu. They were trying to prevent contacts and made whatever contacts existed more visible. So, having arrived in June, we had a couple of months where we had literally no contact with any Vietnamese officials.

Q: What was your job at the Embassy?

HEGINBOTHAM: I was in the AID mission in the program division. I was in the office of economic policy which was responsible for assessing the needs of the Vietnamese economy for supporting assistance - basically military support assistance - which was designed to absorb the spending power - that was generated by the Vietnamese printing presses - with commodities that Vietnam needed to keep its economy going and to support AID projects, much like what I did in Korea.

Q: What were you getting from the people you were working with in AID and elsewhere within the American mission about Vietnam and the Van Thieu regime and his family?

HEGINBOTHAM: Actually it was very much like picking up where I had left off in Korea. As I said, we had virtually no contact with any Vietnamese with the exception of a few locals who worked for AID. So, it was very difficult to find out what the Vietnamese were thinking. But it was quite clear from contacts with a lot of our American colleagues what was going on, because, of course, they had their feelers out in all parts of the country. There was a provincial representatives system at that time which required Americans to be in all of the provinces of Vietnam, so it was relatively easy to get a feel pretty good feel of what was going on in the country. It was a very depressing situation. We arrived shortly after the first monk had emulated himself about a block and a half down the street from where we lived.

Q: We are talking about Buddhist monks?

HEGINBOTHAM: Right. There were a lot of demonstrations and there had been a lot of emulations. A new wave had begun and it wasn't long after we had arrived that President Diem was, in fact, overthrown and killed.

Q: Were you getting a feel about Ambassador Lodge's attitude toward the government?

HEGINBOTHAM: I think the impression was that he had come to talk tough to the Vietnamese in an effort to get them to put their house in order. But I was pretty cut off from the embassy and really didn't get a lot of inside scoop about what was going on. I guess what disturbed me was the sense that the autocratic management of the government seemed to be disappointing a lot of people who normally would supported the government if they had been given a chance to do so. I can't now recall what was wishful thinking and what was suspected with regard to Lodge's job there.

Q: You were part of the program to try and absorb the surplus currency. I came there in 1969 and we were cursing that Vietnam was awash with consumer goods mainly Japanese, like little Honda motor bikes and other thing; it seemed to be a hell of a way to running a war with all these consumer goods flooding the country. What was the feeling at the time you were there on what was being done; how was it being done; and what was your impression of that?

HEGINBOTHAM: At the time I arrived and for about six months at least, very little was being done; things were chaotic situation. I was trying to learn the whole of the macro- economics of the country and so, I wasn't so involved with the non-project assistance program and what was going on mechanically. Basically we were just trying to do the best we could with the ministry of finance to figure out what was happening in terms of inflationary pressures and what was going to be needed in the countryside to meet the essential needs. We were trying to keep the production processes running as best as could be to avoid having to import still more than we already were. Obviously, in incredibly rich agricultural areas, there was a lot done to focus on the agriculture, but efforts were also being made to try and build up the Vietnamese capacity to produce expendables for the military. So, our focus was really not at all on the consumer economy; it was on the productive element of the economy. The visible consumerism that existed was much more associated in my mind with the PXs and the GIs who started pouring into Saigon after Kennedy's assassination. That was really quite visible.

Q: Where were you and what were you doing when November 1963 when Diem was overthrown and he and his brother killed.

HEGINBOTHAM: I was living not very far from the U.S. AID building and therefore my life consisted basically of going back and forth from home to the office with a lot of alerts in terms of disturbances and things of that sort. We practically backed on one of the Buddhist temples that was the scene of a lot of the politics; there was a great deal of disruption of life. I learned to ride a motorcycle because I figured that was the safest, quickest and best way to commute. Our lives were very unsettled and there were a lot of worries. My wife was teaching out near the airport and there were a lot of concerns about family security. In fact, we had three very close calls with the family in relatively a short period of time. Even once things begin to ease up, unless you had very good reason, I didn't travel outside of Saigon very much. There was no way for me to do what I had done in Korea, which was really to get out and get to know the countryside. It was very clustered, sort of catastrophic existence. When we did venture out, we encountered three rather close calls.

Q: What sort of? How?

HEGINBOTHAM: The first one involved one of the first incidence of a VC kidnapping of an American, a guy who I had come to know, Guy Serts. We had gone out to the edge of Saigon for the idle task of picking up some of the sculptured plants that the Vietnamese were adept at creating .We had gone to a particular block on the edge of town and bought a couple of plants for the stoop and came back; we were enjoying them until we picked up the paper the next day and discovered that Guy Serts had been kidnaped from the very block that we had been shopping in. The exact same location.

Then although we weren't directly involved in the theater, there was a grenade thrown into the theater and a soldier threw himself on the grenade which protected everyone else but killed himself.

A third incidence was when we took some Vietnamese friends - a family with whom I had become close to in my official work - for a Sunday lunch including a ride on the river on an embassy lunch Clueneetee where the French used to water ski. When we got back someone asked if we had been shot at. We said, no. They said, "Well, they were just shooting there." Apparently, the VC were on the far bank and were shooting at the water skiers and the motor boats a little while earlier. So, that seemed to be a dubious past time, too.

Then, I guess it was after the family left, I was literally within three blocks of the embassy when it was blown up. We began to take these things a little bit personally after awhile.

Q: After the assassination of Diem, there began a revolving door in the government. What were you doing? Did things open up more; there wasn't much to see?

HEGINBOTHAM: That is an interesting story, because we used to invite some of the provincial representatives in to our house when they would come into Saigon for weekends. We were sort of a local watering hole for people who came back from the provinces. I very quickly became disenchanted with what I was doing in the office and started talking to my colleagues and we decided that we would undertake a little project assessing how economic development might be conducted under conditions of warfare on military action. We set up a little cross disciplinary group with somebody from the military, and somebody from AID, and somebody from the embassy, a couple of different agencies and we started meeting. My boss didn't like this. He told me that I would have to do this on my own time; the project had nothing to do with what we were supposed to be doing in the office. So I did that. Eventually, I would spend weekends in a province that we selected where we could observe the situation to see what the conditions were and to try to see if we could figure out some answers. We picked Tangin Providence, because it was sort of a transitional province between the north and the south. We used to make frequent trips to look at the province program and work with the AID program to see what was being planned for the province. We very quickly begin to see that it was hard to divorce that from what was being done with the military management. We became quite disillusioned with the way the military operations were being run. So, we began to try to push some new policies even though we were all were junior officers in various agencies. We begin to develop some fairly elaborate plans for the province. The military was very fascinated by this and they invited us to make a presentation.

Q: American military?

HEGINBOTHAM: Yes. At this point my boss saw a way of burnishing his credentials a little bit by letting me spend some of my office time on this project. As I said, we became very frustrated with some of the military operations and started developing some proposals to change some of the way things were being done. We would meet and we would decide which agency was likely to be most receptive to a particular idea and then we would propose our idea to that agency. We would all be alert to position ourselves to respond. We would usually try to cast the proposals in such a way that we were sure it would end up on the action list. We begin to have some interesting success at trying to get some relatively minor things changed from the way things were being done. We became aware of the three wars that were being fought and developed a rather strong partiality to the things that were being done in fighting one of the wars over the way things were done fighting in the other wars. We became more and more involved with critiquing the military activities in Vietnam and eventually I became totally disillusioned with what was being done with the military forces.

I guess General Harkins was there when I first arrived and he was quite notorious for cooking the numbers, no negative reports and so on. Among the things we became painfully aware of were just how completely misleading the reports that were coming from headquarters. When you got an honest report from a provincial military advisor, it wasn't getting through; that was very disillusioning.

Q: One person I interviewed was saying that he was there when Harkins left and Westmoreland took over. He said that Harkins had the staff draw up a list showing all the successes; when Westmoreland came, he had the staff draw up a list the failures in order to build a benchmark so he could later show how he had improved matters. All the same matters were on both lists, except in reverse. What was the problem, as you saw it as an economist looking at what the military was doing?

HEGINBOTHAM: What we saw happening was that there would be Viet Cong attacks on various hamlets or villages and the ARVIN (army of the Republic of Vietnam) forces would either not bother to show up or often they would be ambushed and severely beaten and retreat before they ever got there. The subsequent evidence and the scuttle-butts was that there were lots of spies inside the ARVIN and therefore the army was extremely vulnerable. Consequently, the result was that the villages, if anything, got a little mortar cover and that was about as much as they could hope for. The other activity that you had going on were the green berets.

Q: They were our special forces?

HEGINBOTHAM: They were special forces. They were working with in small units, independent of any regular forces, basically as guerilla force to counter the guerilla activities of the VC. We also had CIA assisted village and popular forces, provided support under AID auspices. To us, it made sense to support the village and popular forces and to expand the green beret activities so that they could get behind the enemy lines, where such existed. We could combat the enemy with these forces--probably even better than using regular Vietnamese and American ground troops--and at the same time, gather village and hamlet support. As the military assessed their program later they found out that of the officers who graduated from their training courses the top three officers almost invariably defected or disappeared. It was their military operating procedures which friends and foes alike knew. The ARVIN was just so badly infiltrated that it was just hopeless. So, we became increasingly supporters of the war that was being prosecuted by the CIA with the hamlet forces and green berets and wanted that effort enlarged. After Kennedy's death, the green berets lost their luster. They were very much mistrusted and detested by the regular military; so it didn't take long to undercut and undermine the green beret activity, which I thought was a great tragedy. Furthermore, the U.S. forces were coming in over-equipped for the job that they had to do, which meant that the VC were able to arm themselves with weaponry that was much more suited against U.S. forces than it was against them. They picked up 50 caliber machine guns and were able to start shooting down choppers and planes; it was just a nightmare. We quickly became convinced that much, if not most, of what we were doing with the regular forces was simply building up support for VC by alienating the villagers where the ARVIN had ran over the roughshod thereby disillusioning the locals.

Q: Was it after we studied our troop build up that it was decided that the families had to leave?

HEGINBOTHAM: Yes. The Tonkin Gulf incident precipitated evacuations. That happened about a year and a half after we got there. It was about February 1965 as I recall.

Q: Where did your wife and child go?

HEGINBOTHAM: Since I was expecting to go to a completely location after Vietnam, we decided it made more sense to evacuate them back to the States.

Q: What was your impression of AID operations? Did they change while you were there?

HEGINBOTHAM: They evolved rather radically as the military build-up occurred. I am not quite clear when there was some restructuring of the provincial representatives function. At some point, they changed the whole structure and I don't really have the details of that at my grasp. But the AID process did not change a lot. We were still providing defense support funds and we were still trying to build up plants, more and more of which tended to get cloistered around Saigon as the military areas in the rest of Vietnam became more tenuous. Basically, I was so preoccupied with the general interaction of the military and the AID programs that that was what I focused on just exclusively. As I said, we started with our little group to do everything we could possibly do to promote the village and hamlet popular forces because that it seemed to be the only possible way to achieve our goals. At the village level you could expect that while there might be a some infiltration it was likely to be known. I guess what was most over-whelming was the preoccupation by Washington with statistics body count - the McNamara approach to winning the war with numbers which was just incredibly frustrating.

Q: Does that continue up through when you left in 1965?

HEGINBOTHAM: Yes. I went back to Washington then. I'll have to double check again, because my memory on the dates is a bit fuzzy. I was back in Washington in 1965, but basically I spent most of my time back in Vietnam. One of my principle tasks was recruiting people for the economic and program functions in Vietnam. In the Washington frenzy to win the war; the Johnson years were filled with just crazy proposals. We spent a lot of our time trying to argue against some of the more outlandish ones.

Q: Were these hair-brained ideas or too much or ones that just wouldn't work in that type of environment or what?

HEGINBOTHAM: The mentality that took over was that people in the field weren't using enough imagination. So Washington tried to throw resources at the problems. Washington was trying to come up with ideas - which people wouldn't consider or which wouldn't have been considered in Saigon and in Vietnam.

Q: Were we trying to pump up a horse that was dying? What was the feeling about it?

HEGINBOTHAM: You earlier referred to the revolving door. There was just a constant exchange of leaders and no real conviction that any of them had a strong grip. Big men seemed to be a very imposing type, but they certainly didn't change things just as little men didn't change things. Tal Key, the Air Force general, that didn't do any better, but was at least more colorful about it, but essentially we just seemed to be moving nowhere. The ARVIN were afflicted by their constant susceptibility to being out-flanked and ambushed with their weapons stolen. Basically, they were sort of a supply depot for the VC, it seemed. It was not an encouraging scene. It was just hard to see any way out. The irony of Vietnam was that there were so many people in Vietnam who were sincerely and deeply concerned about the outcome, that it was very hard not to feel terribly committed to try and do whatever one could do. It was like watching the dike gradually giving way and you knew that ultimately you couldn't do anything about it, but you wanted to save as much as you could while you were there. We had a million plus Catholic refugees who had come down from the North; there were whole sects that could and should have been fighting the VC, but who were sometimes fighting against the government forces. There was always that hope that somebody with some sense would come in and allow some local autonomy and regain some support from those sects which were in a powerful position in the areas they controlled. Eventually it became very apparent to me and to many others that the costs of what was being done in the United States - in both political and the economic - terms was just greatly outweighing any possible benefit from our failing efforts in Vietnam.

Q: You broke away from Vietnam in 1967?

HEGINBOTHAM: I was in the Vietnam Bureau in AID and as I say, my principle task was to recruit people to go to Vietnam to serve either as program economists or as program officers. The AID mission had quite a substantial need for program officers at that point, because we were doing so much to support. Incidentally, one of the things that I was doing was trying to see to it that funds got down to the villages, so that they could carry out projects that were of primary interest to them, rather than having all development being pushed from the center downward. We spent a lot of time trying to work with the ministry of finance and through the provincial governments to try to get money out of Saigon; that was very difficult and never very successful.

I felt great frustration doing the core activity to which I was assigned. It was an interesting experience trying to recruit people for Vietnam, because I was told that people were busy fighting a war, so they allowed me a lot of authority. I was told that I would have authority to assign people to Vietnam from anywhere in the AID and if they choose not to go, then they would be terminated - just as easy as that. I told my bosses that I wouldn't work on those terms, but if they would accept my terms, I will be happy to do it. My terms were to give them a third choice.

The third choice was that if they did not accept an assignment to Vietnam for the two year period, they had to accept the assignment to what was then the Vietnam Bureau in Washington, including a requirement to spend at least six months out of the year on TDY in Saigon. I don't recall how many people I sent out - I would guess 20 people - but I did not have to fire anyone, because they mostly settled on my terms. We had an anti-war guy working in the bureau at that time. On weekdays he would work in the AID office and on weekends he would go out and demonstrate with his friends. We sent him out on a TDY to Vietnam; he had been out there about two weeks when we got a message asking for a full duty assignment there. It was just the result of going out there and seeing how many people who were desperate to try and win the war on the South Vietnamese side. It was just hard to walk away from it. I think that was basically what made the TDY route attractive.

JOSEPH P. O'NEILL
Political Officer, USAID
Hue (1963-1965)

Da Nang (1965-1968)

Joseph P. O'Neill was born in New York in 1935. From 1953-1956 he served in the US Army. After joining the Foreign service in 1961 her served positions in Laos, Vietnam, Thailand, the Philippines, India, Portugal, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Sudan, and Eritrea. Mr. O'Neill was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in May 1998.

Q: That was your first time in Vientiane. In 1963, you went to Vietnam. You went to Hue, in fact, which is halfway up Vietnam.

O'NEILL: Hue was important for a number of reasons. One, it was the family home of the Diem family or the Ngo family (I don't know how you want to call it during this interview). Let's call it "Ngo Diem Nhu's family." His brother was the Archbishop of Hue. Another brother was the governor of Hue. His other brother was his political advisor. Of course, then there was Madame Ngo Diem Nhu, who was probably the only man in the family. So, it was all...

Q: So, they were well-connected in Hue.

O'NEILL: Well-connected. They were a Mandarin family with one terrible cross. That was, they were Catholic. They were always considered outsiders. People forget that the Ngo Diem Nhu family had his older brother killed by the communists previous to his coming to power. Ho Chi Minh had offered both an apology, retribution, or recompense, and a position in his government but Diem would not take it. He had his own idea of who he was. He was a Mandarin. He came from a family. Ho Chi Minh was nothing in his eyes. This was the classic... He was more Mandarin Chinese in mentality than Mao Zedong. He was born, I think, about 300 years too late. I remember, when I asked to go to Hue-

Q: Oh, you asked? I wanted to get into that.

O'NEILL: Yes, I asked George Roberts, who had been the political officer in Vientiane, Laos, and then had returned to the Department to become a personnel officer. He knew me and I wrote him. I said I wanted to go there because I felt that there were going to be an exciting place. Old

George, who later made ambassador, wrote back that I was really going to sort of an isolated, not terribly important post, and it was just going to be very quiet.

Q: We had a consulate there at the time.

O'NEILL: Yes. John Helble was the consul there, who was very, very unhappy with what was going on and who reported back to Washington about how things were. So, when I got there. Jerry Greiner was the chief of station. It was just the three of us. We covered everything from Quang Tri to Quang Ngai and what eventually became ICorps. I spent two years in Hue and then two years with AID working on Da Nang.

Q: You went there for State though?

O'NEILL: I've always been with State. I was given what was considered a tremendous promotion with this assignment. I joined the Foreign Service as a Foreign Service staff 13, (GS-4). I had made GS-5 the same year. I was going to take over a GS-7 position. Man, my career was just starting on an upswing. I went to Hue and became the budget officer, the administrative officer, communicator, and the officer who prepared certain political work, even though I was not an officer. I was still staff. I didn't become an officer until years later.

Q: Was there a military threat there at the time that you arrived?

O'NEILL: There was a MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group] mission there. I remember, there was not a great threat there at that time. In fact, all the military officers would hang on and hang on in order to get a combat infantryman's badge. The only way that you can do that is to get involved in a firefight. So, they were always out on patrol. This was '63. In '64, it got a little more heavy. Then, of course, the Marines came in later. What happened was that the period of time, only the Viet Cong were involved there in that area. The NVA, the North Vietnamese Army, did not come down yet. They were not terribly involved.

I have two stories that I'll tell you about this. One, after John Helble left, there were a number of people who came in there. John Negroponete, who had come up from Saigon. He was out of Hue visiting the other provinces and I was left there, and the CIA guy was there, a new fellow. He came charging in. I did their traffic also. He said, "The NVA has come across the border." I said, "No way. Everybody says they're not coming. They're going to stay in Laos. They're going to use the Ho Chi Minh trail." "They're coming in. I got to report it. I'm in a terrible bind here. Negroponete is not here." So, I said, "Okay, I'll send it out. I'll send it out immediately. I'll send it only to Saigon."

Q: Then, Saigon will decide whether they want to send it to Washington?

O'NEILL: Yes. I sent it out and I slugged it from CIA for CIA. It was the first time I had ever done that. I sent it out "NIACT Immediate." By the way, I would code it up and then we had a Vietnamese fellow who sent it out by CW [commercial wire]. The incoming messages would be handled the same way. The cable was "headed" so that all would know what was coming was important. Don't delay processing. So, down it comes. Then the panic sets in. Some types of phone calls could never get through between Hue and Saigon. This time, all the calls got through. The messages consisted of "What the hell is going on up there?" "I sent a cable. That is all I know." "I can't talk anymore." Mendenhall (chief of the Political Section in Saigon) called; he was upset. I told Negroponte what had happened when he returned from the field. He said, "There goes my career." I said, "Oh, no, I headed the cable from CIA for CIA." He said, "Are you sure?" I opened up the safe and I showed him the outgoing tape. He never forgot it. The report was accurate. The NVA was coming across the border from Laos.

Q: [Negroponte's] career wasn't harmed by that?

O'NEILL: No. He's the only ambassador who has been vice consul, consul general, and ambassador (pro consul) in Honduras and later Manila.

Q: Did you ever get any visits up there from the ambassador or others?

O'NEILL: Yes, we had all the ambassadors up. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge and Max Taylor came up. Kissinger came through also.

Q: So no congressmen?

O'NEILL: No congressmen. They never came up. After John Helble left on assignment, he was replaced by Sam Thomsen. Tony Lake, later NSC advisor to President Clinton, was assigned to Hue for some months. He, by the way, was a real political force, as was Halpern when they were in Saigon. People forget that "Rolling Thunder," the big bombing missions into North Vietnam was in part run by Halpern, he of the Pentagon Papers fame. You see the conflicts that later occurred as both Halpern and Lake left the government over Vietnam though they were "hawks" when they were in Vietnam. When we were in Hue, the leader of the opposition was Trich Tri Quang, who was the senior Buddhist monk in the country and who was running the opposition against, first against Ngo Dinh Ngo, and then against us while we were there. Trich Tri Quang used the consulate in Hue as a conduit to the United States government, first through Sam Thomsen and finally Tom Cochran. Tom Cochran was our last consul in Hanoi in the 1950s and later our last consul in Hue. I worked for Cochran again when he brought me back after Tet.

Q: He died about a year or two ago.

O'NEILL: He was our consul general in Da Nang. The problem in that area was the conflict between the Diem family, that was conservative Catholic, a minority family in a majority Buddhist country. Diem had no sensitivity toward the people with whom he had to live and work. The Diem family had a very bad idea of how to rule people. They ruled Vietnam as if they were in the 1600s in China. Other problems included Madam Ngo Dinh Nhu, the sister in law of the president, who was the de facto ruler of the country. She was tough and opinionated. I am reminded of [Russian Queen] Alexandra of Nicholas and Alexandra - narrow minded. The same character - women, which is not going to sound politically correct - who were only interested in protecting their husbands, keeping them in power without regard to the long term interests of the husband or the country.

Q: In her case, her brother-in-law.

O'NEILL: Her brother-in-law. The Buddhists wanted to take back their country and I can understand this. Most of the Catholics in North Vietnam or a significant portion did not come from South Vietnam. They were refugees after '54 from the North. It just did not work. Nobody should also in any way think that Ho Chi Minh was an agrarian reformist. He was a nationalist communist dictator cruel to his own people in the north. One only has to look at what he did for North Vietnam vis a vis what Diem did for South Vietnam. North Vietnam was always, under the French and under the Chinese, the richest part of the country with all the natural wealth. The South had the food. The question later developed of how these two parts of the country could survive economically. I think, until about 1964, the State Department was the body that moved the foreign policy in Vietnam and then came General Westmoreland. Westmoreland was as narrow minded as any general I've ever read about. He makes McClelland, the Civil War general, look like a brilliant, opportunistic Stonewall Jackson. There was a great, great general there at that time by the name of General Walt, a United States Marine Corps general. He had started two programs. One was called "Kit Carson." This was a program whereby a Marine squad or a Marine platoon (but no bigger) was integrated with a Vietnamese squad or platoon. They would each feed a meal to the other every other day. Lunch would either be Vietnamese or American. Then the next day the opposite. They would live in the villages and they would stay there for six to nine months. It was good. It worked for about seven, eight, nine months until NVA finally crossed the DMZ. When the NVA came across, they were too big to handle [by the smaller] units. [Such small unit tactics were] good if they were going to fight guerillas. When the NVA came, Walt said, "Look, we can't defend the whole damned ICorps with what I've got, which is about two and a half Marine divisions. Let's do this. We will protect the DMZ down along Route 1 and from the coast in about 30-40 miles, 50 maximum, all the way down. We will then have a major road, the railroad, the sea, and the major cities, and the most fertile land and at least 75-80% of the population. We will hold this. We will protect this. We will fight in the other parts. We will then build Adrian's wall. When we see them sort of getting up together, we hit them with everything: the planes, the task force, etc." Our friend Westmoreland's idea was that we would have a war of attrition. We would kill them. The Viet Cong/NVA would not be able to take the pain, he thought. As we saw them, we would go out and kill them. They would not be able to run and hide.

I see two things wrong with this. One, we could not afford the casualties. You can see the results of this in the Powell Doctrine today, which is, you arrive on time, you don't cause any trouble, and then you leave on time. If something is accomplished, okay. If nothing is accomplished, so what. That is the result. Now, here you have this long fight. There is no way we could win because Ho Chi Minh and his army were willing to fight to the last Vietnamese in North Vietnam and South Vietnam.

Q: They were not going to fight to the last American.

O'NEILL: We lost this war politically in part. There were many other reasons, when Robert Kennedy ran for the Senate in New York and said, "John would never, never fight in Vietnam the way we are doing now... We should not be there anymore, etc." Again, another misconception. Remember the reason that our friend, President Kennedy, was in Texas was that he had to carry Texas in the coming election. The last political remark he made before he was shot was, “Lyndon, at least we'll have two states: Massachusetts and Texas.” He was going to be accused in the next election of losing another Catholic country after “losing” Catholic Cuba. It was thus necessary for him not to lose Vietnam. Recall that the Catholic hierarchy never supported Kennedy; they knew the family and his father. He could not have carried the Catholic clergy if he “lost” or abandoned “Catholic” Vietnam, even though Vietnam was not Catholic, but Buddhist.

Q: That would make '64 a very difficult fight for him. When the Marines landed near Da Nang there, did that-

O'NEILL: They landed at Phu Bai just south of Hue.

Q: Did that increase your work or not?

O'NEILL: Believe it or not, Tony Lake was one of the officers who went out to meet the Marines as they came flying in. At Phu Bai at that time we had a big listening station. We were listening to everything the Viet Cong [did]. We also had a big VOA station out there which was broadcasting all over Vietnam. So, the NVA were coming down. The Army people who were there couldn't hold it. We just had the Tonkin Gulf [incident]. Even if we had not gotten involved in the Tonkin Gulf, the Marines would have come in to protect these stations. So, they came in. The only problem we had was local problems with fights between the Army troops and the Marines in the bars in town. We got that settled out by giving them every other night in town. On Sunday, they couldn't go into town and they each had one day to themselves.

Q: Real diplomacy, Joseph!

O'NEILL: Yes. The other thing was, the Marines were very good. I went out to stay with them off and on. Negroponte and Sam Thomsen were busy with other things. There were only three of us. We had to take care of these people out there. I would go out. I speak New Yorkese and the Marines and the Army quite understood that. They never knew what my rank was, thank God. By that time, I think I had made FSS-8 (GS-6).

Q: You were a diplomat to them.

O'NEILL: I was the diplomat. I was the fellow they should pass very politely at the restaurant.

Q: How was morale at the post when you were there?

O'NEILL: We were so busy. By that time, by the way, they had a really excellent USIS [United States Information Service] guy in there, Bill Stubbs, who spoke Cambodian and French. We also had some German doctors up there. They were all killed during Tet. Bill is retired now. There was a police advisor who wasn't terribly good. He felt that the way to stop this whole thing was to give all the police officers shotguns and let them kill every NVA they saw, which didn't last very long. Morale was fine. All of us were bachelors or “temporary bachelors.”

Q: I was going to ask whether or not there were dependents there.

O'NEILL: No dependents. So, not all of them, but I would say a significant majority of the officers had household arrangements. We had a daily telegram. You had the consulate and my house next to it. So, everyone would write their portion of the cable for whoever was the officer in charge, whether it was Sam Thomsen, Negrofonte, or Lake. They would type it out and put it together. They would go over and sit in my house, which was in the consulate compound. I would sit down and would "poke it out." It was on an old fashioned, old, manual typewriter with a "crypto tape" I typed pretty close to 50 words a minute. The rest of it would take about an hour. Then we'd wake up the Vietnamese CW operator, who lived in the compound with his six or eight children (He now has a restaurant here in Arlington.) and was in the French colonial army for a number of years. He would "pound it out." Then we would all get up at eight or nine o'clock the next morning and start all the many things that had to be done. There would be the administrative things or maybe seeing the demonstrations out around town. Some of us would be going out to make trips out to Quang Nai or down to Da Nang or whatever. Remember, we did everything by road. There were no helicopters. There were no short trips. So, you would leave and it would be four days, maybe five, depending on convoys and the rest. We would go to Da Nang through the Hai Van Pass, a long, dangerous, and torturous ride. We would stay in Da Nang and operate from there. It was time consuming and there were many days, weeks, months if I think about the whole two years, when the senior officer in charge of the consulate in Hue was a Foreign Service staff 8 (GS-6).

Q: Did you travel in jeeps?

O'NEILL: Jeeps. No armored jeep, but we carried sidearms. I carried a Swedish K and a 357 Magnum, which I would lay on the seat beside me. Very often we traveled with interpreters. John Helble, one of the great officers in the Foreign Service, would take a driver with him. I generally drove myself. I don't recall taking a driver with me. Sometimes I would go with another American. In fact, I think I was the last American to drive from Hue up to Lao Bao. Lao Bao was right on the border with Laos. That was in '64.

Q: In 1965, you were moved to the CORDS [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support] program at Da Nang. Tell us a little bit about the CORDS program. What was that intended to do?

O'NEILL: There was an Army colonel in charge, Sam Wilson. CORDS was the hope that we would help the Vietnamese administer their government in an efficient and democratic way. From the State side, we got, I think, in general, some excellent officers. [From] AID, we had a mishmash of ex-Army officers, contractors, and I do not know what. We had fishery advisors, education advisors, sanitation advisors on everything and many of the advisors did not know their jobs. Sometime in this period, I got to know the French consul general in Da Nang, Monsieur LeBouef. He said something which I have never forgotten. He said, "You have more administrators in my consular district (which was the equivalent of ICorps) than we had in all of Indochina prior to 1954." He was correct; we would have an American sitting with almost every Vietnamese official above the rank of deputy district officer. It was foolish. I ascribe this primarily to Westmoreland, who had by that time taken over both the military and the political side of the war. He did not understand either the U.S. military on the ground or the Vietnamese.

It was badly done in every way. During this time, 1965-1967, I was the advisor [to] the mayor of Da Nang, but I did other things. It was difficult to control all the advisors who reported to Saigon.

Q: Had you asked for this assignment or was this just-

O'NEILL: I'm not quite sure exactly how that happened. I know that a number of senior officers knew me and they had offered to bring me on to AID as an officer. I said, "No." But then they had started to ask State people to be detailed [to AID]. So, they asked me to stay on detailed to AID. I think there was a mistake made there. I think the AID people thought I was an officer because I was the only staff who ever was an AID advisor. There were refugees coming into Da Nang. I helped with some of this. But again, there was rampant corruption. Some of it, we should just have left alone, but we focused on it. We let a Buddhist group come in. We would give them cement and roofing. We couldn't account for all of it in an audit, but we would see a beautiful pagoda going up. Catholics would come in and they would do the same thing. There would be churches built. There might not be a water well built, but there would be a rectory for the priest, a room for the monk, or there would even be a whorehouse built. We would worry about that stuff, but at the same time at the port, tons of material was disappearing. Somebody said (and I'm sure it's accurate) that if we had used all the cement that had been purchased and sent to Vietnam, we could have paved the whole country. There were ships sitting out there at Da Nang waiting to offload for three or four weeks, some for months. They were short loaded. They were selling cement from off the ship. It was awful.

We did, I think, a couple of things wrong. One, we sent out a conscript army to Vietnam. You cannot fight a guerilla war with a conscript army. Two, most of the Army (There were exceptions, were ticket punchers. They knew exactly to the minute when they arrived and when they were going home. Most of the Army never saw combat, never heard a shot fired in anger, and were very pleased not to. Counter that with units like the Airborne divisions or the Marines. The Marines spent 13 months there. There were terrible casualties among the Marines; they kept most of their people in the field.

Q: That's their tradition.

O'NEILL: That's their tradition.

Q: They're all fighters.

O'NEILL: Even those who were in the back, who were in the rear, always wanted to get some front line time. You have to again note that toward the end of this, many of the Marines were not volunteers. They were drafted. Still, they were able to imbue in them this difference. That war did not have to come out the way it was. Much of the problems, of course, were in the States over Watergate and the rest and politics within the political parties. There were ways to mitigate the sufferings out there. The important thing about this whole Vietnamese war, whether we should have been there or not, people did vote with their feet. Whenever there was a fight coming up, I had never, ever seen people flee away from us to [the Viet Cong] before a fight. I never saw them running the other way from us. We would be coming up (and I spent a lot of time with the Marines and others) and I never saw them heading out toward Viet Cong country.

Q: That's a good indication of where their sentiments were. Were you there when the Marines' air base was attacked and so forth at Da Nang? There were some very vicious Viet Cong attacks I gather.

O'NEILL: That was the Tet offensive. Is that the one you're talking about?

Q: No, this was in '65 when they shot up a lot of helicopters and destroyed...

O'NEILL: They snuck in, yes. But again, that was overconfidence by the Marines and sloppiness. It happens all the time. It happened in Beirut. They sometimes forget to do the necessary like Roman Centurions. They were all going out to fight some stupid bunch of slaves (Spartacus) and they forget to put up night defenses. They get sloppy. It happens all the time. It's very difficult.

Q: It's human but it happens in the military, too, doesn't it? Was our consulate in Hue attacked while you were there or not?

O'NEILL: No. Again, the USIS building was burned down. I was there when it happened. I remember alerting people by CW what was happening. I think we sent that one in the clear. I can't recall. Bill Stubbs was over at the USIS building getting his people out. The burning was done by university students who wanted the Americans out. Many of them wound up being murdered in the Tet offensive. They saw their saviors coming and didn't know that they were going to wind up in the grave. Anyway, he was over there getting his people out. Tony Lake ran from the consulate about 600 yards up to the USIS building to make sure that Bill Stubbs and his staff got out. Then, finally, they came in one by one to the consulate. We sat there in the consulate listening for this tremendous (by our standards; it was only a few thousand) mob move down to the consulate.

Q: Were there no police, no military?

O'NEILL: The Vietnamese authorities did not interfere at all. So, we sent home our staff, one of them Tuy Cam, a beautiful young lady who later married Jim Bullington (later ambassador), who came after me; Joe Nguyen, one of our great Foreign Service nationals, whom we found out a few years ago was a member of the Vietnamese intelligence organization. We sent them all home. We sat there. The question was, what were we going to do if they came into the building? We had all our weapons sort of sitting around. We hadn't decided what we were going to do.

Q: We had no Marine guards?

O'NEILL: No Marine guards. There was us. That's another thing, I think, that people forget about the Foreign Service, especially at that time. All of us, Frank Wisner, John Negroponte, Tony Lake, John Helble, all of us traveled throughout southern Vietnam without guards. Some of us were captured. All of us were shot at. Steve Ledogar was under mortar attack a number of times. Gil Sheinbaum, who was down in Hoi An, was shot at a number of times. I was shot at.

We were very lucky not to have been killed. I now think about Negroponte, Sheinbaum, Wisner, and Lake. They're all my age or a few years younger. One would not even imagine these guys driving through guerilla held areas. If I had to count up how many times I've driven through areas which were considered hostile, I would need more than my fingers and my toes. But we did. Foreign Service officers did. They did it then. Regrettably, we don't do it as much as we used to.

Q: So, [the mob] never came to the consulate?

O'NEILL: They came and they streamed in front of the consulate. But they did not come in. I still don't know why they didn't come in, but they didn't.

Q: When you were communicating out of Hue, were you able to communicate with Washington or only with Saigon?

O'NEILL: The instructions were that we sent everything to Saigon. Saigon would pass it on. I think, in a way, it was this way so that Saigon would have control over what went out. We had really tremendous officers in Hue. We first had John Helble, who told us in '62 and '63 how deep and difficult going into Vietnam would be. At that time, we were able to go straight into Washington. But at a certain time he was told not to communicate with Washington directly. After that when the other officers came to Hue, we sent everything down to Saigon. I think some of the cables were not passed in whole to Washington. I think they were excised or they were made parts of other cables. At least, I think, the flavor and the passion of the officers' writing was best.

Q: There was fighting in Da Nang in those years between the South Vietnamese and anti-government forces. Could you say a little about that?

O'NEILL: In ICorps, we had a very good general, Nguyen Chanh Thi. He had been a sergeant in the French colonial army and had risen through the ranks. He was not well educated and not from a "good family." Very honest, decent - he made a fine Vietnamese first division, the best in the army. Then he was moved down to Da Nang to take charge of ICorps. Everybody was very, very pleased with this. I think he was moved down to ICorps at our insistence because he was so good. Other generals were fighting for power in Saigon. They were not terribly interested in who won the war. It reminds me of Chiang Kai-shek, "I'd rather kill Mao Zedong than Japanese." This is what was happening. He cut most of the corruption in Da Nang. We had the port at Da Nang, which was always corrupt, but he cut the corruption. He started to become very popular among the people. So, there was a big fight over this. Richard Holbrooke, later assistant secretary for East Asia and Pacific and ambassador to Germany, was one of the officers in Saigon at that time. I remember having a conversation with him. In Saigon, the politics was that General Thi had to go because we had bigger fish to fry. We would replace him with a better general. Highly unlikely. Highly unlikely. We did, by the way, replace him with a good general who eventually died in a helicopter. I said, "You know the reason that this general has got to go. One, he's not married. He doesn't have a family. He has no future in this country." Holbrooke said, "You don't understand." Maybe I didn't understand. We were caught by the people who were our allies and did not, as the French or the British would have done, send them away. The French would have sent them off to some whorehouse in Paris. The British would have sent them off to Asmara or the Seychelles for a pleasant exile. But we did things stupidly. It goes on. We want people to behave in our image. People in the rest of the world act for their own interests. It just doesn't work.

Q: Was any of the fighting between the South Vietnamese based on religious considerations, Christian versus Buddhist, or not?

O'NEILL: Not at that time. I must admit that (again, politically incorrect) many of the more competent officers were Catholic. Was this for a historical reason, i.e. that the French had trained them and then that Diem promoted them? No, it was strictly over power. There were, of course, the tinges of religion, but that was only as a mask for the people. Only power.

GEORGE M. BARBIS
Analyst, Laos, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1963-1966)

Mr. Barbis was born in California and raised there and in Greece. He graduated from the University of California and served in the US Army in WWII. In 1954 he entered the Foreign Service and was posted to Teheran, Iran as Economic Officer. His other overseas assignments included postings in Thailand, Korea, France, Belgium and Greece, primarily in the Political and Economic fields. Mr. Barbis served on the US Delegation to the United Nations (1973-1975). His Washington assignments involved him in Southeast Asia matters and the US military. Mr. Barbis is a graduate of the National War College. Mr. Barbis was interviewed by Mr. Raymond C. Ewing in 1996.

Q: Certainly at the time you were there, you were very aware from your contacts with Mike Forrestal and Cliff Alexander that the government was very interested in what was going on?

BARBIS: Yes. And, this was before Vietnam had become the issue in Southeast Asia and Laos was the focus of all our attention. But, as things were changing in Vietnam, Vietnam started becoming the main issue, and our involvement started to become openly greater than it was in Laos, Laos became peripheral. But, in that initial period I remember we used to say, "Thank God Kennedy is President," because those of us who were working on Lao affairs at the time were deeply committed to the Geneva Accords, which were quite controversial domestically on the political scene. After all, here we were at the height of the Cold War, etc. and the Geneva Accords on Laos provided for a neutralization of the conflict and confrontation there which was indirect, but nonetheless was taking place. We tried, or so I believed at the time, to honestly try to make those agreements work. In the end they fell apart largely because of things the communist side did. The Pathet Lao, supported and directed by Hanoi, did things to which we had to respond and as a result the solution some years later fell apart and Laos is now communist.

Q: Some Foreign Service officers who worked on Vietnam in a little later period did a lot of soul searching and there was a degree of controversy and of not being comfortable at times with US policy. You did not feel any of that in the time you were working on Laos?

BARBIS: No, because I think we were driven by our commitment to try to make the Geneva Accords work and we thought we were doing the right thing. The right thing being as I recall seeing it, isolating Laos from any kind of conflict or power struggle in Southeast Asia. It was a peaceful, innocent country that didn't deserve to be torn apart by a civil war of great brutality. So, we were doing things that later became known as the secret war that some people would be critical of, and dealing with reporters was a problem for me frequently...I remember I had a pretty good relationship with Friedreich Smith, who later became quite an outstanding journalist and still is.

Q: He was with the New York Times?

BARBIS: Yes and still is. He was young, brand new, my age so we could communicate easily and comfortably. Although he would press, he respected my need to protect classified information so I don't think I ever gave any secrets away. It was a little tricky because we were doing things that we didn't want the press to publicize. All of that came out later, but at the time I was doing it without any moral questions or disagreement with what we were doing because I believed my role as OIC Laos was to make sure that I followed our policy which was to try to make the Geneva Accords work.

Later, as we became more and more involved in Vietnam, and as Vietnam began to drive our policy not only with respect to Laos but also with respect to Cambodia, I can remember sitting around with my Cambodian colleague and sort of bemoaning things that were happening that were Vietnam driven that we didn't feel comfortable with. A feeling that what we were doing in Vietnam was not based on an overall strategic plan or vision of what we were trying to do but was more getting dragged into situations because of what happened on the ground to which we had to respond which committed us and got us more and more involved and then before we knew it, we had half a million troops there.

The need to react and the domestic pressures were great. That was the time of the doves and the hawks, with the hawks pressing for more aggressive action to counter the Vietcong. Our feeling was that we had enough to do dealing with Laos in my case and Cambodia in my colleague's case. We didn't know all the ins and outs of Vietnam, although we participated in meetings and in other ways kept up--saw the traffic, etc. But, our impression was that it was sort of an incremental involvement rather than a planned, deliberate, strategic approach.

Q: Going back to Laos again. Did we see the support for the Pathet Lao coming primarily from China or from the Soviet Union or did we not make really a distinction, that it was the communist bloc?

BARBIS: As I can best recall we saw Vietnam... Hanoi... as being the main agent of the communist movement, if you will, in directing things in Laos but with support both from the Chinese and the Soviets. The Soviets certainly were providing a lot of material support, the Chinese also were playing a role, especially up in the northwest. We had a lot of exaggerated rumors and stories about the Chinese building airfields right up there in that corner where Laos has a common border. Nothing ever came of that, although I guess some people would argue that they did build a road, although I don't know for what purpose. They were able to get supplies and reinforcements and whatever they needed through quite easily without modern transportation.

Q: When you were in Chiang Mai you traveled to the Laotian border, of course, [did you enter Laos]?

BARBIS: Only [viewed it] from across the Mekong [River]. We would go by road to Chiang Rai, which is just north of Chiang Mai, and then by land rover up to the Mekong where there was a little village, [Ban Houei Sai], and looked across into Laos. That was an area of Laos that was fairly sparsely populated. There was not much Pathet Lao activity there during the time I was in Chiang Mai. Most of the Pathet Lao being along the North Vietnamese border in northeastern Laos and, in fact, one province was pretty much under their control for most of the time that I was involved

WILLIAM HARRISON MARSH

Political Officer
Saigon (1963-1966)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1966-1968)

William Harrison March was born in Pennsylvania in 1932. He graduated from Cornell University in 1953 and from Princeton University in 1957 with an MOA after having served in the US Air Force. He entered the Foreign Service in 1960 and served overseas in Saigon, Bangkok, Brussels, Paris, Geneva and Jeddah. Mr. March was interviewed by Lambert (Nick) Heyniger and Vlad Lehovich in 1997.

Q: [interviewer is Nick Heyniger] This was a meeting of junior officers being informed there was a growing and important need for people to go to Southeast Asia? How did that go?

MARSH: There were mixed reactions to it. In the first instance we were told that we had been culled before this pool not solely because of our French language capability and the appropriate rank and level and so forth, but also because we were all unmarried. And immediately, half of the group said, "What do you mean, unmarried? We are married." It developed that the marriages that had taken place in fiscal 1962 had not been recorded and, as a matter of fact, as late as 1966 they still were carrying me as a single officer.

Q: For Heaven's sake!

MARSH: I had a hell of a time to get tickets and a passport for my wife in '63 going to Saigon and in '66 returning from Bangkok, where she was in safehaven. By that time we had a son. (Some officious person in the Department) when I telephoned from Saigon to the Department to complain that the orders had only covered me and not covered my wife and son, when I told her that she said, "But you're not married." And I said that of course we were, we had a son. Well, this functionary informed me that it was not necessary to be married to have a child. An interesting biology lesson from a total incompetent!

But in any event a number of people, for example, Jim Bishop was one who later was very active in African affairs and ambassador to several countries, said well, on balance, he'd rather not go. The rest acted according to their individual consciences, who were married. I was married but I did talk to some people about the assignment and they said it was a golden opportunity and that it would really be exciting and blah, blah, blah...and a grateful nation...blah, blah, blah...all that sort of thing. In any event I did go into Vietnamese language training.

Q: In the fall of '62?

MARSH: No, the very beginning of '63.

Q: Okay, all right, how long did that last?

MARSH: That was six months back in the basement.

Q: You are at FSI studying Vietnamese.

MARSH: I am. A little earlier I said that the course I had taken under Eleanor Jordan in Japanese, at the embassy in Tokyo in the '50s was very fine, very well done. So I was completely unprepared for the totally disorganized experience in Vietnamese at the FSI.

It was bedlam. We were put under linguists and I think we had seven linguists in six months, something of that sort. They'd change. A very few of them were Vietnamese speakers. So their approach was a wholly mechanical approach to Vietnamese, you know you hold your tongue such and such a way, do this, do that and the other kind of thing and so forth, but as far as any practical facility with Vietnamese, they didn't have it. It was an extremely unsatisfactory course.

Q: I've also had hard language training at FSI. When you say linguist... what I mean by linguist is sort of the supervisor who is supervising five or six language classes being taught by instructors.

MARSH: Precisely.

Q: The instructors are native speakers of Vietnamese but the linguists who are supervising don't really have much familiarity with the language at all.

MARSH: Almost none. They disagreed with one another. There was a great deal of tension and rivalry and all of that sort of thing. My friend Vlad Lehovitch was in the class, as was Dick Holbrooke as well as quite a few other notables.

Q: How was Holbrooke as a language student?

MARSH: Fair. Holbrooke has always been a master politician. His career is his supreme artistic achievement of his life and he has devoted his life to this professional equivalent of Sistine Chapel ceiling here still being worked on. Even in those days he was in great shape because his family lived down the street from Dean Rusk in Westchester so when he arrived he happened to be on very close terms with the Secretary of State, which was nice for him.

Q: Tough. Tough.

MARSH: Right.

Q: So at any rate, six months of struggling with Vietnamese at FSI back in the basement of the Foreign Service Institute, and you emerged into the daylight in '63?

MARSH: In June of '63. Now one thing we haven't talked about, because it didn't exist, was any area training whatsoever. Occasionally those of us in the course would go over to the Department. We were supposed to have some sort of briefing or training session or something of that sort. But there were very few of these, perhaps three or four of these and they were very unsatisfactory. We never had an intensive exposition, let alone a discussion, of the U.S. desiderata, the situation, the history of it all and all of that sort of thing. Never.

Q: Why not?

MARSH: What was supposed to have happened was that I was supposed to have been assigned to a consulate to be established at Nha Trang, on the central coast and a very nice place. Unfortunately instead of establishing that post in 1963, it was established a full 10 years later, I believe. We did not have geographic coverage of South Vietnam except from Saigon itself, with the exception of a post at Hue which was very isolated and had very little in the way of resources. It was really to be a watch post to make sure that the North Vietnamese did not cross the DMZ, the demilitarized zone, which of course they did in great numbers, but behind the consulate not in front of it so it was not visible.

Q: So you were assigned to the embassy?

MARSH: Yes. In any event because I was to have had three months of additional Vietnamese training at the embassy, full time. John Burke, who was later deputy assistant secretary and who was ambassador in Guyana at the time of the Jonestown affair, and I were the students in this class.

Now there were two problems by the time we arrived in Vietnam. First of all, the entire situation concerning the Ngo Dinh Diem regime had become very unsettled and very, very troublesome. And the second thing was that we had a change of ambassadors. I was there perhaps two weeks under Fritz Nolting, Frederick Nolting, who was ambassador, and then came Henry Cabot Lodge.

Ambassador Lodge wanted to rethink all sorts of things. He didn't want a vast establishment. There were of course no such limits on the military, so that when I arrived in Vietnam there were, I think, 17,000 U.S. troops in South Vietnam. This would be the rough equivalent of, say, 250,000 Vietnamese troops in the United States with many times the money that U.S. people would have had. So not only did we have the 17,000, a considerable number in its own right, but also they were loaded. And also they were taking over housing. For example the Commanding General of the Military Assistance Command in Vietnam had moved into the former residence of the French commanding general - bad imagery.

There was simply no political control. And when I say no political control I mean, of course, no policy control. And when I say no policy control what I really mean is that to a remarkable extent there was no policy. There was a great, overarching glorious thing up in the heavens that South Vietnam shall not fall to Communist North Vietnam, but apart from that there was precious little guidance and precious little leadership. There was endless, endless concentration upon the military effort and upon this vast work it was undertaking. I am sure that to both military and civilians in Vietnam it must have dwarfed all previous enterprises.

Q: Vast work that was undertaken to do what?

MARSH: Well, to build the place, to rebuild the place, to train everybody from university professors through district water commissioners, to build schools, to build roads, to build everything you could think of, to restore the railway going all over the country. And this was in the middle of an enormous war of both a conventional and non-conventional nature. It was an extraordinary thing.

A few years later I was temporarily Consul in Hue. I'll never forget one day, it was one of the most trying days of my life, when we had virtually all of the students of the University of Hue out on strike. There were demonstrations and all of that sort of thing, and the Buddhists themselves in virtually open revolt and so forth. A great Wagnerian lady arrived from the United States to say that she was a higher education advisor and she had come to do work at the University of Hue. I said, "Madam, you have been sent here under misleading instructions, the university has been closed for two weeks and we are not at all sure we'll be able to change that." She looked over her ample bosom at me and said, "Well, open it." And just about that time a vast flotilla of helicopters, Hueys, bound for an air strike against the Vietcong and North Vietnamese passed overhead and I said to myself, "This is absolutely unreal!"

Q: You had two or three months of language training?

MARSH: I got my three months of language training and then was told I would be assigned to the consular section in Saigon and that they had decided that was what I would be doing. I said that that would provide very little opportunity to use the Vietnamese and without rancor of any kind, let's just call this assignment quits. I didn't struggle through a tonal language very badly taught, well, decently taught but under very difficult circumstances, I mean we had a coup d'etat just before we concluded the training. I didn't do that to work in the consular section with visa applicants. That's not what it was about. So I said to just send me home. And then my wife had had difficulty to get the proper tickets. So, just send me home.

So there was a lot of discussion. The personnel officer was a friend of mine and she was very helpful. Finally it was decided that I should be sort of over-complement in the Political Section helping with the foreign relations of South Vietnam which of course did not involve the Vietnamese army, until they found me something. So after a couple of months they found me a position in what was called the Provincial Reporting Unit. These were about seven officers within the Political Section.

Q: Seven officers, within the Political Section?

MARSH: Well, my friend, we had 25 kosher Foreign Service officers in the Political Section.

Q: "Kosher" means they actually worked for the Foreign Service?

MARSH: Right.

MARSH: 25.

Q: In the Political Section?

MARSH: That's correct.

Q: Holy mackerel! In 1963?

MARSH: Well, '64.

Q: Wow. So what were you doing?

MARSH: The idea of a provincial reporting officer was to go out to the countryside and to cover developments out there and in effect to make a viability assessment. How are things going, are we winning, all that kind of thing.

Q: Did you wear a flak jacket?

MARSH: No, Sir. This was the heroic period of my life because I was driving jeeps over mined roads; I was in a small provincial town when the Vietcong attacked the military headquarters, which is where I was. They handed me a weapon and I went up on the roof. Fortunately I didn't have to use it, because I wouldn't have known how, having qualified with an M-1 at ROTC training camp only because there was a sergeant who was much too smart to have me in any make-up sessions. So he passed me when all I could have done with the M-1 was to have thrown it at somebody.

At any rate, I was on the roof and saw one of the most incredible sights in my life, namely a napalm attack on a Vietcong encampment, about a mile away, by our helicopters at night. Incredible colors, explosions, all of that sort of thing. Absolutely magnificent!

Q: Wow. Wow.

MARSH: In any event, I did that work, covering first the provinces up in the central Vietnam region. Later I became chief of that unit, after Jim Rosenthal, later ambassador...

Q: Good for you, because you were still at this point...what...an FSO6 or 5?

MARSH: Well, it's interesting. That's correct. It took me 25 years in the Foreign Service to supervise as many people as I did in the early '60s in Vietnam. 25 years to supervise as many people. I had seven under me.

Q: Your responsibilities were largely sort of covering internal domestic developments?

MARSH: No, no, no...political-military and then some. The idea was how are the efforts to arm and train the Vietnamese going? How are our military training activities proceeding? How are our economic assistance programs functioning or not? What is the mood, what is the attitude of the South Vietnamese?

Q: So you are going out from the embassy frequently, touring around the countryside?

MARSH: Yes. Usually a week out and then a week back in Saigon to write up everything. You had to get the essential military clearances. A major concession was that military clearances were required on our reporting.

Q: Why?

MARSH: That was part of the great effort of the Department of State to get along with everybody.

Q: Is this what Ambassador Lodge wanted?

MARSH: No, it really was Ambassador Taylor because he believed, poor man, God rest his soul, but he believed that FSOs could not understand military affairs. And what Vietnam proved was that war is much too important a matter to be left to military people.

Q: I take your point but I had you in the embassy in Saigon with Ambassador Nolting having been recently replaced with Ambassador Lodge and then Ambassador Taylor replaces Ambassador Lodge?

MARSH: And then Lodge returns and replaces Taylor, for a second tour.

Q: I see.

MARSH: I was there with both.

Q: This is really a significant factor in the embassy's reporting that it has to be cleared with MACV.

MARSH: That's correct.

Q: Wow!

MARSH: That's absolutely correct. It was a great inhibition and I'll give you what I think is the classic case.

Ambassador, now ambassador Richard Teare, one of the finest officers it has ever been my privilege to know, was working for me. He went to a province in the Upper Delta. He came back and wrote a masterly report; very balanced, very objective, very well done that pointed out how precarious the situation was. MACV blew up over this report when it came time for them to clear the final version because they held that adequate training and recruitment of the South Vietnamese militia forces had taken place, and all that sort of thing. So Phil Habib, at that time our political counselor, said, "Well, could Dick go down and take another look?" I said goodbye to Dick in the morning at the embassy, I can remember it very clearly, and I told him I supported him 100 percent but that unfortunately we were up against some power relationships here that were difficult. I wished him good luck and all the best and so forth.

I returned to my work and then towards the end of the morning Dick reappeared. I said, "What happened, that was a short trip." Dick said that his flight couldn't land at the province capital because the Vietcong had overrun it.

Therefore, as a consequence, MACV agreed with Dick's version, right?

Absolutely wrong! They would not change a word of the neutered version that they wanted.

Q: Because the South Vietnamese Army was shortly going to recapture everything and everything would be fine?

MARSH: Who knows, who knows.

Q: That's incredible.

MARSH: So at any rate I'll skip briefly over Vietnam because in another interview I'm going to be talking about it. In any event we had the misfortune to be on home leave in the United States when the wives were directed to leave by President Johnson, the families had to leave. We sought advice of the Department of State but weren't able to obtain any; no one could give us any. We also found out that my wife was expecting our first child.

Well, we had around-the-world tickets to go back to Saigon, so we decided that we would locate Ruth, my wife, in Bangkok. We arrived there. I'm happy to put it on the record that I couldn't believe how inhospitable and how uncaring the embassy in Bangkok was to the Saigon wives.

Q: And this is an embassy in a similar part of the world with very similar conditions.

MARSH: Precisely.

It so happened that my wife went into labor suddenly. She had a Thai who drove for her with his tiny car and she tried to reach him and she failed. Her contractions were getting faster and faster. She called the embassy. It wasn't just that the embassy turned her down on a ride to the hospital, it wasn't that alone, it was that they gave her a lecture about Saigon wives not supposed to be bothering the embassy.

Q: I can't believe it!

MARSH: She managed to get a taxi and the traffic in Bangkok, as many people know, is horrendous. Even 30 years ago it was horrendous, and our son was coming. As a matter of fact he was starting his final descent as they arrived at the hospital.

Q: Unbelievable and this is the first child.

MARSH: I would like to say to you that the man who turned her down, an American, was completely exceptional, and that he was not the kind of Foreign Service officer that we seek to have, but he did later become an Assistant Secretary for Administration.

Q: I can't believe it.

MARSH: And so what I understood when I heard about that some years later was that I was the exceptional one, in thinking that, as is the case in the military, things had to be "look out for the troops."

Q I can't believe it.

MARSH: But it was a bitter, very bitter and difficult experience.

Q: Assistant Secretary of State?

MARSH: Assistant Secretary of State for Administration.

Q: Wow. Wow.

MARSH: At any rate we were then in 1966. I was desperate to have a sort of normal diplomatic assignment because this had been such an unusual place where, of course, the embassy having been blown up in the middle of my tour, you understand, that it would be nice to see what a place was like under normal circumstances. But of course nothing would do, I had to go back to the Vietnam desk.

Q: Okay. But the normal tour, wasn't it two years?

MARSH: It was extended, without our consent.

Q: You spent an extra year?

MARSH: That is correct, it was extended from two years to three years.

Q: ...in this sort of war zone? Where the military weren't even spending more than two years?

MARSH: I have served, and those of my colleagues have served, far longer in Vietnam than 90% of the military ever did, and without weapons, of course.

Q: We are going to end this part of the interview with your finishing your tour in Saigon and now you are coming back to the Vietnam desk in the Department.

Good afternoon, this is Lambert (Nick) Heyniger and I am interviewing William (Bill) Marsh. Today is Monday, December 8, 1997.

Bill has been talking about his service in Saigon and Hue. The story is up to 1966. So, Bill, you have now been in Vietnam for three years and it is 1966, what happens now?

MARSH: Reassignment happens now. It was a very difficult year in terms of the work that I was doing during the first half of the year in Vietnam. It was a very difficult transfer back to the United States. It was very, very difficult taking up work on the Vietnam working group or Task Force that had been established.

Q: Is that where you were assigned?

MARSH: Yes, it was a disappointment because as I may have mentioned earlier, I wanted to work in a, shall we say, more normal sort of post to see what the standard regular workings of the Foreign Service were like. A good friend of mine, as a matter of fact a Foreign Service colleague and in fact my former roommate at graduate school, some years afterward said to me rather scornfully that I had never been in the Foreign Service. I had been in Vietnam, and that was so extraordinary that it really didn't count as experience in the Foreign Service. He may have had a point.

In any event come spring of 1966, I was dispatched from Saigon to Hue because of the Buddhist uprising and certain rumblings about the Vietnamese military, our allies in that area, and rather they were not plotting against the government. So I found myself in Hue at about the time one would be sending a lot of cables to the Department asking about the next assignment.

Q: Just before we go on, you were sort of assigned to Hue TDY?

MARSH: Yes, I was TDY up there.

Q: And what was your capacity up there?

MARSH: Consul. I was in charge of the state of the Americans there. I feared for it because there seemed to be a very, very strong anti-American sentiment among youth and the citizenry at Hue, particularly in those of the Buddhist persuasion. So I recommended to Saigon that we close the post. Well, that recommendation coming from a junior officer did not carry a great deal of weight so they sent a very senior officer, Tom Corcoran, who had managed over his career to serve in every post in Indochina to Hanoi, as well as the three other countries. Tom came up and took a look around and said yes, I actually had a point and one should close down the post, but that the Buddhists took care of the matter because they burned it down.

Q: Well, for heaven's sake. You weren't in it?

MARSH: Fortunately, once again, I used up another of my cat lives. I've used two or three by this time, haven't I? I still have a few left. But my biggest problem came in trying to persuade the Department of State I was married, had been for three years, and therefore was entitled to travel orders and a passport for my wife, and while we were at it, for my son who had been born in 1965. Some worthy in the Department told me I wasn't married and I pointed out in retort that I had a son and was informed coolly that you don't have to be married to have a child...which really sent me up the wall!

In any event, finally came orders and so forth so we decided we would have a little break together, our six month old son, my wife and me, and we sailed from Hong Kong.

Q: Did they think, for example, Bill, that you had established a relationship with a Vietnamese lady?

MARSH: Well, if so, she was the only Vietnamese lady ever to have been born in Ponca City, Oklahoma. I don't know what they thought, but you are making an assumption, Nick, that they thought! I wouldn't necessarily go along with that.

At any rate, just to lighten matters a bit, we sailed on the President Cleveland from Hong Kong. You know we had shore leave in Yokohama so we went up to Tokyo and had a good time with our baby, and so forth. A classmate of mine from undergraduate days was General Manager of the Imperial Hotel, so we were going to take a taxi back down to the ship and he put a hotel car at our disposal, with a driver. Very thoughtful, except that the driver was a country bumpkin who knew nothing of Tokyo and got caught in immense traffic jam. So as we arrived at the pier in Yokohama we saw the President Cleveland sailing off.

Not to worry, they said, and they sent a lighter and we got into the lighter and it took us out into the harbor where the Cleveland dropped her pilot. A huge rope ladder was put down the side of this 25,000-ton ship. I put baby inside my suit coat jacket, tucked him in there, and up we went. And a great pair of hairy arms came out, that's all we could see were the hairy arms out of the side of the ship, and we heard "Give me the baby" so we did and then we continued on up to a deck where we could get up.

Q: My god! On a rope ladder up the side of this steamer, with your wife?

MARSH: With my wife, and with the baby.

Q: I would have been terrified.

MARSH: This was climbing up about seven stories, I would guess. Well, while this was underway we were more or less stationary, fortunately they stop when they drop the pilot, and they don't just toss him overboard.

At any event we arrived in Washington and hit a maelstrom. The problem essentially was the difficulty in obtaining policy orders, the confusion. The fact that there was tremendous concentration in the presidency of decision-making on Vietnam. You'll recall that President Johnson even had a great hand in designing and approved the embassy that was built after the closure of the old one in 1965. That's how closely everything was worked out.

Q: Let me just take a second here. Okay, now, the Secretary of State is Dean Rusk, the assistant secretary for the Far Eastern Bureau is Bill Bundy, and the deputy assistant secretary is...

MARSH: Len Unger, ambassador previously in Laos and later in Thailand. The office director is Bob Miller, who is later ambassador to Malaysia and to Côte d'Ivoire.

Q: And you're working on the Vietnam desk? What were sort of generally your responsibilities?

MARSH: I was one of the two political officers. You'll recall that at that time McNamara said that he was spending 90 percent of his time as Secretary of Defense on Vietnam. Yet President Johnson, in his memos later, said that his time was perhaps two-thirds, 70 percent devoted to Vietnam at that time. And there we are and the Department of State has named two thirtyish political officers to cover this enormous problem.

Now there were others who were there on special details. At one time, for example, there was a Peace Corps officer, though the Peace Corps never had any representatives in Vietnam. But it was come one, come all, everybody get in the act. At the same time, the essential political work was done either by the two political officers, John Helble and I, or some of the extra people assigned to deal particularly with North Vietnam affairs or with negotiations or what not and so forth. But the regular kind of deskwork that was done was performed by John Helble and by me.

So we arrived and the Buddhist uprising in Central Vietnam had become quite serious indeed. Thus John and I are told that what we need to do is to ensure continuous monitoring and coverage. Therefore we should take turns during the night, in night duty up in the Operations Center. What this meant was that we tended to work 36 hours on and 12 off. We did this for four months.

Q: Holy mackerel!

MARSH: You know, if you want an introduction to exhaustion, this is a very good way to do it.

Q: How come 36 hours on?

MARSH: Well, I think in looking back now the extraordinary thing is we didn't post any objection. We were so deferential and all of us at that time had been in the military, albeit for brief periods of time, not during the Korean War, necessarily, probably not as a matter of fact. But we had had military service to perform after graduating from college and so orders were orders, and "Yes, Sir." We should have said, and I think today's generation would say, to get some more people in.

Q: So it meant both of you worked all day and then one person worked all night.

MARSH: That is correct and this was on a seven day a week basis, and this was for four months.

Q: Before I interrupted you, you said that it was sort of a policy maelstrom with lots of different people telling you what they wanted?

MARSH: Well, it was that. It was pandemonium, really. There were some really quite extraordinary things. For example, in the previous year, that is to say about fifteen months earlier, February of 1965, while on home leave I had been brought into a special little crisis group. This was at the time of the beginning of the air strikes occasioned by the Vietcong actions against U.S. military advisors in South Vietnam. I remember distinctly that one of the things that was made a cardinal principle of it all and I believe originated in State was that in no way were public statements or diplomatic initiatives to indicate that these strikes were retaliatory.

Well, this was just contrary to common sense. I protested feebly about this, trying to say not only that this action of attempting to cast something in a distorted way was against nature, it was actually unhelpful. If we didn't point out that this was retaliation, we couldn't get the advantage in part, at least among the South Vietnamese, for the undertaking in the first place. I lost and was regarded as something of an upstart, as a matter of fact.

This was the period, between 1966 and '68, when I'm afraid I got into trouble several times. For example, there was a Lieutenant Colonel who made a very unfortunate statement in Vietnam in 1968. He said, with respect at the time of the Tet offensive, to the retaking of the town of Ben Thuy, a town in the Delta, that it was quote "necessary to destroy it in order to save it" unquote. I suggested a strong public relations campaign to disown this statement, to dissociate us from it as much as possible.

People thought that this was extreme.

I warned that this was going to become a byword for this effort and that we should get away from it. Others said absolutely not. I think time has shown who maybe had the right diagnosis on that matter. But I got into a little trouble over that one, as a matter of fact. Later still, for example, I said that in 1968 again I had detected a lot of popular upheaval about the war and its course, even after President Johnson had indicated that he would not run again.

Q: You're talking now about popular upheaval in the United States?

MARSH: Yes, that is right. And others on the staff said no, that the President's self-sacrificial act, if you will, had completely appeased public opinion. I wrote a memo contesting this and saying in particular that I understood from talking to people throughout the country that there was going to be a particular problem at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Others did not find that and so I became considered something of a Cassandra, and something of an alarmist. I paid for that. You'll recall that there were parts of our effectiveness reports in those days that were not shown to us? Later I found that there had been some comment put in about that. It was a very trying time for me because it really was something that tried one's soul.

Q: Let's take a bit more time. In other words, the Office Director is writing your Efficiency Report?

MARSH: Yes, never mind who that is, but in any event...this was before any dissent channel. These didn't exist then. I didn't know this. This was the back part of the report, which wasn't shown to us.

Q: That's not supposed to be part of the game.

MARSH: The part that was shown to me glowed. The part that wasn't shown to me burned, like acid, a little bit, a little bit. But at any rate, it was a very difficult time because first of all, to mix metaphors, it took the Titanic years to sink, but we knew she was going down, those of us who were paying any attention. We knew that our effort was not prevailing and moreover we were seeing the destruction of the consensus, the domestic consensus in the United States on foreign policy.

Q: Let me ask were you briefing people on a fairly regular basis? For example, did you go up and brief Ambassador Unger and Assistant Secretary Bundy and other people on day to day developments in Vietnam?

MARSH: Yes in some ways and some times. It depended. After all they had other sources. But they wanted to hear from the field directly which is one of the reasons that for four months we were supposed to call embassy Saigon every few hours throughout the night and then do a memorandum to the Secretary on the subject.

Q: So you did a daily briefing?

MARSH: I briefed all sorts of people, that was my department. For example, I went over and briefed Senator Robert Kennedy once a month. The reason was that we had a classmate who worked for Kennedy, as you will recall, and he got me in and so forth. I briefed one time the governor of Oklahoma. I was visiting my wife's parents and I had a breakfast arrangement with the governor of Oklahoma, later Senator Henry Bellman, who drove 130 miles from the state capitol to have breakfast with me in Ponca City at 6 o'clock in the morning to hear firsthand about Vietnam.

Q: Let me probe with you a little more on that and let me ask you, as you discussed the Vietnam situation and briefed some of these senior officers, what was their reaction? Were there sort of different reactions and different sort of feeling they had about the situation and the future?

MARSH: That's a good question. It seems to me that we briefed them about tactical situations and I think that was really beside the point, I think the essential point was what was the end game going to be? On that none of us had any idea what it was because there was a general supposition, from the President on down, perhaps arising from our western logical point of view that ultimately the (end of tape)

Q: [Interviewer is Vlad Lehovich] Bill, in the fall of 1962, what was your image of Vietnam?

MARSH: Let me preface it by saying that I had visited Vietnam with my General, briefly, very briefly, in 1955. Well, even earlier. I had been put on orders while in Tokyo in late 1953 that would have made me, now get this, as an Air Force Second Lieutenant, would have made me port liaison officer in Haiphong.

What was going on? Well, there was to be a major mobilization for service in North Vietnam to assist the French who were in the final days of their agony there, but President Eisenhower vetoed the whole idea. You will recall that Admiral Radford, Vice President Nixon and many others, urged and advocated this, but the President was insistent that we should not become engaged in a land war.

So, it was almost in a way as if I was fated to go there. Now I visited Saigon briefly with my General in 1955, never dreaming that I would be showing up there eight years later. The French were still very much in command and there were some obvious signs that the French had completely alienated the population.

Q: Was this the Bao Dai government at that time? Or already Diem?

MARSH: It's Bao Dai, who had his Prime Minister Ngo Dinh Diem.

Q: Who had Ngo Dinh Diem as his Prime Minister?

MARSH: That's right. But the French were still in charge.

Q: How long did you stay in 1955?

MARSH: Oh, just a couple of days.

Q: What was your impression?

MARSH: I was horrified.

Q: Why?

MARSH: Well, some things are not suitable for tender ears but that we were shown by the French, such as the prison and certain other things that were very depressing and very wrong. By the way I had met a number of French military up in Tokyo when they came to visit my boss. I liked them very much. I'm a great Francophile, and I liked these people very much. But when they started to talk about the war and about the civilizing mission of France and all that sort of thing, it was clear that they were ninety years out of date.

Q: Was that what you felt was wrong, basically?

MARSH: That and the sheer brutality with which the French had treated much of the population.

Q: How about any impressions about the countryside or the people in Vietnam?

MARSH: Even in those days the countryside, and, again, we were in the South, we were in present day Cochinchina, the extreme south. There were obvious signs of warfare all over the place. I can remember the railroad, following the railroad, down into Saigon. We were coming from the Philippines. I don't know, perhaps for a photo mission we followed the railroad. It had been blasted to pieces in so many parts. You know the Trans Indochina railway had been one of the French great claims of accomplishment in that area. It took them about forty years to build it and they bragged constantly about it and here it was, wrecked. While I didn't see North Vietnam, one wondered what the situation could have been like up there where there had been even more intensive fighting.

Q: So Bill, you are back in the fall of 1962 and you decide that you and your bride will be going off to Vietnam?

MARSH: To put a fine point on it, Vlad, we did not oppose a decision by the Department that that should be the case. So in January I began the study of Vietnamese with your good self.

Q: January of 1963?

MARSH: That's right.

Q: Briefly speaking. In January of 1963, how was it to learn Vietnamese? How long did it last and how much did you learn?

MARSH: Of course, I would be delighted to get your views on this subject, but mine are these. First of all, I come from a musical family and the simplest way to teach tones would have been to note them musically, so I did that. I went to our so-called supervisors there and said, "You know, anybody who can read music, look, I've marked this on the scale for you." They laughed me to derision. This just wasn't the way it was done. Later I helped other people by telling them, "Oh, well, that's a perfect fourth interval" and that sort of thing. In any event the instructors and the so-called linguists at the program conducted a very, very limited sort of instructional curriculum.

Whereas in Japan there had been regular appearances by Mrs. Jorden, who had told us something of Japanese grammar and syntax and usage and the like. And how these things related to the culture and why therefore there are the three politeness levels in Japanese and that sort of thing, we never had that kind of briefing which in Japan I had found exceedingly useful. But we never had that sort of thing. The linguists instead would concentrate on teaching us how to form certain sounds. This was not very comprehensible, the way they were doing that.

I remember one linguist was trying to explain one particular “o” sound by asking if anybody had ever been to Oklahoma. Since I was married to a native of Oklahoma I could make that sound. He said, “That is very good, will everybody else imitate that?” Well, you know you put intelligent people in a room and try to make parrots out of them. This is not exactly the best way.

Secondly, as far as substantive preparation for an assignment in Vietnam, I don’t know. We were supposed to read the newspaper, I think, and we were supposed to intuit the rest. But there was no well-prepared program of briefings or something of that sort.

Q: I wanted to get to that. Let me just ask, when you finished the course were you able to speak any Vietnamese?

MARSH: Sort of. In the first place in an extremely irregular language I found regional variations very pronounced and very strong. I would say I used French as much or more than I used Vietnamese when I was there. Incidentally, you’ll recall you were supposed to have, well, my partner, John Burke, and I were supposed to have three months in Saigon following the six months we had in Washington.

The tones were never a problem for me. Vocabulary was a problem because vocabulary varied from place to place and I’ll never forget that sometimes people in Vietnam, when I spoke with them, would light up with joy and other times would look completely foggy, like what is this strange person from the United States trying to say? So it was a very irregular sort of thing.

I think the program probably should have been at least one year long.

Q: One year long. A long time.

MARSH: And I would have divided it fifty-fifty between Washington and Saigon. Moreover I would have privatized the program and that would have been complete submergence somewhere. Now you and I both met those who had been to the brief program offered at Monterey by the Army. That was ludicrous, that program.

Q: That was a listening program, for listening to pilots basically, I believe.

Bill, let me skip to something you touched on and that is the substantive preparation for some area studies and briefings. Let me just ask generally, before you left what had you learned about Vietnam, what were your impressions of it, and whom had you met who was active on the Vietnam scene in Washington at that time?

MARSH: First of all it's necessary to plan. There was a great deal of turmoil about Vietnam policy at that time.

Q: We're speaking here about 1962, 1963.

MARSH: Early '63. Now when I say early '63, I am deliberately marking off the territory before the great Buddhist uprising against Ngo Diem which began in the spring of 1963. There were those at the desk, Paul Kattenburg foremost among them, who took some forthright exception to the emergent Vietnam policy of the U.S.

I learned more about that controversy far later than I did at the time, because at the time there was really no discussion of pros and cons, assets and liabilities, for those of us. We all had Top Secret security clearances, but nobody was saying these are the risks, these are the vulnerabilities, and these are the potential gains and so forth. There was never that sort of thing. Instead much of it was couched in European terms and particularly the Secretary of State brought up Munich 1938 time and time and time again.

Q: This was Dean Rusk?

MARSH: Dean Rusk. And our actions in Indochina became derivative of the global strategic effort.

Q: You mean the Cold War effort?

MARSH: That's so.

Q: Did anybody bring up Korea in that context?

MARSH: Korea was not a very popular subject, as a matter of fact, because Korea, of course, had ended inconclusively. Nobody wanted to make that point.

Q: It had begun in ambiguity.

MARSH: The ambiguity and the pain.

Q: Not our defense perimeter.

MARSH: And the pain of it. Because those who served, the best man in my wedding, for example, had been a Marine on the retreat from the Reservoir and he had lots of things to say about the terrible suffering in that winter weather of 1950. So this was not some glorious expedition, which you would use. Instead what you would point to, you would point to such things as the restoration of the Shah in 1953, and the overthrow of Arbenz in 1954, that sort of thing. Where the United States acted decisively in the interior of a country, in internal affairs, as it were.

Q: Bill, did you have a clear, summarized policy sense of what America was doing in Vietnam as you were about to go over there and work on that program?

MARSH: There was a slogan.

Q: What was the slogan?

MARSH: The slogan was couched negatively. And the slogan was that we were to assist the South Vietnamese to prevent their takeover by the Communist North Vietnamese. So a preventive strategy, a defensive strategy, a limited strategy.

Q: Diem had been in office since 1955.

MARSH: Well, as President since '56.

Q: As President since '56. What was the policy at that time? When you were going over there did we have a sink or swim with Ngo Dinh Diem policy?

MARSH: Of course that policy emerged much later, once considerable differences of opinion had arisen. But President Truman began the policy of support for the French at the time of the Korean War, in 1950. There had been a continuous policy of provision of materiel and training and political support since 1950. First for the French and then, of course, Geneva came along in 1954.

Q: By the time you were getting ready in early 1963, was there still a sink or swim with Ngo Dinh Diem policy?

MARSH: Clearly.

Q: Clearly.

MARSH: You'll recall that Vice President Johnson had made a trip to the Far East and had hailed Ngo Diem as the Winston Churchill of Asia. Moreover we had been providing rather considerable support since 1961, fairly early in the Kennedy Administration, that is. Then, 1961, which was a year of setbacks, what with the Berlin Wall and what with the Bay of Pigs, all sorts of things. The Laos situation turning so sour. The focus got narrower and narrower and narrower in Asia until it centered on Vietnam.

Q: It centered on Vietnam.

Bill, when did you go there?

MARSH: I arrived in July of 1963. My welcoming committee at the airport consisted of Dick Holbrooke and Tony Lake!

Q: That's interesting, what were those folks doing?

MARSH: They were....

Q: Were they friends of yours from language training?

MARSH: From language training, that's correct.

Q: So they just came out to meet you.

MARSH: They came out to meet me.

Q: Or were they your official greeters?

MARSH: They came out to meet Ruth, my wife, and me. They took us to a house. It was very dark and there was a curfew because of the Buddhist uprising. The main pagoda was four blocks away and it was surrounded by troops and we had an icebox that was stocked with a bottle of milk, a bottle of gin, and some beer.

Q: This was what they had stocked for you and Ruth?

MARSH: No, the embassy had done that, as a matter of fact.

Q: Bill, correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't that a rather innovative and considerate way to greet a newly arriving couple, some milk, some gin...

MARSH: I supposed so. Incidentally, something that was consistent throughout my three years in Vietnam, I didn't have a phone.

Q: You didn't have a phone?

MARSH: Never had a phone in Vietnam at my residence, no, never had a residential phone.

Q: Let me just back up for a moment. You said that you were met at the airport by Richard Holbrooke and Anthony Lake, who continue to be very interested in government and one of whom was a national security advisor, another one of whom has done all sorts of things with both diplomacy and business. What were those fellows doing at that time?

MARSH: They were on their first tours, really, and they were doing rotational assignments, as I recall. Each of them later on became a sort of aide-de-camp to ambassadors and that sort of thing and at the same time traveled around the country. Incidentally, before we get to Vietnam there are a couple of things to signal.

First of all, I was told back in the Department that I was to be consul in Nha Trang on the central coast. That did not come to pass, and then when I was given passport and tickets there was nothing provided for my wife, no orders. The reason was that I wasn't married, they maintained.

And here we go again, this error. Something happened to the Dependency Statements filed in 1962, they never made it. This problem lasted for a decade, trying to get tickets and passports.

Q: Bill, in other words, for a decade after you had gotten married you kept having to prove that you were married to get travel orders?

MARSH: That is correct. One time when I protested that while my wife was in safehaven in Bangkok she had had our first son and how could they say I wasn't married and a supernumerary at the Department told me by phone, "Sir, it isn't necessary to be married to have a child."

Q: Well, that is a wonderful story. I'm glad you took us back there. You just took us to before you had arrived.

MARSH: Before I had arrived. That's right. But I managed to get there somehow or other, maybe just to shut me up they gave me a passport and orders. However when it came time to leave Asia, there were no orders or passport or tickets for my wife, we had to go through that argument all over again.

In any event we arrived in Saigon and there was considerable turmoil, a very unsettled situation for several reasons. First the local political situation with the Buddhists in open revolt and full repression practiced by the Diem government, and secondly because we had a change of ambassadors and clearly a change in policy.

Q: We've arrived in Saigon, it is July of 1963, and you were just saying that there were two things going on which added to the confusion. One was a situation involving Buddhists and another was a change in American ambassadors. Could you share a little bit of the Buddhist situation first of all at that time, as background?

MARSH: The Buddhist situation had been simmering for quite some time but really boiled over in Hue in May, I think it was, of 1963. Now Hue had special resonance because Central Vietnam was the homeland of President Ngo Dinh Diem, and Hue was the see of his brother, the Archbishop, Archbishop Thuc. There was a repression, and it was a bloody repression, of some Buddhist demonstrations and yet another brother of President Diem, Ngo Dinh Nhu, and particularly the latter's wife, Tranh Le Xuan, were hard-liners. We subsequently learned that Ngo Dinh Nhu was double-dealing. But at that time not many of us knew it, if any of us knew that, as a matter of fact because Ngo was extending his lines to the North Vietnamese by the Vietcong, the Vietnamese communists.

So international attention focused on this when there were several immolations by Buddhist bonzes, or priests. The press drawn to Vietnam by the increasing American involvement in the affairs of that country had something sensational to photograph and to report upon that could be very meaningful to the American public as a whole. After all, that you arm so many hamlets or that you prepare the defenses of so many provinces is pretty tame stuff, but martyrs were something quite different. So that was the Buddhist situation.

Now, when we arrived in July of 1963, Ambassador Nolting was already preparing his departure, in fact did so in mid July, and Ambassador Lodge had been named to the post. For the younger listeners, readers, we should point out that Lodge was, after all, the Vice Presidential candidate opposite Lyndon B. Johnson's vice presidential candidacy only three years previously. So this was quite remarkable.

Q: This was a bi-partisan gesture.

MARSH: It was a bi-partisan gesture.

Q: By a president who hated Mr. Lodge, I suspect.

MARSH: By a President who had seen in Mr. Lodge everything the President's father had had to contend with over many years in the Boston area. So that it was a case of opposites attracting. Yes, indeed, as a matter of fact.

Q: So, Bill, had you had a chance to work with Ambassador Nolting at all before he left?

MARSH: I met him. He was a very approachable man, but again I was in there in the capacity of a student, studying in Vietnamese. But a member of my FSO entering class had been his staff aide and so he took me in to meet the ambassador and we talked and all that sort of thing.

Now there was a policy shift that was imminent. Ambassador Nolting had been identified, rightly or wrongly, probably erroneously, as with Ngo Dinh Diem, sink or swim, up or down. So it was clear that a tougher line was coming in with Ambassador Lodge. Why else would the President name the man he had unseated 11 years previously in order to get to the Senate? Why would he invite him if we were going to continue with the same old thing? From the arrival of Ambassador Lodge in August of 1963 until the coup d'etat of November 1, 1963, there was great speculation as to what the Lodge appointment meant and what this mean in particular for President Diem.

Q: Before we get into this period, let me ask a little about the American embassy at that time. When you arrived you went and met a lot of people, can you describe what that embassy was, who was there, who was who at that time?

Who was the deputy chief of mission?

MARSH: The deputy chief of mission was Bill Truehart at that time. Mel Manfull was the political counselor. Richardson was the station chief, CIA, and was a particular target of Madam Nhu.

Q: John Richardson?

MARSH: I think so, yes, I believe so. But that wasn't, frankly Vlad, that wasn't what caught my attention.

Q: What caught your attention?

MARSH: Now the thing I want to describe for you it is necessary to hark back ten years previously when I saw a very large military presence in Japan. I saw bases with tens of thousands of people on them and so forth. But I never saw so many U.S. military relative to the civilian population as in Saigon. They seemed to be everywhere and the Vietnamese, except at rush hours, seemed to be off the street but there were hordes it appeared of military there.

Q: This was in mid 1963?

MARSH: That's so, and there were at that time about 18,000 American military in the country. Now 18,000 would be the equivalent of about 250,000 Vietnamese in the United States, something like that.

Q: Concentrated?

MARSH: Very largely concentrated. They were building an enormous headquarters staff there.

Q: What was that? Was that the MAAG, the Military Assistance Group?

MARSH: The MACV, the Military Assistance Command-Vietnam. That's right.

Q: That was the second of the two? First there was a MAAG, then there was a MACV.

MARSH: That is so. And they were already planning a MACV.

Q: And they couldn't stand each other, as I recall.

MARSH: There were problems but very soon the MAAG was incorporated into the MACV which became a full military Command, it just had hordes of people. For example, where I worked for two and a half years was the Provincial Reporting Unit. There were seven of us provincial reporters and the military set up a unit just to process our reports, nothing else, with 58 people in it.

Q: I was in that unit with you, Bill, and I never knew that until today! You're saying that the military set up a unit to process the reports produced by provincial reporting?

MARSH: That is correct.

Q: Which had a total of...

MARSH: Seven.

Q: A total of seven persons. Amazing. Well, it certainly is attentive. Bill, you were impressed with the military presence at that time in Saigon?

MARSH: I was worried by it.

Q: You were worried by it.

MARSH: I was worried by it, to be perfectly frank with you. Let me again just recall something for the user's benefit here. I had been in local government work, albeit with a Foundation, but there was of necessity a heavy local political component of that work. So I had picked up certain sensitivities of which I really wasn't even fully aware. But what I want to say is, and many people have asked me, when did I first have a suspicion that things were not necessarily going to go according to plan. I would say it was within the first week I arrived. I had literally a physical sensation, a strange feeling in my stomach, and I didn't know what it was but just something seemed wrong, anomalous, and I wasn't quite sure what it was. That feeling didn't decline over the next few years.

Q: You were a student, you said, for the first three months in Vietnam?

MARSH: Yes, although I was pulled off to cover, if you please, for the embassy, that is for the embassy's security section, actions by the government troops at the Xa Loi which was about four blocks from where I was living, as I said.

Q: Was that where the so-called bonze barbecues had taken place?

MARSH: No, they had always taken place in town.

Q: In Saigon.

MARSH: Thus, for example, one took place in front of the Roman Catholic cathedral.

Q: In Saigon?

MARSH: That's right. These were calculated, you know, these immolations, to attract the maximum publicity and attention.

Q: I believe, Bill, there was a list of people who had volunteered to commit suicide in this fashion?

MARSH: That's correct.

Q: And the hierarchy allowed them to at that time.

MARSH: That is so.

Q: By the political Buddhist hierarchy to my understanding.

MARSH: That is so. The thing that was extraordinary is that there we are, outside the Xa Loi Pagoda and we've got representatives of the three Armed Services there, of the intelligence services, of the embassy, and all these American reporters. You almost had as many Americans as you had Vietnamese security forces at these pagodas. It was intrusion.

Q: It was a press event, wasn't it?

MARSH: It was a press event. It was a performance, is what it was, really a performance. There was a lot of shouting back and forth and occasionally there was some wielding of truncheons and that sort of thing, but on the whole I don't think that it was the cruelest thing imaginable, but then I didn't see everything.

At any rate when Ambassador Lodge arrived he decided he was going to reorganize the embassy.

Q: You were pulled out of your language training?

MARSH: No, I managed to take my language training but just before completing the language training they said that I would not be in the Provincial Reporting Unit as I had been told, instead I would be put in the Consular Section. I like music very much and so what I said actually is, "Like Mimi in 'La Bohème,' addio senza rancour... so long, no hard feelings." I said, just give me a ticket and send me back to the United States, I've had this training, we'll just write that off, I'm going to be in the Consular Section where I'll not be using Vietnamese. Let's just forget the whole scene, when can we leave, I'm sure Ruth will be delighted to go.

Incidentally, I did take a trip around Vietnam in October, about two weeks before the coup d'état, with my wife. I took her to Dalat and to Hue and to Nha Trang, so I took her to three very interesting places in Vietnam. One could still travel around by air relatively easily. And so we had seen the country and there we were in Saigon but what worried me to no small extent was that, first of all, everywhere we had to travel by day. At night all bets were off and we were confined whether we traveled or whether we remained in Saigon, to the city.

Q: This was travel outside of town or travel within the town of Saigon?

MARSH: Outside of town, but outside of town was rather severely drawn. For example, suburban areas were off limits. Gia Dinh Province, which was to the northeast of Saigon, no, no, no you didn't do that. We went up to Dalat and that is where we met the head of USOM, the AID mission, and his wife, who were at the same hotel we were. He suggested a place that we would go to dinner called La Savoisiennien, run by two old French women who'd been there for donkeys years and it was a little bit out of town. To my horror, we went through a Vietcong roadblock.

Q: With the AID director?

MARSH: With the AID director.

Q: Who was the AID director?

MARSH: I don't recall, to tell you the truth, I really don't remember. But I'll never forget that. He seemed oblivious to the whole thing but I knew what it was because I did catch a few words, at that time. We are talking October of 1963. But believe me this was not very far from the center of Dalat at all, but it was at night. But we went and we had a very good dinner and we came back and the roadblock had disappeared. It had moved on someplace else.

Q: Did the roadblock stop you? Did they chat with you a little bit?

MARSH: They sort of waved us through. I think at that time the Vietcong were not particularly interested in having any contretemps with westerners.

Q: At this time you say there were about 18,000 or more American forces, but they are not combat forces?

MARSH: They are not combat forces.

Q: They were an advisory effort?

MARSH: They were strictly training, an advisory effort, plus they were cadre for an eventual massive effort. Thus I remember, for example, meeting a Major whose job it was to go over the Vietnam railway to see if it would handle tanks. I happened to meet him in the officer's club in Nha Trang one time. I said to him that of course it would not handle tanks. In the first place it is full of tunnels and this is a narrow gauge line and very lightweight rail and you would never get through it. He said, "Please, please, don't tell my superiors. This has been a very nice trip."

Q: Fascinating. So we are back after three months of language training punctuated by some work that you have described with security, and other issues, what did you then do?

MARSH: Well, I was put in the external side, external political affairs, but briefly. I was there for about a month or two and then put into the Provincial Reporting program.

Q: Bill, can you describe that program?

MARSH: The notion of the program was that officers trained in the Vietnamese language would circulate throughout the country, spending a week or so in a given provincial capital. Getting down with the U.S. military in those capitols, but working pretty largely with the Vietnamese, the province chief, district chiefs, provincial governments, local notables, Buddhist, Catholics, Cao Dai, what have you. And then spend the next week in Saigon writing up a report on that particular province as to how things were moving.

I think that initially the idea was to try to keep a finger on the pulse of the sects and the Buddhists in Vietnam. Now remember there were a number of dissident sects, Cao Dai, Binh Xuyen, and so forth, as well as the majority Buddhist population. But Buddhists varied greatly, that's a term of art. Those of Hue had little in common with those in the Delta and in the mountains.

Then in addition we were supposed to keep an eye on the various ethnic minorities in the country, the Cham, the Montagnards, etc., and my special assignment, because I had strong French, was to keep an eye on what the French were up to. Everyone was very suspicious at that time of the de Gaulle government, and in fact the French were considered hostile to us because whether due to their smarting from their wounds and their expulsion from the area and their resistance to the 'Yankification' of Indochina, I don't know. But in any event I remember there was a distinctly hostile air coming out of Washington with respect to the French.

Now incidentally a number of those who had served in the embassy in Saigon, such as Nolting, Truehart, Manfull, and others were old Paris hands. They were regarded as rather Francophile and French sympathizers and they were replaced in later years with those of Asian experience, rather than those with European experience so that they would not be seen as doing service to the old colonial masters.

Q: Bill that is a very interesting point. Let us go back for a minute to folks like Truehart, Manfull and others. Do you think they were there because they knew French and it was at one point or another a French-speaking post? Why do you think they wound up there?

MARSH: I guess probably that was the case. But also because they were people who could appreciate the significance in Asian security of the French-speaking countries of Indochina. You'll recall that SEATO was in operation, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, and the French were members. These were people who could keep an eye on things. Later the sort of favored country became the United Kingdom, namely because of its success, or perceived success, in Malaya. But under very different terms, of course.

If we had in the '50s and early '60s, French advisors and confidential sources among the French, we later tended to have British policemen. Thompson for example, who had been the chief of police in Malaya, and so on, and others who passed through Saigon and went on to Washington. President Nixon, for example, made great use of Sir Robert Thompson from Malaya.

Q: I remember meeting him. Yes.

MARSH: But there is one strong current in our policy that probably bears mention at this time and that is that there was a fascination on the part of the President, President Kennedy, with the guerrilla mystique. This meant that Indo-China, particularly Vietnam, was to be a proving ground for America's capability to conduct anti-guerrilla operations and to counter what was seen as the spreading Chinese evangelism of guerrilla movements.

It seems to me that this was very simplistic and I thought so at the time because the Chinese Revolution was due to an awful lot more things than presumed friendliness between the peasant and the guerrilla soldier.

But this business that the people are the sea in which the fish, the guerrilla swim, all that sort of thing. We had these slogans all of the time. Now the answer to that problem perceived by President Kennedy and his brother, the Attorney General and later Senator from New York, in no small part the answer was to have been U.S. Special Forces. It was assumed that they could serve as Western guerrillas, moving through the countryside, joining forces with the people and so forth. This idea was totally erroneous.

But later on when I was briefing on a fairly regular basis Senator Kennedy, in his office, his first question was always, “How are the Special Forces doing?”

Q: This was some years later?

MARSH: Yes that’s right. But it was an abiding fascination and I think it was kind of a premature Rambo syndrome that we had here, that heroic virtues were the answer to these great revolutionary problems.

Q: Bill, at that time did you find yourself reading any of the classics of counter-insurgency or guerrilla warfare?

MARSH: I already had.

Q: I had, too. Can you elaborate on that because there was quite a cult of those books at that time?

MARSH: Well, first of all, I read “Sun Tsu,” which is what, the 11th or 12th century, something of that sort, on the art of war. I read everything Bernard Fall ever wrote.

Q: This was when you were in Vietnam or before?

MARSH: Before.

Q: So in other words you had, let’s just skip back for a minute, area preparation? While you said it wasn’t very strong, you had basically done a lot of reading?

MARSH: Well, I tried to find out as much about the country as possible because I wasn’t getting anything at the Foreign Service Institute or from the desk. I wanted to know what the place was like. Now as far as American policy was concerned that always remained foggy. As long as I was attached with Vietnam it was a foggy kind of thing and that you were largely supposed to intuit what to do.

Q: That’s very interesting. So you read Bernard Fall, Street Without Joy?

MARSH: Oh, yes.

Q: Various Fall writings? Anyone else?

MARSH: Malraux. Quite a few things. Anything I could put my hands on, because it was fascinating and it was obviously a darkening, gathering storm.

Q: Yes. Yes. Bill, you mentioned that at that time for a lot of people in Washington Vietnam was among other things a proving ground for counter-guerrilla warfare, counter-insurgency. How did that fit in to what you began to do then with the Provincial Reporting Unit?

MARSH: Well, I had some advantages that others of my peers did not have. I had been in the military and had some familiarity with military processes in thinking and approaches and that sort of thing. On the other hand, one of the most impressive things throughout this whole effort was to meet those junior FSOs, Foreign Service officers, and your good name is foremost among them, who had not been in the military. But FSOs who really had tremendous sense and sensitivity to military situations, and to tactical as well as strategic considerations. I was terribly impressed.

For example, Richard Teare, who was a member of the staff, had never served in the military but could go into a Province and then write an absolutely brilliant report on the vulnerabilities of that Province in the military sense. The problem was that our American military colleagues could not accept this. Now I can recall that later, when Ambassador Taylor had arrived - Ambassador Taylor had, of course, an immense prestige, an immense reputation - we really had titans as ambassadors there in Lodge, Taylor, Lodge and Bunker, I think we had the best you could possibly provide - but it was inconceivable for Ambassador Taylor that civilians could analyze military situations. It was just totally inconceivable because he was of a priesthood that could not admit the laity to these mysteries, if you will. How do I know that? He told us so; that he couldn't understand us making military judgments. That seemed completely wrong. What we did was analyze, use our heads, sense and talk to a lot of people at a lot of different ranks, enlisted lower-field grade and senior, both Vietnamese and American.

In any event, one had to be an autodidact, one had to teach oneself here because the preparation for service in Vietnam was not very considerable.

Q: Bill, the Provincial Reporting Unit, who was in charge of that unit at that time? Were you in charge of it?

MARSH: No, later I was. The first chief was James Rosenthal.

Q: James D. Rosenthal.

MARSH: James D. Rosenthal, an extraordinary public servant in my view and a very close friend and a great man and I know you regard him very highly as well.

Q: Who else was with you, Bill, who were your colleagues?

MARSH: We had David Engel, whose efforts, I would like to put on record, whose efforts for many years went unrewarded by the Service, a self-effacing kind of man but whose contributions were colossal. We had John Negroponte, who became Assistant Secretary of State and ambassador to Mexico and the Philippines, and other places, Honduras.

So we had people who did quite well afterwards. We would have had you, but you were out of reach, you were no fool. You didn't put yourself in our clutches. You were with AID.

I want to put this on record, that when anybody disparages the Foreign Service, I don't tolerate it I point out the work that you and your peers did for another agency, in an unfamiliar situation, with great security problems and so forth, and it was brilliant. Your work was brilliant, absolutely brilliant. For example, Rob Warne, in the Delta, yourself, others, amazing what those young officers, but who were well educated and terribly devoted, accomplished - really, my hat is off to you all.

Q: Bill, in provincial reporting, which provinces did you spend time in?

MARSH: At first I was assigned to those in central Vietnam, and later I took those around the Saigon area. When I became the head of the unit, I was with those around the Saigon area because, after all, rank has its privileges, right? And I wanted to have less traveling. The traveling up to central Vietnam was pretty hairy and the Delta was never an area that interested me very much. Not because it was so infested with communist forces, which was true, but because the dustiness of the place in the dry season made my sneezing so intense that I couldn't talk to people, I was too busy using my handkerchief, so I stayed out of there. I did visit, of course, the Delta to a certain extent and went the length and breadth of the country.

The uplands, the highlands, I also had a dust problem up there. In those days I had considerable sensitivity to that sort of thing so I wanted to stay as close to salt water as I could.

Q: Right. So you were going around central Vietnam?

MARSH: Yes that is right. Remember, we had a consulate in Hue at that time, so the upper three provinces were looked after by our consulate in Hue. I came into the picture a province or two north of Nha Trang and down the coast a couple of provinces, and so forth. A center of considerable conflict between the Catholic and Buddhist populations, the place from which the later President of Vietnam had come.

Q: This was Nguyen Binh Thieu, the later president?

MARSH: Yes that's correct, he was from that area. And, moreover, Nha Trang had considerable strategic significance because of its magnificent harbor.

Q: They were also beautiful places, Bill, aren't they?

MARSH: Well...that was not...I appreciated that very much, but I gave that up in order to move down around the Saigon area.

Q: One personal question at that time, you were married and family still with you? Was Ruth, your wife, still with you?

MARSH: Well, when we arrived in Vietnam... first of all, we were told we would have a two-year tour, and we would never see Vietnam again. And so I would enjoy my two years as consul in Nha Trang and then would have a nice home leave and would never see the place again. Very soon after we arrived there was arbitrary extension of the tour to three years and of course the Nha Trang option was taken away. But for that matter the assignment was going to be completely changed to make a consular officer out of me, rather than a field officer and I didn't want that. Well, I did get the fieldwork, and we were there for three years with a home leave at 18 months. That home leave came in February of 1965. Ruth was with me. We had planned to go around the world. We were sitting in a restaurant in Oklahoma one day and were told that the President was on television and announced the departure of the families from Vietnam.

Q: So you were okay, right? By then, Bill, you had a son already?

MARSH: No, no, no. On this home leave we had reached Oklahoma, where my wife's parents lived, and we went on to Washington. It was there she learned she was pregnant with our first child. So what we sought from the Department was advice: should we go to safehaven, should we leave her there in the United States, what exactly should we do? And we couldn't get any advice.

Q: Bill, what did you wind up doing? What did Ruth wind up doing?

MARSH: I gave Ruth the option and we continued round the world and we dropped her off in Bangkok.

Q: In March of 1965? Or February of '65?

MARSH: In April of '65.

Q: April of '65. And she was there as a dependent in safehaven?

MARSH: That is correct.

Q: Were there others from Vietnam? From Saigon, who had joined in that program?

MARSH: There were quite a few and far more than the embassy in Bangkok found comfortable.

Q: Did they get housing?

MARSH: No, they had to find it.

Q: They had to find it...they had an allowance?

MARSH: No.

Q: No. Okay. It was a self-help project.

MARSH: Yes, quite.

Q: Was it coming out of your pocket, Bill?

MARSH: That is correct, so was the fare between Saigon and Bangkok. Later on, years later, they instituted a paid fare for people to go back and forth.

Q: Correct me if I'm wrong, but I think at that time Emily Lodge, Henry Cabot Lodge's wife, also moved out of Saigon and went to Bangkok.

MARSH: She did and she was wonderful to the Saigon wives, and particularly to mine. They got along very, very well. Ambassador Lodge invited Dick Holbrooke and me and some others to go with him on the jet that was provided for him to go over to Bangkok to see his wife.

Q: Because you and Dick and others had dependents that were there. I imagine quite a lot of folks.

MARSH: That's right. But he was close to us, we were in the embassy, he knew us and that sort of thing. So he was very kind, very, very kind.

Q: That's terrific.

MARSH: But the safehaven arrangements made by the Department were woefully inadequate, more non-existent than actual and Embassy Bangkok was quite unhelpful.

Q: Were they friendly?

MARSH: No.

Q: You weren't terribly welcome, is what you are saying.

MARSH: Well, the thing that I have forgiven but can never forget was that when my wife went into labor she had tried to get in touch with the Thai who drove for her at the hotel where he usually hung out, and she couldn't reach him. She was into frequent contractions and called the embassy and asked if they could send her to get to the hospital in an embassy car. You will recall the notoriety of Bangkok traffic. It is even worse today, but it was horrible then. She didn't get transportation; she got a lecture from the general services officer that Saigon wives were not supposed to bother Embassy Bangkok and were supposed to look after their own matters. So she managed to get a taxi and she arrived at the Bangkok Nursing Home Hospital in Bangkok barely in time, and the gentleman who dealt with her in such an unthinking way later rose to very high rank in the Department.

Q: Bill, on the principle that good deeds shouldn't remain unpunished, who was this gentleman?

MARSH: De mortuis nil nisi bonam (of the dead, nothing but good).

Q: Okay, point taken. Shall we go back a little to the provinces?

MARSH: Yes, let's do that.

Q: We're back to the provinces, Bill.

MARSH: This was very interesting work, I must say, extremely interesting work. It was totally unstructured. We identified what was worthy of reporting or not, whom we would see, we were totally on our own with no supervision out there in the field. Now we had certain general guidelines from the embassy, to be sure, but if we decided we would see X or Y or Z, usually there were no requirement that we call back the embassy for permission. Not everything was a referendum, we had considerable initiative and got around and it was very interesting. It was also an exposure to danger that I never had in the military.

Q: Fascinating, fascinating.

MARSH: I'm sure you as well as I have driven over mined roads. I'm sure you as well as I had been in a town encircled by Vietcong in a night attack. I'm sure you as well as I had been very, very close to a napalm retaliatory attack by U.S. forces. This was something.

Now, the gods were with me in that I was asked to delay my home leave in 1965 by a couple of weeks because John Negrofonte, who was working for me, wanted to go off on a trip. I was furious because I had everything planned and I had to recast everything. Well, what it meant was that I was away when the embassy was subjected to a terrorist attack.

Q: That was March of 1965.

MARSH: That was March 30th of 1965, and I happened to be in Athens at that time.

Q: It got bombed?

MARSH: And it got bombed, that is correct.

Q: I was out of town, too. I was out of the country.

MARSH: I think you and I, as glasses wearers, were particularly lucky not to be there because a number of people lost their eyesight as a consequence of that explosion. The doctor in the CIA, you'll recall, was blinded. He was looking out to see what all the excitement was about outside.

Q: It was considered lucky at that time, Bill, if you didn't have a window view or if you were facing away from the window.

MARSH: That's right. That is correct.

Q: You would have some shards in the back of your scalp, as did Mel Levine. I remember Mel Levine had to have surgery for the back of his head to have the glass pieces taken out.

MARSH: Yes. And Jim Rosenthal, our leader of the Provincial Reporting Unit, was badly cut in the face. It was very bad. But those people all were given magnificent treatment by the embassy. The embassy gave them one day off. One day off!

Q: Yes. Well, it sounds like a health maintenance organization these days, dealing with someone's delivery of a child.

MARSH: May I comment about that incident?

Q: Oh, of course, Bill. We have about a minute left.

MARSH: There had been a report, an intelligence report, of an impending attack. Someone suggested putting back the concrete barriers that had stood in front of the embassy to prevent traffic from coming and the decision was taken at very high level that this was nonsense, and we were not going to be cowed by this sort of thing.

Q: Amazing.

MARSH: So, the Vietcong drove right into the lobby.

Q: ...drove right into the lobby. At this point, let's take a break and we'll resume this very soon.

This is December 30, 1997. This is a continuation of an interview with Mr. William H. Marsh.

Bill, Happy New Year. Last time we talked we had discussed work in Saigon that you were doing. We discussed provincial reporting. You had quite a lot of interesting stuff in that regard and then we came up to the very dramatic moment of March 30, 1965, when the American embassy was badly bombed. You were luckily out of the country. At that point we stopped.

Bill, what were you doing after that, what is the next sequence of events?

MARSH: First, Happy New Year to you, Vlad. It's good to be with you and is indeed like old times.

Upon returning to the embassy in early April of 1965 from a home leave which itself had been charged with emotion in that while we were in Oklahoma, President Johnson ordered out the families so that we knew that my wife could not return to Saigon. We reached Washington to find out that she was pregnant with our first child, and we had to stop at Bangkok on the way back in order to get her established. I left her pregnant in the Oriental Hotel in Bangkok with two cotton dresses and no place to live. So it's an unsung story of heroism which I think deserves to be mentioned because spouses get very little, very little appreciation from the Foreign Service and from the Department generally.

In any event, to return to the shattered embassy, where my desk was under a pile of rubble and where there were two large boxes on that desk. We had ordered some hurricane lamps from Neiman-Marcus and they had been sent. I was just going to pick them up and toss them out but I didn't hear any tinkle of glass. I opened them and they were in perfect condition. We used them for years. I wrote Stanley Marcus and said he would never believe what a packing department he had. I got back a very nice letter from him saying they get a lot of gripes, but this was the first time they had ever gotten praise like that.

In any event, we got our lives reestablished. It was really like an entirely new tour because it was now a bachelor tour; it was now obviously a wartime tour. The explosion I think had finally dispelled any pretense that we were there to look after civil action or police action, or anything of that sort. Incidentally, the powers that be in the embassy had given all of those who had experienced the explosion a day off. One day off. Which was certainly generous, wasn't it!

At any rate we then set up the work. Jim Rosenthal had been the Head of Provincial Reporting and he left in early summer. So then I became Head of Provincial Reporting and remained Head of Provincial Reporting for the next, oh, nine or 10 months, something of that sort. I had to reorganize. We had an increasingly massive American military presence and the beginnings of American military intervention, if you will, starting in the fall of 1965.

Now there was something that happened then, in the fall, that we did not assess properly, I think. That was that the American desire for a classical battlefield confrontation with the Vietcong and North Vietnamese forces was granted. This in the Ia Drang Valley, and American forces were defeated, in effect, at that time. This had a great influence on the U.S. military, I believe, but we did not have the feeling, the full assessment of that. One of the things was that we really were not accompanying U.S. military forces on military operations. Now right at this point...

Q: Which battle was this?

MARSH: Ia Drang... the Ia Drang Valley. That was a pitched battle and American forces came off second best with heavy losses. Before the military, or military historians, or whoever may be listening to this start reaching for their war-clubs, I should say I am not suggesting a system of political commissars. But I am saying that when you have a war which has mixed civilian and military elements, and in which civilians and diplomats at that are supposed to be doing reporting, providing full coverage of these sorts of things, there should be at least sampling for those civilians on military operations.

Now you, Vlad, and I, both had experience of small scale, small unit stuff out in the Provinces. I'm sure that you had the experience that I had in Ham Nghia Province, just west of Saigon. They handed me a weapon and said I would have to use it as the Vietcong surrounded us. They had called in an air strike but I might have to fight off attackers at this compound. This was in the middle of the night. I'm sure you had experiences of that sort.

But at the level of field grade officers out in the field, we did have that opportunity to observe military situations. At more senior levels, and with larger units, we did not and that's a pity because we did not really get the full measure of what was happening in Vietnam with the American effort. Namely, that the American military power was proving inefficacious there.

So we did our reporting. I may have mentioned the work of Richard Teare, who was one of the fellows on my staff and how he had done a very honest report of the vulnerabilities of a certain province. The military wouldn't clear it. Phil Habib, the political counselor, asked him to go back and do another assessment and see if he had done everything right - and he couldn't land at the provincial capital because the Vietcong had overrun the air field and occupied it! But that didn't influence the Military Assistance Command-Vietnam at all.

Now one experience of mine, two in fact, seemed to me demonstrate the problems that we had confronting a major general staff operation. The first was, at a time that I was acting consul in Hue, I was called up to the Ben Hai River which was the boundary, you'll recall, between North and South Vietnam. U.S. Navy aircraft bombing had destroyed the bridge over that river. The Canadian members of the International Control Commission had signaled this to me. I got there at once, looked it over. The bridge was in ruins. I got on the phone, called the embassy and said they should please get in touch with MACV because U.S. Navy aircraft had destroyed the famous bridge, which had great, symbolic importance, as you will recall. MACV's response to this when informed was (A) there were no U.S. Navy aircraft anywhere in that vicinity because they had been attacking Vinh, which was something like a hundred miles to the north, and (B) I deserved a reprimand because I shouldn't have been in the demilitarized zone there. I never did understand the latter and, of course, the former point was totally fallacious.

But they insisted that the bridge was intact and that there was absolutely no problem with them.

A second incident was rather interesting, I think. I went to see an old French planter in Phuoc Long Province, which was along the Cambodian border north of Saigon. He gave me a rather full accounting of how the Vietcong were raising considerable funds from the workers on rubber plantations. As the workers came up to draw their wages in cash from the table where he and the other employers sat there was a Vietcong agent who took a percentage off this for the cause's coffers. I wrote this up and got a query, ultimately, from MACV, how did I get there, since there was no military airfield? I said that I drove and MACV responded that was impossible, I could not have driven because the only road between the provincial capital and that plantation was heavily mined. My response was, sorry, I did go and was here to prove that I had made the trip successfully. In which case, once again, MACV said I deserved a reprimand.

Q: Bill, what you are saying, if I understand it, the point of Ben Hai and this second episode, is that when you get a very large command it doesn't know what is happening on the ground. Is that the moral of the story?

MARSH: Let me speak of a time, and there were numerous times, when I happened to participate in briefings of Secretary McNamara. As a matter of fact I accompanied Secretary McNamara, I believe earlier I mentioned how he insisted on using a Vietnamese phrase which he distorted and it became totally counterproductive. At any rate once again I was in a briefing and I happened to be sitting next to a Major Schweitzer, who later became a General and was at the White House. He was a very forthright man of very good but rather blunt reputation in speaking. He was listening at that time because provincial advisors had been brought in to brief McNamara and of course they did very little talking. It was the staff chiefs from MACV who did the talking to the Secretary of [Defense] and all these people were supposed to do was nod in agreement when things were said.

At one point Schweitzer leaned toward me and said, "Did you hear what he just said? He said the Vietcong in Binh Long Province has no mortar capability." Schweitzer said, "I've got a piece of the shell in my leg from a mortar." He went and took this up with MACV and they disallowed that it was a mortar, he was mistaken. So he didn't even know what had hit him, according to them. An interesting thing to me was that at one time field representatives of MACV were not authorized to receive combat pay, but the Saigon staff of MACV was.

These were distortions. It was difficult for us to know how to deal with them. And as a matter of fact the unprecedented nature of these sorts of problems meant that our superiors, our diplomatic superiors, didn't quite know how to deal with these matters. They found it difficult to give us guidance. Partly because they believed that we should have little guidance because if we were going to go out and report, we should not be biased in any respect by that. But it made it very difficult, frankly, to know what to look for and what was permissible and what was impermissible. Well, we soon learned.

First of all, Ambassador Taylor, Maxwell Taylor, as I mentioned before I believe, did not see a military reporting role for civilians. That was just totally unprofessional as far as he was concerned. Henry Cabot Lodge, on the other hand, who returned in 1965, believed very thoroughly in us and in our work and used and relied on us a great deal. I was there for the second tour of Henry Cabot Lodge.

We saw and learned a great deal, I think, and the difficulty came in transmitting this and then seeing it was useful to policy-makers, decision-makers. I remember, for example, the U.S. Division located west of Saigon, I think this was a little later but at any rate, I asked how many vehicles they had for the troops and was told there was a vehicle for every two. The Lieutenant General shocked me with that statement. I said, "I beg your pardon, there is a vehicle for every two men you have?" And he replied, "Yes, Americans don't walk, they drive." Well, that meant we were going to flood that country with materiel for by this time we had a quarter-million people in the country, you see. But Americans don't walk? Not even soldiers? Not even young men? No, they drive.

There were anomalies of that sort and it was very difficult to know how to put them all together. The confusions were manifest. I think one of the most important confusions that we saw was that in a war which was so inherently political in its compass and in its motivations, the U.S. military weren't quite sure how to provide guidance and to direct their own people. I remember once a conversation with General Westmoreland in which I said the troops had more money than some of them had ever seen in their lives before or were ever likely to see again. Could one not take the system used by the Peace Corps, which rather banks the volunteers' money and then gave it to them when they left? They were able to use that for school or to buy a house or make down payment on a house or an automobile or what have you.

Troops were going out with great enormous batches of money on R&R to Hong Kong and to Bangkok and buying a lot of junk and wasting money in bars and in general driving up prices all over the place. This had an inflationary impact on the economies out there that was not in accord with our war aims for that region. General Westmoreland thought that was a nifty idea and he checked with his people and they told him that it would be too demoralizing, we could not do that. I was struck by the fact that rather sadly he said, "You know, we should, but we can't."

Q: Interesting.

MARSH: Well, work was appreciated by at least one group. There were eight of us Provincial Reporters and MACV set up a Processing Unit. And the Processing Unit simply took our reports, processed them, reproduced them, sent them around the military chain of command and so forth and it was staffed with over fifty people. It had no reportorial, no editorial, functions whatsoever. It was strictly reproduction and distribution. Now that was very flattering to know that that would be done on that basis.

Now we, from '65, noticed that there was a tone of increasing desperation coming in. Foreign Service officers are pretty sophisticated people, or at least they used to be. When people are always talking about success instead of letting the events themselves proclaim the success there must be something wrong. It became a little suspicious. We heard this more and more urgently, about the supposedly growing light at the end of the tunnel, as Phil Habib heard when he went to the conference with President Johnson in Wake Island, I think it was, and so forth and so on. And we had success stories coming in all the time.

But as Henry Cabot Lodge said to some military briefers - and this was a man who had such enormous presence, such an aura about him and so forth, who could really put people in respect of him just by walking or standing nearby or that sort of thing - but at any rate he said in that wonderful Boston Brahmin accent, "General, I'm told there is significant progress made in reducing the Vietcong threat to Saigon, but I noticed that there is even more gunfire every night than there was during my first tour here. How is it then, that there has been such progress." And of course the response was a long, long, series of stutters on the part of the military briefer who could not do that."

Q: Bill, can I just go back, you said there was a tone of desperation that was noticeable by that point, in 1965, can you give some examples of that?

MARSH: The search for negotiations. I'm not sure how we got this, I think maybe we FSOs at the embassy in Saigon got it from osmosis, to tell you the truth. But we knew there was a very active search to undertake a negotiated settlement of matters. We also heard that there was a limitation on the amount of forces. We were going to put in another 50,000, another 100,000, but these would be brief and just as soon as we got things cleaned up out they'd come and that sort of thing. At the same time, oddly enough, the Secretary of State was saying, in effect, we are there for as long as it takes and to do whatever is required. So there is a little contradiction there in that kind of thing. But we had more and more and more visitors and we had an increasing confrontation with the press and you will recall that.

The press could find very little, very little, that was commendable in our effort out there, and a great deal that was condemnatory. I remember when the New York Daily News manufactured a story about Doug Ramsey, one of our colleagues, who was taken prisoner there and said that he was privy to the innermost secrets of the Mission Council and all of that kind of thing. We were shocked at the vindictiveness of the story and the sheer viciousness of it. And so we looked to Barry Zorthian of USIA and said, why isn't Joe Freed, the reporter, why isn't he just cut out of the pattern here. None of us would ever talk to him again. And Zorthian pleaded with us, no, no, no we had to try to keep on the good side of the press, we had to inform the public, blah, blah, blah, blah and we counter-argued that this man was not informing the public but misinforming it. He was harming our own colleagues in the process.

We got nowhere with that sort of thing and we said to ourselves there is desperation here. We were not even showing any real, masculine vigor in what we were doing here; we were kowtowing to everyone. Also we had experts running through Saigon constantly. Dr. Kissinger was there, Sir Robert Thompson came through to give us the benefit of his Malaya experience of the 1950s, although what that had to do with anything we were never quite sure. Then we had Bernard Fall and others who knew the French experience. Come one, come all! There was not a calm sense of assurance; there was a frenzy of trying every possible solution.

I remember the day that McNamara was told about the ramasseurs, these were the middlemen, mainly Chinese, who gathered the rice from individual farmers and then wholesaled it to the major urban markets in Vietnam or, in the old days, it was exported. But the ramasseurs were in a briefing and were suspected of diverting a certain amount of rice to the Vietcong. And McNamara said we would take over rice distribution, and we did! Actually it all fell back into the ramasseurs' hands, its just that you had an American seemingly directing it or distributing it or dealing with that kind of thing.

At any rate we were trying to build nationhood for South Vietnam and at the same time we're taking away one of their principal economic endeavors. I call this desperation. I think we all had this sense of unease at the way things were going, plus the fact that we were eating, sleeping, drinking Vietnam. We talked of nothing else. You will recall, Vlad, how we used to get together for dinner, a dozen of us, something of that sort, we'd go to somebody's house and we'd have drinks and then we'd have dinner. All night long we talked about nothing but Vietnam.

I can remember one time with Dick Holbrooke. I was saying for God's sake couldn't we discuss, you know, what was at the movies, or sex, whatever, anything. He looked at me and I'll never forget Dick's expression. He looked at me, curiously, as if to say "what's wrong with him" and went on with what was probably the fourth or fifth hour of a discussion among colleagues as to what was going on in Vietnam. And here again we were so obsessed that we didn't have "a life," as the kids would put it, today. We lost a life. And everything was like that. This was desperation; this was desperation, because things simply were not going according to plan.

By the way there is a magnificent story about Lord Carrington at Dunkirk in 1940, wading out to an evacuation ship. A man turned to Carrington and said, "Somehow I have the feeling that things are not going quite according to plan." We had that feeling, too.

Q: Bill, what happened next with your own professional activities.

MARSH: In the spring of 1966, Samuel Thomsen had been consul in Hue and had a very junior officer at the time, Jim Bullington, who later became an ambassador in Africa, at the consulate with him. Because of Sam's responsibilities with the Marines there, and because General Walt of the Marine Division really needed a political advisor, I was sent to Hue temporarily.

Now I was rather frantic because I had a matter of a few months before leaving Vietnam and I was desperately trying to get orders for myself but certainly also for my wife and son, who had been born by this time. The Department had not yet recognized that I was a married man. This stuff had been going on for years; we were now in the fourth year of this. They still couldn't get it straight that I was married. They could accept, however, that I had a son, but they couldn't accept that I was married!

In any event we are up there and the scene is percolating like nobody's business because we have the usual university riots, we have the usual Buddhist demonstrations, and at the same time we have intense activity on the part of the Vietcong and certain North Vietnamese forces. Though we are not broadcasting that fact, that they are present, but we know it full well. At one point I was witnessing, observing I should say, a demonstration of the Buddhists. I was standing out of sight, trying to be an inconspicuous as somebody 6'2" tall and 6'2" wide can be and a great flotilla of U.S. helicopters went overhead and disappeared to the north. Then about an hour later it reappeared with stretchers attached to the struts. You've seen that, I'm sure, Vlad, bringing back the American casualties and so forth. And of course the demonstrators paid absolutely no mind, any attention to this whatsoever.

I said to myself at the time that this was ridiculous. Here are people who are not involved in their own salvation; instead mercenaries are doing their work for them. Mercenaries is the wrong term because they were not even being paid for it, we were paying for it, as a matter of fact, and that sort of thing. Things were very bad and I recommended that the Consulate be closed. Well, I was at that time a relatively junior officer and they weren't going to take my word for it so they sent Tom Corcoran up. Now Tom Corcoran was the number two in the Political Section. He was the deputy to Phil Habib, and had replaced Bob Miller, who had been badly hurt in the embassy explosion. He had been deputy political counselor, a wonderful guy. Tom Corcoran, God rest his soul, he was a marvelous man and had served in every post the U.S. had ever had in Indo-China, as a matter of fact.

Q: He closed most of them down.

MARSH: He closed most of them down, that's right. And he recommended that Hue be closed down. He seconded what I had found. And of course they couldn't act on the thing and so the Buddhists closed it for us, as a matter of fact, by just closing off. Well, it's very difficult from a place like Hue to try to arrange your next assignment and it is also very difficult to try to get your family...

Q: We closed Hue and we closed your job?

MARSH: That's correct, at that time. That's right. But the Buddhists had already burned down the USIS building there, their offices, in Hue.

One story I have to tell you because it exemplifies the disorganization of the American effort. I was at my desk in Hue one day, trying to write the umpteen cables that had to go every day to Saigon to describe a rapidly deteriorating situation. A great Wagnerian lady burst into the room and she said she was from the Higher Education Division of AID, or at least she had been engaged by them to work on the academic programs at the University of Hue. I said, "Madam, the university is closed.” She peered over an impressive bosom at me and said, “Well, open it.”

Q: Oh, ye of little faith!

MARSH: Now how this woman had ever managed to come from the United States, and to pass through the AID offices in Saigon, and get a plane and come up to Hue I will never understand. But on the other hand, I could never understand encountering at certain battles that I did attend American tourists. And no necessarily adventuresome kids, young people, sometimes rather mature people who decided to go out and see the war themselves. It reminded me a bit of what apparently happened at First Bull Run, you will remember, when all of the people from Washington went down in carriages to have a look.

This was what it was like. It was a terribly, terribly complicated thing. There was a fellow named Ed Grainger, who was an AID officer in Phu Yen Province. His wife was a good friend of my wife in Bangkok, where they were both living in safehaven. Elizabeth Grainger, who was a very soft-spoken, lovely British woman said one time that she was having a hard time of it financially. Ruth, my wife, told me this. The reason was that when the Vietcong had taken Ed, his salary had stopped! So when on my next trip to Bangkok Ruth told me about this on my return to Saigon, I went in to see Charlie Mann, who was the director of AID. I said this was unconscionable. He was outraged and called in his principal comptroller and said that he couldn't understand why the Grainger family had not received any money and the comptroller looked him straight in the eye and said, “Because he hasn't submitted a time card.” With that Charlie blew up. I was glad to see that. He said, “You will pay him. You will pay Mrs. Grainger the money due him, and you will pay it immediately.” The comptroller looked at Charlie Mann again, directly in the eye, and said, “You don't have the authority to tell me to do that, Mr. Director.”

Well, finally, on his personal recognizance, if you will, Charlie Mann did arrange that she got paid. What's my point? My point is that we had the conflict of outworn regulations and practices in contradiction with extraordinary circumstances of a military nature, of an emergency nature. Incidentally, Ed Grainger never did return from his imprisonment by the Vietcong. They killed him.

But in any event, dealing with all that sort of situation, it was quite a complication. Well, the orders finally came and to my great dismay I was ordered to the Vietnam Working Group in Washington.

Q: Were you unhappy about that, Bill?

MARSH: I was unhappy about it because, let's see, I was 35 years of age and had never served at a conventional, traditional, normal Foreign Service Post. Never. In future years people would cast that up to me.

Now one has omens, or they seem to be omens at the time, at least this is my experience. Before taking up a new assignment sometimes there are a succession of minor crises that precede it in one's personal life, and sure enough they foreshadow a very difficult tour and assignment and all. I had to get my wife and son on a plane in Bangkok to Hong Kong to wait for me. This involved at Bangkok running across Bangkok airport to get my Air Vietnam flight back to Saigon. Almost getting run over by about six jets in the process, returning to Saigon, finding out that the cultural revolution had erupted in Hong Kong, and then the night before my departure from Saigon there was the first time the Vietcong had shelled Saigon airport.

We then took the President Cleveland from Hong Kong to San Francisco but there was one problem on route. At shore leave at Yokohama we missed the boat and had to take a lighter out to the ship and climb up a ladder up about seven storeys up the side of the liner, with a six month old baby boy stuck inside my coat. These were harbingers of some very trying times to come.

Q: Bill, this is fascinating stuff and we have a few minutes more on this side. Should we start with Washington or should we take a little break and have a cup of coffee?

MARSH: Let's take a cup of coffee.

Q: Wonderful idea, I think that's a good idea.

