MERRITT N. COOTES
Temporary Consul
Saigon (1936)

Merritt N. Cootes was born in Virginia in 1909. Educated in France, Austria and Princeton, he joined the Foreign Service in 1931 and served in Haiti, Hong Kong, Italy, Portugal, the Soviet Union, Pakistan, Algeria, and Washington, DC. He retired in 1969. He was interviewed by Lillian Mullins in 1991-1993.

COOTES: I was just about to go back to Hong Kong when a cable came in on January 1, 1936. I said to Henry, "Oh, you can decode this thing tomorrow. Don't bother about it today." Henry said, "No, I think we'd better go down there right now." It's a good thing that we did, because the telegram covered my transfer to Saigon, to fill in for the Consul, Quincy Roberts, who had not been back to the U.S. for 17 years! In those days, if you took home leave, you paid your own way back to the U.S. and then to your post. Roberts decided that, rather than pay his way home from his previous posts in Fiji or Indonesia, he'd stay where he was. So he hadn't been home for 17 years. He wrote to the Department and asked that somebody be assigned to replace him. He received no answer and, three months later, he sent a telegram. That was unheard of in those days. So the answer was a telegram to me in Manila, ordering me to Saigon to take over while the Consul went on home leave. Finally, his home leave was paid, as a special consideration. So I spent seven months in Saigon. It was a one-man post. There were such posts in those days -- they don't any more, as we all know.

Of course, when I arrived in Saigon on January 6, 1936, I thought that I would have to do all of the end of the year economic reporting. I thought that this was going to be a terrible burden. I knew nothing about Indochina -- I barely knew where it was. But when I was met at the dock by Consul Quincy Roberts, he said, "Look, I've got all of my reports lined up. I didn't realize that I was going to get to go on leave so quickly. I've got all of that done. I'd suggest that you go up to Hanoi, because that's where the Governor General lives. You can establish contact with the office of the Governor General and the Customs, Police, and all of the rest of the officials. So if anything happens while you're down in Saigon, you will have your contacts up at headquarters in Hanoi." At that time Indochina effectively belonged to the French. Cochin China [now southern Vietnam] actually belonged to France, by treaty. Annam [now central Vietnam], Cambodia, and Tonkin [now northern Vietnam] were French protectorates. For some reason the capital was established in Hanoi, rather than Saigon, although Cochin China was the wealthy part of Indochina, where the rice exports were produced. So I stayed there for seven months...

Q: In Saigon?

COOTES: In Saigon.

Q: How did you get to Hanoi -- by train?

COOTES: By ship from the Philippines, from Manila. I went from Manila to Saigon, and then, when I returned to Hong Kong, it was by ship from Saigon to Hong Kong.

Q: I just wondered how you got to Hanoi from Saigon.

COOTES: I went part of the way by train, but the railroad had not been completed. So after traveling by train some distance we all got off and onto buses and traveled something like two hours by bus to Nha Trang. From Nha Trang we took the train to Hue and so up to Hanoi.

Q: I see.

COOTES: When I was in Hanoi, I met the Frenchman who was the agent for Chrysler cars. He said that he had just taken delivery on some automobiles which he had to drive down to Saigon. Since I was going back to Saigon, would I drive one of the cars for him? So I drove a car, and it was very interesting. We went through the "pays des insoumis," in the hills of Indochina. It was called "insoumi" because the French had really never done more than occupy the towns. At night it was not safe to walk around. The so-called "natives" had never really been subjugated by the French. So I drove back to Saigon with the Chrysler agent. He was delighted to have someone to drive the car for him.

Q: There were roads?

COOTES: Oh, yes, quite decent roads. The French have always been good at that in all of their colonies, as I found out later on when I was in Algeria. What the French had done in that area in terms of transportation and communications was literally fabulous.

Q: So you were back in Saigon for another few months.

COOTES: I was back in Saigon for another few months. Quincy Roberts came back from home leave, and I returned to my post in Hong Kong. As I said, your transportation on home leave was not paid by the Department. I was entitled to some leave, after three years. My father was a great friend of one of the personnel people who served under Mr. Byington. He arranged to have me transferred from Hong Kong to Montreal, with instructions to proceed via Washington.

KINGSLEY W. HAMILTON
Consular Officer
Saigon (1940-1942)

Kingsley W. Hamilton was born in 1911 to Presbyterian missionaries in the Philippines. He attended high school in China, the Philippines and Ohio. He graduated from the College of Wooster in 1933. One of his favorite history professors topics on world history influenced his interest in international affairs. This led him to graduate work at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and his taking the Foreign Service Exam. He has also served in Hungary and Switzerland. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 9, 1994.

Q: Then where were you assigned?

HAMILTON: Saigon.

Q: You were there from '40 to '42. How did you get to Saigon?

HAMILTON: Well, by train to Genoa, and got on an Italian liner, the Conte Biancamano, and then to Singapore. We had the Italian minister of colonies aboard, he was on an inspection trip to their then colony Eritrea, on the Red Sea.

Q: Italian Somalia?

HAMILTON: Massawa was the port where we stopped and Asmara was the capital of the area.

Q: That would have been Ethiopia, or Eritrea. The Italians had all of Ethiopia at that time.

HAMILTON: Yes Eritrea. Then we went on making stops at Aden, Bombay, and Ceylon; so it took a while, a pleasant cruise. At Singapore I got off, and then waited a week until I could get a small French ship to Saigon.

Q: So you were in Saigon February '40. What was your job?

HAMILTON: There were two of us. The consul at first was Peter Flood, I was the vice consul. We did everything. The Cochinchina government operated fairly independently. The Governor General was in Hanoi, but we were responsible for the reporting and other actions as a legation or an embassy would have been. We communicated directly with the Department but sent copies of some things to Paris while the embassy was still there.

Q: What was the situation in Saigon like in early 1940?

HAMILTON: It was a pleasant and interesting situation, except that we felt cut off. It was all right up until May 1940 when Paris fell. There was regular steamship travel; a ship called once a week or every ten days en route from France to China and Japan and back. Other ships also called. People weren't worried particularly about anything. So life was good; a few shortages but quite pleasant calm. Then, after the German armistice in June, the French really felt cut off, left high and dry. Admiral Decoux, a Vichy sympathizer, became Governor General and General Catreux left and joined the Free French Admiral Decoux was given a large measure of authority and was also appointed High Commissioner for all French possessions in the Pacific. He had authority but meager resources, physical contact with France having essentially ceased. Supplies began to be short, so he had to try to develop increased commercial relations with the Philippines and Hong Kong particularly.

Within a month after the fall of France the Japanese began moving into Tonkin, the northern part of Indochina, in various ways, first with inspectors on the railway running to Yunnanfu in China. There were military clashes in September 1940 at Caobang and Lang Son on the Indochina-Chinese border.

Then the Japanese began making economic demands. They wanted all the rubber and much of the rice, and other things. They promised to pay, but actually all they did was to give vouchers. Generally they needed all their own supplies for themselves and sent little to Indochina.

By the beginning of '41 gasoline was running short. The French began mixing some rice alcohol in with it, and developed what they called gazogenes, an engine able to run on charcoal gas used first in buses and then some cars. Other things began to be scarce, including new movies. Life was more somber than it had been, with fewer balls and parties.

Q: From your observation, how was the French Colonial world? Were Vietnamese integrated into the colonial structure, or were you dealing with the French?

HAMILTON: We dealt with the French almost exclusively. Even in the provinces the top man was always French. Outside of Saigon the French themselves, however, mingled more with the native people than the British tended to do in their colonies. The French also seemed to marry natives more often than the British did. But the French had their schools, their lycee system. There was a university at Hanoi, but the French usually went to universities in France.

A certain amount of unrest developed among the Vietnamese towards the end of 1940. It got rather serious. I don't know who was behind it. There was considerable feeling that the Japanese were. French officials referred to "communist" disturbances. The French arrested a large number of people and put many of them on an island off the coast, Poulo Condore, where they had a penal colony.

Q: Like Devil's Island.

HAMILTON. Yes. Poulo Condore is about 90 miles east of the southern end of Indochina.

Q: Were Vietnamese coming to you as an American representative to let you know how much they resented the French? Were they using this, or were we pretty much a neutral?

HAMILTON: We were pretty neutral. The Vietnamese hardly ever showed up at the consulate, or elsewhere. We had a few Chinese who would come over and whom we knew fairly well -- businessmen, or commercial folks, rice dealers, or something of that sort. But it was rare when a Vietnamese came into the consulate.

Q: What was the major work you were doing then?

HAMILTON: Well, there was no visa work and practically no passport work. Most of the time it was political and economic reporting. There was quite a bit of economic reporting because Indochina was a rich country with a lot of production and export of rice, rubber, metals, and various things of that sort. A lot of political reporting was necessary at that time. It got so heavy and we were so far from Hanoi, the capital, that the Department sent down Charles Reed from Shanghai primarily to do political reporting in Hanoi. He got a room or two, opened a little office in a hotel, and took over much of the political reporting. Normal consular matters he would usually refer to us in Saigon. People visited him but he did not really operate an office for the public, particularly not for consular services.

Q: When you say political reporting, was this basically about what the Japanese were up to more than anything else?

HAMILTON: Yes, plus the policies and attitudes of the French and problems with Thailand.

Q: What was your attitude, and others with you in the consulate there, towards the French, after the fall of France? The British during 1940 were going through the Battle of Britain and it was a very difficult time, and the Vichy French and the British went in and attacked the French navy in Algeria and in Dakar. I'm not talking about our attitude. I'm talking about your attitude and people around you towards the regime in Saigon at that time as this news came out.

HAMILTON: Personally we were naturally pro-British and Free French. The local government people, of course, could only present one front but not always with much enthusiasm. It was pro-Vichy, and Petain still had the respect of a good many people, even though it turned out he couldn't do much. On the other hand, there was also quite an anti-British feeling. Many felt that the British had let them down. Then there were plenty of the French looking to the U.S., and many were friendly towards it. Others just wanted to wait and see...they were completely taken aback about what had happened, and didn't feel up to much of anything. They were worried about the Japanese coming into the north. Initially they didn't think this would cause problems in the south.

Q: How did that play out?

HAMILTON: Well, the Japanese did come down. From behind the scenes, they had good control of things up north by September 1940, and then gradually worked down to the south. They had control there by August of '41, and began landing troops.

An AP correspondent, Relman Morin, tried to trail around the country to find out where all these Japanese soldiers and equipment were going. You could see that they had largely taken over the Saigon airport. This was the only place in the Saigon area where they constructed barracks and kept troops and planes. They also built or improved airfields and barracks in other parts of Cochinchina and Cambodia, took over other buildings and some homes by working through the French, erected small radio stations, and strung telephone and telegraph lines widely.

In November, the Japanese began following us to see where we were going. You'd see them not far behind when you moved about Saigon or out into the countryside.

Q: Was it still technically French government there?

HAMILTON: Oh, yes.

Q: Were the Japanese calling the shots?

HAMILTON: To a very large extent, yes. When they wanted something they got it. They asked for it, and the French pretty much obliged. Various economic and other agreements were the front for things the Japanese wanted. There was little else the French could do if they wanted to maintain at least nominal control. No help was available from France.

The French were never heavily armed in Indochina. Some 40,000 native troops and workmen had been sent to France after the outbreak of war in Europe, and by the time the Japanese moved into southern Indochina their forces exceeded the French.

Q: What was the general feeling? Why were the Japanese there? Why were they putting troops in?

HAMILTON: Well, that was the question. There was some speculation that they had in mind Malaya, now Malaysia, but nobody knew and that really didn't seem likely. Although things were pointing in that direction, people couldn't believe it. In fact, however, that was what it proved to be all about.

Q: Did we have military attachés down there?

HAMILTON: No. The nearest military attaché was in Bangkok. He came over once, I don't remember just when, for a few days, probably shortly after the fall of France.

Q: This would be June of 1940.

HAMILTON: I think it was soon after. All I remember is that he came for a brief visit. He may have gone on to Hanoi, I'm not sure about that either.

Q: This is before Japan went to war with us, any problems with our operation, outside of being followed a little?

HAMILTON: On the whole, no. On Sunday evening, November 23, 1941, however, the Japanese gendarmerie, which was a military police organization, put a bomb against the door of the consulate (which was in an office/apartment building) and blew the consulate apart.

I had an apartment across a little park, about a block away, so I heard the noise. Our American clerk, who lived a floor or two above was badly scared and shaken up. I went over and saw the office was essentially demolished. A lot of smoke and dust were pouring out the door.

In the morning we got in touch with the French who knew all about it by that time. We were able to get some space in the Bank of Indochina on its top floor. We operated there from November 24th to December 8th, when the Japanese took us into custody and stopped all our operations.

Q: Were the Japanese seen to do this? I mean was this blatant, or was this supposedly done by Vietnamese terrorists? How did this bomb...

HAMILTON: I know of no witnesses. The French looked into it and told Sidney Browne, the consul, what we all thought, that it was the Japanese gendarmerie who had done it. I don't know how firm the evidence was. We never had any evidence, I don't believe, of any animus among the natives toward us. We thought it quite unlikely that any of them who were operating against the French would have done it. Why the Japanese would have, is hard to say too. It might have tipped their hand. I do not recall that the Department responded to our reports, but it must have even though it would have been very busy.

Q: Yes, by the time it was absorbed the balloon had gone up. In that part of the world it was December 8th when the Pearl Harbor attack came. What happened with you all?

HAMILTON: I guess it was about 2:30 in the morning in Saigon that low flying planes awakened me, and soon a Japanese squad (a lieutenant, an interpreter, and several men with fixed bayonets) pounded on my apartment door, and said, "Open up." When I opened up they handed me a mimeographed statement from the Headquarters of the Nippon Army that said we were at war and that I had to stay there until further word.

They did the same with Sidney Browne and the British, although they missed one of the British vice consuls. We were all kept in our quarters until arrangements were made.

The British owned a large residence for their Consul General. The U.S. didn't own any property, and I don't know just how it was arranged that we would all be put into the British residence. But after three or four days later we were moved over there, with our servants and a radio. The AP correspondent, Relman Morin, was also brought in, as well as the head of the British and American Tobacco Company office.

Q: What did you do? What were you up to?

HAMILTON: We weren't up to anything. The British Consul General and Sidney Browne negotiated a little bit with the Japanese who said they would put a couple of guards in the front of the house, and they would not go into the rest of the house at all. So our guards sat there in a small room and we organized ways of passing the time; some reading, some writing, listening to the news which wasn't very encouraging, and often bridge in the evening (which is how I learned to play the game).

Q: The first six months particularly.

HAMILTON: One bad military situation after another. But the servants were allowed to go out marketing every day, so we had a good food supply. They could also do the laundry regularly. There were shortages, of course, which affected everyone.

The residence had a fairly large grounds so we could get out and exercise every day. We made a deck tennis court and a miniature golf course.

It was somewhat monotonous, but not too bad a life. You had no responsibilities, nothing you had to do. The AP man, of course, was accustomed to being on the go all the time; so found it very restricting. The rest of us didn't find it quite so bad in that respect. We got along all right together for the most part.

Q: How big was the Consulate General, or was it a Consulate?

HAMILTON: For the British it was a Consulate General.

Q: For us it was a Consulate. How big was the American staff?

HAMILTON: Americans, just the two of us (officers) and an American clerk.

Q: So the two of you and the American clerk was a woman. She was also interned too?

HAMILTON: No, she wasn't. She had to check into the police once a week, but stayed in her apartment. I don't know that it was particularly agreeable, especially going out. People couldn't be too friendly with her. But anyhow, she was on her own. The whole staff of the Consulate was still very small. We had a French clerk, a lady, who kept the accounts, and acted as an administrative officer; an Indian clerk who helped handle the mail room, helped gather data for some reports, and a few other things; a janitor/messenger. That was it.

Q: How did this play out? You could hear the news, they didn't take your radio away.

HAMILTON: No, we always had a radio. In fact we had a couple. Well, the Swiss consul was finally put in charge of American interests and became the contact between the Department, the Japanese, and ourselves. I don't know just when that occurred, but it was a while before he was able to get over to see us. Even then what he could say was restricted since the Japanese listened in. He was the outside contact and if we needed money or anything else, we had to get it through him. He could arrange for us to go to a dentist, or a doctor if necessary, accompanied by a guard, which we had to do a few times. All the information regarding the exchange arrangement that came along ultimately, came through him.

Q: But how did it play out? I mean, how did they get you out? How did you leave?

HAMILTON: Well, the Japanese finally started two exchange ships, the Asama Maru in Yokohama and the Conte Verde in Shanghai. Passengers were mainly diplomatic personnel, but also many missionaries and some newspaper correspondents. The Asama Maru stopped at Hong Kong before reaching Saigon on July 3rd when we were put aboard. On July 4th we went back down the Saigon River to Cap St. Jacques where those who had been brought over from the Bangkok Legation also boarded. We then went on to Singapore to meet the Conte Verde with its passengers.

Q: This would be 1942.

HAMILTON: Yes. We couldn't go ashore and didn't dock in Singapore, but anchored out in the harbor for a day or two, on one of which the Japanese gave a military air display. From Singapore the ship was all lit up and marked. We were routed south through the Sunda Straits, and across the Indian Ocean into Lourenco Marques in Portuguese East Africa, or Mozambique, on July 23rd. We were saluted by sirens, streams of water and cheers from the many ships in the harbor.

The Japanese diplomats from the U.S. had arrived on the Gripsholm the day before and the exchange was made the following day. They left fairly promptly but it was about a week before the Gripsholm was ready to start back. Then it was still a long way around Cape Horn, over to Rio, and then up to New York, staying out of regular shipping lanes as much as possible. We finally sailed into New York harbor past the Statue of Liberty on August 25th.

Q: What did they do with you? Here you were obviously waiting for another assignment, but we were well into the war by this time. What happened?

HAMILTON: Well, when I got back here I resigned from the Department and found that although I was hardly an expert on Indochina, most people in Washington were less so. So I started spending half my week on Indochina with what was first the Board of Economic Warfare and then the Foreign Economic Administration, and the other half working also on Indochina in the Pentagon with G-2. Sometime in '44, I went back to the Department as desk officer for the Dominions except Canada in the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs. Soon after the UN conference in San Francisco in 1945 I became an assistant to the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs and later moved on to President Truman's Point-4 Program.

Q: I think with people who were fired when Stassen came in, the term was they were Stassenated. This interview covers the time particularly I wanted to pick up about Saigon which I found very, very interesting. I served in Saigon much later in '69-'70, and it was quite a different ball game. This was to give you an idea. I was Consul General in Saigon and I ranked just in the upper half of the diplomatic list. I don't think I talked to the ambassador more than once or twice. It was a huge embassy.

HAMILTON: The only other thing I mentioned in that letter I wrote you was fighting between Thailand and Indochina.

As indicated earlier today, the Japanese had established their control of Tonkin by September 1940. In November, military skirmishing broke out between Thai and French frontier forces on the Cambodian border, soon reaching the scale of undeclared war. The apparent immediate source of the situation was a Thai demand, which the French refused, for an adjustment of the frontier, particularly with regard to some islands in the Mekong River. Many people saw a connection between this development and the arrival of the Japanese in Indochina.

Any remaining French reserves were called up and put on the fighting line. At least in southern Indochina, the principal cities were blacked out at night and there was some air activity. Civilians were evacuated from some border towns and the inhabitants of the picturesque Burmese precious stone mining village of Pailin, just within Cambodia, abandoned their homes to return to Burma. It was still deserted when I visited the area in March 1941.

After about two months of relatively heavy military activity between the French and Thai forces in which the Thais were gaining, the Japanese Government offered to mediate. They called a conference aboard a Japanese cruiser at Saigon where an armistice was signed on January 28, 1941.

Under the final peace agreement signed in Tokyo on March 11, 1941 the French ceded to Thailand about one-tenth of the total area of Indochina. This was mostly in Cambodia, and included its richest province of Battambang but excluded the ancient Angkor ruins. I believe Thailand had to give up this territory at the end of World War II.

It was in the midst of the hostilities with Thailand that the internal native disturbances that I mentioned earlier occurred in parts of Cochinchina and to some extent in Tonkin. Their rather severe suppression and sending some of those rounded up to the Poulo Condore penal colony undoubtedly had a correspondingly unfortunate attitude and temper of many Vietnamese.

Q: I think you're adding some interesting areas that aren't covered; the Thais fighting essentially the French to take over part of Indochina, and also what happened to our Consulate in Saigon. Just to be clear, up in Hanoi, we had a Consulate General up there.

HAMILTON: Well, all we had was the political officer, Charles S. Reed, who was sent down from Shanghai, plus an American clerk, Iris Johnston. I don't think the British had anybody up there. The Japanese moved Mr. Reed around a good deal under harsher conditions than ours in Saigon. Then on June 18 he was brought to join us.

Mr. Reed had not really operated an office for the public. He was there to report and have direct contact with Admiral Decoux's office. This caused some problems for Miss Johnston. She was at liberty until January 29, 1942, but then the Japanese held her in solitary custody for two months during which she was severely questioned in an apparent effort to learn about Mr. Reed's sources of information. She was then allowed to go to the mountain resort of Da Lat in Annam because of her health, and was brought to join the rest of us in Saigon a few days before the Asama Maru's departure.

1. Outbreak of the War:

The Department has been informed of developments through December 6, 1941. On the morning of December 7 the Japanese military authorities completely closed off the Saigon airport which had hitherto been partially accessible to the public. By the same afternoon very few Japanese vessels were left in port. Between 2:00 a.m. and 3:00 a.m. December 8 a large formation of Japanese planes flew over the city. Later that morning the inhabitants of the city awoke to find notices posted in French, Chinese, and Annamite indicating that war had broken out between Japan and the United States.

2. Treatment of Consular Officers:

All consular officers, with the exception of a British Vice Consul, were roused from their beds and placed under custody by the Japanese military authorities about 3:00 a.m. December 8. In Saigon they were presented a mimeographed sheet giving the reasons for this action and outlining the conditions of the treatment to be expected. The American Consul had some slight contact with two French policemen stationed before his residence, but was soon cautioned not to speak to them. The American Vice Consul never saw any French official. The acting British Consul General was able to deal through a French liaison officer for about a day. When one of the British Vice Consuls reported to the acting Consul General at his residence about 9:00 a.m. December 8, he was taken into custody.

American consular officers were taken to the temporary quarters of the Consulate for a few minutes on the morning of December 8 while the office was given a preliminary search, their living quarters having been previously searched.

The two American consular officers in Saigon were held in their respective residences until December 11 when they were removed to the British consular residence. Here they remained quite comfortably until July 3, 1942 when they boarded the M.S. ASAMA MARU.

The American Consul in Hanoi was held for a time alone in a room of a building not far from the Hotel Metropole where he had resided. Later he was moved to a house furnished for him by the French Government General but where he was still under Japanese guard. Still later he was removed to the premises of the Standard Vacuum Oil Company in Haiphong; from there to a Japanese military camp on the outskirts of Haiphong; and from there to a private house in Haiphong. He received much harsher treatment than the officers in Saigon. Much of the time he was alone; the rest of the time the British Reuters correspondent was with him. On June 18, 1942 he was also transferred to the British consular residence in Saigon.

The British consular officer in Haiphong was at first confined with his family above the Hong Kong Shanghai Bank, but was soon removed to a small private house where he has remained with other British subjects in Haiphong. The men have been obliged to remain within the premises, but the women have been free to go into the city during the day. The French wife of one of the men actually boards with her family.

3. Treatment of American Consular Personnel Other Than Officers.

In Saigon American clerk Miss Carolyn C. Jacobs was not molested. She lived normally in her apartment and reported once weekly to the French police.

In Hanoi American Clerk Miss Iris Johnston was at liberty until January 29. She was then held in solitary custody for about two months when she was allowed to proceed to the hill station of Da Lat in southern Annam for reasons of health. She was subjected to severe questioning apparently with the primary object of obtaining information regarding the sources of information used by Consul Charles S. Reed II.

Other employees of the Consulate in Saigon have not been hampered in their movements. French Clerk Mme. Petra has been re-employed by the Swiss Consul, but other employees are finding it difficult to obtain new positions.

4. Treatment of Other American and British Nationals:

With the following exceptions American and British nationals in Southern Indochina have been at liberty and obliged merely to report to the French police once weekly. They have had to abandon commercial activity but have been able to carry on missionary work.

The exceptions are: (1) The American correspondent of the Associated Press was taken into custody on December 12 and brought to the British consular residence on December 13 to remain until July 3; (2) The British manager of the French Manufactures Indochinoises des Cigarettes, an employee of the British and American Tobacco Company, was held with the American Consul from the first; (3) All officers of the British banks in Saigon were held from December 8 to December 31; (4) The Canadian representative of the Singer Sewing Machine Company was held in jail under harsh treatment for 59 days from January 29; (5) A British accountant of the Standard Vacuum Oil Company was similarly held for about 68 days; (6) A British employee of the firm until recently known as Dreyfus and Cie. was similarly held; (7) A Filipino no longer entitled to the protection of the United States while abroad was held for a month and then turned over to the French on a charge of illegal possession of firearms. The object of the treatment given the three British subjects, as well as one Dutch subject not mentioned above, was to obtain information regarding the affairs of their firms and to break their spirit so that they would consent to work for the Japanese as one or two are now reported to be doing.

In northern Indochina the treatment given American and British nationals differed only in the fact that men have not been at liberty at all while women have been able to go shopping, et cetera during the day. A naturalized Philippine citizen of Swiss-American origin by the name of Corvissiano was picked up by the Japanese on January 29 and apparently held in much the same manner as those taken into custody in southern Indochina at that time. The British Reuters correspondent has been held from the first, part of the time alone, part of the time with the American Consul, and latterly with the other British in Haiphong.

5. Treatment of Chinese:

The Chinese Consul at Saigon, who had remained closely sheltered in a villa at the hill station of Da Lat for some time prior to the outbreak of war, is reported so far to have eluded the Japanese together with his subordinate officers. However, it is not positively known whether he managed to escape the country and, accordingly, the Japanese are holding three of the local clerks in jail until they give information regarding the consul's whereabouts. The treatment given these men is so severe that it is not believed they can long survive.

Other Chinese in Cholon (Saigon) are also harshly treated. They are picked up indiscriminately, imprisoned, and tortured until they consent to report weekly on anti-Japanese activities.

6. Treatment of Consular Establishments:

The American Consul in Saigon refused to open the consular safes, but on December 12 or 13 the Japanese Gendarmerie delivered to the consular officers their personal belongings which had been in the safes. Evidently the safes were forced open and the Japanese obtained the Brown and Grey codes, readings and copies of all telegrams, blank passports, and all confidential matter.

The Japanese always pretended to know nothing of any other regular office of the Consulate. Accordingly, the only other archives which they seem to have obtained were the current files. All other archives and most of the furniture were still in the office damaged by the bomb explosion on November 23. The Consulate's French clerk, Mme. Paulette Petra, managed to remove these to her home in the first day or two following the outbreak of war and is believed still to have them in her possession.

The Japanese also obtained consular files in Hanoi. The safe has been returned to the Swiss consular agent in Haiphong, but is believed to have been previously opened.

The British Consulate General in Saigon was taken over by the Japanese naval rather than military authorities. British officers have never been taken back to the office and do not know what action has been taken with regard to it. Since the British Vice Consul in Haiphong is an employee of the Chartered Bank, it is presumed that any documents he had were taken over with those of the bank.

7. Political and Military Developments:

A further Franco-Japanese agreement was signed on December 9, 1941, but its contents are not known. Somewhat later the Vichy Government appointed Governor General Jean Decoux as High Commissioner for all French possessions in the Pacific.

It is reliably reported that the French cruiser Lamotte Picquet has remained continually in French waters. The sloop Amiral Charner has probably so remained. Nothing is known regarding the movements of the single French submarine which was in Indochina and under repair on December 8 except that it has been repaired and was in Saigon on July 3.

It is reliably reported that much of the Japanese air offensive against the Allies in the early weeks of the Pacific war was directed from Indochina. The planes which bombed Manila are understood to have left from Nha Trang just north of Camranh Bay in Annam and those which bombed Singapore from Baclieu and Soctrang just south of the mouth of the Mekong in Cochinchina. In the early days of the war damaged planes were frequently seen to return to these points, often to crash before landing.

Most of the active planes have now left the Saigon area for unknown destinations, but there is every reason to believe that Saigon itself is being used as a repair base not only for planes but also for trucks and other mechanized equipment. It is definitely known, for instance, that the foundry belonging to the French firm of Faci (Forges, Ateliers, Chartiers Indochinois) and located about 300 yards up the Arroyo Chinois from the Saigon River is straightening propeller blades for the Japanese.

The Japanese have completed the 60 kilometers of railway between Mongkol Borey in the province of Battambang, formerly in Cambodia, and the Thai city of Muong Aran Pradhet thus linking Phnom Penh with Singapore by rail. They are now reported to be bringing their supplies and troops down the Chinese coast by vessel and through the channel between Hainan Island and the mainland to Haiphong. From Haiphong transportation is by rail to Saigon, by truck from Saigon to Phnom Penh, and by rail from Phnom Penh to points beyond in Thailand or Malaya. Thus the hazardous voyage down the Indochinese coast and across the Gulf of Siam is avoided.

It is probably because of this increased traffic that express shipments have been suspended on the Saigon-Hanoi-Haiphong railroad. The extra wear on equipment which cannot be replaced is also probably responsible for the increased number of wrecks which are occurring on the Indochinese railways.

It was reported on July 3 that the Japanese plan to move most of their troops from Indochina to other fronts, leaving only a police force of about 6,000 men. This would ameliorate conditions for the French considerably, but would not necessarily affect the transit of supplies through Indochina. Accordingly, the railway, which is extremely vulnerable at several points, particularly where it runs with the highway, would remain a worthwhile bombing objective. (1)

A Canadian artillery unit of about 1,000 men from Singapore, as well as Australian and Indian troops, has been in Saigon for some time as prisoners of war. The men are employed on the docks, in general throughout the port area, and at the airport. Their quarters except those of the Indians are in the port area about 200 yards from the river. Six have died; two have tried to escape -- with what results is not known. Their food is believed to be poor. A considerable group outside is working secretly to ameliorate their conditions. In this the Annamites took the initiative under the leadership of Dr. and Mrs. Tranh van Doc, 16 Boulevard de la Somme, Saigon, but there are also French working through several men in the Surete and Mme. Gaillard, the Vogue Dress Shop, Rue Catinat, Saigon. The Indians are quartered at Nhabe on the Soirap River 15 kilometers south of Saigon.

Practically all French merchant shipping has been taken over by the Japanese and now flies the Japanese flag. Most of the vessels have left Saigon and some are reported to have been damaged already. Efforts are being made by the Government General to locate the 850 men from their crews in shore positions in Indochina.

Allied submarines appear to be effective off the Indochinese coast, for the French now consider Saigon a dangerous port from which to sail.

The Allied bombings of the Hanoi airport are reported to have done considerable damage in spite of the offhand manner in which they were treated by the French press. At least one American pilot by the name of Bishop from California is now interned at Saigon.

Japanese participation in the administrative affairs of Indochina has increased since the beginning of the war. They censor the postal and telegraph services, using a French stamp, and listen to telephone conversations. On one occasion they even arrested the Director of Posts and Telegraphs and held him a few hours because one of his subordinates had interfered with one of their own telegraph lines. Later the director was replaced.

The Japanese seem particularly anxious to take over the administration of justice. To prevent their having any excuse for doing so the French are becoming increasingly severe in law enforcement, generally convicting and inflicting heavy penalties, particularly on Europeans.

There is good reason to believe that the Japanese are compiling evidence for a "White Book" or some such document to be issued in justification of their action when they are ready openly to take over the administration of Indochina. The basis of this book is apparently to be an exposure of French morals; for, in the questioning to which they have subjected many persons this has been one of the principal points on which they have endeavored to obtain statements.

It also appears that the Japanese may be trying to gain influence with certain sections of the population by selling them drugs in much the same manner they adopted in North China. The French opium monopoly is short of opium and the Japanese have brought some heroin and cocaine into the country. The French are reported to have increased the area devoted to poppy cultivation in Laos, but the crop is not yet ready. In this connection it is also reliably reported that opium smoking has increased greatly in Hanoi since the outbreak of war, particularly among the women who have lost hope of returning to France.

8. Economic Developments

Economic conditions in French Indochina have steadily deteriorated since December 8, 1941. Business activity is negligible. Supplies of all imported products are extremely low or have already been exhausted. What remains is generally strictly rationed. Wheat flour was exhausted within a few weeks after the outbreak of war; butter and margarine can no longer be purchased except occasionally on the black market; potatoes are a rarity; medical supplies are very low; wines are exhausted and liquors practically so; chemicals for the manufacture of matches are deficient; lubricating oils have to be cleaned and re-cleaned because fresh oil is lacking; iron and steel for construction purposes can scarcely be had; and machinery is not obtainable. Even supplies of some domestic products such as fruit, charcoal, fish, and vegetables are inadequate, primarily because they are bought up by the Japanese. Milk supplies are exceedingly low. What canned milk remains is reserved solely for infants and the sick. All fresh milk in the Saigon area is now being pasteurized for the same purposes, but it is doubtful whether it will be adequate for the need.

Although the Government General endeavors to prevent profiteering and to control prices, it does not try to maintain prices at any given point. Accordingly, both prices and the cost of living have greatly increased since December 8, 1941.

The Government General has also intensified its efforts, begun some time ago, to encourage the development of substitutes for deficient commodities. Thus, a relatively satisfactory flour is now made from a mixture of 70 percent rice and 30 percent maize flour. The production of oil from peanuts, castor beans, coconuts, fish, and millions of rats caught in the rice fields has greatly increased and is used for illumination, other household purposes, and industrial fuel. Soya bean milk, certain toilet articles such as powder, and food side-lines such as jams and jellies and some alcoholic beverages are also being produced. The production of industrial alcohol, principally from rice, for motor fuel has been further increased, but it is now being mixed with 10 percent water according to the Swiss Consul in Saigon. This has probably become necessary because the Japanese are known to be using alcohol and charcoal in some of their trucks.

The Government General has also established an agricultural credit society organized on a sectional basis to foster the production of various crops in different regions throughout the country, to lend money for this purpose, and to purchase the resulting output.

Even fewer supplies than before the war are arriving from Japan, although the higher prices keep goods in the stores longer. Some shipments reported to have left Japan have never arrived, and one cargo of milk is said definitely to have been sunk.

The 1941-1942 rice crop is reported to have been good and the maize crop poor. Further details are not available, but a good rice crop is one which would provide about 1.5 million tons for export after domestic consumption had been provided for in all the territory formerly belonging to Indochina. Without the Cambodian province of Battambang ceded to Thailand in 1941 a good exportable surplus would be about 150,000 tons less. All rice exports are going to Japan, or Japanese occupied areas. It seems probable that much of it goes by rail to Haiphong and only from there by the empty vessels which have brought military supplies.

It is understood that most of the rubber is being stored for the time being.

The financial position of the Government General of Indochina probably deteriorated further during the first seven months of the war, but may not be as bad as might at first be supposed. On the one hand charges incurred on behalf of the Japanese army continued; revenue from import and export duties was low and, as from July 1, the Government General assumed the payment to landlords of the rent due on premises which had been requisitioned and which continue to be requisitioned for the Japanese and on which the Japanese seldom pay more than a month's rent. On the other hand large sums of money normally sent to France, particularly by business firms, have remained in Indochina; payments due abroad for imports are negligible; and taxes have been increased either through raising the rates, lowering the exemptions, or both.

9. Axis Propaganda:

Two types of propaganda are being conducted in Indochina; the Japanese in favor of themselves and co-property for all Asiatics in a greater Asia, and the French in behalf of French administration in general and the Vichy government in particular.

The Japanese propaganda consists principally in showing Japanese motion pictures, news reels of the war, and educational films; staging exhibitions of Japanese art, particularly painting; bringing dramatic and other artists from Japan; distributing pamphlets and other literature; and publishing a large illustrated weekly newspaper. The Japanese also allow nothing derogatory of themselves or especially favorable to the Allies to appear in the French or vernacular press or to go over the radio. The French press, in fact, features Domei despatches and for the most part prints its selected Allied despatches in the final page. It is doubtful whether this Japanese propaganda is effective.

French propaganda features motion picture films and the publication in various forms of material on the achievements of France in Indochina. A fair which served this purpose was held in Hanoi in December 1941 and another is to be held in Saigon in December of this year. Every effort is being made to make the natives believe that the French still control the country, while social and other functions are staged to convince the natives of the French interest in them and of the cordial relations which have existed between the two peoples.

French propaganda is directed both towards the natives and toward the French and, in accordance with the Nazi-Vichy stress on youth, special emphasis is being laid on youth organizations and the value of sports for both the French and native young people. Numerous youth demonstrations and sporting spectacles have been staged. Summer camps are being developed, a youth code has been drawn up, uniforms designed, and the responsibilities of youth stressed. The immediate response to this type of propaganda is strong, particularly among the natives who love spectacles, but how effective it will actually prove to be cannot yet be told.

Pictures, posters, quotations from, and laudatory statements regarding Marshal Petain are to be found everywhere. The French Legion, composed principally of small business men, clerks, mechanics, and low salaried government employees, is striving ever harder to set itself up as the leader of French life and chief interpreter of the Vichy code. The press and radio are extremely critical of the democracies and frequently violently anti-Ally, yet they seldom are positively pro-Axis.

It is doubtful whether French propaganda has been very effective except in its anti-British aspects, which have featured it since June 1940, and in the immediate response to its youth program.

10. Attitude of the French and Annamites:

So far as is known the Government General never made any attempt, at least in southern Indochina, to assist or communicate with American consular officers after the outbreak of war, although on March 23 the Japanese Consul called because, he said, the Governor General wished information regarding the welfare of consular officers and the conditions of their internment.

There were always two policemen, usually Annamite, stationed opposite the house in which the consular officers were interned, but their object appeared to be more to note those who made friendly signs to the internees or attempted to communicate with them than to guard them in any way. On one occasion in particular the Consulate's French clerk, Mme. Petra, came to the fence, and the next day, when she was out, the French police questioned her two young daughters in an effort to ascertain why she had called.

In this connection there is now reported to be an extensive Gestapo organization in Indochina particularly designed to detect those who express pro-Allied sentiments. Persons have on occasion been reported by their servants, and even in small private gatherings people are extremely careful in expressing opinions. In the early days of the war friends of British and American citizens were generally careful not to show undue friendliness or interest in their fate for fear of the possible consequences and, since that time, the French authorities have let it be known that it was not advisable to be seen in the vicinity of the British consular residence.

Nevertheless, British and American consular officers never observed any signs of hostility among the many persons who passed the house daily, nor on the several occasions when sporting or other events brought considerable crowds before the house. A competent observer who had had an opportunity to question many people since the outbreak of war has reached the conclusion that the French in Indochina may be divided into four groups: (1) 20 percent who are totally pro-Ally, (2) 20 percent who are pro-American but anti-British, (3) 20 percent who are totally indifferent as long as their own immediate welfare is not in question, and (4) 40 percent who are pro-Petain and the majority of whom are wholly pro-Axis. The pro-Ally group is predominantly commercial and the pro-Axis group predominantly governmental.

The majority of the native population is undoubtedly indifferent to the political aspects of the present struggle. Nevertheless, there is an appreciable group of upper class Annamites, particularly those who had relatives working for British or American interests -- some of whom have been interned by the Japanese because of "disloyalty" -- which is strongly anti-Japanese. There is also a lower class group which is anti-Japanese because the Japanese have made it difficult for them to obtain their normal articles of food and because the Japanese treat hired labor harshly and pay poorly.

(1) In this connection the following data is given regarding the most vulnerable points on the railway and highway between Haiphong and Saigon, proceeding from Haiphong to Hanoi and south to Saigon: leaving Haiphong there is one railway bridge and one small highway bridge. About 15 kilometers east of Haiphong, there is an important combined railway and highway bridge. Entering Hanoi there is an important railway and highway bridge which is 1.7 kilometers long. South of Hanoi there is a small but important railway and highway bridge 6 kilometers north of Thanh-Hoa. Immediately south of Vinh (at Benthuy) there is a large railway bridge where road traffic uses a ferry. A few kilometers south of Dong Hoi there is a railway bridge where road traffic again uses a ferry. Just north of Quang Tri there is an important railway and highway bridge. At Hue there is a railway bridge slightly west of the city and a highway bridge in it. At the Col des Nuages about 65 kilometers south of Hue the railway and highway run together along the cliffs, the railway under the highway in about three tunnels. At Quang Ngai there is one railway and one highway bridge. At Cap Varella the railway and highway run along the cliffs, the railway below the highway in the Baxbonneau tunnel. This is perhaps the most vulnerable spot in the whole line, since repair would probably be the most troublesome. It was the last section of the railway to be built and caused the French the greatest difficulty. One and a half kilometers south of Tyhoa and 128.5 kilometers north of Nha Trang a steel railway bridge runs close beside a concrete highway bridge. Each has long spans and both would be vulnerable to a single powerful bomb. Between Bien Hoa and Saigon about 5 kilometers south of Bien Hoa are two important combined railway and highway bridges about half a mile apart.

On the highway between Saigon and Phnom Penh there is one concrete bridge about 120 meters long about 85 kilometers west of Saigon and another similar bridge about five kilometers east of Phnom Penh.

Other possible bombing objectives outside of Haiphong, Hanoi, and Saigon are: a distillery 10 kilometers south of Hanoi on the Mandarin Road to Nam Dinh; a distillery near the railway and highway bridge at Than Hoa, and the railroad yards at Vinh which is more important than Saigon as a repair center.

ALBERT STOFFEL
Vice Consul
Saigon (1946-1948)

Albert Stoffel was raised in Rochester, New York. He graduated from the University of Rochester in 1938 with a degree in economics. In 1941, he entered the Royal Air Force Civilian Technical Corps in England. After several months there, he decided to return to the U.S. and join the Air Force as an aviation cadet. While in the service, he decided to take the Foreign Service Exam. He has also served in Canada, Germany, and France. He was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on May 9, 1994.

Q: Very interesting, because I don't think there are many of our colleagues who had the experience you did, with the RAF, before the war.

Now your first assignment in the Foreign Service was to Saigon, in French Indochina. A city which has become famous since that time. Can you describe what Saigon was like physically when you arrived there in early 1947.

STOFFEL: As you perhaps know, Saigon had been known as the Paris of the East, before World War II. It still had elements of that atmosphere after World War II. The living was good, the social life was active, the French were in reasonable control. It was fairly typical, I think, of certain Foreign Service posts at that time.

I was the second Foreign Service Officer to arrive in Saigon after World War II. My chief was Charles S. Reed, an old-time Foreign Service Officer, in every sense of the word. He did the political work and I did the economic work. That sort of set my career throughout the Foreign Service. I was either on the economic side or, eventually, involved in aviation diplomacy.

Q: Was Saigon at that time a Consulate General? Or was that under Embassy Paris in any way?

STOFFEL: We were a Consulate General of a French colony. However, I don't recall that we had any direct connection with our Paris embassy. We did get guidance from the office of Southeast Asian Affairs in State.

Q: At that time, was there not a consulate in Hanoi?

STOFFEL: Yes.

Q: Did you have links with them?

STOFFEL: To a degree, yes. But because of the poor connections between the two places, we didn't travel there. There were occasional courier runs.

Q: Were the French suspicious of our motives at that time in Indochina?

STOFFEL: They were. For example, later, when I'd been transferred to Paris in 1955 I discovered that two Americans, myself and Laurie Gordon, an oil company director in Saigon, who had earlier served with the OSS in Southern China and Northern Vietnam, had been named in, I believe it was, the National Assembly as spies. The suspicious work that I was doing, according to this allegation, was preparing World Trade Directory Reports for the Department of Commerce.

Q: Very suspicious work I would say.

Did we have any line to the Viet Minh at the time?

STOFFEL: One month after I arrived Mr. Reed went on leave and left me in-charge. At that point, within the first or second day that I was in-charge, a representative, who purported to be from Ho Chi Minh, came to the consulate to talk about Ho Chi Minh's political intentions. Cooperation with the French, of course, had already broken down on December 19, 1946. Next he would go to the Americans. Finally, only reluctantly, according to this story, would he go to the Soviets for support.

Q: Was there any confidence among the people, in the Consulate General, that the French could suppress the revolt?

STOFFEL: At that point yes. Security was fairly good in Saigon. Beyond the city proper there was a lot of unrest. We lived on the edge of the city. Every night my wife and I would play cards with a loaded 38 caliber pistol lying between us, because there was no protection from hand grenades or shots through the barred windows. When bullets would start coming through the garden, we would then raise a large American flag on the front porch. However, we never had to use our gun and we got fairly used to the sporadic shooting.

On one occasion coming home from dinner, as we turned a corner in my convertible Peugeot with the top down, something hit the car right under my left elbow. It turned out to be a poor quality hand grenade that didn't explode, fortunately, until it hit the ground and only put two small holes in the car. I just took off, not waiting to see what might follow.

Q: I can understand. Do you have any unusual experiences in your line of work there?

STOFFEL: Yes. Shortly after my arrival, we got a report that an American airplane had been found in Saigon harbor, in connection of the clearing of wrecks from that harbor. I was designated by the Consul General to go out in a small native canoe with a native diver and see what he would bring up.

He started out by bringing up 2 skulls, other bones and eventually 2 dogtags and a silk map of the area (which our military fliers carried at that time) to aid escape. We also recovered some other items from the cockpit of what turned out to be a U.S. navy TBM, a dive bomber, that apparently had been shot down about 2 years earlier before while strafing ships in the harbor.

At that time the consulate didn't have any funds for this purpose, so I had to pay for the diver and for the removal of the airplane. Sometime later, a U.S. Navy grave registration team arrived. They laid out the bones on the floor of my office and showed me that I, in effect, had 3 skeletons. They also reimbursed me for these funds. Letters from two of the families thanked me for personal items and especially for the fact that the relatives now knew that their loved ones had, at least, not suffered capture or a lingering death.

OSCAR VANCE ARMSTRONG
Chinese Language Officer
Saigon (1950)

Oscar Vance Armstrong was born in China of American parents. He entered the Foreign Service in 1946 and initially served in China. He had a short tour in Vietnam in 1950. A Chinese language specialist, his career was mainly in Asia. He was interviewed in 1991 by Willis Armstrong.

ARMSTRONG: I came back on home leave and then had a temporary assignment to Saigon. They wanted a Chinese language officer and the person who was assigned there wasn't going to arrive for some months so I had about four months in Saigon. This was back, of course, during the French involvement.

Q: Still French territory. This was a consulate.

ARMSTRONG: No. It became...I am not sure I am going to get my chronology right...we had an ambassador there, Ambassador Heath.

Q: I guess that was about when Vietnam had been set up, about 1950.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, this was 1950. That is about right. So I had about four months there.

Q: What was your impression of Saigon in those days?

ARMSTRONG: In Saigon, itself, it was not like Saigon of the late '60s and early '70s during our time there, because life went on fairly normally. There were limitations of travel. I did get up to Hanoi, but I did it by air, not by road. This was still some years away from Dienbienphu.

Q: Dienbienphu was 1954. So this was before the French power had really been broken.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, that is right. The French presence was still very strong. I was there for a sort of China watch. Watching the Chinese population, etc. There was also a large contingent of Chinese Nationalist soldiers that had retreated there and been interned there. My main contact with local officialdom was with the French civilian officer who was their man dealing with Chinese affairs.

Q: Basically an intelligence operation.

ARMSTRONG: Not intelligence in the normal sense. It was one more of trying to figure out the mood of the Chinese population and what their role was in Vietnam, etc. I wasn't there long enough to become very knowledgeable about the situation.

JOHN F. MELBY
City Unspecified, Vietnam (1950)

John F. Melby was born in Iowa in 1913. He joined the Foreign Service in 1937 and served in Mexico, Venezuela, the Soviet Union, China, and Washington, DC. A victim of McCarthyism, he left the Service in 1953. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: I inadvertently forgot to ask Mr. Melby some questions about an important phase in his later times with the State Department. Mr. Melby, we didn't cover a trip you made to Vietnam. Could you tell when and what were the circumstances?

MELBY: Well, the French had been asking for military assistance, as they always were. And the government had been sort of stand-offish on the question of whether we should get involved. This was 1949. And even before then, we had an OSS mission in there with Ho Chi Minh, which was very close to him. And they were bringing out a lot of good information, as well as they were actually helping Ho Chi Minh in the war against Japan.

But even so, as soon as the war was over, the anti-communist forces in Washington started mustering strength. The whole bit with Ho Chi Minh came to nothing in the end. The mission was withdrawn. And we sort of were taking a position of supporting Bao Dai as the emperor, but not really getting involved. And General Marshall, the Secretary of State, didn't much want to be involved either. However, there came the development as to whether we -- when we got formal requests for aid for Indochina -- because it wasn't Vietnam then. There was a split in the Department between the Bureau for Far Eastern Affairs and Bureau for European Affairs. Europe, of course, wanted to give the French anything they wanted. And the Far East was adamantly opposed to becoming involved at all. After all, we were still smarting from the whole China debacle, where we knew we had a lot of lessons to learn. It was pretty uncertain whether we had to learn, really, most of them. Any of them!

So we just simply were not prepared to become involved in Vietnam, to which was added the fact that there was no Vietnamese experience in the Department. There was nobody who spoke Vietnamese. In fact, in the United States there was nobody who knew any Vietnamese. Of course, that would change over the years. But at this time, we literally didn't know what we would be getting into. But this didn't seem to bother Europe. You didn't have to know anything about Asia.

Q: When you say, "This didn't bother Europe," these were the people who were in the EUR Bureau. In the Department of State.

MELBY: Yes. That's right. After all, if you knew France and French, that was enough. You didn't have to bother knowing anything about Asia. After all, they were the lesser breed without the pale, you know.

Well, the squabbling finally reached the Secretary, who took the matter to the President for a decision. And as was usually the case in those days, FE lost. And Mr. Truman signed an executive order saying that the United States was prepared to aid the French in their war against the Viet Minh -- it wasn't the Viet Cong then; it was the Viet Minh -- and he instructed the Department to put together a joint State-Defense military mission to go out there. Survey the situation, make recommendations as to the specific kinds of military aid that the French wanted and needed in that area.

In the end, I drew the assignment. I was pretty junior at this time. But, partly I got it, I guess, because of my China experience. They thought that might be helpful in analyzing what was going on in Vietnam. Partly it was that nobody who outranked me wanted to go at all, anyway. So that I went out as the chief of mission and my deputy was a lieutenant general of Marines. He was Bobby Erskine, which posed a few protocol problems in the beginning. Because the pentagon took a very dim view of a Foreign Service officer of my rank. I was class 3 at this time.

MELBY: After I came back from there, I was promoted to class 2. I went up very fast in the Service, as a matter of fact.

We put together this mission. And I realized that -- when we started right out as we left from San Diego -- that I was going to have to have it out with the general and reach some sort of understanding. So we withdrew to our private compartment up front on the plane. We had our own plane. And Bobby and I battled it out and reached an understanding, and from then on, there was absolutely no problem. He and I became great friends and colleagues. Even in the troubled times, Erskine came to my support when I was having security problems. So the mission, from that standpoint, was a great success. It worked very well. When we arrived out there, it was ostensibly a military mission to Southeast Asia, but the real point was Vietnam. Let's face it, the whole thing was a cover. And we actually did go to every country in Southeast Asia, except Burma, which wouldn't let us in.

And, the job on the working level, I had a staff of about 20 officers with me, plus a couple from ECA and some people in the State Department. So it was a good big group. But at that level, they worked with their French opposite numbers very well. And actually, in three weeks, we really had everything that we needed to have in the way of information.

One of the things that we found we had to do was that the quality of intelligence that we were getting out of the area was so poor that we simply had to do it all ourselves.

Q: But why was the quality poor?

MELBY: Because the intelligence officers there -- Army, Navy, and so on -- all the attachés were incompetent.

Q: It was sort of a backwater to which we sent backwater people?

MELBY: That's right. And just one example, it was in Bangkok. I was trying to locate one of the dissident Kuomintang generals who had taken refuge in northern Thailand with a very sizable number of Kuomintang army troops. So I asked the military attaché where this man was and he said, "Well, he's up north now." I then, later on, asked the Marine Corps attaché -- who was also the Naval attaché -- if he knew. And he said, "Oh, no, he's over here," someplace else. And I asked a third attaché, and he gave me another answer. I said, "Well, that's fine. That's what I wanted to know." Because I'd had lunch that same day with this particular general in Bangkok. But they didn't even know that. This was the kind of intelligence that we were getting out of the area.

And we then proceeded from Saigon, where we spent three weeks.

Q: Saigon? Rather than Hanoi?

MELBY: The French headquarters were in Saigon. Everything was located in Saigon. The governor general was there, the commanding general of the French forces. They were all based in Saigon.

I went to Hanoi, which was a very charming, kind of French provincial sort of city.

From Saigon, we then stopped off in the Philippines, en route. But we went back to the Philippines because we had a pretty active military program there. And then we went on to Singapore, where the British were very anxious that we make a contribution to their guerrilla warfare against the Chinese dissidents there in Malaysia.

The headquarters for the Malaysian Federation was in Singapore, when McDonald was the High Commissioner for Southeast Asia. But Washington wasn't disposed to do anything for Malaysia, because Malaysia was the biggest dollar-earner in the British commonwealth. Therefore, the British presumably had the dollar exchange to buy their own equipment for Malaysia. But we had a nice time in Singapore. And McDonald was a very cordial guy.

From there we went to Indonesia. And then back to Thailand. Thailand was a place where, unfortunately, we stayed too long. We sort of wore out our welcome a little bit. Ed Stanton was ambassador there, who disapproved of the mission, to begin with. We were just there too long. Not only was the embassy fed up with having us around, but even the Thais were beginning to get a little bored with us, too. We were there almost a month.

Q: What were you doing?

MELBY: It ended up, we were providing as much military hardware for the Thai Army and Navy and Air Force as we were for Vietnam.

Q: You were looking at the Thai requirements and sending recommendations? And seeing whether it made sense to continue it or not?

MELBY: Yes.

Q: How did the ambassador take this?

MELBY: He was opposed to it entirely.

Q: Was he opposed to our sending military equipment to Thailand? And your mission said yes, to do it?

MELBY: Yes.

Q: Why was the difference? What was the issue?

MELBY: The Pentagon decided that we were going to equip the Thai forces.

Q: Why didn't the ambassador want it? Usually ambassadors like to hand over things if they can.

MELBY: Ed Stanton was a China language officer. He had gone through the whole China bit, and he thought it was a waste of money and time. There wasn't any point in arming one faction in Thailand to fight another faction in another coup d'état, that we ought to keep our hands out of Thai politics.

Q: So there was not a matter of looking upon building this up as a bulwark against communism, as much as giving them weapons? You didn't feel that, without weapons, there was an immediate threat that might take over?

MELBY: Not an immediate threat in Thailand, no. The Thai armed services were a pretty competent bunch, incidentally. And the police, which had its own army, they were the most impressive military forces we saw in Southeast Asia.

Q: So you didn't feel that there was an imminent danger in Thailand. Were you under pressure from Washington to approve the sale of arms to Thailand, to keep a foot in the door? Was there a reason why?

MELBY: It was contingency aid, really. In case things went sour in Vietnam. And as it worked out over the years, there were big American bases in Thailand. About half of southern Thailand was one huge American Air Force base. And an awful lot of secret operations, bombing raids, were conducted out of Thailand.

Q: So contingency actually paid off.

MELBY: From that standpoint, yes, if you thought the war in Vietnam was worthwhile. Of course, I didn't.

Q: Let's go to your report on Vietnam. What did you see?

MELBY: The working stiffs got along fine with their French counterparts. We had trouble at the top, between me and Don Heath, who was the minister.

Q: He was my ambassador for a little while in Saudi Arabia, a long time ago.

MELBY: Well, Don was new to Southeast Asia, but I must say, he was trying to learn Vietnamese, which nobody else in the embassy was doing. And the French high commissioner and the commanding general of the French forces. And we just didn't see eye to eye on what was going on. Because my whole reaction -- and it didn't take more than a couple of weeks -- was that we were getting ourselves involved in something that we were totally without expertise to handle. We didn't know what we would be getting into. We didn't have anybody who really knew anything about Vietnam or what it was.

Q: You weren't saying, "This is a lost situation." The main thing is, we just don't know, and let's not go into something unless we know what it is.

MELBY: It isn't a question, "We don't know," but that what we do know is, "We're going to lose." Don Heath and I just disagreed because he'd been sort of taken into camp by the French. I made my report; I cabled it back to Washington -- and you could still do this. I cleared it with him, and he filed his dissent with it. And he cleared it with me. This was the kind of situation that didn't last very long, you know, as we got into the McCarthy period. But officers still did trust each other. And I just said, "We're getting ourselves into a totally untenable situation. It's all very well to say that this is step one. We go this far and no farther. Because it doesn't work that way. If step one doesn't work, then you've got to take step two. And it goes on and on. And once you become committed, there's no backing out, and we're just headed for disaster."

Q: Did you have a feeling, looking back on this with some objectivity, Heath had been ambassador before that in Bulgaria and had been kicked out of there. But anyway, he was a European hand more than not. You came out of, particularly your China experience, where you saw a very successful movement taking place. And I think all of us are traumatized by things that we have seen. Do you think that maybe it was because you were coming from two different perspectives of how things worked in the world? You saw that unless you had a very strong government, for instance, you saw that the communists had something going for them in Asia. And there wasn't much to stop them.

MELBY: The communists had something going for them because they had a nationalist appeal. They were first nationalists and second communists.

Yes. I was convinced that the French were going to lose, because they, too, never understood Asia or Asians. And they were conducting a positional warfare against a guerrilla army and they had no more chance of winning than Chiang Kai-shek had at winning against the communists. Because you're dealing with a situation in which conventional warfare just simply doesn't work.

Don Heath, of course, I think he was just taken in by the French. Ed Gullion was there. He was Counselor. Ed and I were classmates in the Service. Although Ed didn't say very much, I happen to know from talks I had with him that he thought we were making a mistake in becoming involved, too. Ed would later change his mind on a lot of things. But he hadn't done so yet.

My recommendation back to the Department was, "Please pass this on. Ask the President to reconsider his decision to go ahead and help the French."

Q: How about General Erskine?

MELBY: Erskine was of two minds. Being a Marine Corps general, force was always the answer. But on the other hand, Bobby was not without his insights. And he would say to me, "In the end, this has to be a political solution here. Anything we do militarily is only a holding operation. There has to be a political and economic solution to this whole question of Vietnam." So Erskine was basically backing up my position.

Q: What happened when you made this report?

MELBY: What happened was, I asked that the President read my report and reconsider. But you have to remember the time and the context, because I never got an answer out of it. You've got to remember that this was the summer of 1950. And Washington was just overwhelmed with the Korean War.

Q: June 25, 1950 was the invasion of North Korea into South Korea. And of course, we were thinking them in terms of stopping the communists wherever they were on the march.

MELBY: Yes, but nobody was thinking of Vietnam one way or the other. Before the Korean invasion ever started, mind you. On Vietnam, the President had decided as far back as February. This was based on NSC-68, that we were going to rearm the world. So any recommendations that I made, they were noted and nothing happened.

Q: You were mentioning to me yesterday that you had also sent something in about our intelligence operations.

MELBY: Rusk, the Assistant Secretary for the Far East, had asked me on the side to do an evaluation of our intelligence operations in Southeast Asia and send the report to him, because he'd been in intelligence on the Far East in the pentagon. Which I did. And it was a pretty strong statement that I made. Maybe I just stated it more strongly than it was, at least politically-wise. Because my comment was that the quality of our intelligence is so bad that it approaches malfeasance in office, and something had to be done.

And this, of course, though it was just for Rusk and Bill Lacey -- who was head of the Bureau for Southeast Asian Affairs -- eyes-alone for them, got circulated all over the government. It was a slip that happened in the code room someplace, I never knew just exactly where. And this is the way it came to Bedell Smith's attention. Bedell Smith was director of CIA. And Bedell was livid.

Finally one day, after I got back, Acheson called me in and said I'd better make an appointment to go over and see Bedell Smith and try to quiet him down because, "He's out to get you." Which I did, and it didn't get me anywhere. Bedell Smith wasn't buying it.

Q: What was his reaction when you saw him?

MELBY: "What do you know about intelligence, young man? Who are you to criticize intelligence?" If there was any satisfaction in it, incidentally, it was that within three months of my return from Southeast Asia, every intelligence officer in the entire area was replaced, including all the CIA operators, too. There was a whole new crew sent out. Not only CIA, but all the attachés were changed. So what it was worth, I don't know.

Q: Once again, I want to thank you very much for this. You were at interesting places at interesting times!

MELBY: Well, one of the little sidelights on the thing was, when I was over with Bedell Smith, Alan Dulles was over there. He was then Deputy Director of the CIA. He just sat in the corner and didn't say anything or participate in the conversation at all. He was just present.

The phone rang. And from the conversation, I could tell that the man who was calling Smith was the head of G-2, a major general, who was also livid. He'd seen the telegram on intelligence. And Bedell was trying to calm him down. He was saying, "Don't get excited now. We'll take care of it. We'll investigate this young man and find out what goes on."

CHARLOTTE LORIS
Clerk
Saigon (1950-1952)

Charlotte Loris was born in 1924 in Pennsylvania. She joined USIA in 1950 and served in Vietnam, Japan, Libya, Zaire, Indonesia, Korea, Switzerland, and Washington, DC. She was interviewed in 1989 by Max Kraus.

LORIS: This is the end of 1949, beginning of 1950. So I went back to Washington and got socked into the red tape, getting ready to go overseas and they said it would take months and months to have a security clearance, all of this. But actually three months later I left on an Air France plane for Paris and Saigon, which was located in what was then French Indochina. I was to replace a girl who had been murdered, an American girl.

Q: Had been murdered? In Saigon?

LORIS: She and a friend were entertaining and they were having a party and they went out to pick somebody up. They never solved it. They apparently were ambushed in their jeep.

Anyway, I arrived in Saigon -- .

Q: Just a minute. Before you arrived in Saigon, didn't that give you some pause about taking the kind of job that you -- .

LORIS: No, I wanted adventure.

Q: All right. So you arrived in Saigon when?

LORIS: Let me backtrack just a brief bit.

Q: Okay.

LORIS: I was assigned to Saigon. In those days you had a choice; I could have gone to Munich or to Rio or Saigon. Having always wanted to go to the Orient, to China, I picked Saigon. And they grabbed me with their arms, aha, we have one. So I went through the preparation and then went over to get my medical shots for old Saigon, which was still a French colony. While sitting in the Naval Department barracks waiting to get my shots, they asked me where I was going and I said Saigon. Well, this man came up to me and said, "Did I hear you say you were going to Saigon?" I said, "Yes." And this man said, "Well, I'm going to be the new American consul in Hanoi." Well, in those days, American consul, what's that? Hanoi? Where's that?

So we chatted a bit. I was going out to Saigon as a clerk, class FSS-13, I think it was, that paid $2,850 a year. But all your transportation was paid. So this very kindly gentleman, who sort of walked like a penguin, gave me his name, which was Wendall Blanke. He asked me when I was leaving and I said I was going up to New York for a few days and then to Paris where I would be spending three days and then I was booked for a flight from Paris to Saigon. He said, "I will meet you at the airport in Paris and buy you a drink." I thought, this is great, what a way to go. So I had an exciting trip from New York to Paris but I won't go into detail on it.

On the day I came to leave Paris I went to the airport and was checked in. I sat down at a bench, because it wasn't a fancy airport in those days, and this man sort of walked up to me, waddling like a penguin, sat down beside me. No cocktail lounge. He pulls out a flask and we have a drink of brandy from the flask, which I had never had before.

Q: So he did make good on the offer of a drink in Paris.

LORIS: Yes, he bought me a drink out of his flask.

Q: And that was Wendall Blanke.

LORIS: It was Wendall Blanke. Then we get on this little DC-3 plane -- we didn't have jets in those days -- and we flew across France and into Tunis, Morocco, Algiers. The plane, except for Wendall and myself, was loaded with French Foreign Legionnaires going to French Indochina to help the French.

So we're on this plane and we're leaving Tunis and I said, Wendall -- he's sitting next to me -- there's something wrong with this plane. And about that time the pilot announces, we've lost an engine. It's a two-engine plane. So we went back to Tunis and stayed a few days. They flew down a new engine from Paris. We took off again and went via North Africa to Cairo, one of the stops. Cairo was an all-day stop and it was Easter Sunday. It was hot, sticky, with no air conditioning. I had with me an Agatha Christie mystery book, which I read three times in the airport, and drank hot citronade with flies sitting on the rim of the glass. We finally --

Q: What?

LORIS: Flies.

Q: No, what did you drink?

LORIS: Citronade. Without gin or vodka, just plain citronade. Sticky stuff. And flies swarming around. Finally we take off and we go via Burma and what have you. We finally get to Saigon and it was three days later, four. But remember, this was a DC-3.

Q: All the way on a DC-3 from Paris to Saigon.

LORIS: Greatest plane ever made.

Q: I know.

LORIS: They're still flying.

Q: I know.

LORIS: So we finally arrived in Saigon in the morning and it's hot and sticky. We get off the plane and this young man comes out and he says, "are you Charlotte Loris." And I said, "yes." He said, "well, I'm here to meet you." I said, "oh, well, there's another gentleman with me." He said, "Who?" I said, "Wendall Blanke." He said, "Oh, my God, the new consul for Hanoi." And nobody was there to meet him. But we pile in the jeep together and go into Saigon to this funny little consulate general. Sticky and hot. But that's the way Wendall and I arrived in town.

Then I was taken up -- I dropped my bags off, they took me into the consulate general and Ed Gullion was the chargé d'affaires.

Q: And that was approximately what date?

LORIS: About April 2nd, 1950.

Q: 1950. So you are in Saigon -- .

LORIS: And I'm at the consulate general. We go up these little stairs and we arrive in this small office and go into this bigger office where Ed Gullion was charge. And there sits my friend, Wendall Blanke. So Ed Gullion says, "Oh, Wendall, I would like you to meet our new clerk-typist, Charlotte." He said, "Meet her? I've slept with her on a plane for three nights." Great hilarity. Anyway, Wendall and Ed and I were friends from then on.

Then I was in Saigon, oh, about two weeks, assigned to the information division where the peripatetic Francis Cunningham was the PAO, a State Department man. There weren't many people in Saigon and I think I was the only female that knew shorthand. So I'm sitting at my desk about two weeks after I'm there and a car comes and they said, "are you ready to go, Miss Loris?" I said, "Go where?" "Oh, you're taking the minutes of the meeting." "What meeting?" So I grabbed a couple of shorthand notebooks and a bunch of pencils. Now remember, our offices were not air conditioned and it was sticky hot. So Francis Cunningham says, "Charlotte, you have been elected to take the notes of this meeting." So he takes me downstairs and bundles me into this small car which we had in those days. And it's a meeting of the French High Militaire and the Commandant and the High Commissioner, an American military group and high Vietnamese officials to discuss the French Indochina War.

I arrived and was swept through the palace gates by the gendarmes, Mademoiselle Loris? Yes. On I went, up and pattered down this marble hallway in my sandals, which were clippingclapping, and my legs were running sweat. They escort me down to big double doors, I open the doors, and there sit 40 men.

Q: Palace?

F: This was the High Commissioner's Palace.

Q: French High Commissioner's Palace in Saigon?

LORIS: In Saigon. And I collapse in a chair at the door, realizing the meeting is now in session, I got out my notebook and started taking notes. Then there was a break shortly after I arrived, and Ed Gullion came over and escorted me to the center of this big table where all of the interpreters, the maps and everything else were, and for one solid week -- five days -- all I did all day was take notes. There were many strange names of the battlefields in northern Indochina which of course I did not know. But Gullion was very kind. I would put a number down and he would write the name down and put the number so that when I transcribed the notes later I was able to fit the whole thing together.

Q: Who were the other participants in this meeting?

LORIS: The French High Commissioner, high French military command, and I can't remember all the names, and high American military, generals, and the highest Vietnamese in those days. There were about 40 people in all. We did not in those days have tape recorders or computers or anything like that, and I was the only person who was taking the notes.

Q: Only person among all of these -- ? Nobody else?

LORIS: Nobody else. And they used to wrap me up in an armored vehicle, take me back to the Consulate, shut me up in a room where I'd type up these notes which later became history.

Q: I bet.

LORIS: I felt like Mata Hari.

Anyway, life proceeded. A few weeks later I walked down the street to my office, went around the corner, and a machine gun gunned down the head of the French Surate right in front of me. I jumped in a doorway to avoid the bullets, and survived.

After that, because the French did not have many people, the Korean War had started, and communiques were coming in from Korea and Hanoi, again I was selected to go. The French did not have anybody and neither did the Vietnamese. I used to get up at 4:30 in the morning, ride a cycle downtown to the French Chamber of Commerce and type on a French typewriter, which I had never seen before, in French, the communiques. Then I would leave there about 10:00 --

Q: The communiques about the war?

LORIS: About the war in Hanoi and the Korean war.

Q: And the Korean war?

LORIS: It had started. Then I went back to my office about 10:00 and worked all day there. It was a very exciting time.

Q: What were these communiques for? Were they for -- LORIS: For the French, for the government, the French, and released to the press.

Anyway, it was a very exciting two years in Saigon and many adventures. I'm not going to tell you all of them. Too bad. You would love it.

Q: Well, I think that I know some of the ones that you want to leave off the record.

LORIS: Right.

Q: However, if I'm not mistaken, and I hope you will put this on the record, I think you told me once that while you were in Saigon you got acquainted with Graham Greene and he took you to an opium den.

LORIS: Oh, very much so. I met Graham Greene at a cocktail party where, you know, there were many cocktail parties. He is a great reprobate and loves to have somebody listen to him. Well, I like to talk, but I also like to listen. So we got together a number of times and one evening we were discussing the ethnic background of Chinese and Asians and I said, I've always wanted to go to an opium den. He said, let's go tonight, after dinner. I said fine. So we go down after this cocktail party and we have dinner in a restaurant. Then he said, we won't drive, we'll just take a bicycle chair which is called a cyclo. So we get in the cyclo and the guy pedals us out to this opium den. Graham Greene was an habitue of opium dens and he knew Asia.

So we get out in this dimly lit place and go in. Mamasan, or madame, didn't want me to come in because she recognized that I was American. So we sat in this little overheated room with stuffed settees, drank brandy and soda with no ice, and she wouldn't let us into the big room where the habitues go. But we went into a private room.

It was just like I expected it to be. Absolutely fascinating. I wouldn't have missed it for anything. I did want Graham Greene to buy me the silver opium pipe but he didn't. So he smoked nine pipes and I smoked three. But I didn't inhale because I was scared shitless. But it was fun.

Q: Since you are retired, they will not --

F: Fire me.

Q: -- start a security investigation for drug abuse.

LORIS: Why not find out what the people do? I can understand. As Graham Greene, when we used to talk, he said try to understand these people that live in these overpopulated, crowded areas of the world, half of them sleep at day, half at night, there's not enough room for them all to sleep at night, so smoke opium or whatever. Go out on cloud nine.

Q: Graham Greene wrote a novel about Saigon called, if I'm not mistaken, The Quiet American.

LORIS: There are several composite characters in there, all of which I recognized. It was a good book. Read it.

Q: Including -- is one of the composite characters at least in part Charlotte Loris?

LORIS: Yes.

Q: I'll have to read it.

LORIS: Then I left Saigon after many exciting adventures. I wish I would recount them all, they are in my mind.

Q: We are now talking about what year?

LORIS: I left in 1952. And I went to -- but first I made several trips. I went to Bangkok as a side trip. I wanted to meet the writer of the Bangkok Editor, which is one of the things that convinced me to go to that area of the world. He had been a former member of the OSS and a friend of Jim Thompson's. I did meet him and his Thai mistress, and a few other interesting people, for a glorious weekend.

Anyhow, I was finally taken out of Saigon and assigned -- .

Q: Jim Thompson, was he already at that time into Thai silk?

LORIS: Oh, yes, but he just had a very small shop which was about as big as a three-cornered closet. It was fabulous. It was nothing like it is now. He had not done "The King and I" or any of those costumes. But he was a very interesting person. I met a lot of interesting people. In spite of the fact that I was an FSS-13. I did play a lot of tennis and met people that way. Some interesting stories about that but I won't go into it because I had the right to play on the Palace courts and a few other places.

THOMAS J. CORCORAN
Political Officer
Saigon (1950-1953)

Consul
Hanoi (1954-1955)

Thomas J. Corcoran was born in New York in 1920. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948. He served in Spain, Laos, Cambodia, and Burundi, where he was ambassador. He served three times in Vietnam: in Saigon (1950-1953), Hanoi (1954-1955), and in Saigon (1965-1966).

Q: I want to concentrate mainly on your time in Indochina, because this is where you did spend I can almost say an inordinate amount of time for a Foreign Service officer. How did you get into this particular corner of the woods?

CORCORAN: That started in Spain. The consulate was inspected by Foreign Service inspector Wilson Flake, who asked me where I would like to go next. I said that having started in a consular post and learned Spanish, I'd like to go to a diplomatic post where I could use French, which I had already studied in school for many years. He said, "Fine." Shortly thereafter, I got orders to Saigon, which had not been a diplomatic post when we were discussing this, but which had been converted from a consulate general to a legation right about that time in 1950.

Q: I'm confused. How was Indochina divided up then? I thought Hanoi was sort of the center.

CORCORAN: In the French period, Vietnam was really in three parts. You had the empire of Annam, the middle, which had a French resident.

Q: That was Hue?

CORCORAN: The capital of Annam was Hue. You had North Vietnam (Tonkin), which was largely under military administration, although it was technically under the imperial crown, but was run by the French Army. Then you had South Vietnam, which was a French colony, Cochinchina. So you had three different administrations there.

But with the French reoccupation at the end of World War II, after the Japanese had taken it over, the Chinese Nationalists in the north and the British in the south had accepted the Japanese surrender. The French went back in. There was a very complex period of negotiating with Ho Chi Minh, who was the leader of the Communists, who had come out of the bush and taken over Hanoi initially at the end of the war. They followed on the Chinese Nationalist occupation and coexisted with them for a while. But then the French moved in there. It was a very complicated period of negotiations between the French and the North Vietnamese, first starting with the French admiral, D'Argenlieu, who was General de Gaulle's representative and commander in chief. Then he was replaced eventually by General LeClerc. General LeClerc was the Army commander in the north.

All of these details have to be sorted out, because I've been in that area three times over a period of 30 years, actually four times, with three desk tours. It needs sorting out of the different periods.

The original sort of modus vivendi which the French worked out there began to break down in 1946. Jean Sainteny, who had been in the French colonial service, and who was the son-in-law of Albert Sarraut, who had been the governor general of Indochina and a French cabinet minister, went back in and tried to deal with Ho Chi Minh and re-establish the French presence in the north. For a variety of reasons, that broke down in 1946, and that's when the war really started.

Q: I want to come back now to what you were doing. This gives an idea that it was a complex situation. You were sent to Saigon as what?

CORCORAN: Initially, there had been a consulate in Hanoi and a consulate general in Saigon. As I understand it in the old days, during the hot season, the government moved to the north, and consular representatives would follow them there. But when the war ended, we maintained a consulate in Hanoi and a consulate general in Saigon, two consular posts. Then in 1950, when the French union concept was being established, the other two countries, Laos and Cambodia, had their own problems. Laos had also been divided into three parts, Luang Prabang, the kingdom in the north, Champassak, the kingdom in the south, and Vientiane, a sort of expired kingdom, in the middle, which was under direct French administration. The French union concept was that these three separate countries, Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam, would be members of the French union, each with its own monarchial form of government, a king in Laos, a king in Cambodia, and the ex-emperor of Annam, who was supposed to be accepted as the ruler of Vietnam.

As part of supporting this, in 1950 we agreed to diplomatic recognition of each of these countries, and we sent one minister, Donald Heath, who resided in Saigon. He kept a small branch office with a junior officer in Vientiane and one in Phnom Penh. So I first went to Saigon when it was a legation, and I was a political officer. I was, at that time, a third secretary. But after a few months there, I was sent up to relieve the man who was in Vientiane.

Q: When were you in Hanoi?

CORCORAN: I was there from about the beginning of September 1954 until about December 12, 1955. I was there about 14 months.

Q: We had some trouble on the previous tape. Some of this may be repetitious. How would you describe your principal job there?

CORCORAN: The main thing was to point out that we were not pulling out, we weren't prejudging the Geneva Conference as the end of everything. It was an armistice. We were going to wait and see what happened. We were supporting the government in the south, but we were keeping consular representation in the north. According to tradition and custom, the people holding the real power in the north, the Communists, could have expelled us if they had chosen so to do. But they chose, instead, to say that they just did not recognize us. But of course, we did exist, and we had employees, we had our buildings, two buildings which we owned, and for a while, a couple which we leased just as an anchor to windward, and had people spread out. We obeyed the curfews and we paid our electricity bills and things of that sort. But our main purpose there was to wait and see what happened, rather than just climb aboard airplanes and get out.

They did, in effect, deal with us through the municipal Military and Administrative Council of Hanoi, which was, in effect, a municipal government with both military and civilian functions.

At one point, they actually sent troops into my house during preparation for a parade. My house was on the big Place Ba Dinh, a central place where Ho Chi Minh's tomb is now. I was awakened in the middle of the night by my house boy who said the Viet Minh had arrived. They explained to me that in preparation for a parade the next day, they were putting troops and machine guns on the roofs of the building. I said, well, I couldn't argue with that, I suppose, and they could go up there on the roof. I couldn't stop them. I said, "Please use the back stairs and stay out of the house," which they did. They stayed there until after the parade. They did the same thing on some other buildings in the area. Actually, when the parade came by, I went out to watch it, and a French-speaking Communist policeman gave me a running description of what was going on, obviously part of the propaganda department. So there again, they knew who we were and what we were up to.

As I say, we were very careful not to try to do anything clandestine or subversive or anything of that sort. It would have been hopeless in that situation. Our main purpose was just to stay there and then keep the possibility of dealing with whatever came up.

As time went on, a difference developed between the way they treated us and the other non-Communist representatives. You had the British consul general, who, as I said, was an ipso facto agent of Anthony Eden, who was the co-chairman of the Geneva Conference. You had the French Sainteny mission (his nom de guerre) and he was accredited by Mendes France personally to the government of North Vietnam.

Q: Mendes France was the prime minister.

CORCORAN: Yes, who had forced the Geneva Conference in 1953. There was also the French military mission, actually a liaison mission with the International Control Commission, headed by General Groot de Beaufort. There was the Indian chairman of the international commission, Mr. Desai, who later became number two in the Indian foreign office. And there was the Canadian delegate, Brigadier Sherwood Lett, who was a war hero, who took part in the famous Canadian landing at Dieppe, was a lawyer, and who later ended up and died as Chief Justice of British Columbia. He was the Canadian representative on the commission. Then there was a Polish delegation headed by a man named Ogrodinszki. He was a complete Communist doing the bidding of the North Vietnamese. At that time I don't think you could expect anything else.

On the other hand, the Canadians, who were trying to defend the free world's interests, were not in the same relationship with us at all. They were trying to help us out as much as they could, but they had their own standards of propriety.

The Indians were somewhat in between. The Indians represented the personal policy of Nehru, which was that the important thing was the end of colonialism and the independence of former Asian countries, and the Communist thing wasn't to be worried about too much; that it would sort itself out later. Actually, Nehru came through on a visit. I met him briefly on this one occasion. He came through early on and talked to everybody.

Then, of course, the Indians also had a consul general. They had a vice consul there, and they sent a consul general, who was a man named Sahay, Anand Mohan Sahay, accompanied by his very beautiful daughter. He had an interesting history. He had been at one point the private secretary to Rajendra Prasad, who later became vice president of India. He had also been involved in the Indian National Congress of Subhas Chandra Bose, a Japanese collaborationist, and he had actually fled to Japan and was caught by the British and sent back to India to be tried for treason. But Nehru was his lawyer, the lawyer for all of these people, and they could handle that. So he was a nice man on the surface, very friendly, but he wasn't too realistic. At one point, I guess I can tell you this now -- is this going to be published?

Q: It will be in transcript form, and researchers will be able to use it.

CORCORAN: Well, then, he wanted to give a reception for all hands, including me and the government officials of North Vietnam, and they, of course, wanted to receive the invitation list in advance. They saw my name on it and they wouldn't come if I showed up. I told him, well, forget it, I wouldn't come. I didn't want to embarrass him. But he said, "Yeah, but that's not good enough. I've got to be able to prove to them that you're not coming." I said, "Okay, I'll write you a letter saying I'm diplomatically ill," which I did, and that solved that. This man's background was general good will for all occasions, but he didn't realize what he was dealing with. Some of the people in the Indian delegation to the control commission were a lot more sophisticated, and they had a certain range of opinions.

Q: I'd like to go back, if we may, again, because I'm concerned this might not have come out on the previous tape, about your knowledge of and reporting on the land reform, which was reportedly quite a bloody affair.

CORCORAN: The real details on that didn't come out until much later, when a Frenchman wrote a book, and when the government itself admitted they had made a mistake and killed a lot of people they shouldn't have killed. But it was just beginning to come out. In some cases, there were trials of people reported on in the press. There was one trial, which I saw part of in Hanoi. But we had to rely largely on the press for those reports, and in some of them, the main charge was being a rich exploiter of the poor, a capitalist exploiter. But this varied. The main problem, I gather, was that standards varied from province to province and district to district. Somebody who might be a cruel, wicked landowner in one area might be just one of the people in another, because the property values and income values varied. This may have been the root of their problem. They had an open-air application of the land reform on the Chinese model, but it became clear that some people were being punished for what other people were not being punished for in a different area.

Q: You mentioned that you tried to attend one open-air meeting and were sort of run off.

CORCORAN: Yes. I couldn't have really understood, anyway. I didn't have Vietnamese. But I was recognized as an outsider.

Most of the other trials were held out in the countryside, and you'd get reports on them in the press. As it emerged later, I didn't realize it at the time, but I realized later that one of the main problems was an awful lot of people were killed and the standard kind of varied from province to province. So this had a general unwholesome effect on the people themselves, because some of them could figure out that somebody was being punished for being a poor miserable landowner, instead of a rich landowner. The standards were off.

As I say, the government recognized this at one point. But some experts who followed this more closely than I did later on took the line that they really got in trouble when they eased up on the land reform program. There were some demonstrations in the countryside, really tough ones. Some reporting by some of the French writers indicated that there was a pretty violent uprising. But some of the Sovietologists took a look at these things and said that they had the real trouble after they pulled back on the land reform, in other words, when they showed signs of moderation. That encouraged people to protest more. I really would have to go back into the files.

Q: How did you leave?

CORCORAN: We were there for a total of 14 months. We left in early December. But in September, we could see signs of tightening up. For example, they required all of us, including Americans, to register as aliens with the government. They sent a big form about the size of that map.

Q: Pointing to a large map.

CORCORAN: Filling in all your personal history and whatnot. We could see this was the initial step of closing in on us. Then they wanted to come and interview us, each individual American. I said yes, but I would sit in on all the interrogations as though they were my own, and they agreed to that. They were asking sort of nuisance questions, and I would intervene after a while. They said, "You said you didn't speak Vietnamese." Well, I didn't speak Vietnamese, but I could just see the way they were going, just wasting time and harassing people. We filled out these forms, and they inspected the place and saw we had a lot of radio equipment, which they obviously knew we had. We had been broadcasting every day for the last year as our only means of communication. We couldn't use the mail. So I could sense by the tone of this, something was going to happen.

Early on, after the British started making trips, we had applied for permission to send people in and out. None of them were accepted or refused, but we had gotten a bad publicity campaign as our only reply, so we let that ride; figured that could wait; we'd rely on the radio. But at this point, with the detailed census statement things became tough. At one point, they came in and the Army tried to inspect the place. We asked them out, and they left. When they moved into my house, they had a really plausible pretext, security for the parade. They were doing it to the Russians and the Poles and everybody else, so I couldn't complain. But it became clear that on this occasion, they were getting ready to do something. I could sense that things were tightening up.

What we did was make a plan, which we just sent in by telegram saying, "if this happens, we will do thus and so," and try to destroy classified material, of which we had very little. We would try to communicate by other means, a very simple code.

Sure enough, I suppose it was not more than a week or so after that, I was summoned in one rainy day to the municipal commission, and I had to walk through a flooded street to get to my car. The committee was sitting behind the table there, and they said, "We brought you in to tell you that you're not authorized to use your radio. Stop using it."

I said, "I don't know, this is interesting. When did this become effective?"

I went back and did not use the radio to report that, because that would have been a technical trap I'd have been walking into. What I did was draw up a telegram and send it through the post office, PTT, thinking that if we could survive in that old-fashioned way, that would be all right, too. They held the telegram for several days and then returned it unsent, said no route existed, which was quite false, because they had routes through Peking and Moscow, and then on to the outside world, and to Hong Kong. So what I did was send copies also to my various colleagues and the British, who were supposed to be our protecting power if we got out, sent theirs off, and the French sent theirs off, and the Canadians sent theirs off, so Washington got the news. They wondered why we'd gone off the air, but they got the news pretty quickly.

Then it was a question of getting out. I thought the appropriate thing was not to act in terms of just slam, bang, everybody out. It's easier said than done in a case like that. I said, "We ought to go slowly." In fact, one of the Indians told me, "I'm sure they don't really mean this. You ought to just hang on. Maybe they want you to stay." I said, "Well, I'll try." My other reason for trying it that way was I didn't want to show any signs of desperation to get out. I think if I tried to hang on, they would be less likely to keep us there. So we sent out people one at a time until I got down to one vice consul, who was also the administrative officer and the cashier. He, the man I wanted to keep with me, and I left together, turning it over to the British in due form. We had the regular transfer of the two buildings we owned, and a transfer of our consular function. With the approval of the foreign office, the British consul and I cosigned this. We went out to the airport and left.

Q: Were these done under instructions from Washington? Were you able, through the other: British, French, Canadians, to keep some . . .

CORCORAN: After this initial report, we narrowed it down to the British, since they traditionally, we understood, would represent us. I did it through the other people just to make sure the word got out. But it was pretty clear that we would have to do this. We developed the details with the British, and we left the two buildings there. They were taken over, I gather, later on. My house was used by some Communist diplomat, I think, or by some Communist agency. The office became the headquarters of the liberation front of South Vietnam for many years.

Then, strangely, when I was in Burundi, I was asked by somebody in the department for information about property. This is when Jimmy Carter was thinking of reopening there. I said,

"Look in the files for 1955. It's all there." They did. They kept the files in Milwaukee or someplace. They got it quickly, and they had all the documents, inventories, titles for the two buildings, and the Department said the Vietnamese would let us have those two back. These were the two we owned. We had rented some others just to give us alternatives. They had progressively moved foreigners out at different times. But the rented buildings they took over pretty quickly. These two buildings, which we turned over at the end, which we retained title to, we made it clear that we did, otherwise, there was no way we could have them back. I think the plans were proceeding to move some sort of diplomatic representation in there. Then, of course, the North Vietnamese moved into Cambodia.

The only suggestion I gave to anybody immediately when I left, and also at this much later date, was if you do go in there with any sort of representation, you've got to insist that you have your own territory. A lot of European countries were operating in hotel rooms for years, and considered it a great victory if they got a second hotel room. This is preposterous. You can't function unless you can have a certain degree of . . .

Q: Space.

CORCORAN: Certainly a degree of space, and a certain degree of security, even though the security would always be a problem. So there it is. This goes back to the last days of the Carter era, about 1980.

PAUL M. KATTENBURG
Intelligence Analyst, Indochinese Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1950-1955)

Country Officer, East Asia Bureau
Washington, DC (1963-1964)

Political Officer, Policy Planning
Washington, DC (1964-1965)

Dr. Paul M. Kattenburg was born in Belgium in 1922 and came to the United States in 1940. He joined the Department of State in 1950 as a research specialist and entered the Foreign Service in 1956. He served in Germany, the Philippines, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

KATTENBURG: We had reasonably good relations with Indonesia in the period '50 to '52.

On Indochina that is quite a different story.

Q: Okay, let's move to Indochina then.

KATTENBURG: I switched with Al Seligmann, who was quite tired of Indochina business, and none of us had been Wristonized at this point. We were civil servants. I was more than willing to change my scenery from Indonesia to Indochina. Here I fell into quite a different story because of the struggle between the bureaus that we in the Division Research Far East supported: the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, on the one hand, and the various personalities in that bureau including Mr. Reed the head of Southeast Asian Affairs, who had at one time been consul general in Hanoi, and the European Bureau on the other hand. Relations were quite strained.

I spoke French and I was sort of a natural in a way to do Indochina as so much of the documentation and the analysis had to be through French material. Jack Lydman and I established a pretty close relation with the working people on the Indochina Desk in the Far East Bureau -- this was the period '52 through early '55. I had spent the summer of 1952 in Saigon at the Embassy under Don Heath, the ambassador. This was a period of conflict within the Embassy as well because Ed Gullion, who was his DCM, opposed the pro-French policy. He supported greater independence for Bao Dai's Associated State of Vietnam. We had provided the French support since early 1950, when we had started giving them economic and some military assistance. We increased the military assistance a couple of years later when the French started having a tough time with the war. In any event, as far as the relations within the Department, we had a fairly tough time holding a point of view which on the whole, I think, was supportive of assistance to Bao Dai's Vietnam. We felt we should move faster towards independence. I don't know if this is the place to go into detail on all that...

Q: What was the situation in Vietnam? You talked about the Associated States.

KATTENBURG: These were created in 1948 under the Baie d'Along Agreement, and all this is recorded in a lot of literature so it is easy to get a hold of. Our policy anchored itself in support of the French when we recognized Vietnam -- Laos and Cambodia were secondary problems. They didn't really achieve full recognition. We maintained merely Chargés in Vientiane and Phnom Penh. In fact they were in many ways dependent on the Embassy in Saigon.

Q: Our Embassy was in Saigon and not in Hanoi?

KATTENBURG: No, our Embassy was in Saigon where the French had re-established the capital.

Q: I see.

KATTENBURG: Bao Dai was in Saigon with a summer home in Dalat. We maintained a Consulate in Hanoi until the summer of 1955. Here, before I forget, I would like to clarify something because some of the literature incorrectly assumed that we closed the Consulate in Hanoi after the Geneva Accords of July 20, 1954. South Vietnam took what had been the French territory south of the 17th parallel or the Bao Dai area under the French, if you want. But we did not close the Consulate in Hanoi. It remained under Tom Corcoran, who closed it in the summer of 1955. I was the person on the Desk at that time who recommended him for the Superior Service Award, which he got for the remarkable job he did in quietly, efficiently and thoroughly closing the Consulate operation.

The Embassy, in those intervening years, '52 when I started working on Indochina and first went out there on detail through '55, when I went back again, was under Don Heath virtually the entire time. He may have left in 1954, but I don't think so. In any event there was a mission sent out by the President and Secretary Dulles in 1954, under General J. Lawton Collins, a famous mission.

This leads us to a very interesting episode about a key meeting on Vietnam that I described somewhere in my book, but not in great detail. The meeting took place in late April or May, 1955 during the Sect Battle, so called, in the city of Saigon. When Ngo Dinh Diem, who had by then returned, that is, post-Geneva, as the new President of the Republic of Vietnam, was under siege by the Sects, so called Binh Xuyen. A meeting was held in the Department in late April or early May 1955, chaired by Under Secretary Robert Murphy, to consider a report by General Collins who had been sent on that mission by the President and his political advisor Paul Sturm. They recommended going easy on support for Ngo Dinh Diem and a possible change in government if someone able to handle the situation could be found. I think that was the essence really of the meeting.

At that point Brig. General Edward Landsdale had already been moved from Manila, where he had supported Magsaysay under auspices of the Agency, of course, to Saigon where he and a number of other Americans, some of whom played a very important role and were private Americans, not necessarily directly linked with the Agency, had supported Ngo Dinh Diem. During the time of the meeting a general who had been loyal to Ngo Dinh Diem was able to take care of the city and push the Binh Xuyen back and out of the city, thereby actually solving the situation on the ground in favor of Ngo Dinh Diem. The meeting just naturally gravitated in that direction.

I, myself, during this time in INR supported the Diem regime. I thought Diem was quite capable of holding the situation and I would have hated to see a change made which would have brought in some uncertain military leaders -- as happened ten years later.

Q: Yes.

KATTENBURG: Immediately after this particular meeting, I went out to Vietnam. It had been decided that I would take the Desk in the fall of 1955 to succeed the two people who had been working on Indochina in the Bureau. The director of the Bureau of Southeast Asian Affairs was Philip Bonsal and his Indochina Desk officer was an army colonel, who came into the State Department at the end of the war, but did not join the Foreign Service, to the best of my knowledge. This was Robert Hoey who played a key role in the whole period of the French war. He was assisted, and very ably so, by FSO John Getz, later U.S. Ambassador to Malta before retirement [who can be interviewed, living in North Carolina], with whom I was very close from the INR vantage point during this whole period.

Somewhere or other it was decided, I think with Jack Lydman and other Bureau people, that I would go to Saigon. Now in the summer of '55 I was involved with the question of how to handle the provision of the Geneva Accords of 1954 which required consultation between the two zones of Vietnam, the Peoples Republic of Vietnam north of the 17th parallel, temporary demarcation line, and the government south of that line, that is the Republic of Vietnam. The political part of the Accords had called for interzonal consultations which would lead to all-Vietnam elections to be held in July of 1956, two years after the signing of the Accords. The consultations, of course, had to bear on the question of what the elections were for, what kind of body, what sort of constitution would there be, what method would be used for these elections, was there to be a parliament elected, etc., none of which was determined in the Accords, except that the elections would be by secret ballot. During the year '54-'55 I, from my desk in INR, worked together with Ed Gullion, in the Policy Planning Council, on preparing various papers for the Secretary. The policy in the end shuffled itself out to support for Ngo Dinh Diem. Whatever he wanted, we would support. That was what was essentially confirmed in the 1955 meeting that Murphy held. While the general in Saigon, who was Little Minh or Tran Van Minh, won the war against the Sects in support of Diem, Landsdale supported Diem, Wesley Fishel from Michigan State University, who was the other very important American there, supported him. It was decided at that meeting, although no details were forthcoming that day, but I recall very clearly a discussion of the replacement of the ambassador and designee, Freddy Reinhardt, who went out almost immediately afterwards.

Q: What was your impression of Donald Heath? Both how he ran the Embassy and also how we viewed the situation because he was there during an important time.

KATTENBURG: Oh sure. That's right. I should say that Ambassador Heath was a charming person. I never got to know him very well, but from my observation of him he felt that our policy should be to support a very gradual transition to independence. He was very conscious of Dulles' anti-communism and of his fear that another loss to communism after the loss in China would be a defeat for us, therefore Heath supported most of the French moves. In the end he was strongly pro-French and against giving the Vietnamese greater independence, which Gullion wanted. We had quite a struggle there in '52 to '54, between Gullion and Heath. I hope I have the timing right. Actually if Gullion left earlier the struggle occurred between '50 and '52 and had gone on and grown apace during that time. It was described in a novel by Bob Shaplen of the New Yorker, called "A Forest of Tigers." It is quite accurate as Shaplen was in Saigon during this entire time.

But Heath, I think, when Diem came back in early fall 1954, after the Geneva Accords, from France, from the U.S. really, via France, gave Diem adequate support. The policy shifted. I can't remember when Ambassador Heath departed, but policy-making gradually shifted to General Collins and his assistant Paul Sturm, who was in effect the political counselor.

Now you have a great change in the Embassy, when Freddy Reinhardt comes in mid-1955. His political counselor was Frank Meloy, who was subsequently assassinated in Beirut. The Office Director in EA changed from Bonsal to Ken Young. Here we have an entirely different cast of characters. These are committed to an independent South Vietnam, to the full support of Ngo Dinh Diem and to try their best "to build a nation". I have written at length on this and some of the errors that we may have made even in the very early period. But when you look at it in retrospect, the period from mid-'55 through '61, which is a fairly long period, more than 6 years, was probably the best period of our Vietnam involvement. The French war was over, the French departed, not right away but in due course -- by mid 1955 they were out and we were taking their place in terms of economic and military assistance. We started with minor military assistance, since the Geneva Accords barred any kind of direct military assistance. We were very cautious about the number of military advisers we had there. I became the Desk Officer in the fall of 1955. The most important thing I was involved in was the increase in the number of U.S. military advisers. They were doubled from the 385 or so that we had in place at the time of the Accords, which is what the Accords said could not be increased. In negotiations in 1956 by Dulles with Nehru, who was the Chairman of the International Control Commission, we were allowed to double the number. Part of the reason that Nehru was persuaded by Secretary Dulles to double the number was that there was a considerable fear in Congress that if our American equipment was left rotting in rice paddies, as it was, without the ability of Diem's side to gather it and use it effectively, the French would transport it during their evacuation to Algeria. This was considered undesirable in Congress and the Administration. We therefore figured out various ways to increase the number of our military advisers to keep this from happening.

Q: Were you involved in this? I want to keep this to your experiences.

KATTENBURG: Yes, I was deeply involved in this mission called the TERM, Temporary Equipment Recovery Mission. I created it, as a matter of fact, with the assistance and support of Frank Meloy, the Political Counselor in Saigon, and in a series of telegrams we set it up. I also supported and recommended greater assistance to Ngo Dinh Diem and the maintenance of the Landsdale Mission and of Wes Fishel of Michigan State, director of police training operations in Vietnam during that period.

Q: How did INR and the people around you view China? Did you see this as a monolith and that North Vietnam was part of this? And did you see that there were cracks that were coming?

KATTENBURG: Up until the time I left INR, even after that in my case, we were certainly more willing to consider cracks and to look, perhaps we were more open to another view of Ho Chi Minh, but it was remote given the firm hand the Secretary had on Vietnam and what was to be done and not to be done. Here you must remember that the Secretary [Dulles] created the SEATO Pact in the Fall of 1954 as a way, really, of putting a better face on what had been in sheer power terms an American defeat along with the French at Dienbienphu and at the Geneva Accords, since we had been forced into some sort of negotiated agreement. Half of Vietnam was considered to be salvageable and the Secretary's policy on this was very firm. So the question of cracks and flexibility of this policy was really rather remote. I got my cue on it at the time that Gullion and I presented our long paper on what could be the consultations between the two zones. Dulles dismissed that, and decided he would do what Diem wanted -- there would be no consultations and no elections. That was, it seemed to me, a clear marching order and I have to put this in the context of the McCarthy period, of course. It undoubtedly had an impact. Those of us who were then working on East Asia matters were very conscious indeed of what had happened to some of our predecessors and...

KATTENBURG: The East Asia Bureau was headed by Averell Harriman when I entered the Seminar, but during the year he moved up to Under Secretary and was succeeded by Roger Hilsman. Roger Hilsman and I had gone to graduate school together and knew each other very well, so Roger thought I might replace Chalmers B. "Ben" Wood on the Vietnam Task Force. They wanted more control in the Bureau over the Task Force. Ben Wood was due for an assignment abroad and the job was vacant and I had Vietnam experience, although by that time it had been a number of years since I had been in it. I told Roger this and was rather reluctant. Then the scene changed again because Barney Koren, my former boss in Manila, entered the picture. [I want to put these things on record because I think they can show future historians that ultimately these personnel decisions are far more important than we give them credit, and are often the product of no systematic planning or thinking, but simply the result of personal politics or vendettas.] It turned out that there were two possible candidates for the Vietnam position to succeed Ben Wood in the summer of 1963, when I graduated from the Senior Seminar. One was Joe Mendenhall who had come out of the National War College at the same time. The other was myself, from the Senior Seminar. Koren and Mendenhall had apparently had a difficult personal relationship when they had both served in Bern, Switzerland. I don't know if the oral history project wants discussion...