Today is December 30, 1997. Bill, we are back in 1966. You arrived in Washington to be on the Vietnam Desk, which I think was the Vietnam Working Group.

MARSH: That is so.

Q: Could you tell us a bit about that group, Bill? How was it set up and what was it doing right and what was it doing wrong?

MARSH: It was a very ecumenical sort of assembly. As a matter of fact, for a while there was even a Peace Corps representative on it and, of course, the Peace Corps never served in Vietnam. But there were representatives of numerous agencies...

Q: International voluntary services...

MARSH: No, no, no. Not at that time. There were strictly government agency representatives.

Q: It was a very ecumenical group.

MARSH: We had them from all over and gradually there was a decline over the years, less and less and less outside representation, shall we say. It became a State show. Now in '66 there were two developments that were particularly striking.

First of all, we were now in the third year of the search for political stability in South Vietnam and it was as far away as ever. There had been a significant revival of popular dissension and demonstration against the ever-changing governmental authorities of the South. So that search seemed as illusory as ever.

Secondly there was a rapidly rising tide of dissension in the United States and very surprising things indeed were happening there. Great rallies in Washington against the war, the isolation and even confinement of the President of the United States. I remember one time when he planned to go to the Century Plaza Hotel in Los Angeles to give a speech. President Johnson's people told him that within 24 hours of the announcement that he would talk there, California dissidents would arrange that 100,000 people would be present to protest against it, and that that number would probably increase.

You'll remember that at about that time the Secretary of State went in an unmarked vehicle into the basement of the Waldorf Astoria Hotel. Because in order to appear at the United Nations and to meet with people he would have had great difficulty getting through the lines of protestors outside.

There are two factors of the times as well that I would like to mention, because the younger listeners, if there are some to this, will probably not be familiar with that sort of thing. The first was the Foreign Service had a tradition of noblesse oblige at that time. Moreover many of those in the Foreign Service had been in the military and considered the Foreign Service as a kind of para-military organization, at least as far as Vietnam was concerned.

What this meant was that we were much more accepting of authority than seems to be the case today and that we simply did not question, at that time, or argue, in any event, with decisions that were handed down to us. Thus it was that when the deputy assistant secretary of State for then Far Eastern Affairs, later East Asia and Pacific Affairs, with responsibility for Vietnam among other countries in Southeast Asia, Leonard Unger, decided that he had better have virtually continuous coverage. Thus John Helble and I, who were the political officers on the Vietnam Working Group, had to take turns covering the night duty in the Operations Center. What that meant was that we worked 36 hours on, 12 off. We did this for a number of months. We did this seven days a week. And we did this 30 or 31 days a month, depending on the month. And it didn't really occur to us to say we were exhausted because that wasn't done.

I did question that my superiors made no mention of these marathon reports in my Efficiency Report written in the spring of 1967, and it fell on totally deaf ears. Those involved could not understand what I was talking about when I said that working so many hours constantly was just taking years off my life span, and off John Helble's life span, as well, to be perfectly fair with him.

What I do remember was an example of how ill coordinated the Department was. Whereas I lived in Washington and could take a bus to and from work, John Helble lived out in what was then considered near - West Virginia, that is to say, Falls Church. Which was then about as far from the action as one could be and decidedly frowned upon as not a very classy place to be, way out there six miles away in the countryside. But he used a car. There was no metro in those days, of course. Well, don't you know, in the middle of this, they took his parking permit away and so he was spending an absolute fortune, as you can imagine, for a garage space outside that sometimes would be 36 hours in length. But we tended to work eight to eight and then, if we worked through the night, then we stayed the following day and went home at eight o'clock or some 36 hours after we arrived.

The reason was that we were supposed to call Saigon about every hour or two. Why? Because the percolation throughout South Vietnamese society of that Buddhist uprising in Central Vietnam, that I told you about, in that year, plus the uncertain role of Lieutenant General Thi, who was Corps Commander in Central Vietnam and who looked as if he had separatist ambitions there. Well, there we were.

There were those on the staff who were busily working on preparations for negotiations, which of course came to no fruition during that period of time, and the like. We had a White House constantly in search of progress reports, achievements, something that it could talk about with the public to show that things were going better than indeed they were.

We had one period in which the President had decided that, this was in 1967, in preparation for the following year's Presidential and Congressional elections, somebody had better answer the criticisms that were appearing in great number in the Congressional Record. So the President said that he wanted complete rebuttals sent to the White House the day that the Congressional Record came out. Now what that meant was that one of us had to go to the mailroom of the Department, around seven o'clock in the morning, and go through the mailbags and try to find Congressional Records. Now the Department could not do this for us; they could not put this together for us. So it was amusing because the first day that I did it, I came out of the mailroom so filthy dirty that my dress clothes that I had for the office were hopeless. So I had an old raincoat and I used to wear this old raincoat and then go diving in and go through all these mailbags in order to get them upstairs as soon as possible.

Why did we have to do that? Well, you see, there was a noon deadline on submission on the letters of rebuttal...

Q: You would put on a raincoat?

MARSH: I'd put on this old raincoat and then we proceeded to go through the Congressional Record each day and find the insertions made by members or the remarks put in by members critical of the U.S. effort in Vietnam. Then we proceeded to write rebuttals of that. We had to have all of these fully cleared and upstairs in the Staff Secretariat by noon. Then they would make their way over to the White House and would be signed off by the President that night.

This was a colossal effort because we averaged 50 rebuttals and we had a brand new young lady named Barbara White, whom you may have heard of, I believe she went to Moscow somewhat later. She had just come in from New Mexico, I think it was, and this was really her first job. She was really the most extraordinary worker that you can imagine. Remember she was using a manual typewriter, this was prior to the days of electric typewriters.

Q: Who was Ms. White?

MARSH: She was just a young civil service person, a colleague in the Vietnam working Group. And she just ground out these letters which we just started scribbling as soon as we could. Fortunately a number of them dealt with the same theme and so we were able to crib from one to the other and we didn't have to write 50 individual letters. But we certainly had to write 10 or 15 and get them cleared throughout the Bureau, through the rest of the Department, and up there by twelve o'clock noon. Well, this was not work, this was frenzy for heaven's sake, and it was an absolutely frenzied operation.

You know the consequence of this was that the Public Correspondence Division of the Department was established. Before that time there had not been one to deal with such matters. But for several months we had to put up with this and it was incredible. The workload was extraordinary.

First of all, there was the old problem of obtaining information. What was going on in Vietnam? How to sift, how to sort in the official reporting, and then in the non-governmental reporting, particularly, of course, the press but also the television, to try to identify what actually informed us and to respond to what was simply a criticism or detraction. This was an enormous effort. I remember one evening I left at eight o'clock and I was the first person to leave the Working Group that night. Somebody made cracks like, oh, what, are you on leave? That sort of thing.

Tony Lake wanted to see a sister whom he had not seen for a number of years. Now Tony at that time was Ambassador Unger's staff aide, and he had arranged to spend a couple of hours with her on a Saturday afternoon, mid-afternoon. Tony, it turned out, could not be spared that day and did not see his sister. This was all that way.

Q: Who was Ambassador Unger, Bill?

MARSH: Ambassador Unger had been ambassador to Laos.

Q: What was his role at that time?

MARSH: Deputy assistant secretary, with responsibility for Vietnam.

There were humorous sides to the Herculean efforts we were putting in. One time Ambassador Unger asked us all to wait and we would go together with him to the Vietnam National Day celebration at its embassy. We were so late when we finally left the Department that we arrived at an absolutely empty South Vietnamese embassy and they had to go find Bui Diem, who was then the ambassador, to come down from upstairs, and say hello to us. There is nothing like going to a party when there is nobody there! So it went.

Q: So this was 1966?

MARSH: 1966 perhaps part of '67. Now 1967, it seems to me, was a year that was extremely misleading. It was misleading because in the first instance there was a considerable abatement of the internal political dissension within South Vietnam. The Central Vietnam crisis faded, waned, and not only that but there seemed to be some institution building because there were elections, Presidential elections, Parliamentary elections, and there was the election of Nguyen Van Thieu as President of Vietnam. So you had the first elected President in four years.

I went to Vietnam for the elections in the company of Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, who by this time had returned to the United States, who shepherded a group of prominent Americans to act as sort of unofficial election observers.

The second misleading problem was that there was a decline in military activity. By Christmas of '67 there was the possibility that perhaps we had made substantial headway militarily. The absence of enemy military activity was heartening and perhaps a sign, and it was a sign but we didn't know just exactly what it was a sign of, we learned that in '68 at Tet. The President decided that he would go out and visit the troops in December of 1967 at Cam Ranh Bay. Then go on to visit the Pope, who was a symbol of peace. The President would be able to report on to him that matters were preceding satisfactorily and that we were hoping for negotiations soon on the grounds of the improved situation within the country, as it was then seen.

In the United States, however, the public uproar still rose and the clamor continued very badly. There was not any appeasement of the public dissatisfaction. Much of it we realize now was occasioned by the Draft and in fact once the Draft was done away with, and the university students no longer had to be concerned about that, the anti-war movement declined very rapidly. But it still was in full measure.

I think that many of the FSOs were from Missouri on what the situation was like in South Vietnam, well, let's wait and see what's going on. And there was some reporting that the Vietcong and North Vietnamese were making preparations for intensified fighting and so forth, but again we'd always had reporting that varied 180 degrees. You know, it's hot, it's cold, it's up, and it's down.

Q: Let me just ask a pointed question here. You're saying that as we got to Christmas of 1967 things were quiet politically, things were quiet militarily.

MARSH: Relatively speaking.

Q: Robert McNamara has suggested that three years earlier, if I recall correctly, three years earlier he was able to see that the American effort was not likely to work and he feels a great deal of contrition that he continued to work with it. Does that make sense to you? By the time we were in 1967, what kind of a prediction could one have made? By 1967?

MARSH: The highest level statements in the latter part of '67 were very encouraging. Statements from the senior military were highly encouraging and what they were misreading was a lessening or absence of enemy military activity and taking that as a sign of constructive progress. That we had sufficiently staffed and armed the Vietnamese forces and established hamlet security and undertaken economic and social programs that were taking root and so forth and so that things were getting better. There was that.

Now as far as Secretary McNamara, I've read his book, too. I'm saddened by what I have seen in the book because every experience that I had, and there were quite a few with Secretary McNamara during his visits to Vietnam and in terms of his statements in Washington and elsewhere, every such experience was that he was fulfilling very actively and very eagerly the role of chief cheerleader for the U.S. effort. At no time was there any suggestion that he had any misgivings or any doubts about the eventual outcome.

Q: Do you think he felt comfortable or sincere in his role of chief cheerleader?

MARSH: You know, the so-called McNamara method applied in Vietnam. That is to say the application of numerous quantifiable measures of incremental approaches in terms of arming, staffing, deploying, and so forth, both the U.S. and the South Vietnamese forces. We certainly had the impression at that time that what he had been so famed for at the Ford Motor Company, was in full application with respect to the Vietnam effort. But in terms of any strategic or shall we say global findings on his part, we had no notion of those whatsoever. And, as a matter of fact, the question arises then why George Ball and others, who had misgivings to say the least about the course of events in Vietnam and of U.S. Policy, why they were so alone. They received no support that I can tell, and I've reviewed the foreign relations of the United States for '64 and '65 and looked at other documents. I have never seen any time in which Secretary McNamara gives the slightest indication that he was having second thoughts.

Q: Bill, let me ask. I think McNamara believes what he is saying in his book, but do you think what he is saying in his book represents what he thought in the early and mid 1960s, or do you think he's reconstructed all that?

MARSH: More the latter. A friend at the time in the '60s was on the staff of Senator Robert Kennedy and I was invited over to brief Senator Kennedy a number of times on the progress of the war, or lack thereof, and so on. I found Senator Kennedy in those times, I'm talking 1966 and 1967, I found him very gung-ho as far as the military effort was concerned. He was particularly interested in what the Special Forces were or were not accomplishing. Thus I was quite surprised when we had the identification of Senator Kennedy with an anti-war position when his candidacy for President came about.

Q: We had Governor Romney, who went out to Vietnam.

MARSH: Who was, quote, brain washed, unquote.

Q: Who at the time he was in Vietnam was extraordinarily gung-ho, and was basically running around cheerleading, then when he came back said he was brain washed, and I think thought he was.

MARSH: Yes. Yes.

Q: Anyhow, I ask this Bill not because you know the answer, but because I think it is a very fair question for students of the period and students of McNamara's book. Anyhow, thank you for the insight.

MARSH: I accompanied him to Hue and elsewhere in Vietnam during his visits and sat in on a number of briefings scheduled for him. Suffice it to say that if he had doubts, he concealed them very effectively.

Q: Bill, let me move to a slightly different direction. You were working in the State Department right now, it was still the Dean Rusk period, Leonard Unger, William Bundy was Assistant Secretary, and at the White House, if I remember correctly, we had Walt Rostow and we had Robert Komer who had moved in.

MARSH: Somewhat later.

Q: Somewhat later. Well, still, back at this period can you describe a little bit what the State Department's role was? Was the State Department making policy or was it just answering congressional correspondence at that time? Who was making policy?

MARSH: Well, very clearly the President was making policy. You'll recall that the President took a direct hand to such an extent that he even designed the then new American embassy in Saigon, and went over the plans and so forth. You'll recall that later he said that he was spending, in his memoirs he said that he was spending during that time, 60 to 80 percent of his time on Vietnam. Secretary McNamara later said that he was spending about 80 percent of his time on Vietnam. So the obsession with this small country, and it was that, but as McNamara knew full well and as Lyndon Johnson said many times before, the United States had never lost a war. Moreover, as leader of the free world and the only super power - now we know it was the only super power but then it was the only super power on the side of liberty in the world - it was the bulwark against Russian and Chinese expansionism in the world. The bulwark against subversion and destruction of friendly regimes everywhere what we had to do was to reverse the stigma of the French defeat in Vietnam.

I don't know, I think that the people who expressed misgivings at that time, such as George Ball and others earlier were very heavily penalized for not being part of the effort.

Q: But Senator Kennedy you felt was a friend of the effort at that time?

MARSH: At that time, but later disassociated himself.

Q: Well, that's very interesting.

Bill, we're now sort of finished with 1967, aren't we?

MARSH: We are, and then we entered the most difficult year.

Q: The most difficult year...

MARSH: Because certainly the military had not prepared us for the Tet Offensive, which was after all a magnificently concealed effort by the Vietcong and North Vietnamese of country-wide mass organization and preparation. You had to admire them. Their timing, the force of their attack, all of that, were extraordinary. Now, I liken sometimes 1968 to roughly, for the United States, to roughly 1958-59 for the French in Algeria when we won militarily as the French did and lost politically and psychologically.

Now in preparation for the coming elections, back to '67 for a moment, the President insisted that persons knowledgeable about Vietnam go out on speaking tours as frequently as possible. So those of us on the Vietnam Working Group were very often out doing that. An example of this was when in '66, on the way to Washington, my wife and I visited her parents in Oklahoma and the Governor, later Senator, Henry Bellman became aware that I was there. He was driven up from Oklahoma City, 135 miles, to have breakfast with me at some ungodly hour like 6:30 or 7:00 in the morning, it was still dark, I remember. There were automobiles with state troopers and everything else, and there I am sitting with the Governor of Oklahoma in a diner, for heaven's sake, having breakfast to brief him on Vietnam.

Q: Bill, what was his motivation to drive 135 miles to see you?

MARSH: Every public official, of course, who had political aspirations, wanted to try to get the facts to find out about Vietnam. Now, fewer and fewer, particularly those of the other party were visiting Vietnam because they didn't want to be associated or tainted with that, which was the difference. Even so, we were in the briefing paper publishing business in the Vietnam Working Group. There was always somebody going away on a trip and we were doing these briefing papers, or going to Europe in connection with the effort to seek negotiations and all that sort of thing.

Of course in those days, prior to the Wang, prior to word processors and all that sort of thing this was all virtually handwritten work that was then typed by the tireless Barbara White on her little typewriter. I cannot express fully my admiration for her. She was just extraordinary and grinding it all out.

It's interesting that we had two political officers on the Vietnam Working Group, something that was such an enormous part of the President's agenda. And at that time you generally had two political officers for other countries of some significance, of course, not for the smallest ones. So we had about the same staffing there for Vietnam as there was for Italy or Belgium.

Q: Wow. Bill, 1968, Tet Offensive.

MARSH: The onslaught.

Q: The onslaught. What was your role in that? Could you describe what you and the Working Group actually did, because the Tet Offensive, the outlines of it are fairly well known?

MARSH: The Tet Offensive tended to pass overhead because we now had the full attention of the principals and the seniors. The embassy was dealing directly with them. The military were dealing directly with the Joint Chiefs who were dealing directly with the White House, that kind of thing. We were at a decidedly lower level at that time. But we were considering the options, as a matter of fact.

We were considering options when we did not know what was going to come. And of course the Public Affairs side of the house was a total disaster. You'll remember General Loan executing the Vietcong in Cho Lon on television.

Q: General Kau, yes.

MARSH: Loan, Loan. I believe it was General Loan, if I'm not mistaken. Okay, General Kau, if that is who it was.

Q: Whoever it was.

MARSH: I'm not sure, but the chief of security.

Q: We all remember the photograph.

MARSH: And a bound Vietcong.

Q: It was a prize-winning photograph.

MARSH: Yes, etc. The overrunning of the embassy, and poor Hue, where some 3,000 notables of the town were done in by the Vietcong, really an eradication of the anti-communist infrastructure in the place. It was just an unmitigated disaster. Meanwhile, we were running around the country trying to speak on it and this had some very interesting developments.

I tended to take some of the farthest speaking engagements for the simple reason that I was still exhausted from the whole work and wanted to get away from the office, get a decent night's sleep. So I would take Texas and California. My parents at that time lived in California, so it was a chance to see them. I am an only child and it was a good chance and sometimes I would take my two-year-old son with me.

I remember one time at the University of Wyoming where I was speaking and they refused to help me at all. I had this two-year-old and they wouldn't find a babysitter for me to pay, so I spoke and he was on the stage, sitting on the stage behind me. Basic decencies were not observed. It was really outrageous.

Then I went to a small Presbyterian college in North Texas one time, thinking that this was a state with a strong military tradition, here I'll be on friendly ground. I come to find this huge banner on the chapel saying 'Go Home, Marsh, You War Criminal.' It was a time of insurgency in the United States.

Q: When your two-year-old son was sharing the platform with you, did you think your lack of better care from your hosts was politically motivated?

MARSH: Absolutely.

Q: Absolutely.

MARSH: They refused to tell me where I was to speak, they just said it was in something or other hall. I said, well, where was that, please, and they just said to find out for myself. There was calculated rudeness, nastiness throughout.

Q: Was this before or after the famous episode where McNamara went to the University of California, I believe at Berkeley, and was shouted down and had to leave before he could say anything?

MARSH: I believe it was after. I spoke at Scripps College, which is nearby, and a whole contingent came down from Berkeley to shout me down there.

Q: Bill, when the Tet Offensive happened, shortly afterwards, I remember for example Robert Komer, this is anecdotal information, but I remember that Robert Komer was barely able to speak coherently and indeed was giggling, most of the time, because he was so nervous. He had flown there and he had flown back afterwards, and he was so nervous that he was kept away from the press. My question is, in your observation, how were responsible officials in America, people who were responsible for the policy, how were they taking all this psychologically, the Tet Offensive? Was it a big, palpable downer for everyone?

MARSH: It varied. We had some people who were so much a part of the program that they were just impervious to what the reactions were from outside. I got into a lot of trouble, you know, because I came back and reported in the spring of '68 that people were terribly upset about the war. That there was a great deal of upheaval out there, and that matters were going to be very, very difficult and particularly I had heard that there were plans to disrupt the Democratic Convention in Chicago. I did this in a memo and I got a rebuke and was told that I was exaggerating, that others had said that the self-sacrifice of President Johnson in declining to seek a second term in office had calmed the public.

You'll recall that in the Efficiency Reports in those days there was the part that we did not see and in the part that I did not see there was a pretty strident criticism of me. I was called an alarmist and all that sort of thing and that my reporting was not remarkable for its accuracy and all that sort of thing. Then I was also told verbally to understand that the Democratic Convention in Chicago was in no danger whatsoever and that Mayor Daley of Chicago had all arrangements well in hand.

A few years later, by the way, just to finish the story on that one, an Inspector happened across me in Brussels. He told me about the Secret part of that 1968 report and he took steps to issue a rebuttal and to have that put into the file. I'm very grateful to Ambassador Parsons for that.

Q: Well, I like that. Let me ask another thing. A lot of things happened in 1968. There was a Tet Offensive, there was a My Lai massacre, there was a battle of Khe Sanh, there were U.S. protests, very strong ones, and then at some point that year, if I remember, the Pentagon Papers appeared. Or am I getting ahead of myself?

MARSH: It was afterwards.

Q: It was afterwards. All right, then let's skip over that.

MARSH: The public attitude was such that it was obvious that the post-war consensus on foreign policy had now disintegrated. There was also an attitude in the public of ‘do not bother me with the facts.’ I want to give two examples of that for any scholars who may be listening.

I debated one time Professor Sidney Peck of Western Reserve University. Professor Peck went on and on how in 1967 if the Vietnamese had not voted the government ticket, their rice ration cards would not have been stamped. Therefore they would have been cut out of the food chain, as it were. In rebuttal I said that this was very interesting, but that there was just one problem with it, there weren’t any rice rationing cards in Vietnam. This didn’t stop Professor Peck, he continued on the same story and with the same thing!

Then there was another thing. There was a young man down from Berkeley who spoke at Scripps to me. He was actually rather decent. He said that he appreciated that I had my views and so forth, but on the other hand perhaps my experiences had colored my attitudes. Therefore perhaps people who had never been to Vietnam had a better understanding of what was going on there than those who had been part of it. I said to him that this was an amazing position for a student to take because it seemed to me a total eradication of the scientific method.

Q: Bill, we are in the year 1968, after the Tet Offensive. What were you folks doing at that time? What is next?

MARSH: That was, to borrow a phrase from Queen Elizabeth II, that was the annus horribilis for the Vietnam effort, I think.

In the first place, the wounded lion, Lyndon Johnson, was besieged on all sides. The strange thing is he probably would have been re-elected we see now, but in any event he felt he had no choice to do that. Of course he only lived four years after leaving the White House.

The efforts in Vietnam seemed more out of control than ever before. An example was the famous Lieutenant Colonel who in the town in the Delta, Ben Tre, which I believe you know, Vlad, said the immortal words, “It was necessary to destroy it in order to save it.” And back in Washington I groaned when I read that report and said “this fatuity is going to plague us” and I was chewed out. I was condemned on that. I’m not smirking when I say now that that still haunts us. It became a kind of a watchword, a slogan, a model of those critical of the U.S. effort in Vietnam. But I got in trouble. Why? Because there was a desperate attempt to rally all the forces in Washington in support of the President, in support of the military and in support of what came to be called as CORDS, which was the newest name for a pacification effort.

Q: And these were in particular the civilians who were going out in a pacification effort?

MARSH: Yes. It was extraordinary to me because I had had some experience in state and local government working for a foundation for three years, three and a half years, in Pittsburgh. I knew a little something about the mentalities and the capabilities and the problems of local government. But here we were relying for that work on technical expertise and the people who went out seemed to me political virgins who knew nothing at all about what it was to try to win friends and influence people at local and regional levels. But it went on and on and on.

The decision of the President not to stand for re-election, and the criticism that came, and the debate in the 1968 political campaigns... remember that until his unfortunate assassination Senator Kennedy was a very strong critic of the war and he was an insider.

Q: Bill, when did Senator Kennedy switch from being with that particular program to being against that particular program?

MARSH: I tried to look that up and document that and it's difficult, but I would say that it was some time during 1967, with more intense opposition to the war after the Tet Offensive.

Q: Yes.

MARSH: But in any event, Washington, it seemed to me, was in a state of disorganization at that time. The thrust now was really, at least as far as State was concerned, was really on launching negotiations and making something of them and the question of the war was picked up by others. Again, State is having a very difficult time coping with the public uproar within the United States. It does not know how to deal with it.

It's interesting. In those days we had far more invitations to come and speak or debate or something of that sort, with all expenses paid, than we could deal with. Today there are very, very few indeed. But I would say that I was out a hundred times in the territory between Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and California and Nevada in the course of about a year.

Q: That's very impressive.

MARSH: It was interesting because you went to school in Massachusetts and in Worcester one time a woman really accused me of practicing witchcraft, which she intended as a left-handed compliment to my fluidity and verbosity in defense of the war. But I thought I was back in Salem in 1692.

Q: Bill, we are moving ahead in '68. When that year ended where were we?

MARSH: Well, my trials and tribulations were to end in June of 1968 because I had decided on a switch in region. Now my foreign, overseas experience between 1953 and 1968, not continuously of course but on and off had been exclusively in the Far East. And for family and personal reasons and so forth I had decided to shift into a different geographical region. I spoke with the training people and was to undertake a course called Atlantic Affairs Training.

Q: Bill, may I just butt in for a minute? In mid 1968 did you actually leave the Vietnam business forever?

MARSH: I left the Vietnam business for four years.

Q: For four years, until 1972?

MARSH: That's right.

Q: All right. Maybe for the purposes of continuity here perhaps the wisest thing to do would be to just stay with the Vietnam experience.

MARSH: Yes, right.

Q: You left it in 1968 at a period when there was a lot of gloom and disarray and a lot of repercussions within America, a very tense period. And then you went and you basically went to Brussels, as I remember. But that's another tale.

MARSH: That's another tale told elsewhere.

Q: When you left Brussels, did you come right back to Washington and to Vietnam, did you come home?

MARSH: No. But there is one thing I'd like to relate, with your permission, is that this Atlantic Affairs Training, for some ungodly reason, the Department decided that Berkeley was the place I should go to do that. I sent in a couple of applications to the University, and they claimed they never received them. I finally received an anonymous telephone call from somebody saying, "Mr. Marsh don't send any more applications in because we're going to destroy them. We don't want war criminals here at the University of California."

Q: That's an amazing story! That was a call from the University of California?

MARSH: So I of course immediately said, "Ah hah, so we have McCarthyism of the Left, have we?" Yes, the person thought he was being helpful, it was a man, but he never revealed his name. He refused to reveal his name. So I did not go to Berkeley, which I didn't want to do anyway, frankly, I went to Brussels instead. Now Vietnam and Southeast Asia were a great tar baby. I went on leave. Having left at the end of June 1968 from the desk, I went on leave. While on leave I got a call, and you understand I had left the Vietnam Working Group and was really in transient status. I got a call that I should go to Honolulu for the state visit of President Thieu. His state visit to the United States had a rather brief itinerary. It was Honolulu, period. He didn't dare go to the U.S. mainland.

So I went up there and helped out. President Johnson came in and spent about two and a half to three hours with President Thieu and then immediately leaped on his plane. There was no state dinner, there was no anything. I was just supposed to try to keep the Vietnamese happy. But I was called back, as it were, to go out there.

Q: [Interviewer Nick Heyniger] We were talking about different perceptions of the situation and the future in Vietnam within the ranks of the Department of State.

MARSH: Nick, I have never seen this written out, but it is something that I've been thinking about over the years and came up with rather diametrically opposed approaches to policy making. It seems to me that the Foreign Service tends to regard policy making as an inductive process. That is to say, through empirical evidence and experience you put together all the factors, the assets, the liabilities and so forth and so on and you devise a policy. Whereas it seems to me that our betters and seniors have a deductive approach to it and that this was nowhere better demonstrated than in Vietnam. Apart from the tactical situation, there was really an appalling lack of knowledge and understanding at senior levels about Vietnam.

The only thing that mattered was Deus le Veult, as the Pope said in launching the Crusades, “God wills it,” only in this case it wasn’t God, it was the President of the United States, and we were going to win and we would work out later what winning meant. The basic problem that we had was that we could never prove a negative, and therefore we could never know whether we were winning or not. What do I mean by that? Well, the whole idea was that South Vietnam should not fall to Communist domination from the North. Well, how do you prove that? And nobody had the faintest idea and still doesn’t on the thing, or even if it is provable.

Q: I guess the military would have said if warlike activity ceases or declines significantly and in effect South Vietnam has become pacified we would have won.

MARSH: We fell in that trap in 1967, late 1967. There was a long period of quiet, but the mere absence of conflict is certainly not a peace or a victory. The Vietcong and North Vietnamese preparing to launch the Tet Offensive occasioned that quiet in late 1967.

The shock of the Tet Offensive was the contrast between the relative lack of hostilities in late 1967 and the storm, the tempest that broke out, in 1968.

Q: Okay, let’s pursue that for a minute. What would you say was the effect of the Tet Offensive within the halls of the Department of State?

MARSH: Within the halls of the Department of State there was a mixture of chagrin and hopefulness, perhaps. Because the overrunning of the embassy in Saigon, for example, the overrunning of major parts of Saigon and all of the major cities elsewhere in the country was after the enormous sacrifices we had already made. And having more than a half million troops in the country, at that time, and having spent heaven knows how many billions of dollars, the shock was a very great one, but still there was a hopefulness in that. It was not a military success for the enemy side. The Vietcong were decimated and never, as a matter of fact, came back in numbers and in strengths and in the drive that they had prior to Tet.

But of course for the United States it was an unmitigated political disaster.

Q: But what I’m probing for is you and your job and your knowledge of the Department after the Tet Offensive. Where was Hilsman at this time, for example? Were there people who said maybe we ought to rethink this situation?

MARSH: Oh, clearly, yes, and you can see that in the archives of the Foreign Relations of the United States. For example, George Ball was an advocate of a compromise solution. But remember the general optic was that of 1938. Munich was again and again and again mentioned, and particularly by the Secretary of State, as the raison d’être for the great effort there. That we had failed to heed the signals and for that we paid dearly and we must not do so again. There was also the spreading effect, the domino effect, to use President Eisenhower's phrase for it. And there was also a dread on the part of policy makers. They would not be associated with the first time the United States had lost a war.

You know in that sense they probably had some foresight because here, 22 years after the fall of Saigon, Vietnam remains the national trauma. It has a daily influence on what we do and why we do it and more particularly why we don't do a great many things. But in any event in '67 President Johnson decides, with the election coming up, that he wants people out on the hustings as frequently as possible. They are to hold meetings, explain U.S. policy, and try to clear up the rising tide of discontent and dissent and quasi-revolution in the country. So yours truly and others in the group were sent out very frequently.

Now in those days we could pick and choose, because there were so many invitations all expenses paid for groups all over the country for someone to come out and speak on Vietnam. So I looked upon that as a chance to get some sleep, after a terrible year and a third, year and a quarter, whatever it was. I could catch up a bit because I could sleep on a plane, get to bed fairly early the night before you had to speak – provided you went far enough. Now there were some people who went to West Virginia and Massachusetts. They could be back the same day. Yours truly went out to the West Coast because, first of all his parents lived in Los Angeles at that time, and that sort of thing.

But in any event this was really very exciting. Why? Well, I remember going to a small Protestant college in North Texas where I was to speak at the chapel. Here is a big banner all across the front of the chapel when I arrived that said "Go Home, Marsh, you war criminal." Then I went out to Scripps College in California and had a complete contingent of rather Left Wing students come down from Berkeley in order to boo and hiss and harass and everything else as I tried to talk to the ladies of Scripps College. I had all these men from Berkeley down there giving me a hard time. It was quite extraordinary.

Incidentally, one of the things I remember so well. I did speak in Massachusetts. I took my turn at the nearer ones, yes. And in Worcester, Massachusetts, a lady with a wonderfully broad 'A' got up and said, "Mr. Marsh, you said you are not particularly adept in public speaking. I think you are devilishly clever at public speaking. As a matter of fact, I think you are a representative of the devil." I saw the fires of Salem burning there, in my mind's eye.

Q: Why? What was her complaint?

MARSH: Well, I think that some of her ancestors had been at witchcraft trials, to tell you the truth.

Q: You were talking about the situation in Vietnam, as you saw it.

MARSH: After all, I'd had an awful lot of practice. I debated a good many leaders of the anti war movement whose disregard of the facts was so egregious that it actually helped sustain me during a period of great doubt and self-searching and so forth that I experienced at that time. But what I'm saying is that the other side was so unreasonable that it made our side look even better.

Q: So the lady with the broad 'A' from Massachusetts, what she wanted us to do was get out of Vietnam?

MARSH: Oh, yes, and I went to a Quaker meeting in North Carolina and they handed me pieces of an U.S. airplane that had been shot down over Hanoi. It was extreme. It was a very, very tough time. Fortunately I did not go to Chicago. There was no reason that I should. I didn't happen to be at the Chicago Convention but about that time came the culmination of a very interesting thing.

Oh, there is one more anecdote I must share with you. You'll remember that in the latter days of 1967, President Johnson thought the war was being won. We were going to quote "nail that coonskin to the wall" unquote, as he put it so many times. So he decided he was going to visit quote "his" unquote troops in Vietnam in December of 1967. He would then go and call upon the Pope and talk with him about the prospects for world peace and his desire to seek a negotiated solution and then return to the United States. Well, I'm sure that there were political aspects to this whole thing.

But I remember a series of meetings in the Department to plan the trip and an aide from the White House came over, very Texan. An accent you could fry for breakfast. The President wanted to see the Pope in Rome, period, and didn't want to see anybody else. I'm looking around and the people from the Bureau of European Affairs don't have a thing to say. So, you know, I'm half Welsh and the Welsh are famous for their big mouths, and so I say, "Wait a minute, not even our ally, the Prime Minister of Italy?" No, the boss doesn't want to see him. That's very strange. All these other people are very quiet.

I'm in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, for crying out loud, but still foreign policy is a seamless web, as far as I'm concerned. So I said they'd better change that as it would be a bad thing, it would harmful to NATO, it would hurt this and that and the other sort of thing. Well, he talked to LBJ about it. We had another meeting and the fellow came back and said no, the President wants to get off his airplane once he arrives in Italy and he wants to get into a helicopter and he wants to helicopter directly into the Vatican.

At that time the Holy See did not have a helipad and we pointed out that this was the case. That all there was was this big square there. I looked around and the people from European Affairs are keeping their mouths shut. Those from Public Affairs are keeping their mouths shut and all the rest. So little William sticks up his hand again and says, "But, Sir, there is this obelisk, this sort of a monument that stands tall in the middle of St. Peter's Square." He says he'll talk to the boss about that. So we have a meeting the next day and this guy from the White House is back and says, "Well, I talked to the boss and he says to have it taken down."

Q: I can't believe it!

MARSH: I had to suppress a tendency to laugh hysterically at this point. But the better angels of our nature came to my defense and helped me out and I said, "Oh, but Sir, that is an ancient monument and if anything should happen the Catholic population of the United States would be extremely upset.”

“I’ll tell the boss,” he says. Back he goes and next he says, “Okay, the President will take a limo. But he won’t see the Italians.”

Well, ultimately he did, for a matter of five or 10 minutes in the car, no less.

Q: Did you ask any of your colleagues from the European Bureau, you know, don’t you think it is politic for the President to pay a courtesy call on the head of state of Italy while he’s there? What did they say?

MARSH: Nick, I don’t know. But it wasn’t the first and it wasn’t the last time that my colleagues decided that what was politic was to protect their own careers. I don’t know a lot of instances of overt courage. I know a lot of instances of sort of covert courage.

Q: You’re there to provide advice to the White House.

MARSH: It seems to me if it is to be a dialogue, then it is to be a dialogue of equals. But perhaps I was wrong. In any event, we did not take down Cleopatra’s needle. The President was not impaled on the thing as he attempted to land in the helicopter. He did, and I am not kidding, pull the Italian Prime Minister into his limousine, speed off and dump unceremoniously, the Prime Minister a few moments later. But he did talk with the Italian Prime Minister.

So, there are ways to get things done. You have to compromise a little bit.

Q: I want to take you back to sort of the way the State Department operated at that time. Obviously from what you are saying there was not a lot of discussion within the State Department about policy toward Vietnam. I just wanted to ask, those of us who have been fortunate enough to be desk officers, for example the Bureau of Intelligence and Resource often provides a helpful role in offering a dissenting opinion about future policy, as does the Policy Planning Council. I wonder, while you were on the desk, did that happen? Did INR or the Policy Planning Council get involved in Vietnam policy?

MARSH: Two things. First of all, you may have heard of Paul Kattenburg, who was the Director of Vietnam Affairs in the bureau in 1962-63. He warned that we had a very vulnerable base on which to build a Vietnam policy as far as the country itself was concerned because there was the autocracy of Ngo Dinh Diem, there were the sects, the internal contradictions and a very strong enemy on the other side. And Paul Kattenburg never received the recognition that he deserved and deserves for great courage and farsightedness. Instead he was eased out in a most undignified fashion, out of the Foreign Service, and had to seek a career elsewhere.

So there was this and other examples where people were repaid for their selflessness with very arbitrary ouster. Secondly, when you only know, and that rather minimally, one half of an equation and nothing about the other half, that is to say North Vietnam and what was critical of course was an indication of North Vietnam leaders’ capabilities and intentions. And on that score we had nothing.

Q: Well, I recall that Roger Hilsman was the Assistant Secretary earlier, but after that INR sort of got squelched as far as Vietnam was concerned. I believe that this is the time when the White House, when the President, put Ernest K. Lindley on the Policy Planning Council to see that nobody on the Policy Planning Council voiced strong ideas of rethinking our policy toward Southeast Asia. You didn't find that you were getting that from the Policy Planning Council in any event?

MARSH: No, but what was I? I was an FSO-5 at that time on a scale of eight, and I wasn't privy to lots of things. That's what deputy directors and office directors, even well above that, were undertaking.

Q: Well, okay. So now that's two years in Washington on the Vietnam desk?

MARSH: That's right. Two years that was the equivalent of eight to 10 normal years in the Foreign Service.

Q: Particularly in hours of work served!

MARSH: Well, they are just uncounted. Let me say, for a person who was a close associate and friend, Tony Lake one day asked the deputy assistant secretary if the following Saturday afternoon he could have a couple two, three hours off in order to see his sister, whom he had not seen in some years. And the deputy said that he just couldn't tell and would let him know Saturday morning. So finally Saturday, about lunchtime, the deputy told Tony that he was awfully sorry but he had to stand by, he might need him. Tony did not see his sister as she passed through town.

Now today I think this sort of thing is unthinkable because the response from the young officers in the State Department would be quite unprintable and might even come from their lawyers!

MICHAEL H. NEWLIN
Political-Military Officer, USRO
Brussels (1963-1968)

Ambassador Newlin was born in North Carolina and was raised there and in the Panama canal zone. After graduating from Harvard he joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and was posted to Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Kinshasa and Jerusalem, where served as Consul General. During his distinguished career, Ambassador Newlin served in several high level positions dealing with the United Nations and its agencies and NATO. He served as Ambassador to Algeria from 1981 to 1985 and as US representative to the United Nations Agencies in Vienna, 1988-1991. Ambassador Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

NEWLIN: Of course, I should mention that about midway through in the Johnson administration, we began to have the looming quagmire of Vietnam. JFK sent the first U.S. military advisors to Vietnam but when LBJ became president the situation had deteriorated to the point where McNamara and the joint chiefs were pressing for combat forces. LBJ, I had the definite impression, had initial reservations about this escalation. If you recall there was a big conference of wise men, Acheson, McCloy, Walt Rostow at the White House and all of them bought into the domino theory, that you cannot let Vietnam fall. So I remember somebody coming back to Paris and telling Cleveland that LBJ was having his doubts about all of this, and he wanted others to participate in his decision on Vietnam whether to go for a massive build up of our military. Cleveland said, "He can't have anybody else. He has got to make the decision himself." Cleveland was all for the Vietnam thing. After we got into Vietnam and after things began to go sour, and it turned out not to be a cake walk by any means.

The NATO ambassadors in addition to meeting in the North Atlantic Council which was a formal thing, they would have a luncheon, a private luncheon with just ambassadors present every so often, I think once a month. Cleveland wanted very much to lobby them, all of his counterparts to really support us on Vietnam. Since I had worked for Cleveland before in the Department, whenever he would go back to Washington on consultation, he would take me along. I would arrange all of his meetings. I remember one in Katzenbach's office. Katzenbach was I think in effect the deputy secretary.

Q: At that point he may...

NEWLIN: Cleveland said, "I want to lash the other NATO members to the American chariot. I want the go ahead to start that." Katzenbach looked at him and said, "I don't think you can do it." I remember Foy Kohler coming out, and this was towards the end of my assignment. We had lunch with Cleveland and a few other people from the mission. Foy Kohler said, "You have to understand that every morning when the president wakes up, his first thought is how do we get out of Vietnam?" Cleveland would come back from his consultations in Washington and say, "Well, we must be doing things all right. I got no complaints whatsoever." The fact of the matter was that everybody was so preoccupied with Vietnam that we were not high on the agenda.

Q: Well during this time, '63 to '68 that you were involved in NATO, how did we view the Soviet threat?

NEWLIN: Well the Soviet threat was a serious matter and that was the glue that held NATO together certainly. Everybody believed the United States would certainly live up to its obligations under the NATO treaty to see to it that the Soviet Union did not encroach into Western Europe. There was that underlying belief.

JOHN R. BURKE
Political Officer
Saigon (1963-1967)

Director, Vietnam Working Group

Washington, DC (1967-1969)

John R. Burke was born in Wisconsin in 1924. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956 and served in Asia, France, Haiti, and was ambassador to Guyana. A Vietnamese language officer, he served in Saigon (1963-1967) and with Vietnamese Affairs in Washington (1967-1969). He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

BURKE: The Bureau of East Asian Affairs, I think, had a reputation as one of the strongest bureaus in the Department over the years. When I was in BNA, obviously, I was working in the Bureau of European Affairs. But quite honestly looking about, I wasn't all that interested in one of the more traditional jobs in one of the larger European embassies, which I might have expected in a BNA assignment. So I was interested in getting back to the Far East and to work within the Bureau of East Asian Affairs -- it was Far East, of course, in those days. The name didn't change until 1968.

So I really jumped at the chance to take Vietnamese, going to Saigon and --

Q: What type of officer would you characterize -- this is the early '60s -- was taking Vietnamese? I mean, was there a characterization would you say?

BURKE: Well, I'm trying to think of some of the people who were in the language program with me: Bill Marsh, who is still in the Service; Dick Holbrooke, who later got out of the Service and came back into the Department as the assistant secretary for the EA; Vladimir Rahovitch, who had a very distinguished career in political military affairs; Jim Rosenthal, who later became ambassador in Guinea and is still in the Service; David Engel, Tony Lake, and Sam Thomsen.

Q: So it was, you might say, a high caliber type of motivated person.

BURKE: I would say so. The group that I was associated with, I would rate them all very highly.

Q: Well, you went to Saigon when, and what were you doing?

BURKE: I went to Saigon in -- I think I arrived in June of 1963. The way the Vietnamese language course was set up, the first six months were Washington at FSI and with three additional months in Saigon. So my first couple of months in Saigon, I was told to bring in the language but doing some odd jobs in the political section in terms of covering things that might not otherwise get covered by the political section, which was fairly -- it was a lean political section at the time.

Q: Well, the later half of '63 can be pointed to as the crucial thing and probably with the finger more pointing towards the month of November, October-November. And so you were there on the scene. Before we get to that, how did you view the situation from your vantage point as a relatively junior officer in the summer of '63 in Vietnam?

BURKE: Well, I should back up just a bit. On my way to Saigon, because of my experience in BNA, and because I had been the assistant UK desk officer and the Irish desk officer, I was asked to stop off en route in Ireland. And I was there as an advance man during the visit of President Kennedy.

Interestingly enough, Pierre Salinger announced in Dublin that the White House had decided to name Henry Cabot Lodge as the ambassador to Saigon replacing Fritz Nolting. So I continued on to Saigon after the presidential visit. And, of course, Fritz Nolting, whom I called shortly after my arrival, was already packing his bags and getting ready to terminate his mission. And Cabot Lodge did arrive in, I think, around the 23rd of August in 1963. So it was a very interesting time, a very active time in the embassy. A lot of things were going on.

Q: Well, how did the officers view Nolting?

BURKE: I would say that the officers had a regard for Nolting. Many of the officers had served with him in Paris at the NATO headquarters, and he brought several people with him at that time to Saigon when he was named ambassador. You had Mel Manful, who was the political counselor. You had Bill Trueheart, the DCM. And then you had Bob Miller, who was number two, for the political section. So I think all of those people had a high regard for Nolting. He was certainly a very charming individual. And I thought he was a very dedicated professional, really, in his approach to the job of being ambassador.

Q: Well, what was, at that point, the view of the Vietnamese government and all?

BURKE: Toward?

Q: I mean, your view and the view of those around you, the political section and other officers in the embassy, how did you view the situation in the government?

BURKE: Well, the situation, really, in the summer of 1963 in Saigon was somewhat turbulent, because in May you had the beginning of the so-called Buddhist crisis which began at Hue, the incident of May 8 in which a Bonze, Tri Quang, organized a demonstration demanding that Buddhist in conjunction with their observance of Buddha's birthday be permitted to fly the Buddhist flag on some of the pagodas, and also they demanded that their demonstration be broadcast over the local radio station.

An incident developed on the night of May 8th. It's also been looked at and examined and reported oftentimes inaccurately. It was a very confused moment, in any event. Because of the confrontation before the radio station, there were a number of casualties and some Vietnamese demonstrators died. And this triggered a rather turbulent period. The demonstrations by the Buddhists began to spread down into Saigon and picked up by students, the students demonstrating on behalf of the Buddhists and demonstrating against the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem. And there were also, of course, many American journalists on the scene, some of whom made their reputations in Saigon in the summer of '63, notably, Malcolm Brown, who was reporting for the Associated Press; Neil Sheehan, who was reporting for the United Press International; and Halberstam --

Q: David Halberstam.

BURKE: Who was reporting for the New York Times. These were young journalists. I think with the exception of one, this was their first post abroad as reporters, as foreign correspondents. And they began to file extensive reports on the developing conflict between the Buddhists and the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem. Their reports began to make front pages of the newspapers throughout the U.S., and they brought a certain amount of pressure to bear on the Kennedy Administration and on the government to do something in terms of intervening to somehow help resolve the situation between the Buddhists and the Dinh Diem regime.

We were already committed to supporting the Dinh Diem regime against the Communist insurgency, which had well begun in 1960-61, and we didn't yet, of course, have combat troops in Vietnam. However, we had a growing commitment in terms of military advisors. I think we may have had about 15,000 thereabouts in the country already. And certainly we had begun to supply important resources in the meantime, commodity import program, resources to the government of Vietnam. So it was in our interest, obviously, to try and solve this -- all this regarded by some as a side show -- main problem of insurgency.

Q: Did you get involved in this at all?

BURKE: Well, involved to the extent that we were reporting to the Department, to Washington, what was going on in terms of the demonstrations. Of course, the reports by the journalists were what caught the public attention, and you had that one remarkable photograph taken by, I think it may have been Malcolm Brown. I didn't know he was a photographer, but he took the famous photograph of a Buddhist, Quang Duc, who was really not well known at all. He was a gentleman who one noon sat himself down in a major intersection in Saigon, poured a can of gasoline over himself and set fire to himself. This was such a remarkable photograph; it was just flashed around the world. It was a photograph similar to the famous one during the war in China in 1937 when the baby was set --

Q: It was a baby on railroad tracks, yes. Well, now, did you have any contact with these newspaper reporters? I mean, were they cultivating you? Were you cultivating them?

BURKE: I had limited contact with them and knew them all. I used to chat with them from time to time. But their principal contacts were people like the head of USIS and John -- the name escapes me just now.

Q: You can fill it in.

BURKE: He wrote a book subsequently called Mission in Torment. And he was the principal contact with the correspondents. But they did have social contacts with some of the other members of the embassy staff.

Q: When you got into the political section -- you were there when?

BURKE: I'd say I was getting toward full time in August of '63.

Q: Who was the head of the political section at that time?

BURKE: Well, Mel Manful, as I mentioned was the political counselor and Bob Miller was his deputy. And Mel Manful has retired. He was ambassador to Central African Republic and then Liberia before his retirement. And Bob Miller was ambassador to Malaysia and the Ivory Coast and is still in the Service. But that was the lineup. There were several other officers: Jim Rosenthal was in the embassy at the time; Bill Marsh was in the embassy; Melvin Levine, Charles Flouere, Sam Thomsen.

Q: Well, looking at it, would you say the embassy was sort of one mind? I mean, this was a very "Do we support Diem or do we cut the ground out from under him?" It was certainly a debate in other areas. How did the men of the political section view the Diem regime up to November 1963?

BURKE: Well, I don't think there was any single view. There were shades of opinion across the spectrum. There were probably one or two who felt that Diem had to go, the Diem regime had to go. There were, I think, others on the other side of the spectrum who felt that, "Okay, if Ngo Dinh Diem must go, who will succeed him and how will the succession be arranged, and what will this do to the effort to [unclear] the communist insurgency?"

I'd say there was a great deal of debate back and forth that would go up and down from day to day. As far as Ambassador Nolting is concerned, on the basis of my conversations with him which were limited then during that period because we didn't overlap all that long, but I have spoken with him subsequently and read the article he had before in the Foreign Service Journal and his book that appeared recently, and his position really hasn't deviated. He felt that it would be a mistake to consider a change of administration because the presidency of Ngo Dinh Diem was still valid, that the government was capable of functioning and that the Buddhist affair was a regrettable side show, in fact, distracting people from the real problem.

There were some people in the political section, I think, who probably learned upon review that once you get rid of -- it's clear now from all the documents that have been released, the various books that have been done, that there was an interest particularly in Washington on the part of then Assistant Secretary Roger Hilsman, possibly to a lesser extent Averell Harriman and others within the administration who felt that the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem had lost its effectiveness and probably should be replaced by a more effective regime, possibly the more elite.

Q: Do you think, was there a proprietary feeling within the embassy? You know, we're doing this, and we really should rather than sit back and watch events, that we felt we should get more and more, you know, not concerned but really manipulate things within this government.

BURKE: I think there were probably some people who held that view. There were others, of course, who had served abroad and appreciated the fact that regardless of the American stake in a foreign country, the number of things you can do, the amount of influence you can wield is quite limited. I think that it's -- I had been through a coup in Bangkok. The regime of the prime minister when I arrived, was overthrown by a General. And I remember how that unfolded and what role the U.S. mission was able to play in all of that scenario, and it was an extremely limited role if any role at all.

So I'm afraid that I felt that it's well and good to say, "We have an important stake here, the government must change its way to do certain things to accommodate us in view of our investment." And I think that in most foreign environments where you end up in this would be indigenous. After all, the people of the country, in the final analysis, say to themselves, "This is our country, and this is our government, and we will accept advice up to a point if it's consistent with our view."

Q: Did you have a feel for how the CIA -- its role there? Did you deal with them? I mean, did they have their own policy or own line? How did it work?

BURKE: Well, I was, as I say, a fairly junior officer in those days, and I had little contact with that side of the house.

Q: Again, how did it play out for you personally, and how did you see the November situation of '63?

BURKE: Well, I think it's important to mention Cabot Lodge's arrival and the way he chose to operate.

Q: Yes, if you would talk about his method of operations.

BURKE: Yes. I think that one must bear in mind that Cabot Lodge had been the Republican nominee for vice president in the election of 1960 which John F. Kennedy won.

Q: Narrowly.

BURKE: Narrowly. And I'm sure that Cabot Lodge would be accepted to come to Saigon as ambassador. He brought thought to himself, "Why am I being chosen to come?" He's a very shrewd political animal -- he was -- and he could, I'm sure, put two and two together and probably arrive at the conclusion, although he never stated this to me -- although he's stated several things to me on other subjects -- that possibly his selection was an effort on the part of the Kennedy Administration to make the Vietnam effort more bipartisan and get the Republican involvement.

Lodge arrived on the scene, as I said, on August 23rd -- I believe that's the correct date. He arrived at a particularly crucial moment, because the Ngo Dinh Diem regime had decided to try and surgically eliminate the Buddhist problem, I think on the night of August 21, and they invaded the pagodas in the Saigon area and rounded up several of the activist Buddhist Bonze who were sort of leading the demonstrations. And Lodge arrived at a very tense moment. The American press was out in force to cover his arrival. The obvious question asked was, "What do you intend to do about this terrible thing that the Ngo Dinh Diem regime has done to attempt to liquidate the Buddhist threat?"

He brought with him two advisors or two aides. One was Fred Flott, who had previously worked for CIA. He was more or less a political advisor to Lodge. The other advisor was a colonel who Lodge had met at the Pentagon named Mike Dunn, U.S. Army. And these two people, certainly in the early weeks that Lodge was there, became, in effect, his eyes and ears and conduits to both the U.S. military establishment in Saigon and to the mission itself, the embassy political section.

The economic section was AID. Mike Dunn, who was a friend of mine, has been over the years, I didn't know him all that well at that time of his arrival, but he was a very intelligent officer, got a Ph.D. from Woodrow Wilson School in political science and very active individual, a very effective aide to Lodge and was able to do everything Lodge asked of him. And that is the way the Lodge embassy worked, really, through those two conduits.

I'd say eventually, over a matter of weeks, possibly a couple of months, Dunn became the important member [unclear]. And he was the one that the ambassador depended on most heavily to keep the mission functioning and make sure that he, the ambassador, was being informed about everything that was going on.

Q: There is often a problem when you have put a military man in because of the training, which is, "What does the ambassador want? I'll see that it's done." I mean, we've just recently had a case of Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North causing a lot of trouble in the name of our government. But I mean, there is a military mind set, no matter how intelligent. They're trained to see the objective and not often see the repercussions particularly in a political environment. Do you think this might have been a problem here?

BURKE: Well, I don't think it was a problem. Your question is a little more -- I can understand what you're saying. In terms of the personalities involved, Mike Dunn is a very subtle individual as well as being intelligent in the military individual and coming from his background. I do know on the basis of my own experience with him that he was every bit as tough on the U.S. military side even in Saigon as he was in the embassy. In fact, I know from a couple of my military friends, they said more than once, "Wait till we get Dunn back in the Army!" However, he was able to get back into the Army and eventually made major general before he retired.

But in any event, he was out there, and I think he served Lodge faithfully and did everything Lodge wanted done. And the same time, I think he was subtle enough to provide a cushion between Lodge and the mission. Now, I do feel that Lodge arrived, he knew nobody as far as he had never served with any of the members of the staff, the diplomatic members or the Foreign Service members of the embassy staff. I think he was suspicious, one, as to why he had been appointed. Two, he didn't know the members of the staff. Three, he knew he was moving into a very, very dicey situation in terms of the relationship with the Ngo Dinh Diem regime and what he understand Washington to want.

So I think he was very suspicious throughout that entire period in that he did not accept a great deal of advice that might come to him directly from the embassy staff or from any other source within the mission. I think he was extremely cautious, kept his counsel with a very narrow circle almost consisting entirely of Dunn and Flott. And over time, I think he began to appreciate the quality of the people on the staff, but it took a while. And I'd say it wasn't until the overthrow, the coup of November, 1963, that he had begun to get to the point where he was willing to accept advice from counsel directly.

Q: Again, from your vantage point, how did the November 1963 coup play out as you saw it, and what were the feelings?

BURKE: Well, the rumors were rife in late August that a coup was in the works, something was going to happen in the very near term. Most reporters felt this. I should say this just in passing, but Cabot Lodge made a great effort to butter up the American correspondents on the scene. Almost from the moment of his arrival, he was accessible to them, and I think his press was extremely favorable throughout this period. I think he saw them individually. He gave individual background interviews to some of the more prominent members of the press corps, which was fairly sizeable even then. And I think it played very well back here.

As to the coup, how it played out. Late August the rumors were rife that it was going to happen very soon. And then the rumors began to die down. Elections were held in September for the National Assembly successfully. A new National Assembly was established. The government began to give the impression that they were on top of the situation. And things were very quiet throughout most of October. In fact, many of the journalists said to me they were a little irritated because nothing was going on. And I can't remember precisely what, but there was some sort of a story that was brewing in Djakarta and many of them got orders from their home offices to go down to Djakarta and cover that, possibly find other things to report because things were so superficially quiet in Saigon.

And National Day, which was, I think, October 26, Ngo Dinh Diem came. A parade was held. Diem was out taking salutes of the troops. The crowd was reasonably responsive to him. So things had quieted down, and then, of course, the rumors began to circulate, things would begin at the end of the month. Then the coup erupted. I was not personally aware of the relationship which was later revealed between Lieutenant Colonel Lucien Conein and the coup group headed by General Tran Van Don, "Big Minh," and Kim. But that's been pretty well documented.

So the coup itself, the involvement of the embassy, has been pretty well documented in various books that appeared -- Helen Hammer's book, Death in November, General Tran Van Don's book called Our Endless War. But there are several other books. And there appears to have been a very close contact between Conein, who was an old Indochina hand, who had been in North Vietnam right after World War II and then later on at the time the French were pulling out. He had many friends among the general group that became known as the "Captain's Majors" and whatnot of the past. But from my perspective at the moment -- I was certainly was not privy to any of this -- I rather doubt that the Political Counselor or his deputy were privy to it all.

Q: Well, how did you feel about it? I mean, what was sort of the feeling within the political section when the word came?

BURKE: Well, there was elation on the part of a few people who had argued in favor of doing something to "get this government moving or replace this government." I'm afraid that I was rather cynical about the whole affair because I -- and this was the position I took at the time in conversations with my colleagues -- I felt that unless you knew precisely what was going to follow, there was not much point in replacing a government that had been, for all of its faults, functioning reasonably well and that had claim to a mandate.

One might argue that Ngo Dinh Diem's election as president of South Vietnam was clouded to a certain extent. Nevertheless, he had been in power for a considerable number of years. He had weathered other crises in that time. And he seemed, certainly on the face of it, a leader who had the best interests of his country at heart, and in point of fact, he was almost incorruptible. After the overthrow, the Military Revolutionary Council, a group of generals who led the coup, made a great attempt to try and document evidence that the Diem regime had squirreled money away abroad in Swiss bank accounts and all the rest, and they were unable to find any.

Q: By this point, had you made any contacts using your Vietnamese in Vietnamese ruling circles even at any level?

BURKE: Certainly not within the ruling circle as such. I had several contacts at the -- oh, let's say, the office director level within administrative foreign affairs, within the state interior, knew a lot of Vietnamese business people, and met socially many Vietnamese who were connected with the government, and many people who had no connection whatever, a couple of doctors and some lawyers, people of that stripe.

Q: How did they view the situation after the coup?

BURKE: After the coup? There was a tendency on the part of almost everybody to say, "It's a wonderful thing!" There were a few people who, in quiet conversation, would express certain misgivings, what they could expect now in terms of their leadership. But generally the reaction was, "This is wonderful! Now we can get ahead and go through the problems and have a government of national union and prosecute the war against the communist insurgence without distractions, this Buddhist crisis."

Q: You were there until '67. And how were things? Was there a change?

BURKE: No. I'd say the bloom went off the rose on January 30, 1964, three months after the coup, when General Khanh mounted his what was been described as his counter-coup, and it locked up the generals who had led the first coup incidents.

I and several others had argued that once you had a coup and you got involved in a coup, the one great risk is you had to beware of is the possibility is that one coup would bring about yet another coup. So over the next two years, roughly -- well, November 1, 1963 to mid-1965 -- you had a succession of probably 11 coups and coup manqués, and every one of them brought about a certain change in government.

The real problem here just from a managerial point of view, it seems to me, is that -- let's say that if you were a firm that rates the efficiency of an institution, and you say that the Ngo Dinh Diem regime is 40% efficient, and you look at it two years later, and you find that you've changed province chiefs, maybe, six or eight times in every province, you've replaced directors general in all the ministries, you replaced ministers in all ministries, and just for arguments sake you've lost 5% efficiency every time you have a change, by mid-1965 in terms of governmental efficiency, they're probably scraping on zero.

Q: Yes. Well, I'm hoping that we will have a series of interviews devoted strictly to Vietnam. So I'm moving ahead rather rapidly. But I would like you to talk about Maxwell Taylor. General Maxwell Taylor came in and was the ambassador for a period of about a year. Lodge only lasted about a year, and then he came back again. As far as the embassy is concerned, what did he tell you before he left?

BURKE: I got to know the ambassador quite well before he left in early '64. I did a lot of note-taking for him in interviews that he had with political leaders. I should say, he was almost four-by-four or five-by-five in French. His French was excellent. He certainly needed no interpretation. But he conducted almost all of his meetings with the Vietnamese in French.

Lodge told me the day that he announced his departure -- we were going off to a meeting, and it was just the two of us in the car. And you may remember that in early 1964 with the coming political conventions to choose a presidential candidate in the United States, Lodge began to develop, without even being present, a certain groundswell of interest in various places. In fact, I think he even won a couple of primaries, political primaries, along the way -- the primary in Oregon and one or two other places -- and ran extremely well.

So the major contender, of course, was Senator Goldwater. And Lodge was, in political terms, diametrically opposed to Goldwater. And he said to me in the car that morning, "John, I'm going back. I feel that I have to stop this man in his effort to gain or make the Republican nomination. I feel it would be a great mistake in the party if he is nominated." And he said, "I really don't expect that I have a chance, but the fact that I have run reasonably well in some of these primaries that I didn't even campaign in, I'm going back to try and see whether I can work the nomination for someone else."

Q: Well, when Taylor came in, was there a change in the atmosphere of the embassy, how you operated?

BURKE: Taylor, of course, brought in a new team. The principal team was, of course, himself; Alex Johnson, with whom I'd served in Bangkok; and William H. Sullivan, who came in as mission coordinator.

Q: Both these were skilled people in the area.

BURKE: That's right.

Q: Lodge came in with people who worked as -- well, they were knowledgeable, but they weren't as knowledgeable in sort of, you might say, embassy terms.

BURKE: They created, of course, the post, I think it's the one and only time in diplomatic practice in the world which you had a deputy ambassador. They created that job for Alex

Johnson. But you had, I'd say, a very smoothly functioning embassy under these three people. Bill Sullivan was there just for six months, and it was understood that he was going to Vientiane as ambassador. He serviced as mission coordinator for the first six months for Taylor.

General Taylor I hadn't known prior to this, but I got to know him extremely well, too, and did a lot of note-taking for him during his mission. I've got the highest respect for him as an individual. He's really a remarkable, disciplined individual in terms of, not military terms, but in terms of the way he conducted himself. He has an extremely good mind, a marvelous thinker. He had Japanese, of course. He had German. He had French. I think he had one or two other languages as well. Curiously enough, he spoke excellent French but he had an American accent, so not as good as one might have hoped. But certainly his vocabulary and knowledge of the language [unclear].

I'd say the embassy functioned extremely well. But he arrived in mid-1964. He had Nguyen Khanh as the prime minister. Khanh had overthrown a coup group in January of that year. Khanh was already running into trouble from Buddhists and northern Catholics, who were at least aware that a sizable group of Vietnamese would come south after the French had withdrawn and were withdrawing and settled in the Saigon area on lands furnished by Ngo Dinh Diem.

Let's see, there's one point I wanted to make in connection with that. Taylor, of course, knew Vietnam because he had worked on the Vietnam problem for a long time in Washington. He had made several trips to Saigon with Robert McNamara. And as he had been Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Special Assistant to the President, so he had very close ties with the Kennedy family, with President Kennedy and his brother, Robert.

Q: Well, at that point, how did you feel in the embassy? Did you feel that you were sort of on a roller coaster of which you had no control? Or were we trying to have some sort of control over events?

BURKE: Well, again, I think given the many changes in government by coup or coup manqués, we were at a serious disadvantage in trying to develop contacts. When the first coup group came in, the first military revolutionary council, they put together a group of civilians, and they named it the Conseil des Notables, the council of notables. And the idea was that this appointed group was to function as a legislature of sorts.

Now, there were some very interesting political figures in the Conseil des Notables, you know, people like Shou (phonetic); you had people like Bui Diem (phonetic), who later became ambassador here; just the whole spectrum, both religious -- Buddhist, Catholic. You had people who were members of the Dai Viet Party, the members of the the VNQDD Party. It was a very interesting group, and many of them had been out of the country during the last years of the Diem regime and had just come back, and the embassy didn't know many of them.

So when the Conseil was formed, I said to Mel Manful one day, I said, "Look, why in the world don't we get Cabot Lodge to have a reception, at least?" I said, "We really don't know them well. We have a few contacts with some of them. But we almost are out of touch with this group." So he tried the idea out on Lodge. Lodge agreed to it.

I was pressed into service as protocol officer. I organized the reception. And we had it at Lodge's residence. It went over extremely well. The political section was there en masse with some other officers from the embassy. And after the party, we made a massive effort through MEMCONS, with every conversation and whatnot, and put them all together and really put together the best "book," so called, on political personalities that began to play roles in Saigon.

Unfortunately, the Conseil des Notables went out of business on January 30. But many of these same people began to resurface as political figures in these other mutations and transformations in government that we had later on.

Q: Well, you are pointing to a difficulty that often is overlooked by people who look at the work of a foreign service, and that is, often when a coup takes over, I mean, basically we don't sit back there and have a line on everybody in the country. And when a new group takes over, this often cuts out all the contacts that we have been getting. And particularly when a military coup takes over, I mean, just by its very nature, usually embassies don't have much to do with lieutenant colonels and the like. So that in a fast-moving situation, an embassy can find itself badly crippled as far as gathering intelligence in any country.

BURKE: Yes. And a coup oftentimes wipes out an embassy's entire group of contacts, and you're faced with a whole new set of faces.

Q: Well, again, I'm pressing ahead. I hope we'll come back on another occasion. But you came back in 1967, and you were working both as the director of the Vietnam Working Group and the country director for Vietnam. This is for two years, wasn't this about?

BURKE: No. First of all, I served for 12 months as Bill Bundy's special assistant.

Q: You say you were working for William Bundy. Could you describe his operating style, what you were doing for him, please?

BURKE: Yes. Well, as special assistant, I was the coordinator, if you will, for the East Asian Bureau in terms of keeping the paper moving from the political desks of the various offices within the Bureau up through Bundy to the seventh floor or up to Bundy for his decision or for his action. I worked closely with the country directors at the time, and certainly worked very closely with Bundy on a six- or seven-day-per-week basis, because it was a very critical time, and I'd say Bundy was in the office for 10 to 12 hours a day every day.

I had very little substantive input in terms of paper coming up from the political desks except in the case of Vietnam. And I would participate in substantive discussions on Vietnam with Bundy and with the then country director, Robert Miller, who had been in Saigon with me. Then when Bob left to go to the Imperial Defense College, Bundy asked me if I would take over as director of the Vietnam Working Group, which was the Vietnam directorate at the time.

You asked about Bundy's operating style. Bundy is one of the most brilliant people I've ever worked with. He and his brother, of course, are both --

Q: George Bundy.

BURKE: George Bundy. Both playing key roles at the time, and he's very hard on himself and very hard on the people working for him. He was under extreme pressure, but he certainly asked as much of himself as he asked of others. He did not tolerate sloppy work. He did not tolerate missed deadlines. He was constantly in consultation with Secretary Rusk and with other high officers of the Department in terms, particularly, of the Vietnam problem. But there were many other things going on in East Asian affairs at the time which required his attention as well.

So he, I'd say, set a very high standard for the Bureau and for himself and for the people who worked for him. The people who were not up to the mark he had replaced from time to time. But that goes with the turf, and when you're doing important work, you've got to get the work done as quickly as possible and as effectively as possible.

Q: In that time you were working for him and later when you were the country director of -- what was it? Country director for Vietnamese affairs?

BURKE: Well, the official title in those days was the Vietnam Working Group, and the director of the Vietnam Working Group was, in effect, the director of the Office of Vietnam Affairs. A Vietnam task force had been established back in the Kennedy years, and this evolved into and became the Vietnam Working Group. So it's a rather curious title, but that was the title that was used.

Q: But it boils down to you were the country officer for --

BURKE: For Vietnam.

Q: For Vietnam.

BURKE: Yes.

Q: Well, these are obviously crucial years, '68-'69. What did you as the director for Vietnam do?

BURKE: Well, there was a lot of coordination with other elements of the executive branch that were involved in Vietnam, for example, AID and the aid program, the Pentagon. We were moving to establish the Paris talks and enter into negotiations with Hanoi and looking toward a settlement. We had the Tet offensive that erupted in late January of 1968. So it was the whole panoply of day-to-day sort of crisis management, if you will.

But in the longer term, what we were attempting to do was assist -- well, achieve a series of decisions which would enable our embassy in Saigon to assist the government to become stronger -- well, the Saigon government, the government of South Vietnam -- at the same time, to bring about the commencement of these talks, looking toward some sort of a political settlement with Hanoi and to keep the whole thing together. Obviously, any move on our part in terms of negotiating with Hanoi was bound to put new strains on the government of South Vietnam. So there was a great deal of balancing that went on.

Bundy, in those days, used to chair a group which was referred to as the "Eleven O'clock Group," and this consisted of myself; George Carver of CIA, who ran the Vietnam office at CIA; Les Kalb, who was over at Defense; Mortimer Halperin, who was also over at Defense; and we would have a military officer sometimes, somebody like Bill De Pree or General George Signias as a member of this "Eleven O'clock Group."

It really was not a decision-making body as such, but it was an effort to keep all the elements of the executive branch informed as to what was going on. It was, in effect, a staff meeting, if you will, under Bundy's chairmanship, but just to make certain that all the agencies and departments with important interests in Vietnam knew what was going on, were informing the others about projects that they might be contemplating or working on, and just generally to review the situation that had happened overnight in Vietnam.

Q: What was your attitude towards this evolving thing? Were you, as with the others, so involved in almost day-to-day affairs that it was hard to haul back and say, "Should we be here? Are we winning? Are we losing?" How did you feel about that?

BURKE: I felt, at the time, that the situation was such that we had a reasonable chance of succeeding in Vietnam in terms of -- by that, I mean, arriving at a situation where the government of South Vietnam would be able to stand on its own feet at a time when U.S. forces were withdrawn, and that some sort of an accommodation with Hanoi could be worked out. I was personally convinced that the accommodation wouldn't work or couldn't be arrived at with Hanoi unless they were convinced that a full-scale win in the South was impossible to them and the cost was too high. But I felt in this time frame, '67, '68, '69, there was still hope that this could be achieved.

Obviously, Tet was a great setback to us psychologically in the United States, although I knew almost immediately from the reports coming in that militarily it had been a terrible defeat for the North, that they had tried to foment this nationwide uprising in the South, and it had failed, that they had lost a lot of their cadre as a result of this gamble on their part. But psychologically in terms of the reporting that was coming out of Saigon by the media, by the U.S. media, and the way it was played back in the United States, particularly the occupation of the embassy compound for a brief period, the occupation of Hue for a longer period, attacks carried out within Saigon itself, it was a psychologically serious blow and probably an almost fatal blow in terms of our effort.

Q: Well, how much did you and those working with you feel the pressures from outside, from Congress, from the press and all? I mean, did this have an effect on your thinking or not?

BURKE: Well, it obviously had an effect on us. It didn't have an effect, I would say, generally, on our thinking and what we felt was possible. But we had to deal with it. We had to deal with the Congress. The main brunt of testifying for the Congress was born by Bundy himself, although on occasion I did testify at the subcommittee level in support of an aid program for Vietnam, that sort of thing.

We were getting, though, constant pressure from individual congressmen and also from the reporters on the scene and also from interest groups within the United States who would come to Washington and wanted to be briefed on Vietnam, many groups which were, in effect, opposed to our continued involvement in Vietnam.

Q: Did you have the feeling -- if you can try and go back to the time that the clock was ticking as far as what we could do -- maybe because, you know, we just couldn't keep up the public support for much longer, did you feel this?

BURKE: Well, there was no question but it appeared that the public support was ebbing. And when President Johnson, in his March 31st speech in 1968, chose to withdraw from the election of 1968 and devote his time, what was left of his term, to try and seek a settlement of the Vietnam War and engage Hanoi in meaningful talks, this was obviously in response to his perception of public opinion and public support.

Also, of course, the constant barrage of reporting of demonstrations, especially at the Chicago convention, the campaign of Robert Kennedy, which was essentially an anti-war campaign that he was waging, the Democratic Convention in Chicago, all of this, it was quite obviously that the "peace group" in the United States was becoming stronger and more vocal. I do and did feel at the time there was still a fairly large residue of support in the United States, if only that element of the populace could be convinced that the situation was winnable or we could achieve our objectives.

Q: There was this talk about, "Well, if we only have 50,000 more troops and then another 50,000 and so on, we could do it." And the number grew to be half a million. How did we view the American military role? Again, I'm speaking from the State Department at the working level.

BURKE: Certainly during my time, I was not conscious of any sharp division between ourselves and the Pentagon. Obviously, the commanders in the field are the ones responsible for the success of operations, and if they felt they needed more troops, then they went out to be given more resources. Certainly, we, the U.S. Government starting with the President and others -- I should mention the Tuesday Lunch. In this period, there was a command body, if you will, at the White House, which was known as the Tuesday Lunch. And this consisted of the President, Dean Rusk, Robert McNamara, Walt Rostow and occasionally one or two others.

And in order to get decisions taken at the highest level regarding Vietnam, what you did was get it discussed and decided at the Tuesday lunch, because you had the key players right there. So whenever we had something that we wanted a decision on, it was a very -- actually, it was a very efficient mechanism in many ways, and much more efficient than doing a 40-page memorandum with attachments, which would go up through the machinery of the Department to the sixth and seventh floor, then go over to the White House and eventually be chopped off by, first of all, the NSC advisor and the President. But very quickly, you could get a piece of paper up to the Secretary, and he could introduce the subject at the Tuesday lunch and get a decision on it in a matter of 24 or 48 hours. But this group, of course, looked very carefully at propositions being made by the military regarding bombing, extent of bombing attacks against the North. And targets were approved at this level.

It didn't make -- and this is a personal view, obviously -- it didn't make a lot of sense to me, a former naval officer who had served in not only World War II but I was recalled for Korea and served three years there. But it seemed that the restrictions that we were placing on the military, especially in terms of actions against the North once we had decided to bomb the North, were much too restrictive. I also personally felt that it was a terrible blunder on our part not to have mined Haiphong harbor. I argued with Bundy in favor of mining early on -- by early on I'm talking '67-'68 -- but for one reason or another, it was concluded that it was too dangerous in terms of risks of damage to Chinese, Russian or third country shipping of one sort or another.

That decision is, just by-the-by, I think it was a mistake, because essentially mining is one of the most humane things you can do. You say, "As of 12:00 tomorrow, shipping goes in or out of that port at its own peril, because the mines are there." So anybody who moves runs the risk of running into a mine. It isn't like bombing. Actually, you can give fair warning, and as long as the shipping does not move, there's no danger to any vessel.

But I do feel that the civilian side did put heavy restrictions on the military and what it was able to do. In retrospect, I think it was pretty obvious that there was a great deal of concern that they got too close to the Chinese border. You ran the risk that we ran into in the Korean War and that the Chinese would enter.

Q: We're always inhibited by the last war.

BURKE: Yes.

Q: I mean, this is a continuing factor in whatever we do.

BURKE: Yes.

Q: It's not looking at the real situation. It's always looking at the last one.

BURKE: That's right. We all operate on the basis of experience, and when you're fighting wars, you just conclude -- it's like kidnaping situations in this age of terrorism as far as diplomacy is concerned. I've been involved in a couple of those, and it's always a mistake to try and handle the next kidnaping in a way that the previous one was handled if you handled it successfully.

JOHN T. BENNETT
Financial Economist
Saigon (1963-1965)

Economic Counselor

and

RUTHERFORD POATS
Bureau Chief, USAID
Washington, DC (1963-1967)

Assistant Administrator, USAID
Washington, DC (1964-1966)

John T. Bennett was born in Wisconsin in 1929 and joined the Foreign Service in 1955. He served in Tunisia, the Dutch East Indies, Vietnam, the Dominican Republic, South Korea, and Guatemala.

Rutherford Poats was born in South Carolina in 1922 and joined USAID in 1961. He worked on the Far East from Washington.

Bennett and Poats were jointly interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: I wonder, who went to Vietnam first?

POATS: I was never stationed in Vietnam. I was the assistant administrator of AID in the Far East.

Q: I wonder if you could give me a little background on yourself and then how you got involved with Vietnam.

POATS: Well, Vietnam was the recipient of US military and economic aid from the earliest days of AID programs. At the time of the heightening of the insurgency in South Vietnam in the Eisenhower Administration, there was a sharp acceleration in the concern about Vietnam. During the Kennedy Administration, which took a posture of containment of communism on a global basis, the Viet Cong was seen as a global threat to the United States and the response was in response to that view of it.

The economic aid was increasingly pressed by political authorities and the defense department, to intensify efforts to support the Vietnamese government - then of Ngo Dinh Diem - with the view to strengthening his capacity to win the support of the people or to retain their allegiance against the pressures of the Viet Cong.

Beginning in 1962, there was a major increase in economic aid. My first direct involvement was January 3, 1963 when I went with the Administrator Dave Bell and the Assistant Administrator for the Far East Seymour Janow, to Saigon. We met with the government officials and our representatives there to discuss what would be a useful kind of increase.

Q: Could you let us know how you came into AID and what was your position at that time?

POATS: I came into AID at the request of Seymour Janow in December 1961 at the same time he did. It was just when AID was being created out of several agencies involved in foreign assistance. I agreed to come in for one year and in fact remained.

I had been an economic news reporter and I was bureau chief in Tokyo and traveled extensively. I was initially a special assistant, then program officer and so on and at the time of this trip was the program officer of the bureau.

Q: John, to complete the picture, could you tell us who you are and where you came from and if you would carry on the questioning.

BENNETT: I worked twenty-six years in the foreign service. I went to Saigon in February 1963 as the financial economist in the economic section of the embassy. Saying that, however, doesn't quite convey what was going on.

The economic section of the embassy was in the same building as AID and we worked very closely, not always cooperatively, over the years. I stayed in Vietnam through 1965 and then went back to Washington.

In Washington I was seconded to AID, first in the Far East Bureau and then in the Vietnam Bureau, when it was broken off of the Far East Bureau, until 1969. I went back to Saigon as the Deputy Director of the AID Mission in 1973. I became acting AID Director in February of 1975 and stayed until the last of the helicopters.

Q: Rud, when did you become assistant administrator?

POATS: May of 1964. Janow resigned in November 1963 and about the same time the deputy in that bureau, Jim Fowler, was sent off to language school preparatory to going to Columbia as mission chief. So I moved up from number three to number one in a few days.

I ran the Far East Bureau from then on -- that is from November 1963 until May 1967 when I was sworn in as Deputy Administrator of AID. I kept an eye on Vietnam after that but we split the Vietnam section split off to form a separate bureau at the time I was promoted. Jim Grant came in as the chief of the Vietnam Bureau.

BENNETT: Let's go back to when you arrived in Saigon with Janow.

POATS: At that time the program was pretty conventional for politically motivated AID programs. It had a supporting assistance element -- I don't remember it being very large -- a number of conventional technical assistance institution building activities and a few capital projects. The intention was to provide much quicker impact on the political opinion. We searched for reasonable ways of doing this. We didn't have a lot of experience in these kinds of things. This was rather new to me and to AID. We had somewhat similar concerns at the same time in Laos and Thailand, where insurgencies had begun.

We developed ideas for quick impact AID programs in those three countries in parallel. I went on that same trip to Laos to talk with the people there about how they were responding to this problem.

The roof began to fall in upon the government. The scale of our involvement grew exponentially. AID became involved in support of CIA-led counter insurgency efforts and that was true in Laos. We were in fact financing the air lifts and the food and other non-lethal supplies to the forces opposing the Pathet Lao in the north. Similar programs developed in Vietnam.

BENNETT: I went there in February of 1963. In May we had the beginning of the mess in Hue where the Buddhists got pretty beaten up. Then we had the Buddhists monks burning themselves and the events of that summer.

I was delighted to be going to Vietnam. I was in Curacao at the time. I had very little preparation. My second question was "Where is it?" As soon as I got to Washington, however, I began hearing that this guy Diem hasn't got it. Then I became increasingly aware of the crossfire over those who wanted Diem and those who wanted him out.

How much of that splashed over on your side of things?

POATS: I recall as a newspaper man the efforts to generate press support for aid to Vietnam as early as 1959. So it was a controversial topic even then. But not a national one.

But you are right that we all went into this situation blindly. We had no notion of the depth of the quick sand we were walking into. We had no notion of what social engineering in that kind of culture meant. We were quite naive as to the motivations of the government officials we dealt with, shocked to see that they were not committed to the national cause, weren't even loyal to the people who put them in office. The extent of the corruption was simply staggering. This we discovered quite early on.

Once you plunge into something like this with the kinds of rhetoric that Dean Rusk surrounded it with, it was impossible to do anything else but keep plugging to find a way to make the policy rational. A lot of people spent a lot of time doing just that. We gave it our best and were loyal to the cause.

There were very few who were ready to give it up inside the government. We were somewhat mesmerized by the repeated visit of high officials, like MacNamara, and top State Department people. They were constantly finding the good signs and prospects. I must say that we never saw these signs and were pretty skeptical about these CORP's and rural operations.

BENNETT: I want to go back to that. Were you involved with that when it was first set up? I think Rufus Phillips first set that up.

POATS: He was quite new there and picked by Lansdale. Lansdale was in charge of the counter insurgency effort. A man of towering stature as far as all of us were concerned because he knew something about the country. That put him head and shoulders above everybody else.

Q: Did he really know something about Vietnam or about the Philippines?

POATS: Well yes. He transferred by analogy an awful lot. But we also had the British counter insurgency specialist, Sir Robert Thompson, from Malaysia.

Anyway, these were two people of considerable stature and those of us who were shoveling out the money were not prepared to debate with them.

BENNETT: The first question that was paramount was whether or not we would stay with Diem. The one that was never asked was, "Could we win." There was the assumption that if you changed people, you could. But that was an unexamined assumption.

POATS: The general assumption made at the time of the murder of Diem was that a new cast of characters was bound to be likely to win public support. That he had just simply worn out any chance of winning the hearts and minds of the people.

BENNETT: My feeling at the time was that we sure weren't going to win with what we had. Our mistake was that we continued to try for the next ten years with the next set.

POATS: William Trueheart, the DCM, was one of the few who expressed his skepticism in meetings to the extent that he was just at the point of being tossed out on his ear.

BENNETT: There was enormous skepticism, skepticism was understating it. The atmosphere was very poisonous. I can remember writing a very academic and uninteresting report on agricultural programs and the next thing I knew, I was summoned by Ambassador Frederick Nolting. He wanted to go over it, almost word by word. At the time he said that he had all these people who were shooting at him back in Washington. He didn't want to give them something they could use against his policies. The facts were allowed to stand but a different spin was put into it.

POATS: There are two turning points that I would like to describe, and I may as well get right to them.

One was the set of meetings at a CIA safehouse in Virginia at the time of the initial entry of the US troops. Harkins (the general in charge of MAC/V, the assistance command) General Richard Stilwell and a few others came back to brief the Washington establishment. Present were Alexis Johnson, Len Unger, deputy assistant secretary for the Far East, White House and CIA staff and me, representing AID. It was on what it would take to win, militarily. This was in the summer 1965, I believe.

The MAC/V team presented a plan that entailed putting in about 400,000 troops. That was quite a shocking number to all of us in Washington. Even so, they estimated it would take a four year effort, which was also quite shocking. Doing the arithmetic, it was clear that we were talking about a big expansion of the federal budget. That kind of war effort also entailed a huge increase in military aid to the government of Vietnam. One could easily project a vast amount of economic aid as well.

The question then was how was this going to be presented to President Johnson for a decision. Those of us who thought this was an excessive amount of lives and money for that cause said that we wanted to be sure that the President was given the facts unvarnished. He could decide the politics of it in consultation with his economic and budget advisors and others. Unger said that Alexis Johnson would present it. I asked Chet Cooper of the White House if he would make sure it was done. Well I heard later that Johnson had presented it, not to the President, but to Rusk. Chet Cooper had not found a way to report to the President for reasons that I never quite understood. There was no indication from the White House economic or political staffs that the President this shocking projection; he only learned of the projected costs gradually. He got used to it in increments. MAC/V came in with a more modest immediate request another 20,000 troops, I recall. But the long term forecast was the thing that would have alerted the President politically to what he was getting into. That was one thing that I observed. I felt later that I was derelict in not having somehow seen to it that the people around Johnson who should have done something about it, did it.

The other turning point, in my view of the war, was the decision that in order to sustain public support of the South Vietnamese government's war effort we had to maintain price stability in the South, and that this should be done by supplying goods on the market in Saigon and the other cities to offset speculative and real shortfalls in supply. Because many areas were interdicted and production was inhibited by the war effort, AID had to pump in everything under the sun including rice.

We largely ignored the damaging medium-term effect of those imports on the economy and on the people. We tried overly ambitiously to preclude price escalations. In much of the developing world, particularly in Latin America it was commonplace to have hyper inflation. But we couldn't tolerate a high take of inflation in Vietnam. We just pumped in more goods.

Now putting in those goods was not just having its impact on production in Vietnam, but also creating a whole class of venal operators who got rich on import whole business. This produced very quickly investigative reports and congressional hearings of which I spent sometimes 10 days out of every month testifying.

Literally one time I was up there I think twelve days in one month. It just went on and on endlessly. Both the Senate and the House operations committees had hearings about corruption in Vietnam, and of course the corruption was the fault of the AID managers, who were supinely accepting the guidance of the political managers about how to fight a war.

BENNETT: That brings up a whole set of management problems. I remember one that always bothered me when I was there. We were carrying on two programs at the same time. One was the conventional AID program and the other was what was called rural operations, a program towards the hearts and minds of the peasants. One story illustrates the point. I think it was Matt Drysdale who was the chief agricultural officer. Any way, he came back from a field trip and said that they had been wandering about the country and came across a program we had started to introduce cocoa production. The farmers were really ticked off because they couldn't sell the stuff and eventually began to throw cocoa pods at this group.

It struck me that this is where we got ourselves into trouble. There are two parts to this. Many program elements didn't seem relevant, and didn't mesh with the other things we were doing. It was a very diffuse effort. Later on when we did the rice program to introduce high yield rice varieties, that seemed to work quite well.

Q: Let me ask a question. I have just been reading a critique of Vietnam policy. One point mentioned was the concept that "things aren't working here and so we took over." Certainly on the military side we pushed the army to one side which helped ruin whatever moral they had. Moving them to one side while the Americans fought. How about the AID side?

POATS: No, not on the AID side, at least not in conventional AID functions. Even our heavy financial support of the economy was done through the central bank and through the various technical ministries.

The area in which there is some ground for that accusation against AID is in that twilight area between the CIA and AID, the CORDS or rural development schemes. In those operations you had very eager provincial advisors who were appointed and worked for AID but were borrowed from the State Department or the CIA or from the military services.

BENNETT: Like Tony Lake and Diehard Holbrooke -- a whole bunch of them.

POATS: They were all eager to succeed in their provinces. Like the military counterparts, they pressed for more US action. Not all of them but that was a common tendency. At certain stages later in the war when you simply couldn't count on certain province chiefs to deliver, they would bring in US civil affairs troops. Or sometimes they would get the Vietnamese army to do work that really should have been done by the civil government.

Well, that was very hard to distinguish anyway at that point. Because at that point all the province chiefs were military. But I would say the strictly AID technical efforts, producing a better rice, developing rural credit or educational programs, even on a crash basis still had to run through what had to pass for civil government. Isn't that true?

BENNETT: I think so. In some cases when they did it, it was the CORDS's guy kicking their butts to get them moving.

Q: When I was there 1969 to 1970, we had a program dealing with bringing in third country nationals in. We had trouble getting them documented. It ended up in my office, the consular office. We took over the documentation of this. There was tremendous erosion and moving in.

POATS: You mention third country nationals. We had a lot of them, maybe 2,000 Filipino medical workers. They were literally performing medical services as Vietnamese.

BENNETT: I remember Vietnamese that I knew began talking to me in late 1964 about how we were taking over. They argued that every American military guy we brought in, two Vietnamese would simply quit making any effort. The total effort would go down. I can remember coming back to Washington, in '65, and arguing that by taking over the war we had, had this effect, so that it was going to be very difficult to win. In fact I really felt that we probably wouldn't. But I never really understood how much they were talking about in terms of level of American commitment as early as '64 and '65. We, in Saigon at my level, were thinking of tens of thousands, not hundreds of thousands.

The senior U.S. General, William Westmoreland was a litmus test of this. When he first came in '64, he traveled around a lot, visiting Vietnamese units, and then all of a sudden he just stopped paying any attention to them at all. This was anecdotal, an impression that I got. But it bothered me then and certainly got across to the Vietnamese.

Ken Kugel's (in AID's Vietnam Bureau) response was "Well, we've got so much fire power, we'll blow 'em out of the water, blow 'em out of existence."

POATS: Of course, it was very hard to argue against that at the time. After all, we'd won some wars before. Nobody could understand how that rag tag bunch could resist the might of the US army which was rolling up this little peninsula.

BENNETT: John Arthur who had been a colonel but was working in AID, thought the hamlet program might work. The idea was to create a local hamlet government with a hamlet militia which when attacked could be supported by the army. That second step never happened. We never got that kind of quick reaction force, even when the Americans arrived. We were never able to take something and hold it.

POATS: All of those schemes, strategic hamlet scheme, all created disillusionments, where promises were made that simply could not be fulfilled. Security promises essentially.

Q: Just what you were saying. Did you see a problem where we made promises, that is, we made promises. Is there a problem that when we get involved with something we're not very familiar with, we tend to exaggerate what we can do and we bring people in and there is a lot of movement, but not much gets accomplished.

POATS: External efforts are useful when they support strong local leadership. When you don't have that, you don't have wise leadership or counsel there, nothing makes any sense. We kept building on quicksand. We never had a government composed both of technicians and political leaders in Vietnam that one could count upon to make the right decisions which we could then simply support. We were always pushing our own ideas and they would either grudgingly go along or enthusiastically go along but almost never initiate. That was my impression. I think that was true of almost everything except in the days of Diem's brother Ngo Dinh Nhu, who did indeed have some ideas. A very determined man, but he went down with Diem.

BENNETT: I often sensed that we were trying to do too many different things at any given point. Trying to do land reform, promote new crops, like cocoa, etc. There were just so many things going on. Even when I got there as the Deputy Director of the AID mission in 1973, it seemed to me that we were still trying too many darn things ...

POATS: Otto Passman (Congressman) used to say there's not a project invented anywhere in the world that you aren't trying in Vietnam.

BENNETT: How did you feel about that?

POATS: It's true. And this in a country that had very little administrative capacity.

BENNETT: Why didn't we focus it a little more?

POATS: Usually these things are out of some kind of parochial enthusiasm. Everybody was there to try and win the war in his way and everybody thought the universe centered on his thing. We're going to win the war through land reform; we're going to win it with health, you're going to win it with education; win it with political action in the countryside. Everybody had the solution. And who is to say that one of these solutions might not have a certain degree of verisimilitude. So try it out. Money was no object. But what we didn't take into account was the real resource constraint was acute. The main constraint was people.

BENNETT: On the Vietnamese side you mean.

Q: Until what point were you directly involved?

POATS: Directly involved until 1967 and then I turned the Vietnam Bureau over to Jim Grant and I became the Deputy Administrator and then quickly got busy with other things.

Q: Towards the end, were you getting reflections of disillusionment or was hope springing eternal with each new thing up to '75. How about towards the end and the concern of getting our people out of there.

POATS: Well, I wasn't involved at the end. I can't speak with any confidence about my memory past 1967-1968. I receded from the story. Certainly before that, no doubt about it, hope was springing eternal.

When Nixon came in, there was a thorough reappraisal by Kissinger and the whole crew here. I stayed on for a year after that as Deputy Administrator and Acting Administrator for four months before John Hannah took over. Certainly the tone in the State Department and White House was 'let's find a way to end this thing but not end it in humiliation, not end it in any way that would give encouragement to a repetition elsewhere.' There was not a lot of public pressure on the Nixon Administration the first year to end it quickly, although the American people were certainly tired and illusions were fading by 1969.

BENNETT: That was one of the things that really shook me. With Tet in 1968, the immediate reaction on the American side was really one of despair. Both Westy (General Westmoreland) and Don McDonald (the AID Mission Director), when he came back, were really shaken.

POATS: I was really baffled by the reaction of the press. I couldn't understand it. I think those of us close to Vietnam didn't understand the strange American response to Tet.

BENNETT: A lot of your problem, as Deputy Administrator, was trying to keep your Congressional support at some level of public acceptance. That had to be a running battle from sometime in 1964 on.

POATS: Yes, for a long time it was possible to use the old reliable of fanatical communist forces seeking to impose dominion over a part of the free world. That began to become tattered as government after government, corruption story after corruption story demonstrated that we weren't making it.

It was difficult to criticize the military and the people who were giving their lives in Vietnam but it wasn't at all difficult to criticize the people throwing away money. I got awfully tired defending that side of the war effort. Secretary Rusk had to take an awful lot of this, of course, and I had to go up with him and slip him notes.

Q: What was your evaluation of Rusk.

POATS: A splendid man who had a single mind on the issue of containment, and who saw, despite his expertise in the Far East (after all he was assistant secretary for the Far East before) the challenge in the jungles exactly as he would see it in Berlin. It was all part of the global contest with the Soviet monolith. He was behind his time in that.

BENNETT: I don't know, I think that was fairly widely shared throughout the U.S. Government.

POATS: He did not provide sensitive leadership in this issue. After all he was in his office eight years. I think that was a mistake. I think had there been a change in leadership in the State Department during that period, Johnson might have been led in a different direction. But Rusk and Mac Bundy were so of a mind on this issue, once Bundy had been out there and gotten bloodied himself. You know he was up at Pleiku when they mortared it.

BENNETT: I remember that. It led to my family and all the other families being taken out, and greatly changed the character of the U.S. involvement -- it became much more military.

POATS: Anyway there was too much of a cohesion of thought there between Rusk and Bundy and of course Walter Rostow who was also an activist. So Johnson was not given many options.

BENNETT: Of course the next one was Bob Komer. At any level, we generally thought he never told Johnson the truth on those issues at all.

POATS: Bob, like McNamara, could always see victory just around the corner.

Q: Mr. Poats has left and I am continuing the interview with John Bennett. Give us once again your periods of time in or dealing with Vietnam.

BENNETT: The first time I was out there was from February '63 to June of '65. In that period I was an economic officer in the embassy. After Lodge came, they made me economic counselor, which was unusual because I was much too low ranked for that. But I think it was a matter that I got along well with some of Lodge's staff. I stayed in that job until some time in 1965 when Roy Wehrle became the senior economic person and Jim Killen became the new AID Director and reorganized the whole mission.

I left Saigon in June of '65. My family had already gone in January. I went back to Washington and began working in the Asia Bureau, spending half my time worrying about the economic programs in Vietnam and then I switched over to the Vietnam Bureau full time. In those four years, I was actually spending two to three months a year in Vietnam on TDYs doing whatever there had to be done.

One of my discoveries from this period was that communications between Saigon and Washington broke down very quickly. I would go out and get my viewpoints adjusted, so I could see what they were worrying about. Then I'd come back and in a month, it would all get away from me again. It would all be different. We would be fighting about things that we shouldn't have been fighting about. So then one of them would have to come back to Washington, and we would get it squared away again.

We had a series of running issues in this period. The first one obviously was who should succeed Diem, and the kinds of sets of programs that we were going to carry on with them. There were tremendous bureaucratic rivalries.

Q: This is in the embassy?

BENNETT: I should say the U.S. mission. For example you had MAC/V, and the military attachés. Lodge got rid of the attachés because they became a pain in the neck for the military. They began a fight over the evaluation of what was happening. That was proving to be very disruptive.

The military got to be so large in Vietnam, too, that it became overwhelming. I can remember in '64 I was one of several embassy officers that had to go over for a MAC/V meeting. The first thing was the senior general didn't show up for two hours, so we all sat around and waited. The room finally ended up with thirteen generals, six colonels, and a couple of captains to carry the bags for the others, and us civilians. It was a joke.

Q: What was the atmosphere in the mission before Diem was overthrown?

BENNETT: In February when I got there, people were questioning what was happening. Ap Bac had occurred in the fall just before that, and that raised, at least in the press, a serious question about the military effort that the Vietnamese were making and whether our military aid was being effective. And whether all the other programs we had were being effective.

We had provincial representatives all over the country and many of them were reporting that things were going to hell. Others were saying that everything was fine. We ended up fighting ourselves about the correct evaluation and the appropriate set of actions. Pretty soon we had real dirty rivalry going on. Just take the fact that Nolting felt he was systematically undermined back in Washington. And take General Harkins -- I heard him tell stories that we knew weren't true to the ambassador. I don't know how you handle that. He obviously felt very strongly committed to what ever he was saying.

There were lots of other rivalries. I mentioned the two AID programs -- we had the provincial program and the conventional program, and there was a lot of rivalry there. There was a feeling on the part of the provincial reps that the other guys were not cooperating and providing full support. On the other hand, the agriculturalists felt the provincial reps didn't understand how important their professional standards were. You had real disagreements over that. It became a pretty poisonous atmosphere.

Q: How did you as an economic officer fit into this?

BENNETT: The economic questions became submerged in the larger political and security issues. And I think that was right. Of course you had that running concern throughout -- the question of which objective had priority. And that gave some of the AID people, who were let's say professional agriculturalists, real problems. They didn't want to see it done wrong. That led them into conflict with the other guys, who said "get the goodies out there." Get the Vietnamese to do their thing, to do it right.

Q: What was the reaction to the overthrow of Diem and his assassination?

BENNETT: Leading up to his overthrow, I was asked to look into what things could be stopped which would put pressure on the Vietnamese government, on Diem, to change his behavior. We worked on that. It's not so easy to turn off an aid program. The stuff is in the ships, it becomes expensive, what do you do with it? That sort of thing. In the end it became a strong psychological element that the US had withdrawn its support of Diem.

Now the overthrow. I can go through it day by day but the final day came as a complete surprise to me. I had people in for lunch and suddenly we heard machine guns, small arms firing and bombing outside. We sent everybody home. We hunkered down for a long night of artillery firing. It was pretty scary. I was a warden and I had a radio and was in radio-communication with the embassy and then I was able to talk to my neighbors and tell them what to do. I didn't know that Diem had been killed until sometime in the morning. We all stayed home. We were under house arrest so to speak. It was too dangerous to go out on the street.

The fact that Diem was killed, that came as a shock to many of us. Even though we didn't like him. None of us knew him personally, but we didn't like what was going on. We wanted him out of office. But his death was a shock. Then there was tremendous optimism about what Big Mink was going to be able to do. Then he gets put out in a coup a month later in December. I can remember going with Lodge and some other embassy officers to call on Nguyen Khanh, the next leader. We were going to be his cadre in the president's office. We had one meeting with him and that was the end of it.

This was the beginning of two years of rotating governments and totally ineffective communications between the Americans and the Vietnamese. This is our reason why we ultimately felt we had to take over the military effort and everything else.

Q: Was this discouraging to you?

BENNETT: Oh, yeah. I felt totally discouraged. '63 was a grim year. After Diem fell, there was a lot of optimism for about a month. Then the military situation became clear, and we had lost a lot of ground in the countryside and then we begin the succession of turnovers in the Vietnamese government. It produced a high level of paralysis.

Q: Were you catching the field reports from people you knew?

BENNETT: The field reporting even before Diem, was quite good. There was plenty of evidence that things were not going well and that the people who were saying everything was all right were wrong. It was anecdotal evidence about a particular province, a particular village and particular district. The point was not that there was one report but that there was an overwhelming amount of information indicating things were not going well.

Q: Did you ever sit in on meetings with Lodge and any of the others? When these things came up, how were they handled?

BENNETT: As a matter of fact, we had weekly meetings, called the mission intelligence support committee or something like that. We had people from the military, from AID, people from the embassy, and I sat in on them. We produced a weekly report. I was astonished always at the frankness with which many of these guys from the military, who publicly were very optimistic, how frank and how pessimistic much of the reporting was.

Q: Isn't it enervating being double-faced. Having to report optimistically on something on which you're getting very pessimistic reports.

BENNETT: You become triple-faced. There is a public face. Government can't afford to lie to the public and I think we were doing it. I didn't have to, but as an institution we were doing it. Then what we sent back to Washington was often couched in terms that would show a particular agency in a good light. The military reporting was much more optimistic than what I was hearing from the intelligence officers themselves. Then there were a bunch of people cast as a critical minority in the system who were trying to get a change in policy. They felt that the classified official reporting back to Washington was much too optimistic and had to be changed.

Q: How about the press?

BENNETT: I think it played two roles in Vietnam. When I first got there, I felt the press was doing a great service as it was reporting what we were hearing from the "subversives" in the mission. It put pressure on Washington to do something. Unfortunately it ended up that we took over the war instead of insisting on a higher level of performance from the Vietnamese. Later on, when I went back in '73, I felt that the press was still carrying on the same war with the U.S. government, essentially arguing that the situation was much worse than it was and that we were just a bunch of stumblebums. Probably my perception changed in part because I was being criticized, but to some degree it was true. I had the feeling that some of the reporters were really trying to get their Pulitzer by carrying on in the David Halberstam and Malcolm Brown tradition. The fact remains that the U.S. government told stories to itself and to the congress and the public from the very beginning. We should have told it like it was, warts and all.

Q: When you left the first time in '65, what did you feel about what was going to happen.

BENNETT: Just days before I went, another turn over occurred in the government. While I knew the new guy, I wasn't very optimistic. Boy, was I glad to get out of there. I went to Hong Kong and slept for twenty-four hours.

Q: When you got back you were dealing with the economic side of it, weren't you?

BENNETT: Yes.

Q: Was there any concern, I was there in '69 and I was told there was a reason but I never really understood it for all the Hondas, and the fact that the PX was loaded with tape recorders and I saw the Thai troops march in and buy things. I had been a soldier in the Korean War and you were lucky if you got displays of prophylactics. That was about all they sold in the PX. Then to see this display of wealth was disturbing in a time of war.

BENNETT: It was a strange war. The period that I was commuting from Washington, '65 to '69, the PX system had really gotten large. We had convoys going three miles from downtown Saigon to the PX and they would rip-off half of the convoy. The trucks would simply disappear. Stuff got stolen off the docks, stuff got systematically stolen out of the PX itself. They had an inventory system in which they counted what they put onto the shelves. We didn't know what was sold. We were never able to do anything about it. The military somewhere outside of Vietnam ran the PX system. The commander of Vietnam had no control over it.

Q: It was all part of a whole. Was this a good or bad idea.

BENNETT: Well, they thought it was a good idea because you were providing the soldiers with the amenities. What you were really doing was providing amenities to the staffers. You weren't really providing them to the soldiers roaming around the mountains and the woods and being shot at. They had access to them occasionally but not often.

The great harm it did was to create an enormous black-market, which involved a lot of our soldiers, it involved the Koreans, the Thais, the Vietnamese. It was part of the whole process of corruption that went on. You can take some corruption but the level of it there was just gross.

Q: Was this a deliberate policy?

BENNETT: No, some people thought it was irrelevant, the others weren't able to stop it.

Q: I had heard the theory that it was designed to sop up excess currency, to prevent inflation.

BENNETT: That argument was made, but it didn't really sop it up. You paid for your prostitutes, your female companionship, with goods that you bought with dollars. In that sense you were supplying local demand, but ..

Q: Let's go into when you came back. When was that?

BENNETT: Summer of '73.

Q: What was the situation then? How did you feel?

BENNETT: We'd had the truce. The north had withdrawn some of its troops, and we had withdrawn all of ours except the advisors. Pentagon east still stood, but it was a shell and we were depending much more heavily on the AID program.

I can remember that when I got off of the plane, I went directly to a meeting with the Minister of Finance at his home. They were about to impose a value added tax. Everybody took this very seriously. It was an attempt by the Vietnamese government, with U.S. advice and support, to increase the tax take in order to finance more of the war themselves. To get back some of the vast amount of AID that had been provided all of those years.

I was working hard from then on, right up until the end. It seemed for at least a year things were going reasonably well. Vietnamese seemed to be doing some of the things that had to be done. It was hard but it was working.

But then the North stepped up the military pressure. And it got worse and worse. There is a province up on the Cambodian border, Phuoc Long I think. When that capital there fell, that was the beginning of the end - it was the fall of '74. When some more fell, we knew things were going to hell.

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

BENNETT: Graham Martin

Q: Could you describe him and his method of operation?

BENNETT: Graham is "something else." In some ways he was one of the most unpleasant people I've ever met. I can remember him taking the skin off the MAC/V commander in a mission council meeting. He seemed to take pleasure in it. I got increasingly angry and unhappy with him. A public display of his ability to be superior. It was totally uncalled for.

On the other hand, he hung on when I think not many people would have done so. He fought very hard to get public support. He really spent a lot of time with congressional visitors. I can remember him handling Bella Abzug beautifully. He was very smooth at it. He didn't change her mind but he also made it harder for her to push her agenda.

We lost public support particularly with the newspapers back in the U.S. We lost it with what he thought was half-hearted support from Kissinger. We lost it really in the Congress.

Would a higher level of aid have made any difference? The answer is probably not. But on the other hand, those of us who were out there felt it was worth making the effort because without extra money, it was certainly not going to work. Like Dickens' Mr. Micawber, we thought something would turn up.

Q: What was your impression of the new Vietnamese government?

BENNETT: Well, it was a new generation. When I first went there, the Vietnamese all spoke French. When I got back they all spoke English. Many of them had had some American training. There was a much higher level of competence, but maybe this was because we were inside more, we knew what was going on. At least I knew better what was going on.

The real problem was morale on the Vietnamese side. They stuck with it. The ones I worked with, ministers and the next level down stuck with it for a long time. It was only around New Year's of '75 that they began to lose hope.

We used to worry about what was happening at the next level of the Vietnamese administration. The working level. I suspect that it had begun to deteriorate badly much earlier. They were still not very effective.

Q: What sort of reports were you getting from the consulates we had put there?

BENNETT: Again, it was a continuation of the old reporting system. I spent a lot of time traveling, talking to the AID people in each of the provinces, making sure that some of the things we were getting criticized for back in Washington like the care of refugees, were working reasonably well. As a matter of fact, my reaction was that they were working reasonably well. But there were some interesting differences in the reporting.

Some of the consulates were much more optimistic than others. I guess that reflected the level of military activity in their particular regions.

I don't think we were under any great illusions but it still seemed that we should give it one more try.

Q: How did the last days play out for you. I'm talking both on your job as far as AID and all that. One is just personal getting out but the other when you saw the effort no longer really made much sense.

BENNETT: After Phuoc Long, Ban Me Thuot, Pleiku, and Kontum fell. Then Hue and Da Nang. We were suddenly faced with an enormous problem of getting food to those refugees, to the military and civilians in great columns coming down the roads. We were flying helicopters up there and dropping bread. Officers came south on ships and were wanting to get off at Vung Tau and walk up to Saigon.

The Vietnamese government didn't want them in the capital for fear of a revolt. So we put them on an island, Phu Quoc off the West Coast. There was nothing there, so we had to fly in pipe, had to drill wells for water, and had to get food and shelter down there. In some cases we had boats, not docked, but sitting in the water for days. They had been taken over by the soldiers on board. The soldiers were refusing to surrender their guns. Some feared court martial for desertion; others had robbed, raped, and killed civilian refugees on the boats. We were literally unable to give them water or food until they handed over their guns.

Q: By the time Da Nang fell, didn't you feel ...

BENNETT: I didn't know about the big picture. I just had a job to do. My job was to see that the refugees were cared for and that unneeded U.S. and Vietnamese employees got out of the country. There was a guy named Cliff Frink who was absolutely vital in continuing to supply Cambodia. We went through a series of shenanigans. We would hire tug captains at high wages to pull barges up the Mekong with rice for Cambodia. The North Vietnamese began shooting at them. So we put other barges loaded with garbage or cotton bales to protect the tug and barges with the rice. That worked for a couple of weeks. Then they found ways to sink the barges and that cut it off. Arranging this was a daily problem for weeks.

Q: So you weren't looking at the big picture at all.

BENNETT: No. There was no point looking at the big picture. We were just playing out the hand. The cards had already been dealt and all we could hope for was a slip by the other side. I was beginning the process of getting my people out of Vietnam, thinning down the ranks, trying to be sure that their effects got shipped. I didn't know how long I was going to stay until noon of the last day. My wife went at about noon that day. But we weren't sure that we were all going to leave. Martin thought that we might make some sort of deal where we could keep a small embassy in Saigon. I didn't want to make a judgment on this. I would probably have stayed if that had happened. That went with my job -- I was the acting AID Director the last three months.

Q: This was not just a holding operation. You didn't know whether the thing would be continuing or else there might be a stand. In retrospect it all seems so clear, but when you are in it... Martin has been faulted so much for hanging on much longer than he should have.

BENNETT: My reaction to that is that if we had pulled out any earlier, we would have had an incredible riot in Saigon -- a total breakdown in authority. As it is, I don't know whether Ambassador Martin foresaw it happening the way it did or not. The North Vietnamese divisions had surrounded the city but weren't in it. They bombed the airport late Monday afternoon. We had been taking out masses of people for weeks. Flying them out to the Philippines or where ever we could deposit them. I had been getting people out. The AID mission even chartered a couple of aircraft to get our people out and anybody else who needed a lift.

Q: How about the Vietnamese staff?

BENNETT: Well, we had been taking them out as well. The problem for the Vietnamese staff was that many of them had family who couldn't go. I remember one woman who was preparing to go. Her husband just took off and left her. She decided that she had to stay in order to take care of her husband's sick sister. A lot of the people who would have been eligible to go, couldn't.

Q: A decision had been made which had been agreed upon by the ambassador and all that Vietnamese associated with the Americans should get out.

BENNETT: Yes, It wasn't easy though. For example, we took great care that they had enough money, in dollars. We would put them on buses and take them out to Tan Son Nhut, the airport. Then we found the guards at the gate would steal all their money. So we took the money out separately in an American car.

Q: When you're making that decision to do that, that means it's over, doesn't it in a way? Evacuating local employees. The ambassador had gone along with that. It doesn't sound in a way that there was any illusions.

BENNETT: The question is whether or not he should have done it sooner. If we had done it sooner my personal conviction is that we would have gotten fewer out. We certainly would have gotten different people out. Although, I think more people got out the way we did it, because we had martial law we could move around the city. We got all of our Americans out. And a whale of a lot of Vietnamese as well. The USIA director got heavily criticized for not getting his Vietnamese employees out. That's what I had spent weeks doing. Making sure that each days group got out. There wasn't a hell of a lot else to do.

The one thing I didn't do was burn a whole lot of low level classified material in the AID building. We somehow never got told when to do it, until it was too late.

Q: How did you go out?

BENNETT: On Monday afternoon they bombed the airport. I was running a fever and had come home and sat down. I was taking an aspirin and a little libation. The next thing I knew all hell broke loose. Ten minutes of unremitting gunfire. Everybody in the city thought that this was it. My reaction was, hey, there in the city and here we go. It turned out not to be the case. The soldiers panicked and were firing in the air.

What really worried me was my wife who was driving back from the airport when the bombing occurred. She had just put some kids who had been left by the American parent, married to a Vietnamese, with Vietnamese relatives. She'd taken them out and put them on an airplane. She was really concerned that they had been killed, but it didn't happen.

The next thing I knew, I got this phone call to come to a meeting at midnight at the embassy. I said I'm not going, I'm sick. Then I thought better of it and so I called up Martin. I talked to him for an hour about all things that had happened that day. He was in a reflective mood. He'd called the meeting, but he wasn't going to be there himself. But by that time I was fired up, so I went.

We talked about whom we were going to take out the next day. Then I went home to bed. At about 2:30, AM the Vietnamese artillery started shelling the city. You don't sleep when that's going on. The next thing I know, at 5:30 in the morning, I get a call from the embassy. "Meeting in the ambassador's office." So down I go with my wife and I never went back.

I spent that day burning Embassy files, and trying to round up my AID people. At first not all of them had to go, so I had to identify which ones would and get them picked up. Then we learned all of them had to go so then I had to contact the rest by telephone and get them picked up. We had a number of small helicopters destroyed by the artillery of the night before. They were the kind that could land on roofs, so their loss meant we had to move people around the city in cars and buses. We had a ship but we couldn't get to it because North Vietnamese troops were between us and the ship. So that didn't work out. But we put others on a barge and towed it out to sea with a tug.

There was one crisis after another. I can tell you that at one point I was so tired, I didn't think I was going to make it. But we kept soldiering on. At eight PM I was told to go and so I went upstairs to get on the helicopter. The Marine captain who was in charge was standing there cursing and saying, "Where the hell are all these people. We're waiting up here and they're down stairs having a party."

I decided that he might be right and went downstairs. People were milling around, doing nothing. I began telling them to go upstairs and get on the helicopters. Well I was effective enough that by the time I'd made it to the ground floor there was a line running all the way to the roof. I had to get at the end of it. But I got out at midnight.

Q: Did you go out to a carrier?

BENNETT: To a helicopter carrier. My wife was on another ship, the Denver, a landing ship. I was so tired. When we got on we had to stand in line and register and then they searched us for weapons and had us turn in government property -- e.g., some people had brought electric typewriters. I got bunked with a young lieutenant who was on duty at the time. It was right underneath the flight deck. Every time a plane landed, it hit hard -- boy that really wakes you up. A couple of days later I got on a copter and joined my wife.

Q: What was the atmosphere?

BENNETT: A whole lot of backbiting and excuses. Frank Snepp, who wrote Decent Interval, for example was seething with anger and would barely talk. As far as I could tell, because we had left some people we shouldn't have. The confusion, and the lack of direction and clear lines of responsibility, were part of the problem still. I felt I did all right. I got all my people out. That was my responsibility. Nobody was telling me to do it. I just went ahead and did it. I even got four of them over the wall and into the embassy at seven or eight in the evening. By pure fluke. I had been working in Joe Bennett's (the Political counselor) office, at the switchboard and saw the light for his number and took the call. They had been waiting for a bus all day at the AID Headquarters. I told them if they could get to the Embassy in fifteen minutes we could get them in. The Embassy was surrounded by crowds of Vietnamese who wanted to get out on the helicopters, so we had to figure out a way to identify them. I told them to take the cover off the embassy phone book and wave it. And we got them over. An American on top had to identify them and lean down and pull them up.

Q: Those who didn't get everybody out, what was the problem?

BENNETT: The people in the Korean Embassy stayed there till it was too late and they couldn't move. We could have gotten them out earlier through the American embassy. There were other people who worked for the CIA whose lives were in real danger. They should have been picked up and taken out, but apparently, they all weren't.

Q: You said it was your decision. Was anybody telling you?

BENNETT: The AID Mission was told how many could go out on a particular day. I would simply make sure to fill my quota.

Q: Were you and others jumping the gun?

BENNETT: There is a certain degree of lack of control over this. A lot of Americans had friends whom they helped get out. These were not officials. If you could get them out to the airport, the planes would take them. This did produce trouble. A friend of mine picked up an ex-minister and took him out to Tan Son Nhut, and dumped him on the street. The Vietnamese police picked him up. The next thing I knew Graham Martin was calling. I had to pick up the Vietnamese after he got out of jail. He was really shaking. He was white. We got him out. There was a lot of freelancing. We had a lot of people coming back in. Mission employees who'd been there in past years, came back to get their friends out. Then we had to get those people out again. There was a lack of control over what was happening.

Q: It's sort of a discouraging story.

BENNETT: You win some, you lose some. I wouldn't have missed doing it, but I sure wouldn't want to do it again. There are a lot of lessons to be learned. I wonder if we have.

Q: Let's go into when you came back. When was that?

BENNETT: Summer of '73.

Q: What was the situation then? How did you feel?

BENNETT: We'd had the truce. The north had withdrawn some of its troops, and we had withdrawn all of ours except the advisors. Pentagon east still stood, but it was a shell and we were depending much more heavily on the AID program.

I can remember that when I got off of the plane, I went directly to a meeting with the Minister of Finance at his home. They were about to impose a value added tax. Everybody took this very seriously. It was an attempt by the Vietnamese government, with U.S. advice and support, to increase the tax take in order to finance more of the war themselves. To get back some of the vast amount of AID that had been provided all of those years.

I was working hard from then on, right up until the end. It seemed for at least a year things were going reasonably well. Vietnamese seemed to be doing some of the things that had to be done. It was hard but it was working. But then the North stepped up the military pressure. And it got worse and worse. There is a province up on the Cambodian border, Phuoc Long I think. When that capital there fell, that was the beginning of the end - it was the fall of '74. When some more fell, we knew things were going to hell.

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

BENNETT: Graham Martin

Q: Could you describe him and his method of operation?

BENNETT: Graham is "something else." In some ways he was one of the most unpleasant people I've ever met. I can remember him taking the skin off the MAC/V commander in a mission council meeting. He seemed to take pleasure in it. I got increasingly angry and unhappy with him. A public display of his ability to be superior. It was totally uncalled for.

On the other hand, he hung on when I think not many people would have done so. He fought very hard to get public support. He really spent a lot of time with congressional visitors. I can remember him handling Bella Abzug beautifully. He was very smooth at it. He didn't change her mind but he also made it harder for her to push her agenda.

We lost public support particularly with the newspapers back in the U.S. We lost it with what he thought was half-hearted support from Kissinger. We lost it really in the Congress.

Would a higher level of aid have made any difference? The answer is probably not. But on the other hand, those of us who were out there felt it was worth making the effort because without extra money, it was certainly not going to work. Like Dickens' Mr. Micawber, we thought something would turn up.

Q: What was your impression of the new Vietnamese government?

BENNETT: Well, it was a new generation. When I first went there, the Vietnamese all spoke French. When I got back they all spoke English. Many of them had had some American training. There was a much higher level of competence, but maybe this was because we were inside more, we knew what was going on. At least I knew better what was going on.

The real problem was morale on the Vietnamese side. They stuck with it. The ones I worked with, ministers and the next level down stuck with it for a long time. It was only around New Year's of '75 that they began to lose hope.

We used to worry about what was happening at the next level of the Vietnamese administration. The working level. I suspect that it had begun to deteriorate badly much earlier. They were still not very effective.

Q: What sort of reports were you getting from the consulates we had put there?

BENNETT: Again, it was a continuation of the old reporting system. I spent a lot of time traveling, talking to the AID people in each of the provinces, making sure that some of the things we were getting criticized for back in Washington like the care of refugees, were working reasonably well. As a matter of fact, my reaction was that they were working reasonably well. But there were some interesting differences in the reporting.

Some of the consulates were much more optimistic than others. I guess that reflected the level of military activity in their particular regions.

I don't think we were under any great illusions but it still seemed that we should give it one more try.

Q: How did the last days play out for you. I'm talking both on your job as far as AID and all that. One is just personal getting out but the other when you saw the effort no longer really made much sense.

BENNETT: After Phuoc Long, Bau Me Thuot, Pleiku, and Kontum fell. Then Hue and Danang. We were suddenly faced with an enormous problem of getting food to those refugees, to the military and civilians in great columns coming down the roads. We were flying helicopters up there and dropping bread. Officers came south on ships and were wanting to get off at Vung Tau and walk up to Saigon.

The Vietnamese government didn't want them in the capital for fear of a revolt. So we put them on an island, Phu Quoc off the West Coast. There was nothing there, so we had to fly in pipe, had to drill wells for water, and had to get food and shelter down there. In some cases we had boats, not docked, but sitting in the water for days. They had been taken over by the soldiers on board. The soldiers were refusing to surrender their guns. Some feared court martial for desertion; others had robbed, raped, and killed civilian refugees on the boats. We were literally unable to give them water or food until they handed over their guns.

Q: By the time Danang fell, didn't you feel ...

BENNETT: I didn't know about the big picture. I just had a job to do. My job was to see that the refugees were cared for and that unneeded U.S. and Vietnamese employees got out of the country. There was a guy named Cliff Frink who was absolutely vital in continuing to supply Cambodia. We went through a series of shenanigans. We would hire tug captains at high wages to pull barges up the Mekong with rice for Cambodia. The North Vietnamese began shooting at them. So we put other barges loaded with garbage or cotton bales to protect the tug and barges with the rice. That worked for a couple of weeks. Then they found ways to sink the barges and that cut it off. Arranging this was a daily problem for weeks.

Q: So you weren't looking at the big picture at all.

BENNETT: No. There was no point looking at the big picture. We were just playing out the hand. The cards had already been dealt and all we could hope for was a slip by the other side. I was beginning the process of getting my people out of Vietnam, thinning down the ranks, trying to be sure that their effects got shipped. I didn't know how long I was going to stay until noon of the last day. My wife went at about noon that day. But we weren't sure that we were all going to leave. Martin thought that we might make some sort of deal where we could keep a small embassy in Saigon. I didn't want to make a judgment on this. I would probably have stayed if that had happened. That went with my job -- I was the acting AID Director the last three months.

Q: This was not just a holding operation. You didn't know whether the thing would be continuing or else there might be a stand. In retrospect it all seems so clear, but when you are in it... Martin has been faulted so much for hanging on much longer than he should have.

BENNETT: My reaction to that is that if we had pulled out any earlier, we would have had an incredible riot in Saigon -- a total breakdown in authority. As it is, I don't know whether Ambassador Martin foresaw it happening the way it did or not. The North Vietnamese divisions had surrounded the city but weren't in it. They bombed the airport late Monday afternoon. We had been taking out masses of people for weeks. Flying them out to the Philippines or where ever we could deposit them. I had been getting people out. The AID mission even chartered a couple of aircraft to get our people out and anybody else who needed a lift.

Q: How about the Vietnamese staff?

BENNETT: Well, we had been taking them out as well. The problem for the Vietnamese staff was that many of them had family who couldn't go. I remember one woman who was preparing to go. Her husband just took off and left her. She decided that she had to stay in order to take care of her husband's sick sister. A lot of the people who would have been eligible to go, couldn't.

Q: A decision had been made which had been agreed upon by the ambassador and all that Vietnamese associated with the Americans should get out.

BENNETT: Yes, It wasn't easy though. For example, we took great care that they had enough money, in dollars. We would put them on buses and take them out to Tan Son Nhut, the airport. Then we found the guards at the gate would steal all their money. So we took the money out separately in an American car.

Q: When you're making that decision to do that, that means it's over, doesn't it in a way? Evacuating local employees. The ambassador had gone along with that. It doesn't sound in a way that there was any illusions.

BENNETT: The question is whether or not he should have done it sooner. If we had done it sooner my personal conviction is that we would have gotten fewer out. We certainly would have gotten different people out. Although, I think more people got out the way we did it, because we had martial law we could move around the city. We got all of our Americans out. And a whole lot of Vietnamese as well. The USIA director got heavily criticized for not getting his Vietnamese employees out. That's what I had spent weeks doing. Making sure that each day's group got out. There wasn't a hell of a lot else to do.

The one thing I didn't do was burn a whole lot of low level classified material in the AID building. We somehow never got told when to do it, until it was too late.

Q: How did you go out?

BENNETT: On Monday afternoon they bombed the airport. I was running a fever and had come home and sat down. I was taking an aspirin and a little libation. The next thing I knew all hell broke loose. Ten minutes of unremitting gunfire. Everybody in the city thought that this was it. My reaction was, hey, they're in the city and here we go. It turned out not to be the case. The soldiers panicked and were firing in the air.

What really worried me was my wife who was driving back from the airport when the bombing occurred. She had just put some kids who had been left by the American parent, married to a Vietnamese, with Vietnamese relatives. She'd taken them out and put them on an airplane. She was really concerned that they had been killed, but it didn't happen.

The next thing I knew, I got this phone call to come to a meeting at midnight at the embassy. I said I'm not going, I'm sick. Then I thought better of it and so I called up Martin. I talked to him for an hour about all things that had happened that day. He was in a reflective mood. He'd called the meeting, but he wasn't going to be there himself. THOMAS L. HUGHES
Director, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1963-1969)

Mr. Hughes was born and raised in Minnesota and was educated at Carleton College, Oxford University and Yale University. After service with the US Air Force he worked on Capitol Hill and became active in Democratic Party politics. He later joined the Department of State, first as Assistant to Under Secretary Chester Bowles and subsequently as Deputy Director, then as Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, where he served during the event filled period 1961 to 1969. His assignments brought him in close contact with the major political figures of that era. His final government assignment was to Embassy London as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: I had only one slight contact with Roger Hilsman, one time when I was briefing him about events in the Congo. This was when all hell was breaking loose there. He just seemed to swell up and enjoy the talk about columns coming through the Congolese jungle of rebel troops. He started talking about his Burma days. Owen Roberts, our analyst for the Congo, kept saying "These guys may be spotted. They are going to go home and have beer and lay their wives or girl friends and this is not going anywhere." There were big arrows pointed. I would have thought with this OSS (Office of Strategic Services) background that he would have reveled in this sort of thing.

HUGHES: Roger of course had a heroic wartime background in the Burma theater. But I don't think of his reveling too much in covert operations. He reveled in counter-insurgency like

President Kennedy. Concepts like “strategic hamlets” and “ink blots” in Vietnam really absorbed his attention. He was an admirer of British General Thompson of Malaysian guerilla warfare fame. Roger agreed with him that the situation in South Vietnam required new, unconventional notions about how to pacify the countryside. President Kennedy was on that same wavelength

Q: Maybe we should skip now to Vietnam.

HUGHES: (TLH note in 2006: This Vietnam part of my 1999 interview has been amplified and deepened in a major way by subsequent publications. First, substantial material was published in 2004 by the National Security Archive at George Washington University.

(<http://www.gwu.edu/nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB121/index.htm>) This was the first release of INR’s internal evaluation of its Vietnam estimates from 1961-69, I commissioned this study as INR director in late 1968. It was designed as a miniature Pentagon Papers exercise consisting of a chronological review with reprints of significant texts as well as thematic summaries of INR’s basic output in the Kennedy and Johnson years. Interagency obstruction and bureaucratic inertia had kept the study hidden for decades, despite efforts to have it declassified.

(Second, to accompany the release of the study in 2004, I wrote a retrospective preface which is also available in the internet package above. “The INR analysis on Vietnam” stands out as tenaciously pessimistic from 1963 on, whether the question is the viability of the successive Saigon regimes, the Pentagon’s statistical underestimation of enemy strength, the ultimate ineffectiveness of bombing the North, the persistence of the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong, or the danger of Chinese intervention. This 2004 preface includes extensive comments on my personal role on Vietnam under Kennedy and Johnson, as well as INR’s position within the State Department, the intelligence community, and the wider foreign affairs bureaucracy in Washington.

(Finally the transcript of a conference on Vietnam held at St. Simon’s Island, Georgia, on April 8-10, 2005, sponsored by the Watson Institute for International Studies, Brown University, is now available. This transcript contains considerable additional commentary by me about INR and my personal role on Vietnam. Taken together, the documents listed above amplify in a major way the responses I gave here in this 1999 interview below.)

During my eight years at INR, Vietnam was, of course, THE major issue. It constituted also a prime exhibit of the uneasy relationship between policy and intelligence. The saga began slowly with Laos and Vietnam in a kind of tradeoff early in the Kennedy administration. It was almost as though Kennedy consciously gave Laos, which happened to be militarily indefensible, to the doves in general-- and to Harriman in particular--- to produce some kind of modus vivendi. Vietnam by contrast was entrusted to the hawks to build up and fortify as our chosen protectorate. JFK compartmentalized the South East Asian crisis, letting the negotiators work on the Laos part of it and pointing to Laos when his policy was criticized for being too militarized. At the same time he gambled on a hoped-for success in Vietnam. Kennedy was rather pleasantly surprised that Harriman pulled off his Laos negotiation and came up with some compromises that at least might allow US policy to muddle through.

Q: This is actually where the Soviets were very much involved.

HUGHES: Not only the Soviets, but the international community as well in the form, for example, of the ICC (International Control Commission). In addition there were some storied individuals involved, like the Polish Ambassador in Washington in the late '60's-- a fascinating character named Jerzy Michalowski. Poland was a member of the ICC, and he had early on been deeply involved behind the scenes as Director General of the Polish Foreign Ministry. I remember going more than once to Mikalowski's embassy residence in Washington, and being impressed with his ambidextrous approach. Previously he had been ambassador to the Court of St. James and also ambassador to Hanoi. On his desk he had autographed pictures of both King George VI and Ho Chi Minh.

I said earlier that Kennedy decided to negotiate his way out of Laos and, if necessary, militarize his way out of Vietnam by sending US military advisers for starters. I think it is futile to speculate over what Kennedy would have done about Vietnam if he had lived and won reelection in 1964. Some of his champions are sure that he would have withdrawn. Roger Hilsman thinks so. Others are convinced that the same predicaments that confronted Johnson would ultimately have forced Kennedy to escalate as well.

In terms of domestic politics, hypothetically it would have been somewhat easier for Kennedy to disengage from Vietnam than it was for Johnson because of JFK's Catholicism. The Catholic aspect of the Vietnam war has always been awkward to discuss, but it is there and bears further investigation. I am thinking of Diem's own background at Maryknoll, the dramatic Catholic refugee flow into South Vietnam, the role of luminaries like Cardinal Spellman, and the presence of prominent Catholic generals and politicians in the American Friends of Vietnam. Kennedy and Johnson were located at rather contrasting poles on the political spectrum. Kennedy used to tell his entourage that he was better able to manage the Catholic enthusiasm for Vietnam than anybody else. The opposite was true of Johnson who had to be more conscious of, deferential to, and solicitous of the Catholic vote.

Kennedy (rather diabolically?) had early on sent Johnson out to Vietnam as his personal representative. This was LBJ's first foreign assignment as Vice President. He came back with an autographed photograph of Diem which he proudly displayed in his house in Washington in 1962-3. Johnson had ingratiated himself with Diem and, with his customary extravagance, proclaimed that Diem was "the Churchill of Asia".

By the time I became INR director in the spring of 1963, there were already disputes inside the intelligence community over Vietnam. Views differed about the significance of the Buddhist uprisings, the role that Diem's brother Nhu played in suppressing them, and how seriously Washington should take the growing religious controversy. Kennedy was personally startled by the Buddhist protests, which perhaps for the first time made it clear that he was not dealing with a Catholic country but only with a Catholic regime. According to several accounts, INR's analysis of the serious potential dimensions of the Buddhist crisis certainly reached Kennedy's desk during this period.

Implicit in INR's analysis was a warning about possible consequences. Here was a minority Catholic government in a heavily Buddhist country representing a very strong interest group of ex-North Vietnamese Catholics who had fled south. Diem's sister-in-law, Madame Nhu, was gratuitously inflaming matters with her references to burning bonzes as "Buddhist barbeques." As a former friend and supporter of the organization, Kennedy took note when the American Friends of Vietnam began to take their distance from Diem and advocate a change in regime. JFK was also impressed with the resignation of the hapless Vietnamese Ambassador in Washington, Tran van Dong, Madame Nhu's father, who publicly denounced his daughter and told people that Vietnam was a looming catastrophe. Thus there were a number of negatives accumulating in the summer of 1963 commanding the attention of policymakers.

Q: I would like to talk about the intelligence side. I can't imagine that INR had a cadre of Buddhist experts. Was this a bunch of hotshot intellectuals making snap judgments or did you feel you were getting some in-depth understanding?

HUGHES: That's a good question. It always seemed to me that we were inadequately staffed in general on Southeast Asia when it came to quantity, but comparatively well staffed when it came to quality. People like Lou Sarris, Dorothy Avery, Dick Smyser, Paul Kreisberg, and Evelyn Colbert had considerable background on Vietnam, many of them with experience on the ground. When he was INR director, Hilsman made repeated trips to Vietnam. We sent Lou Sarris out there more than once as disputes arose with the Pentagon. Later on Bill Trueheart, former DCM in Saigon, also served in INR.

During this period we had to be aware that the press in Saigon was also playing an increasingly important role. David Halberstam so incensed Kennedy with his negative reporting that the President asked the New York Times to get rid of him. Halberstam's retaliation for that was his book The Best and the Brightest, where the best and the brightest don't come out very well.

Roger Hilsman, Mike Forrestal, Averell Harriman, George Ball, and Henry Cabot Lodge were later blamed for the sequence of events that led to the Diem assassination. This is unfair. History is written looking backward, but it evolves looking forward. Ultimately the fact of the Diem assassination colors the retrospective attitudes. At the time, those who signed off on the famous August 1963 telegram were reacting to the precipitously declining situation highlighted by the Buddhist problem with Diem. When Lodge asked for instructions on how to handle Diem, his family, and the Buddhist crisis, Washington was forced to confront a very disagreeable situation. The atmosphere was rather electric when the Hilsman telegram was drafted and approved in various quarters, including quarters that later said they hadn't quite approved, or done so conditionally, like Kennedy, Rusk, and McNamara. The telegram basically told Lodge to invite Diem to separate himself from his brother Nhu. Some, like Fritz Nolting, the outgoing American ambassador to Vietnam, thought this was a cockeyed idea and that there was no way you could separate the two brothers. But Nolting was on his leisurely sea voyage back to America which made him effectively a non-participant. It was unfortunate that the crisis came to a head during a change of ambassadors. Lodge had just arrived when he sent the inquiry to which Washington was responding.

Q: Was INR included in this?

HUGHES: INR was involved to the extent that we had written a sober paper earlier that week about the Buddhist crisis, a paper which Mac Bundy and Mike Forrestal, insisted that President Kennedy read. Moreover, by coincidence, it happened that for other reasons Forrestal had previously asked me to have lunch with him at the White House the day of the outgoing telegram. I had driven in to the State Department with Roger Hilsman that same Saturday morning, and Roger was clearly primed for an eventful day's work. As I say, I think he has been unfairly singled out for blame. He was part of a group that legitimately considered the Buddhist crisis to be very grave and of another group that worried about Nhu's reported tendencies toward neutralism. He found brother Nhu intolerable for both reasons. I recall that Forrestal at lunch, much to my surprise, said that Harriman "finally" had just come on board. "Finally" at least means that Averell was by no means the instigator of the August 23 telegram. It is true that he played an important part in legitimizing it, as did George Ball in the State Department. Alex Johnson later wrote that he was playing golf with Ball and was asked to stay under a tree and remain uninvolved while Ball considered Roger's draft telegram. That gives you a glimpse into the complicated personal maneuvering that went on that weekend. My impression is that President Kennedy's role remains in dispute. He was clearly deeply involved personally. I think he was more than acquiescent on Saturday, while his acquiescence turned to outrage two days later when the denunciations began.

If Diem had pushed his brother Nhu out of office and sent Madam Nhu off to Switzerland to calm down, things might have been very different. Ultimately the fact of Diem's assassination affects people's recollections retrospectively. Nowhere in the telegram is there anything about assassinating anybody. The question at the time was whether the proposed removal of brother Nhu from office was possible.

Q: It sounds to me like one of these Washington cables - just tell Diem to straighten out his family - and we told them what to do, so if anything happens we are covered. I got one of those, a couple of months later. Madam Nhu was in Belgrade at an international parliamentary union thing lobbying. I got a telegram saying "Try and persuade Madam Nhu not to go to the United States and raise hell." If she comes in for a visa I don't know what I'm supposed to say - the weather was bad? Did anybody think anything was going to happen with this or was this just to cover your ass?

HUGHES: Of course Kennedy himself had originally chosen to send Henry Cabot Lodge to Saigon partly for that reason--political protection. Lodge had been Nixon's running mate for vice president in Kennedy's recent 1960 Presidential campaign. He was also the Senator from Massachusetts whom Jack himself had defeated earlier in 1954. If Vietnam were later to become politically damaging, the blame would at least be shared on a bi-partisan basis with Lodge in Saigon.

Q: What was expected? Were you gathering anything at the time?

HUGHES: There was another element in the intelligence about brother Nhu to the effect that he was not only capable of butchering Buddhists but that he might work out a deal with Hanoi. The two-pronged thrust of the intelligence about Nhu tended to bring together otherwise opposing forces in Washington—those who wanted to find an exit from Vietnam and those who wanted to stay and win. Hilsman and Harriman were both in the latter camp at the time of the August telegram.

Q: How were you feeling about the intelligence you were getting from Vietnam? How comfortable were you at that time?

HUGHES: We were very uncomfortable about official reporting from Vietnam. We had been critical of Nolting's reporting. We thought it was important to get people out there on the ground to talk widely, not only with the American military and other American officials in Saigon, but also out in the countryside with the troops, with the press, and with foreign observers. There were various INR visits to Vietnam, some of them celebrated. While Hilsman was INR director, President Kennedy sent him and Mike Forrestal on a joint mission to Vietnam. They came back already worried about official reporting. US military reporting became an increasingly difficult problem for INR analysts, culminating in a famous blowup with the JCS in the fall of 1963.

Complicating matters in 1961-3 was the fact that green berets and counter-insurgency had become part of the Kennedy mystique. He and Hilsman shared an enthusiasm for strategic hamlets. A new breed of Americans, right out of Kennedy's inaugural address, was being tested in Vietnam. These were people who didn't take no for an answer, and normally didn't accept skeptical intelligence very comfortably.

Q: I've interviewed a lot of people who served in Vietnam, particularly towards the latter part of the time you were in INR. The military reporting, just by definition, has to be "can do". Also you had a certain discrepancy between a lot of young men who were out in the field as province advisers or out in village hamlets who reported through the embassy's political section. The latter consisted of more senior officers who filtered it out to get away from the supposedly youthful enthusiasm. Thus there was a more rosy picture at the top of the embassy than maybe you were getting from the young people. Did you have lines into that province reporting level?

HUGHES: Yes, and we succeeded to a degree. The people we sent out to Vietnam tried to develop those lines. So did the rather small cadre of academic experts who were not in the government. Unfortunately the number of Vietnam specialists outside the government remained rather stable instead of growing exponentially as the war went on. In fact, this was one of the scandals of the war. The war itself went on and on, but the scholarly community on Vietnam didn't grow along with it. There were various reasons for that phenomenon, including the growing disinclination of the scholarly community to accept government contracts as the war grew more unpopular. In INR we did try to tap into the outside community of experts, such as it was.

Wesley Fishel, for instance, had been out in Vietnam in the late '50s with Wolf Ladejinsky working on land reform. He was a friend and admirer of Diem in the early days, but gave up on him by mid-'63. In late August 1963, I think it was over Labor Day weekend, we called a meeting in Washington at INR to discuss the contingency of a possible successor regime should Diem leave office. Allen Whiting our office director on East Asia, and Lou Sarris, one of our long-time analysts, were joined by Fishel who came in from Michigan for the occasion. Gilbert Jonas from New York also joined us, the one-time secretary of the American Committee on Vietnam. Jonas had had several years' experience as the public relations person for the American Committee and he knew the Saigon scene very well.

We brought them in one week after the August telegram crisis to brainstorm about what the best follow-on regime of generals might be if Diem were to depart. Their conclusions were passed on to Hilsman and Forrestal. Meanwhile, the generals did not in fact move against Diem for another two months. September and October passed with nothing happening. Some people think that Hilsman's famous telegram went out and Diem was promptly assassinated. The generals delayed for weeks, ample time for Kennedy and his top circle of advisers to have corrected their mistakes if they had serious second thoughts about them.

Q: Look a telegram goes to Ambassador Lodge to go and tell Diem that he has to separate himself from his brother or we don't think he is going to win. But that isn't an action thing. Wasn't more going on behind the scenes with the CIA station chief?

HUGHES: The CIA station chief was very definitely involved all through September and October. He was talking to the generals while Ambassador Lodge was talking to Diem. Near the end a rather desperate Diem asks Lodge "Is the government of the United States still backing me?" and he gets an answer which he had to interpret as negative. That leads to another story that so far has not been convincingly pieced together. Why, during the preceding weeks, were contingency arrangements not made for giving Diem refuge or for flying him out of Vietnam? The impression remains that American officialdom was content to leave Diem and his brother to the post-coup mercies of the plotters.

Within a month Washington became temporarily distracted because of Kennedy's own assassination. What stance would Johnson take toward his complicated Kennedy inheritance? Years earlier, I had watched him day after day in the Senate. I was somewhat surprised when Johnson, I thought uncharacteristically, decided that the Kennedy's team would basically continue in place in the Johnson administration. LBJ decided to keep Rusk, Bundy, McNamara, Rostow, and McCone. Here was a man who under normal circumstances would have fashioned a Johnson administration from the beginning. But because of the assassination and because of Johnson's own real insecurities, he retained the major Kennedy appointees with all their Vietnam baggage. A year later he found himself confronted with a unanimous recommendation from the Kennedy holdovers to expand the war and he expanded it. I have often thought that the chances of de-escalation in Vietnam might have been as good--not better, but as good--if Johnson had allowed most of the Kennedy crowd to leave in early 1964 and had appointed more run-of-the-mill Democratic politicians.

Probably Johnson would have gone the way he did anyway. "They would impeach me, wouldn't they, if I cut and run out of Vietnam?" This was a persistent worry of Johnson's in his telephone tapes in '64. But it might have been a closer call, I think, and the decision to escalate in a big way in 1965 might have been moderated, if not avoided, had Johnson surrounded himself with his own domestic political advisers. Confronted, as he was, with a solid phalanx of major Kennedy holdovers, whatever possibility there might have been for avoiding escalation in 1965 was lost.

Meanwhile there was also the 1964 Presidential election. Once more we saw the ubiquitous interplay of domestic politics and foreign policy with intelligence inextricably involved. As soon as Johnson became President he had to consider how he was going to get through 1964 without losing the war in Vietnam. The more the unknown generals toppled one another in Saigon, the more desperate this whole thing looked. At home Johnson was going to be confronted by Goldwater who was bound to accuse him of losing Vietnam at every plausible opportunity. Johnson wanted to go through the campaign as the responsible one, in contrast to the irresponsible Goldwater. The whole object was to tinker the Vietnam crisis over for the campaign year and the November election. Johnson was determined to come across as restrained, sensible, and incremental against the rash, nuclear-minded pilot from Arizona.

Johnson had suffered through the “who lost China?” debate in the ‘50s and was completely sensitized to Republican accusations about losing one more country to communism. Almost everything written in ‘64 was written in that context. Those who wrote intelligence papers knew that if the President was reading them he was going to be reading them in that context. Mind you, this was before we had firm evidence of North Vietnamese troop infiltration. Not until early ‘65 did we have real proof that the Ho Chi Minh Trail was being used to infiltrate North Vietnamese regulars.

Meanwhile, in the summer of 1964, because I had worked for Hubert Humphrey in the Senate and because he was about to be chosen as Johnson’s running-mate, Rusk thought it would be a good idea for me to brief Humphrey regularly on Vietnam and other intelligence. So, in addition to my role as Director of Intelligence and Research, I was assigned to brief Humphrey. There was even some discussion about my briefing Goldwater, because he also knew me and I was still a member of his Air Force reserve unit. However he decided not to be briefed by anyone from the Johnson administration outside the Pentagon. I did brief Humphrey, meeting him frequently that summer. In fact I was at the Democratic convention in Atlantic City as his briefing officer. I was officially available to brief Hubert during the day, while I was unofficially helping draft his acceptance speech the night of his nomination as vice-president.

Q: Were you comfortable with this role?

HUGHES: Not entirely. On the other hand I didn’t feel uncomfortable. In those days we thought we could compartmentalize. I tried to be meticulous and careful about which role I was performing. Meanwhile in the days before the Democratic convention that August, Johnson was playing his usual manipulative game--this time with Humphrey and the other Vice Presidential aspirants, including Gene McCarthy-- keeping them guessing where, when, and on whom the VP lightning would strike. Johnson repeatedly made it clear to Humphrey, through his intermediary James Rowe, that being Vice President under Johnson would entail absolute loyalty. This applied to any possible substantive disagreement on Vietnam or on any other major policy matter.

Just before the Democratic Convention we had had the Gulf of Tonkin crisis. Sunday, August 2, occurred on another of those summer weekends when people were out of town. McNamara was climbing mountains in Wyoming. The Bundys were up in Massachusetts. I happened to be here, was awakened early in the morning, and summoned to Rusk’s house for breakfast. There I found myself in the company of Rusk, Ball, Cy Vance (McNamara’s deputy), General Wheeler, the newly appointed chairman of the JCS, and a couple of men from the CIA and the Navy. We were briefed about an attack on the USS Maddox. The evidence pointed clearly to North Vietnamese PT boats as the culprits. The Navy had sent the Maddox into the Gulf of Tonkin to show the flag and perhaps to be on the scene in case there was any intelligence to be gleaned from radar activity along the shore.

While Virginia Rusk cooked pancakes and served us breakfast, we sat on the floor looking at maps of the Gulf of Tonkin, noting the proximity of islands, speculating about 3-mile versus 10-mile off-shore claims, and guessing where our destroyer might have been. We were also aware that certain covert activities had been approved for this area, the so-called 34A operations. No one knew whether the captain of the Maddox knew about them, or whether the South Vietnamese involved in the 34A ops knew about the Maddox. The Pentagon seemed doubtful about both issues. The scene was reminiscent of the Versailles Peace Conference with Lloyd George and Clemenceau struggling to locate Trieste on their map of the Adriatic. Anyway after we brainstormed this for a couple of hours our small group first went off to our respective offices and then to the White House to brief Johnson.

It was a rollicking encounter, with Johnson at his funniest and most incisive. He asked all the right questions. He speculated correctly that the GVN maritime operations could have stimulated radar activity along the coast, which in turn could have allowed our destroyer to map the coast electronically. He allowed for possible North Vietnamese confusion linking the 34A operations and the presence of the Maddox. He decided that the circumstances were too murky for armed retaliation, and concluded that he would merely warn the North Vietnamese against a repeat performance. (2006 note: subsequent to this interview, TLH discovered contemporaneous notes written later that day about this LBJ briefing. He recounted them at length in session three of the Brown University Conference mentioned above, April 9, 2005.)

The missing leadership was back in town by August 4th in time to handle the so-called second attack at the Gulf of Tonkin. McNamara with his usual decisiveness took charge of verifying the authenticity of the whole event, after doubts had been raised and LBJ briefed about them. Johnson demanded certainty before acting, and the Pentagon rose to the occasion by resolving doubts in favor of certainty. Johnson arranged for McNamara to brief Capital Hill and without further ado, McNamara testified with assuredness about the second attack, misleading the Congress, and propelling more or less everybody into supporting the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Not that Johnson didn't rather welcome the opportunity. Assistant Secretary Bill Bundy had drafted the resolution and had it on the shelf for just such an occasion. At the time, the resolution's supporters, including Fulbright the floor manager, were chiefly worried about Goldwater who was now the Republican nominee for President and eager to denounce Johnson for inaction.

The conventional wisdom now discounts any second attack. The North Vietnamese at the time and since have denied a second attack. Apparently readers of the intercepts at the Pentagon mixed up the times and dates on the telegrams. Those that they thought were referring to August 4 really referred to August 2. The certainty contained in the McNamara testimony was not corrected after contrary conclusions were reached.

Q: Was this of concern to you, that McNamara was such a take charge person? I would imagine by this time there would have been some concern about military intelligence.

HUGHES: Yes, I was concerned about both. When it suited his purposes, McNamara himself rose above the confines of military intelligence. He had his own intelligence. By 1965 he was deliberately seeking intelligence outside the military. He ultimately had some intelligence crafted for his own use at CIA without DIA involvement.

Q: Did he ever call INR?

HUGHES: No, but he tried to fire me once in the fall of 1963. INR had questioned MACV's own Vietnamese battle statistics as well as the Pentagon's interpretations of them. (I wrote this incident up at some length last year in a review of McNamara's new book. See Foreign Policy Magazine, Fall 1995, "Experiencing McNamara.") The joint chiefs were furious when INR produced a research memorandum based on the military's own statistics, reaching negative conclusions about the progress in Vietnam which contrasted with the Pentagon's own positive assessment. McNamara protested to Rusk. The latter called me in and told me that INR had made the JCS and McNamara very unhappy. He remarked "After all, they are the experts on this kind of thing." I said, "You have often made it very clear that INR is independent, and that we are to call the shots as we see them." "That's right" he replied, adding, as if to be helpful, "Would you like some military staffers?" I said, "No, I don't think so. We know what they think. We talk to them regularly. But we don't really need colonels over here helping us write." "I can understand that," said Rusk. So he sort of passed it off, concluding, "I'll tell them that any time the State Department gets involved in military analysis, we will of course check with Defense." I said, "We always do check, but we don't clear." "Well, let's just leave it at that," Rusk said.

Q: It doesn't sound like a very take charge person.

HUGHES: No, Rusk was always deferential. He was deferential to McNamara. He was deferential even to me. He made a career out of deference. That was a major characteristic in his rise to power and also a major ingredient in his staying power.

Vietnam also figured in a big way in the famous Johnson versus Bobby Kennedy rivalry. One reason Lyndon stayed in Vietnam and escalated was that he thought that Bobby might otherwise accuse him of jettisoning Jack's legacy on Vietnam. Bobby had been and could have remained a hawk on Vietnam. At one point he volunteered to become the ambassador in Saigon. Lyndon ran from that as fast as he possibly could, knowing that that prospect meant nothing but trouble, no matter how it worked out. It was never clear that Bobby would be a dove until Johnson himself was over-committed on Vietnam and the whole situation went sour domestically. Of course, Johnson had already annoyed Bobby by deliberately bypassing him for the vice presidential selection. Bobby always loomed large in Johnson's universe of possible opponents.

Johnson lucked out. Goldwater was blunted by the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. LBJ looked resolute in responding to an attack on an American ship, but moderate in comparison to Goldwater who hinted that he might have bombed Hanoi in response to the Tonkin engagement. Johnson was able to be moderate, middle of the road, responsible. Goldwater looked like an extremist. The campaign ad with the little girl and the daisy countdown worked. The responsible Johnson won and the irresponsible Goldwater lost.

Lyndon Johnson also had always liked the other Senator from Minnesota, Humphrey's colleague, Eugene McCarthy. In '64 Johnson tantalized both men over the vice presidential nomination. He did the same with Chester Bowles' old rival from Connecticut, Senator Tom Dodd. In the running up stage, McCarthy finally got tired of being used and withdrew. The night before the nomination, LBJ had both Humphrey and Dodd fly down to Washington so they could twiddle their thumbs outside the oval office waiting for a decision. Humphrey fell asleep waiting for Johnson, but Dodd woke him up exclaiming, "Hubert, how can you sleep at a time like this?"

The Johnson-Humphrey ticket went on to a massive victory in the November election. Fortunately Vietnam hadn't fallen apart in the meantime. Bill Bundy was now producing an options paper about what to do next. Included was a surprise option which most of us were unaware of at the time. In retrospect it suggests that Bill was much more of a dove than anyone who knew him would ever have imagined. This is the paper that included a withdrawal option which so agitated Rusk and McNamara that it was withdrawn from circulation and shredded. There is a good discussion of it in the new book by Kai Bird on the Bundy brothers. Generally speaking, the daily Bill Bundy whom I saw and knew was an unrelenting, though thoughtful, hawk.

After the 1964 election, Humphrey visited LBJ at his Texas ranch. Shortly afterwards, Rusk and Mac Bundy, with Bill Moyers also present, met with LBJ also at the Texas ranch. A few days later I was having lunch with Moyers at the White House. "Did you hear about the discussion about you at the ranch?" Bill asked. I said, "No." "Well, Rusk proposed that you should become the deputy undersecretary of State for political affairs." This is the key job that U. Alexis Johnson had held in the Kennedy administration, with a direct policy pipeline to Rusk, bypassing first Bowles and then Ball, the undersecretaries. "Bundy liked the Hughes idea too, and Johnson said, 'That's fine. Let's do it.' Suddenly, at the end of the morning, Rusk said, "On second thought, I think I'll withdraw that suggestion about Tom Hughes. He is too valuable where he is.'" Moyers asked me, "Can you figure that one out?" I said "No, I can't figure that one out." He shook his head adding "I can't either."

That was a potentially fateful proposition, because, if implemented, it could have had a bearing on Vietnam policy right at the beginning of the Johnson-Humphrey administration. They needed a replacement for Alex Johnson who at that point was in Saigon as deputy ambassador. I would have accepted that post had it been offered. The change could have made some difference in the pre-escalation discussion, because I would have been superior to Bill Bundy in the State Department hierarchy. Had Bill Bundy's secret dovish instincts come to the surface, there would have been a skeptical Ball-Hughes-Bill Bundy lineup at State at a critical time. Instead of this theoretically possible de-escalation signal, the new administration opened with the opposite—with Mac Bundy's own trip to Vietnam in early '65, the Pleiku attack, and Mac's escalation recommendation which Rusk endorsed.

Here was Johnson at the outset of his second term-- determined to accomplish a huge domestic agenda, fearful that Vietnam was going to undermine it; and yet deciding that the domestic political price for his Great Society was recommitting to Vietnam. The way to keep the military and the Republicans tolerant of his Great Society legislation on Capital Hill was to persevere in Vietnam. He was forced to confront the issue sharply just as 1965 opened, when the Viet Cong attacked an American base at Pleiku while Mac Bundy was personally in Vietnam. Of course Lyndon Johnson thought that CODELS (Congressional delegations) were the most important visitors in the world except perhaps for personal representatives of the President like Bundy. In LBJ's view every foreign government was totally attuned to US official travel. He immediately assumed that Hanoi had attacked Pleiku deliberately because Bundy was there in Vietnam at the time. There was no other possible explanation in the ethnocentric view of the former Senate Majority Leader. In fact there is no evidence that the Pleiku attack was authorized by Hanoi. It may well have been the work of a local commander. Of course it also pleased Mac Bundy to think that his visit was of such significance that the attack must have been timed to coincide with his presence in Vietnam.

Once more there was to be no second guessing. The President received a telegram from Bundy who had visited the hospital and seen wounded American troops. All of Mac's old heroes came back to haunt him. One was the ghost of the family idol, Colonel Henry Stinson, the former secretary of war-- the man who told Roosevelt before Pearl Harbor that the way for America to get into a war was always to make sure that the other side struck first. As Mac put it, you wait for the streetcar and sooner or later one will come along. Here was a Pearl Harbor re-enactment right at Pleiku. So, fatefully at the outset of LBJ's first year as President in his own right, his (and Kennedy's) normally dispassionate national security adviser had become an undisguised hawk. Back in Washington Rolling Thunder became the favorite option, and we were about to embark on the bombing of North Vietnam in retaliation for Pleiku.

Last minute efforts to stave off the proposed escalation were then set in motion. George Ball was alarmed and fully realized that historic decisions were in train. On a weekend in mid-February, he urged me to call the Vice President and share our most recent Vietnam intelligence with him. I checked, and Humphrey was scheduled to be in Georgia for the weekend hunting quail with Minneapolis businessman Ford Bell. At that moment Jean and I happened to have a dinner party at our house in Chevy Chase, and by chance Ben Reed, the State Department's executive secretary and a close friend, was also there. The party was interrupted when Ball called on the White House phone which I had at home at that time. He talked to both Ben and myself. "Jesus. This thing is really bad. Tom, you better go down to Georgia, brief Hubert, and get him back here and involved." Rusk also gave his consent—for such important discussions, the new vice president should certainly be on hand.

By then INR had accumulated a considerable record of skepticism on the war. We had taken dissents in recent NIE's and SNIE's. Sometimes these reflected strange alliances within the intelligence community -- dissents by INR and the army, both skeptical about bombing the North, or dissents by INR and the Air Force, both skeptical about chances on the ground in the South. So I called Humphrey who asked me to get on a plane to Georgia right away. He and I spent the weekend looking over the intelligence reports, discussing the options, and noting where matters seemed to be heading. The Vice President was convinced that he ought to make his own views known to the President, privately but forcefully.

So Humphrey decided to write a confidential memorandum to Johnson. The text of the remarkable document that resulted can be found in Humphrey memoirs, "The Education of a Public Man". Humphrey thought that the most acceptable framework for his memo would be a political one -- American politics and the Vietnam War. He would write it as one politician to a fellow politician. Arguably he and Lyndon were in fact the country's two leading politicians at that point. After all they had just won a landslide national election together. It is a very prescient memo, and makes sad rereading now. Let me find it. (TLH gets Humphrey's book).

Q: I have just read this memo, dated February 15, 1965 from Humphrey to the president. It is contained on pages 320 through 324 in Hubert Humphrey's The Education of a Public Man. As you say, it's as though he sat and wrote it in the 1980's, about what the consequences would be-- the lack of support for the war by the American public and the fact that the Johnson administration was really in a very strong position now having won the election by such an overwhelming number. How much did you take part in putting this together?

HUGHES: I wrote the first draft on a yellow legal pad, six or seven pages, following deep and lengthy discussions with Humphrey that weekend. They were his views that I put on paper. Then on the airplane that Sunday when we flew back to Washington together, he went over that draft word for word and made a few minor changes -- nothing of substance. I still have the original document with his handwritten changes on it. Back in Washington, I put the memo in finished form and had my secretary type up a single copy. This I delivered to Humphrey personally in his office in the Executive Office Building, where I assume he had it retyped on his official stationery.

When the memo reached Johnson, all hell broke loose. Mac Bundy was called into the Oval Office to find an irate Johnson exclaiming "That Vice President of mine promised me his loyalty, and just look at this! Well, Humphrey is to have nothing further to do with Vietnam--no meetings, no visitors, no speeches, nothing. I am appointing you his nursemaid for the foreseeable future on foreign policy." The result was that Humphrey was cut out of all Vietnam meetings for several months. He paid for his return to Johnson's good graces only by becoming an exuberant supporter of the war--ironically in 1966 when the war had already gone so badly that even McNamara was privately defecting.

Q: You mentioned before that you had already been known as a dove. I mean this is pretty strong stuff coming at that time. What had brought you around to feeling that a heavy commitment towards the war would lose political support and that the Americans wouldn't understand?

HUGHES: I had been close to national politics and politicians for many years, and I was now immersed in official intelligence responsibilities. Putting the two together and assessing the probabilities was not very difficult. More important, however, was Humphrey's own similar assessment of the probable political reactions of the American public to the long inconclusive struggle that was implicit in, and predictable from, the intelligence estimates we discussed. INR was basically saying that we were in a no-win situation whether in the north or in the south. We could hold on, we could muddle through here and there with some luck, but ultimately it was not going to work. There weren't enough attractive targets in the North to make a bombing campaign decisive. Pouring US ground troops into the South would inevitably produce casualties that would become intolerable. Expanding the war to China would be a disaster. These intelligence assessments led to some pretty obvious political conclusions. After long and serious discussions with Humphrey, these were his conclusions and I was pleased to find that mine were similar. But Humphrey was the political expert here, not I. It was his political antennae at work, and the resulting memo represented his views.

Washington newspapers had noted that I had gone to Georgia to meet with Humphrey that weekend. So I was presumably identified with his memo in the minds of its few readers. On the other hand, the whole episode was known only to a very few. The memo itself never leaked. Soon, of course, it was common knowledge that Humphrey had been frozen out of the Vietnam debate inside the administration. There was speculation about the cause. It was hardly the way Hubert had intended to begin his Vice Presidential career.

Another mystery from February, 1965, surrounds Mac Bundy. That same month he served both as Johnson's escalator in Vietnam and Humphrey's nursemaid in Washington. According to Kai Bird's new book on the Bundy brothers, McGeorge Bundy, on February 2, 1965, two days before he went to Vietnam, and pursuant to a request from LBJ, wrote a memorandum to Johnson about his contingent successor as National Security Advisor. Bundy said that he himself had no intention of quitting soon, but of course he would not be staying forever. His memo to LBJ was entitled "A Deputy or Potential Successor in My Office."

Bundy told LBJ that he would like to bring a deputy into his office who could succeed him when he eventually left. Bundy said the man he was looking for had to have an instinctive understanding of the job and had to protect the President's right to hear both sides of hard cases. Ironically this was five days before Pleiku, when Bundy himself strongly argued one side! His memo named three possibilities. Bill Moyers, Abram Chayes, and myself. I had no knowledge of this memo until many years later. Now there was a certain unreality, even otherworldliness, about Bundy informing Johnson of the virtues of Bill Moyers, who was practically LBJ's foster son. Johnson was likely to have his own ideas about Moyers' future. Abe Chayes was my old friend and colleague from the Bowles days, who had served brilliantly as legal counsel for the State Department under Kennedy. But Abe had returned to Harvard, and he would surely have been known to Johnson as a Kennedy veteran and a suspected Bobby supporter. As for me at the beginning of 1965. Johnson would have remembered the discussion that he had just had with Bundy and Rusk at the Texas ranch about my promotion to Alex Johnson's job in the State Department, the proposal that Rusk had made and then withdrawn. Moreover Johnson surely also knew about my Humphrey connection from our days in the Senate.

Perhaps not so coincidentally at about this time in early February, 1965, Rusk at one of our regular morning meetings had casually asked me if I had ever been interested in going over to the White House. He said "You should know that Mac Bundy has his eye on you". I said I had had plenty of experience in working as an assistant to great men, and that, by contrast, I was now very happy running a bureau on my own responsibility at INR. On balance I would rather stay put. Rusk said he was delighted I felt that way, but if the time came when there was an inquiry from Bundy, it would be best for me (rather than Rusk) to tell him that I preferred to remain at State!

Bundy apparently kept a copy of his 1965 memo in his desk drawer, because it reappeared in identical form in a second memo to Johnson when Mac was actually departing, a year later. In February, 1966, Bundy wrote that, as Johnson knew, he was about to leave to take the presidency of the Ford Foundation. Once more he recommended Moyers, Chayes or Hughes, this time not as his deputy, but as his successor. He repeated the same earlier descriptions of the three of us. Walt Rostow, who was actually given the job, was conspicuously not mentioned in the Bundy memo. Years later in the spring of 1991 I participated in a Vietnam roundtable at the LBJ Library in Texas. Two dozen of the foreign affairs alumni from the LBJ administration were there, including Mac Bundy and Rostow. Mac's 1966 succession memo had just been declassified and it was suddenly distributed to the group. It was news to all of us, including Walt. There was a rather dramatic scene. The librarian asked, "Any comments on the memo?" There was a dead silence, finally awkwardly broken by the librarian's suggestion that perhaps this was a good time for lunch. Riding down in the elevator with Mac Bundy, I said, "Well that was a surprise. This is the first time I ever heard about your memo." He replied, "Now you can see how determined I was to have a moderate successor -- and how successful I was!" Incidentally transcripts of that LBJ Library conference have also been published. They omit the Bundy memo incident entirely, but include several interventions by me on Vietnam and life in the Johnson administration generally.

Q: I'd like to stop here. We have come up to 1965 and you have discussed events leading up to that, including this remarkable memo that you and Vice President Humphrey produced describing why we shouldn't escalate. Also about Mac Bundy's recommendation to the President that you might be one of his successors. So we will pick it up there on Vietnam. And I would like to ask you about the bombing, one of the remarkable things the Air Force could do according to the Air Force. Somehow, when in doubt, bombing seems to be an almost antiseptic solution. I was in the Air Force in Korea and was very dubious about what could be done. I think there were a lot of people in the strategic bombing survey who had doubts. So I wonder if you could comment on your thinking at that time. Then we will continue.

Today is the 20th of September 1999. Tom, we are at 1965 and the effectiveness of the start of the air campaign. How was this being portrayed from INR?

HUGHES: I think it is fair to say that, even at the beginning of 1965, there was an attempt to avoid or postpone the big troop decision. The more the Administration wanted to avoid a ground struggle with potentially large American casualties, the more plausible the Air Force sounded in arguing that bombing the North was the way to go. The one thing that the policy makers of 1965 were incapable of accepting was the idea that there was no positive way out. There had to be some road to victory. Almost everybody agreed that the great government of the United States could not be defeated.

Remember too that the men in charge in 1965 were still the heady victors of the Cuba Missile Crisis. They had successfully faced down the mighty Soviet Union. Compared to that, Vietnam was a pipsqueak problem. The question was which military option was most capable of producing positive results with the least cost. The difficult political and military situation on the ground in South Vietnam made people receptive to the air power argument. When the bombing failed to produce the desired results, the decision-makers had to turn back to the army.

So the ground was constantly shifting, with the US military very much divided. This is reflected across the board--in the policy discussions, in the arguments among the joint chiefs of staff, and also in the intelligence estimates. There were a succession of NIEs and SNIEs -- national intelligence estimates from the United States Intelligence Board -- with INR either joining shifting majorities or dissenting. They were published from the middle of '64 through the fall of '65, reflecting the major policy arguments on Vietnam. The public first glimpsed this bureaucratic saga with the release of the Pentagon papers years ago.

In 1968-9, as I mentioned earlier, I also commissioned an internal INR self-study of our Vietnam production over the entire Kennedy-Johnson period. To my chagrin this study is still classified. We've tried to get it released any number of times. Apparently the CIA is still refusing to clear the release. (Note: This study was finally released in 2004, five years after this interview. It is now on the internet. See TLH comments earlier.)

This study covers INR estimates on all the major themes: the possibility of stability in the south as governments were changing; the possibility of pacifying the countryside; the relative determination of the North Vietnamese to withstand bombing and to persist in their infiltration of the south; and the possibility of Chinese intervention. The study shows that INR was consistently pessimistic on the war. In retrospect most of INR's predictions look very prescient. Earlier than the CIA we were pessimistic about the bombing of the north. Earlier than the CIA we were pessimistic about stability in the south. But there was a bureaucratic downside to all this fratricide in the intelligence community. The number of slim and shifting majorities and of repeated dissents in a way discredited the intelligence community's role on Vietnam. By 1966 the policymakers got tired of the intelligence community's split decisions. They wanted analysis and estimates that would be useful in prosecuting the war.

Q: Did you find that in the intelligence community where you stand depends on where you sit?

HUGHES: Actually INR had less of an axe to grind than the others because we had no particular budgets or State Department operations that we had to defend. By contrast military intelligence tended to reflect the roles and missions of the particular military service involved. Likewise the analysts at CIA had to be aware that CIA had an important operational side that had big stakes in big budgets and covert activities. Therefore, it is no surprise that Air Force intelligence estimates tended to reflect their operational interests. Since they were the ones who would be bombing the north, they found that success lay in that direction. By the same token, the army, increasingly involved in South Vietnam, thought it only natural that army intelligence would find it essential to win on the ground in the south. This was a bit transparent. Similarly, during the Cold War, the positions taken by the armed services representatives in the annual national intelligence estimates on Soviet strength regularly looked like mirror images of what the services hoped for in their own budget requests.

Q: During the Kennedy administration, including your former boss Roger Hilsman, there was this infatuation with special forces and green berets-- somehow you have bi-lingual people parachuted into the jungle, and this would turn things around. I probably am overstating. But did you find a diminution of that view as the Johnson people became more involved in the war?

HUGHES: Well, yes, in fact there was a diminution after Roger left the government in early 1964. But it is also fair to say that he wasn't alone in that enthusiasm. Bob Komer picked it up pretty quickly. Bobby Kennedy continued to treasure the concept as one of Jack's legacies. In addition Roger is probably still a better defender of strategic hamlets than I am. He should be interviewed on that subject to see what he thinks in retrospect. . Of course he left INR in March '63 and that was relatively early in the Vietnam saga. As assistant secretary for far eastern affairs, he was able to continue that interest for another year as the operational head of the geographical bureau into the first months of the Johnson administration.

So I don't think there was an abrupt change. Certainly the whole goal of strategic hamlets and pacifying the countryside remained a central objective for those who thought the war had to be won in the south. All that persisted. And then, perversely, the more troops that were dispatched, the more wedded we became to winning the war in the south. As Rolling Thunder and other air force operations failed to produce any dramatically positive results in the North, the policymakers again turned their attention to saving the South. There was a kind of trade-off--attacking the North for a while and when that proved to be unproductive, concentrating again on the South. That was the kind of mental process affecting the policymakers by 1966. There was no question that these contrasting arguments were on the table. The analysis that showed why you were unlikely to succeed here and also why you were unlikely to succeed there confronted the policymakers with a continuing dilemma. Almost all of them, of course, were also proud veterans of World War II. Kennedy supporters were still wearing his PT boat tie clasps left over from the 1960 Kennedy campaign. They weren't about to give up when it came to professional patriotism.

Johnson inherited all of that. He was proud of his own war record, such as it was. There was even a residual secessionist mentality from our own Civil War that identified with South Vietnam. Rusk and Johnson, for example, shared this historical memory in many ways. Both were poor boys with deep Southern backgrounds in rural Georgia and Texas. Both had grandfathers who fought for the Confederacy. In a way the South's revenge for Gettysburg ever since their defeat in 1865, was their subsequent takeover of the US army. Already in the Spanish-American War and the First World War, many US generals were coming out of Dixie. This was in a way the last bugle call for the Confederacy. I remember Harriman coming out of a meeting on Vietnam saying that he felt like the only Northerner in the room.

After World War II the Pentagon had also had a personal impact on the State Department. General Marshall moved in as Secretary of State. Colonel Dean Rusk who served in the Pentagon after the war, came over to State under Marshall. So there was not only a military-industrial complex but a diplomatic-military-industrial complex. Rusk's protégé U. Alexis Johnson at State had a direct pipeline to the Pentagon. A bureau of political-military affairs was established at State to assure constant contact. Folk memories from World War II were still present in many Washington corridors of power in the 1960's.

Dean Rusk idolized General Marshall. The latter's bitter experience with China also had a lasting influence on Rusk. He himself had been traumatized by the Chinese intervention in Korea. You couldn't have found a more sensitized audience than the Secretary of State over the possibility of Chinese intervention. Speaking of China, there was another curious development in our public diplomacy as the Vietnam war continued into 1967 and 1968. The student protests at home were accelerating and the country was obviously getting more and more deeply divided. The public rationale for the war needed upgrading because saving South Vietnam from communism was no longer quite adequate. There had to be a bigger rationale than that, not only from the public relations point of view, but also to buttress the internal confidence of the policy makers themselves. They had to convince themselves that the stakes were larger than they previously seemed. Suddenly the Chinese threat was magnified. Rusk spoke of a future haunted by a billion Chinese armed with nuclear weapons. McNamara announced that the reason we needed a missile defense was protection against China. Paradoxically, however, the more China became their rationale for the war, the more fixated Rusk, Johnson and others became on the possibility of Chinese intervention.

Rusk had come into office still believing in the Sino-Soviet bloc, and he was one of the last in the administration to accept the fact that there had been a real falling out between the two communist rivals. When INR changed the spelling of Peiping to Peking, from “Peip” to “Pek”, we were pioneers in the State Department, well in advance of the Far East bureau and of the Secretary.

Q: Was it an acceptance of the communists?

HUGHES: Yes, it was a denial of the mythology of Taiwan and an acceptance of the undeniable fact of Communist rule in Peking. But the most significant point was a tactical one. In the mid-‘60’s, Rusk finally accepted the Sino-Soviet split when he realized that it would help let the Russians off the hook on Vietnam. This would enable him to conduct arms control negotiations with the Russians. The more the Johnson administration became embroiled in Vietnam, the more the policymakers became willing to recognize the Soviet-Chinese split. Gradually it became obvious that we were going to conduct a war policy with a China rationale in the morning and a peace policy with a Soviet rationale in the afternoon. By 1966 we have Kosygin and Johnson at their summit meeting at Glassboro. Our debacle in Vietnam had gradually let the Russians off the hook, leaving the Chinese as the main rationale for the war. The US policymakers’ chagrin over the unexpected Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 was therefore all the greater.

Q: I want to return to the role of INR and your role. Were you in the State Department responding to this in subtle ways? Were you suggesting how we should look at this split?

HUGHES: As I said, we were convinced of the split long before the secretary of state was willing to admit it. He was briefed about it when he came into office, and details of the deteriorating Sino-Soviet relationship were a staple in his normal daily briefings. INR and the intelligence community in general also produced more substantial estimates on the split from time to time. Rusk resisted accepting the seriousness of the split, let alone its implications, for quite some time. I came to think that he had a special problem if China was going to become the major rationale for the Vietnam war. It was the Chinese intervention in Korea that had burned him once before, and it was the possibility of a repeat performance in Vietnam that underlay his incrementalism when it came to escalation.

Setting up China as the major culprit also enhanced Whiting's role in INR as the watcher and warner about every move that the Chinese might be making. So Rusk became ever more attentive to the Chinese threat. His first question at my morning briefings always used to be "Any sign of Chinese movement? Any sign of Chinese reaction?" If Rusk had not been so sensitive about possible Chinese intervention, the rapidity and breadth of our air attack on the north would probably have increased. .

Q: Whiting was your man, but was there any disquiet on your part or on the part of other China watchers? Did they feel he belonged to the old school and there was a new school looking at the cultural revolution?

HUGHES: We were quite happy with Whiting in the 1964-6 time frame when he was still with us. After he departed for Hong Kong, and John Holdridge joined INR, there was some shift in attitude. Arguably the cultural revolution did put a brake on Chinese interventionist impulses, in turn enabling US policy to be more venturesome. How assertive Rusk actually was with Johnson on the China issue remains unclear. Johnson himself was deeply worried about China. Rusk continued with his mysterious posture: "I don't speak out at the cabinet meetings. I reserve my advice for the president." We never knew exactly what that was. He clearly saw nuclear non-proliferation as a place where the U.S. and the Soviet Union had a common interest. He was very enthusiastic about pursuing this and undoubtedly thought it could take some of the curse off the Johnson administration's Vietnam predicament. The worse that predicament became, the more Rusk redoubled his efforts with Moscow. That certainly was true right up to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 which of course necessitated another policy U-turn. Thereafter we were back stopping both Chinese and Russian communism again.

Q: One of the things McNamara said in his book which seems to outrage people from the State Department was that we lacked experts about what was happening in Vietnam and he was misinformed. How would you reply to that, since you were part of the cadre of people supplying the experts.

HUGHES: Well, one can reasonably complain about the continuing small number of experts on Southeast Asia that persisted over the years despite our national concentration on Vietnam. Growing academic disenchantment with the war itself was one explanation. Another was the ham-handedness of McNamara's own Pentagon in embarrassing the scholarly community with fiascos like the Army's Project Camelot in 1965. I'll return to that later when we discuss Latin America.

But as far as the quality of expertise actually available to McNamara is concerned, I am just as outraged as others have been over his statements. For example, Allen Whiting from INR personally briefed him whenever he was asked. We certainly had McNamara on the distribution list for every paper that INR produced on Vietnam. Rusk frequently had meetings in the State Department involving McNamara, where INR and other State Department officers would engage him on a particular issue. (I have summarized my own views on this matter in the article I referred to earlier, "Experiencing McNamara", which appeared in Foreign Policy Magazine, Fall 1995) It is indeed noteworthy what a no-growth or slow-growth industry all this was—I am referring to the whole universe of experts inside and outside the government on issues involving the Vietnam war. But to say that there were no experts, or to say McNamara lacked access to those that were there, is certainly not true. The fact that he didn't act on the implications of their analysis was his fault, not theirs. .

Q: It would seem that moving up towards '68 that the number of experts on Vietnam should have increased. You had all these young people who were on the ground out in the paddy fields of Vietnam.

HUGHES: Yes, but many of the young foreign service officers moved on to careers other than Vietnam. Journalists and other civilians outside the government needed funding if they were to continue in the area. It became a catch-22. The chief dispenser of funds was McNamara's Pentagon, but would-be experts were increasingly reticent to take money from that source. I don't know how hard McNamara tried. To me it remains a mystery. How can you conduct a war for 10 to 15 years and not produce a cadre of serious Vietnamese scholars with committed careers in this area? America didn't produce them. We had a handful of scholars on Vietnam at the beginning of the war and a handful at the end. .

Q: Is there anything else we should cover on Vietnam?

HUGHES: Perhaps another vignette should be put on the record illustrating how Vietnam consumed the relationships at the top of the US Government. As the situation in Vietnam continued to erode, the Johnson-Humphrey relationship remained wary on both sides. After licking his wounds throughout 1965, the Vice President had gradually been readmitted to foreign policy meetings. In the process he had been made to pay penance by being sent off to Australia and New Zealand to rally support there for the Vietnam war. He also went to Europe where he was the target of strident student protests, just as he was at home.

About this time—perhaps it was early 1967-- I went out to meet Humphrey at his house to drive in to work, as we had done so often in past years. We got into his official limousine with the secret service before and behind us. He stopped the procession in Rock Creek Park, got out of his car, and said, "Let's jog down the pathway here." When we were about a block away from the secret service and their walkie-talkies, he said rather off-handedly, "You know, this is the only time during the day that I am not being listened to." (He knew he was being tapped by the president. The new Dallek book on Lyndon Johnson explains how Johnson loved to listen to Humphrey's telephone conversations.) Passing casually over that remark, I said something like "Apart from that, my friend, what else is new?" He said, "Well, as you know, Muriel and I are leaving Chevy Chase to move into our new apartment at Harbor Square in southwest Washington. We had a little house-warming there last night. As our first guests, we asked Lyndon and Lady Bird to come over and join us, and they did."

"Oh" I said, "that must have been quite a family reunion." "Yeah, some family reunion. Lyndon came right in and stretched out on my new sofa. He started scratching himself, and then he said, "Now Hubert, I understand you make the best speech on Vietnam of anyone in the entire country. I mean the President can't leave the White House without storms of student protests, the Secretary of Defense gets stoned at Harvard, but the Vice President, that's another story. Everyone says that you make the best speech on Vietnam. I want to hear it." Getting increasingly uncomfortable, Humphrey countered with “Oh, I just try to make the usual points.” “No, I don’t want to hear the points, Hubert, I want to hear the speech.” “So I tried again. ‘I just say this and this’.” “No, no, Hubert, I want to hear the speech.” So poor Hubert is about to declaim on demand, standing up in his new living room. Then Johnson gets up to go to the bathroom, saying, “Keep talkin’, Hubert, I’m listnin’.” “Fortunately, the girls had finished in the kitchen, just in time, and the steaks were ready.”

Johnson also enjoyed his role as chief wire-tapper and was fairly transparent about it. He used to call Humphrey to report on the whereabouts of Humphrey’s staff. “I’ll bet I know more about that staff of yours than you do, Hubert. Do you know where that John Reilly is right now? Over at the Soviet Embassy, that’s where, talkin’ to the communists ...”

Q: Did you feel that you were in the Humphrey camp and maybe a target of suspicion on the part of the Johnson loyalists?

HUGHES: Perhaps I was, but I have no evidence of it. Rusk, for example, who was surely one of the chief LBJ loyalists, asked me early in 1968, before Johnson’s withdrawal from the Presidential race, whether I might want to go over to the White House to work actively in the campaign. I told him I wasn’t tempted. Later, with Humphrey en route to the Presidential nomination, Hubert’s own interest in my keeping him up to date on intelligence was redoubled. Vietnam had emerged as a huge crisis for the Democratic party. Bobby had gradually decided that his interests lay in opposing the war, rather than promoting it. Humphrey’s old friend Gene McCarthy, the junior senator from Minnesota, was leading the opposition to Humphrey and Johnson.

I remember briefing Humphrey in his office on Capital Hill the day after the New Hampshire primary, when McCarthy scored so heavily against Johnson. Humphrey had the television on and McCarthy was on glowing over his 40% showing. Always charitable to a fault, and even though McCarthy at this point was obviously a threat to the Johnson administration. Humphrey looked at his fellow Minnesotan on the TV, shook his head, and said, “I still can’t help liking that guy.” Hubert added “I’m going off to Mexico City. Lyndon is speaking tomorrow night. Do you know what he is going to say?” I said, “How would I know what he is going to say if you don’t?” I think Humphrey already had an inkling that Johnson was going to withdraw. Johnson had told him to be sure to listen. This turned out to be Johnson’s public announcement that he wouldn’t run again.

I remember another delicious story from Johnson’s pre-withdrawal days in 1968. After McCarthy’s showing in New Hampshire, Bobby had decided to enter the race and challenge LBJ for the Presidential nomination. He sought and got an appointment at the White House to tell Lyndon he was going to run. Lyndon took him into the room with the tape recorder and surreptitiously turned it on. Led on by Johnson, Bobby said one thing after another that LBJ thought would be hugely embarrassing for Bobby in his forthcoming campaign. The President couldn’t believe his good luck in having it all on tape. As soon as Bobby left, Lyndon eagerly asked for the transcript. His staff assistant came back with a crestfallen look a few minutes later, saying: “Mr. President, I’m sorry. There’s nothing on the tape but a whirling sound.” Bobby had brought a scrambler along and wrecked the precious recording!

After LBJ's withdrawal, everyone's attention shifted to the looming contest at the Democratic convention and the fight over the Vietnam platform plank. Leading the contesting forces were two of my old friends -- Ted Sorenson, who was now spearheading the opposition, and David Ginsberg, who was in charge of shepherding the platform language for Humphrey.

The 1968 platform fight and the subsequent campaign painted the Johnson-Humphrey relationship in a lurid new light. Johnson was still President and naturally preoccupied with his own role in history. Vietnam remained the centerpiece in that endeavor. Johnson obviously decided that one way to keep Humphrey undeviatingly on board on Vietnam was to hint that maybe Nixon might be able to continue his Vietnam policy better than Humphrey. Part of this tactic was to engage in those surreal three-way telephone conversations with Nixon and Humphrey on one end and Johnson on the other telling them about the war.

Meanwhile the Paris negotiations were proceeding. Harriman and Vance, the negotiators, had a considerable interest in what Humphrey might and might not say about Vietnam. They were hoping to pull off a bombing halt in time to be of some help to Humphrey. I must say that some of us had real doubts about Johnson at that point—about whether he actually wanted Humphrey to win. There was no doubt, however, that Harriman and Vance hoped for a Humphrey victory. As usual, Johnson was sufficiently complicated and ambiguous to make life unsettling for everyone. Nixon diagnosed the situation correctly and played up to LBJ on Vietnam. He would tell Johnson that when he, Nixon, became President he would make it a point to give Johnson full credit for all he had done. Nixon was in a position where he could play that game, but Humphrey with his party in shambles over Vietnam could not.

Toward the end of the campaign, another one of Johnson's famous wiretaps disclosed the Anna Chennault –Thieu scandal. This one did upset Johnson. Nixon's devious intervention in foreign policy in this instance may have helped bring Johnson back to being at least a lukewarm Humphrey supporter. Wiretaps on the Vietnamese embassy divulged that the Republican activist and old China hand, Anna Chennault, was hard at work delivering messages from the Nixon camp to Saigon. Thieu was being told by this Nixon emissary not to cooperate with the negotiations in Paris but to drag his feet. Thieu was promised a better deal under a future Nixon administration if he held off.

Here was specific, direct, interference in an official diplomatic negotiation. Johnson was genuinely furious about this one. He correctly saw Nixon behind it, supported by John Mitchell as middleman, and with Henry Kissinger playing a supporting role inside both campaigns at the time. Overruling many of his advisors, including Max Kampelman and myself, Humphrey decided not to disclose the perfidy for security reasons. Publicity would have divulged the fact of the wiretapping. It was a fateful decision, and Humphrey has been praised for his patriotism and self-sacrifice. Disclosure of the Anna Chennault scandal could conceivably have changed the close election result and given Humphrey the Presidency.

Q: You have been personally involved with many of these people in the political arena for a long time. What was your impression about McCarthy and, Kennedy? Were they figuring out what was best politically or was it a matter of belief?

HUGHES: Their roads into opposition were similar. McCarthy's friendship with Johnson waned, of course, after he was passed over for Vice President in 1964. Before that time, they had been very close. His talented wife Abigail also happened to be a close friend of Lady Bird. McCarthy had supported the Gulf of Tonkin resolution like all of his fellow senators but two. Gene's disillusionment with the war coincided with the shift in attitudes in the country in 1965 after the escalation. By 1968 the anti-war leadership-- Al Lowenstein and others-- convinced McCarthy to lead the anti-Vietnam movement, and he did it very successfully. I'm sure Gene has written about his progressive disillusionment on Vietnam. I just haven't read it. I give him credit for longer term opposition and probably more genuine opposition than the rival who upstaged him, Bobby Kennedy.

Until the mid-'60's Bobby supported the war, enthusiastically championing counter-insurgency, and putting himself forward as a possible US ambassador to Saigon under Johnson whom he personally loathed. During his 1964 campaign for the Senate, running with Johnson at the head of the ticket, Bobby continued to support the war. As the unpopularity of the war increased, Bobby's unhappiness with the war, like Gene McCarthy's, increased as well. When political opportunism and a genuine change in conviction happen to coincide, it is probably futile to assess motives. For a Democratic politician, hoping to succeed a vulnerable president who might possibly retire leaving you an open chance for the White House, the Vietnam war was made to order.

Q: Did you find as the opposition to Vietnam grew, particularly in the academic community and with students, that the foreign service and the civil servants were affected? They come from the same class, you might say, of educated people. Did you find this was having any effect on INR and how it was beginning to treat things?

HUGHES: You mean did the disaffection in the academic community affect recruitment?

Q: I was wondering whether, particularly with younger analysts, this was reflecting itself.

HUGHES: I'm not sure what the statistics would show about how many younger people were brought into the State Department at this particular time. I suspect there was a disinclination to join the government on the part of many young people.

Q: I'm really thinking more about serving officers or civil servant analysts, particularly younger ones. Were you seeing them coming up more with dissident opinions?

HUGHES: INR, as I've indicated, was skeptical about most aspects of the war from the beginning. Did that skepticism increase as general unhappiness over the war increased? Probably. For example, in INR we had an office for external research. This office had charge of relations with the academic community, with visiting scholars, with bringing people in on short term assignments. Dissent outside in the academic community may well have complicated some of these relationships. It was also a hard time for "public diplomacy". Some State Department people were sent out to try to man the barricades intellectually. I don't think that they found such assignments very congenial. Some were prevented from speaking on college campuses. Many got tired of the abuse. Probably some retired, resigned, or otherwise left the government.

Q: Going back to January 1968 how did the Tet offensive hit INR?

HUGHES: Well Tet became an argument. The Pentagon was quick to say that the Tet offensive was in fact a military victory. Walt Rostow enthusiastically agreed. But most of the civilian side of the government concluded that Tet was an intolerable psychological defeat. You couldn't have such a broad attack on American forces after all these years of effort without suffering a major slump in morale. So Tet became an argument. Despite Rostow and Westmoreland, observers outside the government thought that Tet was disastrous. Again INR and the intelligence community were not supposed to be reporting on U.S. domestic reactions. We weren't supposed to be covering student protests in this country. But we read the newspapers like everybody else.

Q: Well did you ratchet up your look at Vietnam to ask "What did this offensive mean internally in Vietnam?"

HUGHES: Oh yes, of course INR persisted in analyzing and estimating the consequences for domestic trends in South Vietnam, and those trends continued to be dismal. Toward the end of the Johnson administration, people were sick of the whole situation. Yet Johnson's deep commitment to his policy seemed unshakeable. Partly for that reason the intelligence community in effect stopped making overall strategic estimates. They settled for producing daily or weekly intelligence reports about developments on the ground. On their part, the policymakers were long since accustomed to taking the bad news tactically, not strategically. If it was bad news today from this quarter, they would place their false hopes somewhere else. In the discussions back and forth between analysts and policymakers, the latter somehow satisfied themselves that the bad news was only tactical and perhaps temporary.

Q: Again, going back a bit but moving off Vietnam onto China. Were you able to get a pretty good fix on China and what was happening? You mentioned there were more China experts than Vietnam experts.

HUGHES: Yes, but they all labored under the cloud of McCarthyism and were scarred by the "who lost China" controversy. There were academic experts within easy reach in Washington, like the distinguished Doak Barnett at Brookings. There were people in the State Department who were more or less exiled from Chinese affairs like Doak's brother Bob Barnett, who worked in State in another capacity on the economics side. Many ranking foreign service officers with China careers had been burned by the McCarthy experience and had left the government or transferred to other geographic areas. But there was a cadre of younger foreign service officers like Charles Cross, incidentally a classmate of mine from Carleton College, who has just written some stimulating new memoirs. They were serving in Taiwan, Hong Kong, or elsewhere on the periphery of China.

Some of the veterans from the 1950s were still around like U. Alexis Johnson. But they had learned to be gun-shy on China. They knew which way the wind was blowing. There wasn't anything very exciting about the China analysis coming from the senior foreign service officers who had escaped controversy for one reason or another. So we are really talking about younger foreign service officers or academics. The brilliant young James C. Thompson, another political appointee, was a conspicuous exception. He too had emerged from the Chester Bowles stable. He eventually worked either in the State Department or White House for everyone across the spectrum from Bowles to the Bundy brothers to Walt Rostow. Jim never ceased to speak truth to power. He even accompanied Humphrey on his famous trip to Southeast Asia, and along the way he memorably tangled with the Vice President on China (see the Humphrey memoirs).

Thinking back on it, I'm not sure that at the time we appreciated the real depth of the Chinese cultural revolution. The careful incrementalism of the US air strikes on North Vietnam were designed to avoid provoking China. But the Chinese Cultural Revolution may have dampened any Chinese interventionist temptations then as well. This combination of factors may explain the external caution displayed by the Chinese. You could argue that the regime was so concerned about its internal convulsion that it wasn't going to be venturesome outside. But our official and public view was more ominous.

The earlier Sino-Indian war also illustrated the manipulative way Washington utilized its anti-Chinese point of departure both for policy thinking and policy explanation. The war gave the Indian lobby, such as it was, a positive way to exploit the prevailing anti-Chinese atmosphere in Washington. Here was one more proof of Chinese aggression, never mind the facts. (Allen Whiting, for example, argued that China hadn't really triggered the war with India.) Once more you had an overriding political reaction. This time it separated the supporters of India from the specialists on China. Those few who had worked for better relations with India were not going to miss this sudden and welcome opportunity. India could now get serious attention from the U.S. government since it was engaged in a struggle with China. This was enough to produce yet another Harriman mission. And since we were always good at pressing weapons on people, there were rush proposals for US military assistance to India. Naturally pressure for US intelligence collaboration with Delhi quickly followed, especially since Washington was eager for information about Chinese preparations for their nuclear tests at Lop Nor. The Chinese "attack" was of course a calamity for Nehru and non-alignment, and Nehru's carefully cultivated relationship with Chou en Lai lay in tatters. Washington was eager to exploit that development.

Conversely the Sino-Indian war also confronted the American champions of Pakistan with an awkward readjustment. Our U-2 base for the famous over-flights of the USSR was not the only stake we had in Pakistan. For a long time our covert intelligence operators had also used Peshawar as a listening post aimed at Russia. We liked to kid ourselves that the Pakistanis shared our interest in collecting electronic intelligence from the USSR. But as soon as American inspectors would leave for the day, the Paks would switch the antennae from north to east, in order to train them on their favorite Indian targets. We were interested in the USSR, while they were interested in India, and not surprisingly both interests were accommodated.

I spent some time in early 1964 in India and Pakistan, and again debriefed at some length on my return. A contemporary transcript of that debriefing about South Asia is available in the Bowles collection at Yale.

Q: Did you find from the intelligence perspective, having a very vocal public figure like John Kenneth Galbraith sitting in our New Delhi Embassy sort of skewed things at all?

HUGHES: Galbraith of course was only there for a couple of years under Kennedy. He returned to Harvard by the spring of 1963 when Chet Bowles was sent back to Delhi for his second term as ambassador. Ken never confined himself to reporting or advising on India. He felt free to comment on world affairs in general. His cables and letters to JFK always provided much intellectual merriment in the Oval Office. Those of us who worried about Vietnam under Kennedy enjoyed Galbraith's fearless weighing in on what we thought was the sensible side. But Ken was by no means Kennedy's only extra-curricular advisor. Others had no government base at all. Joe Alsop, for instance, was equally close to Kennedy. He kept promoting a gung-ho policy on Vietnam for years, and was located right here in town.

Q: How about looking at the Soviet Union? I would have thought we would have had a very sophisticated INR cadre dealing with that by the '60s.

HUGHES: We did. Throughout the decade, INR had several Kremlinologists with strong credentials, both foreign service officers and civil servants. Our Soviet analysts probably had mixed views about how much could be accomplished with the Russians at that point in the Cold War. Hal Sonnenfeldt, then one of our INR office directors, was a hard liner, if that is the right word. He was a realist, as befits a man who later became known as "Kissinger's Kissinger". There were plenty of warnings about the dangers and limits in US-Soviet collaboration. In 1966-7, however, despite the view of the Soviet Union as a continuing danger, there seemed to be new possible policy opportunities with Moscow. They recurred a few years later with the Nixon-Kissinger decision to turn our anti-China policy upside down and to drive a bigger wedge between the two Communist powers.

Throughout the '60's, INR analysts, like others elsewhere in the government, were busy being Kremlinologists, trying to pick who was in and out of favor. Much time and effort was spent looking at the lineup of Soviet leaders on the May Day reviewing stand and guessing who was next in the pecking order.

Q: Looking on it in retrospect, it was almost peripheral, wasn't it? For a long time there wasn't that much deviation between these Soviet leaders and how their apparatus worked was there?

HUGHES: Especially for those policymakers who hoped for better relations with the Soviet Union, there was always a fascination over how much daylight there might be between this Soviet leader and that Soviet leader. In retrospect it is also easy to say that deterrence was working; and that our cautious, hands off relationship with Moscow was succeeding. Henry Kissinger then and now has always been professionally against "personalism." He believes we must always deal objectively with the government in power. Nevertheless in the 1970s Henry personally enjoyed his rendezvous shooting wild boar with Leonid Brezhnev at his hunting lodge, even though he (Henry) claimed he didn't like blood sports. Hal Sonnenfeldt likewise never denied his pleasure over exchanging pocket watches with the Soviet leader.

ROBERT C. HANEY

Deputy Chief, Joint U.S. Public Affairs (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1964)

Robert Haney was born in Iowa in 1921 and educated at the University of Iowa and Georgetown. His career included posts in Paris, Belgrade, Bomako, Saigon, Warsaw and New Delhi. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You were in Saigon from when to when?

HANEY: I got there in the summer of '64. I left in the summer of '65.

Q: What was the political-military situation in the summer of '64?

HANEY: We had a lot to do with the Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV). In my first few days in Saigon, I learned that MACV was a highly influential player there, but I wasn't sure to whom they were referring when colleagues said, "McVeigh wants this," or "McVeigh rejects that." I confessed to an Army captain attached to JUSPAO that I didn't know who McVeigh was. He set me straight and told me, "Don't worry about it. Anybody here who isn't confused is simply ill informed."

That should establish the framework for an answer to your question about the status of things. They were pretty chaotic. We were counting on the South Vietnamese to pitch in wholeheartedly to save their own country. But their military was not up to it, and their hearts were not in it. Certainly they didn't have the dedication to their cause that distinguished the Viet Cong.

The atmosphere in Saigon was unsettling and unreal. It wasn't safe to venture very far outside the city because the Viet Cong owned the bush, the rice paddies, the tree lines. Several Americans were kidnaped, including one AID officer who one day drove a little too far out of town and was picked up and subsequently killed by the VC. The JUSPAO office was right downtown next to a cinema, and above the cinema were several floors that had been taken over for bachelor officers' quarters. On the top of the building was a flat roof with a low wall around it and a great view of the city. You could see almost as far as Tan Son Nhat, the airport shared by civil and military aircraft.

When you had finished for the day—and the days were long; sometimes it would be 7:00 p.m. or later before you could get away—you'd go up on the roof, where there was a restaurant and bar. Dressed in whites, drink in hand, you would look out over the city as the sun went down. First you'd see the fighter aircraft coming back to land at Tan Son Nhat. Then you'd see the gunships taking off to strike targets near the city. As it grew dark, you would begin to hear the harrump! of howitzers firing at pre-selected targets, like crossroads, where they might catch Charlie. Occasionally you could detect the muzzle flashes when the howitzers fired. Then you'd ask the garçon for another dry martini.

Q: This was the Rex, wasn't it?

HANEY: Yes. Named for the cinema, I believe. It was quite a popular place for the military and some of the embassy people. For us, it was right next door and upstairs. To be in the scene but not really part of it gave you a weird feeling.

Q: What were you doing?

HANEY: As Barry's deputy, I managed the "front office" of JUSPAO, screened the cable traffic, assigned chores to the appropriate sections, e.g., films, press. When Barry was away from the post, I handled what we and the press called the "five o'clock follies," the daily press briefing. That was a difficult chore. You had to be very conscious of security. At the same time, you wanted to be as forthcoming as possible. The press in Vietnam really had more access to what we were doing there than I have ever seen. I was in the Army in Europe in the Second World War. Security then was very tight, and reporters didn't have the access that they eventually got in Vietnam.

The number-two man in the AP Saigon bureau was an aggressive type who drove a convertible around town and wore a scarf that rippled behind him like the signature neck gear of a World War I fighter pilot. He always spoke French when he careered about the city and its immediate environs; he didn't want to be mistaken for an American.

Driving just outside of Saigon one day he came upon a film crew and a small unit of ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) troops. He stopped, got out of his car and approached the person who appeared to be in charge of this activity, whatever it was. The AP reporter and the person who turned out to be the film director introduced themselves, and the AP reporter asked what was going on. The American director explained that he was making a film for USIA about the war in Vietnam for showing abroad. The scene he was about to shoot was an attack on a tree line on the other side of a rice paddy, a typical engagement in Vietnam. The AP reporter asked enough questions to get a story line going. Then he got back in his convertible and headed down the road.

He soon came to a crossroads café and bar, where he stopped and went in. The only other person in the place, besides the barman, was an unshaven U.S. Army lieutenant in muddy camouflage gear, who, it turned out, had just come in from the field after a week's combat. The AP reporter ordered a beer, introduced himself and asked the lieutenant, "What would you say if I told you that I had just seen a unit of South Vietnamese troops in clean uniforms with new weapons, and they're attacking a tree line, but it's all for a movie?"

The lieutenant exploded. "We can't get the ARVN troops we need in the field, and here they are making a movie!" He gave the AP reporter some really useful quotes. The reporter went back to his office in Saigon, wrote his story and filed it. It turned up on our AP ticker the next morning. We also received a circular cable from USIA calling attention to the AP story and instructing posts worldwide not to use any faked battle footage in their film programs.

I verified with our film unit that the movie crew was indeed filming for USIA. In the AP account as it came back from New York with a Saigon dateline, the reporter described how a bus full of Vietnamese passengers came upon the scene. Hearing small arms fire (which was all blanks), the bus driver slammed on the brakes. All the passengers jumped out of the bus and dove into a ditch full of muddy water. Then the AP reporter quoted what the American lieutenant had said after he was told that an ARVN unit was being filmed making a fake attack on the Viet Cong. The movie crew said the bus story was a fabrication.

Armed with a version of the story that I could trust, I walked over to the AP bureau. The AP correspondent was at his desk, as was his boss, the bureau chief, talking on the phone. Addressing the number two man, I asked, "Peter, why did you hype your story about the USIA film we're making? You know damn well there was no bus screeching to a halt or frightened Vietnamese leaping into a ditch."

Peter agreed, "There was no bus. I was denied space on a fixed-wing aircraft the other day, and I just wanted to make sure that I would get the kind of transportation I need next time I need it."

That was the first - and happily the last - time I ever had to deal with Peter Arnett, whom I've since seen reporting from rooftops in parts of the world far removed from the 'Nam. Barry was away from the post, so I reported on my investigation to Ambassador Maxwell Taylor. He was philosophical about it, and we were both chagrined that USIA, in its haste to wipe its chin, had - if taken literally - removed from use abroad any movies about the Revolutionary War, the Civil War, and classic Hollywood films like "Lost Battalion" and "Wings."

Q: Well, Peter Arnett had the reputation of being sort of anti-U.S. He was Australian. Were you dealing with a press corps that was hostile or, rather than report, trying to develop situations so they could report them? How did you find the press corps?

HANEY: There were some very good reporters in Vietnam. A few have since written books about the experience, and others made their reputations there. But there were a fair number who were there simply because a byline from Saigon or from Bien Hoa would give you a better chance of landing on page one above the fold.

For those who were in television, there was a radical shift in emphasis in Vietnam. In earlier days, the story - a burning building, a protest march, a vote in the Senate - was the image that filled the screen, described by a disembodied voice in tones appropriate to the image. But in TV news from Vietnam, the image that most often appeared center-screen during your favorite news hour was not the story, but the correspondent. Typically he or she would be dressed for the field, hunched over and glancing uneasily from side to side against a visual background of billowing smoke and an audio background of warlike sounds - explosions, rat-tat-tat of machine guns, roar of engines. Anxiously, the correspondent would confide an oral version of the story to a microphone held close to the chest.

Q: Yes. I used to notice, for example, that the anchor back in New York would say, "Now we'll go to our correspondent, George Smith." Then a notice would go up saying, "George Smith reporting." Then the correspondent would say, "This is George Smith." Then he'd tell his story. Then he would say, "And this is George Smith signing off." Finally the anchor back in New York would say, "That was our report from George Smith." The name became very important.

HANEY: Yes. Some media people made their reputations in Vietnam - through first-class reporting, or simply because it was a great opportunity to get your byline on page one.

Q: What was your feeling about the information that you were giving out? Was this a problem?

HANEY: I was thrown into the breach for the "five o'clock follies" whenever Barry was away. I never had enough time to prepare myself, but it seems to me that there was insufficient coordination among the various elements under Maxwell Taylor's command that led to misunderstandings or sometimes caused us to withhold stuff that you didn't have to withhold. I'm not aware of any written policy spelling out what information could be used and what had to be withheld. We didn't think hard enough about that.

Q: Did you feel you were giving out true information?

HANEY: The information we gave out was as accurate as we could make it, but there were some cases where it wasn't precise enough. For example, there was one occasion where we had used tear gas to try to flush out some Viet Cong from a network of tunnels. The briefing officer had said something about "gas," not specifying what kind. Well, a number of correspondents led their stories with "U.S. forces use gas in Vietnam."

Q: I've got to stop at this point. We'll pick it up next time. We're in Vietnam, '64-'65.

Today is July 30, 2002. How did you find the USIA side of things worked within the embassy in this '64-'65 period?

HANEY: The USIA function had been elevated to something that has never been seen at any other post before or since. As I have mentioned, it wasn't called "United States Information Service" (USIS), but "Joint United States Public Affairs Office" (JUSPAO). Ambassador Maxwell Taylor dealt with his embassy, the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), the Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV), and JUSPAO as he had dealt with the separate entities, U.S. Air Force, Army, Navy, when he was Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The ambassador met regularly with the heads of those elements; their deputies were most often the officers who did the legwork. We deputies logged a lot of chopper time visiting units in the field for briefings. The deputies would travel in one helicopter, escorted by two helicopters for security. Each chopper had GIs riding shotgun - actually .50-caliber machine guns. At first, the sliding doors were left open during flight, but they tended to fall off, so they were simply removed. We flew at an altitude of at least 3,000 feet to avoid small arms fire. The air was hot and sticky on the ground, but at that height with all doors off the chopper, it was breezy and even chilly. I have been a little bit skittish about flying ever since I was in a glider crash in Europe during World War II. I took my vintage Rolleiflex with me on chopper flights and sat belted in on one of the seats facing out an open door, toes on the sill. I snapped photographs to take my mind off where I was and what I was doing. I probably have more pictures of rice paddies than I really need.

We would head out just about every week for a briefing in the field, flying from Tan Son Nhat, the airport that handled both civilian and military traffic. Our "Huey" (as everybody called the HU-1B Army helicopter) would climb rapidly to a breezy 3,000 feet, and off we went across the lush countryside to our destination. The landing pad was generally a soccer field at a local school. To avoid fire from the ground, the pilot would "corkscrew" down for a landing. That meant turning the chopper almost on its side, losing a lot of lift, and dropping down in a spiral, leveling off for a slow landing from a few feet above the soccer field. This maneuver was routine for old-timers, but first-time passengers would sometimes get a surprise. On one flight, a newcomer had put his lunch bag and a thermos bottle under his seat. Unlike a Boeing 747, which gently banks and sweeps majestically to right or left, leaving your cup of coffee unspilled on the tray table, the Huey in a corkscrew maneuver does not generate the same centrifugal force. When the Huey pilot turned us almost on our side to spiral down, the newcomer's lunch and thermos scooted right out the open door.

Q: Barry Zorthian was a major figure there. How did he operate?

HANEY: Barry was very businesslike, very serious, knowing exactly what he wanted, and making sure that you, too, knew exactly what he wanted. He succeeded in increasing JUSPAO staffing to something like 140 people. That was an extraordinary number of slots in that single-country operation compared with the number of Foreign Service officers in the information and cultural function worldwide.

When I turned up in Washington for consultation on my way from Bamako to Saigon, the personnel people said, "This is urgent. We want you out there right away." I had to defer home leave. I did meet the deputy director of USIA, Tom Sorensen, who had sent me my one-page invitation to Saigon. He said to me, "You know Barry, and you're aware he's asked for you. We want you to tighten the reins on Barry. We are giving him what we think he needs, but he keeps asking for more."

At that point, I should have said, "I resign." I should never have accepted that kind of charge. I left for Saigon with people in Washington thinking that I was going to be able to slow Barry down. It didn't work and never could have. I'm surprised I lasted a year.

Q: Often the deputy of a particularly hard-charging person ends up following behind cleaning up the mess, smoothing feathers. How was Zorthian regarded by his fellow officers in other sections of the embassy?

HANEY: He seemed to command a good deal of respect in the other agencies and among his counterparts. I didn't really have much cleaning up to do. When Barry said, "That's it," that was it.

Q: How about the people supporting him? Did they respond to his leadership?

HANEY: Yes. Some of them grumbled a little bit. I got in trouble once after Barry had been away. He traveled rather frequently, came back to Washington, stayed at the White House a couple of times, made contacts around town. While I was in charge in Barry's absence, one of the guys on the staff came to me and said, "I sure would like to take off on Sunday. I haven't been able to play golf for months." (Most of us worked Saturdays and Sundays when Barry was there.) I said, "Sure, go ahead and play golf." Barry learned of this and chewed the guy out for not showing up on a Sunday and playing golf instead. Barry didn't say anything to me about it, but I heard about it from the fellow who had been reprimanded. The staff more or less fell in line, and that was it.

Barry had a rough way of speaking. If I approached him with a question, he would say, "Yo, Bob." He successfully projected a tough image. One newcomer on the staff quietly asked me one day if it was true that Barry was called "Zorro" by his intimates. I told him, "Don't try it."

Q: Let's talk about the Vietnamese press. Did you have much to do with the indigenous press there?

HANEY: I had nothing to do with that.

Q: What about the foreign press, including the American press? Were they seen as the enemy that they were later?

HANEY: Everyone in the embassy and in all of the agencies became very cautious in dealing with the American media. I had worked as a newspaperman, so I was familiar with the vagaries of the press. But the way the corps of American correspondents operated in Vietnam exceeded anything I had ever seen before. Their demands for access to people, information, transportation were excessive and incessant.

Of course, Vietnam was a continuing major drama for the United States and a story every correspondent wanted to cover. Many media plucked their most experienced and best known people to cover Vietnam. They joined a large group of correspondents less well known but no less eager. One correspondent for the New York Daily News and his wife practically lived in the JUSPAO offices. They would eat meals in our snack bar. They may have had a hotel room someplace where they slept, but if I wanted to find the correspondent, I would first look around JUSPAO. He was a faithful presence at the "five o'clock follies." He might try to get some news by saying, "AFP is reporting that MACV has asked for another 2,000 troops for deployment here. Have you got any details on that?" The JUSPAO spokesman would say, "No, Sam, I have nothing on that." Sam would say, "I've got the story, I just need some details." Spokesman: "Sorry, Sam, I just can't help you." Sam: "Can't you give me some details even in general terms?"

Q: These were still the early days. Was the press really seen by the military as hostile at that time?

HANEY: The military tended not to trust the press and to say as little as possible. They were not used to a crowd of media representatives homing in like a swarm of bees.

Q: When you left there, what happened?

HANEY: Barry was absent again, and I was in charge. This was about a year after I had arrived. A cable came in from USIA notifying JUSPAO that the Agency was transferring me to Washington. I never did get any explanation from Barry. I think he was just not happy with me because I would raise questions about the need for staff increases or the best way to deal with South Vietnamese officials, who were prone to say "Yes" under pressure but wouldn't deliver. I was probably doing that because I was stupid enough to heed Sorensen's injunction to try to slow Barry down a bit. That was next to impossible, and it was foolish to try. Since I wasn't playing Barry's game - that he could always get what he wanted - he showed me how the game was played and got somebody else.

Q: You went back to Washington in '64 then.

HANEY: Yes.

Q: What were you doing in Washington?

HANEY: We got some home leave, including the leave we should have had when we were transferred from Bamako. I did odd jobs in the Agency. I worked on foreign press reporting, with the policy people. I was interested in Eastern Europe because I spoke Russian and Serbian and had always wanted to serve in the most important of the Slavic countries. I talked with the area director for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe about an assignment there. A few days later he called me. He said, "We've got a job coming up in Poland. You don't call it 'public affairs officer' in Poland, but it's the same function. You'd be 'head of the Press and Cultural Section.'" Poland at that time was still very much a communist country. I said, "That sounds great." I spent about two or three months in Washington and was then transferred to Poland.

THOMAS F. CONLON
Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1964)

Thomas F. Conlon was born in Illinois in 1924 and received his BS from Georgetown University in 1948. He served overseas in the US Army from 1943-1945. Upon entering the Foreign Service, he was posted in Havana, Surabaya, Singapore, Saigon, Le Havre, Manila, Nice, Canberra, and Bangkok. In 1992 Mr. Conlon was interviewed by Arbor W. Gray.

Q: How did you find the Department of State in 1963?

CONLON: Well, although I had been continuously overseas for over three years, I was able to take only about a week's "home leave" before reporting for duty, as South Vietnam was then in a real crisis situation. Opposition to our involvement in Vietnam had grown substantially for a number of reasons. North Vietnamese propaganda had had a significant impact, particularly in American universities and in the press. Moreover, we were sincerely seen by some Americans as repeating the French "dirty war" in Indochina, 1946-54. Other Americans were concerned at what they regarded as our "intervention" in what they considered essentially a civil war. (Though they conveniently forgot that our involvement in Korea in the 1950's could have been viewed in the same light.) However, the Buddhist crisis made South Vietnam front page news in 1963, a position which, unfortunately, it never lost till the Communist victory in 1975.

In general, Vietnam, North and South, is a country in the Buddhist tradition. Buddhism is not so much a religion, but rather a discipline or a "way of living." A Buddhist shrine or monastery was to be found in almost every South Vietnamese village and town. The same had been true in North Vietnam before the Communist takeover there in 1954-55, after which most Buddhist shrines were closed or converted to other uses, sometimes for storing grain or other secular purposes. No one knows the exact number, but there were probably 5,000 or so Buddhist shrines and monasteries in South Vietnam by 1963. There also were about 1.5 million Catholics--perhaps 10% of the population--either recent converts or long accustomed to Catholicism. The president of the Republic of Vietnam, as South Vietnam was officially called, was Ngo Dinh Diem, a member of a high-ranking, "mandarin" family from the Hue area of Central Vietnam, which had long been Roman Catholic. Diem himself was a bachelor and a man of simple habits, though he had become accustomed to living in Freedom Palace in Saigon, a palatial building formerly the residence of the French High Commissioner in Cochin-China, and to traveling around South Vietnam in a cavalcade of vehicles and with a truly "imperial" kind of entourage. He was far removed from the ordinary people, although he was personally honest and probably enjoyed considerable respect in the country.

This was not the case with his brothers. One brother, Ngo Dinh Thuc, was Catholic Archbishop of Hue. Another brother was Ngo Dinh Canh, more or less the political "boss" of Central Vietnam. Another brother was Ngo Dinh Nhu, a French-type intellectual who was the president's adviser on virtually every issue. Ngo Dinh Nhu's wife became a considerable problem because she was articulate and outspoken and a natural target for journalists, who coaxed her to make unfortunate remarks which considerably damaged the cause of the Republic of Vietnam. Rightly or wrongly, the Ngo family was considered to be generally corrupt.

In May, 1963, an event took place in Hue, the details of which are still a matter of controversy. President Diem had become concerned at the practice of flying Buddhist flags at anti-government rallies throughout the country. Legislation was passed prohibiting the flying of flags other than that of the Republic of Vietnam. In an obvious attempt to defy the government, extremist Buddhist groups flew the Buddhist flag in Hue. Government police, who anticipated trouble, moved in to seize the Buddhist flag. Scuffling broke out and shots were fired which caused a number of dead and injured. This incident was represented by anti-government Buddhists and their supporters in the foreign, and particularly the American press, as anti-Buddhist activity by the "Catholic" government of President Diem. In fact, there were very few Catholics in the Vietnamese Government at the time. A series of more or less continuing, anti-government demonstrations ensued at about 20 of the 5,000 Buddhist temples and monasteries in South Vietnam. Finally, in July, 1963, Vietnamese "Special Forces" controlled by Ngo Dinh Nhu raided the 20 Buddhist centers where virtually continuous anti-government protests were going on. Numbers of Buddhist monks and their supporters were arrested. At about this time a Buddhist monk doused himself with gasoline and set himself afire, dying in the blaze. Several other such suicides, or "immolations," took place, underlining Buddhist opposition to the Diem Government.

Since Paul Kattenburg, the director of the Vietnam Working Group, was visiting Saigon, which he had not seen for about seven years or so, on the day following the pagoda raids I accompanied Ed Rice, the acting Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, to a special, inter-agency meeting in the White House cabinet room, presided over by President Kennedy. Roger Hilsman, the Assistant Secretary, was out in the San Francisco area, giving a speech. At the meeting Kennedy's charisma filled the room, though he said very little beyond opening the meeting with a question, "What do we have to decide here?" I was appalled at the low quality, emotional discussion of the pagoda raids and their impact on policy, in which some of the most senior officials of the State Dept were involved, including George Ball, then Under Secretary of State, and Averell Harriman, then a "Roving Ambassador" on the staff of Secretary of State Rusk. Only Bill Colby, then Assistant Director of CIA for the Far East, spoke up for the policy of support for President Diem and the Republic of Vietnam which had been approved and continued by five presidents from both Republican and Democratic Parties. The condemnation of the pagoda raids and the Diem Government which emerged from that meeting set the stage for a series of statements virtually calling for the overthrow of that government, then fighting for its life against communist aggression from North Vietnam.

It was not surprising that this relentless pressure on the Diem Government virtually paralyzed it and eventually led a group of South Vietnamese generals to approach our Embassy in Saigon, asking if the U. S. would continue to support the Republic of Vietnam if they overthrew Diem. The reply from Washington, decided on at a high level, was that we would continue to provide such support. Meanwhile, economic aid to the Diem Government had all but stopped, further increasing the pressure. Even so, it took nearly four months from the time of the pagoda raids in late July to the overthrow and murder of Diem and his brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu, on November 2, during which time the communist insurgency made rapid strides in the countryside.

Since it took a fairly long time for the coup against Diem to be mounted, once the subject had been broached, there were numerous figures in Washington, including Secretary of State Rusk, who began to have serious doubts about the wisdom of the policy of pressure against the Diem Government. I was called in to the Department at about 10:00 PM on a Saturday night late in October by Paul Kattenburg. Walt Rostow, one of the senior advisers of President Kennedy, wanted a memo prepared on the assumption that we would attempt to reestablish working relations with President Diem. Kattenburg flatly refused to prepare such a memo, saying that he was totally opposed even to considering such a course. With no advance notice, I prepared a memo outlining the steps we would need to take to resume military and economic aid to the Saigon Government but noting that we should, in any case, insist on maintaining contact with all non- communist elements not in jail. Most unwisely, in my view, we had agreed, at Diem's insistence, on not contacting non-communist figures opposed to Diem, although the British and other embassies in Saigon were in regular contact with them. But it was far too late to consider such action, as events were rapidly unfolding.

The coup began on November 1, but Diem and Nhu escaped from the Palace through a tunnel and were not found until November 2, when they were murdered by some of the coup plotters who had scores to settle with them. The Vietnam Working Group, where I was still assigned, had an officer on duty all through that night. Jim Montgomery passed the word of Diem and Nhu's death (allegedly by suicide) to the White House Situation Room at about 5:00 AM on November 2 (Washington time). He was told that the information was brought to President Kennedy's attention and that the President was deeply concerned over having approved actions which led to the suicide of two fellow Catholics. I relieved Jim at 7:00 AM at the Operations Center and had the task of informing Assistant Secretary of State Hilsman of what had happened. Hilsman had left word that, under no circumstances, was he to be disturbed before 7:00 AM. I told him of what had happened, that the information had been passed to the President, and that he was deeply upset. Hilsman limited his comment to, "God damn it" and then hung up. It was not long, of course, before it became apparent that the Ngo brothers had been murdered. The suicide story was a deliberate fabrication by the coup plotters which convinced no one.

It was curious to see the reactions of both Hilsman and Paul Kattenburg to the final overthrow of Diem and Nhu. Hilsman had deliberately sought this end, as had Kattenburg. Hilsman wanted to claim credit for this "achievement," if you can call it that, but he knew that President Kennedy was not pleased with the outcome, and so he had to keep quiet and not refer to it. Kattenburg, as I learned only later, had come to the Vietnam Working Group with the intention of working to overthrow the Diem Government and turn the country over to the communists, whom he considered the only legitimate nationalists. He makes this point fairly explicit in his book, The Vietnam Trauma in American Foreign Policy, 1945-75.

Q: I take it, then, that you didn't think much of either Hilsman or Kattenburg?

CONLON: That's right. Hilsman knew very little about Vietnam, and he was one of the most ambitious, self-centered, and arrogant people I have ever met. During the fall of 1963 he concentrated almost exclusively on Vietnamese developments, to the neglect of his other duties in the Far Eastern area. In mind's eye I can still see Ed Ingraham, then Indonesian desk officer, trying to get a moment of Hilsman's attention to focus on the beginning of Indonesian "confrontation" of Malaysia as one of the endless meetings on Vietnam was about to begin. Hilsman's experience in the Far East was limited to his service during World War II in the OSS in Burma. Kattenburg was an example of a man with his own agenda, the overthrow of the Diem Government and turning the country over to the communists, which he somehow saw as serving the U. S. interest. I was his deputy, but he never exposed this central view to me. I was only able to see it in retrospect.

Q: What happened after that?

CONLON: President Kennedy was assassinated on November 21 or 22, 1963, and Secretary Rusk took advantage of the situation by moving the Vietnam Working Group into the Executive Secretariat, under Joe Mendenhall, my former boss in Saigon. However, oddly enough, I was designated by name, though Rusk didn't know me personally, to remain in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs to handle "routine diplomatic business" involving South Vietnam. Joe Mendenhall said that he thought this was a misunderstanding and that I would eventually join the rest of the Working Group. Hilsman and Kattenburg both left Vietnam affairs, Hilsman returning to private life and Kattenburg going on to another assignment in the Department. I never went back to the Working Group.

"Routine diplomatic business" eventually came to be interpreted as keeping in contact with the Vietnamese Embassy in Washington, then in complete disarray, and helping them with their problems. The Riggs Bank, where the Embassy had a substantial checking account, promptly froze the account after the overthrow of President Diem. I was able to get it unfrozen, as otherwise the diplomats assigned there would have been penniless. I accompanied the very able Pham khac Rau, the Vietnamese chargé d'affaires, on a few calls in the Department, but I had no secretary or other staff, and I marked time for almost three months, with virtually nothing to do.

BROADUS BAILEY, JR.
Provincial Advisor
Dalat, Tuyen Duc (1964-1965)

Broadus Bailey, Jr. was born in South Carolina in 1930. He received his bachelors from Princeton University in 1951 . During his career he held positions in Fontainebleau, Vietnam, at the Pentagon, and in Laos. Colonel Bailey was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 2002.

Q: Well, then, after '64 was Vietnam raising its head at all?

BAILEY: Oh, yes, that's where I went, from Newport to Vietnam.

Q: Had you thought about Vietnam before that?

BAILEY: Yes, I had written my paper – the command and staff course had to write a fairly long paper, and I wrote mine on Vietnam and I had a pretty good idea that's where I was going when I left Newport, and sure enough, I did.

Q: So you went to Vietnam from when to when?

BAILEY: From August of '64 to September of '65.

Q: What were you doing there?

BAILEY: I was the sector or provincial advisor in Tuyen Duc sector; the provincial capital is Dalat. And it was a fascinating tour. I was chosen for that job because I spoke French and I think perhaps because I knew some of the people in the headquarters, and they thought it would be a suitable assignment. It was not an awful lot of military duties. My principal duty was really trying to keep track of the generals who were running Vietnam, and they liked to spend time in Dalat.

Q: It's sort of the Switzerland of "A Beautiful Place."

BAILEY: Oh, yes, beautiful – we were back there several years ago, and it's just the same today.

Q: I had heard that it was considered by both sides to be an R&R area, and the Viet Cong wasn't doing much there; was this true, or not?

BAILEY: That's generally true, yes. The Viet Cong were not very far away, they were not infrequently in the morning market, left propaganda messages. They were never more than four or five kilometers out of town, but trying to get the Vietnamese to stir up the VC in the provinces was very difficult. They did not- (end of tape)

Q: Well, was your job sort of to stir it up and try to get them to do something?

BAILEY: Yes, and they did things, they did go out on operations, and I went out with them from time to time. But the province chief's principal duty was to maintain security in the city and around the palaces, so-called palaces, in the town for the VIPs who came, and to ensure the safety of those VIPS, and as I said a moment ago, that didn't include much in the line of military operations.

Q: I've heard at other times there was an effort made to keep American military from going there.

BAILEY: Yes, I think that's true. I think it was more after my time; I think the town was in effect off limits to some of the American units, but the American Army units were just beginning to arrive as I left, so I'm really not sure about that. There were always more military in town than I knew about although they were asked to be sure that my office knew that they were in town. The attack on the Pleiku headquarters, Pleiku compound and airstrip in February of '65, I guess it was; there were six helicopters from Pleiku in town. They had not bothered to let me know that they were there, but Pleiku was on my telephone saying send those choppers back, and I didn't have a clue where they were. I knew where the choppers were, but not the people.

Q: That attack was the one that sort of kicked off the major reinforcements, wasn't it?

BAILEY: Yes, that's right, yes.

Q: It was actually, I guess, the first real attack on American forces, their advisors...

BAILEY: I guess the Rex BOQ in Saigon was bombed about Christmastime of '64, maybe; I'm not sure I've got those dates right, but that was the first real big attack, and I think almost simultaneously, a couple planes were satchel-bombed at Tan Son Nhut airport. A friend of ours from Newport was killed.

Q: Was the province chief a military man?

BAILEY: He was a Lieutenant Colonel, Colonel Phan, a delightful person. He was a protégé of General Thieu, and later was involved in the police force, I believe the national police, but he was a very able guy, young guy, I think he was about my age.

Q: Obviously you're off in the nicest part of Vietnam. Did you get any feel for the situation in Vietnam at the time?

BAILEY: Elsewhere in Vietnam? I realized that the situation elsewhere in Vietnam was much more serious than it was around us, and we were briefed regularly on the activities around Kon Tum and Pleiku, and I had access to the intelligence, and in the delta, and on my trips to Saigon for one reason or another I talked to my contemporaries. I knew that the war was a lot hotter elsewhere than it was where I was spending my time. Most of my time was spent trying to figure out what the generals were doing, and for that purpose I had a direct phone line to General Stillwell, who was the chief of staff of MACV (Military Assistance Command, Vietnam), because MACV would be very concerned about what General was in town, and what were they talking about.

Q: You're talking about Vietnamese generals.

BAILEY: Yes, right. And Colonel Phan, the province chief, was reasonably candid in telling me what they were talking about; I'm sure he was operating under his own rules, and he certainly didn't divulge everything.

Q: Well, this is a time of rotating generals, wasn't it? Rotating governments, before General Thieu more or less settled into the job.

BAILEY: Yes, Nguyen Khan, the general with the little goatee that he wore, he was chief of government, maybe chief of state, I think chief of government, about Christmastime of '64, and I had the not very pleasant duty of telling him that Ambassador Taylor, General Taylor, wanted to see him in Saigon in the Ambassador's office the next morning. This being Christmas Eve, I believe, and the message came by phone from Saigon, and I said to the other end of the phone in Saigon, I think it was General Stillwell, but I'm not sure.

Q: Is this Stillwell with one "l"?

BAILEY: Yes, Dick Stillwell, yes, not related to Vinegar Joe. Whoever was on the phone, I said, "Well, I think I'd better have that in writing," and there was no capability to provide it to me that way, so I wrote it down longhand and took it and put it on a message form and delivered it to palace #1, I think it was, and I got only as far as the gate where the guard properly stopped me, and I said I had a message from the American ambassador to General Khan. And the guard got on the phone and one of General Khan's aides came down to the gate to meet me, and I told him what I was there for, and that I needed to deliver the message and had been told to deliver it only to General Khan. And the captain aide told me that I would not be permitted to do that. And the aide took my written message form to the general and he read it and came back and the message sent back by me to Saigon was that General Khan was not available to see General Taylor in the embassy, but General Khan would be back in Saigon in the next several days and would be glad to receive General Taylor at the JGS compound. So he let Ambassador Taylor know exactly where he stood. But that sort of political military errand was what I really was involved in, and also the hope that I could pick up incidental intelligence on what the generals were up to.

U. ALEXIS JOHNSON
Deputy Chief of Mission/ Deputy Ambassador
Saigon (1964-1965)

U. Alexis Johnson served as Deputy Ambassador to Vietnam and Ambassador to Japan in the Lyndon Johnson Administration. He was interviewed by Paige E. Mulhollan for the LBJ library in 1969.

Q: Did Mr. Johnson, himself, even get closely engaged in the Vietnam problem, say, prior to the election of 1964?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. We used to have meetings on it. I wouldn't say he was deeply engaged. The deterioration in the situation out there and the facing up to the issue came after . . . It came in the latter part of '64 and, of course, the early part of '65. And I was out there at the time.

Q: How did he talk you into going out there? That was, at least in title, I suppose, a demotion. Did he talk to you personally and convince you to go?

JOHNSON: Well, he did talk to me, primarily, through Dean Rusk. I was approached through Dean Rusk, on whether I would go out as Ambassador. And then I said, "Of course, I'll do anything I'm asked to do." And then the thought of Max Taylor going out came up, and I think it was Mr. Johnson's idea to send both of us.

Q: Create a new position?

JOHNSON: Create a new position. And Dean Rusk . . . Let's see. I thought maybe I was going to go. Then Dean Rusk called me, and said he'd just had a call from the President, and would I go along with Max? This thought had never occurred to me, of course, and I said, "Sure, Max and I are old friends." We were language officers together at Japan, 1935. He was the captain, and I was the vice consul, and we'd known each other for years. I wouldn't have readily accepted this kind of what could be a very difficult relationship with anybody else, but he and I had known each other so long, and we thought so much the same about things, that I had no doubt about it. And he [Rusk] was sitting there at his desk; and he had the President on the other end of the line; and I said, "Yes, of course." And then he said, "What would you like to be called?" I had the rank then of a Career Ambassador. And I was, of course, reluctant . . . After all, I didn't want to drop that title. He said, "What about Assistant to the Ambassador, or Deputy to the Ambassador?" And I said, "No, that doesn't . . ." I said, "What about Deputy Ambassador?" And he said to the President, "What about Deputy Ambassador?" "Okay." And so that's the origin of the title of Deputy Ambassador.

Q: Long, thoughtful consideration of that. (Laughter).

JOHNSON: Thoughtful consideration of it, yes. So I went out--that was on a Wednesday, I think it was--and said goodbye to my wife and family and got right on a KC-135 the next day and went right out, non-stop. And then Max Taylor followed me later.

Q: Was there a fairly clear division between your responsibilities and duties, between you and General Taylor?

JOHNSON: No, no. You know we just worked very closely together. In general, of course, I tended to do more of the running of the Embassy, and maintaining contacts with other missions, and the diplomatic conversations, and that type of thing. But we worked very closely together. There was never any Oh, I should say this was on a Wednesday, and I left on Friday, it was. There's an incident here that I think is interesting.

That night - the night I'd accepted, as I recall it - I know there was a reception. I'm trying to thinkI think it was at the Indonesian Embassy. Can't remember who was here from Indonesia. Well, the Embassy's not important.

Anyway, there was a reception at which the President, President Johnson, was present. This is the kind of a gesture he could do, and I must say, you know, the kind of a thoughtful thing he could do. He spotted my wife over across the room. He didn't know her particularly well, but he knew who she was. He spotted her over there and went over to her, and said he wanted her to know how much he appreciated what I was doing and how much he appreciated her attitude on this. And then he said that--I forget exactly how he put it--but anyway, "I want you to know that you're going to have your ambition." There'd been considerable talk of my going as Ambassador to Japan prior to this. However, it was known that she particularly, my wife particularly wanted to go back to Japan. There were a lot of people standing around, and everybody knew what he was talking about.

Well, from that time on, of course, the story was that I was going to go as an Ambassador to Japan. Then when I came back in '66, the Secretary told me that this was still the plan. And you start getting these newspaper leaks and an occasional newspaper story about my going out to Japan. And in his usual fashion, the President got very furious about these stories. And I recall on one occasion, after there'd been a rumor when I was there; he said something about "these boys over in the State Department blabbing off their mouths." And he, of course, was the origin . . .

Q: Was the source.

JOHNSON: He was the origin, the source of the story from the very beginning. I, obviously, kept very quiet about it, because I well knew his reputation on this. I think that, perhaps, I may be one of the few appointments that was made in the Administration which was not reversed because of newspaper stories.

Q: Maybe he realized he was the leak when he thought about it a little bit.

JOHNSON: He carried through on it. And I must say, I'm very grateful to him for it.

Q: When you were in the mission in Saigon, how much did the mission participate in the tough decision which began almost immediately after you got there?

JOHNSON: Oh, completely so, completely so. One of my first moves, before Max Taylor arrived there, was to set up what we called the Mission Council. That was Commander MACV, who was then General Westmoreland, the agency [CIA] chief, the AID chief, the chief of political section and the two of us [U.A. Johnson and Taylor]. We met regularly and steadily. And all the big decisions were all thoroughly discussed; all our big recommendations, I mean to say, were thoroughly discussed, thrashed out. And we sent back common messages. I would say that, in general, there was no question that Max Taylor was the leader of the whole efforts and Westy and I worked very, very closely together, and when the big recommendations were being made, we worked drafting the messages; and it was a purely coordinated effort. There was no question of anybody running off on one side or another . . .

Q: And Washington did give you adequate time and adequate encouragement to express your views? I'm thinking particularly, for example, on something fast, like the Tonkin episode, that occurred just a month or so after you were there.

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. No, no, we had an opportunity to express our views. We didn't have as complete information on the Tonkin Gulf business, it being a Naval matter, which was handled through Naval quarters in Honolulu. Our information on that was not as complete as was the information back here in Washington.

Q: I see.

JOHNSON: And the Tonkin Gulf resolution, of course, was originated entirely back here in Washington. I would say the lead on that was very heavily taken here in Washington, rather than coming from Saigon. But we naturally welcomed it from our standpoint there.

Q: What about the diplomatic channels, the various attempts to initiate discussions with the North? Was that conducted separately from the Saigon mission? Or were you in on, say, the [J. Blair] Seaborne mission in '64, for example? Were you in the . . . ?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. I maintained direct personal contact with Seaborne and those affairs.

Q: He brought, as far as you were concerned, no hopeful signs at all?

JOHNSON: That's right, yes, yes. No, I maintained very close contact with him.

Q: The so-called "peace-seeking group" that was ultimately formed here did not, then operate outside of the normal mission effort?

JOHNSON: No, no, no, no. We were involved in all of that.

Q: When did you find out that the decision for the--what you'd been recommending--the bombing of the North had been made? When it occurred, or did you know before that, that . . . ?

JOHNSON: Oh, no, we knew before that, of course. When the orders . . . We got the . . .

Q: Was there a point at which--before, say, the bombing of Pleiku--at which it became clear that this was going to have to be done and that the decision was forthcoming?

JOHNSON: Yes, it was. Well, more or less so. I'd say our exchanges with Washington indicated to us we were moving in that direction. But the President took the view that he would not undertake the bombing of the North until we'd moved out the dependents. And we, in turn, out there, took the view that moving out our dependents would create such a psychological factor out there that we just couldn't live with it. So we were in somewhat of an impasse. We used to get these telegrams about getting our dependents out. We used to come back arguing on it. And so we were in an impasse. We were unwilling to move out our dependents, and Washington was unwilling to start the bombing until we moved out our dependents. Then the Pleiku incident came along, and we were able to do it simultaneously.

Q: But it was not a difference of opinion as to what should be done?

JOHNSON: No, no, no. No, there wasn't. The Pleiku incident gave us the opportunity to do so. Mac Bundy was out there at the time, also. And this, of course, was a big help in getting the decision. And Mac saw the thing, at the time, the way we saw it, and joined us

Q: You said Mac, not Max.

JOHNSON: Mac Bundy.

Q: Just being clear.

JOHNSON: Mac Bundy, that's right.

Q: You get two names like that .

JOHNSON: McGeorge Bundy, McGeorge Bundy, yes.

Q: When did it become clear that we probably were going to have to put in American combat troops as a logical extension of the policy we were following?

JOHNSON: The way this came about . . . and here I have some conscience. When we started the bombing of the North, we had the problem of protecting the airfield of Danang against possible retaliatory raids. And the Marines wanted, and we agreed, that we needed to put in a Hawk battalion there to protect Danang. And then it turned out that, for these Hawks to be effective, they had to be on the hills around Danang; and to protect the Hawks, you had to bring in Marines to protect the Hawks.

Q: You're talking about Hawk missiles here, not hawk. Some of these things, I add for the benefit of people a long time from now that might not know what Hawks are.

JOHNSON: That's right, Hawk missiles; that's right, Hawk missiles. And then the problem of protecting Bien Hoa Air Base near Saigon came up.

It was agreed, that we'd bring in a ground force. I think it was 173rd--172nd, well, it doesn't make any difference--but [it was] an Army force, ground force, to protect the Bien Hoa area. We, at that time, were not contemplating any massive introduction of American forces. And frankly, this grew somewhat like Topsy. I think it's quite clear from the record. Looking back over Vietnam--I've talked with my colleagues about this--and examining with the wisdom of hindsight, what was done . . . I don't have any . . . I still don't have any real question about what we did. But I do have a conscience that none of us foresaw the extent of the involvement that was going to be required. And the conscience I have is that I don't feel, that at that decision point, we were able to present to the President, in a clear-cut fashion, the alternatives. That is--the situation in which we now find ourselves versus the situation at that time--it was never presented to him in any clear-cut form. The issues have always been presented to him simply in the form--or were at that time--in the form of bringing in a battalion of Marines to protect the Hawks; and then bringing in a battalion of Army troops to protect Bien Hoa; and it sort of grew like Topsy out of that. And in that, I don't think we served the President well. And I don't know; with the wisdom of hindsight, perhaps we should have foreseen the extent of our involvement that might be required. All I can say is, none of us did.

Q: I was going to say, is it perhaps that because nobody disagreed, that this wasn't fleshed out in a more . . . ?

JOHNSON: Well, perhaps that's it. Of course, it involved the intention of the other side, which was always difficult to read.

Q: How about that "other side" business? That's a point the critics have been very adamant on, the degree of regular force DVN infiltration by the time we began bombing the North. Were you all confident in Saigon that there were appreciable numbers of DVN units actually in the South at that time?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes, yes. You see, we had the--what was it?--the introduction of the . . .

Q: 323's.

JOHNSON: 325th division--elements of it--in December of 1964. This was . . .

Q: They were in as units, not as in . . .

JOHNSON: As units. Oh, yes, yes. Of course, that was long before we started doing any bombing, or introduced any combat ground forces.

Q: So the critics' case here, as far as the information the mission had was concerned, was just wrong?

JOHNSON: Oh, absolutely, absolutely, yes. Yes, yes.

Q: Even some of Mr. Johnson's admirers, and people who think the involvement in Vietnam has been wise, had been critical of what seems to be the lack of influence that the mission there has been able to have with various South Vietnamese governments. [Take] Mr. [Robert] Shaplen's case, for example, that we should have used our leverage at various times-

JOHNSON: All right. We talked a lot about that. We talked a lot about that. And to a degree, we were somewhat subject to what I call "the tyranny of the weak." This was not due to any lack of trying on our part. In these coup situations, we had some awful rough talking. Max Taylor, as a matter of fact, had such a rough talk with General [Nguyen] Khanh, at one time, that General Khanh refused to have anything to do with him again. And I was appointed a committee of one to work with General Thieu and General Ky--at that time, they were just generals--in bringing about a reconciliation between them . . . (Laughter) . . . General Khanh and Max Taylor.

The one ultimate weapon that we had was the threat of withdrawal and the pulling out of all support. That was not a weapon that was likely to be used. We couldn't bluff about it; the United States can't bluff. If we made the threat, we had to be prepared to carry through with it. And we never found ourselves in such a situation as we felt that we could or should recommend the use of that weapon.

Now, talking about how we should influence things: after General Khanh left, we had the Hung government; and then we had the Phan Huy Quat government. Phan Khac Suu was the Southerner who was the Chief of State; Quat was Prime Minister. The military had, really and truly, turned over the reins of power to the civilian government. In this regard, let me say, I think that we Americans are somewhat enamored of the idea that civilian governments are, by definition, good, and military governments are, by definition, bad. I don't think this follows . . .

Q: Right.

JOHNSON: And this case, I think, well illustrates it. They really had turned over the government to the civilians. Quat had two ministers, in his government, that were of importance to us--one of them, the Minister of Economic Affairs; one of them, the Minister of Interior--that were duds. He knew they were duds; we knew they were duds. But it was a part of the deal--as I said, the political necessities of the time--to take them on.

Well, you talk about influencing governments. We harassed Quat about these two ministers, about getting rid of them, and changing them. And Quat said, you know, "Leave it to me. I'll have to do it in my own time." But as a result of our pushing him on this, Quat acted on this sooner than he otherwise would have. Phan Khac Suu refused to sign the decree changing the ministers. You see, Quat is a Northerner, a Tonkinese; Phan Khac Suu was a Southerner; and Phan Khac Suu was damned if he was going to let Quat get away with this, you see. And we had the impasse. We kept saying to Quat, what could we do to help, and how could we assist? And again, he said, "Leave it to me." And the military kept saying the same thing also to him. They were prepared to support him, and what could they do to help? Oh, ten days or so passed; and Quat was obviously losing ground on this. Max Taylor had taken the trip up to Vientiane, Bangkok, and was away . . . Incidentally, it so worked out that every coup and coup attempt, he was away and I was alone there. (Laughter).

Q: Was there any pre-planning on that?

JOHNSON: There was no pre-planning involved in this, but it worked out that way. And about three o'clock in the morning, I got a telephone call from Quat--would I come right over to his office? And I, of course, went over there; and there was Quat sitting on a chair, here, and Thieu, General Thieu, and General Ky sitting on the couch, just the three of them. And Quat said to me they had been discussing the matter; and they'd come to the conclusion that there was no way of getting rid of Phan Khac Suu as Chief of State and resolving the impasse; except for Quat to resign and the military to take over again. And Thieu was going to be Chief of State, and Ky was going to be Prime Minister. I was, of course, taken somewhat aback by this; and I questioned both Thieu and Ky as to their analysis of the situation, the agreement. And I turned to Quat and said, "Are you fully satisfied on this? There's just no other way out of this?" And he said, "No, there's just no other way out of it." All right. What's an American Ambassador do at three o'clock in the morning in a situation like that? You say that we should, you know, we should have been more vigorous in controlling things. What could you say, except, "God bless you.!"

Q: It was all agreed on their side.

JOHNSON: It was all agreed. There was nothing to do. That's the story of Thieu and Ky coming into power. All I can say is that they've been there since; and you've had more stability there than you've had in many countries that are not at war.

And the balance of power, of course, has shifted from Ky, now, to Thieu under the new constitution. And I'm just enormously impressed with the degree to which Thieu has grown into being a politician, in the real sense of the term. I, of course, knew him well at that time. We'd been through several other coups together one way or the other--Ky and Thieu and I--during the middle of the night, and I knew them exceedingly well.

Last time I saw Thieu was when I went through there in January and had a long, long talk with him, a very intimate talk; and I was just very deeply impressed with the degree to which he has turned from being the military type that I'd known into being what I'd call a real political animal. He has real political sense, looking at things in a political way.

Q: What it boils down to, you're saying, then, is that really they know we're not prepared to make the threat of withdrawal; and therefore, there's really no other threat that . . .

JOHNSON: At that time, that's right. That's right. There was no other threat that was credible. You know, you could tell them all, "You've got to get together. All this haggling and fighting among yourselves." You could preach this to all of them, but how do you make them do it? How do you make them do it?

Thich Tri Quang, the Buddhist. Oh, we spent hours and hours with that fellow. He brought Hung down. Hung was respected. We all liked him. I have enormous respect for him. And Thich Tri Quang brought him down. We'd get Thich Tri Quang in; and lecture him; and pound the table, and all that; but how do you get him to act?

You know, every . . . I often say that, so often, the solutions that people have for foreign policy problems involve having an American ambassador go in and tell a foreign government or a foreign people that they should be something other than what they are. This is not, to me, a very productive course of action. You can influence and guide people within certain parameters, but you've got to recognize the parameters. People are what they are. It doesn't do any good to go in, and pound the table, and tell the Arabs they should love the Israelis, or the Israelis they should love the Arabs, or the Pakistans that they should like the Indians. These are facts of life with which we deal.

In these foreign policy situations, you always have the things over which we have no control; that is, the way people feel about each other, and these things, and the way that people are. People are what they are. Then we have things that we can influence; and of course, this is where diplomacy comes into it. What are the parameters in which we can influence, and what are the weapons and the tools that we can use? And then, we have the things over which we have full control.

Q: That's really only our own activities.

JOHNSON: That's really only our own activities.

Q: Right.

JOHNSON: We don't control the other peoples. Apart from our own people, who think that we should be able to make anybody else do whatever we think that they should do, every foreign country, of course, that has a quarrel with its neighbor, thinks that if the United States only would exercise enough initiative, it could make its neighbors behave. It could make everybody else . . .

Q: Behave meaning agree with what it wants.

JOHNSON: Agree with what it . . . That's right.

Q: That influence, lack of influence, also applies not to changing governments in South Vietnam, but influencing the government in power. That is . . .

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. Sure. Well . . .

Q: . . . influencing the military policy of the DVN.

JOHNSON: Yes. Well, there's a part of the job. Again, you can do this within parameters. We have been doing it within the parameters in which we can operate, and I think you can see the results. You can tell the government, "You know, you should do a much better job of administering the provinces than you're doing. You ought to get better people out there." All right, where are they going to find the better people? Just saying these things doesn't do it.

Q: Is that what happened to, say, pacification? There just weren't the people and the effort to make the impact?

JOHNSON: That's a part of the problem. Of course, you've had tens of thousands of . . . Well, you have a government that's started with no training or no base for government during the colonial period. It started with virtually nothing in the way of background or experience. Then you've had ten thousands of the people murdered--government officials, village chiefs--that have been murdered throughout the years. And some of the best ones, obviously, were the ones that were murdered.

Q: Those have been targets.

JOHNSON: Those were the targets, of course. And so, your material with which the government had to work was just extremely limited; and no amount of exhortation is going to overcome that.

Q: That's right. Why, in the summer of 1965, did the Taylor-Johnson mission come back? Was there any specific reason? You felt the job had been done, at that point, that you all could do, or was there some policy . . . ?

JOHNSON: Well, it was agreed when we went out that we would go out for a year.

Q: Oh, I see.

JOHNSON: That was the understanding with which we went out. And we felt that--both of us felt--that we'd done about all that we could do in the situation. And it was accepted back here that we'd gone out for a year; and so we came back.

Q: As a man who had been there and been on the scene, did Mr. Johnson talk to you at length, or frequently, about your experiences there, once you returned?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. We, of course, saw him--saw him privately. Each of us saw him privately. We also saw him at NSC meetings. Oh, yes, there was a lot of discussion.

Q: Did he question you closely as to the very minor details, or specific details, trying to master the situation himself? Or was he just generally getting impressions?

JOHNSON: I would say in general, general questions. General questions, general terms, yes.

WILLIAM N. TURPIN Vietnam Aid Program
Saigon (1964-1965)

William Turpin was born in Georgia in 1923 and educated at Dartmouth College, Mercer and Oxford. He entered the Foreign Service in 1949. His career included posts in Munich, Belgrade, Moscow, the Hague and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You then went to Vietnam. Was this voluntarily?

TURPIN: No. Killen called me – my ex-boss from Belgrade- Jim Killen who had been meanwhile in Pakistan and Korea, called me up in the middle of the night just after we had taken this new, lovely spunket out for few little sailing bits, I remember over the fourth of July weekend. He said “Bill, I have just been put in charge of the aid mission to Vietnam and I need a special assistant on whose personal integrity and professional ability I can absolutely count, will you come?” I said “yes.” My wife proceeded to give me hell afterwards for not consulting. I said “Audrey, there was no question. We did not join the boy scouts and this is what you do.” Well she was ticked off about that and I don’t blame her. She was quite right. She said “you never liked Jim Killen,” which was perfectly true. It wasn’t a question, do I like him or not? If he thinks he needs me, then I better go. But I told Killen on the phone that I didn’t really know where Vietnam was and I certainly didn’t know anything about it. I wanted to come back to Washington and go around with him on his briefings, to which he agreed.

And the only thing that happened during that period of any particular note was a lunch at the CIA after we’d had a session with Mr. McCowen in the morning. And we had William Colby, he was running the far east at the time, and a guy named, I think, Mansfield from the State Department.

Q: Manheur?

TURPIN: Yes. Phillip Manheur. That’s right. You’re right.

Q: Later a prisoner of the Vietcong for a long seven years.

TURPIN: I didn’t realize that. Anyway, they were talking busses and trams around the cable and I still didn’t know anything. So when they finally got around to asking me for my positions, low carb low salt as you could get. “Do you have any questions?” I said “yes, I’ve got two. I’m sorry but you got to remember I don’t know doodly about Vietnam. What I would like to know is what’s eating the VC and what are they peddling.” And these hotshots looked at each other and said “well that’s a really very good question.” If I’d had any sense I would have refused to go right then and there. If we didn’t know by this time, there was a hell of a poor chance we would ever do anything sensible.

So anyway, couple of years later, as you may remember, a book came out which I must say I have never read, by some CIA type, about basically what was eating the VC and what were they peddling.

Q: Yes. It was called Victor Charlie, I think.

TURPIN: You are probably right.

Q: Yes. I can’t remember. I think it was a USIA officer.

TURPIN: It may have been. In any case, I went. And did my best. Killen said he wanted me to learn Vietnamese which I worked at quite hard and quite ineffectually. There wasn't much use, and this really kind of bugged me and still does. I think that the State Department has never had sufficient [language expertise]; they've been okay about languages on the whole. They will give you training and it's good training. But they don't keep anybody around long enough in a country to really master the place. Unlike the treasury people.

Q: Yes. This is always a problem. A language officer should put about five years in a place.

TURPIN: At least. What we need is people that start out about third secretaries and go up to ambassador knowing, I don't mean necessarily Finland, but Scandinavia or something. And what [harm] they do when they send these people off to Africa or Southeast Asia. My last assignment, which I didn't take up, was to Bangkok as economic counselor. And I said, "look, I just don't think I'm man enough in my present tender age of 49 or whatever it was at the time to take on a tonal language." And they said, "oh, you don't have to worry. We've got a kid in the economic section who speaks Thai, and, besides, everybody speaks English. I said, "sorry, I can't play that way." And well, I didn't retire when I got the chance to.

Q: Let's turn back to Vietnam. You go there from 64 to 65. What were you doing?

TURPIN: Well, first I was special assistant to Killen. And I don't exactly know what I was doing. A couple of the counter insurgency people wanted me to come up and take charge of I corps. Killen wasn't aware of that. I don't know what good I would have done. Mostly I just sort of tried to find out what was going on, or what we were doing, to the extent one could. And, I went to Killen's meetings and I wrote a memcon. You know, this was in the days when they were changing their governments faster than you could change your shirts.

Q: Sure. Generals were moving in...

TURPIN: Yes. Everybody moving in, moving out. There was a new finance minister who was a pretty bright cookie, I thought. And Killen said, in the course of the conversation, we must put all of our resources on the table. "We" and "our" are systematically ambiguous in English, unambiguous in Vietnamese. You have to translate it into either "we on this side of the table" or "all of us here in this room." I don't know which was used. I couldn't hear what was being said. But whatever was being said, the Vietnamese had absolutely no intention of putting their money [on the table]. They thought our money was the stuff that was to be dealt with and counted on.

Well, I wrote a memorandum to that effect. Killen got furious. And next thing I knew he'd asked the embassy if they would take me on. Yes, they wanted me to come over and run, so he said, provincial reporting. So from about January on, that's what I did. I was told when I got there, don't bother anybody. It's running perfectly well. Just sit there. I sat there, took Vietnamese and went around as much as I could. And they were perfectly happy to get shut of me the following summer.