Q: Oh sure, sure.

KATTENBURG: Barney did not want Mendenhall. He was now director of Southeast Asia under Hilsman and had been chafing at the independence of the Vietnam Task Force which had been moved out of the Bureau in 1961 and relocated on the 7th floor. He felt this was a golden opportunity to bring back some systematic Bureau control over this thing which had gotten out of hand, growing much too fast. He wanted me to work for him, in effect, even though it was called a task force for some reason. So I succumbed, I think clearly a character trait of weakness that I have had, that I easily said "yes" when felt needed or wanted by someone. I am a succumber type.

Q: But that was the Foreign Service attitude at least at the time -- you do what you were asked.

KATTENBURG: Well, I really didn't pay much attention to where I would come out in the career. It didn't matter to me that much. I do know that he made quite a plea to get me. The director of the Seminar was Andrew Corry who thought I should be very careful. He thought it was a loser. But, of course, my sentiments were still very pro-Diem, pro- Vietnam. Diem was then in a very, very difficult situation because of the Buddhists burnings, a key moment in Vietnam.

July 1, 1963 was when my short leave ended, or June 25, something like that. In any event, I would like to call attention to a section in my book called, "The Vietnam Trauma In American Foreign Policy," published by Transaction, 1980 and reprinted in paperback in 1982 -- there will be a new edition sooner or later as it is out of print at this point. In it I have something called, "A Personal Note," in which I describe this particular difficult period leading up to the Diem coup. I came back, not only with an entirely new cast of characters, but not fresh on Vietnam having been away about 10 years -- from '56 to '63, not quite 10 years. The other thing that made it especially difficult was a new ambassador. Nolting was being pulled out and Henry Cabot Lodge had been appointed by President Kennedy as our new ambassador. We arrived on the desk, in effect, the same day. Koren had made clear to me that he did not have direct authority because it was still a task force. He had authority over me as a member of the Office of the Southeast Asian Affairs, or whatever it was called, in the Bureau but the Assistant Secretary really ran the Task Force. It was a matter of Hilsman, Forrestal in the White House, Mike Forrestal that is, myself and Lodge. I went through all the briefings in the White House and elsewhere with Lodge, which lasted until about the Fourth of July [I went on duty on June 25] and it was a very difficult time because the Buddhist situation was getting worse and worse. Then Wood briefed us, and the Pentagon. These briefings were with Lodge and his two henchmen, Fred Flott and Mike Dunn [Mike was essentially a military aide and bodyguard and Flott, a tough character, was a former Agency type who was also capable of wielding a pistol). We had established pretty good relations.

Anyway, I will never forget a moment, and this is absolutely true, in which Lodge went to my office in EA. My deputy was a man named Conlon, Dick Conlon, who you may have known. I was unfortunate in having one of the few bad secretaries in the Foreign Service. Not only was she nasty, she wasn't interested in doing any work. I was overwhelmed with problems. Lodge walked in and threw a pencil across my desk, right to my face. He said, "Who is going to politic my nomination through the Senate Foreign Relations Committee while I am up in Boston over the weekend and a few days afterwards?" And I said, "Please, don't worry, Mr. Ambassador, we will get it through." So this is my opportunity to thank Skip White, who was then the Congressional Liaison, for enormous help because we worked all weekend to persuade the Chairman to schedule hearings and to put Lodge ahead of Admiral Anderson who had been appointed Ambassador to Portugal and who was controversial and therefore was delaying the hearings. We got Lodge in, and when he came back the next Wednesday or Thursday, and found out that his hearing was scheduled for the following Monday, I could do no wrong by Lodge. I was made!

Anyway, Mendenhall really should have taken this job because he had, even though he couldn't get along with Koren, he had a much tougher and gung ho attitude on the whole Vietnam involvement than I did at this point. Looking at it from the briefings and thinking about it a little bit, even without going to Vietnam, I was not very optimistic as to the future prospects of President Diem and very weary of any further direct American involvement than we already had. But I made Roger promise me that I could go as soon as possible to see the place. He did promise. On July 20 there was a meeting in Honolulu that Lodge, Roger and I attended, after which Lodge was going to take a very long, slow trip through the Far East to show his displeasure with Diem and arrive as late as possible to present credentials.

Q: This displeasure was because of the Buddhists...

KATTENBURG: Correct.

Q: ...burnings and repression. And his brother...

KATTENBURG: And his brother. Exactly. It was decided at this meeting in Honolulu that Kattenburg, having known Diem and been in part responsible for his being in office earlier, would go to talk to him -- "hold his hand" it was put to me by Roger. When I arrived in Saigon, Nolting, of course, was long gone on home leave, and Bill Trueheart, a wonderful guy with whom I had the best of relations always, had taken over as Chargé. Trueheart was just as analytically aware of the dangers and difficulties of the situation as I tended to be, and Nolting felt betrayed by Trueheart -- a sad story, as they were very close friends. After a few conversations with some of my older contacts, including Vu Van Hai, the Chef de Cabinet to Diem, who had been with him in 1954 when he first came back and had been with him when he visited the U.S. and we had gotten him an appointment with Bonsal back in '53, Jack Lydman and I. Vu Van Hai told me "sauvez le patron!", by which he meant get Ngo Dinh Nhu, his brother, out of here by whatever means and get the woman out, Madame Nhu. When I came back to Washington I spent a lot of time trying to cook up this trip for Madame Nhu, which she eventually took, around the U.S., so she was away during the coup. Lodge arrived in Saigon a week before I left. There is on record in the Department a telegram that I sent of a conversation that I had with Diem shortly after Lodge had arrived and just before I left and just before Lodge presented his credentials. It is a long telegram. I have never made a request under the Freedom of Information Act, and I don't know if it has been included in the Vietnam FRUS (Foreign Relations of U.S.) volume. Anyway, it was one in which I was very pessimistic as to the prospects unless we got rid of the Nhus. Then I came back to Washington and found two difficult situations. On the one hand Mendenhall, who had obtained the job of Deputy Director of Regional Affairs in EA, to Dick Usher, was very gung ho and very much in favor of going ahead with the war effort without much consideration of the politics of it. But he wasn't the real problem. In Defense, however, and this I regret to say was Bill Bundy who was Assistant Secretary for ISA...

Q: This was the Department of Defense?

KATTENBURG: In Defense. He hadn't moved over to State yet. Defense was so number conscious and so technocratically oriented to management and to all this nonsense without thinking through the "whys" and the "whats" of things, that we had a fairly difficult time. I think he maneuvered to isolate me somewhat and I wasn't beyond being removed somewhere.

What I worked on during the next two months mainly was with Bob Barnett, who was the EA Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, on what was called salami slicing tactics, a term taken from the Berlin Crisis, and imposed on Diem, that is, a slow cutting off of aid to his special forces. Anyway, we were well clued in that the coup was coming. I believe it is still correct to say that we climatized the coup, we did not make the coup. The coup eventually occurred and then Roger...

Q: This was October, 1963?

KATTENBURG: November 1, 1963. Roger and Barney agreed to my going back and taking a real look at the war. I came back just before New Year and wrote a very pessimistic report which is buried somewhere in the Pentagon. On January 4, 1964, and I am certain of the date, I talked to Roger -- how did I get to this one, I didn't explain the NSC meeting of August 31, 1963, but I will come back to it -- but Roger said to me the President has said if it is too hot in the kitchen, get out of it. Did I want to get out? I said, "Absolutely, I want to get out." The simplest way to get me out of it and to make a real change in policy and personnel was to bring Mendenhall down from RA and to put me in RA. And that was done.

Q: Regional Affairs in...

KATTENBURG: In EA. So I went to Regional Affairs in EA and took a distance from it and looked at other things...

Q: Was this mutually agreed because you were taking too pessimistic a view?

KATTENBURG: It was agreed that I wanted out.

Q: Did you want out or were they trying to get some true believers on board?

KATTENBURG: It may have been a matter of both. It is a very good point, but I was certainly taking too pessimistic an attitude. Roger felt his own position beginning to weaken somewhat with the true believers and I thought it was best for all to move. I certainly wanted out. After my two months in Vietnam I felt there was no way we would ever win the war or that Diem could ever win.

Q: When you went to Vietnam, this was after Diem was killed.

KATTENBURG: That's right.

Q: What sort of views were you getting and from where?

KATTENBURG: Mainly really from my own moving about. I went to every Corps area and talked to a lot of our military and I confirmed all my feelings that we were absolutely replaying the French war. We were just simply replaying it -- down to the minute details of the Beaugeste Forts that the Special Forces were manning along the Cambodian border.

Q: Some of them were the same forts. I know, I helicoptered over some of them.

KATTENBURG: Now, the other thing is a more complicated thing which requires more historical study than it has received up to now, and some of us take different viewpoints on this in the profession -- among academics who have studied this period. My firm opinion was from conversations with three people, Tran Van Dong, who was chief of staff, Big Minh himself, and most importantly the minister of foreign affairs, General Le Van Kim, that we were going towards an arrangement, they wanted an arrangement, and what's more it played within my own sense of what we ought to do. It is clear, I think, that Washington felt, probably rightly, and I agreed with this, that if we made an arrangement with the communists, if they made an arrangement, Le Van Kim made an arrangement, we would get a coalition government that would be gobbled up fairly quickly by the communists. I don't disagree with that but I don't think Kim and Big Minh or Dong really thought this would happen. I think they felt that they had a going concern to sell to the North Vietnamese, that they could make deals because of personal acquaintances. This is not to be confused by anybody who listens to this tape to the previous period in which Ngo Dinh Nhu before his assassination is alleged to have sought contacts with the communists. That, I've always felt, was pure and absolute bluff with the U.S. in order to try and get the U.S. to support him for fear that otherwise he might run to the communists. I don't think the communists would ever have responded, given their basically favorable position, despite their enormous sufferings and the demands put on them. They were basically in a favorable position until we entered with full ground forces. I don't think the communists would ever have deigned to even speak with Ngo Dinh Nhu or Diem, not to speak about making any kind of deal.

However, these generals were a different matter. They might have been believable. What's more, they had forged an alliance with the neutralist elements among the Buddhists groups. Some of the Bonzes that we regarded with suspicion...

Q: Bonzes being Buddhist priests.

KATTENBURG: Correct.

I think here we have a clear clash between the gung ho element on the U.S. side, including many in the Agency, but not everybody, and the more military oriented, more confrontationalist groups (a difficult thing to summarize in a few words), and those who had retained some vestige of knowledge of what diplomacy could accomplish if used properly. The great problem with post-war American foreign policy to me has been that we lost the diplomatic art in the interim pretty much to military confrontational thinking. We all had become political/military experts, but no one was about to do smart maneuvering. That is what you needed in this situation. And it is what I felt when I came back to Washington and that is also what I put in the report which is buried over in DOD; never saw the light of day.

Q: When you came back and talked about making an agreement, was this anathema to even mention this?

KATTENBURG: I think it was. Certainly anathema to ISA which was becoming more important under Bill Bundy at that time. That is why when Bill Bundy came to State to take Roger Hilsman's place in March of 1964, I was immediately "exiled" out of the Bureau to Policy Planning.

Q: Was it your impression that with Bundy coming over from Defense the military solution took over?

KATTENBURG: Right. The only correction I make to that statement would be that it wasn't so much a military as what I would call a technocratic-managerial-McNamara attitude. One in which we thought we could win by systematic systems theory.

Q: What I remember is the village count. The whole approach of the body count.

KATTENBURG: That's right. That whole type of approach, rather than our more conventional State Department, diplomatic or political approach. Indeed, you are absolutely right. So we have a very clear change in attitude. Now there is some modification of it when Max Taylor becomes important in policy, but that was not until a few months later.

Q: But during this time were you feeling increasingly isolated?

KATTENBURG: In the Regional Affairs unit of the Bureau I was very isolated from the Vietnam policy thing, but at about this time, or not too long thereafter, Koren was moved from Southeast Asian Affairs [I can't remember when this happened] and replaced by Bill Trueheart, who had come back from Saigon. Then, in all honesty, I felt less isolated. Trueheart and I viewed the situation very similarly.

Stu, I think you ought to interview Robert H. Johnson, who was a member of the policy planning council for the Far East, who had come from the NSC staff some years previously. I think he shifted at the beginning of the Kennedy Administration to SP (Policy Planning Council). Walt Rostow had a good deal of confidence in Bob Johnson. Bob Johnson, too, was extremely dubious about the Vietnam effort. I think we ought to point out that at this time the emphasis changed more to whether or not we should bomb the North -- this became a key issue. Much more so than what should we do with the problem of Vietnam. We didn't review the stakes at this time. And that is one of the points I make in my book. I have a chapter called "Ten Key Decisions on Vietnam" in which I deplore that we didn't review the stakes at a number of times. And that was one of them.

I was in RA with Dick Usher who is a very decent guy, working on a variety of small problems, including the Philippines again, for a very short time until Bundy came -- March, April. Bundy got me out of the Bureau. Rostow agreed to take me on. I think there was an understanding that I would leave Vietnam alone.

Q: You went to Policy Planning.

KATTENBURG: Right. To write a policy planning paper on the Philippines.

Q: Before we leave Vietnam, there was one place where you said, "how did I get on this without talking about an NSC meeting..."

KATTENBURG: Right. In August of 1963, after Lodge had arrived in Saigon and finally presented credentials, which is the only time he saw Diem until the very last and futile meeting just before the coup. He never saw him in the interim.

Q: Was this Lodge?

KATTENBURG: Lodge. This was Lodge's policy clearly. More Lodge's than the State Department's. It was his way of handling -- keeping his distance.

Roger wanted to see me immediately after my return from Saigon August 30. I went to see him and at that point the question was whether the coup would take place immediately at the end of August, what we now call the abortive coup at the end of August 1963 had become red hot, and he said, "You had better be ready to go to an EXCOM meeting of the National Security Council." It was on August 31, 1963. It was at that meeting that I blurted out my dissent with the policy. I don't know if you recall this, but it has been written up ad nauseam. It is even in the Pentagon Papers, although I didn't know at the time that it would be recorded.

What happened was that everybody was at that meeting, except the President. Johnson was chairing it as Vice President. Rusk, McNamara, Forrestal, Hilsman, and Harriman were there. Max Taylor was there as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. And a number of other famous people. This was the meeting in which I imprudently said that we ought to get out with honor. I used the term "with honor." It was clearly imprudent. As I have said in the personal note in my book that I drew attention to, the reason I did it was not so much out of analysis or out of substantive feeling that we could never achieve anything there, than it was out of being personally appalled after about an hour of discussion at the low quality of the discourse. That these people didn't know a damn thing about Vietnam. They really didn't. Now maybe I wasn't the greatest Vietnam expert in the world, I didn't speak Vietnamese, but I had been around the issue a long time. Although I hadn't served in the Embassy for a full tour, I had been on the Desk. I had lived the experience of the French war and its wrenching agonies. So it was more that, I think, than anything else.

Q: Did you feel there was a great deal of posturing?

KATTENBURG: Yes, there was. But at this particular meeting they just said -- you can read the account of the meeting, the account was written by "Brute" Krulak (Major General Krulak) of the Marine Corps, who unbeknownst to us (I don't think Roger knew it either, as the meeting was supposed to be totally off the record), was making notes for somebody, I don't know for whom. He was the SACSA, Special Assistant for Counter-insurgency and Special Activities.

Q: Was it before or after he had made his tour over there?

KATTENBURG: Oh, it was before the tour. Before he and Mendenhall went out. The President came back and said are you two guys certain you went to the same country. Krulak was certainly very gung ho. In '63 we probably weren't doing that much better than earlier. It seems to me that the macho factor that prevailed in 1961 was extenuated somewhat because by this time in '63 Kennedy had already made his American University speech which as I look upon it now in retrospect strikes me as a very important policy statement. That is, I think Bobby and John Kennedy had decided after the Cuban Missile Crisis, this was in October 1962, to get closer to the Soviets and engage in some pre-detente diplomacy if possible. And that was what was implied in the American University speech in April, 1963. I think as we look at the history of the 20th century that speech will rise in significance. We kept up a very strong stand against Fidel, of course. We didn't change the Cuban policy. I don't want to ramble on. The point is that despite this in '63 we weren't ready to review the stakes in Vietnam, just as we weren't ready when I came back in '64.

I want to say here for the history of the State Department that we, as I put in my book and mentioned names there, that there were a number of very good people in State [I mean by good, not just able people but respectable people with credibility, more credibility than I probably had] who felt the same way -- that we were barking up the wrong tree. And of course as everybody knows the chief of those was George Ball who was the Deputy to Secretary Rusk. But I should mention some of those in that group so that they may become better known. George Springsteen, who was Ball's chief assistant in his office [sort of an in-box guy], was also of the same mind, probably because Ball felt that way. But Springsteen, I think, was extremely helpful in facilitating what I would call the State Department dissenter club's work. We essentially staffed-up many of the memos that Ball wrote. I don't want to take anything away from what Ball did, but we produced many papers and pieces of junk and memos and I know one paragraph in the July 15 memorandum to Johnson by Ball is verbatim something I wrote in a memo to George. So George convened this group that included Bill Trueheart, in particular. And Bob Johnson, and myself, and Carl Salans who was Deputy Legal Advisor [who later became a lawyer in Paris, but I don't know where he is now]. And I am now probably leaving out a number of important names...

Q: Well, you can add them.

KATTENBURG: Several of the people in INR, Alan Whiting, in particular. They were in essence dissenters to the general course we were taking and wanted to get it back on the political track.

Q: So you were with Policy Planning from '64 to early '65...

KATTENBURG: From early '64 to mid '65. And I was able during that time to work in this group of dissenters and ...

Q: One quick question. In this period, '64-'65, what was the role of Policy Planning as you saw it? You hear about Policy Planning under George Kennan and slightly thereafter under the Eisenhower Administration and then it almost disappears from one's radar. It is always there but how important is it?

KATTENBURG: Well, I think a lot of it always depends on the chairman. I think Walt Rostow had credibility and a very strong, aggressive personality at that point and was able to assert some influence. I wouldn't say it was overwhelming. Now one of the reasons why I say that is because we did a study, done legitimately out of Policy Planning that was initiated, pushed and driven through by Robert H. Johnson, who I hope you will interview, on the potential impact of the consequences of bombing North Vietnam. First we considered tit-for-tat bombing, then retaliatory bombing on a more sustained basis, etc. and then outright bombing. This study took place in the spring of 1964 and even ran through the summer, I believe, and the results were contrary to what was wanted. It said bombing would have very few, if any, effects other than pushing the Vietnamese to invading the South massively with ground forces. That whole study which had a Pentagon and CIA participation was buried. I believe among others Dan Ellsberg worked on it but I can't recall for sure, although I know I met him during that time -- Bob Johnson would know.

Another study on the same subject took place under Bill Sullivan. Now Bill at that time was sitting in Harriman's office. When he came on board sometime early in '64, maybe even in '63 -- well, he had been at the Laos conference of '62 and I guess he had been with Harriman and stayed in his circle and became extremely important and influential in policy making on Indochina. I have the greatest admiration and respect for him and always have had. I like him personally, we have always been friends, although never very close friends -- I would say more acquaintances. I would go to see Bill whenever I felt I would not be imposing on him and talk about Vietnam. He would always say "You are premature," or "You are too soon, just wait, hold on." I will never forget that. Just hold it, it is going to go the way you think it should go. I wanted an agreement. But I could see that as time went on we would get less and less out of an agreement. Eventually we lose, in effect. Bill served Harriman as loyally as possible. He chaired another study on the consequences of bombing which was more acceptable.

Subsequently Bundy took all this paper with him to Camp David right after the elections of the Fall of 1964 and he came out with the famous options paper on Vietnam. Options A, B and C. I really think Bundy, too, had his doubts about the policy. And I believe, as I have indicated in my book, that McNaughton, who was over in the Pentagon and working for McNamara, replacing Bundy as Director of ISA, had even greater doubts than Bundy. He was beginning to impart these doubts to McNamara which eventually led to the McNamara dissent with the policy in the Fall of '67. That all culminates in the Tet offensive in '68 and the abdication speech by Johnson. There is no need to go into that here. But I did want to talk about the conditions under which I was reallocated into EA.

Hanoi (1951-1952)

L. Michael Rives was born in New York City in 1921 and raised in New Jersey. After one year at Princeton, he joined the Marines and served until 1945. He graduated from Princeton in 1947 with a degree in French. He took the Foreign Service Exam on a whim and passed. He has also served in Germany, France, the Congo, Burundi, Cambodia, Indonesia, and Canada. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 25, 1995.

Q: Then after this experience they wanted to put you in Asia again, I guess.

RIVES: Yes, in Hanoi.

Q: You were in Hanoi from 1952 until when?

RIVES: '53, I think it was. About a year.

Q: Would you describe Hanoi at that period?

RIVES: It was a city that was beginning to be under siege. There was actually no shelling as such. You could hear it all day and all night, and the French were gradually being beaten back. There, again, I was a junior officer, a junior Vice Consul. I was in charge of visas and that kind of thing. I also did reporting on the Chinese in North Vietnam. It was an attractive city, basically, like so many of the cities developed by the French. It had broad boulevards. The Consulate, I must say, was perfectly beautiful. We had one of the best houses in Hanoi, the ground floor being the Consulate itself, and myself and another vice consul occupied the top floor. It was really very pleasant.

Q: Who was the Consul?

RIVES: Paul Sturm.

Q: Did you have much contact with the French while you were there?

RIVES: Oh, we dealt almost entirely with the French, because they were really in control.

Q: How did they look on America at that time?

RIVES: Well, I think they were torn. We were supporting them quite strongly in those days, and so, obviously, they appreciated that, until we turned them down on Dien Bien Phu.

Q: The Korean War was going full force then, too.

RIVES: Yes, it was.

Q: Was there concern that the Chinese, having entered in the north, might also enter [the conflict in Vietnam?]

RIVES: Yes and no. I don't know if the French really worried about that much. I was fortunate enough, once, to take a trip to the last French outpost on the Chinese border. It really was fascinating, to sort of sneak up there at night, and then spend a day there. It was commanded by a Vietnamese colonel in the French army who was famous, because he was a real character. On Sunday morning, we woke up to band music. We looked out and saw the regimental band playing light music, like waltzes and such, as they would have played in the nineteenth century in France. When he went out on patrol (he would always go out), he would fly his flag, and as he approached each Chinese post on the other side of the frontier, they would lower their flags in salute, because they knew who it was. In the end, they were beaten, but he was a real character.

Q: In your year in Hanoi, '53, did you have any contact with Vietnamese officials, or were there any Vietnamese officials?

RIVES: There were a few, but most of the Vietnamese I dealt with were people like our landlord.

Q: What was the general feeling in the Consulate concerning the Viet Minh? Who were they, and what did we think about them?

RIVES: We thought that everybody around us was Viet Minh, actually. We had a wonderful chef in our apartment over the Consulate. We also had a perfectly gorgeous Vietnamese girl who took care of us but who was married to a man we were all convinced was a Viet Minh. We had no proof of that.

Q: Were any Americans targets of the Viet Minh?

RIVES: No, not while I was there.

Q: Was Ho Chi Minh a person one thought about?

RIVES: Yes, but at that time, as far as I was concerned, we followed the line, which was that Ho Chi Minh was bad, etcetera, etcetera... I don't think we had realized yet that he was a communist but not a "real" communist, so to speak.

Q: Did you travel out in the countryside?

RIVES: Oh, you couldn't go out very far. Too dangerous. We used to go out and visit the occasional Foreign Legion post on the outskirts of town, things like that, but we'd have to be back in before dark.

Q: Did this make you feel, a bit, like you were under siege?

RIVES: Oh, yes. Definitely. Oh, yes.

Q: Where did you go to get out?

RIVES: We flew to Hong Kong, although Consul Sturm did not approve of anybody getting leave. In the year I got one brief weekend there.

Q: Good God! This was your first smaller post... How did Consul Sturm operate.

RIVES: He was a brilliant political officer, bilingual in French, but "...as an administrator...[he was] absolutely hopeless." I am quoting Ambassador Donald Heath's remarks on my efficiency report, which were very bad by Paul Sturm, but Mr. Heath saved me by that kind of remark.

Q: What was your impression of the French military?

RIVES: They were good. Just to meet them like that... I don't know what you'd call them, exactly, compared to the American military. I wouldn't have said they were as organized as we were. They were a really gung ho bunch, and actually, most of them in the Hanoi area that I met were professionals. I met the officers and, of course, the Foreign Legion, people like that. They had all sorts of odd people.

Q: What did we have in Hanoi... well, it would have to have been a Consulate at that time. Did we have anything in Saigon?

RIVES: Yes, there was a full embassy in Saigon which supervised all three countries, Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia.

Q: Did you go down there at all?

RIVES: Well, I stopped there on the way to Hanoi, but I didn't go back there again until I was transferred to Laos as Charge, and then I went back.

Q: Sounds like they really kept you trapped!

RIVES: Yes, pretty much.

Q: What were the visa matters.

RIVES: A few Vietnamese tried to go the U.S., occasionally, and some Chinese. But they'd have to have pretty legitimate reasons [to be approved] to go. A lot of them were trying to get out, you know, that kind of thing.

Q: Were there any Americans there who were having problems?

RIVES: I can't remember any Americans there except at the Consulate and the AID mission -- we had an AID officer -- but that was all.

SCOTT COHEN
Foreign Broadcasting Information Service (FBIS) Officer
Saigon (1951-1953)

Scott Cohen was born in Boston. He joined the Foreign Broadcasting Information Service (FBIS) in 1949 and served in Saigon (1951-1953). He then became an assistant to Senator Charles Percy and served as a foreign affairs advisor to the senator when he was on the Foreign Relations Committee. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You came into the FBIS in 1949. I would like to focus on your experience. You went to Saigon in 1951.

COHEN: Yes, I arrived there the first week of February 1951 to complete a negotiation with the French High Command and the Vietnamese Army for a joint radio monitoring operation out of a suburb of Saigon. That was quickly concluded, and I think we were reporting as soon as the second or third week, maybe the third week in February 1951, by radio teletype to Washington.

Q: What was your impression of Saigon? This was '51. What was the situation there?

COHEN: Saigon then was a beautiful French provincial town with an educated middle class, a very attractive people, who, to a large extent, were fascinated with the French way of life and adopted much of French style and culture. Next to Saigon was the city of Cholon with half a million Chinese who maintained their own culture and seemed less interested in French culture.

The political situation, it was the time of the Bao Dai experiment when Bao Dai was named emperor of Vietnam, largely due to American pressure on the French to establish some Vietnamese government that had a semblance of credibility and integrity. But, in fact, he was a puppet of the French. And in his ministries, there were installed Vietnamese at the top level and beside them French advisors, who, to a great extent, ran those ministries. They had more experience, but that's not why they were running them. They were running them because France was in charge. It was called the Union of Associated States of Indochina, which included Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. There was clear French control, and the French were also training, under Bao Dai, a Vietnamese army of indifferent quality.

Q: If you had to deal with any problems, did you go to the Vietnamese or to the French?

COHEN: I had counterparts in the monitoring business, a French commandant whose name was Besnier, a very impressive man in the French High Command -- I guess that's the rank of major in our army -- and a Vietnamese colonel representing the Vietnamese Army. I had the smoothest of relations with them. And when there were difficulties, I could meet with them and resolve the difficulties very easily. We had a similar goal: to find out what the dissident radio stations were broadcasting. And there were many. It wasn't just the Viet Minh at that time. Even the Cao Dai had a radio station.

Q: Cao Dai being sort of a religious sect, weren't they?

COHEN: A religious and political sect. I knew their Pope who had a spiritual bent and an army of ten thousand, a very interesting man, and some day I'd like to tell the story of the Cao Dai. I got to know him on a very personal basis and went to Tay-Ninh, his capital, forty miles from Saigon, many times. But there was also a Buddhist sect with a radio station. I suppose, at any given time, there were about ten to fifteen different authorities broadcasting in Vietnam, and what they were saying was important to us.

Q: Were we only listening there to monitor them, or were we using it also as a monitoring station for other areas, too?

COHEN: We were interested only in Indochina. There was a larger monitoring station in the Pacific which listened to China.

Q: I see. You came back to Washington in 1952?

RICHARD C. MATHERON
Special Technical and Economic Mission
Saigon (1951-1953)

Special Technical and Economic Mission

Hue (1953-1956)

Richard C. Matheron was born in California in 1927. He joined ECA in 1949 and in 1956 became a Foreign Service Officer serving in France, Vietnam, Italy, Nigeria, Cameroon, Upper Volta, Madagascar, and was ambassador to Swaziland. He was interviewed by Lee Cotterman in 1989.

MATHERON: After being in Paris for two years as a records and communications person, I wanted to get into more substantive work. I was able to get an assignment to the Special Technical and Economic Mission in Saigon, which was opened there in 1951. Robert Blum was the first mission chief. I spent from 1951 to 1957 in Vietnam, of course with home leave and other trips outside the country.

It was particularly when I was assigned to Hue in 1953 as the only American official in Central Vietnam that I got interested in political work. My responsibilities had to do with economic development, but every time I went to Saigon, I was invited over to the embassy to chat with the ambassador and DCM about developments in Hue, which was the former imperial capital, where there were still members of the royal family.

Q: Was that Ambassador Heath, sir?

MATHERON: That was Ambassador Heath. Ed Gullion was DCM, followed by -- all of a sudden his name escapes me, [later Ambassador Matheron recalled it was Robert (Rob) McClintock], and I'm really embarrassed, because he is one of the people who most inspired me. Pat Byrne was at the embassy at that time. I think you were there yourself about that time.

Q: Yes, I was. I left in about October 1953 for an administrative position in the embassy, where I'd been for two years, just before Dienbienphu, as a matter of fact.

MATHERON: I was in Hue at the time of Dienbienphu, when all the French troops were taken out of Hue. I remember that the embassy thought that we ought to completely close down our operation in Hue, but I was able to prevail upon the ambassador to let us go back. There were two of us. Because we had the assurances of the French general that if he had to evacuate, he would take us with him. I thought that the Vietnamese were looking so carefully at what we were doing that it would cause panic if we pulled out first. They thought that even though I was the economic mission person, I must be wired into the White House directly. They almost used to camp on the doorstep to see whether we were going to stay in the area.

Anyway, the point I was trying to make was that because of the encouragement of friends from the embassy, I really thought that I wanted a career as a Foreign Service officer. Another person who encouraged me to take the Foreign Service exam was John Gunther Dean, who was also in the economic mission at that time, and who was just about ready to become a Foreign Service officer himself. He has gone on to a fantastic career. I think he's had at least five different ambassadorships in the last few years.

But to make a long story short, I took the written examination at the embassy in 1955, and passed the exam, much to my surprise. In 1956, I took my oral exam in the ambassador's office. Reinhardt was ambassador at that time, and it was he and Mack Godley, who was chargé d'affaires in Cambodia, and another man, later recalled to be Consul General in Singapore, "Durby" Durbrow, as chairman. I took the exam in Saigon. Those were the old days when they asked you to sit outside while they deliberated on whether you had passed or not. I went outside.

Q: And nervously sat there outside.

MATHERON: Sat outside for about half an hour or 45 minutes. I'd been asked one question to which the chairman of the board had said I was dead wrong in my answer, and I was quite convinced I was right. I had said that the Chinese Exclusion Act was enacted in 1882. Chairman Durbrow insisted it was much later. I didn't know whether he was testing me for my knowledge or whether he was testing my willingness to stand up and defend a position, but I defended it. I was very happy there was an Encyclopedia Britannica in the ambassador's outer office, and so while these gentlemen were deliberating, I looked up my question and knew I was right. I was practically holding it in my hand, ready to defend my position again if he'd come out and said I hadn't passed the exam. But when he came out and shook my hand and congratulated me on passing it, I didn't press the issue any further.

I then left what was not yet AID, I think it was called MSA in those days or United States Operations Mission, and became a full-fledged Foreign Service officer in May of 1957, when I went to the A-100 course. My first assignment as an FSO was in Rome as commercial officer.

BERTHA POTTS
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Saigon (1952-1954)

Bertha Potts was born in California in 1915. After receiving her degree from San Jose State College, she became a member of the WACS. Her career has included positions in Bangkok, Saigon, Lyon, Algiers, Vientiane, and Rabat. Ms. Potts was interviewed by Howell S. Teeple on February 19, 1999.

POTTS: Just two years. Then I got the orders to Saigon.

Q: Did you still remember your 100 hours of Berlitz French?

POTTS: I had to do a little review which I did in Redwood City on home leave with my mother. I found a student at Stanford University who helped me.

Q: This was 1952 or 1953?

POTTS: This was 1952. I spent 1952-54 in Saigon.

Q: Again as a cultural officer?

POTTS: Yes.

Q: This was before any real buildup of our forces in Vietnam.

POTTS: Oh, yes. We were not involved at all.

Q: But it was at the time of the French debacle there.

POTTS: Yes, and I was there at the time of Dien Bien Phu. I was there the day we were all assigned to go down to the docks where people were coming off ships, the great exodus from the north. We were given tins of milk to hand to the people and were asked to give them only to the elderly, pregnant women or little children.

Q: These were Vietnamese refugees from the north?

POTTS: Yes. They were so afraid of us that they wouldn't even take the milk. They thought we were going to poison them.

Q: Did they think you were French?

POTTS: No, they thought from their experience in the north that we were going to poison them.

WILLIAM J. CUNNINGHAM
General Services Assistant
Saigon (1952-1954)

William J. Cunningham was born in Santa Monica, California in 1926 and educated at the University of New Mexico. He entered the Foreign Service in 1949. His career included posts in Prague, Seoul, Tokyo, Saigon, Sapporo, Phnom Penh and Taipei. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

CUNNINGHAM: The upshot of all of this was that by 1952 the eligibility on the written examination had expired. I had to go to square one and start all over again because I didn't have enough French to meet the language requirement. I didn't have enough Spanish either though I had studied Spanish at the University of New Mexico. My French by this time was better than my Spanish so I decided that I had better emphasize that. When I got to Washington in the summer of 1952 and went into Foreign Service personnel in the Department, I said, "I want to pass the Foreign Service examination but I need a language to do it. French is the one I am working on and I don't want to leave Asia." They said, "Great, we will send you to Saigon." So I went to Saigon in September of 1952.

Q: How long were you there?

CUNNINGHAM: I was assigned there until November of 1954.

Q: How long were you actually there?

CUNNINGHAM: I was there all that time – 26 months. The reason I say assigned there was because from July of 1954 to November of 1954 I was working half time in each of two posts - - in Phnom Penh and in Saigon. Again I was in an administrative capacity. When I arrived in Saigon I was assigned as a general services assistant so I was taking care of property, effects, shipping, all kinds of stuff like that, the usual general services work. It was a very large establishment that we had there. We had something like 20 or 25 residences and a couple of apartment buildings.

In the spring of 1954 the final military defeat of the French occurred at Dien Bien Phu and the five powers - Russia, the U.S., Britain, France and China - were convening in Geneva again to try to sort out the Asian situation in the wake of the Korean War which had concluded the previous summer in 1953 with the armistice agreement. They reached an agreement on Indochina. The deal was that the French would get out and that the three Indochina states would become fully independent sovereign countries. Up to that time they had been known as the Associated States of the French Commonwealth, or something like that.

The American ambassador in Saigon, Donald Heath, was accredited also to the governments of Laos and Cambodia. With the entry into force of the Geneva accords on the first of July 1954, U.S. diplomatic representation in Vientiane and Phnom Penh was to be raised to full diplomatic status and we were to have a resident ambassador in each of those posts rather than a chargé d'affaires.

The embassy in Cambodia on the first of July or the 30th of June, 1954 consisted of a chargé d'affaires, Joseph Montllor, a code clerk, another guy who was ostensibly an embassy staffer but was actually the CIA station chief though a very junior one, an AID representative, and a USIS officer. There were five Americans in the American country team in Cambodia at that time. All of this was going to change and a full embassy was going to be instituted there.

Robert McClintock, who was deputy chief of mission in Saigon at this time, was designated to be the first resident American ambassador in Phnom Penh. He had become aware of my work in the general services section of the American embassy and he said, "I know whom I want as my administrative officer. I want Bill Cunningham," who was at this time an FSS-11. I think I had lost the temporary ten and had fallen back to an 11. He asked me if I would like to do it and I said, "Sure." I felt confident that I could do it.

Off I went at the beginning of July to Phnom Penh. We used to have the CIA airline, Civil Air Transport or CAT, as it was known, which operated throughout Asia and it had a regular flight twice a week up to Phnom Penh. What I used to do was catch a plane Monday morning and fly up to Phnom Penh, work there until Thursday at noon, and catch the afternoon flight back to Saigon. Because I had no replacement in Saigon and they couldn't release me, I would work my job in Saigon Thursday evening, Friday, Saturday, and a good part of Sunday, then I would take off again on Monday morning to Phnom Penh to help them with their administrative work there.

That was a real adventure.

The American embassy up until the first of July 1954 had been located on the second floor of a little downtown building in Phnom Penh not far from the banks of the Tonle Sap, which flows into the Mekong a few miles farther south. The office was over the top of a pepper shop that was owned by a French colonial woman, and the building faced the broad, tree-lined mall, which ran from the front of the railway station a kilometer away right down to the Tonle Sap. . She had been there for a long time and her husband started a pepper plantation. He died and she was a widow and she was selling pepper. She was a rather difficult person. There was no way that we could expand there and we had to find someplace else to put the embassy.

There was a building under construction elsewhere in Phnom Penh being erected by a Sino-Cambodian businessman. Montllor had thought of that building and said that would make a great building for our American diplomatic establishment that was going to be set up there. "But," he said, "it is only a two story building. If we could get him to add two floors to the building it will work and we will have enough space." I got a hold of the architect who was a Frenchman. He had designed the building and I talked with him. He said, "Yes, this foundation is strong enough and we can put two more floors on top of the building."

We then got in the midst of a very complicated deal to figure out how we were going to get these two floors added to this building and get it done in time to be able to accommodate the growing staff. People were already beginning to come up from Saigon and elsewhere to report in. We had to find some kind of office space for them because this space over the top of the pepper shop was not going to be adequate.

There was a lot of AID counterpart money around at that point. I can't remember all the particulars now but I became deeply involved with negotiations with the Sino-Cambodian businessman, the architect, and the AID comptroller to figure out some way whereby we could front money for the construction of the building and then credit that against the eventual lease payments that we would make to this businessman. We worked out a deal, and work began on the building with a total of four floors, configured to requirements of the Embassy. I managed to get this worked out about September or October.

Meantime, the U.S. official establishment was growing and I had to find temporary office space, so I started looking around town. Somebody said there was an abandoned Masonic lodge in the other part of town that would make pretty good temporary quarters for us. I went and looked it over, and negotiated a lease on that.

Now this Masonic lodge was a very substantial large two-story building and it was built in the colonial style, which is to say with 15 foot ceilings and very large windows that were closed by shutters. There were no glass windows in it, and there was no way of cutting off the outside air. You couldn't air condition the building without installing glass windows. That would be too expensive of a job to do, particularly since it was temporary space. What I had to do was get ceiling fans installed in the building and somehow or other make it comfortable. McClintock was very good about this.

The fortunate thing was that we moved in there in I think September of 1954 and about that time of the year the humidity begins to decline in Cambodia, and the weather becomes cooler. It becomes bearable, if you have a ceiling fan and dress informally. I had spent enough time up in Cambodia seeing friends over the previous two years that I knew that would work. My gambit was to get everybody into the old Masonic lodge over the cool months and get the four-story embassy building completed before the monsoon hit in April. In late March, early April, it really starts to heat up. By the middle of April you are just praying for the first rain in Cambodia to cool things off.

That year I worked harder than I think I have ever worked almost any other time in my life. I was working two jobs up until November. Finally a replacement for me in Saigon arrived in November and I was then able to move full time up to Cambodia and act as the administrative officer there.

Q: I would like to go back to your arrival now and then we will pick up Cambodia again. I would like to go back to September of '52 when you arrived. Who was ambassador? Can you sort of describe the atmosphere in Saigon at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: Donald Heath was ambassador to the three Associated States of Indochina - - Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, resident in Saigon at that time. This war had been going on by then almost six years since the collapse of the negotiations between the French and Ho Chi Minh. The French were not making it; it was quite obvious.

It was not safe to travel in the countryside. In fact shortly before I arrived in Saigon two American women on the staff of the Embassy had been shot on the golf course, which was just on the outskirts of Saigon, by the guerillas. Whenever you went into a movie theater in Saigon in those days you were shaken down because it used to be a habit of the Viet Minh to go into the movies, carry a bomb in, and roll it down under the seats so that it would go off in the front of the movie theater. That had happened a few times. On rue Catinat (later Tu Do), here was a little hill that went down towards the Saigon River with open-air French style cafes on both sides. Viet Minh sympathizers or agents would sometimes ride by in cyclopousses and throw a bomb into the cafes as they went through. There were no incidents of this kind as I recall during the time that I was in Saigon but there had been earlier on and there were precautions of various kinds.

You could not travel outside of the city safely. You could go up to Dalat, which was the hill station, but you had to go by military convoy and they only went twice a week. I made that trip a couple of times. Sometimes it was safe to travel to Cap St. Jacques, now called Vung Tau, which was the beach resort down at the mouth of the Saigon River. In general the government... (end of tape)

Q: You were saying there were times you could travel?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, we could travel safely to other parts of South Vietnam at times, and other times you could not. I would say about half the time I was there, it was not safe to travel outside of the city of Saigon except in military convoy and even in some cases military convoys were not safe and were brought under attack.

The French were very suspicious of our involvement in Vietnam. They felt we were trying to take over their colony for them, or in some way evict them from Vietnam. We were trying to assure them that we were not interested in displacing them, but we felt it was necessary to give the South Vietnamese more independence, more latitude, in order to be more willing to support the war against the Viet Minh. That was generally the atmosphere as I recall it at that time.

Q: Before the Geneva accords in '54, what was the situation? In '52 was all of Vietnam a French colony or did we have a real embassy there?

CUNNINGHAM: We had a real embassy in Saigon, yes, and a consul general in Hanoi. That embassy had been established in about 1950 at which time the French had changed the relationship of Vietnam to France to something like a commonwealth country. Bao Dai was on the throne still as the “emperor” of Vietnam, but there was a French governor general and the French had very strong influence over the governing of Vietnam. There was a civil Vietnamese Government, with a President, Vice President and legislature. Vietnam, however, was not a truly independent country and my impression was it was not even as independent as Canada was at the time. For example, the Vietnamese piaster was linked to the French franc and the French set the exchange rate for the piaster. The Vietnamese did not have independent control of the value of their own currency. There was the same kind of thing as the British practice, commonwealth preference, so far as the importation and exportation of goods from Vietnam was concerned. It was part of the Franc bloc and it was a possession of the French.

There were about 250,000 troops engaged in the military effort against the Viet Minh at the time. It was a combination of French troops, French colonials from Senegal, Algeria, and other places in the French empire, and Vietnamese troops. There was not an independent Vietnamese army. The army of Vietnam was established about 1953 when de Lattre de Tassigny came out and established the first battalion of an independent army of the Republic of Vietnam. Prior to that time all of the Vietnamese troops were simply troops in the French armed forces fighting against the Viet Minh. It was not a fully sovereign country. It had limited self-rule within the French Commonwealth.

Cambodia was a little bit more independent. It was a protectorate of France and the French were responsible for defense and foreign relations, and the Cambodians were responsible for internal administration but always under the direction of a French prefect. The same was pretty much true of Laos, also.

Q: What was the attitude of the staff of the American embassy in Saigon towards the French at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: I'm trying to think back now to this. We were really walking a bit of a tightrope there. On the one hand we were trying to maintain a cordial relationship with the French and persuade them that it was our intention to support their defense of Vietnam against communist aggression. At the same time I think we were growing more and more aware of the importance of nationalism as an element in the political situation in Vietnam, and we were trying to cultivate some good will I suppose with the Vietnamese. That's about as closely as I can characterize it at the time.

Q: I was just wondering whether it was one of these things where we were sort of thinking of the French as not really doing things very well and we could do it better and all of that?

CUNNINGHAM: Well there was a certain amount of that, certainly, so far as the prosecution of the war was concerned, and a lot of criticism of the French conduct of the military campaign, particularly that they were conducting it as a colonial war rather than as a war for the sovereign integrity of Vietnam as a sovereign country entitled to self-rule. We thought they ought to give the Vietnamese a little more latitude.

Q: What about the events leading up to and including the end of that at Dien Bien Phu, which really started at the beginning of 1954? What was our reaction to that?

CUNNINGHAM: As I recall, the Americans were just as much taken by surprise by the way Dien Bien Phu turned out as the French were. I don't recall that there was that much skepticism on the part of the Americans, particularly the military advisors there. I could be mistaken on this but I don't recall that the Americans were advising the French not to concentrate their forces in Dien Bien Phu. It was quite evident by the time that the French elected this strategy, that the French war against the Viet Minh was not succeeding and that the Viet Minh were gradually gaining, and gaining, and gaining. Something had to be done. The French elected to concentrate a very large force at Dien Bien Phu. I don't think that the Americans advised them against it, that is not my impression.

Of course for a time the French concentrated forces up there and everything seemed to be going well. At first they were not being brought under attack. What no one expected was that the Viet Minh would be able to lug, and actually would lug, artillery over the mountainous terrain and set it up on the perimeter around the valley. I do recall at the time somebody saying – I think it was one of the military groups there – that the French didn't think they needed to take the high ground. Of course now they were being finished off like fish in a barrel.

Q: What about social life there? Were the Vietnamese included in the social life or was it pretty much with the French?

CUNNINGHAM: A lot of it was with the French and what social life there was involving the Vietnamese I think was to some extent... There were some people in the embassy now who worked very hard at cultivating the Vietnamese. What you have to understand is we had no Vietnamese language officers in the embassy at that time. All conversation with the Vietnamese was conducted in French. Therefore you had contact only with Vietnamese who spoke English or French. If you had contact with a Vietnamese who spoke neither English nor French, it was via an interpreter and it was English to French to Vietnamese most typically. There were very few people who could interpret between English and Vietnamese. A few of my Vietnamese staff in the embassy, for example, spoke English but there were only two whom I relied upon to serve as interpreters to Vietnamese contractors, vendors, and so forth, who I dealt with in the general services office.

Q: Was there any concern about penetration of our embassy by the Viet Minh?

CUNNINGHAM: Not that I recall, no. We did not feel particularly vulnerable in that respect. The French were the ones who were the objects of antagonism for the Vietnamese and I don't recall that we necessarily felt vulnerable to the Viet Minh.

Q: Was there any concern as Dien Bien Phu was really going through its last agony that we might intervene? I know the French were trying to get us to intervene and it was being considered back in Washington. I was wondering what the attitude was in Vietnam?

CUNNINGHAM: I think the attitude in Saigon at that point was that it was hopeless. Dien Bien Phu was gone. It was over with. It was finished. You see one thing that happened was, during the period of Dien Bien Phu I remember very clearly one morning while the final battles were going on over there we were all awoken by a huge explosion about 4:00 in the morning. The Viet Minh sappers had gotten through the perimeter and blown up the P.O.L. dump, which was out in one part of town. Then about a half-hour to 45 minutes later there was another huge explosion. This one was closer in, and it was the French army's ammo dump.

So here at a time when the French army was fighting for its life in Dien Bien Phu the sappers had blown up the P.O.L. supply and blown up the ammo dump in Saigon. That convinced everybody in the establishment, I think, that it was over with. If the French could not protect their main stronghold in South Vietnam at a time when their army was under attack and fighting for its life in the north, they were not going to be able to hold onto Vietnam; that was the end of it. Of course the negotiations at this time were beginning to pick up in Geneva, so the handwriting on the wall was very clear. Everybody knew that it was over at that point.

Those two explosions by the way broke windows in the ambassador's residence and I had to get busy the next morning. As a matter of fact what made McClintock pick me out a few weeks later to be his Administrative Officer in Phnom Penh was that I got the windows in his residence fixed very quickly. That's how I got my job in Cambodia. It was truly an extraordinary opportunity. I was an FSS-11 or maybe an FSS-10 at the time. I had a minor supervisory position. I had no training in fiscal or personnel management, which are major responsibilities of an administrative officer. I did like managing things and getting difficult jobs done. And I was still single, mobile, young, and adventurous.

Q: Such are Foreign Service careers made.

CUNNINGHAM: That's right.

Q: Coming back to Phnom Penh...

CUNNINGHAM: There are a couple of more things that I would like to say about Saigon before we leave it, and again it is sort of a personal reflection on it. Once the Geneva accords were agreed to, 90 days was allowed for people to evacuate from the north to the south, and of course the French also were given 90 days to get their troops out.

There were three things that I remember very clearly about this period. One was the speed with which the French pulled out. They pulled out so fast that we actually began to protest that they were leaving too quickly and they were going to cause the collapse of Vietnam particularly by departing so quickly. I think all the French troops were out within 60 days rather than 90. They were not interested in staying any longer at all.

The second thing is the arrival of Ngo Dinh Diem. I remember very clearly the day that he arrived; it was in early July of 1954. It was the first time in my life that I saw spontaneous demonstrations in the streets of Saigon or almost anywhere. There weren't a lot of people that came out but people did come out and I remember that there was sort of a spontaneity and optimism about his arrival and the welcome that he was given at that time.

The third thing that I remember is the evacuation of refugees from North Vietnam. There was a huge stream of them. There was an airlift almost constantly from North Vietnam into Ton Son Nhut airport. I was out at the airport frequently on other business and every time I went out there, there were transport planes of all descriptions, one after another, landing and discharging North Vietnamese refugees. This was a major airlift, with planes of all descriptions landing one after the other. Again I remember these people coming off of those planes and having a dazed look about them. These were people who had been uprooted from their ancestral villages where their families had lived for generations and they were brought into a strange land. Their dress was different. Their language was different. They didn't know where they were. It was really a very moving and pathetic sight.

Not only that, I remember very well the transport ships. American military transports were finally pressed into service to help evacuate North Vietnamese from North Vietnam to South Vietnam within the 90-day period, and they were jammed. Those ships were pulling up in the Saigon River right across the street from the Majestic Hotel at the foot of Rue Catinat, or Tu Do as it was later called, and there were people all over the decks; they were burdened with people. A lot of them were people who were not allowed to leave their villages and go to the evacuation ports. They had actually launched themselves into the sea on whatever kind of craft, or even just a floating piece of wood that they could get, to get out into the shipping lanes and be picked up by ships that were coming south.

There were several hundred thousands who evacuated in that period to South Vietnam. That left a very deep impression on me. Within five years I had seen people fleeing tyranny in three different countries, in two different parts of the world, and those are indelible memories that I just can't forget. I think they have to be part of the record nowadays. Those of us who remember have to let others know what the experiences were like. Anyway, that's pretty much it for Saigon.

HOWARD R. SIMPSON
Press Officer
Saigon (1952-1955)

Information Officer

Saigon (1964-1965)

Howard R. Simpson was born in 1925 and raised in Alameda, California. In 1943, he was drafted into the Army and served three dutiful campaigns in the European Theater. He returned to the United States in 1945, and, under the influence of the GI Bill, continued his educational ambitions in San Francisco and later in Paris. Simpson joined the Foreign Service in 1951, where he served in Vietnam, Nigeria, France, and Algeria. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 10th, 1994.

SIMPSON: Well, my first assignment was Saigon and I was assigned to Saigon as an information clerk.

Q: This was in '51?

SIMPSON: This is in '51 as an information clerk. I got there in '52 after the Washington training. And I arrived there and Lee Brady was the Public Affairs Officer and I was immediately caught up in this thing. The Foreign Service in those days was a little different. There were a lot of opportunities. It wasn't so stratified. And within a very short time I found myself Assistant Press Officer and then a short time later Embassy Press Officer. And with that situation in Indochina during the war. The French war. It meant that I was also assigned later as Official War Correspondent to the French, Franco-Vietnamese forces, fighting the Viet Minh at the time.

Q: I just want to nail down the dates, you came into the State Department in '51 and you went almost out immediately to Saigon. So you were there from '52 until...?

SIMPSON: I was there from '52 until '55.

Q: '55 okay. When you got to Saigon, in the first place, was our Embassy in Saigon? What did we have in Hanoi?

SIMPSON: We had a consulate in Hanoi and we had, when I first got to Saigon, it was an Embassy but it had been a Legation before that. But it had become an Embassy that was serving the Associated States of Indochina -- Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam. Ambassador Donald Heath was the man in place at the time and there was the USIS organization as far as information. And the American Aid Mission had a big information operation and there was quite a bit of duplication, a little rivalry because they had all the money.

Q: Oh yes.

SIMPSON: And it was finally pulled together. It finally worked out all right. But it was a very colorful time. I mean Saigon in those days was a -- you could say it was a bachelor's dream. It was sort of a Terry and the Pirates atmosphere, good food, good drink, the war at your doorstep. Strange things going on all over and you learned very fast the realities of intrigue and the variations of shades of grey.

Q: The war at that point was with the Viet Minh.

Q: And was this down in the Saigon area as well as up in the delta area, the Red River area?

SIMPSON: The fighting in the North was more structured, it was, Giap had produced and brought out his divisions and the Delta French had a lot of severe blows up there, they were struggling to contain. At the same time the war was going on in the South, more in a guerrilla mode with the railroads being blown up and land mines on the roads. Saigon closed down, I mean the roads were closed at about 5 o'clock and you couldn't travel on them, any roads leading out of Saigon, going or coming, you couldn't move. And the villages were all sort of buttoned down at a certain hour. Pillboxes and all that sort of thing, so the war was in the South as well as in the North but it was more guerrilla sporadic in the South.

Q: What were your impressions of the Embassy during this period. In the first place how did Donald Heath operate?

SIMPSON: Well I think that, looking back on it, I think it operated pretty well considering that it was a comparatively small Embassy to cover such a big spread of territory. Heath was a professional with a wry sense of humor and a great temper that didn't usually show itself unless he was provoked. He also wore a broad brimmed fedora all the time which was sort of his mark and we, the young Turks of the Embassy, sometimes accused him of being too conservative and following the French line. But I don't think we were aware at that time, one of our big objectives was to keep France active in NATO and on-the-line in Europe and that any slight problem in Indochina would reflect there too. The French were just beginning to tire of that whole war out there and they had lost a lot of people. And we were moving in to pay for a lot of it. So the Embassy was busy in a reporting mode in the field as well as in Saigon, politicians and all that and the attachés, military attachés were busy all the time and the military aid mission -- MAAG - - Military Aid and Advisory Group, was running what they'd call end-use missions out in the field. They would go check on American equipment to see how it was being used and the French would have these tactics where they would be using the new equipment brought in for Vietnamese units and they'd hear that an end-use mission was coming. So they'd rush this equipment back to the Vietnamese. So the Americans when they visited would see it and then the French would take it back again. I used to accompany these end-use missions from the information side, you know to show American aid was reaching the Vietnamese, etc. And often the French jeep that was suppose to arrive at 10 in the morning didn't arrive until 1 in the afternoon. The best ploy that the French had to keep us away from any real source of material was the big lunch, the big noontime lunch. Where you'd start with pastis, whatever, and then you'd go through a couple of wines under the hot tropical sun and then you'd have some cognac or Armagnac and by the time you come from that you'd be practically prolapsed and it'd be too late. It'd be time to close the road so you'd have to rush back to wherever you were going.

Q: What were our military attachés doing -- what was our military role at that time?

SIMPSON: We had decided that the French were fighting the good fight in Indochina. This was primarily because of the Korean War and we were trying -- you know the Domino Theory -- trying to keep Southeast Asia and that peninsula out of communist hands. So the American military had to liaise very closely with the French. In the field as well as in Saigon and all this American equipment was pouring in including aircraft, tanks, etc. So there was a lot of working together there and there were a lot of visitors. You know the usual VIP visitors from the Pentagon, from Washington or from the Philippines or from the American bases in Tokyo. And the object was to see that the French got what they needed and then hopefully that they were using it the way it should be used. We were supplying not just equipment but also the money. So in other words, they were holding the left flank in the Far East as far as Washington was concerned. And the French government, one government after another was falling in France often and the Indochina issue was hot. There was a lot of opposition to the war and the army was getting fed-up because they figured they weren't getting what they needed. So it was a constant crisis situation.

Q: What sort of contacts did you have with the French for example?

SIMPSON: Well we had constant contacts with them because we worked with their information service, we were involved in psychological warfare at that time. This was interesting because the Foreign Service Institute hardly prepared you for that sort of thing. And one of the first assignments I was given, being press officer, being in Saigon was, "Don't forget Tuesday is the meeting of the Joint Psychological Warfare Board. And you're going to be the American representative." I knew very little about psychological warfare as did most of the people on the board. This was a joint, there were Vietnamese, French and Americans who sat down and the presiding officer was a French colonel, a parachute officer, who thought propaganda was a joke, anyway. But we had these meetings. That was one way we were working with the French closely. Then we had contacts with a lot of French newspapermen, a lot of media representatives that we were in constant touch with. And also the French, let's see: there was the government information, the army information. They were both sort of competing, we had to touch base with them all the time. And then there were the French officials, who were on the scene. And then there was Hanoi, we'd travel up to Hanoi quite often and there was a different picture up there.

Q: What was the situation around Hanoi?

SIMPSON: It was, you know, Saigon is sort of a garden spot, everything grows, a beautiful city. At least it can be. But Hanoi is sort of grey. The weather can be very bad, you get grey skies, grey streets, rain, the people, some of them are dressed in grey, black. And it's just a different atmosphere altogether. Add to that the fact that the hot war was going on up there. It was altogether a different atmosphere. You arrive in Hanoi, there were tanks parked. Everybody driving in Saigon, officers driving in jeeps would be driving very slowly and probably well dressed. Up there they'd be whipping through the streets in camouflage outfits and mud all over their jeeps. So you had a different atmosphere and the Tonkinese had been fighting in that war on either side for so long that there was a totally different picture. And you realized how serious the war was. It wasn't guerrilla anymore, we're talking divisions and artillery and all that sort of thing.

Q: What was the feeling about, at that time, the Viet Minh in the Embassy. How did we feel about that?

SIMPSON: Well there were, I suppose you could say there were, two schools of thought, in a way. There were those -- Americans -- who would specialize not so much in Indochina but in Southeast Asia who realized that possibly a golden opportunity had been missed with Ho Chi Minh. You know right after the war when we had helped his fledgling army fight the Japanese in Tonkin. The OSS, that had been lost because we'd gone ahead with the French and had followed through and yet there was still a possibility. There was always talk of a third force. But nobody knew really what the bloody third force was but everybody was looking for it! And then there was the other side that saw it more in black and white. That the Viet Minh were the vanguard of the Chinese armies that would eventually move down like they had in China and extend their power. And the Viet Minh would be their frontmen all throughout Southeast Asia. And so there was some confusion there and also the other problem was that the Viet Minh, placing them in the context of France's future, one of our great goals was to build up the Vietnamese National Army which eventually became the ARVN but there was no backbone there. I don't mean they weren't brave and a lot of them did fight well, but there was no cadre, no reason, no national reason. Whereas the Viet Minh were schooled and trained and believed so much in their cause that they'd take heavy losses and still keep coming back. As they always did. Whereas the National Army, they'd throw these units together, they'd have a French officer. They'd try time and time again. They'd go out on an operation and then they'd just get chopped to pieces because they just did not operate well. And that was our big goal. To build a National Army that would take over the role of national operations.

Q: Did you have a feeling that, we're talking about this time, and here the French were in charge and we're talking about this fighting in a battle that eventually they're going to lose. But the French and Americans have never mixed well together and I suppose we were full of ideas. How did this work together?

SIMPSON: Well it didn't. In a way, it's the tragedy of the whole thing. As I mentioned, this parachute officer, this Joint Psychological Warfare Board. One of the first things I saw, the French idea of propaganda leaflet was a photo of a French soldier with a submachine gun, standing over about 4 Viet Minh dead. And the words in French and Vietnamese were: If you don't surrender, this will happen to you. It doesn't take a Ph.D. in psychology to figure out that #1 it'll infuriate whoever picks it up or #2 it'll make them laugh and say what idiots these people are. I went to one of the first air drops that went on over so-called enemy lines, in an old Junkers just packed with these leaflets being dropped in the jungle, which was a waste of time. And we often would try to, okay we were naive, we were newcomers, we really didn't know Indochina, we didn't know the people and the French of course resented our presence anyway, particularly military. But we would try to make our little contribution and try to straighten things that we thought were going wrong. And there were inevitable clashes. Particularly with journalists because as USIS officers we were there to help what we could as far as visiting journalist went, not just Americans, British, French and the rest. And there was censorship at the time and all outgoing dispatches would have to be censored so at times the French censor would lay it out with a heavy hand and block stuff that there were no reasons to have blocked. So there were those little irritations. On a higher level, the American military would often come in with what I could see were crazy ideas about what should be done. General Iron Mike O'Daniel was the head of MAAG at one point and before he became head of MAAG he used to fly in. And this was at the time of Dienbienphu. He used to fly in to talk to General Navarre, the French commander and at one point he suggested we should just enclose the whole of North Vietnam in barbed wire, the whole secure area. And that way the "Viet Minh can't get in and they can't get out." Well #1 this is a physical impossibility. Then he wanted to build pillboxes behind this barbed wire, a major cement contract, plus the fact he wanted to man these with Vietnamese troops. Well #2 you didn't have the Vietnamese troops to do it and the French were pulling their hair out every time he arrived because he was always coming up with such ideas.

Q: How did you find dealing with the press at the time?

SIMPSON: Well I didn't find it too hard, I was to find it harder later, during our period. But in those days, the old Hotel Continental Palace in the center of Saigon, was sort of the unofficial press club. Everybody stayed there, the New York Times, Bob Shaplen of the New Yorker had a room there all the time. There were a lot of Americans, Graham Greene was in and out. And all the French, Jean Larteguy and that crowd. But as I'd started my working life as a journalist, I found it a little easier to get along with them than some of the more staid State Department officers. I mean you say information and they run for cover. But we got along well with the press and our office was sort of open house. They were in and out all the time. We couldn't do what we did for them later, you know what I mean, during the American war. We helped them and we exchanged information. We often, let's face it, I don't care where you are, it doesn't have to be in a war situation, but a good journalist who knows the country and is working there, who is in and out quite often. Sometimes he has much better contacts than the officials. It's not just a question of guiding his American official friends, but comparing notes. That way you can get some very valuable information, background. But no, it wasn't bad at all most days.

Q: How about Graham Greene. There's a major collection of Graham Greene papers here in the library. You know thinking about the genesis of The Quiet American the novel which was coming out about this time, at least he was doing his thing. Did you have contact or did you have a feel where he was coming from?

SIMPSON: Let's put it this way. I first met Greene on the terrace of the Continental Hotel. A very cool reception as far as I was concerned. I wasn't trying to make any points with him. Cool fish handshake and a sort of "Gee I wish I wasn't meeting you," sort of feeling. And I saw him off and on, different press conferences. Just said hello. And it became very obvious that everything he was writing...I'm talking about his articles, were being, okay he had his own point of view and he didn't particularly like Americans. Add to that, he disapproved completely of "American interference" in Indochina as he put it. And also, he was fed a lot of stuff by the French. He was very close to the French. He was very close to a fellow, a French editor, who ran a cultural magazine there and they were together all the time along with this fellow's mistress. In fact, he dedicates the book, The Quiet American, to them, René and Phong. But the amusing thing is, okay, Greene and I weren't the greatest of friends. And one New Year's or just before New Year's, the Viet Minh struck in central Laos, a surprise move that almost cut the country in half. And I got word of it and was to fly up there and join a parachute battalion that I'd known before, Bigear'd's outfit, who were sent in there to try to block this move. And so I arrived at Tan Son Nhut airport at about 7 in the morning and there was this little grasshopper type observation plane, waiting, with a pilot with a cigarette hanging out of his mouth. And I said, are you so-and-so and he said "Yes. We're flying to Laos?"

"That's right we're going up to Savannakhet." And he said we've got another passenger. It was New Year's day and I had a terrific hangover and along comes Graham Greene, the other passenger. And he has a terrific hangover. So here we are, hardly buddies and we both have these terrific hangovers, in this horrible observation plane that bounced all over the sky. We flew up to Savannakhet and we got out of the plane and we got in a jeep and they're driving us up to Seno. A town where the battalion was, it was hot, it was really hot and we were dying of thirst and we were looking and looking. The roads were empty, we forgot all about security. We weren't worried about that. All we wanted was a cold beer. Finally, like a miracle, we came around the corner of a road and here's this old woman sitting under a half-tent with some dried cigarettes and about 4 bottles of Tiger beer that wasn't iced, just lukewarm. So we bought the beer and we drank this beer. And I think that's the first time that Graham Greene and I ever spoke together but it didn't last long.

Q: Well do you have any feel for why he didn't like Americans, did it come out?

SIMPSON: I don't know. I didn't know that much about Greene's background. I really hadn't read that much of it. For instance, most correspondents would come in, they'd want to speak to Heath or you know, get the word from the top American, whether it'd be a General or Ambassador, just as background. And Greene never made the effort. And you just sensed it when you met him. Whether it was something that had happened earlier or whether he just decided we were going to ruin the whole show.

Q: Did you find that he was sort of immersed in Vietnamese culture?

SIMPSON: He was very interested in it. I must admit, people asked me what I thought of The Quiet American when it came out. I still think it's one of the best novels to come out of Vietnam, of that period particularly. Because he said a lot without too much effort. He caught the feel of Saigon and the period but I never got that close to him.

Q: Just a little feel. We're 2 gentlemen now in our 60's. You say Saigon was a bachelor's paradise. I mean what was the sort of social life like in Saigon.

SIMPSON: Saigon itself, the street in those days, was called "Rue Catinat" the main street stretching down to the river. And you had these hotels, the Majestic and the Continental, with their big open terraces and their tables out on the sidewalk. Because of the grenade attacks, the restaurants and many of the bars had anti-grenade netting on the doors. And the American crowd, the unquiet Americans, would go out, there'd be a number of cocktail parties, there'd be special dinners but mostly, for a lot of us, it was just getting to know the city. Eating in excellent restaurants. I found a little Corsican restaurant where I use to go all the time. And I used to get, it was sort of like putting your finger on the pulse of Saigon. Because the Corsicans ran everything. They operated the customs, they operated the smuggling, which was a very cozy arrangement. The Corsicans were predominant in the police department. And many of them were in intelligence. There were some in the army in various jobs and some of them were the old Corsicans, the settlers that had been there for years. They were hard drinking, loved good food and all that. And then there were the women, well. There were the Chinese, there were the Vietnamese, there were Laotians, Cambodians, there were a mix of all kinds and let's face it there were some unbelievable places in that town. There was a place called Buffalo Park where a whole block was an army bordello and it had a big sign outside. All weapons and grenades checked here and you'd have all these jeeps parked outside. It was one great big palace packed with all these girls and there was Mama's which was the officer's section and it was attached to this main complex and they were suppose to be a little more select. But when Mama's was busy, she was very busy, she'd run girls from the other section. And in my last book that came out in 1992, I mentioned an incident.

Q: This was the book you wrote. What was the title?

SIMPSON: It was called "Tiger in the Barbed Wire", my own reminisces of that period. Black-Jack Pickering was the Deputy PAO at that time, and he was a wonderful character, he had covered Lindberg's landing in Paris and all that sort of thing. An old newspaper man with a gravelly voice. And he knew that some of his younger officers were spending a lot of time in Mama's because you could go in, you sit and you drink beer and then the women, and so he wanted to see it one night. And he had brought a Cadillac to Saigon as his personal car, a black Cadillac. The Ambassador was very upset about this because once Pickering arrived at an official reception and they quickly ran out with this guard of honor, presented arms because of his Cadillac. So when the Ambassador arrived in his beat-up old Packard, there was no guard of honor. So they arranged that Pickering always arrive later. Well, that night we were driving along and it was the rainy season, a terrific tropical downpour. As we came towards Mama's, I said let's get as close as we can because we'll get soaked if we don't. He said okay and just then he put his foot on the brake of his Cadillac and his foot slipped because it was wet and we went gliding majestically into the front of Mama's. The roof came down on top of us, the girls went climbing up the grenade net of both sides, all the French officers were running out of the place, it was a most undiplomatic situation. We had to get them to hoist up the roof to get the Cadillac out. So from there on in, outside of the hearing of Black-Jack Pickering, we referred to it as the only drive-in whore house in Saigon.

Q: Did you find in the American community, the official American community, something that would certainly,,I was there '69-'70 and it had well developed, and these were people in the, richer marine terms, these were China coasters. I mean basically these were people who loved the orient, usually had a mistress or two and had settled in. Did you find that this was developing there?

SIMPSON: A little, a little. I guess it was, as you say, I experienced the same thing from '64-'65 as far as Americans go, much more so. But I guess we were just beginning, there were very few who were involved in Indochina or knew it at the time. There were some old OSS types. Not old but I mean former OSS types, who had been there just maybe before the war and during the war, '45 and all that, but there were very few Americans that you could call old Indochina hands. They developed, they became that after a certain period of time.

Q: You were there during Dienbienphu? Could you explain or give a feel for how we viewed this at that time?

SIMPSON: Well, let me say that, before I talk about Dienbienphu itself, let me make the point that I was at Dienbienphu itself. At the beginning, when it was taken and for a few weeks thereafter. And being, the privilege of being a so-called war-correspondent, is that you can move when you want. And there was no secret, it was time to get out. I did, but going back to talk about the American position. The whole plan at Dienbienphu was based on the false premise that the Viet Minh would attack over open ground and the French air force and artillery would chop them up and this would be a great defeat and probably the turning point of the war, etc. etc. And there had been a battle the year before in Nassan that sort of indicated this could happen, they took some heavy losses there. But from the very beginning, American observers began to worry about this situation because of, the Korean War had ended, and one of the great phrases of the Korean war was to take the high ground. While at Dienbienphu, although the French had argued that they were on elevated ground, they were still dominated by the surrounding mountains, you see. So in reality, they were still in the chamber pot, as they say. And American military people going there would mouth platitudes about -- isn't this nice and strong fortifications and all that. But they were quite concerned. One of their concerns was that here are some of the best battalions that the French have in Indochina and they're sitting here immobile while all the Viet Minh have to do is go around them and not worry about it. And also, the Americans, an unfortunate trait that still goes on I think, we overestimate the importance of air power. And we thought, you know, air power is going to do this and going to do that. Well, it didn't. And it never has. It never will as far as I'm concerned. Anyway, this was another great fallacy and yet, once the battle was joined there, we did all we could as far as sending in stuff. The French kept requesting different things. Part of the problem was that at the beginning they were so confident that they didn't foresee the problem. The simple question of resupplying this base by air was a terrific strain. And they should have had twice as many aircraft for what they wanted to do, but they didn't. At one point as you know, there was a question of Admiral Radford setting up contingency plans for an air strike. And there was great talk and contingency plans about using nuclear weapons, which as far as I was concerned would have been a great disaster, as you would have probably wiped out the French along with the Vietnamese. And politically as far as the Far East goes, it would be the second use of a nuclear weapon, by Americans against Asians. But Dienbienphu was the type of place where, it's easy to say now, but you didn't have to be a military genius to see the writing on the wall. And a lot of the troops, the good experienced officers that were there said, "You know this is going to be a real fight." You could tell that they weren't sure that it was going to come out right. They ended up, you know everything had to be supplied by parachute and that doesn't work very well.

Q: You were there at the fall of Dienbienphu in Indochina. How did this impact on the Embassy? What was the sort of feeling at that time?

SIMPSON: Let me correct one thing, I was on home leave when Dienbienphu actually fell on May 7th, I was in San Francisco as a matter of fact.

Q: But when you returned...

SIMPSON: When I returned?

Q: When did you return?

SIMPSON: I returned I think it was July and it was a big difference, there was a big difference in atmosphere. There was heightened tension between the French and the Americans. They'd lost, they were trying to readjust to this new situation. They knew they'd lost Indochina. A lot of them blamed it on us. That we could have brought in more supplies or done something, mainly supplied an air strike. And there was great confusion among the Vietnamese and there was a sudden swing of many among influential Vietnamese, who had been with the French, who could tell what was going on. Towards the American who were the new boys on the block. And so this was very difficult for the embassy to handle and of course this was a period where we were putting Ngo-Dinh-Diem into the prime minister's office. Ed Lansdale, you know, the CIA team, were there putting him in place and I worked for, with them, and worked as a press advisor for Diem for a short time. And it was a weird period, this king-making business. You know Americans are not very used to it.

Q: Again, not looking at it from the prospective of today, but at that time, what was your impression of Lansdale, the CIA operation, what were you doing with them?

SIMPSON: Well, what we were doing was, from the beginning, you see Lansdale had been coming out there, checking with facilities and newspapers and all that before the installation of Diem. He'd come out and he'd work with the French and he'd have a lot of liaison with French intelligence, and then when this Diem thing came up, his team came in and setup their operation, their office. I must say that a lot of people poor mouthed Ed Lansdale and what he did. But I think you've got to take into account that at moments of crisis there are certain men who can do certain things. Whether you approve or disapprove well that's another thing. And Ed was one of these people who just built loyalty among those who worked for him and he also had this quiet American routine where they all say, well the ugly American.

Q: Lansdale was considered...there's a book by Lederer called "The Ugly American." Burnett or something...

SIMPSON: And I think that people misread Lansdale a lot. Where they bought 100% this idea that all you had to do was go play some guitar and be nice to the local people and everything would be fine. Whereas Lansdale was not that naive. His point was that you're not going to get very far unless... It's not that old hearts and minds thing, but you've got to have some base in the villages. Not just in the cities. Our role, USIS, as far as the Lansdale team at that time, the Saigon military mission, we were on the ground, we knew the editors, Vietnamese, French, whatever, we knew the newspapers, we had the basic information, we'd sat in and worked with the French on psychological warfare. So therefore we were sort of adjunct, helping when they needed help. And as I say, George Hellyer, who was PAO when Lansdale came in. Hellyer had been with Wingate in Burma.

Q: Ord Wingate.

SIMPSON: Yeah. Hellyer was an ex, was an ex-tea planter and he spoke perfect French. And he and Lansdale hit it off very well. And so they worked together very closely. And one of the first things when Diem arrived -- and they both came back from their first meeting with Diem -- and they sent me over immediately to talk to Diem about the problems of speaking to the international press, because he was basically naive as far as that sort of thing went. So many of the people were out to get him. You know, the axes were out. And if he walked into a press conference cold without realizing how important it was, he could have said things that could undermine his whole government from the very beginning. So we spent quite a bit of time working with the Vietnamese and the Agence Vietnam Press and the radio and all this sort of thing.

Q: Well tell me about one, your impression of Diem and also how he took it because at least later on Diem had the reputation of either giving a long monologue or just sitting there like a Buddha and hearing things and apparently nothing connected. This is early Diem. Again your impression and how did he work towards your practical advice that you were sent to give him?

SIMPSON: Well I'll never forget, it was a very strange situation. I went into the palace, was ushered in, the palace was sort of a mess because all the French advisors and officers had disappeared and Diem was being protected by a catholic militia from up in the north and they all had muddy boots and the marble was all...it was usually so brilliantly polished and the rugs had been removed. And there were rifles stacked in the corner, expecting trouble from all sides. And I was ushered in, told to wait, and suddenly a man came in without being announced, all by himself and it was Diem and he had, he was chubby you know, lacquered hair somewhat long sort of like an American Indian appearance. And we shook hands and we sat down and started talking French and I explained who I was and why I was there and the importance of the international press. And that what he says, at anytime would be in the New York Times, the London Times, and you know, the Figaro the next day. I knew that he was aware of this but that there're so many pitfalls, on and on, and that we were willing to help. And he sat there chain smoking cigarettes with his head sort of down, you know, listening to this, and I finally paused and waited and he looked at me and started to talk. He gave me a lecture about the evils of communism, what he was going to do for the people in Vietnam, etc., etc. To the point where I began to wonder if he didn't realize that I wasn't a journalist out to get a story. That I was there to help him in any assistance he needed as an official. And after 20 minutes of this, I noticed some of his assistants pacing back and forth and waiting and they dared not come and break it up. And finally he stopped and the interview ended. And he went off with the cigarette smoke trailing behind him. This was an early symptom that he developed later. Number one that he didn't listen and he tended to lecture. He tended to lecture like a professor to important people who were not Catholics, the Buddhists and Cao Dai, all those sects, as if they were little children. And this went over like a lead balloon. I think at the very beginning he was a sincere enough man. But his brother you could see was already moving in, hanging on the edges of everything.

Q: This was his brother who was later assassinated.

Q: Was Madame Nhu...

SIMPSON: She was there but an unknown quantity. She was charming, at least visually, and she was fluttering around, flirting with all the French and American officers. The first cocktail party in the palace, she was there in her tight ai-dao. But she hadn't come forward as a power at least as far as we knew.

Q: Well did you have anymore contact with Diem or...?

SIMPSON: No it sort of...Well of course there was the Binh Xuyen revolt that took place shortly after he was in...

Q: The what?

SIMPSON: This was a revolt of the sects, the religious military sects. The Binh Xuyen were leading the revolt. They were the river pirates whom the French had used to fight the Viet Minh. Who had supplied the French with a lot of intelligence information. And that was a very strange situation. Because Diem was our man in Saigon, we were trying to secure him in place. And the French intelligence people -- who were run by a Corsican who was a very tough character -- decided that despite the agreements between Paris and Washington, despite the handshakes with the French high ranking military and the Americans, that they were going to supply the Binh Xuyen and the Cao Dai and all their old intelligence contacts with the arms and equipment to screw up the American plan to put Diem in place. And this was a very hairy situation because you know there were assassinations, there was fighting in the streets, they shelled the palace, there was a counter attack. And at one point... I don't know if you want me to go into detail on this or not.

Q: Well, I'm really interested in how we saw it at the time and what you were doing?

SIMPSON: Well, we saw this as possibly the end of any hope in Vietnam. Because if this revolt had succeeded it would have been the splintering of the South. And under pressure, despite the agreement, it divided temporarily the country in two. With the success of any revolt in the South, it would have meant splintering, the whole chance of having any viable government down there. And so we were doing our best to try to discourage any of these sects. Lansdale was very active in this. It's all on record that money played a big part in persuading certain units and leaders of these sects to come over to the government and not take part in things and yet a number did fight. Diem had a very difficult 24 hours there where it was a question of one or two parachute battalions...whether they would stay loyal to the government. Fortunately they did and they fought well without any advisors. Without any French or American help. But one little side light on this -- in the past we were always getting these calls from these mysterious little men in white suits who wanted to talk to you about something important and one of these turned out to be the political advisor to the Binh Xuyen who knew me and he knew I'd been there since 1952 and I'd been with the French quite a bit. So he asked me to come to General Bay Vien's headquarters which was across the river, the Arroyo Chinois, and to talk. What it came down to, General Bay Vien was the river pirate chief and here again he had his own private zoo with its boa constrictor and a tiger and the rumor was that when his officers went bad he would feed them to the tiger. And so I went over, we drove over, myself and Bob Gildea who was Assistant press officer, and we went through these road blocks. There'd been a sort of temporary truce between both sides, we drove down into the headquarters with a big tall aerial, radio aerials there, and we walked in and sat down and started talking and I was looking toward the door where obviously this aerial was at the end of that building. And as I watched this door, out comes this French captain with some papers and he's making marks and he looks up and sees me sitting there and he swings around quick and slams the door and disappears. And a little bit later, in charges this French dispatcher rider. Jumps off his motorcycle, rushes into that back room with the radio. And so I came out and said to Gildea, the French are running this whole operation. He said I saw, there've been 2 dispatch riders since I've been parked out here so we went back to the Embassy. I won't go into details as to who, what, when, where. So I went back to the Embassy and reported what had happened and created quite a flap. The Embassy checked with the highest French source and were told that those were members of the Good Offices mission working with the Binh Xuyen to stop the fighting. Well that just doesn't wash as far as I'm concerned because these officers were obviously in a tactical situation and not working to stop the fighting. They were right there in the Binh Xuyen headquarters. But that just shows you the differences in attitudes and reporting. But anyway the revolt was crushed and Diem became Prime Minister for good, and after that, not too long after that, I left Saigon. He gave me an autographed picture when I left in August. So that was the end of that period.

Q: Before we move on to Nigeria, would you talk about the fall of Hanoi and that whole business and also the move, I mean the whole evacuation of the northern Vietnamese down south.

SIMPSON: Shortly after Dienbienphu, when I returned, I was ordered to go up to Hanoi and start preparations for evacuation of the USIS staff. And to find out how many dependents would be involved and all that sort of thing. The consulate was undergoing the same thing as was the American aid mission up there. And here again you have the problem where some of the staff wanted to take an extended family down south. On one extreme you had an old man who was a cleaner of the building who had timidly suggested that he and his wife might be included in a flight to the south and even offered a gift that cost him money to the American in charge which was sort of heart rending. The other extreme was a sharp operator who spoke both English and French who had several mistresses whom he tried to list as cousins or nieces or whatever. Needless to say, he managed to fly down on his own steam. And I made sure that this cleaner got out too. It was just a question of cleaning everything up, and getting ready to go. At the same time I was told to stay there and to cover the arrival of Giap's divisions in Hanoi. There were a whole group of newspapermen who had come from all over and were staying in the Metropole hotel to cover the big day. It was Oct. '54 and it was a rainy day and it was a strange thing because it was a great victorious parade for the Viet Minh but because they were all wearing sneakers there was a sort of shush-shush-shush sound. It was one of those silent victory marches. It was very impressive and it was interesting because the French withdrew street by street as the Viet Minh marched in. And as the Viet Minh marched in all the windows would open and out would come all these red flags, yellow starred red flags that had been under preparation for weeks behind closed doors. So I was there taking photos with a velleflex and I must say I got some pretty good photos which USIA used quite a bit, I put some in my book on Dien Bien Phu that's coming out this year. And I was supposedly -- for the purpose it wasn't a question of cover so I wouldn't have any problems -- but I was supposedly a Polish press officer and the only problem there was the truce commission also had some Poles on it so I had to stay clear of the Poles, not speaking the language at all. And finally, John Mecklen of Time-Life, who later joined USIA and served in Saigon years later, tipped me off. The French had passed the word that the Viet Minh military police were looking for an American official posing as a journalist. And so it was time for me to leave. But I might mention during that period I shared a jeep with Lou Conein, who was Lansdale's man in North Vietnam, and Lou Conein, quite a character, he was a Colonel, quite a colorful character, he was known by various names-Black Luigi, 3 Finger Lou. He'd been in Vietnam before the Franco-Vietnam war, he'd been with OSS, he'd been parachuted into north Vietnam, he had saved a lot of prisoners. He'd received a Legion of Honor from the French for saving their men in prison camps. And he was later to surface during the Diem assassination as Cabot Lodge's liaison man with the generals of Saigon. This is much later. But in any case, I left Hanoi that evening in a truck of Senegalese troops for Haiphong where this big refuge movement was being set up. The French at first thought that they could handle the refugees but they just didn't have enough ships so the American Navy had come in and the American flagship was lying off shore, Admiral Sabin was in charge. We were preparing to sail all these refugees south. Most were Catholics from the Catholic delta regions and they were moving along with their priest, with their militia, etc., etc., to the south. And being Diem was a Catholic, you had the situation where it wasn't going to do him any harm to have that many voters from the same religion in the south. And Lansdale and his people were very much involved in this moving people. And it was a very difficult job. It was done well but a tragedy because these people had been living in these villages for hundreds of years and they had to leave their ancestors graves behind and even if they were Catholics there was still that sort of thing. I traveled down from Haiphong on the flag ship to Saigon. And one little vignette, in Saigon, when we pulled in, it was a hot sunny, very hot day and we pulled in and all these refugees had put on a little weight because they'd been well fed by the Navy on the way down but a lot of them were sick and a lot of them had different diseases and they needed care. So as we pulled in there where all these trucks were drawn up to take them to refugee camps and I noted that at the end of the gang plank there's this little gathering of American women. I looked closer and sure enough it was the American Women's Club of Saigon and they were there to greet the refugees. And I must say, I don't want to appear anti-women's club but it wasn't their place to be there in that squalor and in that situation. Here they were in their bright summer dresses, some of them with hats on in the old diplomatic mode. I won't say some had gloves on though I wouldn't doubt it and they were there to hand out a hunk of plastic wrapped American cheese that had been donated by an American cheese company. A hunk of American cheese and some bananas to each refugee as they came down off the gangplank. And of course I looked real hard and saw that one of our best photographers had been mustered to shoot them handing these things to the refugees. And I was furious about it but couldn't do much to stop it as it was under way. But the sidelight on that was that a couple days later word came from the refugee camp that all the refugees were complaining about the American soap because no matter how hard they scrubbed they wouldn't get much lather -- it was the American cheese. So when they found out it was cheese they sold it on the black market to street vendors who in turn sold it to the servants of the American diplomatic community and for months thereafter, your hor d'oeuvres at cocktail parties were melted American cheese.

Q: Shall we move on to your next assignment then or if there's anything else. I'm talking about your personal experiences, let's get them, I'd rather get them now and we may have to do this next year.

SIMPSON: Well I think just in general on the war, the Franco-Vietnam war, it had quite an impression on me being that I had been out on the field so much. In fact one of the last battles of the war, after I had returned, I was at a place called Hu Nugen and this Viet Minh Regional battalion attacked what they thought was a Vietnamese National Army unit. And they thought it was easy pickings or whatever and it turned out to be a French army unit that was dug in. And I arrived the morning after the night attack and they had just slaughtered them. The attackers had been slaughtered as they came on and even the French who were there, they were telling themselves -- why did this happen because the war was almost over and these were peasants, regional peasants, who'd come on bravely in the face of impossible fire. And it just became a symbol of the whole war, really, because I'd seen it in different situations. I'd seen the Moroccans take casualties and the Algerians and I'd seen the Senegalese, and I'd seen the Viet Minh and the Cambodians and the Foreign Legion. And it became the sort of thing where I'd leave the field, I'd go back to Saigon, take up my job as a press officer at the embassy and find a certain unreality at the conference tables in Saigon or at the social events. That the war, that Saigon was really untouched by the war and that what they were talking about was a lot of myth. What I had seen and come back and reported on was accepted up to a point, I think. But let's face it, I was a young officer, I was inexperienced, I was not a military man and a lot of it was they were buying what they wanted to hear from certain sources. They were accepting what they wanted to hear, a human tendency. And when I'd come in and say look the French aren't doing this or they are doing this contrary to what they told us. Or that the Vietnamese light battalions were disasters, they're not working, this battalion's been ambushed, that battalion's been decimated. I'd come in and say the French parachutists are the only people who are doing anything worth while and the use of French armor is usually a joke...little things like that. The reason I'm bringing this up now is that when I left Saigon in '55 I'd had it. I was burned out...so much so that I quit the Foreign Service. I resigned and we left Saigon, sailed out of the harbor and went to Mallorca to live for six months. I met my wife in Saigon on the terrace of the Continental Hotel. She was a secretary working for MSA and we, it's one of those things where the courting went on for some while. Then I went back to the states on home leave and I finally sent her a telegram from Boulder Creek, California saying will you marry me and answer c/o Johnny's cash store, Boulder Creek California. And she finally flew in and we were married in Las Vegas which is her hometown, and then we went back together, I mean we went back to Saigon together. But when I did resign in '55 the idea was to write the great novel on Saigon. And we went to Mallorca.

Q: I'll tell you because of time constraint, unless there's something we should cover here I'm going to do a little skipping around. Why don't we go back to Saigon you were recalled to Saigon '64-'65, which is a whole different world I suppose, how did that assignment come about and what were you doing?

SIMPSON: That takes us back to Cannes in a way. I was on the beach in front of the Carlton Hotel with George Stevens Jr. (director of USIA film programs), Arthur Schlesinger (historian) and Gore Vidal (writer), at about 10 in the morning and it was after a film had been shown the night before and we were discussing this film. Suddenly the beach boy that handles the beach and the chairs came down and waves to me and he says, they want you on the phone. So I pick up the phone in the beach hut and it was my wife calling from the hotel and she says you better get up here right away. I didn't know what that was, maybe one of the kids were sick or something. So I left and went to the hotel and she said there'd been a very strange message from Paris. I said what's that? She said I don't know but they want to talk to you and here's the number. The duty officer was calling from Paris so I got the duty officer on the line. I said what's the story? Well there's a classified message and you'd better get back to Marseille soon as you can to read it. I said I'm sure you can tell me what the story is. So anyway he's some young officer there and he didn't want to say anything so I called Marseille knowing that they would have a copy. I got someone I knew on the phone and I said, what's the story? And they said well it's about an assignment somewhere you've been before and he said it's classified. And I thought they sure as hell aren't sending a classified message about me going back to Lagos. So anyway we packed up and off to Marseille and there was this secret telegram from the agency from Carl Rowan, saying that (you say the agency you mean USIA) I was assigned as the Information Advisor to Prime Minister, General Nguyen Van Khanh and giving me 2 weeks to get to Saigon and specifying that I was to stop at Pearl Harbor for a major conference that was going on, on my way out. So this, as you can imagine, was a great turmoil because my wife was pregnant. And we had the 3 young girls already and she was pregnant and she'd have to stay behind while I went on ahead. It turned out that this was a great project that had been hatched in Washington. President Johnson had decided that the Vietnamese just couldn't cut it on their own and that therefore we had to send people. He said, send a brain trust in on different levels of skills and expertise to run, in so many words, to run the Vietnamese government for the Vietnamese. Even then on the face of it, it's ridiculous but that's what it was. And strangely enough I don't know how it happened, but USIA was the first to respond and I was the boy that was sent out there and arrived in Honolulu for this famous conference and here was Maxwell Taylor, Secretary Rusk, McCone of CIA. You know, the whole upper level there. I guess I was the lowest ranking man in the room. I sat there over these 2 days of conferences with Barry Zorthian who was in charge of the JUSPAO operation in Saigon which was quite an enormous thing. But the idea was that this was a review and new planning and all this and we were really going to take over things there. And to me it was a revelation. I sat and listened to all these reports and these high level briefings and these secret reports. And I had this ominous feeling that we'd gotten no further than we had when I'd left. Even when I'd been there, the French, just because of their experience, had their feet more on the ground than what I was hearing in this conference. This sterilized, sound-proof, air-conditioned conference room full of young colonels, who had stainless steel pointers, were discussing Vietnam as if it was the moon. So anyway, I went on from there to take on this job in Saigon.

Q: What was the political situation when you got there? This would be in '64?

SIMPSON: It was very tenuous. There had been, before Diem had been assassinated, the generals had taken over, the military were running the country. Suddenly General Nguyen Khanh, who was a great manipulator and a behind the scenes operator, found himself or put himself in the cat bird seat. And Khanh had a good war record as a young officer with the French, he'd gone through French military schools and all that. But he was a type of person who thrived on intrigue and playing different sides against the other. He was facing a big problem, the Buddhists were strong, he had to take care of them. The Catholics were strong, he had to butter them up. He was worried about the Sects...who still had the fragments of their original armies. The Viet Cong were getting stronger and we had this weird situation where although Cabot Lodge was still there he was getting ready to leave and Maxwell Taylor was coming out to take over along with Alexis Johnson as the two ambassadors. And Khanh had to walk lightly or try to walk lightly with the Americans because we were supplying everything, keeping him in power. At the same time he resented the Americans telling him what he had to do. It was a very strange situation. In fact, Cabot Lodge took me when I arrived...he took me over and introduced me to the Prime Minister in his armored checkered cab and we walked into the palace and we sat down. And Khanh came in...a chubby fellow in sharply creased military trousers and polished boots. And he went through this routine; how glad he was that I was there to help him on this important thing and all this. Lodge was preparing to return to politics and his mind was back in Washington, and suddenly the Prime Minister said well I want you to meet the man you'll be working with in my office. And the light was sort of in my eyes against the window there and I could see a Vietnamese walking in like that and as he came around the corner, he said, ah Simpson! And I looked at him and it turned out to be a fellow whom I had worked with on the French Psychological Warfare Board. Who had been in government jobs through every regime -- managed to stay on top. And who I knew had worked with French intelligence. And here he was the right hand man in the press office of the Prime Minister! And so I was to work with him which was a great twist. But in the long run what it turned out was that Khanh had no more idea of using me for anything. He considered me a plant in his office to watch him and he quickly moved me as far away as possible into another building. And this whole idea of a brain trust to help the Vietnamese get their government moving fell apart completely. You know, people lost interest in it or something changed. And it just so happened that I was the only one who arrived out there. So I was sort of stranded in this office trying to do a job. Succeeding on certain things, getting him to go out of the country. Lodge was pushing this quite a bit and I continued it. Until he almost got caught in a mortar barrage and he didn't speak to me for some time. And then gradually whatever effective curves I had went rapidly down and I became more involved in JUSPAO things and field trips and all that. And my Prime Minister counseling or advising just tailed off. And then there was one coup after another. And the man I was working with at one point was colonel Pham Ngoc Thao who was famous for his participation or setting up of coups. And he became a very good friend of mine and he was a very funny type. He and I got along fine. We had adjoining offices and we went through these coups together. He always disappeared. I knew a coup was coming when he disappeared. And I did a lot of reporting via phone back to the embassy because I was in the Prime Minister's office surrounded by hostile tanks. And to cap off the story on Thao was that in '91 I think...no '90 Stan Karnow was back in Vietnam. (He wrote a very good book on Vietnam history.) So anyway he went back and he established without a doubt that Colonel Thao was a top, North Vietnamese agent operating inside South Vietnam. So much for our counterintelligence operation! When I went back to Vietnam in '91 I found his grave. Because the Vietnamese were claiming his body was moved north and then when I was up north, no no no we don't know where it is. And finally an ex-officer in the Viet Cong came up to me and asked, do you want to see Thao's grave and I said yes, and he said he'd pick me up Sunday morning and he picked me up in his little car and took me out there. It was one of those strange things. Okay he was "the enemy" and yet he was a good friend at the time. And I wanted to see that grave because I wanted to confirm in my own mind that this was true and it's true enough he's in the Patriot's Cemetery with a big red star on his tomb.

Q: Well how was our embassy doing? I mean you were in the Prime Minister's office area and these coups were happening which was really one Prime Minister succeeding another wasn't it, and all generals, it was a revolving door. How did you find our embassy was reacting? Were they always trying to see, well this one might be better than the other. I mean were they able to deal with it, or was it just resignation or what were you thinking?

SIMPSON: Well it was disarray really. I don't know, I'm sure this may have happened in other countries but maybe not so often, and not under such serious conditions. Where the whole country is threatening to go down the drain. Because here the North Vietnamese were pouring in, you know, along the Ho Chi Minh trails. There were shipments of ammunition along the coast from the North, that sort of thing. And for instance Maxwell Taylor, you know he'd never been faced with anything like this before. I'm sure I can't speak for him, but I would imagine in his mind, as a military man, that these people were generals therefore you could expect a modicum of performance and logic and honesty from them. And when they started this coup, counter-coup, coup-ette, and all this, one after the other, where you couldn't tell what division was moving onto what town, who was on who's side. Whether the Rangers were with the Prime Minister or against him. Taylor just couldn't figure this out. And he had the famous, I can't put a date on it offhand, but he had this famous situation after one such coup he called in the young Turks as they called them, a group of generals including the Air Force general (Ky) who was like a cowboy. And chewed them out like you would a sergeant and just gave them hell. Which was very bad news because I saw them come out of that office and they were white faced. A marine guard saluted them and they didn't even return his salute they were so upset, they just took off. And immediately thereafter Khanh tried to do all sorts of anti-American things and Ky was there with the same thing again. But it was just two cultures that didn't work together. And these generals, they had been, how could you put it, they had been spoiled in a way, it was a different life. Some of them hadn't been in the field for a long while and people were buying their way out of the army or into non-combat roles and making fortunes on the black market and there was a lot of corruption. And the sad thing is that some of the very good officers died fighting at the end.

But from my view point over there, one day I walked into my office and I saw a lot of tanks outside and I thought, good they're here to protect the government. Only when I walked into my office I thought, wait a minute, those turrets are pointed the wrong way, they're all facing the presidential palace. And I walked into my office and there are a bunch of Vietnamese Rangers. Those were real cowboys with dark glasses and tattoos on their arms. They'd just taken everything off my desk, thrown them on the floor and broken everything. They'd urinated in the corner of the room. The captain had his booted foot on the desk, he had a swagger stick. And there's this moment of silence and I didn't know how it was going to turn out, you could never tell with them. And I looked at the situation, I looked at the desk and automatically I said, "Oh merde!" He spoke enough French to realize what I said and he laughed and that broke the tension. And so he asked me what are you doing here, and when I told him that I was an advisor to the Prime Minister they thought that was the funniest thing they'd ever heard. They all started laughing, laughing. Then I asked him what are you doing here? We're here to protect the Prime Minister. Why? Because his office has been taken over by the communists. I said no, that's ridiculous. Oh yes, we've been told. Just about then an American Ranger officer walked in, tanned and fit. I said, "Do you realize what's going on here?" and "We were told to come into town because there's a communist revolt or something and we're suppose to protect the palace." I said, if you look closely you'll see these Rangers are getting ready to assault the palace with all these tanks out here. He thought about that for a while and he raised some people on the radio. And I said, I don't know about you but I'm leaving here because, just about then, Barry Zorthian was on the phone. I'd called him at the office. And General Ky had threatened to start bombing these coup forces, there's a certain time limit. So I told this American Ranger, look I'm leaving, I don't know what you want to do but it'd be silly to die here with a bunch of characters that are trying to overthrow the government. So I took off, and I saw him as I drove off, I saw him walking fast in the other direction. But that was the kind of thing that was going on at that time. Very weird.

Q: Did you work with Barry Zorthian that much?

SIMPSON: Yes.

Q: He became quite a well known name. How did he operate?

SIMPSON: Well Barry was a very unusual and he hadn't had experience in the Far East before, and he was suddenly put into this job. But he was a real pro as far as public information or whatever you want to call it. He had a gift of seeing a situation and realizing what the government's interests were and yet putting it in succinct enough phraseology that it would come across clear to whomever he was briefing. And he realized that the 5 o'clock follies, the briefings that went on downstairs everyday for the general press, were fine in their way but, in reality, those newsmen in the know didn't pay any attention to them. And so therefore he had special briefings, you know one on one or three or four regulars that he knew and all this sort of thing, depending on what the situation was. And we worked. I was tasked out of his office to work with the Vietnamese Information Service as liaison on certain projects. And time after time, Barry Zorthian and I would walk up and down these stairs in the Ministry of Information because every coup that came along you'd get a new Minister of Information and we'd go through this same routine about the polite chatter, the tea, and the table and a cigarette or whatever. And then talking about what we planned to do or what we hoped we could cooperate on. And you could see this veil of disinterest fall over their faces as we talked. And Barry would sit there trying to explain what should be done. But he fit that particular job and I think in general...okay, there were clashes, as there always are, between somebody like that and the press. In a situation like that but I think on the whole most of the pressmen and the professionals appreciated Zorthian. Because he gave it to them straight, what he could. And he didn't hesitate to let them go where they wanted to go. And he got a lot of flack from various generals and some of the ambassadors about, you know, why are you encouraging them to go to such and such a place; I mean two of them are there already and they're going to come back and give a briefing that shoots down whatever the Army wants to say.

Q: Well, what was your impression of the American press at that time? We're taking about the '64-'65 frame.

SIMPSON: Well it hadn't developed into the real press corps that it had later on. This was a period where people like Neil Sheehan and, well I can't think of the other names. There's a whole new breed of pressmen out there, there's still some of the old hangers-on from the French war that would come and go where they were trying to get. One of the problems we faced was that they were only interested in the American participation. Really most of them, not exactly hometowners but still: Is it true that the American Rangers were attached to such and such and as advisors were actually in the combat area. You know this sort of thing. And is it true that American Air Force pilots have done such and such? We hadn't really gotten into the war officially but they were well aware that we were close to it and they're following all this closely. And they had little interest unless there was a major defeat or major victory. As far as the Vietnamese national role in the fighting, I think they were doing a pretty good job of reporting and that's what made them so unpopular with the officials there.