Q: What was your impression of the reporting that was coming through the post?

TURPIN: I think the stuff from the provinces was good. It was the cables, which everybody read, that...

Q: These were cables emanating from the embassy to Washington?

TURPIN: Sure. Sure. Yes, I asked them one time after I got over there, we were busily engaged in operation “many flags” or something of the sort, trying to get everybody’s little brother down there...

Q: Get the Philipinos and the...

TURPIN: The Australians, the Koreans. And I said, “do you think this is an inside job or an outside job?” They said “it’s being run out of Hanoi.” I said, “okay, I can give you that.” But here we are about to intervene with troops when, as far as I know, there is only one North Vietnamese army unit in the country, and that’s the mythical whatever it was, tenth division, which kept getting reported from the mountains. But nobody ever saw it, as far as I could see. And meanwhile the VC were killing us quite happily. Then the troops came in and it really did start.

Q: You were there when the troops came in?

TURPIN: Yes. Yes. I was in Hue the day Turner gave whatever the over one was called, the destroyers were allegedly fired upon.

Q: Yes. The Turner Joy, and another one.

TURPIN: Joy. That’s right. And something else. Yes. Well, I did not see either... In the first place, I did not think that our aid program was doing a damn thing except dispensing largess. I got to a meeting shortly after I got there. They were talking about transportation and they said, “the Vietnamese were completely irrational. They would rather requisition a new jeep than use their own money to buy a new carburetor.” And I said, “well, you may dislike this, but irrational it is not.” That went over like a lead balloon.

And the medical chief was talking to me before he went in to see Killen about something and he said that they had this big hospital which we had built and he wasn’t about to turn over to the Vietnamese because they wouldn’t use American training methods. They insisted on using French ones and they were not good. I said, “well hell, there’s fifty million Frenchmen around. They ain’t all dead. They must do something right.” “Nope. This would be a waste of the American taxpayer’s money.” “What about having that building sit there empty?”

And the exchange guy came in one day and I said – this is all while they were waiting to get in to see the boss – and I said “what are your ex-exchangers doing when they’re back?” He said, “we’ve never had one come back.”

Q: You mean...

TURPIN: People we had sent over on exchanges programs for training. They got off the plane in Paris and stayed there. And I asked the education chief, "what was the political content that we were having printed at considerable extent in Manila?" He said, "oh I don't know. You have to ask Ms. Wynn, or something like that. She's responsible for content." I said, "you mean you don't know whether this is supposed to make these kids loyal to Vietnam." "No. We don't know about that." And the head of the agriculture thing told me after church one day, quite distinctly, "the Viet Cong don't bother us because we are just teaching them how to raise grains. We don't care who gets it." Well, by that time I was pretty sure that, as I'd advised Kinnen in my early days, we should not do something- just stand there. But I never got anywhere either.

Q: Then you sort of left without much optimism about what was going on?

TURPIN: None. And my next efficiency rating had to do with "Mr. Turpin did not make the best of a bad assignment."

PETER M. CODY
Vietnam Desk, USAID
Washington, DC (1964-1965)

Peter M. Cody was born in France in 1925, graduated from Yale and after service in the United States Navy joined the State Department in 1954. He served in El Salvador, Cambodia, Laos, Paraguay, Ecuador, the Philippines, and Lebanon, as well as in USAID in Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Melbourne Spector in 1991.

Q: So you came back to Washington to head up the Office of Vietnam Affairs. You were in that how long?

CODY: It was strange. I was only in that position about eight months, and the reason I left was as bureaucratic a reason as you can get. I left at my choice. When I went to Cambodia, I was an R4, Foreign Service Reserve, fourth grade, which is lower medium level. Through the efforts of Bill Sheppard, I subsequently was promoted very soon to an R3. I had been an R4 for a long time and then for some reason I hadn't been promoted. But I'd only been an R3 for a year and the panel promoted me to an R2. I could never quite figure that out but I didn't object. Then when I moved into the job of deputy, when I was officially made the deputy director, it carried a temporary grade with it of an R1. So in a period of thirteen months, I went from an R4 to an R1. I was pleased.

When I came back to the Office of Vietnam Affairs, I had to revert to my permanent grade, which by then was an R2, but it meant that I lost, including housing, about $6,000. So I kept saying to my superiors, "Either give me a promotion, upgrade the official position of this job so I can get paid temporarily extra, or there are several people asking me to go back to take jobs where I could again be given my temporary grade of an R1," one of whom was Charlie Mann had then become director in Laos. He was asking me to come out as his deputy. So bureaucratically it turned out that it was easier to send me to Laos where I'd get back my grade than it was to do whatever they might have done to give me the grade in Washington. I don't know if they knew it at the time, but very shortly after I left that job, they upgraded my office to a bureau, and they weren't about to make me the head of a bureau at that stage. So maybe that had something to do with it, though at the time I left, I didn't know they were going to do so. I was replaced as Office Director by another man, but he was in the job a very short period of time when they upgraded it. I don't know what happened to him. I imagine he just became one of many in that bureau, which I presume would have happened to me.

Q: While you were in the Office of Vietnam Affairs, what kind of priority did it have within the government?

CODY: It had a high and increasing priority. This was just during the period that President Johnson stepped up the effort in Vietnam. The standard phrase in those days -- and people didn't say no to this question, which they did later -- "Are you against the war?" You could just sort of hold that out as a threat. In fact, in those days we still sent people to Vietnam voluntarily. Later we made it, "Either go or leave the agency." At that point theoretically it was voluntary. I had a letter in my desk from LBJ which said, "Anytime that you have someone that you want to send that you think is important that they go to Vietnam, and they don't want to go, call me and I will personally call them."

Q: The president personally?

CODY: He signed the letter.

Q: He probably would have.

CODY: I was always looking for that occasion and it never arose. It almost arose with Don Finberg once, but it didn't arise. [Laughter]

There was a White House task force on which I represented AID, headed up by Michael Forrestal, the son of James Forrestal, and it had Bill Colby on it representing the CIA, then the head of the Far East Bureau for CIA, and a number of military types whose names I don't remember. I used to be amused how Forrestal, who was quite young (when I saw when he died how old he was, he wasn't as young as I thought he was then), but would sort of push these admirals and generals around. It was refreshing. [Laughter]

So we met once a week. When I first went on that panel, actually, Bill Sullivan was the chairman, who was subsequently my ambassador in Laos and in the Philippines. But he left shortly after I arrived. Then at the end of the time, Forrestal left and went back to private industry, a competent fellow named Len Unger took over. He later became ambassador to Thailand and other places as well.

Q: It's interesting you mention Forrestal and Sullivan, because they were both protégées of Ambassador Averell Harriman. Forrestal had been Averell Harriman's personal assistant when he was the head of the Marshall Plan in Europe, and then, as you know, Sullivan became his aide and he promoted him when Harriman was involved in some kind of negotiation in Geneva. So that's interesting.

CODY: We built up the Vietnam mission in size to about 2,000 direct-hire employees. It had a built-in multiplier factor because there were forty-eight provinces. There were actually forty-nine, but one was an island where they kept prisoners in cages. We didn't have an AID program there. But there were forty-eight provinces where we worked. If we added another public safety advisor in one, we added one in the other forty-seven. As we kept adding people, they were divided into four regions, and this would eventually bump up the regional staffs.

Q: So you had a headquarters staff in Saigon, regional staffs, then provincial staffs.

CODY: Yes, there were people in each province. So you had a multiplier effect. When I was there we reached 2,000 direct-hire employees plus contractors. I don't know how many contractors.

Q: By far the largest mission in the world.

CODY: Yes, by far the largest mission that AID has ever had and hopefully ever will. Our back-stopping job in Washington involved a number of things; breaking bottlenecks, recruitment, dealing with other agencies, making sure materials arrived, occasionally dealing with public or congress men. On occasions we were involved with policy issues as well; a big variety of issues. One of the things we put a lot of emphasis on was showing that other nations were contributing to the Vietnam effort, no matter how small. I don't know if it was monthly or biweekly. I think it was biweekly, maybe even weekly. We had a list of what every other country in the world was doing to help the Vietnam effort, to show it wasn't just LBJ flexing his muscles. The Vietnam program obviously had high priority, and it didn't surprise me when they made it into a bureau. I had about thirty people working for me as an office, which at the time I thought was rather excessive, but the bureau reached 200. I think everybody fell all over each other. The trouble is that you get an organization like that and they start writing memos to each other and they start carving out turfs and having arguments about it and so forth. Even my thirty people included a few people who I thought were unproductive, so I put them over in offices and gave them nothing to do. I couldn't get rid of them. It was called the "old goats pen". As I say, I left when I was offered a job in Laos to be Charlie Mann's deputy.

RAY E. JONES
Embassy and Staffing Protocol Officer
Saigon (1964-1965)

Ray E. Jones attended the Lafayette Business College. After a year in Washington working for the Department of Interior, he entered the army. His court reporting work took him overseas in 1945. In 1946, he went to Berlin with the Department of the Army. He has also served in South Korea, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Liberia, the Netherlands, Sudan, and China. He was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on August 23, 1994.

Q: You certainly added to it in subsequent posts. Two years in Vienna and then came another direct change.

JONES: I was due for home leave and at that time, there was a new team getting ready to go to Saigon. The Ambassador was General Maxwell Taylor, and the DCM was Career Ambassador, was U. Alexis Johnson.

Q: And did they ask you to go along with them?

JONES: And General Taylor, out of my files from the State Department chose me to come to Saigon.

Q: I presume you'd not known him in Berlin because he had arrived in Berlin in 1950?

JONES: I knew him vaguely but not well.

Q: Did he regard himself as successful in Saigon, one of the most difficult missions in the world at that time?

JONES: Well, General Taylor is a very astute general, but he could irritate the Vietnamese, I mean lecturing to them and things like that. His assignment there was for one year only. And I must say of all my post, I would say Saigon was one of the most exciting that I had. We went through four or five coups d'etat and it was just work, work, work, almost as events proved all the hard work was for nothing.

Q: And you were there during the beginning of the great American build-up, were you not?

JONES: The great American build-up. We came out to replace General Harkins I think it was with (Westie) General William Westmoreland. I had very close relations with him. A lot of times on Sunday he would call me up and say: "I'm going out on a little field trip. Would you like to go with me?"

Q: Was this General Westmoreland? It was very kind of him.

JONES: Yes, General Westmoreland. Of course, he was a protégé of Maxwell Taylor. When he was at West Point, he was the number one cadet and that impressed General Taylor who at that time was the Commandant at West Point. Westie was kind of his protégé.

Q: What was the atmosphere you found in Saigon among the Vietnamese? Were they delighted we were there? Were they sullen? Were they helpful?

JONES: Not too helpful, Tom. We always thought they didn't pull their weight.

Q: Tell me about the arrangement at the Embassy where you had two seniors such as General Taylor and Ambassador Johnson. Did Taylor leave the running of the Embassy to Johnson? Did they get into each other's way?

JONES: No. I believe he and Johnson attended maybe Chinese training together, so they were great friends, and Taylor was the one to help Johnson to come to Vietnam. He chose him as his DCM.

Q: Was the Embassy in agreement with ... Policy in Washington was promulgated in Washington or were there differences?

JONES: No. I don't believe so. There were no differences.

Q: We saw the situation. Both ends were about the same. Why did General Taylor leave there after a year?

JONES: It was agreed between him and President Johnson that he would take the assignment for one year only.

Q: I see. Did you feel yourself in any personal danger out there?

JONES: No. Not whatsoever.

Q: Not even on your trips with General Westmoreland?

JONES: No, although one night during my period there we had several bombs. The Embassy was bombed but I was back in the States on a trip with General Taylor when the Embassy was blown up and there were quite a few casualties.

DAVID G. NES
Deputy Chief of Mission
Saigon (1964-1965)

David G. Nes was born in York, Pennsylvania in 1917. He graduated from Princeton University with an A.B. degree in History in 1939. Mr. Nes was appointed as a Foreign Service Officer in 1946. His overseas career included posts in France, Scotland, Libya, Morocco, Vietnam, and Egypt. He retired with a Superior Honor Award in 1968. Mr. Nes was interviewed by Dayton Mak in 1992.

Q: From then on, you were plunged into Saigon where you were DCM with the personal rank of Minister. You had a few other assignments as well. Particularly with reference to Saigon and what came later, what was the situation in Saigon when you were there and who was your Ambassador?

NES: Perhaps I could begin by regaling you with how I was assigned to Saigon in the first place. I was just finishing up in December the IDC course in London when I got a telephone call to report back to Washington immediately. I explained that the course wasn't over and that I was in the middle of preparing a British defense budget, but that didn't seem to cut any ice. So I got on a plane the next morning and flew back.

I was called up to the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs for an appointment with Roger Hilsman, the Assistant Secretary. Roger said, "What would you think about going out to Saigon as Cabot Lodge's deputy?" I expressed some surprise and said, "How has this come about?" He said, "Well, you may recall that when you were in Libya, Cabot Lodge came over there as our UN Ambassador for a visit and you offered him a choice between coming to the Embassy for all sorts of activities, ceremonies, cocktail parties, etc., or taking the Ambassador's car and going out to the Rome ruins at Sabratha and watching the sun set. [I recommended the latter, which Ambassador Lodge accepted.] When the problem of replacement of our current DCM in Saigon arose, we asked the Ambassador if he had any preference. We offered him three names and he apparently selected Nes because of his Libyan experience."

Q: What was the status of our involvement at that point in Saigon? What was the situation on the ground with regard to both the French and the US and the Vietnamese?

NES: By the time I arrived, we had some 25,000 so-called advisers on the ground out to battalion level in the Vietnamese army for training and advisory functions. The activities of the communist forces in the South, known as Viet Cong, were obviously increasing day by day, both in taking over villages, particularly in the Delta, but also in a tremendous propaganda effort. It was very clear that the control and supply of these Viet Cong forces came directly from Hanoi. We were able to intercept the radio and ground communications to a certain extent. The heart and mind of the whole operation in South Vietnam centered in Hanoi which meant that it was very hard to get at.

Shortly after my arrival, General Westmoreland arrived to take over command. We got along very well. I traveled with him by helicopter and light plane into every provincial capital in South Vietnam which gave me a pretty good bird's eye view of the situation. It seemed very clear to most of us that the tentacles of the communist effort in the South extended so far into the villages in the countryside that it would be very difficult, if not virtually impossible, to rout them out without going into the heart and brains of the operation in Hanoi, which, of course, would have meant the occupation of North Vietnam as we had occupied Germany and Japan and which was politically unthinkable back home in the United States, or in fact in the Western world.

General Westmoreland, I think, was still hopeful that the effort we were engaged in in the South could prevail, but I am not sure he was that optimistic. He told me at one point, if he had the number of troops that were bogged down in the South and could use them for the occupation of the North, we would suffer far fewer casualties than we are suffering now.

During my brief tenure, we did begin to build up forces. First of all providing direct air support to the Vietnamese, secondly, naval support off the coast. But by the time of my departure we hadn't yet introduced any active combat units. These were to come very briefly thereafter in tremendous numbers as we all know. But I would say that at the end of my short time there was not too much optimism that we could achieve our objective, which was very simply preserving a non- communist South Vietnam. We could not achieve that objective without in effect going after the North directly. My departure from Saigon was sudden and unexpected. With no warning. Ambassador Lodge departed to run in the 1964 Presidential elections. General Taylor was appointed as Ambassador and chose career Ambassador Johnson as his deputy, and so I was "trumped" out of a job.

RICHARD J. DOLS
Intelligence Analyst, Vietnamese Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1964-1966)

Richard J. Dols was born in Minnesota in 1932. He joined the Foreign Service in 1961 and served in France, Canada, Swaziland, New Zealand, and Washington, DC. He was in the Intelligence and Research Bureau (1964-1966) dealing with Vietnam. He was interviewed in 1992 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Then you moved to INR from 1964-66. What were you doing there?

DOLS: Two things there. I did Soviet-Vietnamese relations during the Vietnam War.

Q: That was a very interesting period, wasn't it?

DOLS: It was indeed.

Q: That was when we were really beginning to get engaged.

DOLS: It was. We were, for example, busy watching the building of the SA3 (surface to air missile) site in the Hanoi area. We knew who was involved in building them. The problem was that one of the unwritten rules of the Cold War was that Americans and Soviets don't kill each other. You only kill surrogates. What do you do? Do you hit those sites now before they are operational or do you wait? If you wait or even if you hit them now you are going to kill Soviets. What do you do? The intelligence community and other military planners were in a quandary. How far do we go? We were very hesitant after being burned in Korea with the Chinese intervention. We didn't want to push anything too hard, too far.

Well, one Saturday in the summer I recall getting a call to come in. There had been a shootdown. Two F-4s were flying over the valley and the pilot had seen a flashing pole of light come up and hit the wing. Of course it was an SA3. That was the first time the North Vietnamese and their friends fired. So now it was a real question of what we should do. We pondered about 24 hours and then came to a very common sensible solution. We just pretend we don't know there are any Soviets there. We just say we are hitting the North Vietnamese positions in retaliation for the strike on our aircraft. And that was what we did. Thereafter, of course, things escalated considerably.

Q: What was the feeling that you got at that time about our involvement in Vietnam?

DOLS: My own personal feeling?

Q: Yes, but at the time.

DOLS: At the time, our rhetoric on the subject was basically that we were stemming the tide of aggression, etc. The other side can call it a civil war, but we had the right to intervene even if it was. We, of course, had our own strategic interests in that part of the world which would be adversely affected if the South fell. So, at least in the early days it seemed a very worthy cause. I think upon reflection we very quickly realized that the cost of it was not going to be commensurate with the rewards of any kind of happy outcome. In fact, the military which earlier had argued before the Johnson decision to intervene and go beyond the 15,000 Kennedy advisers, had staunchly held to the old axiom that you can't win a war on the Asian mainland.

They were right. They were especially right in this situation where the enemy had a protected line of supply practically down to the south part of South Vietnam. It was an unwinnable war and the military was right, but once they got gung-hoed in they went the other way.

We had a lot of problems with the gung-hoiness because they then got carried away in the other direction. For instance, for the Christmas peace negotiations, about '65 or '66, we put on a big campaign to get some peace negotiations going. We had delegations going all over the world to various capitals. What does the military PR apparatus do but announce on the 24th of December some horrible atrocities by the VCs. We said, "Guys you knew those things happened a long time back, but you held them until December 24 in the midst of our attempts to get talks going, can't you be a little more helpful than that?"

So we had a swing first seeing it in our strategic national interest and then having the internal problems that goes from "you can't win there, stay out" to "let's go all the way." We were moderators in the process.

Q: There wasn't any strong dissident group within...just the people like yourselves thinking this was a controllable problem...

DOLS: It wasn't until about two years later and then, you remember, we had the demonstrations about the time of the Cambodian bombing by a number of FSOs outside the Department. One from my class, in fact.

Q: This would be around '70 or something like that.

DOLS: Well, I think it was '68 when we started Cambodia. It was after my time at INR.

There were no dissents really among the officers working on it. Our only problems were excessive gung-hoiness by the military or whatever.

JAMES F. LEONARD
Intelligence Analyst, Far East Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1964-1966)

James F. Leonard was born in Pennsylvania in 1920. He graduated from Princeton University with a bachelor of science degree. He was in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1946. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948 and served in Taiwan, France, Russia, Syria. Mr. Leonard was interviewed by Warren Unna in 1993.

LEONARD: My first assignment was on the China desk, or whatever it was of INR. Then during the time I was in INR, I guess three years, '64 to '66, almost three years, two and a half anyway, I moved from China, to focus pretty much on Vietnam. During that period we were engaging in the escalation in Vietnam and we had a whole series of intelligence estimates on what would be the consequences of various US actions. I was often, not always but often, the State Department representative in those meetings over in CIA where these intelligence estimates would be turned out saying: "Suppose we bomb, suppose we do this, suppose we do that? What will be the consequences?"

Q: Well now, there has been great dispute about the US was informed by its professionals and how much of that information was ignored. So you had a chance to see it coming in and ...

LEONARD: By professionals you mean people in the field?

Q: Coming in and the CIA, and the State Department intelligence people. I guess what I'm driving at is you saw the hard memos. Did they reflect what actually we now know was happening there or not?

LEONARD: I think so. There was from the Tonkin Gulf onward, a tone, an outlook in the State Department, from Mr. Rusk, not including of course George Ball, but then very much including most of the other seventh floor principals as they were called, and Bill Bundy who was the Assistant Secretary for East Asia, a feeling that the war could be won if we just plugged away at it and kept doing what we were doing but did it better. The estimates that we in INR were doing, were ambiguous on that. It was hardly a cheering section for our policy, but it was not anything like a bugle call to lay off, to cut it off. The only bugle calls like that that I am aware of were issued by Bill Trueheart when he was the number two in Saigon and became convinced that there was no hope ... You know the sad story of the Trueheart/Nolting relationship?

Q: I saw both of them out there, but ...

LEONARD: Well, Nolting was the Ambassador and Trueheart was his deputy. They had been together at NATO where Nolting had been the number two. Trueheart had been his deputy and they went together to Vietnam. They were very close friends. Then they had a basic difference. This was in the period of (Ngo Dinh Diem). The difference was over whether Diem could make it. Nolting went away at one period on home leave and Trueheart sent in a famous cable which said basically: "Diem has got to go." "We cannot possibly win; the whole thing will go down the tube if he doesn't go, and probably will go down the tube anyway." Nolting found out about this and rushed back to Washington to try to change things, but by that time that Kennedy and others had begun to think that some reexamination of our policy there was very important. This led , just how directly is a very complex matter which I'm not an expert on, to the overthrow of Diem. Both Nolting and Trueheart eventually left and we got a new team in.

Q: Was the US informed that there was going to be a coup against Diem and looked the other way, because some people said that the US was very much immediately involved in it, in the overthrow of Diem ...?

LEONARD: I don't think that anybody said to the plotters: "Go get him, get rid of him, and we'll be behind you." What it seemed to me may have happened is that there was a failure to say: "At all costs, protect him." But I have read some other memoirs on this period which are much more detailed, specific, and knowledgeable than anything that's in my head. I just think my own thoughts on that ... I was in Taiwan when it happened. I'm simply not a good source for what really took place at the time of the overthrow. What was more important in a way was that after that you got a series of Ambassadors. Alexis Johnson and General Taylor, etc., who basically were in support of the policy, what you could call the McNamara/Rostow policy, and I have to say it looked as if it had Kennedy's support as well, although people swear that if he had lived he would have changed it. It certainly had Johnson's support to see the thing through and not buckle under the pressure. It was at that time that I came into the Department and saw what was I think an uncritical acceptance of our Vietnam policies, except in INR. In INR, attitudes were more skeptical, though not bluntly hostile.

Q: I want to ask you now ... You mentioned the gulf of Tonkin earlier. The gulf of Tonkin resolution. You in INR would be getting the cables on what we assume had happened there.

LEONARD: We would, although I was not in Washington quite yet. I came between the first gulf of Tonkin and the second gulf of Tonkin incidents. There were two of them. The one in August, I had not arrived. I think I may have mentioned this to you earlier, when I arrived I was curious about it, because it to me had seemed like such an extraordinarily inexplicable and stupid action on the part of the North Vietnamese to have attacked our ships and brought down this escalation on themselves. So I went back and looked at the classified material, and my conclusion from that was that you couldn't say that it hadn't happened, but also you sure could not and should not have said that it really did happen. Maybe there was other information that I never saw, but in fact I don't think there was, and it's all been researched and written up very thoroughly.

Q: So you raised your scepticism on that?

LEONARD: Yes, I indicated I was rather skeptical about this and I was told by my boss: "Well, keep your scepticism to yourself."

Q: This is the boss in INR?

LEONARD: This is past history, yes.

Q: I see. Now then, you were there for the second ...?

LEONARD: I was there for the second, and we had, in effect, what looked to me like a replay of it. This time I was in a position to say: "I think we ought to have some reservations in anything we write about just what it is that happened here, because it is a very unclear sequence of events." And in fact, INR did write it up that way, and as far as I know, the second gulf of Tonkin incident, although the right wing used it, you know the hawks, used it for their purposes, I don't think it served quite the same way as the first did.

PHILIP R. MAYHEW
Advisor, Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1964-1966)

Philip R. Mayhew was born in California in 1934. He graduated from Princeton University in 1956 and served in the Marine Corps from 1957 to 1959. He entered the Foreign Service in 1961 and his overseas posts included Laos, Congo, Vietnam, Thailand, and Jordan. In addition, he served in various positions at the State Department in Washington, DC. He was interviewed on May 26, 1995 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Did you go back to the Department for a while from Stanleyville?

MAYHEW: No. It was a direct transfer. I was still on loan to USIS having done only 7 months of my 2-year tour. In Vietnam USIS started something called, at that time, the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO), later changed to other names.

At any rate, in looking back at the African experience, you can see that we had too many people there trying to do things which were really totally irrelevant to a largely tribal situation. I suppose, in the longer run, you could say that US policy there was more or less successful since the Congo never went, even ostensibly, Marxist. But the actual government that the Congolese had was about on a par with Congo-Brazzaville across the river which was Marxist. Both of them were dictatorships and almost without any redeeming economic benefits for the population.

Q: When you arrived, you got to Saigon again, it's still '64, what was your job?

MAYHEW: I became part of JUSPAO as an advisor to the Vietnamese civilian government's information service and to Vietnamese Army S-5 Psychological War efforts. They had representatives of this office at Corps level, it was now decided to break that down to division level.

Q: The IV Corps, I Corps.

MAYHEW: One for each Corps. Now there was going to be 8 or 9, I think, and I was going to have the IXth division area.

Q: Which is where?

MAYHEW: Which is down in the Delta, it included 6 provinces in the central delta.

Q: S-5s being the...?

MAYHEW: S-5s being the military psychological warfare branch. Each province had a set of US military province advisors. So we worked with a US military officer advising the Vietnamese S-5s. Each province also had a Vietnamese civilian information officer which we also advised. Our job was to carry on information and psychological warfare.

I had funds with which I could support various activities. We worked with Vietnamese information service and with military S-5s, Vietnamese and American on almost any kind of project that was thought useful. For instance, in Khien Phong province, a good deal of which is watery and practically every village is on a canal, I funded a showboat. It was a boat which was run by the Vietnamese Information Service with a team on it of actors, actresses, singers, and so on which did psychological warfare kinds of entertainment. I think it was probably the only showboat in Vietnam.

It was an idea thought up by one of the American military S-5 advisers who was a dedicated, hardworking, very creative guy. He thought up the idea and got the Vietnamese Information Service to go for it, and I funded a lot of it. We funded posters for poster campaigns, we funded leaflets to be dropped over VC areas, loudspeaker programs, information sheets of all kinds, even some newspaper-like publications. Anything having to do with the media, we could fund if it seemed like a good idea.

We created a Returnee Program, for VC the government was trying to get back. We funded a little booklet with pictures and very little writing -- showing how to come back, how you were reeducated if you'd come back, allowed to go back to your family and all that. At the end of the book it said, come back with this book and you won't have any problems. We had people come in with the book. Whether it warranted its investment, however, is difficult to say.

Q: In the first place, what was the situation -- military, politically, and all in the area you were in?

MAYHEW: In the area I was, there were a few districts that were almost totally VC controlled and you really could not go in except to outposts by helicopter. You probably wouldn't choose to spend overnight, if you didn't have to. I think every place that I dealt with, all the district capitals of all of these provinces, you could drop in on by helicopter safely enough. But at night many of these places were just outposts that the government was hanging on to.

On the other hand, Angiang province, which was controlled by the Hoa Hao religious sect, was virtually free of communists. It was almost totally safe. The rest of them varied from Khien Phong, which was bad, to Vien Leng and Sa Dec, which were not bad at all, except in the remoter places.

There were a number of roads which were considered unsafe in the daytime and generally untraveled at night. Vinh Binh, which was one of my provinces, which faced the South China Sea, was rather bad from a security point of view. The only real road was the highway that went from Vinh Leng, where I lived, to the province capital. It was normally safe in the daytime, but David Engel, who was one of the provincial reporters for the embassy, was using my vehicle and a huge mine was set off in front of it. He and his driver ended up with all the glass from the windshield in their face, but they managed to control the car and go around the hole, which was about 10 feet across and 2-3 feet deep. They could have been killed.

Q: How did you find dealing with the Vietnamese at that time?

MAYHEW: I consider the Vietnamese difficult to deal with in the best of times. As personalities, it seems to me, they are clever and sensitive but xenophobic, back-biting, rather unpleasant people to deal with. I did not have a great deal of difficulty working with them because, after all, I was handing out money, substantial amounts of money. I was helping them do their jobs, but at the same time pushing them to do things I thought advisable and it can't have been easy for them to have me intervening. They tended to have the long Mandarin fingernail, clearly did not move out of their office very much, clearly were accustomed to giving orders and waiting for them. They were not accustomed to what we think of as public relations. One might think they could look good if they and we put some kind of program together that gave them something to tell their bosses they were doing. However, this was too alien to their bureaucratic culture.

Q: What about JUSPAO? Who was running it at that time?

MAYHEW: Barry Zorthian.

Q: I assume you would go up there from time to time.

MAYHEW: Yes, and Zorthian came down to see me from time to time.

Q: What was the spirit of the time?

MAYHEW: USIS was a very big place when it had JUSPAO. The field reps were different from what everybody else was doing. Probably different than most things USIS people have done in the past. We didn't have a lot in common with people in Saigon. But I recall that we thought we were doing important work, that the war was to a large extent psychological. Perhaps everyone in the field thought the war was being managed wrongly.

It seems to me that the Phoenix program had begun when I was there. There was a local CIA guy that we'd see a lot of. But that was out of my purview, and they were not about to tell me anything about it. I had varying relationships with the US military province senior advisors. Some were very shrewd fellows, some were not, some were easy to work with, some weren't so easy. But the ones who weren't so easy sometimes had S-5 advisors who were fairly good. In that case I could just deal with these S-5 advisors.

The S-5 advisors were usually infantry or artillery and trained to fight wars; doing psychological warfare was something of a change for them. But they figured that was their job and they'd go along with the program. One or two were aware of French experience in Indochina and Algeria and were really very interested in the subject and dedicated.

Q: When you left there in '66, what was your feeling about whither Vietnam?

MAYHEW: I think most of us, who were at that time quite junior, felt that this thing could be won, but we weren't doing it the right way. For instance, Mr. McNamara felt that he never got the information that he should have. Well, if he had asked the questions of most people in the field, including his own military, candidly, he would have gotten some candid answers.

There certainly were plenty of people in the field who doubted that we could win the way we were going. In retrospect, whether the South Vietnamese could have won it any way, is hard to say. But trying not to use hindsight, I think certainly many of us felt, I felt anyway, that the war could be won. But you had to do a lot of things differently than they were then doing them. There had to be much more concentration on local development, much better Vietnamese military efforts, much more local autonomy. You had to have people who were dedicated to winning the war.

I'm certain I would have subscribed, for instance, to John Paul Vann's ideas.

Q: You left there in 1966.

MAYHEW: Yes. I spent the last few months in Saigon, working for a general who was deputy to Barry Zorthian for field operations. That was only three months, then I went back to Washington.

Q: Those three months that you were in, sort of Zorthian's thing, how did that appear? Was it sort of a never-never land?

MAYHEW: I was never involved with press relations and what we told the press, which seemed to be the controversial area. I think a lot of people were knocking themselves out, trying to do the right thing. But a lot of it was, in retrospect, punching the air. By that time I think the American establishment had become so huge, and so many enterprises of all kinds were going on, that coordination probably was extremely difficult. I'm sure it must have been in USIS, in JUSPAO. They had made a decision to go even further toward increasing the size of JUSPAO. In fact, I think toward the end, they even divided my territory. But eventually, of course, they got one of these JUSPAO kind of advisors under whatever organ it was, CORDS by then perhaps, in every province.

CLAYTON E. MCMANAWAY, JR.

Program Officer, USAID
Saigon (1964-1965)

Vietnam Program
Washington, DC (1965)

Pacification Program Officer, USAID
Saigon (1965-196?)

Defense Department, MACV
Saigon (196?-1970)

Clayton E. McManaway, Jr. was born in North Carolina. He graduated from the University of South Carolina and served in the U.S. Navy and the U.S. Marine Corps. He served in Phnom Penh and Saigon, and as Ambassador to Haiti.

Q: When you left Cambodia did you go to Saigon?

McMANAWAY: Yes, for a while..

Q: This was shortly after the death of Diem in October 1963 and you had the October coup and the beginning of the revolving governments and military groups. Were you getting any feel for how the people felt about the situation.

McMANAWAY: We were very isolated there. We were tucked away in one corner of the AID mission and AID missions are pretty well isolated from what is going on at the embassy. So we were even further away from that and pretty much stuck to ourselves. We could sense that there was a good deal of frustration about what was going on and a lot of impatience with these repeated coups and demi-coups.

Q: You were there for how long?

McMANAWAY: I don't remember whether we were there for six months. We had what was then called the commodity import program going on in Cambodia when we shut it down. The commodity import program was easy to run but very complicated to shut down because you had orders all over the place and you had goods and things [in ships] on the high seas and didn't know where they were. There was no system for tracking those things. We were trying to turn ships around and it took a long time to shut the thing down and finally close out the books. I made several trips back over to Phnom Penh. I was there when the embassy was stoned which was another interesting experience.

Q: What happened at the embassy?

McMANAWAY: It was an organized demonstration which turned violent. No one was hurt, everybody was inside. I just barely made it inside before everything erupted. Some cars were turned over and burned, they threw stones through windows and things like that. There was one rickety old elevator in the embassy which was the old French kind being open except for an accordion type metal door. I had gone up to the top floor so that I could see better what was going on. Then word came for everybody to congregate on the second floor. I got in this elevator and you couldn't stop it. It came down [to the main floor] and right in front of the elevator was a window. Well, I hid there. There were three or four Cambodian fellows outside tearing up a car and they saw me and started throwing things in an attempt to hit me. They didn't succeed but did get things into the elevator. They finally got in on the first floor but the Marines blocked up entrances and they couldn't get any further. It was over after a few hours.

Q: Then you went back to Washington?

McMANAWAY: Yes, and was assigned to the Vietnam Desk.

Q: When you say the Vietnam Desk was this State Department or AID?

McMANAWAY: It was AID.

Q: What was your impression of AID's Vietnam program looking at it from its headquarters?

McMANAWAY: My impression was that it was largely a logistics operation, moving things out to Vietnam. And it was obviously growing by leaps and bounds.

Q: This was just before we started to really get involved.

McMANAWAY: Yes. The fellow who was just above the Desk Officer, whose name was Stoneman, I think, was a good logistician, but that basically was all he understood. So I couldn't see much coherence in what we were doing. Later on, once I went out to Vietnam, I was one of the leaders that finally got us away from this awful business of winning the hearts and minds of...of this terribly naive notion that you can build a school or hospital and win the hearts and...I hate that phrase to this day because it really kept us from really realizing what was at stake there for quite a long time and I think really lost the war for us.

We finally developed the pacification program, which I became involved in, both from within AID and then later when we went through the two reorganizations when Komer came out and got the civilians organized so we could put it into the military organization. It took us a long time to turn around from this thinking and realize that what we had to do was to provide people with a stake in the society and economy and local community that they wanted to protect. A stake that was important to them, not winning their hearts and minds which was nonsense.

Q: When you say winning hearts and minds, how does one win hearts and minds in the mind-set of the 1960s when you were back in Washington?

McMANAWAY: The theory was that you gave them better seeds for their plantings, better schools, better medical services, etc. This would, without regard to what was threatening them, somehow gain you their allegiance. Instead of starting with the notion that what you have to do is develop first of all local security and then they need to have a stake politically in their local government. And they need to have an economic stake. You do that by connecting them up with markets and with roads, etc. So, it took us a long time, but we finally got it turned around. Actually, one of the things you will find out later is that I think we won the war and that is why the [Viet Cong] ultimately faded away.

Q: The mainline armies...

McMANAWAY: Turned over everything they had. But we won the guerilla war finally. It took us a lot longer because we didn't understand it. West Point never understood it, Abrams did.

Q: That was also helped by the Tet offensive which knocked the hell out of the Viet Cong.

McMANAWAY: Yes, decimated it.

Q: Did you volunteer to go back to CORDS [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support]?

McMANAWAY: Well, CORDS didn't exist when I went back. I was asked by a fellow who I had a lot of respect for, Roy Wehrle, who was a real star in AID at the time. He was a young man rising...

Q: Is he still around?

McMANAWAY: No, he years ago went back to academia out in Illinois. Everything was inflated in Vietnam in terms of titles. The mission was huge by this time. He was the assistant director for plans and something or other. He was number three in the mission. He was back on consultation and asked me to come out and join his program office and deal with local finance and currency matters, classification, etc. And I did.

Q: This was 1965?

McMANAWAY: Yes.

Q: Were you in Saigon?

McMANAWAY: Yes.

Q: What were the main things you were working on at that time?

McMANAWAY: I was working on pacification. We were torn with a lot of different ideas about how to bring security to the countryside and how to win the hearts and minds. One of the things we were looking at was how could you bypass the province chiefs and get straight to the village chief with money for self-help projects, that is what we called them then.

I set up a special fund which was jointly administered. It was financed from counterpart funds and required sign-off by the U.S. ambassador and the [South Vietnamese] Prime Minister. I designed this thing and worked it all the way through the bureaucracy and sent the letter over to the embassy to go to the ambassador. Peter Tarnoff was the ambassador's special assistant. I got a call from Peter and he said, "Did you write this?" And I said, "Yes." It was about a three page letter, I was still learning how to write. He said, "The Ambassador wanted to meet whoever wrote this and you are not to tell anybody. Don't tell Charles Mann." The ambassador was Lodge and he couldn't stand Charles Mann, who was the director. Charles Mann was an Austrian who had worked his way up from being a clerk in Paris after the war in the original aid program.

Q: That was before the original Marshall Plan, ICA [International Cooperation Agency] or something like that.

McMANAWAY: He had worked his all the way up to be a mission director. But Lodge couldn't understand him and wasn't about to acknowledge to Mann that he couldn't understand this letter. I was pretty scared. Here I was still a junior officer going over to meet the ambassador alone without telling the director. So I went over there and it was a fascinating experience. I sat in front of Lodge's desk and he said, "Who wrote this awful thing?" I said, "I did." He said, "Well, tell me what you are trying to say." And I told him. He said, "All right, you let me know if I say this wrong." He reached behind him and got his dictaphone and dictated a one page letter which was just beautiful. He said everything I had tried to say. I learned an awful lot from that few minutes. Lodge had a lot of faults but not being able to write was not one of them. Anyway, it went off.

Q: Were you getting any input from the field about your attempts to get down to the village chief?

McMANAWAY: Yes, we got some. We would have meetings with people from the field. But at that time, and one of the reasons we finally had to reorganize, we had too many people in the field, too many agencies had people in the field. Later on when we were looking at how we should reorganize, I drew up an overhead slide thing which showed all these lines going out from Saigon to the field and it was a nightmare. That was when initially the Office of Civil Operations was set up, which got all the civilian agencies together under one chain of command. And then Komer moved it into MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] and that is when it became CORDS.

Q: You were at the AID office as a fairly junior officer, what was their impression of Lodge and his direction?

McMANAWAY: There again, we were pretty well occupied with what we were doing. We thought Lodge was sort of a lazy guy, not very energetic. One had this sense of sort of a caretaker approach to things. Not a lot of initiative coming from him. But I was beginning to rise up by then. I was promoted fairly rapidly in Vietnam because they had temporary promotions which was one of the incentives to get people there. Increasingly I was asked to take on more and more responsibility and I negotiated my way up. I said, "Well, if you are going to give me all this responsibility..." I reached the FS-01 pay grade, which in those days was as high as you could go when I was 35 or 36. I was negotiating with the Vietnamese budget office on how the local currency was to be used, the entire budget. Later, when I moved over to CORDS we succeeded in taking all that money away from AID. That was one of the reasons I was no longer very popular in AID. We took all the local currency away from AID and put it into the pacification program.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese bureaucracy at this time?

McMANAWAY: You really had to push them to be responsive to the people of the countryside. You basically had Saigon and the rest of Vietnam, which is not uncommon. In terms of their competence, the Vietnamese are very competent people and very bright. I always thought they were too bright for their own good. They were complicated people. My counterpart, who wasn't really my counterpart, I was dealing over my head with this fellow at the budget office, was highly capable and knowledgeable, but had been there too long. He had been doing the same job for much too long and was quite rigid and you really had to fight with him to get any change. In fact I think he opposed this submission that I finally got through.

Q: Was part of the reason for the initiative that the feeling was that if you didn't have a proscribed procedure to get funds down to the village chief they would be sidetracked by the district and province people?

McMANAWAY: Yes, they would never get there.

Q: Did you have any feel for the role in the CIA there?

McMANAWAY: I was probably was pretty naive about it at that point in my career. I didn't know much about it. It was a huge mission and a big joke because they all drove Toyotas. Some procurement officer went out and got the low bid and bought all the same car.

Q: And they all had Hmong guards in front of their place, who were a distinctive racial type so if you saw these guards in front of a house you knew it was CIA.

McMANAWAY: I didn't know very much about what they were doing. We were working extremely long hours and didn't have time to sit around and ponder what other people were doing.

Q: What was the Office of Civil Operations?

McMANAWAY: This developed out of a meeting that took place, I believe in Hawaii, [President] Johnson had with Westmoreland. Komer had been coming out on visits and I had met him. It was decided to send Komer to Saigon. He was a very forceful man.

Q: He was known as the blowtorch or something like that.

McMANAWAY: Johnson had decided to send him out there to get the pacification program going and told Komer that he and Westmoreland was to work it out. So Komer, I think very wisely, realized that he first had to get the civilians organized, which became the Office of Civil Operations and very shortly after that it was moved in as an integral part of MACV and Komer became a deputy to Westmoreland. We worked right through the military organization. Our head was assistant chief of staff for CORDS.

Q: How did AID take this?

McMANAWAY: Badly.

Q: Were sizeable chunks of the AID organization being taken out and put into CORDS?

McMANAWAY: In Saigon they were being taken out and the chain of command was shifted so that the AID people in the field were reporting back not to the AID mission in Saigon but the Office of Civil Operation. Komer asked me to come over with it and I headed up the plans and program office. No one else wanted to do it. A lot of AID people were afraid to do this. They saw this as something...which I think in the end they were right...a lot of people in AID suffered for having served in Vietnam, which was an outrage later on, several years later. I would have, too, but I left. I think I definitely would have because all they were going to offer me was to run the Vietnamese Desk when I got back. I wasn't about to do that. I got an offer from the Defense Department and left AID.

I went over and convinced some people who had been working with me to come with me. Others didn't. Some refused, it was not a requirement. It was not a large office at the beginning, but it was the beginning of this shift of command of all these people in the field. Ultimately we had people down to the district level. When we moved into MACV we integrated everything.

Q: MACV stood for Military Assistance Command Vietnam.

McMANAWAY: We moved right in and became an integral part. The interesting thing about that was once we got inside the elephant we never lost another policy fight. We couldn't win one on the outside. We argued, for example, over how many popular forces there should be, how many regional forces there should be.

Q: These were basically small militia groups at the lower levels.

McMANAWAY: In theory and principle the popular forces were to be under the village chief's command and the regional forces under the district chief's command or in some cases province chief. These are not the full army units. And we couldn't get any attention to this from the U.S. military. The U.S. military, of course, were the ones who were negotiating with the Vietnamese on force levels and that sort of thing. So we couldn't get an increase. Once we got in, of course Tet had an influence on this, too, a lot of things happened that year of a very positive nature. They mobilized, for one thing. I think the first time the Vietnamese mobilized was after the Tet offensive. They didn't have a government which had the political strength to do it before that.

Q: Tet was in January, 1968?

McMANAWAY: There were three offensives. There was one in February, one in May and one in August. Each one of descending violence. But once we became a part of MACV and were able to put our points forward in their system, I don't think we ever lost another policy decision.

Q: How was the coordination with the military?

McMANAWAY: Well, CORDS was a combined civil/military organization.

Q: Did you have military officers assigned to CORDS?

McMANAWAY: Yes, I had a colonel for a deputy.

Q: How did this work? Were there differences in viewpoint?

McMANAWAY: There were differences but it worked quite well. I was in charge of plans and programs and evaluations. I had a colonel under me. Our top guy who reported technically through the chief of staff to Komer was a civilian and his deputy was a brigadier general. We sort of layered it that way throughout the organization and it worked quite well.

Q: What was your impression of the reports you were getting from the field? Let's say pre-Tet. Was this part of your responsibility to get reports and get an idea of how things were happening?

McMANAWAY: It was not my responsibility but I used them, of course. We had an evaluation unit that went out. Craig Johnstone headed it up. Our impression was that there were a lot more Viet Cong out there than the military was reporting and that Westmoreland wanted to believe. But we were just as surprised by Tet as anyone else. We were not unaware of the weaknesses of the reporting system and that is why we had this evaluation unit to travel all over the country. And I traveled all over the country. And traveled even more after Tet. Before Tet we didn't have a counterpart organization on the Vietnamese side. It was only after Tet that we got them set up as a counterpart organization. Before Tet we would send out instructions to our province advisor and he would go over to the province chief who hadn't heard anything from Saigon, so it was like going up against a brick wall. After Tet when we got the counterpart organization set up, we would parallel these instructions working them out in Saigon first and then the instructions went out so that everybody got the same instructions. Then after Tet we got the first pacification annual plan which grew out of an accelerated pacification campaign that we launched in late summer or early fall that year. John Vann was very much opposed to that plan. It was one of the few times that John and I had a big argument.

Q: What was your impression of John Vann, he being one of the major figures in our efforts in Vietnam?

McMANAWAY: John was extremely capable, a tremendous leader. His private life was somewhat spectacular also. But I was never a moral moralist, that was his business and not mine. He was driven.

Q: How was he viewed within CORDS?

McMANAWAY: He was one of the heavies. He was never in Saigon, he was always out in the field.

Q: How did Tet hit you personally? Do you have any Tet stories?

McMANAWAY: Well, I was here on leave and was called back. One story...I was getting ready to go back and I got a cable from Komer calling me back. I was sitting in home of some friends of mine in New York watching television and the news came on and there was my good friend George Jacobson leaning out the window of the embassy. Someone is trying to throw him a pistol.

Q: I recall that.

McMANAWAY: I came right out of my chair.

I jumped on a plane and flew back and got to the airport which had taken a direct hit on the building. There was no one there. It was just empty. There was no one there to unload the bags. We finally found somebody to open up the cargo area so we could get our luggage. We carried our own bags. Luckily MACV was right across the street so I was able to get over there. I was walking down the road with my bag and along comes my deputy in my car. It turned out my driver had disappeared and never showed up again. That was my entry back. It was still going on.

Q: You are back and the offensive is still active in various places, how is this affecting the CORDS program?

McMANAWAY: I think there were about 35 cities in the country which were hit or overrun. Initially we pulled in our horns but in Saigon I ended up with three jobs. We set up a recovery organization which I headed for Komer, working directly with the prime minister's office. The guy who headed that up was Colonel Que and he, after a few months, became mayor of Saigon. In fact, we made him mayor of Saigon.

Q: Was this because you felt here is somebody who can do the job?

McMANAWAY: He was a very capable guy, strong and forceful. Saigon was desperate for leadership. He asked for me as his advisor. So I was doing the pacification planning programming job, the recovery job, and was the advisor to the mayor of Saigon.

Q: Recovery was recovery from the Tet?

McMANAWAY: Yes. One day Bob Komer called me and Bob Montesque, General Montesque, into his office and said, "There is nobody out there. The Viet Cong are not out there. What we need is a pacification offensive." "What the hell is a pacification offensive?" "Go figure it out." Pacification is defensive by its very concept. After three or four days we came up with an accelerated pacification campaign. And it worked. We targeted where we wanted to send forces in every province. It was all mapped out. John Vann objected, he thought we were overextending ourselves.

Q: Were you having more Americans go out in the field?

McMANAWAY: Well, that got them out. What we needed was something to kick both the Americans and the Vietnamese in the backside and get them moving out of the provincial capitals.

Q: I would think this would always be a problem because it was more comfortable in the capital, it was more dangerous in the countryside and there was always the paperwork which ties you down. Was this a problem trying to get people out without tying them down to bureaucratic burdens?

McMANAWAY: The bureaucratic functions weren't really that much of a concern. It was getting both Americans and Vietnamese out of the bunkers and back out into the countryside and in the process convincing them that in fact there was no one out there, and there wasn't. It was a big success and we built on that and used that as the model for the annual pacification plan which came the next year.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point? I want to put something on the tape so we will know where to start next time. I would like to ask you about the Phoenix program; your impression of Westmoreland, Abrams, Bunker and how the embassy worked; also were you getting at this point any reflections of the operation of the CIA in their work; talking about the post-Tet period.

McMANAWAY: Fine.

Q: Today is September 14, 1993. You mentioned last time that you wanted to talk about the RD [Rural Development] Cadre program. What was that?

McMANAWAY: That was a program run originally by the CIA. It was a concept which ultimately proved ineffective. The concept was that you would take trained Vietnamese, teams trained in various specific projects and disciplines...health, education, security, etc... and send them into VC [Viet Cong] controlled areas, into the hamlets where they would dispose of the VC and provide a form of government and then move on. The fallacy in the concept was that they did move on, didn't stay. Of course once they left the VC came back and anybody who had cooperated with them in the meantime was singled out by the VC for abuse. This was part of our learning process in Vietnam. I can recall and still work myself up into a bit of a lather over this phrase "winning the minds and hearts" of the people, which was a stupid idea. It took a long time to get away from that concept. A lot of it came out of AID and their notion of nation building.

Q: Wasn't this also a reflection of the Kennedy Peace Corps and very American?

McMANAWAY: It is very American. But the idea that you can go in and build a health clinic which then doesn't get stocked with supplies on a continuous basis is nonsense. It took us a long time to get away from that. It took us until 1967-68 to start getting away from that idea and getting into the idea that what we needed to do was to build a political, economic, and social structure in which the local people had a stake and wanted to protect. After Tet we were able to persuade first the U.S. military and then the South Vietnamese military, that local forces were important. We got a huge increase in the local forces which were called popular forces which were at least theoretically under the control of the local chief. So you had permanent security in these areas, not transitory. That made a big difference and was one of the major turning points. It was also a reflection of our beginning to understand the war.

Q: You were there during the period when people were beginning to understand this. Was it first sort of a theoretical thing, with people saying this sounds good and then trying it out, or were there hard minded people as opposed to people who were sort of warm and loving and thought this would do it? How did this work out?

McMANAWAY: You had several things going on at the same time. At the highest level you had President Johnson appointing Bob Komer as his man on pacification...we never did come up with a better name for it than that. At a meeting with Westmoreland, I think in Hawaii in 1966 or 1967, he assigned Komer to Vietnam and told Bob and Westmoreland to work out the relationship. Komer was to be in charge of pacification as a deputy to Westmoreland. Komer was a brilliant bureaucrat, in the best sense of that word. He saw right away [what to do]. What had happened prior to that is that we had a proliferation of civilian agencies in Vietnam, each with its own line of command out to people in the provinces where their people were stationed. I once drew up a briefing chart which showed all the lines out going out to the provinces from Saigon which was a nightmare. There was no coordination. The civilians were not working together. So Bob decided first to get the civilians organized and he established the Office of Civil Operations. He pulled segments out of AID, USIA [United States Information Agency] and other civilian agencies that were there, and put them all together in this outfit which we pronounced OCO. Once he had accomplished that he moved it into MACV, into the military structure, which was his goal all along. The civilians were no match for the military in terms of staffing and bureaucratic struggles for winning any policy issues until we got into MACV. One of the most miraculous things to me was that once we got into MACV we never lost a policy fight. We were inside the elephant and able to do quite a number of revolutionary things. One of them was to get this terrific increase in popular forces. We got across various aspects like permanent security and redoing village structure through elections, etc.

Then Tet came along which was a tremendous defeat for the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong, although obviously not perceived that way. But it was. There were three Tet offensives, one in February, one in May and one later on, I think, in August.

We were getting away from the RD Cadre at that point and moving towards using the regional forces and restructuring the village and using the more sophisticated concept of what pacification needs to be about. Now the accelerated pacification campaign was a big success. Komer was right, the Viet Cong were not out there. We and the Vietnamese were all hunkered down and there was nobody out there. We brought security to about 3 million people in about 3 months. That led then to the first national pacification plan where we brought all of the programs together, got it written up and translated into Vietnamese, sent out and got them organized.

When I went to Harvard after Vietnam, 1971, I was going to write a book about the year of the monkey, 1968, the year of Tet, because so many firsts happened that year. The South Vietnamese were mobilized for the first time, which meant we could get more forces. We got them to organize themselves in a way that we could relate to them both in Saigon and at the CORDS level, the province level, the district level, which is as far as we went, we didn't go down to the village level in our position, so that we were no longer sending out orders to our people that were not be paralleled by the Vietnamese. We had quite good success. As I may have told you in the last interview, I am one of those who believe we won the guerilla war.

Q: What was your impression of Westmoreland and Abrams?

McMANAWAY: Westmoreland, in my view, never understood the war. We used to call him instant image, with that granite jaw appearance. He is a fine man but he never understood this war and I don't think he understands it today. Abrams understood it. If we could have had Abrams there from the beginning, the war would have turned out differently. It was fascinating watching Abrams bring his co-commanders around to support pacification. We actually got into the military plan the objective and strategy for supporting pacification under Abrams. He understood it, Westmoreland did not. I don't think Westmoreland read anything. If you didn't brief him he didn't know. Westmoreland was a logistician of some genius, I suppose, but he didn't understand the guerilla war.

Q: How about Ellsworth Bunker, our ambassador, did you have a chance to see how he operated?

McMANAWAY: He was a master, one of the finest men I have ever known. I did not have the honor of working closely daily with him. I saw him only a few times at country team meetings that I would attend for some specific purpose. He understood the war and what was going on. I have nothing but admiration for Bunker.

Q: What was your impression of the embassy which was very large? How did you feel it did in reporting the situation and dealing with the host government, two of the important things an embassy does?

McMANAWAY: Well, we were almost a separate operation. We were so big and had so much money, so many forces, and so many people in the organization...there must have been 6000 people in the CORDS section...that we didn't pay much attention to the embassy. When I first got there Arch Calhoun was political counselor and then Phil Habib came along. We would hear from Phil occasionally - he would come and brief us on what was going on. We were interested in those things but we were totally absorbed in our work in the field. Even our contacts with the Vietnamese government were separate [from the embassy]. Now Komer, of course, attended country team meetings, and Colby after him...and he worked much more closely with Bunker. The rest of us in the CORDS organization were totally absorbed in what we were doing.

Q: It seems to me that one of the major reasons for the eventual defeat of the South Vietnamese was essentially the corruption and the narrowness of its ruling group. How were you dealing with this?

McMANAWAY: We had special reporting on province chiefs. We didn't get much involved in the national politics. Komer might have, but the rest of us didn't, although we had periodic meetings with President Thieu. He established a council which we attended. But, again, we talked there about the pacification program, about the war, not about national politics. But we had reporting on corrupt province chiefs and we got them changed. We had a very aggressive stance with the Vietnamese. We were right in there all the time. Komer used to call me up and tell me to go tell the prime minister who he wanted fired. We would go over with lists of province chiefs that we wanted changed and they would be changed.

Q: I have been interviewing Terry McNamara who was up in Da Nang and he talked about the I Corp commander of the Vietnamese who had quite a reputation for his involvement in all sorts of nefarious things. Would that have been too high to get at?

McMANAWAY: Yes, probably too high to deal with. Although we did have a very aggressive posture with corruption. I was not one of those who believe that is the reason they lost the war. I think they lost the war because the North Vietnamese had a better army in the end and the South Vietnamese didn't have our support any more. The first invasion came in 1972 and we provided air support which enabled them to fend it off. Between 1972-75 we began cutting back funds for the South Vietnamese army. By this time I was in the Defense Department and was following it for the Secretary of Defense, Mel Laird. I was on his little group of Vietnamization program. I was seeing reports and doing analysis. The South Vietnamese army no longer had enough ammunition to train. Funds had been cut back so deeply that they were not able to allocate ammunition for training purposes. When the invasion came by the entire North Vietnamese army, they didn't have our air support.

Q: How about the CIA? You must have been up against them quite a bit since they had their own programs going.

McMANAWAY: Basically what happened was that they pulled out of the RD Cadre program. This was somewhere around 1968-69. It was after Komer left because I remember I was in the office with Bill Colby who had taken over from Komer, when he got the call from Ted Shackley, who was the station chief, informing Bill that they were withdrawing the funding support for the RD Cadre program. They provided intelligence. They worked with South Vietnamese intelligence. But except for that one occasion, we really didn't bump into each other that often that I was aware of. They worked more with the South Vietnamese and strictly intelligence groups and we didn't have that much trouble or involvement with them.

Q: Was the Phoenix program going at that time?

McMANAWAY: The Phoenix was one of the eight or nine programs within pacification.

Q: This is the one that got a lot of publicity and all. My understanding was, and this is really from hearsay, that it was designed to root out the Viet Cong cadre and all.

McMANAWAY: It was designed to go after the Viet Cong leadership and there were several mistakes made with it in how it was described. I remember Bill Komer was called back to appear before Fulbright for a week of hearings and we brought back a whole team. I came with him and did most of the preparation for the hearings in terms of preparing the testimony, the backup and the questions and answers, etc. I sat through the whole thing but didn't say very much. At one point I realized what we were doing. We were getting a lot of tough questions about the Phoenix program and we had described the program as designed to root out the political leadership of the Viet Cong. I remember passing Bill a note saying that we had made a terrible mistake because we were sitting talking to politicians and they probably thought we were talking about legitimate politicians. We weren't, of course, we were talking about the secret command that controlled the organization of the Viet Cong.

In our terms we were very successful in those hearings because, as Bill put it, we stayed back with the trust ads, Fulbright didn't get the headlines that he wanted. However, there was one night that on national television Walter Cronkite, and I have never had any respect for him since, picked up a very sharp exchange that occurred between Senator Gore and Bill about the Phoenix program. Gore had said, "Now you are telling me that it is not an assassination program?" And Bill said, "It is not." Well, that little clip was shown on TV that night followed by a clip of some rather brutal treatment of some elderly Vietnamese gentleman...he was being given the water treatment by Vietnamese soldiers and this was described as being the Phoenix by Walter Cronkite. The analyst who looked at the film clip for us said that it was made up of about ten different incidents that they had pieced together to make up this story for Cronkite to use.

It was not an assassination program, which was the misconception of it. The only mistake we made was that we gave people quotas. That was really a mistake. I remember George Jacobson being very much opposed to that. He perceived rightly how it would seem when it got out. It was intended as a management goal, a way to measure progress. I never thought the Phoenix program worked very well. It was not designed as an assassination program. It was designed to identify, track down and get at the tax collector and the local secret command in control of the network of the Viet Cong. Not necessarily to kill them but to arrest them, to get them out of the picture. What usually happened was that you would get intelligence...this was also supposed to bring together a lot of the different intelligence...about a tax collector or a local commander who was going to be traveling from this village to that village and you would use those popular forces to lay an ambush. More often than not, and I looked at the statistics at how the people who were part of the Viet Cong cadre, the leaders, were actually killed. They were killed in combat not as a result of assassination teams or a deliberate operation aimed at them. So by the time I left in 1970, I thought we had put so many popular forces out into the countryside that we had pretty well suffocated the Viet Cong structure and the Phoenix program was no longer needed. One of my last recommendations before I left was to disband it.

Q: Then you left in 1970. When in 1970?

McMANAWAY: August.

WALTER A. LUNDY
Political Officer
Saigon (1964-1966)

Principal Officer

Hue (1966)

Walter A. Lundy, Jr. was born in Georgia in 1933. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Georgia in 1954 and serving in the US Air Force from 1954-1958, he received his master's degree from Georgetown University in 1961. His career has included positions in Colombo, Saigon, Hue, New Delhi, Teheran, and Seoul. Mr. Lundy was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in September 2005.

Q: So you went to Saigon in 1964...

LUNDY: Before the completion of language training.

Q: So about how much language training did you have?

LUNDY: Oh I only missed about the last six weeks, but I would have had to have gone out a month or two earlier had my wife not been pregnant. This was because in those days there was a push to expand our embassy in Saigon as we became more and more involved in the worsening situation.

Q: So she was able to go with you?

LUNDY: Yes. Our son was born in Saigon in November.

Q: Oh, that is why you went...I see, a little bit early so she could have the baby...

LUNDY: No, a little bit late. In those days, doctors thought that until women were past the fourth or fifth month of pregnancy, something like that, it was better that they not fly because of the danger of miscarriage. I don't know whether that precaution still is recommended by gynecologists.

Q: I think it's a little bit the opposite now, that you can't fly after a certain point but anyway...

LUNDY: There was a window in there during which there were no restrictions on her flying, and that was when we went out.

Q: Was that your first child? Born in Saigon?

LUNDY: We had our first in Colombo. Our older daughter was three years old when we went to Saigon.

Q: Saigon in 1964. Would you like to describe what it was like and also what your job was there.

LUNDY: I was assigned to the political section in Saigon as one of several provincial reporters. The approach to reporting was completely different in Vietnam from what it had been in Colombo. I loved my job in Vietnam. Obviously, the situation was not healthy. However, when we arrived in Saigon in 1964 the city still was relatively peaceful. We settled in nicely and put our daughter in a French kindergarten. Things were going well for us personally, but the security situation was continuing to deteriorate. Our son was born in November; my wife and children were evacuated in early February, 1965 along with all the other American dependents. That evacuation surely was one of the most efficient things the U.S. government ever did.

Q: To where were they evacuated?

LUNDY: They came back home. The evacuation was announced on Monday, and my family was out of there by Thursday. This was roughly in the middle of the exodus. Within a week all the dependents were gone. The impending evacuation was kept secret from Embassy staff. Only the ambassador and a very few high-ranking people in our mission in Vietnam had any idea it was about to happen. Ironically, some dependents who were evacuated had not arrived in Saigon until the Monday morning the evacuation was announced. This was because the people who were responsible for the assignments process and travel arrangements did not know about the impending evacuation. There were no leaks; the secret apparently was kept.

Q: The reason for the evacuation--I guess this was early February, 1965?

LUNDY: Yes, 1965. This was not the famous evacuation which occurred 10 years later; this was the first evacuation, the one most people have forgotten about.

Q: What occasion, what was the reason for it at the time?

LUNDY: The security of dependents in Saigon had grown to be a matter of increasing concern. However, the immediate impetus probably was the decision to widen the American role in the war. Allowing dependents to remain in a war zone was untenable. I do not recall when our intention to send combat troops into Vietnam was announced, but I am sure the decision already had been made by the time of the evacuation. Three weeks later, in the first week of March, the first Marines waded ashore at Danang in central Vietnam. That was the beginning of the real Vietnam war, which lasted for more than ten years.

Q: Was the threat at the time seen as Viet Cong or other elements?

LUNDY: Viet Cong.

Q: Primarily.

LUNDY: Viet Cong who not surprisingly had infiltrated Saigon thoroughly. We never felt personally insecure, and up until the time my family left dependents still were not being cautioned about areas they should avoid in the city, but the U.S. government rightly was becoming very nervous. There had been some frightening incidents. And less than two months after the evacuation the embassy in Saigon was bombed.

Q: And you were there?

LUNDY: No, I was not there. I was in Grady County, Georgia, by a quirk of fate. Ambassador Taylor had been called home for consultations. (Before he would agree to go to Saigon as ambassador, he had gotten a commitment from the White House that the flow of official visitors to Vietnam would be drastically reduced. Instead, he would come home periodically for consultations). A number of us within the mission were offered seats on the plane, a Boeing 707 from the VIP squadron at Andrews AFB. As one of the more junior Embassy officers, I obviously could be spared for a week. And they felt sorry for me because of our family situation with the two small children. I was home the week the embassy was bombed.

Q: That was the plane that brought Ambassador Taylor back?

LUNDY: Yes the plane that went out to pick him up. The same or a similar aircraft took him back a week later.

Q: And you went back when he returned?

LUNDY: Yes. When they were evacuated, my wife and children went first to her parents' home in Alexandria, VA, but a few weeks later they had gone to Georgia to visit my parents. I joined them there. Of course, that part of the trip we paid for. We came back to the Washington area together, and I returned to Saigon on the plane taking the Ambassador back. It was a lucky break.

Q: Did she and your children ever go back to Saigon?

LUNDY: No, that was out. It was several years later before a limited number of dependents were allowed to return to Vietnam, and I'm not sure that they ever let children go back. As I understand it, there was never a clearly defined policy on the presence of American dependents in Vietnam in later years, but I do recall hearing some adult dependents, particularly those who had jobs somewhere in the mission, were allowed to accompany their spouses. The first evacuation incredibly even took the working spouses out. Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson--he was deputy ambassador in a strange bureaucratic arrangement, but Ambassadors' Johnson and Taylor were both superb professionals who seemed to have no problem at all working together--lost his secretary even though her husband was an AID officer in Vietnam. If he stayed, she could not, meaning Ambassador Johnson gave up his secretary in the evacuation.

Q: So your wife and daughter, and then your newborn, were there for about six months?

LUNDY: A little more than seven.

Q: Well, let's talk a little bit more about your job there in the political section. You were provincial reporting for a particular area/province?

LUNDY: Yes and no. Provincial reporters, as we were called, were assigned a group of provinces. The country was split into four regions, one or I corps, two, three, and four corps, they were called. But we moved around, eventually I worked in all the areas except II-Corps. I worked in the most southern provinces in the Mekong River Delta, which comprised IV-Corps, and the provinces around Saigon, which were III-Corps. I covered most of the country at one time or another excepting II-Corps.

*Q: When you say you covered all of that at one time or another that meant travel?
A lot of travel?*

LUNDY: We did go to the grass roots. To be candid, we spent most of our time talking to the powers that be, or more accurately that were. First, of course, we had to check in with the Americans. We spent a fair amount of time with the U.S. Government civilians and our military in the provinces, but we also talked a great deal to local officials and in many cases to the Catholic and Buddhist clergy. However, the powers that be were mostly those who at least ostensibly supported the government of South Vietnam. At times, we talked to representatives of opposition political parties or religious or cultural leaders who were not enthusiastic supporters of the central government but who presented no serious threat to those in power.

Q: How was your means of travel around to the provinces, usually military helicopter?

LUNDY: It varied quite a bit depending upon their geographic location and the security situation in individual provinces. Sometimes we could take Air Vietnam, the civilian airline. It became well known the Central Intelligence Agency operated a small airline called Air America in South Vietnam. We often used their flights; within the provinces we sometimes went by military helicopter, sometimes by jeep. Some of the provinces close to Saigon we could drive to, and the embassy provided us a jeep.

Q: The kind of reporting that you did on these various provinces, was for internal use within the embassy, or did you do a lot of reporting to Washington, or was much of it edited pieces that were compiled covering several different reporters, or all of the above?

LUNDY: All of the above. Contrary to my first post which would rather not send something into Washington that was not considered letter perfect, in Vietnam the idea was to report virtually everything to Washington. While I was in Saigon, provincial reporters had a great deal of editorial freedom. We had a first class supervisor in Jim Rosenthal, who worked directly for Bob Miller, the number two under the political counselor, Mel Manfull. They were a superb team. Jim, Bob, and Mel all later became ambassadors. At the time, Saigon had the largest American embassy political section worldwide.

However, I think in retrospect we may have been inundating Washington with our reporting. President Johnson made it clear there was no higher priority in U.S. foreign relations than Vietnam. We did comprehensive reports on each province which were supposed to be updated every three to four months. We would spend four or five days in a province, return home, and spend the next two or three days writing up our memcons (memoranda of conversation) and drafting an analysis of the situation in each province. These were called mission province reports. Although I never felt really comfortable in the language, I spoke Vietnamese extensively and also some French, which had rusted out a bit in Colombo. For a junior political officer, in Vietnam I had as good a job as was available anywhere in the world.

Q: Looking back now, what forty years or so later, do you think your and the other political officers view of the situation was too rosy, too optimistic, too incomplete, or pretty accurate?

LUNDY: I guess I would lean toward pretty accurate. The analysts in Washington were not optimistic. I would recommend to anybody David Halberstam's The Best and the Brightest about that period. There was a very insightful analyst named Lou Sarris in a fairly senior position in INR (Bureau of Intelligence and Research) who comes to mind. From the beginning Lou was pessimistic. I think he and his colleagues were basing a great deal of their analysis on the embassy's reporting. Halberstam points out in his book how Lou Sarris harmed his own career by assessing the war in Vietnam as he saw it rather than saying progress was being made, which was what the establishment at the time wanted to hear. Clearly by mid-1965, when we had a change in political counselors at the Embassy, the word from the top was "let's try to be more positive."

Q: Beginning in mid-'65?

LUNDY: Yes, from about that time, I began to see some of our editorial freedom being taken away.

Q: Do you think that was simply a matter of a change of personality or was it...?

LUNDY: I think it came from the top. The new political counselors was that thoroughly admirable Foreign Service Officer, Phil Habib--a brilliant diplomat, and a survivor, if there ever was one. However, I was disappointed in his leadership my last few months in Vietnam. I don't know this, and I can't prove it, but I think he was probably told "let's try to put a more positive spin on things". In later incarnations, I developed a deep respect for Phil. He was a man of considerable intellectual integrity and certainly one of the most successful FSOs of all time.

Q: Now you are in a situation where there is tremendous, very high level concern and interest in Washington, a very political situation, really all the time that you were there and even more so probably after you left.

LUNDY: Oh yes, I'm now in the group that is considered to have served there early on. When I left in January, 1966 there were only about a couple of hundred thousand American troops in the country. The number of civilian staff at the Embassy and in other USG agencies increased substantially. At the peak, U.S. military personnel in Vietnam totaled somewhere between six and seven hundred thousand, I think.

Q: At least that, yeah.

LUNDY: I should talk about the last four months, which were the most rewarding of my time in Vietnam. I was shipped off to the consulate at Hue where I was acting principal officer. There was an unfortunate bureaucratic situation in Hue. The incumbent was moved down to Danang as political advisor to the Marine commander, General Walt. I took over the consulate, which was staffed by only two officers and one secretary/communicator. I-Corps comprised the four most northern provinces. I remain proud of the reporting we sent to Saigon. Direct communications to Washington were not possible from Hue; all of our substantive reporting went through the political section in Saigon. We did very little in the way of consular or economic/commercial work. The war was the pervasive, all consuming issue. There was a considerable amount of dissent in Hue. The families of both Ho Chi Minh and Ngo Dinh Diem (the former president of South Vietnam who was over thrown in a coup d'etat in late 1963) had deep roots in the area. The city also was the old royal capital and the seat of a very influential university. It was an area where politics was taken very seriously, and the reporting we were sending out from Hue was of great interest both in Saigon and Washington. And I began to see more evidence of censorship.

Q: In Saigon?

LUNDY: In Saigon, yes. Let me cite the mission province report I did assessing the situation in Quang Nam province which was where the Marines had landed near Danang and where we probably had committed more resources, both military and civilian, than to any other province in the country. Certainly in I-Corps it was where we were making our strongest push, but the whole situation was bogged down. We had all these troops there, but there was hardly any progress toward pacification of the province. When I reported this to Saigon they sent the airgram on to the Department with only a few of the more damning sentences deleted. The airgram received, I was told later, very wide distribution throughout Washington, and at CINCPAC (Commander in Chief, Pacific) in Hawaii. I think the message that we were not getting anywhere did indeed get through. That may have been my most important piece of reporting in my entire Foreign Service career. Did it really change anything? No, of course not, but I do believe it inspired some thinking about just how difficult our task in Vietnam was going to be. Later, another mission province report assessing our efforts in Quang Ngai was gutted of all mention of the drastically deteriorating military situation. The VC (Viet Cong) virtually controlled the province, but only a small part of the report describing activities of the political parties in Quang Ngai was sent on to Washington.

Q: To what extent was your reporting, particularly from Hue, shared with the U.S. military locally?

LUNDY: In Hue we had no secrets; the local U.S. Army advisors and other representatives saw any of our reporting which interested them. We had a real team effort at Hue, working closely with the military and representatives of other USG agencies. Most of the American military and civilian employees there at the time knew all too well we were working in a backwater, and that we could not expect much attention from either Saigon or Washington. No USG personnel, civilian or military, had anything higher than province level advisor status. As a very junior FSO political officer, sadly I probably had as much or more clout than any American in the province of Thua Thien. Hue was a backwater vis-a-vis the government in Saigon as well, a fact which the local Vietnamese deeply resented.

Q: Deeply resented it...

LUNDY: I mean local government officials, civilian and military, deeply resented the lack of attention they were receiving from Saigon.

Q: So you were there about four months in Hue?

LUNDY: Four months, and then my 18-month tour was over.

Q: In Vietnam?

LUNDY: In Vietnam, and then I went home.

Q: I wanted to ask a little bit more about the dynamics in the embassy. Were Maxwell Taylor as ambassador and U. Alexis Johnson as deputy ambassador there throughout the period?

LUNDY: No. Ambassador Taylor left in late summer of 1965. I think it now is pretty clear that he was fired, unjustly so in my opinion. Henry Cabot Lodge went back to Vietnam, which may have been another reason our editorial freedom was reduced.

Q: Of course this was still the Democratic, the Johnson administration?

LUNDY: Yes, it was LBJ who appointed Ambassador Lodge.

Q: A Republican but also partly with the idea of trying to get a broader support for the war and what was going on.

LUNDY: As I recall, Ambassador Johnson left at about the same time Ambassador Taylor departed. I don't even remember who became Ambassador Lodge's DCM. I'm not sure there was one; perhaps they called the number two man mission coordinator or something like that. I was at Hue most of the time after the changeover.

Q: U. Alexis Johnson had served as ambassador two or three times before going to Saigon as the deputy.

LUNDY: I know he had been in Prague...

Q: And Thailand.

LUNDY: Yes, that's right, and later he was ambassador to Japan.

Q: Yes, that was later. Did he function as a DCM, or was he really in effect a chief of mission, the second chief of mission?

LUNDY: He was more like a second chief of mission, as I recall. He had more contact with the staff than Ambassador Taylor did, although Ambassador Taylor was certainly quite open and did interact with the staff. Ambassador Johnson reached out somewhat more I think, but then that was probably just how they had decided to divide the work. I didn't have a lot of contact with either Ambassador Taylor or Ambassador Johnson. However, they would let it be known when they appreciated something that the junior people had done. There was much respect for their leadership throughout the mission.

Q: I would think though to ask you to go up, even if it were for only four months, to Hue showed quite a bit of confidence in you and what you had done in the embassy or was it that there wasn't anybody else to...?

LUNDY: I don't really know, if I can be a little bit self-congratulatory, perhaps a combination of the two. I was both willing and available. John Negroponte, with whom I came into the Foreign Service, was also a junior officer in Vietnam, and had been sent to Hue that summer to replace the incumbent who was on home leave. I had gone up for a visit while John was there, and I think he recommended me. Bill Marsh who by then had replaced Jim Rosenthal as head of the provincial reporters in the political section had something to do with it as well.

Q: Was Negroponte principal officer in Hue?

LUNDY: He was acting principal officer, as I was, for a couple months.

Q: Before you went.

LUNDY: Before I went.

Q: OK, after your wife and children left did they consolidate you into some kind of bachelor officer quarters in Saigon, or did you remain in your house?

LUNDY: I stayed in the house; they made us double up, however. A good friend in the consular section, Tom Wilson, moved in with me. He had a larger family and had been living in a bigger house, which he knew he would have to share with more than one other person. By moving in with me to a smaller house we kept it down to two people, which probably was his main motivation for making the change. We got along just fine, and he was able to keep the house by himself while I was at Hue, where I was only supposed to be on TDY (temporary duty). Technically, I suppose I was assigned to Saigon but on detail to Hue.

Q: When you finished at Hue you didn't go back to Saigon and start working there again? That was the end of your 18-month tour?

LUNDY: That was the end of my 18-month tour. Originally, I was sent to Vietnam for three years, but after the families were evacuated, all tours of duty were reduced to 18 months. I was only in Saigon for two or three days before leaving the country.

Q: Was the security situation a lot worse during the last six months, eight months of your time in Vietnam, or did it not really change that much for Americans?

LUNDY: At the time, I didn't think it really had changed that much, but it's obvious history has confirmed that the VC (Viet Cong) infrastructure was both growing and thriving.

Q: You said you didn't really have much contact with opposition elements either in Saigon or Hue other than those that were respectable...?

LUNDY: Acceptable.

Q: Acceptable to the government. Was that pretty much the case throughout the whole time you were there and do you think that...?

LUNDY: Much of the opposition in the functioning, but not threatening, political parties and many of those active in the South Vietnamese government had fought for the liberation of Vietnam from the French. You could not, of course, make contact with the real opposition, the Viet Cong, with whom we were at war.

Q: I guess I'm still trying to grope whether we perhaps during the time you were there or otherwise perhaps should have had more contact with Buddhist elements or...?

LUNDY: We talked to the Buddhist leadership all the time. They were not a political party, but they did oppose the government, and Hue was their most important rallying ground. The Buddhist leadership was not united, but those who opposed the South Vietnamese government were the most active. The Catholic leadership in Hue tended to support the government. The most senior Catholic official in Hue was a relative of the Diem family, but he was a much more liberal, more pro-democracy person than most of the other Diems had been.

Q: In Hue did you share housing with the other officer who was there?

LUNDY: Yes, there was one house for the principal officer, and we shared it.

Q: OK, anything else about your time in Vietnam, in Saigon and Hue?

LUNDY: No, I think we have about covered it.

FRANK G. WISNER
Staff Aide, USAID
Saigon (1964-1967)

Program Officer
Dinh Tuong Province (1967-1968)

Senior Advisor
Tuyen Duc Province (1968-1969)

Ambassador Frank G. Wisner was born in New York in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1961. He was stationed in Saigon, Dinh Tuong Province, Tuyen Duc Province, Tunis, Algiers, and Dacca. He later served as Ambassador to Zambia, Egypt, the Philippines, and India. Ambassador Wisner was interviewed by Richard L. Jackson on March 22, 1998.

Q: You went from there to Vietnam and stayed for most of the rest of that decade. That was a time when many Foreign Service Officers were trying to go to Vietnam where the action was and many were trying to avoid it. Did you steer yourself there? Or how did that process work?

WISNER: I certainly didn't steer myself there. I thought at the time -- in Algiers the Moroccan-Algerian War was over (I was covering that) -- I was having the time of my life when all of a sudden a telegram arrived from Washington, signed as one called it in those days by "highest levels". "Highest Levels", that is the President, directed that I be called back to Washington. We were looking for French-speaking bachelors to strengthen our presence in Vietnam, and I was called back to Washington to be one of those French-speaking bachelors. I was first taken aback when later reminded by the personnel officer for the assignment, Alan Wendt, (later ambassador to Slovenia) that when I wrote my original A-100 request for an assignment my second choice, after Algiers, was Saigon, so I was getting it. Just exactly what I asked for. Bill Porter, who also saw me as a future Arabist, asked that the assignment be waived and that I be allowed to stay in Algiers and go on with a career as an Arabist, and his appeal was overruled. So I came back to Washington in the summer of 1964 and was assigned. There were two groups who were called back, those who were sent immediately to Vietnam and those who were brought back and put into Vietnamese language training, area and cultural studies to be prepared. I was in the latter group. We were all told that we really had a choice, either to take this assignment or leave the service. Later on we discovered there was a second choice and that is either you were to do well in our studies of the Vietnamese language -- a tonal language is very difficult for the western ear -- either that or we were to be sent to what was in those days called a fever post, fever spot, and suffer in our careers. In fact one of our officers was taken out of the course for seeming insufficiently diligent in the learning of the Vietnamese language and not reassigned quickly, and we protested that and our protest was upheld and he was reinstated with honor. Fred Spots went on to have some interesting assignments. He was a European specialist, a German expert. As for the rest of us, many went on to great things: Steve Ledogar was our disarmament ambassador, Dave Lambertson ended up as our ambassador in Thailand, Desaix Anderson is our chargé in Vietnam, Paul London didn't stay with the service, but has had a terrific career, he was with me at that time, Dicky Burnham went on to a career in the IFC. We were a very good lot and we had a lot of fun together.

Q: Were there also others like Dick Holbrooke?

WISNER: Well, we were already in Vietnam or about, in Dick Holbrooke's case, to leave Vietnam and come back to the United States. They had been recruited and sent directly without benefit of Vietnamese language training. Peter Tarnoff was working for Cabot Lodge in the front office. Lodge's second tour as the ambassador. Though our group was all foreign service officers -- like Dick Teare, people who were going to learn Vietnamese with the majority to be assigned to the provincial reporting end of the political section of the American embassy -- I was however to be assigned on a secondment to AID, to the pacification program. After going through language training and area studies and a brief stint at Fort Bragg with the United States Special Forces, acquainting myself with some of the weaponry that we were giving the Vietnamese in those days, mainly ex-World War II, Korean-vintage weapons, I was sent out and assigned -- this was really the very end of Maxwell Taylor's period as ambassador to a province in the delta. The province was a sensitive one, it was the Dinh Tuong. It was the headquarters of the 7th ARVN (Army of Vietnam) Division. That division had played a very important role in coup-making. We were at this point trying to stabilize, find a political formula of some stability. The 7th division area was very important. Dinh Tuong was well known as well because, just outside the provincial capital, the battle of Ap Bac had been fought where John Vann and others earned their names. Neil Sheehan cut his teeth as a journalist. The Vietnamese army was really defeated by the Viet Cong insurgents, and this was one of the real wake-up calls when General Harkins realized that our way of doing war side-by-side with the South Vietnamese was not working. It was selected as one of three provinces by the ambassador of the day, Maxwell Taylor, to begin to organize a consolidated pacification program.

Heretofore, American agencies had been represented separately in the field -- AID had its people, USIA had its people, the CIA had its people, the military had their people and each of these American agencies competed for the ear of the province chief and his bureaucracy and of his provincial and village defense forces. Maxwell Taylor decided that we needed an integrated American presence with a team chief. Dinh Tuong was selected as the military command, and a Lieutenant Colonel Mc Fall was given charge of the several agencies. I was assigned to the AID office, provincial operations caring for refugees, building up agriculture, village self-help, village improvement, education support, these sorts of things, with a budget that flowed down through the Vietnamese side with some resource availabilities directly under our control, notably food and some amount of money. The man who I worked for, Mr. Letts by name, was a professor of agronomy from Texas, and he was a flinty old character. He came down, and he felt his instructions were very clearly not to cooperate with the Lieutenant Colonel who Maxwell Taylor had put in charge of the provincial effort, and he and the Lieutenant Colonel could barely speak to one another. It was very disruptive. I found it much easier to work with the military than did my boss, to his considerable unhappiness. Eventually Mr. Letts was able to go back and be an agricultural advisor where his skills were better served. I ended my time in about six months in the delta.

Q: It was a risky place to be?

WISNER: Oh, it was a bit risky. I was not awfully cautious and I traveled the length and breadth of the province to all the reasonably pacified areas. Took a lot of American visitors around. Joe Alsop used to come.

Q: You took some motorcycle trips?

WISNER: No, that was later. That came later. I did actually acquire my first motorcycle then, and I was on a road to Saigon one day when I saw a jeep blown up with a remote control mine a little bit in front of me, but my motorcycle days were in the future. But I was called to Saigon to be the staff aide of the new, then-deputy ambassador. First and, I think, last time in the world we ever named a deputy ambassador. Bill Porter had been brought out to give Cabot Lodge some strength, so that Cabot could focus on Washington, the politics, the diplomacy with the top rungs of the new Vietnamese government of Nguyen Cao Ky and leave the management of the mission in Bill Porter's hands. The idea was, through the title, to give Bill Porter the strength that, in fact, he didn't need because his personality and judgment was really sufficient. I was brought up as Bill Porter's staff assistant. It was also the time I lost my father, and I went home at that moment to attend the funeral, see to my mother and the family and then return to Vietnam. I then started to work in the second phase of my life in Vietnam which was increasingly with the pacification program.

Q: So that meant you traveled a good deal outside Saigon?

WISNER: Well Porter, as I noted, was responsible for the management of the mission. But increasingly, as Washington became more and more anxious about the conduct of the war and our ability to achieve our goals of peace there, Porter was given the job of working together with the great civilian agencies -- USIA, USAID, CIA, the police program of USAID which was a very important adjunct of our pacification effort -- and to create a sort of coordinating mechanism for the pacification program. As his staff assistant, not only this interested me, but it was where he needed someone to pull the effort together, and I really became the working secretary of a mission liaison group that brought these agencies together, set the priorities, assigned the tasks. As the matter progressed through 1966, late '65-'66, Washington became increasingly assertive in the desire to see a more coordinated effort and this evolved into the creation of a formal organization called the Office of Civil Operations. I really wrote the charter for that, picked a lot of the people for it, helped write its rules, and then Bill Porter put me at the disposal of the new organization, which was run by the then-Deputy Director of USAID, USOM it was called. Wade Latham, who had been our DCM in Turkey, was an AID officer, and economist. I went over as Wade's special assistant to help him make this organization run, make it function. The next step didn't have very long. McNamara came out, urged an intensification of our abilities in the pacification field and a closer integration of the military and civilians sides and, without too much more ado, Lyndon Johnson forged a unified pacification effort putting the civilian operation in charge of pacification but under Westmoreland, in comusmacv's direct command. So you had Westmoreland at the top, the Chief of Staff; obviously General Cheysson; then you had a deputy for pacification -- in this case Porter had left and Bob Komer came in when Bunker arrived. Komer was a fiery, determined, and ambitious fellow and had been back-stopping the effort from the White House. "Blowtorch Bob" as he was known. I liked him a lot, but many didn't. A vigorous, demanding individual with a lot of imagination, tremendous drive. He had a military subordinate, General Knowlton who went on to become Commandant of West Point. And I worked for Komer and for General Knowlton and Wade Latham at the end of his tour of duty in headquarters at MACV near the airport at Tan Son Nhut. Again, bringing the military and civilian teams together, writing the mission orders, picking who would be top in one province and top in another, military or civilian, recruiting new foreign service officers for the job, analyzing the pacification programs, working out ways of working better with the Vietnamese, trying to build links with them, I was at the center of our pacification thinking and planning right up to early 1968 when I was given my own province and put in charge of a highland Province.

Q: Frank, before that, pressure was growing on President Johnson and a lot of that pressure focused on the success of the pacification program and you were front and center in that. You came back here probably a few times, you were struck by the growing resistance movement within the States. What were you thinking? Were you a true believer, did you have doubts? What was in your mind?

WISNER: Well, in retrospect of course, this was clearly the first great political crisis of my career. The decision surrounding pacification in a narrow sense, but in a much broader sense the United States' role in Vietnam. I went to Vietnam believing very deeply that we had undertaken a national commitment to preserve the independence of South Vietnam and that we could win if we were skillful and determined. We had to; it wasn't whether we could, we had to. We could not suffer a defeat; it was virtually unthinkable and our cause had to triumph. Now I was not unmindful of the odds: the determination of the North Vietnamese, the consistency of their backing from Beijing -- Peking in those days -- and Moscow. And I was not unmindful of the strength of Vietnamese nationalism and how complicated it was to take even arguable Vietnamese nationalists, of which there were many in the south, and mix them with an outside power like the United States and actually make them a strong and politically credible alternative in this sort of environment. I felt that we had little choice but to do that, and I maintained that view with consistency and determination, focusing rather my efforts on how to improve the practice of the American war effort: how to make pacification more effective, more sensitive to local demands, to decrease the amount of bureaucratization, resist the encroachment of conventional military operations. Pacification was a political, social, and economic issue, not just purely a military one to be conducted by military officers. So my mind was there. Yes, of course I could hear the drumbeat at home of protests against the war rising. They added to a sense of urgency that we had to be able to make a difference in Vietnam, in my mind. The day I came home in 1967, I found even my own family split; my little brother and sister alienated from my next older brother. My younger brother, Ellis, had come out to join me in Vietnam, he was as much part of this. It was almost that the family had split down the pre-WWII, post war fault line. My brother and I had a sense of America going to war we couldn't lose, and I did not question deeply enough the very logic of our engagement. It took me some time to understand that it really was a cause that we could not possibly triumph in. The domestic base wasn't there, but I don't blame it on the failure of the domestic base. We had picked an impossible objective, and that was to pacify Vietnam. To force a political conclusion, the weight of the argument would rest with the most evident nationalist and best organized party, and that was the government of Hanoi.

Q: As you managed the pacification program, was this a debate among you and the other officers there? Was there a division or did you all see it more or less as you then did?

WISNER: If you were in Vietnam in those days, the debate began early in the morning and ended late at night and it was every day, there were no Saturdays, there were no Sundays. The debate was over how to conduct the war not, whether there should be a war. The debate was over whether there were more skillful, politically savvy ways to associate ourselves with the Vietnamese to energize them and to help them overcome the inconsistencies in their own political, military and administrative behavior, as well as to face the problems of their war-wrecked economy. Those were the issues we debated. We debated amongst ourselves. What we saw was the very heavy, stultifying bureaucratic hand of the American military. There were terrific military officers of course but the whole machine was a very heavy operation. We, as young civilians in particular, found that hard to associate with. We were trying to introduce flexibility. In fact the Komer reforms introduced a lot, and Westmoreland, once he was fully in charge, and Abrams after the pacification effort allowed a lot more flexibility of the pacification response inside the military organization than had been the habit heretofore.

Q: One remembers Cabot Lodge and his white linen suits in Saigon, what was your picture of him and his effect?

WISNER: That was really more the first Cabot Lodge when he was associated with the government of Ngo Dinh Diem, before the war reached the fever pitch that it acquired in 1965. In 1965, we were talking about the country being cut in half. 1965 is the introduction of American troops. America takes full responsibility for the conduct of this war. It becomes a really make-or-break national decision for ourselves. Cabot Lodge comes back, obviously picked by Lyndon Johnson with very strong political reasons behind it, and he settles down. Cabot Lodge is an intriguing figure and is, first of all, utterly likable. Our families had an association. He was always very nice to me personally. He wasn't a man for details of bureaucratic management. He left that to the people who worked under him. He loved younger officers.

With the exception of Leverett Saltonstall, he was one of the last of the Boston Brahmin politicians. Cabot Lodge was the choice of two presidents for this assignment, both of them with political motives in mind, maintaining some balance with the Republicans and keeping them more or less on our side as we prosecuted the war in Vietnam, Cabot having been the vice presidential candidate in Nixon's first run for the presidency. I would go on to add that Cabot Lodge was not a deep man, but he had the right political instinct in Vietnam. He was deeply committed to public service and to nation over party. We had to get over this protracted period that began with the death of Ngo Dinh Diem and find stable government. As Cabot returned for his second tour as ambassador, his objective was to take this cockamammy combination of Thieu and Ky as president and as prime minister and turn them into an effective government. Putting American backing behind them, sorting out the natural differences between the two and building a relationship between them and the United States, both in the public eye and private eye, and trying to help them get themselves organized to have a public persona in Vietnam itself and be credible partners in the conduct of the war -- and that really was the right priority, given the assignment that Cabot had.

Q: Which was quite a patriotic assignment for him to take, given his age and family considerations.

WISNER: Oh, absolutely, one had to accept the admirable nature of his sense of service. He was not a man who liked controversy, and he really didn't like all the hair-pulling inside the American mission. He found distasteful the shoulders and elbows that get pushed around in bureaucratic warfare either in Saigon or between Saigon and Washington. People like Ed Lansdale had a very romantic appeal to Cabot, but he couldn't fathom why it produced nothing but bureaucratic confusion. Disorganization rather than forward motion resulted inside the effort in Vietnam from the loose cannon nature of Ed Lansdale and his almost mystical views of how one related to the Vietnamese and prosecuted a war. The Ambassador turned to Bill Porter to run these things for him, to take these demons away from him. When controversy broke out in the country team between Westmoreland and the civilians, virtually he would hold his head in his hands -- this was not Cabot's either forte or pleasure -- he wanted more to focus on the political aspects, both American and Vietnamese. And there I think he did his very, very best against quite overwhelming odds. He no longer had the same proconsular status that he had in the first time as ambassador, for now you had this huge, approaching-half-million American men in the field. Westmoreland was certainly of commanding stature in the American presence in Vietnam. The nature of the operation had changed. Politics and the war, the roles of the two had switched, in our eyes, though really not in fact which was a basic flaw in our way of going about the presence in Vietnam. And so I think this second tour as ambassador -- he was separated from Emily Lodge, no wives were allowed to go to Vietnam -- was a hard period for him.

Q: He and Westmoreland had a reasonable dialogue?

WISNER: They certainly did. Westmoreland was respectful. Cabot Lodge went to pains not to interfere in Westmoreland's military life, nor question Westmoreland's judgments. He made it pretty clear to Bill Porter that he wouldn't countenance a lot of second guessing of Westmoreland's manner and priorities and decisions. And Westmoreland was a fine honorable soldier, but he was a written-by-the-book soldier, and adapting to the complexities of a war like Vietnam with the counterinsurgency and its main force aspects was complex for Westmoreland. His responses were heavy -- more men, more equipment, more bombs. I don't think he was ever fully at ease. He traveled a lot, saw a lot, but I don't think he was ever fully at ease with the more political aspects of the counterinsurgency struggle.

Q: Well, inevitably the mission was also fighting the battle at home, as doubts grew. There certainly have been all kinds of charges of inflated success stories about pacification and what was going on. The McNamara missions were an exercise in spin, as they are reconstructed in history. How did that seem from the perspective of being there? This is perhaps truer of military than of Embassy reporting.

WISNER: No, it's unfortunate. I think it all goes of a piece. The urgency of getting on with things, of showing that we were making success forced us to look for signs of what we could demonstrate was working. We were not only our own program former -- we not only designed our own programs -- we were the judges of their success. Now, while I would tell you right up front that there were no harsher critics of the battlefield statistics than people on the civilian embassy pacification side. And our constant efforts to show that progress was being made -- we were sharp critics of that, sharp critics, much more inclined to try to call -- to see things our own way. But we too were missing a critically important point. And that is that this effort was fundamentally flawed. I operated with the hope that we could make it a success, if we did the right things we could make it a success, if we could get the right Vietnamese in place, the right province chiefs, the right military commanders, the right psychological warfare programs, the right pacification strategy, the right nighttime warfare, the right intelligence coordination. If you could get things right you could make this work, and we were focused on the wrongness of our operations. But we accepted the fundamental logic of the operations themselves. And so we were, too, part of the distorted perspective in which the war was seen. When journalists came out from the United States, from the Rolly Evans and the Stew Alsops and Charles Collingwood and the many times Joe Kraft came out to look at this war, they would see us, and they would find these voices of dissent. Not dissent with the war, but dissent with the conduct of it. We had a bit of the hubris borne of having seen "the truth". I think in reality as well we overlooked some very important internal dynamics. We overlooked the increasing weight of conventional warfare capability of the North Vietnamese. In believing that Westmoreland and his senior officers overdid the military side -- the great sweeps, the heavy use of artillery and air power, the major operations -- in being critical of that, in believing that insufficient resources were being expended to provide local security, we overlooked the fact that what would finally kill the Vietnamese regime would be a military victory, and in the end that is what killed it. It was an overwhelming conventional defeat of the Vietnamese army, overextended. It wasn't that the Vietnamese army was under equipped or badly officered by most normal circumstances. Its political logic was deeply insufficient, but what broke it in the end was not the political insufficiency, it was main force warfare starting in Pleiku and then rolling up the entire front.

Q: It was about this time you went to a province. When did you go? Where did you go? Where did you stay?

WISNER: It was an interesting period. I was asked by Bob Komer to be one of the new integrated military-civilian province senior advisors.

Q: An immensely responsible job for somebody of your then age.

WISNER: I was 29 years old. I was a Foreign Service officer, class 6 in those days, became a five a bit later. I was sent up to take command of about 160 American military and civilians including AID, USIA and CIA employees. Millions of dollars in a provincial program. The province I was sent to was the province of Tuyen Duc in the Vietnamese highlands and the autonomous city of Dalat, the old vacation city, the educational center. There were a couple of universities and the Vietnamese military academy in that city. I was sent up at the beginning of 1968. I had as a deputy a Lieutenant Colonel, United States Army, who really took badly to the thought that a 29-year-old civilian was coming up to set up as head. He had been military attaché, of all places in Malawi. He, I think, saw the final blow to his military career and while I was home on a very brief period of leave -- I went home with Paul Hare, we traveled home via Morocco, had a terrific trip all through Morocco, and Paul was going to the neighboring province of Ninh Tuan as senior advisor -- while I was away, the provincial intelligence picked up the movement of Viet Cong and this was a province that had had considerable peace throughout most of the conflict, probably why Westmoreland and Komer felt they could assign me there. The dangers weren't too great. Very unwisely, without assessing what kind of threat was occurring in the province, the Lt. Col. Lloyd Michel was able to obtain a couple of helicopters and, taking the provincial province chief's reconnaissance force and a couple of his officers, went and landed in the middle of a North Vietnamese battalion. Now in retrospect, this was one of the battalions moving into position for the Tet offensive, and he brought those helicopters down right into the midst of this battalion in a remote area of the province and he paid for his decision with his life. By the time I got to Dalat in January of 1968, a new officer had been assigned, a lovely man, Lieutenant Colonel Arthur Deverill, who had taught a lot in the military system, was a nuclear affairs officer, eventually was to go back to West Point to teach mathematics there, a man of a very gentle and thoughtful nature and disposition, a man utterly determined to support me, a fine, fine man, a man of the greatest integrity. I was in Dalat for a couple of weeks when the Tet Offensive started and we went through hell.

The town was almost overrun in the first days. We had no effective forces there. I ended up fighting for my own house at one point, staying up nights, patrolling the perimeter of my house and then trying to work during the day, answering calls from Saigon, from Westmoreland personally on one occasion about the fate of Dalat's nuclear reactor -- we had a nuclear reactor among other things -- looking for forces, finding them assigned to the province then pulled off for higher priority missions. The actual military threat to the city I was in, intense military threat, did not abate for five months. It was a very complicated period. I was visited by many people. Nick Platt (our future ambassador to Zambia, the Philippines, and Pakistan, and now President of the Asia Society) came out and visited me, and I was sending him home when he was pinned down at the airport with machine-gun fire. It was a very tough, tough period, and yet I had my first experience with command of a complex, interagency operation in intensely stressful circumstances -- intelligence, political assessment, economic action, military training, logistical support, political and economic and military advice to the local commanders, the top military officers in the city and the top province officials in the province. These were mature, senior Vietnamese officers, with the town's political leaders, with the Catholic Archbishop, the religious hierarchies on the Buddhist side, the Montagnard tribal chieftains. It was a diplomatic assignment in a wartime setting with vast resources at my disposal, with few embassies in the United States overseas presence that were as large in even numbers of employees and certainly not in budgets as I had at age 29 in Dala. I turned 30 there.

Q: So you were there for a total of?

WISNER: A year. The basic mission of course was to pacify Dalat and Tuyen Duc, to go out to the population centers, build their self-defenses, improve their economic circumstances, help build political support for the government, and strengthen the administration. It was innovative, lots of good ideas, moving and caring for refugees where that was necessary, expanding employment and prosperity where that was also possible.

Q: Well your stay in Vietnam was certainly longer than average. At each stage they wanted you to go on to further things and you agreed?

WISNER: Absolutely, it was part of my sense of commitment. I remember when President Johnson announced he wouldn't run, I remember that vividly. I was in the province chief's office and he felt very strongly. I had to assure them that this did not mean the United States was backing away. I noticed the skepticism that creased the Vietnamese brows at that point. But it was a sense of real foreboding. I came home to -- at this point in 1968 -- a radically transformed United States. One that I quickly found myself personally out of sympathy with. I had a sense of loyalty to the mission I had carried out in Vietnam, that was only part of it. I was hostile to the breakdown of what I thought was public discourse. I was hostile to the breakdown of public institutions, the anarchy in our university system. I noticed it in the life of my youngest brother, and I consider 1968 in its many aspects, even in racial harmony, one of the worst years in American history. It was hardly, as it was called in those days, the greening of America from what I saw, I saw it as a very, very unpleasant passage. Yet I felt a sense of mission and obligation to what I had done in Vietnam, and that wasn't the end of my Vietnamese experience for later as my career advanced -- I went on to work on things North African again, first in the Department and then in our Embassy in Tunis -- I was called back to Saigon as a Foreign Service inspector in the early 1970s to evaluate the widespread presence of Foreign Service Officers, not only in the embassy but in the field throughout, in my case, the southern part of Vietnam. I was then called back, pulled out of the embassy in Tunis at the time of the cease-fire, made Deputy Consul General in My Tho under Tom Barnes in Can Tho, with responsibilities reaching throughout the southern part of the country, the Delta. For the first six months of the post-Paris peace conference period I then, when Saigon fell, became one of the organizers of the evacuation effort and ended up as Deputy Director of the President's task force for Indochina refugees. I then went on in my regular government career and was called back again by Mr. Vance in 1979 to join then-former Senator Dick Clark in plucking boat people out of the South China Sea and reorganizing the refugee effort for Vietnam. So my career in Vietnam frankly began in 1964 and it wasn't over until 1979.

Q: Thinking about that, going back to organize the evacuation, was this the most intense experience probably of your foreign service career? The most marking?

WISNER: I can't say it was the most. It was certainly very intense. It came about in the following way. Very few people know this story. Would you like me to tell it to you?

Q: Be delighted.

WISNER: Well, as the last year of our presence in Vietnam moved along and the certainty that the United States was going to not return to the fray and that the final round was building up, the disagreements between our embassy and our Ambassador, Graham Martin, in Saigon and Washington grew more and more sharp. Graham Martin was in constant disagreement with Henry Kissinger and with Assistant Secretary Phil Habib, probably the greatest Foreign Service Officer of my time. But I was assigned at that point to the office of the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, Carol Laise, wife of Ellsworth Bunker. Her own sense of anguish over the course of events in Vietnam was very, very deep. She was a superb, decent, committed woman, and public servant. Ellsworth Bunker stayed in a more detached way intimately concerned, but no less anguished himself. So Carol had no quarrel with my sense of obligation to what we could see as the approaching end game. But there was a view that Graham Martin advanced from Saigon that any attempt to organize the United States Government for an evacuation from Saigon would have the political effect of signaling our lack of confidence in Thieu's ability to keep the place together. And we would in effect be kicking the struts out and bring the whole house down on our heads. So here we were faced with the implacable opposition of the ambassador and the agreement of the Secretary and the Administration to back him on this point and the ever increasingly obvious fact that an offensive was beginning and the end was approaching. The final days of the military war were approaching us. Cambodia was falling also on the other side at a rate much more rapid than any of us could have anticipated. Like many others, I felt a profound debt of obligation to those Vietnamese who had placed their faith in us, worked in a mission, or served side by side with Americans.

Q: Were we at a life-or-death decision?

WISNER: So what happened was absolutely fascinating. Lionel Rosenblatt, bless his soul, now in charge of Refugees International, who was working for the Deputy Secretary of State, Mr. Irwin, called a group of us who had known each other in Vietnam to the Deputy Secretary's conference room and there, in approaching disregard for legal authority, we met to plot the evacuation effort. And we met every day to think through what needed to be done and how to go about it. As the end game really began to approach and the Vietnamese army began to collapse under the hammer blows of the North Vietnamese offensive, Henry Kissinger -- largely at Phil Habib's prodding -- gave instructions that a special task force be created. We had a team and a plan. Now that task force was headed initially by Dean Brown. Early on, it was obvious that people were starting to flee Vietnam. How were we going to organize this? What were we going to do with them once they got out? Who were going to come to the United States? Who would take care of them when they came? What were you going to do with your embassy? How were you going to get it out of the country? How were you going to coordinate the full weight of the United States Government and coordinate this internationally, because boats would be leaving, planes would be flying, they'd be landing anywhere from Bangkok to Singapore to Manila to Guam? And what were you going to do with what was shortly to be 200,000 Vietnamese refugees pouring out of the country? Not to mention tens of thousands of others stranded around the world as their country's existence came to an end. It was awesome. We began to organize ourselves inside the United States Government. Officers like Paul Hare, who came back and put his job down; Clay McManaway in AID; Ray Dubois out of the Pentagon; Julia Taft out of HEW in those days, HHS today; the strong and wonderful presence of General Chapman at the Immigration and Naturalization Service; Sol Green, his deputy. We formed a real interagency effort and a very strong connection to the American voluntary service community -- the Lutherans, the Catholics, the Church World Services, HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society), the International Rescue Committee, Jules Kline -- these people all came together to help receive and care for these thousands of Vietnamese.

In the first stage, the issue was getting out of Vietnam, and then we were managed and run by Dean Brown, former ambassador to Jordan, former Under Secretary. I worked with Dean, did a lot of the leg work; we were working 16, 18 hours a day. It was hell on me personally. I had lost my wife at that point to cancer and was trying to cope with a family, a baby daughter without a mother and it was emotionally very complicated for me personally. But I was working -- maybe it was, say 16, 17, 18 hours a day -- trying to make this whole system function.

After the fall of Saigon, the weight of the operation shifted to how do you bring these people into the United States? Where do you get, what camps do you put them? Where do you resettle them? How do you get budgets from the Congress? We had already done that. In fact we'd gotten 500 million dollars for the cost of the effort. Organizing Congressional testimony, liaison with the Congress, another major responsibility. I became the deputy director of the task force working for Julia Taft, a terrific lady who is now our Assistant Secretary for Refugee Affairs. And that really was opening these camps that we had at Pendleton, at Fort Chaffee in Arkansas, at Eglin Air Force Base in northern Florida, Indian Town Gap in Pennsylvania, the last one we opened, and then getting the people settled from there and on into American communities all over the country. We succeeded. Within virtually a year from the fall of Saigon, nearly a quarter of a million Vietnamese had been brought into this country and found homes and most of them who could work had something approaching a job. It was an enormous accomplishment and brought the whole government together in a manner that was unprecedented. The model of course served us very well when Dick Clark came on to deal with the boat people. And over the years we've brought nearly a million Americans of Indochinese origin to this country, but largely as a result of the bit of work that was done at the time. An intriguing story of the foreign and domestic aspects of American public life coming together.

Q: Still, in terms of the time, the image of the helicopters lifting off from the roof of the embassy.

WISNER: Absolutely, it was with some emotion a couple of weeks ago I went back to Saigon for the first time, Ho Chi Minh City now, and stood outside that old embassy, and here it is with its streaked cement. The embassy is back in our hands now, but I mean I could practically hear the chopper blades. I remembered walking through the door and going up to the ambassador's office, sitting in there with Ellsworth Bunker.

Q: Do you feel that the friendships that you forged in all those years on Vietnam and the crew that worked on it formed, in a way, a core of the service and facilitated then your subsequent...

WISNER: Well, I'm not sure I could say there...

Q: The Tony Lakes and Dick Holbrookes and you yourself and many others.

WISNER: Well that's thoughtful of you to put it that way. I'm not sure it was the core of the service. In most cases, all of those you mention, they left. Others a result of disagreements over policy or, in Peter Tarnoff's case, the change of Administration between Carter - Vance and Reagan - Haig. So that in a physical sense these people moved out of the Foreign Service to come back later on in very significant positions. Some were never in the foreign service. Les Aspin, Congressman Aspin, who I worked with in Saigon in those days -- we were in the same office together -- became close and dear friends. Some stayed in the service; Paul Hare and I did. We were the exception in this group rather than the rule. Johnny Negroponte stayed in. Dick Teare stayed in. David Lambertson stayed in. But I think of others who were in this same circle of friends, people like Les Gelb. Some ceased to be friends -- Dan Ellsberg, with whom I considered I had a bemused friendship during my time in Saigon, but when the Pentagon Papers story broke ---. But other friendship circles remain very strong. I remain deeply fond of Neil Sheehan all these years, so the friendships extended into the press. It was really a set of fibers linking a generation, this Vietnam experience. People who were deeply interested in public policy. People like Tony Lake, Dick Holbrooke, Peter Tarnoff with uncommon intelligence, a capacity to take risks for public purpose, a sense of spirit of public engagement that is in some ways lacking today. The sense of drive, the sense of something really being at stake. This was a terrific lot of guys to have known and been associated with, most of them much brighter than me, but a wonderful, wonderful gang.

GILBERT H. SHEINBAUM
Political Officer, USAID
Hue, Hoi An, and Saigon (1964-1968)

Gilbert H. Sheinbaum graduated from New York University with a degree in history and political science. He also attended New School for Social Research, where he studied international relations. He was convinced by one of his brother's friends, Jim Green, to enter the Foreign Service. He also served in Laos, France, Denmark, Madagascar, Malawi, the Philippines, Switzerland, and Sri Lanka. He was interviewed by Tom Dunnigan on September 6, 1995.

Q: And there were three ambassadors, Maxwell Taylor, Cabot Lodge and Ellsworth Bunker, while you were there. What was it like when you arrived in Saigon in '64?

SHEINBAUM: Well, I have a very close friend, Gerry Hickey, an anthropologist who had spent a couple of years in Saigon in the late '50s. He still studies and writes about the Montagnards in Vietnam. In November 1963 he was on his way back to Vietnam and stayed with me for what was to have been just a few days. He wound up spending three months with me, but after the Diem assassination, they put a hold on visitors, so I had learned a lot more about Vietnam from Gerry and it sounded like I was going to a real hell-hole. I was prepared for the worst. However, when I arrived in Saigon in September 1964, it couldn't have seemed more peaceful. Five days after I got there, there was a coup, but you wouldn't have known it if you'd gone out on the streets. I'd gone over to the AID office on a Sunday to do some work, and when I came back to the hotel (the famous Continental with the lovely veranda looking out on a major square) I was told, "How come you went out? We're all restricted." Well, it didn't look like it from the traffic I saw on the streets -- well, the traffic was indeed a bit lighter, but I was new to Saigon and it was a Sunday and I didn't find things to be uptight. There was a lot of military activity as time passed and a lot of government instability which bothered everyone. My first assignment was up in Hue, the old royal capital in central Vietnam, for seven months. There was a fear of Viet Cong behind every bush. I was warned that I couldn't trust any of the local people; even if they were government people, were they really working for the Viet Cong? And so on. And yet I had some very good relationships in those days. So I had an interesting although somewhat frustrating period in Hue. I was the AID rep for the city of Hue, while the provincial AID officer was an Army Lieutenant Colonel, who I think had a different agenda than just AID work, and he was a total loss as far as the rest of us were concerned. He was also a nasty guy. Then I was assigned down to Hoi An, a very old, historic town (formerly known as Fai-Fo) noted for its small port and now capital of the province of Quang Nam. They assigned me there as the provincial rep and I . . .

Q: But still with AID?

SHEINBAUM: With AID. I stayed there only six months because they brought in a senior officer over me, one of many who were two-three grades higher assigned - despite absence of knowledge about Asia - to buttress our civilian presence throughout the country. This guy was a poor administrator, offensive to the Vietnamese, and a pain, so they then assigned me to the 3rd Marine Amphibious Force as the civic action advisor. I spent the last six months in Central Vietnam with the Marines, an unusual and revealing experience. The Marines treated me very well.

Q: Now, when you first arrived, we were not actually in a fighting situation, were we?

SHEINBAUM: That's correct. When the Marines came ashore in early 1965, they were the first U.S. combat troops in Vietnam, and they came ashore in my province, Quang Nam. I was not informed of this beforehand, although the senior AID officers in Da Nang were in on it. It didn't have any great impact on my AID program in the province at first as the Marines took a defensive posture during all that period. They were setting up bases in Da Nang and Chu Lai; they built a new airstrip in Chu Lai, 50 kms. south of Da Nang. And they were establishing reasonably good relations with the local people. But, of course, they were very distrustful of everything and, as we found out, they had good reason to be. For example, the Marines were perplexed to discover one morning that a Vietnamese they had killed the night before during an attack on Chu Lai was the spiker on the local volleyball team the Marines played regularly. But in general the situation was very quiet at that time. The Marines didn't go into an offensive posture until 1966, about the time I was leaving Central Vietnam.

Q: While you were with AID, did you have any connection with the embassy at all? The people in the embassy?

SHEINBAUM: Oh, yes. John Burke, one of my oldest friends in the Foreign Service, asked me if I would consider joining the political section after my AID tour, but I had planned on economic training at Princeton. You see, in '64 when I got squeezed out of that economic training at Princeton, they said, "Well, don't worry, we'll take care of you after your stint with AID in Vietnam." At that time, Jack Reinstein, who had been my Economic Minister when I was in Paris, was head of economic training at FSI. I wrote him that I'd like to get back into Princeton. And the response was, "Well, we have a new program, a six-month economic studies program at FSI." I said, "Fine, I'd love to go into that and then follow it with Princeton." "Oh, no, no, that's not our policy." The policy was that after you go through the six-month course, you get a tour of duty as an economic officer and then you can do economic training at a university. I said, "Yes, but by that time, I'll be over forty." And forty was the cut-off for university training. So I said, "I've just finished my tour in Vietnam and I think that the Department is welshing on its earlier commitment to me." That's the term I used with Jack and he said, "I don't think that's correct, that the Department's welshing on its original commitment to you." I said, "I'm sorry, Jack, they are welshing on it because that was the commitment and I'm not getting it." So I turned down the six-month course and joined Embassy Saigon's political section.

Q: All right, could you have left after two years in Vietnam? You could have gone to the six-month economic course if you wanted to take it? But rather than that, you went into the political section in the embassy.

SHEINBAUM: Right.

Q: Which put you there in some of the hottest days we've ever had in Vietnam, leading up to the . . . Were the Vietnamese you met and dealt with, were they optimistic, fatalistic, or how could you characterize their outlook and their prospects that they saw?

SHEINBAUM: Some were guardedly optimistic. Others were just going about doing their thing. I suppose, guardedly optimistic was the way I would characterize almost everybody there that I dealt with. I was assigned to deal with -- not with the government's party -- but with all the miscellaneous parties. I did that only for a year because I got scooped up by Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker to be his first staff assistant. Well, actually his first staff aide was Bill Shepard who was the holdover from Ambassador Lodge.

Q: Oh, yes. who ran for governor of Maryland, right?

SHEINBAUM: Right. But the Ambassador wanted somebody else and he focused on me. I turned him down at first. I said, "It's not the kind of job I'd like to do. I'm doing substantive work; I'd like to continue in that." And then Tom Recknagel, Deputy Political Counselor, came back to me and said, "Look, the Ambassador's looked around at everybody else - and you're it." And that was nice; I mean I worked with not only Ellsworth but also with Eva Kim who was the secretary. Eva and I were back-to-back in the office and she was great to work with.

Q: Were you often in physical danger, did you feel, in Vietnam?

SHEINBAUM: There were a couple of incidents involving military aircraft or Air America when we were in physical danger, not from hostile fire but from aircraft problems. I was never under fire but, of course, I was there during the Tet Offensive when we didn't know what was going to happen next.

Q: I wanted to ask you about that. You dealt with the non-governmental political groups -- parties. What about the Buddhists? How do you assess the Buddhist factor?

SHEINBAUM: Somebody else dealt with the Buddhist movement, if you want to put it that way, because I didn't speak Vietnamese very well. The Buddhist factor was rather strong because, you know, the Buddhist clergy had become rather activist. There was lingering Buddhist resentment against Ngo Dinh Diem and the Catholic control of the government. In 1967 Nguyen van Thieu was President and, because he was Catholic, the Buddhists felt that they were still getting short shrift since few other leaders of the government -- the major players -- were not strong Buddhist followers. I gained insight through numerous friends who were Buddhist. The Buddhists were resentful, but they were not a cause for major problems at that time.

Q: And they were not supporting the Viet Cong?

SHEINBAUM: No, as best as I can recollect as a group they were not overall supporting the Viet Cong. There were individuals and maybe some small components of the Buddhist community who were, but, generally speaking, I don't think they were supportive of the Viet Cong because they knew that things would be very tough afterwards - as they were.

Q: Well, as you know, there was growing frustration and uncertainty in this country as to our Vietnam policy from '65 on. Was that reflected in Saigon -- the riots, the student demonstrations here, the protest marches?

SHEINBAUM: Reflected in what way, do you mean, Tom?

Q: Among our staff out there?

SHEINBAUM: We were very conscious of it, I would say. We were very conscious of it. Phil Habib was our political counselor the first eight or nine months I was in Saigon and then it was

Arch Calhoun, and I think they felt the pressure building up in the United States. But we all felt that we still had to do our jobs the best way we knew how. We had to present the situation as it actually was. I think we were, generally speaking, pretty honest in our reporting. I saw much when I was working for Bunker. There was so much paperwork on my desk that I didn't have a chance to read anything but the most important documents. Yet, I was certain that the staff was pretty honest, at least for the State Department guys, especially those who were dealing with the reporting from the provinces. The five-person provincial reporting unit - Dick Teare was the head of it when I was there - laid things out on paper in a very realistic way.

Q: Punches were not pulled then?

SHEINBAUM: That's right.

Q: What was the effect of the withdrawal of our dependents from Vietnam?

SHEINBAUM: I wasn't in Saigon at that time (February or March 1965). I was up north. And of course, I didn't have any dependents. And after the bombing of the embassy in February, I think that there must have been a morale factor involved. I also think that it was an indication that things were not going well. And therefore, there was some foreboding about the future.

Q: Now, there were peace feelers being put out from Harold Wilson and other people all through the mid-'60', Did they have any effect on our people out there?

SHEINBAUM: Not that I recall.

Q: People were not saying, "We should have grabbed this, or we should take advantage of this." Because they all came, of course, with various hooks in them as far as we're concerned.

SHEINBAUM: Yeah, sure.

Q: Now let's talk a little bit about the Tet Offensive. Were you personally affected by that?

SHEINBAUM: Well, I had just returned two days earlier from my father's funeral in New York. Dave Carpenter, my housemate, and I and a few friends had gone to Cholon (the Chinese part of Saigon - Tet is also a Chinese holiday) for dinner and to watch the colorful festivities. When the shelling began at 3 a.m. January 30, I had to be woken up by Dave. and we immediately got on two phone lines in Arch Calhoun's house next door one to the embassy and one to Washington. The connection with Washington was important because, after a while, our duty officer at the embassy, Allan Wendt, was too busy handling the wounded and giving directions to the Marines and others in the building.

It was chaos in the embassy. And snipers were firing at it from across the street. Allan, our communicator, Jim Griffin, and the Agency people were very active. They were trying to report as much as possible. Allan had to give up; he just left the phone off the hook in the embassy, except for us and so we fed information back to Washington whenever Allan told us what was going on. I had to stay at Arch's house until about nine or so in the morning to keep on the only line between the embassy and Washington, but I left when I learned the Ambassador had already come to the Embassy after all the Viet Cong inside the compound -- nineteen or twenty-one -- had been killed. But they didn't get inside the Embassy, fortunately. The Marine who had been outside the building but inside the compound had been very alert, and as soon as shooting began at the embassy gates, he pulled those heavy, huge, wooden doors shut and bolted them as he came running in. Thank God for that because otherwise the V.C. would have gotten inside the building, having gotten through the fence after killing the four U.S. Army personnel at the two gates, and the V.C. were running rampant around the property. So I came to the embassy after Bunker had done his walk-through of the property, and things were chaotic. Some staff had slept through the racket going on throughout the city. I remember driving to the embassy and seeing a few bodies lying around -- one hanging out of a car. I think we sent everybody home at three o'clock. There was probably a curfew. I left between five and six and I was the last one in the entire embassy to go. The Ambassador had gone, Eva had gone, and so I went outside and began to drive my Austin Healey -- a white Austin Healey with the top down. It was the only car on the street all the way home, about 1 ½ miles, and I was surely conspicuous all the way.

Q: A rather eerie feeling, I guess.

SHEINBAUM: It was. I got to the first corner, and as I was making a right turn I heard somebody pull the bolt back on his rifle. I slowed down, and I heard bolts being pulled back at a couple of other corners, but nobody hampered me and I got home. So that was that. Then a couple of times in the next few days, I had to run messages up to the palace to Thieu or to his aides. There were a couple of blocks en route where there were still some Viet Cong snipers, and the Marines that drove me in some wreck of a sedan had M-16s on the floor. They were holding them as we drove up to the palace and we kept our heads down. That was one of the last V.C. hold-out areas in Saigon, virtually across the street from the palace, but that the only way we could get into the palace was through that one gate. So I had to do that a couple of times. So that was perhaps the one time I really felt I was under fire, but nobody fired at us.

Q: Yes, you were in grave danger there.

SHEINBAUM: As you can see, I survived.

Q: Did the results of Tet change your viewpoint at all or those of the people with whom you worked in the embassy?

SHEINBAUM: We were trying to make things as plain as possible to Ellsworth Bunker -- what the situation was. He was getting a very limited point of view from the military and perhaps to a certain extent from the Agency. The Agency was trying to be honest in many ways but unfortunately they were under pressure from their powers-that-be back in Washington. I forget who was Agency Director at the time. George Jacobson, the mission coordinator and a retired Army colonel, and I would bring in some people to talk with the Ambassador. We gave them false names for the Ambassador's calendar or maybe didn't even put them on the calendar. Some of these were military officers like John Paul Vann who would come in under an assumed name because General Westmoreland would have hit the roof if he knew that Vann was talking privately with the Ambassador. And the Ambassador was appreciative of that. George brought in his military contacts, and I brought in some of our provincial people. I think it helped to leaven the situation for the Ambassador. We were all beginning to become very pessimistic as to how things were going to come out. Then there was the second Tet Offensive a few months later which made us more apprehensive as it lasted longer and created more devastation around the outskirts of Saigon. I remember flying around in a helicopter a couple of times -- Westmoreland's helicopter while he was in the Mission Council meeting -- and seeing how bad things were. Of course, we didn't have television at the time (no CNN) and we, ourselves, didn't see anything unless you drove or helicoptered through those areas. And in April of '68, Lyndon Johnson was supposed to have met us -- Bunker and Westmoreland -- in Hawaii, but then Martin Luther King was assassinated, so a presidential plane was sent for us and we went to Washington instead.

Q: So you were back here during the Martin Luther King riots?

SHEINBAUM: Well, the riots had ended. It was during the phony peace.

Q: I see. And was Ambassador Bunker kept aware of all the talks that were going on in Paris at this time with Harriman and others?

SHEINBAUM: Yes.

Q: So you were fully in on the picture there. Well, you left in July of '68 . What were your thoughts, leaving Vietnam. Were you depressed or . . . ?

SHEINBAUM: Happy to be out of there because I didn't think we were going to succeed. I guess I'd become somewhat pessimistic even though we generally felt that the Viet Cong had been substantially weakened by their two offensives, and the North Vietnamese were for a while not able to sustain any further offensives as things stood at that time. Westmoreland asked for a lot more troops, 150-200,000, according to reports. I don't know whether he actually asked, I've never seen that defined or whether that was one of several options he put forth.

Q: Which was turned down?

SHEINBAUM: Which was turn down -- wisely.

Q: Well, following those exciting years, you were transferred to Denmark.

SHEINBAUM: I lived through Vietnam again in Denmark because having just come from Vietnam and the Embassy had many requests for a speaker, particularly on Vietnam, I went to many parts of Denmark talking about U.S. foreign policy and particularly Vietnam.

Q: Did you find any sympathy for our policy in Vietnam?

SHEINBAUM: Not much sympathy. But I found less antipathy than I expected.

BARRY ZORTHIAN
Chief, Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1964-1968)

Barry Zorthian, a graduate of Yale, served in the Marine Corps during World War I out in the Pacific. At the end of his service, he became a journalist with the New Haven Register. At a Yale Alumni cocktail party, he ran into an old college friend, Lowell Clucas, who was a senior editor at the Voice of America. Clucas invited Zorthian to come to work at VOA. It was while working stories that centered around the United Nations that he became interested in Foreign Affairs. In 1953, he earned his law degree at night, while still at VOA. He also served abroad in Germany and India. He was interviewed by Cliff Groce on October 20 and 26, 1988.

ZORTHIAN: There was certainly an operation going there -- people like Dave Sheppard and Ev Bumgardner and Doug Pike and quite a few others. The mission was a troubled mission, for all kinds of reasons. My predecessor, John Mecklin -- who was a lateral entry PAO from Time Magazine and wanted to get in a hitch of public service, was a very fine journalist and a very good guy; I got to know him much better later -- had been transferred by Ed Murrow as part of a whole housecleaning of the U.S. mission, which was in all kinds of difficulty with the press, with the Diem overthrow, the aftermath of that. So virtually every chief of agency was transferred, John among them. The AID chief was transferred. Paul Harkins remained as commander but Westy (General Westmoreland) was brought in clearly to replace him in a few months. The CIA people were transferred. We got a whole new country team there very quickly, all within the space of -- Westmoreland, for instance, arrived two weeks before I did, left Vietnam four years later, one month before I did. Phil Habib came in fairly shortly to replace Mel Manfull as political counselor. Pierre da Silva came in for CIA. Jim Killen came in for AID, to replace Joe Brent. The whole thing turned over. Washington's decision was -- the situation there was deteriorating after Diem -- they'd bring in a whole new team and turn them loose on them.

Our USIS role in Vietnam was fairly confused. AID had its own communication program going, providing hardware and equipment and training. MACV (Military Advisory Command, Vietnam) had a political directorate operation going, modeled somewhat after the Kuomintang political operation in Taiwan. We had advisers from the British -- Bob Thompson and his team, including a fellow named Dennis Duncan, who was a specialist in "propaganda," working out of their Malaysian experience. There was all this talk about how to handle an insurgency, the combined political-military approach that was necessary.

This was still a "low-intensity" war at that period. Well, that first year in Vietnam was awfully rough. When I was assigned -- I still have the letter sent by Ed Murrow, it must be one of the last letters he sent before he left the Agency and subsequently died -- he said in so many words, "When I proposed you to Henry Cabot Lodge," who was then ambassador, "he was a little concerned about your lack of French," which I did not have; I had kitchen French but nothing fluent, but said he could live with that. "However," Murrow said, "you have to understand this clearly, that you will have nothing to do with the press. You will be director of USIS, he will handle the press himself, be his own press officer." And those were the ground rules under which I went in. "Zorthian, go do your USIA thing and keep your nose out of the press."

Well, our press relations at that point were horrible. Washington was quite concerned about that, and the new team was quite concerned about that. And despite the ground rules he set up, Lodge kept turning to me on press issues. And obviously I ended up communicating with journalists. By June, when we had a big conference in Honolulu, chaired by McNamara and Rusk, Westmoreland and Lodge jointly recommended that I be named "Czar of Media Relations," of information in Vietnam. Their recommendation was accepted. Remember, this was all in a low-intensity, a counter-insurgency situation. We had less than 20,000 Americans in country then, and those were largely logistical and support and advisory troops.

Q: Who originated that idea of giving you overall control -- the Ambassador?

ZORTHIAN: Well, I'm not sure. I guess the Ambassador did. I certainly didn't because I was in no position to do so. And Westmoreland did, to a certain extent. He had a military information guy, but the need for coordination was very clear. I guess the ultimate recommendation for that may well have come out of Washington. Bob Manning was Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs when I first got there. Bob is an old friend of mine. That decision in Hawaii was eventually endorsed, or adopted, or whatever the right word is, made statutory, by the NSC. As far as I know it's the one and only time the NSC put out a directive, naming me by name, saying I would be the chief public affairs adviser to the ambassador and COMUS MACV, and have the following responsibilities. It gave me the guidance of maximum candor with minimum security, laid out ground rules. Now, I pretty well know Bob Manning wrote that because he moved from the State Department over to the White House as the coordinator of the whole media effort there. To some extent unfortunately, Bob got the offer of being editor of Atlantic magazine shortly thereafter and left, and he was never really replaced. So in the media relations hat, I ended up literally with five bosses, because I was authorized and responsible to five agencies. I'd get White House message, I'd get State Department, I'd get Defense Department, I'd get USIA, and even AID, all of whom had ideas, uncoordinated frequently.

Ultimately -- I guess it was almost a year later -- I finally got transferred, because there were complaints about a USIA man dealing with the American press -- Leonard Marks, I've never forgotten, went up before Fulbright, and when he was asked about the law that prohibited USIA from propagandizing the American people: "Were those people in Vietnam dealing with the American press?" He said, "no, absolutely not, USIA does not." Well, I was seconded to the State Department shortly after that, with the Agency reimbursing State for salary. But those were very intense days. Vietnam was collapsing. Militarily the South Vietnamese were losing as much as a battalion a week. The country was in danger of being split in two by the VC. Governments were coming and going. We had demonstrations in Saigon. We even had raids on some of the USIS libraries. It was a very difficult, intense period, where we were close to anarchy much of the time. And in the middle of all this, we were trying to set up the press operation and to coordinate it and make it effective and be honest.

Q: You were addressing a multitude of audiences simultaneously.

ZORTHIAN: Oh, absolutely. And I kept my hat as director of USIS while also being in charge of this press operation. I had fairly quickly a deputy for press as well as a deputy for USIS. Harold Kaplan came out initially, spent about a year. He was followed by Jack Stuart, I guess. John McGowan came in. On that side eventually, Gene Rosenfeld. On the USIA side I ended up with, in my years, five different deputies. Dave Sheppard first, Bob Haney, then Harry Casler came in, Sandy Marlowe came in, and finally Keith Adamson were all deputies at USIS. And as the thing went along we had enormous numbers of Agency people come in.

I've never forgotten the start of the Five O'Clock Follies. Flying back that June from Honolulu to Saigon, I sat next to Frank McCullough, who was an old friend, "Time" bureau chief out there -- actually living in Hong Kong but spending most of his time down there. I said, "Frank, how am I going to tackle this damn thing? What do we do?" The relations were bad. MACV had very little credibility. We didn't have that much, but I'd started being honest with these guys. He said, "There are a lot of things you can do. One is being honest." But he also said, "Have one time of day when you can be reached. One of the headaches here is that people can't get authentic sources, official sources, when they need them." So I looked around for the best time, and I finally announced to the media, "I will be in my office every day at 5 o'clock. If you try to reach me at any other time I may not be here, but remember, I will be in my office every day at 5 o'clock and available to answer any questions you have." And that literally is what happened. The first day maybe five guys showed up, and then it went down, and then it went up. About a month or so later, the MACV press officer changed. A guy named Lee Baker, Air Force, had been transferred, and they got a lieutenant colonel named Lou Breaux, who died recently. He came in, and I called over there and said, "Why don't you come on down?" MACV put out a daily release -- just put it out, never answered questions on it, unless someone took the initiative. "Bring that press release down with you, that press statement, and sit down on the couch next to me and be ready to answer if anything comes up on the military." Which he did. And this thing built up, and that eventually became the Five O'Clock Follies. Downstairs, when we redid USIS after one of these attacks and sacking of the building, we built an auditorium down there, and it got very formalized, institutionalized.

Q: What was the size of the group in those Follies?

ZORTHIAN: Initially, three or four. As it started to grow, then, some days 15, if there was a big crowd. The day the Brinks blew, on Christmas Eve, or Christmas week, of 1964, when the windows in our office blew out and blew glass all over us, there may have been ten, 15 in there. Eventually it grew out of my office, and I had enough other burdens so Harold Kaplan started taking it, and we moved into another office. Kappy started taking that on, and that became part of the deputy's job, the counselor for press affairs. It finally grew out of that temporary space, and we finally moved downstairs in due course.

Then, as far as my own role goes, I shifted in this a year or so later to where, every Wednesday after lunch -- 2 o'clock if I remember it was -- I'd sit in my office and go on a background briefing with any journalist who wanted to be with me, and we'd get into all kinds of things. I'd go through the files, the cables, give them our evaluation. I did that, and the other thing I used to do, again growing out of that conversation with Frank, is have background briefings at my house, over a drink, inviting a certain number of journalists. It was not a wide open thing, it was by invitation. And I'd try to get the legitimate journalists. One of the problems in Vietnam was that we had a lot of what I called non-journalists, people who'd obtained a letter from their local editor -- I'm going to Vietnam, if I write anything I'll send it to you -- and the editor had given them a letter that forced us to give them credentials. Some of them were there only because they wanted PX privileges. So you had a lot of legitimate, good, first-rate journalists. You had a lot of bad journalists. You had a lot of non-journalists. You had a lot of tourists posing as journalists. There were all kinds there. And you had the visiting firemen, who would be a burden.

Q: Name some of the people you considered the good journalists.

ZORTHIAN: Oh, Frank McCullough certainly was a very good one. Bob Shaplen was an excellent journalist. Of the younger day-to-day journalists, Neil Sheehan was a good journalist. David Halberstam only visited there while I was there. There was a period there when the older hands, World War Two vets, came in: Keyes Beech and Bob Hewitt. You know, as we'd go along, some of the younger journalists who came in winning their spurs there -- Morley Safer I always thought was a first-rate journalist. He was very heavily criticized, I know, for that Cam Ne thing, and if you look at that, his commentary is really not as bad as it was cracked up to be. Dan Rather was out there. There was a group of TV people who were sort of the field dogs. They'd go out with the cameras and look for the boom-boom. There were those who sat back and were much more thoughtful. Peter Grose of the New York Times, in his first years, was a good journalist there. And an awful lot of name journalists came out. The handling, care and feeding of visiting firemen was a major part of our job. As I go along, more names will come to mind. But there were also a lot of just half-baked, superficial and almost irresponsible journalists.

But that first year [1965] was quite frantic. Then, in February -- and I once did a piece commemorating this, I couldn't get it printed -- the first American officially- sanctioned, or admitted, combat involvement came, when we had the air strike in North Vietnam. Shortly thereafter the first American troops came in -- March -- the Marine outfit that came in to Chu Lai, the base up there. By April or May, the 72nd Airborne came in. In June -- this is all 1965 -- there was another very significant Honolulu conference, and this much more secret, much more closely held, where the basic decision to bring in a big American presence was made. I remember Max Taylor giving a press conference, and questions were being raised, and he said something to the effect -- I've forgotten the exact words -- "We're recommending 100,000 men," or something like that, and he said, "We hear there's a figure of 300,000 -- absolutely not! There's no way we can ever justify or need 300,000 troops there." Well, as you know, we finally hit 550,00.

But through the spring of 1965, the other side of the house, the USIS, communications, propaganda side -- and I use propaganda here hopefully in the better sense of the word -- was still disjointed, still uncoordinated. The respective heads of the operations -- Ralph Boyce of AID communications and a guy named Bob Bowen, lieutenant colonel in the military, headed up the MACV thing, and I began to meet periodically under the umbrella of the Mission Council, which was trying to pull the mission together. There had been competition, separatism and everything. Lodge, if you remember, left in June 1964, and Maxwell Taylor came in as ambassador. One of the tasks Maxwell Taylor had was to try to coordinate this mission. We evolved -- because the whole communications was disoriented, uncoordinated and sometimes contradictory -- we evolved the concept, by mutual agreement, that this all ought to be pulled together. I kept pressing: we've got to have coordination. We had a so-called Psychological Operations Committee, which I headed up. When I first got there I found them voting on policy. My first statement was, "There'll be no more voting. I'll make a decision, and if it's wrong it's wrong and I'll check with the powers that be. But this isn't a democracy we're operating here." Well, we evolved this concept of cohesion, of pulling together the whole thing, and that led to the concept of a joint U.S. public affairs office, a completely coordinated operation.

About that time, in March, Carl Rowan came out with Army chief of staff Harold Johnson, who was very receptive and very sensitive to this communications side of the business - the only chief of staff or top military man who came out on one of those visits and asked for a briefing on what USIS was doing -- and he came over and we briefed him. Carl, with Johnson's agreement, picked up on this idea of a joint operation, brought it back to Washington. The NSC approved it. And so we got another directive, organizing the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office, with contributions from all five agencies: State, AID, the military -- MACV, USIS, and even CIA. We had a couple of CIA guys, divorced from their CIA duties, as their contribution to JUSPAO. The operation started informally, by Embassy announcement, in April, I believe, of '65. Formal institutional approval by Washington, with paperwork authorizing and all of that, started July first, '65.

Q: I'm confused, Barry, because I thought when you went back from Hawaii in June of -- ZORTHIAN: That was the press side only. This was the USIS side, the communications side. And for the first time, all communication in Vietnam, from media relations to USIS activities to psychological operations -- anything dealing with communications -- came under one direction. I had two deputies. On one side was the press deputy; on the other side we had a JUSPAO deputy. Both those deputies, incidentally, were counselor level in rank terms. The great tragedy is that the JUSPAO concept, which grew out of the counter-insurgency, was overtaken by events almost before it started, because in came the conventional war units. MACV grew and grew and grew, and the tail started wagging the dog. Even on the civilian side, reorganization started almost that soon. By fall we had CORDS, or whatever they called it then. At this time, you see, we had three representatives in each province; we had a JUSPAO rep, and AID rep and a MACV rep, military rep, advising province chiefs -- this, in addition to the military units -- the civilian side of the operation, if you will, the people side of the operation. Eventually, that was all taken over by CORDS and JUSPAO lost direct control of its province reps, of its field reps, and got instead a support role and a role of substantive direction, much the way the Joint Chiefs command the theater commands and the Army, Navy and Air Force all provide support and manpower and service policy direction.

Within a year or so USIA became tired of the mission because it was drawing down people, it was drawing down money. They wanted out. They said so. There were a lot of elements in the Agency that said, "This is not our job, wartime propaganda." At any rate, JUSPAO got almost dated -- the concept. You know, we kept talking about this coordinated, political and military, counter-insurgency war, and coordinated communications support effort, and it got almost dated by the time it got going. Although I will say over the years I think JUSPAO made some real contributions. I think there were many flaws in the operation, and certainly many people have criticized it. The tragedy to me is that the whole experience, if you will, has been forgotten and put aside. The Agency, when it did a 35th anniversary book, barely mentioned JUSPAO. There was one picture of Sam Dieli, and it simply said under it, "A member of JUSPAO" -- no recognition that this was something that was a very significant part of the Agency record and experience, that took a lot of its manpower, took a lot of its money, and had implications for its role generally.

But you had this pattern. As I say, I got there in early 1964. By June the press chore, on a coordinated basis, had been turned over to me. That first year was a frantic, hectic, chaotic year -- political, substantively -- in Vietnam. The spring of '65 came the concept of JUSPAO. That was accepted. It was put into operation during '65. By December there was some loosening of it. By December '66 the Agency was tired of the thing, wanted out. I've got a copy of a memo from Leonard Marks to the White House saying that in so many terms -- Dan Oleksiw being his point man on weakening it or cutting it down. Then going along for six or seven years, until I think it was officially dissolved in 1972, if I remember. Bob Lincoln would know that, I think. Bob was there. Or Alan Carter -- one of them -- I guess Bob sort of officially ended it and converted back to USIS.

There were a lot of problems, many, many gaps, shortcomings. But I'd also say -- and I don't think it's too self-serving a statement -- a lot of major contributions and lessons were learned.

Q: Name some of your problems.

ZORTHIAN: Acceptance by all hands, who were used to traditional, institutionalized, Washington-based agencies -- to accepting a coordinated concept. Remember there was never this kind of coordination back in Washington, so that we were getting direction -- now I'm talking just about press -- from five different agencies with different interests. There was never that coordinated operation back here. Even though USIA was supposedly the executive agent, it did not pull together very much back here. So acceptance was difficult.

The problem -- and it's an eternal one -- between headquarters and giving direction to a field. The collateral responsibility problem. We had representatives out in the provinces that nominally and in fact were under CORDS but also turning to us for help.

Resources. The Agency and others made a lot of things available, and did put a lot of money into it, but there were times when even those were inadequate for the task in front of us. Now at the same time, I say, probably too much dependence on our part on product, to the mechanical approach, to counting effectiveness in the millions of leaflets we dropped rather than the substance -- the difficulty of affecting substance and actual programs. You and I have been in this business too long to think that you can engage in communication, engage in propaganda, if you want, in a vacuum. If the substance isn't there, the rest is going to be very inadequate.

Q: How did you try to measure the effectiveness of the operation in the provinces?

ZORTHIAN: Very difficult. One measurement was the return of Chieu Hoi's -- the people who returned from the VC. That obviously could be intensified by focusing all your effort on that, and there were times when we did. The ultimate test in the provinces was security at the hamlet level, the resistance of hamlet dwellers to VC influence. That was a very difficult thing. You could almost tell the whole story of the Vietnam war on that. That's what Bob Komer with his hamlet indexes, and so on, tried to do. All you could do was contribute to the overall effort, just as the economic program would contribute and military security would contribute. The ultimate test was: were those hamlets resisting VC influence? Were they secure enough? Did they support the government side? And that was a very difficult thing to measure, and to say it was one way or the other was very hard to judge. So you ended up -- this was like the war. It was so difficult to explain and measure the progress in this kind of a fluid war you ended up looking for statistics that you could quantify. So we got into body count issues, and also we got into, how many leaflets did you drop, how many movies did you put out, how many showings did you put on? Well, those obviously are just statistics and don't tell you what people are thinking.

Q: It also affected VOA. We went up to 18 hours a day of broadcasting in Vietnamese, and had no idea of what good it was doing.

ZORTHIAN: A most difficult thing, and I'm not sure ever resolved; a constant problem for the Agency generally.

Another problem was people, training of people. People came out there for 18 months, they got a quick smattering of Vietnamese -- in the early days they didn't even get that. Were they adaptable? Did they have aptitude for that kind of work? Would they want to be there? Was there some enthusiasm, commitment? Now a lot of them had it. Some had it who weren't qualified. Some who were qualified didn't have it. But this was not, if you will, an elite corps trained for this purpose. A background in the Agency came closest of all the agencies, but still wasn't designed for this kind of a situation. The group of province reps I had at first were a great team, but then inevitably, in that kind of thing, as numbers grow you get dilution. But Fred Quinn and Rex Baer and Sam Dieli and John Scanlan -- that first group who came in were just first-rate officers. They helped set the thing up, they got it established, they functioned well. But they also were in a counter-insurgency situation, those early ones, more counter-insurgency than later when the conventional forces moved in. Part of our answer to problems was always: more, more; and I'm not sure that is the answer. Just as part of our answer to the war was: more, more. I'm not sure Americans are skilled enough, sophisticated enough in that kind of a situation to do it with an epee instead of a saber. We've got to go in and clump down five million tons of cement and bombs and PXs and the God-damnedest logistic tail you've ever seen, and try to just win it by weight. And that never worked -- never worked well.

Plus, you know, the ultimate problem was your relations and the performance of your allies, the Vietnamese. Who again weren't trained particularly for this kind of a war -- not the people we were dealing with, who tended to be by and large the urban Vietnamese, a lot of them northern Vietnamese, not very skilled particularly at communication with the hamlet. Obviously, some were, but an awful lot weren't. The competence of the government, the leadership presented, the issues of corruption, and so on -- all that diluted the effort. It would take a long, long analysis and evaluation to come up with final answers, but I think such evaluation is needed.

Still today, 20 years after I left, the U.S. government has not worked out standard operating procedures for low-intensity wars and how it would handle them. If we got into another such situation, is the Agency going to be the prime agency again? Will it take it on? If so, is it ready to? Has it given any thought to training and preparation? If it's not going to be, who is? Who ever it is, are they ready? Is the military still, in their training for psychological operations, emphasizing largely equipment -- mobile printing presses, mobile radio transmitters, all the rest of the equipment, the goodies? But how much of substance? How developed are our overall plans? Some of it's going on but not very much. We are not prepared, and the Agency isn't. I don't think the Agency has distilled a thing out of Vietnam -- which is a disappointment. Now, the military has tried some; they've done a certain amount of lessons out of Vietnam, they've done a certain amount of postmortems on it. But I don't think the Agency has, and I think the Agency essentially want to turn its back on it.

Well, perhaps so. All I say is, the last time we went into it, the only one that came close was the Agency, and so we were tapped. What's going to happen next time? And it's no good to tell me there ain't going to be a next time, because there sure as hell may be. You know, we came close to it in the Gulf in some ways, and Central America is an area where we've done something. Now the CIA ended up doing the consultation down there, but the Agency has had some involvement in it. As a matter of fact, as far as that goes, I would even note that the Agency hasn't trained for media relations. There's no training for handling the press in our Agency except trial and error, on the spot in the middle of a situation. There's no preparation for it. And as far as I know, none of the training deals with the question of media relations.

Q: They have instituted media relations courses now, in which they're trying to teach people to deal with the press, the media in lively situations. That started recently. They bring in people to really throw zinging questions at them.

ZORTHIAN: Well, God bless, if they are. That has to be recent then. It sure didn't for a long time. It was like throwing the dice. A guy might be good at it or might not.

Well, JUSPAO obviously is close to my heart. I spent four of the good years of my life there, and I get a lot of thoughts on it and somehow I keep saying to myself, I'll write it all out, but I suspect that's not going to happen. On the personal side, I went till June of 1964 without the family. Then my family came to Saigon, after school ended in New Delhi, for a month. Then they took off on home leave, as did I a week or so later and met them in New York. And I wasn't here a week before I got a message from Maxwell Taylor saying, "Come back, you're required." So I went back to Vietnam. Margaret and the boys came out alone in time for the school year in September. They were there about five or six months, obviously not the healthiest situation. The kids used to go to school in a Navy bus with people riding shotgun up on the roof of it. And all civilians were evacuated in 1965 after the initial air strike. Families had a choice of where to go, and my family went to Baguio in the Philippines because of what was then regarded as the best American in Asia, the Brent School, and stayed there three and a half years. I used to get over there about once every other month, sometimes once every three months, a quick visit.

Q: This was high school age?

ZORTHIAN: No -- grammar school age. Actually, when they started high school, Greg came back a year before us to enter prep school here, at high school level. Steve never got to high school while we were overseas. He started that here. Well, then, finally, after Tet, which was a -- shock may not be the right word, but which was a sort of watershed event in Vietnam.

Q: It was certainly a shock in the United States.

ZORTHIAN: You know, it was clear my war was over, and we were entering a whole new phase and it was time for me to change. I stayed on for quite a while because Bunker wanted me to. Ed Nickel came in to take over the USIS part of JUSPAO; he came in as director of JUSPAO. I became special assistant to the ambassador for press relations, with Gene Rosenfeld as my deputy. But that was a temporary setup, and there was no doubt that one of those days I should have left. I was phasing out. At one point I was assigned to Japan. Alex Johnson, who had been deputy chief of mission in Vietnam, accepted me there as PAO, obviously without language. Then that backed off because Bunker asked me to stay on, and the Agency assigned me to Tufts for a year. I was supposed to go to Tufts for a year's residence.

While I was in Vietnam Jim Linen, president of Time, Inc., had come through. Margaret was over there on one of these big visits, because Vice President Humphrey was in town. They called over the wives; I was doing some official things. Jim Linen had always thought he had dinner with me. He hadn't; he had dinner with Margaret. But based on that, when he got back to New York he asked me if I were interested in a job with Time, Inc., and spelled out a prospect for me. I got back, and they confirmed the prospect. I didn't know where the hell to go. At one point, LBJ told Dean Rusk to give me an Embassy. He had asked me in Guam to stay on a year; I was supposed to be out of there. Well, when the President asks you, you don't say no. Subsequently, Westmoreland had offered me the IV Corps - the top civilian job there with the military under me -- a job John Vann finally got, incidentally. I didn't want to extend again. Margaret was getting restless; four years was enough, et cetera, and I was getting tired. Things had changed, and after Tet, as I say, my war was over. But there was nowhere to go. I didn't want to be a PAO for 20 more years. I was relatively young. In 1968 I was 48 years old. Time came in with a very good offer, so I decided to resign. Dick Schmidt said, "Well, stay on till we get the career legislation through, and retire as a career foreign service officer rather than a reserve or civil servant." So I stayed on a couple of months. I became special assistant to the director for those two months. It was a nominal job. I was cleaning up, doing reports, briefing, and so on. The legislation went through, and I was sworn in as FSIO-1, whatever the title, and then resigned the next week and left the Agency in October 1968. So it's been 20 years.

Q: Did you find your military experience, your reserve status in the Marine Corps helpful in that military situation?

ZORTHIAN: Oh, absolutely, absolutely.

Q: How so?

ZORTHIAN: Simply that I had been in the military and in the Marine Corps reserve -- I was promoted to colonel while I was in Vietnam, and Westmoreland pinned the colonel's eagles on me.

Q: I thought you were a colonel when you were at VOA.

ZORTHIAN: No, I was a lieutenant colonel then. This was chicken colonel. And he pinned it on, and the word was around. And, as I say, I understood the military, and with that knowledge that I'd been in service, there was a little more acceptance of it; I don't want to overstate it. Margaret lived on a military post -- or right off it -- in Baguio, right near the John Hay base. I'd go in through Clark. But just understanding their structure, understanding their approach to things, helped. I even did two weeks -- it didn't stretch to two week because it was cut short, but nevertheless I took two weeks active duty training in Vietnam, up in Da Nang. Taylor let me go up there. It lasted about a week, a week and a half, before he called me back, but when Lou Walt commanded the Marines up there -- and particularly with the Marines, you know the old wheeze about "Once a Marine, always a Marine" -- they sort of accept you in the family. No, that was helpful. The military people I dealt with were essentially at the colonel level -- the head of information for MACV, the head of information for Vietnam Air, U.S. Air in Vietnam, for the Navy, for the Army. Eventually it became a one-star thing, Sy Sidle became head of information there. Incidentally, those last years, the military, simply because of its weight, kept getting further and further from direction of USIA and of me. By the time I left, that authority was never really restored. And as I understand, the subsequent people really just ran the civilian side of the press operation.

Q: Well, how much of this decision by the Agency to reduce its involvement in the whole picture in Vietnam was affected by the natural course of events on the ground in Vietnam, or how much of it was a philosophical or substantive position taken here in Washington without regard to what was going on?

ZORTHIAN: Remember, the Agency reached that reluctance -- and I don't mean it was an abrupt cut-off but it was a gradual thing -- in December of '66 while the war was still building up and while U.S. forces were growing there. So the situation in Vietnam in '66, comparatively, was in better shape than subsequently. So the Agency's reluctance didn't grow out of the progress there. It may have grown to some extent out of the growth of the military, the fact that it became more of a conventional war, and the weight of the military, but I think most of it, my reading of it -- and Leonard Marks or Dan Oleksiw may have a different reading -- my reading of it was that the Agency got tired of the burden of the budget and manpower demands JUSPAO was making on it, and the extent it had to constrict operations elsewhere. And also faced internally a certain amount of pressure, saying, This is not our business. The cultural purists, if you will.

Q: When Shakespeare was in charge, Kent Crane was area director for the Far East, it seems to me that the Agency involvement in Vietnam was intense.

ZORTHIAN: Well, that may be, but that's later. I'm talking about a memo from Leonard Marks to the White House, saying, I want out! I don't mean they wanted completely out, but they certainly wanted to reduce it. Don't ever let them deny that, because I have it in writing, the memo to the White House. Now, whether after I left there were some new directives -- remember, what the heck, Frank came in in the beginning of 1969. Whether he restored that I don't know, but the fact on the ground is, JUSPAO was dismantled by '72 and it went back to USIS. And I don't know that the Agency at that time, at the end, had even the franchise for policy guidance in Vietnam. You see, among the other things we did, we had a policy unit that issued guidance in psychological operations to all elements. At one time it was headed by a military man, quite a bit, but Bill Stearman, for instance, did the guidance for and direction of the North Vietnamese effort. My feeling was, as I say, that the core of the opposition came from -- well, there was this feeling, that the nature of the effort had changed, almost before JUSPAO was created. But the core of the effort came from the demands JUSPAO was placing on the Agency -- money, people, and the image of the Agency, as a propaganda outfit as against a cultural, information outfit. And in that there was a good deal of reluctance, including many career officers.

Q: Well, some of us in VOA objected to the fact that we started putting on this program designed to reach North Vietnam, in which we would read the names of prisoners from North Vietnam. This was not a program. This was certainly not in the VOA pattern as a news and information source. But this was enthusiastically supported by the Agency uptown.

ZORTHIAN: Well, it began -- you know, LBJ was a very demanding guy. He'd say, Goddammit, get out there and ... But again I'd say, sure, I can see legitimate questions about that. But here's a situation where you need a tactical radio operation. Who's going to provide it the next time around? There's no preparation for that. And so they'll turn to VOA again.

Q: We turned that portable transmitter at Hue over to, I thought, the military, or to you people for whatever broadcasts you were making into the north, but that had nothing to do with VOA except for the title to the transmitter.

ZORTHIAN: Well, that was after my time. But if the military took it over I question the military's capability at that time of training to handle that kind of assignment. There just was not any readiness.

Q: You think we didn't learn anything from that experience.

ZORTHIAN: Oh, I think we learned a lot, but I'm not sure the Agency has ever distilled it and made it part of doctrine or adopted it or even looked at it. You were in the agency. Now, did you hear of any lessons being learned by the Agency, institutionally? No.

Q: What are some of the memories you have of that experience in JUSPAO, on the personal side -- except for the family situation?

ZORTHIAN: Oh, enormous. Once the families left... You know, someone say, "What price did you pay in Vietnam?" Obviously, the big price -- and it was a very real one -- was separation from family, with two sons in important, formative years -- the months and time you lost with them. Professionally, the job obviously was a very demanding and exciting one, a very intense one. You served in Vietnam seven days a week, 12 hours a day, if that's what the thing called for. And a lot of people did that kind of time. So the intensity is something; you were always absorbed in the job. There were very few breaks unless you got away over to Manila or somewhere else on a trip. And you know, those relationships, in that kind of an atmosphere, become very, very intense, very, very solid. Many, many of those journalists I regard as friends, see many of them today in Washington. A lot of them have grown up to become managing editors or editors. My relations with them were very close. Professionally, some of the jobs I've had since then sort of threw me in touch with them. But that's also true about Agency people, some of whom are gone -- John McGowan is gone, Sandy Marlowe's gone, Harry Casler's gone. A number of others who served out there I see every so often. Now, there's also frustration at what happened, at our inadequacies in implementing policy, in carrying it out. Our shortcomings in that regard, the flaws we had, the flaws our allies had. I was a believer then. I haven't changed my mind about the propriety or need for our actions. I think we carried it out very badly. We could have done much better with much fewer.

Q: You're talking about the total effort, not just JUSPAO.

ZORTHIAN: The total effort. At the same time, I recognize the price paid. But remember, sitting in Saigon, you're not quite as conscious of that. I don't think I was fully conscious of the price being paid until April of 1968, after Tet -- when, by the way, I'd gone on record to Phil Habib, Bill Depew and George Carver, who came out as an inspection team, saying, "We've got to get the hell out of here. We go to the Vietnamese and say, 'Shape up or we're shipping out,' and if they don't do it, let's get out." That's not hindsight, because the failure of the Vietnamese was very visible then. But as I came out here, I left Saigon under curfew, darkened at night, car dark and so on, driving from the residence out to Tan Son Nhut airport, flew in one of those darkened planes, the things that McNamara set up, one of the KC tanker jobs that had been converted with bunks and so on. Flew dark, and we stopped in Honolulu so there was some daylight then, landed in Washington in the dark. And there was a curfew on here. It didn't look any different from Saigon. That was the Martin Luther King period. That obviously comes as quite a setback.

Then I went up to New England to visit Greg, who had just started in Andover. I took two or three days off, and stopped off in Boston and saw Ken Galbraith. He invited me to dinner that night, and there were a number of people there -- Dave Halberstam, among others. I guess I didn't realize till that dinner how deep the criticism and opposition in the U.S. was. You know, you read some about it in the clippings you'd get from the States, but the intensity of that opposition was just enormous. And the price that was being paid! Here was my son, fresh back, already demonstrating against it, as whatever he was, a freshman in high school. So the price we paid was enormous and therefore I began to feel that what we were trying to do in Vietnam probably wasn't worth the cost at home. But I'm also very disappointed that we didn't do it better in Vietnam. And I don't know that, again, our structure, our approach to these problems is any more sophisticated or skilled today than it was then. Maybe. I think we lost whatever accumulated backlog of knowledge and skills we had. And what have we done with it? Twenty years now, we have very few people in this government who know counter-insurgency, are ready to deal with it, or have any real thoughts about it. Sure, there's some skill left. Now, you can't stay prepared for that forever, but you can spend some time dusting off the lessons, keeping them up to date, keeping them alive. And we haven't.

Of course, one of the sharp memories is the people looking over your shoulder. I see Hubert Humphrey in that picture on my wall and remember his visit. Well, brushing against people like that, seeing them for a day or two under intense conditions, is a very good experience -- at least, impressive, in what you see. People don't realize how much of this country came through Vietnam. We had 7,000 official visitors one year. A lot of them were military, but nevertheless many, many civilians came in.

Q: How did you get your regular work done?

ZORTHIAN: You did it only because you worked 12 to 18 hours a day. There was no other way. It was good that the families were out of the way, because we couldn't have done any work. Put aside the personal danger; you couldn't have spent any time with the family. There were some first-rate people involved there who devoted an awful lot to it, put an awful lot into it. The frustration of feeling -- you know, all this crap about "the press lost the war" -- bunk. We lost the war in Vietnam, not the press.

Now, you can make an argument that in a backhanded sort of way we won, that the 55,000 lives did not all go in vain. Because we bought ten years, if you will, for South Asia. And those ten years were important ones in getting the surrounding governments to get their roots in and then to establish themselves. In South Asia, in many ways -- with the exception of Vietnam, where you had all the boat people coming out, and Cambodia, Indochina -- but Malaysia, Thailand, Indonesia, and so on -- not the Philippines recently -- in many ways is one of the more peaceful areas of the world. We've had fewer problems there, with the exception of the Philippines. So there are arguments to be made, but overall, I guess, there's some -- pride may be the wrong word, but some satisfaction in having done a job, feeling you contributed, playing a role in what was a critical event in our lifetime, our generation, being very much part of it. And at the same time, a sort of frustration and very real disappointment -- in not having it be successful. So you get ambivalent about it.

Q: You have expressed regret over the fact that there is not an organized memory, as it were, of that experience, to learn from it. Would you recommend to the U.S. Information Agency, or to the U.S. government as a whole, today, that some kind of institutionalized look at that period be undertaken?

ZORTHIAN: I'd certainly recommend that the U.S. government do some contingency planning for low-intensity conflicts. The military is doing something, but I'm talking about overall, including civilian agencies. And in the field of communications, if the decision is that USIA is the prospective principal agency in that field, then that USIA undertake such a study, yes. Some agency of government should do it. I just get the feeling, as I say, that most often the civilian agencies have just sort of brushed it under the rug, and if it happened tomorrow would be caught again short in capability, resources and knowledge. They'd reinvent the wheel.

Q: Is there anything we haven't covered that you want to get on the record?

ZORTHIAN: I don't know, Cliff. Off the top of my head, no. You know, you can keep talking about all kinds of things. There are some great people in our agency of that period. That kind of situation, what became a conventional war, brings out principal qualities in some people. Some of them were cowboys, there's no doubt. A lot of them weren't particularly happy to be there but did one hell of a job, just determined to do it. Many of them went back to more conventional assignments, and I'm not sure came out that well. It's hard to follow that act, professionally.

Some have done it, I guess, but many of them have put in their time and retired since without, I think, ever reaching that degree of intensity in their professional lives.

Q: Is that why you decided to go ahead and retire?

ZORTHIAN: To some extent, yeah. What do you do, afterwards?

Q: You said you didn't want to be a PAO for 20 years.

ZORTHIAN: You go to Japan, a perfectly important post and so on. But you sit there for three years as PAO in a fairly conventional operation, and you say, "Geez, what the hell am I doing here?" So you end up leaving, and try to find a new career that's satisfying. Well, there are all kinds of reasons. One was that I had two kids to educate. You didn't educate kids in college -- even in those days, let alone today at $20,000 a year -- at private schools on a government salary. Not easily, at least. So all kinds of things entered into it.

I was going to tell you about the ambassadorship. LBJ told Rusk to make me an ambassador, with Leonard Marks there. Rusk was not one of my greater fans. I'm not sure I had too many fans in this press relations job. He was reported to have said at a staff meeting at the State Department about that time when my name came up, "That's one of those sons of bitches who thinks the public has a right to know." That sort of puts the wrong twist on my efforts. The military didn't particularly like the way I was open with the press; I'm not sure they didn't think I was just creating headaches for them out there. AID and CIA may not have been in the loop. So there were very few guys back here cheering me on. Nevertheless, LBJ wanted me, the ambassadors for whom I worked were supporters. My relations with them always were good. Anyway, LBJ told Rusk to give me an embassy.

Finally one day Leonard Marks called and said, "I've got an embassy for you, Barry." This was over the overseas phone, which we weren't quite used to, so you'd shout to make sure you were heard. I said, "Where, Leonard?" and he said, "Niger," and I said, "Oh, Jesus." I said, "You mean Nigeria, don't you?" Which was not all that attractive either. He said, "No, no, Niger." I said, "Wait a minute, Leonard." And I raced upstairs and pulled out an atlas and looked, and there was a big place that said "Niger" but I noticed it also said "desert" in most of it. And then I noticed that little strip of green. I said, "Leonard, I've got to check with Margaret. I'll call you back," I check it out. It has a little sliver of green along the river, the Niger River, three million people, virtually all starving. But it was Rusk's ultimate revenge, because it was one of the few countries in the world without a single daily newspaper. I told Margaret, "You don't want to go to Niger, do you?" and she said, "Not after India and Saigon." So I called Leonard and said, "Margaret won't do it" -- I must admit, I cowardly put it on her and said, "Margaret won't take it." But that was Rusk's thing. And with the State Department attitude in those days, reflecting what they thought about that post, the guy who got the job finally was an R-3 from AID who was black. This, in State Department eyes, is really the bottom of the ladder. If I'd had a reasonable post I might have stayed in. That was a disappointment, and it was obvious I wasn't going anywhere in State. So we gave up on that one, and did decide pretty much to get out.

I have no regrets. You know, you pay a price, jumping around, but no real regrets. I had not intense, close relations with LBJ but came close to him, saw him closely in action many times, a few times directly, and some of the exchanges with him certainly stay in my mind. One of them Bob Donovan reports in the book he did on Truman and Johnson. And there are various memories that come back. I've stayed in reasonably close touch with a guy like Westmoreland, Bunker I've stayed in touch with. I was very lucky in the Foreign Service, with five literally great ambassadors, each in his own way. I served with John Kenneth Galbraith, with Chester Bowles, with Henry Cabot Lodge, with Ellsworth Bunker, and with Max Taylor. That's quite a roster. None of them career; even Bunker wasn't. Then as career people we had Alex Johnson and Sam Berger, who were top-flight, and Bill Porter, who died not long ago. So it was a very impressive group of people to serve with, and I think in many ways the best the country has to offer. So there is satisfaction in that kind of experience. I've often thought about writing a book, and never got around to it. When I first came back I had a couple of five-figure offers, a $20,000 advance, and so on. Frank Stanton at CBS was working on that. But the book they wanted was not the one I wanted to write. They wanted a kiss-and-tell book, "How I Lied to the Press in Vietnam" type of book, and there was no sense in doing that. If I'd gone to Tufts I'd probably have done the book. Instead I went to "Time" and just got involved there very quickly.

JOHN J. MCCLOY
Ambassador
Vietnam (1964-1968)

John McCloy was appointed in 1964 as Ambassador to Vietnam. He was interviewed by Paige Mulhollan for the LBJ Library in 1969.

McCLOY: Then I can recall being called down to Washington by Mr. Johnson on various occasions when he sought outside advice. I remember very vividly one time when he tried to induce me to go to Vietnam. That was when Senator Lodge first resigned from his position there. He wanted me to take Senator Lodge's place.

Q: As ambassador to Vietnam.

McCLOY: Yes, to take his job in Vietnam. That was early on. That was quite a long way back.

Q: That was the summer of '64, yes.

McCLOY: I objected to such an appointment. I said I didn't know anything about that part of the world; that I didn't think that it was my dish of tea; that at my age at that time, I felt that it would take two or three years out from my practice after I had spent so many years in government and I wished to return to the practice of the law, I didn't want to break into my practice again. I sought some continuity and I felt I had responsibilities to my firm. So I resisted his importunities in that regard. But I must say that I had a very strong impression of the man's force when he pressed me to take the job.

Q: He tried to exercise the treatment at this time.

McCLOY: Talk about twisting your arm! He probably has forgotten about this, but I will never forget it. It was not in the big Oval Room, but in that little room at the side there. And he was quite insistent - he's a pretty tall man, and he leaned over me, and he said: "We're organizing for victory there, McCloy, and I want you to go out there and help in the organization." He rang all the changes. He went from appealing to my patriotism and shaming me with my lack of it, or lack of willingness to take on a tough job. And I'll never forget, he told me -- to give you an idea of how heavy the pressure was -- he said to me: "I want you to go out there, McCloy, because you're the finest or the greatest or something, I forget what the adjective was but the indication was that I was a pretty successful proconsul, having in mind my German experience. And he said -- these may not have been his exact words but they were close to it -- but "You're the greatest proconsul the Republic has had." I saw myself with a Roman toga with a laurel wreath around my head. I must say, he almost got me at that point. I thought to myself, "I can understand how Mr. Johnson gets people to do things for him, because from tremendous pressure and tremendous flattery, I felt that he had rung all the changes and I came out of there rather limp and feeling a little bit ashamed of myself because I hadn't agreed to do it. But it just seemed to be so contrary to my scheme of life at that time, having spent so much of my active adult life in service in the government through the wars, the World Bank and Germany and so forth. But I got a very definite impression of the President's will, and his strength.

Q: Did he continue to ask outsiders such as yourself in for various crisis periods?

McCLOY: Yes. Bob Lovett and I were down there off and on for quite awhile. He talked to me a couple of times in regard to Vietnam. President Kennedy had also asked me for some advice in regard to Vietnam early on. There's no use going into that at this stage. Having seen the commitment which Mr. Kennedy had made of American troops and the American flag into the Vietnam war, which when I was consulted about it, I was very reluctant to approve an American intervention there. But, having made the commitment, then I felt that we ought to do what we could to win the war.

I remember one occasion when there was a question of whether we should bomb lines of communication to break up the infiltration and the movement of the troops from the North into South Vietnam. I spoke in favor of such action. I remember very vividly that Clark Clifford was called upon by the President to carry the brief in favor of bombing in that connection. There have been some other reports and alleged comments that I made at a later meeting on Vietnam when some major decisions were up, but those reports are wrong. I didn't attend that later meeting.

HAROLD KAPLAN
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Saigon (1964-1967)

Public Relations Officer, Vietnamese Affairs, The White House
Washington, DC (1967)

Press Officer, Negotiations with North Vietnamese Paris, France (1968-1969)

Harold Kaplan was born in 1918 in New Jersey. He worked in various government agencies including the OWI, UNESCO, the Marshall Plan and joining USIA in 1952. He served in Germany, France, and Washington, DC. He was in Vietnam and in Washington worked on Vietnamese affairs. He was interviewed by Lewis Schmidt in 1990.

KAPLAN: That's right. I had an extremely interesting time there and I wasn't at all enthralled, because the Kennedy Round was really getting into its stride -- this was 1964, when I had a call from Washington. "Sorry, old fellow, but we need you in Vietnam."

I said, "I don't even know where Vietnam is. All my training has really led up to this job. The ambassador loves me. Both ambassadors love me." There was an ambassador in charge of the Kennedy Round, too.

Q: In Berne, too.

KAPLAN: There was one in Berne, but I didn't work with him. My two ambassadors loved me. George Ball was here and loved me. I said, "I'm really feeling useful for once in my life. Why in the hell are you sending me off to this Southeast Asian place that I know nothing about?" Of course, I read the newspapers. I knew that things had heated up there considerably and the Diem assassination thing had happened, and it was getting to be a big headache. But at the end of 1964, we didn't quite foresee what happened later; at least I didn't.

Q: I don't think anybody really did. When Lyndon Johnson went in, I think he felt that this was going to be a six-month proposition and we would take care of it and get out of it.

KAPLAN: Exactly. I thought I was once again being cheated out of my Vienna, except I was in my Vienna already, Geneva, doing something very interesting, fascinated by something new to me, which was the old GATT and trade issue, and working with a guy who was fascinating. I thought it was very interesting.

In addition, I had other problems which gave me a sprinkling of the whole U.N. system, and I was quite happy there, but you're in the Army now, you know. I was a professional by then. They said, "Go," and I went. I went to Vietnam, and I don't regret that either, although I have to regret it as an American, regret the whole experience. It was an awful, awful business for us all.

Q: Were you ever in charge of the so-called Five O'clock Follies?

KAPLAN: Yes. I set them up and created them. Of course, the meat and substance of the briefing was military, so I just presided over it. It was in order to assert the primacy that we tried desperately to keep going at the beginning. It was under my auspices and I set it up. The fact is, however, that the military took over Vietnam very shortly. All through 1965, a great deal of traffic went through Saigon and Washington on this issue. I was Cabot Lodge's counselor of embassy. I wanted to be in the embassy. I wanted to be part of that. I felt this was in our national interest. I wanted everybody to understand that Vietnam was a country and we were accredited to it. But the more they piled troops in there, the more Lyndon Johnson sent these people, the more this became impossible. Although I won on paper, I had a big fight about this with Barry Zorthian, and he finally said, "All right. You win."

Q: Let me get this straight. When you first went there, was Barry there already?

KAPLAN: Yes.

Q: Had they set up JUSPAO at that time?

KAPLAN: No, they were in the process of setting it up. I was drafted into JUSPAO, and all the while kicking and screaming. With the support of Cabot Lodge, I said, "I am Cabot Lodge's counselor. I think we ought to have our setup." After Maxwell Taylor left, and with the consent of Cabot Lodge, who went both ways on this, there was created a thing called the Mission Council. The Mission Council set up a joint U.S. Public Affairs Office under Barry, and although I was recognized by Washington as independent and Cabot's man, in fact, Barry controlled my budget, my office, my secretary, everything. I was working for Barry. I ended by just saying I had to accept it.

Q: That's a point I wanted to establish, because this has come up on several other occasions in which it was indicated that the press activity, in effect, the spokesman for the non-military side of the picture was supposedly completely outside of JUSPAO and was independent of them. I think later even their budget became independent.

KAPLAN: I established the principle of that. I got them, on paper, to send a telegram saying this is the way it was. I put it under Barry's nose. He's a very tough guy to deal with! [Laughter] With a little smile, he said, "Okay, Kappy. You win." But, of course, he knew very well that I didn't win. [Laughter]

So we had the principle, but it didn't work. People totally forgot the embassy existed after a while. The war took the whole thing over, and you couldn't do anything about it; it was just too big. When the Big Red One came over, the Air Mobile Division, the whole thing, pretty soon the country was sagging under the weight of our armor and our men. This little embassy, with its few remaining political people, people just brushed it aside; it didn't mean a thing. This was one of the many great political mistakes we made, because it enhanced the sense we gave to the entire world that South Vietnam did not exist except as sort of a sort of --

Q: A military fief.

KAPLAN: That's right. I have written on this subject, and I won't go any further on this. I wrote "Farewell to Vietnam," our way of negotiating our way out of that. I'll give you a copy if you want to put it in the archives. That was published in Commentary. Before that, I had written a number of little pieces on the whole press setup there when I was out of government by then. I swore, when I left the government, that I would not dump on it and write about how wrong we were about everything, and I didn't. I did write one piece for a French magazine after I retired from the delegation on the theme that the South Vietnamese, unencumbered by us, rid of us at least after the agreement was signed in 1973, would give a better account than the whole world expected and might even be able to survive. I published this in a magazine in France called Preuve. I believe that, and still believe it.

Q: I believe that it could have happened if Nixon hadn't been so besieged.

KAPLAN: That's right.

Q: And with Congress going the other way, cut off virtually all aid to them.

KAPLAN: Absolutely.

Q: That killed the morale.

KAPLAN: They proved it could be done in the offensive of 1972, after we were gone.

Q: They withstood the first attempt.

KAPLAN: The Easter Offensive was a tremendous success. Half of the North Vietnamese attacking force was destroyed. They took a terrific beating in that. The South Vietnamese lost a great deal, too. Don't forget there was not a single American ground soldier involved in that. It was a terrific thing. But what we did give them was the air support to compensate for the fact that the first time the North Vietnamese were bringing tanks and things like that down. That was an extremely interesting operation.

After that, the U.S. and Vietnam concluded the thing they'd been negotiating about, and by that time all our troops were out. The North Vietnamese simply waited until the Watergate situation got deeper and deeper, and it became clear that we would not lift one finger, not even for the air. Then they did the whole thing. I have described that very graphically in a piece called "Farewell to Vietnam," which I must give you, in Commentary magazine, which started out as a review of a book called The Palace Revolution by a Vietnamese, a very interesting book. It was a tragic business. The South Vietnamese would have had a much harder time without any American troops than the South Koreans had, because we'd get those divisions. But they would have, I believe, a fighting chance of surviving if we had kept the Air Force, which was, after all, there.

Q: Also the materiel and economic support.

KAPLAN: That's right. When the collapse came, nobody would lift a finger. One of the most poignant and awful things in the Commentary article about this book, The Palace Revolution, is the story of these people coming back to Washington, where everything is falling apart, and buttonholing people in Congress, pleading with them just to allow a plane to take off from Thailand and hit these people, just to send in another shipment of ammunition. It was tragic, tragic.

Q: Somebody else whom I've interviewed had talked to somebody over there and subsequently also talked to some of the North Vietnamese, who said, "If you had come back in and laid down another carpet of bombing on North Vietnam at that time, the whole thing probably would have collapsed." These were North Vietnamese saying this!

KAPLAN: Lew, you had a situation like the Egyptian Army suffered in the Sinai. You know how very few highways the North Vietnamese had going from north to south. They had the Ho Chi Minh Trail, but you couldn't take tanks over that. So you had twenty-four divisions strung out from North Vietnam to Saigon on an open highway. It was exactly the situation that the Israeli Air Force had against the Egyptian Army. The Israelis just filled the desert with the carcasses of those tanks and trucks. It was a tragic thing. That was the one time the North Vietnamese were not able to move. There were a few planes in the sky. At the beginning, there were a few South Vietnamese planes, too. But they never had a bombing force or a fighter force.

This just left me wrung out and dead. I was, of course, long gone and out of there. I had served in the negotiating group in Paris. I was out of government by then. But I watched all this with a sinking heart and thought of all the people I knew. It was just the most painful thing I've ever lived through.

Q: It was apparently very painful for [Secretary of State Henry] Kissinger, too, because in another interview the officer being interviewed said he was in a meeting at the State Department at the time that Vietnam was coming apart, and the U.S. was refusing to send any further help. Kissinger just stopped and said, "I wonder sometimes just what kind of a country we are." Then left the room.

KAPLAN: When you think of the promises we made to those people, the speeches we made, the endless things, you couldn't have this attitude in Congress just because they so hated Nixon, or whatever, this cowardly, miserable -- these people refused even to talk to the people who were pleading with them. They said, "Go away." It's something that just kills you. You say, "What kind of a country are we?" The political thing meant to these people that promises made, even in our name, solemnly, by people who were elected by the American people -- solemnly -- didn't count for them, because they were just another country. No country can operate that way. It was just disgraceful. The Vietnam experience led straight back to Europe. My wife was in Hong Kong while I was in Saigon. I went back to Europe on a lecture tour that the Agency had asked me to do.

Q: When they were trying to get some of the PAOs and other people in Europe educated to what was really going on in Vietnam, sending people like you around to say, "This is the way it really is."

But before I left, Walt Rostow asked me to come to the White House for a while -- two weeks, he said -- because the President was getting so neurotic about the atmosphere in the country about Vietnam. He wanted to set up a special office to handle his Vietnam public relations problem there. I said, "But it's being handled in a dozen different places. The President, himself, with all the television sets in his office, and everything else, he's his own PAO on Vietnam. What in the world can we do?"

"No, no." The President has decided, according to Walt, that somebody had to do this.

I went over to the White House and they gave me a little office. I created a little facility. I can't remember it very clearly. It was under Walt Rostow's general purview, attached to the National Security Council, and supposed to disengage from the mass of stuff that we got out of Vietnam things that needed to be disseminated by the President's press operation, everybody else in government, etc. I tried to think what we could usefully do in that respect and set up some things.

A few weeks went by, and I wrote a couple of speeches. When you're in that job, you have to do whatever they ask you to do. I began going to see Rostow and saying, "When can I go to Europe? Harlan Cleveland is expecting me there as his counselor. And my wife is there and my youngest child." The other two were at school. "I think I've set up this office. I think I know what you mean. It's working. We've got young Sven What's-his-name here, who will carry on." Rostow had a lot of people. Again, he himself was constantly talking to the press about these various things.

I got a call from Washington. I think it was from Phil Habib. It might have been Bill Jordan, saying, "Harriman's going to organize a delegation in Paris, and we've decided you're on it."

I said, "Phil, the ambassador will tear me limb from limb. He waited and took very good care of my wife, and he's a very sweet person. We're finally functioning here. You can't do this to me." That sort of thing.

Phil Habib says, "Kappy, don't argue with me. Governor Harriman has more clout than Harlan Cleveland, and that's that."

Sure enough, they put me on that damn delegation. I went down to Paris to prepare for the arrival of the governor, who arrived on May 12 or 13, as I recall. I was there a few days before. I went to the offices, saw Sargent Shriver. I was supposed to be the press officer in the delegation, but I was helping out with some of the administrative stuff. The governor arrived, and we were off and running. We were doing the Vietnam thing. Bill Jordan was the main press man at first, but he was very senior, and the President was going to send him off after a while.

The President put that delegation together in a very odd way, because he only half-trusted Harriman, as I began to understand, in the sense that Harriman was anxious to get rid of the Vietnam thing in almost any way, and he was ready to be much more forthcoming to the North Vietnamese than the President was about to be at the beginning. So he sort of surrounded Harriman with other people, of whom Bill Jordan was one of the toughest. Bill had worked very closely with Walt in the National Security Council. Of course, we had Cy Vance, too, who was a good soldier and also very devilish, but, nevertheless, without the independent crowd that the President feared Harriman would use from time to time and pushing him a little further than he wanted. I won't go into all the politics of that delegation. All I know is that it was fascinating.

At first it was an interesting job, but my heart was broken and my wife was still in Brussels, and I had been separated from my wife for a long time. During the Vietnam period, she was in Hong Kong, but I think I made it up there about three times in the whole time I was there, for a day at a time. We worked night and day in Saigon. And now we were separated again, and she was there in Brussels. The ambassador was mad, she was mad, everybody was mad. It was a very miserable situation.

But at least the Vietnam talks were fascinating. Every newsman in the world came to them, as if we were really going to settle that Vietnam situation. Of course, they didn't understand the terms of reference that we were really just setting up what was to be the negotiation later, so they all came. I think we accredited 1,800 newsmen from the United States alone in the first weeks. It was just an incredible number. Of course, Bill Jordan and I were taking care of these people. It was really something. Then we had the rest of the world there, and it was a circus.

When it became clear that the governor wouldn't let me go and it wasn't going to settle down, Harlan Cleveland said, "I need a counselor and I'm going to get somebody else." My wife came down and joined me. So I spent all of 1968, through the election, and then into 1969, when Kissinger took over, and we were still holding the meetings with the North Vietnamese, including some secret meetings. It was a fascinating thing in many ways. The real negotiation became, finally, the business of Henry [Kissinger], and, if you read that piece of mine, you will get some account of what he did and how he started all that. He was a brilliant negotiator, as always, but this was one that he did all wrong, for reasons that were not entirely his fault. The result was, as all the world knows, a total collapse of the whole thing.

Q: How long were you there?

KAPLAN: I stayed there until the autumn of 1969, kicking and screaming more and more as time went on, because we were literally being used as a decoy. We would go to the Hotel Majestic, which the French called the Centre des Conférences Internationales, the old Hotel Majestic, which, curiously enough, in my experience, went all the way back to that first conference of UNESCO in 1946, which was held there. That's where the UNESCO headquarters were before they built their offices. So I knew that place very well.

Now I was attending these meetings there, but as a pure decoy. We'd go out, a newsman would come around, I'd make some sort of statement. I was on French television all the time. That was my one moment of celebrity, because television has that effect on things. So everywhere I'd go in the streets, people would recognize me. They'd say, "Ah! You're the American spokesman!" But it was very humiliating, in a way, because we weren't able to say anything and nothing was happening. It was a purely phony thing while Henry was doing the real negotiating in secret.

So I began going back to our benighted colleagues at 1776 and said, "I love Paris. It's my old hometown. My children were brought up here. I'm having a great vacation, but there's such a thing as vacations that last too long. I think you ought to give me a real job."

They kept saying, "Wait, wait, wait."

I finally said, "All right, I'm going to take my retirement." So that's the story of my USIA career.

Q: You retired in 1969?

KAPLAN: I retired on November 1, 1969.

H. FREEMAN MATTHEWS, JR.
Political Officer
Saigon (1964-1966)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1966-1970)

H. Freeman Matthews, Jr. was born in Bogota, Colombia in 1927. His father, a Foreign Service officer, was stationed there. Growing up, his family also lived in Cuba, France, and Spain. He enrolled at Princeton, but his graduation date was pushed back because of his service in the Korean War. After graduation, he and his wife went to work for the State Department in 1952. He served abroad in Italy, Switzerland, Spain, Vietnam, Mexico, and Egypt. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 20, 1993.

MATTHEWS: From a job standpoint, I was pretty low on the totem pole. In that sense, I think -- We'd been there just about a year when I got a telegram saying: off to Saigon.

Q: This was not 'we'd like a volunteer' or something?

MATTHEWS: No, there was no volunteering. Well it turned out that 2 old friends, Bob Miller and Mel Manfield. Anyway, they were in Saigon and they were trying to collect old friends to go. I was very disappointed with what was happening, even though the family could go on, this was September 1964. It'd been less than a year that Diem was assassinated.

So despite the fact that the family could have gone, they stayed on in Korea. So that's what happened, they stayed 2 years, while I was in Saigon, they stayed in Korea. Which I think turned out to be a wise decision. They had good house, good school, servants. What happened to her of course, it became a very different situation. At the beginning she would write me about some problems with the kids, and even though I'd answer right away, by the time it got back, the problem had disappeared. So it forced a new independence on her, it was difficult at the time but she stepped right in and did a wonderful job with the kids.

Anyway, I was in Saigon for 2 years and when I got home for one Christmas, and Summer of '65 I got back for home leave and a direct transfer. So I did see the family a couple of times. My wife, because she still had orders to go out to Saigon, she came out to see what it looked like, right after Christmas 1964.

George Bundy had come out for President Johnson for a look-see during this period. While he was there, the NVA attacked a couple of our bases. Anyway, he went to the hospital and saw some of the wounded soldiers. He was dramatically impressed by what he'd seen. Meantime, Maxwell Taylor, who had been the Ambassador, and General Smolik had been pleading with LBJ to authorize the bombing of North Vietnam, because there had been increasing evidence of North Vietnamese infiltrating South Vietnam. The only way to try to turn this around was to show the North Vietnamese that they couldn't do this. Therefore we ought to start bombing North Vietnam. LBJ said no, he was not prepared to do that so long as there were wives and children in Saigon. There might be possibly be retaliation against them. If we're going into a war zone, we shouldn't have wives and children.

When George Bundy came and he saw this, he sent a cable endorsing Taylor's and Westmoreland's recommendation in the campaign against North Vietnam. He specifically tied it to retaliation attacks on the American camps in Vietnam. LBJ approved it but at the same time ordered the evacuation of all wives and children. Which made sense. It would be disturbing to see a school bus full of American school children driving around the streets of Saigon, easy targets. But they never worried, they were never attacked. Anyway, all the families got evacuated including my wife, who had come out on orders and then was evacuated. So, anyway, that what's happened. She was evacuated to Hong Kong and I went with her.

Q: What were you doing in Saigon?

MATTHEWS: When I got to Saigon in September '64, I was in the political section. My role changed there. Anyway, Maxwell Taylor was the Ambassador and Sam Berger was the Deputy, Melvin Manfull was the Political Counselor and Bob Miller was the Chief of the Political Section.

My job was kind of twofold, one was to be the reports officer in the political section and the other was to be the political-military guy in liaison with MAC-V. What I did in the beginning was, Taylor sent a weekly telegram back to Johnson summarizing the situation. My job was to coordinate that and also a variety of different political reporting. I helped to supervise that .

There was a great deal of political turmoil in this period and eventually we ended up with Thieu and Ky. There was a standing struggle between the two. In the Summer of 1965 I was picked up the family in Spain and returned to Saigon.

Q: MAC-V was the military headquarters in Vietnam.

MATTHEWS: Military headquarters, General Westmoreland's headquarters.

When I first got to Saigon, the Westmoreland meetings that I would go to, would be held in a room somewhat bigger than this but not a great deal bigger.

Q: This is a very small room we are talking about, 8x10 or something like that.

MATTHEWS: It's a small room. There were about six or eight people sitting around the table with Westmoreland. I think he had maybe two other generals and the embassy representative was very high in the hierarchy there. The whole effort was what we could do to try and support the Vietnamese military units. Everybody there had the job of trying to do what we could to push the Vietnamese along, make sure they got proper equipment they needed, ammunition and intelligence and everything else that went with it. That was a whole effort.

In the spring of '65, after we began the bombing of North Vietnam in that program called "Rolling Thunder." Not too long after that we ended up with landing some marines up around Da Nang and Chulai, and then the 173rd airborne came in, and then the 1st Calvary Division.

The whole nature of the war changed so that before long the MAC-V meetings were held in much bigger quarters. The embassy rep was pushed farther down the end of the table, there were lots and lots of generals around. The people who were in charge of advising the Vietnamese had trouble getting any word in edgewise. All the effort was on bringing the Americans in, getting American troops deployed, building Cam Ranh Bay, the great base that went in there. The whole nature of the war changed completely from trying to help the Vietnamese to our taking it over, trying to do it ourselves. Then of course the pendulum later swung back there.

But this was a fascinating period. I had sort of general supervision of the provincial reporters in the embassy who were six or eight young Foreign Service officers who spoke Vietnamese. Who would fan out around the provinces to try to find out what really was going on. To try and learn things because there was a general, I guess a natural, distrust of the reporting that came in especially from the military but also from the CIA. So we were trying to get our own independent fix on what was going on.

Q: What was the problems with first the military, and then second the CIA, from your perspective of that time.

MATTHEWS: Well I think that the problem with the military, I don't know whether you could pin it all on McNamara, but a major problem they had was in trying to measure something that was not measurable. They came up with all these crazy statistics that became great sources of contention with the press. They had body counts, and they had the numbers of structures destroyed, and acres of land defoliated, and endless numbers of different Q: Villages were classified in different terms.

MATTHEWS: Then when the famous Robert Komer became the head of pacification in Washington, then we developed the Hamlet Evaluation Survey, the HESS. The whole complicated list of questions you applied, as to whether the hamlet was this or that or the other thing. Then they put little dots on the maps as to which area was which.

We had a whole series of American officials all over the countryside, advisers to the province chief, advisers to the district chief, advisers to the sector chief and so forth. We had a consulate in Da Nang.

The problem with the military, I think, was that their reports were called progress reports so you could never show anything that was not progress. There was great pressure on military officers to show that things had improved, with the implication being that if things got worse, it was your fault, which was completely a wrong kind of judgement to make. These are dependent on what the enemies efforts were.

I think throughout the Vietnam war we tended to have a strange, I guess a very American feeling, that if something didn't go the way we wanted it to go, it was our fault. We never took into account that this depended on what efforts the enemy made. We could never get through our heads also that if we did something to the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese, they would come back and hit us just as hard as they had before.

Furthermore we had the idea that if we just kept ratcheting up the pressure on them, Westmoreland's famous phrase -- I can't remember what it was -- anyway, it meant, drawing down or attriting, attrition of the Vietnamese, that's right, attriting the Vietnamese, this would gradually bring them to the point where they were just destroyed and couldn't continue. This was especially true over bombing of North Vietnam, the idea of "Rolling Thunder." It'd roll up there, and the thunder got worse and worse and worse, and eventually they would just have to give up and quit. This was a total misreading, it turned out, of the Vietnamese temperament. They were prepared to go on forever, they'd beaten the French this was and they were going to beat us.

The result of all this was, I think in the embassy there was considerable distrust of the military figures, as to what was going on, what was happening. This I think was certainly shown in Tet 1968. The great attack.

Q: Going back to the time that you were there, we're talking about '64 to '66, what about the CIA?

MATTHEWS: I don't think we had any particular problem with the CIA. I think we felt that a lot of them were kind of wild men. We weren't sure if they had any particularly better grasp on what was happening than others. But they were a good balance to what was being reported by the military. This was another reason why we in the embassy, the State Department, tried to bring our own assessments, to attain our own views of what, in fact, was happening on the countryside through the civilian advisers to many of the provinces and to many of the districts. We had a pretty good corps of young officers who were spread around who were doing these things.

Q: Did you have any feel for how the embassy reports were treated back in Washington as opposed to the military?

MATTHEWS: I think I got a better feel for that when I was later transferred in 1966 back to Washington to the Vietnam Working Group. I worked there for 4 years, then I had a better feel for what the relationship was there.

Q: How about your impression of Ambassador Taylor and Ambassador Lodge, how they operated and all that.

MATTHEWS: They were totally different people. Ambassador Taylor was a remarkable military figure. He would come back to Washington about every 3 months to personally brief President Johnson on what was going on. He was a very hard worker. When he came back to Washington, he always brought somebody from the embassy along, sort of his escort, to carry his papers and take care of chores that he might feel were needed in Washington.

I came with him in the Spring of 1965. While we were back here, the embassy was attacked. The famous attack where a taxi cab blew up right outside the embassy. A lot of people were hurt. One American and several local employees were killed. I think if he hadn't brought me on this trip back, I'd have probably been hanging out the window there, looking to see what this was. My window was one of the few that would open in the building. I'm sure I would have been looking to see what this noise was, probably would have had my head blown off.

Anyway, I did come back with him. I noticed on the airplane that he carried with him the Corriere de la Sera from Milan

Q: The Italian newspaper.

MATTHEWS: the Frankfurter Allemande, Le Monde and a Spanish language paper, I think it was from Argentina, a Buenos Aires paper. He read these 4 papers on the plane, among other things. When he came to a word he didn't know, he had a little dictionary and he'd look them up. He was that kind of man. A man of extraordinary discipline. He believed in making the best use that you could of your time but also to keeping your skills up, that military training. This was just simply another example, there he was working to enforce his language skill.

He was very straightforward, he was a straight arrow. A military leader. I think the embassy felt that this was a guy that could lead you on to what your objectives were. Whether the policies worked out while he was there, I guess that could be questioned. In fact, he supported the military pretty much in what they wanted to do.

Cabot Lodge was a totally different kind of character, very emotional, he could go up and down, very excitable. He was a politician. One of the extraordinary things to watch was how this Connecticut Brahmin, a very political figure in his nature, a very social figure, how he related to Phil Habib who was this Lebanese American from Brooklyn. Phil could just wrap Cabot Lodge around his little finger, it was just amazing how the two of them got along. Phil could talk back to Cabot Lodge, could persuade him on virtually anything that he wanted to do. It was just a remarkable combination there. And of course Bill Porter playing the role of the Deputy Ambassador. It was a very good combination.

Lodge was much more quixotic, you were never entirely sure what was going to set him off on some particular tangent, one time or another. He had a lot of memories, of course, of what had gone before when he was there the first time. Some of the memories were correct and some of them really weren't. He managed to try to butter up and assuage Thieu and Ky during this period.

What happened was Ky, who looked as though he was going to be the person who was really going to drive the Vietnamese government, really lead it, he miscalculated and permitted Thieu to be known as President and Ky was going to be Vice President. Ky thought that he was going to be able to run the whole thing, from behind the scenes, but it turned out that Thieu was a stronger character than he thought he was. Thieu had other support.

There was a lot of jealousy of Ky because he was flamboyant, and I think some of the Americans didn't quite trust him either. They were never too sure of what he was up to. Whereas Thieu, they felt he was more amenable to American control. Ky in effect got kind of faked out in the whole process. Thieu very much became the prominent figure in the Vietnamese.

Q: What about General William Westmoreland? He of course was a major figure in the Vietnam thing. In your meetings with him, what was sort of your estimate, that you were getting from others around you, of how he viewed things.

MATTHEWS: He was a straight forward soldier. I don't think that he had a great deal of subtlety in terms of understanding some of the other dimensions of the Vietnamese problems, the political or the social side of it. I think he paid some lip service to it, but I don't think he really appreciated how important it was to "try to win the hearts and minds." The military would often use that phrase, but I think it was more almost in derision, than a real belief that that was needed to be done.

In fact, that was one of the basic problems, that the government of Vietnam became less and less popular. Partly because it couldn't protect the people but also because a lot of corruption, a lot of inability to get things done. I think the vast majority of people simply wanted to be left alone, to continue their traditional way of life. Growing rice in the countryside, a very rich country. The Vietnamese people were caught between the NVA and the Viet Cong on one side and the Vietnamese authorities on the other.

I think that Westmoreland, as well as most of the military, had tremendous faith in the ability of the American soldier, the American troops, the American equipment to accomplish things that these Vietnamese, despite all the training they got from us, they didn't have the same courage or the same willingness to carry through and fight on. One major difference between the Vietnamese and the American soldier, was that the American soldier was there on a specific limited tour, sometimes 6 months maybe sometimes a year.

The Americans knew they were going to be there for that period of time and then they're out. That's it buddy, somebody else is going to come in and finish this job. The Vietnamese, they were there for good. So they're maybe a little less interested in taking chances and making commitments that were irrevocable in terms of the people on the other side. Of course there were a lot of families that were on different sides of the issue among the Vietnamese.

It was a very complicated mission. Despite all the tremendous effort that we put into it, the numbers of troops, well over half a million, the numbers of bases that we established, and the bombing that we conducted against North Vietnam, these things in the end just wasn't enough. I don't think you can entirely blame the South Vietnamese for this, part of this, we continually underestimated the resiliency and the strength of the North Vietnamese and their willingness to take incredible punishment.

Q: You left there in 1966. What was your impression, how did you think things were going when you left that time -- whither Vietnam?

MATTHEWS: I think in '66 we thought that probably we were making progress, the government seemed relatively stable by that time, American troops were coming in in very large numbers, I think we felt that we were beginning to make some progress in the countryside and against the Viet Cong in all the different areas.

In the military side, the political side and the economic side, I think all these things were looking good in '66 when I came back. I think they continued to look good, even Tet '68 when there was this great surprise with the attack of the Viet Cong. You probably heard the opinion, and I think it's true, that the losses that the Viet Cong suffered in that '68 attack, when all of their infrastructure rose up and came out and were mowed down, that they suffered incredible losses.

In fact it was a strictly military victory in 1968. But politically, because of what we had said publicly about what was happening and some of the pictures that the media was able to bring forth, even the American embassy was being attacked. Westmoreland having been back in Christmas '67, I think it was, that speech to the Joint Session of Congress -- the light at the end of the tunnel, it's about over and so forth and so on -- all these optimistic statements blew up in his face.

Even though on the ground, Tet '68 was a definite plus for the South Vietnamese side, it ended up as a great debacle. It was the turning point in the war because the American public, the left-wing here, the students and so forth, the media, they just completely blew up.

Q: After you left Saigon in '66, what did you do?

MATTHEWS: Well I first flew from Saigon to Madrid where my family had been staying during the two years I'd been in Saigon. I picked them up and we came back by ship, either the Constitution or the Independence, the last trip on a boat, came back to the States.

I then went to work in the Vietnam working group. I was there for another four years.

Q: '66 to '70.

MATTHEWS: 1966 to 1970.

Q: What was the Vietnam working group?

MATTHEWS: Basically it was the Vietnam desk at the State Department. It was a very large desk, I think we had as many as 10 officers on the desk at the time. The idea was that we were suppose to be, in a sense, coordinating a lot of US government policy and activity in Vietnam. Of course that was something that could not be done, given the range of activities that were going on.

Q: When you arrived there, who was running it?

MATTHEWS: Robert Miller was the Director. He stayed there, I guess it was another 2 years, then he went on to London to the Imperial Defense College. He was replaced by, I think it was John Burke. Then when Burke left, Chuck Flowerree replaced him. When Flowerree left, I replaced Flowerree. I think that was only for about 6 months at the end. Our bosses were Len Unger and then Bill Sullivan. We also were involved not only with what was going on in Vietnam, but along during that period the Paris peace talks began, we were also kind of attempting to backstop the operations there.

Q: When you talk about Vietnam, were Laos and Cambodia really included? Was it really Indochina? How did they fit into it?

MATTHEWS: We were pretty exclusively concentrated on Vietnam. There were separate desks that dealt with Laos and Cambodia. But of course it was an obvious relationship between the two. Our boss, first Len Unger and then Bill Sullivan, also Phil Habib was involved. I'm a little unclear as to when who was involved in what. But when Phil came back from Vietnam, he'd already been a Deputy Ambassador to Maxwell Taylor. Then he became very much involved in the Vietnam working group.

Our bosses were clearly involved in the bigger picture of Laos and Cambodia but we were attempting to deal specifically with Vietnam.

Q: Strictly Vietnam you mean?

MATTHEWS: It was primarily trying to keep an eye on State Department reporting from Vietnam; relationships with the White House; to some extent involvement with the Pentagon, with AID, CIA, there were frequent interagency meetings that would deal with one subject or another. Our emphases was primarily on the Vietnam side of it.

Q: How did you treat the reports that were coming in? I mean it was the time when we certainly were looking for the good. I mean having been in the field, say -- we know the pressures here. How were you treating these?

MATTHEWS: I think that we certainly gave more credence to reports from the Embassy in the political section than we did to the military reports on what was going on. Already I think there was a lot of lack of confidence, a substantial lack of confidence, in much of the military reporting as well as in the famous Hess survey. I forget when the Hess came in.

Q: That's the Hannah evaluation?

MATTHEWS: The Hamlet evaluation survey that the famous Bob Komer started up. They were, after all, basically called 'progress reports' and so the implication to start with was this was progress. So I think there's a lot of feeling that much of this was just hype, was not really true, that they tried to always look at the brighter side of things.

But nevertheless there seemed to be a general improvement in the situation. That our forces were making a significant difference in what was happening there. There were of course, continuing reports of the increasing and continuing North Vietnamese movements into the South. There was a lot of frustration over our inability to stop the movement down the Ho Chi Minh trail, despite all sorts of efforts to try to stop that. Including, I think they were dropping some kind of detectors along the trail to detect movement, B-52 bombings, all of this kind of thing. But nevertheless, they continued to move things South. So I think there was obvious frustration on the part of the military that this wasn't doing very much.

There was also concern that perhaps the bombing of North Vietnam was not accomplishing what it was intended to do. Once again, I think I mentioned this in a previous session, our whole idea was that a "rolling thunder" which our bombing raids were called, that they would just continue to increase the pressure on North Vietnam. That eventually the North Vietnamese would see that this relentless increasing pressure was going to be such that they were going to have to give up. Well, this didn't work. It was a miscalculation on our part or a misunderstanding of the North Vietnamese determination. They simply just kept going regardless of what the price was.

I think a lot of us also began to have the feeling that air power was not something that ever was going to win the war. I, ever since, have a great deal of skepticism about the possibilities of surgical strikes even when they're wonderful new equipment that were shown in the Persian Gulf War. I think some of that is still a lot of nonsense.

Q: I think Dean Rusk in his memoirs mentioned that all his professional career, he dealt with the promise of air power and the actualities of air power and had to reconcile the difference between them.

MATTHEWS: That's exactly right. The number of times that we tried to hit that famous bridge in North Vietnam, we never did.

Q: Let's talk about the Johnson years first. How did you feel about the White House? Were you feeling that you had to give an optimistic view or did you feel, at your level, did you feel any pressure from the White House, the National Security Council, on how you dealt with things?

MATTHEWS: No, not in the sense of having to show that everything was upbeat. I certainly had no feeling on that. I'm thinking that on the military side, they probably did feel that. The implication, I think, on the military side, especially for those who were dealing with the provinces as distinct from the American military units, I think a lot of the province advisors were under considerable pressure to show progress. The implication being that if the war wasn't going right in their province, it was their fault. Which of course was a lot of nonsense. It depended on how much effort was being put on the other side.

But as far as the Vietnam working group was concerned, I don't think, I didn't feel any sense of pressure to report or to try to give a rosy view of what was going on. In fact I think, especially Bill Sullivan and Phil Habib, I think their dealings with the White House were often much more on the pessimistic side than perhaps their military colleagues were. So I didn't feel any sense of pressure from that side.

Q: How about the CIA? What was your impression of how they were reporting and dealing?

MATTHEWS: I think the CIA also tended to be somewhat skeptical of the military. That is always a CIA viewpoint, that they kind of mistrust the ability of the military to get things done and to properly appreciate what's going on. The CIA also had a much greater, I don't want to use the word 'stake,' but they were much more involved in direct activities on the ground. So in that sense, they also had some pressure to believe and to show that they were making some progress.

The State Department was in a kind of unique position in that we weren't really, as the State Department, we weren't operating any programs in Vietnam. We did have people who were involved in a lot of the different programs. Many of the provincial advisors or district advisors were State Department officers. But the State Department per se did not have any programs that it was pushing, so we didn't have that particular ax to grind on our own side. Maybe this also made us more skeptical of the activities of other people.

Q: You almost run into these, but at the same time, I mean did you get any sort of the frustration that President Johnson was feeling about this?

MATTHEWS: Well certainly some of it. I think a lot of us felt this frustration, especially those of us who had been involved in Vietnam before the mass of American presence began, before the Spring of '65. Because I got married in '64 and most of the other guys had been there longer than that.

That finally here, once American troops had come in and we'd begun to throw a full weight of our effort into the war, nevertheless, the VC and the North Vietnamese were still able to survive. I think they'd been severely beaten back, especially by Tet '68, they had gone significantly down hill. But nevertheless, they were still there and we hadn't won the war. That showed every evidence of continuing.

I think we all had that sense of frustration that things were not going better than we thought they probably would once our own forces had gotten involved. We were like everybody else in the country. That here we are, an enormous world power and we're not able to take on this small bunch of people.

Q: Did you find, you know, there's intensive, particularly in the military, the Kennedy administration got involved in this, a tendency to look for an American quick solution -- either special forces or getting the right kind of rice in or handing out M-16 rifles to local population.

As you watched this thing over a period of time, did you keep coming up -- there was a technological answer to everything -- did you find?

MATTHEWS: Yeah, I think there was to some extent. There were always new things that were going along. You mentioned the M-16s, I mentioned earlier, I forget what they were called, these kind of pebbles that were dropped along the Ho Chi Minh trail?

Q: These sensors?

MATTHEWS: Sensors that were suppose to detect. There was an outfit, I think it was called "SOG," a Special Operations Group. It was part of the MAG-V effort. They had a lot of crazy, not necessarily crazy, but they had a lot of technological things that they were trying out. Some of the things in fact did work. Defoliation was another thing, I'm not aware that defoliation was used militarily before the Vietnam war. So there were searches for gimmicks like that but I don't think there was sudden great hope that one of these things was going to win the war for us.

Q: After Tet, can you describe what happened when Tet hit. Were you all called back? Can you kind of describe Tet day?

MATTHEWS: I remember Tet day very clearly. My brother had come to town, he lived in California, I forget why he was in town but he had come for whatever reason. I think he was only here a day. So we went out and had a big lunch, just wandered around talking, reminiscing a bit and so forth. So I didn't get back to the office after this long lunch until about 3:00 in the afternoon. All hell had broken loose. I think I was gone maybe 4 hours in this lunch period.

I got back and holy mackerel! Where've you been and all this kind of stuff. Absolute hell had broken loose. I think we were there in the office for the next, certainly, day and a half straight. I don't think we ever went home for quite a bit there, just trying to keep track of what all the different reports were that were coming in. I think there was some telephoning from the Embassy, very dramatic phone calls coming in, the whole thing was just, it became kind of a blur as to what all had happened. But all these different reports of activity, just attacks all over the country. It was really amazing.

Q: What was the feeling? I assume we are talking about surprise.

MATTHEWS: Yes, tremendous surprise.

Q: What was the feeling? Now they've come out, we'll get them. Or something like that?

MATTHEWS: It's hard to remember precisely what the views were. There was certainly astonishment that they had been able to mount such an enormous attack throughout the country, such a highly coordinated effort. I think there was distress that they had as much success as they had. But then as reports began to come in, I think it took a while for an understanding of the severity of the Viet Cong military and infrastructural defeat. It took a while for that kind of information to come in.

When it did come, then we got some hope that this might really turn things around. Because they did lose enormous numbers of their infrastructure, their agents and their covert people, all of whom had surfaced for this one major effort. Lots and lots of them were killed, captured or wounded. Over a period of weeks rather than days, we began to feel that maybe they had been severely hurt. But I think the initial feelings was that this was just a fantastic, dramatic attack, that had had surprising success.

Q: What was the calculation? I mean, there's a certain point, where you're dealing with the fires, as you're able to begin to look at this, what did you feel was the rationale for this at this time?

MATTHEWS: As to why?

Q: Why they did it.

MATTHEWS: Why did they do this? I think there's a lot of truth to the suggestion that they thought that the populace would rise up with them and support them. In fact, the populace, quite the contrary, in many cases showed a lot of bravery in trying to repulse them and turn them back. So I think there was a severe miscalculation on the part of the VC and the North Vietnamese. Otherwise, what was the point in risking such a major loss of many of their forces.

I think perhaps there was, I don't think that they were astute enough to have realized what a major impact this would have on American public opinion. You hear that subsequently this might have been one of the purposes, certainly that was one of the results. But I doubt that they had the sophistication to figure out that -- Aha! Westmoreland made this speech, everybody is being very optimistic, now we'll punch in and show them, Americans will lose heart and back-out.

Q: You never can tell on these thing, they can go the other way. Pearl Harbor is a good case in point.

MATTHEWS: Exactly. But I don't think that was the case. I think it was more that they had been saving up these enormous assets, significant assets that they had throughout the country. They thought that when the people saw how many they were, and where they were, and when they all surfaced and came out, I think they believed their own propaganda that they were fighting to liberate South Vietnam from the colonialists and the corrupt South Vietnamese government.

In fact this didn't happen. In that sense, I think it was a miscalculation on their part. I think the end result was far more significant. In the sense of what it did to destroy American public opinion support for what we were trying to do.

Q: Speaking of public opinion support, here you were, you were there during the really critical time when things were going up then basically down, set the course for how it finally came out. You as an individual, were you sensing the public mood, the protest and all this. How did you feel about this?

MATTHEWS: I think we did sense a lot of this. Many of us, myself included, did a lot of public speaking both to groups here and around the country, going around and trying to talk to all sorts of different groups. Certainly as time went on, you got more and more a feeling, especially among young people at the universities and so forth, that there was rising opposition and lack of understanding of what was going on in the war.

In fact, I guess the State Department, more than any other part of the government, had to respond to congressional and public inquiries complaining about one or another aspect of what was going on in the war. So we got a full flavor, I think, of the disillusionment that seemed to be spreading about the war.

I think I talked about this before to why the disillusionment came, in essence it basically came back to the press, the media losing confidence in the truthfulness or the ability of the administration, especially the people on the ground in Saigon, to really understand what was going on and to tell the truth to the reporters. The 5:00 Follies in Saigon.

Q: The 5:00 Follies being the press meeting that was held at 5:00.

MATTHEWS: Right, Barry Zorthian. I think there were several incidents that pushed that forward. The things where the press knew what had happened, the Saigon mission attempted to, I don't think mislead them but at least to put a rosier hue on what had actually happened. Then the press thought was warranted. Gradually this built into a lot of cynicism and got worse and worse. I think the journalists had a major impact on the American public.

I think beyond that, the other significant factor of course, was TV. You could sit at home and watch the evening news every night and here are these ghastly pictures of what was happening to Vietnam. Of course the pictures were about what had happened to the civilian side of things. Just because of the way you are able to gather news, there was very little about what the VC and the North Vietnamese had done and the kinds of things they were up to.

So I think all of this built up in terms of the impact we had on the people. I also had the feeling, making talks to different groups, that as far as the colleges were concerned, we did a fair amount of speaking to colleges, there wasn't so much the students as it was the instructors and assistant professors, the younger people, they were the ones who were much more vocal and strong against the administration efforts than the students.

Q: Did you have any feel, or did your group have any feel about why they were of this?

MATTHEWS: I think that maybe they felt that they were more sophisticated, for whatever reason, they were more experienced and therefore felt they weren't going to be sucked in by what the government was saying. Kind of an effort, maybe perhaps to show off in front of their students.

Q: I suspect there's a certain amount of that and a certain amount of power. We're still suffering from that generation which are now the full professors and have not done the educational process well, I'm afraid.

MATTHEWS: That's exactly right.

Q: Just to get a little feel, did you find that when you went to universities to talk, did you get shouted down or have to deal with mobs or anything like that?

MATTHEWS: No, I didn't have that kind of experience. I did have some unpleasant experiences in terms of questioning and that kind of thing. But I never ran into any mobs or severe attacks. I think the worst thing I had was at Princeton. Where that famous professor, Falk, who's still around I think, who is vehemently anti-administration to the extent that I think many of the things he was saying were practically traitorous.

I did go and talk to Princeton, I'm a Princeton graduate, I talked to something up there and he was in the audience. Some of the questions or statements that he made after I had spoken, were pretty bad I think. He flat out accused me of lying and being a dupe of the government and trying to mislead the people. I forget exactly what it was, what the argument was. But he just flat out made misstatements, no facts, and accused me of being a corrupt supporter of the government, pretty distasteful. But that didn't produce a great deal of support on the part of the students that were listening. They let him have his say. I forget how I dealt with it but it was primarily kind of ignoring what he said or trying to refute some of the things.

Q: How did you feel? Did you feel that you were on a pretty short string as far as when you went out there, that you had to support the administration line. I mean when questions would come up, would you give a flat answer? Oh yeah, we're concerned about corruption or something like this. Or did you feel that you had to present a rosy picture?

MATTHEWS: No, I didn't feel that I had to flat out say that everything was great about Vietnam. I think that I, as well as most of the people in the working group, during the period that I was there until 1970, I think the general feeling was that what we were doing was right. There were probably things that we could do better but the cause was the right cause and eventually, we were going to be able to win.

I think it was only after I left working on Vietnam, that it later became clear that we simply were not going to be able to do it. I didn't feel under any pressure to make things sound better than they really were. We all had prepared materials that we used in giving our talks, our speeches around the country. But I didn't feel that it had to be presented more rosily than the facts warranted.

Q: When the Nixon administration came in in 1969, did you find a change in what we were doing, or attitude, with the new administration?

MATTHEWS: Well of course the major difference when Nixon came in was that he had talked about how he was going to end the war, eventually the Vietnamization program came along. That was a major change and effort, to shift more the burden towards the Vietnamese as opposed to our own. But as I recall, even under Nixon, there continued to be an increase in the American troop level. I think it was a small increase, we finally got up to about 550,000 troops. I think that peak was reached after Nixon came into office. I might be wrong on that, but that was the impression I had.

I might mention before we get to Nixon, that one of my most clear memories is in March 1968, there was a SEATO and 7-nation meeting. 7-nation being the 7 countries that were supporting efforts in Vietnam with troops. 7-nation and SEATO meeting, I think it was Canberra or it could have been Wellington, I think it was Canberra.

In any case, Dean Rusk was the American chief-of-delegation, Secretary of State; and Bill Bundy, who was the Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, went on the plane and I did too. I was going from the working group, I was not yet in-charge of the working group, anyway, I was the one who went along on this meeting. We had one of the air force KC-135s, the so-called flying submarines that had no windows on there, you can't see out.

While we were on the plane, LBJ's famous speech in March 1968 was broadcast on our way out there. Bundy had helped write it and he was sitting next to me on the plane. Rusk was up in the forward compartment, sort of curtained off. The speech was broadcast over the loudspeaker on the airplane, it was a little bit hard to hear but otherwise you could pick it up. Bundy was sort of following along on the speech that he had written. Then came the kicker there at the end when LBJ said that he would not accept the nomination of his party and that he would not run and so on.

It was just a gasp on the plane and Bundy was clearly astonished. The curtain was opened and there stood Dean Rusk with a big sort of grin on his face and he said something to the effect -- did that last part of the speech surprise anybody? Obviously he had known it but nobody else had. Anyway, it was really dramatic to hear that.

Then we went on to the SEATO and 7-nation meeting which was not anything unusual that I remember. The effort being to try to keep all the allies going there.

Then on the plane going back, I think it was in Guam or Fiji, the word came that Martin Luther King had been assassinated. As we flew back I think we landed in one of the airbases near San Francisco and we heard these reports of rioting in Washington, and we were all concerned about that. Then as we flew into Andrews Air Force Base, there were some small windows, as I said it was a flying submarine, but there were some small windows where you could see out of, you could see the smoke rising out of the Capitol building.

Everybody was just aghast. We landed there and the 82nd airborne was on the ground at Andrews Air Force Base and we were escorted back into town by military troops. It was just an unbelievable experience to fly back in there. Then of course we got home and everybody was worried about what had happened to families and so forth.

And of course the rioting did not reach the parts of the city that most of us lived in. I lost a car in it, a little fiat car that had been in a garage being repaired, it disappeared. But it was a really dramatic moment.

Q: One of my most vivid moments is seeing paratroopers in helmets and flak jackets walking up and down Wisconsin Blvd.

Well back to this SEATO thing. How did we look upon the contributions. President Johnson made a tremendous effort to get various countries. How did we feel, I mean, there's the political component but how about the effectiveness or the value of these troops?

MATTHEWS: Well I may mention about that too. I had an absolutely fascinating trip that General Maxwell Taylor, who by then had left Vietnam as Ambassador who was I think basically had retired although he continued to be an advisor to LBJ, and Clark Clifford. The two of them were sent on a trip to the troop contributing nations to try to get some more troops and to get greater support. Again, we went on one of these special aircraft and it was just the two of them plus a fellow from the Defense Department and myself. Just the four of us on this trip.

We went to Saigon, to Australia, to Seoul, to Manila and I guess also to Bangkok although we never got any troops out of Bangkok.

Q: We did have troops.

MATTHEWS: That's right we did have some Thais.

Q: I use to see them in the PX.

MATTHEWS: That's right, we did. Yes, that's why we went there.

So we went to all of these places and then we ended up back in Hawaii to write our report. It was an absolutely fascinating trip to go with these, I'd known Taylor before but I never met Clark Clifford. It was just a really fascinating trip to be with them.

Q: What was their impression of the value and the actual contribution?

MATTHEWS: I think that the general feeling was that more important than the actual material effect of the troops of the other countries, the more important part of it was the psychological impact of the idea that it was not just the United States that was fighting here, that there were allies that were involved in it. I think that was the most significant angle.

Although it had to be said that some of the troops were very good indeed. The Koreans were certainly very tough, they did a great deal of illegal activities in terms of PX. The Filipinos were even worse, I think, in that sense. The Koreans were, I think, very brutal and very cruel in how they enforced the rules in their particular sectors. I'm surprised we didn't have more trouble than we did over the things that some of the Koreans did. But I think it was primarily the fact that these were additional nations that were supporting us, that contributed, that was more important.

Anyway, I think the result of this trip was that this clearly affected Clark Clifford's views when he later became Secretary of Defense. The report that we wrote in Hawaii, an incredible place to be writing it, but anyway, I don't know if you know Fort Darussy?

Q: That's right on Waikiki.

MATTHEWS: Right on Waikiki and that's where we wrote our report. I remember that Waikiki beach was here and a little bitty house that was on this property, and Maxwell Taylor had his back to Waikiki Beach and Clark Clifford was facing it, I and the Defense Department guy were at opposite ends of the table. I remember that Clifford would kick me under the table whenever a pretty girl would walk by.

Anyway, we wrote this report for LBJ on the results of our efforts and I think we did get some more troops, not anything significant but at least statements of continuing support for what we were trying to do.

One other funny thing that happened, when we landed in Saigon we went into this very fancy room in the Presidential Palace. President Thieu was there and General Ky was, I guess, the Vice President. President Thieu greeted me just effusively and throughout the meeting he kept looking over at me and winking and waving. I thought, what the hell is going on? I met him before but I didn't know him very well.

It turned out that shortly before we were there, at least some months before, Secretary of Agriculture, Orville Freeman had been there. And of course, the Freeman Matthews and the Orville Freeman, in fact, I do look a little bit like him.

Q: You do.

MATTHEWS: And he got us confused and he thought this was his old buddy, Orville Freeman, who had brought in a lot of PL 480.

Q: And you know, these occidentals are kind of hard to tell.

MATTHEWS: All these round-eyes look the same. Anyway, Taylor and Clifford were quite impressed with me somehow. Anyway, that was a fascinating little interlude on that trip out there.

Q: Did you get any feel say with the Nixon White House, particularly with Henry Kissinger and all, that he was beginning to intrude, to make changes there or not. Or was it pretty much business-as-usual for the working group.

MATTHEWS: Well there was more emphasis on the Paris peace talks. They were trying to get that moving ahead. I think gradually as time went on, the Vietnamization program came into effect. There was a difference in the kinds of public statements that were being made, in the sense that we would talk more about trying to wind the war down, end American involvement. But that all came, it seems to me, fairly gradually.

I think from my perspective, I didn't see an enormous amount of change on the ground as to what was happening.

Q: All during this time, really from my guess '65 on, when the Americans started coming in, was there any, trying to go back to the period of time, any sort of disquiet on the part of those of us who were dealing with, about the American military presence and the fact that we tended to brush the Vietnamese aside and "let's us do it." That this might be sapping the ability and the will of the Vietnamese to carry the main burden and all that.

MATTHEWS: I think the short answer is "yes," especially those of us who had been there earlier before the American involvement became so heavy. I think there was a very definite feeling that we were placing too much emphasis on what we were trying to do and not enough on trying to support the Vietnamese. I think I mentioned the last time, that when I first went to Vietnam in the Embassy, that I had been the Embassy representative to MAC-V. Going over there and seeing all the efforts being put on trying to advise the Vietnamese and getting them better weapons and all this kind of thing.

Then when we came in the Vietnamese were just forgotten. I mean not totally forgotten but they went way down on the priority list. I think that many of us continued to feel that this was a big mistake, to not put enough effort on trying to keep the Vietnamese going. Because after all, there was only a certain amount that the foreign troops could do, it certainly seemed to me. We didn't have the language, it was a complicated country, very hard to tell who was a friend and who was a foe. Then you certainly needed the Vietnamese.

I think the original idea was that we were going to take on the North Vietnamese and a lot of the fighting against the Viet Cong would be done by the South Vietnamese. That, before long, was forgotten. I think that there was very definitely the impact that you're talking about, that many of the Vietnamese decided -- well, to hell with it, if the Americans are here, we'll let them take it over.

Part of it was that the Americans knew they were only going to be there for a year and then they're out. The Vietnamese were there for the duration, right to the end, so better let these guys take their chances, after all they only had to do it for a year then they'd be gone. The Vietnamese had their families and everything else.

So I think it did, I'm not sure it had a totally negative impact, but it certainly had some of that.

Q: But you didn't feel Henry Kissinger's hand in the period you were there.

MATTHEWS: Well of course, Kissinger had been in the Embassy in Vietnam, LBJ had sent him out when I was in the Embassy. He came out and stayed for about three weeks, he stayed actually with Dick Smeiser in the Embassy. We got to know him fairly well and he seemed like a very smart visiting professor kind of type. So we had known him and then of course he came to this great new eminence in the Nixon White House.

I think he pulled things together. It was very clear as to who was boss. I think one of the problems of course was the distrust between Kissinger and Rogers. That I think did cause some problems at higher levels. I don't recall that too much.

Another one of my memories, I don't know if I mentioned this the last time. At the changeover, when the new Nixon administration came into office in 1969, by then we had reached an agreement with the North Vietnamese that they would not attack the cities. It was part of the efforts, one of the bombing halts, that we wouldn't bomb North Vietnam if they didn't attack the cities. It was only a short period after the Nixon administration came into office in January 1969, I'm trying to piece it together. Nixon went off on a visit to Europe, to France and England and elsewhere, and Rogers went with him leaving Elliot Richardson as Acting Secretary of State.

On the night before they were to leave, the VC did attack way Hue and Da Nang, I think it was, two of the cities that they had promised not to attack. There were rockets that came in from, telegrams that came in from, I guess it was Taylor, Taylor was still there, Taylor and Westmoreland. Saying, we cannot permit this Vietnamese violation to go unchallenged and therefore we must strike back at North Vietnam. So Bundy called me early in the morning, maybe I was in charge of the working group by then, this was about the first thing that happened in the new administration. Bundy called me early in the morning at home and told me, get down there to get the cables from the code room and meet Elliot Richardson down at the Department and brief Richardson on the car going out to the airport, where he was going out to say goodbye to Nixon and Rogers.

I was suppose to give him whatever advice I could on what we should do in response to these cables. I tore down there and I hadn't met Richardson or these other people and got the cables and met him and rode out in the car. And I explained what this was all about and here was the recommendation from General Westmoreland and Maxwell Taylor, that we should resume the bombing in North Vietnam immediately in response to these very clear violations of what the understanding was. So we went back and forth on this.

He finally decided that he would talk to, I guess, Kissinger and Nixon and Rogers out there at the airport, then decide what to do. He never got a chance to do that, of course. He got to the airport with all the goodbyes, he had no chance to raise it. The upshot was that we didn't do anything about that at the time because he was not able to, he felt that he didn't have the authority, he didn't want to take it on himself to go ahead and do that.

Q: That would be really a major thing I suppose.

MATTHEWS: I can't remember now what the upshot of that was. I think, at least as far as those attacks, we did nothing about that at the time. Later on we felt we had to.

Q: Is there anything more we should cover on this Vietnam working group?

MATTHEWS: It was a time of very long hours, fascinating work. On the working group, we were not privy to all that was going on in the Paris peace talks. I think certainly Bill Sullivan wasn't happy. The Company were up to date on it but they kept a lot of this to themselves and to Kissinger. So we weren't fully briefed on that.

One of our jobs was to keep the Paris delegation, we backstopped them in terms of material that they needed for speeches and that kind of thing. So that was a pretty heavy chore to keep going.

But in terms of what really was going on, I think we were not all that privy. Of course, during that period we didn't reach any definitive results.

Q: Nothing much. The line of communication was open and that was about it.

MATTHEWS: That was about it.

Q: You left in 1970 and then you went off in quite a different world.

MATTHEWS: After 6 years in Vietnam, I finally escaped to Mexico City. That was a bit of a fight too because I was only an FSO-3 at this point. I think the job in Mexico City as Political Counselor was a FSO-1 job.

RICHARD E. UNDELAND
Field Operations Officer
Saigon (1964-1969)

Richard E. Undeland was born in 1930 in Omaha, Nebraska. He became deeply interested in Foreign Affairs during World War II. He graduated from Harvard in 1952 with a degree in English Literature and received an MBA from Stanford. One of his professors at Stanford nominated him for a scholarship of unrestricted study in Egypt, where he studied from 1955-1956. In addition to Vietnam, he served in Egypt, Algeria, Lebanon, Kuwait, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Tunisia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy between July until September of 1994.

Q: Dick, I see you served in Saigon from 1964 to 1966. How did that assignment come about?

UNDELAND: I learned of it in a rather bizarre way. Much taken with Alexandria and liking the USIS operation there, I felt an assignment was too short, and I had in my typewriter the draft of a request to be extended for another year, when the unclassified traffic arrived from the Consulate, containing a cable reading, "USIA urgently requires its best young officers for key field positions in Vietnam. Blah, blah, blah. You are transferred immediately." So much for the Alexandria extension. When in Saigon, I found that there was a slight variation in text that went out to the 8 or so of us in that batch; it was whether you merited the word "young" in your telegram or not. I learned that by USIA standards, anyone 38 years old or less you was still young. After that, I guess, you were over the hill, but still eligible to be tapped for Vietnam duty. Anyhow, I made a handful of farewell calls, we put on a large farewell function and I and the two boys flew back to the States. Joan had just given birth to our third child; she and the daughter followed shortly.

I went out to Vietnam after about a week in Washington, with the family coming on a few months later. To continue with the personal, we were together in Saigon for about six months, but after the Viet Cong bombed the American installation in Pleiku, all American dependents were ordered to be evacuated. The only choice was to where; we chose Bangkok, as nearby as possible, so I could make trips there as often as possible. I got over every six weeks or so. Others went to the Philippines, Hong Kong and Malaysia, as well as Thailand and, of course, the U.S. That was Spring of 1965.

Q: Now, you arrived in Saigon, when did you come to Saigon in 1964?

UNDELAND: In Summer.

Q: What was the situation at that time?

UNDELAND: Bad and steadily getting worse. The Vietnamese army was suffering one defeat after another and had pretty well lost control over the countryside, except for fortified positions. The Viet Cong had almost cut the country in half. Defeat clearly loomed when American forces arrived, the Marines into the Da Nang area in the north and the 1st Infantry Division into the central part of the country. Political confusion in the government abounded, and there seemed to be a diminishing will to fight on, both in government circles and among the people outside them. This defeatism was also apparently widespread among much of the military. More and more the Vietnamese army, or as we called it ARVN, was not fighting, or at least not fighting effectively. The American troops arrived in the nick of time; if they had not, it was pretty generally felt everything would have been soon over.

Q: What were you doing?

UNDELAND: I was a field officer in something called JUSPAO, the Joint United States Public Affairs Office, which was headed up by one of the more colorful characters that USIA/USIS, has ever had, Barry Zorthian. It was called joint, for it had both American Army and USIS officers. The main aim was to help the Vietnamese government in its information and psychological efforts to help wage and win the war.

Those of us in the field operations worked outside Saigon trying to beef up the government's feeble information efforts and promote psychological warfare activities, working with American military advisers and Vietnamese province and district chiefs, all of whom were military officers. Trying to gain the allegiance and loyalty of the people in the countryside was as daunting a challenge as any of us had faced anywhere. To begin with, we sought to do so in many areas where no central Vietnamese government had ever had effective control. How do you do more than go through the motions in places where your enemy either holds or shares sway? Add to that a much dispirited and defeatist government cadre, who saw their main challenge as being to stay alive and in other ways just get by.

Still, it was a time when many Americans believed we were going to prevail, because we had decided to do so and would throw enough resources into the fray to emerge victorious. We were in a never-never land, following the dictates of Johnson Administration and trying to impose our will on people who marched to a different drumbeat and who understood us as little as we did them. The problem for us, which we never really comprehended or fessed up to, was it was their country, where their ways would necessarily prevail unless we put in and used such massive force to make a purely military occupation work.

I started off as the JUSPAO representative in the provinces surrounding the capital, Saigon. They were the capital province of Gia Dinh, plus, if I can still remember all the others, Bien Hoa, Long An, Hau Nghia and Binh Duong. The Information Ministry people and offices in these places were pretty sad and ineffectual, but JUSPAO thought we somehow could make them better by providing products, urging and prodding the officials to get out among the people and sharing the effort with them. We at least had rightly concluded we couldn't do it all ourselves, even using our talented Vietnamese employees, who showed amazing dedication and ability. I rapidly saw there was no way the Information Ministry types were going to amount to much and therefore concentrated my attention on working with district chiefs and in two cases, province chiefs. They were ARVN majors and colonels, fairly receptive and active when once convinced. I was gratified some of them came to seek me out as much as I did them.

My most interesting job came with my involvement in training Vietnamese rural survey teams. They were under province and district chiefs and went into the villages to sound out public opinion in a simple but structured way. The resulting reports had two uses. The first was the information they contained, for although the good district and province chiefs already knew most of what the surveys came up with, they nonetheless usually added details and specifics, and it was a way to be updated, raise questions and offer hints. From comments made in passing to the surveyors outside of the survey questions, gripes and problems were voiced that a couple of district chiefs found more important than the reports themselves. And on at least one occasion significant intelligence emerged, which led to a successful ambush of a Viet Cong unit. However, the aspect found most important, though we hadn't foreseen it at the outset, was the creation of a body of structured, organized information that could be used up the line to back up requests from the central authorities and Americans in Saigon. When justified by survey data, whatever was being sought or proposed became more than just the view of, say, district chief X. The reports proved especially useful in getting funding for projects from AID, which had most of the money. We developed survey teams in Binh Duong, Long An, Bien Hoa and whatever the province is called just south of Da Nang, whose capital is Hoi An. Maybe also in other places after my tour was up and I left, but I haven't heard of them. I'm not sure how well they fared over the long run or even whether they were continued, but it was something that got off to quite an encouraging start.

Q: Could you tell me, describe how you went about this. What would you do in a typical day or week?

UNDELAND: The first steps were to seek out likely places, drawing on as many sources as we had, but most important where we thought the district and province chiefs would react positively and be supportive. Then there were the initial visits to explore and explain and to assure there was not only approval and agreement, but also the availability of local cadre for the team or teams to be formed. We also made sure the American advisors in the area were on board. For example, we delayed in one part of Binh Duong province, when at first the advisors balked, though they not only soon came around but became enthusiastic backers.

With the preliminaries out of the way, we would arrive, rent a house, have more sessions with the authorities, meet with those chosen to be on the team, spending much time with them convincing as well as instructing, for they were key and had to be truly willing to take on this exposed job. This last was not easy, though only a few backed out. They were mostly minor officials and guards, without much education and with considerable wariness. It was a dangerous, insecure world out there, not a place where commitments and sticking out one's neck were the rule. And what they were being asked to do would take them at times into places where they needed military protection as well as being armed themselves. It is a credit to the JUSPAO training team, all Vietnamese of course, that so many initial reservations were overcome. We went over the questionnaire with them until they understood it well, had practice sessions interviewing first the Vietnamese trainers and then officials before heading into the field. Once there, they were brought along gradually. As they got better at it and found it working, their confidence and enthusiasm rose. I was surprised how successful our trainers were in motivating as well as teaching and how rapidly they could do it. I don't want to oversell what we did, but there was the case of a team formed in Hoi An that got mixed up in a fire fight, in which one team member was killed and another wounded, but the next day the others were back in the villages continuing the surveying.

As to a typical day, it depended where in the roughly three week training cycle we were, but let's say fairly well along. We would meet, usually at the house we had rented, in the morning for breakfast and discussion of where we would be going, review once more the questionnaire and then move out, more often than not with armed escort, although that depended on the degree of Government control. Once there, we would meet with the village leaders, go over what we were up to, and begin. We would hire a villager to fix a lunch for us -- absolutely splendid food, I can't remember a single mediocre meal in a village -- after which we would continue, but by 3 PM or so we would pack up and leave. The late afternoon and early evening were favorite strike times for the Viet Cong. Once back, the trainers and trainees would go over the results, tabulate them and jot down other information they had picked up. The training team and I usually had dinner together, but it was also a time for my schmoozing with Vietnamese officers and American advisors.

I mentioned going out often with security, local defense forces or the Vietnamese army, and once when we went into a village in a hairy part of Binh Duong under escort of a unit of Vietnamese Rangers. We ourselves were armed with a variety of different weapons, I personally with a couple of grenades, a 9mm pistol and a semi-automatic folding stock carbine. One ridiculous part of this job was the immense difficulty in getting weapons for the surveyors being trained. The could not draw on Vietnamese army stocks, I've forgotten just why, so I took on being the gun procurer myself. I never dreamed it would be so complicated, but after jumping through more hoops than I had thought existed, I finally broke loose some CIA weaponry and then got a regular supply source from a U.S. Army depot.

I had, at the outset, wondered if the presence of guns and escort might not be so intimidating that what we got would be worthless, but I soon became convinced my fears were unfounded. From all I and the training team could tell, the surveyors were talked to quite frankly...

Q: You're saying that they tended to be quite open. Why is it that if you come in with guns, taking a poll, or the equivalent of a poll, or finding out things, that you didn't get what they wanted you to hear, or what they thought you wanted to hear?

UNDELAND: I once asked a villager elder, why it was he was speaking out so calmly and openly, telling us all these things and in great detail. He replied in an unemotional, matter of fact way, "I always speak openly and tell the complete truth to people with guns." Not to tell the truth to either the Government or Viet Cong and be found out was to ask for rapid and usually violent retribution. I am sure we were not told everything, but I felt what we did get was accurate and what was left out was, well, that's another matter. The answer I have just cited says a lot about Vietnam in those days, and maybe other times as well.

Back to your question, remember the people being trained were not going out into these villages in a vacuum. They were Vietnamese, who lived in the area. The trainers, on the other hand, were bright, experienced, skilled, who had seen it all come and go. So when answers or comments would come up that seemed off the mark, at least widely off the mark, warning bells would go off. I don't think they got fooled very often.

The Vietnamese of the countryside were people who just wanted to be left alone, as we heard in various ways, usually indirectly, when we talked with them. At heart they had little use for the government, but if anything they had less for the Viet Cong. They disliked the exactions of both sides, mainly manpower and taxes, but I think even more was the fact that neither side could provide them with reliable security. Many of these places were controlled to varying degrees by the Government during the daytime hours and by the Viet Cong at night. The villagers had no choice but to make their peace with both. How could you expect loyalty to one or the other unless it was in control all the time? I recall another conversation, in which a villager told us exactly where the Viet Cong had entered at night, the meetings and their other activities and from where and when they departed. I asked him whether he would tell the Viet Cong everything about our day in the village and got the simple answer, "of course".

Let me expand on this question of loyalty, apart from the surveying project, which indicates what a rare commodity it was to come by. As a field representative, I spent a fair amount of time in Go Vap District, which is a rural area in the north west corner of the capital province, Gia Dinh. Its chief was a Major Vy, an educated, sophisticated, dynamic man and one of the Vietnamese whom I admired most and, indeed, with whom I came to feel quite close. (To insert a personal note, Vy wanted to see me off at the airport when I definitively left Vietnam, but I talked him out of this and instead had a lunch at his place, which was one of the most stimulating and pleasant times of my tour.)

Go Vap under him became the first district in Vietnam declared completely pacified, with local defense forces in place and supposedly control and with all kinds of economic progress being made. Vy was proud of this and delighted in showing off these accomplishments. It was a place visited several times by Secretary McNamara and General Westmoreland. It seemed to show what could be done.

I later heard the Major had been killed, shot by mistake while riding in his jeep on a road in the district. I was shocked to hear this, but much more shocked when I heard the rest of the story. When going through his papers, the authorities were aghast to discover the price of Go Vap's pacification. Running through the mostly uninhabited corner up against Hau Nghia Province was the main north-south Viet Cong supply route, whereby men and material were fed into the Mekong Delta region. That route was untouched and, in return, so was Go Vap. I wondered how many other Vietnamese had made their arrangements, indeed probably saw no other way out, except to come to terms with both sides. Perhaps, who stood where only became completely clear when the North Vietnamese/Viet Cong took over and started meting out punishment. Maybe not, even then.

It's getting away from your question, but let me go on with what I did in the latter part of my tour, when in addition to the survey team training, I became the JUSPAO representative in a number of sessions and study groups dealing with pacification. This grew out of my work with the rural surveys, and it was perhaps logical I became JUSPAO's pacification specialist, but perhaps the fact that no one else in JUSPAO seemed to want it should not be overlooked. This was not a particularly happy job for me, for after I had been in Vietnam about a year, I came to the conclusion that pacification, at least as designed and practiced was fatally flawed, could not do the job and was conceptually off the mark. Maybe there was no other choice, so that what was tried was the best possible, but it was disturbing to be involved in promoting something in which I had no confidence. It became a case of soldiering on. I voiced my reservations and doubts, but without openly challenging the system. The pacification idea was likened to a spreading oil spot, where the center area is first controlled militarily, then effective local government is installed, a local defense force is recruited and trained, all kinds of development and social projects are put in place, and voila the loyalty of the people is gained, with no place remaining for the Viet Cong inside the pacified area. At this point, the oil spot spreads out from a secure center to begin the same process in adjacent areas. It was neat, tidy and logical on paper at the Saigon headquarters, but fundamentally out of tune with the reality that existed in the countryside.

Many of these areas had never had effective government or more than temporary, raw military control, so it was trying to build where no previous groundwork existed, where most of the young men had been drafted or gone over to the Viet Cong or moved away, where suspicion of both sides was deeply ingrained, and for which the personnel needed, were they to be found, had to be formed from the ground up. Persons in the area had been making deals or accommodations with both sides, a frame of mind which would have to be changed. The idea that physical progress -- schools, roads, drainage, agricultural credit and the like -- were going to be determining in a political sense among people who had never been loyal to the central government out of conviction was fundamentally flawed. I could go more deeply into the faults, but I trust this is enough to make my point.

Still, I got a certain stimulation from my involvement, in no small degree because of two others with whom I worked closely on pacification matters, Dick Holbrooke and Bob Montgomery, the former we all know of and the latter a perceptive Army colonel. We three did not always agree on details, but we were almost always on the same wave length.

Now to the military...

Q: Which military?

UNDELAND: The American. The MAC/V of General Westmoreland, with whom I spent several informal evenings in a small group at his house. Bob Montgomery was among a group of officers sharing his quarters, and it was through him I was included. An admirable man, wholly dedicated to his mission and the welfare of his men, Westmoreland felt Vietnam was where history was being made and could not understand how any serious American would not want to a part of it. He fully realized some of the MAC/V limitations and spent nearly an hour one evening asking me to get JUSPAO to take over all parts of the chu hoi program, that is trying to induce Viet Cong defections and then taking responsibility for the re-education and indoctrination of those who came over. I told him I'd take his message back, but this was something way beyond the scope and ability of the USIS led JUSPAO. He came back, "But we in the army don't know how to do it at all. You at least understand it better than we do." It was primarily in these sessions, I came to feel the general had little comprehension of the guerrilla nature of the war, which in those days it still very much was, or of the people fighting it or of the vast majority of the countryside who only wanted to be away from it. Maybe, this judgment is too categoric and harsh, for I liked and respected him. It's just I felt he was seeing things only through an American military optic, with the emphasis on fire power, big unit operations and so forth. I don't mean to try to set myself up as a military expert, which I clearly am not, but I had trouble with anyone in a responsible position who couldn't or wouldn't see it necessary to at least consider the war from the Vietnamese viewpoint, maybe viewpoints.

I had two other encounters with Westmoreland. The first was in his office at a debriefing of an advisor, a captain, a survivor of a battle in which the ARVN unit he was with had been badly mauled. Westmoreland listened sympathetically and intently and then broke in, telling the advisor that before going any further to use his phone to call his wife in the States and let her know he was OK. I was moved by this humanity.

The other was in an area north of Da Nang, where a Marine unit had cleared an area and the question of how to secure it permanently was being considered. I was there as part of my pacification involvement, when in came helicopters carrying Westmoreland and General Krulak, the Marine Commandant. By chance, I attended their briefing by the Marine unit commander, a Lt. Colonel Clement. They wanted to know how pacification was going and were bluntly told, "Gentlemen, there is no pacification." They were obviously taken aback and replied that this was our whole policy of winning in South Vietnam. Back came, "perhaps, but we have nothing to pacify with. There are no young men here to put into a defense force. We have only women, old men and children. We have scared people, who give us no problems, but are unwilling to commit themselves to anyone, government or Viet Cong...As long as we keep sufficient force here, this area will remain relatively secure, although even now we can't control it 100%. The moment we move out, the Viet Cong will be back in. Maybe they won't control it, but they will make sure we don't." That ended the discussion of this topic. As they boarded the helicopters to leave, I wondered what impressions they took with them and fear it was little more than perhaps a bit of confusion. It was quite a performance by the Colonel; I would like to think he got the credit he deserved, but I never heard anything of him later, nor did I return to that place.

On the Marines, I got to know fairly well a number of officers, captains, majors and one Lt. colonel, in the Da Nang area. I found in them an understanding of the nature and dynamics of the war that was to me unmatched among others I met in the American military in Vietnam. They realized the only way to fight an essentially guerrilla war in another country was to take into account that country, its people, their reality, their apprehensions and their capabilities. You could impose only so much from the outside and expect anything more than temporary achievements, if those. And the Marines had some degree of success in putting this thinking into operation, albeit in limited scope, in the area around Da Nang.

Q: You were saying the Marines, you felt, were the most in tune with the actual problem. I would have thought the opposite, for one thinks of the Marines by training and outlook as being warriors in the most basic sense and probably not having the subtlety that maybe some other units might have. Do you have any thoughts about why the Marines seemed to be adapted to this type of thing?

UNDELAND: I don't have a good answer to that, but the ones I'm talking about were bright, on the ground, away from the Saigon or headquarters mentality. Maybe there is something in their training; I can't say. I've never been in the military myself. It is true they look on themselves, and with justice, as an elite fighting force, but I found them much more than that. Sophistication and open-mindedness are two words that come to mind. It's neither here nor there, but I spent an evening with the light colonel in Da Nang, discussing the Vietnamese people and listening to Mozart. He and the others I met had inquisitive minds. Maybe it has something to do with their being a smaller organization, maybe more field oriented. These reasons I'm hazarding don't seem all that convincing an explanation even to me; all I can say is this is what I found.

Q: Well, they had a different approach. They broke themselves down into small units in the I-Corps area if I recall. They would go out in small units, rather than sending out battalions...

UNDELAND: That is part of what I referred to a couple of questions back. They were more into small unit operations, developing the concept of mixed Vietnamese-Marine units, which became closely knit, with a sense of camaraderie, of belonging together, that brought out the best in the Vietnamese soldiers. I leave it to others to pursue this further. My information on this was obviously second hand.

And yet there was another side of the Vietnamese equation that cannot be ignored, which just so happened to involve the Marines. While the survey team was in Hoi An, I attended a morning briefing given to the American advisors by a Vietnamese colonel. All of a sudden a Vietnamese soldier burst into the room and whispered something to the colonel. He, the colonel, left the room, but soon came back with a big smile on his face and said, "Gentlemen, it's nothing really. There has just been a little fist fight, nobody killed, between some Marines and some Vietnamese Rangers...I must tell you the result is two Vietnamese hurt and ten Americans." The Vietnamese present roared with laughter, pleased the Americans had had the worst of it. So, while we were needed, in ways respected and liked, while we had prevented the country from falling to the Viet Cong/North Vietnamese, our presence was so large, so widespread, so domineering we were at the same time much resented.

Q: Did you run up against other resentments of the American military? I would have expected there were lots of such stories.

UNDELAND: I heard reports that the vast differences between what American and Vietnamese soldiers were paid was vastly resented by the latter, but I don't have specific incidents which come to mind.

But there is one which involved me. I had gotten to know the III Corps commanding general, and he invited me to his headquarters in Bien Hoa for lunch, I forget just why. There he sat me on one side of him and the American colonel, who was the III Corps chief advisor, on his other side. He then talked only to me, ignoring the colonel completely, speaking exclusively in French and asking me to do the same. The advisor was one of the most unpleasant persons with whom I had ever figuratively crossed swords, and I had no problems in helping give him his come-uppance. At the end of the lunch, the general turned to the colonel, saying in English he had invited me to come back another time. (I later had a ride in the colonel's helicopter, an upside down, tree hugging, swooping up and down sort of thing, but if he could take it so could I.) Americans who paid no attention to Vietnamese pride and ways did us no service, whatever their military or other competence might be. Maybe it wouldn't have been so bad had there not been so many Americans in Vietnam, but it would have been helped by a lot more cultural sensitivity on our part.

I found my serviceable French useful with a number of senior Vietnamese types, both civilians and military. In part, some liked it because they were more at home in French than English, but also I think they welcomed the chance to get away from their usual mode of dealing with Americans, even if they were talking to an American. It somehow put things in a different context.

Q: What was your impression of USIS operation in Saigon?

UNDELAND: It was very big, but I didn't have anything to do with much of it, for those of us in field operations were quite off by ourselves and away from the more or less normal USIS components. There was a huge binational center, with its library and English teaching classes in which more than 7,000 were enrolled. There was the gamut of exchange programs. There was a large printing operation, a book translation program. So, while there were the traditional things, which seemed to be functioning relatively smoothly from all I knew, the heart of the operation lay with the war related aspects -- field operations, which I have discussed -- and handling the press. The press briefings were given by JUSPAO in the JUSPAO building; I personally kept my distance from this and otherwise had next to nothing to do with journalists, but could not be unaware that they were very skeptical about the truth and completeness of the information they were getting. If not being lied to outright then being fed half truths and untruths or omissions on purpose was the way they felt about the briefings.

We had lots of money in the JUSPAO budget, and what we did not have could almost always be gotten by glomming onto AID money that was a bottomless pit, a milk cow that never ran dry. I have never been in a post where the cash flowed so freely that it wasn't even a consideration. So long as we could buy it, we got whatever we wanted.

I felt the leadership of JUSPAO tried to bring realism to what we were doing, but neither we nor anybody ever got wholly away from the idea of being in fantasy-land. I recall Barry Zorthian once saying, "I keep hearing these stories of how well we're doing with this project or that, but in fact things are rapidly getting worse. We're losing the war. Let's never confuse a few little tactical successes with the big picture."

Q: Barry Zorthian was an important figure then because he was the prime person dealing with the press, the media, while also running the show. What was your impression of how he operated?

UNDELAND: Barry Zorthian is one of those bigger than life figures. You have to admire him for what he pulled off, but many who worked for him didn't like him for various reasons and in varying degrees. He had no fan club, not that he sought one or probably would have found one accepted. He operated in an autocratic way and didn't try to hide it. Once, he created a serious morale problem when he tried to extend length of tours without consulting those concerned and then didn't see to it that his message to Washington with proposed names and dates didn't get out. Big brouhaha over that. Also, some felt there was no guarantee that what he said one day would be valid the next. A politician, who kept one step ahead of the rest, he liked the power and position of being JUSPAO's head. Given the hand he was dealt, I can't think how anyone could probably have done a much better job. He's not one of my personal favorites, but then I have nothing against him either. I didn't work directly with him, so my impressions are largely from a certain distance.

Q: Did you find as a field officer that when you came back to Saigon and JUSPAO headquarters you entered another world? Others have felt this difference between Saigon and the field.

UNDELAND: Yes, very definitely two different worlds. There was the physical side. When I went to the field, I was, as I've said, armed. For the provinces around Saigon, I would head off in a Jeep that had a 3/4" steel plate on the floor, topped by sandbags to protect against land mines. I have mentioned the arms I carried. I didn't wear a tie the whole time I was in Vietnam, and when in the field was always in combat boots. Sessions and activities there were few, informal, with virtually no standing on ceremony. In Saigon it was quite different. Endless meetings, particularly, when I got more deeply into pacification. Also a lot of working up papers and taking positions, bureaucratic stuff.

Aside from the physical and procedural, attitudes were far apart. In the field, it was what works, what is real, what is feasible. In Saigon, so much was on concepts and big schemes, and whether they were based on reality or not didn't always seem too important. Political imperatives seemed to outweigh reason on all too many occasions. I preferred the field. Indeed, I sought to get away from Saigon completely during my last 3 months and be assigned to psy-ops with the First Infantry Division, but I was not accepted, purportedly because I had so little time left, but I suspect my tendency to speak out may have been a factor.

Q: One of the things that struck me in the 18 months that I was in Saigon, where I was just learning the Consular thing, was the lack of knowledge on the part of so many Americans, self included. I found myself at one point chairing a committee where I was supposed to have historical perspective on a problem and I had been there only six months. The constant turnover. Did you note this?

UNDELAND: I certainly did. But I noticed even more that a lot of people were there who, from my perspective, didn't have any idea what was going on and, worse, didn't care or try to find out. It was easy to get lost in the bureaucracy, and all too many not only did it but were happy to do so. There were also many who were there reluctantly, who were putting in their time, 18 months or 2 years, and going through motions until they could leave. I did not choose to go there myself, but once there threw myself into it and did my best. I am contemptuous of those who didn't. For me, you are either professional or not much.

I don't think I need to get into chapter and verse, but you're right in saying there was a lack of continuity and information.

Q: What about the problem of corruption? Did you note this at all? How was the Government's reach beyond the capital?

UNDELAND: Two questions. I of course heard talk of corruption, but I did not personally brush up against it much, at least not so I recognized it. There were the items from the PX and Commissary being sold openly on the street, but was this theft or corruption or both, and anyway how important was it? I sensed that corruption wasn't as major a problem as some thought. There were bigger fish to fry.

You are right on the second one. The central government was essentially a Saigon operation, whose officials rarely if ever got out into the field or were pressed or urged to do so. It was not just the war, but as I understand it, the tradition. Of course you had the governors and other officials outside the capital, but the central government-provinces relationship had long had the character of a considerable distance.

This might be the place to speak of Nguyen van Cat, a thoroughly Saigon bureaucrat in his late 40s, who was concerned with pacification and became intrigued by the rural survey team idea.