You know Johnson was blowing his top. He was a great telephone practitioner and he'd be on the phone to the Embassy to Taylor and the others. On the little, the slightest things that would come up. Why can't you do this or why can't you do that? He didn't understand what was going on out there. And what it came down to, because of the wide open, you know, no censorship deal, that was unique to Vietnam at that time. We would fly them anywhere they wanted to go and fly them back again. I mean chopper them in and chopper them out. So that they were often on the scene of the action, they'd come back and they'd arrive in time for the 5 o'clock follies and here's some Army major briefing on the same battle from second-hand news that was all wrong. He'd be briefing on, reading off the official report he'd gotten through radio or something. "And such a such a unit was attacked and the Vietnamese fought bravely and so many dead Viet Cong were found on the ground," and somebody from the back would shout, excuse me major, excuse me major, but I just came from there and that's all bullshit. I was there, the Vietnamese lost so many people, the Viet Cong pulled out and they only left two dead behind. Blah, blah, blah, this sort of thing. So it was this sort of problem that went on constantly.

And some of the correspondents, the American press there, I must admit there were some funny instances. General Westmoreland was a very straight arrow, serious type, and he'd give these briefings occasionally. He'd come over and give these special briefings. And there was a correspondent, Joe Freid of the New York Daily News, and Joe was the old school, very perceptive, acerbic correspondent, and one day, Westmoreland gave this whole story, I forget what it was but it was something very positive. And everybody sort of you know, yes, yes. And then Joe said, are you finished General? And Westmoreland said, yes Joe, I am. And Joe said good, now let's get serious. And he started asking his questions.

Q: Well, was there anything else that we should cover around this time when you were there? I found your time in the Prime Minister's office fascinating.

SIMPSON: Oh, one little sidelight to show you how the two periods sort of blended. One day I got back to the office and on my desk was a telephone message. A Mr. Anh or somebody was calling me, to get in touch with the Hoa Hao. So I got in touch with them and he was a representative of the Hoa Hao, one of the military sects that had revolted against Diem, and asking me if I would come to dinner etc. I didn't particularly want to do this. I was in a very difficult situation there. It was ridiculous in a way. My assignment had been classified. Well, how the hell can you be an information and press advisor if your very presence is classified in the palace? They'd done that I think, primarily to preserve, I mean the Vietnamese didn't want people to think that they needed advice and all this sort of thing. Or that we were, or they didn't want the American press to know that we were sending people into the Vietnamese government offices. But anyway that soon blew over and everybody knew, I mean there was no doubt about it. So these people got in touch with me and it turns out that I was being invited to dinner to one of the best restaurants in Saigon, an old French parachute hangout, by the widow of Bacut who had been the head of the Hoa Hao, a real character who had cut off some of his fingers. He said he'd cut off one every year until the French left. He was eventually captured by the Diem forces and executed. He was betrayed in fact. But anyway, in 1965 here I am in the situation where I'm invited. So I check with the political people and what do you think? They say any bit of information we can get now is gold. The situation being what it is, so go ahead and have a good meal, see what's going on. Well, it wasn't hard to figure out what they wanted. They wanted, they gave me all this stuff -- you know Vietnam, you were here when the French were here, and all this routine. Incidentally, his wife was a knockout. She was a little teenager when I knew her before and she developed into a beauty in a black ao dai, a form fitting ao dai. And so this little political advisor was with her. We had this very good meal and what it came down to was...they wanted American arms, American money and with that they would form once again a hard fighting anti-communist force, etc. They didn't say that they would support the government at all. And I, all I could do was say well that's very interesting and I will report everything that you'd said and onward and upward and all this sort of thing. And then just as we were leaving, and I look back on this often with mixed emotions, this dream in an ao dai said, "Can I drop you off at your home?" And in a few split seconds that it takes a brain to work, I said, "No thanks, I've got an embassy car." I thought to myself, you fool. But it wouldn't have been politically smart, I think.

SAMUEL CLIFFORD ADAMS, JR.
Education Advisor
Saigon (1952-1955)

Ambassador Samuel Clifford Adams, Jr. was born in Houston, Texas in 1920. He received his Bachelor's Degree from Fisk University in 1945, his Master's in 1947, and his PhD from the University of Chicago in 1952. He served in the US Army from 1944 to 1946. His postings include Saigon, Phnom Penh, London, Lagos, Bamako, and Rabat, with an Ambassadorship to Niger. He was interviewed by William J. Cunningham on February 2, 2000.

Q: You were sent to Saigon, weren't you?

ADAMS: Yes. It was not a full experience but it was something because there was a young white fellow likewise who was making the trip. His experiences were so grossly different from mine. He represented real class, so everywhere that we went, like when we got to Paris, our experiences were different.

Q: You traveled together, the two of you?

ADAMS: Yes, we did.

Q: Were you on official orders of the Department of State as government officers?

ADAMS: We were not officers. I don't know what we were called but anyhow, we traveled together. It was a catalytic experience. I got to stay in a hotel in Paris. Can you imagine?

Q: Yes, and you were in the same hotel as the other fellow.

ADAMS: Yes, I was. Anyhow, we got to Saigon and nobody could imagine that I had been sent there to do anything. That was a long story going back and forth, back and forth. The thing that was really interesting was that I resolved that finally by getting myself adopted by a Vietnamese family.

Q: You were adopted by a Vietnamese family?

ADAMS: Yes, I was.

Q: I see here in the biography that you were sent out there in 1952 as an education advisor to the U.S. Special Technical and Economic Mission to Indochina.

ADAMS: Yes, something like that.

Q: Donald Heath was the American ambassador in Saigon at that time.

ADAMS: All I am trying to say is that nobody knew exactly what to do with me.

Q: I was in Saigon at the AID [United States Agency for International Development] mission. I reported for duty there in September of 1952.

ADAMS: Then we were there at the same time.

Q: We were there at the same time, and I was a general services assistant, a very low level FSS-10 in the American embassy. The point is that the AID mission was very sizeable in those days. It had a separate building. In fact, it had a building that was more impressive than the building that the embassy was in.

ADAMS: It was because they were the ones who were supposed to be linked to the French army.

Q: That's right. So, you got yourself adopted by a Vietnamese family. What do you mean by that?

ADAMS: Literally, every spare moment I had, I spent with them. I learned the language.

Q: How did you pick them out?

ADAMS: There was this man who was kind.

Q: Yes, but how did you meet him? Was he an employee of the mission?

ADAMS: He was an employee.

Q: He was a Vietnamese employee of the USAID mission in Saigon who took you under his wing.

ADAMS: I just literally got myself adopted by him. When he took his family and they went to, say, the temple for praying and they bowed down and hit the floor, I did the same thing. Do you follow?

Q: Yes. They were Buddhist.

ADAMS: Yes, but the thing about it, the whole routine of my life was about them.

Q: Oh, you lived with them as a member of the family?

ADAMS: No, they would come pick me up.

Q: I see, so you had your own government quarters.

ADAMS: Yes, it was something like a hotel room. That was my whole routine but it meant that I knew more about what the Vietnamese people did than the officials.

Q: Many of the people in the mission in those days spoke French. Had you mastered French by then?

ADAMS: Yes, I had.

Q: And you said you learned Vietnamese in addition?

ADAMS: Yes, I did.

Q: Now, that was very rare. Very few people spoke Vietnamese.

ADAMS: Nobody could get around like I could get around. For example, things like this would occur. I'd get to go to Hanoi. I remember being a guide in Hanoi because I could talk with the people. Do you follow?

Q: Sure, of course, I know what you are talking about.

ADAMS: Well, I was not worried at all, even when Dien Bien Phu fell.

Q: Why were you not worried?

ADAMS: I was up there in North Vietnam.

Q: Do you mean in Hanoi?

ADAMS: I watched the French general go through an act, which was also his last portrayal of his dominance. He was running around on the streets of Hanoi in his car with the horn blowing, the siren blowing, and things of that sort.

Q: I see, he was making the grand gesture.

ADAMS: Yes. I was the one who knew the Vietnamese personally. I knew not only the one at the hotel but the one who ran the restaurant or did whatever. I knew a whole round of things, but can you imagine somebody having complete freedom to go?

Q: I was there at the time, and I remember the atmosphere very well, but how did your colleagues in the mission regard that? Did they welcome this, did they make use of it, or were you, in effect, somewhat suspect of being too close to the Vietnamese?

ADAMS: I was and am suspect even now.

Q: Really.

ADAMS: It is because they couldn't see how I could travel all over the place on my own.

Q: They could not do it themselves.

ADAMS: No. They even gave me a Jeep.

Q: The mission did.

ADAMS: Yes. I didn't have a chauffeur, and it was nothing for me to drive myself from Saigon to, say, Phnom Penh.

Q: Really? That was not always safe in those days.

ADAMS: Yes, but it was safe for me.

Q: Did you have someone from the Vietnamese community with you when you were going out?

ADAMS: Sometimes I did but the first five Americans to see Angkor Wat were with me. They'd never seen it before.

Q: Did you have a Vietnamese escort?

ADAMS: No. I was by myself.

Q: You went by yourself. In other words, you talked your way through whatever situation you ran into.

ADAMS: Also, the people knew me. Also, too, after a certain time I got to the point where I was arranging for a Vietnamese to go to the Philippines, to go here, or to go there.

Q: Was it for advanced education or practical training?

ADAMS: I ran teacher training activities and things to offset, what do you call this when you are taking advantage of people?

Q: Well, colonialism or the colonial experience?

ADAMS: Yes. All I am saying is, I had access to not only the Philippines but to all of Indochina, Singapore, Hong Kong, and all that. Can you imagine?

Q: Well, I can imagine it. Yes.

ADAMS: This is what life was about.

Q: Were you debriefed frequently by officers in the embassy or in the mission as to what knowledge you had of things going on in the Vietnamese community at that time?

ADAMS: Sometimes, yes, but not all the time. For example, the first time I went to Angkor Wat, there wasn't any curiosity at all even though I took six people.

Q: You took six people from the mission?

ADAMS: Yes. They were not persons way up there. They were all white but we sat on the steps of Angkor Wat, the first Americans who got to go through it.

Q: Really.

ADAMS: They didn't know what Angkor Wat was about. You see what I am talking about?

Q: Yes. It was just emerging from the jungles in those days.

ADAMS: You also had the possibility of the Viet Minh attacking, or different things of that sort.

Q: You had no fear of that at all?

ADAMS: No. I had no fear.

Q: What is your opinion of the U.S. policy toward Vietnam in the final days of the French empire there?

ADAMS: The whole thing was a big tragedy.

RANDOLPH A. KIDDER
Political Officer
Saigon (1953-1955)

Chargé d'Affaires
Saigon (1955)

Randolph Kidder was born in Boston and educated at Harvard. His career included posts in Canberra, Sydney, Belem, Rio de Janeiro and Saigon. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: To move ahead, you went to the National War College from 1952 to 1953. Then you were given one of these peculiar assignments where you were assigned to three countries at the same time. The names then meant little to anybody, but became household words later. You were assigned to Saigon, Phnom Penh, and Vientiane. How did that come about?

KIDDER: Well, for one thing, I spoke French. I didn't expect anything in particular, but with my background I thought it might be Latin America...

Q: But this was a ..what did the assignment entail? What was your job?

KIDDER: Political...political reporting, political relations...

Q: It was political reporting for Indochina?

KIDDER: Right, in those days we had a Chargé d'affaires in Vientiane and in Phnom Penh. Mike Reeves was in the former.

Q: That would be about equivalent to a Colonel?

KIDDER: That is right. So they had their own offices. Our Ambassador in Saigon was minister to those two other countries. I had a chance to visit them several times.

Q: Well, it was a period of time when the French were going through their death agony in Vietnam.

KIDDER: They certainly were...

Q: And how were we reacting at that point?

KIDDER: I think a lot related to the use of the military. When I got there, there were practically no American military there, except an attaché or two. Of course it grew up and up till a Brigadier General was our attaché. He had no political sense what so ever.

Q: So it was a routine assignment? The military sent somebody there without thinking this was really a hot spot?

KIDDER: I don't know how they were assigned. The senior American military officer was a two star General up in Hanoi. In those days, our military attaché in Saigon was a Brigadier General. He was a nice fellow, but he had no political sense whatsoever. His reporting was generally what he thought Washington wanted to hear.

Q: What was the situation, you had the French involved in the Dien Bien Phu incident; they were up in Hanoi. What down in Saigon? Was this considered a separate country at that point ?

KIDDER: No, when Vietnam was split in two, we had to close our office in Hanoi, where we had had a consul and a vice-consul...

Q: That was Toby Swank?.. no, Tom Corcoran?

KIDDER: Yes, I can't remember who preceded Tom. But we worked together, I went up several times, and we got along very well with the French. I never found the Vietnamese people easy to get along with, as opposed to the Lao and the Cambodians, who were...

Q: Did we feel at that point that there were Vietnamese to deal with?

KIDDER: Oh yes, increasingly so. Ngo Dinh Diem, always worked late at night. I remember being called at 12 o'clock at night to see him.

Q: What was his position at that time?

KIDDER: He was Prime Minister.

Q: What was your impression of him?

KIDDER: I think he was a very able man. He was not popular with the French. He had a very rough job really, because he was neither one thing nor the other, while the French were really in command. We talked a lot in late evenings. He liked to talk a great deal. We got along very well with him, and his principal officers.

Q: What were the major things that you were trying to accomplish, what was your major focus?

KIDDER: Our major focus was the war. The way which we would operate together and a number of problems kept arising, none of them very serious. By and large, I think our relations were good.

Q: I was in the Air Force, and I recall this vividly. As an enlisted man, and I was going to be discharged in 1954; yet there was a lot of talk after Dien Bien Phu which was what, early '54 or late '53?

KIDDER: I think it was May of '54.

Q: The French were trying to have us go in, and there was a debate about whether we would get involved or not. And so many of us were concerned about being kept on in the military but what were we advising or saying we should do, what was the thinking about what we should do at our legation?

KIDDER: It became an embassy about that time. The work with the French who were under the Governor General - I can't even remember his exact title - he was military while I was there. But Jean Daridan, a career diplomat, was high up in there, and I had known him before. By and large we got on extremely well with the Foreign Office people. They were very helpful to us. I think they understood our problems; their problems were serious, but they knew they were on the way out. The question was were we on the way in or what was going to happen? So I saw a great deal of the French and also of the Vietnamese military.

Q: What were we trying to do at that time? Speaking from the embassy, there was Donald Heath who was our Ambassador...

KIDDER: He was Ambassador for a long time. He was a wonderful fellow to work with...

Q: He was my Ambassador when I was in Saudi Arabia. What was his thinking and what was the thinking of his staff about the situation and what we should do?

KIDDER: He played a very quiet role. By then relations were a three pronged affair - French relations and Vietnamese... Laos and Cambodia didn't account for much then. Basically it was in Saigon...where Donald Heath who was a very able man, but very understated; he wasn't loquacious, or a man who sort of took the center stage. He was wonderful to work for. Basically it was a question of continuing our relations with the Vietnamese and the Vietnamese armed forces and also the French. Because that was certainly very important. The French were still ruling the roost.

Q: How did you see this thing playing out at the time? Did you have any feeling about what we should do? Other than just what our instructions were?

KIDDER: I felt very strongly that the United States should not get too deeply involved in Southeast Asia. Because I figured it was a losing game. At that time I think the total American military in Vietnam was around 300 to 400. We didn't want a vast American presence and of course there wasn't until after I had left. We felt very strongly that Americans should not get deeply involved in Southeast Asia. We figured it would be a losing game.

Q: Before you went out, what was your impression of Sihanouk?

KIDDER: I don't think he was taken very seriously, as seriously as we should have. He was regarded as something of a playboy. I think he was underrated.

Q: Was this from within the Department, too?

KIDDER: Yes.

Q: Were you given any sort of instructions before you went to Saigon?

KIDDER: I must have been but I don't remember them.

Q: It was a hurry-up affair?

KIDDER: It was a hurry up affair. I'd been out of touch with that part of the world for quite some time. We had a very competent fellow who had been in charge of the embassy who was transferred. I knew some of the French in Saigon who were in close contact with the Vietnamese and always talked very frankly with them. I never had a problem with the French.

Q: What was the feeling when you went out, did you see Cambodia as purely a front for the North Vietnamese? Did you think there was something we could do to prevent the North from using it as a staging area?

KIDDER: I don't think there was much optimism with regard to that. I think what they wanted me to do, and it was being done very well by the officer in Hanoi, were personal estimates of the Prince's views. How much power he had or didn't have, and during the time I was there I talked to the British and the French, and the Canadians, and others, the Australians, and I think the impression was he was a much more competent man than they thought he was. That was the reaction I got. But I never saw him while I was there.

Q: This is a later addition to the interview, you mention that you had an experience in Saigon?

KIDDER: Yes, I was chargé d'affaires, in a rather weird position because the personal representative of the President with the rank of Ambassador was my boss. But he never presented credentials, so I remained technically the chargé d'affaires, and signed all his telegrams, which surprised his aides considerably. He was a very fine man to work with, but he and I didn't quite agree on some things. He said he wanted me to say exactly what I thought, which I did, much to the alarm of the two Colonels who worked for him. But anyway, he was called to Washington for several weeks. The problems of what was going to happen to Vietnam was very much a toss-up and the personality of Ngo Dinh Diem... should we or should we not help him out, should we support him? I believed we should support him and when my boss, the general, was back in Washington talking to all the higher-ups, I was called one day to see the French General in command. I'd been to see Ngo Dinh Diem twice that day, and the French Commander-in-Chief who was the principal French representative in Saigon, I saw twice that day. It was a very, very busy day, and the thing that the French had decided was they would no longer support Ngo Dinh Diem, would try to get him replaced. In the meantime, Ngo Dinh Diem had I thought done a remarkably good job. And I took the liberty without any instructions from Washington - I had none - I decided that we would not support the French in trying to get rid of Diem; on the contrary, we would support him. And I reported that to the Department in a carefully worded telegram by Frank Meloy who was an expert, and for three days I got no results. Nothing. The third day I got a very brief telegram of congratulations. It was very moving for me. I had had no instructions, and I knew that the general, my boss, did not agree with me. I had pointed that out in the telegram, but under the circumstances we had to support Diem and not have him thrown out by the French.

Q: This was 1955?

KIDDER: Well, it was not long before I left. That was the only time I had to make a decision for the government without any instructions.

Q: This came up after the interview because we were discussing the feeling in Washington that with the telephone, they don't need anyone out in the field. They are calling the shots. But again and again when things are moving fast, that's not the case. It gets lost sight of.

KIDDER: When I saw the French Commander-in-Chief in Saigon, he was very, very surprised. He knew what my boss thought, so he was very surprised when I told him what our position was.

GEORGE LAMBRAKIS
Trainee, USIS
Saigon (1954-1955)

George Lambrakis was born in Illinois in 1931. After receiving his bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1952, he went on to earn both his master's degree from Johns Hopkins University in 1953 and his law degree from Tufts University in 1969. His career has included positions in Saigon, Pakse, Conakry, Munich, Tel Aviv, and Teheran. Mr. Lambrakis was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in June 2002.

Q: This would be in '54.

LAMBRAKIS: This would be '54. I also taught by correspondence personnel relations to business people at a school called the Holmes Institute. I was teaching Greek and selling encyclopedias. Then I passed the Foreign Service oral exam in Asia, in Saigon, where three ambassadors examined me. One of them, Mac Godley in Cambodia, much later took me on as his DCM in Beirut, Lebanon.

Q: Well, when you arrived in Saigon, what did they do?

LAMBRAKIS: It was pretty good. USIS had about 12 people. I was the first, and then we got a second junior officer trainee, Tom Grunwald, so there were two of us. I was assigned to the press section to begin with. Howie Simpson who used to make wonderful cartoons for the Foreign Service Journal was the press officer. He knew a lot about everybody. This was shortly after Dien Bien Phu. I went there in September; Dien Bien Phu, the great defeat of the French, had happened, I think in June. Simpson knew several of the French colonels who had either served there or knew people who had served there. I was rotated from section to section over one year, publications, field work. I traveled around the country with mobile units passing out literature. When my year was up, the word came in that I was going to be transferred to Laos.

Q: Before we go to Laos, what was the situation in Vietnam at the time?

LAMBRAKIS: When I arrived in Vietnam, Ngo Dien Diem had just taken office. I was told as I arrived there that South Vietnam would last at the most six more months, and Ngo Dien Diem no more than three months. This was the beginning of my experience with people telling you what will happen, and of course, eventually many people are right, but the problem is what is their timing. In this case, as we know, Ngo Dien Diem went on for many years, South Vietnam went on for many years. But everybody was very pessimistic. It was a dicey situation, but frankly USIS was trying its best to fix it. I had interesting experiences. One of my assignments was with the radio section. What we were doing was monitoring the news around the world in the evening and then we would tape them and they would be rebroadcast by the Vietnamese to their own field posts, so they would be put out as news bulletins all around the country next morning. Somebody had to get that tape from where we were recording it to the broadcasting studio at night, around midnight. One of the problems was that the police and the military were fighting at that point, because the military were under Ngo Dien Diem, the police were still quite corrupt, and with a lot of French influence. The French had left very unhappily at the time. Also there were at least three other armed groups that were anti-government. One of my jobs was on my motor scooter carrying this tape. I had to go up this main street between the police on one side and the military on the other, who would occasionally shoot at each other. This was always kind of fun as I zoomed through in the middle of the night and got to the Saigon radio station where people would turn their Tommy guns on you. That was one of my various experiences here. The situation in Vietnam was quite good when I was there from '54 to '55. It got much worse later.

Q: Well, had the exodus from the north started?

LAMBRAKIS: I am glad you mentioned that. Yes, and I had a part in that too. First of all that was the height of the exodus. I was sent to Haiphong because Hanoi and Haiphong were the last places to be evacuated. Haiphong harbor was the last place from which they were leaving. I went up there and did interviews on the ship on the way back with people as to what their experiences were as refugees, most of whom of course were Catholics fleeing to the south. Ngo Dien Diem was a Catholic, which eventually was part of his downfall in a Buddhist country. The other part of it was that the North Vietnamese got kind of preferential treatment. People thought that this was because they were Catholics but it was also because northerners tend to be a lot more energetic in Vietnam than the southerners. They were ready to work. But I did come back on their boat with them. I was also sent up there for six weeks to sit in for the USIS representative in Haiphong, "Red" Austin, the last one we had, while he went on leave. That was one of my temporary assignments.

Q: Was the plan early on to stay in North Vietnam?

LAMBRAKIS: I don't think so. We had to leave. The last thing we did, one of the many futile gestures, was passing out radios to people. That was one of my last jobs in North Vietnam, which of went to all of the villagers when we had to leave. As soon as we left, the local Viet Minh came by and collected them all. They were all supposed to be tuned to our frequency. I would just drive around and distribute them with a Vietnamese team. Mind you, it was quite clear at the time that there wasn't going to be another election in the south, because by then people knew all about elections in communist countries. We figured if there was going to be one total election for the country, there would be 99% vote for the communist party in the north, there would be a large percent in the south. The communists would win, and we had already seen what happened in places like Czechoslovakia when even 40% of the vote goes to the communists. So reinterpretation of this later on had it that the Americans broke the Geneva agreement, but at the time there was no talk about the issue. In fact even as late as when I was in Israel, I was making speeches in favor of the American position in Vietnam.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you were in Saigon?

LAMBRAKIS: Well we had several. I can't remember the name of the Foreign Service officer. Was it Reinhardt?

Q: It was Donald Heath at one time.

LAMBRAKIS: Actually I got there while Heath was still ambassador. Then he was replaced by someone else, I think Reinhardt. A military man, I think General Collins, came out there as presidential special emissary because I also did a run up country following President Diem with Collins when Diem went around introducing him and showing him the country. I even had an amusing time one day when I got to a theater late. I told the usher "I am from the American embassy." He ushered me to the second row where there was an empty seat right in the middle. The guy in front of me turned around to see who I was. It was Ngo Dien Diem, the President! The usher must have thought I was an American ambassador just arrived!...Not very sophisticated.

Q: Then you were moved. Is this part of a regular rotation thing?

LAMBRAKIS: There is one last thing I should say about Saigon since I have a French wife. That is that French junior officers were very unhappy about the Americans appearing to take Vietnam from them. They started setting off bombs. The first bomb was set off in front of the USIS library which happened to be just below where I was living at the time. I was in my apartment when the explosion occurred right in front of it. Then they were leaving bombs all over until finally they were caught. The Vietnamese police officer I was sitting next to in a theater one time turned to me and proudly said, "I was the one who caught those Frenchmen."

Q: But it was French who were doing that?

LAMBRAKIS: They were French officers, junior officers, but there was a lot of bitterness among the French. If you think back on it, Eisenhower had refused any meaningful assistance at Dien Bien Phu. They resented the Americans because they felt we were supporting Ngo Dien Diem, and Ngo Dien Diem was taking the country away from them. There was somebody named Bao Dai, the former emperor there, who was on the French Riviera and never came back.

ROBERT F. FRANKLIN
Radio Officer, USIS
Hanoi and Saigon (1954-1956)

Press Officer
Saigon (1962)

Robert F. Franklin was born in California in 1920. He joined USIA in 1951 and served as a radio officer in Tangier, Vietnam, Germany, the Philippines, and Africa. He was interviewed by Earl Wilson in 1988.

Q: Then the French you had when you went to your next post which I understand was Saigon?

FRANKLIN: That's right. I was French speaking and had a radio-broadcasting background which is the reason they asked me to replace the radio officer. I must tell you about this.

A fellow named Frank Mullen was the previous radio officer who managed to render the daughter of the Chief of Police in Saigon pregnant.

Q: I have to interpose right there one minute. I want to get a time frame. It's around early 1954 we're talking about.

FRANKLIN: That's correct. I think I arrived in April of '54 in Saigon.

Q: Okay, now back to the police chief.

FRANKLIN: Well, it was gently suggested that he might do better to resign, which he did. But, of course, they were left without a radio officer, and things at that time were really getting hot in Indochina. It was the period of Dien Bien Phu. The Viet Minh were winning. The French pretty much had their backs against the wall. And we didn't know quite where we were going.

So anyway, I was sent over and asked to sort of restart a radio program which I did. I got involved with the aid program there, too. We did audio tracks for A.I.D. motion pictures and that sort of thing. So it was an active period. Very shortly after I arrived, I don't suppose it was more than a month, I was sent up to Hanoi where Martin Ackerman at that time was the branch PAO. You remember Martin I'm sure. Howie Thomas was up there, also.

Q: That was a rather pleasant town, wasn't it?

FRANKLIN: Well, now that was a wild town. Because this was all French troops. The French to support the moral had sent in entertainment from Paris, the best entertainment they could get, the nightclubs and all that. So it was a very interesting time. However, Dien Bien Phu finally collapsed.

The agreement was that the French would render all of North Vietnam to the Viet Minh on a certain date. It was sometime in the middle of the year. And I went up with my chief local whose name I cannot recall but who shortly thereafter went to work for the Voice. You can probably look him up in the Vietnamese section, at least in the record.

He and I went up to see what we could see on this turnover. And he made a report in Vietnamese; I made a report in English -- these were all on rather primitive portable tape recorders at that time, battery operated -- which we sent back by pouch to Saigon. I recall that we recorded the Viet Minh, who were very militant singers. We had really quite a singing concert there where they had taken over one area. They didn't bother us.

We were hitching a ride with a fellow named John McGowan. This was not your John McGowan. He was an Army Major, an assistant military attaché. We found a hill in Hanoi where we could get a good view of a large area. There were plenty of people in the streets (this was a popular rebellion) and everywhere you could see more and more Viet Minh flags, the red field with the gold star centered. And, as I wrote into the little piece that I sent back, the major said, "you know, something is very familiar about this." He thought a moment, then he snapped his fingers and said, "I know! It looks just like the takeover of East Berlin. All the red flags popping out here and there."

Right. One little interesting incident: My local employee, my assistant, had a sister who lived not far from the Red River Bridge, and he wanted to drop off briefly and see his sister. I said, all right, five minutes, ten minutes, don't be very long. So we parked in this large square near where his sister lived. She was half a block away. The significance of the Red River Bridge or the Red River was that it marked the border between the area that was to be immediately occupied at that time by the Viet Minh and the sort of reserved area around Haiphong, the adjacent port city, that was not to be turned over for several months.

As we learned later, the Hanoi regiment of the Viet Minh was due to come in to that square and have a celebration. We had had no idea. And in the ten minutes that we were there, parked in that square, the square became packed with people awaiting the arrival of this home-town Viet Minh regiment. This was from our point of view sort of the enemy, you know, although nothing was declared at that time. Here I was sitting with an American major in uniform driving an American car -- I think it was a little Jeep carryall -- and surrounded by these people, absolutely surrounded by them. They didn't really pay much attention to us, thank God.

I was saying mentally to my assistant, "come on, come on. Say goodbye to your sister and get up here." Well, to make a long story short he did, but we could not see how we could get out. The place was absolutely jam packed with people. It was a sizeable square that ordinarily would take up about a square block in the United States. Fortunately, the last French tank column to leave Hanoi came through at that point and started crossing the Red River bridge down to Haiphong. We just pulled in behind the French and got across the bridge. So that was a little incident worthy of remembering.

From Haiphong, incidentally, MSTs, that is Military Sea Transport Service ships, American ships, came up and transported refugees from the north, 5,000 at a time, down to the southern part of Vietnam, Saigon and that area.

My wife got involved in that. She was working at that time. The Binh Xuyen rebellion, which I will explain shortly, had resulted in the death of the chief of the AID photo laboratory, Dixie Reese. As I said, everything was heating up during this time, and AID was desperate for somebody to take that over. My wife had some photographic experience, not very profound, but enough to count, and they asked her to take over and run the lab. In connection with that, she ran up to Hanoi and did a photo story on the refugees coming down, among other things.

Interesting historical note: That was the time of Dr. Tom Dooley, who later became rather famous in setting up the clinic in Laos. When we went up to Haiphong on two or three occasions pending its turnover, we stayed in the same hotel as Tom and ate a number of meals with him. We had to admire this energetic young Navy doctor going out and working in the refugee camps where they were staging pending getting on the American ships. That's just a little sidelight.

One other incident that occurred. Well, it wasn't really an incident -- a situation: Just before the takeover of Hanoi, the consulate up there was a residential place, a house, set well back from the road, behind a lawn of 50 feet in depth perhaps. And they had a Viet Minh guard out in front of the consulate. The consul, by the way, stayed there, oh, six months or more after the occupation by Viet Minh. But it was very nerve-wracking, because when you'd go into the consulate or come out of the consulate, the Viet Minh guard had a burp gun, a small machine gun, that he pointed right at your belly button, all the time from the time you got out of the car, walked up the lawn, the 50 odd feet, and got in the door. Then he'd pick you up coming out of the door, machine gun pointed at you all the way, with his finger on the trigger. And you couldn't help but think, "Gosh, what would happen if this fellow sneezed?"

In Saigon we had another rebellion that I didn't see much of in the American press later on. It was the Binh Xuyen, nominally a religious sect but not really: a little bit closer to the Mafia than anything else. Emperor Bao Dai had given them control of the police force in Saigon. But Bao Dai had gone back to France in exile. Ngo Dinh Diem had been elected president, and he wanted the Binh Xuyen out. They rebelled. We had a rather violent civil war in Saigon when this occurred. I don't remember the exact date. But it was not too long after the Hanoi takeover, probably the fall of '54.

And there was a murder right in front of our house. I happened to live directly opposite the ambassador in a duplex along with Jim Carrigan and his wife -- that is, they had the other half. And there was a shooting from one vespa (motor scooter) to another right in front of the house, connected to that local rebellion.

So my boy -- how old is he now? I guess about 10 or 11 at this time -- grew up knowing the size of mortars from the sound and the caliber of ammunition. Was that a 30 caliber or 50 caliber machine gun, etcetera? It was an interesting period. The rebellion failed after two or three weeks.

We stayed two years. I didn't like Saigon. Not for the lack of interest in it, but I tolerate the tropics poorly. The heat bothers me a great deal. I didn't like it, so I was happy to leave in the Spring of '56.

Q: Your broadcasting, were you feeding stories to VOA?

FRANKLIN: No, we were doing mostly local work. Occasionally we'd send a piece to VOA, but really not very often. Nearly all was local production for placement on the local radio station. At that time there were two stations operating in Saigon, "Radio France Asie," French Asian Radio which, of course, was owned and operated by the French government, and comparable perhaps to RIAS, you know, that sort of thing. Then Radio Saigon and, to the north, Radio Hue. We were putting things on tape, reel to reel tape in those days, and giving them to Vietnamese radio stations. And we curried their favor by giving them our equipment which they used for various programs. We got along very well with them.

Q: Well, I suppose, some of this was covering AID type of activities.

FRANKLIN: Part of it was that, yes. Part of it was blatant propaganda. Now we were getting very militant about opposition to the Viet Minh. And I remember, I got a book of Vietnamese proverbs and had it translated. (Of course, we had translators in the office.) I picked out anything that might be turned to apply to the anti-Viet Minh posture.

Q: So this was unattributed material.

FRANKLIN: Well, it was nominally attributed to the South Vietnamese government.

Q: Right.

FRANKLIN: But we prepared the spots. And we prepared them in typical American fashion with fanfares and music background and two and three voices. A lot of one minute spots. The stations played them to death. They really played them to death. I think they had quite an impact.

We also produced a cultural program. One of our officers, Mim Johnstone, had been reared in part in France and really spoke quite good French. So we asked her to do -- I think it was a weekly program on American culture, all sorts of things. Cultural news from the United States, music -- no heavy hand at all. she did, and that was very popular. These were all, I think. We recorded the spots on disks in those days, the old 16-inch acetates. And her program was on tape, of course, then provided to the radio station. Very, very popular.

Q: Two things. One is that progressively as the cold war developed, especially in Vietnam and Thailand, the USIA was moving more and more into unattributed type of propaganda activities in support of the local government.

FRANKLIN: Exactly right.

Q: I suppose during your period in Saigon that the Viet Minh controlled vast areas of the country. And therefore radio would have been a particularly effective means of trying to reach them.

FRANKLIN: Exactly correct. And the Voice of America itself was very important with their daily Vietnamese program. It was run very efficiently by a fellow whose name I've forgotten, but he was a former missionary in Vietnam and spoke fluent Vietnamese -- an American -- and he did a very good job with that.

When I arrived there the post was "Indochina," and Saigon was the capital of Indochina. Later, of course, we split up and had separate operations in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, or Kampuchea they call it now, Vientiane for Laos.

Q: I remember a fellow by the name of Olsen who was a political officer in Manila had been in Saigon. And he would go up to Phnom Penh to play bridge with French civilians and come back to report on conditions. That was his cover.

FRANKLIN: Well, we all did this. I was responsible for providing radio programs the three countries, what are now three countries. And I made frequent trips to Phnom Penh. Later Martin Ackerman became PAO there. And who was it? Ted Tanen was PAO in Laos, where I also had to visit. We had far more than we could do for all this big area, really. We had to rely heavily on radio, because a great deal of the country is rural, as you know. How else are you going to reach these people?

One officer, Fred Rein, who was a former Broadway stage manager, had a good idea: He got together a cast of actors who went around giving little skits. All propaganda, if you will. But he had a regular tour going in our area around Saigon. Quite effective.

Q: Well, you said that you didn't do well in the tropics. Were you sick there?

FRANKLIN: I just tolerated the heat ill, I think. In those days we didn't have enough electricity to run two air conditioners. Jim Carrigan, who had moved in a few weeks before me, had an air conditioner, and I couldn't ask him to stop his so I could put one on, so I had no air conditioner.

Q: My recollection is Jim Carrigan got sick and left.

FRANKLIN: No, you're thinking of Jack Andrew, who died of a liver infection. Annette Andrew later married Stan Karnow. (Author of Vietnam, A History. Stanley Karnow was at that time, and for many years thereafter, a correspondent in Southeast Asia.) Several years obviously.

Q: I'll be darned. I just finished reading Karnow's history.

FRANKLIN: And I knew Stan later on.

You recall my mentioning the election of Ngo Dinh Diem who was, at least initially, "our man." The one that we supported for president of the country. USIA played a very big hand in that, with radio spots, and I remember Jim Carrigan my neighbor who was running the press section at that time, turned out I don't know how many hundreds of thousands of little paper Vietnamese flags. The Viet Minh had their own flag. And the Vietnamese flag was a yellow background with horizontal red stripes on it. But the whole idea was to instill patriotism and support Ngo Dinh Diem.

Ngo did very well when he first came in. He was an ascetic, you could say almost a recluse. And a very moral man. He got into trouble later on and got assassinated. That's all in the history books, and you don't need that from me.

Q: Well, in any event, according to your biography you went from there to Berlin.

When I was serving in Manila, the fellow who was slated to be press attaché in Saigon had a family problem, I think his wife had glaucoma as I remember, and was delayed in arriving. The departing press attaché had frantically to get to someplace else -- I don't know why that was -- so because I was nearby and was familiar with the area they asked me to come over and wear the press attachés hat for a little while.

A couple of things there stick in my memory. I was there, I don't know, maybe a month, maybe even slightly less. But while I was there I had the embarrassing little incident of having an Indian, that is from India, publisher from the Madras area, owner of a newspaper and a publisher. Acting as his own correspondent, he had come in to see me, the American press attaché to ask about this and that. And I swear his accent was so thick that I got embarrassed asking him, "What did you say?" Shows to go you English ain't always English. It depends a lot on how well it's understood.

Another rather annoying incident that came up that I would like to relate for the record. About that time the very first baby flat top was coming over from the United States bringing the very first batch of helicopters to Vietnam for these American troops. And we got notice of it by telegram. But it was secret. The telegram was marked secret for a couple of obvious reasons.

And some damn fool politician, one of the Congressman or a Senator, I've forgotten which, opened his yap and gave it to the press long before the ship arrived. I think the ship had just departed Seattle as I recall. And I was put in the very embarrassing position being the press attaché and dealing with all these news hungry American correspondents asking about this ship which had a certain significance at the time, since it was the first one to come.

And I finally wound up going down to the dock which in Saigon was at the end of the main streets. We used to call it Rue Catinat -- I've forgotten the new name of it. But anyway, there was the ship, this great big ship, blocking the sun. And helicopters all aboard. And one of the correspondents came up to me and said, well, what have you got to say now? And I said, "Ship? What ship?" What else could I say?

JOHN A. LACEY
Intelligence Analyst, Vietnamese Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1954-1956)

Country Officer, Burma/Cambodia Desk
Washington, DC (1965-1966)

John A. Lacey was born in Illinois in 1917. He joined the Department of State in 1950 and the Foreign Service in 1955. He served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Australia, and Rangoon. He was interviewed by Henry Precht in 1989.

Q: So, John, you then made the decision, over your wife's reservations, to enter the Foreign Service, but you continued in intelligence research. And I see from your CV you were an analyst of Vietnam, of Indochina, in that period.

LACEY: That illustrates another continuing point of my gripes against the American public and Uncle Sam's operations in terms of the American's ignorance of foreign affairs. I was called in by my boss, my senior boss, in INR and told that I was now being assigned to Indochina. Why? Well, the battle of Dien Bien Phu, you remember had occurred -- well, I think it started in March and ended in May of '54. In any case, whenever it started, it became a turning point in history, the end of colonial rule and the beginning of America's involvement in Asia.

Uncle Sam suddenly realized that we knew nothing about Indochina. Now, why did we know so little? Because up to that point in time, Uncle Sam was quite content -- and I use Uncle Sam in the sense of Washington leadership -- to leave the administration and problems of Indochina to the French, just as we looked to older colonial powers to administer other Asian countries. Suddenly, we were left with a vacuum.

Of our several people in the Department of State, only Paul Kattenburg -- whose name may ring a bell with you -- had any claim at all of being knowledgeable about Indochina. Now, we did have a couple other people. Conrad Becker was an authority on Burma, Dick Stuart on Indonesia. But that was more of a personal pastime than it was a matter of State. Certainly, when I said to my boss, "I don't know anything about Indochina."

"Well, you know something about China, don't you?"

"Yes."

He said, "That's half the battle."

Well, you chuckle rightly because anyone halfway familiar with the world knows that it is not half the battle at all.

Anyway, I was assigned to the Indochina desk in 1954, about the summer thereof. I remained there until '56. Because of my NIS, National Intelligence Survey, experience I was put in charge of the NIS program for Indochina. That was illuminating, but primarily for me. I am not certain that the product represented anything spectacular.

Q: How did you know you were in trouble with Mr. Bundy? I mean, how did that drama play out?

LACEY: I took over the Burma-Cambodian desk from a very able officer, Dick Ewing, in July or August -- I have forgotten the precise date -- of '67. At the time, it was felt by everyone including myself that Burma and Cambodia were sleepy little outfits and that Lacey despite his health would be up to it. But, as it turned out, no one had reckoned with the desire of the Pentagon leaders, especially those concerned with Asia and Vietnam, to step up the ante. The ante being a desire on the part of senior Pentagon mostly Army types to intervene in Cambodia to stop the movement of the Viet Cong down the Ho Chi Minh trail. Remember that?

Q: Right.

LACEY: And the Ho Chi Minh trail went along the border that ended in the southern part of Cambodia. The Pentagon wanted to intercept that trail in the worst kind of way.

Well, John Lacey and a superior person by the name of Evelyn Colbert, who still was intelligence INR/DRF, felt to the contrary. Our argument was, "Look, you fellows, you can't even control the northern part of Vietnam, south of the dividing line. Why do you want to extend the war? I mean, the conflict?" Incidentally, I still refuse to refer to it as a war because we never declared war. In any case, that was our position and EAP's energies focused on that.

Every morning there was a scheduled meeting on Vietnam/Cambodia. The Pentagon tribe would come over the river to the Department of State. We would have prepared our last position in response to their last proposal only to be confronted with a newly-developed position, a new rationale for why American troops should be allowed to enter Cambodia. They wore us down.

I fought that to the point where the word got passed to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State.

Q: Sullivan?

LACEY: No, not Sullivan, he was much earlier. This fellow was a carpet by the name of Habib, Phil Habib. He called me into his office and said, "John, Mr. Bundy wants you out by noon today."

Q: Had you done something in the morning meeting that had offended him?

LACEY: I have no idea what the circumstances were, but I think the provocation for Bundy's decision was that I had been consistently opposing --

Q: A thorn in the Pentagon's side.

LACEY: Well, in the Department of State's side, too, as far as Bill Bundy was concerned. So I had no choice but to pack up my few papers. I remember going to Harald Jacobson's office who was then chief of the China desk of EAP. I cried like a baby. The second time I have cried.

Harald Jacobson was a good family friend and still is. I was mortified, but in retrospect, that was probably the best thing that ever happened to me, Henry, because Roy Wald -- whose name I have mentioned before -- was now working in the Office of Science and Technological Affairs. He and I had been long-time friends.

RUFUS C. PHILLIPS, III
U.S. Army and Central Intelligence Agency
Saigon (1954-1955)

Assistant Director, Rural Affairs,
Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Vientiane, Laos (1957-1959)

Rufus C. Phillips, III was born in Ohio in 1929. He graduated from Yale University in 1951 and served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1954 to 1955. After serving for several years with the Central Intelligence Agency, he served as Assistant Director of the CORDS program in Vietnam. He was interviewed July 19, 1995 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You said you were assigned to Ed Lansdale's operation. Could you explain who he was and what you did?

PHILLIPS: He had been sent to Vietnam. When he was in the Philippines acting as an advisor to Magsaysay, he had been asked to go over and take a look at Vietnam. Of course, all of this is in his autobiography. He went around with the French and looked at the guerrilla situation there. When the Geneva Conference took place in 1954, he was called back to Washington and asked if he would be willing to go to Vietnam. So he did as Chief of what was called the Saigon Military Mission. The Agency had two local stations. One station was a normal station inside the embassy, and the other was a special group in MAAG. General O'Daniel was commander of MAAG. He had just been assigned out there. Lansdale had requested some help and the Agency scoured the Far East for anybody who was in uniform. Some reservists were put back in uniform. He got a whole group of people there, none of whom were particularly suited for what he wanted them for, except for the then Major Lucien Conein, who had been in the OSS, had been in Vietnam, had both a paramilitary background and Vietnam experience. The rest of us, by and large, were people who had some paramilitary training, which wasn't really what he needed at that point because there wasn't going to be a war. He put some of us into an entirely different role. I was assigned to begin to work with a Vietnamese Army psychological routine unit, which was a combination psy-war company and troop information unit. That is what I began to do. Just about everything I did out there was an overt rather than covert activity.

Q: You must have been sitting down and reading the book trying to keep one chapter ahead of the book?

PHILLIPS: Well, I remember when he told me that he wanted me to work with the Vietnamese psychological warfare unit, I said, "I don't know anything about psychological warfare." He reached into his bookcase and threw me this book by Paul Linebarger, which was THE book written on psychological warfare after World War II and said, "Here, read this."

Q: Before we move on, how did you see Lansdale's operation and how did it fit into the mission there?

PHILLIPS: He had a very broad charter. It was literally, "Ed, do what you can to save South Vietnam." In my opinion, he was a real political genius in terms of conceptualizing what might pull South Vietnam together. It is hard now, I think, to realize what South Vietnam was like then. The French had just lost the war and were completely discouraged. The South Vietnamese had been excluded from the negotiations. Diem had just been appointed by Emperor Bao Dai as Prime Minister. He had come to Saigon and found that he didn't even control his own palace guard who belonged to the Binh Xuyen who were a gangster sect in Saigon. They had actually bought control of the police force from Bao Dai. So you had the Binh Xuyen who were riding around in uniforms patrolling the streets of Saigon, who were the police, but who also controlled all of the gambling, vice and the opium trade. The army was commanded by a General Hinh who held the rank of brigadier general in the French Air Force. He was Vietnamese, but very susceptible to French influence. The French establishment resented Diem because he had always refused to cooperate with the French and was known to be anti-French. They wanted to maintain their control over the way things were being run. They tried to do this through the Binh Xuyen. Initially they tried through the army, where they had some real influence with General Hinh.

The other thing that was really complicating things was that there were so many refugees coming out of North Vietnam who had to be resettled. The government was completely disorganized. The French had never given it much responsibility. It was a facade of a government. The French controlled all the gasoline supplies for the Vietnamese Army, for example. Most of the logistics for the Army had been provided by the French. All of a sudden after Geneva, the Vietnamese were nominally in control but had little or no means and certainly no experience in actually accomplishing the tasks of government.

Ed tried to help the Vietnamese attack their problems on a number of fronts. One was to help them organize and set up some kind of a special commission to handle the refugee problem. Through MAAG, we were able to get special CAT (Civil Air Transport) flights and the Navy participated in moving these refugees. We were able to get supplies in and to help the Vietnamese build refugee camps. MAAG was very effectively involved in that. There was a volunteer medical operation called Operation Brotherhood which provided a lot of Filipino doctors who came in and took care of many of the refugees. Operation Brotherhood was a combined brain child of Lansdale and of a group of Filipinos.

Another problem was that the Viet Minh were scheduled to evacuate areas in the South that they controlled and move at least their regular troops back up north. The question was, "Is there anything to fill this vacuum?" Lansdale saw that a plan was needed on the Vietnamese side which the Americans could support both with tangible economic aid and military assistance to reoccupy these areas and to reestablish government. So that became what we called the National Security Program. We helped draft and Diem promulgated a National Security Act whereby the Vietnamese Army was put in charge of these areas for a certain period of time. Eventually they would become civilian areas.

So, these operations, using elements of the nascent Vietnamese Army, had to be mobilized, organized, trained and then deployed to reoccupy various areas. One of the real problems was a psychological one with the Vietnamese. They didn't think they could do anything, because they had never been allowed to do anything on their own. They had very little self-confidence. They had never really organized anything themselves, being used to the French telling them what to do or doing things for them.

One of the ideas that Ed came up with was to use the Philippines as a way of generating self-confidence in the Vietnamese and giving them ideas about what they could do or how they could address some of their problems. In September 1954, we got a group of younger Vietnamese together who came from a couple of ministries, from General Hinh's staff and from the presidential palace to go over in a group to the Philippines to see what Magsaysay was doing, and how they had dealt with the Communist Huk problem, not only militarily but mainly in a civilian way. And also how they were resettling the Hukbalahaps, the communists, who had surrendered.

I took this group over as their escort. This was rather a unique experience because I didn't know anything really about what had been happening in the Philippines. It was very exciting for me personally, and I think very exciting for the Vietnamese, because we saw, contrary to communist propaganda, that in fact the Filipinos were running their own affairs. They were responsible for all of these operations, not the Americans. I think the Vietnamese picked up both ideas and a lot of confidence out of that. We were able to bring some Filipino advisors to Vietnam later to help them. The head of the presidential guard battalion, Colonel Valeriong, came over to help Diem organize his own security force and get rid of his Binh Xuyen guards.

In addition, of course, there was the whole political situation. All of the political parties in Vietnam were basically underground parties. They had never been out in the open, never worked with each other. They had lived a clandestine existence because the French had tried to eliminate them and, of course, in the post-war struggles the Viet Minh had tried to eliminate them and in fact did eliminate a number of them. So, everybody relied on secrecy and nobody was used to dealing with each other out in the open. It was very difficult for them to do. The standard feeling they had about each other, unless they knew someone almost from childhood, was automatic distrust. Yet they had to begin to work together. Lansdale got involved in trying to get Diem together with a number of local leaders and personalities. Most successful was his helping Diem to achieve a relationship with Trinh Minh Tho who was a dissident Cao Dai leader who was widely respected because he had fought both the French and the Viet Minh. His troops were brought into the Vietnamese army as sort of an auxiliary. This helped tip the balance between various quasi-religious and religious sects of which there were the Binh Xuyen, who weren't religious at all, the Cao Dai, who were but who were divided into factions, and the Hoa Hao who were another Buddhist offshoot, further down in the Delta, who also had two dissident factions. The French had paid and subsidized a number of troops which came from the Cao Dai and the Hoa Hao and had some control over various factions. So, it was a struggle between Diem trying to line up some of the cleaner elements and the French maneuvering other elements and the whole natural scene of mutual suspicion. It was very, very difficult to try to keep some semblance of government going in South Vietnam during this period.

Also, I should mention that General Hinh was himself involved in trying to pull off a coup against Diem. It eventually aborted, and he left the country going into exile in France, because the Americans wouldn't support him.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the United States had come in to be the big brother at that point?

PHILLIPS: No, not really. We had come in, but you have to remember that we came in very small numbers. I guess you could say that we wielded an influence which was disproportionate to our numbers, but most of the Vietnamese, regardless whether they supported Diem or not, wanted the French out of power. This was the real struggle that went on between nationalist Vietnamese all of whom supported Diem in that part of what he was trying to do, and those elements who still felt, either because they were directly on the payroll or were influenced by the French colonialist element which was still in defacto control in this French establishment in Vietnam. When Diem succeeded in overcoming the Binh Xuyen in the spring of 1955, he became immensely popular in South Vietnam because he inherited the nationalist mantle as the person who succeeded in getting the French all the way out of Vietnam. Well, this of course put the Americans in a rather difficult position. We were working at the time in a joint military mission called TRIM which was headed by General O'Daniel, but had a French deputy commander. The idea was to combine the French and the American military missions. In this way the Americans would have some ability to get at the training of the Vietnamese. Before that the American military advisory group was the military advisory group to the French, not to the Vietnamese. The Vietnamese were a subsidiary element of the French army. Once Diem came, of course, the situation changed. General O'Daniel and the US as a whole wanted to have some direct influence and contact with the Vietnamese. The way, at least initially, was through a joint military mission. The problem was, of course, that there was a lot of dissension inside of the military mission. It was funny in a way. What was called the National Security Division of TRIM, was set up to assist Vietnamese national security operations, which were basically reoccupations of territory by the Vietnamese army. Lansdale was the head of it. He had a deputy called Roman Des Fosses, who was a very nice person, very decent, who had been in Vietnam 17 years. Under Roman Des Fosses, there was a group of French intelligence officers whose job was to do nothing but to watch us. So it was really a bit strange. I didn't spend too much time at headquarters because by October, November, 1954, I was already down in Soc Trang, with some elements of the Vietnamese army, who were then forming to go in and reoccupy the Ca Mau peninsula, the far south of South Vietnam. So, I spent most of my time out in the field.

Q: One person you haven't mentioned is the ambassador. Who was our ambassador at that time?

PHILLIPS: It was Donald Heath, who was replaced in 1955 by Reinhardt.

Q: These were both Europeanists.

PHILLIPS: Well, Heath was but he had a lot of sensitivity and feeling for the Vietnamese. He had very good relations with the French, but he, I think, was very perceptive and actually quite sympathetic to what Lansdale was trying to do. It was a very, very difficult period because the French were our allies in Europe. It started out being a European driven policy basically and I think that is why we came, as much as anything, to the aid of the French in the early years of the Indochina war. Then all of a sudden we found ourselves at loggerheads with them during the 1954-55 period. It was rather painful.

Q: Could you talk a little bit about your impression of the group of South Vietnamese you were working with?

PHILLIPS: I worked with a variety of people. I worked with a number of the military, some of whom had been Viet Minh earlier and then had come into the Vietnamese army having abandoned the Viet Minh cause. Some of them had been trained by the French from the very beginning as officers. So they were a mixed group. I found a number of very intelligent, very, very dedicated people. Probably the most capable officer I worked with was Le Van Kim, who was then a colonel. He was in fact the Army Chief of Staff. He had actually grown up in France, although he was completely Vietnamese, and had been trained by the French. At the beginning of World War II, after France fell he was interned and then was eventually repatriated to South Vietnam. There later he joined the nascent Vietnamese army when the French decided to put Bao Dai back on the throne and create a government in South Vietnam. He was an intellectual, extremely bright and a very, very able army officer.

I spent a lot of time with Kim and became the liaison between TRIM and a two division operation which he was in charge of to reoccupy Interzone V in Central Vietnam. Interzone V stretched from the southern part of Quang Ngai almost down to Qui Nhon, or just south of Qui Nhon. So it was all of Binh Dinh Province and about half of Quang Ngai Province. This was a zone that the Viet Minh had controlled for about nine years. The French at one point had invaded the area in something called Operation Atlante for about six months. They had brought some Vietnamese unit with them and made some inroads but then left. So, really the area had enjoyed almost uninterrupted Viet Minh rule for nine years. It was kind of a sanctuary. The Viet Minh had agreed, as a result of Geneva, to pull their regular troops out of this, and other zones, and to leave sections of Interzone V beginning in the north and going south in successive stages. So the Vietnamese, under their national security directive, organized a force to go in and reoccupy that area, using some lessons learned from the reoccupation of Ca Mau for which the troops had not been very well prepared. In the case of this operation, Kim set up education and indoctrination classes for all of the troops in terms of how to deal with the civilian population and what to do, which actually resulted in a very successful reoccupation. There were two divisions of troops who went in. It took about six weeks to progressively occupy the entire area from north to south. During that time there was not one single incident between a civilian and Vietnamese soldiers. The Army's morale was extremely high. It was interesting, the attitude of the civilian population. They had been told by the Viet Minh that the Vietnamese army troops were going to come in and rape and pillage. But when it became apparent that they were not going to do that, that they weren't stealing anything, and that in fact they were helping people by rebuilding bridges and so on, the attitude of the population changed. The operation started to generate a lot of enthusiasm. Part of that was because frankly a lot of the people were tired; the Viet Minh occupation had been very, very hard on them. They had been deprived of medical supplies and the Viet Minh way of running things was pretty heavy-handed. So, we got a tremendous psychological boost out of this operation. About a week or ten days after it was finished, President Diem came up to Qui Nhon, and I have photographs of this, and had a tremendous reception. A really enthusiastic crowd of people greeted him there. Part of it was because the word by that time was spreading throughout South Vietnam, that he was defying the French and defeating the Binh Xuyen.

One of the things back then was that the American presence was very, very minimal. When I went out in the field I went out in civilian clothes. I did not go in military uniform. If I was asked, I was just there as an observer. I was not an advisor. It was all very low key. I think those of us who really knew the Vietnamese understood how important that was. This was something we didn't understand later on, certainly not at the top, that it had to be the Vietnamese doing things for themselves. Otherwise our side was not a viable alternative to the Viet Minh, who had played on Vietnamese nationalism.

Q: What was the feeling when you were there in 1954? Was it that the Viet Minh or communists were out of South Vietnam and just a matter of reestablishing the government or were they getting ready for another round?

PHILLIPS: We knew that they had left a stay-behind cadre. We knew, in the case of Binh Dinh, that they actually forcibly evacuated about 14,000 young men between the ages of about 10-14 -- just took them right out of their families and that they had given orders to their soldiers to try to marry as much of the female population as they could and possibly conceive a child before they left. These were the instructions. We knew that there was a network left behind, that there was going to be a coming struggle at that level as to who was going to control the rural areas and basically the rural population of Vietnam. I don't think any of us had any illusions about that. I don't think this was universally perceived or adequately appreciated. Certainly the aid mission policy became focused on development in the cities, on trying to industrialize South Vietnam so they could start import substitutions.

One of the persons I worked with a little later in 1955-56 was a guy named Kieu Cong Cung who was a very interesting person. He had become a Brigadier General in the Viet Minh army, was one of two or three leaders who led the early resistance in the south against the French and the British, when the Viet Minh broke out of Saigon and went into armed rebellion. But he never joined the communist party. About 1953, he was in North Vietnam and because he refused to join the party the Viet Minh were about to arrest him. So he and his wife and an infant child fled, walking all the way from practically on the Chinese border of North Vietnam to South Vietnam, evading the Viet Minh all the way. Evading the French, too, of course. Then, he had settled on a farm in South Vietnam and did nothing for the remaining period of the war against the French until Diem came. At that point he surfaced and volunteered to go to work for Diem. Diem wanted him to develop a group of younger people to go out and work in the villages. The idea was a village self-help program. We called it civil action, the Vietnamese had a different name for it. So he was given some support and a fairly free hand to start recruiting people.

We asked the aid mission if they would provide support and not only that, Diem asked them for community development advisors. The aid (ICA) program didn't want to have anything to do with this operation. Ed argued with Ambassador Reinhardt about it pointing out that there was a vacuum in the rural areas which needed to be filled and that this was critical to the future of South Vietnam. The Vietnamese had to carry their program largely on their own, unfortunately without much tangible assistance. Civic Action became more of a propaganda operation than one of tangible assistance to people. A type of communist denouncement operation. If it had some real economic assistance attached to it, I think it would have helped to stem the communist insurgency which started up again.

Q: What was your role in this?

PHILLIPS: I was gradually given more and more responsibility because I was able to work with the Vietnamese. I became in effect, first as a second lieutenant and eventually as a first lieutenant, the only contact between the Military Assistance Advisory Group and two divisions of the Vietnamese army. I held an advisory role which later would have been occupied by a US brigadier general. After that I was given a series of responsibilities. One of them was to assist in the reorganization of the Vietnamese army and to set up what was called a G-5 bureau in the army, both at the general staff level and on down. The other was to help Cung organize Civic Action.

Q: G-5 in military parlance would be what?

PHILLIPS: Psychological warfare and troop education. I worked on that, setting up training courses in psychological warfare having learned, I suppose, a fair amount about it. I also acted as an informal advisor from Ed's shop to Civic Action in terms of how it was being set up. Initially we were able to get some Agency funds to help get it started. We wanted to turn the thing over to the economic aid program as I said previously, but they weren't having any of it. I continued to do things like that. I was very close to Nguyen Dinh Thong who was in the secretariat at the presidency, and eventually became the Secretary of Defense in 1961. I did a lot of odd jobs which were almost all overt. The only really covert activity I got engaged in -- this has been pretty well written up -- was a psy-war effort against the Viet Minh. One of our people had been working with a UNQDD writer. The UNQDD was the oldest nationalist political paper in Vietnam. They had been decimated by the communists when the communists assassinated a lot of political leaders in the North. The writer was an interesting guy. He was what you might call a "bomb thrower." His idea was, "give me a gun and I will go shoot some Viet Minh and failing that maybe I can go shoot some French." He was a good writer too. Lansdale had the idea that if we could find a good Vietnamese writer, maybe we could write something like Tom Paine's "Common Sense," but for the Vietnamese. This was to try to give them an idea of a political cause they could rally around. What was the South's political cause? What kind of rally cry could they, would they respond to? He (the UNQDD writer) did turn out a piece which had some success in this regard.

Later I learned from him that he had a lot of friends who were astrologers in South Vietnam, and of course astrology is very, very influential there. I suppose this was the most unique thing that I did in South Vietnam. I started working with him to put out an astrological magazine for the 1955 Vietnamese New Year in which we would give some predictions from Vietnamese astrologers that would be in Diem's favor and against the Communists. He did a heck of a job on this thing. It was sold out in two printings and got back more money than we put into it. So, I worked with him on that, but it was a sideline.

Q: Did you find yourself as you were getting this on-the-job-training that the Vietnamese did not want to do things the French way no matter what?

PHILLIPS: I think our attempt was to try to elicit from the Vietnamese what was their way. In other words, let's say we knew that one of the big problems was that government had to be restored to an area. We looked at what the French experience had been, what the Vietnamese experience had been and then we had a dialogue with the Vietnamese to try to get them talking about their own ideas. I suppose what came out was sort of a melange of ideas which we helped to organize. In other words how do you organize an activity and staff it with Vietnamese ideas of what to do practically on the ground, what do you say to people, how do you get popular support, etc. We couldn't supply these answers, they had to supply them. I think the process was a common one but it was one in which the Vietnamese felt that results were their ideas and not our ideas. We weren't there trying to sell American ideas.

Q: When you were up in what we called II Corps did you get involved in the working with the Montagnards?

PHILLIPS: No, I didn't have much to do with the Montagnards in those days because inner zone V was all along the coast. Later in 1962-63 I had some contact with the Montagnards. The Montagnards were basically not very sympathetic to the Viet Minh. The French had been fairly effective in working with them, mainly because the French liked to play the Montagnards off against the Vietnamese and vice versa. So, the situation with the Montagnards was that there really was not a lot of Montagnard support for the Vietnamese on either side. They were more of a passive group.

Q: How did our MAAG mission under General O'Daniel operate and did you have any contact with him?

PHILLIPS: First of all there was this joint military mission, TRIM. That was an uneasy relationship with the French. O'Daniel wanted to try to help the Vietnamese army with logistical support in terms of these reoccupation operations, in terms of help in settling the refugees. He was able, I think, to do that and he wanted to begin to do some training with the army. He was able to start some training programs. Then he left in 1956 while the Vietnamese army was still a territorial force. The decision was made when General Williams came, the beginning of 1956, that the Vietnamese army was to be converted to a conventional army to oppose an invasion from the North. Lansdale didn't think, and I don't think any of us who had been out on the ground thought, that this was the right idea. I think this policy was driven from the point of view that the US didn't want to have our forces being a blocking force in case there was an invasion from the North. So, therefore, we had to train the Vietnamese army to fulfill this function. Unfortunately it took them away from their territorial role in which they had been placed as a result of the pacification program and as a result of successful operations against the Hoa Hao, some of the Cao Dai and the Binh Xuyen. We were not happy about it. However, that became US policy.

What happened then was that we left a vacuum out in the countryside. The civil guard was supposed to fill this vacuum but it didn't. At least we had the army dispersed and it was pretty local and had more discipline than anybody else did. It could, I think, have been converted into an effective local defense force -- not purely local, but one with which you could insure both local and general security against larger forces. Instead, they were pulled out and formed into divisions and positioned (to a considerable extent towards) the 17th Parallel. That was another error in my opinion and our opinion at the time, the way we tackled that problem. The US just didn't see the security problem in South Vietnam clearly. I think that distorted some of what we wound up doing. Other considerations were driving what we were doing.

Q: You stayed there this first time until when?

PHILLIPS: I was there until November, 1955. I got out of the Army and went back as a civilian with the CIA in 1956.

Q: Was this again dealing with Vietnam?

PHILLIPS: Oh, yes.

Q: Did you find when you got back home that there was too much theory and not enough practical experience? When you came back you must have been one of the few people who had field experience.

PHILLIPS: There were still a lot of things that were going on. Vietnam was adopting a constitution, they were going to have elections, Operation Brotherhood was still there out in the countryside, the Vietnamese army did need some reorganization but not the one it got. So, I went back to be a part of that. One of my jobs was to try to get Civic Action turned over to our regular aid agency, because the basic idea behind Saigon Military Mission was that it was something temporary to deal with an emergency and that the regular US establishment ought to take over. But I don't think, with all due respect, that the regular US establishment was very attuned to the situation. Everybody was coming with their own particular program and point of view and you were dealing still with a pretty revolutionary situation there. You had a national government which still didn't have any effective government out in the countryside. Diem was criticized for abolishing the system of elected village chiefs. His idea was that these would be replaced by future elected village chiefs, but in the meantime there would be a reorganization and some civic action at the village level to try to push the communists aside and encourage popular support.

Q: Had things by the time you left in 1956 been more or less turned over to the civilian agency at that time equivalent to AID?

PHILLIPS: There were a number of developments which were not very heartening and I think which reflected a kind of made-in-Washington conceptual approach. It wasn't just that we were reorganizing the army with very little thought, except in theory about how to provide security in the countryside. I mean, if the Civil Guard had been trained and ready and had taken over this function, and then the army had been withdrawn and retrained in units, it might have made some sense. But there was no transition. So the Civil Guard never got on its feet and became the subject of a lot of wrangling, which you probably have heard about from other people, between USAID (the Michigan State people) and General Williams as to who was going to train them, etc. Well, the fact is they never really got put on their feet and never got trained and therefore there was a vacuum out in the countryside. So far as any real community development effort at the village level this was another vacuum which was not filled. I think that the US had an opportunity, and Diem had invited us in, to participate in this thing, to have community development advisers involved in this thing, but we didn't take him up on it. Gradually Civic Action became more purely political in nature. The mistake that was made was really a political one. The decision was made: "Okay Diem is in power and let's just support him in whatever he wants us to do." There was a decision made to fund through the CIA the Can Lao party which was a secret political party put together by Diem's brother Nhu to provide support for Diem. The feeling was that you couldn't trust all these other Vietnamese so the way to go about this was to set up your own secret political party, recruit members into it and think that this was going to provide the basis of support for Diem. Everybody had to swear loyalty to Diem. Lansdale fought this. We fought it in regard to the army. I got involved when we found out that Nhu wanted to put the Can Lao into G-5. We brought it to General Williams and he talked to Diem about it. Nhu hadn't said anything to Diem about it and it became quite an argument and they didn't do it, not at least while we were there. So what happened? Well, a lot of the other political parties, the Army and other religious groups were alienated by this process. Lansdale argued with Diem about it, but the US was giving the money so this was what happened.

What happened was that instead of a unifying political process, you had a divisive process which was very ill-suited to the situation in South Vietnam. It was a lousy decision. Then, when the decision got called into question later on, the Agency withdrew its support which created a problem of confidence between Diem and the Americans.

Q: When you were in Washington did anybody really talk to you about it?

PHILLIPS: I remember talking about Civic Action to the coordinating body of the National Security Council about Vietnamese army and Civic Action in South Vietnam for about an hour. But that is the only time I had any real contact with who, you might say, were policy makers. Of course, I was a pretty junior guy. I know that Lansdale had plenty of discussions at a very high level. I think he personally argued with both Dulles brothers about the Can Lao decision. Basically the policy became one of a very conventional approach on the aid and military front, and was to build up a personal political party for Diem on the political front. I think these efforts went awry. If you look at some of the decisions that were made, for example, on the constitution. Lansdale got involved and got a constitutional expert from the Philippines to come over to help the Vietnamese write their constitution. He wanted to have some checks and balances in the way the government was set up. There were two arguments used against this. One was that it would make Diem less effective and make it very difficult for him to run the government. The other was that it was just transferring an American idea to Vietnam. I remember a lot of discussion about this but it wasn't just transferring an American idea. I know from some discussions with Lansdale personally that he felt that the Vietnamese would never learn how to run a modern government in even a semi-democratic way unless they had to deal with people, unless they had to deal with a supreme court, unless they had to deal with a legislature. Then they would learn how to compromise and how to talk to each other and how to negotiate. But if left to their own devices, it didn't make any difference if it was Diem or some other Vietnamese, the only tradition they had ever had was autocratic, secret, and revolutionary and this was the way they were likely to behave. They would fall back on what was familiar to them.

I think again we missed the boat. We became obsessed with, "Let's get on with it. Diem is our man and everything is stable. We just have to back him and get the economic aid program going, get the army ready to confront the North Vietnamese at the 17th Parallel and we have the problem solved." But the problems were a lot more complex than that. It seems to me, and I don't want to speak just from the benefit of hindsight, that if you looked at the history of Ho Chi Minh and the whole Vietnamese communist movement one should have known that this was going to be a never ending struggle, that they were going to be back and nothing in the same way they worked before which was to start from a rural base. So, it seems to me that what was going to happen there was fairly predictable in terms of what you were going to be facing.

Q: In these oral histories I want to stick to you. So you were back in Washington dealing in Vietnamese affairs?

PHILLIPS: Yes, but very limited. I would talk to some people in the Agency and got some exposure to the staff elements of the National Security Council. But then I went right back out again.

Q: When did you go out again?

PHILLIPS: I went out in January, 1956 having returned to Washington in November, 1955.

Q: And you were there for how long?

PHILLIPS: I was there until November, 1956.

Q: What were you doing there?

PHILLIPS: I was in a variety of roles. I was helping Civic Action get organized and recruiting people and trying to see if I couldn't get the economic aid mission involved in Civic Action. I was involved in the reorganization of the Vietnamese Army, and the formation of the G-5 organization. I wrote the staff plan for that. I arranged for some training for the South Vietnamese. I helped a Vietnamese friend of mine who subsequently became Vietnamese Ambassador to the US, Bui Diem, who was a Dai Viets, get some money to make a motion picture. I acted as sort of a catalyst in that process. Bui Diem had come up with the idea of making South Vietnam's first premiere movie, which was going to be about a Viet Minh captain who defected because his parents were caught in the land reform of 1953-55 (which actually occurred) in North Vietnam. Some of the story was pieced out of actual events and some of it was made up. Somebody had written a book about this and he wanted to make it into a movie script. I prevailed on Charlie Mertz, who was head of USIS's film unit, to provide some film raw stock. I talked to the Acting Secretary of Defense, Thuan, and persuaded him to put up some Vietnamese money for the movie. I helped Bui Diem assemble the necessary support and he produced the movie. The sad part of it was that after the movie was produced and it was all set for the premiere, Nhu found out that the guys who were mainly responsible for producing it were Dai Viets and he canceled the money that they were going to be paid by the Ministry of Defense and forbade the Acting Secretary from going to the reception. There was quite an uproar. We finally got the money out of Defense to help pay part of the cost, but this was a little example of the realism of Vietnamese politics at the time, and also the effect of Nhu's increasing influence. Although, I don't think we saw that completely clearly at that time.

Then I spent about two months in the hospital with hepatitis at Clark Field. I think those were mainly the things that I did.

Q: Let's go to this 1962-64 period. In the first place how did they get you back?

PHILLIPS: Well, what happened was that counterinsurgency became the doctrine. MACV (Military Assistance Command Vietnam) had its counterinsurgency program and there still was a Military Assistance Advisory Group there. MACV was originally set up to command the air units and other American units that were directly involved, but it rather quickly took over the strategic planning function, although all the advisors on the military side remained directly dependent on MAAG. MACV was trying to train and organize the Vietnamese army. Within Vietnam the Vietnamese had started carrying out a pacification program. There had been something called Operation Sunrise, but it hadn't been very successful. It involved a lot of resettlement. Subsequently with the assistance, as a matter of fact, very key assistance of Lou Conein who was working for the CIA station, a better approach was started. He had been there before in the 1954-55 period and he went back and dug up the old records of what we called pacification back then. He helped the Vietnamese draw up a pacification plan for one province, Phu Yen, which would combine military with civilian elements and would involve not resettlement but a gradual extension of security and some rural assistance to the population.

Q: Where was this province?

PHILLIPS: Phu Yen is in central Vietnam south of Qui Nhon. What happened was that AID had no rural assistance program. The previous director had left. A guy named Bill Fippin was there as acting director. He was very frustrated because there was no AID organization out in the countryside that was equipped to support anything that the Vietnamese were doing, any kind of rural development effort. AID was asked, and I think probably Mr. Bell, who was the director, probably got asked by Kennedy, "What are you doing out there?" And they weren't doing anything or much of anything they could talk about. So the search went out for somebody to go out and look at the way the AID mission was structured, and to come up with some kind of program for AID. They got ahold of my name. I think that Ed Lansdale was probably the source of my name but I am not sure. Anyway, I got a call from a guy named Rod Poats who was the Deputy Director for the Far East at AID. He asked if I would come in and talk with him. So I did. He said I had been suggested to them as a possible candidate to go out to Vietnam and do a study on how to organize the AID mission. I asked what were they doing now and they asked me about my background, etc. He came to the conclusion that I was a candidate for doing this. I said that I needed at least one other person to go with me and would like Bert Fraleigh who was in Taiwan working for AID. I told them that he was the best pure AID guy I knew, that he knew more about development in Asia than any single person that I knew. I said that I thought together we could really survey what they were doing and what the Vietnamese were doing and come up with something. So in June 1962, I went out for about a month and met Bert out there. I went out to the provinces, talked to high level officials in the government including Diem, because of my previous experience. Even though I was relatively young, I was a recognized friend and had entree into almost any level of government. I discovered that the Vietnamese had something going called the Strategic Hamlet Program that the US side didn't understand very well. It had some interesting elements in it, although it also had some things wrong with it. There was a lot of forcible resettlement in some areas without compensation. Some of the security things they were doing and the idea of having hamlet elections made good sense, and the idea of trying to focus on a hamlet by hamlet approach, and an hamlet development. But they had no resources. None of the popular government programs were reaching the countryside. Moreover, they had a financial system which imposed a pre-audit requirement on the province chiefs. In other words, if you wanted to go out and buy ten sacks of cement to help somebody build a bridge or a dam, you had to get prices from three suppliers, send the prices to Saigon, get the purchase approved and only then could you spend the money even though you had the funds available. Well, it usually took over a month to do this. By the time authorization came back, the price had changed so you couldn't buy what you needed. It was an unbelievable system. The government simply wasn't functioning properly. Most of the agricultural programs were focused on research stations, but nothing was reaching the farmer.

So, out of talking with the Vietnamese and looking at the resources available, we developed a program which supported the strategic hamlet concept. We decided to do this on a province by province basis because the provinces in many instances were so different and their needs were so different. We determined that it was necessary to put an AID provincial representative out into each province. We created a separate office within AID with plenty of independent authority to support rural development in each province in South Vietnam. There was an opportunity to establish a piaster fund into US funds (ten million dollars), which could be used to kick off rural development in support of the strategic hamlet program. We decided the way to make that fund function was for a plan to be developed for each province. There would be a tripartite committee in each province which would decide and approve all expenditures of these funds. The funds would be programmed against certain activities, but there would be a miscellaneous activity account so in case you had a natural disaster of some kind or a plane dropped a bomb and destroyed a school you could rebuild the school and not have to go back to Saigon for approval.

We set up these provincial committees, which were composed of the province chief, the USAID provincial rep and the military advisor. In some cases we were not able to get provincial reps out into the provinces very fast so the military advisor wore both hats. In effect the US had control over these funds and the Vietnamese agreed to it. I went to Diem personally with this program. I said, "This is the way that I think we can really get some effective assistance out there." He agreed with it. The ten million dollar piaster fund was established and used effectively.

Q: What was your impression of Diem at that time?

PHILLIPS: That is a long story. Let me tell you how I came back. I developed this program and presented it to the Vietnamese informally as well as to the Americans and everybody liked it.

The Vietnamese said, "This is wonderful, but you have to come back." I said, "I am not promising to come back." The same thing happened on the American side, they wanted me to come back to run the rural affairs office. The position in AID/Saigon was called Assistant Director for Rural Affairs. I came back to Washington. My father didn't want me to leave because he was getting older. I really got asked to go back in a way that I couldn't refuse. The request came right through Mike Forrestal at the White House. So, I said, "Okay, I will go back and run this program." I went back in September with my wife Barbara, and our two infant children, and we started staffing up. We started sending people out into the countryside.

You asked about Diem. Diem was a very complex person. He was shy, diffident and self-confident at the same time. He had a tremendous intellect, an encyclopedic knowledge of every province in Vietnam and practically every Vietnamese family. If you mentioned somebody and said, "I met this province chief and he seemed to be doing a pretty good job, Mr. President," he would say, "Oh, yes, his grandfather was so-and-so, his father was so-and-so," and he would give you a half hour history of the man's family. So he was something of an academic. He was a passionate Vietnamese patriot, he detested the French and, of course, had resisted the French. He tended to see their hand in things where they probably weren't involved at all. You could accurately describe him as sort of a Vietnamese mandarin type. He had a tremendous amount of energy. You had to have tremendous patience in talking with him because if you brought up, say, the Montagnards and were talking about a certain Montagnard problem you would get a chance to present your idea but then he would say, "That's good but I think that we need to do this because of this," and then you would get maybe a two hour history of the Montagnards in that particular province. It used to be mind numbing for some of the diplomatic reps who had to go over and talk to him because he felt, probably rightly so, that most Americans didn't understand much of anything about Vietnam and therefore he felt obliged to explain it at tremendous lengths. I think for a lot of Americans it became very mind numbing. I was younger, knew a fair amount about Vietnam and something about his personality so I just let him go on until we got through whatever was on his mind, and if there was something I wanted to bring up I would do so.

I think he, despite the influence of his brother Nhu who was afflicted with terminal paranoia, trusted us and what we were trying to do because, even close to the end he seemed to retain these feelings. This was in 1963 after it was reported that I had been critical of what the Diem government was doing back in Washington. Diem still seemed to have confidence in what we were trying to do with the Strategic Hamlet Program. One example of that is that we started producing reports on the program beginning in May 1963. We called it a summary report of the situation in the provinces. It was a status report of the Strategic Hamlet Program. We did this report in English and in French in order to give Diem a copy he could read. We didn't pull many punches and he took it. The general American idea was that you couldn't go in and tell Diem anything critical. Well, that was not true, it depended on how you told him something. Whether it was constructive criticism or not.

There was an incident that occurred in the spring of 1963. I had gone to look at this one province because our provincial rep had reported to me that the province chief was doing some things that he thought were wrong. The province chief had developed a theory that the way to protect his province and his hamlets was to get everybody out to build these huge mud walls stretching from hamlet to hamlet. There was no way that you could patrol these walls. Furthermore it involved a tremendous amount of "voluntary" labor on the part of the local population. So I went to inspect these things. Hell, I had been in Vietnam long enough to know that the people were not happy with this. I could detect disgruntlement among some of the local officials as well. Nobody would say anything overtly but you could tell that this was not a happy situation. So, I came back and wrote up a report about it. I sent a copy of the report to AID Mission Director, Joe Brent and a copy to Colonel Hoangtun Lac, who was chief of staff of the hamlet program. Apparently it produced a hell of an explosion on the Vietnamese government side, I heard afterwards. My report went down to the province chief. The province chief claimed that I had come down there and was interfering with his program and telling him what to do. He tried to make Vietnamese nationalism an issue. He denied that he was building the walls. Well, they had a big meeting and they called him up to this meeting. Lac was very clever. He had gotten a Vietnamese Air Force to take some aerial photographs of the province. When the province chief denied he was building these long walls, Lac just pulled out the aerial photographs and that guy was ordered to stop the walls that day. Subsequently he was removed. And he had been a favorite of Nhu and Diem. I don't know what this tells you about Diem, but the notion that he was impervious to advice or impervious to ideas, is not true.

You have to understand that we were working in a very constructive context. We were able to get things started that the Vietnamese, themselves, didn't believe could be done. When we started a pilot program in central Vietnam of teaching Vietnamese families how to raise a new breed of pig that grew about three times as fast we were changing about ten centuries of practice in raising pigs. We had them building pig pens. We had them inoculating the pigs. We had Vietnamese farmers doing all kinds of things that they had never done before. The guy who was in charge of this -- we had one Chinese guy from Taiwan and a young IVS (International Volunteer Service) guy named Harvey Neese working in it. They started out working with poor families. They didn't go out and pick a capable farmer, they picked the poorest families they could find. Once everybody else saw this was successful, the demand went sky high. So, we started out with the idea that we were going to have 500 families raising pigs but it was so wildly successful that Diem said, "We have to increase this to 15,000 families." Everybody said it was impossible except Bert (Fraleigh), Harvey (Neese) and one guy in the agriculture ministry and the people in central Vietnam who said, "If you can get us the pigs, we can do it." And we did it. In about three or four months we reached 15,000 families. All of a sudden people who never had any cash in their pockets for generations were going to market with pigs and starting to build better houses for themselves. This was the kind of stuff that we were doing. That put what we were doing in a very, very positive context. So I think the relationships that we enjoyed and our ability to work and our ability to have some influence over what the Vietnamese were doing, and coincidentally to try to get rid of dishonest province chiefs and get better province chiefs, was becoming successful. But the whole thing came a cropper because of the political difficulties stemming from the Buddhist crisis which spiraled out of control, and you know the rest of the history.

Q: Were you trying to get Diem and Nhu out into the field?

PHILLIPS: Early on (in 1954-56) with some personal persuasion by Ed Lansdale, Diem got out into the countryside a lot more. One of the things that put a crimp into that was that when he went up to the highlands in about 1959, some guy tried to assassinate him. This incident generated concern for his security and restricted his movements. He didn't like it. And then the visits were openly formal. The Vietnamese, like Chinese, are much more formal people than say Filipinos, so they don't go easily into a democratic political mode that we find more natural. I went with Diem on a couple of trips, but the whole thing was too organized, too cut and dried, much too formal. There wasn't enough outreach, in part because the province chiefs were scared of making a mistake and would get everything over organized so that no mistakes would be made.

Q: What about the American representatives out on the provincial level? You are trying to push something that is not something that would come naturally to either the civilian or military type of program. Where did you get your people?

PHILLIPS: The people came from a variety of backgrounds. Some of them were in the AID mission and volunteered. Some heard about what we were doing and were doing other things. There was a guy by the name of Dave Hudson who was a news stringer for NBC. He came in and volunteered saying he wanted to work. I asked what he wanted to do and he said, "I want to go to the toughest province you got." I said, "Okay, great. You are going to Ca Mau." We took people like that. We produced Provincial Representative's Guide, a compendium of the programs we had, some inspirational pieces about what counterinsurgency was all about, what we were trying to do in Vietnam. It had a brief piece that Diem had written earlier in his career about democracy in the villages in Vietnam and this sort of stuff to try to orient our people in terms of what was the purpose of our being there, what were we trying to achieve in helping the Vietnamese. And then we said, "Look, you just go out there and listen to the province chief and this is the program and these are his problems, and we will help you." I had four more senior guys as regional representatives who circulated around their regions acting as backstops and problem solvers. Then I would go out to the provinces, or Bert would go out. There was a constant back and forth in terms of how do you deal with this situation and that situation. Of course, it was great where you had good province chiefs and not too good where you didn't. We tried to move some people around where they could function more effectively. We put some good people in where the province chiefs were not too good to try to help them. It was a mix and match situation. I recruited three guys who had worked for Tom Dooley in Laos. I had one young guy who had been in the army, was part Hawaiian, had worked in the cane fields in Hawaii and knew how to get along with Asians. We wanted people who could understand Asians and would feel at home in Asia. I picked up about eight IVS guys, young college graduates who were already in Vietnam. They had learned Vietnamese and were all agricultural graduates mainly from the mid-west, who had come out and had started working with the Vietnamese helping to improve agricultural techniques. They were on contract to AID. I talked to them, Bert talked to them and about seven or eight volunteered to come over and work for us. I sent them to the provinces. I had guys out in the provinces who were 22, 23 years old and had never run anything in their lives before. Most of them were absolutely splendid because they would listen, they would respond to problems and the province chiefs understood that they were conduits through which they could get support and assistance. They developed good working relationships with most of the province chiefs. And they understood the agricultural programs we were trying to carry out, so they were very good.

Q: Did you have any Foreign Service officers?

PHILLIPS: Yes, I had two Foreign Service officers who had been trained in Vietnamese and this was part of their training, to come and work for us. One of them was Dick Holbrooke and the other was Vlad Lehovich.

Q: Holbrooke is now Assistant Secretary for European Affairs.

PHILLIPS: Yes, that is right. He was also Assistant Secretary for Asian Affairs. As I said, we had a very wide variety of people.

Q: What about the American military? How did you find them?

PHILLIPS: I found a lot of understanding at the provincial level. These were captains and majors who were relatively young guys. They were listening to the Vietnamese and very quickly acquiring the perspective of what were the real problems from the province chief's point of view. So, to them we were a godsend because it was obvious that this was not just a military situation. To begin with, if you were sitting there as advisor to the province chief, you commanded very scant military resources. You depended on regular Vietnamese Army forces or the Corp's level which was supposed to protect you.

Q: We are talking about a period when American forces weren't many.

PHILLIPS: We had no American forces, we had advisors. We had advisors at battalion, regiment and Corps level.

Q: Of the Vietnamese army?

PHILLIPS: To the Vietnamese army. And then we had advisors to the province chiefs and most of the province chiefs at that point were military officers because you had an insurgency problem in practically every province.

Of course there were some military who didn't get it. Who were just so rigid in their thinking that they couldn't really cope with the role. We had problems at the Corps and Division level getting understanding. There were two parts to the military structure, there was MACV, which was the military advisory command which had J2, J3, J4 staffs -- this was kind of a super level. Underneath, there was the Military Advisory Assistance Group (MAAG). The structure stayed that way until eventually MAAG was combined into MACV. But then, the advisors who were out with the CORDS and provinces came under MAAG. But, within MAAG there was a separation of structure too. There was a structure that supported the guys out in the provinces and that was the one that we worked with most intimately. There was a guy named Colonel Carl Schaad who was responsible to MAAG aspect of the Strategic Hamlet program. He is here (at McLean) and you might want to interview him and get the other side of this thing. They were very responsive. They were involved in the day-to-day stuff that we were involved in. There was a coordinating group headed up by Bill Trueheart, the deputy chief of mission, and that included Schaad, myself and a couple of other agency representatives. We met regularly and discussed programs...what was the military doing; what were we doing...and tried to coordinate our efforts. There were a lot of things that the military were doing which involved US Air Force bombing and some of the advice given to the regular Vietnamese army which never fitted in with what was called the pacification program.

Q: Were you involved in the Phoenix program?

PHILLIPS: No.

Q: Did you have a problem being an alumnus of the CIA with the station or other people?

PHILLIPS: What we were doing was so open that I don't think there was much of an undertow of suspicion on the part of other Americans. At one point, because I had been in the Agency, when word got back that I had been in this National Security Council meeting and that I had said we were not winning the war in the Delta and had in effect taken on the US defense establishment, word got back on the Vietnamese side and I guess reached Nhu that somehow I was attacking the Vietnamese government and what they were doing. I don't know how all that leaked back. I had spoken in this meeting about the fact that Nhu was a real liability and somehow should be gotten out of the country. This was after the raid on the pagodas. When I got back, he (Nhu) started having articles published in the newspaper he controlled (Saigon Times) that I was going to replace John Richardson as the head of the CIA station. But that was his paranoia. I don't know what he thought he was doing. I wrote Diem a letter about the articles and said that they were not true and that I would like to come talk to him about them. He gave me an interview and I went and complained about them. I said that they were wrong and explained what I had said and what had happened. He took it, and apologized for his brother.

Q: When was this NSC meeting?

PHILLIPS: This was in 1963 when the Buddhists crisis really got bad. This was when Lodge came out and replaced Nolting. Lodge came right after the raids on the pagodas. The US was really shocked by this. There was this famous cable that came out and gave Lodge direction, as Lodge interpreted it, that we sponsor a coup against Diem. A coup cranked up, but then it died because the Vietnamese generals were not ready to move. Then Kennedy sent Joe Mendenhall from State and General Brut Krulak from the Marine Corps, who was on McNamara's personal staff, to do a survey of what was going on. They came back and I came back at the same time, not because of this meeting, but because my father was very ill, in fact he was dying. I came back to see him and talk to my mother about what to do. Coincidentally, I was corralled by Mike Foresthal and Roger Hilsman into going to this NSC meeting. I didn't know all the internecine struggles that were going on in Washington. I had some inkling that there was a whole dispute about what to do about Diem, etc. I understood from the Vietnamese end of the thing that the government and Diem's regime was in very, very deep trouble, that there was going to be a political change or a coup one way or another, that Nhu had some ambitions about pulling a coup of his own, that even the most loyal supporters of Diem were getting very skittish about what was happening. The whole thing was coming unglued. So I was pushed front and center after Krulak gave his report and after Mendenhall gave his.

Kennedy said, "Did you two guys go to the same country?" It wasn't just that Krulak had gone to the Delta and Mendenhall had gone to Central Vietnam. Mendenhall was talking about the politics. He had been anti-Diem for a long, long time. He had talked to a lot of dissidents. So all that came out. Krulak went down to the Delta and got a bunch of military briefings. I had gone to one of those damn briefings up in Bien Hoa just north of Saigon where they carried out an operation in the Iron Triangle in which the Vietnamese Army had run a bunch of tanks over the place and hadn't encountered anything. Nothing came out of this operation. I happened to go to this meeting at which the division advisor, Colonel Miller, gave this incredible briefing to Krulak about how it was a great victory. Afterwards I went up to Miller, because I knew him, and said, "How the hell can you tell a guy like Krulak what you just told him? You know that is not true." He said, "Well, that is the way they wanted it presented."

The other thing that happened to me just before I came back was I got a call from our provincial advisor down in Long An, a province just south of Saigon, that strategic hamlets were being destroyed. The Viet Cong were coming into a lot of the hamlets at night, getting the people to take down all of the barbed wire security fences, take the roofs off their houses and the Vietnamese Army wasn't providing any security at all. So, I went there to find out what was going on. I sat down with the advisor, and Earl Long, who was our rep. They briefed me. More than a hundred hamlets had been invaded by the VC. I asked what was the problem. They said, "Well, the troops are in the barracks because everybody is afraid of a coup so nobody is providing any security. As a result, the hamlet program is being destroyed here."

I had just come out of that context, and here I was in this NSC meeting and Mendenhall is talking about the problems in Central Vietnam and about the political side and Krulak is saying, "I don't know about that, but we are winning handily, particularly in the Delta." And I had just been in the Delta.

So, I was presented by Mike Forrestal. Kennedy knew who I was. I started to talk about what I thought was going on in Vietnam. I thought to myself just before the meeting that if I had a chance to speak I would tell the President everything I knew as honestly as I could about what was going on. So I talked about the political situation, about Nhu, about the problems with the government. I felt we had to get Nhu out of Vietnam and had to disassociate ourselves from Nhu. If we could, we should isolate Nhu, I said, and I offered some ideas about that. But first, I took on Krulak. I said at the beginning, "I'm sorry to tell you Mr. President, but we are not winning the war, particularly in the Delta." And then I talked about Long An.

Well, this created an uproar. The whole time I was talking McNamara was sitting there beside the President shaking his head. Then I got into a verbal match with Krulak for a while and argued about the situation. He said, "You don't know anything about the military. This is a war." I said, "This is a political war and we are losing it." This was the kind of argument that went on. At the end Kennedy asked me if I had any recommendations. I said that I would recommend that he send General Lansdale back to Vietnam as soon as possible. I said, "I don't know if he could salvage the situation or not. If there were a coup he could at least help pull things together. I talked to Ambassador Lodge about it and I think he would favor it. We need somebody who can talk to Diem. That is my recommendation." Kennedy took notes the whole time I was talking. At the end he said, "I want to thank you for what you had to say, particularly for your recommendation about General Lansdale."

Of course, nothing happened. I saw the thing as a looming disaster. Lodge started using me as one of his eyes and ears because I knew so many Vietnamese. I would go talk to Thoun, who was secretary of defense, he was an old friend. He would confide in me all of his fears and I would write a memorandum and send it to Lodge. Little did I know that a lot of these memorandums were being transmitted back to Washington and people were reading these things and saying, "Look at this. We have to do something about this." I didn't understand the politics of Washington in terms of this contest that was going on between Harriman and elements in State on the one hand and McNamara and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Taylor, on the other. I didn't know the background of that telegram (the "Hilsman telegram"). The situation remained unresolved through a series of NSC meetings. One of the interesting things that occurred was, of course, eventually President Kennedy sent McNamara and Taylor out there again to look into the situation. Taylor confirmed everything that I had said about Long An. In the meantime, the Long An MAAG sector advisor got removed in disgrace because apparently he wasn't suppose to tell me what he did. McNamara was saying, "How come I didn't know all of this?" Then somebody showed him our provincial reports, that I alluded to earlier, and he said, "This is amazing." Apparently as a result of his reading our report he turned to somebody and said, "We have to have a reporting program that tells us these things." This resulted in the development of a system designed to fulfill McNamara's predilection for statistics.

Q: Hamlet evacuation.

PHILLIPS: Yes, exactly. That was an outgrowth. Our reports were about one paragraph long (per province), although some provinces might merit half a page because they were particularly complicated. But they were an evaluation and an assessment, not a statistical anything. We didn't believe that statistics meant anything. Of course, McNamara's focus was entirely on statistics. He thought these reports were really interesting apparently and he apparently didn't realize these reports existed. He wanted to know how come he wasn't getting them. Well, of course, they were just disseminated within the Mission out there to try to keep people informed of what was going on. But they were so different from anything he had seen that I guess he became fascinated with the idea that was where the real information was.

Q: I have had those briefings when I was in Vietnam too. These briefings are rehearsed so you never get a spontaneous briefing. The military is trained to put forth the positive view. This is what we are doing and this is what we are accomplishing. It almost goes against the grain to come up and say we are losing here, we are doing this, we can't get this. You have to see these things in positive terms. It is almost built into the system.

PHILLIPS: Only really good or great military commanders understand that the system is biased this way, and start asking questions. They go out and actually talk to the grunts on the ground. Then they understand. This is like what happened when General Abrams took over from McNamara and TET occurred and mini-TET occurred. He went out and got these still optimistic briefings, told the American commander that it was not a goddamn victory, we got our ass kicked and don't give me this bull shit. If we had Abrams there from the beginning, instead of Westmoreland, I think we would have had Vietnamization a lot earlier.

Q: When you came back to Vietnam after the NSC meeting, how was what you were saying received by the embassy?

PHILLIPS: Well, I think Lodge felt what I said was factual. MACV was in a state of shock because they had been filing all these optimistic reports and then somebody had gone back to say that was not the way it was. They were angry and I was persona non grata with them for a while. In fact, when McNamara and Taylor came out I didn't participate in any of the meetings. I just let all our guys go and speak for themselves. So it certainly affected my relationship with the top military level like Harkine, etc. Harkine came to a party given by Phoebe Trueheart, William Trueheart's wife and a lovely person, and said, "I am going to get that goddamn Rufus Phillips," and she said, "But General, he doesn't work for you."

Q: This National Security meeting took place when?

PHILLIPS: It was August, 1963.

Q: So the clock is ticking. Can you tell your perspective on the events that came in the fall?

PHILLIPS: Yes, I think it was probably one of the most depressing periods of my life. On the one hand it was obvious that the situation could not continue the way it was. In effect the Diem government and Diem and Nhu, which I blame mainly on Nhu, had really lost confidence with their own military and a coup seemed inevitable. The question was, was Nhu going to organize his own coup and kill some of the military or was the military going to organize a coup against Diem. Because I had some friends like Lou Conein, who were very much involved in the coup, I could sort of follow what was going on. It was really distressing because you could see the Vietnamese government falling apart. I knew a number of the military pretty well. One was a key staff person both in the coup and afterwards, General Le Nan Kim, an old personal friend. I knew he was very competent but I didn't think the General knew anything about politics or had any ideas of how to run a government. They knew what they didn't like and there were a lot of things that Nhu had done that they didn't like. Many thought that the strategic hamlet program was really bad. They were against the irregular forces that the CIA had helped finance in Central Vietnam, which were controlled politically by Diem's brother, but in fact were providing very effective security for the hamlets. I saw us heading for a train wreck. It seemed to be out of control. I saw Diem the day before McNamara saw him and it was really to talk about Nhu and about this newspaper business as much as anything. We talked about that and then we talked about the strategic hamlet program. We were still making some progress in the countryside in terms of development effort. But, obviously it was being hurt because the army was paralyzed. Where there were effective local security forces they were able to maintain security, but where there were not, the Viet Cong were beginning to invade a number of hamlets.

Diem looked at me quizzically and said, "Is there going to be a coup against me?" I looked at him and just wanted to cry, and said, "I am afraid so, Mr. President." That was all he said. To this day I am affected by memories of that because after the coup occurred, which was three or four days later, I went to the palace and the two seats that we had been sitting on in this waiting room were riddled with bullet holes. And I had just been there three or four days before.

Q: For the record this was early November when Diem and Nhu were both taken out of the palace and killed.

PHILLIPS: Well, actually they went out by an underground route, took refuge in a church and informed the coup leaders that they were there. The idea was that they were supposed to be taken to the airport and flown out of the country. For some reason, the plane was delayed, we couldn't get a plane there. I don't know why because supposedly that had been all set up. What actually happened apparently was that General Minh (Big Minh) decided to have them killed. This was not a decision of the revolutionary committee. He sent his own man in this armored personnel carrier with personal instructions to kill them. That guy was then subsequently arrested about four months later and assassinated in prison. But, I have talked to General Don (?) and Kim about it. Both of them came to the conclusion that Big Minh was the guy who decided to do this. It was not a decision that he shared with anybody.

Q: Where were you when this happened?

PHILLIPS: I should tell you that in the meantime I had decided to come back home. My father had died in October. So I made a short trip for the funeral and arranged for my family to come back because I had to take over the family business, at least temporarily. I then went back to wind things up and that was when the coup occurred. I returned to Vietnam in late October and the coup occurred in early November and I stayed for about two weeks after that.

So far as the coup itself, I was having lunch with General Stilwell when he got a telephone call that the coup had started. Since my family had left, Lou Conein had asked me to go over and stay with his family because he was concerned about what might happen if there was a coup. So I did. He had gotten a couple of Filipino friends to guard the house. So there were about three or four of us with AR-15 rifles there in case the house got assaulted, because Lou's wife and two small children were there.

Q: You were actually only a couple more weeks in Vietnam, did you see a noticeable affect on the program you had been administering during that time?

PHILLIPS: Oh, yes. There was the new revolutionary committee. I went to talk to them and spent time with Kim and with Bui Diem who was an unofficial advisor to them. I went to see General Big Minh. I was very intent on salvaging what we were doing, and on saving the committee structure. I explained that there were a lot of things wrong with the strategic hamlet program, but they shouldn't disband it. I went to see Vice President Thio and I talked to him about it. I wrote a series of memoranda to these guys. Their initial impulse was to demolish anything that Diem might have been associated with. I said, "I don't care what you call it, call it by another name, but you are going to have to be doing the same thing because the basic program and approach is right." I also talked about the security issue. I said, "You guys have got to come up with a way of providing effective security for these hamlets." Well, they were so preoccupied with the political problems, with establishing their control, with chasing down and throwing in jail former elements of the Diem regime that I could tell the attention span was not all that great. I could get through to Kim, he understood what I was talking about, but everybody else was preoccupied.