I induced Mr. Cat to join me on a field trip, his first in years, outside Saigon. We flew to Da Nang and the next day drove to Hoi An so see the trained survey team in operation. On the drive, he was nervous and apprehensive, but stuck it out, even when an American Marine at a check point said, he personally wouldn't go further down the road. We chatted away in French, he got out into a couple of villages and clearly liked what he saw. I heard later he took back a glowing report to his colleagues in Saigon. I saw him a number of times thereafter and suggested another trip together, but he declined. This one experience was apparently enough for him.

Q: Did you get any feel for the two Ambassadors, Maxwell Taylor and Cabot Lodge while you were there?

UNDELAND: Not at all. I talked once briefly with Taylor, but never even shook Lodge's hand. The distance from a JUSPAO field officer to the ambassador was large.

Q: You left there in 1966?

UNDELAND: That's right.

Q: How did you feel about Vietnam when you left in 1966?

UNDELAND: I was ready to leave. I hadn't asked to go there, and it was in a place for which I was ill prepared, knowing nothing of either language or culture. For me such gaps are always a source of frustration. I felt I had done as good a job as I could, although I came to doubt much the validity and workability of what we were trying to do and the ways we were going about it. I left thinking that without major conceptual changes, we were doomed to failure. Use of added power may have been advisable and necessary, but by itself could never bring more than temporary improvement, never a viable solution. We all too much were trying to solve a political problem militarily. I never felt we were morally wrong or at fault on these grounds, for the idea of preventing a communist take-over had my approval, indeed was admirable. It was only we were going about things in the wrong way. I didn't see what anyone could do about the Vietnamese authorities, who did not seem to come across to most of the people as that much superior to the Viet Cong. At least that's the way the villagers also saw it. Personally, I looked on Vietnam as an interlude in my career. I learned a good deal. I have memories, many positive ones, which will always be with me. I did not like at all the family separation; that was hard to take.

Q: You came back in 1966, towards the end of 1966?

UNDELAND: Mid-66. I picked up the family in Bangkok. We flew to Hong Kong and Japan for short stays, two places I had never visited, before taking the President Cleveland to San Francisco. But leaving Saigon was not without its hitch. I was on an Air Vietnam flight from Saigon's airport, Tan Son Nhut, to Bangkok and looked down to see us flying over Phnom Penh and a few minutes later I saw it again but we were going the other way. Engine trouble dictated a return to Saigon and awaiting another plane. Tough on the family as I couldn't communicate with them and they had no knowledge of what was happening, except the plane didn't arrive.

ROBERT J. MCCLOSKEY
State Department Spokesman
Washington, DC (1964-1973)

Robert J. McCloskey was born in Pennsylvania in 1922. He joined the Department of State in 1955 and served in Hong Kong, and in Washington as a public information officer. He was ambassador to Cyprus, the Netherlands, and Greece. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: How did you view and treat the Vietnam War? You were there from the beginning until we got our troops out.

MCCLOSKEY: That was probably the toughest continuous assignment I guess I've ever had. As I said earlier, there is always something going on around the world that can get your telephone to ringing at home. As this part of the world was going to bed, things were just beginning to happen out in that part of the world.

The coverage of the war was heavy, detailed, saturating at both ends in Washington and Saigon. It was perfectly obvious to anyone with two eyes in his head and two ears that the U.S. government was heading into serious credibility problems. That is a very complex matter, that simply can't be summed up in a very short time. I will say, however, that there was at the same time a very important term, benchmark, if you like, in the history of American journalism, because we began to get what was then being called advocacy journalism.

This is the phenomenon where the reporters covering the war became involved in the story, and became part of the story. There used to be an iron law in journalism, if you permit yourself to become a part of the story you're not serving your responsibility as a reporter. It is still considered an iron law, but it obviously has been breached. I think that breaching began during the Vietnam War.

You remember the call that Kennedy grew so agitated about David Halberstam and his coverage out of Saigon in those days, that Kennedy made the serious mistake of going to the New York Times and asking that Halberstam be reassigned, which was a blunder of the first order in the conduct of government/press relations. But it will give you some sense -- it always reminds me, of how passions were developing over that bloody war, when there were sins of commission, omission, committed by both the government and the news media throughout.

Q: Did you feel that you were being manipulated yourself within the department?

MCCLOSKEY: I can only answer that by citing another anecdote, illustration. Manipulated, I wouldn't go so far, having information withheld, yes. It became evident to me in May of 1965 when we added a very significant number of Marines to our forces in Vietnam. This was the beginning of the use of the word escalation, the deepening of American involvement. It became clear that the Marines were going to be involved much more than just perimeter security, which, I believe, is the way their assignment was being defined by the White House and by the Pentagon.

When you look back at how absurd some of this was, when the administration thought it could conceal this: the fact that the Marines were, in fact, going to be involved in search and destroy operations. With the size of the press corps covering the war in Vietnam, it stuns the imagination to think that this could have been kept very long.

Well, it did by euphemisms and some misleading statements by different sources here in Washington, official and unofficial. My instinct told me, don't touch it. So for a long time, that is to say days, whenever I was asked whether the role or assignment of the Marines in Vietnam had been changed, that is to say, upgraded, I found some way to have no comment.

However, it got to a point where this was no longer tolerable. By which time, I knew, the Marines were, in fact, in combat. I answered a question one day, and I forget whether it was June 5th or sometime in June of 1965, that confirmed this, and led among other things, the New York Times the following day, saying in an editorial that the American people were told by a minor official of the State Department, yesterday, that the country is at war in Vietnam.

To go back to your question about manipulated, I don't want to say that I was manipulated, because if I had known I was being manipulated, I would not have stayed on. I knew that information was being withheld, and I would give anyone the benefit of a doubt for a period. But that doubt became an unreasonable thing after I knew better, had hard information which really was only confirming what reporters out there were telling their home offices back here, but couldn't get official confirmation. We had put ourselves in a box, that was just so untenable.

Q: You mentioned euphemisms. So often words get used like a protective reaction, or this type of thing, rather than saying we're fighting. Did you ever sit down with people and say what kind of words will we use to deal with this which make it sound a little bit better than the straightforward way?

MCCLOSKEY: It happened, but let me say, there is no institution in our lives that isn't seeking always to put its best foot forward, and even the best face possible on something. It is an American custom, in hindsight, can always be made to look totally absurd. I grant that.

WALTER MONDALE
United States Senator
Minnesota (1965)

Vice President Mondale was born and raised in Minnesota. A graduate of the University of Minnesota and its Law School, Mr. Mondale served as State Attorney General before his appointment and subsequent election as United States Senator from the State of Minnesota. Elected Vice President of the United States in 1976, Mr. Mondale served for the duration of the Carter Administration as active participant and advisor. President Clinton nominated him United States Ambassador to Japan, where he served from 1993 through 1996. Throughout his career Mr. Mondale has contributed substantially to the welfare of the nation in both the public and private sectors.

Q: To turn to the larger theme of your participation in foreign affairs and experiences with the foreign affairs community, the Foreign Service, do you recall what your first official visit overseas was?

MONDALE: I believe my first official visit was as a young senator to Vietnam. Another one was to a NATO conference in Brussels. Those were back in '65/'66.

Q: You were senator during the Vietnam War period.

MONDALE: Alas.

Q: So foreign affairs issues have in fact been very much on the horizon for you.

MONDALE: Right.

Q: In the United States, when foreign affairs are raised, there are those who talk about boondoggles and argue that Congress should never travel overseas. From the Foreign Service perspective, in the contrary, there is a strong opinion that we should encourage the Congress to travel overseas, to get the representatives of the people out in the field.

MONDALE: I've talked about that many times, that the most dangerous thing to have in America are ignorant members of Congress who haven't traveled, who don't know what's going on in the world, who are unable to relate what we do here to what happens overseas. I think the better members of the Congress are people that have taken trips and taken them seriously and used them as learning experiences to broaden their understanding. I think that's one of the best things that can happen. Now there are boondoggle types. I'm not endorsing them. But most of the members of the Congress I knew took these trips very seriously.

Q: Despite knowing a large Congressional Delegation coming to Thailand just wanted to do some shopping and some touristy things, our Ambassador met them at the airport in a van that had a microphonet and he briefed them for the 40 minute ride in from the airport. He wasn't going to miss that opportunity to educate.

MONDALE: Yes. I admire him and I don't know why those congressmen just came on a shopping trip.

Q: Well, that was his effort, but there have been congressional trips that have gone awry. Have you ever had that experience?

MONDALE: No. I've read about it. I don't remember any trip that I was on that I didn't think wasn't well handled and didn't contribute to learning more about those countries. My experience has been almost entirely positive. As I sit here, I can't think of one bummer of a trip.

Q: As we were saying earlier, you were a senator at the time of Vietnam, which was a major foreign policy issue at that time. From your position as Senator, how did you see the role of yourself as a representative of Minnesota or your position in the Senate on this kind of a foreign affairs issue?

MONDALE: I came into the Senate the last day of 1964. The war was just starting to heat up. I believed and said that this was analogous to Europe, that we didn't stand up to Hitler and he came to cause all that tragedy, and that this was a similar kind of challenge and we had to stand up to North Vietnam and China and so on. I was wrong. But that was how I started out.

For a few years, I supported the war. But as I watched and listened, that 1965 trip to Vietnam helped me to understand. I remember a general taking me aside to say things weren't going well. Some of the reporters covering that war like Johnny Apple from the New York Times and so on started talking to me about what they were seeing and my doubts began to build. So, I didn't go there with a set foreign policy. I didn't go there in any other pose than to learn, see, try to understand better what was going on.

Q: Which is in one sense an interesting description of the way in which the American government operates, that the Executive proposes and the Congress disposes, or reviews and funds. So it took some time for the Congress to come to a certain amount of skepticism?

MONDALE: And that wasn't to our credit at all. When you have American lives involved, you'd better learn rapidly. You'd better know what you're doing. My excuse - and I don't have one - is really that I was brand new, first impressions, listening to our government, believing what I was hearing, and then slowly becoming aware that there was a much more complex and disturbing underpinning to the whole thing.

Q: That is, at some turning point, the issue becomes how do you extract oneself?

MONDALE: Right, not a dissimilar problem to today.

Q: Does history repeat itself, Sir?

MONDALE: A real problem for Americans who wanted to believe, as I did, that we were in there to do the best, that we wanted to reform this country so that things worked. We put out stories of a number of projects we had done and this and that, stories about how the public liked us and so on, but we now know that the public there saw us more as a successor to the French, as people coming in as colonialists trying to gain influence there in order to block the North Vietnamese and so on. We were never able to shake that idea about ourselves in the eyes of the Vietnamese and we paid an awful price learning that lesson.

RALPH J. KATROSH
Vietnamese Affairs, East Asia Bureau
Washington, DC (1965-1966)

Ralph J. Katrosh was born in 1927 and raised in Kingston, Pennsylvania. He attended Virginia Military Institute. From there, he joined the military and became a part of the Third Army Palace Guard. It was here in Europe that he developed a desire to join the foreign service. Upon returning to the States, he entered the Foreign Service School at Georgetown University. He then went to the State Department to work with China in Taiwan. He has also served in Singapore, Burma, the Philippines, Malaysia, and Israel. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 28, 1992.

Q: You left in 1965 and went where?

KATROSH: I have always had a tour back home after an overseas tour. I was put on the Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos Desk. That was the beginning of a long and complicated period when...my first job on the Desk was liaison with other agencies. I worked with officers in CIA, DIA and the Security Council trying to maintain some kind of continuity in the various programs that we were developing to assist the Government of South Vietnam.

At that early date no one knew what we were getting into. When you start on Vietnam, from my point of view you have to start back in 1945. Then after Dien Bien Phu we got involved...1954. Then, slowly, slowly we built up.

When I started my assignment, there was still a reasonable amount of popular support for what we were doing. No one at that time realized exactly what we were getting into. Now this may sound like a little bit of horn tooting, but after you have been four years in Taiwan; two years in Singapore, watching that conflict between the locals; and up in Burma watching that conflict; some of us knew that Vietnam was a powder keg. We knew then we were not going to win it. There was no way we were ever going to go in there and structure a government and army that is going to be solid enough to win the support of the people.

Kennedy said he was going to pull troops out. Well, maybe Johnson would too. I think Johnson has been pillaged on Vietnam. I have my own view on it. I think he was misled. I don't think he would have done what he did if his lieutenants had not told him that was the thing to do and that he would be a big hero if he did it.

My personal views aside, 1965 was the time of the big build-up and our job was to get people there; lassoing people in halls trying to persuade them to go, trying to get money, trying to get some consistency in policy, trying to execute the directions received from the White House.

Q: So as liaison you were running around saying you said this, they said this, etc.?

KATROSH: Well, there wasn't much time given as to whether it was good or bad. It was a policy implementation phase rather than the development phase.

In 1966 there was the bombing of the Embassy. That shattered the Embassy structure so I was sent out on TDY, which lasted nine months, to help out.

Q: There was a bomb set off at our old Embassy which killed quite a few people.

KATROSH: Yes. Again I had an "implementation" task. Here is the program, check this, do that, go there, etc. There was no innovation.

Q: Did the situation seem any surprise to you?

KATROSH: Yes. I saw things that were said about Taiwan being said again. It was Singapore again. It was China again. This whole lack of appreciation of the history driving these cultures and subcultures. This is true throughout my career in Asia, frankly. Malaysia and the Philippines come later. If you are sensitive. If you can smell a united Germany in 1945...and you could smell it...that is why you don't want to get into Bosnia. These conflicts do not react well to military forces. Repel aggression yes. Slam the aggressor on the head and get him out of the way, but not this sort of war, not intercultural conflicts. You lose every time. Those involved don't want you there. If they want to kill each other, they want to kill each other and they resent your going in and trying to stop them from killing each other.

Anyway, during my first stay in Vietnam, people would come to Saigon, programs would come in, Congressmen would come in and need to be briefed. It was just like pushing a button. You would give the spiel and they or it would go away. And another would come in.

I was able to leave there when my mother died. I came back and the Department asked if I would like to go to the Philippines? Oh yes indeed. So in 1966 I went out to the Philippines under Ambassador Blair.

This is nice. The Philippines was our "colony"; in 1966 they were our colony. The interesting thing going on in the Philippines, I guess, was again making sure that the Philippines wouldn't get too far adrift from where we wanted them to be...a strong right arm for our Southeast Asian policy and providing us with what were then strategic bases, Subic Bay and Clark Field.

President Johnson made a visit to Manila while I was there. It took two months before his arrival to get ready and two months after he left were spent in repairing the damage. This happens all the time in most Embassies and I am sure you are familiar with it. That was one of the big events, the Johnson visit, and trying to get the Philippines to support us in Vietnam. Manila wouldn't send combat troops but they did send some rural reconstruction battalions there.

Everything was going swimmingly and I had a two year assignment there. I asked for a third and had it approved and then bang!

Q: We are talking about the TET offensive in Saigon, January, 1968.

KATROSH: Right. Well, I was directed back to Saigon but I don't want to go. I am using all the chips I collected throughout my career trying to get the assignment changed. No way. Your family can stay in Manila. You only have to go for 18 months. They don't even have to move out of the house...it was a lovely house. Everything is going to be fine. You can catch a flight from Saigon to Clark and spend a weekend with your family. They knew I had spent quite a bit of time there earlier and was not very sympathetic about Vietnam...not hostile, but I would say, "let's recognize it." I told them that I didn't want to go back because we had lost it. Not go back? Okay I did.

During this second assignment, I was Ambassador Bunker's special assistant. There is much that I cannot say about this assignment, but my job was to work with the Ambassador and his other assistants in his office in dealings with the senior officials of the South Vietnamese government.

Q: That being?

KATROSH: Thieu, Ky, the prime ministers, industry leaders, etc.

Q: Before we get to that, did you sense...you had been in 1966...did you sense a difference there?

KATROSH: We were in a new building which was big.

Q: Did you sense a difference in the attitude of those dealing...had TET come as a shock to thinking or not?

KATROSH: Not really, because amongst the US faithful, TET was a victory and it truly was, militarily. The Communists took their best shot and didn't make it so now we were going to start rolling them back. That really should have broken the morale of the Communists. The VC did not conquer the South. Regular North Vietnamese divisions conquered the South. It wasn't the people that failed, but the corruption and deterioration of the Thieu government that we structured.

Q: Did you have any impressions of how we operated at that time? I mean the American style of operation in Vietnam...

KATROSH: Stu, I wasn't impressed. The military was given a mission and by God nothing was going to change. They were going to do it, like Grant. I think, frankly the Department as a whole had it right all the way along. People like Marty Hertz, and Berger and Bunker...these fellows tried awfully hard. Westmoreland had his way.

Q: He was the general in command.

KATROSH: Right. Abrams, who followed, was more practical. McNamara, and to a certain extent Rusk, just wouldn't give in. They were going to have it their way. I remember one time going up to see a senior US official with an associate and I said, "Can I tell it like I saw it?" My associate said, "It is kind of dicey. I am going to tell you the policy right now, so don't go in there swinging because you will be picking up your teeth." There wasn't much leeway. Again I am speaking about someone who was a very senior official at the time. You did your job the best way you could seven days a week and sometimes 20 hours a day. And thank God you were able to do so because you would go crazy if you didn't. I literally wanted to work all the time, as did most others.

ROBERT DON LEVINE
Embassy Spokesperson
Saigon (1965-1966)

Robert Levine was born in Germany of American parents in 1924. He joined USIA in 1955, served in Switzerland, France, Vietnam, Cambodia, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed in 1988 by Pat Nieburg.

Q: Bob, let me interrupt for just one minute.

LEVINE: Go ahead.

Q: Would you define a little bit what this job entailed?

LEVINE: With the build up of American forces in Vietnam in 1965, I arrived there in May of 1965, there was increasing interest on the part of the American media in what was going on in Vietnam and in following what was happening to our troops, what they were doing. And that required more work on behalf of the United States Mission dealing with these reporters.

Also at about the same time that I arrived there, it may have been a little later, the normal U.S. Information Service operation in Saigon was transformed into what was called the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office or JUSPAO in Saigon which included both the military and the civilians.

By the time I left, the daily news briefings which were given at the U.S. mission hosted several hundred newspaper, television, wire service and freelance reporters. So the job was primarily one of helping my boss, Harold Kaplan, who was the mission spokesman, to get ready for this briefing at five o'clock, called the five o'clock follies, and find out what was going on, what activities the mission was involved in and what kind of questions he might have to respond to at the daily briefing. The during the day, of course, we had to handle other queries that came along from newsmen and also make some arrangements for them to visit different parts of South Vietnam where our troops were operating or where American civilians including USIA civilians were functioning also. Of course, State Department people were in the some of the larger cities in Vietnam.

The five o'clock briefing was a joint military and civilian briefing. I might say that the military handled their part of the briefing and the civilians handled the civilian part of the briefing but basically we controlled what happened there.

Q: Robert, let me interrupt with one question. Would you describe for me a little bit how does one get ready for that kind of five o'clock follies that you had to face everyday? In other words, where did you get the information? Where did you get the basic data that you had that you needed to prepare to answer the questions of the media?

LEVINE: Well, first of all we had cables to read, outgoing cables from Saigon, incoming cables from Washington. We also talked to mission officers, State Department people, JUSPAO, JUSPAO officers, military officers, to get them to explain certain things that were coming up in the news. We, of course, had the wireless file that we looked at, had some idea from that. I don't recall how quickly we got newspapers there. I don't think it was all that fast. But we did get reports on what the American press and also how the foreign press was playing the situation in Vietnam. And from these reports, press, media reports, we knew what issues were hot. We also knew based on our conversations with correspondents who asked us questions and wanted to know what was going on, what our attitudes was towards, I don't know, whether it was a cease-fire or what have you.

Q: Robert, did you or Harold Kaplan, for example, sit in on mission staff meetings which were either just embassy missions or joint missions with the military. Were you in at the policymaking discussions to get a readout of what was going on?

LEVINE: I never was. Harold Kaplan was to a greater extent than me but not all that much. Primarily it was Barry Zorthian who was then the Director of JUSPAO who sat in on those meetings. This made things a little bit difficult for us admittedly. Although we did find out things through other people at a lower level who were informed, either people in the military or in the civilian part of the operation. I'm talking about the whole entire mission, not just JUSPAO.

Q: Did Barry share the information that he had with you? In other words, did Barry Zorthian actually brief you and/or Kaplan and tell you?

LEVINE: To a certain extent, not as much as we would have liked. I think that he retained for himself a considerable amount of this information to make himself a better source and a single source for newsmen. That was one of the problems. I always thought that Kaplan did a marvelous job given the fact that he wasn't as privy to all the information that the mission had as Zorthian was.

I might also say that part of our work as I started to say earlier was arranging for trips, correspondents that wanted to go into the field. They were usually flown around on MACV, Military Assistance Command Vietnam Aircraft, and were able to get into the field quite a bit. Some of them were wounded. I don't know. Maybe some of them were even killed. I don't recall whether -- you may recall that, whether any correspondents were killed there. I don't think anybody was in my time. But I know some of them were involved in some pretty hot operations.

Q: You may recall Dickie Shapiro, Larry Burrows were casualties in Vietnam.

LEVINE: That's right. I remember reading about Burrows. I don't think that -- that didn't happen when I was there. But he was always -- he was a photographer for Life.

Q: That's correct.

LEVINE: And I can remember seeing some of his photos in print, particularly one very dicey operation which he miraculously got out of alive with helicopters being shot down one after the other.

Q: What was the emphasis? As you remember during those years we had some very famous engagements in '65, '66 when you were there. There were such things as the battle of Ia Drang which was a major battle in the highlands. There was the question of securing the Delta. And then there was the question of pacification. Did you get into all these substantive areas?

LEVINE: I did not. I made a few trips. I read about the Ia Drang Valley battle and some of the other battles. But I did not get close to anything substantive insofar as that was concerned. I did make one rather interesting trip to the Mekong Delta with some Japanese correspondents early on. This was in about, I would say, July of 1965. And with two of our famous Vietnam hands, Ev Bumgardner and Frank Scotton who were then involved in a motivational training exercise which they did with the popular forces and regional forces trying to help the Vietnamese explain to them, the South Vietnamese government, what they had at stake in the fight that was going on. A short part of that trip was by plane. And I don't really remember the names of the towns we went to. And then we proceeded by jeep almost up to the Cambodian border. Scotton knew a lot of Vietnamese along the way and was sure that the road was secure. And it included, I remember, a ferry ride in our jeep. We had to cross a stream or a river. I don't remember the name of it now. But there were no exciting developments on that trip. I was just intrigued by the fact that we could travel as far as we did by jeep in an area which I assumed had a lot of Viet Cong in it. Apparently they weren't around at the time because obviously we would have been easy picking if they had been.

So I didn't get into the big substantive decisions of the mission. I might mention one thing, that before Zorthian got there, and he got there over a year before I did, there was a situation with the reporters who were much less numerous then. The reporters just simply didn't believe the mission. The mission was putting out a lot of very optimistic information about the situation in Vietnam. The reporters didn't believe it. The reporters were guys like Neil Sheehan of UPI first and then later with the New York Times and David Halberstam who was with the New York Times and is now a freelance writer. He's written a number of books including a couple about Vietnam. And the basic thrust of what we were trying to do with the mission press center was re-establish the credibility of the U.S. mission which I think was done to a certain extent. In spite of what later happened, the fact that we really lost the war there.

Q: What were your guiding principles if you want to call it, or your modus operandi, in order to re-establish the credibility of the -- ?

LEVINE: Well, first of all it was to make it easy for reporters to travel around the country who wanted to, to view American troops in combat, in other words not hiding things from them. That was number one. Number two was to try to answer their questions as candidly as we possibly could given the requirements of military security. The daily briefing by us, and then there was another one by the Vietnamese, which was not held at the same place at least when I was there, the daily briefing was an opportunity for the reporters to ask us questions, if need be sticky questions, nasty questions about things that either they had seen in the field or that they had heard about in the field. And I think that this strategy did succeed to a large extent.

Q: In your tenure in Vietnam, Robert, did any of the Washington VIPs come to Saigon and then make themselves available at press briefings? Did you get involved in that type of operation?

LEVINE: Well, yes. Some came. I mean, Robert McNamara who was Secretary of Defense came at least once, maybe more than once while I was there. Secretary Rusk came once. Averell Harriman who was I believe then Assistant Secretary of State for the Far East came with Rusk. I'm trying to think of who else. There were some other VIPs who came there who were maybe somewhat lower down the line. Of course, even the ambassador, who was, I believe when I got there, Maxwell Taylor and later, Lodge on his second tour in Vietnam, were to a certain extent VIPs, Taylor having been Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Lodge very well known and having been U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, and known for other things too. They did make themselves available at news conferences. I don't recall the details of any of their news conferences.

But usually at this five o'clock news conference, we had the five o'clock follies as I mentioned to you earlier. Any activity that was unusually important and might interest the press was unveiled there. If there was a visitor he would show up there. Sometimes a visitor would give a background briefing to a smaller number of correspondents and instead of several hundred maybe only 20 or so of the key people there. This went on all the time even whether or not there was a VIP there. Then General Westmoreland who was a commander of MACV would see some journalists individually or talk to them on the phone. The ambassador would too occasionally. But I did not have any involvement in that.

Q: But as you look back over this period Robert, tell me a little bit what were some of your satisfactions that you derived from the job and some of the frustrations that you encountered?

LEVINE: Well, I suppose the chief satisfaction was being involved in what was a very big story. I was there in May of '65 to August of '66, about 15 months. And the story was a hot one all the time. It was on page one virtually everyday. And so you felt that whatever information you gave to reporters who asked you questions was going to be fed into a story was going to be used. That was a big satisfaction. The fact that you were a part, even though a very small part, of something that was big and important. The frustration was the fact as I mentioned earlier that we weren't always, well, we weren't often briefed enough to be able to answer questions. And we would have to send a reporter who quizzed us on one thing or another to Barry Zorthian who was pretty well wired in to everything that was going on. I think that was a major frustration. The physical situation there was quite pleasant. I shared a big villa with my boss Kaplan and living was comfortable. There wasn't any problem like that. Unlike the poor GIs who were out in the field, I'm talking about the infantrymen, who had a very rough and bloody time. There was none of that kind of frustration.

Q: What about some of the frustrations working with newsmen who are ever demanding and never satisfied?

LEVINE: Well, I suppose I was to a certain extent used to that. I had started doing it in Geneva. I didn't do much of it in that brief tour in Paris because it wasn't really part of my job, a little bit of it. But that goes with the territory as they say. When you deal with the press there is a funny two prong kind of relationship. It depends upon the individual journalist.

But on the one hand to a certain extent they are part of the operation. They hate to have this said. But in a case where you are fighting a war and they participate by going out on operations with American troops, they become part of the operation willy nilly. It's very difficult to take the enemy's side when you're with some guys who are getting shot at and you see some of them wounded and some of them killed. You take a certain point of view whether you like it or not.

On the other hand, of course, there was a lot of objection which was steadily growing in the United States and which I saw later on incidentally in a tour I did in the State Department after leaving Vietnam. There was all this opposition, a considerable amount of public opposition to our policies there, disbelief about the evaluations of how things were going there given by the top officers of the government from the President, who was then Lyndon Johnson, on down. And that created a certain amount of difficulty. But I don't know if you want me to get into what happened after I left Vietnam because I was still involved in Vietnam affairs at the State Department.

Q: We might follow up on that after we go through the actual period. But there were stories, you must have had what you would call your favorite or more favorite correspondents. You must have had some that were gadflies or a bane to you. I'm thinking of one correspondent who shall remain nameless who used to wander through the offices and look at people's desk and look for classified material. Do you have any anecdotes and stories?

LEVINE: Well, yes. There was a case of one correspondent, I don't know if he's the same one you're talking about, who was totally obnoxious. I won't name him if I'm saying these nasty things about him. He was a totally obnoxious creature. On the other hand, his copy was very good. He supported us. He had a good relationship with General Westmoreland as a matter of fact. But he looked upon us -- I'm talking about myself, Harold Kaplan, the civilians who worked in JUSPAO as sort of civilian hacks who were doing this because we couldn't do anything else. Nevertheless, his copy was always supportive of everything we did. As a matter of fact, the other newsmen actively disliked him.

On the other hand, there were a few correspondents who visited us. I remember one, I don't recall his name, who took a very anti-U.S. policy view. He was a visitor. He was not stationed in Vietnam. And Frank Scotton took him out on a trip to one of these motivational training centers. And he was, according to Scotton, completely turned around and understood, felt he understood we were fighting the good fight and they were doing something very worthwhile in this motivational training. When he got back to the United States he flipped back again, or flip flopped again, and wrote some very nasty stories. So that's the kind of thing, that isn't something that I personally had to put up with. But I did deal with some correspondents, some of whom were very supportive. One Frenchman, for example, who had fought in Vietnam during the French war. He was a visitor. And I've seen him a number of times since then although I haven't seen him for many years now. I think his name was Pierre Darcourt, D-A-R-C-O-U-R-T. I'm not 100 percent sure of that name. And he went out to visit the first air cavalry division. Of course, if you take a division with 15,000 men you're going to find all kinds of people. Like they had somebody there who spoke fluent French. There were people there, he said there were people who even spoke, they had somebody who spoke Turkish believe it or not. They had somebody who spoke I don't know what. Anyway, other languages.

And when the first air cavalry division arrived, I don't know whether you knew about this or not, there was a massacre of a French unit somewhere on what Bernard Fall called the street without joy, somewhere Route One going up towards the north although it was still in South Vietnam, A French unit as ambushed and virtually wiped out.

Q: North of Tuy Hoa.

LEVINE: Where was it?

Q: North of Tuy Hoa.

LEVINE: North of Tuy Hoa. The French put up some kind of a marker about this. And it was all overgrown. The first Air Cav found the marker and cleaned it up and, I don't know, presented military honors, raised a flag, blew a bugle, or whatever they did. And Darcourt who was really basically on our side anyway was terribly impressed by this. He just thought it was great. He could probably say no wrong about anything that we were doing there.

Q: Robert, tell about the relationship between the civilians or the USIA staff and the military. Here you were in a way mission spokesmen, but you weren't really spokesmen for the military were you? I mean, how did this whole relationship and interaction work?

LEVINE: Well, Barry Zorthian, of course, covered the whole thing. And the civilians as far as the daily briefing was concerned, the civilians really ran it. And Barry organized it. You know what a dynamic guy he is. He organized all kinds of things. He organized backgrounders, backgrounders by Westmoreland as well as by the Ambassador.

I would say that the relations that we had while I was there in the mission in JUSPAO with the military the relations were very good. If a reporter came to us and wanted to go somewhere out in the field, we would talk to the military and they would see what they could work out, a plane, a ride, what have you. So I think basically our relations were very good. Now, Barry Zorthian being the kind of guy he was I'm sure he rubbed a number of the military information people the wrong way. They didn't like the fact he was civilian even though he was a reserve officer, you know, a Marine Corps reserve officer. They didn't like the fact that he was the one who controlled everything. But I never found at least in my experience there, I never found any difficulty. I remember once when I occasionally did the five o'clock briefing, the civilian side when Kaplan was away. And I remember once I got into some kind of trouble. I couldn't answer a question. And the top military briefer jumped in and helped me out, you know, for which I was very grateful. In fact, I even got helped out once by a correspondent who pointed out something that I had overlooked that was favorable to what we were trying to say.

Q: But you also had, of course, to work with the military on logistics. In other words, you said they were flying in MACV transportation. So you had a continuous liaison with the military LEVINE: We did. They were in that same building on -- what was it? I can't think of the name of the street. I'll think of it in a minute. Where JUSPAO headquarters were next to the Rex Theater and whatnot. So we would just go to them and say, look, I've got a guy from such and such a newspaper or whatever who's trying to get to this place and see if they can help. Sometimes a correspondent would go directly to them. But if he was a visitor who didn't know his way around too well then we would intervene.

Q: Were these military directly attached to the JUSPAO staff or were they separate? In other words, did they work as part of the JUSPAO team, let's say a transportation officer, a military transportation officer, assigned to JUSPAO?

LEVINE: I don't think they were part of the JUSPAO staff. But they were expected to cooperate with us. As you know we had many military people in JUSPAO. You asked me about the military-civilian relationship. My experience with it was good. But as you know the general idea of Barry Zorthian was to have an information officer on every single province. I think he almost made it. There may have been one province that didn't have one whose purpose was not to act as a spokesman really, but to beef up the Vietnamese, to give them some ideas about selling their own cause to their own people. What I'm saying now is really mostly hearsay. But it comes from these guys who arrived from all over the world in Saigon, knew nothing about Vietnam. Didn't, of course, know the language. But often didn't know much about the country at all, and had a couple of days of briefings in Saigon and then were shipped out to the provinces to work with the Vietnamese Information Service. All I know is that they had a very difficult time with it. They knew something about Information. But they didn't know anything about the atmosphere of the country, you know, where they were operating.

Q: What about this proposition? If you send a correspondent to anywhere in Vietnam, would you call up the province or wherever he was going and alert the JUSPAO representative in the province to try and be helpful to that man? Or did you turn them over to the military?

LEVINE: Well, we basically turned them over to the military. Because unfortunately -- I say unfortunately although it's normal. These guys are interested in what the American troops are doing in the battles that they were fighting. I am sure I have never seen anybody do this kind of a study. But if you took a survey of what was written, printed, broadcast, what have you, about Vietnam during the years when the fighting was really hot, probably 98 percent of it dealt with military operations, with U.S. military operations, maybe 95 percent. Maybe a few percentage points dealt with what the South Vietnamese were doing. But except for a very rare few correspondents such as Sol Sanders who worked for U.S. News & World Report, Dennis Warner who was an Australian whose copy I think also appeared occasionally in The Reporter which was still in existence.

Q: Shaplen of the New Yorker.

LEVINE: I don't recall him. Oh, Shaplen. Yes, Bob Shaplen whom I knew actually very well. But these there were almost unique in trying to describe what the country was all about, what the cultural background of the war, what the history was, what kind of a government the country had, what the social problems were. And now and then there was a Nisei who worked for the Christian Science Monitor, Takashi Oka. I don't know if you ever dealt with him. He did some of that too. But for the others, all they wanted was the military. As a matter of fact, I can remember -- maybe you had this experience also. But I can remember groups of editors. I remember a gang from Time Magazine who came over, a bunch of their top editors. And I was at a luncheon talking to one of them. I don't remember the man's name. And I made this pitch. I said, why don't you guys write more about the country and stop writing just about the U.S. military operations. And he seemed very sympathetic. But obviously there was no change discernable in Time's coverage. As a matter of fact, some of the Time reporters that I knew there told me that they would constantly get demands, rockets from New York asking for coverage of this or that military operation and expressing very little interest in anything else.

Q: There weren't really in your experience any specialized people, for example, who covered the economy or the AID operation?

LEVINE: No. I mean, there was some writing about some of these things, but not very much. I mean, there was nobody specializing in the economy. With the exception of the three people that we talked about earlier and a possible fourth, I don't recall anybody even wrote about the politics, you know, who specialized in the politics and let's say ignored the military and decided I'm just going to write about the politics.

Q: Well, you know, what you say is fascinating. Because so many of the books that have since been written about Vietnam dealt very harshly and probably justly so with the corruption of the Saigon government.

LEVINE: Yeah.

Q: Did you have any experience even during the briefing that this subject was raised by correspondents? You mentioned Neil Sheehan whose latest book, of course, is very critical on this particular point. At that point did he raise any do you remember?

LEVINE: I don't recall him raising that issue. But that doesn't mean he didn't raise it. I'm sure he did. I mean, after all there were Vietnamese spokesmen and they talked to them. I think that when an issue really boils up -- for example, while I was there at one point there was one of the perennial Buddhist crises. And it became so big, particularly I believe in Da Nang and -- what's the other city?

Q: Hue.

LEVINE: And Hue, H-U-E, that correspondents had to cover it, you know. I mean, it would just impose itself on them. So there political moves became, got a certain amount of attention. And when there was a coup, just as you know there were many, the coup got attention. But then they quickly slipped back from that into the regular coverage of military operations.

Q: You mentioned in your past experiences that you had with Scotton and Bumgardner who at one time were rather legendary in USIA also for their counter terrorist programs, and ultimately I think were engaged in the Phoenix program probably after you left. What about some of the other colleagues that you worked with? Who was there? Who impressed you? Or did they know what they were doing? What was it like to have all of a sudden a big build up of many Americans drawn from all over the world and somehow being ignorant of what they were even supposed to do?

LEVINE: Well, it's kind of difficult for me to talk about this. I had some contacts. Most of my contacts were just absorbed full time with the daily briefings and dealing with correspondents. In other words, I didn't have too much contact with the other parts of the organization. Now, I did talk at one -- I talked to a few province representatives, as I mentioned earlier, who confessed, as a matter of fact, at being chagrined because they were shoved out into the provinces without any knowledge of really what they were supposed to do, just a very general idea. I'm sure that some of them were good and managed to survive somehow or other. And others were not. But I don't have, I really don't have a good fix on what the other people in JUSPAO were doing.

At one point, for example, I had -- I don't know whether this is amusing for this project's purposes. But believe it or not, even after there was an enormous amount of copy being filed out of Vietnam everyday with television and radio reporters there as well as print reporters, there was no way for them to get television interviews for example or any kind of film back to the States except by flying it to Manila or Tokyo or what have you. It would always come a day late. And I was given the job of trying to work something out.

I got a fellow whose name I can't recall now who worked for JUSPAO. He was a real ball of fire, an amusing guy, who was sort of an expeditor who used to try to get our pamphlets and propaganda and whatnot shipped out to the field.

Q: Bill Ford?

LEVINE: No, it was an Italian name.

Q: Dino Catarini?

LEVINE: No, it wasn't Catarini either. As a matter of fact he was from somewhere upstate New York I think. I can't think of his name now. It may come back to me. In any case I made the point to several of the wire correspondents, several of the tv correspondents that there's an awful lot of money to be made here if -- not for them personally, but I mean their organizations, if they would be able to file their copy electronically out of Saigon. And we finally got something going. And this fellow whose name I can't think of now got MACV to bring in some equipment from Manila which was finally set up so correspondents could go downtown someplace, I don't know where it was, and file directly to the United States via, I think it was via air to Manila, via cable from Manila back to New York so the stuff could be filed immediately.

Q: Robert, just for clarification when you said file you mean written copy.

LEVINE: No, I'm sorry. I don't mean written copy. I mean video stuff. I mean video copy, audio or video. One of the things that was kind of amusing about that, after working like hell to get this thing all set up and getting everybody involved, the equipment supplied free, brought in to be paid for as a result of the fees that would be sent back to the United States. Because it was obviously an enormous amount of traffic. There wasn't any problem of it being paid for. The equipment landed in Saigon from Manila. And the minister for PTT, I've forgotten his name now, Vietnamese.

Q: For the postal service.

LEVINE: Yeah, for the postal service, postal, telegraph, whatnot. Called me up and said, listen, all this equipment has just landed here. He said, I don't know. There might be bombs in it, you know. After doing all this work -- he spoke in French incidentally. He was an old timer. And I really got sore I suppose like many Americans did who were frustrated by the Vietnamese after all I had gone through to try to get this equipment, number one, supplied, number two, transported to Saigon, we run into a roadblock because this guy was afraid to clear the material to be sent into town. Well, I finally did. I exploded. I've never done that before or since to a minister of any government. And the material came in and was set up and used. Whether it benefitted what we were trying to do or not I don't know. I suppose some of the negative reports that came out like the famous burning of Cam Ne, I don't remember if that was before or after.

Do you remember about Morley's -- well, it was a famous incident that happened while I was there. Morley Safer who now works on 60 Minutes was a correspondent for CBS there. He was with a unit out in the field. And they had taken some fire from the village. I don't know whether they had anybody killed or wounded. But I know they'd taken fire. And the head of this unit which wasn't very big, it may have been a company. I don't even think it was a battalion, went into the village and with a Zippo lighter simply set fire to huts there. Safer got this on film And it was seen back in the States the same day or the next day, I don't know which, including by the President as a matter of fact. And all hell broke loose because of that. So I don't know that my getting that equipment in benefitted our cause or not. But it created a certain amount of good will, I guess, with the correspondents.

Q: Bob, do you have any comment -- I think tours of duty for USIA officers were rather limited. They were 18 months without home leave as I recall or two years with a break in between and some people left. Was there a problem with --

LEVINE: Well, there was a problem of continuity with this rapid turnover of USIS JUSPAO officials. It was also I think a bigger problem perhaps even with the military who had a shorter tour of duty, just 12 months. As a matter of fact I recall -- you know, I hadn't mentioned this yet, but I had visited Vietnam in 1952 when I was a journalist working in Paris for International News Service. And the French were fighting their war at that time. They did not send draftees to Vietnam; they had draftees but they didn't send them to Vietnam. So all their people were professionals, whether they were noncommissioned officers or privates or officers. Their tour of duty was 27 months.

And I met French officers, and noncoms, who were there on their second tour of duty and some on their third. Obviously this gave them considerable amount of continuity and knowledge. They still didn't achieve what the French government sought to achieve there. But I think it helped them a lot. And we were hampered by this lack of continuity unquestionably.

Q: There was a great deal of world interest too. And you mentioned already you went out with some Japanese reporters. Did we do anything to attract or bring people from the USIS posts around the world? Did they send reporters or television crews to Vietnam? What was interaction between JUSPAO and now USIS post or USIA post around the world if any?

LEVINE: Well, I don't know too much about that. I know in several instances, for example, USIS Tokyo, for example, sent Nat Thayer, who was a fluent Japanese speaker. He's no longer with the agency. And he came down to Saigon to deal with the Japanese press. And the Japanese have media that are so vast, I mean, they have enormous circulation. All their big newspapers are nationally circulated, unlike the United States. And there was a sizeable contingent of Japanese correspondents in Saigon. And Nat came down to deal with them, talk to them, travel with them. So that was one example of it.

Now, correspondents did come in from all over the world. And there was a certain amount of contact between JUSPAO and at least some of the main posts around the world. I was not involved in that except when people arrived. Sometimes I would help to orient them and maybe fix them up with trips around the country, that sort of thing. So there was a definite attempt to influence public opinion around the world by influencing -- well, the attempt was made on various levels. But one level was to influence their media. I think that most of the media saw that this was a big issue. The war was an important issue even in countries that were not fighting it as we were. And so we got quite a few European correspondents, Japanese, Australian. Of course, there were some Australian troops there, not many, but there were some. Some Korean correspondents too because Korea had, I believe, a division there if I'm not mistaken. Anyway, they had a sizeable contingent. So there was contact with other posts.

Q: Robert, let me just go a little bit to the lighter side. You just alluded to it earlier. You said you and Harold Kaplan shared a house and living was quite comfortable. Can you describe a little bit, were you assigned a house? And that also applies to the correspondents. Did you get into logistics with them like housing or transportation?

LEVINE: No.

Q: What was it like to live in Saigon? What was an average day like for you? Did you observe weekends? Was life normal outside of work? What was it like?

LEVINE: Let me say first of all, we did not get into logistics for correspondents. Aside perhaps from making hotel reservations for visitors. But the ones who were stationed in Vietnam did not benefit from our attempts to get housing for them or anything like that.

Q: But they had access to the PXs.

LEVINE: They had access to the PXs by virtue of being accredited to MACV and that's true. As far as living, those of us who were stationed there, who were members of JUSPAO, as I said, it was comfortable. Kaplan, who got there before I did, he'd been there I think since about February of 1965, had a villa assigned to him. And he asked me if I would like to share it with him. I didn't think it was too good an idea to be living with a guy who was my boss. But it worked out very well. And it was a nice big house on a street there, Phan Dinh Phung, P-H-A-N D-I-N-H P-H-U-N-G.

And we had, you know, several servants. There was a cook. There was what, I think they call a boyess, who sort of cleaned up, like a maid in other words. There were at least those two that I can recall now. Maybe there was a third person there. It was a pretty good sized house. And we were able to put up at least one visitor there. We had one spare bedroom which was used for visiting either USIS or State Department people who came through. We did a fair amount of entertaining. The cook we had was very good.

So I would say that, as I said before, that living there was pleasant. All the creature comforts were certainly there for those of us -- at least it was my case. Maybe I lived in a fancier house because I was working for a higher ranked boss than would have otherwise been the case. But I think most of the homes that I visited there while I was there were comfortable. There was a certain amount of entertaining back and forth and dinner parties. And we held one big New Year's bash while I was there which was quite successful.

Q: How much business did you do at this famous, or rather infamous, whatever you might think of it, Cercle Sportif, which was the sports club, I mean, which was the swimming pool.

LEVINE: I don't recall really doing business there. I recall going there and swimming and having lunch. Kaplan who was an ardent tennis player played a lot of tennis there. I guess kept his weight down because playing tennis in the Saigon heat would do that. But I don't recall transacting much business there. Most of the business was transacted in the office. And incidentally, the office work was seven days a week. I mean, I remember it being seven days a week. Of course, when I was there I was single. I didn't have a family. So I didn't go on R&R anywhere. I took off at one point in the 15 month tour. I went back to the United States for about a week getting a free ride in one direction on the Secretary of State's airplane.

Q: Now Robert, in retrospect, Vietnam or service in Vietnam also had become a hazard to many USIA officer's families, not only because of family separation, but there were also a lot of family breakups. Do you have any comment on what caused it or what might have been contributing factors?

LEVINE: You know, as I said to you I was single when I was there. So I didn't face that problem myself. I think anytime you have lengthy family separation that's going to put a strain on a marriage. So it certainly put a strain on marriages there. In other words, a marriage has to be pretty solid to be able to withstand that. And I don't know what the statistics would show about the relative stability of families who were separated in Vietnam versus those that didn't have to go through that. Of course, there were people who said that there were other places in the world where they faced family separation also. But the only thing I can say is if the marriage was solid it would probably endure. If it wasn't solid that would weaken it.

Q: There were times especially in Saigon when even some of our military people seem to have gotten involved in various kinds of scandals. I remember a Navy person who was there. Did you have to deal with this in relation to the press? I mean, were questions asked about this? And how did you deal with these things? Or did you refer that back to the military or to other people?

LEVINE: Well, I can recall several scandals there. One was the military. And I don't see any reason not to mention his name because it was a public matter. Archie Kuntze who was a captain, a Navy captain, who was in charge of the PX. Now, that didn't break until after he got back to the United States. And it may have even been after he retired from the Navy. I don't know. But I know he was not in Saigon anymore when he was supposedly, I don't know, finagling money, changing money on the black market and whatnot. The funny thing about that is after that Kuntze left and they got a straight arrow in to run the PX, the stuff that you found there was much less attractive than when Kuntze was running it.

Now, there was another scandal when I was there that did take place while I was in Vietnam which involved one of the top officers in AID, who was having an affair with a Vietnamese woman. He was married. His wife was back in France, not in the United States; she was French.

And I don't remember all the details of it. But it resulted in a murder. That's the reason it became a scandal. This Vietnamese woman who was beautiful had while this AID officer was away on home leave, extended leave that lasted, I don't know, a couple of months or something, quite a bit of time, took up with a younger officer, also an AID officer. When the big boy came back she left the younger man to go back with the older guy, and the younger man shot her and killed her. This became quite a cause celebre. I think we did have to answer questions on that. But then those are the only two scandals that I can recall while I was there.

Q: Bob, looking back on this experience that you have had, I suppose nobody in USIA at that time had much of a choice whether they did want to go or did not want to go. They were sent there. And that was about it. But how would you sum up your experiences? Was it professionally interesting? Was it rewarding? I mean, if you had a choice, I mean looking back now, would you have gone voluntarily rather than been ordered there? What is your summary impression of that year? And what did it do for you as an individual or didn't do for you as an individual?

LEVINE: Well, I suppose I would say number one I would not have gone there voluntarily in the middle of another tour. I had only been in Paris for nine months, a city I knew very well and loved and I spoke the language and all of that. I would have been willing to go there. I would have gone voluntarily if I had been asked at the end of the tour in France. What I got out of it professionally, I got a lot out of it professionally because I learned a lot about dealing with the press which I continued to do to a considerable extent in my career in USIA and even now when I work at the Treasury. I also deal with the press. Of course, the issues are much more low key. They're not hot like that one was.

But I suppose I got an abiding interest in things Vietnamese. I read a number of the books that have come out about the subject. You mentioned Neil Sheehan. I read hi book just recently which I found fascinating, the biography of --

Q: John Paul Vann.

LEVINE: Of John Paul Vann, that's right. But it's the Vietnamese experience built around Vann's biography, on which I thought that Sheehan did a terrific job in that book. Obviously he did a lot of research on it. So I still have -- when I see something about Vietnam I read it, I grab it and read it. I don't think it did me any either particular good or harm as far as my career in the Agency was concerned. It did get me the press experience of dealing with a difficult subject.

Then I went on. My next assignment was on loan to the State Department as first Deputy Public Affairs Advisor and then Public Affairs Advisor in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. So I used my Vietnamese experience in dealing with that. And I also made one trip to Vietnam in 1967 when I was still at State for the -- they had national elections. I think it was around September of 1967. And I went with an observer team that went there that the President and the White House put together.

RICHARD M. MCCARTHY

Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1965-1966)

Richard M. McCarthy was born in Iowa in 1920. He joined the State Department in 1947 and served in China, Hong Kong, Thailand, Taiwan, and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Jack O'Brien in 1988.

MCCARTHY: I was one of the three assistant directors of the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office, the infamous JUSPAO.

Q: Reporting to Barry Zorthian.

MCCARTHY: Reporting to Barry Zorthian.

Q: What was your special responsibility?

MCCARTHY: I was in charge of most of the more conventional aspects of the operation, the publications, radio programs, the binational center, library, motion picture showings in the provinces, and certain aspects of the field program. But we also had another assistant director, Bob Delaney, a USIS officer who ran the civilian field program. Then we had Brigadier General Fitz Freund, who ran the military program.

Q: We forget that there were some fairly regular conventional activities during that period. Did you find that you were up against others for resources, either manpower or money, within JUSPAO?

MCCARTHY: Not really. If we needed money, it seemed to be there. Or if we needed people, they were hauled in, in some cases kicking and screaming, of course, from all over the world.

Maybe I shouldn't tell this story, but I will. I went out to Saigon. I think it was late in 1964, very early in 1965, when they had finally decided to have a JUSPAO. I went out on TDY. Barry Zorthian had asked me to come out, to put it bluntly, to finger people for his staff. (Laughs) I was there long enough to be greeted with great indignation by some of my good friends who suspected I had something to do with their being there. They were all present at Tan Son Nhut airport in May, when I found that somebody else had fingered me for assignment in Vietnam. As I say, the money was certainly there, the people were there, perhaps more people than we really needed, although I don't want to get into that.

I think one project which is probably worth somebody doing a story on at some time is the arrival of television in Vietnam. Armed Forces Radio people decided that we needed television for the American troops, and the build-up started a couple of months after my arrival. It was also decided that we couldn't have television for our own troops unless we had television for the Vietnamese.

They cast about for some means of transmitting these broadcasts, and they discovered three of these Super-Constellation aircraft that had been converted to military use with television transmitters. They had been hastily modified for the Cuban missile crisis. They had an interesting capability; they could fly over a target area, they could jam the local television, and on other channels they could transmit our television.

Anyhow, these three Blue Eagle aircraft were brought out to Vietnam. They proved to deliver a surprisingly good signal, but we scratched our heads a little bit when it came time to find out how to get Vietnamese television on the air, because we couldn't find anybody in country, and Vietnamese who had had any experience with television. We finally decided that the only thing we could do was use the resources of their national film studio, which was a very small-scale operation.

There was a problem, of course, of receivers. I remember that we bought 2,000 black and white receivers, very large receivers, from RCA in Camden, New Jersey, and we flew them out at a cost higher than the purchase cost of the receivers. The idea was that these receivers would go into community centers within reach of the transmissions of that Blue Eagle aircraft, and most of them landed up there. Some of them, of course, were diverted into the hands of Vietnamese generals and government officials.

We went on air pretty much on schedule. We had some top names from American commercial TV come out to help. One I remember in particular was Larry Gelbert, who was the presiding genius of "M*A*S*H," and I think some of his better ideas probably came from his experience in Vietnam. Certainly a remarkable and inspirational man.

Q: The idea was not to provide entertainment only to the Vietnamese.

MCCARTHY: No. The idea was to provide practically anything that would move on the screen. We ran old films, Vietnamese opera films, time and time again. It was very difficult to do news or anything live in Vietnamese. One upshot of this, of course, was that a great many Vietnamese watched Armed Forces Radio television programs. I may say that we took one survey that showed that the most popular program the Vietnamese watched was the old American film with Vic Murrow, "Combat." We didn't object to this at all, because, of course, the Americans always won.

Q: But it was justified, the whole effort, as a morale builder. Was that the justification?

MCCARTHY: Yes, and it was that. It was amazing how soon the black market blossomed with Japanese sets, which somehow made their way in country. When the PX got in sets from the U.S., they didn't last more than 15 minutes.

PATRICK E. NIEBURG
Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Pleiku (1965-1966)

Patrick Nieburg joined USIA in 1962. Early in his career he worked in Bolivia and Brazil. He was in Vietnam during the Vietnam War and then served in Germany, Sweden and Turkey. Later he was the Director of Radio in the American Sector which is known as RIAS. His last assignment before retirement was as Director of Foreign Language Broadcasts of the Voice of America. He was interviewed in 1988 by Allen Hansen.

NIEBURG: Unfortunately, my tour in Brazil came to an abrupt end. The war in Vietnam was heating up, there were -- in Vietnam -- the first full-scale battalion size battles, and the major attack on the Provincial capital and airfield of Pleiku. I got an immediate -- like to be there yesterday -- transfer to Vietnam.

I need to mention one more anecdote in connection with this transfer. I do so because it reflects on the Brazilian character. If Brazilians like you personally, nothing is impossible. Conversely, if they don't nothing is possible. As I was saying some very hurried goodbyes to some of my Brazilian friends -- many of whom were genuinely shocked at my transfer -- not a few of them asked what they could do to have this USIA decision reversed. I did not encourage them, feeling that I had signed on for world-wide service and that I could not renege when the going got rough. So my Brazilian friends actually mobilized the President of Brazil who, in turn, called Ambassador Gordon to ask him to leave one Pat Nieburg in Brazil. The Ambassador was somewhat surprised by this call -- possibly suspecting that I had initiated this action -- but firmly told the Brazilians, "Sorry, but my President needs him in Vietnam." But I must admit I was touched by this demonstration of friendship by Brazilians in the highest echelons of the media and government.

Just the same, within five days I left Brazil and was on my way to Vietnam. To be specific, I was on my way to Pleiku, a place I had never heard of, nor knew where exactly to locate it on a map. Nor did I know what the job of Senior Field Representative, JUSPAO, for II Corp, meant. I ultimately found out -- because essentially I created the job (it was a new position) -- but not because anyone anywhere really told me, let alone briefed me on what my objectives were to be. But Vietnam, I am afraid, is too long a story to cover here. It would require a separate interview.

Q: Did you have any combat experience during your stay there in Vietnam?

NIEBURG: Yes, on numerous occasions. I was in various scraps that I, in a way, would almost prefer to forget today and was shot at more than once. But one of the things that I did want to point out is that for the Vietnamese -- at least during that particular time -- how important it was to have security in their particular location. And I remember going out on a one week patrol with a Green Beret patrol which was a civic action group rather than one of trying to ambush Viet Cong. We went into the villages and the medics would render medical assistance. They would show people how to dig a well. And I'm impressed to this very day how appreciative these villagers were, because these were solutions to practical problems of real needs that these special action teams, civic action teams, performed. It was also a test of my own mettle because I was not the youngest at this particular time. And to slush through the jungle 20 miles to 25 miles a day is not an easy task. But it was one of the most rewarding experiences that one can have.

I remember another instance which I should mention here because it showed part of the operations of JUSPAO or USIA there. It was during the siege of a provincial capital which was just south of where I was located. I had gone there because we had intelligence that there was an impending attack by the Viet Cong. And indeed it came. I will never forget it because the Viet Cong used elephants with grapple hooks to attack the strong points in the barbed wire.

During that particular, eight hour, night of fighting, I flew a relay plane, flew in a relay plane I should say, relaying messages. We also had prepared, and that was part of the function that we had in support of the military, surrender leaflets that the Viet Cong could hold up to surrender to the military -- to our military -- when they came close to the wire. Well, I was back on the ground after a very heavy night of fighting and we had repulsed the attack when a second wave of Viet Cong came. Many of them held up the surrender leaflets.

But what happened is that after that heavy night of fighting, understandably probably, there was so much nervousness among the defenders that fire was opened, and a lot of people were killed right at the barbed wire -- still clutching the surrender leaflets. Well, you can say that can happen in the heat of combat, but I can also tell you that set back military operation in terms of getting surrenders or chieu hois for many, many weeks to come because the experience was that the people did have surrender leaflets and were never really given the chance.

Now -- whether the military could have given them the chance and taken the risk of possibly being overrun -- I'm not trying to be the judge. In the heat of the battle much is understandable. But one thing is sure, that in terms of psychological warfare, surrender leaflets did not work for quite a while to come.

Q: After you had been out there in the boondocks did you then get transferred to Saigon and work there for a while?

NIEBURG: Indeed, they pulled me in after a while -- toward the end of my tour to Saigon and tried to take advantage of some of my Latin and other foreign experience and languages. I was put in charge primarily of visiting foreign press. And I remember, since I had had the experience with the Green Berets, going out with a team of Venezuelan cameramen, television cameramen.

Q: Oh, I remember that. I was in Caracas then.

NIEBURG: And showing them around and showing them what really was the contradiction of Vietnam -- and talking to the foreign press whether they were German or Dutch or Venezuelan or what have you. These people would say to me, "what you say is contradictory." The minute they made that statement to me I would say, "ah, this is your first sign of wisdom. Because in Vietnam you learn to live with contradiction." The reason that I say this is that you will go from a combat zone where you're actually being shot at whether by small arms fire or by mortar, and then you go up to a place like Dalat and other provinces and there you would see, at the university, scientists working on an atom reactor as though there were no war at all. There was a normal market. There was normal life going on. And at night, sometimes fighting would break out.

So the contradiction of combat and what was normal was always present. As was the strange fact that during the time that I was there the one thing that did not happen that usually occurs in war ravaged areas, there was no famine. There was no hunger. Because the Vietnamese grow a great deal on their land, even in the arid areas. There was always enough to eat. And it wasn't just because the U.S. would send aid in terms of rice. A lot was grown and their diet was basically a good diet.

And I remember one thing. The famous Vietnamese fish sauce called Nuocmom, you know, which smells terribly but tastes very well was one of the main ingredients to give them a balanced diet because it contained a lot of protein. People ate a lot of it. So, basically between fruit and fish, and what they could grow on the land, there was no starvation. And that, at least, was something to be thankful for.

Q: I recall I think it was that first meeting, he was a motion picture producer and television producer. He went back to Venezuela and his films were shown on television in Caracas and he had a special supplement in one of the leading daily newspapers and so forth. That was an excellent USIS project on both ends.

NIEBURG: I felt that I was somewhat productive in that particular area because I could do something; a great deal, for example, with some Dutch newspaper people who since have become very good personal friends; with some of the Germans who came out. So it was an international effort. But while you couldn't say -- it would be hard to make the general statement -- that it brought support for the U.S. position, it certainly mitigated against some of the great criticism that existed during that particular time.

Q: Sort of wrap up here on Vietnam, would you like to make some comments about looking at it in perspective now, the whole experience and our involvement there?

NIEBURG: Let me just say very quickly in 1972 I was fortunate in attending the Senior Seminar. There were 17 of us seminarians who had served in Vietnam from the period of 1944 to what was then 1972. All people with different perspectives and different experiences and different functions in Vietnam. We tried very hard to draw on the lessons. One of the things that we agreed to -- there was a whole range of people from super-doves through super-hawks represented in that particular group -- that, given the circumstances that the United States was in, given the information that was available to policymakers at any one moment of life (without benefit of hindsight) we would make the same mistake again. We also found -- and there was no disagreement among us -- that not only were the motives of the policymakers justified and honorable, but that the best judgment was exercised with the information available. And we considered not only Vietnam, but what was going on in Indonesia, what was going on in Europe or other parts of the Far East.

It wasn't a question of war-mongering. It was truly a situation where the facts as they appeared at a specific time could not be projected into the ultimate result that we finally experienced. But I think in retrospect if you ask me, "am I supporter of ..what went on in Vietnam" I will give an unqualified yes with one exception. That was the frustration that I think all of us experienced, that the political imperatives in the United States were such that when you started any program you had to show progress, or success within 48 hours, or else the program was abandoned. The one lesson that I think that we learned in Vietnam or should have learned is that we never even succeeded in either validating or proving wrong the programs that we introduced. Because none of them were carried out to the logical end. And that was one of the tragedies. We jumped from horse to horse to horse without ever really knowing where we were going, knowing what we'd done right or what we'd done wrong.

Q: Pat, on your next assignment, that was Germany, and by then you were somewhat of a Vietnamese expert having lived and worked there during the Vietnam War, did you use this background on your assignment to Bonn?

NIEBURG: Indeed it turned out that I would. But I should say to you while I was "rewarded" with a Bonn assignment, so was the ambassador in Vietnam Henry Cabot Lodge, I had hoped to escape from him because I had a run in with him in Saigon during a cocktail party -- and there were quite a number of those amongst the Saigon warriors, ..as we called them. I had been imbibing a little bit more than I should have, felt no pain. And I talked to the Ambassador. And I asked him, Mr. Ambassador, do you remember when you were running for Vice President in the 1960 campaign? And he said, sure. I said, well, I was running for Congress at that particular time and you came to my district and talked. I was a Democrat. And after you came to my district I think I picked up a couple of hundred votes.

Well, he looked at me and he did not feel amused at all. I had felt no pain. I didn't give it any further thought. But you can imagine that when I was transferred to Bonn I was rather pleased to escape Ambassador Lodge. But lo and behold he too was rewarded for his faithful service in Vietnam and became Ambassador to Bonn. Since I was information officer, and also press attaché, my job also involved some speech writing. I remember being called to his office to discuss a speech. He saw me. He said, not that man. Get him out of my office. I could hear him today because I was so pleased. Speech writing was not one of my favorite occupations. So I was relieved of that particular duty.

While I was in Germany -- because of my relationship with Ambassador Lodge -- I tried to spend as much time out of the office as I could. Actually I arranged for a very extensive, almost continuous on-going lecture program on Vietnam and Vietnamese problems and questions. I lectured at universities, at political clubs, at civic organizations. I remember very vividly being invited by the student body of the Free University of Berlin to talk about Vietnam. When I arrived, there were police. There were police dogs. There was a huge banner of the Viet Cong. And there was a very rowdy group of students and they did not want to let me speak. Which was all right with me, but they had invited me to come in the first place.

They told me, dammit, we know this is a bunch of lies and we don't want to hear about Vietnam. We want you to talk about the Brazilian government's genocide of the Amazon Indians. Well, that may have sounded facetious. But I told them that I was quite willing and quite prepared to talk to them since I had served in Brazil. That ended the argument. I must say I never got to give my speech on Brazilian Indians in the Amazon Basin because the crowd got so unruly. Eggs were thrown. Objects were thrown. I was ultimately rescued by the police and their dogs and went back to my hotel.

That was not one of my more successful lecture pursuits. But I lectured widely and I hope judiciously in the sense that I came prepared with a great deal of ..background material, of history and tried to really give a historical approach to these various problems and to defend U.S. Administration policies as best as I could. There was a lot of logic to it. Certainly my heart was in it. So the Agency actually saw fit to reward me for this particular effort.

Q: This was in what year?

NIEBURG: That was in '66 to '69.

Q: Did you lecture in German?

NIEBURG: In German, yes. Since I am bilingual in German. That surprised many of the audience. Of course, they all remarked that I had somewhat of a Prussian accent which is quite true.

G. CLAY NETTLES
II Corps, USAID
Lam Dung (1965-1967)

George Clay Nettles was born in 1932 in Alabama. He attended the University of Alabama for both a bachelors and a law degree after serving in the US Army. Nettles joined the Foreign Service in 1957 and served overseas in Japan, Vietnam, Venezuela, Lebanon, Pakistan, Zaire, Turkey and Saudi Arabia as well as attending the NATO Defense College. Nettles was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1997.

Q: So you went to Vietnam, and you went right out to the provinces, or did you spend some time in Saigon?

NETTLES: I spent three days in Saigon. I was the only one in our group that had been to Saigon before. When I was in Japan, I took a vacation and went to Saigon. A group of us from my class had arranged a meeting at a very good restaurant I remembered. We had a really magnificent dinner. At that time, it was the most expensive dinner I remember that I'd ever had. But all of us were quite happy to pay it, because we didn't know where we were going exactly or what we would be doing.

Q: So all during this training period, you were the expert on Vietnam; you had been to Saigon. You were the only one.

NETTLES: I'd only been to Saigon for two or three days, but at least I had been there. The very first night I was in Saigon when I came back, I was invited to a big cocktail party given by the admin. counselor. At this party, I was talking to an officer from the political section of the embassy, and he asked what I was doing. I said, "Well, I'm on detail to AID, and I'm going to be assigned to II Corps." As you know, there were four divisions, known as corps, in Vietnam. II Corps was basically the central part.

And the political officer said, "That's too bad. We expect II Corps to fall within a few weeks, and we'll probably lose a few people."

Well, that was my introduction. The situation, especially in the highlands, was desperate at that time. Someone compared the situation to a poker game in which one side had won, meaning the Viet Cong, but before they could pick up the chips that were lying there on the table, we changed the rules of the game by sending in combat troops. It was so bad that gasoline that was sent to Pleiku, one of the big U.S. bases in the highlands, had to go through Viet Cong roadblocks, and we had to pay a tax on American military fuel to get to go through the roadblocks.

Q: To the Viet Cong.

NETTLES: They had to pay a tax to the Viet Cong at the Viet Cong roadblocks. Now, of course, it was paid by Vietnamese contractors, the U.S. military didn't directly pay the tax, but indirectly they did. I arrived in July of '65, and the first U.S. troops arrived there in June, just a few weeks before I did. They, for the most part, were in I Corps, which was the extreme northern part, and then later they came further south and west. I was assigned to Lam Dung Province, which is right in the center of the highlands. There were never any U.S. combat troops there, only advisors, while I was in Lan Dung.

Q: In the period that you were there, or ever?

NETTLES: There could have been some later. During the period I was there, there were never any U.S. combat troops other than advisors. I was in charge of the AID program, as I said. Later, they consolidated the various American groups in the field. The USIS (USIA officer today) might have responsibility for two or, in my case, even three provinces, and there would be a resident CIA officer. Of course, the military was by far the largest. They had about 30 advisors within the provincial capital where I was. All of us were separate but equal. Later, USIS, AID, CIA, and the military were combined and were known as MACV. Usually, the senior American military advisor would be the MACV head in the province, but occasionally, it would be an AID officer. But they were all separate when I was there.

Q: So that meant, when you were there as the AID representative in the province, you would report to Saigon?

NETTLES: No, I would report to Na Trang, which was the headquarters for AID within II Corps, and then they would report to Saigon.

Q: And you also had an advisory liaison responsibility with the provincial governor?

NETTLES: Yes, but also with every division of the provincial government, such as education, agriculture, and rural development. We even had a program, Chu Huo, to encourage Viet Cong to defect. Now AID provided support for most of these Vietnamese government agencies. A hundred percent of the budget, for example, for Chu Huo programs came from AID, but a relatively small percentage of the support for the educational bureau was AID. For the most part, the support was in kind rather than in cash. For example, we would provide bags of cement or roofing materials or bulgur, which is a type of wheat.

Q: And your job was to facilitate all of this flow and to deal with problems.

NETTLES: That's right, and constantly planning for what was to be done the next year. We would work very closely with the division chief to see that the programs were effective and to see that the material was used properly.

When I arrived in Lam Dung Province, the very first night, I was invited to a party given for the head of U.S. military, who was leaving. He commented, "Tomorrow, I'm going back to the States. People will ask me about the war in Vietnam. But all I can tell them is that there are 52 provinces. And I can only tell them a little about the war in Lam Dung Province."

And that was very true. My experience the entire 18 months in Vietnam was in Lam Dung Province. And Lam Dung was not typical. For one thing, two thirds of the people there were refugees who had come from North Vietnam in 1954, at the time of the partition of Vietnam, and were staunchly anti-Communist. They were very receptive to what we were trying to do.

About a third of the people in the province, though, were Montagnards. And the Montagnards were in various degrees of civilization. Those in Lam Dung Province were very primitive. I would say they weren't even in the Iron Age.

Q: What would you say about the caliber of the Vietnamese officials that you worked with in the province?

NETTLES: I found them, for the most part, very impressive. And one must remember, too, that despite the American casualties, the Vietnamese consistently had far higher casualties. In fact, their casualties were usually about five times what ours were. That tends to be overlooked by a lot of the people.

Q: Were the officials honest? Was there a lot of corruption evident?

NETTLES: I did not see any. I remember, though, we had one province chief who, when he arrived, told me and the senior military advisor, "Gentlemen, you don't have to worry about me. I've been province chief twice before. I've made my money." But I never saw any corruption. That was my job, to run the AID program, and I think we could account for all of the funds and material that we received. And I did not see any misuse.

Sometimes, though, things might require a little explanation. I remember one of the programs that AID sponsored were self-help programs. Usually, these were wells for the small villages, or a small bridge, something like that. But the first thing the province chief wanted to do was to build a tennis court. I protested, and he said, "This is very important. It's not for me. It's for all of the government employees. The roads have been cut. It's impossible for them to get out to go to Saigon anymore, or to go anywhere. I think this will be essential for morale." And he was correct. It was used by the lower- ranking bureaucrats, and it was used properly.

Q: The province chief was not from the local area, he was sent in by Saigon. He was a civilian or a military person?

NETTLES: Military. All the province chiefs, to my knowledge, were military. There may have been some civilians, but I never learned of any.

Q: If you wanted to go to Saigon, how would you get there?

NETTLES: Normally, I would go in on an Australian Caribou, a Canadian-made plane. But the Australian government was involved in the war effort in Vietnam, and basically what they did was to furnish military transports. They provided cargo flights to six provinces in II Corps. It was three days a week, and the last stop was in Lam Dung Province. So it was very easy for me to get into Saigon. Now if I wanted to go back on a military transport, I had to do it in reverse and make five stops before I got there. So I tried to get a flight some other way. The U.S. military had frequent flights in and out, and they were good about letting me know when one might be going directly. I don't believe I ever made that circuit with six stops before getting back. The roads in my area were controlled by the Viet Cong.

Q: The full route.

NETTLES: Yes. AID had its own planes. For example, they would provide one for me to go into their headquarters about once a month, to go over all the accounting. They were very strict about that type of thing.

Q: Did you have to spend a lot of time taking care of visitors who would come to your province?

NETTLES: Well, we did have a number of visitors. Marietta Tree, for example, came through. I had a good cook, and word got out that I was happy to receive visitors and served a good meal... And we had an interesting program. So we got more visitors than we might have otherwise.

Q: How about the Viet Cong? How present were they in the province?

NETTLES: There were very few local Viet Cong, but the composition of the population of the province was not typical of the country as a whole. However, the Ho Chi Minh Trail went through the province, so there were quite a few at the time. We would get reports when large units were going through. We knew that the Viet Cong could always take the province any time they wanted to, but we didn't think they could hold it. But we were constantly aware they were there. For example, my first month, they blew up my house. That makes an impression on you.

Q: Were you in the house?

NETTLES: Yes. And to be awakened by the roof falling on top of you is a little disconcerting. There were three of us in the house. At that time, I was the assistant AID provincial representative. Three of us were sharing the house, the provincial representative, myself, and a summer intern from Berkeley.

Q: The AID representative.

NETTLES: Right. The house was part of an agricultural college, which had been built some years before by AID. There were three bedrooms in the house, across the back of the house. My bedroom was the middle bedroom. The only hotel in town sold rooms by the hour, so we put up any visitors in our guest bedroom, which had a single bed and double-decker bunk. This happened, as I say, my first month. The only north-south road in Vietnam went through the province. And the week before I arrived, the Viet Cong blew up the two main bridges on this road. We had experts from the U.S. military come and look at it, and they said that it was a really professional job. They said, you don't know how difficult it is to blow up a big bridge and do it properly. Well, they obviously had left behind explosives, because a week later, there was an attempt to blow a very small bridge. The bridge wasn't damaged, but two of the people doing it were killed.

Well, some of these leftover explosives they decided they would be used to take out us, the three American civilians. They planted the charge on a tripod against the corner room where the summer intern was staying, perhaps because it had three beds. The other two rooms each had a single bed. We were very lucky, because, as the U.S. military experts told us, they used probably about 20 pounds of plastique, a type of explosive. They put it on a tripod, but they didn't try to shape it, so about 90 percent of it just dissipated. Had they shaped it, they said there wouldn't have been anything left of the house or of us. As it was, the blast blew out most of the back wall and part of the roof. My bed was in a corner, right below a large picture window, and the picture window was blown over me and blew out the next wall. The wall between my room and the summer intern's was blown out also. The electricity went off at 10 o'clock every night, so I always slept with a flashlight right by my bed, and, miraculously, it was still there. I reached down and found it. Ted, the summer intern, was screaming, because he thought he was on fire from the blast. He could only see red. And I thought his screams were charging VC (Viet Cong). My initial reaction was, this couldn't be happening to me, I'm a Foreign Service officer. Well, Bob, the AID provincial representative, said he was alright. And even though I was concerned about VC, I didn't think I could let Ted, the intern, bleed to death. He said he was hurt. So I snapped on my flashlight for just a second or two, because I knew it would make us a better target for VC that I thought might still be there. Ted said he would never forget that I exclaimed, "My lord, there are no walls!" Ted looked like raw hamburger, from his knees down and his chest up. He had heard a noise and was sitting on the side of his bed when the blast went off. There wasn't a piece of his bed left as large as the palm of my hand. But other than one very bad cut on his instep and a ruptured eardrum, all of his wounds turned out to be superficial. They were puncture wounds, so they weren't bleeding.

So, again, being concerned about VC, I wanted to do something to let them know that we weren't helpless, so I told Ted, just stay there. He had been thrown into a corner when his bed blew into pieces. I was going to throw a grenade, but our grenades had been in the top of the closet, which was all blown out, so those were gone. My carbine at the bottom of the closet was still there, so Bob and I fired a few rounds from our carbines, just to let the VC know we were alive and well.

Then we moved Ted to the living room, the least damaged part of the house, without any light, of course, and put him on the sofa, not realizing that it had been covered with broken glass, and he got a few more cuts from that. Fortunately, not serious, either.

The U.S. military compound, with about 30 military advisors, was about 300 yards away. We thought they'd be over to help us, but they weren't about to leave their compound at night. They came over at daybreak. The blast occurred about 10:45 pm.

Q: Even though they had heard the explosion.

NETTLES: Yes. But they weren't getting out of their compound until the dawn. It was a long night. But it all worked out fine.

I should add that Ted, the summer intern, recovered fully, and went back to Berkeley.

Q: So you had to find a new place to live.

NETTLES: That's right. And taking advantage of the fact that we had been blown up, I told Bob, the provincial representative, that I would arrange for a new house. Bob was a Mennonite and had previously been in Vietnam under a Mennonite assistance program to the Montagnards. He had had no experience in dealing with U.S. bureaucracy. I hadn't had much, but I had had enough to realize this was an opportunity to find a good house. So I leased the largest house available in town. Only the province chief had a larger house. At the time, AID complained that the rent was rather expensive. But with inflation, it quickly became a bargain. It was quite useful because we had many official visitors and had quite a few visitors, and we had a place where we could put them up. So it all worked out very well.

Q: Did the Viet Cong keep coming back and doing this kind of thing again? Or was that just one episode early that didn't continue?

NETTLES: That was the only instance of that type that happened while I was there. It was unique at that time in Vietnam. Some AID people were killed or captured, but during the period that I was there, they were not singled out. They happened to have been in the wrong place at the wrong time, but there were no deliberate, specific attacks on Americans. I believe it stayed that way right up until the Tet Offensive.

Q: In '68.

NETTLES: I'm not certain of that, but I do know, the time that I was there, '65 and '66, I don't think there was any single, specific attack upon American civilians...

Q: You, Clay, said that you were the assistant provincial representative for a while, and then became the representative. How much time did you serve in both those capacities? And how did you happen to become the senior representative? Did you have an assistant at that point, or were you the only one?

NETTLES: I was the assistant for about six months, and then I was provincial representative for a year. I did not have a formal assistant, but instead I had a young lieutenant as my assistant for the second year, a great guy. He was a former football player at the University of Florida, who had majored in agriculture. The U.S. military advisor was rather annoyed that a lieutenant was assigned to report to me rather than to him, so he said, "All right, he's your responsibility completely. You can take care of him logistically." So he lived in this large house that I had. He did a very effective job.

He was a perfect example that although language training is very helpful; it's not essential. He did not have any language training, but had the ability to identify with people and was extremely effective. Of course, he had a Vietnamese assistant.

Later, an 18-man U.S. military unit was sent to the province and reported to me rather than the military advisor. This was part of the MILSAP program of military physicians and assistants. Normally, there were 18 in each unit -- two doctors and about 16 corpsmen.

Q: They were physicians, medical people.

NETTLES: All were medical -- two or three doctors, and the rest corpsmen. In our province (at that time, I think it was unique), we split the MILSAP unit up. We had 12 in the provincial capital, and six in a district capital.

Once a week, I would go to the district capital. AID would provide a helicopter once a week. It was actually two helicopters, because the helicopter for transportation came with another one, which was a gun ship. A gun ship was an armor-plated helicopter that simply was so heavy it couldn't take any passengers or cargo. But they flew together just in case one was forced down, the other could provide cover, or help, possibly even rescue people.

So, once a week, I would go to the district capital.

I would arrive, and the very first thing I would do would be go to a local restaurant, which was run by a Frenchman, who had a Vietnamese wife, and tell him that I would be there for lunch with the people who were traveling with me. He would send his wife to the market to buy whatever was available. You didn't order, because you didn't know what was available, but you knew you would have a good meal.

Then I would go to see the military unit, the MILSAP team, because they were my responsibility.

Then I would begin a tour program with the Vietnamese district chief, who was very good. Unfortunately, the month after I left, he and 43 other people were killed in an ambush.

Then I would have a late lunch. Usually a few French people would be there, and I'd talk to them. When the day was over, I would have talked first to the Americans, then to the Vietnamese, and then to the French. If they were all saying the same thing, I thought, well, perhaps I know what's going on.

Q: Let me ask two questions. First, tell me a little bit more about the MILSAP team that reported to you. What was their function and purpose, to provide medical assistance to you?

NETTLES: No, to the Vietnamese, strictly the Vietnamese.

Q: For public health and vaccinations and that sort of thing?

NETTLES: In this province, the medical facilities were primitive in the extreme and transportation to large cities was difficult.

Q: Basic health care.

NETTLES: Right, for the entire province.

Q: My second question is, you talked about going to this district capital and talking to all these different people, and maybe you had a good feel for what was happening locally. How much of your function, your responsibility was reporting to Saigon or whoever about conditions in the province?

NETTLES: Once a month, each agency in the field would get a joint report. These agencies were the U.S. military, AID (I being the AID representative), CIA, and USIA. Well, USIA's representative had two other provinces and only spent about one week a month in the province, so he obviously couldn't write the report. The CIA representative was good, but he was one of those people who just had a great deal of difficulty writing or drafting. And, as you know, we Foreign Service officers are supposed to be good drafters. If we aren't, we're in trouble. But the military, who had some very capable drafters, would insist that I write the reports, because the provincial U.S. military said, you can send it directly to Saigon. In fact, you must send it directly to Saigon, because we cannot do that. We would have to send it to our headquarters, and they would send it back, because we reported the situation as we saw it, and the situation was pretty grim. The U.S. military told me, "If we say that we've got a problem, then that's an admission that we're not doing our job properly. We cannot write anything negative. However, we can sign off on what you write."

I remember specifically, once, and this was when a unit was ambushed in our province. There were approximately 50 people killed, including a U.S. officer who had been at Fort Bragg with me. They were killed within six kilometers of where I lived. It was an ambush... they were just wiped out, and no Viet Cong were killed. Well, the local U.S. military reported on it, and the U.S. military report came back. Headquarters said, "Look for enemy bodies."

The local U.S. military sent it back again and said, "We looked, and we didn't find any."

And the report came back again from military headquarters, saying, "Look again."

Then the local U.S. military reported that artillery fire and an air strike had probably resulted in at least 150 enemy killed and 200 enemy wounded. This was, of course, strictly fiction.

Q: But it satisfied the higher headquarters?

NETTLES: That's right and, I'm afraid, was indicative of much of the military reporting.

Q: You were there in Lang Dong province about a year and a half? You left in the summer of '65?

NETTLES: No, I arrived in the summer of '65 and I was there for 18 months.

Q: When did you leave there, the end of '66?

NETTLES: Yes.

Q: What was the situation at the time you left as compared to when you arrived? Had it gone downhill steadily?

NETTLES: No, I arrived shortly after the first U.S. combat troops arrived. Had they not arrived, all II Corps would have fallen within a matter of weeks. As I mentioned earlier, that was what I was told upon my initial arrival by someone in the Political Section that they expected II Corps to fall. It was very clear when I left 18 months later that as long as the U.S. troops were there, the country was not about to be taken over by the Communists. The question was what would happen when and if U.S. troops left. The U.S. involvement was apparently a limited relation and the goal being to train the Southern Vietnamese so that they could sustain themselves after we left. Unfortunately, it turned out that they could not.

Q: This happened well after your period there. You went on, as we will hear, to a number of other assignments. Did you ever think about volunteering or asking for another assignment in Vietnam with your language? It sounds like a pretty positive experience that you had there overall.

NETTLES: It was a positive experience. I found the Vietnamese to be a very sympathetic people and I liked them. However, and I give the State Department sent out officers to the field to rate all of us on detail to AID and we got a formal efficiency report. That was toward the end of my 18-month tour. The senior officer who did the report counseled me and said, "I recommend that you do not extend." I was thinking about extending for a year because I enjoyed the work and I thought I was doing a good job, but he said "you are still a junior officer and it would be good experience, but counting the year of training you had, you will have been out two and a half years and you really need more experience in the normal career type work. Later if you want to come back to Vietnam, fine, but you need more experience before that." I took his advice and applied for the Economic Training Program at the Foreign Service Institute in Washington. I had enjoyed my economic-commercial assignment in Venezuela, but I knew if I were to work within that field in the State Department, I had to have more training so I took the FSI course which was at that time a six months course. Then I had an assignment in the bureau doing economic reporting in Latin America area. After that I had a year at Harvard studying.

ROBERT B. OAKLEY
Political Officer
Saigon (1965-1967)

Ambassador Robert B. Oakley was born in 1931 in Texas. He graduated from Princeton University in 1952 and served in the US Navy until 1955. Oakley joined the Foreign Service in 1957 and served overseas in Sudan, the Ivory Coast, Vietnam, France, Lebanon, and as Ambassador to Zaire, Somalia and Pakistan. In Washington DC, Oakley served in the Office of UN Political Affairs, the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, as the Coordinator for Counter-Terrorism and for the National Security Council. Oakley was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kenney and Thomas Stern in 1992.

Q: In 1965, you were assigned to Saigon. How were you so lucky?

OAKLEY: It was totally unexpected. In the first place, I was a French language officer. Secondly, Cleo Noel was the Personnel Officer responsible for staffing of Far East posts. We had talked in 1964 and he asked me whether I was looking for something different outside of Africa. In fact, I was getting a little tired of African Affairs, having spent a lot of time on its issues. Cleo suggested that I look to Vietnam where he felt there were some very interesting jobs. This was just at the beginning of our major involvement in that country. So I consulted Phyllis and she was willing to go. That was supposed to take the Oakley family to Saigon.

However, between the time the assignment was made and my departure, the security situation in Saigon changed dramatically. Families were no longer allowed to accompany official personnel. Phyllis was greatly displeased by this turn of events, but we finally agreed that the best thing for her and the children would be to for them to go to Shreveport, LA, where I had grown up and where I had a lot of friends. But it was a strange place for her. Those two years of separation - the first in our married life - were not particularly enjoyable for her or me. But we were sufficiently impressed by the fact that our soldiers were actually risking their lives in Vietnam and could not see any way around the moral dilemma that my refusal to go to Saigon would have created. I would not be subjected to physical danger unlike our soldiers; they too were separated from their families and we didn't see how I could now seek another assignment with a clear conscience. We weren't happy with the prospect of separation, but felt that it was part of a Foreign Service career commitment. Fortunately for all of us, my best friend from childhood, Stanton Dossett, and his wife and children lived across the street from Phyllis and Tom and Mary. They probably saved Phyllis' family and my marriage.

When I arrived in Saigon, I became one of Phil Habib's "boys" - a member of a 26 man Political Section. That was an experience! I was first assigned to work with John Burke on internal political affairs; we were part of the Embassy's Political Section under Phil Habib. Someone should write up the history of that section; it was absolutely extraordinary. Dave Lambertson, Dick Teare, John Negroponte, Paul Hare, Bill Marsh, Tom Corcoran, Bob Miller, John Burke, Freeman Matthews, Richard Smyser, and Ken Quinn were all members of the section at the time; most of them rose to be ambassadors. They were outstanding in their knowledge of Vietnam, SE Asia, and Asia generally, and also innovative, intellectually curious and excellent at interpersonal relations. Dick Holbrooke and Frank Wisner were working as special assistants to Ambassadors Lodge and Porter, but were really part of Phil's group. The section included a special section of language officers who reported on activities in the provinces; they went out in the countryside for 2-3 weeks at a time to get first-hand views of the situation and then came back to write up their reports. These collected reports provided the most accurate information of activities and trends in the countryside. Too bad they were largely ignored at the policy level in Washington. In fact, worse than ignored, they were denounced by agencies other than State that found them too pessimistic. Eventually, the U.S. Pacific Command and the Pentagon succeeded in having the provincial reports stopped and the section disbanded on the spurious grounds that the reporting was too subjective. They were replaced with a new, objective measure of the situation in the countryside, which came to be called the Hamlet Evaluation Program. Everyone recalls that it measured the provinces as over 95 percent secure and stable just before the Tet Offensive.

Our living conditions in those days were very good. We lived in a compound of five houses; Habib, naturally, occupied the one in the middle and his acolytes lived around him. The security situation was well in hand and didn't have any fears for our security even though we were not heavily guarded. The Ambassador was Henry Cabot Lodge - his second tour. The Deputy Ambassador was Bill Porter - in addition to his DCM duties, he was also the head of CORDS (a program to try to stabilize the provinces with assistance). I found my assignment fascinating - very exciting. My work was on internal Vietnamese political affairs. I got to Saigon shortly after the old Embassy had been blown up and left just before the new one suffered the same fate. Fortunately, the old building had been repaired by the time I arrived.

As I said, I worked on matters relating to the political situation in Saigon. I was supposed to try to understand and analyze South Vietnamese politics. Before my arrival, there was a period of "rolling coups." - that is one government after another. My job also included working with the U.S. military to try to understand the political role of the Vietnamese military. They had a tremendous amount of political information but did not understand it. I remember one day going to MACV - the U.S. military headquarters - to see a couple of generals. I needed some information about some Vietnamese officers which I thought they might have. They met my inquiries with the answer: "But they are involved in military affairs; they have nothing to do with politics. We can't answer your questions and give you any information." I was pretty sure that the Americans knew, but were not prepared to provide it to me. I think it was clear to many of us that the American military was quite aware of the political activities of their Vietnamese counterparts, but were not ready to share their knowledge with the Embassy.

My dealings with the U.S. military were primarily because I was assigned as head of a committee dealing with the Montagnards (tribal people living in the highlands who worked with the U.S.). The committee had on it representatives from the military, CIA and AID. The purpose of the committee was to coordinate all the programs and activities that the U.S. government carried on in support of the Montagnards. That brought me into contact with the U.S. military; tangentially, I had contacts with the military on other issues as well. We worked very diligently on this coordinating committee because we found out that - unconsciously - our Special Forces and the CIA had picked up where the French had left off, treating the Montagnards as a special group, providing assistance and protection far more generously than that received by other indigenous groups; in fact, we protected the Montagnards against the South Vietnamese government. One day, we attended a graduation ceremony at the Montagnard training center, a group trained by the U.S. was ready to go into the field. It was a big event with lots of fanfare and pomp - wives were invited to attend. Ambassador Lodge was there for the U.S..

At one moment during the day, we noticed all of a sudden a lot of scurrying around; people bringing messages to Prime Minister Nguyen Cao Ky. It turned out that a number of Montagnard units had rebelled; they had pillaged a number of South Vietnam towns and had then retreated into the countryside. These units happened to be crack units that we had trained to fight the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. They had rebelled against their South Vietnamese leadership. When members of one of these units returned to town, they were arrested and put in jail along with a U.S. Army major who was with the Montagnards. The major had been assigned as an advisor to these units and in an act of loyalty decided to go to jail with "his" men to try to protect them from any retribution that the Vietnamese might have wished to mete out. He was upset that the Montagnards had been arrested. Our relationship with the Montagnards had reached the point at which we not only treated them better than other indigenous groups; we in fact sheltered them, just as the French had done.

The events of that day made me become aware of what was going on generally. I recognized that we had fallen into the same mental trap as the French had and that instead of trying to bring about a rapprochement between the Vietnamese government and the Montagnards, we were continuing the policy of separation. We failed to realize that one day we would leave Vietnam and that made it imperative that the Montagnards and the Vietnamese be able to live together. So I took the issue up with Ambassador Lodge and the Embassy leadership. That brought the development of a new U.S. stand vis-a-vis the Montagnards and the establishment of the coordinating committee I chaired. As I suggested, our policy of treating the Montagnards differently from the Vietnamese just developed unconsciously and before we were aware of it, we were following the policies of the French. We did then make the conscious decision to bring the Vietnamese and Montagnards closer together, enabling us to abandon the role of intermediary which we - the U.S. military and the CIA - had unconsciously assumed. These two American agencies had trained the Montagnards, as they were supposed to do, but in the process had become so close to them that they became the protectors thereby perpetuating the French policy of separation. The Montagnards of course did not object to having this special status; they had become accustomed to their role during the French rule of Vietnam. In fact, they really didn't like the Vietnamese; so this separation suited them.

The internal political situation in Saigon was always full of intrigue. We didn't know as much about what was going on as we should have. That was the main reason that we were continually surprised by a new coup, which as I mentioned had happened frequently in the period preceding my assignment to Saigon. While I was there, Ambassador Lodge received orders from the White House to transform Vietnam into a democracy. Those instructions were passed on to Phil Habib and the Political Section. This seemed highly unrealistic but President Johnson insisted. I worked on that effort, which was an interesting experience. Phil and I along with a professor of political science from Penn State started a joint project with the South Vietnamese government. Our first objective was to write a draft constitution. That was followed by the election of a constituent assembly to ratify the document so as to make it the supreme law of the land. After that, there were presidential elections.

The Embassy trio - Habib, the professor and me - set to work and ended with a Vietnamese version of the U.S. Constitution. It had three separate power centers: the executive, the legislature and a judiciary. The president was to be elected by the Vietnamese voters. When we had finished with our draft, we sent it over to the Constituent Assembly which fiddled around with it. But the "fine tuning" did not change the essence of our draft. I must say that from the outset we did not think that a constitution based on Western principles was likely to work in an Eastern culture. The question for us was not would the new constitution be in effect while the U.S. was present in Vietnam, but what would happen after we left? The concepts underlying the document were alien to the Vietnamese and we did not give them a very great chance of becoming permanent. We did it because we were instructed to do so.

We then got the word from Washington that the presidential candidates would be General Thieu and Air Marshal Ky. This was somewhat contrary to our hopes. We had hoped that a fine civilian, Mr. Huang, would step up and become a candidate. But Washington felt that we could not afford to take any chances; i.e. we had to stick with those we knew. A new candidate would be unpredictable and Washington didn't want to take any risks. It was satisfied with the status quo and didn't want to rock the boat. We proceeded with elections and a new Constituent Assembly and President were elected. General Thieu was elected President.

I have been asked whether the approach we took to political reform in Vietnam bore any similarity to what General MacArthur did in Japan. We did not really review that experience primarily because the situations were so different. We occupied Japan and we were completely in charge of all governmental functions for a period after WW II. MacArthur had many experts on his staff who could not only develop appropriate legislative approaches, but could also over a period of time correct any processes that seemed ineffective. We in Vietnam, never did quite figure out what our role was. We were not an occupying power; we were allies, but how far did that allow us to interfere with domestic affairs? Were we the "big brothers" with all the responsibilities that that term often connotes? We were in fact ambivalent about our role and the South Vietnamese were not any clearer about this question than we were. I think that in the absence of a clear understanding of our role, the Vietnamese leaders manipulated us to a great extent; we did not ever manage to understand or lead them. Of course, the Vietnamese had had a lot more practice at manipulating Westerners - starting with their former colonial masters. But we created a situation which was neither fish or fowl. We left ourselves open to charges by Vietcong and their Hanoi masters that we were acting just like the French had during their colonial rule. It wasn't true because we never managed to achieve that level of influence because we wanted the Vietnamese to maintain a certain amount of sovereignty. So it was a strange situation. The Vietnamese played the "game" because it was obviously to their advantage; they adopted some of the outward attributes of democracy knowing full well that the full concept would never be acceptable to them. Of course, our role in selecting presidential candidates was hardly a model of democracy; the Vietnamese learned that lesson fast. In fact, once the South Vietnamese army leaders made their choice of winner known, that was it; he was elected. We all knew that Thieu was going to win.

Although I am not a cultural anthropologist, it was quite clear to everyone that often we and the Vietnamese talked past each other. For example, I remember the day when several mid-grade Vietnamese Army officers came to see Frank Wisner and myself. Frank at the time was working for Bill Porter. The officers asked us whether we realized what General Westmoreland was about to do. He was going to remove all Vietnamese troops from the front lines; they would be exclusively devoted to the pacification efforts. The front would be manned entirely by American and South Korean troops. These officers pointed out that regardless of our opinion of individual Vietnamese units, such a move on the part of Westmoreland would have a devastating effect on all Vietnamese troops. Their morale and self-image would be completely destroyed; the Americans were in fact saying that the Vietnamese were not good enough to fight their own war, fight for their own country. My answer was that they obviously had misunderstood the import of Westmoreland's concept; he and we felt that pacification was extremely important. Their comment was something along the lines: "For us and our men, it is the garbage detail!" One of the officer pointed out that he had been a regimental commander in an airborne division; he was then the chief of staff to Minister of Defense Co - who by the way was a complete crook. He said that the airborne men had a tremendous amount of pride; he thought that the airborne troops were still very good. There were other units that were mediocre and some that were poor, but he was sure that if Westmoreland followed through on his plans, all the South Vietnamese troops would end up being poor. There wouldn't be any left to fight. Frank Wisner and I understood the Vietnamese anxieties and agreed with them. We got Habib to support us. He got Ambassador Lodge to see Westmoreland and held a long meeting with him. At the end, Westmoreland said: "I am in charge of military operations in Vietnam. This is a military issue. I have the support of all of the Vietnamese command. End of conversation!" He did not have sufficient feel for Vietnamese "face saving" needs. Of course, later Westmoreland was replaced by General Abrams to "Vietnamize" the conflict, to bring the South Vietnamese army back into the war. That was too late because by that time there were no effective Vietnamese fighting forces left. Westmoreland's move destroyed the morale of the Vietnamese troops so that Abrams had nothing to work with when he arrived.

This story also illustrates the American command structure in Saigon. On "military" matters, the CINC [Commander-in-Chief] called the shots. The issue of what units would fight where was perceived to be a "military matter." Habib was frustrated by the situation. We understood that there were very few matters, if any, which were strictly "military." He and others like myself tried to interject ourselves when we thought that larger political objectives were at stake. We did our job as best we could, recognizing the limitations dictated by the situation. It is true that we managed to force some decisions to the Washington level and that would end the local debate. I should note that episodes such as the one I described seem to have been overlooked by McNamara in his book on Vietnam. I have mentioned CIA. I should note that the relationships between the Political Section and the Station were quite good, although we did not always agree with what they did. On a minor scale, I think they may have been undertaking actions which were not known to Ambassador Lodge, but this was not a major problem. There was one specific problem that we had. As I mentioned earlier, we received word from the White House that either Thieu or Ky would be South Vietnam's next President. The choice of the winner was to be left to the Vietnamese military command. CIA sources maintained that Ky was going to be the winner and so reported to Washington. We in the Political Section maintained that it would be Thieu.

John Negroponte was by this time working with me on internal Vietnamese political affairs. We were certain it would be Thieu because he was much more Vietnamese; Ky appeared to be much more western. I had left Saigon by the time the final choice was made, but John told me later that the last report from the CIA - still predicting Ky - was filed just at the time that Ambassador Lodge was called to a meeting with the military command at which he was told that its candidate would be Thieu. CIA had had a very close relationship with Ky for a long time; so they had a bias in his favor which undoubtedly colored their reporting.

When I left in 1967, I was not optimistic about Vietnam's future. I could not predict the outcome of that struggle, but I was less than sanguine about the possibility of a free South Vietnam - much less a democratic one. I remember one day attending a Westmoreland briefing as the representative of the Embassy. He was talking about building a large military complex in the Delta which would have cost millions and millions. At one moment, he looked at me - as if I were representing the enemy - and said: "If you think this is a waste of money, you are wrong! We will still be using this facility ten years from now." It was at that moment that I recognized that we had no strategy which would permit us to leave Vietnam under less than panic circumstances. It was inconceivable that any one could seriously believe that we would still have a major presence in Vietnam in ten years. I had a sinking feeling at that moment; the lack of an exit strategy did not bode well for the success of our efforts in Vietnam. Our military command at least and others as well did not have the slightest idea how to bring our involvement in Vietnam to a conclusion. That was a disturbing thought since I was certain that the American public would not support our involvement in Vietnam for anything close to another ten years. I am not sure that it took a rocket scientist to figure that out; I was only a mid-level political officer, but I knew that Westmoreland's statement lacked credibility.

Joe Alsop came to Saigon at one time. Many of my bosses were in Manila for a high level conference with LBJ. Alsop maintained that a major victory was just around the corner and that we would be leaving South Vietnam in triumph in six months' time. He and I had a very strong argument about that. I told him that I thought he had lost his mind. I may have expressed my doubts a little more vigorously than others, but I don't remember any great feeling of optimism in the Embassy about Vietnam's future. But we had not yet reached the point at which "exit strategies" were not only acceptable, but as is the case today, mandatory. There are some who will maintain that our effort to bring democracy to South Vietnam was in fact an "exit strategy." If we had been successful and if the concept would have won the "minds and hearts" of the Vietnamese, then perhaps those analysts would have been right. But in fact, beyond writing a new constitution, I don't remember any other efforts made by the U.S. to bring democracy to Vietnam. CORDS may have been thought to have been an effort along those lines, if you believe that bringing better administration is fundamental to democratic development by winning the loyalty of the population and reducing corruption. But I don't think the basic goal of CORDS was to bring democracy to Vietnam; it was designed to bring support to our friends in the government in Saigon. We did have democratization as a political goal, but our implementation efforts were very shallow and superficial. I suppose the Vietnamese themselves could have taken greater advantage of the opportunities for democratization that we would have supported, but when we write the constitution and dictate who should be the candidates for the highest office in the land, it is a little hard to fault the Vietnamese for not taking democratization a little more seriously. Our policy of democracy was not an "exit strategy"; I think it was a cynical move dictated primarily by U.S. domestic politics.

I might mention a couple of other efforts in which I was personally involved. We tried to establish a youth committee for younger Vietnamese - student leaders, recent graduates. I was personally interested in this project because it related to my interests in trying to do something about the city of Saigon. I spent a lot of time working with the Mayor and other city officials on the subjects related to the administration of Saigon. CORDS and AID focused on the rural areas and other cities besides Saigon. I thought that our target was somewhat misdirected because the real action was in Saigon where the politics was focused, where most of the people were. I thought it imperative that assistance be provided to Saigon because in addition to the problems it had under the French, it was being overwhelmed by a flow of refugees from the countryside. So I managed to get some assistance directed to improving the administration of the city, its public transportation, infrastructure, etc. AID helped us to get some projects going, even though its principal target was still the countryside.

I found a project headed by Charlie Sweet, an AID advisor, to be one of the most intriguing efforts. Together with Frank Wisner and Sweet we were able to get the Vietnamese themselves to establish self-help programs in the Saigon's outlying districts - 6, 7 and 8 - which were filled with refugees. Some of the former student leaders, who had led demonstrations against their government while at university, found a challenge in helping to bring some order to the chaotic situation in those districts. It was a satisfying experience for those young men and women. We worked with them to improve the infrastructure and housing conditions by trucking building materials to these young people in the middle of the night so our help would not be visible. At our request, Lodge issued an order that no Americans were to enter those districts without the explicit approval of his office. That insured that the effort would be seen as entirely Vietnamese. The young people managed to get the refugees to provide the "sweat" labor; they put up the housing. SEABEES would go in at night to lay the concrete slabs - the young people and the refugees didn't have enough skills to do that, but the Vietnamese built the rest of the houses. So it could be and was said that this was a Vietnamese self-help project, which I think was a very important symbol.

In fact, these self help measures assisted the inhabitants to take the political process into their own hands. In those three district, they held elections and voted for their own municipal officials. That did make the rest of the city officials very uneasy because the representatives of those three districts were not corruptible at all. As I said, most of them were student leaders who were not interested in "feathering their own nests." That made the others very nervous. They began to wonder what the Americans and the students were doing in these three districts. These new political development came to a crunch when the Tet offensive took place; it was that part of the city that we destroyed to get the Vietcong out of Saigon. That was most unfortunate. It put an end to what was an inspiring, growing project.

I just mention one incident which I believe is instructive for anyone trying to understand our role in Vietnam. On one occasion, a team from the Pentagon and CINCPAC came out. Habib was gone. I was the senior officer in the Political Section at the time. They presented a plan which would have changed the nature and methodology being used by the Provincial Reporting Section of our Office. Negroponte, Teare, Lambertson were part of that staff. Ken Quinn was a member of that section - he just went out as our Ambassador to Cambodia. All the members of that section spoke Vietnamese or Khmer. They would go into the countryside for 18-19 days and then return to Saigon to write their report which would take approximately a week and a half and then they would head back into the field. They gathered information about conditions and programs from whomever would talk to them - Vietnamese, Americans, civilians, military. Their reports provided us and Washington with a composite picture of the situation in particular provinces. It was not long before some of the other agencies staffs - CIA, military, army civilians, AID - began to mumble resentment about these reports. That was because the reports from our provincial reporting staff did not square with the usually optimistic and up-beat tones of the reports that the representatives of these other agencies were submitting to Saigon and Washington. So this Pentagon-CINCPAC team wanted to change our reporting system - they considered the reports to be "faulty." The team complained that our reports were "subjective"; they insisted that only "objective" measures be used to measure what progress we were making in the countryside. So I asked what the team suggested as "objective" criteria that might be used. The answer was a classic; I was told by the team that the war was progressing much more favorably for our side than our Embassy officers were reporting. They had looked at certain statistics such as the number of local officials killed or wounded; that number had dropped from the previous year and therefore they concluded, and thought that I would conclude, that the war was obviously going our way. I think the team was somewhat startled when we told them that the reason for that "improvement" was because the local officials had all moved back into safe military bases; there were in fact very few local officials left in the countryside. Their "cause and effect" analysis was completely mistaken; we just had to laugh. Unfortunately, these kinds of analyses led to the end of the Embassy provincial reporting and to the quantified "hamlet evaluation" program which was intended to prove how well pacification was working. It showed 96% success just prior to Tet. False premises lead to false conclusions!

In general I found the younger generation - the student leaders for example - much more progressive than the power structure. I was greatly impressed by the young people. They lived in those districts among the refugees. Initially, they viewed us as the "enemy"; when they saw that we were also interested in their agenda and were willing to give them support, their whole attitude towards us changed. Sweet worked with them constantly; there were some NGOs [non-governmental organizations] out there as well, but we tried to stay in the background as much as we could. We had no U.S. military involved nor any senior people from the U.S. civilian agencies. The emphasis was Vietnamese management and it worked. Perhaps even more importantly, the people who lived in those districts became strong supporters and vocal fans of the students, in part because the students withstood considerable pressure and intimidation from City Hall and other power centers. I suspect that we might find similar circumstances if in a large U.S. city run by a political machine all of a sudden finds wards declaring their independence and distancing themselves from City Hall.

There was no question that corruption ran rampant in the government. I remember one time Bob Komer coming out to Saigon; he gave us a briefing of Washington's views of the situation. During his presentation, he insisted that we should get rid of the corruption. I and some others asked him whether he wanted to get rid of the whole Vietnamese government? That upset him. But we kept insisting that Washington face reality; it had to understand and accept that most of the Vietnamese leadership was extremely corrupt. They were pocketing a lot of money. We named the Minister of Defense and others as illustrations. Washington knew that the Vietnam leadership and much of the bureaucracy was corrupt. But what to do about it was another question. Our only solution - inadequate at best - was to run our own programs as honestly as we could and to target areas that were likely to be less corrupt or quite clean like the three districts in Saigon I mentioned earlier.

Corruption is very hard to ferret out. If we are occupying a country, such as Japan, then it is possible to have control of the process. But where we are “advisors” at best, as we were in Vietnam, the best we could do is observe, preach and try to protect our own programs from the insidiousness of corruption. In Vietnam, we were trying to prop up a leadership and a process that was not able to gather sufficient popular support on its own; and therefore failed.

Occasionally I had an opportunity to discuss the Vietnam situation with American journalists. I had to use my own best judgement in those discussions; I was not under any censorship, but I certainly was not giving a prediction of gloom and doom. There was no “party” line, but I tried to stay as positive as I could. I think Habib certainly agreed with my assessment of the situation.

During my tour in Saigon, the Buddhists were a very important element in the political process. They were very much opposed to American involvement. At one point there was a civil war in Hue and Da Nang; some Vietnamese army units actually revolted against the central government; they were led by some Buddhists. So we had to keep a wary eye on the Buddhist monks. I find it interesting today to recollect this religious involvement because it comes as a great shock to the American public when it is mentioned that a major religion and its leaders - Islam - are involved in a political process. That is nothing new to those of us who watched the Buddhist monks leading political actions in Vietnam. Of course, we also used the Catholic Church in Poland to put pressure on the Soviets to leave that country. The use of religion for political purposes has a centuries long history - e.g. the Crusades - , but somehow or other many Americans found the Buddhist involvement novel and unacceptable. Much of this is discussed in Don Oberdorfer's excellent book on the Tet offensive and its effects. He and I - we are good friends - have discussed that issue on more than one occasion.

I must say that my Saigon tour was an extremely busy one. It was fun; I enjoyed it, despite the family separation. I spent a lot of time in the office and going around Saigon to talk to people. For a change of pace, John Negroponte and I spent a lot of time playing badminton; it was a healthier form of release than bar hopping or finding female companionship. Sometimes, we would find two other officers and play tennis. Most Embassy officers, including Ambassador Lodge, belonged to Cercle Sportive de Saigon - a Vietnamese club that we could join. That is where we played because the Embassy had no facilities of its own. Of course the Vietnamese used the club and some of them used to petition Ambassador Lodge with one favor or another or provide some advice to him.

There were a number of lessons that I learned from my Vietnam experience. In the first place, I found out first hand how complicated situations could be. Secondly, I learned that the U.S. had to be very careful about its involvement in matters outside this country; it is far easier to become involved than to disengage. As I mentioned earlier, we had no exit strategy in Vietnam and therefore suffered frequently from the law of unintended consequences. That lesson was an important one when later I was confronted with the Somalia situation; I knew by then that all the facets of U.S. involvement had to be drawn together - political, economic, humanitarian and military. When I got to Mogadishu, in fact, I put three very good political officers together with some AID folks - from the disaster relief program - and started a mini-CORDS program. I would send them around to certain locations in Somalia to work with the military teams and NGOs that were already stationed there in an effort to pull all activities together towards some common objectives. I think that was a very useful management technique.

I also learned in Vietnam - and later in other situations - to not mislead one's friends. It was better to be above board - even if it was bad news - than to take a position which later would obviously be seen as not honest. I think we did that in some respects in Vietnam. We led some people down "a garden path" - not necessarily deliberately or with malice of forethought - but some of our analyses were obviously too optimistic. I had some qualms about that approach, and I tried never to repeat what I consider to be a major mistake.

I learned another lesson too, as illustrated by the following anecdote. I used to talk to a Vietnamese journalist because he often had information that he could not print.. On one occasion, he finally turned to me and said: "You know, you Americans look on us as if we were just a basket of crabs. You don't really care what the crabs are doing in that basket as long as they don't escape or as long as someone is not stealing the basket away from you." I thought then that he had that right. It was exactly the way we viewed South Vietnam. These were "our" crabs; they could do whatever they wanted in that basket as long as we held on to the basket. It was obvious to the journalist and to others, I suspect, that our motives were often quite selfish even when disguised in very noble terms.

There is no question in my mind that my tour in Vietnam stood me in good stead for some of my later assignments. I look back on it frequently. For example, during my first week in Somalia, I sat down with the Marine generals and discussed the lessons of that "police action" and our unhappy experience in Lebanon to make sure that we tried as best we could do avoid the mistakes made during those U.S. actions.

Vietnam was interesting. The only problem was that between the time I decided to go to Vietnam and the time that I actually went, the Department had changed its policy and was barring dependents from going with their sponsors. So that made it tough on my wife Phyllis. We were separated for twenty months during which I came back to the States once - on Lodge's plane. Lodge had been unable to convince the Department to authorize Embassy officers to travel back to the U.S. to see their families. It was alright to see the families somewhere overseas, but not in the U.S.. Other agencies however authorized their officers to fly back to the States for family visits. That was a major discrepancy in the personnel policies of different agencies of the U.S. government and not helpful to the morale of State employees. Finally, on one occasion, Lodge had to return to Washington to testify before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; he was going to tell them how well things were going in Vietnam. While in Washington, he went into Bill Crockett's office - who was then the Deputy Under Secretary for Administration. Lodge told him that he would not leave that office until the travel regulations were changed. It is wonderful how quickly an immutable regulation can be revised! But for me, by that time it was too late. So except for that one time, I did not see Phyllis for twenty months.

ROBERT W. GARRITY
Assistant Press Officer, USIS
Saigon (1965-1967)

Robert W. Garrity was born and raised in Boston, Massachusetts. He graduated from Boston College in 1957. In addition to serving in Japan, Mr. Garrity served in Vietnam, Germany and Iceland. He was interviewed by Patrick Nieburg in 1989 and Hans N. Tuch on June 5, 1990.

GARRITY: My Vietnam experience was my first assignment with USIA. I came to the agency in 1965, after a three-week orientation at the State Department on Vietnam, was assigned to Vietnam. I arrived there in early September, 1965. I was there from September, '65 until early May, 1967, when I was transferred to Munich -- although I actually left Saigon on orders to Vienna, which caused quite a sensation because nobody had ever received orders to Vienna from Saigon before.

Q: Bob, you are one of the few people who not only had an illustrious career, but who have changed areas -- rather violently, if I may say so; from Europe to the Far East, and study at Harvard. How do you feel about your career?

GARRITY: Well, I always say there's a pattern there somewhere, but I've never been able to figure out what it is. I must say, with all of the mayhem in Vietnam, I had more direct exposure to violence when I got to Germany, because of the rather strong anti-Vietnam sentiment expressed by the students at the various universities on a rather constant basis. For that reason, we were unable to have any programs directly identified with Vietnam.

Q: That was in Germany?

GARRITY: That was in Germany.

Q: So your Vietnam experience actually went somewhat for naught, in Germany?

GARRITY: Well, like yourself -- not to the extent that you did -- but around the Bavarian part of Germany, I did get out and meet with groups. I remember one very funny meeting, as it turned out, with a group of German students who were in a state of high dudgeon over Vietnam and American policy there. When they were sort of pausing for breath, they said, "Oh, by the way, what do American students think of our protest against Vietnam?"

I said, "They don't think anything of it; they don't even know about it. They're too busy protecting themselves." They were quite disappointed; in fact, they were really downcast after that; it took all the starch out of them.

Q: Tell me, you said that your first assignment was Vietnam; what made you leave what you were doing, and what were you doing to join the agency and go to Vietnam?

GARRITY: I had been in the Navy for three years, following college, then worked for Little, Brown and Company in Boston, which was my home town. While I was at Little, Brown and Company -- perhaps because of being stationed in Puerto Rico in the Navy -- I just felt that was something I should do again. Fortunately, my wife agreed; although she had become a New England housewife by that time.

Nevertheless, we began a career with USIA, having three young children, and not much idea of what we were getting into. We had great assurance from the panel that interviewed us. In those days your wife was interviewed as well as yourself, or your spouse, I should say. We were quite assured that I would never be ordered to Vietnam.

And sure enough, as soon as I was sworn in and was assured of the usual six months of training, everything fell apart. They had an immediate need for someone in Saigon. The training was scrapped, and replaced by a three-week Vietnam orientation course in the State Department; which did nothing but raise doubts, by the way. It certainly didn't reinforce, in any way, an argument for being there.

So we set off for Vietnam, over the agency's assurances that we would never be sent there on a first assignment.

Q: Robert, when you say we, where did Joanne and the children go while you went to Saigon?

GARRITY: Well, I first went down to Washington, and left her in Marlborough, Massachusetts. I called her up and said, "My god, we're supposed to go to Saigon, and we're leaving in three weeks."

She said, "What does that mean?"

I said, "It means you have a choice of going to Hong Kong, or Baguio."

She said, "Baguio, where's that?"

I said, "It's supposed to be a very nice place in the Philippines, or Bangkok." So I said, "You have to decide." I called her back a couple of days later, and she said she had decided. I said, "How did you do it?"

And she said, "I went to the Marlborough library, and I got all the materials on the three places, and decided on Bangkok."

And I said, "Well, did it seem the most comfortable?"

She said, "No, it's the closest." So that was the basis of her decision, and as it turned out, it was a very good decision.

Q: In effect then, did you take Joanne and the children to Bangkok, and get them settled? Or did you go your separate ways?

GARRITY: Well, the agency wanted us to all take a plane that landed in Saigon, and then continued on to Bangkok. I refused to do that. I said I wanted to accompany them to Bangkok, and get them settled. It was the first time overseas. And they said, "Well, you can't do that because you don't have any leave time accumulated."

I said, "Well, that's not my fault. You folks changed the whole schedule." Vietnam threw a lot of agency programs into a tizzy, because of the need for personnel. So they finally agreed to give me a couple of days, and I did get to Bangkok. Somebody had found us an apartment. It was Carol Forte, who was the senior wife among the Saigon widows. She very nicely found us an apartment, which was so far beyond our means that we quickly had to find someplace else, and get it lined up for a move.

I arrived in Saigon five days after we'd landed in Bangkok. I was supposed to replace someone on an emergency basis, and when I got there the person I was supposed to replace -- Pete Hickman--announced that he wasn't leaving for another six or eight weeks. I said, "Oh, what happened?"

And he said, "He had won an extension in a poker game with the Public Affairs Officer." He was so reluctant to leave Saigon, that he decided to bet an extension as part of an ante in a poker game, and won.

Q: Who was the Public Affairs Officer then?

GARRITY: That was Barry Zorthian.

Q: Barry was known for the famous poker games.

GARRITY: That's right.

Q: And that was one in which Hickman won an extension, rather than transfer back home?

GARRITY: That's right.

Q: That is fabulous. When was that, in '65?

GARRITY: Right, 1965, in early September. As it turned out, I worked in the JUSPAO Press Center for 89 days. I remember that very clearly. My boss was Harold Kaplan, who was an absolutely superb gentleman, briefer, and head of the Press Center. We also had Bob Levine, or Don -- he goes by both; he was on the staff then. It was a very exciting 89 days.

Q: Were you assigned housing, and then what was your assigned job?

GARRITY: I recall staying in a hotel for some weeks, and then eventually shared an apartment with another officer, who was brand new -- Mark Crocker. He was very skilled in the language, and had been there in the Army; he was very, very fluent in Vietnamese.

Q: Then what was your assignment, actually, in JUSPAO?

GARRITY: My first assignment was Assistant Press Officer. I remember two major events. One was escorting the press, with Senator Kennedy, who was making a whirlwind trip around the country. It was very exciting, because just as we started out, an unexpected -- or at least unannounced -- strike, began.

Q: By whom?

GARRITY: By the American forces, with the result that each stop along the way -- and there were six of them -- we lost our press plane. I recall having to get -- six different times -- having to beseech the local authorities to give us a plane, to continue on, so that the press could fly with him.

Q: When you say a strike, do you mean military? Not the usual labor strike?

GARRITY: No, a military air strike.

Q: And they preempted your planes for that military strike?

GARRITY: Yes.

Q: But you went in transport planes.

GARRITY: That's right, they needed more transport planes each step along the way. But somehow we managed to procure a replacement.

Q: What areas did you cover? Where did you go on this particular trip? What did they try to show Kennedy?

GARRITY: I remember we went to Ban Me Thuot. I believe on the same trip we went to the province where you were.

Q: Yes, you came to Pleiku; I remember that. But Ban Me Thuot was the former imperial seat, and Bao Dai had a summer, or hunting cottage there. Is that where you stayed?

GARRITY: No, that's not where we stayed, if it's the place I can remember. We went to a Montagnard village, where Senator Kennedy was treated with some rather poisonous rice wine, and made a political speech.

Q: Was it a home-town speech kind of thing, to the troops?

GARRITY: It was a speech to the Montagnards, which none of them understood. They knew the name Kennedy. I had a very strong impression when I first was in Vietnam. The three most famous people in the world, to Vietnamese, were John F. Kennedy, Pope John XXIII, and Ho Chi Minh. Those were the three figures that all Vietnamese seemed to know about.

Q: That, to me, is a very interesting side line, because you went to Ban Me Thuot at the time when the Vietnamese government was the most suspicious of the Montagnard. Prior to that, we'd had some Montagnard uprisings, was that deliberate?

GARRITY: Well, Kennedy had made a specific request to visit a Montagnard village, and every effort was made to accommodate him. And, of course, the fact that this trip was a precedent, and covered by American press, and international press -- for the whole two days of the trip.

Q: Do you recall any infamous, or famous names among the press who covered that event?

GARRITY: I'd have to go back and think about that.

Q: But there wasn't a Neil Sheehan, or a chaplain?

GARRITY: I believe one of the people along was Ron Nesson, who later became press secretary to President Ford. Names are starting to come back.

Q: And from Ban Me Thuot you went on to Pleiku, which I remember.

GARRITY: Then we had several stops I cannot remember, but we wound up in Da Nang.

Q: Robert, you said at the beginning that you had 89 days at the Press Center, which was only a very partial time of your entire tour. What happened after the Press Center?

GARRITY: I remember the 89 days because when I suddenly was transferred out of the Press Center, I never got an evaluation for what seemed to be the most exciting 89 days of my entire life up to that point; and I was very chagrined, because it sort of disappeared, and was never recorded.

It was a sudden decision to have a Japanese language-capable officer in the Press Center; and since there was a limit on the number of positions, and I was the newest, I was sent up to become Assistant Publications Officer, and was replaced by Jim Seece, who spoke Japanese.

Q: But before we leave the Press Center, you said that there were two events. One was the Kennedy visit; what was the other?

GARRITY: The other was what became a very famous visit, of ten governors to Vietnam. I was the press escort for the entire trip. Governor Romney was the governor of Michigan at the time, and he is the name that stood out later, when he was running for President. He said of that trip, that he was brainwashed in Vietnam; and it was very amusing having been with him the entire time he was there. I couldn't imagine when it happened, unless it was during his sleep, because being a good politician, he never stopped talking for the entire time he was there, and did very little listening.

Q: Just as a point of interest, Robert, do you recall, were there embassy people going with them? Were there people from MACV going on these trips, as briefers or guides?

GARRITY: There were some military escorts, but essentially they were briefed at each stop along the way. They went to places like Nha Trang, Gha Nang, and a trip out to the Enterprise. So it was a very quick and frenetic kind of trip.

There was a wonderful incident, and I think it was either outside of Na Trang, or outside of Da Nang. I think it was outside of Na Trang, near the village that was famous for the fish sauce, Nuoc Man. We were on a bridge, and Romney was having a conversation with a Vietnamese peasant. Neither one of them was being translated accurately to the other, with the idea that neither one would have been able to make any sense out of what the other was saying because of the cultural barrier.

Q: So they literally talked by each other?

GARRITY: Exactly!

Q: Is that one of the incidents that Romney cited as an example for being brainwashed?

GARRITY: It had to be, along with, again, one of the incidents where he did all the talking. The idea of having 20% of the nation's governors in Vietnam at one time was quite extraordinary.

Q: So, a lot of the time the governors would address the accompanying press, rather than anybody else?

GARRITY: That's right. Quite often it was a conversation between the visitor and the press.

Q: Were they critical of what was going on in Vietnam at that time?

GARRITY: I think most of them were there to find out what was going on, because they really weren't very well informed. That was really typical of most visitors; they really did come there to find out what was happening. Some of them realized that in four days they couldn't find out much; others felt that they had learned everything during that time. But the typical visit, for a VIP of that nature, would be the four-day visit, after which they would become expert.

Q: During some of these visits, where you were press escort, did you actually come under fire? Or how close did you come to fire? I know nobody wanted to expose VIP's to any hazards, but how close did you come?

GARRITY: The only time I really can recall was when I was escorting John Steinbeck, who was probably one of the most illustrious of the correspondents we had; we very seldom got prize winners of that sort. He was visiting in Tay Ninh, where Don Besom was the field rep. When we were taking off from Tay Ninh, going back to Saigon, the chopper suddenly made some rather strange, sharp movements. The pilot told us afterwards the reason for it was we were being shot at.

Q: Did you feel that actually in the chopper?

GARRITY: We knew something was happening; Steinbeck was quite delighted by the whole thing.

Q: So he could say that he was actually there when it happened?

GARRITY: Right. I was just delighted nothing worse than that happened.

Q: Bob, we've all heard these stories about Barry Zorthian, and the Hickman story reminds me -- and I want to ask you -- before you left Vietnam, did Barry ever ask you to extend?

GARRITY: Oh, very definitely. We had set up a schedule that involved getting back to Boston for a wedding, which because of the date meant that we would actually extend an additional month in Saigon. So I figured that was good reason to be able to leave gracefully; but I reminded him weekly that I was leaving. At that time I was serving as Press Attaché to Ambassador Lodge; and a sort of liaison between Barry Zorthian and the Ambassador. It wasn't until the week before, he finally said, "You can't leave."

I said, "I have to. We've got everything booked, and we're ready to go. The lease is up in Bangkok, and there's no way. We've already extended for an additional month."

He was very angry with me at that time. We were good friends afterwards, but he was not happy to see me go.

Q: You said you were Press Liaison to Ambassador Lodge. That implies that during your tour of duty, you'd been in the JUSPAO Press Center as Assistant Press officer; you were a Publication Officer; you went back into the press business as a liaison. What other jobs did you hold, that you had to do while you were there?

GARRITY: Those were the three. The third job was for about a year; the last year I was there, working with the Ambassador, handling his press affairs.

Q: You were not a Vietnamese speaker, I take it?

GARRITY: That's right.

Q: You were in the Publication section.

GARRITY: That's right.

Q: What did you publish, and what was it all about?

GARRITY: We published a series of pamphlets, inserts in magazines. The Agency had a number of magazines that were published in Vietnam, in Vietnamese -- also some in English. But we did a series of pamphlets on various events, or situations, or developments in Vietnam, to try to explain to the Vietnamese readers what was happening; particularly positive developments, encouraging agriculture, encouraging pacification, so forth and so on.

Q: What would be a press-run for a publication?

GARRITY: Oh, it was way in the tens of thousands; I'd have to go back.

Q: I'm just looking for magnitude. With all that paper, and we used to have a saying in Vietnam, "We could have papered Vietnam over, with everything that was printed there." Who would be the consumers, in terms of your outlets for distribution?

GARRITY: The field rep offices. These pamphlets would go out to their offices, and they would deliver them to various villages, or readers they felt would benefit by reading them. The material was quite varied. I remember there was a refugee group, who was transported from Da Nang to Na Trang, in some sort of barge. During the course of the trip, which was maybe an overnight, a woman on the barge gave birth to a baby. The baby was given the Vietnamese name for Phoenix. The connotation, which in Vietnam wasn't that different from the old Egyptian legend of rising from the ashes. The phoenix, of course, is one of the four great animal symbols. So this became material for a story to be put into a pamphlet.

Another time we took a couple of Vietnamese high school students out to the carrier Enterprise. And we gave them a day on board; met with the Captain, steered the ship, and then came back and appeared on radio and t.v. Of course, that became the subject of a pamphlet, also.

Q: Would you explain how this worked? Take the barge story; who wrote it, who actually got the story, how did it come to you, what happened? Did it go into a translation to Vietnamese, who did the translating, who did the checking? And where was the printing done?

GARRITY: We had some American writers assigned to do nothing but write stories. As Assistant Publications Officer, I did go out and develop stories, and I did write some stories myself. These would then be translated by our Vietnamese staff. The actual printing would be done in Manila, at the Regional Service Center.

Q: So what was the time lag, from the conception of a story, to its distribution to the field reps?

GARRITY: Probably several months.

Q: So you couldn't do any quick reaction, basically. There was always considerable lead time?

GARRITY: That's right, these were stories that would conceivably have a longer kind of shelf-life.

Q: Were there also quick-reaction types of material put out?

GARRITY: The wireless file, but that was part of the Information Division, not specifically under Publications. That was circulated, and items which would be more important would be reproduced in greater numbers, and circulated.

Q: Do you recall how many writers there actually were for your section?

GARRITY: It was a pretty big section. I think maybe there were a couple of officers assigned to do nothing but write. We had at least one full-time photographer, who was Vietnamese. The editors, and translators, and so forth, were Vietnamese with professional experience. Then there was the Publications Officer, and Assistant Publications Officer. We reported to the Information Officer, who was David Briggs at that time. He was eventually replaced by Clyde Hess, just as I got transferred back down to the Press Office for the job with Ambassador Lodge.

Q: Robert, when you were still an Assistant Press Officer, and going on press tours, describe a little of what an ordinary day was like. What was involved in setting up a press tour?

GARRITY: The JUSPAO Press Center was a unique operation. We had some military assigned to the Press Office, usually headed by a Navy captain, or an Army or Air Force colonel -- rank. And then a staff. These people would try to set up logistics for getting correspondents out and around the country, to various places.

If you were up in Pleiku and a correspondent came in, and had an interest that we felt that you could respond to, we could then go to the military and say, "Would you set this journalist up with a trip to Pleiku, to see Pat Nieburg?" And they would handle the logistics.

The only problem was they all got to work at 7:00 or 7:30 in the morning, when there were no correspondents around. And their day officially ended between 4:30 and 5:00. 5:00, of course, was when the daily news briefing took place -- "The 5 o'clock follies". So we tried to plead with them to change their schedule, and they were very sympathetic, but they couldn't get permission from the military command, because that was the military day.

So the only way we managed to get late-breaking logistics set up was if these military logistics folks would stay behind, and just work overtime. Otherwise, they'd all be gone just at the time when all the correspondents were there, looking for help.

Q: But basically, for them, it was business as usual, as they had done in the barracks back home?

GARRITY: That's about it. For the rest of us -- we'd get in there about 8:00, and we got out of there at 8:00 at night if we were very lucky. This was pretty much six to seven days a week. Of course, there was a briefing every day at 5:00. It was a very full day. If you got in early, at 8:00, which is what you tried to do, you'd get a chance to get ahead of your paperwork -- figure out who was coming, and who was to do what. You had a resident press corps, which in 1966 and 1967 was about 600 full-time foreign correspondents. I'd say half of them were American, and the other half were from all over the world.

In addition to that, you had a number of visiting correspondents, from various countries, including the U.S. We had some pretty unusual people. For instance, we had the Archduke Otto Von Hapsburg visit. When we asked him how we should address him, he said, "Archduke will do." He came in as a correspondent for the Indianapolis Star, and we outfitted him with fatigues, and boots, and sent him off into the jungle.

Q: Did the correspondents have to pay for these goodies?

GARRITY: The transportation was courtesy of the Army, and any kind of equipment the correspondent would pay for if he could. Sometimes there was no way to pay for it. For instance, one of the more infamous instances of this was a visit by Mary McCarthy. Mary McCarthy had nothing to wear out into the field, so she was the recipient of a whole outfit from one of our colleagues -- Rube Munson, who shared an office with me. He saw his fatigues and his boots next when he saw her picture in Time Magazine. She was wearing Rube's outfit. I guess she took it back with her as a souvenir.

Q: Did the correspondents make a lot of demands on you, including trips to the PX. How did you handle that?

GARRITY: Well, the correspondents were always trying to get people to buy things for them. Generally, they received enough of an allowance from their own organizations, that they could take care of whatever they needed. Anything you wanted was available in Saigon, if you could pay for it; and generally, they had enough money to pay for things.

I'm sure they did get a few things from the PX, but then again the PX was somewhat overrated as a source of gifts and treasures. As I recall, if you wanted to buy tennis shoes, during a good part of my time in Vietnam, you couldn't do so unless you wore size 8 narrow. Somebody had ordered 10,000 pairs of one size; and they couldn't order any others until those were sold! They're probably still trying to get rid of them on the black market in Saigon.

Q: Were all the military PXs, clubs, and so forth open to correspondents?

GARRITY: They certainly had the clubs open to them. The famous one on top of the Rex Hotel, where JUSPAO had its headquarters.

Q: You must have run into some strange characters, especially amongst the resident correspondents. What kind of demands did they make on you, on a daily basis?

GARRITY: Constant demands. Of course, one of the most cantankerous ones, who's not with us anymore, was a correspondent for the New York Daily News, and also for Mutual Radio, Joe Freid. Joe Freid would come into your office, and go through your in-and-out boxes. It didn't matter whether you were sitting there or not. If you weren't there he'd probably go through the drawers, too! His famous line was, "What'd ya got?", hoping that somebody would have something that would result in a story.

I remember one time another correspondent was sitting in my office; he had made an appointment -- Ray Coffee, who was working for the Chicago Sun Times. Joe Freid burst into the office, and started in with, "What'd ya got?" and going through the boxes.

And Ray Coffee stood up, and said, "Freid, if you don't get out of here, I'm going to punch you out!" So Freid left.

Q: Well, Freid was a well-known character around Saigon. I think he never moved out of the city, actually.

GARRITY: Nobody could remember any time when he left Saigon. And whenever confronted with this, he'd say he had to file so regularly that he couldn't afford to be out of the city.

Q: Well, when you got in, in the morning for example; would you have access to cables from embassy on what was going on? How were you briefed? How could you actually stay up to date with what was going on, even in country?

GARRITY: Well, of course with all of the correspondents running around, there was a limit on what we could have available for ourselves. I remember the great ploy that Harold Kaplan used when he briefed. He carried a huge book marked classified, with a red stripe and white letters. It really impressed all the correspondents that he was supposed to be quoting from this huge book of classified information. But truthfully, most of the classified information was kept upstairs, beyond the Marine guards. We were supposed to get up there as often as we could -- at least once during the day; hopefully once in the morning, and once in the afternoon, to check on what was incoming and even what was outgoing, that we may have missed.

Q: How would you keep up, for example, with what was going on in the field? Did you have access to field reps' reports? If a correspondent wanted to go out in the field, and asked you, "Hey, where's the action?", how could you advise them?

GARRITY: The biggest asset I had, in this regard, was having my wife in Bangkok. The Bangkok connection proved to be the most helpful thing for me, and to many, many correspondents. I was able to meet so many field reps, because of their dependents being in Bangkok.

I remember the first Christmas, Joe and Carolyn Forte had a party, and the wives were all introducing the husbands to each other, because so many hadn't met; they were posted all over the country. As a result of getting to know all of these field reps, when they came in to Saigon, they would always stop in my office. As a matter of fact, I got to visit a lot of them at various times during my stay in Vietnam, on one occasion or another. We developed relationships such that I was able to send really qualified correspondents; correspondents who were serious, and could do a good job, out to see a representative situation, and talk to a reliable, intelligent representative of ours, in almost any part of the country.

It was really because of the Bangkok connection that I was able to do that.

Q: Did you feel, when you were doing it, that you were manipulating the press?

GARRITY: No, because I found that our JUSPAO field reps had the best handle, the most accurate grasp of what was going on, in Vietnam. There's no question about that. And I felt that a most important job for us, was telling the story of what was happening in Vietnam. And to the best of my ability, I tried to put correspondents together with responsible individuals, who were in strategically important parts of the country, and who could discuss what was happening in their area.

Q: From your experience, Robert, and knowing so many of the field reps personally, you must have had a feel that many of them were doubtful, critical of some phase or the other. So you were taking a deliberate risk, if you will, in having the correspondent exposed to that kind of reaction by field reps. What kind of feedback did you get from the correspondents?

GARRITY: The correspondents, to my way of thinking -- always certainly the intelligent ones -- always appreciated being able to get a frank picture, with a good amount of candor about what was happening in Pleiku, or Da Nang, or Hue, or down in the Delta.

Q: Did anyone ever hold you responsible for the lousy story that came out of this correspondent, who talked to this field rep?

GARRITY: No, if it happened to anyone else, I don't know, but I certainly never had any problem myself. There was so much information available in Vietnam that no correspondent was without material to file.

In fact, most correspondents that I knew, including television correspondents, filed far more material than ever was used. So the coverage of the war in Vietnam was largely decided by editors back in the United States.

For example, CBS News -- T.V. -- would send back at least 20 stories a week. And at that time, the mid-'60s, on the CBS Evening News, they were using a Vietnam story -- four times out of five -- for the evening broadcasts. They probably upped that to a Vietnam story every day later on. But they were choosing four stories, out of 20 that were filed. If somebody ever complained that they should have covered something else, they probably found out that they had; but when it got back to New York, it was an editorial decision on the part of the network not to use it, or to use it.

Q: Much of the coverage, though, was military action. But as we both know, there were tremendously important civilian developments; anything from black market, to a certain amount of pacification -- where agriculture resumed, or dropped out. Was there a contradiction between, for example, what the JUSPAO field reps told the correspondents, and what the military told them? Was that a problem?

GARRITY: Well, it wasn't so much a contradiction. The military stories were so specifically military that there was no way of contradicting. The field rep would look at the situation from a psychological point of view, a sociological point of view, the political situation, the economic situation, and so forth. So they were commenting, overall on what was the basic thing that was going on in a province at a particular time. Whereas, the military brief would talk about a specific strike, or a specific military incident -- how many were killed, how many captured, so forth.

Q: It becomes, ultimately, a judgment. What is the security of a certain province if there are some differences of opinion, between, say, the civilian assessment and the military?

GARRITY: Well, there probably were. I don't think, somehow, that these found their way into print, in a way that would make a pattern; which is probably unfortunate. There's no question that correspondents in Vietnam did cover pacification stories, or non-military stories; it wasn't that they weren't covered. We all felt, while we were there, that these were terribly important. There was a lot of incredible effort put into making a story available for coverage, and promoting revolutionary development, and democratization, and so forth. But these were covered by the correspondents. If they did not appear in hometown newspapers, or on network television, this was an editorial decision made in the U.S.; not one made by the reporters in Saigon, or wherever they were in Vietnam.

Q: So what you're really telling me is that the correspondents were pretty conscientious in covering the whole spectrum, but that the gate-keepers back home filtered out what they considered to be the sexy, or appealing stories; and that is what influenced the reporting of the Vietnam War?

GARRITY: If something had a specially sexy kind of angle to it, and was non-military, then it could get covered. For instance, there was a school in Vung Tau -- which is a very pretty resort, or formerly a resort area, on the coast.

Q: It was also called Cap St. Jacques.

GARRITY: Yes, east of Saigon. There was a School of Revolutionary Development Cadres, which is a mouthful. But what this translated into was training young Vietnamese to go into villages, somewhat like a Peace Corps group, to try to develop projects and to make life better for the villagers. They were not specifically supposed to be engaged in warfare; they were supposed to be doing Peace Corps type work. And it was a very badly kept secret that the school was run by the CIA.

Until one Sunday, we'd had very little coverage of the Revolutionary Development Cadres. But it happened to be a slow weekend, and so a reporter whose name is quite well-known -- with the New York Times, Johnny Apple, wrote a story about the training school at Vung Tau, and that it was run by the CIA. Well, that produced a front-page story; it was the bottom of the front page, but nevertheless, front page in the Sunday Times. As the story goes, when the President saw that story, the school was immediately transferred from CIA sponsorship to what we now call AID.

Q: Wasn't that also the school that had some input by Frank Scotten, and Ed Baumgartner? So there was more to it than just the Peace Corps; they were also taught ambushes, and village defense, and the emphasis was more on that than on the Peace Corps aspect?

GARRITY: There were two aspects. In fact, I believe there were two different kinds of cadres; one was more of a Peace Corps variety, and then there was another that specialized in what you might call hit-squad tactics. They all wore black pajamas; it was hard to tell them apart, which was maybe unfortunate for those who were doing strictly pacification work.

Q: You were always great in absorbing the humor of a situation. Do you recall any of the jokes, the humor that went around-Saigon during the time you were there? Some of the black humor, too, at ourselves?

GARRITY: I have a terrible memory for jokes. Maybe some will come to me along the way. There was an incredible amount of humor, and a lot of writing of song lyrics to well-known melodies, describing the situation.

Q: Do you remember something called the Turtle Club?

GARRITY: Turtle Club?

Q: You became a turtle if you were willing to stick your neck out. There was the Bob Delaney club, primarily started by the field reps; those who were willing to speak up and stick their necks out.

Let's go for a second to your job with Ambassador Lodge. He was a legend, in a sense. How did you get assigned to it, and what was your actual function?

GARRITY: As I recall, the person who had the job before me didn't have a very happy relationship with Lodge's office, or with Lodge himself. And Lodge had requested someone else. Zorthian set up three candidates for the job, and I was one of them. I was interviewed by the Ambassador, and was selected by him for the job.

The idea was that I would sit down with him every day at 12:30, and we would go over anything that had appeared in the press that he had participated in, or upcoming press plans that would involve him. The Ambassador was not anxious to be continually in the press, or continually giving press conferences. But on a selected basis, he was happy to do so. And he was, I found, very effective at doing so. I would talk with Barry Zorthian beforehand, and afterwards, to be sure it was something he thought was important.

For instance, the New York Times had approached the Ambassador, and Barry, for a sort of round table interview, giving an overview of the whole situation for the past year or so. And the Ambassador wasn't awfully sure he wanted to do this; it was a very time consuming thing. But we did convince him it was important, and he did do the interview.

In fact, I'll never forget it because I had to have five different secretaries type up the transcript; four of the secretaries were terrific, but the fifth one happened to work in Lodge's outer office. His inner office was manned by the incredible Eva Kim, who is probably the greatest secretary who ever lived. But the outer office was manned by someone else, and she gave to me the last of her section; what I didn't realize was a couple of pages had fallen under her desk. Lodge was very anxious to see this transcript, because this was going to be a big spread in the New York Times. The transcript was about 20 pages long. We were going through it, and there were three pages missing. At that point I had no idea where they were; I'd even forgotten which secretary had done which section.

He said, "Where are those?"

I said, "Well, I'll have to find them."

He turned to me, and said, "Bob, I just know this is an example. You want me to take care of the details, and you want to think about the big things. But I want you to take care of the details, and leave the big thoughts to me." He was so delighted having said that. Then I went out and found the missing pages.

Q: Tell me, how did you prepare for the 12:30 meeting with Lodge?

GARRITY: I usually would talk to Barry, and to Jack Stuart, who was the director of the Press Center. We had a pretty good idea of what we wanted Lodge to be aware of, and which requests came in. We didn't want to overwork him, but on certain occasions it was necessary to put him before the camera.

For instance, NBC wanted to do an interview, and he agreed to do it. We set this up in Barry Zorthian's office. As I recall, Barry took a field trip that day, so the Ambassador had the use of this office. This was a fairly new reporter, and the interview wasn't going terribly well. Of course, this was in the days before video tape, so there was a 16-mm camera grinding away. The reporter was talking to Lodge about B-52s being used by the U.S. against an enemy that would hide in the water, and breathe through a bamboo shoot, and how could we ever put the two together?

The Ambassador was just not answering the question. So at one point the reporter said, "Stop the camera." He turned to me and said, "Bob, would you please explain to the Ambassador what my question is, so that I can get an answer?"

So I said, "Mr. Ambassador, I think what he wants you to comment on is the idea that we're trying to kill a gnat with a cannon."

And he said, "Oh, well," and he gave an answer. I can't quote it, but he was fun to work with. He just didn't cotton to the reporter. We got along very well.

Q: Barry Zorthian was known during his "reign," to play the top echelon very close to his vest. Whether it was his colleagues in JUSPAO, or with the press, Barry was the tsar. What was your relationship with Barry? This must have been a very delicate kind of relationship with Barry? You have the triangle of the ambassador, Barry, and Garrity.

GARRITY: Barry himself said, "You're a lightning rod." He called me the lightning rod, and he said any time there was a lot of electricity, I was the one who was going to get shocked.

Q: One of the things that Barry was known to hog was information. To what degree did he share with you, so your relationship with the ambassador could be a satisfactory one? Or to what degree were you left defenseless, for lack of information?

GARRITY: I don't feel that I was privy to nearly all of what I should have known, but I guess it was a matter of keeping your eyes and ears open. That's how Barry got his information.

Q: But that means, in a sense, that you must have spent a good bit of your time trying to attempt end-runs to get at information, which you probably could have spent more profitably otherwise.

GARRITY: Well, that's true, but it didn't seem to me -- at the time, at least -- to be an overwhelming problem. So much was happening, and information became so quickly outdated. And really, Lodge's role with the press was not to talk about very specific things, but more the overall trend. And he himself was much more in touch with the political feeling of the situation.

He would say, "What this country needs is a good police force." He said, "You know, if you're out in a village, and somebody tries to murder you, there's no police!" He had kind of a New England sense of -- if we just had some town meetings, and got these things going, this would all work out a lot better. I think he felt more comfortable analyzing the political side of it, than the military.

Q: As a person, Lodge was very imperial. Was that a problem, vis-a-vis the press? It wasn't easy to cotton up to Henry Cabot Lodge.

GARRITY: It's very interesting; he was very tough on his senior officers, but he was very kind to his junior officers. And personally, I found he was very kind to me. With the press, when you finally set up an appointment, he was very good; he would be a good interview. The one correspondent that always could get in to him, without ever going through anyone -- outside of Lodge -- was Joe Freid. And nobody could ever figure out -- I'm not sure even Barry knew the real answer -- to what was responsible for Joe Freid's access to Lodge; but he certainly had it. It was an odd combination.

Q: Do you have any feeling of what the relationship was between Lodge and Bunker?

GARRITY: They succeeded each other; Lodge was gone when Bunker arrived. Part of my agreement, and part of my timing, was that I would be there for Bunker's first week; so I was there for Bunker's first week, and that was quite a week!

Q: When interviews were requested, were they of the generic type, that somebody wanted to see the ambassador? Or were these interviews often tied to specific events, or developments in the war in Vietnam?

GARRITY: They tended to be more generic, or very broad kinds of developments. The other kinds of developments were tactical matters, better addressed to the military. So he would talk about things on a broader basis. For instance, when Joe Alsop came to town, he always had to see the ambassador, naturally.

In fact, a funny situation happened one day. I had a call from a weeping secretary, from Lodge's office -- I believe the same one that lost my three pages -- saying, "Bob, you've got to help me!"

And I said, "What's wrong?"

She said, "I just had a call from Mr. Alsop, and he's having lunch with the ambassador, but he doesn't know whether he's the guest or the host."

I said, "Well, why don't you ask the ambassador?"

She said, "He's all tied up in a meeting, and I can't get in to him. And Mr. Alsop won't speak to me anymore." So I called Alsop at his hotel, and I said I was the press attaché.

He said, "I don't speak with press attachés."

So I said, "You'd better speak to this one, or you won't have any lunch!"

I explained the situation to him, and he said, "If it's that much up in the air, then I'll be the guest and Cabot can be the host.'" So he went off to Lodge's for lunch and Lodge never knew about the exchange.

There were so many notables who rolled through town. Every Thursday evening Barry Zorthian had a backgrounder in his living room; and the press was just unbelievable. We'd have Chet Huntley, or Walter Cronkite. Every week there would be several world famous correspondents sitting among a group of 20 or so -- corps correspondents that he wanted to really give as much access as possible.

Q: Did you attend any of these backgrounders?

GARRITY: Oh yes.

Q: Who would be present, other than the correspondent from the USIA contingent? Yourself, and who else?

GARRITY: Barry usually had a guest. He might have the Secretary of Defense as a guest, because there were so many visitors. If there were no visitors, he would always have Phil Habib, who was the Minister Counselor for Political Affairs, at that time, at the embassy. Every week, there was a chance for the correspondents to talk about what had been going on during the previous week.

The mixture would be the top resident foreign press, and any notable visitors. You know, the New York Times would always be here. Time and Newsweek would always be there. CBS, ABC, and BC were always there. Washington Post would always be there. Wire services would be there. It was very informal, and it was, I think, very much appreciated as a chance for the correspondents to have background access. This was not for attribution; these were on background. And yet, it was intended to be educational, and helpful for the correspondents.

Q: During sessions of that sort, did they address the political situation?

GARRITY: Every aspect of the situation; I don't think anything was not covered.

Q: During your time in Saigon, Robert, there were several scandals, which permeated. I think of a Navy captain who was running either the clubs or the PX's. Did things of that nature come to the surface?

GARRITY: If whoever was the guest that week knew anything about it. Generally, that kind of thing would be referred back to the military spokesman, for comment. Of course, they were doing their own investigation, and so forth.

Q: How about discussions of the Vietnamese government? General Ky, General Chou -- their capabilities, or incapacities? Much of the problem we had at that strata was with the government, and the possibility that it could function effectively. These things were discussed I take it?

GARRITY: Not so much in terms of the personalities involved, as in terms of U.S. desires, or U.S. objectives. And I think it was felt that if these objectives got out, they would be read by the personalities. But the backgrounders were not engaging in any kind of character analysis, or assassination, or whatever.

Q: To what degree did you experience that the embassy, or JUSPAO used -- and I say this in quotation marks -- the press to put pressure, let's say, on the Vietnamese, for whatever reason? Either to be more aggressive in their military operations, to institute reforms that would capture the hearts and minds. Do you have any feel for that aspect of the operation?

GARRITY: I think just by telling the story of the ongoing process -- coverage of the kinds of things you're talking about -- naturally were followed by the Vietnamese government. Now whether briefings on these developments were made only so that coverage could be generated, which would influence the Vietnamese government, or whether they were influenced in the process of telling the story .

I think that JUSPAO's role seemed to be telling the story both ways -- internally in Vietnam, and externally to the rest of the world. It was certainly a unique thing for USIA to be involved in, because although we deal with American press, and other foreign press at whatever post we're at, our prime responsibility is usually the domestic press in whatever country we are then stationed in.

And of course, we had a liaison with the Vietnamese press, in Vietnam. But this huge press center was engaged in talking to the foreign press -- American and the rest of the world. Of course, we brought a lot of press -- sponsored a lot of -- journalists to come to Vietnam, to supposedly learn about the war. And I think that our whole purpose was to be as open as possible, and generate as much information as possible.

Q: If I'm not mistaken, Bob, there was also a Vietnamese press briefing regularly, or irregularly, almost catty-corner from where JUSPAO's press center was?

GARRITY: That would precede the 5:00 follies.

Q: To what degree did you ever steer the press in that direction?

GARRITY: Some of the press attended it, but they didn't find it very useful, as I recall. The general view of the correspondents was that the Vietnamese briefing was either too far behind the curve, or not willing to be as open as the American briefing would be.

Q: Bob, in retrospect now, we've read a lot about Vietnam since we've been out of there. We've had a lot of comments from reporters going back. And one of the charges that has always been hurled at us who were participants in those years, is that we were lying; the U.S. government wasn't telling the truth. How do you feel about it now?

GARRITY: In all of the time I was at JUSPAO, whether it was in publications or in the press center, there was no known lying going on. Certain developments the mission wanted emphasized; you know, pacification, the non-military side of the war, which was very important.

And the fact is that in a country with very little democratic institution, some grass roots notion of democracy was beginning to catch on, and bear some fruit. As we know later, when Vietnam fell, that was one of the great tragedies, that some of the work that had been done, had been effective, and left behind people who were doomed because they had participated and become democratic, and had taken on these rather strange notions for their culture -- of man deciding his own fate, and being his own individual, and having his own vote.

But as far as lying to the press at that foreign press center, if there was any ever done it was by omission of fact and with the feeling that certain information had to be withheld for the safety of the troops. I know the approach on the part of JUSPAO was always "when in doubt, tell it." It's more important to get the story out. So JUSPAO was always pushing for publicizing the story, getting the story out. And sometimes, I think, it was resented by the military for that reason.

Q: Did the protests that occurred, not that infrequently -- especially by the Buddhist monks -- have an impact on your work? I remember going to a protest meeting, where the monks were in a pagoda, and nothing really happened until television arrived there. Was that a problem for you? How did we handle internal protests against the Vietnamese government?

GARRITY: It was covered just like anything else. The journalists generally would find a way to cover it themselves. If they didn't, or weren't able to, or wanted some analysis of what was going on, we had people in-house who could talk about Buddhist affairs, or what they were protesting, without perhaps making a judgment on it -- to get the facts together for the correspondents.

We did an awful lot of backgrounding; we had people like Doug Pike, who knew so much about the Viet Cong. We would save people like Doug for especially able journalists, who really could digest, and employ that kind of background information in their coverage. The emphasis in that case was not to propagandize, but to really project an accurate picture. Quite often somebody would take the accurate picture, and draw a negative conclusion; and many of these negative conclusions were well-drawn. But I think Barry Zorthian, and so many of us, always felt that the chips had to fall where they would; but the most important thing was to get the real story out.

Q: To what degree, Bob, did we get information from the press that we didn't get otherwise? To what degree was the learning process reversed? Did we learn things from the press we might not have found out otherwise?

GARRITY: Certain of the correspondents -- certainly the Neil Sheehans, and the Malcolm Browns -- were exceptionally active, and able in following the story for a long time; either in books that they wrote, or articles and so forth, and they themselves became historians of the war.

In that sense, the fact that they used continuity -- long time assignments, repeat assignments; the kind of continuity where they knew all the characters, and they knew all the developments, and they really became tremendous sources of information themselves. Vietnam was a situation where, in fact, you would use correspondents to brief other correspondents, simply because they knew so much.

Q: In retrospect, how do you evaluate the work that USIA did in Vietnam?

GARRITY: I would give USIA's performance in Vietnam very high marks. Certainly the result in Vietnam was not a very happy one, and there are a lot of reasons for that. I don't think USIA was one of them. I think that USIA's role, and what USIA did in Vietnam, was perhaps one of the few positive programs; one that really took into account the people of Vietnam, as well as the American audience. And one that was ultimately done in by other policies. The agency has always wanted a chance to be in on the take-off, as Murrow said; and always wanted to be part of the action. Here, they were part of the action, but ultimately the policies, and the approach followed in waging the war was simply a matter beyond USIA's control.

I would say that if there was a real element of honesty in the whole effort, stemmed from what USIA was trying to do. I found that USIA was probably well-known now, largely because of Barry Zorthian, who was responsible for the lack of censorship in the war. If there had been censorship, with the same kind of policy, we might have been in much worse shape.

Q: You made an interesting observation, that we were part of the action. Should we have been that much involved -- as actors -- rather than being more like the press was -- the observers; and putting out the story that way. You know, following, but as a good American instinct of doing -- rather than thinking, and reflecting, and interpreting, which should maybe have been JUSPAO's role. We were part of the war, rather than the observers who could interpret. If we had it to do over again, would or should we do the same thing?

GARRITY: I certainly hope we would never get in a situation like that again. It was an illbegotten war. It was badly conceived, badly carried out, and it's no surprise to me, at least, that it ended up the way it did. I think whether USIA was playing a part or not, it would have ended up the same way. Whether we should have had field reps in provinces, liaising between the Vietnamese province chiefs and the American military commanders -- I think those were not always very pleasant jobs. But perhaps these were some of the few voices of sanity in the situation. It may have been a lot worse without the influence of our JUSPAO field reps.

It's hard to say whether we should have done it, because, in fact, we did do it; it might have been worse without it. I think the policies that were applied were policies that ignored a great deal of wisdom and background knowledge, of the kind that USIA acquired during its experience in Vietnam; when we did have all the field rep expertise, and the information that came from these field reps about the real situation of security, the political complexion, what is going on in a particular province. I think if that information had been better employed, we might have had a different kind of situation.

Q: Robert, again in retrospect, what did the Vietnamese experience do for, or to, you and your family?

GARRITY: The first thing it did was separate us for the first time, and I think there are still a few scars from that. It's very difficult with young children. But then again, there were a lot of people in the same boat, so it's hard to say you feel sorry for just yourself. It was a situation that was not easy.

Certainly the experience of being there, and what I learned about the world, and other cultures, is something that will remain with me forever. I'm not sure how I can ever employ this to the benefit of U.S. policy again, now that I'm retired.

I read today, in the New York Times' science section, that psychiatrists have made the remarkable discovery that cultural differences account for the need for different kinds of psychiatric treatment, for different kinds of psychiatric problems. It's as if science has suddenly discovered something they never knew before; that there are essential, cultural differences between East and West, and North and South. Something, I think, almost anyone who has had a career in USIA's foreign service should -- or ought to know.

Q: What did it do to Joanne, and the children? Have they ever reflected on it? Have there been complaints about the times you have been separated?

GARRITY: I think my wife had to become very independent in handling the situation.

HOWARD FRANK NEEDHAM
Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
City Unspecified, Vietnam (1965-1967)

Howard Frank Needham began his work career in journalism, with the San Francisco Chronicle. In 1942, he enlisted in the Army. After the Army, he went back to the San Francisco Chronicle. He became interested in Foreign Service when answering President Truman's International Campaign of Truth for media specialist. He has also served in India, Guatemala, Paraguay, Lagos, and Nigeria. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt on March 29, 1990.

NEEDHAM: I continued in this capacity until late 1965, when it came my turn to do a tour in Vietnam. I was in Vietnam, with JUSPAO, under Barry Zorthian and Harry Casler, first as press attaché to the ambassador, who was Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge at that time, and then later on special duty developing materials for the South Vietnamese Government; materials of a feature nature.

Q: I know several of our people had some doubts as to how effective the JUSPAO program was, and I wonder whether or not you have any opinion as to whether we, in JUSPAO, had any substantial long-range or short-range effect in Vietnam?

NEEDHAM: Well, Lew, we certainly had some effect just by being there. But that has to be largely on a short-range basis. We had representatives in the provinces and I have no doubt that, to a certain extent, at that time there was some advantage gained. But I don't think it was of a lasting nature. And I would say that holds true for the largest part of the JUSPAO program, except for the work that Douglas Pike did in research and study, which was very deep, very substantive, and which I understand is still of considerable current value and use.

Q: Yes, it certainly is. We have an interview with Doug Pike, in which he goes into his opinions and his work in Vietnam. He was there for 15 years. He's now, of course, with the Institute of East Asian Studies at the University of California, at Berkeley, where he continues to be considered, practically, the country's expert on Vietnam.

LEONARD UNGER
Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Far East Affairs
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Ambassador Leonard Unger was born in California in 1917. He joined the Department of State in 1941 and later the Foreign Service. He served in Italy, Thailand, Laos and Taiwan. He was ambassador to both Thailand and Taiwan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: We've now reached the point where it's 1965 and you have become a Deputy Assistant Secretary dealing with Far Eastern affairs in Washington. What were your responsibilities?

UNGER: I'm trying to reconstruct the situation in Washington, i.e. who was where and doing what at that point.

Bill Bundy was the Assistant Secretary for East Asia and the Pacific. At least that's what we call it now. I was his deputy for Southeast Asia. That meant that I had pretty much direct supervision over the pertinent desk officers and for the work of the Economic Deputy Assistant Secretary which related to that area.

This was a period of considerable turmoil in Southeast Asia. I'm trying to establish the setting as of that particular moment. The situation in South Vietnam was beginning to become more and more active in a military sense as the struggle with the North became more and more acute.

In Cambodia the government was becoming more and more disturbed about the use of Cambodian territory by both of the factions in Vietnam. The South occasionally trespassed on Cambodian territory and, of course, the North by this time had established its infiltration route; northeastern Cambodia was being very heavily used for that.

The Thai and the Cambodians had long-standing differences, including differences over small, but to both of them, important, geography along their boundary.

The Thai and the Burmese were having occasional little dust-ups, sometimes with relation to the situation in the Shan States, Burmese territory just north of Thailand and northeast of central Burma. Sometimes there were problems with reference to some of the frontier areas down south in the Malay Peninsula, the area of the Kra Isthmus and so on.

It was a period of constantly deepening crisis, with its focus principally on Vietnam, but with repercussions and expressions all over the Southeast Asian area. It was an era when U.S. relations with the People's Republic of China were very strained, and when there was constant tension in the Taiwan Straits. And a period when Sukarno had just been ousted in Indonesia, which had been a critical moment there. This is an era when the Southeast Asian Treaty Organization was still functioning, but it had lost a good deal of its credibility and importance. Pakistan had, I believe by that time, been separated from India, and Bangladesh had been separated off.

Q: Bangladesh was Henry Kissinger's time. We're talking about '65 to '67. So Bangladesh was still part of Pakistan. Did you have prime responsibility through Bundy for Vietnam or were you really dealing more with the other parts of Southeast Asia?

UNGER: Well, at that time, and increasingly from that time on, Vietnam became not just the responsibility of a desk officer or of a Deputy Assistant Secretary or of an Assistant Secretary. It moved right up to the very top echelons in the Department because it was becoming a more and more serious matter. The United States involvement, including the military involvement, was constantly increasing.

So I guess you could say that my position, as far as Vietnam goes, was for a time the desk officer for it. I had a fairly large staff, including a number of young FSO's, some of whom had served out there. We were trying to handle the problems relating to Vietnam without letting them become prime international issues.

But there was a high level of interest right up to the top, including the President. So what would have been a usual country desk officer kind of responsibility had changed into a very special operation, in which much higher-level interest was constantly involved.

Q: What was your attitude at the time? How did you see the Vietnam thing? We had just started the build-up, starting really inserting combat troops for the first time. How did you see what we were doing there at the time?

UNGER: I would say that I was apprehensive about our turning this into a major military contest. I think that was the concern that I know I felt, and I think that some of our people in Vietnam and, certainly many of the people working in Southeast Asia, either in the field or in Washington, felt. It would be a mistake to try to turn what was essentially a political problem into an essentially military problem. There was a feeling that if the government in South Vietnam could pull itself together, operate more effectively, take more account of the kinds of internal measures that needed to be taken, that there was a much better chance of getting some stability in the South and frustrating any efforts of the North to move in and take the country over.

But there was, as you know, a succession of Vietnamese governments, with one leader after another. First, the unhappy history of Diem. And then finally Ky. There didn't seem to be a capacity on the part of the government in Vietnam to recognize what we saw as the central problems. Or, if they did, to organize the government resources and the bureaucracy to deal effectively with these problems, in order to enlist a much fuller support from the population.

The debate raged as to how much the Vietnam War was, in a sense, a conventional war, with the North simply being an invader with perhaps a number of superior arms and no inhibitions. Or the extent to which it was a situation in the South, in which government was steadily losing support, in which it was not effective in many areas of the country, and in which either direct military pressure from the North, or all the subversive activities engineered and carried out by the North constantly weakened the South, until it finally was clearly unable to protect itself.

The debate raged also over what the U.S. role should be. A military commander like Westmoreland was devoted to what we thought of as generally conventional ideas of warfare. Whereas many of the people who had served out there (including quite a number of Foreign Service officers who had been stationed in a lot of the outlining areas of the country, and who had had a pretty good chance to get a feel for the positions and the political problems in the villages and out in the countryside, as well as in Saigon) considered that the problem was one of poverty and of their government's lack of attention to improving their situation. Also there were the problems of corruption in government, not only at the center in Saigon, but throughout the country and, there was the view that for these reasons as well, the South Vietnamese military were not effective. The North was able to infiltrate into many areas and destroy the stability that the country needed.

Q: Were you able to get these officers talking to William Bundy and move their thoughts up the line? Was there a good flow of communication of, you might say, the ones who saw this as political rather than Military?

UNGER: Yes. I think, certainly as far as Bill Bundy was concerned, there is no question but that he interested himself and became involved. There were many sessions in which he had a pretty good opportunity to hear what these people had to say.

One of the people who began to show up in the scene in those years was a professor from Harvard who came down and was fairly well acquainted in certain circles in Washington and was sent out to the field, in Vietnam, at the time that I was concerned on the desk with that country. He usually spent several weeks out there and he was already well acquainted with a group of French political scientists who knew the area from an earlier time, and who had some perspectives on it worth listening to, even though one couldn't, by any means buy the whole analysis that they presented. This fellow was named Henry Kissinger and I found, when he went out to the area and saw a number of contacts he had in South Vietnam, and occasionally some others in the area although mostly right in South Vietnam, that he usually had a very perceptive and useful analysis to pass along to us. He had suggestions that were definitely worth listening to about our programs in Vietnam and how they might be altered to make them more effective.

At that time Kissinger was still teaching at Harvard and he would make these occasional visits to Washington when he came by and we talked. I tried to give him a thorough briefing of the situation, as it had changed from the last time he had been out there, always on the understanding that when he came back, we would debrief him and get his judgment on the situation. I would say this probably happened about three times in the course of my dealing with Vietnam.

Q: What was his message that he was bringing back? Was it a political, rather than a military war?

UNGER: I wish I could reconstruct with any reliability. I'm sure that there are places where this sort of thing is on the record. But he certainly tended to emphasize the political, as opposed to the strictly military approach, but not to the extent that some of the officers in the embassy in Saigon were doing. In other words, as I recall, he felt there had to be some military strength to back up the political program when it was necessary. There was no question that the North Vietnamese, either directly on the frontier, i.e. the 17th Parallel, or pushing in and probing from Southern Laos or Cambodia, were using military means. They also had an extremely widely proliferated network of operatives, intelligence and people who were working for them clandestinely throughout South Vietnam.

Q: Did you feel that there was a solid debate going on between you and what the others on the desk at the Bureau were saying about yes, it's military, but mainly political? Those in the Pentagon were saying just give us more forces and we can take care of this problem.

UNGER: You're asking if I felt there was a debate going on?

Q: A debate between the defense side and the state side?

UNGER: Yes, there was no question that these were issues that were being debated and argued passionately and quite continuously, as I recall it, through this period. This is the period when people talked about "the hearts and minds", a phrase that recalls the U.S. Colonel Ed Lansdale, who developed programs for Vietnam and who had earlier worked very effectively with President Magsaysay in the Philippines. When the State Department people, who had been sent out there and had served in the various provinces, put their emphasis on the economic and the political. There were very few that denied there was a military aspect to it, but I guess you could say they felt the South Vietnamese forces could handle the North Vietnamese with the pressures that were being exerted, if the situation within the country in South Vietnam were a stable and a secure one.

But that wasn't the case; this was primarily because of the actions and the policies of the government in South Vietnam, which never figured out an effective program to assure the loyalties of the population, particularly in rural areas, of the country. (This is an awfully big subject. It's one where I would like to refresh myself on some of the communications at that time).

Q: As a matter of fact, we are hoping to get an oral history program concentrated on the Foreign Services role in Vietnam. Hence, I'm going to just touch this one lightly because it is big and it is major. So at this point I think we might move on.

How did you see William Bundy? How did he operate?

UNGER: He operated effectively at upper levels. In addition to his own considerable reputation and valuable connections, he also obviously had a very close relationship with somebody who was right there in The White House, namely his brother Mac. The communication between Bill and Mac was practically continuous; I can remember innumerable occasions when I would walk into his office and he was on the phone with Mac.

So I guess going back to the Kennedy days, and certainly also into the Johnson period, there was a very close and immediate connection with The White House. Those of us who were working in concentrated fashion on Vietnam, although we were in State -- and I guess Dean Rusk was Secretary at that time -- we were frequently called over for meetings and discussions at the White House.

When Johnson was President, meetings were held in his office on a number of occasions. He was very deeply concerned and distressed about the situation. He wanted to be briefed and took a very direct personal role in many of the decisions that were being made. (I'm trying to reconstruct the period and relate it to the events that precede it. When I was first back in Washington, Kennedy was President, and then Johnson, following Kennedy's assassination).

Q: In '65 when you went there, of course, Johnson had been President for more than a year at that point.

UNGER: Yes. Kennedy was killed in the fall of '63.

Q: And you were ambassador in Laos from '62 to '65.

UNGER: I finished up in Laos, I think, in December of '64 and came back to Washington. I hadn't been there more than about ten days or two weeks, when one of the kinds of trips that became fairly routine was getting organized, involving Robert McNamara (Secretary of Defense), Mac Bundy, Bill Bundy and several others of us who flew out in McNamara's plane; it was non-stop from Washington to Saigon. We spent about three or four, maybe five days at most, in Vietnam; went up to Pleiku, which about a week or ten days before, had just had a very disastrous incident in which the Viet Cong had moved in and assaulted what had been regarded as a rather secure post. They killed a lot of people, including some American military, and generally terrorized the population. It was a typical action of the Communists, just to demonstrate how insecure the country was and how uncertain was the hold of the government.

Q: Was this the action that a number of Americans were killed too?

UNGER: Yes.

Q: And this was really, in a way, what triggered our response almost from that point on.

UNGER: When we came back to Washington, the debate began as to what should be the U.S. role. Should we continue as we had been in the past, with a lot of advisors, a tremendous amount of military and economic assistance, but without any U.S. forces, or at least any considerable number of American personnel, beyond advisory groups. That debate led -- and this is a matter on which I'm not too sure of my recollection -- to a decision made, probably in March, to send about 10,000 American military to Vietnam -- and the following summer, a very much larger number. This was Lyndon Johnson reluctantly going ahead with something I think he very definitely had not expected, or wanted to do, i.e. to authorize such a degree of American military involvement in Vietnam.

He was looking for advice from every corner that he could get it. He was dependent on Mac and on McNamara. I'm trying to remember to what extent Henry Kissinger was involved at that time.

Q: Probably only at the peripheral of things.

UNGER: I think so. I don't remember his being central at that point. He was certainly becoming a State Department central figure. But I would say, that although he was always there, always had something to say, he was not much of an activist, not as far as McNamara. And always somewhat cautious as to what he felt should be done. But on the other hand, not ever, that I can recall, taking a very strong and determined position in opposition. I think whatever his own personal thinking may have been, the impression one got was that at that time he was unprepared to be the President's informant and advisor.

Q: How did you feel about the embassy? There you were on the desk; did you feel that you were getting good information? Did you feel that you had a strong embassy there or was there a concern?

UNGER: Earlier there certainly had been a concern; I'm talking about back when I was in Washington before my assignment to Laos. And also we felt more confident of our judgements by the time we had got this whole company -- I don't remember how many there would have been; 20, 25 -- young Foreign Service officers who were trained in the language and were sent out to work in the provinces in Vietnam in order to give us good reporting directly from the field. By that time, I felt that we were getting a pretty reliable picture.

There was, of course, tremendous competition on the Washington scene for getting nearer to the President to press various proposals, positions and points of view, various courses of action. There were groups like Ed Lansdale's, in Saigon; his group included some Foreign Service officers but was a special, "hearts and minds" group. They had their ideas about countering insurgency, which Lansdale developed from his experience in the Philippines.

Q: That's the understanding.

UNGER: And he was thinking of applying in Vietnam some of the kinds of concepts, programs and approaches that he felt had been successful there. I think he introduced some ideas that were adaptable to Vietnam and useful, but by and large I don't think he had a major impact. I think what happened, was that the military were more and more in control of the situation, and by the time this was happening I was on my way out of Washington and going on out to Bangkok. In the "grass roots" situations, in the small towns and rural areas these groups of young Foreign Service officers were sent in order to provide Saigon and Washington with an informed judgment of what were the problems in this country; they tried to identify what were the kinds of programs that were effective; what ought we to be doing? Obviously, what was being done was not succeeding.

Those people, more and more, got caught up into the kind of military network. Also, given the rapidly expanding numbers of military in the country and the various roles they were to play, they were inevitably a major source to whom the President and Defense, and to some extent State, had to look for information about local situations; as time went on they were more and more the qualified Americans, on the spot, more than anybody from the Foreign Service.

They were good and bad and indifferent. Some of the reporting that came from those young military figures was first class, and some was very unreliable.

Q: How about the CIA? Were you in competition with the CIA? Or did you feel the CIA had their own point of view? How did you feel about it? We're talking about the '65 to '67 period.

UNGER: Looking at it from a Washington point of view, I would say the relationship was reasonably good. I remember Bill Colby and George Carver and others in the CIA with whom we were in close touch. The feeling was that the CIA and the State Department were not very far apart in terms of analyzing what needed to be done, and in putting less of an emphasis on military actions than did the U.S. Military. To be sure, there were those in the Military who also saw it as a problem with a very heavy civilian aspect, as something that could not be handled or solved on a purely military basis.

The CIA people had much more in the way of resources and flexibility to work with. They had a lot of people who had had experience living in villages and so on, or they had access to such people. But my recollection is of a fairly good, cooperative feeling with the CIA. We in the Foreign Service had to depend on their resources in some areas and when it came to the Embassy in Saigon, they would depend on our resources. There were certainly some areas where there was keen competition, for example, some of the places where we had consuls. I think we had a consul in Da Nang and Nha Trang and probably in Dalat.

My recollection is that even though there were differences in interpretation, and differences in opinion, by and large the cooperation was pretty good. They both had, of course, a much more political element in their analysis, political and economic, than did the Military who tended to see it as either a large scale military operation or a military subversive and local village problem, but always with a military emphasis.

Q: I'd like to move on now to your assignment to Thailand as ambassador. How did this come about?

UNGER: I suppose one of the reasons they asked me to go out to Bangkok in the fall of 1967 was because of my earlier experience there and in Laos. Let's see, did I follow Ken Young?

Q: It was Graham Martin.

UNGER: Excuse me, Graham Martin. Yes, that's right.

Q: You presented your credentials in October of 1967.

JAMES R. MEENAN
Audit Branch, Office of the Comptroller, USAID
Saigon (1965-1967)

Mr. Meenan was born in Rhode Island and raised in California. After graduating from Woodbury College he entered government service. Joining USAID in 1965, Mr. Meenan had a distinguished career with that Agency, serving as Mission and Program Auditor in USAID Missions throughout the world. His foreign postings include Liberia, Vietnam, Brazil, Chile, Panama, Sri Lanka and Philippines. Among his Washington assignments was Committee Staff Member in the Office of Senator Max Baucus. Mr. Meenan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Was any specific Vietnam training provided?

MEENAN: When I returned from the Liberia review, I entered a Vietnam specific training program that was conducted in the Rosslyn, Virginia training center. The course covered guerrilla warfare and Vietnam area studies. The trainees comprised a unit from Air Force Intelligence, one of its members I had met earlier in a USAG training program, and Colonel (Col.) John Paul Vann. Col. Vann had earlier served with the Army in Vietnam and had his own views on how the war should be conducted. Now with USAID, he had the authority to better put his views into action.

Mr. Mike Bengé, who worked with the Montagnards in the central highlands of Vietnam, also participated and added good insights to the real world situation in the country. He later was captured by the Viet Cong and became a Prisoner of War. Upon securing his freedom, he continued his USAID career.

Q: How was work in Vietnam?

MEENAN: I was assigned to the Audit Branch of the Comptroller's Office in Saigon, when the operation was still referred to as the U.S. Operations Mission. A short time later, it was renamed USAID/Vietnam. I started out in auditing at a point where no one in the mission seemed to want audits undertaken. There was, however, strong congressional interest in our oversight work. Some staff changes were made including the posting of a new comptroller.

At the time of the arrival of the new comptroller, I was in the midst of performing an audit of the countrywide cashiering operations. Since there was no national banking system, the local payments for project work was carried out through cashiers in each region. The air transport services of Air America, which functioned as our regional taxi service, facilitated my unannounced spot audits.

I was in the midst of one of these spot audits when I received word to report back to the new comptroller in Saigon. Mr. David Curtain, Comptroller, surprised me with a request that I take up the post of managing all the USAID local currency in the country. I was only two years or so out of college, and I was being placed in charge of well over a billion dollars in local currency. All the local currency records had been hand kept by Vietnamese staff. There was not a direct American manager involved which could pose a breakdown in internal controls.

The records were all hand written, so the first thing I did was to contact the local National Cash Register (NCR) representative to explore establishing an updated mechanical accounting system. We worked out the introduction of a NCR posting machine along with a new chart of accounts. I shortly learned that the programming of these local currencies wasn't of interest to the program office, so I assumed this responsibility. The programming aspect encompassed determining where and when local currency was needed and how it would be delivered.

I learned that the finance ministry had issues with Nguyen Cao Key, the country leader, and blocked the funding of some favored local projects. The ministry officials left me with the impression that they didn't like Americans much, favoring their older ties with the French. They would erect all sorts of roadblocks in providing official Vietnamese money that should have supported economic development projects to counter the Viet Cong.

One such issue developed when the ministry froze the funding for the collection of garbage in Saigon. The trash was piling up on the streets so we had to run quickly and set up a payroll operation for the garbage collectors. We actually went out and paid the garbage collectors in Saigon to clean up the trash and keep the thing going until we could bring enough pressure to restore the regular flow of Vietnamese currency, the Piasta.

Q: What was the problem?

MEENAN: Internal battles within the Vietnamese government, particularly the finance ministry not supporting Nguyen Cao Key and others in his administration. We also had a devaluation of the Piasta, pushed by the U.S. When they negotiated that devaluation between our two governments, they executed an agreement that threw a monkey wrench into our local currency operations. The agreement changed the method of collecting all of the local currency generated by the Food for Peace (Public Law 480) shipments, which funded a great number of our programs. The agreement changed the method for computing the local currency due from the available data on shipments from the U.S. to the undocumented arrivals in Vietnam.

Since there was no data on food shipment arrivals in Vietnam on which to base our billings to collect the Piastas due for the food provided, the Vietnamese commingled the local currency funds in its general import currency generation account. As a result, quite a few millions of dollars in local currency funds due the U.S. were blocked.

One key beneficiary of the Food for Peace funds was the U.S. Military Assistance Command-Vietnam (MACV) that relied on receiving USAID funding on a regular basis in order to pay the salaries of the South Vietnamese Army (ARVN) forces. When this blockage happened, it threw these payments into limbo.

Two courses of action were developed to address the commingled funds and to rectify the problem created by the devaluation agreement. For the commingled fund problem, we determined the rough amount of funds that were due the U.S. from the existing balance in the ministry's account. In a meeting with finance ministry officials, we proposed a percentage split for the local currency due the U.S. be applied to the balance in the account. The ministry initially balked at our proposal, wanting to keep the fund blocked until it could come up with its own computations. I pointed out to the officials that this blockage would directly impact the funds going to MACV and the ARVN forces for payrolls, unless they agreed to the split. It was further noted that the interested parties would be advised that the delayed funding was the due to finance ministry actions. When it learned of these potential impacts, it saw the light of day and negotiated a split of the blocked funding.

In regards to the complication imposed by the devaluation agreement, we learned that the U.S. Embassy and the Vietnamese Foreign Ministry did exchange notes correcting the situation, but the embassy staff could not locate the documents. My chief local accountant was of North Vietnamese descent with many good contacts in the South Vietnam government. He was instrumental in making use of his contacts in the foreign ministry and secured a copy of the exchange of notes correcting the devaluation agreement. With the notes in hand, we were able to present them to both the embassy and finance ministry staff to resolve the issue for future collections of local currency due from Food for Peace shipments.

Q: We're going through similar problems with Iraq right now. Was most of the economic assistance provided for stabilization purposes?

MEENAN: Yes. We were building power generating plants, distribution systems, roads, and providing a full range of basic economic development projects to improve the living standards for a more stable country, even under wartime conditions. Much of the focus was on decentralized regional development and growth that directly supported village level activity. There was some real progress being made in this area including the fine work of Colonel Vann, who later perished in an aircraft accident. The USAID staff was dedicated and committed. Under difficult conditions, whether it be war, ethnic violence, or poor emerging economies, I strongly believe the best approach is to undertake assistance efforts that directly supports keeping the local population actively employed in one form or another and with a source of food for nourishment. With the basic population's needs being addressed, the country can more effectively advance with more progressive economic growth activities. However, as an outsider, the U.S. can do nothing until the local leaders and population take the lead in improving their own lot. This approach could have helped Russia when it transitioned to a market economy as well as now in Afghanistan and Iraq.

This point was made even clearer when I worked in Sri Lanka. I witnessed, first hand, what ethnic violence, between Tamils and Sinhalese, can do to impede a country's great economic growth. Unfortunately, the violence is still on going today. Applying this perspective to Iraq, the violence is similarly ethnic driven and not a political war for territory expansion, as we have seen in past world wars. Ethnic violence seems much more vicious and targeted at specific individuals or groups in a community. As an outsider, the U.S. is very restricted as to what it can do to help, until the local populations take the lead in creating a reasonable working environment.

Q: What was your impression of the Vietnamese government that you were dealing with?

MEENAN: I felt that the Vietnamese government needed a lot of support and, unfortunately, the U.S. in many cases had to step in and take the lead in providing the impetus to stabilization as well as economic development activities. The government seemed to be doing what it could, given its limited capacities. While some in government like the finance ministry official's actions seemed to be counter productive. You try to deal with them the best you can.

There was a marked difference between North and South Vietnamese. The South Vietnamese seemed more agriculture focused while the North was more industrially productive. That's why my chief accountant was a North Vietnamese, who was fairly aggressive with many contacts.

Q: Was there much pressure put on your team by the South Vietnamese to cook the figures?

MEENAN: No, none whatsoever. The program was project driven with each activity carried its own funding requirements. Of course, the project activities were worked out in advance with Vietnam officials. One such project was a power distribution project being implemented by the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association (NRECA) from the U.S. The project entailed constructing wood pole treatment plants to support the expansion of power lines. It was a good effort being carried out under difficult circumstances.

One thing I did notice was the weapon of preference by the Viet Cong in Saigon seemed to be the Claymore Mine. It was a small rectangular mine that sprayed steel balls from its flat surface, thus making it well suited for placing in saddlebags on a bike that is parked at a strategic location. One such use was against customers on the Mekong Floating Restaurant. The attackers would set off an initial Claymore to get people fleeing. The real damage came with the backup Claymores that would catch the fleeing customers. We were advised that if there was an explosion, you should promptly drop and face your feet in the direction of the blast to minimize personal injury.

Q: How long were you in Saigon?

MEENAN: I was posted to Vietnam for an eighteen month assignment starting in 1965 and ending in 1967, just before the Tet Offensive.

Q: How did you feel about how things were going there?

MEENAN: During my assignment the size of the USAID mission more than doubled. It was a difficult situation, trying to blend military action with economic pacification. I was hopeful that our efforts could work to provide some economic balance in the regions and help the population determine their own fate. As soon as one plays the military option, effective negotiations and economic persuasion to neutralize a situation, goes out the window. If one utilizes diplomacy and economic persuasion, there is a much better chance of achieving the objectives and insuring economic and political stability. This is particularly true for the U.S., because we carry a lot of extra baggage and resentment as a result of any intervention. If the U.S. can actively work with foreign countries to assist to get their economic houses in order, then we can often avoid a destabilizing situation.

Often enough we don't pay that much attention to the economics of a situation. The U.S. seems to be overly focused on the political and military options and not the economics that may be driving the problem. USAID, with its multiple congressional mandates, seems to have lost its way and now is trying to manage, through contractors, a convoluted program of non-economic activities. At the end of the day, USAID will have spent the appropriated funding but not have improved the economic wellbeing of the recipients or necessarily have that much to show for the expenditures.

In the older days, following my Vietnam assignment, I had the pleasure to serve in Brazil, where real economic development was underway laying the foundation for the country's current good fortunes.

EDWARD L. LEE II
U.S Marine Corps
Da Nang (1965-1968)

Mr. Lee was born and raised in Michigan, educated at Delta College and American University. After seven years service with the US Marine Corp, he joined the State Department as Agent in the Office of Security. Mr. Lee's entire career in the Foreign Service was devoted to Security matters in Washington and in diplomatic posts throughout the world. His postings as Regional Security Officer include Cyprus, South Korea, Thailand and Panama. Mr. Lee was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: When did you go to Vietnam?

LEE: I went to Vietnam in March of 1965, which was really the first landing or the official deployment of troops beyond advisors in Vietnam. I went to Da Nang.

Q: That's where you all went in.

LEE: Right. I spent some time briefly in Chu Lai. Mainly in the early years it was not as bad as during the period of Tet and thereafter. We had engagements. We had losses. There were some things in Vietnam in the Marines that dispelled what people have seen in movies. There was not drugs. The entire period I was in Vietnam, I don't know a person who used drugs. That whole thing was either a manufacture of Hollywood or happened to somebody else.

Q: I also think it happened later, too. I think it was after Tet.

LEE: Demoralization was a big part of that.

Q: The Marines had a record of having these... Were you in a core infantry unit or in the civil action type of programs?

LEE: We were primarily patrolling roads. We'd try to get the ARVN, the Vietnamese soldiers, to participate in patrols with us. That didn't go too well. We had problems in that we had bad weapons for Vietnam. We had been trained with a rifle called the M14, which was a very good rifle for different types of tactics but in jungles, for example, it had a flash suppressor at the end of it. If you were going through a thicket or a jungle and you banged it against something or somebody, that flash suppressor would get bent. The next time you fired rounds through it, the rounds would be sheared off. It was not until '67 or '68 that they came up with the AR15 and the M16 and that kind of thing. We had a hard time. We had heavy losses in Quang Mi and Quang Tri, which another one of our units was in. One of our companies lost 70%, which is a lot of people. Most of the people that I went through boot camp with died. Very few survived. I sometimes wonder how I sort of escaped it all, but I did.

Q: What was the feeling within your Marine unit about the war?

LEE: You take a group of young people that probably come from the lower socioeconomic part of the system, not well educated, don't understand macroeconomics and politics and things like that. You don't really think about it. You're basically told, "You're here to save your country." In actuality, that's not what Vietnam was all about. Vietnam was about political paranoia and economics. Everybody thought they were fighting for their country. They really weren't. They were fighting for someone else's political agenda. The 63,000 people that died in Vietnam during '61-'75 in many respects died for nothing. Maybe a lot of people wouldn't share that, but that's the way I view it. You have somebody like McNamara, who had been the former Secretary of Defense, who really helped get Vietnam off the ground during the Kennedy administration, wrote a book a few years ago basically stating that he made a mistake in pushing this whole Vietnam period. Well, why say it now? The money that he earned from that book should have been donated to the survivors of Vietnam KIAs (killed in action). But it goes to show you how politics works. It's very imprecise, it's very unscientific. I think my general feeling about the war is, it was wrong, it took the lives of a lot of people, it achieved no political objective, it was never an ulterior war, it was a political war.

Q: What was your reaction and that of your comrades about the ARVN, the South Vietnamese army?

LEE: There was an awful lot of prejudice by us, a good bit of it unjustified. We were harsh on the Vietnamese because we didn't understand them. We didn't understand where they came from or anything about their history. I had one advantage in that before I went to Vietnam I spent six months in the Vietnamese language school. So, I understood things about Vietnam that a lot of people didn't understand. Basically Vietnamese, North or South, really didn't care who was in charge. They just wanted to be able to plant their crops. They wanted to be left alone. I think we made a lot of big mistakes in not educating our military better about Vietnam. But there was an awful lot of prejudice, racism if you will, calling Vietnamese all kinds of terrible names. It was definitely a black hour in U.S. history.

Q: They gave you an aptitude test and found out you were good in languages?

LEE: Yes. I spent the first couple of months in Vietnam teaching infantrymen how to speak certain things in Vietnamese when they would go into villages. It was by no means a high level of Vietnamese but it was basically certain questions to ask, directions, the nuances of getting around and that kind of thing.

Q: Did you find yourself being used as "Hey, let's get Sergeant Lee to tell them what...?"

LEE: Yes. I would say that there were times when I felt my loyalties were a little bit mixed because I was being asked to fulfill objectives I really didn't agree with. Actually, when I left Vietnam and when I got out of the Marine Corps, I wrote a number of letters to the editor that were pretty harsh about the Vietnam War, namely just to vent my feelings toward it.

Q: Having spent seven years in the Marine Corps, this was more than just getting out of your hometown. It sounds like you might be becoming what was known as a "lifer," a career Marine. Was it Vietnam that changed you?

LEE: After I left Vietnam, I got back to the United States. I really wanted to stay in the Marine Corps. They came around wanting someone to go to Marine security guard school. I could see the handwriting on the wall. This was 1967. I knew that if I went back to the United States and I didn't get out of the infantry, I'd be going back there. That didn't appeal to me at all. So, when someone said, "Look, you have the opportunity of living in Paris and wearing civilian clothes and having something close to a real life," I said to myself, "This is a good opportunity." I went on line embassy duty, which was very plush for a Marine, and I ended up going back to Vietnam, to Saigon. I spent a year in Saigon as a Marine security guard. I continued to go up in rank. Then

I was assigned a year after that just before Tet to Bangkok where I became in charge of the Marine security detachment. I would have probably continued in the Marine Corps, but I began to see things that were different from what I had been used to and I made the decision to get out of the Marine Corps in 1968.

Q: Tell me about being a Marine security guard in Saigon. Were you there when they had the new embassy?

LEE: I was there during the old embassy. The new embassy was under construction. There were an awful lot of bombings in Saigon at that time. In fact, I was working in a building where a bomb had gone off and I was knocked about 100 feet down the hallway. Fortunately, I was not seriously injured. But there was an awful lot of city type attacks. MPs were being shot and killed. Bombs were being thrown. Hand grenades... It was not by any means a really healthy environment either. It was very unpredictable. We had a large Marine security guard detachment in Vietnam about that time. About 100 Marines. I left literally three months before Tet. One of the Marines that I had trained was the only Marine security guard to have been killed in combat in the Marine Security Guard Program, Marshall. He was up on the wall of the new embassy and was killed.

DAVID LAMBERTSON
Mekong Delta Reporter
Saigon (1965-1968)

David Lambertson was born in Kansas in 1940. He received his BA from the University of Redlands in 1962. He entered the Foreign Service in 1963, and his assignments abroad included Saigon, Medan, Paris, Canberra and Seoul with an ambassadorship to Thailand.

Q: Now, you were telling me earlier that that group that was to be seconded to AID included Frank Wisner.

LAMBERTSON: Frank Wisner, Desaix Anderson, Steve Ledogar, Rich Brown, Clay Nettles. I don't know if you've ever run across Clay Nettles, he's a wonderful fellow. Paul London who was a very good officer; he left the Service early and made an interesting career on the Hill and other places. I've got that whole list downstairs along with a picture of the group as it appeared in the State Department newsletter. Would you like to have it? We were the first group of draftees for Vietnam and we were about half FSO and half AID direct-hires. The direct-hires included older guys who came from the LAPD and places like that and were in the Public Safety division of AID, as well as younger guys right off the street. We didn't know it, but we were the first cadre in what later became CORDS.

Q: I think that would be very interesting and we can add things like that to this record, but you're not going into CORDS, you're going into the embassy after more Vietnamese language. So, when did you actually arrive in Saigon?

LAMBERTSON: I arrived in Saigon in July of 1965.

Q: In the political section. How was the political section organized at that time?

LAMBERTSON: I think it was organized as any political section was, with the unusual exception of the so-called provincial reporting unit. The embassy had its traditional economic section, political section, consular section, AID and a huge CIA station, and then was of course operating side by side with and always in danger of being overwhelmed by MACV, the military headquarters. The provincial reporting unit was generally about a half dozen junior Foreign Service Officers who were assigned to the provinces, but traveled to those areas from Saigon. My territory in the beginning was the lower part of the Mekong Delta. We would stay on the road two, three or four days, come back, write a report about what we had seen and do the same thing the next week.

Q: You would touch bases with both Vietnamese officials and Americans that were out in these provinces. So, you'd speak to the governor and the district chief?

LAMBERTSON: Yes. I'd always see the governor, the members of the provincial council - provincial councils were more honorary than substantive, but they were reflective of what politics there were in the provinces. Prominent people. People who had something to say about the situation in Chuong Thien or Bac Lieu. Then always I would be in contact with the AID provincial representative, often one of my former colleagues from FSI, and with the U.S. military people who were there.

Q: Now describe the area that you were originally assigned to, what provinces or districts were those?

LAMBERTSON: It was the lower, the southern part of Four Corps. Vietnam was militarily divided into four corps areas. I Corps being in the North, II Corps being the Central Highlands and central coast, III Corps the area right around Saigon extending over to the Cambodian border, and IV Corps being the Mekong Delta. IV Corps was in turn divided into what I believe was the ninth infantry's area of responsibility and the 21st infantry's. These were Vietnamese military unit designations - no U.S. troop units were in the Delta at that time. The lower part of the Mekong Delta was about as far off the map as you could get, the kind of place that the brand new guy in the provincial reporting unit would be assigned to. It included the southern tip of the Camau peninsula, mostly mangrove swamps and heavily infested with Viet Cong—Bac Lieu, Ba Xuyen, Chuong Thien right in the middle, Kien Giang on the Gulf of Siam side and An Giang, which was the stronghold of the Hoa Hao - a fundamentalist Buddhist religious sect and a fairly safe place because it was an unusually cohesive population. Can Tho was the biggest city in "my" region.

Q: You would meet with the Hoa Hao leaders?

LAMBERTSON: Yes. In the manner of traditional Foreign Service work, in all of these places I tried to get to know people who knew something or were in some way influential. The Hoa Hao were quite effective in knitting the community together and keeping out alien influences such as the Viet Cong.

Q: Would you describe your duties primarily as observing and reporting on what was going on and what resources were there?

LAMBERTSON: That's precisely what it was. It was nothing more. It was a very good job in terms of the opportunity it provided to travel rather widely in a particular area of Vietnam and be able to compare the way things were done in one province with the way they were done in another. It gave you therefore a slightly broader perspective than my AID colleagues would have had. But it wasn't as meaty as being a provincial representative in other ways. I wasn't handing out money. I wasn't a decision maker in a particular province. I was simply a guy passing through and reporting back to Saigon.

Q: What was traveling like in those days?

LAMBERTSON: Well, it was by air almost exclusively.

Q: An Otter or something like that?

LAMBERTSON: Usually by Air America transport, and Air America flew twin engine Beechcraft, tail draggers, not the more modern turbo props or King Air type Beechcraft although a few of those were coming into the inventory by the time I left Saigon. That was probably the most common type of airplane that I flew in, but I also flew in the latest Pilatus Porters, a wonderful turbo prop, high-wing, single engine thing that could take off in about a hundred yards, literally. There were Dorniers, a funny French twin engine high-winged airplane, with the engines down on the wing struts. Yes, Otters as well. The Otters, however, were always U.S. army aircraft, but we used them. Then very often helicopters. Also C-46s and C-47s. Caribous, C-123s. I could go on

Q: Air was chosen over land?

LAMBERTSON: Air was chosen over land because land travel would have required a heavily armed military convoy to get from Saigon to virtually anywhere I was going. You could drive from Saigon to My Tho, where Frank Wisner worked. I think in good periods you could perhaps drive all the way to Vinh Long, one of "my" provinces which was the next one down, but you were risking things to try to go much beyond that. The roads very often were out. They had been sabotaged and/or fallen into total disrepair because of nonuse. So, to get to a provincial capital from Saigon, you almost always had to go by air. I went back to Vietnam as a tourist in 1995 and we drove all the way from Hue to Saigon and My Tho. It was quite wonderful because I saw country that I'd only seen from the air in the sixties, including much of that beautiful central coastline.

Q: The requirement to use air all the time must have underscored the idea that it wasn't secure and there were things that needed to be done.

LAMBERTSON: There was no doubt about that. I think the war in the Delta was always pretty low intensity. There were rarely major battles that resulted in huge numbers of casualties. There were often large sweeps by Vietnamese military units and later by the U.S. 25th infantry division, but they rarely resulted in major contacts with hundreds of people killed. Most of the war in the Delta, right up to the end of the Vietnam War, was ambushes and attacks on isolated outposts by roving bands of guerrillas or increasingly well armed units of one kind or another. It made the whole area insecure in the sense that it was certainly unsafe to be out on the road and a long way from home. As I say, within the various provinces there were safe areas. I think for example in Vinh Long province you could easily drive from Vinh Long to Sa Dec which was a major district capital 30 or 40 miles away. In An Giang province, the Hoa Hao area, there were broad areas in which you could travel safely. But in most of the Delta it was quite risky. You couldn't really safely plan a Sunday afternoon drive through the countryside.

Q: So, what then was the theme that you'd say would come out of your reporting for this period?

LAMBERTSON: I'd be interested and probably embarrassed to read some of my provincial reports from that first six or eight months on the job. I imagine I was far less critical than I should have been and far less discerning - probably just generally naive. But there was a lot of variation. I think probably after I'd been to An Giang or Kien Giang I would write a pretty doggone upbeat report about prospects for security and stability in that province and the way the war was going there. But after visiting Vi Thanh, the capital of Chuong Tien province, there was very little positive one could have possibly said, because Vi Thanh was an island in a sort of rice paddy sea of hostility as I remember it. You really couldn't go anywhere outside that little town unless you were armed and accompanied by lots of guys.

Q: So, you were in the provincial reporting unit of the political section. Who are some of the other PRU people?

LAMBERTSON: When I arrived there Bill Marsh was the head of the provincial reporting unit. Bill had been there at least a couple of years by then, a very good officer. He was a strong intellect. He wrote well, he spoke well. He had an ebullient, expansive personality. Still does. After a year or so, Dick Teare replaced Bill as head of the unit.

Q: Here we go. Vlad Lehovich?

LAMBERTSON: Vlad had arrived a year or two before me. I think he and Dick Holbrooke took language training together. I'm not sure if they had a full ten months of it, but they had some Vietnamese language training together and I think arrived in '62 or early '63. Steve Lyne, later an ambassador in Africa, was provincial reporter for the mountainous regions and our man among the Montagnards. He was not a Vietnamese language speaker, but he didn't really have to be for that particular portfolio because he was dealing with tribesmen who were a non-Vietnamese people.

David Engel was in the section when I arrived. David Engel was a wonderful Vietnamese speaker, the best I think the Foreign Service ever had. He was later Henry Kissinger's interpreter in private meetings with Le Duc Tho in Paris. He was assigned to the upper part of the Delta.

Later on we had two David Browns. David E. Brown and David G. Brown who shared an office in the new embassy when we moved there – desks back to back. Both of them were very good writers and very good reporters I thought.

Jim Bullington arrived in Vietnam when I did or shortly thereafter. I'm not sure what his language training route had been because he wasn't in my class and he was not in the AID class, but I think he'd had some training. He spent a little bit of time in Saigon and then was almost immediately assigned to Hue or Da Nang. He was in both Da Nang and Hue.

Tim Carney was a provincial reporter at one point. Spence Richardson arrived a year after me and we were housemates after Dick Teare left. Harry Dunlop replaced Dick as chief of the unit. By and large I thought it was a very good group of people, some talented FSOs who had good careers later on.

Q: Now in terms of covering and reporting on Vietnam, the PRU is in the embassy; are Da Nang and Hue going to have PRU reporting for their areas, because Saigon is not all of Vietnam?

LAMBERTSON: I Corps was basically not covered from Saigon. It was covered from Da Nang/Hue, and this varied. We had a consulate in Hue and we at one point moved it to Da Nang, but we had had a consulate in Hue for a good long time. John Helble was consul there years ago. As I recall, I Corps provincial reporting was done by the people in Hue and/or Da Nang. We didn't have anybody who was in Saigon and traveled regularly to I Corps.

Q: There was a PRU type of reporting going on for every district.

LAMBERTSON: For every province.

Q: For every province. Actually that's a pretty impressive list of officers. Now, you're saying Holbrooke was in the PRU unit?

LAMBERTSON: No, Holbrooke actually was an AID provincial representative, before the term was coined perhaps.

Q: So, he was in the field.

LAMBERTSON: Yes. He spent at least six months in, I believe, Ba Xuyen province. In fact the first time I met Dick was when we were going through language training in the fall of '64 and he came back as a grizzled veteran and spoke to our group about what it was really like. By the time I got to Saigon, Dick was in the embassy. He had somehow moved from being a provincial representative in a very obscure part of the Delta to being the ambassador's special assistant or staff aid, to Maxwell Taylor. I'm not sure what Dick was doing when I got there. He was between opportunities perhaps. Henry Cabot Lodge had just returned. Dick didn't stay too long after I got there, but he was, I think, attached to the political section. He had long since stopped being a provincial representative. He had spent time in the front office. He was on his way.

Q: The PRU central reporting unit was part of the political section, but there was a political section doing sort of standard political reporting?

LAMBERTSON: The political section, the internal unit, was run by John Burke when I arrived. Burke was replaced by Ted Heavner, a very good officer. And there was an external unit, which had Dick Smyser, at one point Roger Kirk, and working in it for a time was Frederick Flott.

Did you ever hear of Fred Flott? Frederick W. Flott, whose job was to keep in touch with officials of allied embassies - at that time we were desperately trying to increase the numbers of "flags" that were flying in South Vietnam. So we made major efforts internationally to get other governments to send troops, even if we paid the freight. Today we would call it a "coalition of the willing." Fred Flott spent a lot of time liaising with the embassies of troop-contributing countries, and so inevitably Frederick W. Flott was known as "Free World Freddy." That might have been Phil Habib's doing.

Q: You were saying Desaix Anderson was in that group that was seconded to AID. Was he out there at that time?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, they all arrived in the spring of 1965 and I didn't get out there until July of '65.

Q: They're provincial reporters?

LAMBERTSON: No, they're provincial representatives.

Q: Yes, they're out there and you're cycling through there if you will.

LAMBERTSON: Yes.

Q: Was Negroponte out there at that time?

LAMBERTSON: Yes. John had been a provincial reporter but had moved over to the internal unit of the political section and was working for John Burke, following Saigon domestic politics. Then I eventually moved in that direction myself and worked closely with John in the constitution building process that we attempted in South Vietnam.

Q: Was Hal Colbaugh around at this time?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, definitely. He came in probably six or eight months after I got there and he was assigned to I Corps. He was a great linguist. I believe he was based in Da Nang as a provincial reporting officer assigned to that office. I believe we still had the consulate in Hue. Da Nang was not a consulate, but it operated like one, to a greater extent than the other corps headquarters did. II Corps was headquartered in Nha Trang, III Corps was in Bien Hoa, and IV Corps was in Can Tho. But only Da Nang had an office that operated like a consulate.

Q: Standing back for a moment, Vietnam is becoming a major issue. Administratively State has an embassy, it has a consulate there and now they're adding these other reporting tools so it can report what's going on in Vietnam. So did State have a separate stream of information from MACV? I mean that's what the provincial reporters do. That's what the people who are now in place are doing. So, State has actually made a major commitment of manpower and resources to the whole Vietnam circumstances and you're listing names of people who have become quite noted years later from that experience who like yourself would become ambassadors and what not. It must have been a very...I don't want to say driving experience, but a very fulsome experience. It was an incredible introduction to the Foreign Service world.

LAMBERTSON: It was very intense. It was very absorbing. It was something you lived 24 hours. For a young guy it was exciting, extremely interesting. I felt like I was exactly where I wanted to be. Not everybody shared those feelings. A lot of people were sent there against their wishes, but for me it was something I really wanted to do. I've always felt that when something important is going on, it's better to be close to the action rather than to be out on the periphery. It's the same principle that would hold, for example, when there's a presidential visit coming to your country and you have a chance to work on the trip or to try to insulate yourself from it to the extent possible. The best thing to do is to plunge in and be part of it and be close to the action. In Saigon I felt very close to the action. I liked that. It was exciting.

Q: Was your entire tour spent in the provincial reporting unit or you were saying that you were moving onto other duties in time?

LAMBERTSON: My provincial reporting experience actually was in two parts. Most of it was in the Lower Mekong Delta, but I also did a few months as a provincial reporter in the central coastal provinces, replacing Vlad Lehovich who by then had finished at least three years. That was a good change of scene for me and it broadened my perspective a bit. A different kind of war in the central provinces, much more main force action - and more intense politics traditionally, because that had always been a more highly developed part of the country. Then in the...I would say...the spring of 1966, we - the United States government - came to the conclusion that something better had to be done in terms of developing a viable South Vietnamese government that might command the respect of its people.

There had been a series of coups and revolving-door military governments in Saigon ever since the November 1963 assassination of Diem. There were Nguyen Khanh, "Big" Minh, Nguyen Cao Ky and Nguyen Van Thieu, jousting with each other. It was a mess, and a situation that was causing a rapid diminution of confidence in the United States in addition to the effect that it was having within South Vietnam. There was no real effective government in Saigon; therefore, the war effort in the provinces was hampered and diluted and made ineffective. In the United States people were beginning to wonder what this was all about. So, in the spring of '66, we began a process of constitutional government building. It was, I'm sure, more our initiative than the initiative of the South Vietnamese, but we guided them through a process - electing a constituent assembly, i.e., a constitutional assembly, drafting a constitution and then on the basis of that constitution, electing a president - between 1966 and the end of 1967. When that happened I moved to the internal unit of the political section and this constitution building effort became my full-time job, mine and John Negroponte's.

Q: How does that express itself?

LAMBERTSON: Well, first, we were involved in organizing and developing the rules for the constituent assembly election as I remember. I don't recall exactly what entities we were working with or through. The ambassador and the big guns in the embassy worked with the South Vietnamese leadership establishing the ground rules and timing for the constituent assembly election. For me it meant a lot of traveling prior to the constituent assembly election to the provinces, including places I'd never been to before, to talk with local officials and encourage people to run for office, and to talk with American officials and explain to them what this was going to be all about and encourage them to watch the process closely and let us know what was happening. In that brief period I traveled to darn near every province in the country. I recall returning to the embassy at midnight from one such trip and writing up a long report on a yellow legal pad and taking it directly to the code room. There was a response to it the next day, commenting on some issues I had raised. I later learned it had been written personally by Dean Rusk. That seemed perfectly natural somehow. The election was held in, you probably know this from your chronology, the summer of '66 and a constituent assembly was convened in Saigon and began the process of drafting a constitution. Negroponte and I were basically the embassy's lobbyists. We spent all day in the old opera house advising these Vietnamese politicians on how to draft a really good constitution.

Q: Not exactly a reprise of what MacArthur did in Tokyo; there were other things quite distracting at the time going on.

LAMBERTSON: Yes, and MacArthur had full authority, we didn't, notwithstanding what some people thought. We learned our limitations as this process went forward. We did have some influence, undoubtedly, on the shape of the constitution. We had a guy attached at that time to the political section - Phil Habib was political counselor - a fellow by the name of Bert Flanz, who was an academic and whose specialty was constitutions. He had been sent out to Seoul in the early sixties when Phil was the political counselor there to help us help the Koreans write a constitution. In any event, he was there and we had lots of people with lots of fixed ideas about what ought to be in that constitution and what ought not be in it. One of the points that we worked hardest on was Article IV, which as written would have prohibited anyone who was ever a member of the Viet Cong from ever having any role in the political life of South Vietnam. We wanted to eliminate that or change it so that in the future in South Vietnam there could be some degree of political reconciliation in which former Viet Cong could be members of the national assembly or otherwise participate in politics. The constituent assembly members were very strongly set against that and it was not changed. I think the constituent assembly was a group of authentic representatives of their communities. Article IV was something that they felt strongly about and that probably a great many of their constituents also felt strongly about. A spirit of reconciliation was not abroad in the land. In any event we certainly lost on that provision, and on others.

Q: You were mentioning a moment ago that Phil Habib comes in as a political counselor. What's it like to work for Phil Habib?

LAMBERTSON: I always thought it was great working for Phil Habib. He arrived in the political section shortly after I did. When I got there the previous Counselor, Mel Manfull, was just leaving. I was kind of inhibited by Phil when I first saw him and I thought, man, he comes on awfully strong. You know, brusque, a lot of humor there, but you don't necessarily recognize it right at first. Very smart. He soon became very popular with everybody who worked for him. He was a much-loved guy. I felt that way about him in Saigon and I was lucky to work for him, there and in a couple of other places.

Q: So, that admiration was professional?

LAMBERTSON: Professional and personal. Personally he was always entertaining to be around. He had boundless energy. He and Barry Zorthian, the public affairs counselor, and John Negroponce, the most sophisticated junior officer I ever came across, and one other guy would have an all night poker game once a week. I don't know how they did it, but Phil was able to burn the candle at both ends in those days and he kept doing it until he had the first of his heart attacks. I was still in Saigon, and Phil was by then back in Washington when he came out to Saigon for a visit shortly after the Tet Offensive. Phil came out to assess the situation and to go back with his own views as to what we ought to be doing. More troops, fewer troops, etc. During his visit he had what I'll bet was a mild heart attack. He sort of collapsed at Arch Calhoun's house on a Sunday afternoon. He didn't have a full-scale heart attack as far as I know until he was ambassador to Seoul, but he was clearly on the way. Anyway, he was extremely energetic, very bright, a man with a complete common touch, no pretensions about him at all. You couldn't help but like him.

Q: His guidance on the reporting from the section, was he saying, go for it guys?

LAMBERTSON: Oh, yes, Phil would never have suggested that anybody shade the truth as they saw it for the sake of some sort of harmonious product. He wasn't like that. You always felt that you had his backing and that he intended for people to call the shots as they saw them.

Q: You were suggesting a little mentoring perhaps on his part, talk to the officers on a personal level, what are you going to do after this. By then he had seen quite a bit of the Foreign Service.

LAMBERTSON: Yes, I think he was good at giving career advice. I probably had better conversations with him later on in Paris and in Washington than I did in Saigon where he was busier and I was one of a great many chicks in his flock. I remember in Paris once talking with Phil about his work as a deputy assistant secretary just after he'd gotten back from being political counselor in Saigon, and in that capacity he was probably the Department's senior guy who did nothing but Vietnam. He had a lot of contact as a result with all the big players in the administration right up to and including Lyndon Johnson. He sort of marveled at the idea that he, Phil Habib, a kid from Brooklyn, was moving in those circles and he appreciated it. It was touching.

Q: You were talking about a visit that he made later, but you had recalled for me that when you were in this assignment as provincial reporter in the central provinces that you had a visit from Henry Kissinger.

LAMBERTSON: Kissinger back in the mid '60s was a consultant to the Johnson administration on Vietnam, a country about which he knew very little. But nevertheless, he had his views and he paid periodic visits in his consultancy capacity. Sam Huntington also came out once or twice, along with Allan Goodman who was a graduate student then and is now dean at Georgetown. In any event, one time when Kissinger came, Harry Dunlop and I accompanied him to Qui Nhon, capital of Binh Dinh province, where he was to get briefings on the pacification program and how things were going in the war in Binh Dinh province. We flew up in a twin engine Cessna. I think the army might have called it a U-21. Anyway it was a small aircraft, but adequate to the task. We got to Qui Nhon and went through briefings, carefully prepared briefings, by Vietnamese and U.S. army officers. Kissinger was bored by it all and I think got very little out of it, and his boredom was evident to everyone. As I recall it was a little bit embarrassing. When it came time to return to Saigon, we went out to the airport at Qui Nhon, which was U.S. army-controlled, run by a U.S. army colonel. Gale force winds had come up during the course of the day and the airport was closed. Sandbags were being placed on top of the wings of the airplanes lined up along the tarmac. Kissinger was dismayed because he had a dinner appointment that night with Henry Cabot Lodge; this was a big deal and he wanted to keep that appointment. Our pilot was a very senior colonel and held a rating of master pilot, which he contended allowed him to override the wishes of base commanders. So he and the base commander had a nasty argument after which we took off. There was a small mountain at the end of that runway and I remember when he pulled the nose up we seemed to almost bounce off the ground. It was one of the scariest flights I ever made, and I made a lot of questionable flights in small aircraft while I was in Vietnam. Kissinger was in a white knuckle condition the entire way back to Saigon as Harry and I were too, I imagine. But he got to his dinner appointment with Henry Cabot Lodge on time and so he was presumably happy at the end of the day. Kissinger, we knew, was a guy who didn't like flying much except in very large aircraft. Thus, he was really making a risky move by his lights to get in this little airplane under those conditions. That's how important that dinner with Henry Cabot Lodge was for him.

Q: He white knuckled it the whole way down.

LAMBERTSON: You bet.

Q: Vietnam is a major issue and is going to attract a lot of visitors. Were there any others that you recall? My notes say that McNamara came out in August of '65. There must have been others that you were involved with.

LAMBERTSON: When is your McNamara trip?

Q: It's August of '65.

LAMBERTSON: Actually I am thinking of Thanksgiving of '65. I was with Bill Marsh. We were having our Thanksgiving with the Special Forces "A" team on Phu Quoc Island and we got word while we were there that SECDEF was on his way and we were needed back in Saigon, so they sent an airplane for us. I don't remember the first McNamara visit and I don't remember a whole lot about the visit that we returned for in November of '65. We had a whole host of prominent congressional people coming through, including a Senate Foreign Relations Committee delegation led by Mike Mansfield. Mansfield was of course a strong skeptic of our Vietnam effort. I remember sitting in on a briefing for him in the political counselor's living room. Presidential hopefuls visited, and other prominent people. I met Richard Nixon in Phil Habib's upstairs lounge – he was traveling under Pepsi Cola auspices. Ed Muskie visited around the time of the constituent assembly election I believe, and I accompanied him around town and interpreted for him. George Romney of Michigan, of course, famously visited Vietnam and my housemate Dick Teare was in charge of his visit and therefore presumably was at least partially responsible for “brainwashing” him. I had lunch one time at Ambassador Lodge's table on his patio, where he always had lunch in good weather, with Walter Mondale, who at that time was the up and coming young Attorney General of Minnesota.

There were other prominent people from other walks of life who would breeze through Saigon to see the place, to boost the morale of the troops in one way or another, or for other reasons of their own. Many of them would somehow end up being in our care for a few hours or a few days. I took Mary McCarthy around Saigon one time. Mary was acerbic and didn't seem real interested in what we were doing, but I tried to put Saigon's best face forward in our afternoon together. We visited several of the local sights including the opera house where the constituent assembly was in session and then we went across the street to the veranda of the Continental Hotel - a very pleasant spot - where we had coffee and I asked her what she thought of Saigon. She said, “It's a dreadful place.”

Q: So, you stopped going into the tour business.

LAMBERTSON: Yes. It was as Baghdad would be today, where for one reason or another, politicians felt compelled to go, and when they went they required escorts, and very often that duty fell to the political section.

Q: Let's see, where are we? Why don't we take a break for a second? We were talking about the other experiences you were having out of the political section. You have a note here that in the spring of '66 you got involved in some interesting negotiations. You had spoken earlier about helping the constituent assembly do the constitution.

LAMBERTSON: Now, you're speaking of?

Q: This is a standoff in Hue?

LAMBERTSON: Oh, yes. Hue in the spring of '66 as I recall. This is before the constituent assembly process got started and it, in fact, was one of the events that gave a little bit of impetus to that process because it once again seemed to indicate that South Vietnam was coming apart at the seams. In the spring of '66, Nguyen Chanh Thi, who was the commander of I Corps as I remember it, was very much in opposition to the government in Saigon of Nguyen Cao Ky, a general in the air force. I don't remember what his exact grievances were, but he essentially was challenging the authority of Nguyen Cao Ky and in effect threatening to go his own way. His stance was completely unacceptable in Saigon, and it was troubling in the extreme to the United States as well, and we wanted to put an end to this incipient rebellion. We brokered a meeting between Nguyen Chanh Thi and Nguyen Cao Ky and the meeting was to take place at the villa on the beach in Da Nang of General Lou Walt, commander of the Third Marine Amphibious Force, the senior U.S. military officer in I Corps. Before the meeting took place we sent someone up to Da Nang to “wire” the room so that we would have our own independent record of what actually was said. The meeting took place on schedule and the tape was urgently flown back to Saigon. An interpreter/translator for another agency was going to attempt to transcribe the tape. Phil Habib instructed me to help him. So I and the other fellow went into a soundproof room somewhere in the bowels of that old embassy on Ham Nghi Street in Saigon and turned on the tape recorder. We could hear snatches of conversation, but primarily only the hum of a big floor fan as it rotated across the room. We couldn’t get anything useful out of that tape. I think the floor fan was placed there because both Nguyen Chanh Thi and Nguyen Cao Ky suspected what we were trying to do and they didn’t want us to hear what they were saying. I told Phil, “Sorry, there’s nothing useful on this tape.” You can probably imagine his reaction.

Q: High standards indeed. Actually you were noted or it was remarked by other people at the time that you were one of the best Vietnamese linguists in the mission at that time. In fact you tell another story here about translating between embassy and the South Vietnamese cabinet from time to time?

LAMBERTSON: That was not a translating or interpreting situation. That was a note-taking situation. The American Embassy country team, which naturally in Saigon had to be called something grander - it was the “mission council” – met on a regular basis with the cabinet of South Vietnam, as if these were two co-equal bodies. In fact in many respects, we of course had the final say. In any event, there would be regular meetings between the prime minister and the ambassador and their respective staffs, i.e., the South Vietnamese cabinet and the American Embassy Mission Council. It would actually alternate between the presidential palace and the American Embassy. Even at the time it seemed to me that this was a demeaning practice to put the South Vietnamese through. They were after all, at least theoretically a sovereign government, and to have them troop over to the American Embassy for a meeting was really quite astounding when you think about it. I was the note taker for that meeting at least once, and had there been any need for translation it would have been French to English, not Vietnamese. All of the cabinet members spoke French fluently and fortunately almost all of them spoke English quite adequately. So, as I recall the meeting was almost entirely in English.

Q: But isn’t this an interesting issue as you were just saying, the symbolic relationship between the embassy and the government of South Vietnam, I mean how would their own press play such a meeting or did they not?

LAMBERTSON: They probably did not. Their own press counted for very little really. This is an issue that we’ve faced in other places around the world and that we’re facing in spades - John Negroponte is facing - right now in Iraq. How do you conduct yourselves when you have overweening power and authority and yet you’re trying to stress the independence and sovereignty of your host government? You’ve got to really be careful about it, and we were not nearly as careful as we should have been in Saigon, and to some extent that weakened the South Vietnamese government.

Q: The host audience for that is the national citizens.

LAMBERTSON: You bet. The people who see it happening. We needed more than anything else in Vietnam a government that truly commanded the respect and allegiance of the South Vietnamese people, and I doubt that the way we treated the government necessarily contributed to that goal. It goes right to the point of the nature of our role in Vietnam, as it was transformed by us from a supportive one on the periphery of the conflict to being at the very center of that conflict and in fact carrying the main load.

Q: Once you grabbed the metal.

LAMBERTSON: Yes. So, this practice of frequent meetings between the cabinet of an independent and sovereign government and the American Embassy was just a reflection of the way the relationship actually had evolved.

Q: When did that set up start? Had that been going on sometime by the time you got there?

LAMBERTSON: I think it probably had, perhaps not for a long time, but it was certainly not new when I was introduced to it. We'd had a central role in Vietnamese politics since before the overthrow and assassination of Diem. We had just become a little bit too obvious about it.

Q: This would proceed until when? These meetings, in this manner?

LAMBERTSON: I suppose they continued. I don't know if they were still going on in the latter years of our presence in Vietnam, but certainly in '65, '66, '67, that was the routine practice. I'd like to think it stopped after the 1967 election, but I don't recall, or at least that we went to their offices rather than they to ours.

Q: Speaking of routine, I mean here it is '66, '67, the war is being more militarized, but your daily life operating in Saigon was...

LAMBERTSON: Well, particularly after I left the provincial reporting business which did let you sort of brush up against realities and the war in various ways, working in Saigon was like working in a lot of other capitals I suppose. Even in 1966, '67, '68 when Saigon had been...

Q: This is tape two, side A. You were talking about sort of your daily life. What were your living accommodations?

LAMBERTSON: In the spring of '65 after the embassy had been car-bombed, all the dependents in Saigon were sent home so that by the time I got there in July it was a bachelor post. I shared a house with Dick Teare, my language-training partner and Dick was there for a two-year tour as Provincial Reporting Chief. When he left, Spence Richardson became my housemate and we shared that house for another year. I lived in a separate house within a five house compound that had been owned by a French bank. The largest house on the compound was the residence of the political counselor and the others were either political officers or the number two guy in USIS. The political counselor's house had a small swimming pool, which was the site of frequent Sunday afternoon water polo games. George H. W. Bush participated in one of those water polo games once. He was visiting as a newly elected congressman from Houston. He was about 40 years old and looked like he was 25.

Q: In addition to your duties, did you have any off duty interests that you could or did pursue?

LAMBERTSON: No, not really. There were plenty of places to eat and drink in Saigon at night. Tu Do Street was extremely lively. There were quite a number of good places to have a meal. There were always parties to attend, plenty to do after hours, even though our hours tended to be very long. We worked until the early evening routinely. We always worked at least Saturday mornings, often Saturday afternoons, and sometimes Sundays as well. It seemed like the job was kind of always with you, but at the same time you were surrounded by people in the same boat and there was a lot of camaraderie and a lot of fun as I remember.

Q: Now, the ambassador most of that time was Bunker?

LAMBERTSON: I don't recall exactly when Henry Cabot Lodge left and Bunker arrived, but, yes, by sometime in '66 probably, Ellsworth Bunker had arrived in Saigon. A very fine gentleman. I liked him very much.

Q: Did his arrival make any atmospheric difference for the embassy and its work?

LAMBERTSON: I don't recall that it did for me, quite frankly. But I'm sure that people closer to the top felt a difference. His personal style and Henry Cabot Lodge's were quite different. Bunker must have been a much easier man to be around than Henry Cabot Lodge. It seemed to me to be that way at least, and I suspect that was in truth the nature of his personality.

Q: Was this the time that there were deputy ambassadors?

LAMBERTSON: Yes.

Q: How was the embassy organized now by '66 or '67?

LAMBERTSON: Well, there was a deputy ambassador, Sam Berger, and then Bill Porter or perhaps Bill Porter and then Sam Berger.

Q: In NSC?

LAMBERTSON: No, no. That's Sandy. This is Sam.

Q: Okay.

LAMBERTSON: He was a distinguished career Foreign Service Officer. There was beneath the deputy ambassador in the hierarchy, a guy called the "Mission Coordinator," who at first was Phil Chadbourn, a French specialist who spent years as consul general in Marseilles. I think his was kind of an administrative role and not analogous to a DCM. He was more a very senior special assistant perhaps, to the two ambassadors. There was nobody called DCM. The political minister ran the political section. You had very senior talented people in the economic section. Chuck Cooper was the Economic Minister most of the time I was in Saigon; he was an AID star who later did other senior jobs within the administration on the economic side. The station chief was Bill Colby. For a time, Ed Lansdale had his own, sort of parallel political section. The embassy must have had an interesting looking organization chart. There were two MACV chiefs while I was there - MACV was part of the Mission Council even though it was an 800-pound gorilla - William Westmoreland was followed by Creighton Abrams.

Q: Was there a POL/MIL counselor there?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, there was a POL/MIL section in the embassy. That may have been Roger Kirk's job in fact. I said earlier in our conversation that he had been on the external side, but I think he was political-military when he was in Saigon. There were several officers doing that sort of thing with MACV and you can imagine the range of issues that they had to deal with in an operation like that.

Q: In these kinds of very interesting environments, all kinds of sort of unusual circumstances come up. You were telling me about Dick Teare's trip to Hong Kong where he had his own airplane?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, the point I was making was that during the Vietnam War, and I'm sure this is the case right now in Baghdad, resources were not an issue. If something needed to be done and it required calling up a special flight for somebody to do it, that was never a problem. In this particular case, just as an example, a congressional delegation, I think perhaps the one that was led by Mike Mansfield, had come through Saigon. Some record of their conversations was being written up. Or possibly they had asked for an analytical paper of some kind. They wanted to have that as soon as possible. They had moved on to Hong Kong. Dick Teare took the paper in question to them in Hong Kong with his own private jet. This was not particularly unusual. There was an embarrassment of resources. What did the Vietnam War cost us? It's an astounding figure and some small portion of it went for things like that.

Q: One of the other points you were making though is the difference in technology that we might not understand now 40 years later.

LAMBERTSON: That's right. The reason there had to be a paper delivered in Hong Kong was because there was no way to transmit a lengthy document more quickly. Obviously we did not have e-mail. That was 30 years in the future. We did a lot of our provincial reporting by way of typed airgrams.

Q: Which was the green paper, type the report, put it in the pouch.

LAMBERTSON: That's right. I remember it as being yellow, but in any event, it was on paper.

Q: Yes, it was yellow and cables were green.

LAMBERTSON: Everything was cumbersome and quite slow. It was very difficult to make a phone call to Washington. Or should I say it was certainly not routine to make a phone call to Washington, although there was a lot of telephoning done between the embassy and Washington because of the priority of the issue - but it was expensive and not something undertaken lightly.

Q: How about internal communication within the embassy? You had a telephone at your house, did it work?

LAMBERTSON: Yes, telephones as I recall worked pretty well and I don't remember whether we were on the regular Saigon phone system or whether we were knit together in some sort of special system that linked us to the embassy. I quite frankly don't remember that. We may have had two phones.

Q: Did you have individual radios?

LAMBERTSON: No. I don't think I had a radio in my house. If I did I never used it. There may have been one within the compound. The political counselor's house may have had something like that. It was sort of the dark ages as far as modern communication is concerned.

Q: You were in Saigon for the Tet Offensive, which started the evening of January 31, 1968?

LAMBERTSON: Yes.

Q: What was that like?

LAMBERTSON: Well, I distinguished myself at the very beginning of the Tet Offensive by sleeping through it. I'd been out late the night before with Hal Colbaugh and if I heard anything during the night I probably assumed it was Tet fireworks going off. I woke up at the usual time in the morning, turned on the radio to the armed forces radio station, and the announcer was telling everyone that this was not a normal day and that the embassy would not be opening on time inasmuch as it was still occupied by a squad of Viet Cong. So, I got dressed and went next door to the political counselor's house where he was on the phone with Washington and with Allan Wendt, the duty officer who was inside the embassy. There were other people there as well and I was more than a little put out that nobody had seen fit to wake me up. By then Arch Calhoun was the political counselor and he was dealing with the situation, I guess conveying information from Allan Wendt back to the Department via the telephone.

Q: Now, Allan's being in the embassy, the duty officer in the embassy? If you're duty officer, do you go to the embassy?

LAMBERTSON: The duty officer slept in the embassy. There was a room with a bed in it up near the code room and that's where he was when the attack happened. I got to the embassy I think by around 9:00 am, just about the time that Bunker showed up. On the front lawn of the embassy were a number of deceased Viet Cong. The place was a mess, as you can imagine. There weren't shattered windows because some kind of plexiglass window had been used in that building, someone having had this sort of thing in mind. One of the things that quickly changed in the architecture of the place was that the large decorative planters spotted around the lawn of the embassy were removed - they had been very good firing positions for the Viet Cong. They were sort of like concrete lily pads. It was a very strange thing to see. The dead bodies on the lawn. The hole blasted in the perimeter wall. The guard booth where the American GIs had been shot. The mission counselor's house, by then occupied by George Jacobsen, was an old French villa within the embassy compound and it had been the scene of some dramatic action. A Viet Cong soldier, or one or more, was actually going up the stairs ready to dispatch George Jacobsen when one of the marine security guards threw a pistol up to his bedroom window and he caught it and shot the guy as he came in his door. It was that close and there was a picture in Life Magazine of the security officer - it wasn't a marine - it was a security officer, crawling along outside this villa getting ready to throw the gun up to George. Do you remember that?

Q: Yes, as a matter of fact I do. So, people didn't have personal weapons up to that time?

LAMBERTSON: I would have thought Jacobsen would have had. I think he was a retired military officer, but apparently he didn't have one where he needed it. It might have been downstairs. After the Tet Offensive, fighting continued around Saigon sporadically, quite a lot in the days immediately after the Tet Offensive when there was also continued fighting in Nha Trang and of course in Hue. Scattered around Saigon, particularly in Cholon, there were still communist units present and causing havoc. It was easy to get a gun if you wanted one, so I got one at that point, a .38. I kept it beside my bed at night. There were several times in the ensuing weeks when at night it seemed like something was happening right outside my house. At night gunfire can be misleading I think if you're not experienced with it. There were certainly little skirmishes that took place not very far from where I lived. There were also incoming rockets during that period and one of them landed on one of the houses in our compound. Gil Sheinbaum's house across the way. You know Gil?

Q: Why yes. We're currently serving together as Retiree Representatives on the Board of the American Foreign Service Association (AFSA).

LAMBERTSON: Yes, well, ask him about that; although Gil might have left Vietnam by then. So, it was a very strange period. We had seemed to be making a lot of progress in Vietnam, particularly through this political process that we had pushed. The constitution was drafted. It was ratified. A presidential election was held. It was a pretty good election - free if not entirely fair. Nguyen Van Thieu had won with a plurality of the vote in a multi-candidate contest, monitored by international observers. It was one of the first elections in which that sort of thing was done. When Thieu was inaugurated (our new embassy was dedicated at about the same time), Hubert Humphrey came out for the occasion. That was in November of 1967 and we were beginning to be a little bit optimistic about the prospects for a happy outcome to this whole thing. Then in January of '68 the Tet Offensive took place - less than two months later - and it basically rendered moot anything that had been going on politically in Vietnam and it essentially wrote an end to any possibility of a successful military outcome as well. I would not have imagined in the aftermath of Tet and the aftermath of Lyndon Johnson's decision to not run again that there would have been four more years of pretty intense warfare, as there were, before our withdrawal. Tet fundamentally changed things. It changed the atmosphere in Saigon. I don't recall exactly what I was doing in the political section the last six months that I was there, but I think everybody believed we were just treading water.

Q: Can you give us a better sense of what you mean by a changed atmosphere in Saigon?

LAMBERTSON: Prior to Tet there was, as I said, a feeling that we were on the road to something that could be called a success. The military campaign had been going reasonably well and we were very much encouraged by the political developments that had taken place. It seemed like we, or they, had at last established a really legitimate government that no one could dispute. Maybe we were going to come out all right. I think at the end of 1967 that was a pretty widespread feeling, perhaps not in the country at large, but among those of us in Saigon and probably in Washington. And then came the Tet Offensive - which militarily was a net loss for the communist side. But it represented a huge political victory for them and a tremendous political defeat for us. That was obvious to everyone who was there and it sort of zapped morale.

Q: Because by '68 we had so identified with a specific outcome in Saigon. When you arrived in '64 could we say that we weren't as tightly identified with what was going to happen?

LAMBERTSON: Had I arrived in '64 we could have said that, but I arrived in '65.

Q: Okay, '65.

LAMBERTSON: By which time we already had 65,000 or 70,000 U.S. forces on the ground in Vietnam, mostly up in I Corps, but we were there, we were engaged in combat operations, not just in an advisory role. It probably was already a little bit too late. But by the time Tet '68 rolled around we had well over 500,000 troops in-country.

Q: Now, as you know AFSA keeps an honor roll in the lobby of the Department and on that honor roll there are quite a number of people from this period of Foreign Service Officers killed in Vietnam. Did you know any of those people?

LAMBERTSON: I think the only guy I knew and then only slightly was Dwight Owen, who was a young summer intern in the political section.

Q: We had summer interns?

LAMBERTSON: We had one. He's the only one I remember and I think he perhaps had some connection that enabled him to do it. He was a very bright young man and he was out in the countryside, I think in Binh Dinh province, and he was killed by a mortar. I recall David Engel having a narrow escape from a land mine. He ended up bloodied a bit, but not hurt seriously. Of course there were a number of Foreign Service Officers who were injured in the bombing of the embassy in March of '65 before I got there, including Jim Rosenthal who was badly cut up. Edie Apple, who later became the wife of R.W. Apple of the New York Times, was in the consular section. Eva Kim I think was hurt in that bombing.

Q: Was she there at that time?

LAMBERTSON: Yes.

Q: Okay. '68 is the end of your tour. Did you get extensions or were you given different assignments, because I mean it was a normal two year tour, wasn't it?

LAMBERTSON: I think there was an option for three years with perhaps a home leave thrown in at the middle of the three years. At least I did have a home leave. I was a bachelor and so I had no good reason to make it a two-year tour, which is what it was for Dick Teare. I was there three years, yes.

JOHN W. HOLMES
Economic Officer
Saigon (1965-1968)

John W. Holmes was born in 1935 and raised in Quincy, Massachusetts. He graduated from Columbia in 1957 with a degree focusing on European Cultural History. He has also served in Iran, Italy, the United Kingdom, Belgium, and Italy. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 18, 1996.

Q: You left there in what?

HOLMES: August of 1965 to go to Vietnam. Most of this period from 1964-1965 I had spent being assigned to Vietnam and then having assignments quashed. The first two times I was supposed to become one of what were then called Assistant Prov Reps (Provincial Representatives). It didn't happen the first time because the Economic Bureau's executive director, a formidable woman, managed to stand in the way of it. Another time the Aid Director in Vietnam decided not to expand the program in the provinces. The third time I was assigned to the Embassy Economic Section in Saigon and I was advised that I might as well go, at least this was better than going to Soc Trang. And the choice then was between going or resigning. So, I went.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

HOLMES: From August of 1965 until June of 1968.

Q: Can you describe our embassy when you went in 1965 and how it operated? You were sort of the new boy and not an area you knew particularly...first of all, did you get any training before you went out there?

HOLMES: There was some area training. If I had got one of those jobs which I didn't want, as a Prov Rep, I probably would have gotten Vietnamese language training. I still remember that somewhere in the course of the assignment process I was given the Modern Language Aptitude Test (MLAT) and I got a score which was high enough to qualify for language training, but not a very high score. It was noted that I had 3's or better in both French and Italian by that time. And I got a call from somebody in Personnel accusing me of trying to throw the exam. That wasn't true, I just found the sort of abstract approach of the MLAT Exam frustrating. I had a little bit of area training but that's all. I didn't have any Vietnamese. I found that insofar as I was dealing with the Vietnamese government and I was...and even with Vietnamese businessmen and agriculturists, French was very useful and in fact I probably used French more in Vietnam than anywhere else.

Q: In the first place, what was the situation in 1965 when you got out there?

HOLMES: Well, I find it a little bit hard to separate what I remember and what I've read in recent years -- because occasionally I'll read a book about Vietnam, though for a long time I took a vow not to think about it. My memory of some things may be weakened by shutting off my mind regarding Vietnam for awhile. Ngo Dinh Diem had been assassinated in November of 1963. There were still people around the Embassy who had been there at that time. At least the ones I talked to thought the United States had erred in its role. In any event Diem had been succeeded by a bunch of laughable of successors like General Khanh. By the time I arrived, the unlikely duo of Nguyen Cao Ky and Nguyen Van Thieu had arrived on the scene and seemed to be running things as a duo. The Embassy was still in its old building, not the one that was attacked in 1968 and evacuated in 1975. It was a rather crummy old building down near the waterfront.

Q: Near a big market area or something...

HOLMES: Not too far. A totally unimpressive structure. By then I had been in the Foreign Service enough to think that DCM's were sort of important but it was one of the few Embassies of the post war period that did not have a DCM. It didn't during any of the last years we were involved in Vietnam. It had lots of high powered people around with various Ambassadorial titles -- U. Alexis Johnson at that point, for example, was Deputy Ambassador (and temporarily Chargé). The biggest impression I got was of the similarities to what I'd heard about the Second World War. Places with huge staffs, sort of clumsily coordinating with each other, with a big military presence, with the civilians having a hard time staying on top of the military -- or even along side the military. It was not just a matter of State and the military. There were divisions within the military and there were all sorts of civilian agencies.

Another interesting aspect was provided by an active American press corps. They came around to see us: relations with the Press were better by 1965 than they had been in 1963. So, we saw quite a bit of them.

I was personally a dove before my time. I still remember in Washington, I think it was in 1964, listening on the radio to a public discussion of what should we do in Vietnam, held here in Washington. I was impressed by George Kennan saying "Well, we should get out," that we had no interest in that place. Which I think reawakened my "Realpolitik" views. And I was never shaken in the view that didn't matter a goddamn what happened there, that we were wasting our time and our lives as the well as those of the Vietnamese by being involved. But, that being said, I found the situation fascinating. Here I was, involved in something that I'd only read about before. And the attention that Washington gave almost anything that went on in Vietnam, made it, even if it wasn't intrinsically important, seem important.

Q: What was the, as you saw it, let's start with 1965 when you arrived, the Vietnam government, the War, the country?

HOLMES: What struck me first was that Saigon was sort of a besieged city. You couldn't safely, or even moderately unsafely, drive from Saigon to almost anywhere. If you were nuts you could drive to My Tho, the next provincial capital south of Saigon. But our part of Vietnam was really a bunch of little safe areas and the communications between them, at least for Americans, were almost all by airplane or helicopter. Around Saigon, you didn't have to go very far to get to an unsafe area; cross a bridge or two and you had it.

The place was booming. It took me a little to realize it, but Saigon was enjoying a sort of war time boom, with a lot of cruddy construction going on, a lot of inflation, usually the signs of a boom. The American forces had started arriving in an overtly combat mode, real fighting types as opposed to real or alleged trainers or technical advisors, not very long before I arrived. Just a few months before I arrived. They weren't so obvious in Saigon. The first large contingents went to Central Vietnam. It took time for them to be so obvious in Saigon.

What I got involved in pretty quickly was the rice situation in the country. Vietnam had been a big exporter of rice before the Second World War and even after the Second World War. But, a combination of things, the disruption of the countryside and the new opportunities for the Vietnamese to do something else, a combination of bad and good, had reduced rice production to below the subsistence level. So, we began pumping in huge amounts of rice. The peak reached during my period of responsibility was something like 700,000 tons [in one year] -- which is a lot of rice. So, I wound up traveling a lot around the country, to talk to rice merchants, farmers, officials, basically with a focus on the agricultural economy, but picking up other things as well. I traveled mostly to the South of Saigon, although eventually I saw most of the country. Charming place. Unlike in Iran, I didn't think the people were anti-foreign in a dogmatic sort of way. Obviously a lot of them wanted the United States to get out but it wasn't based on thinking that foreigners were monsters.

Pretty obviously to me, the South Vietnamese government had turned over and was progressively turning over more of the fighting of the war to the United States, and that continued during the most of the time I was in Vietnam. There was a constantly used cant phrase about how we have to get the Vietnamese more involved but in the years of the middle 1960's the movement was in the other direction with the fighting but not necessarily the dying) being carried out by the Americans. An interesting place.

Q: What...did you have any meetings with the Vietnamese government?

HOLMES: Yes. I had my own contacts who were pretty high level officials usually from the Economic Ministry and places like that. The Embassy Economic Section shortly after I arrived got folded into AID's Economic Office. We -- AID -- we eventually had a joint commission with the Vietnamese government that was supposed to run the economy of the country for the Vietnamese, and I took part in it. I saw a lot of Vietnamese civilian ministers and civilian officials, but I didn't see so many military officers except in the provinces when I would always see the local military officials. I didn't see so many of the Vietnamese military rulers, although I encountered them to some degree.

Q: You had come from Khorramshahr and then Naples, not exactly two hotbeds of pristine government. How did you find, particularly dealing with the commodities such as rice, which I mean, is a staple, pushing it in...how did you see the distribution system?

HOLMES: The Vietnamese government had a rationing system for rice. It was full of opportunities for corruption and rice merchants had their own interest in hoarding and speculating although their hoarding was exaggerated. We became more and more free marketish in our efforts, finally deciding that details didn't matter. We would simply pump the rice in and eventually there would be so damned much that it would force the prices down. And we succeeded. The rice was available at a reasonable price. Then we began to worry, and I began doing some of the tiny amount of semi-abstract, semi-theoretical economics I'd done in my life. We became conscious of the need to avoid going too far and to avoid crushing production by having too low a price. I did analyses for the Mission Council on the supply response to rice prices. One thing led to another and I came to realize how, as in lots of less developed countries, local government only cared about the urban dwellers. We Americans wound up being spokesman for the peasants in a certain abstract way.

But the corruption was obvious. I remember one occasion when a ship came from Thailand. We were paying for imports from Thailand. I think in this case it was corn that was on board rather than rice but we couldn't get the ship unloaded. I knew the Vietnamese in authority and I finally told the American commercial types who were involved that (unofficially, of course, and choosing my words carefully) I strongly suspected that the only way they were going to get that corn unloaded was by administering a bribe and probably if they talked to so and so he would not be reticent about telling them how much. They would have to decide whether it was worth it. It was a matter of a few thousand dollars, which they no doubt could afford. I've been conscious of corruption in several places, but that was one of the few times I've been so close to it.

Q: What was your impression of the American business community there?

HOLMES: It wasn't very strong in numbers at that time. There were some rather fishy types who may have been, for all I know, undercover types who means of income were not entirely clear but there weren't very many American business men there. It was considered too dangerous and not very profitable, I think, for most of them. There were a few...very few.

Q: What about your local staff? Did you find them useful...the Vietnamese who worked for the Embassy?

HOLMES: They were very competent, at least the ones I dealt with myself. You know, very pleasant personally usually, very competent at doing their work, not very imaginative. Good clerical types but this may have been because of the way we used them, I don't know. Yes. They were better by far than one would expect in a Third World country.

Q: When you were there, who were the Ambassadors?

HOLMES: We shuffled Ambassadors frequently. Maxwell Taylor left about the time I arrived, I believe. Henry Cabot Lodge then came for his second round as Ambassador. Finally, there was Ellsworth Bunker.

Q: Did you have any impression of their interests or were you so removed...?

HOLMES: I can't say anything about Taylor. Lodge? I can't say too much about his operations but he impressed me as being very shrewd fellow in what encounters I had with him. I was also aware from the times that I was Embassy Duty Officer of his enormous telegraphic reports to Lyndon Johnson. He used to dictate these things on the old fashioned big dictaphone reels and they were massively long. Ellsworth Bunker I had more contact with, partly because after the Tet attacks in February 1968, Bunker got worried because there was a big rethink going on in Washington on what to do about Vietnam. It had something to do about Lyndon Johnson's eventual decision not to run for reelection.

Q: This was the assembling of the wise men...it was called...

HOLMES: Yes. But rethinking went on elsewhere. Bunker decided he wanted his own process on Vietnam. So a group was organized and I became one of the members of this. I remember being really shocked by one suggestion of dropping a nuclear weapon or weapons on Haiphong and I wrote a memorandum to Bunker saying that from what I knew about the Nuremberg Trials, etc., to allow this sort of thing, such an incommensurate act, even to be suggested, would be hard to justify as legitimate under international law. Anyway, Bunker called me up very quickly and I think it was expunged from the documents. But, I liked Bunker. It seemed to me that he was a really nice man. I don't know what I would say about him in terms of policy. I don't know how much influence he had on policy. The policy in Vietnam was usually made in Washington. Even though there were lots of high ranking people in Saigon, they didn't have a great deal to say about it. I don't think that he was against the policy, I'm just implying I don't know how significant he was. On the other hand, when Henry Cabot Lodge was Ambassador the first time, he certainly bore a fair amount of the responsibility for the conniving in the assassination of Ngo Dinh Diem. Yes, Lodge had some distinct influence. And later Lodge -- and we heard echoes of this in Saigon -- did start putting out feelers to the Poles and others in order to try to come to a peaceful settlement of things in Vietnam. But this was one of the rare exceptions so far as I recall or no to the rule that policy was made in Washington, and that Saigon mainly implemented it.

Q: Were you in Vietnam during the Tet attack of February 1968 which had so much to do with Johnson's eventual decision not to run for reelection?

HOLMES: I wouldn't claim that I have or had powers of prophecy. But I was always nervous about the possibilities of a Communist attack at Tet. Our South Vietnamese allies took those holidays very seriously -- they let down their guard, while everyone celebrated. So, I arranged to be out of the country two out of the three Tet seasons that occurred during my tour in Vietnam. I was in Indonesia in February 1968; I learned of the attack the day before I was supposed to return to Saigon. I decided to go ahead and take the UTA (French) plane I had a ticket for. It overflew Saigon and landed in Phnom Penh. We didn't then have relations with Cambodia but I talked my way into the country. After a few days it was clear that Saigon was still not cleared of Communists, and I managed to get Royal Air Cambodge to accept a personal check and flew to Angkor Wat. After a few dazzling days there, my money was running out, and with some Italians I rented a Land Rover and drove to the Thai border, where we caught a steam-propelled train to Bangkok. There I got in touch with U.S. authorities. After a few days I was told I was on a priority list to return to Saigon, which I did on an Air America C-46.

Well, I came back and the city was still under siege. A colleague from my office -- Allan Wendt -- had been the Embassy Duty Officer the night of the Tet attack. He told us about what happened as seen from within the Embassy, as well as writing his thoughts down in a report which got picked up by Peter Kann and published in the Wall Street Journal. From him I got a pretty good idea of what had gone on.

A lot of people had become quite optimistic during 1967. I had become somewhat more optimistic myself. At least, I thought, things were going better. The Tet attack, although I believe military historians think that the Viet Cong lost more than they gained militarily from the attack, had a sudden and tremendous impression on the morale of everybody in the US government, perhaps especially on those who had become quite optimistic. As I mentioned, we shortly thereafter plunged into an examination of whether the US should stay in Vietnam.

That time soon after Tet was an odd period in another sense in that the U.S. Mission was functioning, but the Vietnamese employees were generally not coming to the office anymore. Things that we normally did in our office, a mundane example being doing a cost of living survey, became difficult. It was hard for a foreigner to get a real price in an Asian market. Fortunately we had a Japanese-American whom we sent down to the market; he was able to do somewhat better than the rest of us.

I think clearly the Tet attack shook everybody and shook the US government. Whatever the military result, the political result was a disaster.

Q: One question on this and then we'll wrap this up. Did Miracle Rice enter your calculations at all while you were there?

HOLMES: A little bit. I made a couple of trips to Los Banos to...

Q: Los Banos was in the Philippines?

HOLMES: Yes, the Rockefeller-financed International Rice Research Institute. In fact, we got into importing a little bit of it in Vietnam. The Vietnamese were very resistant to eating it. The Vietnamese traditional rice varieties were long grain. Although a lot of it breaks up in milling, it is still a rather superior rice. And the Los Banos rice was a somewhat stubbier sort of grain and the Vietnamese claimed it had a different odor as well. In lots of Oriental countries, there is a highly developed connoisseurship about rice that was violated by the Miracle rice. I don't know what has happened since but this had not got very far in my time.

Q: Next time we'll pick this up...is there anything else we should cover in Vietnam? So where did you go, just so we'll have this...?

HOLMES: After Vietnam, I got a sort of reward of spending a year at the University of California, Berkeley, doing Atlantic studies.

Q: So next time we'll pick up Berkeley, which was another war zone.

HOLMES: Yes, it was. 1968-69 was the peak year for troubles at Berkeley.

The other things are about Vietnam. As I mentioned, I haven't thought much or talked much about Vietnam in the last 25 years or 30 years, so things escaped my mind. This is a series of random observations.

One is that there was one area in working on the economic side occasionally gave one some insights. One case I drag out of my memory is recorded in Stanley Karnow's book "Vietnam: A History." I remember my own slight role in it. In 1966 the Vietnamese government in one of its fake anti-corruption campaigns decided to execute one Chinese merchant for being corrupt.

Q: I recall that.

HOLMES: Yes. Ta Vinh was his name. I wouldn't have remembered the name -- Karnow's book reminded me of it -- but I remembered the incident. Some of us in the Economic Office, I among them, who had contacts in the merchant class, were bombarded with angry complaints that this action a) was inherently hypocritical on the part of a corrupt government and b) that the economy couldn't get along without these "wretched middle men" -- the merchants. We fed this into the Mission Council through our bosses. I don't think it had any particular policy impact but it seemed to come as a surprise to the upper levels of the Mission people that General Nguyen Cao Ky was viewed as the most corrupt person in Vietnam and that his ostensible anti-corruption campaign wasn't winning hearts and minds.

Q: Was he Vice President at that time?

HOLMES: He was the Prime Minister under Thieu at that time. It was sort of an uncomfortable duumvirate at that point. Later Ky got shoved out.

The second thing is that I've been reading Prochnau's book, "Once Upon a Distant War." I was in Vietnam in a later period but some of the same characters he writes about in that book had come back or had remained there -- like Neil Sheehan, who was back on his second tour. I think things had eased somewhat in the relationship between the American mission and the journalistic community in the few years between 1963 and 1965. We used to provide multiple press briefings, there was such a large press corps that they would attend briefings on any subject. And they actually showed up. I also remember Barry Zorthian who was the Public Affairs Officer in my time in Vietnam, holding evening drinks and food parties at which a few selected correspondents and a few relatively opened minded members of the mission would talk fairly freely; I attended some of these sessions. It was a different atmosphere at any rate from the trench warfare that existed during 1962-63. Ironically so, because it was during my period in Vietnam, from 1965-68 that some journalists, as well as other people, actually started questioning the premises of the Vietnam War, whereas in 1962-63 the argument was about the tactics being followed. Anyway the atmosphere had cleared up a little bit. That was true within the Embassy as well. I used to go to the political section's weekly staff meetings as the economic office's representative. These meetings were great fun. Phil Habib, who was the Political Counselor, was a natural born (I'm tempted to say) cynic. At any rate he refused to be blinded to reality and at least within that room people would say things that were fairly objective about how things were going in Vietnam. Aided, I must say, by some of the participants. The one I remember best was Bob Oakley who was somewhat older than most of the officers, although he was hardly very old at that time, and who also had an independent streak. He and Habib would fight, but the fights were friendly. I thought it was quite different from the "lock step" atmosphere that at times prevailed at the Embassy. Unfortunately, I think that such free thinking and objectivity later declined within the Political Section, not to speak of the impact still later of Graham Martin on the internal processes of the Embassy.

One reason I stayed on as long as I did in Vietnam, was that after my normal year and a half assignment was over I thought I was going to be able to slip off to a delightful assignment on a US secondment to the OECD International Staff in Paris. But the State Department's Vietnam working group decided it needed me as a replacement. I acquired a fair amount of bureaucratic sense while I was in Vietnam and realized that the Vietnam Working Group was at that point a dreadful place to work. It had lots of work but almost no influence. I didn't feel like doing that so I signed up for another year in Vietnam...as a better fate, doing something significant than doing something invisible back in Washington on the same subject. Also, if I can say so, more pleasurable.

Q: You went to Berkeley. In the first place, having gotten out of Vietnam, I imagine by the time you got assigned to Berkeley, Berkeley had a reputation, it and Columbia, as being the hotbeds of student unrest...or had it?

HOLMES: Yes, it had. The Professor of Italian History at Berkeley -- we became friends after I had been in effect his only graduate student -- lamented that most of his academic career had gone in the wrong direction. He had gone to Harvard as an undergraduate, then got his Ph.D. from Columbia and then went to Berkeley as a professor. Both Columbia and Berkeley had gone to the dogs. In fact, the student troubles at Berkeley had started long before anywhere else in the United States or in the world.

People associate Berkeley with the wave of 1968 but the student movement had started there in 1964-65 and hadn't ever really died out. But it became more political and less a movement complaining about the education delivered by the University than it had been in 1964-65. In 1968-69, there was a somewhat Marxist, radical group that dominated the students and some of the faculty at Berkeley. There was clash built in because Ronald Reagan had become Governor of California and just as he later demonstrated during the Air Traffic Controllers' strike, showed that he might be a nice guy but he was also very tough. So Berkeley was dogged during the 1968-69 academic year by riots. The one advantage I drew from having been in Vietnam is that I had been in riots and I had smelled tear gas before and had some idea of what you did when it started being used.

During that time, if asked, and only if asked, I would admit that I was an employee of the State Department, a Foreign Service Officer. If asked twice, I'd say that I had been in Vietnam. But I certainly did not go around advertising that.

JAMES R. BULLINGTON
Provincial Reporter
Hue (1965-1966)

Aide to Ambassador
Saigon (1966-1967)

Province Representative, USAID
Quang Tri (1967-1968)

State Department, Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1968)

Ambassador James R. Bullington was born in Tennessee in 1940, and received his BA from Auburn University in 1962, when he entered the Foreign Service. His assignments abroad include Hue, Saigon, Quang Tri, Chiang Mai, Mandalay, Rangoon, N'Djamena and Contonou, with an ambassadorship to Burundi. In 2001 Ambassador Bullington was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well, then you went in '65 where?