And Lodge, himself, was sort of fascinated by the fact that there was this big revolution which he didn't really understand. I went to see him the day after the coup, after it was known that Diem and Nhu had not only been assassinated but were buried in unmarked graves. I asked him to go talk to the junta to give Diem a decent funeral. I said, "Look, this guy is the first president of Vietnam under the first constitution of Vietnam. They are not just killing a man, they are killing a symbol. He did a lot of good and the Vietnamese people know it and even though he was killed he ought to be given a decent funeral. Otherwise the Catholics are going to be terribly unhappy and we are going to hear from them sooner or later. This is going to be real trouble." Lodge didn't understand any of it. He said, "Well, he is gone, dead and forgotten. You know, the same thing happened to me when I ran against Kennedy and lost the election in Massachusetts, the next day nobody knew who I was." I said, "I am sorry, Mr. Ambassador, this is not Massachusetts, this is Vietnam, this is different." I felt exhausted, sad and not very optimistic because I could see that the military who had taken over really didn't understand politics, and didn't understand how to get out and establish a sense of confidence. I knew that Minh had a charismatic personality but he was not very smart. He really needed somebody to tell him what to do. Lodge decided it was his role to tell Minh what to do, but he had no concept of how to do this in a Vietnamese context. So, they frittered away what psychological opportunity they had and then, of course, they were replaced by General Donh in about six months.

Q: Well, you left pretty much right after that, didn't you?

PHILLIPS: Yes, I left on November 21, 1963. I was en route when Kennedy was assassinated.

Q: Did anyone tap you for your knowledge or insights when you came back?

PHILLIPS: Oh, yes. I continued as an AID consultant without pay for quite a while and then I was a consultant to State. I helped Ambassador Unger when he set up the Coordinating Committee. I participated in all kinds of meetings. Lodge wanted me to come back to Vietnam and run the Rural Affairs program and I engaged in an extended indirect negotiation with him through Mike Dunn, who was his chief assistant. The conditions for my coming back were that I would do so only if Lansdale came too. The reason was, I didn't want to go through another political disaster. I didn't want to go through the situation again where we were developing a really good economic development program, that was tied in with the security effort, was focused on giving the Vietnamese people a stake in something that they might think was worth fighting for, when the whole political core in Saigon was rotten and there was nothing there to inspire anybody to fight for anything. Having gone through it once, I didn't want to go through it again. I said, "We have to help generate a political cause that holds up hope for the Vietnamese people, and there is only one guy that I know that understands this in the Vietnamese context and could help the Vietnamese to bring this about, and that was Lansdale. If he goes out there, I will go, if he doesn't, I won't." After a while those negotiations broke down.

Q: What was Lansdale doing?

PHILLIPS: He had retired at that point. His official retirement day was the day Diem was assassinated.

Q: Had he been playing any role up to then?

PHILLIPS: Marginal. McNamara had really marginalized him.

Q: They were two different types of people, two different approaches?

PHILLIPS: Yes. You can see that in his book where he gives Ed one line and says that there was nobody who knew anything about Vietnam except Lansdale, but he was a relatively junior officer who was not a "geopolitical expert." That was it. That was McNamara talking about the fact that there were no experts to tell him anything about Vietnam. Ed was a senior officer. He was in charge of special operations in the Pentagon. McNamara gave him 12 minutes when he came in. That was it. That is as much of a comment on McNamara as anything I know of.

Q: During this period when you were advising did you find yourself marginalized too?

PHILLIPS: There were several things that occurred. One was that I was helping a guy named Stoneman, who was the AID guy in charge of backstopping Vietnam, recruiting people for rural affairs, which continued. But Rural Affairs ran into trouble when a guy named Killen was sent out as AID Mission Director. He was one of these people who felt that if he didn't invent it must not be any good. He tried to destroy it, the program, but it survived him. What happened there is another whole chapter. I helped recruit people, participated in meetings and did that sort of thing. I spent time informally with Senator Hubert Humphrey and his staff and after he became vice president he became the sponsor of the idea of getting Lansdale back to Vietnam. I was involved in the planning for that. Even though I was still running my engineering business, I took a month off in 1965 and went out with the Lansdale team and helped them get set up and informally tried to backstop some of what they were doing back here. In 1966 and 1967 I went out to Vietnam every year to try informally to help the Lansdale team, in addition to running the engineering business.

Q: On these trips that you were making back, what were you seeing, and how was the program going?

PHILLIPS: Before I went back in 1965, I had been receiving a lot of correspondence from Bert Fraleigh, who kept me informed as to what the Rural Affairs was doing. Also Colonel Bohannon was keeping me informed. He had been Ed's assistant in the Philippines in the Magsaysay era, and had been in Vietnam helping Ed in the 1954-55 period, but I had hired him on contract to help set up Chieu Hoi, which was a surrender program. The idea was we would model it on the program that Magsaysay had used against the Huks in the Philippines. So, Bo came over in the fall of 1962 and stayed on through 1965. I helped to recruit another guy who had worked for Ed in the Philippines, Mark Huss, who went out to Vietnam at the end of 1964. He became the principal liaison between Komer and the Vietnamese (the same Huang Van Lac that I had worked with earlier), Mark also kept me informed. Lac was the one continuity on the Vietnamese side throughout all the government changes and everything else. So I gained through correspondence a pretty good notion of what was going on. Very quickly in 1964, I began to get impressions that things were going to hell in the provinces. Security was deteriorating. Then Oanh came in and it didn't get any better. Things were just not going anywhere at all. And, of course, the situation deteriorated militarily, the North Vietnamese were putting in regular units and we started to intervene with regular US forces. By the time I got back in 1965, we had 150,000 troops on the ground and it was becoming an American war.

I had thought somehow the thing could be turned around, but not with the emphasis that was being given to fighting the war as an American war. Vietnamization came too late. It should have been started at the beginning.

Q: Vietnamization began about 1969, I think.

PHILLIPS: Yes.

ROBERT J. MACALISTER
International Rescue Committee
City Unspecified, Vietnam (1955)

Robert J. MacAlister was born and raised in the New York City area. He studied history at Bard College. It was at Bard that he became interested in foreign affairs while working at the State Department. In addition, he served in the Peace Corps. He worked in the Ivory Coast, Zaire, Chad, and Senegal. He was interviewed by W. Haven North on August 14, 1995.

MACALISTER: My next job stemmed from a contact I had made in India. Another part of my activity in India involved scheduling American visitors who came under the USIS program. The young ones, who were American youth leaders, would travel around with me in South India. One of these leaders was a fellow named Ernie Howell with whom I am still in touch. In 1955 Ernie was asked by the International Rescue Committee- a refugee assistance agency- to go to Vietnam. This was right after the Geneva Agreement of 1954 and the first refugees were coming down from North Vietnam. This was the end of the Indochina War between the French and the Viet Minh. As a result of the Geneva treaty, you had the seventeenth parallel demarcated between North and South Vietnam.

The International Rescue Committee, among other American PVOs, had decided to go in there and try to do something to help the refugees. So Ernie Howell gave them my name and my wife and I decided to go. The International Rescue Committee is a very interesting refugee assistance agency because it was started by Albert Einstein for refugees, particularly from the Nazis. And we worked with refugees like Willy Brandt, Thomas Mann, the man who wrote the "Song of Bernadette", and Marc Chagall. Traditionally, it specialized in intellectual and political refugees. And so we worked with students and professors and other intellectuals who had come down from the north.

While I was in Vietnam, we had an opportunity to work with a group of young Vietnamese who had no respect for Bao Dai, who had been the principal Vietnamese leader under the French. However, they did have respect for the Presidency of Ngo Dinh Diem, who was made President of South Vietnam after the Geneva Agreement. These young people had formed an association in providing services for students and intellectuals who had come down from the North. They called it the Popular Culture Association. They offered night courses to people. I guess we'd call it "continuing education".

Q: The reason they left the North was because of the communists?

MACALISTER: Yes. They were anticommunist and had not come back to South Vietnam while the French were still there because they were anti-colonialist. So that was another exposure.

Q: How long were you there?

MACALISTER: We were there about a year and a half which gave me an opportunity to work with some very interesting people including Andrew Biddle Duke, who recently died. He was President of the International Rescue Committee and I got to know him fairly well. Toward the end of our stay in Vietnam, I decided that I wanted to get some graduate work.

Q: Before we go to that., what kind of impressions did you have of the Vietnamese people that you worked with? How would you characterize them?

MACALISTER: Very hard working people. People who had a great respect for education. It was my first direct exposure to refugees. Most of them were Catholic. Whole villages came down. They saw this as an opportunity to escape the Viet Cong, Viet Minh. It was my first opportunity to see first hand a people uprooted from their livelihood and what that means. Of course, I had dealt with it second hand by having college professors who were refugees, mostly from the Nazis.

I was intellectually of the persuasions that Asia and later Africa should have their freedom from colonialism. As noted previously, I had the opportunity to live and work in India right after they had gained freedom, and the opportunity to live and work in South Vietnam right after they had obtained independence. I was struck by the different approach that the French and the British used. I came away much more of an Anglophile in terms of the British approach to colonialism. The British had left a civil service. They had left a court system. There were Indians with training and experience. I remember, when I first came through Saigon on the way back from India, there were Frenchmen at the airport checking the customs. Obviously that wasn't the comparison with India.

In Vietnam I also had the opportunity to work very closely with a Filipino group called Operation Brotherhood. Working with them gave me an opportunity to compare first hand the effect of American colonialism in the Philippines with the French approach. Another important part of my Vietnam experience was the opportunity to be associated with newly independent countries. I was extremely disappointed by the road that Diem took in South Vietnam and the ultimate collapse of a democratic alternative to the Viet Cong.

Q: The road he took was what?

MACALISTER: The road he took was a very authoritarian one. Initially, I dealt quite a bit with Diem because the person who actually went out to open our office in Vietnam, a man named Joseph Buttinger was a member of the board of the International Rescue Committee (IRC). He was a socialist in Austria. A refugee from the Nazis, who had been very active in Austrian politics. One of the great things about the IRC board was that it spanned from very conservative republicans to people like Joseph Buttinger who were democratic-socialists. And they all worked together for something they believed in. But in any event, Buttinger went out first and established a very close rapport with Diem and I had many opportunities to talk with him.

Q: What was your impression of the man?

MACALISTER: In the beginning, it was favorable. The fact that he was a decent man. For a short time Diem had been in exile here in the U.S. He was a very devout Catholic. One of his brothers was a Catholic priest. I thought he really wanted to make a positive difference to his country. In contrast to Nehru, he did not have the human resources, infrastructure, or the tradition that India had even in terms of provincial legislators, free press and an educated core group with which to start. He did not have the tradition of British parliamentary democracy.

You had the whole Mandarin tradition in Vietnam. Diem became more of a recluse, adopted more and more authoritarian methods, and ended up with his brother Ngo Din Nhu. Ngo Din Nhu and his wife became more and more the architects of intrigue and repressions which I think ultimately played into the hands of the Viet Cong. As a result, I saw the great tragedy of people as refugees a second time. People, with whom I had worked in Vietnam and who had already been refugees from the French, who had come back to try and build a democratic country free from French colonialism, had to become refugees again.

JOHN A. MCKESSON, III
Political Officer
Saigon (1955-1957)

John A. McKesson, III was born in New York in 1922. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947 and served in Iceland, Germany, Vietnam, Paris, Senegal, and was ambassador to Gabon. He was interviewed by Arthur Day in 1990.

Q: And then from there you went all the way around the world to Saigon in 1955. You were there for how long?

MCKESSON: For two years. From March '55 to April '57.

Q: The initial period you were there must have still been affected by the French defeat and the effects that that had throughout Indochina. How did that look to you at the time?

MCKESSON: As far as the French were concerned, it was perfectly clear that all during that period and even after that when I went to Africa, the French still had a concern that somehow we Americans were out to replace them, to take advantage of their having lost the war in Vietnam. This, of course, was something you sensed; they did not openly accuse you of it. I saw a fair amount of my French colleagues in Saigon and they were all very pleasant as far as that went.

The striking thing about my tour there, as far as I was concerned, was the fact that it was practically the only period for many decades that that poor country was in a state of peace as far as the Viet Cong, or Viet Minh as they were then called, was concerned. My wife and I traveled all over, not only in the Saigon area, but we went up to Dalat, Hue, and Cambodia. We went several times to Phnom Penh and saw Angkor Wat, and had no problems at all. The only fighting that was still going on was between the government and several of the sects, the Cao Dai, the Hoa Hao, the Binh Xuyen being the main ones.

Q: That took place right in Saigon?

MCKESSON: The only one that took place in Saigon was the Binh Xuyen. The Hoa Hao and Cao Dai were mostly active outside Saigon, not too far away, but outside Saigon itself. The Binh Xuyen, who practically controlled Cholon, which was the neighbor city to Saigon, did put up resistance and when the government moved in at a certain point to try to put an end to it, there was an out and out battle that lasted several days right in Saigon and I remember there was fighting going on right outside my own house. My wife and I shared a house with Frank Meloy, who was head of the political section and who had the other half. The government had set up soldiers with machine guns just outside our front door. We, of course, stayed inside and during that two or three day period we could hear the guns going off. Actually nobody ever came into the house, but the war was brought fairly close to us. The Binh Xuyen were defeated.

Q: I think off and on during those years there was some terrorist activity?

MCKESSON: There were quite a few terrorist activities, several of the sect leaders themselves were arrested and decapitated and others were assassinated, and they themselves assassinated some people. The house where I lived had an interesting history. I remember several years later when I was back in the states reading in Life magazine an account of Vietnam and there was a picture of that house. That is where the Viet Cong, during the Tet offensive, had moved in and actually gotten into the house, and an American colonel who was standing on the stairs had shot a Viet Cong who was attempting to come up. That was the old house I lived in at 5 Rue de Massige, as it was then called and subsequently named Mac Din Chi.

Q: I was interested in your traveling around the country. It had changed so much by the time we all became familiar with it by the press accounts. Did you also go up into North Vietnam?

MCKESSON: Unfortunately not. It was practically impossible, of course, because after the Geneva accords, which were signed shortly after Dien Bien Phu, the North and South were separated. It was supposed to be just a short separation, but it became permanent and the French continued for some time to have an envoy up there in contact with the Vietnamese, but we Americans never did. I think Tom Corcoran made a trip up there once during that period, but it was normally out of bounds for us.

Q: What was your role in the embassy?

MCKESSON: I was assigned to the political section, and was number two in the section, which was relatively small. We had about five or six officers, and when Frank Meloy left, which was about half way through my tour, I became acting chief of the section until I left. When Freddie Reinhardt came as the ambassador, he decided that he wanted to keep me as head of the section. Although I was relatively junior, he did not want a replacement until I left.

Q: That was the period in internal politics when Diem was becoming a major figure.

MCKESSON: Diem was completely running the government. I did have a few chances to meet Diem, but of course at my level I did not have any negotiations with him. I was always impressed by several things. One, he was a man of great strength of character, very strong willed, too strong willed to suit many people, certainly a man of great integrity. I think his brother Nu and his brother's wife, Madam Nu, were notorious for having been involved in shady deals, but Diem himself was a man of strong integrity. He also had such strong views that when he had a chance to expound them to an American, he would carry on at great length. I remember that once when Secretary Dulles was coming to Saigon, he had a meeting with Diem. Diem talked the whole time in a monologue. As Dulles was coming back to the embassy, he was muttering under his breath, "You would think that he would be interested in knowing what I thought."

Q: That was an odd situation for Dulles to be in.

MCKESSON: Yes. Dulles was used to telling everyone what the word was from on high.

Q: Did you deal, in your capacity as political officer, with Vietnamese officials?

MCKESSON: I dealt with officials at all different levels including Ministers, but Diem was the only one that I did not have business contacts with. Contacts with him were pretty much confined to the ambassador, our AID mission director and CIA representative.

Q: What impression did you have of these Vietnamese officials. Were they generally effective?

MCKESSON: Well, they were friendly, well-educated, well-informed, and I thought quite effective. I got to know the mayor of Saigon quite well, Tran Van Lam, and also the number two in the Foreign Office, who was the person I had the most contact with. He was very soft spoken and was effective. They all seemed quite dedicated. You had the impression, which I did not always have later in Africa, that the officials were well-trained for their work and really seriously attempting to do a good job.

Q: What did your work consist of in the main during this rather odd period?

MCKESSON: Mainly keeping informed of what was going on in the political field -- both on the official side, what the government was doing -- and what the sects were up to, what different elements outside the government might be feeling. Even in those days when Diem was in power and there was more or less a strong, one-man rule, you did have critics and opponents and they would want to come to the embassy and try to convince the embassy that they should be brought in to replace Diem. Actually I would see more of that when I was in Paris.

Q: We had an American general there at that time?

MCKESSON: Yes, General Collins was our senior representative in Saigon when I arrived. He headed the embassy and Randy Kidder was the deputy chief of mission; there was no ambassador. General Collins was in effect the ambassador, but without the title. It was when Collins left that he was replaced by a diplomat and Freddy Reinhardt became our ambassador. Which reminds me, if I may make a correction here, that I mentioned that I took over the political section when Frank Meloy left. That is not correct. Frank Meloy had a replacement, Dick Gatewood, who was briefly in Saigon as chief of the political section, and it was when Gatewood left that I was moved up and stayed on in the job.

Q: I wonder if you had any role in the little incident in the attack on the hotel where the International Truce Commission lived?

MCKESSON: It was very amusing. We got a cable that Perle Mesta was coming with an entourage and it just so happened that both Ambassador Reinhardt and the DCM, Randy Kidder were out of town. Frank Meloy was in charge, and suddenly we got a phone call that people had invaded the hotel and that Perle Mesta was being held prisoner in her room. Frank Meloy decided that something had to be done to rescue her, so he dashed out of the embassy and told me "John, you are in charge of the embassy", and off he went. So I had nothing to do with the rescue, but Frank did get her out of the hotel and to safety. Her main concern seemed to be that somehow we had not taken care of her typewriter. She lost some effects, but we felt that we had nobly saved her life. It was all rather amusing.

ROBERT E. BARBOUR
Language Training
Saigon (1955-1956)

Political Officer
Saigon (1956-1957)

Prinipal Officer
Hue (1957-1958)

Robert E. Barbour was born in Ohio in 1927 and educated at the University of Tennessee and George Washington University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1949. His career included posts in Basra, Tokyo, Saigon, Hue, Paris, Rome and Madrid and in 1984 he was named ambassador to Surinam. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You were the first Vietnamese language officer?

BARBOUR: Yes.

Q: I don't imagine at the time that you thought you might be the beginning of a whole wave of people.

BARBOUR: No. It was fun; I had about six months here and then another three months on my own in Saigon. The way the language students had done it in Japan.

Q: You said two languages. What was the other one?

BARBOUR: The other one that was offered later on and declined on my behalf before I knew it, was Thai.

Q: How did you find the language?

BARBOUR: Extremely difficult. We spent our first thirty days or six weeks doing nothing but singing tones, there were three of us in the class. And we sang tones with our southern instructors, that is all, the first month before we put anything together. The vowels are as difficult as the tones. You have to develop a totally different way of thinking.

Q: I took just about two weeks of Vietnamese as an introduction and I found it absolutely impossible. I couldn't tell the difference between words with different tones.

BARBOUR: We transmit emotions by tones, they transmit meanings.

Q: Could we talk a little about your activities as a trainee and the situation in Saigon when you arrived there as a trainee?

BARBOUR: My wife and I arrived in Saigon on double ten, 1955, after a twenty-three day ship trip from the United States. This was after the Geneva Conference. In any case, South Vietnam, the Republic of Vietnam, was a new country and I was in a new field. As for the language study aspects, I tried to follow the pattern I had seen in Japan for the language students there. There was an organized school and an organized program. We had neither in Saigon, but I had no duties in the Embassy. It was understood that I would not work in the Embassy. I had money for tutors; the USIS people helped me find some, I interviewed them and established a regular regime of classes with tutors and then spent a number of hours each week on my own, wandering around in Saigon and, whenever I chose, outside. It was a quiet period, probably the beginning of the best period in Vietnam's life. Someone once referred to it as the golden age; anyway you could do anything you wanted, go anyplace by any means. They had public transportation, trains down to the south. I took a train once down to Can Tho, found a place to stay, wandered around town, struck up a conversation with some army officers. This was the sort of thing I thought one was to do, wander around Saigon. It was fun and added to that was the regular course of studies with my tutors, both spoken and written. That lasted about two months and then the Ambassador asked if we would like to take up residence in his house in Da Lat, which was up in the highlands.

Q: Sort of the Switzerland of Vietnam.

BARBOUR: Exactly. And during the period of Bao Dai, the Emperor, that was his summer capital. The United States owned up there a large, Charles Adams type, Victorian mansion on a hillside.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

BARBOUR: Frederick Reinhardt, Fritz Reinhardt. Since he and his family wanted to go up for Christmas, they wanted someone to go up and get the house not so much cleaned as organized. There was a permanent staff of servants and there were all kinds of problems. Needless to say we said we would do that service and off we went. The missionaries helped me find some tutors and I reembarked on a program of regular study, in very pleasant circumstances. All that time in Saigon my wife and I had been living in Room 333 at the Majestic Hotel. At the end of that three months of formal study, we applied for and were authorized to take a regional study tour. So we went off, the two of us, to Singapore, up through Singapore to Malacca, Bangkok and back. Shortly after we arrived back the Department sent me off to be an observer to a university sponsored regional studies program in Rangoon. That was the extent of my studies program. I started to work in the Embassy in January, 1956.

The situation in Vietnam: it was the dawn of a new era for us; there was real enthusiasm of various kinds. The country was in the process of creating its new institutions; it was writing a constitution, it was creating a parliament, it was preparing to elect a chief of state. We were optimistic, enthusiastic. We were convinced the country had economic potential if we could develop the rice export industry. Needless to say, underlying it all, was the fact that we were the non-colonialists. The French had tried to deal with the country as a colony and had harvested the inevitable fruits--failure, disgrace. We were democrats, we were going to show this country; we were going to teach this country democracy, one way or another we were going to teach it democracy; it was going to be democratic and it was going to be a success. It was a period of that kind of attitude. It was genuine; we really thought we had a chance of turning this little country into a prosperous democracy.

Q: What were you doing at the Embassy?

BARBOUR: I moved into the Embassy as the junior officer in the political section, the only one who could speak or read or write Vietnamese. I was sort of given political grunt work. We got a copy of the constitution and I translated it. I read the newspapers and did a little press summary for the Ambassador every morning. I would get out and talk to people. One of the first things I wrote was a series of dispatches on the developing election campaign. That sort of thing--basic political reporting.

Q: How much interest was there back in Washington?

BARBOUR: I personally never got any feedback, but I got a lot of encouragement from my bosses. The Ambassador, a professional, his deputy and the head of the political section and his deputy were all very supportive and encouraging.

Q: Who were they?

BARBOUR: Fritz Reinhardt was the Ambassador, Dan Anderson was the Deputy Chief of Mission, Frank Malloy was the head of the political section and his deputy was John McKesson. Anything I wanted to do they thought was fine, they would be glad to have. They would steer me, give me guidance which I badly needed. John McKesson, in particular, was an outstanding writer; he had a very graceful flowing style, could accomplish a lot with few words; he was a profound and beneficial influence.

Q: What was our view of the government? Diem was...

BARBOUR: Diem was to be the hero. I am sure the Ambassador had no illusions about problems and attitudes, things like that, but we were optimistic. I remember in particular, because it was published the other day, writing a dispatch about the electoral setup, how I was convinced that it was heavily rigged, heavily loaded in every way, institutionally, legally, etc., in favor of the chosen parties and individuals, and said so. I remember having to be careful about how I said it. The Ambassador, all the people I mentioned, did not impose any kind of censorship, but on the other hand they had their instructions and they didn't want to sow discouragement. So I had to be careful about how I wrote this particular dispatch.

Q: What about the timing? Was Magsaysay of the Philippines going strong or had he recently died? I was wondering if there was a correlation between these events?

BARBOUR: I think he was dead by then but there was a correlation in more ways than you realize. We had with us General Lansdale who considered that he had made Magsaysay. General Lansdale was very present and had his own little operation, I guess. Even to this day I am not sure what it was; had with him a number of scholars and academicians and people like that. I remember one Sunday my wife and I invited to go with us on a picnic that the Vietnamese-American Association had organized a Filipino jurist who was living in the hotel. He was working on the constitution and we had become friendly with him, so we invited him to go and off we went. The following week, I don't remember the details, I was told that General Lansdale didn't like the fact that I had invited Judge So-and-so to go off with us and would I please not pursue that relationship. My attitude toward that was that General Lansdale can do his thing and what I do socially is my business. That is the way it was left.

Q: Was there any other feeling about Lansdale's operation by the political section?

BARBOUR: In retrospect I suppose he was trying to make Diem like Magsaysay, make him honest and develop him and get him all kinds of apparatus to extend his authority in the right kind of way. I guess, I am not sure. Yes, General Lansdale's operation was viewed with something close to distaste because he wanted to be alone, he wanted his autonomy to do whatever he wanted to do--I suppose the way he operated in the Philippines. They were plugged into the station, but how we were not quite sure. I didn't really care.

Q: By station you mean the CIA?

BARBOUR: Yes, the CIA station.

Q: Was there the feeling at the time, that there were wheels within wheels; that we were encouraged by the way Vietnam was going but at the same time we were developing a client state?

BARBOUR: That came a little bit later; certainly if there was sensitivity to it it was not viewed as a concern. It might even go so far as to say that a client state would insure its success. You had General Lansdale's operation; you had Michigan State University which was there under contract to AID and also helping them to write a constitution, civil institutions, under a man named Dr. Fishel. They had their own way of doing things, they were less--I don't want to use the word estranged--distant from the Embassy, but they had their separate operation. So you had Lansdale's operation, this particular operation and a large and growing USOM operations mission, and a small military assistance advisory group--it was small, limited by the terms of the Geneva accords.

Q: Fifty-five observers, or something. I guess I don't know how many.

BARBOUR: I forget the number, could it have been three hundred? Under General O'Daniel.

Q: Was there any insurgency going on?

BARBOUR: At that time, no. The central authority in Saigon was principally concerned with establishing its writ throughout South Vietnam, and in the first instance that meant against Bao Dai, the Emperor, resident in France but wanting to come back. There was a plebiscite shortly after we arrived as a result of which he ceased to be a factor. It was obviously heavily rigged, but be that as it may. Then you had some insurgencies, local South Vietnamese warlords who had probably been encouraged and tolerated by the French, who wanted to maintain their fiefdoms, including armed fiefdoms--the right to stop traffic on the road and collect tolls and things like that. There were, I think, two of those which had to be put down, and were. Everybody thought putting them down was a good thing; we talked about our Shay's Rebellion and the Whiskey Rebellion. Then came the extension of civil institutions and authority.

Q: How about the French? Did they play dog in the manger?

BARBOUR: No, the French moved out, probably happily. The last troops, the Foreign Legion, departed in April of 1956, departed proudly. I do not recall any of that on the part of the French. There was a French Embassy and a French Ambassador and I am sure that there must have been a good deal more than I saw, but I do not recall any French interference from then on. They were probably delighted to be out of the place, this was the Fourth Republic in France and it was well shed of Indochina. But nonetheless, as I mentioned, you had the signs of authoritarianism in the electoral laws, you saw it in the constitution, which I remember because I told you I translated the first version we got. Everything was hedged by "in accordance with the law." "There shall be complete freedom of the press, in accordance with the law." Everything had that qualification with it. We wrestled a lot of the time with the concept of "personalism," which was a mystical, Catholic origin, Buddhist influenced philosophy of the President's brother. No one was quite sure what it meant but it became the official ideology. Then there was the President's sister who was a pain.

Q: Madame Nhu. She was the wife of the President's brother.

BARBOUR: I beg your pardon, the President's sister-in-law. A pain, but not a major factor.

Q: How about the President's brother?

BARBOUR: That was Nhu; another brother lived up in Hue, was a mandarin, a regional autocrat.

Q: The real problem later was the President's brother and sister-in-law. How did we see them at that time?

BARBOUR: As pests. Troublesome, interfering. We didn't realize at first the enormity of the problem that they were to become. Both of them were seen as unhelpful influences. Diem himself was very difficult to deal with, for one thing he was so garrulous. He would talk and talk and talk; every American visitor who went there got a lecture of some kind. I know the Ambassador would go for long meetings with him and come back and try to piece out what it was that he had actually accomplished. I went to take notes once with a Senatorial delegation. I wrote pages and pages and pages of notes and when it came time to do the memcon I had to completely rearrange the meeting to make any sense out of it. I think everyone had that problem with him. Secondly, he was not honest with us. Whether he would lie, I don't know, but certainly he would conceal, not deliver, have his ministries hold back information. People in the government told us many things that were simply not true, knowing they were not true; it was much easier to tell us something good that was not true than something bad that was. And they didn't like us prying, trying to find out what was going on.

Q: What about corruption?

BARBOUR: Corruption certainly was endemic. We were perhaps less sensitive to it at the very beginning than we became later on. There were many, many rumors of corruption and so we were all convinced it was there, but it was more, at first at least, intellectual corruption, philosophical corruption. The Nhus were obviously getting money though I don't think we were able to identify how. By philosophical and intellectual corruption I mean l'état, c'est moi; whatever is good for the country me is good for me, whatever is good for me is good for the country; whatever I do is ipso facto beneficial. That is, of course, what led to awful corruption later on in all forms because it spread down to all levels of government. But that came later on.

Q: How about our view of events in North Vietnam?

BARBOUR: I think you could say that we had no illusions as to what was going on in North Vietnam, the only illusion we had was that they would respect the Geneva agreement. Illusion and hope; they said they would, they said they were. Of course we know they never had any intention of doing so. As far as what they were doing in Hanoi it was obvious. There was also the institution of the ICC, the International Control Commission, which was the treaty supervision body established by the Geneva accords with an Indian chairman, a Polish component and a Canadian component. They became my reporting responsibility later on so I spent a lot of time with them as well as with the Vietnamese who were in liaison with them. The Canadians would tell us, and some of the Indians, about what was happening in North Vietnam. There was no question of what they were doing.

Q: We may then move on to your next assignment.

BARBOUR: Well, technically my next assignment was in Hue. My wife and I drove up there in the summer of 1957 and opened a consulate. Birth pains at the end of the line in the truest sense. We opened a little consulate; I had one administrative assistant, there was also a USIS cultural center with an American and his wife, sixteen MAAG officers, Military Assistance and Advisory Group, and an American nurse supplied by the Economic Assistance Program. It was a very interesting year.

Q: Where were you? On the Perfume River?

BARBOUR: Oh yes. Again, at that time there were no restrictions on what you could do or where you could go. There was a French consul in what was still called Tourainne whom we knew quite well and we used to drive down and have dinner with them, or take the train down, have dinner with them and drive back at night. We could go hunting, which we did from time to time, at night--walk all night through the hills. Then I went on a trip with a couple of MAAG officers up into the plateau, on foot and dugout; up the river, almost to the Lao border and back through the valleys and down again. I was gone almost a week. Life in Hue was very different from life in Saigon and I did a lot more writing of basic things about what was going on up there.

Q: Was there a difference? Here was Hue, the former capital of united Vietnam; was there a different political atmosphere? Also, how was Diem's presence in Saigon impacting on this part of the country?

BARBOUR: A different psychological and cultural atmosphere. Diem was from Hue, his mother lived there when we arrived. His brother lived there; his brother was the local mandarin, and mandarin in the very classic Chinese sense almost; unmarried, shy, retiring, said to be an intellectual, who ran that part of the country, which was central Vietnam, absolutely. It was his fief, it really was. He controlled the entire government authority up there. There is a contradiction in being shy and reclusive and hard to see and running everything, but he did. His power was unseen but very present; of course it was derived from his brother. Hue was referred to as the ancient capital of Vietnam; ancient means the beginning of the nineteenth century. The oldest building up there isn't as old as the White House. But it was the traditional capital for about a hundred years. It is modeled on Peking, they even have the inner part called the "Great Within" as in Peking; the royal palace, the forbidden part, etc. It still saw itself as the repository of Vietnamese culture. The accent is different, the food is different, the attitudes are much more intellectual and detached, there are more monasteries around Hue, the royal tombs are up there. We were closer to Hanoi than we were to Saigon.

Q: What was the relation of the Vietnamese there with the Montagnards? Later we recruited the Montagnards in large numbers but there always seemed to be this problem between them and the plains dwellers.

BARBOUR: The Vietnamese certainly, I don't know if oppressed them is the right term, exploited them. As the highlands became targets of development and exploitation and the Vietnamese moved up there voluntarily they began to conflict with the Montagnards whose lands they were. The Montagnards were much happier with us, I think, than with the Vietnamese who were very aggressive. Sihanouk used to say that if there had been no French in the middle of the nineteenth century there would be no Cambodia. Yes, there were conflicts and the Vietnamese in their cultural arrogance looked down on them and exploited them and ordered them around. I remember once we were spending the night in a Montagnard village and as we were sitting around I noticed a picture of Diem up on the wall. I asked our host, "Who is that man?" He said, "I don't know." There was a Vietnamese with us who got very exercised and said, "Yes you do know who that is."

Q: Did you ever get to see Diem's brother?

BARBOUR: Yes, I had one meeting with him shortly before I left, unfortunately; I hadn't wanted to press him but use it as a social occasion to build upon later. I think I was the only American who ever saw him. We had a nice social chat about general problems up there and about American aid, he had some pet projects he hoped we would help him with. He had some criticisms of American aid which, as I recall, were factually incorrect and improperly premised. Just a few days before we were leaving we were being inspected and I had the inspector in my office and there came some messengers from the "councilor," as he was called. In they came with a pole over their head with an enormous gaur head. A gaur is a wild cow, I think, a jungle cow, an enormous beast. Here was the stuffed head of this gaur slung on the pole. That was my farewell present from the councilor.

Q: How did the Embassy use you? You already had your ties there.

BARBOUR: We were a listening post to extend the reportorial reach of the Embassy, which we did. I remember one day sitting in my office wondering what I would do with my time that day. I said to myself, "I know." I got in my car and drove down to the lagoon, it was a kind of estuary, hired a boat and went across to the other side and spent the day walking around through a couple of villages there. Then went back and wrote what I thought was a wonderful report on what life was like over there, what people were talking about and how the economy was functioning or not functioning.

Q: Did you get up to the town right on the DMZ?

BARBOUR: Yes. That was Quang Tri province; in fact we ended our hike, our walking tour, right along the DMZ in Quang Tri. Went up there several times but could never go in; I used to go up and see the province chief from time to time, went up to see some maneuvers a couple of times, paid visits. It was routinely covered from the consulate. We would go up and have dinner with the ICC from time to time.

Q: There were no cross-border problems at that time?

BARBOUR: There was no cross-border movement to speak of, except for the ICC. It was virtually impossible, except for a small number of farmers, to move back and forth.

ROBERT LOCHNER
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Saigon (1955-1958)

Robert Lochner was born in New York in 1918 and educated at the University of Chicago. His career with USIA included posts in Frankfurt, Saigon, Berlin and Bern. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1991.

Q: Can you speak a little bit about the Saigon period? The French were still in control weren't they or had Dien Bien Phu come just before that?

LOCHNER: I got to Saigon in September, 1955. The division of the country, of course, had happened at Geneva in 1954. But the place had just simmered down very shortly before I got there. President Diem had defeated the river pirates, the Binh Xuyen, and the army of the Cao Dai. So outwardly things seemed pretty quiet in Vietnam. I will say first, that in my two years there, because it was a hardship post--I confess that while it was a fascinating experience I was happy to leave after two years--I, of course, never felt remotely as useful as I felt in Germany with my being bilingual and with my background. I am to this day a strong believer in regional specialization. I felt totally out of place. At best, shall we say, the last half year I felt halfway useful. What added to this feeling was that there was so abominably little language talent in the USIS operation. It was a gigantic operation. I had 32 other Americans and 200 Vietnamese. We, in effect, were the information ministry for the new Diem government. As everyone knows, the French left behind no trained personnel in almost any field. The few, so-called information specialists the new government had were former communists who had defected for whatever reason and joined the new Diem government. So they were utterly helpless. We prepared the weekly newsreel for the movie theaters. We did most of their radio broadcasting. We did all the pamphlets. We had mobile theater groups moving around the country with some kind of political message. So, in essence, we were the Vietnamese information ministry.

Now among the 31 other Americans on my staff, there was one who spoke Vietnamese. Typically, he had grown up in China as a son of a missionary with fluent Chinese. He had two years in Hanoi before the division of the country, during which, being a good linguist he had picked up Vietnamese which is apparently sufficiently related to Chinese so that if you speak one you can learn the other. John Donnell was his name. I once said only half in jest to my ambassador, "You know you could really send me and the 30 other Americans home because this one guy speaking Vietnamese is so much more effective than all of us put together." If we wanted anything from the Vietnamese Information Ministry, we would send John Donnell and they would roll all over themselves with delight to have an American come and speak fluent Vietnamese to them. And here is the sad end of the story of John Donnell. He'd had two years in Hanoi. After the two years in Saigon he was assigned another two years in Saigon--and it was a hardship post where everybody else, including myself, served two years only. At the end of six years, he asked for a nice post like Paris, because he spoke fluent French, too. What happened? They assigned him to Vientiane which was the end of the line. People would come for rest and recreation to Saigon from Vientiane. So what happened? He resigned from the Foreign Service. That is how we treated the one Vietnamese specialist after six years. It still outrages me today to lose such a good man.

So, among the other USIS Americans, there were only two besides myself who spoke French. The others, of course, spoke neither French nor Vietnamese. At that time all educated Vietnamese had gone to French schools and universities, so at least with my French I could certainly communicate with the Information Minister and people like that. But the others didn't have any language capacity at all. I thought that was one of the reasons we were not more effective than we could have been. To deviate for a moment, in my opinion much of the later catastrophe of our involvement in Vietnam was in part due to language difficulty. When you saw the unqualified Vietnamese who acted as translators you could tear your hair out. You could just see how many misunderstandings arose simply due to language difficulties.

Q: You partly answered the question I was going to ask you. If nobody on the American side spoke adequate Vietnamese, how in the world did you get your stuff translated? If you did get it translated how did you know it was done correctly?

LOCHNER: Precisely. We did have some Vietnamese staffers whose English appeared very good. But, of course, outside of John Donnell, there was nobody ever to control the final product. He didn't have time to read every pamphlet.

I would say this much for the whole two years, that we were all quite optimistic in the sense we thought with Ngo Dinh Diem there was a viable alternative to Ho Chi Minh, after all Diem was not tainted with colonialism, he had been in the US in exile. We felt that South Vietnam had a chance to make it on its own. It was not over populated. It had wonderful natural resources, rice, rubber--the French created all these superb rubber plantations--and with our help and, particularly economic help, South Vietnam could make a go of it. So in my two years, I would say I would never have foreshadowed how in the end catastrophe would envelop us there.

Q: The so-called dragon lady, Madame Nu, had she come into prominence yet?

LOCHNER: Oh yes, indeed. In fact, I had the pleasure on many official occasions to sit next to Madame Nu. She was one of the most brilliant and attractive ladies I have ever encountered. You see, Ngo Dinh Diem, among his many weaknesses, when he went around the country he would drag the whole diplomatic corps with him. After a while our ambassador got sick of doing it. I was one of the cabinet rank people as PAO so he sent me along. Through some rule of their protocol I wound up often at the ceremonial dinners next to Madame Nu. I must say I got to admire her very much. I had a very good personal impression of Ngo Dinh Diem, himself, too. He was quite sympathique, except he couldn't delegate. He worked 18 hours a day and he tried to do it all himself. And here I come to a specific frustration of my USIA work. Among other things, of course, we had an exchange program. So we selected a considerable number of Vietnamese students to go to the US through all the normal procedure. That particular year, the fall was approaching and they didn't get their exit permits. So the ambassador sent me over to the Chef de Cabinet, who under the French system was the number two man under Diem, to goose him so that they should let these students out. So I went over and told him that this was terrible, college was opening and everything else was done except for the exit permit and couldn't he issue them. The man threw up his hand in horror and said, "The President reserves that unto himself." So Diem would personally handle any exit permit of any Vietnamese leaving the country. He personally stamped every passport of every foreign diplomat who came to Saigon. So if you want an explanation of why his government did not succeed you can find it right there. The Chef de Cabinet was absolutely adamant that he could not do anything about it and we lost several slots because they just wouldn't come through with this technicality. These people had been screened up and down. It was inexcusable that they would not issue the permits. But that was among the more frustrating aspects. As I said, otherwise it was in a sense fun doing their weekly news reel, doing all these pamphlets, so I won't say that we at all foreshadowed, so to speak, that all this would go down the drain in the end.

During those two years from 1955 to '57 things really looked up in Saigon.

Q: Well, since you weren't there this might be an impossible question for you to answer, but what finally got Madame Nu into the kind of position where she was apparently usurping the government and mostly running things behind the scenes? Do you have any guesses on that?

LOCHNER: I don't agree with that thesis and I don't think there is unanimity among historians by now on that. Of course, it was really, at least during my time, much more her husband, Ngo Dinh Nu, who was the power behind the throne. But yet in all the encounters that I saw when the two were with Diem, they always seemed to defer to him. I never had the feeling that either her husband nor she were running Ngo Dinh Diem. Diem relied on both of them, maybe to excess, but that is different from saying that they were the power behind the throne.

SAMUEL T. WILLIAMS
Military Assistance Advisory Group
Saigon (1955-1960)

Samuel T. Williams was a member of the US Army. He served in Japan, Korea and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Ted Gittinger in 1981.

Q: What was your first impression of your MAAG people and Saigon when you first arrived?

WILLIAMS: Well, I would say the whole thing looked like it was an enormous mess. It wasn't anyone's fault particularly; we didn't have very many people out there. That was one trouble with MAAG, they never had enough people to do what they were told to do. And there were very few U.S. military there - Mike O'Daniel didn't have a great deal of help. He had one brigadier that was not the strongest general officer I've ever known, and his headquarters was in a dilapidated, or gutted Chinese building in Cholon. The noise there was terrific from the street noises and things of that nature. Mike hadn't been able to set up any workable administrative system in his headquarters. Frankly I would say that Mike, I had known him since 1925 and we were intimate friends, was not an administrator. He was an aggressive fighter in peace and war but he knew no more about running an office than the man in the moon, and he didn't have anyone to run it for him. So he had no files nor reliable records nor anything of that nature. He was out all the time from daylight till dark, as hard as he could go, trying to get things done out in the field. That was the impression I had of MAAG when I got there. One man driving hard to get things done and with little help.

Q: What exactly was General ODaniel trying to accomplish?

WILLIAMS: He was trying to get some kind of organization in the Vietnamese army and air force and navy, but his primary work had been at that time to help receive almost a million refugees from up around the Hanoi area. They were moving down into South Vietnam to escape the to escape the communist government of North Vietnam. Now, you seldom hear or read about that, but right after the Geneva accords, Ho Chi Minh said he'd let those people go south that wanted to go south. Well, they didn't let all go but they let a hell of a lot of them go south, and there was no organization to receive them, feed them or do anything else, so Mike O'Daniel at least got tents shipped in there and pitched camps for refugees. I have no idea what the figure was, but I've heard the figure ran anywhere from five hundred thousand to almost a million refugees that came south. That's what Mike was doing mostly, and he was doing it mostly by himself with his bare hands as the South Vietnamese he had to work with were not used to doing things like that.

Q: How many people were in MAAG at about this time?

WILLIAMS: Oh, I think we had around two hundred maybe.

Q: A large company?

WILLIAMS: Yes, that's right. They were about equally divided among non-commissioned officers and officers. Now that's a rough guess, I don't remember. After I got going there I tried valiantly to raise that figure. I wanted a minimum of two thousand, but the people stateside could not agree on that strength. Now here was the reason.

The Geneva accords, which we never signed, but Bedell Smith said in his infinite wisdom that we would adhere to, stipulated that any U.S. military that came in would be replacements for the people who were on hand at the time the accords were signed. Or in other words, we would not increase. Well, when that happened there was anywhere from two or maybe I'd say on the outside four hundred officers and men in South Vietnam that were Americans. There was an International Control Commission made up of some army officers from India, from Canada and Poland. The Indians were violently against us from the day that I got there until the day I left.

They were against Mike, too. The Canadians were very much for westerners, and the Poles, they held a swing, one way or the other. Now that commission would monitor very closely every U.S. military person or piece of equipment that came in or out of Vietnam. If I got some replacements out there I had to show by name, rank, organization who they were, how many they were, and exactly who they were replacing. Those Indians worked on that to a degree.

So Mike didn't have enough Americans to work with, and for a long time I was terribly handicapped before I could get any additional people. Finally we were able to get what we called "training teams," a few technicians for this, a few technicians for that, to come out, a team of three or four, something like that, and stay for a certain number of days or weeks and then go back. That's the way we were doing it because it took the bureaucracy of the Control Commission so long to operate, the teams would be in and out before the hell they could do anything about it. That's the way we got any additional help at all.

Q: Was the situation ever resolved?

WILLIAMS: No. No, it was not resolved, and it went further than that, because each piece of equipment--and we're fixing to get into that again I'm afraid--shipped in there had to be a replacement for a piece of equipment that was there at the time of the Geneva accords.

Q: How could you know what was there at the time?

WILLIAMS: You couldn't, you couldn't. But anytime that we got anything shipped in I had to show the commission that some number of items were being destroyed. Regardless if it was vehicles or anything else, we had to show item for item. Say we're getting in ten jeeps. All right, we had to show them ten jeeps that were going on the salvage pile right then to be cut up. So then we could bring in ten more jeeps. They made things as rough as possible. Pure harassment. I remember that one time one of my sergeants was absolutely browned off. American soldiers will only put up with so much. He came to me because he was cutting up some old one-pounder cannons. Very likely you are not familiar with those, but in World War II we had a one-pounder gun that was our original anti-tank gun. You'd shoot that against any tank and its shell would bounce off, but nevertheless that was what we had. Well, we were going to destroy some of those to get them off our invoice. And we were cutting those barrels in about two or two-and-a-half-foot lengths and throwing them in the scrap heap. The commission came along and said, "You can't do that. You've got to go back and cut these barrels again, and each one of those two-foot barrels you have to cut them into one-foot lengths." Well, that's just harassment.

Blowing ammunition. There was ammunition all over Vietnam at that time, and large piles of it. I asked my counterpart there, a Frenchman, [Pierre] Jacquot, General Jacquot, "What the hell were the French doing with so much ammunition? Here, there, yonder, there's piles of it all over Vietnam." He said, "It's simple. We were getting ammunition from you, from the States, and if we wanted some ammunition at Hue, it would be better to have it unloaded at Hue than it would be to unload it in Saigon and we then tried to ship it up there. So anyplace where we needed the ammunition, that's where we asked the ammunition be placed." Then they ran off and left lots of it, and there it was. It had deteriorated and had to be destroyed before we could ship in some decent replacement ammunition.

I remember one time I notified the commission that we were going to blow a certain number of tons of ammunition at a certain place and time and we'd dug an enormous pit and put that old ammo in there. They hadn't shown up, our people went ahead and had that pit about half full on the way to blow it and the commission came and they said, "What's in there?" The U.S. sergeant said so and so, and they said, "We don't know it. Dig it out of there, let us see it and then put it back." That's when the sergeant blew his top and came to me and said, "General, we're just not going to do it." I said, "I know you're not going to do it. Just tell them to go to hell and go ahead and blow it." Hell, the commission didn't do anything about it, but it's that harassment--oh, they'd make reports about it, they'd make a report to Hanoi, they'd make reports of it to the Vietnamese and so forth, and to Washington: "the Americans are not doing this, that and the other. They are bullheaded." But that was the kind of stuff we were running into all the time. It was just like molasses in January. Did that answer your question?

Q: Yes, Sir. I was just going to ask you about certain people. Now I think at one place General Lansdale says that he spent his first interview with you getting royally chewed out. Do you remember that incident?

WILLIAMS: Yes, I remember it quite well. Because he hasn't let me forget it. First of all, I didn't see Lansdale until after I moved that headquarters out of Cholon, where I had found it, and taken over another building in a better part of town. It was a larger building and better located. The chief of staff or headquarters commandant, or whoever was handling that kind of work at that time, had divided it up and assigned the offices here, there and yonder. Then it suddenly dawned on me--Lansdale was there and I think he had eleven people with him, but they had not come to my attention prior to that, and if they had, it just went over my head. But one morning, one day, I was coming up the front steps of the MAAG headquarters and an American, or at least a Caucasian, unshaven, dirty as hell, in a very dilapidated automobile drove up and got out and left his automobile standing there where he shouldn't have, and went up the steps into the headquarters. The first officer I saw I asked, "Who is that character?" I didn't know if he had any business being in the MAAG headquarters. At that time we didn't have guards on our headquarters. He said, "He's one of Lansdale's people." So I sent for Lansdale and I told him about this incident, and I told him I wanted him to get his people spruced up a little bit.

Well, he didn't make it clear to me, which he should have, or maybe I was a little slow on the uptake, but he had his people looking that way on purpose. They were CIA operators and they were working all over the country and he didn't want them dressed up looking like good, prosperous Americans.

Q: Were these military personnel in civilian clothes?

WILLIAMS: I don't know, I don't know if they were military or civilian. I never inquired into his business that much. Lansdale, I was talking to him in my office and he was sitting there--do you know Lansdale?

Q: No, Sir.

WILLIAMS: Well, he's a very fine-looking officer. But he also has a dreamy look. He can lounge back on a divan or a chair and kind of look at the ceiling, look at the walls with a kind of a dreamy look, and you just think that you're spitting against the wind, that he's not hearing a damn thing you say. So I had to wake him up. He wrote in his book [In the Midst of War: An American Mission to Southeast Asia], which he sent and asked me what I thought about it, that I jumped on him and did it in such a voice that I could be heard all over Vietnam. Maybe I did.

But he also wrote in that book that I reminded him of either his father or his grandfather. Anyway, he said he took a liking to me right then and actually invited me to supper that night, and we had a very pleasant time. Well, I don't remember that part of it. Lansdale and I never did have any major differences. I didn't know much about his business, and I don't think he knew a hell of a lot about mine. There was mutual respect. I liked him.

He was working at that time with a group of people that he had brought over from the Philippines, and he never told me, or no one else told me, but it was my assumption that he had brought these people over, and actually they were men and women nurses, maybe Red Cross people, and they worked all over Vietnam and I think those were his informers. I'm sure they were.

Q: I think he called that Operation Brotherhood.

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: What was his official capacity exactly?

WILLIAMS: He was a member of MAAG, and his rank at that time was lieutenant colonel.

Q: But you more or less held him on a loose rein?

WILLIAMS: Absolutely. I had nothing to do with his business at all, never gave him any orders, because I believed he was working directly for the CIA and I didn't want to get my fingers into that business at all, especially after the army told me that if I found a CIA man in my headquarters to report it immediately. I thought, if that's the way they're running things back there, if they don't know what's going on, well, I'm not going to enter into it at all.

Q: Did you ever notify Washington that Lansdale was working for the CIA and not for--?

WILLIAMS: I don't ever remember mentioning Lansdale in any official letters or dispatches. I gave him a free rein.

Q: Did he report to you on what he was doing or directly to Washington?

WILLIAMS: As I recall he would come in every once in a while and give me briefings and discuss conditions and so forth, and I judged that he told me what he was damn willing for me to know, and that was all. Any reports he was making, official reports, I'm positive he was making direct to his people back in Washington. I had too many problems of my own to think about CIA affairs.

Lansdale is a very unusual man. He's had a lot of experience in Asia with Asiatics and with the Filipinos. He got this notoriety of being the man that they modeled The Ugly American after, which I don't think is true. I don't think they modeled him on Lansdale at all. Lansdale is intelligent. I mean by that that he knew his way around. I think he's smart as hell. I like him.

Q: What was his relationship to President Diem?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. I know that Diem knew him, and I imagine that Diem very likely mentioned his name occasionally to me. I remember one time a year or so later when some Americans were going to come out, a committee was going to come out to Vietnam and the Vietnamese were in conference with the embassy on this subject. The embassy saw Lansdale's name on the list of visitors and vetoed him, said he couldn't come. President Diem told me that and said, "What do you think about it?" I said, "Hell, you know Lansdale as well as I do. I think he's done a wonderful thing for your country in the work he's done here, and if you want him to visit, okay, bring him out." And he came out. I imagine that if they knew about it, my comment to Diem very likely irritated the American Ambassador. I don't know. But anyway, Lansdale I would say on occasion was not getting along too well with the embassy. Whether he was or not, I don't know.

Or it might be that the CIA man at the embassy at that time and Lansdale were at cross-purposes. I don't know.

Q: Lansdale came back about two years before you did. Isn't that about right? Something on that order.

WILLIAMS: I don't remember.

Q: Do you know what he did after he came back to the States? I've heard that he continued to work on Vietnam problems, and I was wondering if you had any contact with him after he left Vietnam?

WILLIAMS: I think we exchanged personal letters.

Q: Not official contact?

WILLIAMS: Oh, no. I presume he came back and was working with the CIA here in the States. That's the best of my knowledge. In years past I've had a terrific amount of correspondence with the people, officers and soldiers. I get letters now from soldiers that I haven't seen in twenty or thirty years. Sometimes they come see me. The same with the officers. Sometimes an officer will call me long distance on the telephone and I'll have to get out of it as well as I can by saying, "Well, by George, when was the last time we served together?" If he tells me that, then I can chop these periods of time off into compartments and often be able to place a person. Sometimes I can, sometimes I can't. But I mention that because it would not be unusual for me not to remember any specific correspondence between myself and Lansdale at this minute.

Q: Right. I don't mean to dwell on Lansdale. It's only that he has a lot of notoriety, and you're obviously a primary source about Lansdale. So I don't want to let that get away untouched. What was the atmosphere in Saigon in the countryside when you arrived? How would you describe the-

WILLIAMS: Very pleasant, very pleasant. We had no problems there except the problem of dealing with Vietnamese who were inefficient. Now, when I say inefficient, I'm--well, let me take specific cases. The French were there and they controlled everything. Most of the merchants either thought a great deal of the French or they might have been French merchants. I testified before Mike Mansfield's Senate committee in Washington one time that the French objected to our being there and resented it very much. Our State Department took exception to that and Ambassador Durbrow tried to get me to withdraw that statement. I declined to withdraw it, and I told him, "How in the hell can I withdraw it? You know at one of these committee meetings how many stenographers there are typing as the witness talks. Here are all these senators up here listening to me. You want me to come out tomorrow and say I didn't say so and so? How goddamned stupid would that be?" Threats were made but I refused to change my statements.

But the French objected to us. They always said that I was trying to do a job that couldn't be done. They said, "You can't organize a Vietnamese army. The Vietnamese will never fight. They're not worth a damn." My answer to that was, on one occasion to a senior French officer out there, "Hell, they just got through whipping your ass and driving you out of this country. What do you mean they won't fight?" "Well," he said, "that's the Vietnamese up north." I said, "Well, they're bound to be cousins to these down here. I think they'll fight if they're given proper training and have any leadership."

But it must be remembered that the senior officers in the Vietnamese army had been lieutenants and captains in the French colonial army. The chief of staff, the senior officer in the Vietnamese army, was a man by the name of Lieutenant General Ty, spelled T-Y. Ty had been a noncommissioned officer in the French colonial forces in World War I, in a transportation company, a truck transport company and had served in France. In World War II he was a company commander and a battalion commander. The Japanese came in and the French were cooperating with them at that time, and suddenly when the Vietnamese found out that the Japanese were going to take over--Ty told me this himself- he said, "I told my soldiers what was happening." He said, "I'm going to the jungle. You fellows go where you like." He said, "We disintegrated overnight (snaps fingers), just like that." Now, he was very outspoken in telling me that. I think the same thing happened to a hell of a lot of these Vietnamese officers that I had to work with because when the French came back, by grace of the Americans and the British after World War II, they arrested some of these officers and court martialed them. But they didn't sentence them as far as I know, but they threw the fear of God in them.

Now we'll take this man Big [Duong Van] Minh as an example. Big Minh was a very close friend of a man by the name of T-H-O, who became vice president of Vietnam. Big Minh and I were very close. I asked him one time, "What was your relation with Vice President [Nguyen Ngoc] Tho?" He said, "We were in prison together." I said, "Where?" He said, "Right here. The French had us in prison. It was terrible. They had us confined, many of us, in very small rooms. It was more horrible than you could think of. There was no place to relieve ourselves and we'd defecate on the floor, we'd urinate on the floor, and sometimes we'd be ankle deep. Tho got released." Why the French let him out I don't know, and that's beside the point. But he said, "After Tho got out, he got me released." Big Minh had been a first lieutenant in the French colonial army at the time the Japanese came in and he took off. So the French were holding him for desertion. But they never did try him, to the best of my knowledge. I think he feared them.

So these people that we were working with had held jobs as lieutenants or captains, at the most, in the French colonial army, but in which they were never allowed to do anything of any importance.

Now we'll take another incident, that of Tran Van Don, who was Ty's chief of staff when I was there, and was also an intimate friend of Big Minh. Don served in the French army, not the colonial army, but the French army in World War II, as he was a Frenchman. His father was a doctor and had gone from Vietnam to France and the family was there when Don was born. So Don was a Frenchman by nationality. World War II came on. Don went into the army. He was commissioned in the French regular army, not the colonial. I said, "Well, Don, did any of these race problems ever come up at different times?" He said, "Well, no, not exactly. But this would happen if my company commander, who would be a Frenchman, happened to go someplace and I would be the senior lieutenant, something would happen, and a French lieutenant would come and take command and I would be sent somewhere else until the regular company commander came back." So that's the way they were treating these people.

You've asked questions in here about Diem and his officers. Now, we'll take the man by the name of [Mai Huu] Xuan, X-U-A-N. Diem told me on one occasion he didn't trust him. He was either brigadier or major general at that time. I said, "Why?" He said, "Because he was once in the French army intelligence. Any man who was ever once in the French army intelligence is always in the French army intelligence up until the day he dies. And so that man is still under obligation to the French army intelligence. That's why I don't trust him as a general in the Vietnamese army." Much later this was the man in charge of Diem and his brother when Diem was murdered.

Q: Was this a common problem, this divided allegiance of officers?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Most of those people had dual citizenship and had dual passports.

Now we'll take an occasion when the French were turning over to us their excess property that they didn't want, we'd find that in each one of these warehouses or depots, there would be a Vietnamese officer as second-in-command. The French would turn over this material and we'd go in there to look at it, see what they had turned in and try to invoice it as we didn't know what was there. We'd find property in the most terrible condition. Boxes of spare parts broken open, and the paperwork inside the box listing contents, spare parts for an M-16 or spare parts for an M-1 or whatnot, they'd be gone. I'd say to this Vietnamese, second in command, "Well, you've been working here, you've been assigned to this depot for how long?" Such and such. "Well, why does this mess occur? Where are the records? And those officers would invariably say, and I believed them, because I heard it so many times, "I had nothing to do. I was not allowed to do anything. Sure, I was carried here as a deputy for this depot. I don't know what's in this depot, what comes in or what goes out, because I was never allowed to do anything or see anything. But the French could always say, "I have a Vietnamese deputy here."

Now it comes back to advisors again, which we worked out by getting these U.S. training teams out. If I went into a storehouse or warehouse that covers hundreds of square feet of storage I find there's crate after crate of spare parts, for weapons, rifles, machine guns, automatic rifles, mortars or anything else. The boxes have been torn open, the stuff not necessarily spilled out on the floor, but sometimes out on the floor. I'd look at that, and well, hell, ninety-nine times out of a hundred I could look at it and I'd say, "I don't know whether this comes out of a Browning automatic rifle or whether it came out of an M-1 rifle." Because I didn't know enough about spare parts. The Vietnamese didn't know anything about spare parts. I was trying to get trained ordnance people from the States to come over there and try to sort this stuff out. Otherwise it was just going to waste as junk. I couldn't get it done. Now the Secretary of the Army, Mr. [Wilber M.] Brucker, was with me a hundred per cent, but he couldn't get it done.

Now we had a place there we called the Acre of Diamonds. The French had come in and dumped equipment there. The first time I heard about the Acre of Diamonds I immediately went there and looked. The French were bringing in surplus material and dumping it. I saw Cadillac engines that never had an ounce of gasoline burned through them, sitting in the mud, halfway sunk in the mud. Things of that nature, artillery pieces, anything you could possibly imagine, bulldozers, trucks, just driven into this, what we called the Acre of Diamonds, and left there in the mud and the weather. Well, I tell you what it eventually came to, eventually we just had to salvage the whole damn business. When we finally got some technical people in there, ordnance and engineers and so forth, they said, "Well, it's hopeless, you might as well just bury the whole damn lot and let it go." But we didn't bury it. We let it sit there so that when congressmen and senators would come over on visits we'd say, "All right, here is what we found. Here is what the situation was. That's what we've got."

So there was one problem. Vietnamese officer and the noncommissioned officers had seldom been allowed to do anything. They had never been given command. The French had gone so far as to organize what they called light infantry Vietnamese battalions to fight the North Vietnamese, and their comment was, "We formed these light battalions to throw them in against the North Vietnamese. We let the North Vietnamese and the South Vietnamese get out there and wallow in the mud with each other. What happens, we don't give a damn." Now a smart Vietnamese officer, one that's really been through the French schools in France could see what was happening to them. Now for instance, along about the time of Dien Bien Phu in that time period--one of them told me this one time when I was watching a division maneuver exercise. I saw these people, the regimental commanders and battalions commanders, seemed apprehensive and were always looking over their shoulder, and so I had conversations with a senior officer through my interpreter. The last fight that several of those officers had been into was like this.

They had been on a campaign up north with the French and the French were of course quite strong, they had a division or so, or several regiments. They took this one Vietnamese regiment, and said, "We're going to attack. You're going to lead out. You're going to lead the attack. We're right behind you with a French regiment here and a French regiment there and when we get going right, we're coming in here and going in there to support you." And the senior officer said,

"We'd started the attack and got going good and looked around to wait for the French to come up on our right and left, but they started a withdrawal action at the same time they ordered us to attack. That left us alone and we were defeated badly." Now they'd tell me stories like that. So they didn't trust anyone, and it took a great deal of living with and association with the Vietnamese to get them to change over and have some semblance of confidence with the Americans that they were working with. At first they just didn't trust anyone at all. Finally the military began to accept MAAG as good friends and cooperated. Well, I could talk about that for ages, but I don't think that's what you want.

Q: Well, what were you getting the Vietnamese army ready for? What was the prime threat as you analyzed it in those early days?

WILLIAMS: When I had my last conversation in the Pentagon with the Chief of Staff of the army, or his staff, they told me that there was an agreement, presumed agreement, that general free elections would be held in Vietnam, North and South Vietnam, one year after the signing of the Geneva accords, and I believe without going back, but somewhere in my mind the Geneva accords were signed in June or July. If the elections were not held, then North Vietnam was going to attack and conquer South Vietnam. They said, "Now, we don't believe that President Diem is going to agree to general elections." Well, they were right, he wouldn't agree. So, the thing uppermost in my mind when I got there in October was that I had until next July to get something up on the [17th] Parallel to withstand an attack in July of 1956.

That was my primary purpose, to get something up there and get them in some kind of shape, and I believed that so strongly that--although I didn't have the authority to command, I just went up there. I think the 1st Vietnamese Division was in that area at that time. I went up there and lived with that division commander for about a week before I thought the attack was going to be made and stayed up there for about an extra week, so that I could be there and be of any assistance I could with those people in case the attack came. So that's what I had in mind when I went in there in 1955, that we were going to fight a North Korean type of invasion in July of 1956. As a matter of fact, I thought that for at least two years. I thought each year that this was going to be next thing to come.

Q: Were the sects still much of a problem when you arrived in South Vietnam?

WILLIAMS: Yes. To a degree.

Q: The Bao Dai--

WILLIAMS: They were.

Q: --or the Hoa Hao, I mean.

WILLIAMS: Yes, they were, but not both at the same time. When one sect would be up in arms, the others would seem to be taking it easy. In other words, as I remember it, they never did fight all at one time. Incidentally this man Big Minh I spoke of a while ago, had gotten a semblance of fame and notoriety there, before I arrived. He had taken some Vietnamese troops and cleaned out some of those sects from around Saigon. Not only did Lansdale tell me this, but Mike O'Daniel told me that when Big Minh almost had the sects where he was going to destroy them completely, the French moved some troops in between the Vietnamese and the sects. The Vietnamese decided they were going to call the battle off because if they didn't call it off they'd have to fight through the French troops to get to the sects.

Q: Was that the Binh Xuyen, or do you remember that?

WILLIAMS: I don't remember. It was down in the south, below Saigon. You see, the French had us, in many ways, because among other troops that they had, they had some Foreign Legionnaires, some of the best-looking soldiers you ever saw in your life. Any time I went to French headquarters there would always be one of those Legionnaires or two of them on guard at the door. I used to talk to them. I couldn't speak German, but I made a pass at it.

Q: Were they mostly Germans?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Almost 90 percent. With those French Legionnaires, the French could do anything they wanted to. I never had any close contact with any French soldiers in Vietnam, only French officers. The only French soldiers I ever came in contact with were Foreign Legionnaires. They had a Moroccan band with them. One time I said to General Jacquot, the commander-in-chief of Indochina, Indochine they called it, "I want to give your bandmaster some cigars." He said, "That's fine." So the next time I went to his headquarters, I took a box of cigars and I gave them to the bandmaster and I told him to pass them around among those bandmen and he did. Jacquot was over on the veranda watching me. He said, I thought you wanted to give the bandmaster a cigar." I said, "Well, you know damn well I wouldn't be cheap enough to come over here with one cigar." Without a doubt Jacquot didn't like it because I gave his bandmen cigars.

But, as a result of that, I send an aide-de-camp, an officer by the name of Jack [John M.] Shultz that now lives in Austin, over there with my tape recorder and got the bandmaster to record some of their Moroccan music. That tape right there on my shelf, "Foreign Legion Bands, 1956," about one half a reel, ends about graduation number thirty.

Well, I don't know how we got on the subject of the Foreign Legion, but anyhow, for example, [G. Frederick] Reinhardt--Ambassador Reinhardt. Ambassador Reinhardt, who was ambassador when I got there. He phoned me up one morning, he said, "There are tanks rolling down behind my house going down to the river and being loaded on ships. Why don't you stop them?" I said, "Jacquot has got the bayonets, I haven't any troops." Well, it suddenly dawned on him that the man with the bayonets, by God, was the one who controlled. A lot of people don't realize that, that you get into a situation that way, any diplomacy goes to hell. The man who's got the soldiers and the bayonets is going to do what he wants to until he gets tired or until the bureaucracy can get around to making protests. But that quite surprised him. I told him, "You can't keep those people from loading on anything here that they want to take to France."

Mr. [John Foster] Dulles came to Saigon. He was coming up from Australia I remember and he sent me a wire, or sent me a cable before he got there, "Give me an invoice of American property issued to the French during such-and-such a period." Well, that was for three or four years, since 1954 certainly. I had no such records. Mike O'Daniel had no such records. I immediately went to Washington with a TWX and said, "Mr. Dulles is coming here, going to be here at such-and-such a time and he wants an invoice of the property the U.S. furnished the French. Will you send it immediately?" I got a reply back that said, "There's no such record in Washington. All we can do is give you the dollar amounts."

Anyway, when Mr. Dulles came in, I reported to him: "You asked for an invoice of property that we had furnished the French. We have no such invoice as that. Neither do your friends back in Washington have such a thing as that. Further, I can tell you right now that the French are stealing us blind here in this place. They're taking out equipment that they have no authority to take out, and I have no means to stop them." He said, "What did you expect? Of course, they're going to steal you blind. They're going to take anything they can get their hands on. They have ships to haul it with. They're going to do it."

I sent a message back to Washington that the French were taking out more than they were supposed to. In other words, a decision had been made, between Washington and Paris that when the French forces evacuated South Vietnam that they would take out a certain amount of equipment and no more. In other words, they would take out a full TO & E [table of organization and equipment] for all the troops they had in Vietnam. I reported, "They're taking out much, much more than they have TO in troops here." They came back from Washington to me and said, "That's impossible. The French wouldn't break an agreement in that manner."

Several months later, after they had completely evacuated, the chief of MAAG in France sent a message to me as the chief of MAAG in Vietnam, "The warehouses here are full of equipment, military equipment from South Vietnam. Where are the records and how do I pick the equipment up on the French records here?" I send him back a message--I knew this officer although I don't remember now who it was--I replied, "That's impossible, because Washington told me the French wouldn't do a thing like that." But I also sent both messages back to Washington and said, "Here are the warehouses"--Jacquot had boasted in the French newspapers that his warehouses were bulging with equipment that he had brought from South Vietnam--"Here is property theft that I told you about some time ago that you said was not happening at all." I heard not another word from anyone about it. Well, there's nothing anyone could have done about it at that date. It was an accomplished fact.

Q: Let me ask you what your first impressions of President Diem were?

WILLIAMS: I don't remember my very first impressions. I don't remember. He was a very small man in stature. I say very small, I imagine Diem might have been five foot, one or two [inches], maybe not that tall, and inclined to be stout, portly. Always well dressed. That is, to this extent, he had an affinity for white sharkskin suits, he always wore a collar and tie, and his shoes were polished, his hands, nails and teeth were clean. His hair always well combed, his face hairless. He was a great talker. It was not unusual for him to have me sit down beside of him, and talk to me for one or two hours without ever stopping for a breath. His office was spartan as was his bedroom. An army cot, table and two chairs. Our conferences presented a problem that I was able to solve to a degree. I was able to get, at various times, different American officers who could speak French and at the same time someone who had enough military knowledge to know what we talked about and enough economic and political knowledge so what was said wasn't foreign to them. They would sit there, and every once in a while--initially I'd say, "Mr. President, stop just a minute," and then I'd tell this man to tell me what the President was saying.

Then after I got to know him better, or he got to know me better, I suggested, "This is not going as well as it should because my memory is not as good as yours and I can't remember everything that you tell me here and all the problems we discuss. I've got a good interpreter, and I have him interrupt us occasionally, Why not just let him take notes and there will be no interruption, and then when we get back to my office we'll put his notes into a draft that I can read, so that I can know exactly all that was said." And he bought that.

Consequently, thereafter that was the method of operation. When I would get back to my headquarters and before the interpreter was able to get something on his mind that would divert his thought to something else, I had him sit down in my office and with the notes he had write out in longhand his concept of what had been said during the last two or three hours. I'm not exaggerating when I say two or three hours, because that was not uncommon. The same time he was doing that I was sitting there at my desk writing my version. In those days I had an excellent memory. We'd get through, he'd hand me his version and I'd take it and thank him and he'd go his way, and I'd take his draft and compare it to mine and I'd come up with what I thought was a reliable record of what had transpired. I became a great admirer of President Diem. I thought he was doing a wonderful job. He was simply outstanding and well informed. But I was in the minority as far as some local Americans were concerned.

Q: I want to come to that a little later down the line, because I think you can speak to that point very well, and I have some questions I wanted to introduce along that line just a little further. Do you remember any of the other young officers who became so prominent later on? Do you ever encounter people like [Nguyen] Khanh, for example, who took over I think sometime around December of 1963 after the coup in which Diem was assassinated.

WILLIAMS: I read part of something right here. We've been cleaning up my office here the last few days and I unearthed something here. Now you take a look at those papers and talk about Vietnamese officers. Now I don't have the file at my fingertips now, but before I left Vietnam I had compiled a roster of the Vietnamese military officers, the senior officers or officers that had key positions, and either written a brief about those officers, each one of them individually, or had the American officer that was most closely associated with him write a detailed brief of him. So I had a dossier on every officer that I thought outstanding in the Vietnamese forces, and as I recall I furnished a copy of that file to CINCPAC, and I kept a copy myself. I don't know where my copy is. I'm almost positive that I gave it to the U.S. Army Historical Section. But at that time, which was twenty-one years ago, I knew practically all these people and knew very closely where they came from and what they did, what their idiosyncracies were and how good they were or how bad they were.

I remember that when [Nguyen Van] Thieu became president that I referred back to that file--at that time it was on the shelf right over there in that corner--and the notation I made on Thieu, who I knew as a lieutenant colonel or colonel on the Headquarters Army Staff there in Saigon, I had stated, "This is the most efficient Vietnamese officer that I have met in Vietnam, and one that will probably go the highest." And by God, he did, he became president.

Q: So you were not surprised?

WILLIAMS: I was not surprised, no. I didn't think Big Minh would ever become president, although later I think he wanted to be. I didn't think he would, because he was too lazy and he wouldn't take responsibility. I thought possibly Don would go high, Tran Van Don, but I wasn't too sure. But Thieu, when I knew him was a staff officer on the Vietnamese general staff. I thought [he] was the smartest and most intelligent man I had ever come in contact with in Vietnam, Diem excepted of course.

Now there was one man that was pushing him very closely and his name was [Le Van] Kim. Kim was a French citizen and was married to General Don's sister and had been an officer in the French regular army. When I wanted to get the [Vietnamese] military academy on its feet and going, Kim was the man I picked to do that job. At that time he was a colonel or a brigadier, I forget which. Did that answer your question?

Q: Yes, Sir, that's exactly the kind of thing I was looking for. Do you remember [Nguyen Cao] Ky, or was he still a youngster?

WILLIAMS: I knew Ky, but not too well. He was a captain and an aviator. I'm not too sure that I ever had any conversations with Ky, but I saw him frequently because on occasions I went out to the headquarters of the paratroop brigade, the outfit that tried to pull a coup in November I think-

Q: Of 1960.

WILLIAMS: -of late in 1960, yes. Ky invariably would be going here to there or passing some place near, and I always recognized him because he had very dark hair and his moustache. At that time he didn't have the flamboyant dress that he later affected, but I asked who he was and I remember being told his name. But if I ever had any detailed conversation with him, I don't recall. He had aroused my interest.

Q: Now everybody, even Diem's enemies, credit him with being a scrupulously honest man. But were there problems with the corruption further down the line in the Vietnamese administration? Did you encounter problems this way?

WILLIAMS: I couldn't say that there was not. First of all, however I'll say that I would agree that Diem was scrupulously honest and had not only an honest, but I think a high moral character. How much corruption there was down the line I don't know, but I do know this, that on several occasions without any warning of any kind or anything of that nature, I would require American officers to appear at this pay table or that pay table when the Vietnamese were paying the troops. Or, with their interpreters, check records, and I never once found a Vietnamese officer who was padding his roster to draw additional pay. Now they were always after more pay, no doubt about that, and I had several hard conversations with Diem about the army being top heavy with noncoms. They were not noncoms, they were people carrying noncom ratings and drawing that extra pay. But I never found any corruption as far as the Vietnamese military were concerned although I was looking for it all the time. That's normal precaution.

Q: Did this apply to aid, their handling of American aid in those years as well?

WILLIAMS: To the best of my knowledge, yes.

Q: Were you satisfied that we were able to keep track of how they administered the aid that we were giving?

WILLIAMS: The military aid, yes. Other aid that went through USOM [United States Operation Mission] no, I have no idea.

Q: You have no acquaintance with that end of it?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: The military aid, that was okay?

WILLIAMS: Yes, absolutely.

Q: What struck you as the problems that were bothering Diem the most at this time? What seemed to be on his mind?

WILLIAMS: He was just trying to build a country. Some thought he was working on a foundation of sand, and I think he knew it. He had a terrible time, I think, deciding who he could trust and who he could not trust. He placed great trust in me. Probably more than any other foreigner. Being a Vietnamese, of course, he was a very strong family man, and that's the reason he relied so much on his brothers, because they were family and he thought he could trust them. But I'm sure that he was never sure whether he could trust anyone else or not. I'm not talking about his military so much now, I'm talking about the different things he would try to do in the legislature with his land reforms and his taxes and things of that nature.

Q: Did you have much familiarity with those programs?

WILLIAMS: Yes.

Q: They've come in for a lot of criticism after the fact. What was the problem with land reform as you could see it?

WILLIAMS: There was no problem, no problem at least to my mind there should have been no problem. First of all, a lot of those people over there--not a lot of them, but several of them owned large acreage, thousands of acres. We mentioned Tran Van Don here. His father was a doctor and had been an ambassador here, there and yonder, highly respected, a highly educated man. He owned thousands of acres down in the Delta. One of Diem's reforms was that no person could own more than a certain number of hectares, and I think it averaged down to no one could own more than two hundred or maybe two hundred and fifty acres of land. So that immediately threw the big landowners against him. Now the government didn't confiscate that land, but they decided what the fair value was and that's what the owner was paid and that was it. Then the government turned around and sold this land or gave it to the peasants. Thus many were no longer sharecroppers but small landowners. Well, you know, if you tried that right here in the United States you see what you would run into. Say someone is going to decide to break up Lyndon B. Johnson's or other ranch holdings over here, and then say one can have two hundred acres and no more. Well, you know what that would raise. Well, that same thing happened over there. The land barons were being divided [?].

He tried and did move people from unsettled and poor areas into more prosperous areas and built small towns. I thought he was doing a wonderful job. I thought if a man owned land he would fight to defend it. As a sharecropper he probably wouldn't.

Q: Was this what they called the relocation program?

WILLIAMS: That's right, yes. That was one name to it. Another one they called something with a ville on the end of it.

Q: Oh, agrovilles.

WILLIAMS: Agrovilles, yes. I thought that was wonderful, because not only were these people brought into small villages, but then they could go out from there to farm their nearby holdings, but the villages were arranged so that there was a certain amount of ground behind each house, maybe fifty feet wide. I'm guessing now, it makes no difference. Say it's fifty feet wide and a hundred feet long. Each house had a little garden right there. The American embassy objected to that. Why, I don't know. They never explained to me why they objected to it. They fought it tooth and nail.

I know that we had a discussion, Diem and I had a discussion on this one time, on people doing various work for the state. He said, "We're supposed to pay for this work with taxes. Some of the people can't pay taxes. What's your solution in the United States?" I said, "I don't know what the solution is in the United States now but when I was a boy in Denton, Texas, in Denton County in North Texas, when some taxes came due if a man couldn't pay his taxes, he took his team of mules or his team of horses and his wagon and he worked on county roads and he paid out his taxes that way. There was no discredit to the rancher or the farmer who did that. It was normal and hundreds of people did it, that's the way they paid their taxes." "Well," he said, "I think that's all right," so he started doing that over there. Well, Jesus Christ, you would be surprised at the uproar that went on in the American embassy.

Because Diem was allowing some of these people to work and therefore get credit for the tax, they were being made peons and slaves. Well, there was no slavery about it. And in those country team meetings I'd say, "Well, goodness gracious, they did that in Denton County, Texas when I was a boy and no one said anything about slavery then. I don't see anything wrong with it. It's honest work for an honest debt." Well, they said, "You don't do things like that anymore." And so that was it. Actually they were advocating welfare that the U.S. would pay for.

Well, I don't know what their solution was, that is Diem's solution, except that if the people couldn't pay taxes, then they had no one to pay for this labor and so the labor wasn't performed and so the agroville slowed to a halt. A Diem program was blocked again. Maybe the embassy wanted the U.S. to foot the bill. Maybe they were put out because they hadn't proposed the project themselves.

Now there were all kinds of arguments like that coming up and it really got to be very bad, very bad.

Q: You mentioned the relocation program, and I'm a little puzzled. Was that supposed to be a social reform or were there military implications to that? Exactly what was Diem trying to do?

WILLIAMS: It was largely social.

Q: It was?

WILLIAMS: Agricultural.

Q: Now I'm speaking of the Highlands. Didn't he move some people into the Highlands?

WILLIAMS: Yes, he put some people up there, but I don't say that was necessarily military. I was quite in favor of it, because in that country there you had a series of tribes that are generally called Montagnards [tribes] or Moi. That's the [Vietnamese] word for savage. They weren't savage. They were not--oh, they might have been on the same life standards as American blanket Indian back in say 1800s or something like that, but I visited among them time and time again. They were very primitive. The women, oddly enough, wore skirts, but from the waist up they were completely naked. But the men wore jackets, but from the waist down, except for a jock strap, they were naked, reversed that way. No one seemed to think anything of it. They were migratory. They would go into an area and cut down the brush and the trees and plant their crop. Some of them were very industrious, and near some of their villages there would be any number of what back here in Texas you'd call a corn crib. They had their produce stored up in those cribs. Now when they got ready to move they'd go to another place and first of all, after they cleared off as much brush as they wanted to, they burned the rest. I asked them why, and they said, "That's the way we get our fertilizer." I could communicate that much with them to find out what the hell they were burning this brush for. Well, to make the ground more fertile. Simple.

I was very strong for Diem putting as many people up on the borders as possible, because what I really wanted was a string of listening posts. I wanted a string of listening posts all up the Cambodia border and all the way up to Laos and on up to North Vietnam. I remember one time that I had that plan fixed up on a map for benefit of one of our officers that came down from CINCPAC, one of our admirals. When he looked at that he said, "Hell, you're building a Maginot Line." I said, "Look at the scale of that map. Those outposts are thirty miles apart." Too few Americans knew anything about Vietnam, the country or its people.

Q: Were there any problems with that relocation program?

WILLIAMS: Yes, they had a lot of problems. Just exactly what the magnitude of the difficulties were [I don't know], but very few of those plans worked out completely because first of all, he had to fight the landlords. Then he had to fight the Americans and God knows what other political people that might be involved.

Q: What Americans were against it?

WILLIAMS: The American embassy, representing the United States State Department as far as I could guess.

Q: What was their objection?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. They never did explain to me. Why not let a man work out his taxes with his [labor] in one of those agrovilles? What's their objection? I don't know. You'll have to ask some liberal, bureaucratic character who thought welfare better than work.

Q: Sounds like someone is not communicating.

WILLIAMS: That's right. There's no doubt about it. Or they suddenly say, that's slavery. I've heard people here in the U.S.--years ago--say when a person went down to one of those labor halls, they'd speak of going down to the slave centers. Why teach a people that welfare is better than honest work?

Q: In line with what we've said about the relocation program, did Diem ever express to you any concern about the long frontier that he had with Cambodia and Laos?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. He was quite aware of that, and I was, too. That bothered him. I might bring in at this time--although it might be touched on later--but I brought up the question of hot pursuit. We were having so much trouble--I keep saying we, because it was as much MAAG's problem as it was a Vietnamese problem--with Cambodia. They would come over the border and raid these Vietnamese villages. I know they did because I could go and visit the villages after the attacks.

Q: These were Cambodian troops?

WILLIAMS: Yes, or as far as I know just outlaws, because by the time I could get there they were gone. There would be a fight, a short little fire fight. They'd attack these villages, burn up what they could, shoot up this and that and the other and then jump back across the border real fast. I suggested to Diem that he have an arrangement with Prince [Norodom] Sihanouk of Cambodia for the privilege of hot pursuit. Well, Diem didn't know what the term hot pursuit was, and I used as an example the agreements between the United States and Mexico, which led eventually to General Jack Pershing going across the border looking for Pancho Villa. I said, "We would never have accomplished that if Mexico hadn't given us the privilege of going in there when we were hot on a bandit's trail. Of course if the Mexicans were hot on a bandit's trail they could come into New Mexico, Texas or wherever they wanted to. But usually it was the other way around, and it ended up with Jack Pershing going into Mexico." He said, "We can't do that with the Cambodians because I've discussed a plan of that nature with Sihanouk, and he won't have anything to do with it."

He said, "You know, there's a great rivalry between the Cambodians--hostility, too--and the Vietnamese," and he told me something about history that I didn't know. Later I read and studied it. But in years gone by--and I'm talking about plenty of years gone by--the Vietnamese conquered Cambodia and exacted tribute from them. They kept an occupation force in Phnom Penh for years, maybe fifty, a hundred years, something like that. And the Cambodians became so used to it--this was Diem's statement--that eventually the only Vietnamese that stayed there were not troops, but merely the Vietnamese agent, this day and time you'd call him ambassador. The Cambodians paid him tribute each year and he sent it over to Vietnam. He said, "That's the hostile relationship between Vietnam and Cambodia. I haven't been able to improve that relationship although I have tried."

Now with Laos it was something else. I found here the other day a paper that is a proposed agreement with Laos for hot pursuit, and I think I wrote it, but I'm not sure. By anyway, it was one of the things that Diem and I discussed. He was very much in favor of one member of the royalty in Laos. They had a royal family in Laos, and there were arguments between members of that family. He favored a certain part of that family, a certain branch of that family. And actually, a prince came down to Saigon one time and I was invited to the Palace to meet him. I was amazed when I met him because I'll bet you that man stood six-six if he stood an inch, and weighed about two hundred and fifty or two hundred and seventy-five pounds. When you remember that most Vietnamese and Laotians are people that stretch it to weigh a hundred to a hundred and ten pounds, you can see. But anyway, Diem was very knowledgeable of that border and worked with me in many ways in trying to secure it. I thought so much about it that one time I got in the group with Reinhardt and a couple more people and made necessary hunting arrangements. Got on elephants and went up and rode that Cambodian and Laotian border an awful long ways under the guise of hunting. Reinhardt wasn't under the guise, he was actually hunting. I was under the guise of hunting. I went up there to see what the terrain, trails and streams were like. I had a good plan prepared that comes into road building. I wanted a road that would go from the east coast across Vietnam, across Laos, into Thailand and on down to Bangkok. I wanted a good highway through there so that if and when we started fighting that we would have this lateral behind us for supply purposes. But I was blocked on that. Diem was blocked on that. Laos agreed.

Q: What was the objection to that?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. Diem was for it, the Vietnamese were for it, MAAG was for it. USOM and the embassy were against it. Some of the roads that--well, they wouldn't come out and say, "We're not going to do this." But they'd volunteer to take over certain sections of the roads to build. They were going to do that with USOM funds. They'd never get their sections done. They'd never do it. Finally I'd go in there in desperation and try to finish the job myself with army engineers, that is, Vietnamese army engineers. From the day I went out there until the day I left, I thought we might have to fight, and I thought we could fight and win but I didn't think we would need American infantry to do it. Some U.S. Air Force and some U.S. Navy, maybe.

Q: In connection with this security problem down along the border, did the Vietnamese attempt to enlist the Montagnards who were already sparsely up in that area?

WILLIAMS: Yes. But the Vietnamese military told me they couldn't rely on the Montagnards, and I could understand that because the Montagnards couldn't rely on the Vietnamese. I remember General Ty, the chief of staff, told me, "They can't stand artillery fire." "Well," I said, "you know, I think that's particularly unusual because you've got one company in the Vietnamese army that's made up entirely of Montagnards and that's a trench mortar company." They call them trench mortar, I'd call them 4.2's or 81's. I don't think General Ty ever knew that he had such a company.

The French considered those people savages and that's where they got their name. Diem said that the French priests, Catholic priests, were preaching sedition among them and he issued an edict there at one time that no French Catholic priest nor American minister of any kind could go into the Montagnard area without specific passports from the secretary of defense. The Americans were sending over large amounts at different times of material for destitute people, mostly clothing and things of that nature. That project was handled by church people, not by MAAG. We had a few American protestant ministers over there, missionaries. And there were Catholic priests there. And they may have had some French Protestant preachers, I don't know. But the charity was under agreement. Church organizations assembled all the clothing, blankets, et cetera in warehouses in Saigon, and then because the French priests had penetrated the Highlands better than anyone else, they turned the disposition of it over to the French priests. Diem complained bitterly to me about that arrangement. He said, "The American people think that's going to the Montagnards and so forth as presents from American people. It's not. These priests are taking it in there and either saying so directly maybe, but the implication is that all this aid is coming from France. If you ask any Montagnard that's got on an American sweater or a coat, 'Where did you get this?' he'll say, 'From France.'" Diem said, "That's wrong. You ought to get that changed." I could not.

I took the matter up with the embassy but they weren't interested in it, and I had bigger problems and so I never did anything else about that other than to discuss it with a couple of American missionaries. The system did not change.

Q: Was there an ethnic problem between the Vietnamese people and the Montagnards? Was that part of it?

WILLIAMS: Yes, definitely. That whole country over there as I knew it was divided into classes. Some examples: One night at a lawn party at the French embassy, a hundred people present, men and women, Vietnamese and French and some Americans, I was standing off by myself when I saw a Vietnamese army officer nearby that I knew and knew he could speak a certain amount of English, and so I engaged him in conversation. I said, "You know it seems odd to me that everyone here is speaking French. I don't hear any Vietnamese spoken at all, and certainly a third of these people here are Vietnamese." "Well," he said, "you can't expect anyone here to speak Vietnamese. If one of these Frenchmen speaks Vietnamese, he loses face immediately in the eyes of other Frenchmen because he knows how to speak our language." I said, "You couldn't be serious." He said, "I'm very serious. It would not be popular for a Frenchman to be known as to be able to converse in Vietnamese."

One time I was talking to a Vietnamese general. I asked what some Vietnamese soldier had said in our presence. He took me to one side, he said, "General Williams, you know, I don't understand Vietnamese." I said, "You don't speak Vietnamese?" He said, "No, Sir. I was born and raised in France, and I was educated in France. I can't speak this language." I said, "Well, goddamn it, you're wearing stars in the Vietnamese army! Why don't you learn?" He said, "Yes, Sir." I doubt if he did.

I was driving with a Vietnamese general one time going to his corps headquarters. I was always trying to find some way to improve their mobility. We were accused by certain American writers of trying to make the Vietnamese army over into an American type army, where everything was done in trucks. Well, that charge was not true at all. They had a method of carrying food, water, soil, any load, in baskets. You very likely saw it yourself in your time over there. They'd put a loaded basket on one end of a pole and a loaded basket on the other end of the pole, put the pole on their shoulder and they'd go down the road with their load. Those little old women and men would go along there at almost a trot and they'd go like everything. They could cover distance. So I said to this general beside of me, "Is it easier to carry the same number of pounds of whatever you're carrying with two baskets on a pole, or to carry it some other way." He said, "I don't know." I said, "Surely you must have some idea." He looked at me and said, "General, I never had one of those poles on my shoulder in my life." In other words, "what the hell, do you think I'm a black goddamn nigger or something like that?" That was that officer's attitude.

Now, Diem decided that he wanted to get the Vietnamese of Saigon to know something about the Montagnards other than what they had known before so he decided to have a big reception and party. He invited any number of Montagnards down from the hills to an open outdoor banquet on the Palace grounds or what they called the Palace grounds. The Palace really was just a big building; it wasn't no more a palace than this house is a palace, but it was known as the Presidential Palace.

They had the food and drink all laid out on tables and he had a lot of guests present: French, Americans and so on and so forth, American military, French military, American civilians, French civilians, the diplomatic corps. Then the Montagnards arrived. They came through the big front gate of the Palace grounds. They dismounted from whatever vehicles that had been used to bring them down from the hills and they walked down past the Palace, down to where the banquet tables were laid out. What we'd call a big picnic where people would go up to tables and help themselves. They walked down through the party guests. They were dressed up, they thought, the best they could possibly be dressed up, and some of their costumes were rather picturesque. Of that whole damn group, French, American officers, American civilians, French civilians, Vietnamese civilians, there were only two men who stepped out and met those people or shook hands with them and said hello, and one of them was Ngo Dinh Diem and the other was Sam Williams. The local people stood around and stared at those mountain people like they were animals out of a zoo. I had visited most of the chiefs in their villages. Common courtesy required me to speak to them and I did.

The Montagnards were not that bad, I can assure you. I've gone up into their villages, I've also gone up in their villages with President Diem. I preferred to go with him more than anyone else, because he didn't mind going into the villages and talking with these people. If with a Vietnamese officer, he was liable to, hell, cuff one of them or something like that, arrogant as hell, because the mountain people were in their opinion much lower.

Now you ask about the ethnic divisions, there they were. Now here's one officer that says "I can't speak the Vietnamese language." Another officer says "I never had one of those carrying poles on my shoulder in my life." Then you see this at the reception for the whole group to Montagnards. Sure, it went straight through.

Q: The great distance between officer corps and everybody else.

WILLIAMS: Yes. European style. Now, here's where they started having trouble, almost having trouble. They had one division they called the Nung, N-U-N-G, Division, it was the 3rd. That division was recruited by the French several years before on the borders between North Vietnam and China. They were mountaineers and some of the best soldiers I ever saw. They moved them down to South Vietnam and the French positioned them, and they were in position when I got there. Going out of Saigon as though you were going north to Hanoi, shortly before you came to Cam Ranh Bay, that's where the Dung 1 position was.

A colonel, a Nung colonel, commanded that division and he had French-Vietnamese dual citizenship. Diem wanted him to take Vietnamese citizenship only but he wouldn't. I visited him frequently. I liked him, I liked his wife. They served an awful good table and the food hotter than you can buy in Austin or San Antonio. Oh, it would burn you up, but it was good. I said, "Why don't you take Vietnamese citizenship? What would it hurt?" He said, "The French have told me I would lose my pension. I'm almost ready to retire." There was his official reason. Renounce French citizenship and you lose your pension.

Diem and his people became nervous because of these Nungs. They wanted to infiltrate them. They decided that they would do it through the division signal company. So they sent in some enlisted men, Vietnamese enlisted men. Radio and telephone men, and assigned them to this Dung division signal company. Then they also sent in some Vietnamese officers who were top notch, as well as they had, signal officers, to run telephones, radio and so on and so forth.

Now one day in an inspection of some kind, one of these Vietnamese officers was going through this signal company, which was predominately Nung, and he slapped a Nung soldier for some reason which to him was perfectly all right, because officers had done it in the Vietnamese army, they had seen the French do it to their soldiers and their own. But boy, they had an awakening right there. The soldiers grabbed the Vietnamese lieutenant and those people know rough ways to treat a prisoner. They had out in those divisions cages. If you looked close enough you'd see these wire cages, just about the size of a good dog house. A man can't stand up, he can't lie down, he can't sit down, nothing. They're made out of barbed wire. So when I got wind of this thing, they already had this Vietnamese lieutenant in one of these barbed wire cages and then had turned the whole thing over to the commanding colonel of the Nung division.

Diem said, "They haven't had discipline." I said, "Wait just a minute. They've got plenty of discipline. Your officers have got to stop, your officers have got to stop slapping people. You can't do that at all." He said, "I agree." I said, "All right. That Vietnamese officer slapped a Nung soldier standing in ranks. In the American army an officer cannot hit a soldier. Nor can a soldier hit an officer, because if either one of them should do that, the other one is going to be in an awful jam. That's the only way you can work this military business and you've got to teach your people, and make your people believe that." Well, Diem didn't argue with that, he agreed, but what could he do? You can't change customs like that in one generation; it's going to take some time to change things of that nature. However he did stop use of rickshaws overnight. It was degrading for a human to pull a rickshaw. Yes, they had ethnic problems

Q: How did that relocation program finally work out, or was it still going on when you left?

WILLIAMS: It was going on when I left.

Q: Continuing problems with it?

WILLIAMS: Same thing. I don't think they ever found a solution. They weren't getting adequate support. The Vietnamese were going to have to have some financial support from USOM, even if it was no more than--well, I don't know enough about that to talk to--maybe--no more than seed rice for planting their crops or something of that nature.

Q: But you attribute the problem to lack of support primarily?

WILLIAMS: Yes. American economic support.

Q: Let's deal with what was primarily your bailiwick over there, the Vietnamese military organizations. I presume you had a good deal to do with their training and so on. Did Diem distinguish between an external and an internal threat to security at that time? Or did you?

WILLIAMS: I don't know whether he did or not. Now if I understand, when you say internal threat, you mean an uprising of Viet Cong, for example?

Q: I don't mean to look at it through the glasses that we're wearing now, because we know what happened later on. But there was organizations formed early to keep security internally. Like the Civil Guard, for example. What was the Civil Guard and the Self-Defense Corps supposed to do? What was their role?

WILLIAMS: The Civil Guard in theory roughly could be compared to the National Guard in the United States. The Self-Defense Force was maybe what you'd call state militia. There's a difference. Neither of them were functional because they didn't have the leadership nor the means to function. They didn't have the training, they didn't have anyone to direct their training. They were not a MAAG problem because MAAG was told repeatedly by the embassy to keep hands off completely in the Defense Corps and the Civil Guard organizations' equipment and training.

Q: Well, whose problem were they?

WILLIAMS: USOM. USOM sent back to the States and had police people, University of Michigan I believe, but I'm not sure, come over and they were supposed to train them.

Q: Michigan State in fact.

WILLIAMS: I remember distinctly that--well, as an individual and as chief of MAAG I had quite a bit of argument repeatedly about the Civil Guard and Self-Defense Corps, very serious. Because--well, primarily: the Civil Guard was untrained, Self-Defense Corps was untrained. Their weapons were no good. Some of them were carrying old French rifles that the Vietnamese called fishing poles. I've picked them up and had them fall apart in my hands, actually physically had rifles fall apart in my hands when I'd take them from a man, take them up like that to inspect them. They'd put a detachment, say a platoon, what we'd call a platoon, out to guard a bridge or something of that nature.

Q: Let me interrupt you just a second, General. Who were they guarding it from?

WILLIAMS: Any outlaws or anyone--actually, what they were doing mostly was giving them jobs, I thought. But there was a certain amount of outlaws there and what they call Viet Cong gangs and so forth that would try to disturb things. Of course the Vietnamese guards would move in around this bridge with their wives and children and they'd set up their little hooches and things like that. Now, we'll say that twenty, thirty of them were there, of the Civil Guard or the Self-Defense Corps. This would happen for instance. Maybe half a dozen hard-core Viet Cong would come to a nearby Village and demand, "All right, everybody out." They'd get them out, they'd form up. "Now we're going to march up such-and-such a place and you're going to holler and yell." So they would, Viet Cong in front. Now these poor bastards guarding this bridge for instance, we'll just take that as a hypothetical situation, here is this multitude in the dark. The leading Viet Cong comes up and demands: "We're here. We've got so many fighters. We can surround you in a minute. It's either life or death. Surrender immediately or you've had it." And they had all this shouting and so forth. These poor people in these hooches at this bridge, they hear maybe two hundred people back here shouting and yelling. They have no discipline, they have no weapons that's worth fighting with and so forth, they see themselves as heavily outnumbered and they give up.

Okay. Now where does MAAG enter into that? I say when that happens, it causes the people to lose confidence in the government, because the government had put the people there to guard a bridge and they can't guard that bridge from a half a dozen Viet Cong, although the government had maybe forty or fifty men there. So any time that happens it weakens the government that much. I don't want the government to be weakened. I want these Civil Guards and Self-Defense Corps to be so strong and so well trained that they can fight and resist anything like that. And if they fight the half a dozen Viet Cong are going to fade back into the brush. That briefly was my interest in the problem. Now, those discussions became serious and heated.

Q: At what point was this beginning to become a problem? Was this a problem right from the earliest days?

WILLIAMS: I'd say by 1957.

Q: That early?

WILLIAMS: When did Mr. [Elbridge] Durbrow come over? He came over in April of 1957. Well, it was during his regime that most of this started and became progressively worse.

USOM brought a man over to Saigon and he appeared at a country team meeting one time. You're familiar with the country team? That's a group made up of the heads of the various sections: the head of the USOM, the head of USIA, and the head of MAAG and the ambassador and so forth. I was introduced to this man as Chief so-and-so and he said his job was or was introduced to me as the man who was training the Civil Guard and police, a dual job, in South Vietnam. He seemed like a nice sort of fellow, maybe in his fifties, and friendly. I said, "You've been in police work a long time?" He said, "Yes, I have," and I think he told me he'd been in the police business ten or fifteen years. I said, "They call you chief. Were you chief of police?" He said, "Yes, Sir." I said, "Where?" He said, "Detroit." Well, that made quite an impression on me because the ex-chief of police of Detroit must be a pretty reliable man. Now it wasn't till a long time after I found out there's more than one Detroit in the United States, and he wasn't from the Detroit, Michigan that I knew about. Now that man was flying under false colors with me.