BULLINGTON: In '65, I was assigned to Vietnam.

Q: Was this by mutual agreement?

BULLINGTON: It came out of the blue, actually. One day I got the call that 'Hey, you're going to go to FSI and study Vietnamese for awhile and go to Vietnam.' They assigned me to Hue as Vice Consul. I'd never followed Vietnam affairs. I'd heard of it, but that's about all. The war at that time was not really a big deal like it later became. We had military advisors there, but we didn't have any American combat units. Vietnam was still seen as pretty remote, and our involvement was only at the margins, or so it seemed. But it was obviously a growing concern, and growing very quickly. The State Department was rapidly building up the Embassy and what was called the Provincial Reporting Unit, which I was to be a part of even though I was stationed in Hue. It was a unit within the Political Section.

Q: You said you're going to be in Hue, but acting as the Provincial Reporting Officer.

BULLINGTON: That's right. That's what I was to do. Travel around in the five provinces of I Corps, the five northernmost provinces of South Vietnam. I was to send in reports to the Embassy on the political situation, economic situation, pacification in the countryside, those sorts of things.

Q: Well, first let's talk a bit about the training. You took Vietnamese at the Vietnam training center?

BULLINGTON: Yes. Not the full course, I think eight or ten weeks, so I could get by but I wasn't really fluent in Vietnamese. It got a little better after I'd been there for awhile, but I did have French, so I could use French with most Vietnamese I needed to talk to. All educated Vietnamese at that time spoke French.

Q: Around you was Vietnam, before you went out has it become controversial, our commitment there...

BULLINGTON: No, it wasn't really all that controversial at that time, in early 1965. I'm sure there were some people in academia and elsewhere that were criticizing the involvement already, but it wasn't something you saw in the papers. There were no demonstrations or anything like that. It was not that big a deal in 1965.

Q: So you went out in late '65?

BULLINGTON: I went out in July '65.

Q: July of '65, and right to, did they sort of brief you in Saigon first?

BULLINGTON: Yes, I spent two weeks, maybe three, in Saigon, went around with some of the people in the Provincial Reporting Unit there. People like Bill Marsh, John Negroponete, Dick Holbrooke, Dick Teare, David Lambert, Vlad Lehovich.

Q: By the way, who was taking Vietnamese with you? Were you taking Vietnamese with other Foreign Service Officers?

BULLINGTON: There were just three of us in the class. Lyn Baldyga was one, a USIA officer. I don't remember the other.

Q: Well, when you got to Vietnam in '65, how did the situation on the ground seem? What was the image you were getting?

BULLINGTON: It was deteriorating. That seemed to be pretty well established. The Provincial Reporting Unit was the part of the Mission that would bring the bad news, more than any other. The official MACV military chain of command was not giving as realistic reports as the State Department provincial reporters. Or the journalists. That was when the journalists were beginning to change from supportive to more and more questioning and sometimes downright hostile.

Q: Were you given any kind of firm, the Embassy Reporting Unit, were you given any equivalent of marching orders, go out and find this or find that?

BULLINGTON: No, no it was not to prove any point, or to look for anything in particular other than the normal things you would look for: how is the government doing, what do the people think, is there corruption, is the government winning or losing, are the hamlets safe or not safe?

Q: When you moved to Hue, what did we have in Hue at that time?

BULLINGTON: We had a small Consulate there. Sam Thomsen was the Consul and I was Vice Consul. There were the two of us, plus the communicator, Joe O'Neal, who later went on to become a Foreign Service Officer, along with three or four Foreign Service National support people. And that was it.

Q: That was, Hue was what, was it Marine or Army?

BULLINGTON: It was in the Marine AOR, Area of Responsibility.

Q: How did you find relations with the Marines at that time?

BULLINGTON: The first Marine combat units got there not long before I did, in March of 1965. At first they were only in Da Nang, protecting the airbase. We had the MACV advisors, and they were mostly Army. Those were the people I interacted with much more than Marines during that period. I was traveling, visiting the provinces (or sectors as they were called in military terms) and districts (sub-sectors in military terminology). The Americans I dealt with were mostly career Army people. I also visited some of the Army Special Forces teams, including one in Khe Sahn. There were lots of places in the mountains where we had Special Forces A-teams, they were called. I'd spend two, three, four nights usually, staying with the military folks in those districts or provinces or in villages with the A-teams. I'd use those as a base of operations and talk to the Vietnamese government people and military, and to anybody else who seemed to have information about what was going on. I'd gather information and try to develop a feel for the situation, and then come back to Hue and write a report on "The Situation in Quang Tri Province," or something like that. It was very akin to journalism.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the military reporting and the CORDS reporting was very much, you know, body count, pacified / non-pacified villages, it got very quantified in all that. Was the feeling that this is really not giving a very good picture?

BULLINGTON: This was before CORDS, which came later. Hamlet evaluation surveys, which sought to quantify everything regarding pacification, were begun later, '66 and '67. In '65, the only other reporting was in the military channel from the MACV sectors and sub-sectors. Yes, that did tend to be less than full. It relied on body counts and other numbers too much, largely overlooked the political and economic context, and really didn't give a good picture of what was going on, or so most of us in the Embassy felt.

Q: Well, there was a lot of pressure on the military people, to show improvement.

BULLINGTON: Oh, yes, their performance was measured in how many new hamlets their team had pacified. Of course they were just advisors, and it seemed to me awfully unfair to hold them responsible for the performance of the South Vietnamese military forces and government. It also led to overly optimistic reports.

Q: What was the impression you were getting of the South Vietnamese forces?

BULLINGTON: Mixed. In some areas, they were darn good. And in some areas they were awful. In northern I Corps, Quang Tri and Hue, was the ARVN First Division. That was reputed to be and was, in my opinion, a fine military outfit. It remained so through the rest of the war. The leadership was good, and so were the soldiers. In southern I Corps it was much different. The Second ARVN Division and some of the other forces down there were not nearly as good. The Rangers and other specialized units were quite good, but they were part of the central reserve and would only be deployed from time to time. When they did come they were quite effective. The militia, the Regional Forces and Popular Forces, would vary even within a province, according to the leadership of the district chief and other officials there. In some districts they were good and in others they were not.

Q: Well what was going on, sort of one of the, North Vietnamese was it or was it mainly Vietcong in that area when you were there?

BULLINGTON: In I Corps, by then at least half the problem was regular NVA units. Also, they had reinforced Vietcong units with a lot of NVA troops. By that time we had regular NVA regiments in both northern and southern I Corps.

Q: Well, it must have been pretty dangerous, prancing around from place to place.

BULLINGTON: Well, hell when you're 24, 25 years old you're invulnerable. You don't worry about that sort of thing. It was foolhardy, but I never felt a great sense of fear as I was traveling around. I did get shot at a couple of times, but as with most young people, personal safety wasn't at the top of my concerns. Should have been.

Q: How about, did you have problems with your reports, did you get any feedback on what was going, what you were reporting?

BULLINGTON: Some, but after I'd been there a few months, domestic politics began to take over from the provincial reporting. This was the time of Thich Tri Quang, whose headquarters was in Hue. He and his An Quang Buddhist movement began to make all kinds of problems for the central government, as did one of the leading military figures, Lt. Gen. Nguyen Chanh Thi, who had been I Corps commander and before that, ARVN First Division commander. The political situation was really spiraling out of control, with a lot of student demonstrations and Buddhist demonstrations. After November, December of '65, that became the consuming issue we were focused on, reporting on the political unrest in I Corps. Hue was correctly seen as the center of it, although it was going on in Saigon and other places as well. Hue was particularly important for the political stability of the country, so I began reporting more and more on those sorts of things, talking to the Buddhist leadership, the dissident military leadership, folks like that. Those reports were very much noticed. I was front and center among Embassy reporters, as a matter of fact, because of being in Hue. I remember one occasion in early '66 when there had been lots of protests and student demonstrations, and the central government had replaced the commander of I Corps in an effort to get better control of the political situation. The new commander was coming up to visit his division in Hue for the first time, but the division was essentially in rebellion and didn't want to receive him. I'd gone out to the division headquarters compound for the arrival ceremony. All the MACV advisors were there as well. At the same time the students were demonstrating, and they decided to march out to the First Division to protest against this new I Corps commander. Moreover, some of the First Division soldiers had entered a conspiracy to assassinate him. And indeed, after he made his speech and as he got into his helicopter to take off, some of the First Division soldiers started shooting at the helicopter, to try to kill him. It was an American helicopter, with an American crew and the commander's MACV advisor accompanying him. In self defense the door gunners on the helicopter started shooting back and killed some of the people on the ground that were shooting at them. But Thich Tri Quang and the students got it wrong. They claimed the Americans had come in and wantonly attacked their compatriots and killed their brethren. I started driving back to town just as the students got there, and they poured over my car, banging on the roof and shouting anti-American slogans. I thought they were going to take me out and kill me, but they didn't. After they passed by I went on to an appointment with Thich Tri Quang, the leader of the Buddhists. He was well known, had even been on the cover of Time magazine just a couple of weeks earlier. The previous week he had sent a message through me to President Johnson, and I was to deliver that day the President's response. So I went to his headquarters at Tu Dam Pagoda and delivered the message. One of the Consulate FSNs, Tuy-Cam, who is now my wife, was with me to interpret, since Tri Quang spoke no French. Just as I was finishing that task, a firefright broke out between the Vietnamese troops around the pagoda and the Catholics in the neighboring area. We couldn't get back to the Consulate for awhile. But when we did, I wrote all this up, the assassination attempt on the Corps commander, the demonstrations, delivering the President's message to Tri Quang, the Buddhist-Catholic firefright in the middle of Hue. This was a hell of a report, a good day's work for a young FSO-8. Sam Thomsen, the Consul, had gone to Da Nang on temporary duty, and I was Acting Consul at the time. That report went all the way to the White House, and Dean Rusk was kind enough to send a special commendation, which was surely helpful when the next promotion panel met. Those anti-government demonstrations continued and became increasingly anti-American. There were daily demonstrations outside the Consulate. And finally in March student demonstrators burned down the Consulate and the USIA library.

Q: Well, Tony Lake was there at the time, was he?

BULLINGTON: No, I replaced Tony Lake. Tony had been there before, in my job. Shortly before the Consulate was burned, the Embassy sent up Tom Corcoran. He was Deputy Chief of the Political Section in Saigon. Since I was one lonely FSO-8 up there in Hue, and all these things were going on, they sent Tom to fill in as Consul.

Q: Well, Tom was the last man out of Hanoi too.

BULLINGTON: He closed down Hanoi and Hue and... Vientiane as well, I think?

Q: I think Vientiane, at least for a little while.

BULLINGTON: He was quite a guy. We did a lot of reporting on that crisis, and had to evacuate American citizens from Hue. Both Tom and I were given Superior Honor Awards for our performance.

Q: What was your reading at that time of the Buddhist leadership?

BULLINGTON: Thich Tri Quang?

Q: Thich Tri Quang and all. Where were they coming from? How did you see them?

BULLINGTON: A lot of people felt they were basically tools of the communists. I think probably they were, but unwittingly so. They served some communist objectives, and the communists certainly got behind them and were pushing that kind of anti-government and anti-American position. But the Buddhist leadership was not communist. That was pretty well demonstrated after the war. Thich Tri Quang was eventually imprisoned, but I don't know what happened to him thereafter. He certainly didn't emerge as a leader of the new society when the communists took over.

Q: Who was the head of Provincial Reporting in Saigon?

BULLINGTON: Bill Marsh was head of the Provincial Reporting Unit. His boss was Phil Habib, the Political Counselor.

Q: Did you feel that the Embassy was sort of with you, often if you were in the Consulate that they don't understand us or they're getting it wrong, did you feel for that?

BULLINGTON: They got it pretty well right. They kept sending up people for TDY, during the course of this Buddhist "struggle movement." John Negrofonte was one. He was in the Provincial Reporting Unit. He came and stayed for two or three weeks. Colonel Sam Wilson, who was the military advisor to the Ambassador, came and stayed for two or three weeks. They not only were getting my reporting, they were sending people up to be on the ground from time to time, where I could talk to them and brief them, and they could see the situation for themselves. So I think they had a pretty good handle on what was going on.

Q: What was your feeling, by the time you left there when?

Q: '68?

BULLINGTON: No, this was March of '66. After that, the Embassy (primarily Phil Habib) brought me down to be staff aide to Henry Cabot Lodge.

Q: Let's talk a bit about your impression of Henry Cabot Lodge.

BULLINGTON: I liked him. It was a really heady experience for me to be a young FSO right at the very heart of the most important American international engagement at the time. Obviously I didn't have any decision power, but I was certainly sitting at the right hand of power, filtering all the information coming and going to the Ambassador. It was an exciting time. I liked Lodge, thought he was competent, thought he was a decent man. I got along with him quite well.

Q: Did he get out much?

BULLINGTON: Some. In fact I usually went with him. I carried his briefcase on several trips. He both got out some himself, and he would listen to the other people in the Embassy that got out, especially the young officers in the Provincial Reporting Unit. I remember one time he went on home leave for a month. I didn't have anything to do during that month, so I asked if I could go spend some time in the provinces. He agreed that I could go to Long An province down in the Mekong Delta where they were having a special experiment at the time involving Colonel Sam Wilson, who had been with me in Hue for awhile. They put him in charge of both the American combat units in the province and the MACV military advisors and civilians involved in pacification. This was something that had not been done before. So I thought it'd be interesting to go down and do some reporting on how that was going. I wrote a long report to Lodge when he got back. He sent it on to the President.

Q: How were things going that sort of southern tip of South Vietnam?

BULLINGTON: It was going pretty well, by this time. In '65 the security situation was clearly deteriorating. In '66, once we got through the political turbulence, it had become stabilized. I'm not sure that we were making much progress, but the overall situation there and in most of the country was no longer deteriorating and had been stabilized.

Q: Were you able to develop sort of good relations with your Vietnamese counterparts or was this a problem?

BULLINGTON: Oh, yes, good relations. Obviously it depends on the individuals, but for the most part we were able to develop quite close relations with them. In fact I married a Vietnamese..

Q: Where did you meet your wife?

BULLINGTON: She was a Foreign Service National employee working at the Consulate in Hue. As I mentioned before, she was my interpreter when I met with Thich Tri Quang. We had developed an interest in each other when I was there. After I went to the Embassy as Lodge's aide, she was transferred to AID in Saigon, and the courtship became more serious. I'd been engaged to a woman in Washington before I left for Vietnam, and the idea was when I finished my tour in Vietnam we were going to get married. But when I finished that first tour and came back I found that she had decided she didn't like the Vietnam War or anything to do with it including me. Then my courtship with Tuy-Cam really got serious. We were married right before I left Vietnam in '68.

Q: Well, a lot of relationships have broken up over the Vietnam war.

BULLINGTON: No doubt.

Q: Were you aware of the building intensity of the anti-Vietnam movement in the United States?

BULLINGTON: I was aware of it in the sense that I was reading Stars and Stripes and occasionally Time and Newsweek, but I guess I was not really personally, dramatically aware of it until I came back, after I had completed my time with Lodge. That was when my lady friend in Washington told me she didn't want anything to do with me or the War. Moreover, I saw all the snow and ice around Washington (it was in January), and I quickly decided I wanted to go back to Vietnam.

Q: '68.

BULLINGTON: No, January '67. It was then that I first got a feel for what was going on in the U.S., and how much anti-war sentiment there was.

Q: When you came back, you came back in '67 to when?

BULLINGTON: I was there until March of '68. This was my third job in Vietnam. First Hue, and then staff aide to Lodge, and the third tour I came back to work in what by then was the CORDS program in Quang Tri province, the northernmost province of South Vietnam. I could have gone other places. I had an interview with John Paul Vann in III Corps, and he wanted me to work for him. But I went back to I Corps, mainly because by this time Tuy-Cam was there. She was in Da Nang, where the US Consulate had been moved after it was burned in Hue. I wanted to be in that region so we could continue the courtship.

Q: Well, before we leave, your time with Henry Cabot Lodge... What were his work habits?

BULLINGTON: He was a methodical sort of guy. He would listen, especially to Phil Habib, who I think was by far the most influential person in the Embassy. He had regular relations with Westy, General Westmoreland. I didn't see them either as particularly close or particularly negative in any way. It was a businesslike relationship. Westy would come over once or twice a week and that was about it. The CIA Chief of Station was also influential, as was Barry Zorthian, the JUSPAO chief.

Q: U.S. Public Affairs Office.

BULLINGTON: Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office.

Q: Did you deal at all with the press or have any social contact with the press at that time?

BULLINGTON: Yes, even in Hue. With my background in journalism I was interested in the press, and there were a lot of journalists who came through when I was in Hue. Joe Alsop, Frankie Fitzgerald, Johnny Apple, Neil Sheehan, Don Oberdorfer, several others. There was Keyes Beach, Chicago Daily News. A reporter I got to know well when I was in Saigon was George MacArthur, with Associated Press and the Los Angeles Times, mainly because George was dating Eva Kim. Eva was Cabot Lodge's secretary and I was the staff aide, so we were in the same social circle there. In fact I had dinner with George and Eva last night.

Q: I tried to interview Eva, but she didn't want to.

BULLINGTON: She would be a wealth of information.

Q: Oh, I know, she was the institution.

BULLINGTON: She's a dear friend.

Q: Well then, you were up in Quang Tri...

BULLINGTON: The northernmost province, right up on the DMZ.

Q: What was the situation in '67, you know, prior to Tet?

BULLINGTON: We had the big war up there. There were large combat units, mostly Marines at that time. All along route 9, which runs south of the DMZ from the coast to the main road junction in Laos, called Tchepone, there were heavy battles. Camp Carroll, the Rockpile, Cam Lo, scenes of big, big battles.

Q: So what were you doing?

BULLINGTON: At that time with CORDS there was a senior province representative in each province, and under the province rep were two deputies, at least this is the way it was in Quang Tri, one for the military side, and one for the civilian side of the pacification effort. I was the deputy for the civilian side. That was the position. But the first job really was totally focused on an operation to remove about 10,000 people from the southern half of the DMZ. The DMZ was a river and a strip of a couple kilometers on each side of the river. McNamara had come up with this scheme (which did not work at all) to have electronic barriers along the DMZ to prevent infiltration from the north. We called it derisively the McNamara Line. We had to remove these people from the southern half of the DMZ preparatory to building this McNamara Line. My job was to take care of the refugees and help resettle them south of there in a place called Cam Lo. The first day I got to Quang Tri they started coming, about 10,000 refugees to organize feeding and care for. The Marines assigned a colonel to work with me. I also had an ARVN colonel for a counterpart. And we got 'em resettled.

Q: Well, you can resettle people but we're talking about people who are working and fishing and farming and all that, you move them and you give them shelter and all, but were they able to sort of gainfully support themselves?

BULLINGTON: No, they were basically on the dole. And we had to feed them with bulgur wheat and other things that they didn't much want to eat. Some of them were able to do a little bit of farming eventually. Largely they were on the dole or they were employed as militia, in the Popular Forces. These people were mostly Catholics, and there was a very active priest who got them organized.

Q: So, was there a major invasion down there, or was this... What were the northern Vietnamese doing, just testing or were they really trying to get across.

BULLINGTON: Some were coming across the DMZ, right through the McNamara Line. But they were mostly going around it, going around through Laos down the Ho Chi Minh trail and then coming back into areas of northern and southern I Corps and attacking all along a north-south front.

Q: At one point, it was later I guess after you left, at Khe-Sahn?

BULLINGTON: Oh, no, I was there. In Quang Tri. Khe Sahn is in Quang Tri province. I visited it a couple times. During the Tet offensive is when it became so notable. I had quite an adventure during the Tet Offensive.

Q: Let's talk about the Tet Offensive.

BULLINGTON: I was working in Quang Tri, but I had decided to go down to visit Hue, to see Tuy-Cam. We were engaged by this time. She was working in the Consulate General in Da Nang and had come up to her home in Hue, and I was to come down from Quang Tri, to be with her for her last Tet in Vietnam before we were to be married in March and go off to the U.S. So it was a big deal for her and the family. I had done some favors for a French guy, he was Franco-Vietnamese actually, whose company ran the power plants in Hue and Quang Tri. I had put him on some Air America flights when the roads were blocked. So he had invited me when I visited Hue to stay in a little guesthouse they had at the power plant there. I flew down on the afternoon Air America flight from Quang Tri, arriving in Hue on the afternoon of January 30th, 1968. This proved to be a poor choice of time to visit Hue. I went by the CORDS headquarters, and was able to borrow one of their USAID jeeps to get around town. We'd had some intelligence in Quang Tri that there might be attacks during that period, but it didn't seem to be anything unusual. There were always attacks of one sort or another. When I got to Hue I asked at CORDS headquarters if anything special was going on, and they said no, though there were some low-level rumors that there might be problems during the Tet holidays. But nobody seemed to be especially concerned. We had dinner that night at Tuy-Cam's house. We had two other Americans there. One was Steve Miller, who was the USIA representative in Thua Thin province, where Hue is located. He had been a Foreign Service classmate of mine. The other was Steve Haukness, who was a friend of Tuy-Cam's at the Consulate in Da Nang. He was a Foreign Service communicator. He had never visited Hue so he wanted to come up to the old imperial capital for some tourism. After a nice Vietnamese dinner at Tuy-Cam's house, the two Steves went to Steve Miller's house, and I went back to the power plant, to the guest room, to spend the night. About two a.m., I was awakened by the sounds of incoming mortars. It was evident that there was some serious fighting going on. Of course there wasn't much I could do about it. I expected that it would be over by dawn. There had never been a North Vietnamese or VC attack in a major city where they had come and stayed. It was always a hit and run thing. They would get out of town by dawn because by occupying fixed positions in an urban area they became vulnerable to counterattacks. By dawn things had quieted down, so I figured that's what had happened, they had come in and raided the town and blew up a bridge or something like that and were gone. I walked out of the door of the guest room and across the courtyard into the power plant looking for my French friend. He was in the power plant, but when I got there he said, "Oh, my god, don't you see what's happened? There they are!" And he pointed to the other end of the courtyard where for the first time I saw armed men with pith helmets. They obviously weren't friendlies. My friend said "Get back, get back," and I did. I went back to the guest room and spent several very anxious hours there. Eventually that afternoon my friend came by and knocked on the door. It was with some terror that I opened that door, not knowing what I would find, but thankfully it was my friend instead of the NVA. He told me a little more about what was going on. The power plant obviously was a main target of any invading army that's going to occupy a city. The NVA had set up a command post right there in the power plant, not more than 25, 30 yards from the guest room where I was staying. My friend said that it's not a good idea to stay at the power plant, and I certainly agreed with that. So we worked out a signal. That evening he was to stand across the courtyard and give me a thumbs-up when it was clear to move across. The first time we tried he gave me a 'don't come' signal because the NVA were evidently looking. But the next time, about sundown, they were all busily cooking dinner around a campfire, and he signaled me to 'come on.' I walked across the courtyard with my heart in my throat. If the NVA soldiers noticed me they didn't do anything. They probably assumed I was a Frenchman working at the power plant. I passed within 25, 30 yards of them. When I got to the other side of the courtyard my friend guided me over some fences, through some backyards to a house where two French priests welcomed me. One, Father Cressonier, had been in Hue for 30 years with the Société des Missions Etrangères, the missionary society headquartered in Paris that was active in Vietnam. The other, Father Poncet, had been at Khe Sahn. Because of the fighting at Khe Sahn he had to leave a few weeks before that and was staying with Father Cressonier in Hue. Cressonier was a big guy like me, and he gave me one of his soutanes, the black gown, and the beads and the whole priestly outfit; so for the next nine days I became a French priest behind the North Vietnamese lines in Hue. For an East Tennessee hillbilly raised in the Church of Christ, that it itself was quite a thrill. A couple of times the local VC cadre came to the door, but they didn't demand to come in. If they did, the story was going to be that I was a visiting French-Canadian priest. I don't know whether that would have worked or not, but thankfully we didn't have to put it to the test. The greatest danger turned out to be the counterattack, especially incoming artillery from friendly forces. The fighting was pretty intense around there, and we saw a lot of refugees and a lot of North Vietnamese units, including one tank, which they had evidently captured from the ARVN. There was a lot of incoming mortar and artillery fire. Father Cressonier's house was a two-story French Colonial type. When the artillery starting coming in heavily we would all go downstairs, and huddle under the staircase. And thankfully so, because we took a direct hit from what was probably a 105 mm artillery shell. The house became one-story all of a sudden. The second story just was no longer there. But we were downstairs and didn't get hurt. After nine days of this, the U.S. Marines, working their way house to house in fierce combat throughout Hue, got to where I was, the priest's house, and liberated me. The company commander was Ron Christmas. He later went on to become a Marine Lieutenant General. I was never so glad to see anyone as Captain Christmas and his Marines. They wrapped me in a blanket and carried me out as if I were a wounded Marine, so the neighbors would not see that these priests had been harboring an American. I had invited, in fact urged, the two priests to come with me to safety, but they had pastoral duties they felt kept them there. There were Catholic refugees they could now get to at a nearby cathedral, several thousand people. They wanted to stay and minister to the flock. The Marines took me to MACV headquarters. I spent one night there, and was interviewed by reporters. The next day the story of my liberation was on the front page of the Washington Post. In fact that's how my parents found out about it, through a newspaper report. They'd been told by the State Department that I was missing. They eventually saw the newspaper report from the Washington Post via the Chattanooga paper. After another day at MACV, I went to Da Nang to take a bath, which I hadn't had in nearly two weeks, and get some food as well as to report in to the CORDS regional headquarters there. After the staff at CORDS debriefed me, I told them I had to go back to look for Tuy-Cam. Even though the house where she lived was no more than 500 yards away from Father Cressonier's house, there was no way I could get there because it was on the other side of the Phu Cam canal, which was one of the many lines along which the fighting took place. I knew the Marines would eventually get there, so I wanted to go back to Hue. My CORDS bosses told me no, you can't go. I told them the hell with that, I'm going. By that time I'd been around long enough and knew the territory well enough to arrange my own travel, so I just went out to Da Nang airbase where I knew the appropriate sergeant. I got on a helicopter back to Hue, to look for Tuy-Cam. When I landed at the helicopter pad, she was there! She and her family had just made it to safety that morning, and she had come to the helicopter pad to look for me, and was trying to go to Da Nang. So that's where I found her. We were reunited on Valentine's Day at the helicopter pad outside the MACV compound in Hue. Her family was at a nearby refugee camp. She had two brothers who were military officers, one was an ARVN officer and the other was an Air Force cadet. They were both home on leave for Tet. They had successfully hidden in the attic of the house for the first few days. But eventually because of all the incoming ordnance they decided it wouldn't be safe where they were. The family all left the house and was on the way out of town with other refugees when a group of VC or NVA stopped them and took out all the young males in the group. Tuy-Cam's two brothers were taken out and apparently shot. They were never heard from again.

Q: What happened, let's see, Haukness was killed there, wasn't he?

BULLINGTON: And Miller. After I got back and found Tuy-Cam, I began looking for them too. A couple of days later the Marines found Steve Miller's body with his hands tied behind him. He had evidently been executed, shot in the back of the head. Haukness was last seen being led off toward the west, out into the jungle. We never did find his body at the time. I don't know whether his remains have ever been found since then.

Q: What happened to you... she was your fiancé still?

BULLINGTON: Yes.

Q: What happened then?

BULLINGTON: We got married. It was near the end of my tour, in March. We got married at the Consulate General in Da Nang. Before Tet, we had planned a traditional Vietnamese style wedding in Hue, but now we couldn't do that. We organized the wedding right at the Consulate.

Q: Who was consul general?

BULLINGTON: Chuck Cross.

Q: He's now in Seattle.

BULLINGTON: Is he? Chuck had been in Da Nang only a few months. Barney Koren was before him, Chuck replaced Barney. Chuck was away on vacation, and at his invitation we spent our wedding night in the Consul General's residence.

Q: Then you went back to the states?

BULLINGTON: Not immediately. After about a week, we went down to Saigon, but had all kinds of trouble getting Tuy-Cam's passport. They kept asking for official papers that were in Hue. We pointed out that we couldn't go back to Hue, and since Hue was largely destroyed, particularly the government buildings, we couldn't get those papers even if we went there. Eventually I had to get Vice President Nguyen Cao Ky to intervene. I was able to do this because I knew Ky's aide from the time I had been Lodge's aide.

Q: So, you then at that point went back to the States?

BULLINGTON: Went back to the States, and spent three or four months working in the Department on the Vietnam desk and getting ready to go to Harvard. The State Department decided that I needed more education, and they sent me off to the Kennedy School of Government. A real battlefield, as it turned out.

RICHARD W. TEARE
Political Officer
Saigon (1965-1967)

INR, South Vietnam Analyst
Washington, DC (1967-1969)

State Department, Vietnamese Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Richard W. Teare was born in Ohio in 1937. He received his bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1948. His career includes positions in Barbados, Philippines, Vietnam, Laos, New Zealand, and Australia. Mr. Teare was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in July 1998.

Q: How did you find Vietnamese?

TEARE: Well it's a tonal language. It's difficult I think for Westerners. The principle advantage over Japanese or Korean or Thai or Chinese is that it is written in the Western alphabet now, thanks to some Portuguese missionaries four hundred years ago. And it is relatively accurate phonetically with a few ringers in it. The tones are indicated by diacritical marks. So from a fairly early stage anything you can say or understand you can also read and write in Vietnamese, which is not the case with the others. Vietnamese was taught in one year, ten months actually, whereas the others were and still are taught in two years, that is the Japanese and Chinese and I think Korean, too. Typically one year in Washington and one year in field school.

So we came out of Vietnamese speaking like educated foreigners with limited vocabularies I guess is the way to put it. Furthermore at least in my case very much a hothouse sort of thing. I could understand everything the tutors said to me but when I first got into a real life situation in Saigon, hey, there was traffic going by, horns honking... I find this in any language, people hear you say a couple of words and they think you understand full speed so they make no concessions anymore and that was pretty hard. I am only a middling linguist.

Q: You arrived out there in '65, I take it with your family?

TEARE: No. No. Families were no longer allowed to go to post because in early '65 there was the incident in Pleiku. McGeorge Bundy was visiting, being run around the country and was at a Vietcong border town and he took it personally, or Lyndon Johnson did and thought hey, this is a dangerous place. So from that time on I guess families were evacuated, families already there. Certainly no new families were allowed to go. That is when we got into the safehaven business in a big way.

We had I think a couple of hundred families, mainly AID, some State and CIA in Manila. We had about as many in Bangkok, maybe even more.

Q: So where did your family go?

TEARE: When I left for Saigon my wife was pregnant with our second child, the first one had been born in the Philippines. And so we decided that she would stay in the U.S. through the birth of the child at least and then see how things stood. And so she went to stay with my parents in Cleveland and that is where our second child was born and that was in October of '65. In early January of '66 she and the two children came out to Manila. And of course we had left there only a year and a half before. I had made a trip over and managed to rent the very same house we had occupied while assigned there. So she knew exactly where she was going and what to take and so forth.

And so she and the children stayed there from January of '66 until the end of my tour which was April of '67. I would come over and visit every couple of months. For the first several months where was no money for such travel so we did it space available with the military or else paid out of our own pocket. I did Space A which was sometimes pretty grueling. Go to Tan Son Nhut airbase outside Saigon, get a military flight over to Clark and then to get from Clark to Manila was something of an ordeal. A couple of times I took the Philippine Rabbit Bus which is about as reliable and safe as it sounds and go tearing down the highway to Manila at high speed and get to the Manila bus terminal and get a cab and go to the house. But I did all those things. I'm not sure

I would do them again today!

Then sometime in mid '66, I guess, they introduced visitation travel at $2,400 a year. That was the maximum and was the same for everybody. And that would finance I think six round trips to Manila and twelve or thirteen to Bangkok, except you had to be back 28 days or 30 days between trips so the Bangkok people couldn't use all their money. So I made four or five trips to Singapore and so forth. So that made life easier. Although I remember on one trip coming back, must have been in the beginning of '67, Pan American was in a dispute with the Government of Vietnam. We were the guinea pigs, the first flight in after the agreement had collapsed or whatever. We were kept on the tarmac for two or three hours and not allowed to get off the plane. I believe it was the Deputy Ambassador, Bill Porter, who intervened with Ky, the Prime Minister, to get us off. We were reduced to little pools of sweat and were mightily annoyed at the Government of Vietnam.

Anyway that was the basis on which the visitation program worked.

In Saigon we lived in the houses previously occupied by embassy families and typically it was two Officers or more sharing the quarters. Lambertson and I shared a house. The house had previously been occupied by Jim Rosenthal, the first chief of the provincial reporting unit.

Q: I've interviewed Jim.

TEARE: Well he can tell you, I'm sure has told you, how all that got started. The second chief, who inherited from him, was Bill Marsh, who'd be worth interviewing if you haven't, and I was the third. I took over when Marsh left which was after I'd been there nearly a year. That was a unit within the Political Section, alongside the Internal Unit, the External Unit and the North Vietnam Communist Watcher Unit.

Q: First, what was the situation when you arrived in 1965?

TEARE: At that time the first U.S. combat troops as opposed to Advisors had been on the ground since March, I think. Just as I went out there President Johnson had announced a big increment which I think took it up to 128,000. In those early weeks there were some very encouraging signs, or at least encouraging as we read about them in the papers and in the newsmagazines. I'm sure there was a lot of White House spin on it. In particular Operation Starlight on a peninsula up in ICOR where U.S. Marines trapped a Vietcong unit and pretty well did away with it.

This was the early surge of there was nothing the United States can't do and now that our guys are getting in there directly this is going to be it, we are going to save that country! That sort of spirit lasted for a number of months but it rather quickly wore down as we failed to repeat that success very many times. We wanted an enemy who would stand and fight and of course that is what the Vietcong and North Vietnamese wouldn't do, they realized it was highly unprofitable. So they would strike at times of their choosing, to their advantage and then disappear. And we would go chasing them all over the countryside and sometimes, as at Que Son later on, get ourselves into a real fix. So it was not a totally satisfactory undertaking in that respect.

But the part I saw more of was really the Advisory effort because I was supposed to go out into the field and judge how well the Government of Vietnam was doing, particularly on the civil administration and political organizing side. We had an Advisory Program, military, that was paralleling the Vietnamese structure not only in the units, corps, division, regiment, battalion on down to company, I think, but also in the administrative structure. We had U.S. Military Officers advising the Province Chiefs who were all concurrently Sector Commanders. We had more junior U.S. military, almost all Army, advising the District Chiefs who were concurrently Sub Sector Commanders. So we were cheek by jowl with the enemies down to a fairly low level. But, whereas we went out there gung-ho, full of enthusiasm and on our, in the case of the military twelve month tours, thirteen months for the Marines in ICOR, the Vietnamese had no similar motivation.

Some of them had already been fighting this war for ten or fifteen years and for them it was a 40 hour a week proposition, five days a week, which is of course not the way to fight a war, particularly not in one's own country. But it was a different kind of war and they had been brought up under the French tradition and then I think some of their worst talents were ingrained by us, particularly organizational structure. It was essentially a war for small maneuver units; battalion was the largest that we needed according to a number of my Army friends. But we created a Vietnamese Army in our own image. It was corps, division, and regiment and so forth, which was ridiculous. A top-heavy structure and just wrong for the nature of the combat but it was what we had and what there was.

Q: I take it you were probably spending a certain amount of time in Saigon and then go out in the field and examine?

TEARE: That's right. We had divided up the country. Again, the consulate in Hue as it was then, later moved to Da Nang, took care of ICOR, the five northern most provinces. Saigon took care of the remaining three core areas in I guess it would have been the 38th Province. So we divided it up and I had the upper half of Four Corps. David Lambertson had the southern half of Four Corps. Bill Marsh and somebody else took care of Three Corps, the area around Saigon, ten provinces, so quite a lot of territory. Then someone else did the central coast and yet another person did the central highlands.

The guy for the highlands in my time was Steve Lyne, later Ambassador to Ghana and now a Professor at Boston University. Steve did not know Vietnamese but he had good French. He would be very good for this project. He had served earlier in Cambodia and spoke Khmer and the logical place to use him would have been in the western Mekong Delta where there is a considerable Cambodian minority and where the border is very sensitive. Precisely for that reason he was not sent there. That would have been seen as messing around with the Cambodians, which Embassy Phnom Penh didn't want and we didn't want really. We didn't want to encourage the Vietnamese to hire or create any more Khmer units. So Steve covered the highlands and dealt with the Montagnard, most of whom spoke French and on principle refused to learn Vietnamese.

So that is the way it worked for awhile and I visited my first seven provinces, some of them only once, others perhaps as many as three times, and then, after all it was a short tour, I had been there eight months, Marsh left. I was moved up to be Chief of the Unit. I inherited part of Three Corps from him. I visited most of those provinces maybe four or five times for most of them and one or two of them only once. I had supervisory duties. I was clearing the other guys' reports and I was escorting visitors more. I was sometimes going to country team meetings and so forth so I sort of was sucked up into management of a low order even before I knew the ground in Vietnam all that well.

Q: How were reports treated? You had the military making their reports and this was a time when McNamara had all sorts of criteria for making reports at various levels. Everybody was making reports. When you have a very powerful President, Lyndon Johnson who wanted to hear certain news and this was what he wanted to hear, could you talk about the dynamics in the embassy on this?

TEARE: Let me try. I'm not sure I have the best perspective. Yes, you are right of course that it was Johnson who wanted to hear news and it was McNamara who wanted to present news, and particularly statistical news. And McNamara would visit Saigon at least a couple of times a year and those would be major occasions and we would all be turned inside out preparing Briefing Papers and so forth.

Occasionally a big question would be asked such as should the United States use tactical air in support of its own and of South Vietnamese ground operations in the south? To ask the question was almost to answer it and the answer clearly was going to be yes. But I remember we all were sent to work, in fact I think we each made a special trip to a province and went around and talked to Vietnamese opinion leaders about that. I remember talking to priests and monks and schoolteachers and so forth. Essentially the attitude was, as I look back on it, well we'll tell this man what we think he wants to hear, but essentially it was we don't welcome destruction but we do want to defeat the Communists and if this is the way to do it, so be it. And that's what we reported back and that's the word that went back to Washington and very soon back there was instituted support of ground operations in the south.

I think what really counted was the highly secret NODIS message traffic that I only rarely got a glimpse of or had any input into. Ambassador Lodge and I think Taylor in between, Lodge a second time, and later Bunker, supplied weekly or more frequent notices back to Rusk and the White House that were the truly influential documents. Our stuff, our provincial reports, generally went in as attachments to Airgrams, that old hectograph on pink paper when it was classified, which it almost always was. They would take days to get typed in Saigon. They would take I suppose a couple of weeks to get to Washington by pouch and get around. They tended to be long and low level and anything but earth shaking for the most part. In retrospect, I have to think that we could not have had much influence at all with any given report. Maybe the cumulative picture that we presented as it was read and promulgated by INR and CIA in particular contributed to the relative pessimism of those organizations as against more optimistic outlooks.

Q: One thinks that we know how these things work in the military. If they tell you that you are supposed to go out and pacify a district, by God, when you report that district will be pacified, no matter what the situation is on the ground! I mean you are expected to give a positive response. Did you find at all that your people were acting as almost Devil's Advocates or looking at the situation somewhat differently from the American military?

TEARE: Oh, absolutely. The hamlet evaluation system was tested and officially introduced during my time. That was where each hamlet was rated on a variety of criteria, given a letter grade A, B, C, D, E.

Q: Whether you slept in the town or not?

TEARE: Yes and whether the local officials did and road access and do the farmers get to market and all of that. Do they go to the fields? We were around long enough, longer than any of the military, to see a pattern. A sub-sector advisor would arrive and he would say "Good grief, this place is Dodge City, everything is messed up" and then he would work there for a few months and he would do his utmost. And, yes, you could drive a little farther or somebody would sometimes go out at night and gradually things would creep up. Of course his evaluation was riding on what he accomplished and by the end of his six-month tour he would have quite a few A and B hamlets, nobody below C probably. And then the next guy would come in and get shot at his first week on the job and say the whole thing was padded and rigged, let's get honest about this. It is all D and E, its Indian country and then this pattern would go down, things would get better in his mind and in his official evaluations the longer he was there. We were the opposite. We had no vested interest, no ax to grind.

I remember visiting one of the most obscure backwater provinces I had, Kimtung, for the first and maybe the only time. I didn't have much to compare it with except the report of a previous visit by one of my predecessors a year or so earlier. The whole U.S. side had turned over during that time. Most of the Vietnamese were still there. I talked to some of them and tried to get some idea. I came back and titled my report 'A Year Without Progress' and sent it in. A month or two later I heard from the Sector Advisor, that is the Military Province Advisor, quite a blast back taking exception to it. He had received a copy down through the MAC V chain and said look, this, that and the other thing had improved, mostly in his time, and in fact I don't think there was objectively very much difference at all. Indeed some of it was definitely backsliding, so far as I could tell, from a year earlier. But that is the only time I can think of when anyone specifically challenged one of my reports.

Q: Was the Political Section in the embassy divided up? Was there much communication there and were there camps about whither Vietnam and all that?

TEARE: I don't think so. I think in those days we were all sort of...or thought of ourselves anyway...as cynical, tough, well aware of the defects of the Vietnamese but at the same time determined to prod them into doing better.

Just as I arrived Philip Habib came on board as Minister-Counselor for Political Affairs and we had a Political Counselor, Tom Corcoran, and the units within the Section that I mentioned earlier. Lodge was the Ambassador, back for the second time, for his second tour. Bill Porter was newly arrived as Deputy Ambassador. Somebody observed in '65 or '66 that we had as Ambassador a politician from a predominantly or heavily Catholic state and then under him a Deputy Ambassador, a Political Minister Counselor, a Political Counselor and the Chief of the Internal Unit, John Burke, all of whom were Roman Catholics themselves. That this was sort of a built-in bias in favor of, well, if Diem had been around it would have been in favor of Diem, then in favor of Win Van Kew who was Roman Catholic himself and against all the non Catholic elements and supremely so against the Buddhists of Vietnam. Including those who had gone out and immolated themselves in '63 and so forth. Certain others, notably John Negroponte, were caught up in a vague sort of way as more sympathetic toward the Buddhists, also David Engle in the Provincial Reporting Unit. I think there was even a term "Bud-symp reporting". But Negroponte, at least in later years, became identified with the forces of reaction and conservatism in this hemisphere, so I don't know how accurate that was in his case.

I think a lot of us were very skeptical about the ability of the Vietnamese, the Government side, ever to do any better than they were doing. We certainly saw their defects, the laziness, the corruption, essentially telegraphing their military operation so that the Vietcong would have plenty of time to get out of the way and no contact would occur if the Government side were lucky. At the same time I think most of us believed that the goal was a worthy one, that is keeping that country out of Communist hands. We had seen what had happened in Eastern Europe. We had seen the invasion of South Korea by the North. We knew what had happened in China and so forth. We were I guess vaguely aware of the Sino-Soviet split but world Communism was still, we thought, a monolith and Ho Chi Minh was one extension thereof and it would be better for the people of South Vietnam if the Communists never came to power. I think that is undeniable.

Q: Yes. I was there '69 to '70 and that is exactly the way I felt.

TEARE: But history began to undercut even those assumptions. May I suggest that we call it?

Q: I think we'll call it at this point. I just want to put at the end of this tape, so we can pick it up, before we leave Vietnam were there any major developments that we could put on here that we should talk about?

TEARE: Not too many because I left in '67 and was back in INR working on Vietnam by the time the TET Offensive came along. There are some other stories and anecdotes that I can toss in and would like to.

Q: Alright well do you want to just put a clue what they are or make a note to tell me?

TEARE: Why don't I make some notes?

Q: Okay, just make some notes and we'll do that. Great. Okay, we'll pick it up then.

It is the 12th of August 1998. Dick, you said you had a couple of things you wanted to mention about the Philippines, going back?

TEARE: Yes, I did, if I may. One thing that I was involved in myself quite a bit in the Consular Section in Special Consular Services Unit was work with the U.S. Military. I worked with the Navy at Sangley Point, which we still had then and at Subic Bay and the Air Force at Clark Field or Clark Air Base...CAB as the Filipinos called it.

The dependents of the U.S. Military came in on regular tourist passports with a category of visa. The Filipinos had modeled theirs after ours. For tourists it was '9A'. Diplomats were '9E' and so forth. Merchant seamen I think were '9D', a close copy of ours. They didn't want to treat military dependents as regular tourists and indeed of course they stayed longer than tourists ordinarily would. At the same time they couldn't be put to all of the strictures, requirements, that resident aliens were, mainly Chinese. So they developed a category called the '9A Special' visa for military dependents. They were good for single entry only. So whenever a military dependent wanted to travel outside the Philippines, they had to come to the embassy and get the form signed, something like an affidavit, which a courier then took over to Immigration and got them a new visa for re-entry. Some of the military spouses in particular traveled a lot of the time, made circle tours, shopping trips and so forth. So I used to sign I suppose a couple of hundred of those every week.

I also had something to do with the hospitals at all three of the bases over the registration of births. The military had its own registration certificates but a lot of people like to get the consular certificate and particularly our blue form that looked like a stateside birth certificate on top of it. So I did that and all of that was sort of interesting in light of my connections with the military at virtually every subsequent post and of course my last job in Honolulu.

The other point I wanted to recall, I think I mentioned previously, I'm sure I did, my boss Lou Gleeck, who was the consul general. He ran a good section and had a lot of time to go over to the coffeehouse, La Casa De Ore, where he picked up a lot of political gossip and polished his Tagalog and so forth. I think I said also that Gleeck played golf with Ferdinand Marcos. I don't think though that I took this to where I was going with it. That is that Gleeck studied Marcos very carefully and wrote a long biographic study of him which he compared in length and depth to a New Yorker profile, the New Yorker of the old days. He finished this document sometime while I was still there, I suppose in the spring of 1964. It was clear by then that Marcos was going to get the nomination of the Nationalistic Party having bolted the Liberals, and run for President in '65 against Macapagal.

Although the United States is universally seen as having been in bed with Marcos since day one, this was not true in fact. The preponderance of feeling in 1964, when I left and on into the next year I'm sure, was that Macapagal while not very effective was at least a known quantity, whereas Marcos was unknown and therefore to be suspicious of. Gleeck meanwhile was championing his friend Marcos and pushing this document. The Ambassador, Bill Stevenson, did not want it to go forward to Washington because it was ultimately quite favorable to Marcos and that just didn't fit with his reading. I think he didn't quite understand the difference between reporting and advocating. He thought if we sent this in we would be seen to be advocating Marcos's ascension, which nobody was really. The embassy leadership, the Station, the Defense Attaché people all seemed to be inclined toward Macapagal and I think Washington was.

Finally Bill Stevenson, the Ambassador, left and Gleeck kept working on the Chargé, Dick Service, to submit this document. Finally Service did. He sent it in as an enclosure to a very short Airgram and the Airgram simply said something like: this reflects the views of the author who is well acquainted with the subject but not necessarily the views of the embassy. That is how it got in. Gleeck seemed to believe that his friendship with Marcos and this big document that was put on file, plus his seniority because he had been promoted by this time to I guess to old O-1.... No, sorry, what had done it was that he had obtained the title of counselor of embassy for Consular Affairs, which vaulted him over all the other counselors to whom he was senior in personal rank. He was an O-2 with umpteen years. He really hoped, and he confirmed this to me in later years, that he would be made DCM when Service left in '65. In the event he was not even though he was perhaps the only person in the embassy in Manila who welcomed the Marcos' victory when it came later in '65.

So Gleeck stayed on as consul general until '69 and retired. By this time he was divorced from either wife number two or number three and later married a Filipino research assistant and had another child named Eddie-Boy, or nicknamed Eddie-Boy. Freddie was his child of the marriage I knew and it was Freddie who was the childhood playmate of Ferdinand Marcos Jr., alias Bong-Bong, who just a few weeks ago was elected Governor of the Ilocos Norte Province.

Q: Did Gleeck stay on in the Philippines?

TEARE: After retirement he did and he became, unofficially at least, the historian of the American community in the Philippines which goes way back to 1898, and he also did some stuff about American firms. I think I have three or four of his thin, little books that he gave me on a later trip somewhere in my attic probably. Okay so much for the Philippines.

Q: So we're coming back. You left Vietnam but you didn't leave Vietnam. You came back to Washington and you were in INR, is that right?

TEARE: That's right.

Q: I just want to get the dates... '67 to?

TEARE: '69 in INR and then '69 to '71 on the desk as one of two Officers doing essentially South Vietnamese internal stuff.

Q: Well let's talk about INR in '67. Was there a fairly large INR establishment devoted to Vietnam at that point?

TEARE: I suppose in relative terms yes. There were at least three of us junior Officer analysts working on Vietnam or Vietnam-Cambodia or some combination. That was not North Vietnam, either, they were across the hall. In the old days East Asia...the Far East Bureau, had an Asian Communist Affairs Office that looked after not only China but also Mongolia and North Korea and North Vietnam. The China Desk still looks after Mongolia. Above us was sort of a straw boss, Lou Sarris, a civil servant, and above him Evelyn Colbert, who was the Deputy Office

Director, I guess. And then Fred Green, an academic from Williams College who had come into government for just a couple of years, was the Director of the Office of Research and Analysis for Far East or East Asia and the Pacific.

Q: I think he taught me for awhile at Williams!

TEARE: Very possibly. A good guy. And Evelyn Colbert is a wonderful person. The problem for the analysts, and me I think, I know that to be the case with one or two of them anyway, was Sarris, our boss. Sarris was an enormously bright guy but he was a terrible manager. He should have been left as an individual analyst. He and Colbert were among those who, along with some of the people in DDI at CIA, raised the biggest questions earliest on about the likely success, or lack of it of our involvement there and they deserve a lot of credit for that. I have sometimes said since that my sojourn with Sarris was the only bad job I ever had, not because of the subject matter which continued to interest me but because he would never get around to dealing with any drafts that had to go through him. Never. He'd sit on them for weeks or months and by that time they'd lose their currency.

Of course what I didn't appreciate going into that was the premium that the intelligence business puts on being first. In the morning you had to be in there by five and publishing your morning notes to the Secretary and things like that. They had other people doing that essentially. I got in at 8 or 8:15 or whatever it was and it seemed to me that the hot stuff for the day had almost all been done by that time by other people in INR or CIA, DIA. There wasn't a lot left for the rest of us. But again what incentive I had to do bigger and longer-range projects tended to disappear because I'd never get them cleared out.

For example I remember writing a study based in part on sensitive intelligence of the personalities who were going to make up the South Vietnamese Delegation to the Paris Peace Talks. They were not all government apparatchiks...well maybe they were ultimately but a couple were Foreign Office, a couple were military. We had a fair line on the personal views and biographies of three or four of them. I put all of this together in a paper of I suppose ten or fifteen pages. I would ask Lou about it every couple of days and nothing would happen, nothing would happen. Negotiations began and this document that I thought might have been of some use to our negotiators was...I don't know what ever became of it. It certainly wasn't published while I was still there.

So I tried to get out of INR. Much as I liked Evelyn Colbert and Fred Green. I couldn't report directly to them. I had to go through Sarris to get there. I tried to get out after a year and switch to the Desk that had a vacancy and wanted me. I was not allowed to do it. Although I was told I could go off for a year of area studies at a university of my choice. That seemed like a generous offer but I wasn't interested. The family was just back, kids starting school and I didn't want to relocate to Ann Arbor or New Haven or something just for one year and then probably have to come back to Washington. So I said no thanks and the result was a second year in INR and then finally I was allowed to move to the Desk in '69.

The first year there I understudied Jim Rosenthal who was the senior guy on internal political stuff and had been the first Chief of the Provincial Reporting Unit in Saigon. Then he left in 1970 and I moved up and became the senior internal political guy. The junior one was a woman named Theresa Tull who came back from Saigon at that point. So she understudied me and I believe took over when I left.

We had a lot of frustration there but at least what we got done had some demonstrable use.

Q: I'd like to go back to when you were in INR...was there any intimation of the '68 TET attacks and all?

TEARE: I don't think so except in maybe the most generalized way. That is we had a pretty good idea that infiltration was increasing, that the North Vietnamese troops in whatever number, and that is a separate subject perhaps, were probably going to try to do something one of these days. But the idea of a spectacular, coordinated countrywide offensive, such as we saw in 1968, I don't think had really occurred to anybody. In part I think the North Vietnamese buildup was being interpreted at the time as a reaction to the very substantial introduction of U.S. combat forces. How were the North Vietnamese to deal with this? They soon learned that the way to deal with it was not to stand still and fight for ground but rather to retreat and fight in times and places of their choosing and let us be the ones exposed or surrounded in Khe Sanh; the Dien Bin Phu lesson over again, if you will.

But one of the most interest aspects and here I am dealing partly with other people's published recollections I think, is of a conference I attended as a representative of INR. In September of '67, my first trip back, I had been recruited by the East Asia Bureau, by Phil Habib in fact, to go as an escort for an election observer mission, which is yet another story. These were the elections in which Thieu and Ky became President and Vice President, respectively. I had done a lot of work while they were on the constituent assembly election of 1966 and so I was a natural for it, I guess. INR rather grudgingly let me go even though East Asia was paying expenses.

We went out with a group that included the Chaplain of the Senate, who was Erland Heginbotham's father in law, and a Rabbi and the Archbishop of San Antonio. They were about the only clergymen in the entire country who would have gone along on such a mission! We had the Governor of North Dakota, we had Senator Hughes of Iowa and a bunch of others. I was also involved a little bit with the White House on getting instructions out to the field. The White House's general idea was that the observers should be taken out and kept running around all day so that they would be exhausted when they got back to town. Some of them we were told were pretty elderly but we didn't want to say that to Ambassador Bunker who had replaced Lodge by that time because he was in his upper seventies by then.

Anyway, once out there I was asked by INR if I would stay on to participate in a major intelligence conference 'guess-timating' enemy strength. I had been with INR only three or four months at this point and had not tried to do battle order, enemy strength in particular, and didn't know much about the subject. But INR could afford to send me because they would only have to pay my way home commercially and a few days per diem. So I joined in this conference along with some people who were then or later became pretty well known. I think General Graham who later headed DIA was the J-2 of MAC V at that time. Bill Hyland and Sam Adams of CIA. I can't remember whom all else.

The big question was how many troops and cadre should we credit the Vietcong and North Vietnamese with having. The basic answer was, well, we should give our best estimate provided it didn't go higher than a given number. I think this was right at the time that Westmoreland was out arguing for an additional 200,000 Americans. I've forgotten now, I'd have to refresh my memory what our ceiling was, but the main point was that we could mix and match provided we did not go above a certain figure because MAC V, J-2, would not agree to anything higher. It didn't matter what there was evidence for or what the best minds of Washington could come up with. MAC V was going to dig in firmly. Sam Adams was the young analyst for CIA who had developed a type strength for the Vietcong infrastructure and it had postulated so many committee members, so many armed cadre, so on and so forth in a District. It multiplied that by 240 some Districts, which was the total in the country.

If you did that you got very considerable strength figures because the District for which we had the good documentation was a very healthy one. I forget now which Province, which District. But Sam championed the argument that this was a typical District structure and that if we were going to be conservative about it we should postulate that the Vietcong had something approximating this nationwide and that made quite a difference in the strength figures.

The other point was whether or not we believed in a force known as the secret guerrillas. If we did, then they added another ten or fifteen thousand to the enemy strength total. That would have put us over MAC V's unstated numerical ceiling. So there was a lot of argument back and forth about that, all of it quite new to me. I found it intellectually stimulating but also I began to see just how subject to pressure and even dishonest the intelligence business could be.

We went in as a group to see General Westmoreland to present our findings. We were waiting there in his outer office and Joe Alsop came out. He had just had a long session with Westmoreland.

Q: Joe Alsop being a Conservative columnist in the United States.

TEARE: Yes he was. And the next week in his column, I was back in Washington by that time, I saw a couple of references to very sensitive code word intelligence information and to high sources in Saigon and so forth. I am sure what happened was that Westmoreland was selectively feeding him intelligence. Anyway we did present our findings to Westmoreland and I don't think there was any blood on the carpet in front of him. I think it had all been sort of negotiated out by the other people from Washington; most of them were fencing with the MAC V J-2 and me. It is a little bit like Henry Ford and the Model T. You could have any color you want so long as it was black. Well in this case we could postulate any strength figure we wanted for the VC and NVA provided it was no more than whatever...and I think the limit essentially was whatever MAC V itself had previously estimated in the spring in the same year.

Q: It was an eye opener. The whole war, particularly under McNamara turned very statistical.

TEARE: It did. I think I told you last time my recollection of the hamlet evaluation system. Every hamlet was rated on a scale of A through E, I think. A new District Advisor would come in, American military, find out it was no man's land and he would rate everything D and E. Then he would realize that over his six months in the job he was going to be rated on the improvement in the security situation. So a lot of hamlets went up to D and A by the end of his time. The next guy would come in. Indian country. Be horrified. All the ratings would drop again. And I may have quoted Ward Just who said that all the numbers were positive and all the numbers were irrelevant, speaking of McNamara.

Q: When about were you doing internal affairs in Vietnam, when you were in INR?

TEARE: Yes and more specifically on the Desk there was a division between internal and external and POLMIL and so forth.

Q: While you were in INR the TET Offensive happened in January and February of 1968.

TEARE: Correct, end of January.

Q: Were you able to come up with an evaluation of what this really meant in Vietnam itself?

TEARE: I don't think that what it meant in Vietnam was really the most important thing. In fact if you look at the casualty statistics, at least what was reported back to Washington, it was a serious military defeat for the NVA. They took a lot of casualties over the three or four weeks it took to clear out Hue, for example. In body count alone it was a loss for them, materiel and all that. The real change as everyone has commented, I'm sure, was psychological.

Q: You were saying the upshot was?

TEARE: The picture that the Administration had tried to paint of a winning struggle was shattered. Within weeks, by the end of March as I recall, Lyndon Johnson announced he would not run again. Bobby Kennedy had entered the race and been killed and all that. And there was the famous wise men's group, Clark Clifford had taken over as Secretary of Defense, and Phil Habib's report to them in which he told them that things were not going well. For the first time I guess Johnson's other advisors mostly lined up with Clifford and said we had to stop this.

Q: Well in a way we are coming up with two things. I mean we are looking at what I think most people could say was essentially a military defeat of the Vietcong.

TEARE: Yes, on the ground at TET.

Q: While on the ground in Vietnam. So in a way things were going well in Vietnam weren't they? The American view and all is almost a different factor. You are looking at Vietnam. Were you seeing a decrease in Vietcong activity? Do you recall?

TEARE: I don't recall specifically what we were seeing in terms of enemy activity. We did think that there were some fairly good signs of progress. One was on the electoral front. Although I am much more cynical about elections now than I was in those days. We'd had the successful one in 1966 for the Constituent Assembly and when I was back out there in '67 and it looked pretty good in the sense that a lot of people turned out. In fact in '66 one Province reported that 103 ½ percent of all registered voters had voted! Barry Zorthian who was Public Affairs Officer at the time came around the Political Section in '66 and we were sort of celebrating the successful Constituent Assembly election and Zorthian said to Habib, "Well, Phil, it is a victory for my policy of maximum candor." And Habib said, "You mean maximum pander" to the press.

Also in '66 I had joined Phil for a background briefing at Zorthian's house, I think it was, for a bunch of American correspondents and one of them asked Phil, "Well what sort of Assembly do we see coming out of these elections? I mean is it going to be animal, vegetable, mineral, what?" That gave Phil an opening and he said, "Well, at a minimum vegetable...but we hope there are going to be some live animals." But sure 60 or 70 percent of registered voters would sometimes brave bullets and bad weather and they'd go out there and vote. But that is because they knew that that was what was expected of them. If you weren't able to prove that you had voted life might be more difficult the next time you wanted something from the government. And so in that sense and I think that continues down to Cambodia last month, elections in that part of the world are not necessarily to be taken at face value.

But we wanted things to be good and we had eleven Presidential-Vice Presidential tickets in the race in '67. Thieu and Ky had won with I think only about 35 percent of the vote. The other tickets had finished more or less in the order that any observer of Vietnamese politics would have predicted in light of the strength and reputation of the people involved. The surprise of course was the so-called peace ticket of Trum din Ziu which came in second. He had adopted the dove of peace as a symbol, clipped off a UNICEF green card. In retrospect again I would say that the vote for Ziu, although he himself was not a very reputable person, sort of a crooked lawyer with a shady history. The size of the vote he got, let's say somewhere around 20 percent was probably illustrative of war weariness and a desire for peace in the electorate, the populace. I forget who was third.

The guy I had kept in contact with, about my only regular Saigon political contact, Ha Thieu Ky of the old Diviat, or Revolutionary Diviat Party, finished fourth, which is about where he should have finished. He had ten or eleven percent of the vote.

It was all very plausible. So if you were looking at it in Political Science terms, the '67 election, like the '66 election for the Constituent Assembly, was not a bad exercise. Of course then we had a bicameral legislature in Saigon which spent most of its time arguing with each other and Thieu and Ky didn't have to pay much attention to them and didn't. So it was anything but a Westminster or Washington type democracy and nobody really claimed that it was. Well, yes, I guess we had to, but without a great deal of heartiness in our claims.

Meanwhile I had settled down in the internal job on the desk where we had to deal with a lot of things. For example the tiger cages, the revelation that the Thieu Government had perpetuated the practice of the Diem Government before it of incarcerating people in pits. That was a hard one, believe me.

Q: Tell me, what was the issue?

TEARE: Well the issue was how could the United States be supporting a government so corrupt and so cruel that it does this to its political opponents? In a nutshell. And the short answer was that it is very difficult to support such a government except that the alternative was seen as being even worse. Another incident I remember from that era was that Senator Fulbright wrote a letter to General Westmoreland who was then Chief of Staff of the Army saying would you please identify for me the request from the Vietnamese Government to which we responded by sending combat troops?

That turned out to be very difficult to do. In fact, almost impossible. The period in which we began sending troops was the period of '64, early '65, before Ky took over as Prime Minister, Chairman of the Central Executive Committee or whatever he was called. The last Prime Minister before him was Dr. Phan Huy Quat and that was the fourth or fifth government in the 18 or 22 or however months since Diem had been overthrown.

Quat was a medical doctor and he had a couple of other doctors in his cabinet which therefore became known as the Medicine Cabinet. From all the archives that I could get at in Washington, and I had no knowledge that the Pentagon papers were being put together and so forth, though I knew some of the people involved. The closest I could get was sort of a weaseling formulation suggesting that there had been an implicit request by the Quat Government during I guess the very early months of 1965 for help from the United States in fending off the Vietcong and the invading North Vietnamese. Invading as we saw it.

My draft went up the line in the East Asia Bureau and over to the Legal Advisor's Office and it went hither and yon, over to the Pentagon, and it bounced back a couple of times. Other people tried to strengthen it. I'm not sure that anybody ever came up with a satisfactory answer but I do recall hearing that Westmoreland eventually signed some sort of reply to Fulbright. I've never seen it and don't know what it says but it was a long stretch because essentially we had decided in our own interests and on the basis of our own assessment that something needed to be done to stave off collapse. So we had decided to send in troops. But we also made the point that we were there at the request of the legitimate authorities of South Vietnam. Well what request was the question and there wasn't really a totally satisfactory answer for it.

Q: You worked on the desk in '69 to '71.

TEARE: That is correct. The Office Directors in those days were first, John Burke and then Freeman Matthews, Jr. and then just at the end there, Jim Engle.

Q: Well now were we sort of scratching around trying to find good news? The TET Offensive had come and gone.

TEARE: Well we would point to such things as the fact that the government had continued to function or had restored its control in Hue and Da Nang and Quang Trach and elsewhere. That conditions were returning more or less to what they'd been before and that the Vietcong had probably only alienated a lot of people who had been sitting on the fence by their vicious tactics and so forth and so on. But I don't know how many people we convinced. Probably not very many.

In this era also we were going out and doing quite a bit of public speaking at teach-ins and other sorts of spots.

Q: Did you do any of that?

TEARE: I did some, yes.

Q: That couldn't have been fun.

TEARE: No, I didn't mind it. I was never subjected to any personal abuse and I think I tried to come across as reasonable and open-minded although certainly with a point of view. I did one at Colgate University. I did another one in some places in Iowa. I did one in Columbus, Ohio, and vicinity. We went out to several colleges. I went to Ohio Wesleyan. This was not the big time teach-in circuit. I was never up against the Berrigans or anybody like that.

No, I got a polite hearing almost everywhere and although probably not many people agreed with me.

Q: Well what was the feeling in the '69 to '71 periods whither Vietnam? I mean when you were back in Washington?

TEARE: Well as best I can recall we had this feeling that the losses of the TET Offensive period on the ground had been largely overcome. Things were back to somewhere like they'd been before. We still held some hope for improvement of the Vietnamese armed forces. At the same time we had embarked on the program of 'Vietnamization' under the Nixon Administration under which we were turning things over to them progressively. I forget when we actually began reducing troop numbers but I think certainly by '70 or '71.

Q: Around '70, I believe.

TEARE: Yes. On the other hand I don't think we had many illusions about Thieu, Ky or the political process in Vietnam.

In 1967 when I was newly back from Saigon I was put on guide duty, escort duty, for some Vietnamese legislators who had been brought to this country. By now it was '68. They had been elected in '67. We brought this over to this country. One was a guy in his sixties who had an overcoat he had bought in Paris as a student in the 1930s. It went down to his ankles.

We took them all to Annapolis and we had a cruise on the yacht of Governor Agnew. This was a few weeks before lightning struck him and he learned that he was going to be the Republican Vice Presidential nominee. Maybe I told you this story?

Q: No.

TEARE: One of the legislators came from Quang Trach, where Agnew's son, Randy, was stationed in the Marine Corps at that time. He had brought some photos of Randy. This guy was pretty sharp. He knew he was going to meet the Governor of Maryland, got photos of his son. Randy looked pretty good out there, stripped to his waist, passing the ammunition to the next guy beside the artillery piece, so the Agnews were overwhelmed with these photos and so forth. Later of course it turned out that Randy Agnew was a homosexual and ran off with a hairdresser, a male hairdresser, and I don't think that cheered the family to the same degree.

Then we split up and my group went to Philadelphia and San Antonio and Austin and back to New York where we all met up again. They were really nice guys. Two of the three spoke pretty good English. We were riding in a cab in Austin, this was May of '68, LBJ had just announced that he was not going to run again, so I said to myself well, I'll engage this cab driver in some political conversation. These cab drivers are always good at that and these guys will get a kick out of it. So I asked him what he thought about Johnson's decision and resulting fallout from it. He said, "Son, I've known that Johnson-Connolly crowd, man and boy these thirty years, and I can tell you it don't matter whose elected in the fall, whoever gets to Washington is going to find there is not one red cent left in the Treasury. That Austin crowd have cleaned it all out!" And I said that was enough, we didn't need to hear anymore for the innocent ears of these Vietnamese politicians!

So there were little things like that happening along the way. But it was not a good democracy, the political process was not really going anywhere on the Government's side and I think everybody knew this. By '71 there was another Presidential election. I had already left by that time, I think, Ky ran against Thieu, that time, I believe. Thieu was re-elected with somebody else as Vice President and so forth.

Well I went off to Mexico City as Political Officer. It was Free Matthews for whom I had worked on the desk who'd offered me the job. And about the same time John Burke, his predecessor, who was by then DCM in Port Au Prince had offered me a job in Haiti, where I would have been Chief of the Political Section. At that point I thought Duvalier would last forever, Papa Doc, so Mexico sounded a little better for the family. So I decided to take the offer to go to Mexico.

I had been there a year and a half when the Paris Agreements were signed at the end of January in 1973 and at that point the Department brought back 44 Officers who had served in Vietnam previously, plus one guy who had not but who spoke Polish. The idea was that he would be the liaison with the Polish contingent of the International Commission on Control and Supervision that was established to monitor the Paris Agreements, originally Canada, Indonesia, Poland and Hungary. So I was one of those called back. If I had been in Haiti I don't suppose I would have because there I would have been Chief of Section or maybe the only Political Officer and could not have been spared. But from Mexico City I was. So I got back to Vietnam at the end of January 1973, right at TET in fact, five years after we passed it.

They had parceled us out. We had created instant consulates general on the shells of the MAC V and CORDS regional headquarters. We already had a consulate general in Da Nang. So we set up one at Nha Trang, a MR-2; at Bien Hoa a MR-3 and Can Tho a MR-4. I had not spent a lot of time in Central Vietnam previously so I was glad to go up there. The way it sorted out I was deputy principal officer to Jim Engle, whom I had known for just a few weeks in Washington, the end of my time on the desk. That turned out to be a very good arrangement.

Q: Before we go into Vietnam again, you were on the desk in the spring of 1970 when there was the incursion or whatever you want to call it of Cambodia. This caused great outrage on campuses.

TEARE: It was right at the time of Kent State.

Q: There were petitions. Kent State was involved in the protest. Did that have any effect? I mean were you involved in the protests of some Officers and all that?

TEARE: No, I was not. I regarded most anything we did to Cambodia at that time as pretty legitimate. Sihanouk had been harboring the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong for years at that point. Now maybe he had no choice. That is about the best thing I ever heard in his defense. But it seemed to me that to hit them where they lived was legitimate. I knew more about, and was more disturbed by, the incursion into Laos about the same time. Operation Lang Son 719 which was more a joint enterprise, I think, in the sense that the Vietnamese were more involved. They were at the front but they would not have done it without our pushing and our air and artillery support. That one turned sour very quickly. It was generally regarded as an almost total failure and the South Vietnamese got whipped soundly and came running home in disorder.

No, maybe I was not sensitive enough politically or not bothered as much as I should have been by the duplicity of the Nixon White House. But I didn't particularly get outraged and take the Tony Lake approach on that one.

Q: I was consul general in Saigon at that time and I thought bloody good show!

TEARE: I remember demonstrators outside the Department, though, right around the D Street entrance for example as I was getting a bus to go to some other building. And of course where were teach-ins and big demonstrations here and elsewhere. I have a friend who is a Protestant Minister who came with his wife from Cleveland to participate in one of the big anti-war demonstrations of that era. They left their car in a church parking lot in the middle of town, hiked on down to the Mall and their car was broken into. I said, "Jeez, it seems to me we have some pretty big domestic problems, too, that we ought to be worrying about, not just the foreign ones."

Most of the people I knew outside Government were totally out of sympathy with the Administration. I don't think I had any friendships dissolve over it but certainly there were people, including my own mother for example, who were decidedly against Nixon. She'd hated him for many years. She was against his policies in Southeast Asia. She was quite well informed about him and had very good arguments that were very hard to rebut.

Ambassador Stephen Ledogar was born in New York in 1929, and received his BA from Fordham University. He served overseas in the US Navy from 1949-1952. Ledogar entered the Foreign Service in 1959 and was posted in Montreal, Milan, Quang Tri Province, Saigon, Paris, Brussels and Geneva. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 1, 2000.

Q: You got out there in '65. You were there from '65 to when?

LEDOGAR: Early '67.

Q: Talk about getting there. You went to Saigon and they looked you over and assigned you?

LEDOGAR: I went to Saigon and reported to USOM [United States Operation Mission], which was the name for the AID field office. I was told to take the next plane and go to Quang Tri Province, which was the northernmost province in South Vietnam and included the southern half of the DMZ (De-Militarized Zone). It was rather quiet at that time. I went up there. Later on, a few weeks later, a classmate was assigned as my deputy. Most of the others in my group of FSOs were sent out as deputy province representatives.

Q: Were you in Quang Tri the whole time?

LEDOGAR: I was in Quang Tri for about a year, during which time the security situation deteriorated rapidly. But, just about the time that things were getting extremely bad in terms of security, I was pulled down to Saigon to participate in a special interagency study. It was called the Revolutionary Development Joint Task Force. The idea was to take a close up look at roles and missions and to try to recommend clear distinctions as to which agency would perform which mission. There was quite a bit of overlap among U.S. field agencies, and friction between programs. Who was to advise the Vietnamese on pacification, on psychological warfare, on public works, etc.?

Q: Let's go to Quang Tri. Could you describe Quang Tri at that time? It was right on the DMZ. Quang Tri City is the only city there.

LEDOGAR: It's about the only city, but another important feature is that about halfway north on Route 1 between Quang Tri City, the capital, and the southern half of the De-Militarized Zone, was a town called Dong Ha. It was there that one of the major national roads, Indochina Route 9, went off to the west. It went into Laos and then it turned directly south. Actually, that was a shorter way to get to Saigon from Quang Tri, because South Vietnam is shaped like a banana or a bow (convex to the east). If you went over at the very northern part of Quang Tri and took this Route 9 down south, it was like a western string to the bow and it was quicker and fewer kilometers to get to Saigon.

But on the way up into the mountains on Route 9, you came to Khe Sanh, which later became quite infamous. That was one of the districts of the Quang Tri province. There were a couple of other districts, two of them on the plains, a couple in the foothills. The whole province was relatively secure at the time I first got there, except that Route 9 had been cut and parts were in the hands of the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong. So, Khe Sanh was isolated from the capital and accessible only by air. There were several other areas in this province that were kind of rough. The famous "Street Without Joy" was along the ocean in the southern part of the province. That had been made famous by Bernard Fall writing about the French experience in Indochina in the early '50s.

Like most of the provinces, Quang Tri was mountainous in the west and then the foothills and the sandy plains are along the coast. Not a wealthy province. There wasn't much in the way of raw material there. There was coffee and some tea in the mountainous area, some highland rice, mostly lowland rice in the flatlands along the side of Route 1. Mostly Buddhist. Some Catholic. In a way, Quang Tri depended on the city of Hué, which was the capital of the next province to the south. Hué was an old time city where there were universities and cultural attractions and so forth. Quang Tri was very much a backwater.

Q: What was the situation along the DMZ?

LEDOGAR: We still had to respect the demilitarized concept. The friendly half of this DMZ was one of Quang Tri province's districts, so Quang Tri had to have a civilian province chief, unlike every other province in South Vietnam which had military chiefs. There were no military forces in the DMZ, but there were police. They were, maybe, paramilitary. They carried machine guns, not just pistols and clubs. But there was not much population there. Each side of the river which formed the border had a flagpole, and the two flagpoles were getting taller and taller and the flags were getting bigger and bigger. Both North Vietnam and South Vietnam would blare propaganda back and forth at each other across a river with smashed railroad and automobile bridges lying in it. So, there wasn't much purpose in going up there.

Q: You didn't have an American military up there.

LEDOGAR: We had American military advisors to the South Vietnamese (ARVN) units that were stationed there. There were considerable South Vietnamese forces in Quang Tri province. There were three battalions. There was one up beyond Khe Sanh. There was a U.S. Special Forces team that had so-called mercenaries (native Montagnard recruits) at Khe Sanh itself. There were two battalions in closer to Quang Tri. Each district had advisors to the district chief and his district forces, and that would require a small unit of U.S. military advisors.

Q: Was there much concern at that time, the time you were in Quang Tri, about infiltration through the DMZ?

LEDOGAR: The strict answer to your question is, during the time I was there, it went from very little concern to outright North Vietnamese invasion right through the DMZ in that one year. But in the beginning, Quang Tri province was being bypassed by the Ho Chi Minh Trail, which ran down through Laos at that latitude. The North Vietnamese infiltration was further south through Laos and into the so-called Highlands of South Vietnam's II CORPS. That's where the roughest part was prior to 1966. The United States Marines when they arrived in country were assigned to I CORPS or the northern five provinces, and headquartered in Danang. These All-American units were building up during my time, but we still had U.S. Army officers as advisors to the regular South Vietnamese units and also to the district forces.

Q: Before the outright invasion, what was your job?

LEDOGAR: It was to oversee and dispense U.S. development programs and materials in cooperation with the province chief. There was cement. There was roofing. There were pigs and corn. We had medical teams that worked in various places, sometimes setting up shop just to do a series of operations like on hare-lip kids. We had programs in public health, public works, agriculture. We had a couple of guys on my team who ran around helping farmers deal with animal diseases and other kinds of agricultural extension services to... In a sense my job was making sure AID kept our provincial warehouse fully stocked, and then working with the province chief to help empty it out and get stuff out to the various programs. That was a lot of work. But also, you went around as an advisor to him. I traveled a lot with the province chief. As I said, he was a civilian because one of his districts which was in the DMZ had a civilian chief, unlike the rest of South Vietnam. But we always traveled with a military escort. When moving about with an escort I always had a weapon handy, so as not to be an unnecessary burden to the escort if we got into a firefight. My deputy, Richard Brown, myself, and one or two other civilian officials lived in a reasonably nice house on the northern edge of Quang Tri City. We had two bodyguards outside the house at night. I had an M-1 carbine that stayed in my bedroom at night and in my vehicle when my driver was on duty. I also had a Belgian 9 MM handgun that lived in my attaché case.

Q: What was your impression of the province chief?

LEDOGAR: I think he was a moderately competent fellow. He was probably skimming off a little bit at the edges, but I would not call him corrupt, using the criteria of the rest of the country. He was quite conscientious and courageous. Unfortunately, he didn't speak much English.

Q: Was he from the area himself?

LEDOGAR: Yes, he was, but that brings up a phenomenon that was one of the major problems of U.S. experience in Vietnam. Going back into the history of the French experience, after the border was drawn between North Vietnam and South Vietnam and the DMZ was established, there was a period of time when the border was open to whomever wanted to travel north or south. The Catholics, especially the educated Catholics, especially the Frenchified Catholics from the north, came down in hundreds of thousands to the south, recognizing that there was not much future for them with the Communist Viet Minh administration in the North. A small number of Communist cadre were brought from the south to the north for training and to form the nucleus of the guerrilla forces to be reintroduced back to the south. But of the northerners who came down, they were of a higher social class for the most part than the average southern farmer. They had an accent that was quite harsh to the southerners. They had a certain arrogance and sense of superiority. They quickly came into leadership positions. They filled up the army and many of the government positions. So, you had the phenomenon of the battle for the hearts and minds of the Southern refugees and the farmers. The local senior military officers of the ARVN spoke with a harsh northern dialect. They tended to treat farmers like imbeciles. At nighttime, the local Viet Cong guy who had training in the north came into the village and was one of them. He spoke their dialect and was a farm kid himself. So, you had this very difficult circumstance.

Q: Had we reached the point where there was a rather elaborate system of reporting on the American part about the pacification effort in villages and districts?

LEDOGAR: Yes, that was being codified when I got there. It was being abused and that was really scandalous. Our gung-ho leaders in Saigon designed reporting forms where you had to be objective and check boxes. They would read, "How is security in X village? Your choices were "much better," "a little bit better," or "about the same." So there was no box to say "This place has gotten worse" or "This problem has gotten worse." We were coloring maps blue at times, meaning secure for political reasons. This was true especially when American military forces started operating themselves, and not just advising South Vietnamese forces. In a way you had to have a certain amount of understanding. The American forces would mount an operation, go in, clean out some valley, and at the end of the day, they would stand holding the ground, and there would be 100 dead North Vietnamese young men and 10 dead Americans; the U.S. commander, as far as he understood things, had won. He had just won that battle. This was the problem of the entire war. Then the helicopters come and he returns to base. It comes time to write the report and he says, "Color that valley blue. We just pacified it." They didn't do a damn thing. All they did was go in, have a battle, and kill more folks than they lost. But as soon as they left, the place belonged to the Viet Cong again. That went on over and over again in that province, in the other provinces, and throughout the entire country. We never could understand that we were winning the battles but losing the war. We never could understand that a body count of ten dead Viet Cong to one American killed was perfectly acceptable to the Communist side. Pretty soon, there would be no more Americans. There were a whole lot of mistakes we made of this kind. I stayed with Vietnam for eight years. I saw and heard and participated in and was involved at policy levels and defended our policy in Vietnam for a long period of time. I still haven't resolved my doubts, except I believe our cause was just, but our grasp was faulty.

Q: Did you get any feel about how the central government in Saigon was taking hold down at the district and village level?

LEDOGAR: Yes. It was not doing very well. That became increasingly clear. One of the things that was a constant problem and became a very real crisis in I CORPS was that the radical Buddhist clergy in Saigon started this terrible movement against the central government, and they started exposing corruption and mismanagement. They caused the government entities in the northern provinces to separate from Saigon control. So, we had the circumstance there where we Americans were advising in the CORPS area in the northern provinces, but the folks who we were advising were no longer connected to Saigon. Of course, that meant that their troops were not being paid and all kinds of other problems. We had to deal with the Buddhist clergy. There were all kinds of problems that were involved.

Q: On your part, how did you work with the Buddhist clergy? Were they approachable?

LEDOGAR: They were approachable, but they were a little bit difficult. They had chips on their shoulders and there was a good reason for that. Because of U.S. legislation and the nature of our aid programs, we were prohibited from giving any U.S. aid for religious purposes unless it clearly was consistent with one of our programs and only incidentally attached to a religious institution. The Catholic church - and here the Catholic clergy was very smart - would say, "We want to build a health clinic. Can you help us?" And we were allowed to do that, provided they didn't divert any of the materials to the church. The Buddhists would see them and come in and say, "We want to build a pagoda." We would have to explain to them, "Build a health clinic, I can help you out. Build something that's consistent with something social and we can help you out, but I can't help you build a religious building." They'd say, "See, you favor the Catholics." This went on over and over again. I don't know why we were unable to make this distinction, but we were seen by the Buddhist clergy as favoring the Christians.

Q: With the village and district leaders, did you have any particular control or would you just keep an eye out and say, "Let's try to deal with this or make them a little more aggressive in making programs work?"

LEDOGAR: Well, first of all, I and members of my AID team visited districts as often as we safely could. We tried to work through the American military advisors at district level. For the most part they understood the programs and tried to make them work. Also, we dispensed material "goodies" through the district teams. I would say that it was a totally engrossing 24 hour a day job. You lived and breathed every aspect of the problem. You had nothing else to do in this rural province. There was essentially nothing else. Furthermore, it was so far away from Saigon that it was difficult to go down there on weekends. I found out that by the time I would get to Saigon on a Saturday, the American AID employees stationed there were running out of the building to go off to Bangkok to be with their families. It was terribly annoying to come in from the field and find out that you were working that weekend and nobody else was. So, it was kind of a "we-they" attitude that developed between the AID people in the field and the headquarters folks.

Back to the field again, a lot of the work that an AID field representative did, if he were wise, was with the resident senior U.S. military advisor. This was the officer usually around lieutenant colonel level who was in charge of the compound where all the U.S. advisors to the local Vietnamese units had their bases and where the advisors would come for a shower and a hot meal at the end of the week. If you were lucky, you had a fellow who would pay attention and who would motivate his district advisors to work with AID programs. But many of our military folks were really not terribly skilled in dealing with the citizenry. They felt they were in a hostile environment and couldn't trust any of these natives. That was a big problem, the inability to distinguish friend from foe. There was not a very high sensitivity about the negative impact that certain military actions can have on the livelihood of farmers. Timber was extremely precious and soldiers would come along and grab major pieces of wood from houses to build bunkers. Well, that's the backbone of the farmer's house. All kinds of things like that. You spent a lot of time trying to influence the American military and help them understand. At the same time, I was in a province that spoke a different dialect than I had been trained in, so I found that my advantage in Vietnamese was not all that great. I spoke French to the province chief, but his French was not famous.

I can recall one time when we AID advisors in the northern five provinces were pulled in by the regional AID director to Danang to meet with a visiting U.S. congressional delegation that included Senator Ted Kennedy and Senator John Tunney of California. We had been briefed to make sure that during the course of this reception, our province chiefs each had a chance to speak privately with each of the Senators. I brought my chief over to see Senator Kennedy, and he with his bad back said, "Come on, let's go over here and sit down." We sat down on the couch. The Senator knew how to use an interpreter. The province chief got all flustered and he couldn't speak French all of a sudden. Kennedy was trying French but he was not doing very well. So, the chief said, "Ledogar here can speak Vietnamese. He'll interpret for me." I panicked. That's a tough job. But Kennedy sat himself in the middle facing the chief there and I was back over here, which is the proper setup. Fortunately, the questions remained general. Kennedy said, "Mr. Province Chief, tell me what your biggest problems are." So, the chief started rattling off a mile a minute and I'd pick up a few words like 'security' or 'refugees.' But, I knew his problems as well as he did. I was his advisor. In fact, I'd try to focus him more intently on some of his problems and less on others. So I let him go on for a while. Then I spilled it all out as though he had said it all. I do remember that the Senator was quite amazed and complimented me after this interview on how well I spoke the language. Well, it was a sham. I picked up a few words and using clues and my knowledge of the general situation just elaborated.

The war was an all-engrossing situation and one could clearly see things were deteriorating. U.S. troops were moving in. They had not yet come into Quang Tri province. The Marines were assigned to I CORPS by this time, so we were still working with the U.S. military advisors, who were Army. But there were signs that the North Vietnamese, taking advantage of the Buddhist struggle movement, were beginning to infiltrate major units directly across the DMZ. Indeed, shortly after I was pulled down to Saigon, all hell broke loose. They had several big battles around the DMZ between the U.S. Marines and the North Vietnamese.

Q: These were American Marines. While you were there, a place like Khe Sanh and all that, which later in '69 or so became quite a hotspot, was that country up in the hills pretty much Viet Cong/North Vietnamese territory?

LEDOGAR: Not downtown Khe Sanh and not the military base or the airfield. So, we would fly in there - and I did several times - and we could visit the district headquarters and the local units, the regional forces, and the Montagnard units that the U.S. Special Forces team was training and really commanding. But without heavy military escort, you couldn't go very far from that airport. You could not go back down Route 9 to Dong Ha at that time. The first of the U.S. Marine operations which did occur while I was still living in Quang Tri was exactly to try to clear that route. They brought a reinforced battalion to Khe Sanh, flew them in and had them march the road down eastward towards the coast, the old French national route. Of course, they fought their way through and the Communists closed in behind them. That was the first operation in the province by main U.S. forces. It was called "Operation Virginia."

Q: Did we have a fairly elaborate setup along the DMZ to pick up who was coming across?

LEDOGAR: I don't think so, but all I would get was processed intelligence reports. I'm not sure how they were gathered. We had what were called LRRP [long range reconnaissance patrols]. These so-called 'lurps' were made up of mixed U.S. and Vietnamese forces. They would have random places to land and then they would patrol in patterns around those places. They picked up quite a bit of intelligence. Then I didn't know how much was being gotten by signal intelligence nor how much was being gotten by other sources. But I think that it became quite clear that main force North Vietnamese units were moving into the province through the DMZ. That became very vivid when, shortly after I was pulled down to Saigon, there were great big battles that occurred between the U.S. Marines right there in Northern Quang Tri province. We called them "Operation Hastings" and "Operation Prairie." Clearly, the North Vietnamese were coming right through the DMZ.

Q: By the time you left Quang Tri after about a year, I take it you were not very optimistic about how the government rule and pacification was taking place?

LEDOGAR: No, I saw a year-long downward trend throughout the area. On the other hand, U.S. forces were just beginning to be engaged, and we were seeking main force contact in order to try to get away from this guerrilla hit and run sort of stuff where we were not doing very well. One of the metaphors I used at that time was that it was like a master surgeon was advising a local surgeon, but the patient on the operating table was getting worse and was going to die. Maybe the advisor ought to take the scalpel. We were going to have to solve the basic security problem ourselves, and not try simply to advise the South Vietnamese forces.

Q: In '66, when did you come down to Saigon?

LEDOGAR: It was '66. It was approximately June.

Q: You were in Saigon from when to when?

LEDOGAR: For about six months. I still was technically the AID province representative on loan to the Saigon Embassy for this study. It was to be overseen by the Deputy Ambassador who then was Bill Porter. He commissioned an interagency study team that included representatives from each of the U.S. agencies involved in field operations. Where they could, they tried to get someone who was from another agency on loan to the agency that was contributing someone. So, I was a State Department officer on loan to AID, so I came down as the representative of AID on this. There was another guy in our group who was a USIS officer who was on loan to the Embassy. They kind of got people who had more than one discipline, allegiance, or point of view.

Q: What were you looking at?

LEDOGAR: We had a license to hunt that was unlimited. We were looking at the entire effort. We had resources put at our disposition - helicopters and other means of transportation - and a proper introduction that would tell anybody all the way up to a two or three star general that we were people working for the Ambassador and they should answer our questions. We were trying to find out "How do you see your task? What are its limits?" Where there were two organizations - let's say one from USIA (U.S. Information Agency) and one from the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) - who were both trying to run cadre programs, one for information purposes, the other for security programs, we sought to identify how their roles and missions overlapped or left gaps. Was there a good division of labor or could we make a clearer line or could we assign the responsibility to one group and leave the other free to do one of their other assignments? But we were looking not only at the U.S. units but also at the South Vietnamese units. So, were the South Vietnamese rangers so ruthless that they were causing more people to side with the Communists than they were killing Communists? In other words, were they part of the problem, as seemed to be the case? They were a wild bunch who were given to terrible behavior. It was like 16th century mercenary forces who after they had finished the killing would go on looting and rampaging and raping, and they had no connection whatsoever with the people in that area. Some pretty tough recommendations came out of this. In our group was Daniel Ellsberg, who was then a hawk. He was borrowed from Ed Lansdale, who had a special mission there in pacification in connection with Lansdale's famous work in the Philippines. Ellsberg, of course, later became a famous anti-war dove, and infamous leaker of the "Pentagon Papers."

Q: That's right. One of the problems that everyone who has dealt with the American military, particularly coming out of the non-military side, is that the reports tend to be either quite optimistic or "we can do the job" or "the job is getting done" or of this nature. I think that causes a problem because you tend not to see how the situation actually is on the ground.

LEDOGAR: That's true. Part of it is cultural. It's the "can do" optimism and the "we'll prevail," sort of football spirit that has virtue but sometimes lacks in the sophistication that is going to help you uncover some of your basic problems. We also had a phenomenon that was pernicious in that Robert Komer had established himself as the special assistant to President Johnson for the conduct of the war, and was trying to run everything out of Washington. All reports were directed to the White House. Then Komer was suddenly, after my time in Quang Tri province, sent out to Vietnam to be in charge of the pacification program. He then gathered all reporting lines directly to himself in Saigon, so Washington suddenly was totally cut out. Then we had these new reporting forms where it was impossible to report lack of progress, because you could only comment on how well we were doing. They were called "progress reports." There was no way that you could squeeze in lack of progress or deterioration.

There were a number of structural mistakes of that sort that we were making in Vietnam, where we were kidding ourselves. When you look back on it, we never figured out what the other side did with its wounded. The other side prevailed in that conflict and never flew a single combat air sortie. They had some logistical sorties with their helicopters up and down the Ho Chi Minh Trail, but in country we never had any combat sorties. Folks who were bombing the north ran into trouble with MIGs, some of which were flown probably by Russians or Chinese. There were an awful lot of mistakes, and yet as I look back on it - and for a number of years after my eight year stint on Vietnam affairs, I kind of blanked it all out and tried to forget the whole thing, figuring nothing was going to be sensible for years to come and just didn't bother reading and analyzing the early books written about the U.S. experience in Vietnam.

Q: In a way, it's helpful to capture now that it's been percolating for some time, but also to capture how we saw it at that time. What was the feeling about the advantages and disadvantages and whither should we go about the introduction of main line American troops into the battle as opposed to trying to beef up the ARVN?

LEDOGAR: I think we were doing this at the same time. The South Vietnamese were very much in favor of working with American main forces because with the U.S. troops came all kinds of support, particularly air support, logistics support, artillery, transportation, and so forth, and all of the communications that were involved with the above. And yet there was a dependency that was developing. I'm not saying I could see this at the time I was in Quang Tri, but I can't separate it all because I spent so much time focused on this. But a dependency was being built up and also a fear on the part of the South Vietnamese nationalists that the Americans were at some point going to walk away from the war, which we did. That becomes a self-fulfilling prophesy. I could see that even back when I was in province, that many South Vietnamese who would have a natural inclination to be friendly were very leery of being seen too close to the Americans because of the potential consequences if what eventually did happen happened. So, you would get a cold shoulder or some withdrawal if you crossed somebody's threshold. They wanted to make it clear that you were there at your choice and not at their choice.

Then an American civilian in the provinces couldn't help but have very close contact with the U.S. military advisors, who worked hand in glove with their district chiefs. You would hear the advisors' stories and frustrations and how they'd think they would be making progress and all of a sudden they'd have a setback. They thought the South Vietnamese guy they were working for was clean and then they'd discover that he had his hand in the till, or that he was being professional when the Americans were around, but he was being a tyrant and not taking care of his own troops when their backs were turned.

I saw cases where there was torture going on and the U.S. military would let their opposition to torture be known and then would sort of withdraw from the scene, but where could they go? They couldn't travel alone. They had to travel with the military unit they were with. One day I remember flying into a rough area with the province chief. It was a South Vietnamese operation in which they had just caught the Viet Cong district counterpart and the Viet Cong guy was being worked over by his captors, but the American captain and his assistant or first lieutenant were standing over in the corner. They made it clear to me that they had professed to their counterparts their objection to torture, but what could they do? They had to walk out with the South Vietnamese troops later on. Even an ARVN general came in and really lost face because he got so provoked by the obstinacy of this prisoner that he took his general's baton, took a swipe at this guy and broke his stick over his head. There was total frustration. There we were, in a circumstance which encapsulated the whole structure. It was extremely vivid... It was all hanging out.

Just to carry that scene further in order to give you an example of some of the things that we would run into: At the end of the morning which included this torture incident, the province chief and I caught a helicopter back to the province headquarters because the general from Hué was officially visiting us. There was a lunch that the province chief put on for the general and I was there.

Q: We're talking about a Vietnamese general.

LEDOGAR: Yes, the one who had cracked his stick over the captured Viet Cong leader's head. About the time that the dessert came, the general and the province chief were talking about how useless it was to try to extract information from a hard-core Viet Cong, so right there the general ordered the captor's assassination. That was the sort of thing that happened. What can you do? He said, "I want that guy killed." Now, all this was in Vietnamese and I couldn't understand everything, but clearly they were arguing about the pros and cons of continuing torture. The general said, "He'll never talk. We're never going to get anything sensible out of him."

And yet on another day, we would confront atrocities on the other side. This one day we got a call early in the morning to go into a remote friendly town that had been hit by the Viet Cong in the night. We had to go overland because of the probability that the road was mined, and with a military escort. All of the local popular forces, the good guys, that were unfortunate enough to have been captured had been assassinated. This wild grieving was going on. The Vietnamese have professional grievors that are employed by families to really do the heartwrenching wailing. Just as though we might have singers at a funeral, they have grievors. The bodies were laid out there and... There was one case where the Viet Cong had come into the hooch of a woman who was blind and she had two or three children. But she happened to be the wife of a South Vietnamese policeman. The Viet Cong just sprayed the whole room with machine gun fire, killing the children, because she was married to somebody on the other side. She was wounded, but she was going around blind trying to find out what had happened to her kids. She couldn't see. This was not every day, but there were so many of these heartwrenching experiences that you could not help but be caught up in it all. One impression cascading in on another one.

The local representative of the CIA's overt program, which was called the "Revolutionary Development Cadre Program," a predecessor to CORDS (Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support), had ways of getting bags of Vietnamese money to support his programs so that he was able to meet the cash payroll for his folks. I had one particularly bad circumstance. Saigon's payrolls were late for the South Vietnamese local military forces. We would have serious defections if we couldn't get some sort of payroll through to some regional forces. This CIA guy loaned me sufficient Vietnamese money to give to the district chief to pay his troops for whatever the pay period was. All I had to give him was a hand receipt. That's the kind of stuff that was going on there. He later was reimbursed. He had “walk-around” money enough to advance the pay of a full company of local forces.

Of course, we were dependent on the CIA’s Air America for our air transport because that was the only way to go back and forth from Quang Tri to Danang or to Saigon. That was exciting. You’d get shot at every now and then.

You had sort of a rich life as a field operator. It was not your typical Foreign Service post. I had a good friend, an FSO and former language school classmate who was assigned at that time to a more peaceful province in the South. He came up to Quang Tri and visited me and my deputy and spent a day with us. That happened to be a day where all hell broke loose. AID managed to get me an airplane for the day so that my team and I could visit an outlying district. We ran into a roadblock on the way to the airport. Then we got into an airplane that flew into bad weather and nearly crashed into a mountain. We landed in Khe Sanh, did our business, started back, and then got lost because of the bad weather. We had to divert to Danang. But we had with us everybody in the Quang Tri U.S. province team. We even had our doctors with us. It was not very often we had a plane to get up to Khe Sanh. So, I had to get them all back to Quang Tri province from Danang, and that meant borrowing the regional bus and driving back, which was a sporting course, especially since it was toward the end of the day. From Danang, we went up over the Pass of the Clouds on Route 1, across the mountains. We actually had an automobile accident on the way, so everything was thrown in. This was the road from Danang up to Hué. We got shot at south of Hué, but no one was hurt. We got into Hué, and by this time it was too late to go all the way to Quang Tri, so we had to spend the night in the city. My visitor and I were invited to the residence of the U.S. consul in Hué. I remember being served a martini there by a white gloved waiter. Here was this absurd thing. We were being shot at and nearly crashing into a mountain and all sorts of difficulties during the course of the day but by cocktail time, we were back with good old Mother State Department in a decent residence. My friend from further on South got the impression that we in Quang Tri lived that way every day.

Q: Who was that?

LEDOGAR: Desaix Anderson.

Q: Who was the consul in Hué at the time?

LEDOGAR: I think it was Sam Thomsen.

Q: After you finished this study of about four months, what happened to it? What were you all pushing towards?

LEDOGAR: I was pushing to get back to my province, where the reports were very bad, because by that time major contact had developed between the U.S. Marines and the North Vietnamese, who were coming straight across the border. This was important, heavy main force combat and not guerilla warfare in any way. But the U.S. authorities started a move, of which our study was one of the first steps, to unify all of the U.S. civilian operations that had to do with field operations. In the meantime, the U.S. military command in Vietnam, like any big headquarters operation was divided into departments - the J-1, J-2, J-3, etc. J-33 (the field support and sub-section of J-3) - was renamed Revolutionary Development Support [RDS]. That was the then current euphemism for pacification. On the civilian side, we were working towards the unification of civilian operations, so that the overt CIA cadre operation, the USIA field operation, the AID operation, and a couple of others would be brought together - even the psychological warfare units of the U.S. Army or the U.S. military would be spun off to USIA and all would be brought together into what was to be termed the Office of Civil Operations (OCO). I was offered a good job in OCO as part of a package that would have had me sign on for another two years in Vietnam. The answer to the question is that I was not released to go back to Quang Tri province and my former assignment. In fact, they started to look for my replacement there. I did go out, pack up, and said goodbye, but by this time I had become one of the guys in a large residence in Saigon working towards the establishment of OCO. But before the OCO really got established, the authorities decided to take integration one step further: to unify all U.S. pacification efforts in Vietnam.

The CO of OCO and the RDS of the military side were merged and became CORDS, which is bringing together all the civilian and military programs that had to do with the pacification program. This was all under Robert Komer, who was brought from the White House out into the field. Later, it was Colby, later director of the CIA, who was the head of the CORDS program. The advisors in the field were to be unified and instead of having an AID advisor and a MACV (Military Assistance Command Vietnam) advisor, there would be a CORDS advisor that could be either a military or civilian officer. Staff would be integrated. So, I was working on that and some other issues in Saigon at our headquarters and then I was sent to CINCPAC (Commander in Chief, Pacific Command) headquarters in Hawaii for a week-long RDS conference. By this time, it was December 1966. At that time, two things happened. One was a young lady whom I had known and gotten very serious about came out to Honolulu from New York and we met and hit it off again. Then I had a little bit of annual leave coming and we flew back to New York together. I arrived a few hours after my father had died suddenly. That was a bit of a jolt. Since he was in the private practice of law and I was, at least on paper, a lawyer, I thought I could be of use in settling his affairs. The combination of these two events led me to answer the offer of a promotion in Saigon that, thanks very much, but I was just not inclined to re-up. So, I went back out to Saigon and finished up my regular tour there and collected my stuff. I took advantage of a USIA invitation to go the rest of the way around the world and stopped in Milan, Italy, where I had been posted before and could speak to the Vietnam situation in Italian. That and a couple of other public affairs assignments enabled me to go back to New York westward out of Saigon.

Q: What was the reaction you were getting in Milan and elsewhere where you were talking about this? Had it reached the point where people were anti what we were doing or was there still a question?

LEDOGAR: Mostly still questioning at that time. But our allies were beginning to become quite alarmed. I really left Vietnam quite early in '67. Of my original twenty month assignment, I spent only a little more than a year operational as an AID province representative in peace. Then about three or four months was in this "how to win the war" special commission. And then I had a bunch of odd jobs around Saigon and headquarters. By February or March of 1967 I was back in Washington.

After my posting with AID in Vietnam I was assigned by the Department to be a State Department representative in the Pentagon's National Military Command Center [NMCC]. At that time, the Department kept manned, 24 hours a day, a desk for a mid-level State Department representative in the NMCC, always ready to give political advice if called upon. This was a rotational watch. It was a curious job. The Department of Defense in reciprocation had a field-grade military officer on 24 hour watch at that time in the State Department command center, always ready to give military advice. But with a war raging, the State Department needed more military advice than the Pentagon needed political advice. What we State reps at NMCC wound up doing was really supporting the military guy in the State Department. He needed to have someone to gather potentially politically sensitive military information and material and we would pouch it over to him every couple of hours; he was the one who would interpret regularly, or on demand, the military developments of the war for the Secretary of State. So, we were not doing an awful lot to directly support the military authorities but rather helping the State Department through the military rep. I learned quite a bit about how the U.S. military operates, but it was not a terribly challenging or satisfying assignment.

Q: Did you get any feel for the military attitude from the Pentagon towards the Vietnam War?

LEDOGAR: Oh, yes. That became quite clear. What everybody has sensed and written about was the frustration with the hobbles and the restrictions that were imposed by the Congress, the White House, and other civilian authorities on the conduct of the war. You could just feel the frustration and resentment that the problem was not being turned over to professionals who could use their own judgement as to how to prevail. That was especially clear in the selection of bombing targets and was exacerbated by the fact that we were losing aircraft and pilots in powder puff, militarily ineffective attacks on insignificant targets, and yet were not permitted to hit strategically important targets or ones close to centers of power lest there be a possibility of hitting many civilians or a Russian or a Chinese ship in Haiphong Harbor. That was quite clear. At the same time, I witnessed the Pentagon's frustration with the fact that the U.S. military authorities in country did not seem to succeed in locating and closing with enemy main forces in a decisive fashion. There was a Pentagon frustration at the inability to come to grips with the problem. Of course, that's where the North Vietnamese leadership was brilliant. They would strike and melt away. They would cause significant U.S. casualties and there was no significant outcome otherwise.

Q: You were doing this from '67 to when?

LEDOGAR: I only did NMCC for about six months in '67, from roughly March to October. I was married while I was in this job. I can't remember exactly how much longer after that, but I was then suddenly yanked out, which seemed to be my fate at the time, to help in a special new unit that was being created in the Department's Bureau of East Asian Affairs. It was called the Office of Vietnam Information. We were a group of Foreign Service officers who had the responsibility of essentially following the U.S. congressional debate on Vietnam. We looked for misinformation and knowledge gaps, and tried to identify Congressmen we thought ought to know more about the subject than they apparently did. We would then offer information to them in the form of briefings or in some cases draft whole speeches. Also, we would support friendly Senators and Congressmen who were well disposed to U.S. foreign policy in Southeast Asia with information and articulation. That included knocking down arguments that we regarded as fallacious or ill-founded, or not well-reasoned, and so forth. A very touchy operation!

Q: In a way, government departments aren't supposed to lobby Congress.

LEDOGAR: Right, but we were doing it. Our product was not often transmitted directly. It was sent to the White House where the White House congressional liaison folks would flog it to the legislators involved. It was quite clear that at times there were quids pro quo in terms of things that were of interest to the particular Congressman; so much so that after a number of months of this activity, the office of Vietnam information was probably the only group in the history of U.S. bureaucracy that ever recommended its own demise. My colleagues and I could see the handwriting on the wall and the beginning of Congressional resentment. People were starting to say, "Hey, wait a minute. What's going on here? We were just informing ourselves about the legislation!" Then we got counterpressure through the White House from the Senate to say "Get out of here." We were disbanded. There were only about five of us. But that curious activity took up the rest of '67, and into January of 1968.

In '68, I was assigned to the Vietnam Desk. At that time, it was headed by John Burke. Phil Habib was the Deputy Assistant Secretary to whom we reported. Bill Bundy was the Assistant Secretary. The desk was called the Vietnam Working Group then.

Q: You did this in early '68.

LEDOGAR: In fact, almost all of '68.

Q: '68 was an interesting time. You got in on it just in time, didn't you?

LEDOGAR: I got in on it just in time for a politically pivotal year, mind you. I was then still fairly recent with experience in-country. Less than a year after a wide-ranging 20 month tour in Vietnam, I was assigned in the Vietnam Working Group to the pacification desk. When the Tet offensive occurred in late January or early February '68, General Wheeler, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs, was assigned by the president to go out and assess what happened. Two places on his aircraft were given to the State Department. I was identified by Phil Habib as his spear carrier. I went out on what became an historical mission. We flew out on February 23rd after the Tet offensive, which we had watched, as the rest of the world did, on television, including the Viet Cong attack on the U.S. Embassy. Since I was in the Working Group, I was on the task force that was set up in the Operations Center all during that night as the Tet experience was developing, so we were fairly close to what was going on.

Habib took me along on the Wheeler trip, I believe, because I had recent experience in-country and it was a broad experience. It was not just one province. I had traveled the entire country in this roving roles and missions study.

So, we went out to Vietnam on this VIP plane, on which the general had 12 military staff plus a doctor. Phil and I were the only two civilians on the plane. I didn't have very much to do on the way out. But Phil had said to me that as soon as we landed - and we were on a high priority mission - he wanted me to get out of Saigon, go out to the field, and go see as many of my old buddies all around the country so that I could find out from them what happened. He would take Saigon, where he had been political counselor, and work with the leadership. I had a helicopter at my disposal. That's what I did. I choppered around, two days up north and one down south in the delta. Actually, each night, we came back to overnight in Saigon, but I went to perhaps fifteen different provinces. I couldn't get into Hué because the battle was still going on there. But I had a lot of buddies who were still in the Delta. I went to Ben Tre, where it had been claimed "we had to destroy the city in order to save it," and all of that stuff. Of course that turned out to be a reporter's phrase, not that of a U.S. army major. I really learned what I could through the observations of people whose judgement I respected. They were for the most part Foreign Service officers who were still in-country. Most of the U.S. military I had known had rotated out.

The situation around Saigon was still so tenuous that after our chores in the country we all had to make our way out of Saigon by small aircraft to Bangkok, and that's where the big plane waited for General Wheeler and the rest of us to gather. We went back to Washington via Hawaii. We had another civilian on the way home, Bob Komer, the U.S. pacification czar, who was pretty exhausted and dismayed at the really unexpected blow that had been inflicted on the U.S. and South Vietnamese by the Tet offensive.

Curiously, official U.S. military judgement about the Tet offensive was not too far wrong: in military terms, the Tet offensive was a success for South Vietnam. An enormous number of Viet Cong cadre were killed. They surfaced and came running out saying, "You're liberated" and they would get stoned or clubbed to death by the citizenry. They were not as popular as they thought they were. They sacrificed a huge number of South Vietnamese indigenous Communist cadre and guerrillas in this effort to strike everywhere at the same time. But unfortunately the damage had been done by some very low level Viet Cong actions with very high visibility. U.S. television network cameras were focusing from the outside watching the U.S. Embassy being attacked over the shoulders of the attackers. The impression was that these guys were in the ascendancy everywhere.

Q: As it turned out, they didn't even get in to the Embassy. I have an interview with Allen Wendt, who was inside.

LEDOGAR: As a matter of fact, Phil Habib came into the State Department Operations Center the night of the Tet offensive and said, "Has anybody telephoned the Embassy?" We were standing around and saying, "Good heavens, we never thought of that." "Well, get them on the line." We got the duty officer Allen Wendt, who incidentally had been the officer on assignment in 1964 to the State Department Office of Personnel, who had been put in charge of selecting the original State Department guys who were sent to AID. I just met Allen yesterday and some of these memories flooded back. I can remember Phil on the phone that night saying, "What's going on? Get down! Keep your head down! Put your head under the desk! What's going on? Look around! Get your head down!"

Q: As a matter of fact, Wendt was saying that he had very good communication with Washington but he couldn't get anybody from Tan Sanh Hut to come out. They were all busy, except the military police who were able to keep the Vietnamese sapper unit - they killed the leader - and they were rather ineffective.

LEDOGAR: Well, the guy who was in charge of that Roles and Mission study group I had participated in, George Jacobson, shot the last Viet Cong sapper. Jake lived in a residence that was right next to the embassy compound. There was the famous picture of one of the MPs (military police) lofting a-

Q: 45.

LEDOGAR: Yes, that's right, a 45 Caliber automatic pistol from the Embassy lawn up to Jake on a balcony. It was dawn. The MPs had driven the last Viet Cong into the ground floor of Jake's residence and were using tear gas to flush him out. When we were traveling around the country, Jake, for his personal security, carried only one thing and that was a hand grenade. That was in his attaché case. The rest of us all had sidearms, some kind of weapon. But Jake, a retired army colonel, thought a hand grenade was all he'd have a chance to use. So he was caught in his own bedroom with only his hand grenade and by this time it's dawn. The last of the sappers came over the fence and into his residence and was downstairs. The MPs threw tear gas in. They were flushing the Viet Cong upstairs, so Jake quickly ran to the balcony and he got one of the U.S. MPs to loft up a 45 pistol. Jake got it, went into the corner of the bedroom, and sat there. The guy came in with teargas in his eyes and squeezed off a couple of rounds that went in the wrong direction and Jake shot him. That's his account.

Q: I remember seeing on TV the pistol being tossed up to him.

LEDOGAR: Yes. That was a minor squad-size Viet Cong action and yet it shocked the world. A couple of weeks later here we are in the airplane coming back to Washington and two things are happening. The more colorful way I can tell it is that I was busy with the colonels and the doctor in the front of the VIP cabin, and the bigshots were in the back talking among themselves or playing poker on this long flight back to Hawaii. I wrote out a handwritten report to Phil. Then I didn't have much more to do. I could only give him so much that would be of use at that time at that high level. I told him what I had heard and what I had concluded about what went on in the countryside. I didn't have a chance to talk to him because he was involved with the generals and Bob Komer the whole way back. When we got to Pearl Harbor, the FSO who was the political advisor there met us and drove Phil and me to the BOQ. Phil said to me, "What are you hearing up front there?" I said, "I don't know. They haven't shown me any papers, but I gather that they're asking for a substantial influx of additional U.S. troops." "What do you mean by substantial?" I said, "I gather they're talking about two and a half divisions." "How many do you think that is?" I said, "Well, if they're heavy divisions, that probably could be as many as 60,000." Then he turned to me and said, "206,000 troops because they're not divisions. They're division slices. The U.S. Army is created in a pyramid like this. You've got so many divisions down on the bottom and when you take a division, you take a slice of all the support that goes with it. So, that's 206,000 and that's going to be the headline in the New York Times 24 hours after we get back. "Mark my word." I said, "Phil, that's impossible. There are 16 of us on this airplane. It seems to me that the cover of anybody who leaked that would be blown immediately."

Of course, Phil was absolutely right. We got back to Washington on February 28th. It was the headline in the New York Times a day after: "Westmoreland asks for 206,000 more troops to put this victory over the top." That's what occurred. It was one of the things in my judgement that caused an additional loss of support and credibility for the U.S. war effort. Even though Tet was technically a military victory, that was not the time to ask for... We had 545,500 authorized U.S. forces in Vietnam at the time. The requested increment would have been in effect an increase by 40%. It would have meant calling out the reserves and going to Congress for supplemental funds.

Q: Yes. What were you getting from your colleagues that you were visiting?

LEDOGAR: It varied in each case, but it was a substantiation of the fact that the Viet Cong came out of the woods and to a large extent got mowed down. But they did a hell of a lot of damage. In many cases, there was a lot of damage caused by the friendly forces who were trying to deal with them. Now, incidentally, in the province where it was alleged that an American major had said "We had to destroy the town to save it," senior U.S. military said hey had interviewed every single American major who had been anywhere near that province. U.S. authorities convinced themselves that no one had said that. Later on in a book it was revealed that the journalist who had first reported that slogan confessed: "Well, the alleged major didn't actually say that, but that's the kind of thing the U.S. military was saying." There were an awful lot of those sorts of media developments that helped to expand the gulf between the U.S. officials and the public.

At any rate, we got back to Washington and within a matter of hours, it was all over the public domain exactly what Westmoreland was asking for. The reaction to that was explosive.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point? We'll pick this up the next time. You're back from the Wheeler mission.

Today is March 2, 2000. Steve, you wanted to give me the dates of the Wheeler mission.

LEDOGAR: Yes. I have a note here saying that it was February 23 outbound and returning on the 28th of February. This was 1968 immediately following the Tet offensive.

Q: You mentioned how Habib had told you that they were talking about additional Division Slices. Did this make any sense for you? What was the plan?

LEDOGAR: To the extent that I understood it, the plan was to try to conventionalize the war. If, as seemed to be the indication, the Viet Cong - the indigenous southern Communist military structure - had been largely defeated, then it was felt that the Communist side would pursue the war with conventional North Vietnamese forces. Also, there was a considerable urgency to get on with things and not allow the conflict to drag out. But there is a rich and revealing story of the next five weeks, one in which I was not a first-party participant, but I know quite well from being on the fringes and reading a lot of books about that period: how the decision was made not to add additional forces, which incidentally would have required additional appropriations from Congress, the calling out of reserves, and doing a number of other difficult things in an economically strained time. We all know that Johnson was criticized for not putting the country on a war footing to begin with, and for the heavy inflation that followed. Instead, there was a series of deep draft reconsiderations of the U.S. war policy.

For the purpose of this interview, in my understanding it began with the President assembling a group of senior advisors who were called the “Wise Old Men,” statesmen-

Q: Acheson, Lidle, Clifford, and so forth.

LEDOGAR: Yes. There were three briefings that were given to this group, one on politics by Phil Habib, one on the military situation by General De Puy, and one on the intelligence situation by a man named George Carver. These were very sobering, very straightforward and honest, classified assessments. There were a lot of details I didn't know or couldn't repeat. Some of this I later became aware of when I was helping to write the Southeast Asia foreign policy portion of the history of the Johnson Administration. In the end, the calculation was made that even if the president gave the Pentagon or the military establishment all that they asked for, all 206,000 troops and other additional resources, there simply was not sufficient time remaining to bring those forces to bear and to seek out and destroy the enemy before the United States would fall apart politically. The briefings, which were very highly classified, were on the internal U.S. social circumstances: on the rate at which support for the war effort was eroding, on how civil disobedience and actual street violence were increasing, and on how the financial curve lines for inflation and social disaffection, and everything else were such that the judgement was that these various trend lines intersected too soon. In other words, the country falls apart in the near term and you hit a crisis before there could conceivably be a military victory.

Q: All I know is that from most of '68 through '70, the country was pretty stable.

LEDOGAR: Yes, because one month after the Wheeler Trip on March 31, 1968, President Johnson got up and made a speech on Vietnam in which he called for partial cessation of the bombing of the North, peace talks, and incidentally in a final paragraph that was closely guarded until delivered, said “I'm not going to run again for a second term” He was taking himself out. As I said, this was March 31, 1968. Shortly after that first phase, the ‘preliminary conversations’ phase, of the Paris Peace Talks between just North Vietnam and the United States opened. That was in May of that year.

Q: What were you getting from the people you talked to in Vietnam and were telling Habib? The South Vietnamese army had held up against this attack.

LEDOGAR: First of all, it was evident that there was a lot of destruction. It was also evident that the performance of the South Vietnamese military was spotty. It seemed quite clear that the indigenous Communist cadre, the Viet Cong, had surfaced and suffered substantially, but the North Vietnamese were also running around and there didn't seem to be an awful lot of intestinal fortitude on the part of the South Vietnamese forces, the ARVN, to stand up and fight the northerners, who by this time had come into the country in substantial numbers.

I'm getting ahead of my story and should go back and review 1967. We've gotten into '68 too soon. In 1967, I came back from my tour in Vietnam and went to the National Military Command Center and did the watch officer business. Then I went to the Department's Office of Vietnam Information. We were lobbying Congress and that got to be quite dicey. It was right on the edge of government employees lobbying the Congress. So, I was assigned to the Vietnam Working Group. Then I found myself touring all over the U.S., participating in debates about Vietnam and U.S. policy in Southeast Asia. It was a question of being assigned to do so, but I welcomed it. I was anxious to improve my public speaking and public affairs capabilities. There was a great demand for government defenders of U.S. policy. Everybody was holding a symposium on Vietnam and they wanted to have a spectrum of opinion. Universities, citizen groups, and other sponsors were most anxious to have someone who would come and defend the government's point of view. These programs were financially supported by the organizers. If the State Department sent a speaker, the State Department was reimbursed for transportation and lodging. No honoraria or anything like that was allowed. I did an enormous amount of traveling all over, including Washington State and Florida and almost everywhere in between. I was constantly on the road and very much engaged in debates about the Vietnam War. In many of the forums, I would find that the format was stacked up so that the government position was sort of like the right hand side of the spectrum, and all the critics, the other three speakers, would be various levels more to the left of what was going on, including some people who were calling outright for a Communist victory. It was very heated. I had a firsthand immersion in the debate and an opportunity to sense how whatever support there was for the Vietnam War was crumbling. It was not just reading the inside-the-beltway newspapers that gave me an impression of where the country stood on Vietnam, but being out in the sticks. You recall that protests did reach the point where we had the so-called "Resurrection City" on the Capitol Mall, and had marches across Memorial Bridge, and hundreds of thousands of folks marching on the Pentagon. One thing that was noticeable was that the composition of these demonstrations became more and more centrist as responsible mainstream citizen groups began to support what was in the beginning mostly radicals and extremists. You had all sorts of organizations and political leaders whom one would consider to be main-stream responsible critics throwing their lot in with the anti-war movement. There was a lot to the judgement that the country was coming apart.

Q: How about you? Were you undergoing any change as you went through this?

LEDOGAR: Well, I would think of it more in terms of sophistication. I always did believe - and still do to the extent I think about it, which isn't very often - that the objective of our Vietnam war policy was an honorable one, and that the essence of the conflict was not an internal struggle between competing factions for the upper hand within one nation, but rather an attempt by North Vietnam to impose its views on South Vietnam through force. That gets into the whole essence of the Vietnam conflict. Later, we'll talk about the argument over the shape of the table in Paris. That's all part of the same thing. Was the conflict essentially a civil war in which outsiders, the United States and others, were helping one side? Or was the essence of the conflict an attempt by North Vietnam to reacquire by force what it had signed away in the 1954 agreement with the French, the Geneva Accords? If it was the latter, then there was quite a legitimate set of reasons for us to try to assist the Republican side and to resist the Marxist side. If you accepted what was pretty well accepted at that time, that there could be consequences in surrounding countries all falling to communism if this one was let go - the domino theory - then you tended to believe the cause was just.

When it comes around to the execution, then I have some very strong criticisms about things we did and did not do. My criticisms were not simply of the sort that “if we knew then what we know now,” but also that we should have known better back then. We made a bunch of stupid mistakes militarily, politically, and in public affairs. Exactly where and how we might have corrected the course of action is subject to a whole lot of judgements, and many of them were more sophisticated than those that said “We have no business there. Get out” or worse yet, “I don’t give a damn about our forces. We have no business there. Let the other side win.” We had all kinds of critics of that sort. So I did not personally go through a transition where I was a supporter of the war and wound up after all of this an opponent. To this day, I remain a supporter of the objective but a critic of the execution, and of how we made some pretty stupid mistakes.

Q: My personal view is on your side, except I wonder whether South Vietnamese society was such - and particularly the political society - that maybe it just was not strong enough to hold no matter what.

LEDOGAR: I think that that probably proved to be the case. In the end, after we signed the peace accords and we continued to give support, the object stated many times by President Johnson and later by President Nixon in particular, was to threaten the North with the Vietnamization program: we would get out but we would get out so slowly and turn over so effectively the responsibilities and the wherewithal to an increasingly competent South Vietnamese regime, including the armed forces, that they would be able to handle the thing themselves. In other words, the North Vietnamese would not be able to gain their objective through the United States in Paris unless they made compromises. But it didn’t work out that way because the structure was not strong enough. Once they saw the rate at which the U.S. was getting out - and Congress made us get out a lot faster than we would have on our own - and saw that we were constrained by Congress to give less aid than would have been necessary, the South Vietnamese felt abandoned and they crumbled. They crumbled big time and rapidly.

Q: Now back to 1968 when you came back from the Wheeler Mission. You had been around the country beforehand. Did you and perhaps Phil Habib know that sending 206,000 people wasn’t going to fly in the United States?

LEDOGAR: In the months that followed the return from the Wheeler trip, I think almost everyone in the administration came to that conclusion. That was the conclusion the Wise Men came to. That certainly was the conclusion of the briefings that were given to them, including the one by Phil Habib. That was eventually the President’s conclusion, that reinforcement and escalation was not the right direction to go. In fact, the right direction was to begin what was codified by President Nixon within a year, to begin to make a plan for an orderly withdrawal. The rest of 1968, after Johnson dropped his political bombshell and Humphrey became the Democratic candidate and Nixon became the Republican candidate, looking towards November of that year, we still had the debate going on. The Paris Peace Talks were coming together and the negotiation there started, but remember it was at first limited to only two parties - in our view, the two external parties. None of the contending South Vietnamese forces were represented.

Q: You came back from the Wheeler trip in late February of '68. What did you do?

LEDOGAR: I went back to my job in the Vietnam Working Group. I also continued spending a lot of time on the road.

Q: Now it's after the Tet offensive. Did you find a change?

LEDOGAR: Yes. The Tet offensive had an enormous emotional and psychological impact in the United States even though the small part the public saw of it was militarily insignificant - a squad of sappers trying to jump over the fence and attack the U.S. Embassy, which was a suicide mission. There were a lot of problems about slanted press reporting, but for many other reasons there was a fundamental lack of public commitment that made any U.S. casualties increasingly regarded as an unreasonable price - "It wasn't our responsibility; we shouldn't be there." Of course for the longest time in the U.S., I think until 1967, we had conscription and were drafting American fellows to go over there and fight in Vietnam. The South Vietnamese did not have a draft. They had an all volunteer force. That was one of the basic mistakes we made, taking over the fighting the way we did.

But, yes, by late 1968 I did continue in my responsibilities, but also I started to look towards my next assignment. I was very anxious at the time to try to repair what I regarded as a hole in my own background, about never having really studied economics and trade. So, I signed up for the FSI economic training course.

Q: This was the six month course that gave you the equivalent of a bachelor's degree in economics.

LEDOGAR: Exactly, provided you already had at least a Bachelor's degree in something else. I was to have gone in the middle of '68, but I was extended at the Vietnam Desk. Then I finally got my orders to go in January of '69. Indeed, down the hall here (at FSI, Foreign Service Institute) somewhere is a picture of the January 1969 economic training class. I'm in that picture because we had our picture taken on the first day. Before the first week ended, however, I got another one of those foreign service draft notices. I was assigned to quit FSI and immediately go to Paris to the Vietnam Peace Talks Delegation on very short notice.

The so-called Paris Preliminary Conversations took place between May and November of 1968 between the United States and North Vietnam. Ambassadors Harriman and Vance headed the U.S. Delegation. On the North Vietnamese side, Xuan Thuy was in charge. Remember that Nixon was elected in November. The Preliminary Conversations ended just before the election. In effect, the agreement was that in exchange for a total cessation of U.S. bombing of the north, the wider talks would be organized. They would include two additional parties, the Viet Cong on the Communist side and the government of the Republic of Vietnam on the "good guys" side. But of course Nixon was not going to be inaugurated until January. In that period between November and January, the Paris talks were in a hiatus. We devoted ourselves to working out the procedures for those wider talks before the substantive exchanges began.

Q: Were you involved in that?

LEDOGAR: From the Washington end, but by the end January, I was over there in Paris.

Q: While you were in Washington during the late '68 period, you got involved in the preparation for the talks?