I wanted USOM to arm the Civil Guard with decent weapons. This Chief said, "They don't need any more arms. The only thing we need is one revolver per man. These people will be taught marksmanship to such an extent that every time a shot is fired an outlaw drops dead." Now this was a serious discussion, just like we're having here now. I asked, "Were you in any gunfights when you were chief of police of Detroit?" He said, "No, Sir, I never had to draw my gun." I should have wised up right then. I said, "Have you been in any gunfights since you've been in South Vietnam?" He said, "Why, no." I said, "Have you ever been out in the boondocks here, out in the countryside when the Vietnamese and the outlaws were shooting at each other?" "No, Sir." I said, "Well, if you're going down a road in your jeep and a half a dozen men from either side of the road start shooting at you with rifles or throwing grenades, are you going to be able to handle that situation with a six-shooter?" "My every shot will be a dead man." (Laughter) And you know, everyone on the country team believed that man. Everyone believed that man!

Q: Well, his concept of the Civil Guard was a police force.

WILLIAMS: Exactly. A city or village policeman.

Q: And your concept was more of a military.

WILLIAMS: That's right, that's right.

Q: Was that the heart of the-- WILLIAMS: That was the heart of the whole business. Now, these differences were no secret. The chief of staff of the American army knew of them. Mr. Brucker, who was secretary of the army, they knew about the problems. His deputy had come out there repeatedly, they all knew about this thing going on. One day someone told me, "There's two thousand Tommy guns in Japan--or Okinawa, it makes no difference--that have been declared surplus. You can get them free. Do you want them." They said, "All right, you've got them." And so eventually they shipped me two thousand Tommy guns, 45 caliber, the whole thing. Spare parts, magazines and a certain number of rounds, two or three thousand rounds per gun. Shipped those to me at Saigon. CINCPAC knew about this. I told CINCPAC I was going to issue these to the Civil Guard, and he directed: "Don't do it all at one time. Issue them in small groups and see that the people are trained to handle them before you turn them loose."

Q: Wouldn't USOM object to this?

WILLIAMS: Up until now they hadn't objected. When I asked the USOM director to request these weapons before I did, I said, "They're there. All you have to do is ask for them. They're your babies. You ask for them." He said, "I'm not sure we want the Civil Guard to have those weapons." Now that was his answer, and that's the last answer I ever got from him. So I said to myself, to hell with that, I haven't got time to play with that kind of a ball game. So I immediately asked for them myself and got them for free.

All right. Then I said to USOM, "We've got these weapons. Will you order in two hundred Civil Guard people at one time for one week's instruction under MAAG officers, to be instructed in the use of these Tommy guns?" He agreed, and he did. Now, as a precaution, I had a list made of the serial number of every one of those guns, because if something was going to come up about it or some captured they'd say, "All right, it was your fault." I'd say, "What's the number on that captured weapon?" Whether that would have done any good or not, I don't know.

So that way we distributed two thousand Tommy guns to the Civil Guard. Now after it was over, Mr. Durbrow, who at that time was the ambassador, took me to task. He said, "Why in the world did you issue those weapons to the Vietnamese?" Well, I said, "For a simple reason and you know why I did it. We've talked about this at the country team meetings, about these weapons being available. USOM was going to get them, they didn't get them, so I went and got them." He said, "Yes, but if we'd held it off, I could have held these up as a carrot to Diem, and then got some favor in return." Well, I said, "That's too late now. What we get in return is some efficiency out of the Civil Guard, maybe. Certainly not some personal favor."

Q: Did he ever say what he wanted out of Diem?

WILLIAMS: No, no, didn't. And I doubt if he had any particular thing in his mind. But I had interest in the Civil Guard, but up until the day I left there I never was able to get any decent training done in the Civil Guard nor any adequate training done in the Defense Corps. Now, some people have said much later, well, the Vietnamese didn't want good training or equipment because they were afraid for all these people to have decent weapons. That was not true. It certainly was not true as far as the secretary of defense was concerned, the Vietnamese secretary of defense, the secretary to the presidency, or Diem, or Mr. [Ngo Dinh] Nhu. None of those people offered any objection at all to the Civil Guard or the Defense Corps having individual weapons. In fact they wanted them. Also they wanted them under MAAG for training.

Q: Did any of the ARVN officers express an opinion on that?

WILLIAMS: No. Not on the Tommy guns. They expressed no adverse opinion on it. Of course, a lot of them said--not a lot of them, but it was hinted later, "Well, General, why didn't you give us those Tommy guns?" "Well," I said, "your TO & E doesn't call for them."

Q: The reason I ask is that one former USOM official has advanced the claim that Diem was creating a counterweight to disloyal army units with the Civil Guard.

WILLIAMS: I've heard that. I've heard that.

Q: Would you put any credence in that?

WILLIAMS: No. None whatsoever. Because the Civil Guard was in such a pitiful condition that even though the army was not at that time an A-1 army by any manner or means, the Civil Guard couldn't have offered any competition to them at all. By 1957 the army was making good progress.

Q: You have hinted several times that relations between Diem and USOM, or Diem and the Ambassador, were not everything they should have been. Is that correct?

WILLIAMS: That's my positive opinion, yes.

Q: Was that a constant or did that situation build?

WILLIAMS: I'd say it built.

Q: What was behind that?

WILLIAMS: I'm not too sure. When Mr. Reinhardt was ambassador, relationships all around were excellent, and within the country team they were excellent. But after Mr. Durbrow came, maybe we were all at fault to some extent. Friction developed. I was trying very hard and I thought it was in the United States' interest to get South Vietnam built up into a strong nation as fast as possible. I used to tell any Vietnamese who had any questions about it, "If you've been told by the French or others that we're just swapping hats, that the French left and Americans come in? That's not so. The quicker we can get this job done, the quicker we are going to get out." I made that remark before a Senate committee one time. One of those senators said, "Well, General, what you're trying to do is work yourself out of a job?" I said, "That's exactly what I'm trying to do."

Q: Were those the hearings in the summer of 1959, the [Albert] Colegrove business?

WILLIAMS: I think that was the Mansfield Committee. I'm sure it was.

Q: Some people have accused I guess the Self-Defense Corps, that was the Dan Ve, wasn't it, wasn't that called the Dan Ve?

WILLIAMS: I don't remember.

Q: I don't speak Vietnamese, so I'm on shaky ground--that they were often guilty of misbehaving in the villages, stealing~ducks or chickens or arrogant behavior or so forth. Was that a common thing or did it happen at all in your tenure, or did you hear of it at all?

WILLIAMS: I'm sure it must have happened, but right now I can't remember a single incident of that kind ever being brought to my attention.

Q: So it wasn't a problem so far as you knew?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Where was Diem getting leaders for all of these organizations?

WILLIAMS: I'd say he was having an awful hard time. He was scratching.

Q: Where did he get officers for the Civil Guard, for example?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. I know that the leaders of the Civil Guard, the commanding general of the Civil Guard, was normally an army officer.

Q: Did army officers take lesser slots in that as well?

WILLIAMS: Probably.

Q: The reason I'm asking is that once again, a former USOM official has said one of the problems with the army was that Diem was using army officers for lots of other things besides being in the army.

WILLIAMS: Oh, he did, there's no doubt about that. He used them for many things: overseeing construction work, overseeing the building of villages and overseeing the building of roads and things like that. We do it here in the United States to a degree. Most of it is done by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, as you know.

Which brings up another thing that I just happened to think about. We had to have an airfield at Tan Son Nhut. The airfield we had there was not big enough to even take care of the planes we were then using. We had a wonderful chance there to get a field, and I wanted a field that's not less than two thousand feet long.

Q: What was significant about two thousand yards?

WILLIAMS: I wanted it big enough for a four-engine bomber to come in and land on it. No one objected to that particularly. I don't think anyone thought about it. They didn't think, "what does General Williams want two thousand feet for, anyway?" But they argued about who they'd give the contract to. Okay, now I spoke about the army engineers a while ago. The American Navy takes on jobs like that, which I didn't know prior to that. So the American Navy sent out a couple of captains in civilian clothes, I guess they were naval engineers. They looked over the thing. And the United States Navy put in a bid for that job.

Q: How can they do that?

WILLIAMS: I don't know what the authority is; just like the Corps of Engineers can go down here and put in a bid, I guess for building a dam. But nevertheless, it was done. Now, that was a very good bid and I was very much in favor of it because I thought we could trust the American Navy to do the job we wanted done. Incidentally, along about that time I couldn't get any air force officer of any stature to back me up on my desire for a long landing strip.

Q: Why was that?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. Whether they didn't have the foresight to see that they were going to use bombers in there one day that would require that kind of runway or not, I don't know.

Q: Were they saying that what you had was adequate? Was that their position?

WILLIAMS: No, but they wanted me to agree to take something less. Well, anyway, when the discussion [arose] at the country team about that, the USOM director said, "Well, we can't have a bunch of sailors running around out there with their sailor suits and so forth. Why, the communists will know immediately that that is going to be for military purposes." I said, "Didn't these naval officers explain what they did?" "Well, I don't remember." I said, "If the Navy Engineers got the job, you're not going to see anyone in navy uniform around that place. Those officers you talked to were here in civilian clothes. The people that they employ, whether they're Americans or local labor, and they'll employ both, will be in civilian clothes. You can't tell that from any civilian project except it will be done better and you can depend on it." I don't know whether there was any hanky-panky in there or not, but the company that got the contract for that was not the United States Navy and it cost a hell of a lot more than the United States Navy bid on it. But those are the problems that I ran into.

Now for instance, we were building a highway from Saigon, going up north, and there were places on that highway that were going to be straight as an arrow. Now USOM was building this highway. It was not a military highway presumably. I said, "Now from this place here, certain kilometer, up to a certain kilometer, you've got a straight stretch. Let's make this highway four lanes from Saigon at least out that far or a little further, and let's put a little bit heavier base on that section." "What for? What do you want to do that for?" I said, "I want airplanes to be able to land on that. Did you ever hear about German planes landing on the autobahns in Germany during World War II?" "Ho. They did that?" You have an awful time convincing people if they're not informed about things. But that suggestion didn't work either. There was a good chance. I wasn't there after the war started, but all those airfields they had to build and those big things they did with the air force out there, lots of that could have been done beforehand, well beforehand, and certainly at much less cost than it was later. But you've got to work with people who have a little foresight to do things like that and to get things done.

Q: Did the South Vietnamese army suffer from losing too many officers to all these various and sundry projects that Diem had going on? Was the leadership diluted more than it should have been?

WILLIAMS: I doubt it.

Q: Speaking of officers, how did Diem select the top officers?

WILLIAMS: I don't know for sure. I think he took them more or less in order of the rank they had held in the French colonial army. He told me he selected Lieutenant General Ty as commander because he was the senior Vietnamese officer, a major I believe.

Q: There are allegations that he placed too much reliance on personal loyalty and not enough on efficiency. Did you ever make a recommendation for promotion and run into that problem?

WILLIAMS: Well, I can't deny that he put a great deal of faith in the personal loyalty, but I can't say that I could ever cite an instance in which he put a less efficient officer into assignment because he thought that officer was loyal to him and some other officer wasn't.

Q: So if this happened at all, it didn't happen during your time?

WILLIAMS: It could have happened in my time, but I don't believe it did. But you know, you can't tell, you can't tell what goes on in a man's mind.

Q: Did he consult you about high appointments in the ARVN?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. Oh, yes.

Q: Was your advice pretty well heeded, do you think?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Except in one instance I brought up here a while ago, in the case of General Xuan, X-U-A-N, I don't think I'm pronouncing that right. I suggested Xuan for such and such assignment and he said, "I haven't got complete trust." And you know he was right in that lack of trust because it turned out that he was the officer that Big Minh sent to Cholon to pick up President Diem and his brother and bring them back to his headquarters. They were executed en route. Xuan was head of that convoy. So Diem had been right all that time.

Q: They never have decided who pulled that trigger, have they? Did you know?

WILLIAMS: Oh, I think so, I think so. [Tram Van] Don says so in his book [Our Endless War Inside Vietnam]. There's no doubt in my mind who did it. However, I think that all of them were equally responsible regardless of who pulled the trigger. I think Big Minh ordered it, Don insists that he didn't know anything about it. There were about twelve of those officers in that coup and we know, they were being monitored by a CIA man by the name of [Lou] Conein. Conein has stated publicly in the United States that he was in constant communication with Ambassador [Henry Cabot] Lodge while the coup was going on, and advising Lodge what they were doing and what they were going to do, and so on and so forth.

Well, anyway, when Diem phoned in from Cholon into the headquarters and told them that he was ready to surrender, they promised him they'd send him out of the country. Big Minh sent Xuan, in command of the detail, to go get them and send an armored personnel carrier to bring them back. I don't know where the word came out, but Diem and his brother were suspicious when they came for them and locked them in the back of a personnel carrier instead of an automobile. Then initially the escort claimed they came to a railroad track and had to stop, and then that sometime while they were stopped some persons unbeknown got out of the convoy and went in there and killed President Diem and Mr. Nhu.

But that's not the true story at all in my mind. Xuan knew about the murder because Don states that when Xuan came back he was in the room with Big Minh when Xuan came in and reported: "The job is done," period. Don, thinking that they had the prisoners there, went out and over to another part of the compound where they were to fix up quarters for Diem and his brother, and when he came back he learned they were dead. The brother had been shot and cut up terribly, Diem had been shot and stabbed a couple of times, they were dead. There's no doubt in my mind about it but that Xuan knew of the murders and had honchoed the crime. I, from a personal point of view, held all of the generals that were present or members of the coup responsible for it.

Q: Well, they undoubtedly had agreed on what was going to happen.

WILLIAMS: I don't know if they did or not. Maybe Big Minh might have taken the murders on himself, but I doubt it, but whether he did or not, I say the others are responsible just as much as he is. Of course, his aide charged with the murders then committed suicide. Now whether he committed suicide or Big Minh had him killed, I don't know. They found him hanging in his cell. Of course, they had first locked him up and then they found him hanging in the cell. I would say it's highly probable that Big Minh had that done, maybe did it personally, as he was such a big, powerful man physically, maybe he wanted to be damn sure that this aide de camp didn't talk. I wouldn't put it past him at all. But anyway, as a result of that, I broke off all correspondence with the Vietnamese.

Q: We hear a lot of criticism after the fact that we were training the Vietnamese for the wrong war. I would like to ask you, was there any criticism at the time of the way we were training the South Vietnamese army?

WILLIAMS: While I was there, there was none except occasionally there would be an article by some newspaper reporter or stringer that would write that we were building a Vietnamese army in the image of the American army and that was the wrong way to do it. Those people didn't know what they were talking about. Now I'll tell you exactly what we did as far as organizing the Vietnamese army. First of all, over a period of time, the Americans had been putting in for supplies, rifles, machine guns, whatnot and so on and so forth, and the requisitions were being honored back in the United States. The word came to me, orders came to me, that we had to have an approved table of organization and equipment and we would therefore requisition against that, nothing else. So that meant that immediately the Vietnamese had to have a table of organization and equipment, which up until that time, believe it or not, they had never had.

They had so many light divisions, so many heavy divisions, so-called, and units like that. So, it was decided that we would build a type [of] Vietnamese division. I had long conferences with Diem and with the Vietnamese senior officers. I said, "Now what we want to do is to get a Vietnamese division. You don't want a Japanese division nor an American division nor a German division nor a French division. You need a division that is built to work in this country, in swamps, mountains, jungles, that's the kind of division you need." All agreed.

So we started working on it. They appointed a board and we worked with that board for an awful long time and we finally came to a consensus, and it wasn't easy and there was draft after draft. We started in from the rifle squad right on up, or the artillery crew right on up, see, the mortar crews, building right up from the bottom. And all to take advantage of the characteristics of the Vietnamese people and the terrain on which this army would be used. Finally after we got an agreement between the Vietnamese and MAAG on a table of operations we turned it in, as approved by the Vietnamese government. We sent it to Washington through CINCPAC. Washington then approved the TO & E's and that's what thereafter we requisitioned against. That's what we paid the troops on. I spoke a while ago about Diem being perturbed because we had reduced the number of noncoms. Instead of having, say, umpty-ump numbers of corporals, we had a lesser number, according to how many squads they were going to command and things of that nature. There was no padding.

Now where these stringers got their ideas was this: Any time the Vietnamese had a parade or anything like that in the streets of Saigon, they had an idea that the more vehicles, the more armor or the more heavy material they could show in that parade, the better it would look to the world. Okay, you see a man come in there and he's a reporter from the Philippines or Japan or someplace and he sees one of their parades, he says, "Mother of God, look at all that equipment coming down the street. Everyone is riding in a two-and-a-half ton truck or a jeep. Look at all that stuff. MAAG must be crazy. Those people can't work that in the jungle."

These photographs here, which I'll show you and describe them, these are some of the things that we tried to do. Now the Vietnamese are crazy about bicycles, and they use them all the time. So this vehicle you see here is a bicycle wheel under a frame that would normally look like an ordinary stretcher. All right, now there's their packs and their equipment on that frame. A man in front, a man behind that frame, but the weight's on this bicycle, and there they go. All right, that's one thing we used.

Pontoon bridges. We didn't have use for American-type pontoon bridges nor did we have them. Those people are used to using the normal growth there, so here we're showing how to build local pontoon bridges. You don't have to carry those or very little of them in any wagon train, because you haven't got one. You can actually build pontoon bridges on the spot. Here's where we take shelter halves and put them together and make rafts and use those for boats. There's another example of it right here.

Here's some more of these pictures showing how sometimes we would use two wheels instead of one wheel under one of those stretcher frames. Here's where we tried pack animals--we had some horses over there, but not military, but we tried to use some horses as pack animals to see how it would work, but it didn't work at all.

Q: What was wrong with the horses?

WILLIAMS: Climate. You see there a raft made out of inverted helmet liners. Another type of raft--we were doing all kind of experimenting like that. Here's people stripped down to their shorts because they're going to do some work out there in the river with their rafts.

Q: The point of all this of course is that you were using indigenous materials?

WILLIAMS: And materials that the people had been used to working with. Here rafts are made out of shelter halves. Soldiers crossing rivers on ropes and so forth. This is the stuff that the anti-Vietnamese and pro-communists who were writing about the parades in Saigon never saw or heard of. They said, "Well, goodness gracious, MAAG is building an armored force in Vietnam." We weren't doing anything of the kind. People read that trash and believed it.

Q: Were there other representatives of Western allies, military representatives of Western allies, in Saigon at this time? Did they have any input into all of this training exercise?

WILLIAMS: There were other military people there, from Korea, Australia, Great Britain, but those were military attaches, and in their embassy attache office. They had nothing to do with the Vietnamese training except to observe.

Q: And they never entered into the advisory capacity?

WILLIAMS: No. Oh, I used to talk to them. They used to come over and see me and ask me about this, that and the other, because they had to get a certain amount of material to report to their home government.

They'd come over and ask questions, and I was always very frank with them, I'd lay it right on the line, tell them what we were doing or trying to do.

There's a lot of Americans that wanted to find fault with what went on in Vietnam, and one claim was that we were training the Vietnamese military improperly. But my orders were to organize, train and equip the Vietnamese army, navy and air force. I had a certain number of navy personnel there, not many. A captain was their senior officer, comparable to an army colonel, of course. We had a major of the Marine Corps there, a good one, too. I think the senior air force adviser would have been a lieutenant colonel, maybe a colonel. The rest of them were army. We were always so short-handed. Of course, you say what we can see today and we couldn't see then, but I thought I saw a whole lot then that I'm not convinced that I didn't see. After say 1958 or 1959, I did not see a North Korean type invasion from North Vietnam, which I had seen in 1956 and 1957. I said to myself, "They're not going to do it."

Q: How did you know? What changed your mind?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. I think it's because the Vietnamese were getting progressively stronger. We were making very good progress. I thought if the North Vietnamese came down they'd have a fight on their hands that they didn't want to take on. I believe that if they had come down in 1955 or 1956 they could walk in standing up. By 1958 or 1959 I thought it would be a terrible fight from start to finish. And I wasn't sure that the North Vietnamese could handle it or wanted to handle it.

Later I was under the impression that if we and the coup had let Diem alone that there would never have been a war. I think that Diem would have been able to negotiate in such a way with Ho Chi Minh that they could settle differences. You see, Ho Chi Minh and Diem knew each other quite well, and Ho Chi Minh had offered Diem a job in his government when Ho Chi Minh first took over from the French, but Diem had turned it down. So they were not strangers. Diem knew that country up north very well and had lived there, had traveled there. He was not a North Vietnamese, his home was around Hue, which as you know is in Central. But he knew the North Vietnamese and spoke several of their dialects. He was a smart man, and I believe if they had not had a coup d'etat and killed him there would not have been a war. In Diem's time, at least.

I think more so, that if they would have gone ahead and given me an adequate number of advisors--see, when we got down to the fighting troops I had advisors at division headquarters only. None at artillery, none at the regiments, nor in separate battalions and units like that, and then advisors with supply and logistics, I was woefully short. When it came to the navy, hell, I couldn't move, ! didn't have near enough. I tried to put a couple of officers in the naval academy in 1955-56, and the French admiral in command of the French navy in Vietnam at that time, told me and told me in all seriousness, "General Williams, if you will take command of the Vietnamese forces, I'll back you up with anything that I possibly can with the French navy. But as long as you insist on the Vietnamese being in command and Americans merely being advisors, I'm going to fight you every step of the way until I'm shipped out of Vietnam. If you try to put one single advisor in the naval academy, I'll pull every French officer out of that academy within the hour after you do it." Well, he had me, because at the time the utmost that I could have put in that naval academy was two U.S. officers.

Q: How did you explain his attitude?

WILLIAMS: Well, that's the way he thought; he just thought, by George--and I don't think he was too damn stupid either. He just thought we should take command as the French had done and not try to let the Vietnamese command their own navy--in other words, I think he thought we were just spinning our wheels, that we couldn't teach the Vietnamese. Just like a senior French army officer said, "These people won't fight." And foolishly I said, "They just whipped you." Well, that was a stupid thing to say. The French weren't whipped necessarily there. They were whipped in Paris, just like we were whipped in the United States. We weren't whipped in Vietnam. That is my humble opinion of it.

Q: You gave me your reasons why you thought there was no longer a serious threat of invasion, say after 1958. Did you have a good intelligence about that sort of thing in those days?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: How good was our intelligence over there?

WILLIAMS: I could only say as far as MAAG was concerned it was nonexistent. I had no intelligence personnel. I had no way of getting any military intelligence about the North Vietnamese and little about the sects, other than Bao Dai or the Hoa Hao that I got from the Vietnamese themselves. I think the Vietnamese officers, their headquarters, gave me all the information they could get, but I had no means. And I got none from the United States; I got no reports from G-2 of the Army or G-2 of the Department of the Army or Defense Department, saying such-and-such a thing is happening in North Vietnam. I got nothing of that nature that I can recall. Once I suggested to Diem that he get spies into North Vietnam. He said they had tried but with poor success.

Q: So you depended more or less on Vietnamese sources for lack of anything else?

WILLIAMS: Yes, that's right.

Q: When what we now call the insurgency in South Vietnam got started--and there is some argument about when you can date that exactly, but the late fifties seems to be a pretty general consensus--how good was your information on that, on the early beginnings of that?

WILLIAMS: The only information I got of that was when the Vietnamese military would report, "We had an attack at such-and-such a place." The embassy often said these reports were false. MAAG advisors said the reports were true.

Q: Did you see these as communist-inspired or bandit-inspired or what?

WILLIAMS: I thought it was simply local, but I always figured that the hard-core was communist and directed from Hanoi?

Q: You always thought that?

WILLIAMS: Yes. I never at any time thought it was local uprisings. I thought they were sending those people down, these hard-core people down, and they would go into these villages and intimidate the people. They could do that. They would take a man and string him up on a pole, cut off his head and lay it down at his feet, take his wife out and gut her and lay her down there by his head and let the pigs get on them, things like that. I know those things happened. If you want to intimidate a village, that's an awful good way to do it, and two or three men can come in the night and do it. They know where the chief or the top man in that village lives. They come in, they go into his hootch at night and pull him and his wife out, and in the morning they're there laying out there in the middle of the street.

Q: Could you ever get hard evidence that people were infiltrated from the north?

WILLIAMS: Well, you say hard evidence, no. I never had anything that you could pull a man up and try him for, but I know one of the first times we had casualties there, it was out at Bien Hoa if I remember correctly. It was after supper and the Americans were in their dining room and they put up a little motion picture machine and looking at motion pictures. Suddenly some people appeared at the windows, local Vietnamese were already at the windows looking in, kids and people there at that post looking through the windows at the picture show. Some of these outlaws appeared and sprayed inside the room with automatic weapons. One of them appeared to throw a bomb or a grenade of some kind through a kitchen door. He was countered in that, because there were two screen doors about ten feet apart. He apparently didn't know about the second screen door, and so the thing bounced back on him and they found his remains outside the next morning.

I happened to be in Bangkok that particular day that happened, but I got a message of this attack. I got over there as fast as an airplane could take me. I told Diem, "This is no good." I don't know what our casualties are. There's three or four people wounded and I think one or two dead, but I'm not positive and it makes no difference now at this late date. Lord take care of their souls. But I said, "This won't work. This case must be solved." Later Lansdale told me, "The Vietnamese thought so much about this that they broke some of their security finding out who did this." So those people, the best I could find up until now, came three days marches from the north. In other words, they left someplace in the north, and I never did know the details and I didn't particularly care to, if I had known I couldn't have remembered it anyway. They left a particular place in the north and they walked all night. Then they went into hiding during the day. Another guide picked them up. They were strangers, they didn't know the country. Another guide would pick them up, walked them all night.

So for three nights they walked. They got to this place and then they botched their job, because the windows were too high so they couldn't shoot down at the seats. The people that were hurt were trying to get upstairs to get their weapons. By that time I'd told our people to always keep a weapon handy. Now, we weren't supposed to be armed. But I never went anyplace that I didn't have a .45. I said, "You can carry weapons without advertising it to the world, not even your Vietnamese compadre needs to know that you're carrying a .45. But for Christ's sakes, carry something!" These advisors weren't carrying them because they were sitting in their own dining room, they'd left their damn weapons upstairs. That's stupid. The reason some people don't survive is because they do things like that. But anyway, the people that were shot were going up the staircase.

The raiders killed a Vietnamese girl that lived there. She happened to be standing outside on a box or something watching the movie. They killed her. They didn't give a damn who they killed. [They found] the remains of one of them there. He had been killed by his own grenade. But that was the only hard evidence that I recall that someone had come down from the north. But of course I knew, or at least I believed, that these people were coming down and they would go to these places and they would intimidate these villagers and they would make certain recruits.

Q: Was that the purpose of these terroristic acts in your own mind?

WILLIAMS: Yes. It was merely to disturb the people so that they would have no confidence in their government.

Q: With a view toward--

WILLIAMS: Someday to overthrowing it maybe.

Q: I see. Okay.

WILLIAMS: But in my mind it never was anything except communists. I didn't believe any of these local agricultural people wanting to rise up and overthrow the government. To me from the very first it was definitely communist inspired. I still think it was. And I think some of the things that came out to us from the United States was by people who had a very charitable view toward communism. I wouldn't say they were communists, but I would say that a lot of the things that came down to us or came to me I thought was instigated by someone who was pro-communist. I'm very serious about that; even after twenty-some odd years I still believe that with all my soul.

Q: You said that our intelligence was no better than it should have been, I suppose. How good was the other side's intelligence as you discovered as time went on?

WILLIAMS: The Viet Cong?

Q: Yes.

WILLIAMS: I think it must have been very good. I think it must have been very good, because they could pass themselves off as villagers. They could go anyplace in the country they wanted to anytime as there was free movement. I remember one U.S. Army War College class came out there on a visit and one of the students said to me later, "Hell, you're living in a police state." I said, "Why do you say we're in a police state?" He said, "Well, from the airfield in to your headquarters there were two policemen on every block." Police walking. I said, "Sure, they're watching traffic. They know you're coming in. They want you to move and move without any congestion or anything else where you're going. Now for your information, I've talked to police officials in the United States and told them what the police strength was in this city and asked about the ratio of police to population. I've been told that there's no city in the United States that could work on a ratio of as few policemen per thousand people as they do right here in Saigon. This is not a police state." People could go anyplace. There wasn't any hold on them. This student had been given false information before he ever got to Vietnam.

Q: A very free and easy atmosphere?

WILLIAMS: That's right, yes.

Q: Did you ever have any indication that the Viet Cong had infiltrated higher headquarters, not necessarily yours, but others?

WILLIAMS: No. I never suspected it.

Q: Well, I have to ask you to explain something then. I read an interview that you gave to the U.S. News & World Report--at least that is the credentials that they presented--and as I recall the interview was in 1964.

WILLIAMS: Well, I tell you, I sure wish I had a copy of that interview because several people have asked me for it and I have said, "I can't find that damn magazine. I used to have it around here."

Q: Well, I'll give you my copy. I can get another one. The reason I ask you that is because they've got a quote there that says, and I'm quoting--well, I will in a minute--the VC infiltrated both ARVN and MAAG headquarters and then they quote you, "I knew that and I fought it," unquote.

WILLIAMS: Let me see if I can find that.

Q: I don't have the page [number].

(Interruption)

You've just said that you may have said it in 1964 but you can't remember now why you would have said it.

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Okay. Well--

WILLIAMS: I know that they used to come in and insist on going over my walls and telephone and things like that with their electrical machines to see if there were any bugs in there or if the phones had been tapped. But, I didn't put a great deal of faith in that either. You know, it's just like anything like that can happen. They can do that and say your place is absolutely clean, tomorrow morning might not be clean at all.

Q: Did they ever find anything?

WILLIAMS: No. If they did they never told me. Correction. A Vietnamese clerk in MAAG finance office was arrested. Vietnamese police told us he was a Viet Cong agent.

Q: Was there some point in the fifties when you became aware that what was going on in the countryside was not just isolated terror anymore, but a campaign of sorts had started against the government? In other words, these were not unrelated incidents but there was a pattern and it was being centrally directed.

WILLIAMS: I thought--well, now, against the government. Well now, we're talking about the Viet Cong raids?

Q: Yes.

WILLIAMS: Well, I thought all the time that was directed from Hanoi.

Q: Okay. Did Washington ever give you any indication of what their estimate of the situation was at all? Any advice on what new measures should be taken to cope with the worsening situation, anything like that?

WILLIAMS: At this moment I can't remember of any. In any case I had no means, no troops, no police.

Q: The reason I'm asking is that there was a national intelligence estimate that was done in the spring of 1959, which I came across, which predicted that the security forces--the Civil Guard and the Self-Defense Forces--were not going to be able to cope with the terror in the countryside, that the ARVN would have to be used, and the Diem was losing his popularity. I'm wondering if you ever got such a report from Washington.

WILLIAMS: If I did I can't remember it.

Q: Okay.

WILLIAMS: But a report like that would not be surprising to me at all, because I think every Tom, Dick and Harry that had ever crossed the Pacific Ocean suddenly became an expert on Asian affairs and was liable to get anything in print back in the United States about that part of the world.

Q: Of course, this was a national intelligence estimate, it wasn't a State Department estimate or even just a CIA, it was the combined intelligence thinking of the whole Washington community. When I saw that I thought, well, this is serious. Obviously somebody in Washington thinks the situation is getting serious. I was wondering if they ever communicated it to you.

WILLIAMS: If they did I don't remember it. The embassy may have received it, however.

Q: Okay. Despite the increase in terrorism, did you think still in 1959 and 1960 there was still sufficient cause for optimism about how it could possibly all turn out?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Yes. I was optimistic up until the day I left there in 1960. Since 1955 we had made great progress with the Vietnamese armed forces. Our advisors were good. They were doing top work.

Q: That was the impression that I had garnered and I wanted to make sure it was the correct impression. But you also said in another place, I think it's in this other interview, that when you left in September that the situation had worsened in one respect, and that was the relations between the embassy and President Diem. Is that an accurate statement?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. I would say that.

Q: What was going on? What was the trouble there?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. I know that there was this friction--what I called friction-- between the President and Mr. Durbrow. It didn't surprise me too much because there was always so many derogatory things being said at country team meetings about the President.

Q: Such as what?

WILLIAMS: Oh, vulgar things in country team meetings where not only the country team members were present but maybe some staff officials from their various headquarters would be in there for different kinds of briefings and so forth. If derogatory things were said, I had the fear, and I believed very strongly, that those things could be repeated on the outside. Say that USOM might have a man at the meeting that's going to say something about fisheries or something like that. Maybe the Ambassador or one of the high-ranking individuals there would say, "Well, now, what do you think that little son-of-a-bitch is going to do about that?" Or someone might ask how can we embarrass the little bastard today.

Q: What would prompt--

WILLIAMS: What would prompt that? I don't know. I don't know. Because I thought it was terrible and I objected to it and I objected to it strongly. I said to these individuals, maybe not at that instance, "You've got people in here that go outside and this man here has something to do with fisheries and he goes back to his office and says, 'I heard the Ambassador or so and so, maybe the USOM chief, refer to President Diem as that little sawed-off son-of-a-bitch or a dirty little bastard.' He says that because that gives him prestige; he thinks because he's telling someone that he was in on such a conference. Who he tells it to, whether it's his secretary, whether it's another American or whether it's a French secretary or what, they're going to repeat it. First thing you know, it's all over town that so-and-so referred to the President as a son-of-a-bitch. Now what good does that do anybody? It can do nothing but harm, nothing but harm. It's nasty, it's shortsighted, it's non-professional."

Q: You were out of sympathy with people who felt that way?

WILLIAMS: Absolutely.

Q: Well, did this affect your relations with the country team or with USOM?

WILLIAMS: It affected my relations with the country team no end.

Q: How so?

WILLIAMS: Well, because most all sooner or later became hostile to me. Example: when MAAG submitted a yearly budget, I would never get up and submit the budget. I would always get one of my officers, in particular a man that's dead now, General Lambert, to present the budget. Lambert could get up and present the budget and [snaps fingers] they'd approve it like that. I'd get up and present that budget and have to argue and answer questions for three hours, just nit-picking. They knew that President Diem put a good deal of faith in me and that he had a very high regard for my opinions and took me in his confidence and he didn't take these other people in his confidence. There must have been jealousy there. I assume it was jealousy. I would certainly say it was stupidity, because it didn't do the United States government any good to have friction like that going on. I thought it was very bad, very bad.

Q: Did you report on this development through channels?

WILLIAMS: I made no official report of it that I can remember of, by sitting down and saying, "I want to report this, that and the other." But the Secretary of the Army, Mr. Brucker, was thoroughly cognizant of it. I'm sure General Taylor was aware of it. Admiral [Felix] Stump certainly knew it, who was CINCPAC. Admiral [Harry D.] Felt certainly knew it. It wasn't any secret in Southeast Asia. As a matter of fact, one time I was bemoaning the fact to some U.S. army officer visitor, and he said, "Why, you shouldn't worry at all. You should know about the friction that's going on between MAAG and the Ambassador up in Japan. What you've got down here amounts to nothing. If you want to get into it, just think about the Chief of MAAG over in the Philippines and the Ambassador over there. They're almost at fisticuffs. Hell, everyone does that." So, that causes a person to think, well, maybe it's not so bad, but to me it was very bad.

Q: Now, I have looked at some Senate hearings that were done in the summer of 1959, and then again there were some that were taken, some testimony was taken in Saigon in December of 1959, and I think this has to do with Colegrove, who was a reporter and reported some very sensational findings and there were hearings and so on. The testimony from Ambassador Durbrow and Mr. [Arthur Z.] Gardiner, I believe it was, is all very positive about the whole program, about President Diem and so on and so on. Not a harsh word.

WILLIAMS: Very positive, you say?

Q: Very, yes. They praised the Vietnamese government and so on. It reads one way and what you're telling me reads another way. Can you reconcile that?

WILLIAMS: They couldn't afford to downgrade Diem and the Vietnamese in an open investigation. I was reading a draft that they had prepared up at the Military History Division, they sent down here a book that they're writing to get my opinion. They spoke about the friction between the American Ambassador and the Chief of MAAG and said both freely admitted that this friction and that Mr. [Leland] Barrows, who had been USOM chief before Mr. Gardiner, said yes, that it was simply terrible, that the friction that went on between those two men was just out of this world. That same history, that was a draft of a history they're writing, quotes General [John F.] Ruggles as remarking on it, so on and so forth. So there was no secret about it.

Q: But it doesn't come out in the testimony before a Senate committee?

WILLIAMS: Probably the Senate had no knowledge of it and certainly Durbrow and Gardiner wouldn't bring it up. But I'll tell you what did come out there, which was very bad. The Senate sent for the Ambassador and Mr. Gardiner to come back to the United States to appear before the Mansfield Committee. Suddenly I got orders from the Department of the Army that I would come also, that same time. So I did. When we got to Hawaii I think it was, Durbrow said--maybe it was Guam--to Gardiner and me, "Now we've got to get our stories lined up so it won't appear that there are any differences of opinion." Well, Gardiner didn't say anything, I didn't say anything. When we went in before the Mansfield Committee, the Ambassador sat down at the center of a table. I was over on the righthand side and Gardiner on his lefthand side, and the Ambassador and Gardiner had stacks and stacks of papers and books in front of them. I had a pocket notebook and a pencil, nothing else.

Well, as this committee hearing went on and went on, I kept moving further away because it was a massacre. Finally it got so that those senators would ask either the Ambassador or Gardiner something, and before they could answer they would ask them another question. And you know when they start seesawing a witness that way the witness is whipped. So I kept taking distance. Now, at last when they did question me, Mr. Mansfield started out by saying, "Now, General Williams, we didn't ask that you appear before this committee, but the Army decided, or the Pentagon decided that you should be present. So since you are here we'd like to ask you some questions." So he asked me some questions. Now I must say that maybe this was not very diplomatic, but several times during this couple of days these hearings had been going on, when they'd ask the Ambassador something or Gardiner something and they'd start fumbling with the papers to answer it, I would say, "I'll answer that question. It was such-and-such." And that was the answer, because hell, I knew it from general knowledge and memory without having to--in other words, if I had to shuffle through a batch of papers to get an answer, I would be lost.

Q: Was one of those questions whether they had ever canceled one of your programs?

WILLIAMS: I don't know. I don't remember. But anyway, Mansfield said, "We didn't ask you to be here, but since you are we'd like to ask you some questions." And they did ask questions. When they got through, Mansfield and some of these other senators were very laudatory in their remarks to me. I was surprised. There's where I got the expression that I used later with the Vietnamese, I'm working myself out of the job, because Mansfield said to me, "You're trying to work yourself out of a job." I said, "Exactly. Just as soon as I get done what I was told to do out there, I want to come back to the United States, as I've been out there some time." Neither Durbrow nor Gardiner could have been too happy with their experience before Mansfield.

Well, anyway, now we're back in Vietnam. One day Mr. Thuan, the secretary to the presidency, said to me, "What did you think about the Mansfield Report?" I said, "I haven't seen it," and I hadn't. He said, "Well, the embassy tells us to take it all with a grain of salt. Said your treatment wasn't as good as it sounds."

Q: All right, General Williams, despite the increase in terrorist activities in 1959 and 1960, did you see cause for optimism in the South Vietnamese situation in your last two years on your tour?

WILLIAMS: I was not necessarily optimistic, but I certainly was not pessimistic. I thought that the situation was under control and that it could be kept under control, because I had a great deal of faith in the people that I was working with, especially U.S. military advisors, both officers and NCO's being furnished me. I had a great deal of faith in the Vietnamese leadership in the form of President [Ngo Dinh] Diem and his secretary of defense, his various secretaries of state and so forth. And I thought that they would come out of it, that they would come out of it in time.

Q: I think, in fact, you said in a letter to Senator [Mike] Mansfield that you thought after 1960 South Vietnam might even be able to reduce its defense budget. But in 1964--and I'm referring again to the interview that you gave to the U. S. News and World Report-- you said that when you left Vietnam in September of 1960, that the situation bordered on the critical due to a loss of good relations between USOM [United States Operations Mission], the embassy, on one hand and Diem on the other hand. In what sense was the situation critical when you left?

WILLIAMS: Well, I don't know exactly how to explain that to you. To me, it was critical because there was not good relationship between the presidency and the Americans in general in Vietnam with MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group] excepted. The President was making complaints about the Ambassador personally; he was making complaints about the CIA; he was making complaints about USOM. On the other hand, the people at the embassy, the people in USOM--I'm talking about the leaders of those people, not the Indians doing the work, but the leaders--were making complaints about the presidency and about any other government official whose name happened to come up, and in my opinion, the situation was such that if there was not some change made, that it could become severely critical. And I was right in that, because it did become--

Q: Can we take those a little in detail? Now you saw that Diem was complaining about the mission and about the CIA, for example. What sort of complaints was he making?

WILLIAMS: Well, he was complaining because USOM would not do anything about helping them with a Civil Guard. That's one thing. Any project that he wanted to carry out, such as resettling people and things of that nature, they would buck him on it. For instance, he wanted to take people out of the Delta where they were packed in as tight as they could be, and put those people up in the Highlands on farms.

Farming was what they were doing down in the Delta. And personally, I thought it was right. I thought if he could settle that Highland area with good substantial Vietnamese and each man own his own land, that it would be a good bulwark against communist inroads. His idea was that every man, every head of family, that went up there was going to have two or three hundred acres, and the government was going to sell him that land and give him either six or seven years to pay for it. I couldn't think of anything better. USOM said no. If they moved anyone up there they had to move them up and put them on the outskirts of any cities that were there, in other words, merely enlarge the cities. Well, Diem's reply to counter that was, that's just making larger cities up there; it's not cultivating the countryside nor it's not sowing a good yeomanry through the country. Those kind of things.

Some of the villages he started to build in the Delta area. There was a tax on those people to help build the villages. He asked me one time what I thought about people down there that couldn't pay their tax. I asked, could they work? And he said yes, and I said all right, will you consider this: why can't a man work out his tax? I said, as a child in Denton, Texas in the United States of America, they had road taxes, and I presume they still do. But in my day and time, if people didn't have cash money handy, and the county had some roads to build, a man and his team of horses or mules and scraper or wagon would come, and they would work under county supervision and build roads. I said there was nothing degrading about that; a man was working out his taxes. I said, hell, everybody did it. All right, now he started to apply that to the Delta area. Immediately he was accused by embassy and USOM of using slave labor.

Q: Were these the agrovilles?

WILLIAMS: That's right, the agrovilles, I think that was the name. They said, look, Diem's trying to do this with slave labor. I said what the hell's slavery about it? A man's working out his taxes. If he has money, he doesn't have to do that if he doesn't want to. He can work or he can pay his taxes with money. He can do either one he wants to do. Diem put out an ordinance ruling or dictating, or whatever the proper term is, that no person could own over two hundred and fifty acres of land. There were some people, some Vietnamese, that owned large estates--two and three thousand acres--and they used Vietnamese farmers to farm that land as sharecroppers. But the farmer's share was very small. American sharecroppers wouldn't put up with that. I'd seen sharecroppers in the United States as a child, and had observed them, and after I got grown realized they were getting the short end of the stick.

Well, immediately the large landowners--a man owning two or three thousand acres of land--looked with a dim view on the government taking all of his land except two hundred and fifty acres, although he was reimbursed for what the government took. He looked with a dim view on that, because then he would shortly in years to come, or his family, would fail to be millionaires or multi-millionaires, and be ordinary, moderate citizens.

Q: Were these larger estates primarily Delta estates?

WILLIAMS: They were, yes. Now, Diem would be opposed in anything like that that he brought up. It didn't make any difference what it was, someone would up and say, "Well, that little son of a bitch can't do this."

Q: Is that the term that they used?

WILLIAMS: That was the term they often use. And I objected to that very strongly. I said, "Don't you know"--speaking to these senior U.S. people in the country team meeting--"that using language like that is going to leak and get back to the President of this country and to his various and sundry people, Secretary of Defense, Secretary of State and so on and so forth." "Oh, no, no one's going to repeat anything like that." And I said, "The hell they won't. You can believe it, and on top of that, what good does it do to always be abusing a person? It's going to cost you money, it's going to cost you prestige. It's going to cost you the ability to work."

I was totally disregarded; they kept on doing that. That irritated me terribly because first of all, I thought a great deal of President Diem; I thought that he was doing a good job, as good as he could possibly do. And I thought that our purpose was to give him as much help as possible, and if we thought he was going wrong in this or that to nudge him politely to get him to change ideas instead of saying flatly "you can't do this" or "you can't do that."

Q: Who, primarily, would you say were the chief offenders in this way, in the USOM?

WILLIAMS: I'd say it'd have to be the chief, because I think most take their line of conduct from their chief. All Indians in USOM were not anti-Diem.

Q: So you think Ambassador [Elbridge] Durbrow, for example.

WILLIAMS: Well, as far as the embassy was concerned, certainly it was the Ambassador as he is responsible for the embassy and his staff.

Q: I'll ask a question about him a little later, but we can get into that. So you felt that relationships were what was critical?

WILLIAMS: Yes.

Q: In 1960. Not the security situation, necessarily?

WILLIAMS: No, I thought that mainly the critical situation revolved around the relationship between the American civilian officialdom in Vietnam and the Vietnamese officials.

You see, another thing that convinced me of that--I was having no trouble, my officers were having no trouble with our Vietnamese counterparts in army, navy or air force. We had our differences, we had our arguments, but nothing to cause a person to be mad about it five minutes after the conversation ended.

Q: That reminds me of something you mentioned last time, which was that your relationship with the senior officers was so good, they were so open with you, that when talk of a coup would come up, they had no hesitation about discussing this in front of you, and you were able to influence them to go along this line.

WILLIAMS: That is correct.

Q: But it occurs to me that we didn't mention what was behind such talk. Why would they be discussing a coup at all, what was their reason?

WILLIAMS: I was never too sure about that, but some times there was talk of coup, around campfires and there was a lot of it on the radio, international radio. They would say, "Well, Hanoi Radio says such and such. French Radio says such and such." I don't know whether they ever quoted American radio, Voice of America or anything like that. I don't remember that. I think those broadcasts instigated, and on top of that, you want to remember that the officer corps was primarily French oriented--they were Vietnamese second. The senior officers had served in the French army, either in the Colonial army or in the Regular army. They were educated by the French, if they had any education. And the French didn't like Diem. He had literally thrown them out of the country. Just a lot of French-oriented people were talking against the Vietnamese government.

On top of that, they were rather young and what else did they have to do if they couldn't do other things but sit around the campfire and bitch about something. I've seen the same thing in the American army, except I haven't heard anyone in the American army sit around and bitch about having a coup d'etat. But they bitched about the CG, they bitched about the commissary, they bitched about supply, they bitched about the Adjutant General, and you name it, and the American army officers will sit around and bitch about it. Nothing serious, you understand. Well, they were doing the same thing, except these generals and colonels were mostly younger--they were younger than the average colonel in the American army at that time.

Q: And these were the top-ranking Vietnamese officers.

WILLIAMS: They were the top-ranking, yes. For instance, Big [Duong Van] Minh who later became the instigator of the coup d'etat--the man who had Diem murdered--he'd been a first lieutenant in the French army, colonial army. Don, who was next to Minh--

Q: Is this Tran Van Don?

WILLIAMS: Yes. He'd been lieutenant or captain in the French army. Tran Van Don had been aide-de-camp to Emperor Bao Dai. You could go right down the line. Some of them had been born in France, some of them had been educated in France. Some of them had merely been with the French army. General Ty, who was the oldest and a senior, and very likely the least efficient of all, had been a sergeant in the Colonial army and had even gone to World War I in a truck transportation corps. I ran into them in World War I on one occasion. We called them at that time, solder vernacular, I don't know what the correct name is, we called them Annamite. I remember one time that I was sent to find one of the battalions in my regiment that had failed to get where they were to go, and I ran into one of these truck companies, and there was one of these what I now know to have been a Vietnamese officer in the leading truck. When I talked to him, he couldn't understand me, but he asked me what kind of insignia was painted on the door of the trucks of the convoy that our soldiers were riding in. He showed me some dragon or some damn thing like that that was painted on the door of his truck. Well, I didn't know, but if I'd known that, he could have told me where that column of trucks were, presumably.

But old General Ty had been a sergeant in France in that outfit. He came back and was an officer in the Vietnamese army under the French at the time that the Japanese came in. When he found out--he told me he was a battalion commander by that time--that the Japanese were really fixing to take over from the Vichy French and not collaborate with them like they had heretofore, he warned his battalion. He said they were out in a field at- t~he time. He told his troops such and such is going to happen, and said, "I think now it's every man for himself. I'm going to the jungle." He told me he took off, and said his whole damn battalion just disappeared.

When the French got back, after Great Britain and the United States gave Vietnam back to the French after World War II, Ty came out of hiding, Big Minh came out of hiding, the rest of them who had been hiding came out. Big Minh was arrested, put in jail, and the French were going to court-martial him, but they didn't probably because of his association with a man who later became vice president, a man by the name of [Nguyen Ngoc] Tho, T-H-O.

Big Minh told me about being in the French prison, and the way he described it, it was terrible. He said they were packed in there in what later became known in our literature as tiger cages, and he said he couldn't sit down or lie down. It was crowded in there, and [he] said there was no place to defecate. He said there was urine and feces on the floor ankle deep when he was finally gotten out. I said, "How the hell did you get out?" He said, "Mr. Tho got out, and after he got out, he got me out." The French still held desertion over him, though. They threatened to court martial him, but they didn't.

Now that was the type background of some of these people. Each one of them had a different background, and that's the reason they couldn't be taken as a group. You had to know each one as well as you could and figure him out. Now with Major General [Huu] Xuan, X-U-A-N, that led the detail that went down to the church in Cholon to get Diem and his brother and bring them back after they had surrendered by phone. He'd been in the French G-2. And at one time when I commented about this officer and asked Diem why he didn't give him more responsibility, Diem apparently had a gut feeling this man was no good, and it turned out he wasn't. Diem told me, "That man was a G-2, French army." And added, "Once a G-2 in the French army, always a G-2 in the French Army." Well, what he referred to was the Intelligence Section.

So they had all kinds of backgrounds, and you ask, now what would cause them to do this? Maybe boredom? If nothing else, maybe just to see what my reaction would be. I don't know.

Q: Now, some authorities say that one of the sources of disagreement in this area involving the embassy was that the embassy believed generally that Diem's problems, wherever they may have been in the country, resulted from his gradual loss of political clout, of authority, that he was alienating too many people in the country, and they advocated therefore certain reforms which Diem didn't want to carry out, and that the military argued that making Diem act against his will would cause him to lose face and only aggravate the situation. Do you recall an argument along those lines?

WILLIAMS: At the moment I can't say that I do. It doesn't sound mysterious to me because the whole thing began to turn into a can of worms, there's no doubt about that. But what they were referring to as the reforms, I haven't any idea. It sounded like a lot of hindsight talking to me.

Q: Did you have any specific advice to Diem about how to handle the insurgency, for example? What were your ideas on what was behind the growing acts of terror in the countryside?

WILLIAMS: I certainly had advice to him about handling the insurgency. What was behind it was nothing to me except a bunch of people that were reds, communists, that were just attempting to take over the country. That's all there was to it.

Q: But where were they coming from? Were these infiltrated communists, do you think, or had they been left behind from before?

WILLIAMS: I thought and still believe the hard core of them, the leaders, were from the North. When the North and the South divided, we know that almost a million people came down from the North to the South, and General Mike O'Daniel honchoed most of that.

Q: Yes, we talked about that last time. That's right.

WILLIAMS: There were certain numbers of them, but very few, that left the South and went North. Now, one group of those people, several hundred and I don't know exactly how many--I say several hundred because that's the figure I have in my mind--were stopped short of the border and were held by the North Vietnamese for several months. And all the young men in that group then were married to Vietnamese girls that lived in that vicinity. Now, when they went ahead and moved on further north, the husbands went but the girls were not allowed to go. So that put these young men who had been born and raised in the South but had sympathy toward the communists, moving up into the North, but their wives and any children that were coming on were living back down South. Well, now this might seem far-fetched, but to me it wasn't far-fetched at all when that was told to me, because knowing the tremendous loyalty in the Vietnamese family which comes first--the family comes first, the State second, then the Church about third--but the family comes first of all. Those men were going to come back to the South to get their wives and their children. That gave them a perfect bed to come back to and an area to come back to after being thoroughly indoctrinated in the North and then to spread from there out throughout the country.

Q: Now, if I read you right, what you're saying is that these men, and men like them, formed the cadre who organized and directed the insurgency. Am I reading you properly on this?

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: Now, most authorities would agree with that, I think. Most of the people that I have read would certainly agree with it. Where they disagree some time is where did the followers come from and what motivated the followers that these cadre organized and got together? What is your opinion about that?

WILLIAMS: I think it's not too big a question. First of all, this thing that I just related here, of course I had no personal knowledge of that, that was merely told me by the Vietnamese how they kept those people there for a while and married and then they took the men on and left their wives and families back. That of course came to me just by hearsay.

Now, where did the followers come from? It's not too hard to understand. Your hard-core Viet Cong came down from the North, and they'd start prying around these villages, and they would try to get help from the villages because they had to have food, they had to have money support, they had to have places to hide and so on and so forth. Now, they would come into a village that was just as innocent, more so, than a little town in Texas or Louisiana and they'd say, "All right, we want help. We want assistance. We want food, we want a place to hide, we want money, we want some piasters" and so on and so forth. People would say, "Nothing doing." And they'd say "Fine." And later they'd come back at night, they'd pick out the head man, what we would call the mayor, his wife and then his children, and when the people got up the next morning, there would be a stake or something of that nature standing up in the main street of the town, and there would be the mayor's head on it, his body down at the bottom of it, and very likely his wife's body also. If she was pregnant, she'd be gutted, her baby out, and by that time maybe the hogs had started working on them.

Now, just a few things like that, and you've got some innocent farmers that don't know very much, except how to work in a rice field, and the next time some man comes in and he says, "I want some piasters, I want a place to hide, and I want you to do this, that and the other," they're going to hesitate a hell of a long time before they say, "No, no way." I hate to think it could happen here, but I tell you, I believe that a small town in the United States could be intimidated, some town, just as well as you could intimidate some villages in Vietnam. They had no communication, there's few telephone lines, the roads were very poor. If anyone went from one place to another, they walked, or they rode a bicycle. Yes, those things could happen, and in that way a man, an outfit could build up a very good following.

Now, I know that these things, the instances like this did happen. We'll take a Civil Guard detachment that's out here guarding a bridge, or something of that nature. I relate this as positive facts of things that happened. Maybe a half dozen Viet Cong would come, and tell these guards, "we want you to surrender." It'd be always in the night, see. And they'd say, "No, we won't surrender." Remember they are around the bridge or around a little old building that they're guarding or something of that nature, and their wives and their children are living there in little shacks, and I'm talking about really shacks, something you can throw up in fifteen minutes. They're carrying old 1898 French rifles, and the ammunition for it will fire and some of it won't. They said, "No, we won't surrender." Maybe they've got a corporal or a sergeant in charge. Hadn't as much training as a good Boy Scout in the United States.

The V.C. come back the next night, they stop at the nearest village, they round up all the villagers. Say there's a hundred villagers. They put them in a column of two's and march them down the road. They don't march them up close to this little fort. They'll march them up within a hundred yards of it maybe, it's dark. They order, halt, start shouting and hollering. They do. The Viet Cong goes back to this little outpost and says, "You're completely surrounded. I've got two or three hundred troops here. We're going to put you to the sword, we're going to kill you and your women and children if you don't surrender now. Are you going to surrender or not surrender?" And the guards say, "Boy, come on in."

Now, those things happened repeatedly. I used to complain about that and wanting to do something with the Civil Guard and give them some kind of training and equipment. I said, it's beyond this argument about who is going to train the Civil Guard. Someone's got to train them, someone's got to equip them, someone's got to organize them, because incidents like this happen, and I related instances of that nature. I was able to say this happened at such-and-such a place at such-and-such an hour on such-and-such a night. I'd have the information right at my fingertips, and today I'm talking in generalities, and I don't have details of times and places. I'd say, now as soon as that happened, these V.C. can go back to their villages and say, "Look, you think the government of Vietnam is defending you? Look what we just did. We just knocked off this outfit up here on this bridge, we just knocked off this outfit over here on this radio station." And I said the natives will believe it. "They're not knocking them off, they're using their own Vietnamese villagers to do it under the cover of darkness." So that's actually digging the foundation right out from under the Vietnamese government. Our officials couldn't see it, or didn't want to see it. Or simply were afraid to face facts.

Q: What was their explanation?

WILLIAMS: None.

Q: They just didn't accept your explanation.

WILLIAMS: Didn't accept it. Often claimed I'd been misinformed.

Q: So terror was a very effective weapon?

WILLIAMS: Very effective. And not only they didn't accept it, but I had long since started working through the Vietnamese military to have them give me a report, as well as they could, of any time any incident of this type that I have just discussed happened. Say, once a week I'd take a consolidated report like that and I'd take it to a country team meeting, and I'd say "All right, now, here's the information I have as to what terrorist activities have happened during the last seven days, which we're not doing anything about and we're keeping the Vietnamese from doing anything about," and I'd read the report. They wouldn't accept them. They'd say, "Let us have that data, and we'll check it through our sources." They'd come back a week or fourteen days later and they'd say, "Our sources don't jibe with yours."

Q: What were their sources, do you have any idea?

WILLIAMS: No. And I'd say, "Well, why do you think the Vietnamese military gave me reports like this?" They'd say, "They're trying to pull the wool over your eyes. They're doing that to get more military aid." I said, "They're not getting any military aid at all for the Civil Guard or Self-Defense Corps. This has nothing to do with military aid. This is what's going on in the countryside that the army has no control over, and no one else has any control over because the Civil Guard's supposed to be sitting on these places." I was just hitting a stone wall.

Q: Were your people, your American people in the field corroborating some of these stories?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. However, they couldn't corroborate all of them, because maybe there wouldn't be an American within miles of one of these places.

Q: Some people say that in addition to terror, the Viet Cong had another ace in the hole, and that was the business of land reform. You've touched on land reform already, you mentioned Diem's program. Some of Diem's critics say that the problem is that Diem didn't follow through on the land reform program, that is, that there was a program, all right, but that not nearly enough land actually changed hands. Not enough landless peasants wound up with some land. Did you have any insight into that?

WILLIAMS: I wouldn't know about numbers.

Q: It wasn't your business to check on that?

WILLIAMS: No. The only thing I would know about that would be in the conversation with Diem he might casually mention, "Well, we've settled so many people at such-and- such a place or in such-and-such an area." But, you see, so many times when Diem would bring up a thing like that you just spoke about, I'd caution him by saying, "Mr. President, you know I have great sympathy with what you're doing, but I have no control over those things. I have none whatsoever," and I said, "Odd as it may seem to you, that's entirely the civilian, American civilians are handling that business, and anytime I even bring up the subject, they often take offense that I am bold enough to bring it up."

Q: Why would they take offense?

WILLIAMS: Because they'd say it was none of my business.

Q: I see. So why was Diem bringing it up to you, then? He was a smart man, he knew you couldn't do anything, I suspect. Why?

WILLIAMS: I don't know, unless he knew that I was trying to get those things back to report through military channels, which I would, and he very likely knew that I was trying to defend him before the other Americans. Those people were pretty smart; I think they knew what was going on. I'm not so awful sure that there weren't American civilians that would tell Diem, or if not Diem but members of the Vietnamese government, many things that--in other words, I don't believe that all people in USOM were in sympathy with what USOM was doing. I'm not so awful sure that all people in the embassy were in sympathy with what the ambassador wanted to do. I'm not sure of that.

Q: We've mentioned a lot about Diem. Do you have any recollections or any opinions to share with us about his brother, [Ngo Dinh] Nhu? We hear an awful lot about him after 1960, that he was sort of the real bad guy--

WILLIAMS: He was the man that wore the black hat to hear the Americans tell it. My relationship with Nhu was very, very scant. He didn't speak English, and I didn't speak French. Certainly not enough to carry on a conversation with him. I had very, very little contact with him--some, not much. I must say I had more contact with Mrs. Nhu, and that was very limited, than I did with Mr. Nhu. But a certain group of Americans considered Nhu as the black-hatted guy, and they objected to the political party that he organized--

Q: That was the Can Lao, wasn't it?

WILLIAMS: That's right. Can Lao? Yes, as I recall that was the name of it. And I don't know whether that was a labor union, or if it was anti-labor union or exactly what it was, but it was a political party that the President did not belong to because I asked him flat out. I asked, "Are you a member of the Can Lao Party?" He said, "I am not, and I have nothing to do with it." He said, "My brother is with the Can Lao Party." He may have been the dastardly villain that the Americans, some Americans, made him out to be, but I doubt it. Neither do I think Madame Nhu was the dragon lady that she was painted to be, not by any manner or means.

Q: She became rather famous for making certain statements to the press later on, and the one that sticks in my mind at this time for some reason is that after 1963, she went on record as saying that the Americans were to blame for it all. Somehow, it was all our fault. How did that strike you, when she said that?

WILLIAMS: Well, first of all, I wasn't so awful sure she said that, if she was correctly quoted. Was this after Diem and her husband were murdered? I'd like to go back just a little bit.

Q: All right.

WILLIAMS: Madame Nhu spoke English, and she was a very, very attractive woman, and a lot of people were mesmerized by her beauty. I wasn't because I was totally indifferent to her, and why I don't know, but I just was. I engaged her in conversation, she engaged me in conversation, and she used to take me to task for things, occasionally. For instance, I remember one time she invited me to a house party she and Mr. Nhu were having down on the coast, and I declined.

Q: Was this in Saigon?

WILLIAMS: No, the house party was down on the coast someplace. I declined and later the President invited me to the same party, and I accepted. And the first time she saw me, which was at the party, she said, "I invited you to this party and you declined, and the President invited you and you accepted." I said, "Well, what the hell do you expect me to do?" (Laughter) "Of course I accepted when the President invited me. That didn't mean I wanted to come." But nevertheless, we'd have arguments like that.

But now I'm really drawing on my imagination, because there's several things I told the President that he did long after I was gone that may have been good and may not have been. I told him one time that I thought he should send someone to the United States to give the Vietnamese side, his side of the problems that were going on. And I said, "Someone who's thoroughly familiar with them." All right, he sent Madame Nhu. She got over here and the press started tearing her to pieces. I think maybe--now this may be egotism on my part, but I'm not too sure it is--I think maybe Madame Nhu came to the United States because I told the President he should send someone over here to give his side of the problem. Now, Madame Nhu's father was the ambassador to the United States, and they were at cross-purposes.

Q: Do you know why?

WILLIAMS: Well, her father was anti-Diem, and I think he was pro-Bao Dai, but I'm not positive. But I know that they were at cross-purposes, and I know that that worked out to her disadvantage, and actually to serious disadvantage, because when she went to various and sundry places, and the bills at those various and sundry hotels were sent to the Vietnamese Embassy in Washington, which is common custom, the way it's done throughout the world, they were not paid. So the American press didn't come back and say the Vietnamese ambassador refused to pay Madame Nhu's bills, they came back and said, Madame Nhu jumped a hotel bill in Los Angeles. I read that in the press myself. Well, hell, that woman's as honest as I am, she wouldn't jump a hotel bill. Then she was painted as the dragon lady and all that kind of stuff, which was terrible. Among other things she organized women out there, she had a good women's club going there that was getting to be almost nation-wide, and she had a hell of a lot of people in that thing, and I think she was wielding a lot of power, as much power possibly as her husband, maybe more.

But she also had the Americans at a disadvantage either because of her good looks or because of her sharp tongue or something. Very few of the foreigners would contradict or argue with her. I was not one of them. I'd argue with her. Anytime she said something

I thought was wrong, I'd say, "You're just as wrong as you can be." Actually Mrs. Williams would, too, because she and Mrs. Williams were fairly good friends, not very close friends, but pretty good friends. I remember one time that they were up in Dalat. Mrs. Williams was visiting her up in Dalat, which was a summer resort up in the hills. One of Madame Nhu's little boys started whipping a dog with a bicycle chain, and Mrs. Williams told him to stop. He stopped. Mrs. Nhu said, "Why should you stop my boy from whipping that dog with a bicycle chain?" And Mrs. Williams, who was a dog lover and we always had dogs, said, "Because that's not the way a child's supposed to do and you ought not to let your child do things like that." Well, I doubt if there's anyone else in Southeast Asia who would ever talk to Madame Nhu that way. But she liked it. I guess she liked it. She continued to have a pleasant relationship with us. But that's not answering very much your question about Mr. Nhu.

Q: Well, you've told me what you recall, and that's what we're after. Let me get back to the problems created by the growing terrorism or insurgency, whichever name you care to put on it. Did we adopt any new policies by 1960 to deal with the problem of security in the countryside?

WILLIAMS: You mean as a nation? You mean MAAG?

Q: I mean MAAG in Vietnam. Wasn't there a counter-insurgency plan or something of that nature?

WILLIAMS: Yes.

Q: What was the nature of it?

WILLIAMS: I can't remember the details of that.

Q: Were there special counter-guerrilla units formed?

WILLIAMS: No. If so I can't remember them at this late date.

Q: Okay. Speaking of that, do you remember when the Ranger Battalions first made their appearance in Vietnam, the South Vietnamese Ranger Battalions?

WILLIAMS: I'd say along about 1957 or 1958. I'm guessing. I'd like to say something of that nature about these special detachments.

Q: All right.

WILLIAMS: I mentioned that in this U.S. News and World Report business. I was told to organize, train, and equip the Vietnamese army, navy, and air force, and their marines, and their paratroopers. The marines came in as part of the navy and the paratroopers as part of the army. Now to do that, I had to have some kind of organization, because an American army, as you well know from your own army experience, cannot requisition equipment unless you requisition against an approved Table of Organization and Equipment. All right, the Vietnamese had none. So anything that I was getting from the United States I was either begging, borrowing or stealing it, and I was finally told, "All right, you've got to have more formal tables of organization and equipment out there for us to work against. I said, "Fine, that suits me fine. That gives me talking points with the Vietnamese."

So, taking this up with the President and the Secretary of Defense right straight on down, I told them what was necessary and of course they accepted my word for it. I said, "I want to form a Board of army officers who have had experience." Some had had some combat experience at least. Some had administrative experience, and to determine, through this board, through trial and error, tests, and things of that nature a proper Table of Organization and Equipment for their army to start with. So that's what we did.

Q: Is this when you first formed the first Vietnamese division, the eight thousand men--

WILLIAMS: No, Mike O'Daniel had done that without any table of organization or anything else. He'd just taken anything he could find because the French had little detachments here, there, and yon. Nothing bigger than a battalion, and he'd just thrown those people together the best way he could. He was just like marching through mud, he was having a terrible time because that's the way the conditions were. I was a little bit better off because he'd done a certain amount of preliminary work.

Anyway, we formed this Board and we finally came up with what I called a Vietnamese division, and I worked with the Board, not directed them or anything of that nature, but nudged them this way and that when they were going off on tangents. And [I] told them we wanted a division that could work in the jungle, in the swamps, in the mountains, those were the main terrain features, and I didn't want a Japanese division, nor an American division, nor a Korean division nor anything else. I wanted a Vietnamese division that could be theirs. So that's what we got. Now, those divisions were built so they could be broken right on down as far as companies and platoons. Some people that didn't know any better later said, "All right, General Williams and his people organized the Vietnamese division like an American division." Well we didn't do any damn such a thing, and if anyone had taken the trouble to take a Table of Organization of a Vietnamese division and look at, they could see that it didn't resemble an American division as much as it might resemble the Japanese or the Korean division. Actually the supply was based on the Korean labor force type, so what in the world do they call those people up in Korea that the Koreans had with their army up there-

Q: Katusas?

WILLIAMS: Katusas, yes. No, wait a minute. Katusas were the soldiers that were with the Americans. I'm talking about the men that carried those A-frames on their backs, that they had instead of trucks. Korean Labor Corps? Or Korean Service Corps? Well, anyway, they had a corps of those people. We used those people as examples when--those were those photographs I saw with you the other day where we built things that looked like bicycles that had two hundred and fifty pound loads on them. And the motor transportation amounted to nothing. Well, you could break those down to squad, platoon, companies--any size you wanted to, to go after guerrillas or to fight a set-piece battle. There's nothing wrong with that organization, and any military people to this day will admit there's nothing wrong with it, and as a matter of fact, there was no change made in that organization as far as I know as long as American military were in Vietnam, and up until 1970--when did we come out, 1972, wasn't it something like that?

Q: We came out in 1972, I believe.

WILLIAMS: Yes. They made no changes in the Vietnamese Table of Organization all during that time. So there wasn't anything wrong with it, but people that didn't know wanted to do any picking that they possibly could. The reason people were talking about Motor Divisions was because these "stringers" that would come in there and write foolish things, they'd see a parade in the city of Saigon, for instance, and the Vietnamese would pull in every old tank they had, every half-truck, bulldozer, anything else that would run, they'd put that in the parade down the street and people would look at that and say, "My God, here's a motorized division." Well, it wasn't any more a motorized division than I've got a motorized division sitting here in my carport. The stringers just didn't know.

But it's easy to pick, pick. A few days ago we saw a headline here in the San Antonio papers: "Navy Goes to San Salvador." You pick that up and read it. Then you read they'd sent down five goddamned sailors to help the San Salvadoran people learn how to run the motors on those motor boats that they had. But there's a headline two inches high: "U.S. Navy to San Salvador." You might not remember it, but I can tell you that type of reporting was going on back in 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960 and right on through. It was just terrible. What did the U.S. press have to gain?

Q: But you read about it, it sounds like gunboat diplomacy all over again.

WILLIAMS: Absolutely. Now, there's talk about advisors. Someone wrote me a letter the other day and said, "We'd like to have your opinion on the advisors to San Salvador. Isn't that the way we started in Vietnam?" My answer to that was advisors in Vietnam didn't cause the war; they had nothing to do with the war. I stayed there until 1960, the war didn't break out until sometime after Diem was overthrown in 1963. I think it broke out in 1965. Well, American advisors didn't cause that war. It was American policy that caused the war indirectly. American policy in overthrowing Ngo Dinh Diem. And we know that's recorded history now. No question about it. But here an intelligent person writes and said "Isn't this the way we got started in Vietnam, by sending advisors?" Well, memory is short, and historical memory, and you're getting to be a historian, or are a historian, and you know that as well or better than I do.

Q: In this Table of Organization which you developed with much agonizing and soul-searching and so on, where do the Ranger Battalions fit into this organization?

WILLIAMS: I don't remember that detail. But I know that the Vietnamese wanted Ranger Battalions.

Q: This was a Vietnamese idea, then, the Ranger Battalions?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes, as I recall.

Q: I see. What purpose were they supposed to serve?

WILLIAMS: Oh, the Americans had them.

Q: I don't understand.

WILLIAMS: America had Rangers just like we've got right now. So the V.N. want them.

Q: I see, I see. Did you agree with--

WILLIAMS: I didn't argue with them about it. As long as it didn't bother going ahead with the organization of the division. You just can't have everything your way, you know.

Q: I see.

WILLIAMS: The U.S. Green Berets have a great deal of glamor about them.

Q: When were they introduced? When did they start coming in?

WILLIAMS: I don't know, but I tell you the first U.S. batch that came in there almost got us in trouble. This was done almost without my knowledge; in other words, someone had set it up, and it had not been the Vietnamese. But someone wanted one of our Ranger Battalions, or one of our Green Beret Battalions, I'll call them, that was up in Okinawa, they wanted them to have some training in Vietnam.

Q: Was that what they called a C team, do you remember that designation? I think that's the higher headquarters of a special forces detachment, that's the largest detachment. But that may be a later development, I may be getting ahead of things.

WILLIAMS: Could have been. But anyway, this was instigated by someone other than the Vietnamese, because the Vietnamese came to me and said the Americans want to bring a battalion of the Green Berets in.

Q: What Americans now?

WILLIAMS: He didn't say. As far as I know, it was someone in Washington or Hawaii. Not our advisors. They wanted to do this for training, and I said okay. But we must remember that at that time we were under a terrible handicap, because we had only four hundred and forty-two advisors which we had when the Geneva accords were signed, or adopted--we never did sign them. So this International Control Commission made up of the Poles, the Canadians and the Indians always checked very closely any additions we had to MAAG, and we had to defend every one of them. You bring in one extra typist, you had to defend it as though you were bringing in two combat teams. I said, "How are you going to get by with this business?" They said, "Oh, we're going to bring them in over the beaches." I said, "Okay. Where do we want to put them?" "Oh, in such-and-such a place." Now all this had been arranged, not through MAAG.

Q: What did they mean by over the beaches? Did they mean under cover of night, or...

WILLIAMS: That's right. They were going to land in rowboats or motor boats.

Q: Okay. A tactical landing.

WILLIAMS: That's right. Come in over the beaches. No ships in sight. Okay. Now that was done, and this was going to be kept a great secret. So they brought in this battalion, and they coiled up there in the hills, over on the east coast.

Q: Do you remember about where that was?

WILLIAMS: Oh, I'd say it was up around that enormous big bay up there.

Q: Cam Ranh?

WILLIAMS: Cam Ranh Bay, yes. Close to Cam Ranh Bay. And the Vietnamese were going to work with them, and the Vietnamese detailed some of their troops to work with them, say, a battalion or a couple of companies, something like that. All this was in great secrecy, and I knew that if anything happened and the secrecy was broken that I was going to have a terrible lot of trouble with the Control Commission made up of the Indians and the Canadians and the Poles. And I was having plenty of trouble with those people anyway. So about the first thing that happened after the battalion had landed they took a half a dozen or so of these Green Berets and they put them in an automobile or a truck and moved them by road down towards, and in the general direction of Saigon, but only, oh, say, about ten or twelve miles from where the battalion was coiled in the hills. And turned them loose and said your compass direction is such-and-such, now go through the jungles and get back to your battalion.

Q: Strictly a training exercise?

WILLIAMS: Strictly a training exercise. In a few days, word came to me, "We can't find our people." I said, "What do you mean you can't find them?" They then explained to me what had happened, you see? And I said, "Well, I'll find them for you." So I got some Vietnamese soldiers, or officers, in that vicinity, and I said, "There's some Americans lost in these damn jungles between here and the coast and God knows where they are because they've got compasses, and they're supposed to be able to navigate--all you got to do is march straight east and you will come to the coast anyway." And the Vietnamese went in and found them. The goddamned Green Berets had gotten lost. Ten miles from the coast. So help me! Then I began to get skeptical about these people.

So the next thing that happened, I got information that there'd been a terrible accident out there, and so I got there as quickly as I could. You see, I was staying away from all this stuff, because I wanted to be--if the Commission had said anything to me about it, I'd have said, "Gentlemen, what the hell are you talking about?" See? And the Vietnamese government theoretically were, too, because all this was under cover. I went out there, and there was a Vietnamese officer dead, there was an American captain dead, of the Green Berets, there was an American warrant officer with one arm gone, and that was just about it.

I said, "What the hell happened?" Well, here's what happened as they explained it to me. We had a convoy moving down the road, and we had certain Vietnamese here and we were teaching them how to handle a convoy, and so a fire fight started, simulated, and they wanted to add a little bit of zest to it, so they had some sticks of dynamite. Now, these people are sitting around an open fire, and they'd light one of these sticks of dynamite with the fuse on, and they'd throw it like that, and exploding it, imitating artillery fire. Now, that's like a state fair in Texas in 1914. Two militia companies having a sham battle. To my mind, that's what it sounded like. What happened, the warrant officer threw one stick of dynamite and it failed to go where he wanted it to, and it killed an American captain. It also knocked off his own arm, and it did this other damage.

Hell, I said, the soup's certainly in the fire. But I didn't know how much so, but how we got out of it I don't know, because a few days later--of course they evacuated these people and then later evacuated the battalion. They pulled out again over the beaches. A little bit later, I saw or was sent, rather, a clipping out of a newspaper that was published in Okinawa that said Captain so-and-so, and gave his name, his organization and so forth, was killed during an exercise in Vietnam on such-and-such a day by a premature explosion of a stick of dynamite. Now, if the Viet Cong or Hanoi had been smart enough to be reading the newspapers, they would have wondered "Now, why was this captain of this Green Beret outfit that's stationed in Okinawa, what the hell is he doing in Vietnam with a stick of dynamite?" You see? It gave away the whole show. Now, if Hanoi picked it up I don't know because I never heard a word about it, I didn't hear anything about it from the International Control Commission, no Vietnamese ever said anything to me about it, and no American ever said anything to me about it to this day.

Q: Now, something occurs to me. You said that these Green Berets were primarily on a training mission.

WILLIAMS: That was my understanding.

Q: Was it their training or the South Vietnamese?

WILLIAMS: Their training.

Q: Their training.

WILLIAMS: As far as I was concerned, or as far as I was told.

Q: Now, you may not know the answer to this, but it occurs to me that this is a legitimate question. Why send them to Vietnam where all the problems which you have mentioned exist? Why not send them to the Philippines where you don't have an International Control Commission?

WILLIAMS: That would be a good question, wouldn't it?

Q: Same terrain, isn't it?

WILLIAMS: Yes. I haven't the slightest, foggiest idea.

Q: All right. Were you there when the Special Forces came in to stay, then? I think this is in 1960. I think this is in the spring and summer of 1960.

WILLIAMS: I can't remember but it must have been after my departure on 1 September 1960.

Q: Okay. Can you think of any other important developments in that last nine months, eight or nine months that you were in country? The reason I'm asking, I have seen reference in the Pentagon Papers, one edition of them, which says that there was something called a counter-insurgency plan, which was developed late 1959, early 1960, and that the Green Berets and the Ranger Battalions were involved in it. But I don't know much more than that.

WILLIAMS: Well, my memory's just not that good.

Q: Okay, okay. Was your successor General [Lionel] McGarr?

WILLIAMS: Yes.

Q: Were you able to brief him before you left?

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. He was there, oh, maybe ten or twelve, fifteen days before I left.

Q: What kind of a picture did you paint for him, as you can recall?

WILLIAMS: I laid everything flat out on the table.

Q: How did it look?

WILLIAMS: I didn't think it looked very well. I didn't know General McGarr. He had been the commandant of the Command and General Staff College, I've been told, and I'd also been told he'd been in the 3rd Division during World War II. So since Mike O'Daniel, my predecessor, had commanded the 3rd Division in the latter stages of World War II, I wrote and asked Mike what he could tell me about McGarr--I forgot his first name.

Q: Lionel, I think.

WILLIAMS: Lionel McGarr. His nickname was "Split Head."

Q: Was that because he parted his hair in the middle?

WILLIAMS: That's what I was told. Mike O'Daniel wrote back and he said, "He's the best regimental commander I ever knew in combat." So, the Vietnamese were of course probing me, who's going to take your place and so and so forth, and I said, "I don't know this officer," but I said, "General O'Daniel tells me he's the best regimental commander he ever knew, and so he must be pretty good, because General O'Daniel was a hell of a good division commander." So that was the only thing I could tell them, and I just told McGarr everything that I knew that was going on. That's where I left it with him. I was told later that General McGarr didn't like things the way he found them, and that surprised me, but then I was told that that was not unusual because that was his method of operation. Any outfit he went into he always took it apart and put it back together according to his own ideas, some people do that.

I hadn't put the two things together, but while he was commandant of the Command and General Staff College, I had sent back to the United States to the Command and General Staff College a few Vietnamese general officers. I was told later, much later, much later, several years later, that Diem had possibly developed an idea that some of his officers who had gone to school at the Command and General Staff College when McGarr was there as commandant, had gone in collusion with McGarr as to a coup d'etat. I thought to myself that's ridiculous, because knowing the Vietnamese officers as well as I did, I didn't believe any of them would be bold enough to go to a stranger, an American officer at the Command and General Staff school, and talk about a coup d'etat that was not going to take place until four or five years later. It just didn't make sense. Now of course, whether Diem actually thought that or ever expressed that opinion I don't know because there's any number of things that I was told that Diem expressed an opinion on, later, that I don't believe he did at all.

Q: What was your impression of General McGarr, or did you have a chance, really, to form one?

WILLIAMS: I didn't have a chance to form any definite impression of him at all. I thought he was very impatient to get started, and I could understand that. I tell you, I was so busy there at the last, I didn't have the time to sit down and try to analyze my successor.

Q: Now, he didn't last nearly as long in that.

WILLIAMS: Oh, he didn't last at all.

Q: What was the scuttlebutt on that?

WILLIAMS: Well, of course, the only thing I can tell you is pure gossip, which I don't like to participate in. I was told that he was relieved because of heart trouble. Now, whether he was or not, I don't know. I was also told that things had gotten into very bad condition, and he possibly was relieved because Washington thought he wasn't getting along very well.

Q: With who? With the Vietnamese?

WILLIAMS: Well, certainly not with Diem. An officer told me that after a while it became infrequent for him to be sent for to come to the Palace to talk with the President, and one time after he hadn't been to the Palace for maybe a month, when the President sent for him, he asked some of his staff, "What in the world will I talk to the President about?" Well, of course, something had happened there, and I have no idea what it was, because it had not been unusual for me to be at the Palace two or three times a week and anywhere from one to four hours at a time, and talk about everything under the sun. So for the President to go for a month without sending for the chief of MAAG, I just can't understand what the hell was going on.

Q: Something obviously was not right, is that your feeling?

WILLIAMS: There must not have been the close association there that Diem had with me. Maybe it'd be a good idea to interview McGarr.

Q: We're going to try. We're going to try. We're going to try to get to General Harkins pretty soon, too.

WILLIAMS: What'd you think about these other people? What about Major General Ruggles and--?

Q: I've written them all letters.

WILLIAMS: What about this man here at 5th Army Headquarters?

Q: I don't remember that name.

(Interruption)

Now, you left country in September of 1960, is that correct?

WILLIAMS: First day of September, yes.

Q: And a couple of months later there was an attempted coup. It failed. What was your reaction when you heard about that?

WILLIAMS: I thought it was ridiculous. The man who attempted to pull that coup was a brigadier general or maybe a colonel at that time by the name of Tri--T-R-I--and he had command of the paratroop brigade. It actually wasn't a brigade; he had about eight hundred paratroopers. But they like to call it a brigade--well, in the American army today we've taken every regiment of three battalions and we call it a brigade. I'm used to thinking about a brigade as being two infantry regiments. But I thought the coup was ridiculous, and I couldn't understand why they let it go as far as it did.

Q: By "they," who do you mean?

WILLIAMS: The Americans and the Vietnamese. I think that Tri--it's known now, or at least a lot of people believe it to be true--that Tri, even if he didn't have any encouragement from the Americans, nevertheless he found no opposition from them. For instance, there's a man by the name of Gene Gregory and his wife who were Americans, and they ran a newspaper in Vietnam.

Q: Was that the Times [of Vietnam]?

WILLIAMS: The Vietnamese Times I think was the name of it. I know that he was out of the country and she was there by herself; and she appealed to the American embassy for help, and she was ignored. Gregory resented that bitterly. But anyway, they asked me, someone asked me at one time--maybe it was you, but I think it was someone much earlier, a long time ago--what I would have done if I had been there, and I have said, I'd have gone up there and gotten hold of Tri and told him to get his damn paratroopers back in barracks or I was going to kick his ass clear across Saigon, and he would have done it. He would have done it just like that (snaps fingers) too. He's a good man, but he's had funny ideas, and one of them was that he thought he could pull a coup d'etat. But he would have obeyed me.

Q: What do you think was behind that? Why pull a coup d'etat?

WILLIAMS: Well, he possibly thought that Big Minh or Don or some of the others or Diem was going to try to pull one--maybe he thought he could beat them to it. Absolutely no understanding what he might think about anything like that. You know, to understand why a Vietnamese or any oriental will do anything, some say you have to think the way they do. Well, it's impossible for me to always think the way they do. I think sometimes I can think the way they do, but not always.

Now, what in the world Tri had in his mind, I don't know. But he certainly didn't intend to succeed, and I'm told that some of the marines, V.N. had a battalion of marines at that time--I don't know really if we had more at the time or not--but when I was there, the V.N. had about a battalion of marines. Some of the marines went down and joined Tri's outfit, and they surrounded the Palace, but one of the naval officers there called in his deputy and told him to take over the Naval Yard, that he was going to the coup. He took a company of marines and went up and told Tri he was going to help him and marched right on down and marched through the gates of the Palace, up into the Palace, and turned around and started shooting at the marines and paratroopers who were on the outside. And he became a favorite of President Diem after that, because there was a naval officer that the President hadn't paid much attention to prior to that time, who had taken a marine force and through guile had come through the lines, as they were, and entered the Palace and came to his help.

Now why did he do that? Did he know, did he have some instinct the coup was going to fall and he wanted to be on the right side? Or if he had that instinct, why didn't he say, "Well, I'm going to stay out of it entirely?" He didn't have to go up there. Why did he decide to go? Was that because of his admiration for Diem? Possibly. Diem certainly was not unpopular with the rank and file of the military.

Now, of course a lot of this that I'm telling you, I got from corresponding with Vietnamese or Americans long after I left Vietnam. Now I don't do that anymore, because there's no one over there, no Americans over there I care to correspond with, and the Vietnamese--I broke off with those people, corresponding with those generals shortly after the coup d'etat that killed Diem.

Q: Speaking of that coup d'etat, the one that ousted Diem, most Americans all during this time were baffled by the coups and the counter-coups, the attempted coups, I think because they couldn't understand what was behind it. Nobody could satisfactorily explain it. Did you ever try to explain it to anyone or could you explain it to anyone?

WILLIAMS: I have my own personal ideas about it, and it comes right back to the city of Washington in the United States. We had a man there that was Assistant Secretary of State for Southeast Asia--I think was his title--and he was anti-Diem, there's no doubt about that, and I think some of the American embassy in Saigon were anti-Diem and possibly part of the U.S. State Department was. So this Assistant Secretary wrote a message one day to Ambassador Lodge and called up John Kennedy on the telephone who was at Hyannis Port at that time and read the message to him, and Kennedy asked, "Does [Maxwell] Taylor"--who was at that time chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff-- "and McNamara"--who was Secretary of Defense--"Does Taylor and McNamara know about this?" The Assistant Secretary said, "Yes." And Kennedy said, "All right, send it."

Now, McNamara didn't know anything about it, and Taylor didn't know anything about it, and both of them said they didn't know anything about it when it finally came to light. This was Saturday about noon--Taylor knew about it Monday morning when he came to his office and the duty officer had a bunch of outgoing messages laid on his desk. He saw that, and from the description to me from a person who saw this happen, Taylor absolutely hit the ceiling and immediately got hold of people over in State and said, "Why did you dispatch this without giving me the courtesy of expressing an opinion?" I was told that McNamara did the same thing but not from an eyewitness account. The State Department people said, "Well, we sent it to your office, so we presumed you saw it." Well, that was too much. This was a message to Lodge to all intents and purposes saying we need a change on V.N. and let the conspirators go ahead. And Lodge did exactly that; he took off from the embassy and went to his quarters, and he stayed there, but he had a man by the name of [Lou] Conein I believe his name was. He was a CIA man. He was at the headquarters of the coup d'etat people, and who has since written and published the fact that he was in constant communication with Ambassador Lodge by both telephone and radio during the entire time and told Lodge exactly what was going on step by step. No one else, apparently, could get hold of Lodge, at least everyone said they couldn't. But anyway, Big Minh went ahead and pulled a coup.

Now I immediately said, "Well, what the hell was [Paul] Harkins doing during that time?" All right, Harkins' people, or Harkins himself--I can't say he did himself, because he didn't tell me personally but I believe it's been published that Harkins heard that this coup was in the mill, and he sent one of his staff officers to General Tran Van Don and asked "What about this coup d'etat that I hear about?" Tran Van Don says, "I don't know what you're talking about." So then Harkins dismissed it from his mind. Well, I could have told Harkins or anyone else that you can't send a staff officer to Tran Van Don or any other Vietnamese general's that worth a damn, and say, "What about a coup? Tell me about it." They're going to say, "I don't know anything about it." If Harkins himself had gone to Don, and if his relationship with Don was what it should have been, he could have said, "Don"--had him off in a parade ground or someplace like that and say, "Don, what the hell is this about a coup d'etat?" Don would very likely have told him the whole business. But he's not going to tell a third person. You see my point?

Q: Especially a staff officer.

WILLIAMS: Yes. And any third person, no one's going to do that. I don't believe if you're going to pull a coup d'etat in the United States you could do it that way. Well, they pulled a coup d'etat and I had told Diem--and he did it the first time when we had this one in November of 1960--I said "If you ever get in a difficulty and they start anything like this, coil yourself and take as good care of yourself as you possibly can and start talking. And keep in conversation, because as long as you can keep in conversation, they're going to make a mistake and you can take advantage of it. And get in some troops from outside that you can trust." All right, he did that exactly in 1960. He kept talking, and while they, the people, were horsing around there, the marines came through to back him up. He called up people on the radio from outside, and they moved in their troops, loyal officers came in (snaps fingers), Tri and his paratroopers had it. That ended the coup right then.

Well, I think he tried the same thing in 1963, because he was there quite a while before he and his brother left the Palace and went over to Cholon. But now we also want to remember--and none of them deny it; Don doesn't deny it, Big Minh doesn't deny it and no one else in that outfit ever denied it to my knowledge. They told Diem that "All you've got to do is surrender and we're going to accept your surrender, put you on an airplane, then send you out of the country." I think Diem carried out what I told him as well as he could. He talked as long as he could; he saw that he wasn't going to get any further with it, and he got into an automobile and went to Cholon. There was all kinds of things in the paper at the time about having an underground tunnel and all that stuff, which was pure newspaper rhetoric, it wasn't true at all. He merely got in an automobile and drove over there. That's all there is to it. Then he got over there, and he went into this church--he was an extremely devout man. His brother was, too, as far as I know--and then he called coup headquarters and said, "We're ready to surrender." They came over and picked him up; Major General Xuan was in command of the detail.

Q: Can you tell where your--is this from more or less first-hand sources?

WILLIAMS: Where did I get this information?

Q: Where did you get this? Now I know you weren't there personally.

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: But I know you have contacts.

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: And I want to know who you're citing here.

WILLIAMS: Well, I wouldn't attempt to tell you, because I don't remember. I was corresponding with several Vietnamese officers at that time or shortly thereafter--I said after a while ago I decided to break them off, break off those contacts--but where, I don't know who told me that. Part of it's covered by General Tran Van Don in his book. Don says that when--I've got to go back just a little bit and quote a dead man. There's a Catholic priest by the name of DeJeagher--now dead--

Q: Can you spell that?

WILLIAMS: De-J-E-A-G-H-E-R.

Q: That's good enough.

WILLIAMS: DeJeagher's picture was laying here on--well, here it is right here. See that man shaking hands with Diem? That came out of my files the other day. That's Father Raymond DeJeagher, and here's the way he--

Q: And that's President Chiang Kai-shek, isn't it?

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: And is that Minh in the background that I see?

WILLIAMS: That's Big Minh standing back behind there

Q: He was a big man.

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes. He was big. He was bigger than either you or I, which was very unusual for a Vietnamese.

Q: And this picture was taken in January, 1960 during his visit to Taiwan. All right, please go ahead, Sir.

WILLIAMS: Well, DeJeagher was a Catholic priest that was teaching school in China when the communists took over China and put him in prison and kept him in prison for a number of years--and when I say a number of years [I mean], what, five, ten, fifteen, something like that--and then released him. He continued on in Southeast Asia, and he was a very close friend of the Nationalist Chinese as contrasted to the Red Chinese, and he was a very close confidante of Ngo Dinh Diem. We got to be friends. And I corresponded with DeJeagher, up until he died which was maybe a year ago. Cancer.

Well, I got a lot of information from DeJeagher, because he knew the Vietnamese inside out, and he had a thorough network with his Chinese friends in that country. So I got a lot of information from him. But anyway, I've got it very firm in my mind, and I'll give it to you the best I can.

Diem and his brother called up the coup headquarters and told them they were ready to surrender, and they said they'd send for them. Some of the people that were in the convoy that went and got them were suspicious when they didn't send an automobile for them but sent an armored personnel carrier. So they put Diem and his brother in the back of this armored personnel carrier, and the convoy started off heading towards Saigon.

Q: Why would they be suspicious on that account? What was the significance of--?

WILLIAMS: Well here's a President of a country that's surrendering and has been promised that he'll be exiled and nothing else and sent out, and he gives himself up, and they send for him. They don't send a car for him but send a closed personnel carrier for him. An armored personnel carrier.

The fact that it's closed makes it--That's right. Because they never came out of it alive. Because when they got out of that thing, or were hauled out of it, Mr. Nhu had been stabbed repeatedly, and the President had been stabbed once or twice, and both of them had been shot repeatedly. And they dumped their bodies out on the ground there at the coup headquarters. Now, Don comes into it this way as I remember his statement in his book. He said that he had come into the headquarters where Big Minh was sitting--or standing, whatnot--and General Xuan walked in and said "The mission is accomplished." Don said, "I understood that to mean that the President and his brother were there at the headquarters, and I went out to arrange quarters for them, where we're going to put them up until the time we shipped them out." He said, "It wasn't until later that I found out that they both had been murdered." And he said, "I had nothing to do with it. I didn't know anything about it." But he says, "Big Minh had something to do with it, and Xuan had something to do with it because Xuan said 'the mission has been accomplished.'" !.Jell, anyway, Big Minh's aide-de-camp, who went out to Cholon to get them, was immediately arrested, and put in prison, then immediately hanged himself or was hung. So there goes your witness. Okay. Now, what was I leading up to? What was your question?

Q: I was asking you--

WILLIAMS: Where I found out all this.

Q: Well, you had answered that. My question I think was mainly, as an old China hand, so to say, weren't you called on by friends and acquaintances and media and so forth to try to explain at various times what is behind this seeming Vietnamese passion for overthrowing the government every couple of months? 1960 was only the first of a long series of coups and attempted coups.

WILLIAMS: I don't remember whether that many people asking me about it or not.

Q: Well, let me ask you.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, will you voice your question once more? Exactly what is your question?

Q: What is behind this apparent Vietnamese passion for coups? Now, I know it's a third world phenomenon, but we were primarily focusing on Vietnam, and I'd like your opinion on that. Americans could never understand it.

WILLIAMS: Well, I can't remember of a coup d'etat--of course I'm not too sure of my history--but I can't remember of a coup d'etat in Vietnam prior to the coup d'etat in 1960 that attempted to overthrow Diem by Tri and the paratroopers.

Q: True. But after that comes a whole series--

WILLIAMS: After that, sure. Every Tom, Dick, and Harry said, "It's my turn. I want to take a whirl at it."

Q: What do you think prompted the first one in 1960? Do you think it was simply officer ambition?

WILLIAMS: I think so. And stupidity.

Q: All right, let me ask one more question about this coup business and then I want to leave and go on.

WILLIAMS: Of course I think they were needled into this by everyone you could possibly think of.

Q: You think they were urged by Americans?

WILLIAMS: Yes, I think they were urged by some Americans. They were very likely urged by some French, they were urged by the North Vietnamese, they were urged by anyone that wanted to see that country go communist. Because in my discussions with these officers prior to my leaving there in 1960, anytime we talked about a coup, we ended up with a consensus that the only people who could ever benefit from a coup would be the communists. And they agreed to it.

Q: And that ended it.

WILLIAMS: That would end the discussion until the next time someone would say, "Hell, let's do such and such."

Q: There were reports that there was widespread celebration in Saigon when the news that the Diem government had been overthrown spread. I don't know what the reports were from the countryside. I don't remember even seeing a report from the countryside. Do you have an explanation for that? Was Diem that unpopular in Saigon?

WILLIAMS: No, couldn't have been. Couldn't have been.

Q: Well, then, why the mass demonstration?

WILLIAMS: Well, I don't know. Didn't we see a demonstration a few days ago where several hundred people appeared outside the White House up there clamoring because we'd sent some four, five or a dozen, fifty advisors down to El Salvador?

Q: Oh, yes, Sir, but I'm not--you can always find a few hundred people to demonstrate for anything. I realize that.

WILLIAMS: Okay.

Q: But these demonstrations were--at least they were reported to be, and reported across the board, every reporter said this, in the thousands and thousands of people. There were mobs of people in the streets of Saigon.

WILLIAMS: It could have been. I don't know; I wasn't there, but I didn't realize anything like that was going on. Of course, there had been the trouble with the Buddhists and coming back to Madame Nhu again, American reporters used the word barbecue, and she repeated it and thereafter no American reporters was ever quoted--it was always Madame Nhu talking about Buddhist barbecuing themselves.

Q: Oh, you think it was an American reporter who used that term first?

WILLIAMS: Why, it was published, it was an American reporter who used the term, said to the President or Madame Nhu, "The Buddhists have barbecued another man down here on the street. What about it?" And so she picked up the expression and immediately it went worldwide: "Madame Nhu's talking about barbecuing the Buddhists."

Q: And she got the credit?

WILLIAMS: She got the credit.

Q: Let me change my tape.

Q: Now, General, you have mentioned, in passing, the press in Vietnam a few times, and I would like to ask you to comment directly on the press. What would you say was the general caliber of the press who were covering Vietnam in the years when you were there?

WILLIAMS: Exceptionally poor. To the best of my knowledge, they had no regular assigned reporters out there, and they were relying on various and sundry people that in the newspaper vernacular I believe they call "stringers."

Q: Now the stringer, if I'm not mistaken, is a person who's paid by the column. He's not on a regular salary.

WILLIAMS: That's right. And he might write for this newspaper today and that one tomorrow and so on and so forth. Because I asked that question one time of one of these people. I said, "Where are you getting information, and who are your reporters?" and so forth. Now who that was I was asking, I don't remember, but it was someone in a position to know. They said, "Well, we don't have anyone out here. We just rely on stringers." And I said, "Well, why I'm asking is because I read a column here by a young man," and I happen to know that fellow, and I said, "he's barely out of his teens, he's half-French, half- Vietnamese, and I don't think he was too well-educated, and if he's getting coverage like this, it's astounding because, frankly, the man's not, he doesn't know what he's writing about." And they said, "Well, that's the risk we take."

Q: I want to ask you about a couple of individual reporters in particular to see if any of these strike a memory or whatever. The reason I'm mentioning these names is because a couple of people in the military have mentioned them to me as being one kind of reporter or another, and I want to see what your reaction is. Do you remember Till and Peg Durdin of the New York Times? Does that name ring a bell?

WILLIAMS: It does not.

Q: All right. How about Hank Liebermann, also of the New York Times?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Homer Bigart of the New York Herald-Tribune?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Here's one I think you might remember. John Mecklin of Life-Time.

WILLIAMS: I recognize his name, but I don't remember if I ever met him or not.

Q: Well, I think Mecklin wrote a book called Mission in Torment. Mecklin later became the public affairs officer for the embassy. He was a reporter, in other words, who changed sides, you might say.

WILLIAMS: I didn't know him.

Q: Okay. Did you know John Roderick of the Associated Press?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Okay. Were you able to stay abreast of developments in Vietnam after you retired? I know you said you were in correspondence with a number of people over there.

WILLIAMS: I'd like to go back to your last question.

Q: Oh, certainly.

WILLIAMS: I can't understand why I don't recognize those names. Now, even making allowance for poor memory after twenty some-odd years, I can never remember a newspaper correspondent or columnist coming to Vietnam that didn't contact me and ask [for] an interview, if you please, or a conversation, things of that nature. And there was never one turned down, and sometimes those things would last for hours. I'm thinking of people like Jim Lucas and maybe Maggie Higgins and, well, those are the only two names I can think of right at this particular moment.

Q: Well, let me ask you to comment on those two, Lucas and Higgins.

WILLIAMS: Well, I knew Jim Lucas previously, and I remember quite well his coming to Vietnam because the Secretary of the President called me and told me that a reporter by the name of Jim Lucas and some other man were at some place--either in Tokyo or Seoul, or some place else--and wanted a visa to come to South Vietnam, and what did I think about it? I said, "I know Jim Lucas--because I knew him in Korea and I think I knew him in Europe, but I wasn't too sure--"but the other man I don't know, and Jim Lucas is a good reporter and an honest man. I can't help you with the others."

Well, as it turned out, Jim Lucas got a visa to come to Vietnam, and the other man didn't. I didn't put much importance to it until the Ambassador said to me one day right after Jim Lucas got there, "How in the world did Jim Lucas get a visa to South Vietnam?" And I said, "Why, I don't know. Was there any problem?" And I related this instance I've just related to you. He said, "No one gets a visa to South Vietnam unless I say so. I said, "Mr. Ambassador, that's a stupid, goddamn remark to make." I said, "There's thousands of people come to Vietnam that you don't even know anything about."

Q: What was his reaction to that?

WILLIAMS: Well, he just sat there and looked at me. Of course it was true. Did he know every American, every Englishman, every Australian, every Frenchman, or anyone else that got a visa to come to South Vietnam? And the Vietnamese wouldn't dare to issue a visa without handing it to him for approval? Why, that's ridiculous, see? Well, stupid things like that were being said all the time. Well, anyway, that's what caused me to remember Jim Lucas, you see?

Then he went ahead with this conversation. He said, "Is Jim Lucas a friend of yours?" I said, "Not necessarily." I said, "I know him. He interviewed me in Korea when I commanded a Division up there, and I think he interviewed me when I had a Corps there, maybe when I was Deputy Army Commanding in Korea, I'm not sure." And I said, "Maybe I've talked to him in Germany. I don't remember." But I said, "I know Jim Lucas. I'd say, yes, I consider him a friend and at least an acquaintance." He said, "All right, now I want you to keep a diary, and every time you talk to Jim Lucas or he talks to you, I want you to write down exactly what the conversation was about, and I want you to report it to me." And in utter amazement I said, "Well, shall I tell Jim Lucas that I'm spying on him?" He said, "Of course not, goddamn it, don't tell anyone!" Well, I said, "You've just told a room full of people." And I said, "I'm not going to do it. Period." And I didn't do it. Now what he had against Jim Lucas, I haven't the slightest idea, but those were the kind of things that would--people would say, "why, what the hell happened at the country team meetings?" There's an example of what happened in one country team meeting. Apropos, nothing.

Van Fleet. General [James A.] Van Fleet was Commanding General of the 8th Army, when I first went to Korea. Van Fleet phoned me one time and he said, "I'm coming down to Vietnam"--no, he didn't phone me, he sent me a TWX--he said, "I'm coming to South Vietnam and Saigon, and I sure hope to see you." Well, I'd been a Division Commander under Van Fleet, and I knew him from Europe, too, and I liked him very much and had great admiration for him, and I thought that was fine. So when he came to Saigon, he phoned me, and I immediately invited him out the next day, or sometime soon--we'll say the next day--to come out and have a highball, a cocktail or something and invited some Vietnamese general officers to meet him. And also the V.N. Secretary of State for the Presidency.

We were having little pleasantries there, and I found out that he was representing some U.S. company that was selling some kind of equipment, electrical equipment or something else. What it was I don't know, and it was as immaterial to me at the time as it is now. But he said, "I'd like to talk to the President. Can that be arranged?" And I said, "Well, General, I don't see why it can't. Sitting in that corner right over there is the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State. Why don't you tell them and very likely they can arrange it." He walked right over and started talking to them, and the next day he had an appointment with the President, and he went up to see President Diem.

The next time we had an embassy meeting, the Ambassador said to the multitude, and looking at me, "How the hell did Van Fleet get an appointment with the President?" Someone said, "General Williams arranged it." I said, "You're mistaken. I didn't arrange an appointment with the President of South Vietnam with General Van Fleet, but if I'd been asked to, I would have." But I said, "Van Fleet was at my quarters, along with several Vietnamese, and he said that he wanted an appointment with the President, and I said, 'there's the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense. Why don't you talk to them?'" And I said, "He got it." Well, again, it's just like "no one gets a visa unless I say so." He says, "No one can have an appointment with President Ngo Dinh Diem without my permission." I just looked at him and laughed. Stupid. Incredible! I'm sure the British ambassador didn't call up Durbrow and ask if he could have an appointment with President Ngo Dinh Diem. You know, that's egotism to the extent that a person may be getting on the verge of incompetence. To me it is. Was it insecurity? Inferiority complex? The case of Van Fleet. The case of Jim Lucas.

Q: That's a good story.

WILLIAMS: These other reporters.

Q: How about Higgins, Maggie Higgins?

WILLIAMS: You know, I don't remember anything about Maggie Higgins, although I'm positive I engaged her in conversation or she engaged me in conversation. But I've read her books, or some of her writings.

Q: What did you think of them?

WILLIAMS: I thought they were excellent. I thought she had a very clear grasp of what the situation was.

Q: Did you read any of the reporters who came a little later, just after you left? Like-- well, I guess the most famous and obvious one was Halberstam--David Halberstam.

WILLIAMS: Oh, yes.

Q: What did you think of David Halberstam?

WILLIAMS: Terrible reporting.

Q: Terrible. What was wrong with him?

WILLIAMS: I didn't think he knew what he was talking about in the first place, and in the second place, I thought he was trying to undermine the Vietnamese government.

Q: He was one of the younger ones who was over his depth or out of his experience, would you say?

WILLIAMS: I thought so. That's a very bold thing for me to say, because he has quite a reputation--I presume he still has a reputation--as a writer, and I don't but if you ask me a layman's opinion, that's it. I considered him pink, if not red.

*Q: I think I missed Robert Shaplen. Do you ever read any of his things? Shaplen wrote one called The Road from War, and then he had an earlier book, too.*

WILLIAMS: No, I don't remember.

*Q: The Lost Revolution, I believe, is the name of it.*

WILLIAMS: But that thing that you so graciously gave me the other day which was an extract of U.S. News and World Report--I'll tell you how come that thing to be in existence. I had great admiration for the man who was running U.S. News and World Report at that time, long since deceased. And I was reading these reports from Vietnam, which I thought were terribly slanted or some of them were downright false and didn't jibe at all with what American officers were telling me, or writing me from Vietnam or what Vietnamese officers were writing. And I read one of these articles in U.S. News and World Report, and I sat down and wrote this gentleman. I wrote, "I'm a long subscriber to U.S. News and World Report, and I consider it one of the best, most informative magazines in the United States, and I've always relied on it," I said, "but I've just finished reading such-and-such an article--" and I don't remember the name of it or who wrote- "but it's the most astounding thing I ever read in my~.life because it's utterly false from beginning to end. And I think you should know that some of your readers have that kind of impression of it."

Well, by George, that opened the floodgates, and either by telegram, letters or telephone calls and so forth, they asked me if I would submit to an interview about South Vietnam, and I said "I certainly will, if you'll let me read what your people write before you publish it." Well and good. In no time at all, there two of them were right here at my gate, and that thing that you brought in to me the other day was the result of it. Now, who [was] the man that I was criticizing at that time, I don't know. But--

Q: Let me ask you about that interview. Did they in fact publish what you said? Did you approve of--?

WILLIAMS: Yes. You got it, right? You gave me a copy.

Q: Yes, I gave you a copy. I have one. Okay.

WILLIAMS: Yes. And they sent it to me in draft form, and I read it and put a note on there something to the effect, "I'm not going to attempt to correct the English. You people can do it better than I can. This is okay for publication as far as I'm concerned." And by George, they did it. Now, I think I was exceptionally fortunate. That magazine's bound to get a world of letters, and some secretary saw mine and for some reason, said, "Well, here's something that the top honcho should see," and pitched it into him and that was his reaction. It could just as easily have been thrown in the wastebasket.

Q: Well, some knowledgeable person screened the mail, that's all.

WILLIAMS: It could have been. It could have been.

Q: Well, do you want to add anything about the media, anything about the press that you haven't had a chance to stick in?

WILLIAMS: No, but I think that we've got the same thing coming up right now that we had then. We have a two-inch headline coming out in a very good newspaper that says "The Navy Goes to San Salvador" and you read it, you find out they sent five sailors. They raise the question, is this leading to another Vietnam? Well, to me that's someone that's attempting to manipulate the American public to make them scared of what the administration is trying to do. That's my firm conviction. And there's so many people that have no more idea about what the advisors did in South Vietnam or anything else about South Vietnam, that they can say, "Well, is this another South Vietnam?" And everyone immediately screams.

Now, what was wrong with South Vietnam? First of all, I don't think we should have fought there, and I don't think there was any reason for us to have fought there, and I sincerely believe that if Ngo Dinh Diem had stayed alive that we would not have fought there. I think he would have come to accommodation with Ho Chi Minh. President Diem told me that he knew Ho Chi Minh very well, and Ho Chi Minh offered him a place in his government in Hanoi. They were on speaking terms; they could negotiate. I think that-- and I mentioned in that U.S. News and World Report thing if I remember correctly--that every time anyone came to Vietnam--that is, I'm talking about American officialdom-- they had audiences with the President, and I would say nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, I would be present, and never did I hear any of them say anything except sometime during the conversation, "Mr. President, you're doing exactly right. We're behind you 100 per cent. You keep on pitching, and we're going to back you up to the hilt." From congressmen, senators, vice president of the United States--Nixon came there as vice president of the United States--generals, four-star generals from chief of staff of the army right straight on down to maybe commanding general of the U.S. Army of the Pacific--they'd all say the same thing. President Diem had an idea, I'm afraid that he got an idea, "I can go as far as I want to because the United States is going to back me up."

Q: Some people say that his attitude was, "They're going to back me up because they haven't got any option and they've got to back me no matter what I do."

WILLIAMS: He could have thought that, but I wouldn't say that I thought he thought it, because I couldn't see that far into the man's brain. The option was, of course, just for us to pull out lock, stock and barrel. That could have been done easily, just like that (snaps fingers). And any number of times I thought we were going to do it.

Q: Oh, really? When did you think they were going to do it?

WILLIAMS: Well, when I kept asking for people. As I said before, I had about four hundred and forty-two people I inherited when I took over--were there when the French were there--and we were able to increase that a little by pulling in teams to do this and teams to do that, and they'd come in and stay a few months and then go back out, and that would satisfy the International Control Commission. I wanted at least two thousand advisors there, and I needed them very badly because--I imagine they're running into the same thing down here in El Salvador--you have motors, you have motorboats, you have tanks, you have different kind of weapons and so forth; you have spare parts, and you have to store them properly so that you can fill requisitions on them. You got to know where the spare parts are--you've got to have spare-part bins for this, spare-part bins for that--and you've got to have someone that's cognizant with the weapon or the material that you're using to know how to store those things and to teach someone else how to issue them. You have ammunition to store. It's just as simple as that. The two thousand advisors I wanted--I wanted advisors down a little bit below division level, and I wanted to get down to regimental or battalion level, if possible, and I wanted to get people in it that could deal more with the finance and with the supply and logistics and motors and schools and things of that nature. Not necessarily to get out there and take a carbine or an M-1 rifle and go help run down some damn guerrilla. But they wouldn't give them to me. And I don't know when they broke that, but I think it was after Diem's death in 1963 before they ever broke that. I'm not sure.

Q: Well, I know at the time of President Kennedy's death, which was just a month later, we had sixteen thousand.

WILLIAMS: No, couldn't have?

Q: Yes, Sir.

WILLIAMS: Sixteen thousand? But that was in 1963. They should have been furnished in 1957.

Q: Yes, Sir.

WILLIAMS: Well, they didn't wait until Diem died then before they started pushing them in?

Q: No, they started pushing them.

WILLIAMS: Are these troops or advisors you're talking about?

Q: Total. Total American military.

WILLIAMS: Yes?

Q: Military of all kinds.

WILLIAMS: Well, I imagine then by that time you very likely had some Green Berets in there?

Q: Yes, and they were getting advisors down at regimental level by that time.

WILLIAMS: Yes?

Q: Did any subsequent administration ever call on you for advice, consult with you, contact you in any way? Kennedy or Johnson?

WILLIAMS: Not really. I went up, was invited up to the Military Academy to make an address in May of 1961, I think. Couldn't have been 1971--that was too long later. But on the way back, General [Edward] Lansdale asked me if I would come by Washington and serve there as consultant for a few days, and I said yes.

Q: Now let me clarify this. Was General Lansdale still working for Defense at this time, or was he retired and working for State, or do you recall?

WILLIAMS: As I remember he was in uniform. And in the Pentagon.

Q: Okay.

WILLIAMS: So I'd say he was with Defense. And I did that. While I was there, someone--and I don't know who it was, but anyway, I was sent down into the bowels of the Pentagon where Max Taylor and Burke, Admiral Burke--

Q: Arleigh Burke?

WILLIAMS: Yes. And Bob Kennedy were investigating the debacle of the Bay of Pigs, and I was given a desk in a small room there, and they started throwing large, manila envelopes at me--

-larger than I'd ever seen before, at least two feet by two feet square--and on the upper left-hand corner, they had on there the White House, and down at the bottom it was addressed to--if I remember correctly--General Taylor. These were plans, contingency plans. And I was told to go through those plans and to make comments as to whether or not they were up to date, or if they were workable or whatnot and so forth. So that's what I started doing.

Q: Now what did these contingency plans--what were they for? What contingencies were they for?

WILLIAMS: Fighting anyplace in the damn world that you could think of, as I remember.

Q: Okay. All right. These were not specifically Vietnam?

WILLIAMS: No. But my memory is vague.

Q: General military situation.

WILLIAMS: That's right.

Q: All right.

WILLIAMS: And at first, I was going about it in very careful manner and making detailed comments, and finally it got to the degree I would take one of them, glance at it, scan it, and write across it "Obsolete. Worthless," and throw it back out.

Q: Were they so bad? Were they that far out of date?

WILLIAMS: Yes. To me they were, yes. And while I was doing that, I was called out one day, and Bob Kennedy and Taylor were there--Burke was not--and Kennedy started asking me questions about Vietnam.

Q: Can you recall any detail of these questions?

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: What was he after? What was he trying to--

WILLIAMS: I don't know. When he got through asking questions--Taylor didn't say anything, he just sat there and listened. Kennedy started out by saying, "I've heard a great deal about you, and I want to ask you some questions." I said, "Okay." And, of course, I must admit, I didn't look upon Bob Kennedy with the great reverence that some people did. To me he was just another young man. The fact that his brother was President of the United States and he'd been appointed Attorney General didn't make a damn bit of difference to me. He looked like he might be a very young Major in the army, as far as I was concerned, which was possibly a wrong attitude to take, but it wasn't anything disrespectful. But I didn't look upon him as one of America's great heroes, martyrs, as he turned out to be, unfortunately.

But anyway, he asked me a lot of questions, and when he got through, he said to Taylor, "I've learned more about Vietnam from General Williams than I have from anyone else since I've been in this headquarters, in the Pentagon." And he said, "Don't let that man get away." Then as he went out the door he said to me, "As I've said before, I've heard about you, and you're supposed to be a pretty hard person. How would you like to go to Vietnam as ambassador?" And I said, "I wouldn't like it at all." And he said, "Why?" And I said, "Well, I'm not a professional foreign affairs officer, and when political appointees go in jobs like that, the State Department old hands tear them apart." I said, "They'd crucify me before I'd been there six months." And I said, "That's the only reason why I think it would be wrong for me to go out there as an ambassador." Frankly, I doubt seriously he had the slightest intention of me ever going out there as ambassador, but, hell, you can't tell from the people that they have appointed.

Q: Now, let me ask you this. Since you express that opinion, what did you think when Max Taylor went as ambassador? Because clearly the same objections would apply.

WILLIAMS: No, Max was a politician in addition to being a superior army officer. Max is a very astute politician, and his association was so close with the Kennedy family--they named one of the children after him--that the foreign affairs cadre over in the State Department couldn't have touched him. I don't think they could. They may have; I don't know. Well, anyway, I guess I was a little bold when he said, "I've heard about you, and you're supposed to be a pretty tough nut to crack." He said, "How would you like to go out and be ambassador to Vietnam? I said I didn't want to. And I said, "Now, as far as being a tough nut's concerned, you're getting a pretty good reputation yourself." I said, "All I hear is that you're one of the hardest people around Washington, D.C." And I said, "If people are calling and referring to me as an old son of a bitch now," I said, "they're going to be calling you one at the same time, if they're not already doing it." Kennedy looked at me and laughed, and said, "Adios" or something like that and walked out the door. He seemed to be a very pleasant fellow. Now I wouldn't say that that was asking me for advice, but no one else ever did. Now, I will say this, that after [General Creighton] Abrams became the CG in Vietnam-

Q: Now this would be about the summer of 1968, wouldn't it? I believe that's correct, because [General William] Westmoreland came back about June of 1968.

WILLIAMS: Okay. It would be after that. Well, then, maybe it was before he became CG. But we had a mutual friend. An officer that had served with me quite often. He retired--major general, he's dead--and he had served with me in Vietnam, too, and I knew Abrams fairly well. Abrams and I had known each other some time. We weren't intimate friends, but we were pretty close to it, and I'd known him since Germany. I knew he was busy, and I never was presumptuous enough to write him and tell him that he should do this, that and another, but I had a friend that was on his staff that was very close to him, so when I had ideas I'd write this friend of mine and say, "Next time you're talking to Abe, you might suggest this, that and another. And whether you attribute it to me is immaterial, but it might be something for him to think about." And sooner or later I'd get back word, well, Abe bought it or he didn't buy it.

Q: Do any of these stand out in your mind, any of your suggestions or ideas?

WILLIAMS: None that I'd care to talk about now. Both these people are dead, and the war's over. But I didn't think the war was being fought properly, but I also didn't believe that Abrams had much control over it. I didn't believe that CINCPAC had a hell of a lot of control over it, nor the U.S. Army of the Pacific, and I think now historically we know it was controlled almost entirely from the Oval Room at the White House and was terribly bitched up. There's where I cross with you and your friends, or the people that employ you. But--

Q: Well, you won't cross us. That man is dead and gone, too, after all. (Laughter)

WILLIAMS: Yes, but this all goes into his building. Now, not long ago, Roche, who used to be a terrible liberal and has changed considerably--

Q: You're speaking of John Roche, now?

WILLIAMS: Yes--made a remark in one of his columns that he walked into the Oval Room one day, and there was Lyndon Johnson and Bus [Earle G.] Wheeler and McNamara fussing over a damn map on the wall, deciding which one was going to stick a pin in to show where the next bombing target was going to be. Well, that's absolutely ridiculous. You can't fight a war that way, and we found it out. We got ourselves in a terrible jam. If you read--I don't know whether you have time to do it or not--but if you read some of the analysis now of our air force activities during the Vietnamese War, you'll find out that our B-29s that, or 52s, whatever those biggest bombers were, that were flying out of Guam, very, very small per cent of those--less than 5 per cent ever bombed North Vietnam. They were bombing in South Vietnam. On the other hand, we were taking fighter bombers and sending them up to North Vietnam and losing aviators almost every day. That was mismanagement, entirely mismanagement.

Some of these aviators have written, and it's been published in such a thing as the Armed Forces Journal and other military publications--I think I'm quoting the Armed Forces Journal correctly--where that some of the very senior officers in the air force, or at least the field grade officers resigned because of the damn ridiculous orders they were getting as naval aviators flying off of carriers and going over Hanoi. I remember reading one of them not too long ago where he said that on such-a-such a night they went in there and not a plane was allowed to carry a bomb; the only thing that they could carry was flares. And he talked about their losses and so forth. Hell, you can't fight a war like that. We would have won that war easier than I could drive from here to San Antonio--city of San Antonio--if they'd let us alone. Now, if Westmoreland couldn't have done it, they could have jerked him and put someone in there that could have done it. They had plenty of people could have done it. Abrams could have done it.

Stop to think how ridiculous this is. Now an army officer of some experience, Abrams didn't even command the air force in Vietnam. He didn't command the damn marines; he didn't command anything but army. Westmoreland was the same. You had no unified commander. Even President Diem--when I was told in the greatest confidence to find out what President Diem thought about unified command--I asked him--and I was told never to let anyone know I did it. Well, hell, that's so long ago it doesn't make any difference now. But anyway, he didn't know what unified command was, and I started in back in World War I and told him how the Allies had to finally decide on General Foch to be commander, to coordinate things and how in World War II, why, we had a unified command down in Africa, and finally in France we had unified command with General Eisenhower operating with [Omar] Bradley and [Bernard] Montgomery as subordinates.

I said, "Now, that's unified command. Now, if we have a fight here, and American troops come in, is everyone going to go and have their own show or are we going to have one man in command and let him fight the damn war?" I said, "Now, our concept is that, like Eisenhower's headquarters at least--so I was told--that if you have an American commander, you have a deputy that's opposite. For instance, Eisenhower's deputy was a man named [Arthur] Tedder; he was a British flier." And I said, "Right on down the line. If we have a war over here, if you have a Vietnamese commander, then you ought to have an American deputy commander or vice versa." Diem said, "Who would do that?" I said, "If the fight's tomorrow, it'll be me. How long that'll last, I don't know. He said, "If it starts tomorrow," he said, "you'll be commander." He said, "You'll command Vietnamese forces as far as I'm concerned." Well, hell, we would have sold on that thing. Lord, goodness, here and I've passed that on to people that told me to get the answer to that question, who were military people. But, by George, we ended up--the army commander over there commanded army, the navy commander commanded navy, the air force commander commanded air force--and hell, who in the world organized and coordinated? Nobody. You can't fight a war that way, and we found it out.

Q: And the ARVN went one way and we went another way.

WILLIAMS: Absolutely. Absolutely. There was no [coordination]. You can't saddle that on Ahe. You can't saddle it on Westmoreland, except I think Westmoreland should have objected to it strenuously. And there was so damn much jealousy, I can't think it was anything but jealousy that CINCPAC would not realize that someone on the ground should be commanding there and not back at CINCPAC or back at the U.S. Army Pacific.

My impression is that once the war heated up that CINCPAC virtually got shoved out of the circuit and maybe it was--

Q: My impression is that once the war heated up that CINCPAC virtually got shoved out of the circuit and maybe it was--

WILLIAMS: I'm afraid they did.

Q: --between JCS and Commander, MACV.

WILLIAMS: I'm afraid they did. We have had American aviators publish articles in which they said they'd be on carrier, and a telephone conversation would come through directly from the President of the United States to a carrier telling them what they're going to do on their next flights out. Well now, my Lord, you could say that as much as this nation idolizes George Washington, hell, old George Washington couldn't have done that. It's impossible. So that's where we lost.

Now then, where did Vietnam get its bad name? Okay, they started their draft, or they had their draft going and the draft didn't work properly. If a kid had money enough to go to school or any reason to get excused from the draft, he got excused from the draft. Thousands of them went to Canada; that paid off because later when the administration, another administration came in, that said, "King's X. Everything's free. Come on back." Okay. Now we had a lot of kids going to school and they said, "All right, I'm in school because I'm a student. All right, I'm going to graduate next year. What the hell, the army going to get me?" Well, the best way to stop that is to start bitching about the war. So your students started, and they were ably assisted by all agitators, both pink and red as well as white. All these agitators immediately helped them, and the first thing you know all the students throughout the United States were saying what a horrible thing Vietnam is. First thing you know you have the entire American public mind poisoned about Vietnam. That's why I was very glad to see Mr. Reagan come out the other day and said it wasn't criminal to be a soldier in Vietnam during the war. Well, that's just an old soldier's viewpoint of things.

Q: I want to ask you a wide-open question.

WILLIAMS: Okay.

Q: Will you compare the performance of the country team under Ambassadors [G. Frederick] Reinhardt and Durbrow?

WILLIAMS: Yes.

Q: Would you do that for me?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Under Mr. Reinhardt we had a good, working country team as far as I could tell, and we had no dissension. I never knew of any serious dissension taking place there. It was just the difference between daylight and dark. Now, I don't say that because Reinhardt and I were personal friends, we were not. We were on good speaking terms, but he was the ambassador, he represented the country. I never saw him do anything that would cause me as an American to be embarrassed, and I never saw him get up, for instance, in front of a mixed crowd and strip down to his shorts and put on a belly dance. Vulgar things like that. Reinhardt was a gentleman, and he conducted himself as such. At parties and so forth, if he got up to give a toast, he got up and read a toast off a card that he'd written in French. Everyone accepted it, and he was just what I considered a top-rate American ambassador.

Q: Very professional?

WILLIAMS: Very professional, and I thought very understanding. Now, that doesn't mean to say that Reinhardt and I didn't have differences, but any differences we had were absolutely minor. He phoned me one time, "Tanks are going by my quarters over here, been going by here for an hour--going down to the docks, being loaded up. The French are shipping all these tanks out." He said, "Why don't you stop them?" I said, "Fine. The French have the bayonets; I don't have any," and hung up. That's all there was to it. The French had a regiment of Foreign Legionnaires right there. They could do anything they wanted to, and they did do anything they wanted to. Mr.

[John Foster] Dulles came over there. I told him, "The French are stealing us blind." He says, "Hell, I know it. There's nothing unusual about that," or words to that effect.

Anything that Reinhardt and I ever had differences on amounted to nothing. I had quite a bit of admiration for him. No one would disparagingly refer to him as a "ladies shoe salesman."

Q: How did things change when Ambassador Durbrow came in?

WILLIAMS: Well, I don't think I can elaborate on that any more than I have already. I think they got petty. If Reinhardt had been strongly adverse to President Ngo Dinh Diem, he never indicated it in my presence. I'm sure that none of the American staff there--I'm talking about USIS and the CIA and USOM, certainly not MAAG--if anyone had any idea that he was violently opposed to the Vietnamese or to the regime of President Diem, he gave no indication of it by word or action in my presence at any time. He conducted country team meetings in a professional manner.

Q: Do you think the difference between Reinhardt and Durbrow was a matter of policy or personality?

WILLIAMS: I think, well, I'd start off first by thinking it was personality, or it could be that Durbrow was getting new instructions from stateside or maybe he wasn't. Maybe his messages back stateside were written in such a way that State could take them this way or that way because I, when I got my hands on them, I used to study those things line by line and paragraph by paragraph and often when I'd get through with a couple of pages of a dispatch that had been sent back there, I couldn't tell what the hell--whether he was for or against the subject.

Q: You didn't ordinarily see the dispatches between State and the Ambassador.

WILLIAMS: No.

Q: Did you see them under Reinhardt?

WILLIAMS: Yes, as far as I know.

Q: But that stopped with Durbrow? Was that abrupt?

WILLIAMS: I don't know whether it was abrupt or not. I never had any occasion to question anything that was put out under Reinhardt. There could have been things that I didn't know about, wasn't familiar with, but I became very cognizant under Durbrow because--here's an instance that occurred which I thought was not exactly right. The chief of staff of CINCPAC sent me a message and said, "We want your detailed analysis, comments, et cetera of a message sent by the embassy to State Department, number such- and-such on such-and-such a date. Soonest." I called for it; we didn't have it in MAAG files. I picked up the telephone and called the embassy and I said, "Do you have such-and- such a communication?" "Well, let us check. Yes, we do." I said, "Will you furnish me a copy of it?" "Yes, we'll send you a copy." Now, who I was talking to, I don't know--some clerk up there. So they: sent me a copy of it, and I sat down and read that thing, page after page, with utter amazement. So I sat down, in longhand myself, and wrote out almost sentence by sentence my objection to the concept that had been advanced in this--

Q: Do you recall what the substance of the matter was?

WILLIAMS: No. It was a policy paper. And when I got through, I had it typed up and proofread it and so forth and signed it and sent it to CINCPAC. The first thing I knew, the Ambassador phoned me and said, "We have a message from State Department saying that they don't entirely agree with my letter of such-and-such a date, and furthermore, you don't either." And I said, "Is that such-and-such?" And he said, "Yes." And he said, "Why did you coherent on it?" I said, "I had a direct order from CINCPAC to comment on it and direct it to them soonest without delay. I asked your office for a copy of it, and they gave me a copy, and I sat down and made my comments and sent them in."

Then he issued an order, a directive. It was really a whopper. He said, "Hereafter, you will send no communication of any importance to CINCPAC or any other headquarters outside of Vietnam without it being proofread and approved by this headquarters, by this embassy. I said, "All right, but you want to remember that I may get instructions to answer a communication by fastest method possible, and that means that I'm going to get an answer out within less than twenty-four hours. If I sent it up here for you to proofread and approve, and you let it lay on your desk for two or three days or a week or so--which has happened in the past on various papers that I've presented," I said, "that's going to get me into a terrible jam." He said, "I'll take care of that." So, after that, anytime that I sent to a high headquarters a comment on anything or any paper of any importance at all, I had to send it to the embassy and get it initialed by the Ambassador before I could dispatch it. And sometimes that would be anywhere from twenty-four hours to ten, fifteen days.

Q: What did CINCPAC think of that?

WILLIAMS: They told me not to pay any attention to the Ambassador's directive.

Q: That kind of puts you between a rock and a hard place.

WILLIAMS: Yes. But you see, CINCPAC was my immediate military superior. And here you see a MAAG chief is put in a delicate position. He has a military superior that's giving him orders, he's got a civilian superior that's giving him orders, and no man--the Bible says it--can serve two masters at one time. And anytime you try it, you're going to get in a jam.

Now, I found out that this was not an isolated case. I had people visit me from Japan and the Philippines and people I could trust and talk to--army officers--and I'd say, "What the hell goes on here?" I said, "This situation here is outlandish." I said, "We're just at each other all the time, and I get some of the craziest orders that a person could conceive of." And any number of times, well, several times, they said, "Why, you don't know half the story." "Why, you're getting along fine down here." "You ought to see what's happening between the Ambassador and the Chief of MAAG up in Tokyo." Or they said, "Do you have any idea what's going on between the Ambassador and the Chief of MAAG over in Manila?" I said, "It couldn't be worse than this."

"It's much worse." So I thought to myself, "Well, that's something the American government's got to work out; that's beyond me."

Q: General, looking back now, do you see any turning points, any crucial decision, any point in time during your tour in Vietnam when you were still there, that you wish had happened differently or that you wish you had done differently? Anything crucial, anything that stands out in your mind at all.

WILLIAMS: No, I can't think of any one thing. I've often said that anytime there's trouble between two people, or two headquarters, probably both are partially responsible. One might be more responsible than the other, but the other's going to be partially responsible. So I thought many times, "What could I have done to have kept better relations between MAAG and the embassy?"

Q: And you're speaking of Durbrow's tenure now?

WILLIAMS: Yes. And I don't know what in the world I could have done and still carried out the orders that I had, the directive I had when I went over there. Then too, I've often wondered why I wasn't able to make an impression on Big Minh and Don and those people that would have lasted longer than three years. I had a letter--first of all, when I left there, President Diem told me that he was soon inviting me back to visit Vietnam as a guest of the country. And I had a letter from him to that extent after I'd been home about a year, and it said, "You'll hear from me through the Vietnamese embassy." Well, I never did hear from him, or I never did hear from the Vietnamese embassy. Now, I'm sure that if he sent such an invitation, it was stopped on purpose by the V.N. Ambassador who's on a different side of the fence from myself.

I had at least one Vietnamese officer, general, of some importance write me one time-- prior to the coup--and said, "You promised that you were coming back, and if you're coming, you must come soon. You have been gone too long now." Or words to that effect, see? And I thought to myself, "Well, now, if I had taken the bull by the horns and realized that it was possible that the Vietnamese Ambassador or the American Ambassador was keeping me from going back over there, I should have applied for a visa and gone over on my own and talked to these generals and said, 'What's going on here? I've been gone too long. What the hell are you people plotting?'"

Now, this is going to sound egotistical as hell, but it's possible that if I had had enough foresight to do that, or enough intelligence to do that, or enough get-up-and-go to do it, I could have stopped something. I might have stopped that coup d'etat, then--carry my theory on--if Diem had lived, had stopped the damn war and saved how many thousands of American soldiers that were killed in Vietnam.

Q: But could you have made any difference with Lodge in the picture in the way that he was?

WILLIAMS: I doubt it seriously, but maybe I could have neutralized him, if that's the proper word. I wouldn't have attempted to confront Lodge.

I would merely have talked to the Vietnamese. How strong, what kind of hold he had on the Vietnamese, I don't know. I don't believe he had very much. But he could have.

The other day, you were asking me a question about Lansdale, and I said I hadn't corresponded with him very often. And cogitating on that, I wondered if you had something particular in mind, because I think maybe that I've corresponded with Lansdale more than my answer may have indicated. I don't know exactly what I did answer you when you asked me about Lansdale.

Q: I asked you if you had much contact with him after he went back to the States in 1956, and the reason I ask is because I know that he was continuing to work on Vietnamese problems while he was in Washington, and I thought perhaps that had been an occasion for you to correspond.

WILLIAMS: Well, we have corresponded. Not over anything of particular importance that I can remember.

Q: I was thinking specifically of the time when you were in Vietnam between, well, I guess about 1957 and 1960. I thought perhaps there was an official connection there, since he was continuing to work on Vietnam back in Washington.

WILLIAMS: No. We have corresponded to this extent. He writes to me occasionally, I write to him. His wife died; he wrote and told me about it. He married one of the people that worked for him when he was over there. He's very happy with his new life. I think he's consulted by the Military History Division of the Department of Army at times; it's run by a brigadier general by the name of [James L.] Collins.

Incidentally, you asked me a question here one time that I could have elaborated on. Collins's people have been down here; one of them came down here and spent a week at least going through my files and xeroxing records and taking them up there. I don't have much to do with them anymore because I've lost faith in them. They sent me a draft and said they were preparing a history on Vietnam, and they sent me a draft covering the period 1954 to 1960 and said, "If you have any changes or suggestions, make them on the margin, and we'd appreciate it."

Well, I mulled over that a little while and I sit down at this old typewriter and took out some foolscap paper and wrote them five or six pages, almost paragraph by paragraph of what they'd said was wrong and what I thought was wrong and sent it back to them. Then I wrote to an officer up there, an ex-officer that I'd known that had written some books and had been kind enough to send me an autographed copy--and I think his name was [Charles] MacDonald. Does that name mean anything to you? I told him, "If you're still with that outfit up there, you sure better do some looking around. I've got this thing down here and I've written a number of pages." I said, "The stuff that the historical section put out on World War II," I said, "I used some of those things as reference datas." Well, hell, here's one of them right here, for instance. That's Rearming the French. That's put out by that office.

I said, "That's some of the best stuff I ever read. Beside [that] this thing that they sent down here is atrocious. And if that office can't do as good as it did on World War II, I think you ought to do something about it." He wrote back and told me, "We have examined your comments. We had a murder board here, and your comments were discussed, and we've decided, in view of your comments and others--"and he didn't say who the others were--"that the work was not of satisfactory stature, and we've given the historian twelve months to rewrite." And he says, "I can assure you that when we do publish, it'll be as good as anything we published on World War II, or it won't be published at all." "Sincerely and cordially" and so forth, and that's the last I heard.

But I heard no more about that. Then I got another letter from some other man--I don't know who he was, I don't remember his name--he said, "We're making a pictorial history of the Vietnamese War and we find that we have no pictures for our pictorial history prior to 1960, and we're about to go to press. Can you furnish me any pictures that could be included in such a volume?" Well, I wrote back and I said, "I'm sure that I have a lot of pictures here, filed away in this place and that and another, but I have none immediately available." And I said, "Here's two or three that are available, and I'll send those to you." And I sent them to him, and I got back an answer. He said, "Well, these are fine and we'll hold them and see whether we use them or not, but we were looking for something less formal." He said, "We're about to go to press until we discovered here that we had nothing prior to 1960." So I wrote back and I said, "How in the hell can you put out a pictorial history of South Vietnam and have it start some time in 1960?" I said, "You remember the French fought a war out there, and we got our nose in it in 1954, and that's six years before your history begins."

Q: I was going to say you need to go back to about 1945, I would say, if you want to pick it up at the beginning.

WILLIAMS: So that's the last of those people, and as I say, I've lost faith in them. So when they start talking about records--other people have talked to me about records. People at the University of Texas, egged on by some of my University of Texas alumni friends, communicated with me, and I answered their letters and so forth, and they suggested eventually that I put my files down in the University of Texas museum at El Paso, Texas. One of my very good friends was Slam Marshall. His records are there. Then for some reason or another, somehow or another, the Hoover Institution of War, Peace and Revolution got hold of my name out at Stanford, and they wrote me a letter, and I started corresponding with them, and I ended up by shipping lock, stock and barrel.

Addendum

WILLIAMS: As this is the end of this interview let me summarize by repeating that when I was sent to South Vietnam in 1955 my Directive was a) to organize, train, and equip a South Vietnamese army, navy, and air force; b) that I was to support the regime of President Ngo Dinh Diem.

This Directive was not changed during my tour in Vietnam which was extended from the normal two year tour to five years.

I would be remiss if I did not include remarks about the U.S. military personnel assigned to help me as Chief of MAAG. Without exception the officers, NCOs, and soldiers assigned by the army, the navy and the marines, and the air force, especially the army, were of a high calibre. Far above the average. Several of the army officers went on to higher rank and some eventually retired as general officers. More should have.

We had no disciplinary problems among the U.S. military and the use of drugs or the excessive use of liquor was unknown. No commander could have asked for better help. The problem was the numbers were inadequate for the tasks at hand. This shortage was not corrected until several years after I'd left Vietnam.

CHRISTIAN A. CHAPMAN
Political Officer
Saigon (1957-1958)

Christian A. Chapman served 10 months in Saigon (1957-1958) before being transferred to Laos. He was born in 1921 in France of American parents. He entered the Foreign Service 1951, serving in Morocco, Lebanon, Iran, Luxembourg, Paris, and Cyprus. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Your next post Saigon, was another trouble spot. How did this happen?

CHAPMAN: I was in the foreign service to be active. It was a French speaking area, and it was going through a difficult period. I was single and that was a factor. I was sent as deputy chief of the political section, which was a very nice promotion. This was in 1957.

I was acting chief for several months because the previous chief had left. Tom Bowie, the new political Counselor, came in three or four months later. It was fun.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

CHAPMAN: Durbrow. Durbrow came in after Reinhardt and Daniel Anderson was the DCM. As a Foreign Service tit-bit, the administrative counselor asked me to stay in the residence to keep an eye on things in the interim between the two ambassadors. I jumped at the chance and there gave some of the best parties ever in my whole career. It was elegant living!

Q: What was the situation as you saw it in 1957?

CHAPMAN: I think all of us felt it very difficult to penetrate the Vietnamese situation. I attended a number of so called political meetings and there were a lot of formalized speeches in Vietnamese. Not knowing Vietnamese it was difficult really to get a grasp of the reality of political life. Diem and his family were very close knit, and completely ran the show, which was in the tradition of the country. Flowering democracies are not many in this world.

There was no political party that was impressive as such or that you could determine its true configuration. The country had completed what I call the French chapter in 1954 with the signing of the Geneva Agreement and the departure of the French administration. Many of us were disquieted by the tensions that existed between French and Americans and it just happened that there was a group of recently arrived young American officers who spoke French well and were trying to bridge the gap between the French and ourselves. Some Americans were coming over and saying, "well, now that we're here, we are going to save the situation, and the French don't know how to do anything. They fought the war poorly but now we're going to be here and teach the Vietnamese how to fight."

These were American military officers mostly. Particularly, the more senior officers. The captains and lieutenants who had been out in the field, had a much better appreciation of what was involved than the colonels and generals.

The lieutenant general in charge of the MAG at that time was called Hanging Sam Williams, because he had been responsible at Nuremberg for overseeing the execution of the prisoners condemned to death.

The junior officers had a better sense of the nature of the insecurity, than the senior military coming out of World War II. The latter tended to be disparaging of the French; the junior officers, both military and civilian, felt that this was not a terribly intelligent attitude, because the French had a good understanding of the country and still held very important positions. To start with, the Vietnamese leadership spoke French more than English and still felt surprisingly warmly towards France. There were French schools and French businesses were still a major factor. So most of us thought it was better working with them rather than against them.

1957 was a year of restoring relations between the French and American embassies. We managed quite well but with the military it remained difficult. These were also some of the rare years of peace between 1954 and 1960, when the war heated up again. In 1957, you could actually drive a car from Saigon all the way to the highlands. There was a remarkable sense of security and it was a beautiful country. The people are hard working and interesting. Very pleasant and interesting posting.

Q: Did you feel optimistic about how things were going to go?

CHAPMAN: I think we were optimistic because we were putting in a lot of money, a lot of effort and a lot of good people, and felt that Vietnam could be built up into a viable country.

Q: Having come from Iran where you were seeing this corruption, did you feel this was being duplicated.

CHAPMAN: Again, it is so hard for a foreigner to measure such things. There was a feeling that Diem was absolutely honest, but that feeling didn't extend to his family. That was one of the strong factors that led us to support him. He was a stabilizing influence. He was clean. He was patriotic. He represented a tradition, even though he was a Catholic, and he represented a moral force. But even in '57, we were debating among ourselves how much support Diem had among his people. Our impression was that Diem was very rigid and that he was alienating a lot of his countrymen. The country had been very heavily worked over by the communists, who were still gaining positions in the countryside. So while we respected Diem, we had a very uncomfortable feeling that he was not establishing the sort of authority that would pull the country together. To this day, I find it very difficult to make a judgement of how in fact he was viewed by the Vietnamese themselves because after his murder, there was a series of coups but there was no one who was really able to establish his authority. In countries like Vietnam which have always experienced authoritarian regimes, it is crucial to have a respected central authority, and to be able to work with it.

So it was a time of hope. Diem represented a leader of eminent qualities: honesty, patriotism, seriousness. In many ways he represented the kind of leader whom we have looked for in many developing countries, but we remained nagged by doubts regarding his ability to cope in a confrontation with a major communist challenge.

DAVID I. HITCHCOCK, JR.
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Hue (1957-1958)

David I. Hitchcock, Jr. was born in Massachusetts in 1928. He graduated from Dartmouth and Colombia and served in the U.S. Army. He joined USIA in 1957, serving in Vietnam, Japan several times, Israel, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1992.

HITCHCOCK: I was the second PAO in Hue. It was the first post outside of Saigon.

Q: Which years were you in Hue?

HITCHCOCK: 1957-59. Bob Lochner was the PAO in Saigon when I got there.

Q: What was the nature of your work there?

HITCHCOCK: I had two major roles. I was the U.S. advisor to the Vietnamese Information Service in Central Vietnam, and to that end, traveled a great deal with and without Vietnamese officials, advising them on how to get their information program going more successfully. It was a regional post in that sense. We covered Da Nang; we covered the four prefectures of Central Vietnam, as well as Hue.

The second, and perhaps in the end, more important project was to assist the University of Hue and get it going. This was Ngo Dinh Diem's favorite project. He had persuaded some young, talented Vietnamese who had been trained in Paris, Brussels, New York or London, to come back and become the faculty of this first university where everything would be taught in Vietnamese. Everything was taught in French in the universities in Saigon and Hanoi.

In Hue, this faculty was, in effect, writing its own text books as they went along. I helped to cast a net to the US for interested foundations and others who could offer to help get this new university going; to get a Fulbright program going; to launch a major book donation program for the university: these were activities that I was involved in. In the end, another aspect of my job was to be a "morale booster" for this university's faculty, which very soon found itself demoralized by the authoritarian character -- not so much of Ngo Dinh Diem's, but of his brother, Ngo Dinh Kanh in Hue, who quickly squashed all intellectual journals and free speech that these young teachers had brought back from abroad with them.

He outlawed dancing. One of my major accomplishments in Hue was to get the government to allow me -- it took me a month -- to hold a dance party in my house for 12 young Vietnamese faculty members and their spouses, with the curtains down and the music not too loud. There wasn't a dry eye in the house by the end of the evening, because this was the first time...it became a symbol of all of their frustration with the iron rule they found themselves under in Hue, when they thought they were going to practice Jeffersonian Democracy in a free society. [They were very naive.]

Q: To what extent did the government crack down on their curriculum?

HITCHCOCK: It began to do that also, but it cracked down more on their intellectual activities and journals. Some of them were arrested. My wife, Lee, started the first Vietnamese-American Association outside of Saigon in Hue, with my help. You never could tell how many people were going to be in our class, because some of them who weren't there, had disappeared during the night. Of course the Viet Cong was beginning to target district chiefs in the rural areas, not in the city. And they were not targeting us, although I had an armed jeep with me whenever I went up to Quang Tri or went across from the coast inland towards Laos, near the border.

At the beginning of my tour, we were very active in interviewing refugees who were still coming across from north of the parallel, and getting their stories to the VOA.

CHESTER H. OPAL
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Saigon (1957-1960)

Chester H. Opal was born in Illinois in 1918. He joined the Department of State in 1946 and later USIA. He served in Poland, Italy, Austria, Mexico, Vietnam, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1989.

OPAL: I opted for Far East on my spring trip in '57: it was a new area for me. George Hellyer was the area director for Far East in the Agency and learned of my interest in the Far East. Since French was one of my languages, he thought he had somebody. So he asked me to take the country PAO job in Saigon the upcoming fall. I tentatively agreed, and I visited the Vietnam on my War College tour. It was good that I did, as I learned on the very first day I was in charge on October 22, 1957, a month after I reached Saigon to take over my duties.

I spent from 1957 to 1960, 30 months, in Saigon, as country PAO. USIS was one of the larger posts in the world, with over 220 locals and some 20 Americans and actually some other contract employees. We had operations in Hue and, during my time, in Cantho and the peninsula. With the help of facilities in Manila, we produced a weekly newspaper, a newsreel under Alan Fisher, and a monthly illustrated magazine. We originated radio programs for the Saigon government and operated an information center in Saigon itself.

On October 22, 1957, during the Colombo Conference there, the communists targeted the Americans for the first time since the Korean War. We couldn't believe that the Viet Cong were doing this -- in fact, our first surmise was that the French were doing it. A couple of years before, when some bombs went off in flower pots and under car-hoods around American homes, we found the French were doing it. They hated us. They didn't want us taking over the country. So you assumed it was they. But it was a little dangerous, what they were doing, and we found people with maps, routes, and everything, and it was the Viet Cong from the north. They had me targeted, and they had two generals, General Williams and Meyer of the Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG), and Wesley Fishel, who was head of Michigan State Advisory Group, which was training the police and the civil service in Saigon.

I escaped because of a fluke of timing. My language tutor was late that morning, and so we left my house a little after 9:00. I would always have my language lesson just after breakfast and between 8:00 and 9:00. We were a little late. We came to the palace, and there was a wooden horse in front of the street leading in front of it, because they were doing some repairs farther down the street. We took a route on a side street.

My bomber, it was later learned, was waiting about 20 feet beyond this on the palace street, behind a tree, and he was all set to blow me up as I came by. The generals just took diversionary routes because they always did; they never took the same routes. Wes Fishel had the flu, so he was safe. Anyway, they bombed a bachelor officers quarters billet, and made an attempt against our men at the airport. Then because I had been to the post just that one day in the spring of '57, when I'd asked someone to take me over to the library center, I found an American librarian, Nance O'Neill, working at her desk, and it was during the siesta hour. Here she was working at her desk, and it was terrifically hot. I thought, "What a terrible thing." It was a Sunday, and she worked there all the time. She was a work horse.

Well, I remembered this, and when the bombings went off on the MAAG billet, and they got the bachelors' office quarters, (I didn't yet know they were after for the generals and me), and as soon as I got to the office, I said, "Call our center. Call the library." They couldn't get through. So I sent Walmsley, my executive officer, across town with the words, "Get everybody out of there!" It was approaching noon. I said, "Get Nance O'Neill out of there, too. I don't want her to even have lunch there or even hand around." So they got her and everybody else out.

I went home and took a siesta. I was wakened from my nap by some fellow from the security office. He said, jokingly, "Okay, what other prediction do you have?" The Viet Cong had bombed the center. The bomb had been placed in a book and put on a shelf. It blew down the whole wall right over Nance's desk, and it destroyed the tables. What was terrible about this thing was that the local employees who worked in the library slept on the tables during the lunch hour, the siesta hours. They slept on the tables during the siesta hours, and she worked in the back room. All of this was just avoided because I'd been there in the spring and seen this woman working on Sunday. I thought, "This woman has no gift for time. Time doesn't mean anything to her." And I was right. Of course, she was always grateful.

I tried to turn it into a joke. A couple of days later, they had the South Vietnamese Independence Day parade in Saigon. They had chiefs of staff and General "Big" Minh, who was later head of the government after Diem fell, came by standing in his tank, and General "Little" Minh right behind him, and the troops marching. We Americans officials were in a little stand, sitting up on benches. Behind us was the Saigon harbor of the Saigon River. Wham! Pow! Rockets or a cannon or something went off behind us, and it was just a salute. The president was about to come, and this was a salute. Everybody was tensed up because just a couple of days before we'd had these bombings. So I, with great to-do, stepped down from my seat, stood in front of everybody in the stands, and I said, "I regret to say I have but one library to give to my country." All laughed, and this broke the tension. (Laughs) It was a gay, gay ceremony. But I was as tense as anybody, I can tell you.

After that, I had a precede car and a follow car and a security man riding shotgun in the front seat. I lived in what had been the home of the French admiral of the French Government, their imperial government. It was a huge house, and I had a Sikh guard who slept all the time. He was not really a guard. I told the security people, "Why don't you tell him to stay awake? He's not guarding anything." This was an enormous place. I had rooms for 15 people -- servants, monkeys. They had monkeys back there and everything! In fact, anybody had access. I knew that my number-one gal was a concubine for the cook of the acting Defense minister, a great pal of mine. I knew that. This is not security; the cook could come and go any time during the night.

Somebody in the embassy dreamed up this business of locking the gates every night, with the Sikh still as the guard. So we locked the gates every night. So this damn thing had to be opened and closed all night long for the concubine! (Laughs) Well, this was not security. But I did discover, too, that there were men on pedicabs, the Saigon pedicabs, who were security police, and they were planted all over the place, watching. But nothing happened to me, thank God.

Now I'll go back to Vietnam. I think we were covering a little bit of the objectives of the program when we were talking last. When I came to Vietnam, we needed a new country paper, and I had great difficulty getting one that the ambassador would approve. The problem in Vietnam was that we had to sell Diem to his own people. We were not selling the United States, we were not really selling American objectives, except tangentially and coincidentally, if they matched those of the Diem government. This struck me as a legitimate enterprise in the light of our policy, although this is just the sort of policy that burned us in Iraq when Nuri Pasha fell in 1958, as our ambassador there, Waldemar Gallman, later recounted in his book. It's the same all-our-eggs-in-one-basket policy that hurt us in Iran, too, later on.

We had a weekly newsreel that Alan Fisher produced with a Filipino staff, which would be processed in the regional production center in Manila. By this newsreel, which was mainly to promote the U.S. aid program in Vietnam, we hoped to cement Diem's own relationship with his own people, to give him identification with his own people, because in Saigon and generally in the Cochin China part of South Vietnam, there was a feeling that Diem was not one of them simply because of his Annamese accent, and he spoke French whenever he could, even to his own people, because this was the second language of the country, thanks to the ninety-year French colonial influence.

We Americans also faced this problem where we had a state within a state. There was a secret state, actually, like Chiang Kai-shek's Kuomintang relation to the Chinese people. There was a certain amount of control of the population which was not at all the kind of control that was exercised in the north. I used to say the difference was that in South Vietnam, if a man wanted to study the color of flowers, he could do it. In the north, if he studied flowers, he had to work in the message that the flowers had this color because they served the Party interest. There's a great difference in a positive statement. In the south, there was that kind of freedom, relatively.

As a consequence, we had many of the products of USIS which were indigenous in their appearance, at least. These were not black propaganda, but they were obviously promoting Vietnam. We talked much more of Vietnamese developments and Vietnamese tradition than we did of American or worldwide events. This made for a different program, too. This was all necessary. Diem was our choice, he was anti-communist, and quite vigorously so.

Madame Nhu and I had a strange relationship. I was believed by the palace to be unfriendly to their interest. Madame Nhu, who had a negative view of the Minister of Information, Tranh Chan Thanh (Diem's own choice), never felt that he was her man. Once she invited me to the palace and I went. She designed a whole interview, if I may put it so, such that we went from big reception room to little reception room, and wound up behind closed doors in the room adjoining her bedroom. Her intent, obviously, was to create an impression that I was her lover. I later wrote a dispatch on this. We conversed in French the whole time. I had one little cup of tea on my lap, which I carried from room to room as it got colder.

OPAL: I never got to drink the tea, and I assured everybody, including the ambassador, that I had it the whole time that I was in the palace. Well, nobody believed me -- it's like the question, are you still beating your wife? -- and the reason they didn't believe me is that Madame Nhu made it a point in front of my wife, at the palace, at ceremonies and so on, to make sure that she cavorted before me in her latest gown or dress. She used to pirouette before me. All of this was a deliberate act on her part. In the States, as you know, she was known as "the dragon lady." She was the power behind the throne, and her husband was the brother of President Diem. This was to frighten anybody who had close relations with me and would therefore be a little more circumspect because they would then believe that I was in her pocket, so to speak, and therefore they couldn't be as confidential with me, they couldn't be as intimate with me in their relations. I'm referring to the other ministers, the nominal Minister of Defense, who was a close friend, and also Tranh Chan Thanh.

I might parenthetically say that after Diem was deposed and there was a great purging going on under "Big" Minh, one of the generals -- I don't know if this was in the time of Nguyen Cao Khi or whoever -- but at any rate, in 1964 or 65 I received a wire from Mim Johnson, who was a gal of ours in Paris and had been in Vietnam while I was there, in which she asked whether I would please say something about Thanh, whose life was in danger. She'd been in Saigon and knew that I had worked with him, and could I say something in his support? I sent back a telegram supporting him and saying that he was an honorable man, and that he hadn't been difficult in the way others in the Diem government had been. As I understand, this and other statements of this kind managed to save his life. He later headed the constituent assembly in Vietnam that wrote a new constitution. Of course, this was all in the sixties, after my time.

The use of law by Madame Nhu to get a Catholic family bill passed in a country that was 90% Buddhist or animists was a violation of social tradition. This was typical of her attitude toward her own people, which was expressed very horribly years later when they were taking to the streets, and Buddhists were burning themselves, and she said, "Let them barbecue themselves." The new gospel of Personalism which derived from Mounier in Paris, a combination of a kind of socialism and Catholicism based on the person, was a new ideology which the Ngos were trying to graft on people to whom this was, for the most part, quite alien. This was part of our difficulty.

One thing I felt very strongly, and I used to impress this on Wolfe Ladejinsky, who was counsel to President Diem, and who used to come and put his feet up and "flirt", as he put it, with my wife during all my years in Saigon, and who was running the land redistribution program. I believed that it was important for Diem and Diem's government to have the support of the American people. The support could only come when, whether wisely or unwisely, the American people felt that there was some democratization going on in Vietnam. The more the South Vietnamese government seemed to be imposing restrictions, the more Brother Nhu was seen as the power behind the throne and so on, the more the American journalists would report with a very critical eye -- which was in fact the process that prevailed through the whole Vietnam War. This went on from the very beginning of our time there.

I tried to impress this upon Mr. Orem of Orem Associates, who were handling public relations for President Diem in the United States. I said that unless the American people saw South Vietnam proceeding in a democratic line, eventually the Diem government would lose support in this country. This, as it turned out, was what happened. I remember telling our Agency deputy, Don Wilson, in 1964 that I felt that the Vietnam War would be fought on the streets of New York, and he said, "What do you mean -- troops?" I said, "No. The demonstrations." I didn't foresee the free speech movement at Berkeley [California] or anything else, but I just felt the American people would not countenance any kind of war in which they felt they were supporting an oppressive government.

We remember very well how every step was taken to impress the American people with the fundamentally humane government in the Soviet Union during the war when they were allies. I've talked earlier about how Bert Wolfe, for example, couldn't get published because he was critical.

At any rate, Orem took this to notion to the palace, where Diem and his tribe accepted this as proof of the fact that I was out of sympathy with him. One local Vietnamese girl, who remained anonymous, wrote a letter published in The Washington Post, with the help of one of our American staff photographers in Manila. It was critical of conditions in South Vietnam. The palace was convinced that I was behind it. Our photographer had visited South Vietnam for purposes of developing materials for a Vietnamese language publication which was distributed in Vietnam. (This publication, I might say, was the currency used in barter in the provinces, it was so well dressed up and "permanent".) He had been distressed by conditions there, and he had talked to this Vietnamese girl. He had given her the address of the editor of The Washington Post, and they assumed, since the photographer nominally was under my charge while in their country, that this was somehow my idea. It was not. But at any rate, because the girl was critical of the Diem regime, I was felt to be critical as well. Whatever I may have felt about the regime, I certainly never stated it publicly, and I was very careful about it in that respect.

However, I will say that while I was in the post in Saigon, there was a full-scale security investigation of me because of views that I had expressed under classified circumstances to a member of the faculty of the National War College that had come on a Far Eastern trip in 1958. Anthony Bouscaren, who was said to be the leading McCarthyite in American education, was the temporary faculty member involved. Bouscaren was at my table when I gave a dinner for several of the War College class who were visiting, and I told him, in a way which was meant to be taken ironically, that the North Vietnamese had a "more democratic" constitution than we did; why, they even quote the Declaration of Independence. He never understood that I was just being ironic in that sense, and he took everything that I said as the literal, serious truth. I said, "There is a lot that is going on here that could be better from the standpoint of acceptability to the American people, but I'm not sure your briefings tomorrow are going to elaborate on them." Just as I had talked to Orem, quite openly, in a frank discussion between men on the same side of the struggle. At any rate, this with Bouscaren was a closed meeting, with only men cleared for highest security. I think there were three people. William Kehoe, of my staff, was one of those at my table, although I never thought I'd need a witness to this.

At any rate, when Bouscaren got back to Washington, he met with a Catholic group. One member of the Catholic group was Edward "Ted" Heffron, who was our public affairs officer in Malaysia. Heffron denounced me to the Agency, and started this security inquiry on the basis of which I was said to be out of sympathy with U.S. policy and godknowswhat else.

Q: Ted Heffron was on the staff in USIS-Brazil when I was deputy and then acting head of the program. He was noted for his far-right-wing views, and he was a devoted Catholic. Jack Vebber was the PAO. He warned me to be very careful about saying anything in Ted's presence that might even remotely be construed as left-leaning. Ted later proved on several other occasions that he was capable of the kind of thing you mention.

OPAL: This is interesting, because let me tell you what the upshot was. Of course, the inquiry was held and reported also to CINCPAC, and the admiral there sent an admiral to the post, and he talked to Ambassador Durbrow and me. Durbrow couldn't have cared less. I mean, he thought all of us were woolly-eyed liberals -- and that "included those guys in the Department." USIS and Washington was full of woolly-eyed liberals, you see. I don't know where this "woolly-eyed" came from, but he certainly believed that. That was one of the reasons I had difficulty getting my country plan approved. He couldn't understand why I should worry about democratization in Vietnam.

Also at this time, the time that the security question arose, I was asked to come back to chair a promotion panel. I had just had about five months before come down with a sciatic attack. The sciatic was a very serious one. I used literally to crawl up into the embassy elevator, lie on the floor, crawl to my desk, and lie on the sofa, working. I did this for three months. I conducted my affairs. I didn't lose a day in the office that I can remember, but this is how I worked. Durbrow, perhaps to get me off the scene or even out of personal sympathy, was very happy to take this occasion when the telegram appointing me to a selection panel in Washington came through, and he said, yes, Opal could take the relief from the post, that I wasn't in good health and so on. I'm sure he wasn't without some sympathy for my condition either. He always was civil to me, and I admired his hard-working dedication and his hard-headedness.

But because the security investigation was on, this became germane to our whole program in a way. This is the only time that I have seen where the fact that the Agency is independent of State had a meaning. George Allen was Director of the Agency at the time. He sent a telegram, and he said, "No, we've decided to keep him at the post and let him serve out his time." As a matter of fact, I served two and a half years instead of the regular two years at this hardship post. Allen, instead of bringing me back, decided that Durbrow was trying to get rid of somebody, and this was his way of doing it. Whether this was so or not was beside the point; the point was that the Agency could not have done this if I had been part of the State Department. He knew Durbrow, he knew what type of person he was, and decided that this was the whole point. He wanted me to go through the whole security thing, which cleared me completely. Bill Kehoe was called and couldn't remember the conversation very well, but it was obvious that this was a hatchet job.

I must say, then, in 1959, I was at a PAO conference in Baguio in the Philippines, and at the end of the week's sessions, Ted Heffron came over to me and said, "I've had my eye on you."

I said, "Why?"

He said, "Well, I want you to know that I have never heard anybody talk about the Cold War and about the menace of communism as eloquently and as wisely as you have. I have a confession to make to you. I am the man who denounced you. When I go back, I'm going to write a letter to everybody that I wrote my original letter to and tell them that I was absolutely wrong, and that I regret it. I'll meet with anybody and tell him why I was wrong to do this thing."

I hadn't realized it was Heffron. I had no idea what had started this. I thought it was purely Bouscaren writing a letter, but it was not. It came out of this Catholic group -- and me, a one time Catholic! Heffron told me about the Catholic group. Another man that they denounced was Bob Clarke, who was PAO in Hong Kong. What was Bob's curse? Bob had said -- and many of us believed this -- we would never really have any kind of standing and thorough diplomatic relations with Asia until Red China is recognized. After all, when Ike tried to surface this idea at West Point once, the press and the lobby in Washington just castigated him, and he pulled in his horns. So there were many people who felt this. This is true.

In fact, at that conference in Baguio, I presented a paper which I called "The Porcupine Theory of Chinese-Soviet Relations." I said, "They should be driven so close together that eventually China will draw apart," which is precisely what happened. It was interesting, because the shaking of heads, and even the puzzlement of George Allen, who was at this meeting, was strange to behold. I thought, "What have I proposed here?" But I felt that this was something. I said, "This is the Schopenhauer theory of porcupines. Their gregarious instincts draw them together, but their quills drive them apart." At any rate, it's things like this, I guess, that made some sort of an impression on Heffron and made him confess. That's the only background of it that I ever discovered. It was all a mystery. This is a strange thing, too. It was a mysterious denunciation, and I had to answer in the dark, unable to face my accuser.

At any rate, I got a letter from our security people saying that the security clearance that I'd had at such and such a date had been renewed. No reference to the inquiry or anything else. But this was a distressing thing in many ways. It could only have come because of this Catholic group and because of Bouscaren. I think they were connected somehow with the Maryknoll Fathers, with whom President Diem lived as a recluse while in the States and who sponsored him. Diem was really a defrocked priest at heart. He was a very pious, very chaste man. So this was the thing that I ran into there.

Also we had programs that were addressed principally to the 1 million Chinese who lived mainly in Cholon, who were being wooed by Red China. Diem had policies toward them which were cruel, in a way. He banned their language, he made sure that they were integrated into Vietnamese society without their own native customs and so on. Chiang Kai-shek, over in Taiwan, even objected to these policies, but he had no effect. Diem proved right, because the Chinese, who were great accommodators, accommodated themselves to this thing. Working among them for an anti-communist cause were Belgian and Chinese priests who had come out of China and who felt very strongly about the Red Chinese and the communist government there. So it was not hard to work among these people and to get them at least seemingly on our side.

I don't know how the Chinese behaved during the war itself. I left Vietnam in spring of 1960. The Viet Cong were attacking in battalion force, and in the provinces they would rob the cashiers of the plantations, which remained French still, destroying village elders, beheading and killing village elders, probably 50 a month by that time. But it was not a big engagement in the sense that it became later.

The MAAG group, our military assistance advisor group, had only 660 people in Vietnam when I left. They had 300 people on the equipment recovery mission and 300 training the Vietnamese military. I felt -- and most of us, even in the military -- that we were training -- and it was probably reasonable under the circumstances -- for a 1950s-like invasion from the north, crossing the river by the North Vietnamese, and there would be that Korean War kind of warfare, not the deep engagement of guerrilla forces in caves and using the Ho Chi Minh Trail that later developed. But there was nothing we could do about that, and the USIS program was mainly one to make Diem and what he stood for a part of the culture and the society of the time.

While I was in Vietnam, one of the public affairs meetings we had in Baguio, under George Allen also (this is the one where I presented my "porcupine paper"), I made a crack which George Allen took umbrage at. We had just had the written exam which was given to people in our reserve programs to make them career officers, and several of our people took the exam and apparently did very well. But I said at this meeting, "You know, we talk about cultural shock and so on, how our officers go overseas and have culture shock. I don't think our Agency en masse has ever suffered the kind of cultural shock that our officers did when they faced that written exam. This was the greatest cultural shock they ever experienced of their life." Of course, everybody laughed, but they knew very well what I meant. It was a serious document which called for a lot of knowledge and a lot of understanding of America, and I thought in many ways a good exercise.

Among the other programs we had there was an English-language center, where I had a succession of madmen in charge. I had more madmen in Vietnam. I would have madmen on my staffs everywhere, but I had really a concentration of them in Vietnam. We had people breaking down in Poland, and I've had them elsewhere. But in Vietnam, they came cuckoo. We had one fellow, Joe Flickop. He provided me with a lesson in personnel management. When we had our bombings in October, he got a call from Boston. His mother had seen headlines about Saigon bombed. She telephoned Saigon and asked for her son. He answered the phone but she thought he was a ringer. He said, "Mama, this is Joe! This is Joe Flickop! No, I'm not a ghost. I'm not a substitute. Mommy, this is Joe! Remember Uncle Willie? He's my uncle. Remember the sled I hid under my bed? I'm alive! This is Joe! I'm alive!" I went and summarily hung up the phone, he was tying up my line. I had no idea what was going on, that the whole of Saigon was wiped out in the Boston tabloids.

Anyway, Flickop, whom I loved, was slightly kooky. He manufactured a ghost family of three children and two wives and nobody got on him until he started to talk about the spooks. Then there was some objection to him. Well, he'd settled down when I discovered, by a little bit of staff work, that he went around into local taverns with a billfold, which he took out for everybody to behold the photos of his imaginary wives and imaginary family. So I called him in one day and talked to him. He calmed down and stopped all this business about the spooks, which was what had brought him to my attention. I told him I used the word "the enemy" and nobody knew what I was talking about when I spoke of "spooks." I advised he do the same. It was my patented word, used by another man in the embassy, too, I learned. Then because he was just a Junior Officer Trainer (JOT), he was going to spend the major part of his two years abroad in Vietnam. For his last nine months Personnel was assigning him to Laos, to Vientiane. I remember telling him -- and I've used this line ever since -- I said, "Joe, you're going to Vientiane. Laos is the end of the universe! This is like being assigned to Siberia or Aden or Tegucigalpa. Do you realize, from now on you're going to have a career in which you're going to be able to confront a personnel officer and lean down to him, and say, 'No, sir, I've already been to Vientiane!' You're going to be able to say that the rest of your career!"

The reason I cite this is that once I was questioned in Washington in the sixties, when I came back from Saigon, on how I felt about men who had had no foreign service experience heading up Agency personnel. I said, actually I didn't object to it if either the director or the deputy had no foreign service experience. It didn't bother me. I think one of them should, but if the director or the deputy did not, it didn't bother me, because I think what happened with personnel people who have had too much foreign service experience is that they get autobiographical about it and personalize it. They will not listen sympathetically to complaints about posts. They say, "Well, when I went into the Service, it had all those horrible places. I went there, by God, they sent me there, and you're going to go there." And the more you protest for one reason or another because of your family and so on, the less response you're going to get from them. It seemed to me that a personnel officer who took that autobiographical view didn't necessarily enter anything meaningful into his analysis of personnel needs.

At any rate, a little bit of less of that, I felt, would be helpful. For this reason, once I was asked by Bill Weathersby, who headed Personnel, how I felt about this, and I told him I had no objection to a domestic personnel man having to do with foreign personnel. Somebody said, "That's interesting. Would you give me a memo on it?"

I said, "No, I won't give you a memo. I'll let you quote me and I'll back you up."

He said, "That's not the general feeling." This, oddly enough, got to Mosley some way or another when he was appointed Personnel chief in spite of having no foreign service experience, and he said that apparently this had become doctrine, but was probably descended from God, they probably found it written on the tablets on Mt. Sinai or something. It's no longer attributed to me, by which, I mean, it became authoritative. At any rate, it was a point. But Joe Flickop, bless him, was the man who started this little chain of thought in my life.

The use of the Manila Regional Center, which I think was started up by Earl Wilson a long time ago, was marvelous from the standpoint of operations throughout the region. It was a very sophisticated outfit with a lot of excellent facilities available. In fact, I think our film and our radio unit also had people who had worked there and were working on scene in South Vietnam, who were marvelous. They were such superb professionals, and also very wise. In all the time I was there, I never had any flak on policy or anything. I used to try to communicate policy, but I had to rely, just because of the size of the operation, on the common sense of Alan Fisher and our radio officer, Hunt Downs, who later wrote a novel on Vietnam which I titled for him, The Compassionate Tiger and got published through my agent. These people were just given to feeling the atmosphere and communicating it. But the main thing was the locals who could handle it because of the language. Except for one man I assigned to open our facilities in Can Tho, none of my people knew the language. Without the locals we were lost.

Q: By the way, the man who ultimately became the chief local editor, Filipino, in the Manila center, is now in the United States, and I think he's a citizen now. He's publishing the only Filipino newspaper in California.

OPAL: In the Filipino language? In Tagalog? In English?

Q: English.

OPAL: English is their lingua franca, really.

Q: It's a weekly, and he puts it out. It's quite a newspaper, about 36 or 40 pages, and he puts it out weekly. When I was president of USIA, he sent me several copies of it, and I got a little note about him in the last newsletter, saying that here was this man who had been trained by USIA in the center, made an editor, and now he was in the States running this paper.

OPAL: That's wonderful. You know, it's interesting that the fellow who ran the press section, a Lebanese, is in Washington now as the head of something in our Near Eastern IPS. George Shehade is his name. He's from a very distinguished family. He was a wonderful person and the kind of person who absorbed your own feelings almost by instinct, took your own coloration, and you could trust him implicitly in his motives and in his expression of views. George was one of my tutelary spirits in Beirut. These people helped us educate ourselves. These were great people.

In 1960, I got on board the S.S. of the Messageries Maritimes. Maybe this story doesn't bear repeating. Anyway, there was a delegation that came aboard the ship it lay in harbor in Saigon, as I was getting set to return with my family to the States on home leave. This was after 30 months in the hot-house of Vietnam. This delegation, General Williams' wife and his staff, I think his chief of staff, marched aboard and presented me with a plaque. The plaque said, "C.H. Opal, Corporal (simulated)," and cited me for intrepidity and all sorts of silly virtues that made up the acronym, USIS. At any rate, this was a great tribute to me, because I was being promoted right there in my name. It showed that something that had happened years before at the National War College was somewhere remembered, and had preceded me to Vietnam.

At the War College in 1956-57, General Patch, who was the Commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps, delivered one of those special two-hour lectures, at the end of which for 20 minutes we would question him from the floor. I came from lunch that day, I suppose sleepy and from too many martinis -- two, at least -- and I was sort of groggy. An Air Force colonel on the faculty grabbed my arm and said, "Why don't you ask the general what the Marine Corps does that volunteer groups in the other services can't and don't do." He said this as I was passing by and I proceeded to my seat. I sat there, and then when the general was soliciting questions from the class, I sort of tentatively raised my hand, and sure enough, they called on me. So I stood up and heard myself repeating the colonel's words, "General, sir, can you tell me what the Marine Corps does that volunteer groups in the other services can't and don't do?" With that, I sat down. General Patch, who'd been in trouble with the press recently because he'd forbidden wives from joining their husbands in Japan, turned on me waspishly and said, "Young man, will you tell me what volunteer groups in the other services do do?"

I stood up, all befuddled. I was still sleepy and thoroughly groggy. I said, "General, sir, there is nobody in this class that is more civilian than I am. I have the rank of private first class (simulated). I have no idea what the volunteer groups in the other services can and do do." With that, I sat down. Of course, he never answered the question, and the class broke up in laughter.

This preceded me, and this little plaque that I received in Saigon Harbor in 1960 was, in effect, a promotion. I'd been promoted from private first class (simulated) to corporal (simulated). At any rate, this was General Williams' doing, and I still have the plaque and am very proud of it.

ALAN FISHER
Motion Picture Officer, USIS
Saigon (1957-1963)

Alan Fisher was born in New York in 1913. He joined USIA in 1945, serving mainly in Brazil. He was a motion picture expert. He served in Vietnam from 1957-1963. He was interviewed in 1988 by Lewis Schmidt.

FISHER: When I got to Saigon, I found a very good operation, but it was very difficult for me because there was nothing on paper. But it was a very interesting experience because that was the largest operation we had in motion pictures in the world. We had our own production staff of cameramen, editors, writers, directors. All the cameramen were Vietnamese and they were good. The writers and directors were Filipinos. When I got out there, Chet Opal then became PAO, and I talked to Chet and I said, "Chet, I really can't produce films unless I can also have the distribution, because I have to know what I'm distributing to. I can't produce them and hope somebody's going to distribute them.

There was a young officer there handling motion picture distribution who hadn't handled it before, and Chet said, "Great, because you have the experience in distribution, so you take it." Pat Green was the young officer who was handling distribution. "He needs some instruction." So Pat then became my assistant for distribution. Charlie was putting out a 16-millimeter newsreel for mobile unit operation, and really, it was a newsreel put out for the Vietnamese Ministry of Information. I had met the minister, I worked very closely with him and with his staff, and I proposed to Washington that we continue a 16-millimeter print distribution, but we go to 35-millimeter theatrical distribution. We'd distribute in 35 initially. I said, "That way we really get a picture of tremendous impact." So they approved it, and I immediately then started to distribute in 35mm weekly, opening on Thursday night at the theaters. We were opening at every major theater in Vietnam in 35-millimeter. That was like Paramount newsreel in the States.

Q: This was after Dien Bien Phu?

FISHER: Oh, yes.

Q: You were doing it for South Vietnam because the North had already separated.

FISHER: Yes. We were doing it for South Vietnam, and we had three objectives, basically: to support President Ngo Dinh Diem, to tell what USOM, the operation mission, was doing in Vietnam, and to support other American policy objectives through news clips which we brought in. So theoretically, I was to check every newsreel with the Minister of Information, but after checking with him a few times, he said, "You know what you're doing. Don't bother me with it."

So we put it out under their name. It was released in 37 theaters first run in Vietnam, all over South Vietnam, and very effective. I had two cameramen everywhere President Ngo Dinh Diem went. We had two cameramen with him. We always had a story of him, and that's the way they knew him. Remember this was before television, so they knew him through the newsreels. I think it was a very effective way of doing it.

Q: It didn't keep him from being overthrown, however.

FISHER: No, it didn't. He was a nice guy, you know.

Mrs. FISHER: He was not overthrown; he was murdered.

FISHER: Yes. Incidentally, an aside. Wes Fischel was the head of the United States Operation Mission at that time. He used to breakfast with Ngo Dinh Diem every morning and they'd work out a program for the day. We saw Wes in Washington when he got back. He'd left the service. He was a contractor. He came to the house for dinner one night, and we were talking about perils of living in the Far East. He said, "You know, I spent something like 18 years in the Far East, and I had stomach troubles all the time I was there. Because of these troubles, my diet consisted of just white rice and tea." He said, "You know, I just went through a series of allergy tests and they discovered I'm highly allergic to white rice." (Laughs)

To get back to Saigon, it was a good operation. We had a contract with USOM to produce 48 reels of documentaries for them a year. I was there on TDY at this time. Then at the end of this period, I went back to Washington. I had written a long report to Turner while I was there. When I got back to Washington, Turner came over and came out to the house for breakfast one morning. As we were having breakfast, he said, "How would you like to transfer to Vietnam?" And I got a terrible kick in the shins from Florence under the table.

I said, "I would like it. I would like it." Because it was exciting, it was fun. Professionally, it was great.

Q: How long were you there on TDY?

FISHER: Three months. I made those changes when I was there.

Q: Florence was still in Paris.

FISHER: She was still in Paris.

Mrs. FISHER: With our daughter, of course.

FISHER: So I agreed, and we went back, direct transfer to Saigon. I really enjoyed it because it was a job that took every moment of my time. In addition to that, I had supervisory responsibilities for production in Cambodia and Vientiane, plus a laboratory contract operation in the Philippines, where all our laboratory work was done.

When Turner proposed that I be transferred to Saigon, I said, "I will take it on one condition, that you get me Bill Ridgeway out of Korea, transfer him to the Philippines, to Manila, to supervise that laboratory operation." Because Bill was a crackerjack. I knew if I had him there, I'd never have any lab problems. He agreed to it, so Bill was transferred to the Philippines. I would go over every month or so and talk with Bill. He'd come over occasionally to Saigon. It was a good operation.

ELBRIDGE DURBROW
Ambassador
Vietnam (1957-1961)

NATO
Paris (1961-1965)

Elbridge Durbrow was appointed ambassador to Vietnam in 1957 and served in Paris as part of NATO in 1961. He was interviewed by Ted Gittinger in 1981.

Q: Mr. Ambassador, were you given a briefing, a formal briefing or informal, before you went to Saigon in 1957?

DURBROW: Oh, yes. I came back to Washington for about three or four weeks, I've forgotten how long. I'd been in Vietnam before, because I was stationed in Malaysia. I'd been up there [to visit] my predecessor, Freddie Reinhardt, [who is] a very close friend of mine, an old Moscow callow colleague. I'd been up to Saigon on a long visit one time, so I knew the situation up there, the physical situation. Then I came back and I was briefed in the department and in the Pentagon and in the CIA and everything else, a full briefing. I went out there in March of 1957.

Q: What were your expectations that you derived from the briefing? What sort of situation did you expect? What kind of problems did you expect to encounter?

DURBROW: Well, one way or the other, I was not surprised by anything for the simple reason that I spent most of my career dealing with communists. I went on my first mission to Moscow in 1934, was there for four years. I had gone into Moscow again during the war on a short TDY, about four months. Then I came back again to Moscow in 1946-48 as the deputy chief of mission there dealing with the Kremlin boys. I dealt with them during the war when I was with the East European Division. I had been in Italy, a big Communist Party there; I'd been in Poland way back when before that, so I thought I knew something about the way they operate. Nobody does really, but you get a better idea if you've been there. So I wasn't surprised. I knew what we were fighting, which is something I don't think they understand today, really. The American public and the press doesn't, I don't think. So therefore the public should learn much about it, what a war of national liberation is all about.

That's a technique that the Soviets developed a long time ago. They've perfected it, and Vietnam is one of the best examples of it. Our press, in Vietnam particularly but elsewhere even before that, they think this is a local insurgency, a local civil war, grow like Topsy in whatever country it is, and they're fighting for their freedoms against the oppressive government or the imperialist Americans, whatever you want to call it. So, in that sense, I suppose that's one of the reasons why I was sent there, because I had had experience in that sort of thing before. So I wasn't surprised in any way at all.

The problem was that they were trying to take over the country by subversive methods and terrorists. That's one thing I think that is not understood at all, is that a war of national liberation is a well worked out technique, and only one of the tools of that technique is terrorism. We're talking so much about terrorism today, and terrorism, well, that's part of it, no question about it. But I don't think anybody else has any--El Salvador is a war of national liberation. It's not a local civil war down there. Nicaragua is the same thing. Angola was the same thing. Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, Cuba, South Yemen, they're all caused by national liberation. I tried to bring that out in that paper I gave you the other day.

Q: Let me ask you about President [Ngo Dinh] Diem. Now, when you went to Vietnam in 1957, what was the generally held view of Diem and what he had done in Vietnam up till that time?

DURBROW: Well, his image was going up quite well by that time. Freddie Reinhardt, who had also done the Moscow tour and knew the situation, was there when he took over and he helped him to get started. We all did or our government did. So by 1956, 1957, he'd beaten down the Binh Xuyen in the town there in the 1955 war, fighting right in the streets. On the other attempts by the two to three thousand well-trained communist guerrillas that they'd left behind after the 1954 accords... They weren't supposed to, of course. And Hanoi hoped and expected [he would be defeated]. Diem wasn't too well known, he didn't have too much of a following in the country. He'd been exiled and out and that sort of thing. They hoped that by terrorism, subversion, propaganda, and intimidation that they could topple that government without having to go to an all-out military effort.

But by 1956 Diem had calmed those things down pretty well, beaten the Binh Xuyen. The Hoa Hao and the Cao Dai sects were collaborating with him. In the time beginning in 1956 he started to rebuild the country, the countryside and things of that kind. With our AID program and our assistance, we worked on a plan for land reform, which turned out to be quite a good one, as a matter of fact, eventually. As I remember the figures, there were about six hundred thousand acres taken from the larger landlords and divided up into seven acre or three hectare plots for about a hundred and twenty-five thousand families, mostly in the Delta, because that's where it was easier to do and where the best productivity on this land was.

Q: Let me ask you to follow on a line connected with that. Now, there was a lot of criticism then and later on the subject of land reform in South Vietnam, at least there was in the press. And there was some, I understand, among some members of the mission, too. Did you know Wolf Ladejinsky?

DURBROW: Ladejinsky, yes. I knew him very well. He's the guy that put it in. He's the guy that worked it up.

Q: Didn't something come up between him and Diem later?

DURBROW: Yes, but it wasn't over the land reform.

Q: Oh, it wasn't over land reform?

DURBROW: No, no. Wolf Ladejinsky had done a wonderful job in Japan, you know, before that. He got them to become eventually self-sufficient in their rice production. He'd worked in the Philippines and he came down to Vietnam. And Wolf did a very fine job basically in that field and other agricultural developments, helping with the rubber and new plants and that sort of thing. But there was no [disagreement there]. They fought over other things later, because he became a very intimate adviser to Diem. On some of the things I worked with Wolf, too. I'd only maybe come into it later, I'll bring it up now, though. You probably have seen the Pentagon Papers or somewhere else or [David] Halberstam's book [The Best and the Brightest] about the instructions I asked for in September 1960 to help Diem to get a better hold on things and get things going in a better direction, more democratic and that sort of thing. Well, Wolf was all for me on that sort of business because the land reform was going great guns by then. So Wolf was a great help, but he was advising on all sorts of other things besides land by that time. So when the break came--I've forgotten--he and I talked it over, but it wasn't a "throw him out of the country in twenty-four hours" sort of thing. Just a disagreement--

Q: Falling out.

DURBROW: --falling out, yes. And he went on to India from there.

But the land reform, I tell you, was a darn good success, six hundred thousand acres, a hundred and twenty-five thousand families. I visited many times, saw the things and we did the cadastral work and a lot of the other stuff to help them out. It couldn't be done in the mountainous part of Vietnam; it could be done along the coast, the flatlands. But Diem founded these new villages as a program to get somebody to go up into the mountains to relieve the population concentration on the coast, particularly up the coast from the Delta. That didn't work too well, but it got the people--

Q: Was that the relocation program?

DURBROW: Yes, the relocation program, yes.

Q: What was wrong with that? You said it didn't work too well.

DURBROW: It didn't work for lots of reasons. First of all, who started it or whether it was a rumor or not [I don't know], but I think it was believed by most of the people. It always starts as a rumor, but by the time I got there it was believed that if you were a lowlander and you went up in the mountains, you were going to get some disease. You couldn't [survive], you're all going to die, your whole family's going to die. There were mosquitos or some kind of bugs up there, I've forgotten what the cause was. But you were up there and you were going to get tuberculosis and all sorts of things could happen to you. So there was [one reason]. All people who have ancestor worship as their basic religion, and the Vietnamese do--it's not a Buddhist country at all, by the way, not at all; it's not what the press tried to tell us over here--they want to be near their ancestors. So their graves were down on the lowlands and all that sort of thing, so it was quite a wrench.

Diem didn't use force, but he used a lot of persuasion to get them to go up there, inducements, too. They gave them this plot of land and they cleared one hectare completely for them, gave them the bamboo and other things to build their huts with, or thatch and that sort of thing. We helped them work out various crops that would grow in the highlands in that type of soil. So it didn't work very well because people didn't want to be moved. Now, if you were down there in the Delta and you were going to get this piece of land you had lived right next door to for a long, long time, why, that's home. So that was one of the main reasons, as I understand it, that it wasn't working.

Q: Was there any friction with the Montagnards over this?

DURBROW: Oh, yes, sure there was, naturally, because the Montagnards are a very interesting people. I spent a long time up with them. All through that whole part of Southeast Asia, not just in Vietnam, they have this economy they've developed themselves, indigenous. In order to make this--they had no fertilizers at all, didn't know about animal fertilizers or anything like that. They had very few animals, as a matter of fact. They burned the forest down, and the ashes, the stumps and all to get humus and fertilize the land so they could plant their little crops and move on to mountain rice and that sort of thing. They'd move on and burn another big area down, and Diem said, "You can't do that anymore. You can burn these places down and that place, but this is a new village area, so you can't do that." And that caused friction, naturally.

There was always friction, of course, between the Montagnards and the Vietnamese. They're animists, among other things, and they're very primitive people, but very friendly. I stayed up in camps with them and so forth. They, knowing we weren't Vietnamese and we weren't French--although the French got along with them better than the Vietnamese did. The French realized their problems when they built their coffee plantations up there and tea and other plantations, and they paid attention to local taboos and that sort of business and got along better than the Vietnamese did. So there was friction with the Montagnards, yes.

Q: Did you go hunting when you were up there? I understand you hunted.

DURBROW: Oh, yes. I didn't get my real spurs as an ambassador, because I never got a tiger. My predecessors had, and Freddie Reinhardt's wife got a tiger before he did, incidentally. So I went off, I think I added them up one time, anyway, about thirty-nine days I spent in the jungle, which was very, very interesting. I'd been through a jungle, you know, a rain forest here and there down in Haiti or somewhere like that, but to spend four or five days up there in the jungle camping out under a canopy of three trees, when our troops got in there, I had a very definite idea of the problem of how the local guerrillas can hide. From twenty feet away you can't see them, you can't smell them, you can't do anything, and this canopy of three tiers of trees in the jungle made it very easy to hide in. Orange--was it called?

Q: Agent Orange?

DURBROW: Agent Orange had to be used.

But I enjoyed that. I always liked to camp. I did in Moscow, I went down the Caucasus and had an eighty-day horseback trip up in the Caucasus. That sort of thing relaxes me, so I did quite a bit of that. I didn't get my tiger.

Q: Well, I'm sorry. (Laughter)

DURBROW: Tigers are an endangered species now, I'm glad I didn't.

It was a very sporting thing the way they do it, though. One way, they dig a hole in the ground and they get some new boughs, branches, cut down just from the local scenery so it looks like home. They make a little top in this thing and they leave a hole, get a dead buffalo or a big deer or something down there that's at least five days putrid. So the tiger finally gets a--a tiger, I understand, has a very bad [sense of smell], sensitive ear, sight, but not too sensitive a scent. So they' try to put the carcass down near a path to a waterhole, hoping they'll smell it and find it and come back for a meal. So you sit there for five or six hours on end, and you can't talk to your partner. You wait for the tiger to come and you have this little peephole and he can walk right on top of you. He's more scared than you are, so it wouldn't be too bad. I got two shots, wounded one and goofed on the other one, so I'm not a hunter.

Q: Well, I heard you were. I heard differently.

Regarding the military situation in South Vietnam, what kind of threat did you perceive as not most likely but perhaps likely? We've been criticized for paying too much attention to a possible Korean-style invasion. Now, that, of course, comes later. What about in 1957? What were your views then?

DURBROW: Freddie Reinhardt before me warned me about it and it turned out to be 100 per cent true. One of our biggest problems was going to be with General [Samuel T.] Williams. He was a nice guy and all that sort of thing, but he and I just didn't get along and Freddie didn't get along with him either. He had no respect for civilians. He knew how to run a military outfit and we had nothing to do with it, so he thought. He had been a private, got in World War I, came up through the ranks, became a very good operator in the field of various types, infantry man and then a tank man. By the time I got there--and Freddie had been fighting it, too--he was building this Vietnamese army of ten small divisions with tanks and they didn't have very many personnel carriers then, but there were a few of those, as if they were going to come down the main roads in a column of squads or column of tanks. Having been in Malaysia, I knew what the British did down there to get rid of the communist insurgents there. When you worked in the jungle, you had to put this, that, infiltration and all the rest, cutting off food and whatnot. I had a pretty good idea of what--and I knew [Sir Robert] Thompson down there, too, who set up their whole operation, came up to Vietnam later.

Q: Isn't that R. G. K. Thompson?

DURBROW: Yes, yes.

Q: Okay.

DURBROW: The great guerrilla warfare expert, whom I saw in Hamburg last June, who's quite a guy still.

So I had a very definite idea that this column of squads thing coming down the main road across the DMZ, maybe they were going to do that, but you had to expect them to do otherwise. Once you got in the jungle and lived, saw how it is to get through the jungle--we had jeeps of course, we had to cut down trees to get into our campsites, the roads were few and far between. We built some good roads, but they were just the main arteries, the Jersey Turnpike, so to speak. In the mountains you've got to go on foot or pack animal or something. So I was already set for a problem with my friend General Williams and we had some real knockdown, drag-out fights. I was fortunate, Eisenhower had put out an executive order--I've forgotten, it was 1956 anyway, 10566 or something else like that--which laid down the fact that the ambassador in the country was the personal representative and was responsible to the president and therefore he was the principal representative of the United States government in that country and he would control all of our operations.

Q: Why would he find it necessary to say that?

DURBROW: Well, because of just the problem I was having, because it was done before I got there. I knew about it from Malaysia, but [it happened] all over the darn place. Remember, we didn't do a doggone thing in foreign affairs until we got hit at Pearl Harbor. I mean that categorically from World War I. I mean, we had a neutrality act and we had very small embassies. We dido very fine reporting, I hope, on what we thought was going to happen to that Czech government that might fall in two months, but if they fell, we didn't do anything about it. [it] didn't make much difference except you got good marks for predicting they would fall, and whether the right guys came back in or not was not our business. We were neutral.

So we won World War II and mostly by ourselves. We were a side issue in World War I, basically. We helped, though. So all of a sudden these military guys were all over the world, bases here and bases there, Vietnams, MAAGs all over the place. We knew how to run the railroad, we won the war, we know how to do it, and so forth. You guys, you can run the political stuff and talk about the elections, that sort of thing, but this other business, how to protect the country's our business. I don't know exactly why, I'm sure something along that line, because I'd run into that before.

Q: So it was not uncommon for MAAG and the embassy to have their friction?

DURBROW: Oh gosh, yes. The most interesting guy I did [encounter] before that [from] my experience in Moscow was Bedell Smith. He was Ike's chief of staff, of course, and he was the ambassador, and I happened to be the number-two guy. There was a fellow named Macon [?], General Macon, a hell of a nice fellow, had a fine record in World War II and he was a very fine tank commander and so forth. He ran the MAAG, the military section of the embassy. It wasn't called MAAG there, but it was the same thing. They had twenty or thirty officers. Of course in the Soviet Union the secrecy and the surveillance was quite different than it was in Vietnam. But nevertheless, here Macon knew who Bedell was, of course, naturally, but he thought he could run his little bailiwick by himself, but I can tell you Bedell Smith made sure that didn't happen. Maybe Bedell got Ike to write that executive order, I don't know. Because Bedell had quite a battle, really; they just told him to shut up or "I'll get you kicked out of here. I'll call my friend [George] Marshall and you'll get out."

Q: I have heard from other sources that it was not uncommon for MAAGs to have their problems with the embassy and vice versa.

DURBROW: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. There's no question about it. But fortunately this executive order came out, so one of my first jobs was to draft my own order based on that, how all the various [groups], the CIA, the MAAG, the agricultural boys in the AID program, would coordinate their operations this way, and no basic policy change will be sent out to Washington without my knowing about it. If I agreed, I'd endorse it; if I didn't, I would say I wouldn't endorse it.

Well, Williams didn't understand English or something because I caught him right on, I mean I learned about it through the channels. The grapevine works better than telegraph lines sometimes. So I had to tell him to come over there. I said, "This order means what it says. Now if you want to go against what I'm suggesting or putting down as the policy of the embassy, fine, go ahead, but let me know about it so I can say to Washington why I disagree with what you're doing." And we had one thing in about 1959, I guess. I had a military attaché as well on my staff. You see, the MAAG was a separate agency. And Colonel [Richard H.] Comstock came and said, "Mister Ambassador, I was just talking to my friend Colonel somebody of the Vietnamese Army who I've been working with very closely, trying to help out on getting the special forces camps going, guerrilla training of these special forces--"

Q: Is this Vietnamese special forces?

DURBROW: Yes. Yes. And I'd worked like the dickens to get that through and Williams got orders from Washington to go ahead and do it, and he wasn't doing hardly a thing about it when I got there. Freddie Reinhardt had tried to get it done, too, but he just resisted, so Freddie had helped me on getting started on the thing. I tried to follow through.

Q: Do you know what he had against that idea?

DURBROW: "They can't handle that. They're going to come down the main road. I know how to handle that, we can handle that. There'll be a few snipers here, there, and that sort of thing." It was obvious. As I said, I'd had the experience, I'd gone up into the jungle in Malaysia with [the British]. The British were very kind to me there as a friendly representative. I'd gone on treks through the jungle with the officers up there on the inspection trips, so I had some idea what the problem was in Malaysia and it's the same kind of climate and place. But Williams just didn't want to believe it. So anyway, without telling me, Williams canceled the arrangements made with the Vietnamese to set up five or six--I've forgotten--special forces training camps. They had one pilot plant already going. So from Colonel Comstock I learned this thing, and I had one hell of a fight. I had to go right back to Washington and say, "Here it is, boys." And they put it back on again. But he resisted from well before I got there this idea that there was going to be guerrilla-type war, not a trench warfare, World War I, or maneuvers as in World War II or anything of that kind.

You're going to bring up [Lionel] McGarr later. Well, fortunately, McGarr who came much later--I might confess to one of my many mistakes in life, I made two of them in one place, in the same place and at the same time with the same person. It was about General Williams. It was discovered in the archives of the Pentagon that General Williams, quite patriotically, he wasn't wrong, because as a kid he'd lied about his age.

Q: When would he--?

DURBROW: In 1917.

Q: Oh, when he enlisted. Oh, I see. I see.

DURBROW: He was not seventeen, he was only sixteen, but he wanted to go in for good, patriotic reasons, so give the guy full credit. They caught up with him later, so all of a sudden his time of station in the army on active duty came up.

Q: A year early.

DURBROW: A year earlier than was known to be. His record was still the seven-teen-year-old getting into the army. So I got word from the Pentagon through the State Department that General Williams would have to retire in a short time, but was there anybody I knew that I wanted, wanted to make some suggestions, something else like that, and please inform President Diem to this effect, he was going to be retired because of age. And I told Diem--of course Williams knew about it--and Diem just begged and plead and screamed because he and Williams got along very, very well. He liked to have lots of tanks and armies for his parades, I guess, I don't know why. And Williams had won his confidence before I got there, of course, and he counted on him for advice and things of that kind in the military field. I told him that I was afraid that it was a pretty strict rule, but there can be exceptions made. So Diem asked me specifically and officially on his behalf to ask that Williams be extended for at least one year. Well, I was having my battles with Williams, but I wasn't worried about that. I like battles. So Diem wanted it, and we were trying to do the right things in the military, and by the way, by that time Williams is coming around to doing a little bit of this special warfare stuff and guerrilla warfare and jungle training and that sort of thing. So I had a bird in my hand, so why not keep him there, he might be going in the right direction. So we got an extra year.

Then a year after that along came Anderson, who was under secretary of state, whatever he was--the cotton Anderson in Texas. What's his name? I know him damn well. Bill Anderson, was it? Anderson, Clayton Cotton Company.

Q: Yes, I know who you're talking about, but I can't call it to mind either.

DURBROW: That's the Anderson. I've forgotten his first name now. [Dillon Anderson?] But anyway, he was on his way to Malaysia to represent the President at the time that they got their independence from the British in 1958, 1959 I guess it was. Anderson stopped over to see Diem and check on what was going on over there for President Eisenhower. Diem got to him and said Williams told Diem that he was going to have to retire definitely this time unless some special arrangements were made. So Williams didn't tell me this; I knew it was true, but I didn't know what he was doing. But he got Diem to tell Anderson--didn't tell me--but to tell the President that he wants him to stay on another year. Fortunately, Anderson immediately did the right thing for our country and for the guy who was supposed to be the boss there. He told me. So I thought it over, and I went to Diem. I said, "What gives here?" He begged and plead with me again, so my second mistake was that I said, "All right, I'll go along with it if Eisenhower does." He did, so he had two years, and I should have only had him less than that.

But that was fun. I don't mind fights, but it was hard to have to fight all the time to get things done. Because just after that, by golly, he canceled these special forces training camps for the And I learned about it in this roundabout way. Fortunately for me, I had been at the National War College for two years and the Deputy Commandant for the Army was a guy named [Lyman] Lemnitzer, whom I knew quite well as a personal friend as well as a colleague from the War College. So when they canceled this special warfare business, I not only reported it officially but I wrote a personal letter to Lem and I said, "Do something about this." So Williams didn't last very much longer after that, and McGarr came over. I guess because of that reason, I don't know exactly why, but the army did pick a man who was specializing in unconventional warfare at Leavenworth. He was a commandant at Leavenworth before he came over. When he went there some three years or so before, he had almost immediately instituted a compulsory course in Command and General Staff School on counter insurrection and unconventional warfare. So he was all set for it. By the time McGarr got there, everything was still on the track. These camps were going and they were training them in unconventional methods, but McGarr stepped it up quite a bit.

Q: This question just occurs to me, and I'm not even sure it's a valid question. I have heard that General Williams was hand-picked by General Taylor for the job in Saigon.

DURBROW: Could have been.

Q: And I know that General Taylor was very interested in counterinsurgency, you know, the flexible response and so on.

DURBROW: I know Max Taylor very well. I see him all the time now.

Q: And it just strikes me, well, why did he pick him if he was going to take this approach? Or is that a valid [question]?

DURBROW: I never knew that he did. He probably did. I think your information may be perfectly correct, but I don't know. But Williams just didn't understand it. He understood tank maneuvers and trench warfare of World War I, that sort of thing, but he just didn't want to have anything to do with it.

Q: How did Diem react? What policies did he institute as the security situation in the countryside began to go downhill in the beginning of 1957 or whenever?

DURBROW: Well, it really started going down in late 1958 and 1959. As I said, the early period, 1954 to 1956, was the "get myself in the driver's seat," and he did. He beat the Binh Xuyen and the Hoa Hao and the Cao Dai and the rest of them. The three thousand-odd Viet Minh--not Viet Cong, they hadn't even been named yet--guerrillas weren't doing the job they were supposed to, to intimidate the whole countryside. [Then] they'll all rise to the communist cause and then Diem would be thrown out or bumped off.

So then from 1956 to 1959, building up the forces, we finally got Williams--and Diem was not 100 per cent sold on concentrating on unconventional warfare. He still liked tanks and that sort of thing. Williams, of course, helped to convince him of that. So there was a period of peace and quiet basically. There were incidents all the time, like in the new village of cutting off somebody's head or hand or the village chief or a teacher or a province chief or something like that. But, as I say, I traveled all over the darn country without any guard. I had a Vietnamese hunter, and he got a bunch of usually Montagnards to do the packing work for us as we trekked into the jungle. I just told him--of course he told me not to go to certain places like Zone D and Zone C on the Cambodian border, but outside of that I was up and down the spine and on the coast and all over the place and in the jungle.

Q: What kind of provisions did Diem make for local security, outside of the army? Didn't he have what they call local defense forces or self-defense forces?

DURBROW: Yes, he had the civil guard.

Q: The civil guard, right.

DURBROW: And they had their own police and the regular army. Incidentally, Williams wouldn't have anything to do with the civil guard, because he didn't control it, the military didn't control it.

Q: Who controlled it? Were they a police force?

DURBROW: The civil guard was a rural police force, if you will. They were not like most civil guards. It was a separate force that Diem would have that knew the countryside, weren't going to jump on tanks and come down the roads and that sort of thing. He did all he could to have the countryside policed, to fight off the bands coming out of Zone D and things like that, if he could ever catch them. Sometimes they did.

One of the big battles I had with the Eisenhower Administration was trying to get more helicopters. When I got there, they had six, seven or eight, I've forgotten. We wanted to get some H-34s, I think they were.

Q: The banana-shaped?

DURBROW: Oh no, no. The little-bitty ones.

Q: Oh, okay.

DURBROW: I've forgotten the designation, but nevertheless, you could get twelve Americans to sixteen Vietnamese--because they're smaller--[on them] with their gear and that sort of thing for dropping in through operations against the guerrillas and evacuating the wounded. For some reason--this was toward the end of the Eisenhower Administration--they resisted. Where they said we didn't have enough, we had other demands, we wanted lots of things. Even Williams went along with that one. And McGarr went along in a big way. So we got them before we left there.

But Diem wanted to have that sort of thing to help protect the countryside. The diplomatic corps was invited--not all of them, but selectively, ten or twelve chiefs of mission--to go with Diem out in the jungle out on the Delta for two-day trips. They had security guards all along the line and lots of other things and then boats were down in the Delta area, in the rain forest. They did a pretty good job in protecting us that way. By the time McGarr got there, things were going pretty hot and heavy internally. 1960, at Bien Hoa Air Base there, you know, two of our guys got killed.

Q: Excuse me, I had the impression that was 1959. I may be wrong.

DURBROW: Maybe it was.

Q: It's not terribly important.

DURBROW: It was 1959, yes. That's the first real big effort they made--the Viet Cong--to get a very important base right near the center of the capital, fifteen miles away. And of course, it was a hit-and-run job, again. When they got two of our officers, you know, it was very sad. But then they started hitting other ARVN bases not to kill men, necessarily, to capture--they wanted to get medical supplies and guns and ammunition. The Ho Chi Minh Trail had not been reopened again. So there was Tay Ninh in January of 1960 or February of 1960. And then in October-November 1960, they hit a bunch of construction sites up the new roads Diem was trying to build up in the spine of the Annamites.

Q: Was that the road to Ban Me Thuot?

DURBROW: No, beyond Ban Me Thuot. North of Pleiku.

Q: Kontum, perhaps.

DURBROW: Beyond Kontum. There was no road there. You got up to Kontum and a few miles further and the route was just rocky mountains. So he was trying for military reasons and other reasons to put in a road to Nha Trang. They hit some construction camps there in a pretty good-sized operation. That was a day after they started up there, and I saw where they had artillery and shooting in various places. It was a well-organized affair. By that time, it was clear that they had given up hope that the guerrilla, terrorist, propaganda, subversive operation was going to topple Diem. So they decided they'd better do something more organized. Those are the first signs of it we had.

Then in December 1960, we got a report that some IL-14 Soviet transports were staging through Hanoi--our Canadian friends told us this, from the ICC, International Control Commission--flying off to the west. So we got that on early--about the second or third of December. So I asked my air attaché, who was assigned to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, all three, so he could fly around all around the place. Just file a flight plan, he could take off, didn't have to get special visas or anything else like that. So I said, "Why don't you fly up to Vientiane tomorrow and see what you can see up there, what's happening."

So he got in his C-47 and flew up there, had some cameras with him. And sure enough, he flew a little bit out of his route over the Plaine des Jarres, which is a very flat plain in Laos there, the entrance to the Ho Chi Minh Trail, and sure enough, got pictures of IL-14s flying in there. They were parachuting it in this day--this is about the second or third of December, I've forgotten what it was, early December. And there were pretty heavy things they were putting in there. Finally, he flew around a bit, saw what looked like a small tractor going in there, a bulldozer.

So we reported that, and on the day before Christmas, the twenty-fourth of December, he flew up again to get some more pictures with a better guy to take the pictures. We had no special plane for taking pictures. And this time these IL-14s had teeth in them. They let go at him, and thank God it didn't shoot it down, but several bullets hit the fuselage and one sergeant got a--

Q: Now, let me be straight. This was air-to-air combat?

DURBROW: Yes, yes, yes. Aerial combat. The IL-14 had seen our guy flying around. They said we better get some machine guns on board these things. So from these IL-14s coming in--they were landing by that time, they'd made an airstrip. They were landing. So in taking their pictures they got shot at, just a few holes in the tail of the plane, that was all, and they got to Vientiane. Then we reported that and we got permission through Bangkok to release the pictures taken by somebody--I don't know who it was--to show what was happening.

So they started opening up the Ho Chi Minh Trail at that time. This was full Soviet assistance, these IL-14s flying in. From then on in, they pushed down the Trail more and more, and the operations in Laos got more organized and larger scale, infiltration got much more concentrated down toward Vietnam. Then they started hitting these camps and that sort of thing.

Q: Had there been infiltration before this time?

DURBROW: Oh yes, sure. There'd been infiltration, quite a bit of it. But they couldn't do it in large droves and the very heavy equipment, trucks couldn't come through. The DMZ was pretty well protected. You could infiltrate men across the DMZ. It was very rugged, it had paths and that sort of thing. There was a jungle to help.

Q: How about by sea? Did you have much evidence of infiltration that way?

DURBROW: No, there was some, but very little. That was too hard. That was pretty well patrolled. Pretty hard to do. There was some. But the estimate of it then by 1959 was that the original two to three thousand had been stepped up to maybe six to eight thousand, we never knew exactly, because the operation was more sophisticated, they were better trained. See, the ones they left behind in 1954 to 1956 and so forth were all southerners. They spoke with a southern accent. While they speak the same language, it's like our Deep South in this country and our Down Eastern Mainers. They're distinguishable, quite distinguishable. So then when they started training the new cadre to infiltrate, they took boys that were up in the North, born in the South, that accent, because they'd run out of southerners to come down to fill out the cadre in the South. But the build-up started really in 1959.

Q: Let me propound a thesis to you that I have seen proposed to explain Hanoi's actions in this period in the late fifties. It's been asserted that Hanoi expected to win by means more or less political in the late fifties and that was why they didn't push the shooting war any harder before 1959. And that Diem's anti-communist programs in the South--I think he called it the Communist Denunciation Program--was putting so much heat on the stay-behinds that the southern communists essentially told Hanoi, "If you don't start something, we're going to have to or we're going to be down the drain."

DURBROW: "We're not going to win." They weren't going to win. But how could they do it politically? They thought in 1954 that by intimidation, terrorism, propaganda and persuasion they could show this weak puppet called Diem, this American stooge and that sort of thing, "It's not going to do you any good. We've got a feel for the workers. We're all for the workers. Workers of the world unite," slogan things. But it just didn't work, even in the 1954-56 period. By 1956, 1958, 1959, they still tried it by raids on villages, and cutting off hands and heads, and terrorism, and it just didn't work. So deciding it could be done politically is--the people didn't rally to them by their intimidation or promises or propaganda or persuasion or subversion, so they had to change. Your version you just gave me is the same thing except that nothing can be done politically. It was not going to be done by this small group down there that would cause Diem to lose all backing among the people and they'd join the other team. Well, they didn't and they didn't all run either. Despite the fact when the thing got really going in the sixties, there were the police and the civil guard and the militia and the regular army, ARVN. There were some four hundred thousand guys who had guns in there. They could have shot it all at Diem and knocked him all up, but they stayed loyal to Diem and [Nguyen Van] Thieu and [Nguyen Cao] Ky and the rest of them. And the version you heard there, I'm afraid, was part of this revisionist historian type of stuff that's been put out by our press and others that we forced the people, the communists, to react. Please, just don't ever believe that junk.

Q: Well, I wanted to stimulate a reaction.

DURBROW: I lived too damn long behind the Curtain myself and we're dealing with that same problem today, "If we do that, that'll stimulate them to react." Of course they're going to react. Well, who the hell started it? When they left these three thousand guys behind, they hoped to do it, and it didn't work. Then they started infiltrating more down there. It didn't work, so they decided they'd better pour the regular stuff on, and they did by guerrilla type operations. By 1961-62 the Ho Chi Minh Trail was pretty well open then. They'd been working on it since before that [with the] bulldozer dropped to the Plaine des Jarres. They opened it up and they were getting quite sizeable convoys coming down. We weren't allowed to hit them. Diem wasn't allowed to hit them in Laos or Cambodia.

That brings up another thing. They were coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail in piles but not by large convoys, and they set up these sanctuaries in Cambodia just across the Vietnamese line, just east of Phnom Penh and west of Saigon. They had all these Viet Minh troops in there and I went over to Phnom Penh every once in a while to see my colleague Bill Trimble who was a very close friend of mine from way back days. It was only forty-five minutes by plane. So I'd go over to see Bill and sometimes I'd see [Norodom] Sihanouk, and Bill would come see me and [I'd say], "Do you want to see Diem this time?" We'd work out these things--and they weren't getting along, never did--hoping to get them to drop the hatchet a bit and then collaborate. We knew these Viet Minh troops were in Cambodia in 1960, and in January 1960 I was over seeing Bill and--when was it?--it must have been 1960. Well, I can get that for you later.

But anyway, Diem is squawking like the devil about this big bunch of Viet Minh troops having a sanctuary and operating out of a sanctuary area, parading into the Delta, getting rice, discombobulating the population in large units, company units and that sort of thing, pretty good size for that sort of operation. And why does Sihanouk let them stay there? So this particular day, Diem invited Bill and me to come talk to him. I'd gone to school in France and got my master's degree at the Sorbonne so I could speak French pretty well and Bill had better command of French than I have. So we both could speak to Sihanouk just alone, no interpreters around, free to let our hair down and talk Dutch uncle business. So in this conversation that came up, I said to Bill, "I'm going to try to work in to see if I can ask the question: why the hell doesn't he do something about getting rid of those Viet Minh troops in his territory, violating his neutrality and all that sort of thing?" So I've forgotten how it came up in the conversation, but I wheeled in and Bill helped me along a bit. Sihanouk--did you ever hear his voice?

Q: Yes.

DURBROW: A very high-pitched voice. "Je ne sais pas pourquoi vous posez cette question comme ca mais tout [inaudible]." So I said, "Well, you know, you don't get along with Ngo Dinh Diem and your people haven't got along over the centuries, but you're both in the same boat now. Hanoi wants to take you both over, Moscow does, and so does China. Why the dickens don't you try to bury the hatchet a bit? One thing, if you could possibly do it, is to try to drive those Viet Minh out of your territory right across the Parrot's Beak there and beyond the Mekong." He hit the high C's on this one. He said, "I know they're there. I know they're there." I said, "Well, there's quite a lot of them." "Yes, there's about twenty-five thousand of them. I don't have an army of twenty-five, thirty thousand with all my militia. There's the Mekong River in between, there's only one road, it's marshy all around the side. I don't want them there. They shouldn't be there. I can't get rid of them. Don't blame me." He was telling us all this, it was what we wanted to hear.

So he got all through and I said, "Could I pass that on to Diem that maybe you'll collaborate a little bit? You push them one way and you'll need your whole army and you push there and you'll cut off their line of supplies to the north somewhere and--" "No, no, no, we can't do that. I haven't got enough army." So he said, when I'd bring up this, talking, "Don't you tell that to Diem." I said, "I'm not going to tell him. I won't. Of course I won't." "And what's more, if either one of you tell your government about this and it gets published, I'm going to deny every word you said and call you both liars." (Laughter)

Q: I heard or saw him described a few years ago as a cross between an absolute dictator and Hubert Humphrey. Is that apt?

DURBROW: That's very apt. (Laughter) He was in town the other day, about within the last year. He'd come to visit and I went up to see him to see what he looked like.

Q: Did you get to talk to him?

DURBROW: Oh, I talked--it was just a reception, about fifty other people there. But he recognized me of course, and we chatted for just a minute. He was trying to get us to do some setting up of his new government in Cambodia.

But anyway, things were going very bad by 1959. McGarr, as soon as he got there, went in for the unconventional warfare step-up.

Q: Can I interrupt a second? It seems to me that I have seen that in 1960 Washington directed that some kind of counterinsurgency plan--

DURBROW: That's what I'm going to talk about.

Q: Is that what you're talking about?

DURBROW: I'm going to bring that up.

Q: Good.

DURBROW: Under McGarr who was all for it. So we got the MAAG, the AID program, and the CIA to work together as a real team. We got a team going and no quibbling and squabbling about who's on first or second. So we had what we called the counterinsurgency plan and it took us about three months. And the military put all their input on why and how it'd be used, and where it'd be used, and what kind of rifles and machine guns and helicopters, everything. And we put ours in the CIA and all the different plans. That thing was worked on and worked on and worked on until finally sent out by courier just before Christmas. I'd say the twenty-second of December in 1960. We learned later by telegram that it had arrived in the department just before New Year's, had been glanced over and they said, "Keep up the good work. We'll give you some reaction."

Of course, in the meantime, Kennedy was just about ready to take over, and so we were given a few go-aheads on some of the things we had been looking for for a long time. "Go ahead with the old program. We can't tell you later." Then we were very gratified and they sent a photostatic copy, a Xerox copy of the--we had a summary of the thing in the first part, by itself I would think, and Kennedy looked it over apparently enough to [write], "Why so little? JFK." We were scared. It was about two hundred million dollars. We were making a hell of a--we were going for a big show. And "Why so little?" Then on the basis of that, Johnson came over there in May. I presume that is [why], anyway. I don't know why, but that made us rather gratified.

So the picture changed like the mischief beginning in 1959 when they opened up the Ho Chi Minh Trail. We knew it was going on, the raids in Tay Ninh, the one in Bien Hoa before that, way up north of Pleiku and all that sort of thing. So the fat was in the fire and anybody that tries to kid the American public that this is only because we were being mean to them and weren't even letting them take over politically in the South, is the same kind of stuff they're talking about in Angola, Namibia and whatnot. If they don't get their way, we provoked them into doing something worse.

Q: Let me ask you a few questions about intelligence, because that's an issue that comes up from time to time, too. How good was our intelligence when you arrived in country?

DURBROW: It was fairly good. The CIA was doing a good job. A fellow named Nick Natsios was the chief of station when I first got there. We became very good friends. Bill Colby was the fellow who succeeded him. I'd been with Bill in Rome, all right, so we knew each other quite well, were very good friends. By the time I got there--of course, [Edward] Lansdale did a very good job, despite the reputation he's had. You know, he [Johnson] recommended I not stay there in 1961; he knew I was going out already, so he said I should be replaced.

Q: Oh, that was when he made the visit in 1961. Okay.

DURBROW: Yes. I developed my throat among other things, and my nose was running and I was six years in the tropics. Knowing there was a change of party and also a change of regime at home here, I'd written my good friend Loy Henderson, who was once a Moscow stable mate of mine. I said, "I'm not rushing to get out of here, but I've got this sinus drip and this sort of thing." It irritated my upper lip so much I had to raise a mustache. I had great big scabs all around here. I'd been there so doggone long in Saigon that I became chief, you know, the dean of the diplomatic corps. Go around kissing babies and cutting ribbons, so I had to raise a mustache. That was fine. I got this French tropical doctor, military doctor, [who had] been out there for years, a very nice guy named Kessier [phonetic], a very nice fellow. And he said, "I can cure it up." So he said, "It's an old cure, an old cure. They don't use it anymore, but it's going to work." An old German dye, gentian violet--have you ever seen any gentian violet? So he said, "You put this on in the evening and you sleep with it. Then you take it off in the morning with this." And it burned. And my gosh, did it hurt. But my mustache was purple. (Laughter)

So here I am running around kissing babies and doing all the things that the dean of the diplomatic corps [is supposed to do]. So I had asked Loy to move me out of here, and I made a recommendation that because of the so-called elections, which weren't our type of elections, but they're better than none, that Diem was going to have in May of 1961--there was a lot of controversy whether he's going to have re-elections and all that sort of business, who's going to be in the opposition and all this do-good stuff at home, which doesn't do anybody any good, us particularly. The country doesn't understand what democracy's all about. But I said, "Maybe it'd be a good thing if my successor"--before I knew who it was going to be actually--"could come in with a clean slate. The elections are won or lost, whatever happens to them. [Otherwise] he comes in and gets tarred with a brush that he didn't put enough in their democracy, and I'm an S.O.B., already." So that's why I stayed until May 2, incidentally.

Things were going much worse by then, but the counterinsurgency plan had started to work. [Here's] another bit of information that may not be in the records. There's a colleague of ours--and I've forgotten who it was in the embassy in Paris, a fellow I knew, anyway--[who] got to talking with a Frenchman I guess early in 1960. Something came out about how the French had fooled us about the number of advisers they had when they left Vietnam in 1954. The official record was, at the Geneva Conferences, Geneva Accords, six hundred and forty-two. I've forgotten the figure. You can get those or I can check my records. Freddie Reinhardt worked--you had a bunch of recovery teams come in there, so we never got above nine hundred and forty-two advisers. The recovery team was a cover to get some more guys in there; we needed them. We did recover a lot of the equipment that was left there; they shipped it out. We didn't need three hundred more guys, but we did get them.

He said, "You know, we had about nineteen hundred advisers there in 1954 and we told you six hundred and forty-two and you guys bought it." So he reported this to me personally and said, "I don't know if it'll do you any good, Durby, but this guy, I drew him out quite a bit and he gave me some champagne or something and more details: 'We had about nineteen hundred and some-odd--'" So we said, "Sure it will." So we asked the department to run this thing down, to double-check it and get somebody in the French government to officially confirm that yes, they had lost some records or something and they didn't realize how many they did have, but it was nineteen hundred and sixty-six. So by that time, we had the official record and the French said, yes, they did have that many military advisers in Vietnam and they should have given us that figure when they made the accords in 1954.

So here we are, Christmas time, presents all over the place, so it was on the basis of that that JFK and the rest of the boys bring up their [proposal]. It was already in the mill when Kennedy actually took over. But that's how we got the bunch of advisers. It wasn't something that happened, that Kennedy did overnight. We knew that we needed many more to carry out this counterinsurgency plan. We made this lucky discovery, confirmed by the French. So we told the ICC--the International Control Commission--the Canadians, the Indians and the Poles. They checked the records. Yes, the French confirmed that they made a mistake in 1954, so under the accords, we were allowed to have the same number the French had. So that made it possible.

Q: The ICC bought it?

DURBROW: The ICC bought it, yes. Not the Poles, but the others did.

Q: Well, the Poles never--

DURBROW: The Poles never did. Incidentally, one of the guys--well, several of them; I was there four years and a half--one of the Poles I knew very well when I was in Poland, way back when he was a young man, of course.

Q: Well, you get on these career tracks and you just keep crossing trails.

DURBROW: The elite. (Laughter)

Q: Now, I have seen some place a CIA National Intelligence Estimate, an NIE, I guess they're called.

DURBROW: NIE, yes.

Q: --that was done in 1959. Now, I don't know what month; I can't recall off-hand. I have the impression that Chester Cooper had a hand in writing it--maybe he was the chief author, I'm not sure--which said that one of the things that was making things worse was that Diem's repressions were alienating too many people. Now, was that intelligence coming from Washington to you, or were they feeding off what you were telling Washington?

DURBROW: We were getting it. Have you read my request for instructions in September, 1960?

Q: I can't remember seeing it.

DURBROW: Well, by the time I'd been there several years, a year or two, I got to know Diem very well and I admired him and respected him. He wasn't a Jeffersonian Democrat, and he couldn't be. He didn't understand it, among other [things]. His country couldn't run that way. To try to demand that they must all have free, open-seated elections overnight is just impossible in any country, wherever it is, unless they have some mores and build-up for the thing, some feel for it and understanding. So it got so that I could talk to him really very frankly. I had many very frank talks with him. I'd see him once a week, sometimes more often and sometimes three times a month, whatever it was. But you had to set a half a day aside when you went over there. He talked and talked and talked and talked and talked.

He didn't delegate any authority--one of his problems--except with his brother a little bit, some of his generals, but just a little bit. He was trying to do too darn much and things weren't getting done on the AID program, the military program, the social programs or wherever, public relations, among others. So I'd had many frank talks with him and had had instructions, which I usually asked for, to get pretty frank with him. And he could have thrown me out as persona non grata, but we got on a very good man-to-man basis, not agreeing on everything but with mutual respect, I guess you want to call it.

So I asked for these instructions. We got together the country team and said, "He is not getting over public relations-wise, not only with our country. People back at home [think] they're not democratic enough, [he] doesn't have enough free elections and this, that, and the other thing, and no free press and all the rest of the thing." But do you know what the Can Lao Party is?

Q: Yes.

DURBROW: That's the Diem party, the Nhu party--Nhu was the head of it--and CIA penetrated it. I don't know how the hell they penetrated it, but they did. We knew a great deal about what was going on--really a lot--and the grumbling and how things are going better, the economy is going better. They passed the pre-war rice production in 1958, rubber in 1957, exports were going up and things were going much better. The land reform program was all over in the Delta; the new villages up in the mountains weren't going too well for the reasons I explained, but that was all fine. The Can Lao Party was antagonizing too many people and arresting too many people. We knew it; we didn't know how many exactly of course. So he was our man, he was on our side, he was an anti-communist, he was not anti-American by any means. He was a dedicated patriot, he was not corrupt anymore than any other Asian, clearly less than most of them, some of them in the Philippines, their own little country. I was all for him. The department was, too, I think, and our government in general.

So we worked up these instructions, a rather long request for instructions, and it bandied back and forth with changes here and there. And finally I got my go-ahead, and I had about three or four--very long ones this time--maybe four-hour talks with Diem as a straight Dutch uncle about setting up a joint chief of staff to have some say-so. "Don't try to run everything, delegate authority here, do this, do that, the Can Lao Party be--" I told him two or three times about some of the things we knew the Can Lao Party was doing, monopolizing the cinnamon trade and all that sort of thing, and getting money from the South to enforce declarations going through our custom. We had quite a bit of dope on this whole [thing]. For a little country of that size, the CIA and the AID people were doing a good job, too. One way or another we got pretty good intelligence.

So anyway, I got these instructions and had this long talk and he didn't agree with any of it basically, but he didn't throw me out or didn't try to change the subject. He promised to think them over. He started to implement some of them, quite a few, and that's what I'm after. I sent--what you get in the Pentagon Papers is a New York Times version--my request for instructions to tell him this, and telling him the other thing. Then at the end of the thing, if the department approves of me talking along these lines, in the event that by chance he doesn't go along, doesn't want to go along with most of them and doesn't try to do what he can to help himself with our suggestions and assistance, it is perhaps time for us to give serious consideration to look around and see if we may not have to look for another leader over here.

Q: Now, Mr. Ambassador, let me interrupt you a second. You have mentioned a number of specific things that you talked to Diem about on this occasion, delegating authority through a joint chiefs of staff sort of set-up and so on.

DURBROW: And the civilian side, too, yes. Premier. The vice president. Let the vice president do some things.

Q: Now, these all strike me as being administrative sorts of improvements, loosening the reins of authority a little bit and so on.

DURBROW: Yes. Free press.

Q: How does this approach the subject of the repressions that were supposed to be--?

DURBROW: Well, the Can Lao Party operation was brought up in quite a big way.

Q: You mentioned they were arresting people.

DURBROW: And they were.

Q: What sorts of [people]?

DURBROW: He didn't have just thousands and thousands of political prisoners. He had hundreds and they were pretty key people in the opposition, so they got squawks from their other people. But it was authoritarian government. It wasn't a dictatorship, he wasn't Stalin. I had the dubious pleasure of spending all my six years in Moscow under Stalin. I knew what a real so-and-so can be and how he operates, with real secret police and no opposition whatsoever. There was opposition in Vietnam and you could talk to other people. They'd come and talk to you and it wasn't this omnipotent KGB-type operation. So it was authoritarian. It has to be. They'd never had any government of their own for some two or three centuries, and the French and others.

Q: Wasn't it in 1959--I'm a little shaky on this, I think it was 1959--wasn't there sort of an ad hoc group of notables who got together and wrote an open letter to Diem recommending improvements?

DURBROW: Yes, yes.

Q: They got in trouble for doing that.

DURBROW: Yes, they did. We helped them to write it a bit, the CIA--

Q: Oh, you did?

DURBROW: Yes, we did. They didn't get in real trouble. Oh, they lost their influence, so to speak. But the guy was right, the country was going very well economically, going along with a lot of those things, but he just couldn't help being the good old mandarin that his ancestors had been. His father had been a mandarin type in Hue and that sort of thing. So he had to make some moves in a relaxing direction, and we didn't demand that he have free elections better than New York City or anything like that. But [we recommended] having more free elections and more freedom of the press, give press conferences and things to allow the people to have some safety valves, talk to the senators and the representatives to allow them to have safety valves and other grievances.

Anyway, Halberstam in his book gives me a great deal of credit--I was the guy that tried to get rid of Diem way long back. We should have gotten rid of him way before that, but Durbrow did have the good idea of getting rid of him in September 1960. I had no such idea whatsoever, because I had this shirt tail on the thing and in case it doesn't work, boys, just don't think we got to back this guy up forever when we ever start to thinking about who the hell could we get to replace him somehow. And we were paying for all these darn things and we were trying to hold it in our days of containment, which is the only way to run the railroad against the Soviets as far as I'm concerned. So if we can't get this guy to help us on this thing, we got to look for somebody else.

Just an afterthought sort of thing. So I was the guy that really wanted to get rid of Diem in 1960, and why did we not do it until 1963, says Halberstam.

Q: If you had to give Halberstam a grade for the things he says about your tenure in Saigon, what would it be? F?

DURBROW: He gave me the wrong grade. He gave me an A. I should have had an F from his point of view.

Q: But I want you to grade Halberstam now.

DURBROW: Well, I've never met Halberstam. I haven't tried to duck him, I haven't had an opportunity to meet him. He got there after I left there. I was so concerned about his stuff for the New York Times, as I read it in Paris--I was transferred to the NATO Council in Paris--that I went to Drew Middleton, who was the chief of bureau there. And I'd known Drew very, very well in Moscow at the end of the war and then in 1946 to 1948. And I had lunch with Drew several times. I never did meet this guy Halberstam. You know I just got out of Vietnam and what he was saying there was just completely crazy, "These Buddhists are being persecuted by Diem." By the way, Diem was not an anti-Buddhist. He was a Catholic of course, a very devout Catholic, but he was very tolerant of religion. Halberstam saying this, that, and the other thing, I said, "Why the devil did the Times send a guy like that, because the only thing I can tell you there is that they're completely wrong." "I don't know, Durby."

Finally he saw these things coming and whatnot, these dispatches. Halberstam did his two years, he was transferred from Saigon to Paris and I think it may be my poison, but anyway, Drew said, "I won't take him." By that time Drew is pretty high up in the Times' foreign correspondents business. He'd been in since the early part of World War II. So Drew didn't take him in his bureau in Paris, and he went to Poland and was the bureau chief there in Poland--where he met his wife, incidentally.

But to get back to Halberstam, I've not checked this through myself personally because it doesn't make any difference, but a young kid, a young graduate student came to see me four or five years ago from American University here to talk about this period in Vietnam and war. And he said, "You got the best marks of any ambassador from Halberstam there." "Yes, I noticed that." I told him why he was wrong, it was just exactly the opposite. Now, if he was trying to tell the whole truth, why the hell didn't he put in--because they are available in the Pentagon Papers, too--my reply of my four-hour discussion with Diem where he'd agreed to do things and was doing things then and whatnot? If I was such a good guy, why didn't he give the full story?

But he said, "Don't you know where Halberstam got all that thing for The Best and the Brightest in his book?" I said, "I know when he was sitting out there. No." "He was allowed to see the Pentagon Papers before they were leaked." Those direct quotes, I said I couldn't understand why Halberstam could quote so-and-so, Marshall or I don't know who all, Rusk or McNamara or all over the place, those guys, direct quotes doing this, that and the other thing. It sounded like they're official and real. He saw the Pentagon Papers. He worked on the Pentagon Papers, made a lot of money, supposed to split with Daniel Ellsberg, too, I don't know.

Q: Well, of course Neil Sheehan was a good friend of Halberstam.

DURBROW: Oh, yes, sure. Yes.

I want to finish on this Diem thing. He started in really doing quite a lot of them, really going very, very well for about six weeks until November 11 and the coup. You can bring up the coup then, the [Nguyen Chanh] Thi coup, which is a serious thing, but we had rumors of coups every other week there. The CIA had the place pretty well cased. I must say they did a very fine job there. They didn't know this particular one on this particular day, you are never sure.

But they had it all set up and it started about three o'clock in the morning. My residence was half a mile from the palace. The chancery's half a mile the other way about as the bird flies. We had an air-conditioned room, so the windows were closed and I heard, "Boom! Boom! Boom! Boom!" I went out on the balcony and I could see flashes down there, fireworks. What's this? Before I got to the telephone to the duty officer down at the embassy--because that was higher up, that was a seven or eight-story building--to see what he could see and whatnot, who was on the phone but Bill Colby, the station chief of Saigon whose house was literally on Independence Avenue, which is the main drag leading up to the palace, two blocks north of the palace. The guys were all becoming reporters right in front of his house. And Bill was reporting, getting his own boys around, and by about five o'clock that morning one of them came through the fire and got into my house, gave me a full report, who it was, Colonel Thi, what he was doing, how the others were handling it. It really went on for a couple of days. But my beautiful thoughts and my beautiful efforts and the State Department's and everything else to get Diem to go on the right track were thrown off the track immediately.

Q: Now, why was that?

DURBROW: Somebody really revolted against him. And all these things we said, these democratic things, these freedom things, these relaxing of tensions, "Well, look what I got to face, by God! The air force at least went after me. I'd better do something about it and I've got to go back to my old ways of operating."

Q: Lansdale reported -- I may be paraphrasing him slightly--when he came back in 1961 that Diem had developed a deep distrust of the State Department. I think that's a direct quote.

DURBROW: He probably did say something like that.

Q: Can you account for it?

DURBROW: Maybe I'm one of the reasons. We tried like the dickens to get him to do these things. We thought it would be in the long-range interest of Vietnam and ourselves as well, but basically his. It wouldn't hurt us too much if he got bumped off. It caused a lot of trouble and got us in a war, but we weren't thinking in those terms then. But Fritz [Frederick] Nolting got along with him very well, you know, and with Nhu as well, even better than I did, I understand from what Fritz tells me and others did. Maybe because of that September tete-a-tete I had with him. I had a couple of others with him, too, before I left in May.

Incidentally, Halberstam said that after I tried to get rid of one of those instructions that [Diem] didn't give the answer to, that I hardly ever saw Diem from then on in until I left; he didn't even give me a farewell party. He gave me three.

Q: Three?

DURBROW: Oh, yes. One was a very intime one for my wife and myself, the Nhus, General Thieu, the chief of staff, and his wife, and about eight or ten. Nobody else on our side, just all these Vietnamese. We had a wonderful evening. Then I got the big one, then the one from the foreign office. I saw him just as often after September as I ever did, but Halberstam [wrote that] the guy that really tried to get rid of that son of a bitch wasn't spoken to for the rest of the six to eight months, he had no contact with Diem. Well, we had all kinds of contact with Diem. That's what I think of Halberstam.

Q: Can you account for that in Halberstam's book at all?

DURBROW: I don't know why our press then and still now, in many cases, are bending over backwards to make us look like boobs, around the world, be it El Salvador, Nicaragua, Angola, name it. When I was there, there was very little press, you see. They had a couple of stringers and the boys that come down from Hong Kong or from Tokyo to spend a week, two weeks looking things over, and a lot of them I knew before. But as soon as we got troops in--I guess by the time the Vice President came over, Johnson came over, and you had all these new advisers coming in and the counterinsurgency plan was coming in over the docks, you couldn't miss seeing it--the boys started flocking down. So why they turned out that way and just almost 100 per cent undermined everything that was going on [I don't know]. Wrong, wrong, wrong, terrible, terrible, terrible.

Q: I have seen an interview that General Williams gave to U.S. News and World Report about 1964. He said that when he left South Vietnam--and I think he left in September of 1960--and this is a quote, "the situation bordered on the critical," unquote, and what he meant was in the context that relations between Diem and USOM were so bad that the situation was critical. Would you comment on that?

DURBROW: I remember that. That was one of our problems with Diem. A lot of our AID stuff was not getting out in the field, out in the country, and fertilizer was not going out to the farmers and the rest of it. So I had a very good, tough USOM guy--Haraldson, by name, Wes Haraldson--and we concocted [a plan]. He talked to his counterpart numbers in the government and I'd talk to Diem about that sort of thing. That they had to show better use of the stuff and not have it stacked up in warehouses.

Then we had reports. We never got them quite 100 per cent, but I think they were true, that the Can Lao was using some to feather their own nest maybe or to get their own cohorts to stick faithful to them. Despite the reports in the press, incidentally, about Nhu and Diem having these millions of dollars in Swiss bank accounts which [they were] flying over--you've heard the expression Radio Catinat? Catinat was the French name for Tu Do Street. That's where the hotels are where all the correspondents lived. So I've been in lots of places with lots of rumors, but I've never been in a place anywhere where the rumors popped up [as they did] in Saigon. Unbelievable! [There were rumors that] Radio Catinat had all this money stashed away and everything else like that, they were feathering their own nest, getting ready to fly. Well, I don't know what money they had in what bank account in Switzerland, if any, or whether Mrs. Nhu really had this coffee plantation that she was supposed to have down in Brazil or the Rex movie theater in Paris. We got the CIA to check that any doggone way they could to see whether [they were true]. Those are two reports I particularly remember. And [there was] no verification whatsoever, not even hints about it.

But when they both were bumped off--Nhu and Diem were bumped off in 1963--Mrs. Nhu was out of the country and saved her neck that way. In Paris, when I was later on in Paris, she lived with Brother Nguyen--that was the youngest brother of the Ngo family--in one of these great big French apartments where you've got lots of room. The Nguyens had eleven children. She had two, and herself. Then one of our military guys on the NATO staff lived literally right below her. He saw her go up in the elevator and knew the concierge. They were living like peasants in this room, just stacked in like sardines in a tin in this fairly big apartment in a nice part of Paris. Finally they had to move.

She moved down to Rome where the oldest brother of the family, the Archbishop, was able to get a little place for her to live out in Frascati, just outside of Rome. I checked that with my CIA friends, and they checked on it. She was living very frugally. She lost the key to all these riches or they didn't know where it was or they didn't tell her. But this idea of corruption was greatly exaggerated, but our press just fell for it hook, line and sinker.

Talking about USOM and Williams, I haven't heard that one before. But anyway, he didn't like the USOM because they were getting much more aid than he thought his boys should get, dividing up the pie in many cases. They had the civil guard under their... They were supplying the supplies.

Q: Wasn't there some kind of argument over the civil guard?

DURBROW: Oh, God, yes. A hell of one.

Q: What was that about?

DURBROW: "Well, if I can't control it, I'm not going to give a damn if it all goes to pot," was Sam Williams' basic idea. And Diem didn't want to put it under the military and we knew it was a good idea that it should be a rural police sort of thing, as it was really supposed to be and you need different kinds of weapons. You don't need tanks, you don't need personnel carriers or that sort of thing. So USOM funded the military supplies for the civil guard and we tried to get--McGarr went along with it very nicely--Williams to make some suggestion, for God's sake, for something besides the military, the regular army, to help these guys to do their operation in the countryside for internal security.

Q: Who was in charge of the training of the civil guard? Or were they being given any?

DURBROW: Oh, gosh, I can't remember. It wasn't MAAG.

Q: Was MSU [Michigan State University] involved in that?

DURBROW: Yes, MSU was, that's right. Of course they were.

Q: I was curious.

DURBROW: Oh, yes, yes. MSU, yes. They did a very good job, by the way, I think. Now, I'd just forgotten this--my mind. And they got civilian trainers to come over from police forces and that sort of thing and it was very good. They set up the police force in Saigon, too, as a matter of fact. I'd forgotten about MSU. Had it in my notes but I'd forgotten about that.

Q: I've heard there was a controversy over the fact that General Williams went out of channels on one occasion over a question of arms for the civil guard. Do you recall any such incident?

DURBROW: Yes, yes. Gosh, I can't remember the details. You're quite right. He did. Gee, I can't remember. No question, I remember very well it happened, [but] the details--that just slips my mind.

Q: Well, I don't know the details, but I thought--

DURBROW: Yes, yes, he did. I told you that one of my many mistakes were those two. Hanging Sam was his name, you know.

Q: Yes, yes, I've heard that. Apparently that was famous throughout the army, that he was Hanging Sam.

DURBROW: Yes, because he was the guy, the guard at the Nuremberg trials.

Q: Were you able to brief your successor, Mr. Nolting?

DURBROW: Yes. You never brief your successor at the post. That's an old tradition. Why I don't know. It's obvious why, I guess. You're the has-been and don't gummy up the works, and he comes in as a fresh mind or fresh ambassador, fresh look, new administration, whatever it is. Fritz and I were old friends anyway, so we debriefed each other at Honolulu. I left on the second of May and he got in about the seventh or eighth, got there just in time for LBJ to arrive. We had a day and a half at CINCPAC in Honolulu.

Q: What did you tell him?

DURBROW: Oh, I told him more or less what I'm telling you now. We were very old friends. [We discussed] the problem I was having with Diem and why I thought they rose up again, the coup, and that sort of thing.

I saw a lot of Nhu, incidentally; I haven't mentioned this before. I didn't see him as often as I did Diem. I made a point of seeing Nhu, but the CIA boys worked more closely with Nhu, and I'd see him maybe once a month. Very little socially, because he didn't ever go out at all, but I'd try to make a point of seeing him, the foreign minister. But Diem really ran the show.

Q: Can you tell me what kind of picture you painted for Mr. Nolting, just in broad terms? Did you tell him the situation?

DURBROW: Well, I know definitely, as I've said already, I liked Diem very much. He was our man. He was not the kind of guy we'd have picked if we were picking the perfect guy for the job we had over there, but he was on our side and all the rest of the things that I've said. And I told him about taking half a day off if you're going to go over there. You're going to spend time, he'll talk with you. I told him how to break in if you can. If you can get him to break in, he'll listen to you. And Fritz spoke quite good French, too, so try to not have any interpreter, he didn't like it. He doesn't want his own staff to know what he's told you.

Incidentally, on that score he very politely and very delicately, after he learned that I knew French quite well and I translate back and forth, asked me when some bigwigs came over there, Lemnitzer or whoever it was, would I mind being the interpreter. He didn't want his own staff to know what he said to these guys. So I said, "Please, go ahead, s'il vous plait." So I talked to Fritz along those lines.

Q: Now, you say you went to Paris, is that correct, after this?

DURBROW: Yes.

Q: Were you able to follow from that vantage point what was happening in Vietnam?

DURBROW: Yes. I'd been there four years plus I liked the place, I'd tramped around the place, I'd been around, I hoped I'd done them some good, and then when I saw these really Halberstam-type, Sheehan-type stories and all the rest, they just made me burn. So I went to Drew Middleton and said, "This guy's telling a bunch of hoopla." Of course, I was still getting the traffic, the State Department traffic, and you get traffic from the Southeast Asian part of it, too, so I didn't bother to read it all. Anyway, I didn't have time. But in one sense the word that while NATO--that's out of the NATO territory, dealing with the French and other powers, and what of our picture in Vietnam and what we were doing out there and when our troops came in. So I was Mr. Vietnam on the American delegation to NATO and discussed it with the council once in a while, something that happened and what did you hear about it. So I tried to keep in fairly close touch with it, not just from the press.

Q: What was your reaction when the news of the Diem coup, the one in 1963, came over?

DURBROW: I was just stunned. I was. I couldn't tell you, guarantee what happened. I knew it was going to be one hell of a mess. There's nobody can take over, because [when] I made that suggestion, sent with this instruction, and I said you might think about [replacing Diem], we had tried to think who the heck we might get to be forceful enough and have enough backing in the country, constituency in the country, and we couldn't think of anybody. We had some names, but nobody would be even half as good as we thought Diem was. Because he worked like the devil, you know; he was a bachelor. He worked too much to delegate authority. I understand he worked about sixteen hours a day and never took any vacation or whatnot. I knew there was going to be one hell of a mess and it turned out to be worse than I thought it would be.

Q: What was your reaction to the revelations that it was apparently an American initiative which started that ball rolling down that hill?

DURBROW: I didn't doubt it from what I knew already and from what I'd heard after I left, that he wasn't democratic enough. Now, I want to make this clear, and I want to say it whether anybody likes it or not. We are completely wonderful in our thoughts about everybody having all the four freedoms, all the civil rights and all the ten commandments and the original ten Constitutional amendments. It's a beautiful thought and I hope it works in every country, but it can't. It just can't work. Today in the world there are about fourteen countries that have really practiced democracy in our sense of the word that the authority has changed hands by a fairly honest secret balloting process. Only about fourteen left. Latin America doesn't count; Eastern Europe doesn't count; Germany doesn't count--I mean, since the Take the day of the Soviet revolution in 1917. From 1917 to date, there are about fourteen countries that have changed their governments by the ballot process, by the secret ballots and freedom of the press and so forth. They're wonderful thoughts and they work when they work, but to try to say we must have Diem or the generals in the Argentine or wherever it is, Duarte in El Salvador today, [to tell them], "You have free elections or else we won't back them up any mere," it's a beautiful thought and I wish it were practical, but it isn't.

So I resisted all these ideas about these free elections and I said, "Well we have to go through the motions." And the May 2 ones were, for that part of the world, pretty good. [He] had a few opposition token things, and people went to the ballot box. Now, Ky, on the other hand, when he had his election in 1964-65--I've forgotten when.

Q: September 1966 I think.

DURBROW: 1966, yes, yes, sorry. But when the Buddhists boycotted it--I want to get that on the record: Vietnam is not a Buddhist country, never has been a Buddhist country and can't be, unless they boot a bunch of them in. About 10 per cent of the population in Vietnam were Buddhists. About 10 per cent were Catholics. There were the Montagnards, a million of same. The census out there is very elastic. Nobody else had one, really. The Chinese are about two million, and in my day out there, there were about fourteen million in South Vietnam. And there were the Cao Dai, the Hoa Hao and the Binh Xuyen who got wiped out. There were the other Buddhists--the Cambodian Buddhists, Mahayana, what do they call it?

Q: Mahayana ?

DURBROW: Mahayana, yes. And most of the population, about 40 per cent of the population, are synergistic religion. It's a composite. It's a mixture of Confucianism, Taoism, some tenets of Buddhism--but very few tenets of Buddhism--ancestor worship and When the Halberstams and the rest of the boys would get this telegram, this telephone call that Thich Quang Duc is going to burn himself up at Forty-second and Broadway in Saigon, he's going to speak on Tu Do Street, they'd all go over there with a camera. And we had the impression that this dirty, mean old Catholic Diem--and I'm not a Catholic myself--was persecuting these nice, poor Buddhist people. It was just the best bunch of propaganda and undermining operations you can think of.

Q: What do you suppose was motivating those Buddhists who immolated themselves?

DURBROW: Well, I think what started the thing probably--and this happened while I was there, just before I left, on Buddha's birthday in 1961 up in Hue they had this march. They weren't supposed to parade as Buddhists per se, and they did and somebody in the militia or the civil guard shot and killed quite a few of them. That gave them the martyrs, and it was from that time on that the Buddhists tried to get this publicity and things of that kind. I wasn't there when it was going on, but they were just so wrong that it was a Buddhist country and this dirty old Catholic--he was very tolerant of religion. He knew the difficulties that he was having as being basically a Catholic, and a very devout one.

Q: How did you read the disorders in the cities during that summer of 1963, the so-called Buddhist troubles?

DURBROW: They were all contrived, all contrived, I think probably by the disinformation department in Moscow that induced these guys to do it. The Viet Cong, the Viet Minh, the rest of these people, the NPLA in Angola, those are all--the SWAPO in Namibia right today--that, Moscow started backing and applauding and praising SWAPO in 1964 in Pravda and Izvestia -- which I read all the time, one of my sins. And they go on to these things and it works, and they kept people to give them some supports, supplies, munitions. Well, they found this Buddhist group after the shooting up in Hue and said, "Hey, we can disrupt this whole doggone thing down there. Let's get going and use them." And I don't know. That's the way it operates, I know from other experiences.

Q: The Tonkin Gulf incident--and I know you were not there--

DURBROW: Yes.

Q: But of course everybody at the time and since has put some kind of interpretation on it if only to explain it to themselves, and the one that mystifies me--and I have no reason to think that you know more about this than anybody else, but I want to ask you--what motivated the North Vietnamese in that incident? I have never heard a good explanation, not that I've asked everybody.

DURBROW: Well, again, I get back to what I started to talk about earlier, that we don't understand what a war of national liberation is all about. And your other sources that said this was what they hoped to do by political means and we forced them to come with force, that is just for the birds. It's happened all over the damn place, in Cuba, Vietnam, El Salvador, South Yemen, the Pathet Lao in Laos. They concoct these local insurrections and they don't work, they've got to use more and more and more and more force. By that time, the boys weren't doing too well, their armed forces and whatnot. And they started blowing up our barracks down there in the South and things of that kind. They'd done some of that when I was there, you know, they did two bombings when I was there. Fortunately, nobody was really badly hurt, but they could have been. They tried to do it subtly. I'm talking about the communists, not just North Vietnam, the apparat. Every once in a while they'd want to get a provocative thing going and they'd do it. It's not done by some battery commander that got drunk that day and pulled the lanyard and shelled the land just as far as whatever it is. I don't know exactly what the motivation was, but they were up there in their territory, of course, in the Gulf of Tonkin, and they were getting pretty in close I suppose, and they said, "Well, we've got to try to scare these guys off." I don't know. They're not afraid of doing a thing like that and when they feel they're not doing too well otherwise, why not try to shoot the works a bit?

By the way, I took my oldest son out to see the Verdun war battlefields out there, and we'd gone out for the weekend in Paris and were driving and I had the radio on and by golly, I heard about the Gulf of Tonkin. I cheered, "We're finally going to clean that place up."

Q: How did you feel when the first combat troops went in? This would have been about a year and a half later.

DURBROW: Yes. I was all for it. The one thing that I really don't like and still don't understand, and I blame basically McNamara for this, but the graduated response which turned out to be also--and I hadn't heard about this before until I got to NATO. When you're trying to do a graduated response on the trip wire and on the Iron Curtain and all that sort of business, [it] just threw me for a loop that we should think in those terms. You either go in to win or you don't go in. Now, if you're not going to go on to win with this graduated response and a little bit more, a little bit more, then the bombing pattern was wrong as hell. What Nixon did in 1971, mined the harbors and bombed the hell out of Haiphong and Hanoi, should have been done from the day we went in and then they'd understand you. The only thing they understand is force and we'll use it if necessary, and if we go in there using force, you've got to have plenty to make it work. We just put more and more troops in, more and more troops in without doing [anything]. We should have] cut off their supplies. How the British did it in Malaysia, they just cut off all the supplies to the Chinese in the jungle. [There are] mostly Chinese down there, you know. The people that lived on the fringe of the forest, the jungle, they had to curfew at night, one person outside just got shot dead, period, no human rights, or they've got the wrong [person], woman or child, no My Lais. They just said, "You're out of bounds. Pfffft!" Of course, the My Lais are another thing.

Q: Yes, there's a difference.

DURBROW: Oh, well it wasn't at all. There were many My Lais in Vietnam, many, many, many. When you're working under conditions of that kind in a guerrilla operation in a jungle area, hostile, unfriendly area, you can't tell whose black pajamas are whose black pajamas, and you're taking you're company through. Suppose you're going to capture Hill 202 up there, you've got to go through some villages, you send word in, "Everybody in their quarters. If one person comes out, we're going to shoot." And when your troops have been hit before by kids being taught how to throw grenades, use small automatic weapons, so do women, when you've got people that have been trained to do that and they do it all the time, they've been doing it for a long time. Poor [William] Calley got caught and made a heel of, a terrible killer. God, that went on all the time, My Lais. You can't have Hague convention rules of war apply in a jungle, unconventional warfare type operation. You've got to be tougher than hell.

Q: How would you answer the people who talk about hearts and minds in a war like this?

DURBROW: Well, again, I say the hearts and minds of over four hundred thousand in the militia and the civil guard--five hundred thousand Vietnamese in the South were given arms by us through their government and they didn't turn around and shoot them in the other direction. They were dead against Hanoi, they were dead against the communist type of operation, they didn't want the Viet Cong, a lot of them had lived under it. So it's too bad if you get some women and children when you're going through a Viet Cong [area]. The Vietnamese understood. They did it. They weren't going to let their boys get killed because there might be a woman who did or didn't have a gun and she was looking out of a window and she had a broomstick in her hand. You just shoot. This hearts and minds and this hearts and flowers, do-gooder stuff is beautiful, but when you're in a war, you've got to go in to win. The reason we didn't win this war and lost a hell of a lot was--I haven't got the paper I gave you on it; I can give it to you later, because I've got it xeroxed now. But I ended up by saying, quoting Vo Nguyen Giap, the commander of the North, "This is the model war of national liberation. If we don't win this one, we won't win any others. If we win this one, it's going to go wonderful for us and the imperialists will lose." And we have ever since.

We just don't understand what that damn system is. I'm working on a piece right now for a committee over here in the Senate to explain where terrorism fits into this thing. Because way down the line in there it's a tool they use to make a war of national liberation work, or in countries like Italy or France or Germany where they have a stabilized, western type parliamentary government, to try to get their communist party into the government in cabinet positions by showing the people that the present government can't maintain law and order. People get shot in the streets in Italy or wherever it is and grenades thrown there and the Prime Minister gets captured and killed, [Aldo] Moro. "Gee whiz, these guys are no damn good. We'd better try to confuse issues, get their people disgruntled with their own present government," and then by using the ballot box, we've got a nice communist party in Italy, France, wherever it is, not in Germany. But then they get them in the government and start worming from within. And that's the kind of terrorism they use there.

Q: Have you--I'm sure you have--read or do you know the work of Douglas Pike on the Viet Cong?

DURBROW: Oh yes, yes, sure.

Q: What's your reading of him? He wrote a book later, I think, on the Viet Cong use of terror, specifically. Did that confirm your own observations?

DURBROW: Yes, it did very definitely. Gosh, when they cut off hands, they cut off heads, they put a village chief's head on a pole, not always but very often, and they impressed the kids. They'd go in at night, "Join us or else." They didn't dare desert, although some two hundred thousand did desert by the way of the Viet Cong forces--Viet Minh, Viet Cong forces. So in the hearts and minds of people, they didn't think Diem was God's gift to manhood, womanhood and all the rest of the world, but they had more confidence in him than they did in letting the Viet Cong take over.

And that's one of the things our press does. I don't blame them. They've got to sell newspapers. And they've got to make it sensational for anybody to read it: "Three Women Killed Yesterday." Ah, terrible. "American Soldiers Shot" whoever it is, or our side shot somebody. The four nuns in El Salvador, who the hell shot them? I don't know, I don't think anybody knows. But why are four women out at an airport unless they had some real reason to be out there, coming back at ten o'clock at night on a patrolled road, a road that was ambushed on many other occasions, with roadblocks on it by one side or the other, driving down the main drag in a panel truck you can't see who was in it? They either went by a roadblock they didn't see or didn't stop, and the boys let go and they got them. "Oh, my God, we got some women. Look, they're nuns. Let's try to hide the bodies over here." It's too bad they're dead, they were courageous women, but they were foolish to go down a road in a place where they operate at night. The guerrillas work at night as well as the other people.

We got ourselves all hot and bothered about these little bit of things. Our FBIs were saying all this time about whether this bullet came from this gun. Too bad the women are dead, but why the hell were they going down that road at that time of night? Too bad they were killed, it's terrible, but I don't think anybody has even suggested that it was done deliberately, their ambush was just to get those four American women, whether the rightists or the leftists or the middle got them. We get ourselves all mixed up in that sort of thing. So I hope we can get more realism of what's going on in these various operations. A war of national liberation's working like a charm for our Soviet friends. Vietnam was one of them.

JOHN W. KIMBALL Assistant Security Officer
Saigon (1958-1960)

John W. Kimball was born in California in 1934 and received his bachelor's and master's degree from Stanford University. He was positioned in Saigon, Sarajevo, Brussels and London. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 24, 1999.

Q: You were in Saigon from '58 until when?

KIMBALL: July, 1960.

Q: That should have been fascinating.

KIMBALL: It was very interesting. I should add that I was married in the summer of '58 as well.

Q: Where did you meet your wife?

KIMBALL: In the State Department. Lyla (Rustan) was a secretary in UN Political Affairs and we were introduced by mutual friends. In those days one could arrange blind dates, and this one worked out very well for me.

Q: Not too much earlier I've had men say that they were called before personnel and some crusty old gentleman would say, "You've been overseas long enough and we want you back here in Washington and it's up to you to get a wife." It usually worked out too.

KIMBALL: Lyla went from IO on assignment to New Delhi and stayed there for about six months. I finally was able to persuade her to come back and we got married in July of '58. Soon after, I learned of my assignment to Saigon and we got there in late August, via stopovers in Tokyo and Hong Kong. (Our memorandum of assignment was dated August 13 and told us we should arrive at post on or about August 30!) I was assigned as the assistant security officer in a regional security office which covered Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam.

Q: What was Saigon, South Vietnam, like at that time?

KIMBALL: I had to consult a map at FSI to make sure I knew where I was going because my interests had been concentrated on Europe. It struck me upon arrival as very much a French ambiance. That was because we drove down the main street of Saigon and saw what the French had left. There were still French restaurants, and French was still a language that one could get around in. Saigon itself was a very pleasant city. Cholon was also fun to visit, with its own ethnic Chinese population. But you didn't have to go far to see how lower-income Vietnamese lived in what for us were very poor conditions. I also learned that even in late '58, early '59, we were not to drive around the countryside at night. We had to take precautions.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you were there?

KIMBALL: Elbridge Durbrow was the ambassador for my entire two years.

Q: Did you have anything to do with him?

KIMBALL: At that time our Embassy was on a corner not far from the Saigon River (Vo-di Nguy and Ham-Nghi streets) and the security office and the administrative office were in the annex which was a couple of doors away. I didn't have contact with the Ambassador directly. However, our house was across the street from the Residence and we frequently went over there on Sunday nights to play badminton, and enjoy the gatherings he put on for Embassy personnel. Our cooks traded tablecloths when entertaining. Ambassador Durbrow was an old EE hand and he knew a couple of people with whom I had worked on the Soviet desk. However, as a junior officer in the "annex," I had no regular access to the substantive work of the Embassy.

Q: As a security officer what were your responsibilities?

KIMBALL: We screened local employees and conducted the traditional physical security checks such as controlling public access, Marine guard deployments, and document security. My supervisor, Warren McMurray, did the liaison with the Vietnamese authorities, assisted by a local employee, Dick Robertson, a young man of English parents who had grown up in Saigon. For a new junior Foreign Service officer it was a good way to find out how missions operated and for an administrative job - and maybe I shouldn't put it this way - it had some substantive overtones to it. You had to know what was going on. You had to work with some of the other agencies in town. There was a huge AID mission in Saigon at the time and we had to help them out sometimes. Incidentally, the first two names on the Vietnam Memorial on the Mall date to July, 1959, during our tour.

Q: We're talking about people killed in action, Foreign Service people killed in action?

KIMBALL: No, these were military advisors, whose names are etched on the Vietnam Memorial here in Washington. The first two military names on there are dated July, 1959, and they were killed by Viet Cong in Bien Hoa, outside Saigon, while watching a movie in their compound. We got word of that late at night. McMurray was away at the time, so I had to go immediately to the Embassy and make sure that things were secured adequately. One aspect of that job that I remember with pleasure was the opportunities to travel to our posts in Hue, Vientiane, and Phnom Penh, which were very interesting in those days.

Q: We didn't have one in Da Nang did we, it was Hue?

KIMBALL: Yes, it was Hue.

Q: What was Hue like?

KIMBALL: It seemed a very quiet and peaceful place. Lots of Vietnamese history and culture there. We had Vietnamese language officers assigned as consuls. Being in the boondocks, they were experiencing the realities of living in Vietnam much more than we in Saigon. I developed a lot of respect for the work they were doing. Especially after our next tour in Sarajevo, I often wondered how much the Embassy or the Department listened to their observations.

Q: Obviously some people had been shot, but how was the Vietcong or the communist insurgency viewed when you were there?

KIMBALL: It was something that we knew was out there in the remote areas of South Vietnam but you didn't need to worry about it on a personal basis living in Saigon. The rules were to not travel country roads at night, and to check in with the security office before you traveled to many places outside Saigon. I don't remember any specific instances where American civilians were threatened, or harmed, It was a precautionary thing rather than a response to specific threats.

After a great weekend in the cool hill station at Dalat, a small group of us returning in two autos had the misfortune of not just one but two flat tires, one on each auto. On one car the tire was changed but on the other, for some reason, the spare was not usable. So it was decided the repaired car should drive towards Saigon and seek assistance, while one colleague went along with a tire to try to find a place to get it fixed. Meanwhile, the remaining group, including us, had to sit parked on a remote stretch of road battling biting bugs and getting jumpy about those creepy jungle sounds as the sun began to set. Imagine the relief when a local bus came wobbling down the highway and stopped. Out hopped our colleague, Harry Christie, with a repaired tire. Always with a dry sense of humor, he had us exploding with laughter as he stated he would not have minded the hot and crowded bus if it hadn't had all those ducks sitting on the rafters leaving their "calling cards" all over the place!

Q: I would have thought that in hiring Vietnamese it would have been somewhat difficult to screen them because you had this massive flow only three years before from North Vietnam and these tended to be probably the people that you were more likely to hire, I would think. They were probably a little better in French, better educated, and all of that. Was this a problem?

KIMBALL: In retrospect, I'm not sure we had a very reliable methodology. We handled name checks through a local employee who as I mentioned earlier had grown up in Vietnam and seemed to have a solid foot in both cultures. He conducted name checks with colleagues in the Vietnamese Sureté and I never understood exactly what resources were available to them. Of course, we checked with other elements in the Embassy too. At least nothing bad happened on our watch.

Q: Was it a concern that the communists might infiltrate into our secrets?

KIMBALL: I don't believe there was an active concern that they were actually going to infiltrate us by means of employment, although naturally we had to take precautions. In any case, our local employees were located primarily in the "Annex" and USOM (AID), not the Chancery. Our worries were more about the security of American personnel traveling around the countryside and the safe handling of classified documents.

Q: This was not the era where people were coming around with bicycles full of explosives.

KIMBALL: No, but it could have happened very easily given the nature of traffic and circulation in Saigon. Luckily for us, however, we were there in a trough between the French war ending in 1954 and the American combat involvement later on. We were there at a relatively benign time with no overt hostility to Americans, at least in Saigon.

Q: Was there much of a knowledgeable cadre of people in the officer corps who knew much about Vietnam when you were there?

KIMBALL: There were colleagues in the political section and in Hue who were Vietnamese language speakers. We also knew John Monjo, an ex-roommate in Washington, who was a Cambodian language officer assigned to Phnom Penh. Yes, there was a real effort to get below the surface and I think that they were doing that. However, neither in Saigon nor later in Washington in the '60s and '70s could I ever satisfy myself that their expertise and insights were being adequately factored into the decision-making process.

Q: What about our American military, was that very apparent?

KIMBALL: There were about 600 military advisors. Professionally I had few contacts, but there were several nice bachelor officers quarters or enlisted men's quarters which were always fun to visit. They had great steaks, lettuce, and ice cream! I'm sure these installations, and the advisors, must have been obvious to the Vietnamese. A commentary sometimes heard among the junior Embassy officers was that American advisors were helping the Vietnamese prepare for another Korea-type military invasion from the North across the 17th parallel, a contingency which did not seem as likely to us as a more subtle and insidious infiltration into South Vietnam's countryside, where we reckoned it would be difficult for outsiders to distinguish friend from foe.

There was a very large AID mission financing a lot of projects. In my second year there, I began to wonder whether there wasn't something missing: was money, or so-called development, going to solve all our problems? Was there a reciprocal desire on the part of the Vietnamese leadership to make the most of the foreign economic and other assistance they were getting? The longer I stayed there, the more that gnawed at me.

Q: Were people talking about basically corruption, nepotism, and all that?

KIMBALL: In my position I didn't notice corruption as much as I did simple unwillingness or inability of people in government to make decisions, or to make the decisions that we thought were necessary to use the assistance effectively and affect popular political attitudes. But there again I was an outsider as far as the AID program was concerned. There were a lot of well-intended things going on.

There was another factor that didn't get enough notice, I believe, and that was the Vietnamese' official antipathy to the ethnic Chinese resident in south Vietnam. While we were there, the Government decreed that all ethnic Chinese should use Vietnamese surnames. We seemed to let that pass, presumably out of our larger interests in the stability of the GVN. But it also seemed a symptom of the GVN's inability to capitalize on its own resources and co-opt the talents of a significant group in its society. On the other hand, this same antipathy led me to believe that we didn't have to worry as much as we did about the possibility of close cooperation between Hanoi and Beijing.

Q: Later it became almost overwhelming, but I was wondering about the CIA presence. This was something that as a security officer you would be aware of, but was it a big establishment at that time?

KIMBALL: I thought our office had a friendly relationship with the deputy at the time. They occupied a certain amount of space in the Chancery which I didn't consider overwhelming. In fact, the deputy, one Bill Colby, and his wife graciously included us in a dinner party at their home one evening. Beyond that I was not aware of what, specifically, they were up to.

Q: Did you have any contact yourself with the Vietnamese government, sort of at the local level, police stations, and all?

KIMBALL: I must confess that I did not because either my boss did it on the formal level or local employees did it on the working level. For some reason, it did not seem very necessary. It may have been a mistake in retrospect.

Q: You say you had Cambodia and Laos. Did you get to Vientiane much?

KIMBALL: I made a trip to Vientiane, where I did a formal security survey, with the assistance of a very cooperative Administrative Officer. At the time Vientiane seemed a long way away from anything and Laos had yet to achieve the notoriety that it did later. I remember being fascinated by a return flight from Vientiane on an Air Laos plane that was older than a DC-3. It stopped at dusty runways in Pakse and Savannakhet. For Christmas of 1958, we visited friends at the Embassy in Phnom Penh and drove with John Monjo to visit Angkor Wat. The stillness, the ambiance of Angkor in its undamaged and relatively undeveloped state, was a memorable experience. It was our first taste of an old colonial hotel, in Siem Reap, complete with sagging beds and huge mosquito netting surrounds.

Q: Laos was beginning to heat up wasn't it?

KIMBALL: It was beginning, at least in the remote areas. Again, it was a fairly friendly situation for Americans in the capital and of course we did not yet have the infiltration problems we later had with Laos and Cambodia.

Q: It's just getting impressions of this.

KIMBALL: Let's put it this way, it was safe to travel and what I remember most was the travel rather than the politics of it. I can't say I did anything that qualifies me as an expert on the area.

Q: When you were in Saigon were you picking up from other junior officers at all about whither Vietnam?

KIMBALL: Yes, I have mentioned several items already – the training objectives of the MAAG, the uses of our economic assistance, the use of our language officers, and the difficulties of getting the GVN to act in its own self-interest. I think we also covered the idea that the Vietnamese - north or south - had their own agenda and the seeds of doubt were sown in my mind about the “domino theory.” The Vietnam situation seemed just too unique and it was hard to imagine the North could have any interest, or ability, to carry its fight beyond Indo-China or allow their future to be mortgaged to the Soviets or Chinese. In the 1960s, I would ask myself whether it really would make any difference to us “who ran Saigon.”

If I can generalize about it, the feeling during our tour was that the Diem government was very hard to deal with. It was very hard to push in the directions that we wanted it to go to but it probably was the only administrative mechanism available and probably better than any alternatives. That was kind of a dilemma that was I think noted at the time: that you can't really do without him and yet you can't do much with him. By then he had absorbed the opposition in the South, the local warlords, and the religious factions, and things seemed to be on a path towards improvement and on the way up. If they would just use our aid correctly and unbend a little bit, they would have a lot going for them.

Q: Any discussion about the ability of the South Vietnamese army?

KIMBALL: I never got involved in any specifics on that. I knew we were trying to train it and work with it but I never saw any evaluations.

THEODORE J. C. HEAVNER

Political Officer

Hue (1958-1959)

Political Officer

Saigon (1960-1961)

Vietnam Working Group

Washington, DC (1961-1963)

Theodore Heavner was born in Canton, Ohio in 1929 and was educated at Case Western Reserve College, the State University of Iowa and Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included posts in Hue, Saigon, Medan and Georgetown, Guyana. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: What were you getting about Vietnam? By this time it was divided and Ho Chi Minh was the ruler in the North and Diem in the South. Were you getting anything about a contrast between the two places?

HEAVNER: I focused on the fact that here was a country not occupied by the Soviets or the Chinese communists which had nevertheless emerged from World War II as a communist state. North Vietnam seemed to have a genuine popular base which was, I thought, quite different from what we had seen in places like Eastern Europe. I examined a number of factors I thought had led to that outcome. However, I'm not sure we saw a glaring difference between North and South at that time. Subsequently, there certainly was a great difference. It was never like North and South Korea, though. The North was never that different, it seems to me. The Vietnamese think of themselves as northern, central, or southern, and in a way the division of the country was a throw back to earlier periods in Vietnamese history when the country had been divided between north and south. So, in some respects, 1954 was not that much of a departure from their past. But the Vietnamese are one people with a common history and culture.

Q: You were in Vietnam from when to when?

HEAVNER: I went first to Vietnam in 1958, had a brief stop in Saigon and was in Hue 1958-60. Then I served briefly, six or seven months, in Saigon in 1961 at which time I came back to the States and worked on Vietnam here. After a period in Indonesia I was pulled out and sent back to Vietnam during the war, i.e., 1966-69.

Q: Let's go back to 1958. You went first to Saigon. What were you doing there?

HEAVNER: I was assigned to the political section, but I think the intention from the beginning was that if I seemed suitable, and they wanted to look me over pretty carefully because this was my first Foreign Service assignment, I was to go to Hue and replace Bob Barbour. That was fine with me. I thought that was a wonderful idea.

In Saigon, I was asked to do some very minor chores, and there were a lot of social events in which I think I was certainly being sized up. But it was all really just a prelude to going up to Hue, and it was a wonderful experience just getting there. I chose to drive up, and it was the beginning of the rainy season. Route One, the only road that still, I think, goes all the way along the coast was broken in many places by floods, with bridges down and various hazards of one kind or another. It took the better part of a week to get there. I had a great introduction to rural Vietnam.

Q: What was the political situation in Saigon when you arrived in 1958?

HEAVNER: Diem had had to deal with a number of private armies, the Hoa Hao and a couple of others.

Q: Wasn't that rather close to Saigon?

HEAVNER: Yes, the Hoa Hao were, certainly. Diem had to face up to them, and he succeeded in imposing his authority. He seemed a very vigorous and straightforward person. We felt he was a pretty good choice as head of the government, and it seemed at that time that with some help from the U.S., South Vietnam could become not only economically sound but also politically healthy. We unfortunately thought then that Diem was inclined, at least, towards democratic institutions. So, it was kind of a honeymoon period with Diem.

I saw him three or four times in Hue. The consulate corps consisted of only three consulates, the Chinese, the French, and the U.S. Diem's family was in Hue, his very old mother and a younger brother who ran central Vietnam like a fiefdom under Diem. Consequently, Diem came to Hue quite often, and when he did the consular corps, of course, would be out at the airport to meet him. On a few occasions he took us with him on his travels around central Vietnam. So, unlike most junior officers and certainly most consular officers, I actually interacted with the head of government on a fairly informal basis a few times, which was really heady stuff for a young Foreign Service officer. This was especially exciting because the embassy was intensely interested in what Diem said and how he behaved when he was in his own particular area, i.e., central Vietnam. I liked him then. I thought he was a very dynamic person.

What ultimately went sour, of course, was his dependency on his family. He essentially trusted only family in running his government and they turned out to be not very trustworthy. They let him down in a lot of ways. They were also very authoritarian in outlook. The idea of democracy was the furthest thing from Ngo Dinh Can's mind. He set up what was supposed to be a secret political party, which wasn't very secret, known as the Can Lao. That party was what he really used to control central Vietnam. All the prerequisites which he could give to the Can Lao party in order to generate funds for them, like a monopoly on the cinnamon trade, was done.

Q: Cinnamon was a fairly substantial crop?

HEAVNER: Well, it was in great demand because among other things it was old cinnamon which grew wild in the highlands and was thought to have great medicinal powers. Consequently, it brought quite a high price. There was also ordinary cinnamon, not from old trees, and production costs were very low, so I guess the take from that was substantial.

I knew the Can Lao chief financial agent, whose home was in Da Nang. In fact, he took me tiger hunting, but we never encountered any tigers, for which I was very grateful. He had a very sporting notion of how one hunts tigers, and the tiger really had a chance. He not only ran the cinnamon industry for the Can Lao, he also owned the entire Vietnamese merchant marine. I'm not sure he actually owned it, but it was all in his name. Their merchant marine consisted of only four or five vessels, but still... That is how it was.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you arrived in Saigon in 1958?

HEAVNER: Elbridge Durbrow. I read his obituary just a week or so ago in the post. I was amazed that he had lived to age 93 because I remembered him as a) a chain-smoker and b) a very active, overweight person. I thought he was a prime candidate for an early heart attack. Durbrow was quite a character.

Q: I'm trying to get a feel for these people. Was the embassy small enough so that even as a junior officer you were within his orbit?

HEAVNER: Not really, because I was in Hue. He came to Hue once and was our houseguest. I was in his orbit at that point. The Vietnamese laid everything on for him. I remember we went to Quang Nam province and went up the Tra Cuc River on a barge that could only be described as minor league Cleopatra. They had a couple of big armchairs on the barge for him and the province chief. It was powered by a little, very antiquated outboard motor. Durbrow was famous for mumbling, and he was mumbling and I was translating. This was difficult because the motor was going put-put-put- bang, put-put-put-bang. Durbrow would mumble, then look at me and I would say, "I'm sorry, Mr. Ambassador, I didn't hear what you said." It was not my finest hour.

Q: I take it the feeling at the time, 1958, was that South Vietnam was going to make it?

HEAVNER: Oh, yes. We certainly thought so.

Q: Was there any particular threat from the Viet Cong?

HEAVNER: Yes. There was indeed. In fact I am proud to say I must have been one of the very few people who saw some of that coming. I wrote a dispatch based on talking to missionaries and district chiefs, in the highlands primarily, who told me about infiltration from the North, that the Viet Cong strength was growing. I said this was a growing threat and an ominous one. Indeed, when I finally saw Ngo Dinh Can, who did not ever receive foreigners, but he...

Q: This was Diem's brother?

HEAVNER: Yes.

Q: And sort of the godfather of the central area?

HEAVNER: He was indeed and a very reclusive, mysterious figure. My predecessor, Bob Barbour, had gotten to see him once. I was very anxious to duplicate that as was the ambassador. I can't say that I got to know him, but I did see him. I spent the better part of an hour with him. One of the things I asked him about was this fact, as I saw it, of increased communist activity in the highland provinces as well as Quang Ngai. I don't know if he was ill-informed or simply wanting to put me off, but he made light of it. He did not appear to see it as a threat.

Q: Where is Quang Ngai?

HEAVNER: Quang Ngai is on the coast. If you go south from Hue, you hit Quang Nam province and then the next one down is Quang Ngai. The consular district included all of those central coastal provinces down to Binh Din and the embassy later added, because they wanted me to go there, Pleiku and Kontum, two highland provinces. The Montagnard country.

Q: Was there a consulate in Da Nang at that time?

HEAVNER: No.

Q: So you had pretty much the north?

HEAVNER: Yes, including Quang Tri which was up near the border.

Q: What was the situation in Hue when you got there? A little about living and then how a young Foreign Service officer goes about working in an area like that.

HEAVNER: Hue was a consulate although they didn't want us to do any consular work. If anyone wanted a visa or passport they had to go to Saigon for it. The reason for that was not terribly clear to me because we could have done consular work there. There wouldn't have been that much demand for it.

The main reason I was there, and Bob Barbour before me, and a number of other people after me, was to report on the situation in central Vietnam and in particular the area bordering North Vietnam and the activities of Ngo Dinh Can and his people. So, it was a political reporting post. I think the intention was when they opened the post that we would get soundings from North Vietnam. But it was a sealed border. We never learned anything about North Vietnam as far as I know. Certainly we didn't while I was there.

Q: Was there concern from the embassy and was it transmitted to you about Ngo Dinh Can and his activities at that point?

HEAVNER: We didn't know what to make of him. Certainly the word that the government gave us was that he was doing a lot of good things. He was very interested in education and very supportive of the University of Hue. He was busy working through his people with USAID [United States Agency for International Development] to build rural schools and put in small irrigation works. One of the things I did was to travel around and look at those and it seemed to me that the money for the small irrigation works, in particular, had just evaporated. When I talked to Can, he was indeed interested in education, particularly the University of Hue. I think some of the money which he made or taxed was going there. This was a despot but he was not entirely bad by any means. There was certainly a benevolent aspect to Can and to Diem. They did want the country to prosper and they did want the people to be taken care of, as long as it was clear who was in charge and who would get the cream of the crop.

Q: Were you picking up any mutterings against him and the Diem family while you were in Hue or was Hue pretty much in their pocket?

HEAVNER: One of the things I reported on was how Cam had picked up on a lot of communist tactics for controlling the population, like peasant farmer organizations and political study sessions. He had not done nearly as good a job as the communists did in the North, but he had picked up on a lot of their methods and people were afraid to complain about him and Diem. There was no freedom of expression. I think that central Vietnam was a pretty introverted, reticent kind of culture to begin with and became more so under Can.

This was the heartland of Vietnam in many respects. Hue was the old dynastic capital for many years, and Bao Dai had been there under the French not so long before.

Q: Was there still a royal presence in Hue and did that have any significance?

HEAVNER: There were relatives I was told, but I never met them and they had as far as I could make out no political impact. I think any of them who might have been interested had been forced to leave. Bao Dai, himself, of course, was very much out of the picture.

Q: Yes, he was in France.

HEAVNER: And I don't think he was wanting to come back.

Q: How did you go about your business?

HEAVNER: That was a bit of a problem for me initially. It was not entirely clear how I would operate there. I began by doing a lot of traveling. In fact I did a lot of traveling throughout because I found that the people who would talk most readily were district chiefs and sometimes province chiefs outside of Hue. I made a lot of contacts within the city, although there wasn't a lot of social life there to begin with. But these tended to be very careful about what they said. I got a lot more information from people in the countryside about what was going on. I reported that. We did a series of provincial surveys in which I described everything I could find out about each province - its economy, its political structure, and what the Can Lao seemed to be doing there. Who the province and district chiefs were and where they came from and how they interacted with the Montagnards in the case of the highlands at least, and in the case of Quang Ngai with the Cham minority. Strangely enough there is still a Cham minority there.

I did a comprehensive survey of each of those provinces as I could, beginning with Binh Dinh, because my predecessor had done Thua Thien and Quang Tri. I did Quang Ngai, Binh Dinh, Pleiku, and Kontum. That took quite a while, actually because I had to come and go several times and travel over those roads was slow.

Q: This was long before the time when if you wanted to go anywhere you just whistled up a helicopter and off you would go.

HEAVNER: Yes.

Q: Were there many missionaries there?

HEAVNER: I found one who was a very good source and very knowledgeable. He had spent many years there, mostly in the highlands, but also along the coast. He didn't have the parochial point of view that so many of the missionaries encapsulated themselves in. He really was interested in the political structure and what was going on across the board. I quoted him a great deal in my reports.

Otherwise, my main sources were some province and district chiefs who were a little more loquacious and friendly than most of the others. As I said, I did get to know the financial front man for Can Lao pretty well. I was his guest at his home a number of times and that was an overnight guest because he was in Da Nang. As I said, he took me tiger hunting twice and thank God we didn't find any tigers because his idea of hunting tigers was to get a shotgun with what I think they called a triple 0 shot. It had only three pellets. You went through the brush on foot with a miner's light on your head. The idea was that you would pick up the cat's eyes in this light and that would stop him long enough for you to let him have it with the shotgun. A very sporting proposition it seems to me still. Fortunately, I didn't encounter a tiger with him. I did later, in a much safer situation, but I didn't get that one either.

Q: At that time was there a feeling of oppression? How would you describe what you were getting out of the country?

HEAVNER: It was not at all well received in Saigon, but I thought, as I said, it was a pretty tight, well regulated communist style regime in central Vietnam, given the way the population was organized and required to do this and that. That dispatch was not well received because it didn't read very well from the point of view of this friendly, supposedly increasingly democratic regime that we were supporting. I did not see it as a particularly benevolent regime in that respect. Freedom of expression was not there.

Q: You say it wasn't received well at the embassy. I think an interesting thing is the difference between the...

HEAVNER: Well, Saigon was a very different place. In Saigon, the opposition did mouth off and they did get reported in the press. There was nothing like that in central Vietnam.

Q: Would you go back to Saigon from time to time and were you getting they would rather have you reporting on a different view, or something like that?

HEAVNER: No. I wasn't told that this was biased reporting, although I think that was the message. I think there was also the view in Saigon that "Hey, this country has never been a democracy. These people have never exercised much in the way of democratic rights. Don't get so concerned about it." Although that was never said. There was some justice in it, too, by the way. We are not exactly seeing a democratic regime there these days.

Q: In 1954 there was this mass exodus of Catholics from the North. Did that have an impact on your area?

HEAVNER: I think so, as Diem, of course, was Catholic. He used a lot of northern people who were Catholic. I visited some of the Catholic groups in central Vietnam who were still in very bad shape in 1959. They were on very unproductive land along the coast and being supported in part by the GVN and in part by USAID. They were certainly not going to be able to grow enough rice to take care of themselves. They were heartedly despised by many of the southern and central Vietnamese by the way. They were seen as carpet baggers and the fact that Diem used them as well as his central Vietnamese Catholics was part of the reason, probably, that he was not more successful in uniting the country under his aegis.

Q: How were relations in your area with the Buddhists at that point? Later this became a major, major issue.

HEAVNER: That is one of my regrets of my Hue assignment. There were a lot of Buddhist temples there and I saw them and thought about them. They were completely excluded from the political scene or excluded themselves from it in those days. But, I thought it would be interesting to get to know them and the structure of their organization and to write a report on it. I had always intended to do that but never got around to it before I left, unfortunately, because as you pointed out the Buddhists became a potent political factor later on. I suppose Tri Quang was there in those days. I did not know about him. I had not heard of him when I was there.

Q: Tri Quang became the Buddhist leader and very controversial figure later.

HEAVNER: Much later. I did meet him later on in Hue, but that was during the war.

Q: Was the Catholic church playing any role up where you were?

HEAVNER: Probably, but again that was not something that was easy to plug into. There was an assumption, I think, that the priests would do whatever was necessary to assist and support Can and Diem. They were very active in some of the social welfare organizations and educational efforts in central Vietnam. My assumption always was that they were important in that respect. The rector of the university in Hue was a Catholic priest. He was, however, central Vietnamese, not northern. I knew him pretty well, seeing him socially a lot. In many ways he was a very admirable man who worked very hard to set-up a university and bring to it Vietnamese who had qualifications for teaching. Father Luan was his name. In fact, he came to the States when I was working on Vietnam here and visited me and had dinner with us. I think that was the last time I ever saw him though. I think he had died before I went back to Vietnam. He had a very active secretary general at the university. A young man who was very, very intelligent and very fluent in English, whom I also got to know pretty well. He was not clergy and had been educated in French as had his wife. The university was a pretty good organization as far as I could make out, a reputable, substantial educational institution.

Q: What about the consular corps? You said there was a French and a Chinese consulate. Did you ever work with them or was everyone off on their own?

HEAVNER: We did not have a lot of social interaction. The Chinese consul was an elderly man who as far as I could make out rarely went out and certainly didn't travel. His English was negligible so communication with him was in French and my French wasn't very good. So, I didn't have a lot of interaction with him at all. The Frenchman was an interesting man. I think the French did not regard that post as important and I think he was on the skids careerwise. He was a very tall man, about 6' 6," which made him remarkable indeed in a country where most people are five feet and under. I think he did have good connections in the remaining French community. There wasn't much left of that, but he was worth listening to when he was willing to talk, which wasn't very often. I think he saw the Americans as usurping the French role in Vietnam, however, and doing a pretty poor job of it. He basically was not very friendly to the U.S. or to me. In short, by and large, not a useful contact.

Q: What was the social life like there?

HEAVNER: Minimal. There was a Cercle Sportif, a nice building and right on the river, but it seemed like a haunted house. It had been a French enclave, of course, in the old days and the French were largely gone. In fact, as far as I could make out they were pretty much all gone from Hue. I recall going over there early in my tour at noon and walking around all alone in this big building and thinking how nice it was and how lonely it felt.

What social life there was was dinners. They weren't much for receptions. There would be national day receptions and that was about it. The province chief and the delegate, they called him, who was the central government figure for the whole region, but who seemed to be much less powerful than the province chiefs, would come to my home when invited. They rarely reciprocated. I think I was never at the delegate's house for dinner and only a few times at the province chief's home.

The head of the hospital there was very friendly, however, and he did have us around many times. When I departed, his wife thought it would be wonderful to give me a traditional Vietnamese costume, which for males was all black and white and sort of like a tunic with a headdress which was peculiar to, I believe, central Vietnam. So, they were good and well plugged in people and useful contacts as well as nice friends. My wife was a nurse, which probably helped. She had something she could talk about to him that made sense to him and was probably useful at times.

The head of the university and his secretary general were intelligent and knowledgeable people who when they wanted to could tell me things that I found very interesting. Often they were pretty circumspect.

Q: What was your impression of the Montagnards vis-a-vis the central government?

HEAVNER: I think it is fair to say the Vietnamese in general, then and perhaps still, regard the Montagnards as slightly less than human. They were not well treated and the animosity was reciprocated. The Montagnards did not like the Vietnamese any better than the Vietnamese liked them. I did manage to see and talk to some Montagnards, which was difficult because most of them spoke no Vietnamese. Those who had any foreign language spoke French, and my French was not very good. Neither was theirs, I might add. Subsequently, when I was in Saigon during the war, we had a marvelous go around in which a large group of Montagnards that had been trained and armed by our people had decamped into Cambodia and we were trying to cajole them to come back into Vietnam and deal with the Viet Cong and the Ho Chi Minh trail. The head man insisted that our ambassador, who was then Henry Cabot Lodge, come out to meet him on the border between Cambodia and Vietnam. Lodge was not about to do that so he sent me. I and an army colonel landed in a helicopter in a clearing. As we were coming down the pilot said, "We haven't prepared this landing." I said, "What do you mean you haven't prepared this landing?" He said, "Well, usually we spray it with gun fire to make sure that there is nothing down there in ambush." When we landed and were surrounded by Montagnard troops it was a pretty hairy moment. It turned out they were friendly. But, communicating with them was very difficult, even at that date, because they still weren't speaking English. The colonel had no French and mine was rudimentary. We finally did get the leader to come into Pleiku and talk to the Vietnamese there. Ultimately they did succeed in bringing them back into the fold.

This was much later during the war. The time you are talking about, making connections of any kind with the Montagnard minority was difficult. I did make an effort and did see some Montagnard leaders. They did not make a favorable impression because alcohol was a big problem and they did a lot drinking. A leader there could afford to be drunk most of the time and they often were.

The Vietnamese once staged a Montagnard buffalo sacrifice for my benefit, which I attended as a guest of Can's financial front man. It had to do with Can's interest in the cinnamon trade, because the Montagnards were in the area where most of the cinnamon grew. The Montagnards were given water buffalo to sacrifice and it was a pretty sad, but I remember vividly the dancing women and the dancing men and the spearing of the buffalo who died very slowly, I'm afraid. A nasty business. Even though this was meant to be something the Vietnamese were doing for the Montagnards, I felt strong currents of animosity even at that event.

Q: Was Pleiku used as a special place at this time?

HEAVNER: There had been a lot of tea plantations in Pleiku before the French war and there was still one French planter up there whom I talked to a few times. I don't know how much tea he was getting out. Pleiku was kind of a wild west place then. We had an American construction company there that under USAID was building a road from the coast right up to Pleiku. This was quite an undertaking because the terrain was really very rough. They had actually finished before I left, and I was among the first to traverse that route from the coast up to Pleiku. We had a military MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group], as we called it, there. I don't think there were more than a dozen officers there, if that. The main MAAGs were in Da Nang, Hue, and Binh Dinh. These were the military advisory groups. They would be a handful of officers usually, not a big contingent. And then, of course, there were the Montagnards themselves in Pleiku, with their strikingly different traditional housing arrangements on stilts with the beams going up. If they entertained you, which they did do a few times for me, a major part of the entertainment was to serve you rice wine. The idea was that everybody sups from the same straw, and if the rice wine won't get you, that straw will. You had to partake because it would have been a terrible discourtesy not to.

Q: Did you get any feel for the South Vietnamese military while you were there?

HEAVNER: Yes and no. The general in charge of what later became I Corps was a man who grew up in Rome and whose Vietnamese was not very good but whose French was impeccable and who spoke pretty good English. I used to see him occasionally. He was one of the principal leaders of the coup against Diem ultimately. I don't know that I knew him well, but I did know him.

Q: What was his name?

HEAVNER: Well, you know, one of the things that happens to you as you get older is that although these things are still all there, the recall mechanism becomes rickety. As I was sitting here thinking about him I could see his face clearly, but I'm blocking on his name. It will probably come to me as we go along. You would recognize it, I think because he was a well known general at the time of the coup. He was probably the only Vietnamese general whom I knew when I was in Hue. Tran Van Don was his name. There were plenty of military about and increasingly they were functioning as district and province chiefs, although most of the province chiefs were still civilians at the time I was there. That changed later on. They came under the military government almost entirely. But even Diem was using some military in those days.

Q: You left Hue in 1960 and then went down to Saigon for a while. What were you doing then?

HEAVNER: I was in the political section. I wasn't doing anything that I thought was of any consequence, but I happened to be there at the time LBJ [Lyndon Baines Johnson], then vice president, came to South Vietnam. He insisted that he have an American as his interpreter. Well, that was okay when he went to see Diem. We sent Tom Conlon whose French was impeccable and Diem was probably happier in French than Vietnamese and might have felt insulted had they sent me. Also, it would have cut the ambassador out of the exchange. However, Johnson wanted a Vietnamese speaking American to go with him when he went into the countryside to look at the AID projects, etc. So, I spent a day and a half literally on the laps of the Secret Service when we were in the vehicles and more or less at Johnson's elbow otherwise. It was one of the most incredible days of my life. You probably have heard a lot of Johnson stories, I think they are all true.

I remember we had stopped along a road bed AID had financed and there was a cortege of Vietnamese, mostly women, standing along the edge of the road waving American flags. Johnson riveted one Vietnamese woman and said, "Tell her that I am the Vice President of the United States of America and have come here to help the Vietnamese people." I told her that and she said, as Vietnamese do when they don't know what else to say, "Yah." And he asked me to tell her that this road is one of the great things that we have done to help the Vietnamese people. I did and she said, "Yah". Then he asked me to ask her if she has heard about the American AID program. I did and she said, "Yah". He then asked me what is she saying? Well, in Vietnamese "yah" is a "yes, I hear you," it is not "yes, you are right." It may be "yes, I don't believe a word you are saying" or "yes, I don't understand you," but it is just, "yes, I'm listening." I said, "I don't know, Mr. Vice President, she really didn't say." He stepped on my foot very firmly and said, "Ask her again."

It got more difficult as we went on because we were getting farther away from Saigon and the Vietnamese, at least, were getting a little anxious about his security. We got to a bridge and the abutments were festooned in barb wire. Johnson jumped out of the car, as he had been doing right along to press the flesh, and somehow he got around the barb wire and down into the village that was stretched along the creek down below without any escort. The AID director, whose name was Gardner, pattered after him and said, "Mr. Vice President, you shouldn't come down here alone. It is dangerous." Johnson looked at him and said, "Nonsense," I guess, and kept on going. Gardner persisted and Johnson whirled on him and said, "God damn it, if you can't talk nice you can't come along." He then moved on into the entrance of one of these little straw huts along the river and successfully cornered a Vietnamese woman in the hut. He went through the same drill again of how he had come to Vietnam to show our support for the Vietnamese people and did she know about the American AID program. She said quite clearly, "No." She then exited under the back of the house and Gardner not understanding much of what was going on got very exercised about what he thought and articulated as turning her back on the Vice President of the United States of America where upon Johnson bellowed at him, "I told you once, if you can't talk nice you can't come along." And so it went.

We got to the border of the next province over and the province chief had erected a magnificent arch across the highway which said in English, "Welcome to the Vice President of the United States of America." Johnson really liked that, so he stopped the cortege and got out and said to the vice president of Vietnam, Tho, who was with us... by this time they had put me in the front seat of that car, by the way, and I was supposed to translate Tho's English into Johnson's English, which after a few efforts caused Tho to stop talking all together, because his English was pretty good. Both Tho and I thought that Johnson, when he stopped there and said to his military attache that he wanted to take this with him to show the American people, meant that enormous arch. Tho said that it would be very difficult to get it down and get it into the airplane and it wasn't until Johnson, himself, and the military attache started to detach the banner that it was clear what was wanted. They did get the banner down with Johnson helping and put it into the car and off we went.

We finally got to what was supposed to be a military display. There were some maneuvering of troops and Johnson was sitting on a grandstand in a big easy chair. Sitting beside him was with what to me at least was a novelty, a portable tape recorder, property of an American reporter, a rather attractive young woman. She had this tape recorder under Johnson's mouth. I don't know what he was saying, I couldn't hear it, but she was asking him questions and he was responding into the tape recorder. His hand was hanging down over the side of his armchair and he began to pat her on the thigh and then on the rump as he talked. Well, if I could see this, I am sure some of the Vietnamese could also see very clearly what was going on. But she is not paying any attention at all to that. She is just busy doing her interview, by God.

That was probably more than I should have told you, but there was more.

Q: Well, let's hear more because this is the personality of somebody. I take it Johnson was feeling rather constrained in the Kennedy White House and would kind of like to get out and do his thing elsewhere.

HEAVNER: He acted as though he was running for office in Vietnam, at least when I was with him, and as if this were an American audience he was playing to. He did everything, I believe, as he would have done it in Texas, and most of it was right over the heads of the Vietnamese.

Q: By the time you left and particularly being in Saigon, did you sense any change in the atmosphere between 1958 when you arrived and 1961 when you left?

HEAVNER: Yes, I think it was pretty clear by 1961 that the North was making a serious effort to infiltrate and organize a Viet Cong underground. The threat was maybe not a big cloud on the horizon, but it was certainly there. I don't know how clearly we saw that. It would be nice to say that I saw it coming, but I don't think I did. I knew from my own experience in Hue that some of this was going on, but if someone had said it would turn into a major conflict and Vietnam would become the linchpin of our whole foreign policy, I would have laughed. I couldn't see that coming down the pike and I don't think anybody else did.

Q: Did you see any change in the attitude towards Diem during your time in Vietnam, both throughout the country and within the embassy?

HEAVNER: There was a lot of increasing skepticism about Diem and in particular, his brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu and his wife, the famous Madam Nhu. There was a very articulate, intelligent, well educated upper class in Saigon who thoroughly disapproved of Madam Nhu and her husband. They told us a lot of truths and probably a lot of exaggerated truths about them. How corrupt and nasty they were. Much of that rubbed off on embassy personnel so that under the level of the ambassador and the political counselor, I think, there was increasingly in the political section and other parts of the embassy a lot of questions of whether we were supporting a regime that a) could make it and b) that we wanted to be associated with. But it was our policy to support Diem - and that is why Johnson came - to be very closely associated with and supportive of the Diem regime. That was obviously how Johnson saw as his role and why he made the visit.

So, there was a certain tension in the embassy, and I was part of it because I had become increasingly skeptical about the Diem regime and I don't think I kept that to myself. Not that we weren't good soldiers, but when we talked in house we said what we thought, and I didn't think the Diem regime was very effective or promising for the long term. I did believe all the stories about the corruption, some of which I was aware of firsthand from my time in Hue. It was difficult in Can's case to call it corruption because he did a lot of good things as well. In Nhu's case, if the stories were true, it was pretty out and out - there were probably Swiss bank accounts and the whole nine yards. Anyhow, there was a lot of disenchantment about the Diem regime in the embassy ranks. You may remember that when Durbrow left, he, himself, had become pretty disenchanted and he was replaced by Nolting whose mandate was to repair our relations with Diem and to reaffirm our commitment to support that regime. Fred Nolting did a good job of that.

Q: Did you sense that there was a larger commitment toward Vietnam when the Kennedy administration came in?

HEAVNER: Well, it was the Kennedy administration that really got us started there down that road. They were the ones who first introduced American combat forces, although it was done clandestinely. We had some close air support in Vietnam early on which was called Farmgate. I don't think you can blame Johnson entirely for our deepening involvement in South Vietnam. It seems to me that the Kennedy administration really got it under way. I was working on Vietnam back here until shortly before Diem was overthrown, which was authored in the Kennedy administration too, by the way. I don't know that you can say that Kennedy wouldn't have continued just as Johnson did. I think he might have done.

Q: You left there in 1961. When?

HEAVNER: It would have been the summer or early fall of 1961. I came back here and went to work for Sterling Cottrell who was then head of what was called the Vietnam Task Force and Ben Wood was his deputy. I had known Ben in Saigon. I was happy as a clam because I really liked and admired both of them immensely and we were doing something which was obviously increasingly important in our foreign policy. It had the attention of the White House. I recall Cot, as we called him, going to the White House and riding back to the State Department with Kennedy one day. The interagency group, which started out being called the task force and later became the so-called Working Group, was an interagency organization chaired by State and obviously of great interest and concern to the President himself.

Q: Why don't we stop here. We will pick it up next time and talk about your time on the task force which was from 1961 until when?

HEAVNER: Just two years, 1961-63.

Q: But a very important time.

Ted, we are going to be talking about the Vietnam Working Group, 1961-63. When did you leave in 1963?

HEAVNER: It would have been in the spring of 1963 because I went from there into Indonesian language training.

Q: Could you talk a bit about your leaders in the Vietnam Working Group and how they operated and how this very important apparatus was put together and what it was trying to do?

HEAVNER: It was already put together when I came on board in 1961 so I am not sure how it was initially established. My recollection is that Sterling Cottrell was the first director and Ben his first deputy, although I could be wrong about that too. It was an interagency organization that was clearly led by State in a way that in retrospect seems kind of unusual. It was Cot and Ben who did take the lead and clearly had the blessing of the White House as well as the seventh floor. It was a very nice organization from my point of view. I thoroughly enjoyed all the people in it. We met periodically with the other agencies. It was my relationship with Cot and Ben that made my working life then so pleasant, however.

Q: Ben?

HEAVNER: Ben Wood. After Cot left, Ben moved up to be director and I became his deputy. I think Hilsman was still the assistant secretary then and Averell Harriman took the job later on. Harriman was assistant Secretary then. I thought Averell Harriman was a very remarkable man. I remember him talking on the telephone, reading a draft, and interrogating me at the same time, which I thought was quite a feat. I also learned very quickly if you didn't get his attention in about the first ten seconds, you might as well forget it. He used to take out his hearing aid which was kind of a signal of "I'm not interested in what you are saying." That was when Harriman was assistant secretary. He came in with Kennedy, as you may recall, and after a very distinguished career at much higher levels, accepted that assistant secretary job under Kennedy. I guess this was a real vote of confidence in Kennedy as well as something interesting for him to do.

In any event, I ran into him again in 1975 when I was on Caribbean affairs and Carter had decided that all our ambassadors would be vetted and recommended by a panel of distinguished diplomats and other distinguished folks, one of whom was Averell Harriman. They were talking about each area subsequently and in due course the Caribbean came up. It was the custom that the country director, which was me in this case, was asked to join them for their consideration not of specific names but of the requirements of the chiefs of mission jobs there. Although I wasn't asked for it, I assumed that they also wanted recommendations. Harriman was sitting down at the end of the table and I came in and sat down for my ten minutes and began to talk about the requirements for the job in the Bahamas. About ten seconds after I began, sure enough, out came the hearing aid. I thought to myself that I had lost him again!

Q: When you arrived there did you find this group had a realistic, from your point of view, view of the situation in Vietnam or did it seem to be more dominated by the Washington establishment?

HEAVNER: I think it is fair to say in general we did not have a very good understanding of Vietnam, so probably we would have to say it reflected Washington concerns and outlook far more than anything else. Counterinsurgency was big in those days as you may recall. In fact, I think there was a period not so long after that when everybody was supposed to have counterinsurgency training. So there was a keen interest in the problem. It was seen, I think through insufficient historical background and even more importantly through insufficient strategic point of view. The assumption from the beginning was that it was not going to be too costly. We were not going to be in a situation where we really had to expend vast amounts of treasure and blood. At no time, I think, and this extends into the Johnson years as well, did we face up to the idea that okay you are in a war, do you mean to win the war or not. We were never prepared to make the ultimate effort, for example, to somehow challenge Ho Chi Minh on his home ground. On the contrary we reassured him repeatedly, at least during the Johnson era, that we were not threatening the integrity of North Vietnam. That we weren't going to invade and take over that part of the country and reunite it by force. We never were willing to face up to the possibility, in short, of another confrontation with China and so we were sort of playing from a bad poker hand it seems to me. In retrospect it is easy to say we never should have gotten in there in the first place, but having gotten in as deeply as we had then, it seems to me we needed to make it clear to ourselves, primarily, but also to the enemy, that we were quite prepared to do whatever was necessary to bring it to the conclusion we wanted. We never reached that.

Q: At the Working Group level were you so involved in the details of working the situation that you all were just not even talking about what might be done?

HEAVNER: Well, there were a lot of phases. Again in retrospect, I think it is fair to say that we won the war a number of times and each time our opponent raised the ante. In 1967, for example, things were in pretty good shape. In fact, I reupped for a second tour there because I wanted to be there when the war ended. I don't think that was an unrealistic expectation given the situation then on the ground. The difficulty was that none of us foresaw the ability and the willingness of North Vietnam to inject more and more men and materiel into the effort, and for the Soviet and Chinese backers to continue their support at the necessary level to raise the ante.

Q: Let's go back to the 1961-63 period. While you were sitting with this Working Group was it a topic of discussion where we should go or something of this nature?

HEAVNER: We thought a lot of precedents like Malaysia, and in fact had an expert on Malaysia come talk to us a number of times. The assumption was that if that strategy which was translated into strategic hamlets in the Vietnam context worked in Malaysia, it ought to work in Vietnam. The difficulty, of course, was that Malaysia had no common border with a communist supporter and therefore was not able to get the continuous infusions of assistance that North Vietnam and the VC got. The other problem was that the Malaysian communists just weren't of the same stripe as the Vietnamese. The Vietnamese are very tough people, very determined and had a long history of fighting off foreign invaders. The French were not the first, the Chinese were a continuing problem and the Vietnamese had driven them out a number of times historically. So, they were an entirely different kind of opponent and I think that was never understood.

Q: What were you doing in the Working Group?

HEAVNER: The idea basically was to coordinate all of our efforts. The AID effort which grew tremendously over those years. The military effort which also grew greatly over those years. And the political effort which was to build or try to help Diem build support for his regime. That perhaps fared worse than some of the other efforts. Building up military support appeared to do rather well, although in retrospect it is fair to say that we never created a very effective military organization in the South. Certainly the AID program generated a robust, although very dependent economy. All of that needed coordination and direction and repeated infusions of American assistance which grew and grew and funds for it had to be found in the U.S. budget. Dealing with congress was part of Cottrell's job, not the part of it that I got into. When we got into the business of strategic hamlets, the Working Group, primarily at our instigation, although CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] was for it, too, was to do a series of provincial surveys. We got what we thought was an okay from the Diem regime to do that, and they sent me back to Vietnam to organize and start the effort. The trouble was the Vietnamese kept dragging their feet and although I was there for six weeks, we couldn't get it off the ground. We finally gave up trying to get a joint provincial survey effort. It wasn't until much later, I think, under CORDS, that we actually did provincial surveys, province by province.

Our biggest concern from my perspective was the relationship with the Diem regime and how to strengthen it. Diem started out with some heavy obstacles. The Hoa Hao and the Cao Dai private armies were opposed to him. He really didn't have a lot of support even in the Catholic community and yet in 1955 he had managed to take over and exert control. So, there was a lot of vigor and determination there. Whether that deteriorated, got old or something, I don't know. But it became less and less evident that he was able to really take charge and marshal support the way it was required. Part of the problem was again a failure on our part and perhaps on his, to take into account the fact that Vietnamese people in general haven't supported governments. They have tried to keep government of whatever stripe at arm's length. Primary loyalty was to family and village. That was certainly true when I was in the Vietnam before the war.

One of the things that I think I mentioned in one of our earlier sessions, was the extent to which Diem's brother, Ngo Dinh Can, had taken over essentially communist methods, mass organizations of all kinds, compulsory study sessions on a regular basis, right down to the family units which were responsible for one another. If you got a bad apple in your group who defected to the Viet Cong, God help the rest of you. They had had 10 years of that before Can came along because the communists were in charge there before. So this population was highly organized, highly disciplined and I think very scared and resentful of government of whatever kind. So, Diem, I think couldn't probably have marshaled the kind of popular support that we seemed to think he was needing and we wanted to help him build.

Later on in the Thieu Ky period, we tried to somehow graft our notion of political parties onto the Vietnam scene. The trouble was that our notion of a political party didn't resemble anything in Vietnamese history. They had absolutely no experience of it. They had had secret societies, all the communist organizational kinds of control apparatus, and religious based organizations like the Cao Dai and the Hoa Hao and the Buddhists, but nothing like a western political party. In their experience, you didn't get support by getting a lot of votes, you got support by having your people in the right place to pull the levers. You had cadre in short.

Q: While you were on this Working Group could you give the perspective that the military were giving to the group and also the CIA in this 1961-63 period?

HEAVNER: To be truthful, my recollection of that is pretty hazy. But, I think it is fair to say we were all pretty much of a single mind. I don't think there were any nay-sayers in those days. We all thought it was manageable. That with the right infusion of assistance and increasing advise bordering increasingly on direction, it probably could be done. We could defeat the Viet Cong and maintain at least a more democratic and more free section of the country than the North.

I don't think it was until the end of my time, and even after that, that we began to have people with real doubts. Paul Kattenburg succeeded Ben as the director of the working group and Paul, subsequently became certainly very anti-Vietnam war, as you may recall. At the time he took over I think he had doubts but they were not operative. When Lodge went out to Vietnam, and Kattenburg was part of that operation, we all, including Paul, I think, still thought that the war could be won and that a free independent South Vietnam could be maintained - and at an acceptable cost, I should say.

Q: Did you while you were with the Working Group begin to sense a growing unhappiness with Diem?

HEAVNER: Oh, yes. That was certainly a feature, and fairly early on, of our thought. I had come out of Vietnam in 1961 with a lot of reservations about Diem's regime viability. Those didn't diminish as time went on. We considered other options pretty early on. By the time I left we were actively asking ourselves what kind of transition might take place, who might be a better leader, and how that might come about. I consider myself fortunate that I left the Working Group before this had degenerated into a formula which ended up in the assassination of Diem and his brother. I feel that my hands are clean in that respect. I think we could have avoided that. It seems to me that it was really quite unnecessary.

Q: You mentioned that one time you ended up coming from the White House with the President...

HEAVNER: I didn't, Cottrell did. Kennedy was coming to the State Department to address the whole department, I believe at that time. He was keenly interested in foreign affairs from the start of his administration. One of the things he did early on was to come over to the Department and talk to us about how he saw things and to inspire the troops, which he did. When he did that, for whatever reason Cottrell was in the White House and when Kennedy went to the Department, Cottrell rode back with him and they talked about Vietnam. I was not privy to the conversation but I was delighted, of course, to hear that it had taken place, that we were getting that kind of high level leadership.

Q: Did you have any feel for the role of Dean Rusk while you were on the Working Group?

HEAVNER: I never had any contact with Rusk. Both Hilsman and Harriman were less enthusiastic than Sterling Cottrell, but Cot pretty much had his way on most issues. I think Cot talked directly to Rusk, certainly to the seventh floor, on many occasions and had their support.

I did have a fair amount of contact with both Hilsman and Harriman. I remember one of the things that Harriman was very much concerned about, and rightly so as we have subsequently learned, was the use of defoliants. He thought that was a very bad idea. That destroying food crops was a form of warfare that would backfire on us. That it would be seen worldwide as an inhumane kind of weapon.

Q: I worked for Roger Hilsman in INR about a year before you got involved in this. I remember he was a great enthusiast about guerrilla warfare, etc. He had been in the OAS in Burma. I have a feeling that he was the person who was kind of helping to sell the idea of counterinsurgency, etc. and that this was the key to everything. Did you get any feeling about his particular brand of activism about getting out there and putting the kibosh on the Viet Cong?

HEAVNER: He once spent an inordinate amount of time, I thought, telling me about his experience in Burma which was apropos of nothing we were discussing, or at least it didn't seem so to me. I think again though that I'm a poor source in that regard because although I had some contact with Hilsman, it was Cottrell and Ben Wood, subsequently, who had most contact with him.

Q: What was your impression during the 1961-63 period of how the media dealt with Vietnam? Were you following the media and what the American public was getting?

HEAVNER: We must have done. We were very concerned about the impact of casualties on public opinion. I can't say I recall following the media intensely, but I think we must have been concerned. I am not sure the media was at all hostile then, however. It doesn't seem to me it was. Again though, I'm pretty unclear about that.

Q: It may not have been a matter of great focus either at that point.

HEAVNER: Well, by September, 1963, I'm just looking at an old State Department Bulletin, there was a statement by Assistant Secretary Hilsman and a Vietnam situation speech that I gave to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Clearly it was pretty central by then. The other contents are education and the USSR. Up front is Asia and Vietnam.

Q: What date is this bulletin?

HEAVNER: September, 1963.

JOSEPH A. MENDENHALL Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1958-1959)

Political Officer

Saigon (1959-1962)

Deputy Director, Southeast Asia Affairs
Washington, DC (1963-1965)

Chairman, Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1964)

Vietnam Affairs, East Asia Bureau
Washington, DC (1964-1965)

Vietnam Affairs, USAID
Washington, DC (1968-1970)

Ambassador Joseph A. Mendenhall was born in Missouri in 1920. He entered the Foreign Service in 1946 and served in Turkey, Iceland, Switzerland, Vietnam, Laos, and was ambassador to Madagascar. He was interviewed in 1991 by Horace Torbert.

Q: Well, I think it is a systemic weakness of diplomacy very often that you are afraid to make anybody mad.

About this time you began to get in to the Vietnam business?

MENDENHALL: Yes. After two and a half years of economic work, the Director of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, decided to switch me over to the Vietnam desk. I was very interested in this job. After all, the desk officer was then and I assume still is in the Department in many ways the principal focus of the U.S. towards the country concerned. So I was very happy to take on this assignment. I might say that at that time the Vietnam desk officer ran not only political matters, but all the economic matters with respect to his country. That was true of all the Indochina countries, it wasn't true of the other countries in Southeast Asia. I had handled Thai and Burmese economic matters but not political matters when I was in the economic unit of the office. But that economic unit did not handle economic matters, for some anomalous reason, with respect to the Indochina countries, the desk officers did. So I had responsibility for all aspects of U.S. policy and operations vis-a-vis Vietnam. At that time we had only one officer on the desk. I don't know what it is today, but I know before I retired, the Department had mushroomed and you had two or three desk officers dealing with countries.

There is one particular case I would like to raise in connection with my Vietnam Desk experience here in Washington. I think it is worth noting for posterity.

One of the principal things that arose during my tenure of about a year and a quarter on the desk, was approving the armaments and training of the civil guard in South Vietnam. The civil guard was a paramilitary organization similar to the Gendarmerie in France, which I think probably was its predecessor, since the French had control in Indochina, or the Carabinieri in Italy. We in the United States don't have anything exactly like it. We have either military organizations or police organizations. We don't have something that stands sort of half way in between.

Well, the Vietnamese wanted because of the increasing insecurity in the country -- the communists had already launched terrorists activities and assassinations in 1957-58 -- to improve the arms of the civil guard. Unfortunately, President of South Vietnam Diem's proposal was to give the civil guard tanks and artillery, which was ridiculous as they would then be no different from the regular military. But there was an intermediate way of stepping up the quality of their arms and finally we got the Vietnamese government to agree to request the right kind of arms. The request came back to Washington through ICA, the predecessor of AID, which had a very strong police program.

It got here and the head of ICA said that this was not a regular police police. Which I think was quite right. He said, "This is not something which I think ICA should get involved." The Department of Defense was not about to take it on either because the civil guard was not included in the approved military personnel ceilings for military aid which had been approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff for military aid programs in South Vietnam. So here we were falling in between the two stools. I kept pushing ICA on this and finally the head of the organization said he would do it if he got a direct order from John Foster Dulles, the Secretary of State. So I drafted a direct order and Dulles signed it. ICA then agreed to undertake this program. As it turned out, the head of ICA was fundamentally right. ICA could not do a proper job of training and arming the civil guard. It was too big an organization. It was far bigger than any police program they had ever taken on. The civil guard consisted of about 50,000 people. This problem was never really resolved until about three years later after John Kennedy became President and had authorized a big increase in our military personnel and funds in Vietnam and finally induced the Department of Defense to take over the program. That was the really efficient way that it could be handled.

Q: Was there any question of it possibly be handled by CIA at that time?

MENDENHALL: No, because I think it was also too big to be handled by CIA.

One other thing that I did during that period was to handle Cambodia as an additional duty for a few weeks during the summer of 1958 while we were between Cambodia desk officers. I remember the office director said to me, "I am rather reluctant to intrust Cambodia to you because Vietnam and Cambodia are traditionally and historically at loggerheads. You are the Vietnam desk officer and are apt to be rather prejudice in favor of Vietnam. But I don't have any alternative so you will have to take it on."

Well I handled it for a few weeks and was very pleased when my temporary service came to an end and he said to me, "You have treated this with very fair objectivity."

During that period Prince Sihanouk, who even then was the head of the Cambodian government, paid his first visit to Washington. It was not an official visit in the strict sense of that term where he is invited by the President and therefore President Eisenhower would have nothing to do with Sihanouk while he was here. He would not work him into his busy schedule. I understand the President has a busy schedule, but when people like Sihanouk, leaders of small countries, could go to Peking, or to Russia and get all the honors and attention from the heads of those governments, when they came here and didn't get the same thing, on a number of occasions, I think, it worked very substantially against our interests. We could not get President Eisenhower to agree to see Sihanouk, the best we could do was to get him received by the Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles. Sihanouk had shortly before diplomatically recognized Communist China. That was at the time that the U.S. was holding a line very strongly against further diplomatic recognitions of that country. Sihanouk did it because there had been one of the periodic flaps in Vietnamese-Cambodian relations over a little border marker in the wilderness, which had been blown up to such proportions that he decided to resort for diplomatic support to Peking and recognize them diplomatically.

He arrived here with this very recently on his record. I accompanied him on his call on Walter Robertson, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, whose meeting was almost completely a lecture to Sihanouk on the evils of communism -- predictably the way Walter Robertson would handle it. Then I accompanied Sihanouk to his meeting with John Foster Dulles. Dulles had this reputation of being an anti-communist fire eater. This was the only time in my career that I was ever in Dulles' office and I have never forgotten the way he handled Sihanouk. He didn't take the Robertson approach at all. He took a very philosophical approach in talking with him. He explained to him that we felt that the containment policy vis-a-vis the communist countries -- both China and Russia at that time -- was the one to follow because if we held that line over time those communist regimes might begin to change, to modify themselves. To be sure that is what eventually happened in both China and the Soviet Union. It is not the kind of attitude normally associated with Dulles, but he expressed that point of view and I think in view of what subsequently happened in 35 to 40 years of history it proved rather prescient. I think that is something that some of these anti-Dulles academics and writers might take into consideration some time. Of course, I don't know if this is even in the public record. It should be.

Q: I am not sure about this particular incident, but the idea has been discussed in the last few years by scholars, partly stimulated by Eleanor Dulles, perhaps.

MENDENHALL: I witnessed this and I can testify to it. I am sure I have a memorandum of this conversation between Sihanouk and Dulles in the official files.

Q: That is an extremely interesting point of view. Was there anybody else that you worked with in the Far Eastern Bureau besides Robertson that was particularly impressive at the time, or that you remember as an influence.

MENDENHALL: Yes, I have already mentioned Howard Jones with whom I have worked considerably when he was economic deputy assistant secretary. Graham Parsons came in as the political deputy assistant secretary in the summer of 1958. Interestingly enough, Graham Parsons has probably told this himself in his oral history, but this is another incident of my diplomatic career which I have always remembered.

Walter Robertson, as you know was the key man in holding the line against Communist China in the 1950s. When Sihanouk recognized Communist China Robertson happened to be away and Graham Parsons was holding the fort there. Our ambassador in Cambodia, Carl Strom, had done everything possible, knowing the policy of the U.S. government, to try to prevent Sihanouk from proceeding with diplomatic recognition. His cables sounded increasingly desperate as they came in. Then a copy of an outgoing cable came across my desk which Graham Parsons as the Acting Assistant Secretary had sent to Carl Strom in Phnom Penh. It was a cable which was very understanding of the anguish that an ambassador in a remote country knowing that U.S. policy vis-a-vis his country was in a sense going down the drain was going through. I happened to be in Parsons' office right after that. He turned to me and said, "I went through a similar kind of experience as ambassador to Laos. I knew how lonely and distant from Washington he feels under circumstances like that. He needs something that bolsters him in the way he is handling himself." Again a human approach based on previous experience in the Foreign Service.

Q: I think that is as good a justification for a career Foreign Service as you could make. You went from there to Saigon.

MENDENHALL: Yes, I had been told when I became the desk officer that, if I handled that job properly and the ambassador in Vietnam, it was Elbridge Durbrow, agreed, that in the summer of 1959 when the assignment of the then political counselor in Saigon expired, I could succeed him. And that was the way it turned out.

I arrived with my family in Saigon in August of 1959 and served there for three years in what proved to be one of the two most challenging and interesting assignments of my career.

Q: What was the other?

MENDENHALL: Director of the AID Mission in Laos. Not as Ambassador to Madagascar which was less interesting.

In Vietnam I arrived when the security situation was already deteriorating in the countryside. In a few months, by January, 1960, the war, as I define it, actually started. In January, 1960 there was an attack on a regimental post of the South Vietnamese army by the Vietnamese communists and at the same time a reign of terror in an entire province south of Saigon. This was a quantum leap in terms of the kind of violence that the communist had been engaged in, so I have always stated that the beginning of the war was January, 1960.

At the same time internal non-communist dissent with the way in which President Diem and his brother Ngo Dinh Nhu, his right-hand man, handled the government was increasing in Vietnam. These were our two great problems at that time and to remain so for a number of years. In September 1960, the Embassy, partly as a result of my pushing as political counselor, decided to try to put pressure on President Diem to appease his non-communist opponents by bringing some other men into the government and making some other changes and principally by getting rid of his brother Nhu, who was the focal point of disagreement. Nhu and his wife, Madame Nhu, were the two principal foci of the growing non-communist opposition in the country.

On Labor Day weekend, 1960, we drafted a message to Washington and got approval of a demarche to Diem on this point. The demarche was actually made when Graham Parsons, who was then the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, was visiting in Saigon. He and Ambassador Durbrow called on President Diem and the demarche was made. Our principal recommendation was that Diem get rid of Nhu, perhaps by sending him abroad as an ambassador -- one of the classic devices for getting rid of a man who is unpopular. The whole demarche fell completely flat. Diem did nothing of what we recommended to him at that stage. Within two or three weeks, the first military coup attempt to overthrow him took place. This is what we were concerned about because we knew there was increasing disillusionment and dissent within the armed forces. The Vietnamese military were increasingly feeling that with the way in which Diem and Nhu ran the government war could not be won against the communists. These were non-communists, not communists at all.

I had been very much a pro-Diem man, even when we drafted these proposals to make a demarche to him. I wanted to see him get rid of Nhu, but was in favor of keeping Diem. But after that first coup attempt when Diem showed that he had learned nothing -- had made no changes whatsoever as a result of this first coup which had come within an ace of succeeding -- it became increasingly obvious to me that Diem, himself, would have to go if we had any hope of winning the war.

Now that, of course, was the beginning of the time of great disagreement within the U.S. Mission about the U.S. policy towards Diem. Disagreement which came to a head two years later, which I shall reach in a moment. The mission was split right down the middle as was the U.S. government here in Washington over the policy towards Diem. My own judgment was that the conflict could not be won because of the utter disorganization of the way Diem and Nhu ran the government.

At the same time that this was going on the communist war in the field was expanding and it was decided within our mission that we ought to draw up a unified counter-insurgency plan and propose it to the South Vietnamese government. A country team subcommittee was created with membership from the Embassy; MAAG, which was a large military assistance mission; AID organization; CIA and USIA -- five agencies represented on it. I, as political counselor, was chosen as the head of the team to draft the counter-insurgency plan. Much of the work on it was done by my military colleagues on the committee, with whom I had close and good personal working relations. After a couple of months we had the plan completed and submitted it to Washington for approval. The first, as far as I am aware, official act which John Kennedy as the new president in January 1961, took was to approve this plan personally, because we got a brief telegram from Washington -- "Plan approved at highest level." That term was reserved for the President.

Then came the job of selling it to the South Vietnamese government. The ambassador turned to me and said, "I want you to conduct a briefing and negotiations with the number three man in the Vietnamese government." The number one being Diem and the number two being his brother Nhu, the number three being a man by the name of Thuan, who had two hats -- he was the Chief of Staff of the Presidency and also the Secretary of Defense. So I spent a week doing that. I had sessions every day with Thuan, accompanied by some of my military and other colleagues.

Thuan was one of the ablest Vietnamese I ever encountered. A man whose subsequent history was in a sense tragic. In 1963, he, like so many officials, finally broke with Diem and Nhu, himself. I believe he had to flee across the Cambodian border for his life. He escaped to Paris and never became involved again in affairs in Vietnam. I thought he was a great loss to that country because he had one of the best minds of anybody... And could organize and knew how to operate. I had very high regard for him.

After we concluded these sessions with Thuan, he had to present it to Diem. By that stage relations between Diem and our ambassador Durbrow were at a low level because Durbrow had on Washington's instructions, been pushing Diem on so many things. Diem was not about to concede anything to Durbrow. It was also known that Durbrow would soon be leaving on transfer and be replaced with another ambassador. Diem held out until Durbrow actually left.

Our DCM was on home leave and I, as political counselor, was Chargé for about five days. I think within 24 hours after Durbrow's departure, Thuan telephone me and said -- by that time we had reduced the plan to two essential demands: 1) unity of command in the armed forces (which seems to me absolutely essential in conducting a war) and 2) a unified central intelligence organization. The Vietnam government under Diem had neither. There was no central focus of command in the military and there were all kinds of intelligence organizations. Thuan said that President Diem had agreed to those two points. Well, I cabled it off to Washington, but the sad upshot was that this proved, not to my surprise, to be an agreement only on paper. Diem never did implement these recommendations. He was so afraid of a military coup against him that he wanted to keep his own military and intelligence divided. My answer to that was that by doing that and thus failing to conduct the war against the communists effectively, you increase rather than decrease the chances for a coup. But Diem didn't see it that way.

At the same time, I had been Chargé about 24 hours, I received a NIACT or FLASH from Washington -- "Lyndon Johnson, then Vice President, will be arriving within a few days on an official visit. Please get the concurrence of the Vietnamese government." The message was brought to me while I was at the main hotel in Saigon at a dinner the Vietnamese were giving for Senator Dodd from Connecticut. He had arrived that day and they were giving him a dinner. I got the message, I remember going out to the reception desk, and immediately telephoning Thuan. He said, "I will ask President Diem in the morning." I said, "Can you ask him tonight?" "No," he said, "I can't ask him tonight." Knowing how Washington, and particularly people like LBJ, could be impatient for immediate responses, and if you don't get them the guy who is in charge on the American side suffers. I had a rather sleepless night, but Thuan came through in the morning. I cabled it off to Washington. Then there was much back and forth. Johnson wanted to stay in a hotel and Diem wanted him to stay in the President Guest House. Diem finally won on that one -- Johnson did concede.

Our new ambassador arrived about 24 hours prior to Johnson -- Frederick "Fritz" Nolting. Nolting having had no experience in Southeast Asia before, let alone Vietnam, obviously knew nothing about the situation, so he let me handle the visit of the Vice President. I worked out all the scheduling with the Vietnamese government, all the activities. I remember being in the Vietnamese Guest House....this is something that I have always found remarkable, Tully. The first night that Johnson was there -- he was on a six nation tour, Vietnam was the second stop. This was a man who six years earlier had had a severe heart attack when majority leader in the Senate. He slept one hour of that first night. I was in his room with Lady Bird Johnson sleeping in bed, Johnson on the telephone to Washington at 2 and 3 am in the morning. He slept one hour and had four more countries to go. Where that man got his energy I do not know.

Q: No politician could survive without it.

MENDENHALL: I have always prided myself on having a considerable energy, but at the end of that Vice Presidential visit I was more tired than I have ever been in my life and I didn't have four more countries to go. I may add one more thing in respect to that visit. Johnson was there two nights and one full day and I remember on the afternoon of the full day the Vietnamese general who was in charge of Johnson's security turned to me and said, "Your Vice President has changed the itinerary so often during his time here that I can't possibly keep up with him. I haven't the slightest idea where he is going to be or what to do to protect him. I can only hope the communists are just as confused as I am with all these changes he has made. That is his only hope under the circumstances."

Q: I never traveled with Johnson, but I did once travel with Nixon. Different personalities but...

MENDENHALL: Johnson was not the easiest man. Lady Bird is a real lady. Johnson was not an easy man at all.

Q: I saw a good deal of him during the days I was on the Hill.

MENDENHALL: As I indicated, our new ambassador, Fritz Nolting, arrived just before the Johnson visit. He came with instructions from President Kennedy to get along with President Diem. Nolting very quickly became convinced 1000 percent of the rightness of these instructions and was a total pro-Diem man. By that time I had reached the stage in my mind that Diem could not win the war against the communists and therefore it no longer served our interests for him to be in power. So there was this big disagreement between the ambassador and me, as political counselor, and it was well known.

Q: Who was the DCM at this time?

MENDENHALL: Francis Cunningham who was later succeeded by Bill Trueheart.

As a result of this disagreement, my influence and range of activities considerably declined. I indicated that I had been very close to the number three in the Vietnamese government, Mr. Thuan. He noticeably had cooled on me because he knew I no longer had the influence with Nolting as ambassador as I had when Durbrow was ambassador. A very interesting example of how power can wax and wane. So during my last year in Saigon I was considerably less involved, less prominent than I had been during the first two years.

I think for the sake of new Foreign Service officers, or even present Foreign Service officers in training, it is also interesting to recall some of my experiences under Nolting. We as political officers had very little contact with Vietnamese military officers even though we regarded them quite important in a political sense, because we felt that it might well endanger them personally if they were seen in contact with political officers. One night at a dinner party given by the director of the AID mission at which General Big Minh, who was prominent in Vietnamese history for 15 or 20 years, was present. I managed to get myself seated at a table for four with him and talked to him in the indirect fashion in which one always talked with Vietnamese about possible dissent with the government. There was never a direct conversation. One had to conduct it very carefully in terms of circumlocution, but if one had experience in dealing with the Vietnamese one knew exactly what they were saying. Well, I had this talk with Minh and it became clear as we had heard that Minh was becoming increasingly disillusioned as far as the government was concerned.

I went back to the Embassy the next morning and prepared a message on this. The ambassador saw it, but he, like his predecessor, had always insisted that everything going out be cleared by all agencies. He sent it over to the chief of MAAG, a Lt. General, for clearance. The latter came back and said, "Minh had never said anything to me like this, I don't believe it." Well obviously he wasn't going to say this to the chief of MAAG because he knew the chief of MAAG was pro-Diem and any Vietnamese who valued his hide wouldn't talk like that to anyone pro-Diem. Everyone's views at the American mission were known by the Vietnamese -- they knew whom to talk with and whom not to talk to. Subsequently the chief of MAAG became as anti-Diem as I did, but at this time he was still very much pro-Diem. As a result the ambassador canned my message. This was not the time when dissent messages could get out.

I also around the same time drafted an assessment on the so-called strategic hamlet program. This was a program that was pushed by the British general who had been prominent in the successful British anti-communist guerrilla campaign in Malaya and who by then was in Vietnam advising the Vietnamese. It was basically a good idea that was picked up by Ngo Dinh Nhu, the president's brother, who ran with it and executed it in utterly the wrong way so that it was not being effective. It was complete chaos. I drafted a frank assessment of how this program was going based on the views I was getting from my Vietnamese contacts. Since this disagreed with the assessment of the ambassador and the chief of MAAG, that message got canned too. It didn't get out either.

The other message of some significance which I did draft during that last year was, I think probably the first one that dealt with bombing North Vietnam. I was in favor of initiation of bombing for retaliatory reasons. I never see why your enemy should get away with raining destruction on you unless you rain some on him. I was not of the view that it would be decisive in any way, but I suggested targets and so on. I think this was the first time, as least as far as the U.S. Embassy was concerned, that any such message had gone out. Both the military and the ambassador approved of it and it did get out.

So after about a year of this my three year tour in Vietnam came to a close. In the summer of 1962 I came back to Washington. I had a three year assignment here. The first year I was a student at the National War College, which was just what I wanted at this stage of my career. I enjoyed it very much, learned a certain amount while I was there and always look back on that year with considerable pleasure. I regard it as having been useful. My military colleagues, who of course were getting increasingly interested in Vietnam, were all fascinated with my experience there so I developed a very good rapport with them at that stage and found it a very satisfying experience. The Department deputy commandant at that point was Ambassador Winthrop Brown who had been our ambassador in Laos and I had a good relationship with him as well.

I looked around, as one does at the War College, before the year was up for assignments. I thought the next step in my career might be a small post DCM position, but I did not find open any which I thought were sufficiently of interest careerwise to make me want to pursue the possibility. I did get a request to come over to the Bureau of International Organizations for an interview as deputy director of the office of economic and social affairs -- the office in which I had rejected at a lower level job earlier. I went through the interview and declined that job as it was not one that would interest me either professionally or careerwise.

Meanwhile, Roger Hilsman, who was then the Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, indicated that he wanted me to come back into that Bureau. First as the so-called United Nations Advisor, which was a senior advisory slot, FSO-2 level, which had been held for many years by a lady by the name of Ruth Baker who executed Walter Robertson's anti-Communist China policy vis-a-vis the Bureau of International Organizations. He said that this would be an interim assignment because what the Department was planning to set up in many of the geographic bureaus was an office of regional affairs which would absorb several adviser posts that each bureau had maintained previously. He wanted me to be deputy director of that office.

So, I agreed to this assignment. I immediately found that virtually all I was doing, though it was regional, was Vietnam affairs, as Hilsman, himself, was at that stage. It was at that point that the only real footnote in history which I will ever have occurred. President Kennedy fairly often sent out special missions to Vietnam to assess the situation and report back to him. The Secretary of Defense, Mr. McNamara, had gone out fairly often as well as other members of the government. In early September, this was at the height of the Buddhist crisis in Vietnam in September 1963, Kennedy had a meeting of the National Security Council, or whatever he called the equivalent of it, dealing with the crisis in Vietnam and decided that he would send General Krulak, a two star Marine Corps general and known as the Brute because he was so small...

Q: I knew him.

MENDENHALL: ...out on a special assessment mission. Krulak was known to be a 100 percent pro-Diem and was very close to McNamara, Secretary of Defense; and General Taylor, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. At this NSC meeting Dean Rusk, Secretary of State, probably at the prodding of Roger Hilsman, suggested to President Kennedy that the State Department should also send a representative. Hilsman, himself, was anti-Diem so he would have liked to get somebody in to balance Krulak's view. After he got back he asked me if I would be willing to go. I said, "Sure." He called Dean Rusk who said, "Mendenhall's anti-Diem views are so well known maybe we should try to get somebody else." Hilsman said, "I don't have anybody else. I still think we should send him." And Dean Rusk agreed. This was about 11 o'clock in the morning. Hilsman said to me, "The helicopter is leaving the Pentagon for Andrews Field at 1 o'clock." I said, "Well, I need both money and to pack some clothes." He said, "Well, I will call your wife and tell her to go cash a check and get some money while you go home to get some clothes." This was probably the only time in history that an Assistant Secretary called and told a wife of a Foreign Service officer to go cash a check.

I managed to reach the helipad at the Pentagon in time to get on the helicopter with Brute Krulak. We went to Andrews Field, got in a plane and took off for Okinawa. We arrived Saturday evening in Okinawa to be informed that there was a curfew at the airport in Saigon. That we couldn't get in before 6 am. So we had a few hours to kill in Okinawa. We went to the Saturday night dance at the Officers Club and I tried to get a little sleep before we got on the airplane again. We arrived in Saigon about 6 am.

The first thing I did in Saigon was to get together with Henry Cabot Lodge, who was the ambassador, who also knew my views -- his and mine were pretty similar. Krulak and I separated completely. Krulak, I knew, would have everything laid on by all the resources of the military. He could get around the country anywhere he wanted. The only thing the poor Embassy had was the Air Attaché's aircraft which was a slow moving propeller job. So Lodge arranged for me to have that aircraft, which took four hours to fly up to Hue and Da Nang. I knew that Krulak would come back here and say "Well, I have been in x many number of provinces. I know the situation on the ground and the war is going excellently." So I knew I had to get out into the countryside in order to counter balance his view and I got up to Hue and Da Nang. I stayed overnight and talked to people up there. Came back to Saigon where I saw a few old Vietnamese friends whose judgment I knew I could trust. At that time there was a virtual reign of terror in Saigon. Bill Trueheart, the DCM, invited my old friend, the number two in the Foreign Office, for lunch and told me it was even dangerous for him to come to a lunch at an American Embassy official's house. The fact he is coming and is an old friend and knows you indicates that he is willing to brave the situation even though it is personally dangerous to him. The situation had deteriorated to that extent in Saigon. Americans, including Trueheart, himself, were on an assassination list -- not of the communists, but of the Vietnamese government because of the pressure we were putting on Diem and Nhu.

I saw what the situation was both out in the field and in Saigon. Thirty-six hours after we landed, Krulak and I were back on the airplane headed back to Washington. We left Washington, Friday afternoon and were back here by Tuesday morning at 6 am and by 10 am we were both in the Cabinet room at the White House reporting to the President and the National Security Council. We gave very diametrically opposite views on the situation in Vietnam politically and as far as the war was going. When we finished, President Kennedy turned to each of us and made that remark which has been so often reported, "You were both in the same country weren't you?" This is what got into so many books -- my small footnote to history.

Fortunately on the airplane we had brought back with us two officials from the U.S. mission whose tours were up. One was the director of USIS, John Mecklin, and the other was an AID official by the name of Rufus Phillips, who had been running the AID program in the provinces. Both of them supported my point of view at the meeting with the President. Phillips, in particular, lent considerable credibility to my point of view because of the kind of assignment he was on -- he knew the area and the situation in the countryside very well. I might say that at that meeting with Kennedy and his NSC, Fritz Nolting, who had just been replaced as ambassador by Henry Cabot Lodge, was present. He immediately tried to impugn my credibility before the President. The man who sprang to my defense was no less than McGeorge Bundy, the National Security Advisor.

Q: But you stood up under all this...

MENDENHALL: At that meeting, though, I learned subsequently, that I totally alienated the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the point that the next time I went to the White House for an NSC meeting on Vietnam, I went with Alex Johnson, who said, "Don't open your mouth at this meeting." Alex was then responsible for liaison with the Department of Defense. I now know he was getting this kind of line from McNamara and Maxwell Taylor.

As a matter of fact this had repercussions on me and my assignment and career later which I will get into in just a few minutes. One doesn't alienate some of the great powers in Washington without consequences as you well know.

Q: You have to wait quite a while for a change in personnel. By this time were you Chairman of the Vietnam Working Group?

MENDENHALL: No, not yet. I was still Deputy Director of Regional Affairs for the Far East. The next event of significance in my job and career came at the end of October, 1963. It was known in Washington on the basis of cable reporting that there could be a military coup in Saigon. At that stage we were mounting a 24-hour watch in the Operations Center. I happened to be on all night duty the night the coup took place. I saw the first messages that came in to the Operations Center. As soon as I saw them I got on the telephone. I awakened the Secretary of State, Mr. Rusk, the Secretary of Defense, Mr. McNamara, and the National Security Advisor, McGeorge Bundy. I asked if he wanted me to call the President. He said, "I will take care of that." They got their first word through me of the fact that the coup was then in progress.

Everybody, I think, knows the outcome of that coup. It was successful, but within about 24 hours after the coup had ended, Diem and his brother Nhu were slain, assassinated, by military officers. It was General Big Minh who took over the government with two of his colleagues. Whether these assassinations were done with his knowledge I really don't know. I for a long time thought it probably was done by some military officer on the spur of the moment. But I have seen books and articles which indicate that Minh was responsible for it. I just don't know.

That, of course, was a traumatic experience for the Administration because they had no anticipation that Diem and Nhu would be assassinated. It was thought that they would be exiled. If one wants to look at this in a real politik manner, it probably from that standpoint was better in the end that they were eliminated. This wouldn't be a very popular point of view to express in the United States at all, but Diem and Nhu would have constantly plotted their return and added enormous complications to the situation.

Well, what happened in Vietnam after that unfortunately was a series of coups. We had two years of political chaos which did nothing for Mendenhall's political reputation because I had been in favor of replacement of Diem. But eventually General Thieu took over the government in 1965. I believe, although one can make a very good case that the coup against Diem was a disaster because of the subsequent chaos, over the longer run it was the wiser thing because I think Thieu governed Vietnam more effectively and with better organization than Diem and Nhu did and certainly permitted closer collaboration with us Americans than Diem and Nhu would have. It was through that kind of close, integrated, cooperative Vietnamese-American effort that we finally succeeded in the counter-insurgency pacification program. As I said I was responsible for the first counter-insurgency plan which I know fell far short of the kind of effort which after many years of experimentation we finally devised in Vietnam by 1967, which succeeded in eventually winning the guerilla war in that country.

Now this is something I would like to stress. Many Americans, even many who were for the war, do not understand what actually happened in Vietnam. We were losing the guerilla war for a long time, but from 1967 on we and the South Vietnamese organized ourselves properly to win that war which was won by 1970 or 71. South Vietnam was eventually defeated not in the guerilla war but in a straight conventional conflict after we had withdrawn our forces and the Congress had cut back very greatly on the amount of aid going to Vietnam. As the general who led the Vietnamese communist forces in the final great push which took central Vietnam and eventually succeeded in taking Saigon said, "The South Vietnamese wound up fighting a poor man's war. We were better equipped than they were." -- because the Congress had cut back so much on military assistance to Vietnam. For the sake of the United States in the future, we should understand that we did win the guerilla conflict but we and the South Vietnamese lost the one where we should have won, the conventional war.

Q: I think a good deal of that is now coming out from others too, as well as yourself. It will be a long time before we have this history totally organized.

MENDENHALL: Tully, I might go in to one other thing with respect to Vietnam before I leave that subject -- you can see it is one that interests me very greatly. That is the upheaval within the Department over responsibility for Vietnam. I think this is something that would interest Foreign Service officers.

I have indicated that Roger Hilsman who was the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs was also a man who thought that in the early stages of the war the Department of Defense was not conducting our part of the war properly. That we should be putting much more emphasis on anti-guerilla activities rather than the conventional war at that stage. Hilsman was influenced by the fact that during World War II he had worked in anti-guerilla units in Burma so his personal experience had influenced him greatly. Hilsman made no bones either within the government or talking with the press about how he thought the war should be conducted. He and McNamara were totally at loggerheads. McNamara, of course, being the more senior official, met along with the Secretary of State and the National Security Advisor every Tuesday with the President at lunch to talk about Vietnam. McNamara's attitude towards Hilsman was such that the Secretary of State had to agree in February, 1964 to remove the responsibility from Vietnam from Hilsman as Assistant Secretary, put it in a special unit attached directly to the Secretary's office. I was not chosen to head that even though I was director of the Vietnam Working Group because it was also known that my relations with McNamara were not good.

Bill Sullivan, who was then special assistant to Averell Harriman, the Under Secretary, was chosen to head the unit. I was moved in under my good friend Bill, and a lot of other officers from various Departments were added until we had an integrated government-wide working group under Bill dealing with Vietnam. It worked all right but there wasn't really enough for both Bill and me to do so I decided that after a few months I ought to be looking for some other assignments.

Meanwhile Hilsman had resigned because in addition to the blow of responsibility for Vietnam being removed from him, there was a decision to send a special emissary to Cambodia to deal with Sihanouk over the situation in Cambodia and instead of Hilsman being chosen somebody else was and it was the last blow as far as Hilsman was concerned. I don't think you find this in Hilsman's book as the reason for his resignation, but these two things together I think are what led to Hilsman's resignation.

Hilsman was replaced by Bill Bundy, who had been the Assistant Secretary for International Security Affairs in the Department of Defense. He was very close to McNamara and obviously a man who could get along with McNamara when he came to the State Department.

Q: It was, however, Mac Bundy who had defended you before.

MENDENHALL: Right, they were brothers.

Bill Bundy asked me whether I would come back into the Bureau of East Asian Affairs to be the director of regional affairs. I had been deputy director. I agreed to do it and served about a year in that capacity. I can't say that year was one in which I did anything of very great significance. One thing I do remember doing there was to send a memorandum to Bill Bundy in the summer of '64, July, I think, when we got the first intelligence that North Vietnamese military individuals and subsequently units were being infiltrated from North Vietnam into South Vietnam. Prior to that time the North had always infiltrated southerners who had been taken to the North in 1954 at the time of the division of the country into the two zones -- North and South. They had exhausted that supply and were beginning to infiltrate northerners. That to me represented a change in the nature of the war. The North Vietnamese had always tried to portray that this was a civil war within South Vietnam of the southerners against their government and they had had some success up to that point because they had been using southern communists including those who had been taken north in '54 and retrained and armed up there. Having exhausted that supply they began to send in first individuals from the North Vietnamese armed forces and then units. It is pretty easy for a Vietnamese to determine who is from the south and who is from the north by accent. They know immediately where a Vietnamese comes from. So on the basis of that I sent Bundy a memorandum recommending that what we should do to win the conflict in my judgment was to send American military forces to Vietnam. At that point Johnson had not made the decision to send military units. We had a lot of American advisors, but no military units as such. I suggested just off the top of my head about three divisions to establish a barrier along the demilitarized zone between North and South Vietnam and all the way across Laos to Savannakhet on the Mekong River to cut off to the maximum extent possible the infiltration of men and supplies from North Vietnam to South Vietnam -- the Ho Chi Minh Trail. Preventing the North from sending down northerners I thought was increasingly important. I have remained of that judgment ever since: that is, in terms of strategy we, the US, followed the wrong one in trying to apply the attrition strategy which had been successful in World War II in the Vietnam situation. What we were dealing with in the case of Vietnam was what was in effect a sanctuary in North Vietnam. Certainly we bombed them, but we had no intentions of sending ground forces in because of our experience in Korea. So in effect the North Vietnamese had a sanctuary in North Vietnam and in Laos. We bombed the Ho Chi Minh Trail a lot, but you cannot interdict by bombing alone. This may be relevant to Iraq today, I do not know. You have to do it on the ground.

So my strategy was to try to reduce to the maximum extent possible the constant flow of replacements. With an attrition strategy you cannot hope to win it if what you attrite is always being replaced by new men and new equipment and that was what the North Vietnamese did since they were operating from what in effect was essentially a sanctuary.

So as early as '64 I recommended this as the strategy to be followed in the war. Obviously we know that that strategy was never adopted by the United States. There are books published since the war, including one by a four-star general, Bruce Palmer, which indicates that he thinks this kind of strategy should have been followed as well. We also have another Foreign Service officer who recently published a book to this effect -- Norman Hannah. His book is A Key To Failure, I think. The South Vietnamese Chief of Staff, General Cao Van Vien, also recommended this approach. But I don't think it was ever very seriously considered within the United States government. It certainly was never adopted. Maybe I should not say never taken seriously. I think at one point the Joint Chiefs of Staff even suggested this, but it was never adopted by McNamara or President Johnson -- the two men who in my mind are primarily responsible for the outcome of the war in Vietnam for failing to adopt the proper strategy.

Q: However, general American psychology in the long run is what cost us the war.

MENDENHALL: Yes, but if we had adopted this strategy, Tully, we wouldn't have lost American public opinion. As General Palmer said, we would not have had to put in nearly so many in the way of forces and our casualties would have been substantially less. These were the two things that turned around the views of the American public.

Right at the moment we see this factor operating in the case of the war against Iraq. The Administration is following the path of the air war as long as possible because it keeps the casualties down and therefore they don't risk a reversal of public opinion.

Q: Well, does this get you pretty much through...?

MENDENHALL: Let me just say a couple of things. One of the interesting experiences I had during that period was to attend a meeting at the Foreign Minister level of the SEATO Council -- the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, which never began to amount to the same thing that NATO did in Europe and was eventually dissolved. But at that time there were annual meetings at the Foreign Minister level and I attended one at which Mr. Bhutto, then the Foreign Minister of Pakistan, subsequently the Prime Minister and President, was present. Bhutto, though Pakistan was a member of SEATO, was as anti-American in the views that he expressed at that council meeting as anybody I have ever seen. My view of him was formed very much on the basis of how he conducted himself at that meeting. Pakistan's foreign policy, of course, has always been guided in large measure by its view towards India. In more recent years, Afghanistan has played a very important role in determining Pakistan's foreign policy. But then at that time Pakistan was being very cosy with Communist China and therefore Bhutto was very anti-American. Subsequently, when he became Prime Minister some years later, I think he modified those views and moved to a considerable degree towards a pro-American position. I think his daughter now is quite pro-American I understand.

The other thing of some interest which I did as director of regional affairs was related to an Afro-Asian conference. We don't have these any longer today, but in the 60s following the first Afro-Asian conference in Bandung, Indonesia, I think in 1955, there was considerable interest in this. The second Afro-Asian meeting was to be held in Algiers in April or May, 1965. Of course the U.S. would not be attending such a meeting in any official capacity, but I was going as a lobbyist to try to prevent whatever damage I could with respect to our cause in Vietnam.

I had made a swing through the Far East prior to that time talking to friendly governments, officials at foreign offices, about the meeting and urging attendance and doing what we could to hold our position. We knew we would be outvoted as there would be more radicals at that meeting than there would be friendly countries. We were trying to follow a policy of damage limitation as well as we could. I was on my way to the meeting and had arrived in Paris where I had to pick up a plane to Algiers when word came through that there had been a coup d'etat in Algeria and Ben Bella had been overthrown by Boumedienne.

I thought since it looked like the Afro-Asian meeting was going to proceed that the best thing was to go on down and adhere to our damage limitation policy. I got on the telephone to the embassies in Paris of various Far Eastern countries that I had visited to talk to them to urge them to proceed to attend. I was on the telephone with the Thai embassy talking to an official when all of a sudden the Thai Foreign Minister got on the other end, I had met him at the SEATO council meeting earlier, and he talked to me directly about it. He said he was uncertain whether to go and I urged him to go. He agreed to go. We all got down there and I tried to stay in the background as much as possible because it would have been counter productive to put myself forward as the American representative, but we had these friendly countries who would be on the floor of the conference and we would do what we could.

The afternoon for the opening of the meeting arrived. Bill Porter was our ambassador in Algiers at that point. All the ambassadors were invited to the opening ceremony and he said he would take me along to the opening. We arrived at the door. The Algerian officials greeted him, he had credentials to get in, and I started in but was told I was not permitted in. Porter turned to him and said, "But he is my interpreter, I have to have him." Well, Porter was one of the best linguists in the Foreign Service. The Algerians said, "Oh, but Mr. Ambassador you don't...." "Oh, yes I actually do...so you come with me." So he pulled me through and I went right through. The Algerians were looking sort of agape at the way that he got me through. Out of sight of the officials he turned to me and said, "Now you are on your own, I can't take you into the seat." I started down a corridor and another security official challenged me. I had no credentials at all. He said I would have to get out of there. At that moment his attention was diverted so I dived into a loge box and stayed there monitoring. I was right in there where I could see everything. The meeting opened and within five minutes was adjourned by the Algerians and never resumed.

I have never known exactly why the Algerians did that, but from our standpoint it was the best outcome of the meeting, because we couldn't have won if the meeting had proceeded. My friends from other embassies whom I had urged to attend were a little annoyed. They felt their dignity had been compromised by this denouement. No, they were not annoyed with me, they were annoyed with the Algerians. So it turned out all right.

MENDENHALL: Then I came back to Washington and though I had not been very well supported by the Bureau for Far Eastern Affairs, AID fought for me as much as it could. AID asked me to stay on in their organization as the number two man in the Vietnam bureau. In 1967 Lyndon Johnson had insisted that the Vietnam operation in AID be set up as a completely separate bureau equivalent to a continent, equivalent to Asia, Africa, etc. That bureau had rapidly expanded under a very able man, Jim Grant, and had between 400 and 500 employees here in Washington.

When I arrived in the summer of 1968, Lyndon Johnson who had been the instigator of that bureau was on the way out of his presidency, so Bill Gaud, the head of AID, said, "What I want you to concentrate on is cutting the staff of that bureau down substantially. In the course of the year and a half I was with the bureau I succeeded in cutting it in half. That doesn't render one very popular as you well know, Tully, and it wasn't a very easy thing to do because personnel who were about to lose jobs were inclined to get hold of their Congressman and one is involved in a lot of correspondence and discussion with members of Congress over personnel matters. But we did get it cut in half and I was rather gratified by it.

After I had been in the bureau for half a year, Jim Grant, the Assistant Administrator, the head of it, decided to leave the government and go to an important private job and I became his successor as head of the bureau for a year.

It was a very interesting year. You are an old Deputy Assistant Secretary for Congressional relations and one of the few Foreign Service officers I imagine who ever had extensive contact with Congress. My understanding is that besides the Bureau of Congressional Relations and those in the Management Bureau who deal with the budget of the Congress, the normal Foreign Service officer in the Department, even Assistant Secretaries, don't have all that much contact with members of Congress.

Q: Some, particularly in the Economic Bureau.

MENDENHALL: In AID, on the other hand, one is in touch with Congress almost all the time because the key principal function of the AID Bureau is to get money out of Congress.

Q: As I remember you had a delightful Congressman to deal with.

MENDENHALL: We did indeed. As a matter of fact the worst afternoon I think I ever passed in my life was with Congressman Passman of Louisiana who was the chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee dealing with AID appropriation. Passman had been in that chairmanship for about 15 years and knew his way around very extensively. But he had the habit of subjecting the AID people who came up to defend the appropriations request to a third degree harassment with a whole series of minor questions which they couldn't fairly be expected to know the answers to and then trying to ridicule them. He had a staff member who sat beside him and whispered the questions in his ear during the whole process of the hearing. I was up there for the AID appropriations for that year and was on the stand for four hours continuously. At the end of that time I don't think I have ever been so tired in my life. I think I didn't let slip one unguarded answer toward the end on which he pounced to try to show that our AID appropriation at the level we were requesting was not justified. I don't know how much you dealt with Passman.

Q: I saw him but I never faced him.

MENDENHALL: It was the AID people...

Q: There was a Congressman from Maryland who was a problem too about that time as I remember.

MENDENHALL: No, I didn't...Oh, yes, I remember there was one -- Long. He became chairman later. Passman finally got his come uppance. He was put on trial for something in respect to Korea, I can't remember it now, but that ended his political career. I don't even remember what the outcome of the trial was, but it ended a long congressional career.

The other man who gave me a certain amount of grief was also from Louisiana and that was Senator Ellender, Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee. I remember he harassed me at one point during an open, public hearing to the point where my middle daughter, then about 14 or 15 and sitting in the audience, got up and shook her fists at Senator Ellender saying, "You can't treat my daddy this way."

I would like to talk a bit about an interesting encounter with Senator Packwood from Oregon who was then a freshman Senator and is now the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee. In 1968, Jim Grant, the Assistant Administrator of the Vietnam Bureau, before he left had driven through the U.S. government a policy decision in favor of the initiation of a drastic land reform program in South Vietnam. He even insisted in getting the signature on the cable of Henry Kissinger who was then the National Security Advisor. Everybody approved and that became the official policy of the U.S. government.

I was all in favor of it. I did think it was important that farmers buy the land and not be given it on a grant basis because my experience in Laos was that when we in the Aid Mission did anything completely on a grant basis for rural villagers they regarded it as "the American project" and not theirs and if the communists came along wouldn't raise a hand in defense of it. On the other hand, if one involved the villagers, say in the construction of the school they provided all the labor on a self-help basis and we provided the materials, they had a real interest in that school because they had put something into it and would defend it against the communists.

So I felt that in South Vietnam it was important for the farmers to have a personal stake in the land reform program by having paid at least something for the land they got.

This position that I held became known fairly widely in the government when I became the head of the Vietnam Bureau in 1969 and one good day Senator Packwood summoned the AID Administrator and myself to his office on the Hill and read the riot act to us as though I was completely opposed to the land reform program. I endeavored to explain my position but it is sometimes a little difficult to get some things across when a preconceived idea gets into the head of a man up on the Hill. Packwood had by his side a professor from the State of Washington who was known as a man who thought that the total key to victory in South Vietnam and the war was land reform. Nothing else mattered. Land reform would give us the victory. He was the man who was feeding ideas into Packwood's head.

Later the chief Agricultural Credit official from South Vietnam came to Washington on a visit and I arranged for a luncheon on the eighth floor of the State Department for him and invited Senator Packwood to attend the luncheon. I thought I would try to demonstrate to him that my heart was in the right place; that I was supporting agricultural development in every way possible in South Vietnam. Unfortunately during this luncheon it became clear that the Vietnamese director of agricultural credit was not particularly in favor of the land reform program. So this whole effort of mine boomeranged with Packwood. I came out worse than I was before I went in as far as he was concerned.

Later the professor from the State of Washington who had been with Packwood when the AID Administrator and I had been in his office and subjected to his third degree, published an article in the Seattle Post Intelligencer which was front page banner headline attacking me personally for opposition to the land reform program in Vietnam. When this was brought to my attention I sent out a letter in response to the article. The newspaper did indeed publish the letter which explained my position but then published a retort of the professor's side by side, which further confirmed that in a battle with the press you can never really win because they always have the last word, simply because of the nature of the media.

Another congressional experience which I think may be worth recording was one with Senator Ted Kennedy who was the Chairman of the Refugee Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. Kennedy had manifested very great interest in the refugee program in Vietnam, much of it I think for his own political reasons. He decided in March, 1969 that he would conduct public hearings on that program. The AID Administrator and I were summoned up to testify. To open the hearings, somewhat to my surprise and annoyance, Senator Kennedy read out the conclusions of the hearings before they actually opened. Why? Because the press was there for the opening of the hearings and would not be there later during the continued sessions. So his conclusions had already been given to the public before he even listened to us. That has, I think, rather influenced my views of Senator Kennedy over the years.

The other man with whom I had a certain amount of experience over the years is one whom I know you have a different regard for from mine, Tully. That is Senator Claiborne Pell. I met Senator Pell in the summer of 1968 over dinner at a club here in Washington and at that dinner he and I got involved in a rather heated exchange over the war in Vietnam. He was a dove and I was a hawk. I didn't think much more about that until I learned toward the end of 1969 that Pell had made it clear to Bill Macomber, the Under Secretary for Management in the Department, that he would oppose me for nomination to any significant position in East Asia or indeed elsewhere if it involved anything of any importance. And that explained to me why the year I was head of the Vietnam Bureau in AID I was always Acting and never named officially and my name submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I had never thought very much about it. I had as full authority Acting as I would have had with Senate confirmation and I had developed excellent rapport with AID people -- indeed when I left at the end of that year I was given a very fine sendoff from the AID Administrator and my colleagues as Assistant Administrators. But that did explain why I had never been formally nominated and confirmed.

Q: He must have learned all that from Fulbright who used those tactics.

MENDENHALL: To me, Pell is a reverse McCarthyite, the way he pursued me, the way Javert pursued Jean Valjean in "Les Miserables."

At the end of 1969 the Administration decided to nominate a Republican as the Assistant Administrator for Vietnam. I decided it was time anyway for me to come back to the Department. I had been four and a half years on loan to AID which was, from a career standpoint, long enough. I enjoyed it, learned a great deal and look back upon it as one of the highlights of my career. The Inspector General, Fraser Wilkins, asked me whether I would take on an inspection job and I agreed to do so. Interestingly, I indicated some interest in going to Italy -- there was to be an inspection in Italy in early 1970. When Fraser got the assignments worked out whom do you think he called to say that he was giving us Italy -- not me, but my wife. He knew that my wife was especially interested in going to Italy.

CECIL S. RICHARDSON
Political Officer/Staff Aide
Saigon (1959-1961)

Cecil Richardson was born in New York in 1926, and graduated from Queen's College. He served in the US Army from 1944 to 1947, and overseas from 1951 to 1952. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he was stationed in Dakar, Saigon, Lagos, Niamey, Paris, Accra, Brussels, Quito, Tehran, Lima, St. Paolo and Bahamas. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 5, 2003.

Q: Southeast Asia.

RICHARDSON: Southeast Asia. I went to Saigon, which delighted me. That was a good time to be there. The French war was over a couple of years and the American War had not yet started. It was a war alright. It was a Vietnamese War, but this was the period when they were developing the plan, how to win the hearts and minds of the people and send in the Green Berets and small groups to give medical attention and this and that. That was when that was going on. So that was an interesting time.

Q: So you were there from ... ?

RICHARDSON: '59 to '61.

Q: What was your job?

RICHARDSON: I was the political section.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

RICHARDSON: Elbridge Durbrow.

Q: You went back, he was an old China hand, wasn't he?

RICHARDSON: No, no. He ... where would he have been before? I don't know, but I don't think he had had any previous experience in that area.

Q: No, maybe not.

RICHARDSON: And then he was soured by old things.

Q: How, what was the situation in Vietnam when you arrived, we're talking about South Vietnam.

RICHARDSON: Well, we were solidly in support of Ngo Dinh Diem.

Q: Was there ...

RICHARDSON: We were not yet, not yet disillusioned with him as happened later on in the Kennedy Administration.

Q: Well, were they still talking about Diem being Arguit the Abonese Magsaysay, and all?

RICHARDSON: Well, that, if no one ever said it in my presence, but certainly he was our man. He was Syngman Rhee. He was Magsaysay. He was our choice. After he was, what in a convent, or a monastery in the States when they anointed him.

Q: What, where'd you live and how was life there?

RICHARDSON: I lived in an apartment. The first place I had was a completely air conditioned apartment and it was dark. Then there was an opportunity to move to the top floor of a small apartment building that wasn't air conditioned at all but it was so bright and cheerful so my wife and I moved there and enjoyed it. Yes, we really enjoyed Vietnam. We traveled all over the country north of Saigon. One time, I put something like 2,000 miles on that car, on the Volkswagen and it's such a little country I can't figure out how I got that many miles on it.

[Laughter]. And the people are hard working. They're cultured, I mean in terms of their own culture and of course they absorb the French culture and so for most and the food was ...

Q: When you get French and Vietnamese food, you couldn't ask for two nicer cuisines.

RICHARDSON: No, no. So we enjoyed that very much and it was a good time because as I said the French War was over and the American one had not begun.

Q: Who was the head of the Political Section?

RICHARDSON: Joe Mendenhall. I think later Ambassador in Madagascar, I think. I know that he went from Saigon to head up the AID mission to Laos, at a time when it was a very big operation.

Q: What piece of the action were you given in the political section?

RICHARDSON: You call "dog's body." The one thing that I had that I did all the time was in North, was a weekly report on North Vietnam. Now, where did I get that information from? Very often I got it from people who'd been there. They had the international commission.

Q: I see ...

RICHARDSON: These are Canadians and Indians.

Q: Yes, but Canadians, Indians and Polish.

RICHARDSON: Well, the Poles, we didn't have much luck with them but the Indians and the Canadians, we were able to ...

Q: And they traveled back and forth.

RICHARDSON: And I would include stuff that I'd been given from the political section that they'd picked up, a lot from the agency people.

Q: Well, how, was the CIA outfit the station, or a substantial station?

RICHARDSON: Yes. I would say that in my 35 years service, the best relations that I've ever experienced in my time. When I arrived, Nick Natsios was the head of the office and he took me around his shop to meet his people and you know there were no new barriers. And he was followed by Bill Colby, later Agency director. My wife and Mrs. Colby still see each other. So there were excellent relationships between political and the agency. As a matter of fact, they even called on me once because they wanted some cover. They wanted to make contact with a Pole and he played bridge so I invited him over to play bridge and the fourth was the guy who wanted to meet him. And when we left Saigon, Mrs. Colby gave a big tea for my wife. This produced a lot of question within the embassy, "Why is Mrs. Colby giving your wife a tea party?" Because they got along well, but it had nothing to do with Bill and me. Later, a few years later, sort of a happen stance, we traveled from Europe to the States on the same ship so we've had lots of contact, but if you go back to the professional part of it, I've never had or seen better and closer integration of effort and activity.

Q: Well, what were you seeing up in North Vietnam at the time?

RICHARDSON: Who were we seeing?

Q: What were you seeing developments up there?

RICHARDSON: There was activity in agriculture collectivization and efforts to keep people from fleeing south.

Q: Did you have much contact with Vietnamese, South Vietnamese?

RICHARDSON: Yes. Matter of fact, I'd go out one weekend, yes I had Vietnamese to my home all the time. Very often they'd turn up without their wives and a bunch of flowers, but still they came. And I'm glad our relations with French too, who are still there. There was this colonel who headed up the brewery there. 33 is the brand. Another was a doctor who lived right opposite the presidential palace. Oh, and there were French there with whom we had very good relations. One amusing thing, I don't know if you think, we just talk, I was at dinner one night and I met an absolutely charming Frenchmen, delightful fellow. And his name was Oquinel. It sounded like something that you eat. At the end of the evening, we exchanged cards. His name was Raymond O'Connell. His father or grandfather was some Irish adventurer who ended up in Indochina in the 19th century.

Q: Well, did you get out and talk to the French on the plantations and all that?

RICHARDSON: Yes, but we had a better informant for that. I did spend one weekend up with the French at a rubber plantation, but we had a secretary, Larry Pat Hughs who was up there every weekend.

Q: Was the American presence sort of overpowering at that time or very small?

RICHARDSON: No, but they were there. My guess is there were probably as many as 1,900 U.S. Military, but I can't speak with any exactness about the figure. This is the impression I have from that period, there may have been as many as 1,900. No combat units. It was definitely a highly desirable assignment for the Military at that time because this was the only war going on and they would come out to get their cards punched.

Q: How about, were the French Military around?

RICHARDSON: No, no. The French had even given up training the Vietnamese Army in 1954. They turned that over to the U.S. a couple of years earlier. When was Dien Bien Phu? 1954?

Q: Ah, '54, I think.

RICHARDSON: And so, in fact, I think in '56 they turned over responsibility for training the Vietnamese Army. to the U.S. so the French Military were there maybe only as attaches.

Q: Did, how about, did you have many, much communication with the Chinese community and so on in other places?

RICHARDSON: No, no.

Q: How about ... ?

RICHARDSON: With them, there would be mostly a language problem. I don't know how good their French was. So one night, I was astounded, when it was very late, 11:00 at night and some, for some reason I think it was, my wife and I in Chalon, eating, why we'd be eating that late, I don't know, but we got into conversation with the waiter who spoke very good English. And so we asked him some questions about that, and do you know where he learned his English? From a Chinese teacher of English. [Laughter]. His accent was good. But, that's as I say that's the only serious conversation I've ever had with a Chinese.

Q: How about your days going down to the Delta and often times to the Highlands?

RICHARDSON: Highlands, I would, North of Saigon we went everywhere up to the DMZ. That's where I had my Volkswagen bug.

Q: You had what?

RICHARDSON: My Volkswagen bug, the car.

Q: Oh, yes.

RICHARDSON: But the Delta was out.

Q: Why was that?

RICHARDSON: Because guerilla activities had picked up. When I first arrived, Tom Barnes and I talked about using public transportation and going down to the Camau Peninsula, to the Delta, to see the country, but we didn't. Before we could put that into operation, within 6 months there was so much guerrilla activity that we could never get permission to go down there so we ended up going North to go hiking in the Highlands. On another occasion I traveled to the North and back. Up along the coast and back through the highlands.

Q: Do we have anything on Da Nang?

RICHARDSON: You mean as a consulate?

Q: No.

RICHARDSON: No we had only Hue. Da Nang was military.

Q: Was there any sort of North-South, I'm talking about difference within the political spectrum between North and South Vietnam and Southern-South Vietnam?

RICHARDSON: Well, of course, you had the Northerners who had escaped from the North, but they had moved South and they were predominantly Catholic so you had a difference there. Both of geography and of religion. And you had more political opposition that probably came from Buddhists or types that didn't have any particular religious affiliation, but the government was not very tolerant of them, tolerant of opposition.

Q: Yes. Were they having that battle, I can't remember, between I can't think of the name right now, it was sort of a sect, a religious sect?

RICHARDSON: Bao Dai. Yes.

Q: Yes.

RICHARDSON: Yes, but there were guys who ran the whorehouse.

Q: Yes, I mean ...

RICHARDSON: That was a gang.

Q: It was a gang essentially.

RICHARDSON: Yes, well he squashed that before I arrived. What were they called, I've forgotten?

Q: I'd say Wha Wha or something like that.

RICHARDSON: Hwa Hao.

Q: Hwa Hao, something like that.

RICHARDSON: Yes, yes. No, that was, that gang, but there were two of them: Wha Hao was one, which we're calling Wha How and then there was another one, they were Hoods, I think. And they were operating the whore houses, they had that kind of activity and it was also a threat to law and order, but while I was there, there was an attempt by some army unit to overthrow the government and that was in November, I know it was November 11th because that's the Marine Corps birthday is. So it was November 11th, the night of the 11th/12th.

That coup attempt lasted the entire weekend. After the Marine Corps birthday reception Friday night, there was no ball due to security concerns. My wife and I went to an after-hours club where we fell in with a bunch of Canadians and Political Section secretary Mary Pat Hughes. We got home about 2:00 after dropping off Mary Pat. As I was putting the car in the garage, heavy gunfire broke out nearby with tracers passing over the house so thick it looked like a lighted path in the sky. Along the way I found Mary Pat on the street curious about what was going on. She jumped in with me confident that a secretary would be useful. And she was. Other than communicators and Marine guards we were the only staff at the embassy until Sunday afternoon. The ambassador had set up a command post at the residence where he was getting reports from our people on the street. He dictated cables to Mary Pat and I signed off for transmission. On Sunday afternoon a couple of us were going out to the top floor balcony when we stopped because of nearby gunfire. The fellow immediately in front of me spun around and was pressed against my chest. Just then he caught a bullet in the back. He was other agency with a sense of humor. Reaching around to his wound he complained "someone has put a hole in my cloak." He survived.

Mary Pat certainly deserved an award for her work, initiative, and devotion to the job, but I don't know if she ever got one.

Q: I think November 10th, as I recall.

RICHARDSON: Okay, that night. That would have been '60. Colby was already there so it must have been '60 because one of our junior officers, John Helble, distinguished himself by reporting by telephone from the balcony of the Colby house overlooking the presidential palace and was able to give the ambassador a blow by blow report. Well, have we talked long enough?

Q: Well, no. I'm thinking in terms of, I want, I'd like to finish up the Saigon bit and then we can stop. How about, did we have much contact with say the Buddhists. I assume we had relatively good contact with the Catholics and all.

RICHARDSON: With the Buddhists as Buddhists?

Q: Yes.

RICHARDSON: I don't know. I'm not aware of it in the political section, but I would, I think I have to assume that this would have been something the intelligence agencies would have been doing because the political section, the embassy as the embassy would have been very much concerned about alienating Diem by being seen to cultivate his enemy so I think that ... they would have to leave that to the intelligence people.

Q: How about, did you run across the news, I was thinking Madame Ngu of course and her husband which was, who was it Tim's brother.

RICHARDSON: No, I didn't. No, what's his name? Nhu.

Q: Well, anyway ...

RICHARDSON: Nhu.

Q: Yes. Were they figures when you were there?

RICHARDSON: Oh, very much so. We regarded Nhu as the principle advisor and confidante of his brother. The one person he trusted. And, remember, he had ambitions and evidently had real influence, this was the impression we had. She was a power to be reckoned with ... a very strong personality and she still is I think.

Q: Yes. Well, were there any attacks on the embassy or ... ?

Q: Yes the bomb went off right in front of it.

RICHARDSON: Yes and there were, there was a bomb of sorts thrown over the wall at one of my colleagues, I think he was USAID. I don't think anybody was injured, but there was concern, but not, if, there wasn't so serious a situation that I couldn't get permission to drive all over the country except down South.

Q: Well, then maybe this is a good place to stop?

RICHARDSON: Except, do you want to finish Saigon?

Q: Yes.

RICHARDSON: LBJ was coming out as Vice President.

Q: Well wait, he wouldn't have, he didn't come in until '61.

RICHARDSON: As Vice President.

Q: Yes, I mean Kennedy was elected in '60 and they came in '61 and you were still there?

RICHARDSON: Yes.

Q: You were there from '59 to '61.

RICHARDSON: Yes, now so LBJ is coming. Of course this is a big deal so they get us all together and I had not had too high of an opinion of the Admin. Counselor, but when I saw how he organized this big deal that was coming up ... my esteem for him went up considerably. Well, my job was to organize a reception, guest list of about 600 people and by then I had left the political section, I was staff aid.

Q: For Nolting?

RICHARDSON: For Nolting.

Q: Ambassador Nolting.

RICHARDSON: Yes, yes. Durbrow had just left. He wouldn't let me leave until he left. So I get out a guest list and did what everyone has to do to organize a big affair and the morning of the affair, I boarded a ship going out to the South China Sea. [Laughter]. At 6:00 when the first guest was due to arrive, I was just clearing the river going past Vung Tau with tears in my eyes, into the South China Sea. So, it's the only time I'd really run away from my responsibility.

Q: Yes, that's probably a good one to get away with. I think when the Kennedy's, Jack and Bobby, sent Lyndon Johnson out to get him out of town more than anything else.

RICHARDSON: Yes. But I was very saddened to leave. I'd had such a good time, I had become so attached to the country that I literally stood in the stern of that ship as we went past Cape St. Jacques and tears were rolling down my face. I went back there just a couple of years ago as a tourist and got to Hanoi which of course I couldn't have gotten to except as a prisoner in those days.

Q: okay. We were able to, when did that bombing of that waterside restaurant, The Barge, did that happen while you were there.

RICHARDSON: I don't think so. I don't remember, I think I would remember that. Oh, but one thing I do want to include on this note is for several years after I left, '61, I tried to get back to Saigon and I did until the number of troops in the country reached the figure of 100,000. Then I stopped asking to go back because it was no longer a Vietnamese War that I could support, it had become an American War which I could not personally support and so that- (end of tape)

Q: In 1961 where did you go?

RICHARDSON: I went back to West Africa. I went to Lagos, Nigeria.

Q: Alright, we'll pick it up next time then. Did you say at one point you went hiking with your wife and what did you do?

RICHARDSON: No, no this was with Tom Barnes.

Q: Tom Barnes.

RICHARDSON: Tom Barnes, when we decided, it was decided for us that we couldn't go through the Delta and the peninsula by public transportation as we had hoped because of the guerrilla activity so we went North into the Hill country and drove the Volkswagen up the footpath to a Montagnard village where we left the car, hired some people to carry our equipment, because we were going to be camping to the next village and we worked our way around the hills for about a week and made a circle and got back to the Volkswagen and this was my only real contact with the people other than the lowland Vietnamese and they couldn't have been more gracious and accepting.

Q: Did you get any feel for the division between the lowland Vietnamese and the Montagnards?

RICHARDSON: Not when I was traveling there because we had a Vietnamese armed guard with us, but he was very, he was courteous and circumspect in his duties, but everything else we heard was that the lowlanders, the Vietnamese were contemptuous of the “primitives” in the hills. We found them gracious and very, very open. Now we’re up in the hills and the streams there are pretty cold. When we would come to a stream, our porters would get a bar of soap and take off their clothes and jump into the water. [Laughter]. And so Tom and I got into the habit and we took off our clothes and jumped in after them which was just as well because that was the only occasion we had to bathe.

Q: At that point had we put special forces in?

RICHARDSON: No, no, no. We were talking. The embassy staff were working on the anti-insurgency plan. That was in development while I was there in my last 6 months or so and everybody was contributing to it actually. Hansbacker of USIA had an important input and everybody got a piece of that one. And that was the anti-insurgency plan which involved bringing the green berets in for medical assistance and things like that, to win the hearts and minds.

BEN FRANKLIN DIXON
Political Officer
Thailand (1959-1962)

Ben Franklin Dixon was born in North Carolina in 1918. He joined the State Department in 1945 as a civil servant, dealing with Near Eastern and Greek matters. Joining the Foreign Service in 1956, he served in Morocco, Thailand, Pakistan, and Washington, DC. In Thailand, he dealt with Vietnamese matters.

Q: Did the early stages of our involvement in Vietnam play much of a role in what you were doing at that time?

DIXON: Yes. I was up and down in Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam quite a bit, as well as Australia, Indonesia, and Singapore, about various and sundry things. I figured, you know, what could we do to try to bring Vietnam on our side? We had this Mekong development. And, you know, we at that time were trying to have peace with the North Vietnamese. The war had not gotten to the stage that it later got onto, and it was still possible to do something about this.

I therefore wrote a dispatch recommending certain projects, which the North Vietnamese obviously couldn't participate in the Mekong thing, and suggested that we use these things as bait to try to interest them and join the Mekong, stopping the war in effect.

President Johnson used this basic idea in a speech at a college to propose this. But the Vietnamese would have nothing to do with it.

The other thing was that I knew the president of Vietnam. Also, there was the guy, Wolf Vladijinsky, who was...

Q: He was the very famous advisor both in Vietnam and in Japan, too.

DIXON: Yes. I was up in Laos on special duty when the incursion came in from the north. Wolf was there then, I got to know him. And he got to telling me about how bad things were with Diem and his family and all of those secret organizations and so forth. Later, while I was in Vietnam, he introduced me to Diem. And I got into the conversation, saying, in effect, you know you ought to get rid of Madame Nhu.

Q: Diem was the president, and Madame Nhu was his sister-in-law.

DIXON: Yes. And I had occasion a couple of times after that to talk to him about it. He clearly was aware that it was a liability to him, but, on the other hand, he apparently seemed to think that all this organization and so forth that they had was really important to his support. There wasn't much I contributed to that.

There was some resentment against Diem. There was a rumor at an ECAFE conference that Diem had been deposed. The Vietnamese ambassador rushed over to me and said, "What is this? Have you heard?"

I said, "I don't know, I can go over to the embassy and find out if there's anything."

And I went down and found it wasn't true.

But they didn't know what the hell to do. They heard that somebody else was taking power. You know, they wanted to be on the right side. And a great, great to-do.

And finally, when we got this thing straightened out, he acted as though nothing had happened, but I think he was getting ready to try to throw his weight on the other side.

I went down on an inspection of the Mekong, and we went down to look at something in Can Tho. There was of course fighting in there, but it wasn't very great.

Q: This is in the Mekong Delta, Can Tho.

DIXON: Yes, and we took a look at this thing. We were riding in Jeeps, and there was an Army truck with some soldiers in it that sort of went with us. It was an area where there wasn't any fighting to speak of. But on the way back, somebody started firing, and they stopped that big truck. The driver said, you know, it made him nervous to sit there. And I said, "Well, I agree with you. I was in the Marine Corps, you don't ever let yourself get caught while you're just sitting like a duck somewhere. Either let's go back or let's go in to Can Tho." So we just drove around that big truck -- with some difficulty, they didn't want us to, but we went on into town. They didn't get out of there for hours after that. But they sat there, of all stupid things. That was my only encounter with that down there.

While I was there, this incursion into Laos came. The Pathet Lao had come into the north there. They needed people up there and I went up. John Holt, who had inspected me in Rabat and thought very highly of my work, asked that I be assigned up there. And I stayed up there nine months. I drove back and forth to ECAFE things, and then went back when things were quiet.

But I did two things there. One was that we borrowed the United Nations mission to take a look and see what was going on. I had worked with UNSCOB on Greece, when I was the assistant Greek desk officer.

Q: What was this?

DIXON: United Nations Commission on the Balkans. And I knew generally how it was organized, so I explained to them, and we did the basic preparations to set up for a mission there. A guy named Jilliard, I think, who was from the U.N., finally came out there. But he didn't know much about this either.

We also had to see about getting aircraft that could get people up to that high level up there where this thing was going on. And I got the Naval attaché and we talked to the people in the Navy channel to sort of figure out what sort of plane we could use to go up there. We finally found the only kind of plane we could use. Helicopters wouldn't do very well. But the landing place there was in the shape of a "U" cut out of a mountain. And you had to come in, turn around, and land on a very short strip. So that you could not get more than about two or three planes in at a time. The only plane we could use was a Canadian plane named something like a duck or something like that.

Q: An Otter, I think. There's a Canadian plane called an Otter.

DIXON: Otter, yes. And you could only take a few people up there.

When we were organizing for this, the minister of defense asked that I come out and talk to him. I went in there and sat down and expected him to ask me a question. And he said, finally, "Well, what do we do?" And I explained to him how UNSCOB had been organized and what we ought to do, and that we ought to send people up there to take a look around, we ought to interview people and explain how the mission should work. And generally I worked on...

When the mission came, we had a great guy, a Japanese who was on the mission, who had been Mariel's handler in Istanbul during World War II. But he was an active guy and got out and did things. The son of the president of Tunisia was there, but we couldn't get him to do anything.

Q: Bourguiba.

DIXON: Bourguiba, Jr., yes. They were the two outstanding ones -- Bourguiba for not doing anything, and this Japanese, whose name I don't remember right now, who was very good and very active.

Anyway, they went up. We got the aircraft in and everything worked fine. And they did the interviewing and finally got up a pretty good report on it.

The other thing that I got involved with there was, there were two Gudden brothers who had an airplane, who rented their plane and flew commercial missions for people. They had been down to...I've forgotten where they'd gone to, but they had stopped, because they were low on gas, at a field they saw in Indonesia. Well, they landed there, and it was the CIA field that they were trying to build up, or outfit, to get rid of Sukarno. They had a terrible time with the Indonesians and, I guess, the CIA getting out of there.

But they finally got out, and they got up as far as Laos and they ran out of money. They got a contract with a local guy, hauling something from Cambodia somewhere. They were just bags of things. They finally realized they were hauling opium. They refused to do it anymore. Don Corli, who was a Corsican living in Laos and running dope out of there, took over the planes. I went down to the Lao government and told them to give the planes back to the owners. And, after long representation, they finally did.

This Don Corli, however, was still doing a lot of things, and they were trying to find out who the hell was supporting this thing.

The Lao ambassador to India came there, went down to the Banc D'Indochine (the French Indochinese Bank), and did some transactions. I talked one night to somebody, and I was asking about him. Something made me think that he was somehow involved in this. So I went down to the Banc D'Indochine and talked to some people there. And I found out that the Indian ambassador was sponsoring Don Corli and that he, of course, was very closely tied in with the prime minister.

This absolutely sent Horace Smith, who was the ambassador, wild, because he [the prime minister or the ambassador?] was the principal supporter of the Indian ambassador and apparently must be getting some rake-off from this thing that Don Corli was doing. And that explained why we had so much trouble in trying to get this thing straightened out. It was very interesting. But the CIA had been unable to find anything about it. And I guess it was just by accident, in talking to one of these Laos who said something that gave me the idea that he might be tied-in to the problem. And I must say that, for bankers, I was surprised they would tell me as much as they would tell about him.

JAMES HOWE

Program Officer, International Cooperation Administration (predecessor to USAID)
City Unspecified, Vietnam (1959-1962)

James Howe was born and raised on a farm in Gage County, Nebraska. After spending two years in a small teacher's college, he transferred to the University of Nebraska, where he majored in foreign affairs. He received a degree in public administration from Harvard. He has also served in Brazil. He was interviewed by Sam Butterfield on April 24, 1997.

HOWE: In 1955, I took a job with ICA (as AID was called then), in the Central Planning Office, which we called "DDP," (Deputy Director for Program or for Planning). DDP put together the programs to be requested of the Congress each year and did other kinds of planning work. One example comes to mind that was interesting. It was probably in about 1956 or 57. We had a new Director, a businessman from Colorado who knew little about foreign matters. Someone called to his attention that the US had collected billions of dollars of foreign currencies as a part of the deal we made with host countries when we sold them surplus agricultural products (PL 480). He conceived the idea that, with these billions, we could meet the needs of the developing countries without asking Congress for fresh appropriations. So he invited three businessmen to come to Washington for a month or two to look into the matter and advise him. I don't remember all of their names. One was Bill Bristol of Bristol-Myers. Another was Strauss, head of an investment company in NYC and the third man I don't remember. My job was to squire them around town to all of the relevant experts so that they could gather the facts and come up with a report. They were very enthusiastic when they got the basic facts about the great volume of foreign currency "owned" by the US and set off with great relish to save the taxpayer the burden of funding the foreign aid effort. I tried to quell their enthusiasm by pointing out that: a) money is not a resource; it is a claim on resources; b) this money was only "ours" on condition that we use it in the country (with some small exceptions) and that we use it with their permission. Since what they needed from the US was not a claim on their local resources, but actual imported resources (either imports of goods or of technicians and other services), there was really no way (with small exceptions) to use the local currencies to substitute for these resources. Bill Bristol saw the point right away. The others took a month or two longer to give up the hope of using the currencies to alleviate the US budget burden. I wrote the first several drafts of their report and, with some compromises and considerable disappointment, they accepted it. This was a fun project. I stayed with DDP until 1959, when I took a job overseas in Vietnam as the program officer. It was the program officer who put together the annual program for each year. It also had the training program assigned to it. This sort of cut my eye teeth on what we do overseas because Vietnam was a big program - 230 or 240 million dollars, as I recall in those days, a big part of which was the program to import commercial products to be sold on the market in Vietnam to generate a local currency to be used to support the military effort. I remember that I got into a difference of view with the military because it was very clear that we were importing more than our need for local currency. The reason I said that was because we used an exchange rate, if I remember correctly, of 35 piasters to a dollar. All other markets were '70s and '80s and the black market was over 100. But for us, it was 35. Why? Because we had agreed to it. Now, what did they do with the dollars? The folks who imported goods with them were able to sell the commodities and what did they do with the local currency? They converted some of it into dollars. Their third largest export after rice and rubber was of US dollars to Geneva and such places to put it in bank accounts. We could have had the same effect, I remember arguing, if we had just changed the exchange rate to 70 or 78 or so. We still could have generated the local currency that they needed at half of the cost to us. But that idea didn't sell well in those days. This was an aid program totally dominated by the military effort that we were slipping into.

So, I stayed there for a couple of years. Other formative things or major events that loom? I did become exposed to the different view that one takes in the field from what one takes in Washington. I remember feeling desperately the need for AID in Washington to rotate their people out to the field so that they would have that point of view. Some of the views in Washington, I thought, were terribly unrealistic. That was a thought which grew in my mind in the subsequent assignments, both in Washington and overseas, this wide gap between the world view from the field and the world view from Washington. You'll hear more of that, I'm sure, as we talk on.

Q: I recall a comment you made to me once about technical assistance. You said all the planning was fine, but the thing that really mattered was whether you had a highly competent advisor on the technical assistance side.

HOWE: Yes, that really was the critical thing. Most of our planning went into our files and I don't think there was a large transfer of knowledge from that to the host country. Of course, that was the purpose of technical assistance, the transfer of knowledge, and the host country didn't pay an awful lot of attention to the paperwork side.

Q: Were there any people there or any individuals, US or other, that you recall with particular favor or interest?

HOWE: Well, there was Hanging Sam Williams, who ran the MAAG, the Military Advisory Assistance Program. He used to say, "When I look into the morning and I am shaving myself, I say to myself, 'You're going to meet General Giap (the military chief of Vietnam). You're going to meet him on the field of battle. You're going to meet him on a field of battle with tanks and planes and all those things. You're going to have to take him.'" This showed how completely General Williams misunderstood his assignment. But I have other, better impressions than that, like Ambassador Durbrow, who was a great guy, and Arthur Gardner, who was our Mission Director there, and a variety of people. One doctor, Doctor Boyton, who was from Maine, put together a list of pharmaceuticals which, taken together, couldn't do any harm, but were designed to treat some of the more common ailments. He would give them to his barefoot doctors. They would go out on the trail. He taught them the rudiments of how to diagnose these very common disorders and how to treat them. I thought that was very effective. It didn't have any long-term, lasting thing, but it certainly served a very acute humanitarian need at the time.

Q: You remembered something which I thought was very important to get into the record because of its singularly personal impact. So, without further ado, we will rewind to Vietnam and when you were there in your first overseas assignment.

HOWE: One of the places that we had in Vietnam was a pretty decent golf course about four or five miles out of the city. I would go there on Saturdays and play golf. One day, we were playing golf. We had played the first nine holes and then, as was traditional, being hot weather and all, we would go into the little clubhouse there and drink an orange soda or something to quench our thirst and visit the men's room and go back out and go on with our golf. Well, we had gone through that ritual and we were standing on the ninth tee, which was about 80 or 90 yards from the clubhouse when the clubhouse blew up, right straight up in the air it blew. It turned out that some little guy was hired by the Viet Cong to go down and put a plastique bomb under the men's urinal. Then he had left. So, in the aid program for a couple of days after that, people go around asking other people, "Did you hear how far Jim Howe was from the plastique bomb?" They would respond with a gesture, "About this far. No, about that far."

While we're on the subject of personal danger, I didn't have any intense personal danger, but another episode-

Q: That was very close.

HOWE: That was a close one. We had four kids there, little bitty ones, and we had taught them that, in the event of any gunfire, they were to hit the ground quickly. Well, there was the attempted coup against the president, Ngo Diem Dinh. There was a lot of gunfiring near our house and we were up the bedroom, Carol and I. We raced downstairs and here were our kids, all flat on the floor, just as they had been told. One of them was on the stairway and he had dropped right there on the stairway, as he had been told. That was an interesting episode, too.

Q: Indeed. They had learned their lessons well.

HOWE: They had learned their lessons well.

Still on Vietnam and the personal danger sort of thing, we did lose a number of people. We lost one of our malaria technicians, who had been shot by the Viet Cong.

GEORGE F. BOGARDUS
Economic Officer
Saigon (1959-1963)

George F. Bogardus was born in Iowa in 1917 and graduated from Harvard University in 1939. He served in the US Army during 1941 and joined the Foreign Service in 1941 and his first assignment was Montreal, Canada. His overseas posts included Canada, Kenya, Czechoslovakia, Algeria, Germany, and Vietnam. He was interviewed on April 10th, 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: How about Vietnam?

BOGARDUS: Oh, sure. When the Tet Offensive occurred, they were very keen to talk with me about the exact situation, where things were and so forth within Saigon because our installations were being attacked. Saigon is where we also became very close with the William E. Colby family. There were two coups d'etat attempted while we were there. During the first one, they took refuge with us.

Q: That was earlier, wasn't it?

BOGARDUS: Earlier than what?

Q: I'm just trying to keep this somewhat chronological. We've already talked about Vietnam.

BOGARDUS: We arrived in Vietnam in January of 1959. We stayed there with home leave interruption until July of '63.

Q: Have we talked about Vietnam?

BOGARDUS: No, we have not.

Q: Why don't we start with Vietnam then? Somehow, we've jumped up to '67 and I want to get back.

BOGARDUS: I do want to just make another point about service in Stuttgart. We had been there in Vietnam when we were not allowed to have more than 863 individual military personnel conducting training. It gradually went up. Finally, they had changed to General Harkins with a big command -- MACV it was. That changed everything. We Americans in Vietnam were front paged. With that background, having been there for four and a half years with the embassy, even though my work there was almost all with the USOM (in other words, economic development), I had a lot of local knowledge of people and events and the way things went there. I felt in Stuttgart that, in response to the embassy and the USIA, I should give lectures before university students in Germany on behalf of justifying our cause in Vietnam. I did it, both in Stuttgart Institute of Technology, and at the University of Freiburg, the University of Tübingen, the University of Heidelberg, the University of Bremen, the University of Hamburg, and a couple of weekend seminars with supposed leaders of public opinion. It wasn't very easy to do that auf Deutsche. Fortunately, the German students were not very pugnacious.

Q: The earlier era, yes.

BOGARDUS: Remember, the American military forces were defending Germany at that point. When they asked, "Why did you go in there?" "Well, we were invited in." But the ones who did cause trouble were the Greek students and the Iranis and the Turks who were studying in the German universities at that point. They were really pugnacious. But I was able to tell them what was true. They nearly all were Marxists, thought of economic determinism and so forth, so I'd say, "Well, it wasn't colonial at all." I remember very well (and this was the truth) Ambassador Nolting came back on a very hot afternoon at the end of a day to a staff meeting in the embassy. He said, "You know, I was sitting there for hours having tea with President Ngo Dinh Diem and his brother, Ngo Diem Nhu and so forth, and arguing and debating and talking. At one point, the brother, Ngo Diem Nhu, turned to me and said, 'You Americans need us more than we need you.'" That really threw these Marxist students because it was the God's truth. It completely refuted any colonialist Marxist ideas.

Q: When did you go to Vietnam?

BOGARDUS: We arrived just before Tet, late in January of '59.

Q: The Tet Offensive was in '68.

BOGARDUS: Yes, the Offensive was, but Tet happens every year.

Q: Excuse me, I'm sorry. When one says "Tet" these days, you always think of THE Tet.

BOGARDUS: I was in Intelligence Research in the Department, which was, from my standpoint, horribly boring. I did everything I could to get out, to get away.

Q: So, you went to Vietnam in '59.

BOGARDUS: About January 15.

Q: And your job was economic?

BOGARDUS: Yes, in the Economic Section there. I was writing weekly reports on the way things were going and then a monthly sum-up. I was number two in that section. There were seven of us, including two secretaries. We of the Economic Section were of the Embassy, but most unusually were not only in a building two miles from the Chancery and were subject to the USOM Director, Arthur Gardner, who was also Economic Minister. He headed 175 officers throughout Vietnam and also supervised the activities of contractors for specific jobs, such as construction, training police and civil servants, and normal schools. So we in the Econ Section were just a small part of the whole USOM show. As loyal members of the team, we were eager to signal advances. Yet our job was to report the progress or lack of progress of all phases of economic development, and Mr. Gardner had signing authority. So, from time to time there was a distinct conflict of interest as to his own and the Embassy's report card.

Q: While you were there, what was the security situation?

BOGARDUS: It wasn't bad until about September of 1961.

Q: Then what happened?

BOGARDUS: We had to retrench. We couldn't go out of town. In the meantime, we had made one trip as far as Angkor Wat, Angkor Thom, by car. It wasn't too difficult in January 1960. You just had to be sure that your car was in very good condition and drive it. We got back and later on, we were able to go into the highlands, Banmethuot and up to Nha Trang and Dalat and along the coast there, Da Nang and Hue (pron. whey) and that sort of thing. But it gradually became extremely dangerous. We were sort of circumscribed in staying in greater Saigon.

Q: What about the problems in the programs there, of corruption? Was this a difficult time?

BOGARDUS: Oh, yes, sure. But the main thing was that they badly needed a land reform. The records were not there for land use title, land ownership. There were squatters nearly everywhere because of the war against the French for so long.

Q: The ambassador then was, what, Nolting first?

BOGARDUS: No, it was Elbridge Durbrow, affectionately called "Durby".

Q: How did you find him?

BOGARDUS: He was a workaholic and never stopped. He thought it was just great to have everybody come over there at his house on our day of rest to keep the embassy together. There were a lot of us in the fairly large embassy, you know. He was very congenial. I eventually got into negotiating PL 480 treaties or agreements and had to associate with him on that, mainly with Arthur Gardner and so forth. Elbridge Durbrow left in '61 and Ambassador Frederick "Fritz" Nolting came from Paris in the beginning of May of '61. I had just ended my home leave at that point. My wife stayed on, didn't come back to post until July or something of that sort. But Nolting was there with Bill Trueheart, who was his DCM. They had been together in Paris.

The first attack by rebels, the first coup d'etat, had taken place in late November, I think, of '59. The airplanes came over and really frightened the daylight out of us. There was a second one later on, in which we lived not too far from the palace. The first one was when the Colby family took refuge with us. Then the second one was 13 months later, early 1961. On that occasion, there was a real battle on our street for an hour. Fortunately, they were fighting each other along the street and we were 100 feet back to the side.

Q: We're talking about not the communists, but within the Vietnam army and the rebels against the president.

BOGARDUS: That's right, yes. Mainly, it was the southerners against all the northerners that had been brought in into high places. To a certain extent, it was also a religious rebellion of the Buddhists against the Catholics. Mrs. Nhu, Madame Nhu, when she married her husband, Nhu, (Diem's brother), converted to Catholicism from Buddhism, but the rest of her family remained Buddhist. Her father became ambassador here in Washington, as you recall. I notice you were there a bit later.

Q: In '69, yes. From what I understand, there was a certain disagreement between these two friends, Nolting and Trueheart, over how we should proceed in Vietnam.

BOGARDUS: That only came out when Fritz Nolting went on vacation, home leave in July 1963, which he spent in the Greek Aegean islands. I had been passing on to Bill Trueheart inside information from one of the prominent Buddhists, who was Truong Dinh Dzu. I was able to safely play golf with Truong Dinh Dzu without any danger of being overheard on the golf course. He was a most interesting man, Truong Dinh Dzu. He had been a boy scout and then he went to University of Hanoi. When we knew him, he was a very successful attorney, able to plead in Vietnamese, French, and English. He had also been a governor of Rotary for Southeast Asia. I did an extensive confidential biographic data report on him with lots of things, including the fact that he had been told by an astrologer down in the Mekong Basin that, one day, he would have a very high post. Eventually, that's what encouraged him later on, after Diem was gone and the other military regime, to run for president in 1965, I think.

Q: Something like that. I'm not sure exactly.

BOGARDUS: He was passing this information to me about what was going on in Hue, for example. The visits from Buddhist emissaries from abroad and the frustrating results, and their not getting anywhere with the regime. I would pass this information, send it down to Bill Trueheart, who was DCM, head of the Political Section. Also, I did a biographic report on Madame Nhu, a lot of information about how she had -- There was another sister who was married to a Franco-Vietnamese big game hunter. This was the inside story of these people running away and troubles within the Ngo family over this sort of thing. You remember, Madame Nhu was so powerful that in 1958, she forced the passage of a law that all kinds of gambling, including card games, were absolutely illegal and felonies and that no divorces were possible unless the president approved it (reaction to her sister's elopement).

Q: Later, she tried to have a law against dancing, too.

BOGARDUS: Yes, I know! A number of us Americans and Chinese and Vietnamese families introduced the twist as a bootleg thing and had bootleg dancing parties, where they would send the servants out on the street to give warning if any police were likely to come nearby. A bit of comic relief there.

Q: Did you feel constrained in your reporting, the difference between, say, when Nolting was there, as opposed to Trueheart, and what you could talk about?

BOGARDUS: When that rift occurred, we were just leaving ourselves. We left on July 14 of '63. The real dust up didn't occur until the end of the month. Senator Cabot Lodge arrived late in August, as I recall. We saw the Truehearts a year later here in 1967 or '68. We didn't go into it too much, but he said that he was no longer a hawk.

Where I did feel constrained was, particularly under Arthur Gardner, that we had to report an overly optimistic picture. In '61, I opted to stay on. I had the choice of three years without home leave or two years, home leave and back. Joe Rosza, who was head of the Section, was leaving, probably retiring. I opted to stay under Arthur Gardner, meaning that I would have home leave, and come back for May. But my relations with Arthur Gardner, unfortunately, became more and more unpleasant. Towards the end, in September of '62, we had an inspection by Wilson Flake, who was a retired ambassador. He was out to get Arthur Gardner. As it turned out, he felt it was necessary to lambaste me, too, in order to do this. Wilson Flake, it turned out, fervently believed that it wasn't necessary to learn any foreign languages -- let them all speak English with you. I had seated him beside the Vietnamese Minister of Commerce, Thanh, who spoke pretty good English. But those officials were very few and far between. We Americans dealt with all the other Vietnamese officials in French, Flake didn't bother. So, he had very little -- Then he criticized my reporting as being far too long and not necessary -- cut things back and so forth. He gave me a black eye and it hurt my career.

Q: Back to Vietnam, when you left Vietnam, all hell was going to break loose in October and November of '63. But you left in July of '63.

BOGARDUS: When things went bad, we were in Stuttgart.

Q: What was your feeling and can you say about the other officers in the embassy about Diem and the regime about the time you left in mid-'63?

BOGARDUS: We thought that Diem and Nhu, something had to be done about them, most of us. Fritz Nolting had very clear instructions to be the nicest, sweetest, most seductive, persuasive ambassador who was a philosopher and a devout Episcopalian, which is very close to Catholicism, and so forth. He was trying and sincerely thought he could persuade them, I'm sure. Then he was really angry afterwards when Bill Trueheart reported, "Things have really gone too far. We can't continue." John F. Kennedy finally agreed with him. The way I read it, they never said we were going to shoot Diem and Nhu, but we did say, "Well, if you guys want to push him out of the way, you generals, it's okay. We won't stop you."

I met the CIA agent who carried the message to the Vietnamese generals. I'm trying to think of his name. He was an American officer, major or lieutenant colonel, of Belgian origin. It's a matter of historical record. I met him later at the Colby house on Bill Colby's birthday January 2, either 1968 or 1969. That is the way that happened. I didn't have anything to do with the falling out of Nolting and Trueheart, but I feel sure that afterward Fritz Nolting could see how the change in policy came in his absence, and insisted that he could have succeeded in his mission, and so on. He thought that, probably, until his dying days. He died two years ago in Charlottesville. Maybe this is a good point to...

Q: This might be a good point to stop, I think.

BOGARDUS: Yes. I'll tell you this though, just lately, I've finally read a book called Approaching Vietnam. If you haven't read it, I recommend it to you. I have it at home. I forget the author's name. What it does detail is from 1946 to 1954, Dien Bien Phu, over and over again we were placating the French government one crisis after another, about Vietnam and rebuffing Uncle Ho.

Q: Ho Chi Minh, yes.

BOGARDUS: Ho Chi Minh. We did rebuff him several times. All that was hidden from us at the time and until contrarily much later. If I had known that sort of thing, I don't think I could have been so eager and sure of the righteousness of the cause. Even now, it's very painful. I used to debate with our daughters, teenage and so forth. Oh, boy!

NEAL DONNELLY
Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer
Saigon (1960-1961)

Neal Donnelly was born in Buffalo and educated at Canisius College. He entered USIA in 1960. His career included posts in Saigon, Hong Kong and Taiwan. He was interviewed by David E. Reuther in 2001.

Q: How was your reception in Saigon? They were waiting for you and had housing?

DONNELLY: They had housing but I don't remember anybody meeting us. We got to the office and they had an apartment for us in a building that was owned by the Bank of Vietnam and we were the only Americans in it. Most of the Americans lived elsewhere in houses and things, but we had this little apartment.

Then I settled down to my job which was junior officer training, and that means you work a little bit in each section. The section I worked in most was the press section where I assisted the press officer in selecting stuff from the wireless file to send to newspapers which they probably ignored, and typing a lot of things and running around. I did just a little bit, a week or so, in the cultural section and just a little bit in the exhibit's section, but most of the time I was in press.

Q: How big is the American Embassy in Saigon at this point?

DONNELLY: Well, we weren't in the embassy; we had our own building. I really didn't get to the embassy except once or twice.

Q: How big was USIS then?

DONNELLY: USIS had about ten offices; if I stopped I could think of all of their names. We had about ten offices and the Vietnamese staff was probably about forty. We had a fairly large building with a good, large library. We had an auditorium, a large exhibit section. It was centrally located. It was a better looking building than the embassy; the embassy was sort of a greenish-gray building, very dull looking. Our building was nice, bright, and white and we were right in the central square near the opera house and the hotels. We had a very good location.

Q: This is going to be your introduction to the various USIA functions. So your first job was in the press section and here you're taking various wireless file things and trying to place them in Vietnamese newspapers?

DONNELLY: Yes, because I spoke Cantonese they had me concentrate on the Chinese city that was adjacent to Saigon, Cholon.

Q: Cholon.

DONNELLY: Cholon, yes. So I knew most of the editors and even the owners of the newspapers there.

Q: So part of the job was to get out and meet the local press people so that that personal contact would assist you in placing...

DONNELLY: Well I had a three-month stint at the branch post in Can Tho. There was a hiatus between the outgoing branch PAO (Public Affairs Officer), Greenwald, and the new one coming in, Dolf Droge. So they put me down as a branch PAO for three months. I know it was over Thanksgiving; it was probably November to January, something like that. There again, nobody told me exactly what a branch PAO should do, so I sort of went by Kentucky windage. The other guy had English teaching courses and gave little talks at schools and then they had a mobile unit which showed movies out in the countryside and it did all of those things.

One thing we would do there is we would record the morning VOA (Voice of America) broadcast and then transcribe it and put it on a mimeograph sheet and send it around as a newspaper because there wasn't really any English news at all in that city and not much news of any kind. So everyday we'd have this newspaper which we would distribute to a couple hundred people, which was nothing but the VOA news.

Q: On the distribution list was?

DONNELLY: Schools and police stations and just the regular sort of people you'd expect. A funny thing happened; Kennedy and Nixon, of course, were challenging each other in the presidential election and someone in Saigon took a black and white photo of Nixon and one of Kennedy and put them on something called the gastetner, which you may remember.

Q: That's the old memory card.

DONNELLY: You could take a photo and make a mimeograph image out of the photo and then you could run it off on the mimeograph machine; it's a reasonable facsimile. He sent enough Nixon photos and enough Kennedy photos so that we could clip the winner onto the newspaper the day after the election.

I'd be down there alone without my wife and I would go back to Saigon a couple days a week. I went back the day before the election and left word with my chief local who unfortunately later was killed by the Viet Cong; a very nice guy named Lou. I left word with him to clip the winner's picture on the news the day after the election. I came back and found out that he had clipped Kennedy's picture on it the day before the election because he knew he was going to win, which negated the whole idea of free and fair elections.

Q: Where was the branch post?

DONNELLY: Can Tho; it's in the Delta. When I was there, there were six U.S. (United States) military officers outside of town and I was in town, the only American, and that's all we had in the Delta in those days. To get there – there was no airfield – the military would fly me down in something called an Otter or a Beaver, a six passenger plane, and they'd land on an abandoned roadway because there was no airport. To alert my chief assistant to come out and get me in a jeep, they would buzz the building. It was actually a lot of fun in those days and it's a lot of fun remembering about it.

Q: So there was three months down in the Delta. So when you came back to Saigon, how much was left on your tour?

DONNELLY: I think I went to Hong Kong after that in – it had to be in June, because I remember in May of that year Vice President Lyndon Johnson came out to Saigon. He was a pretty rough guy to deal with. I remember he gave a speech one night at a late dinner and Ed Robinson, the press officer, and I were captioning photos or doing something all day and were leaving about eleven o'clock at night and somebody runs up with a tape from an old Uher tape recorder, open reel tape. He said, "Lyndon Johnson just gave a speech and they want you to transcribe it and give it to the press." So we did. I ran the tape machine and Ed did the typing and we put it on a mimeograph and then we had to get it mimeographed. Of course it took us a while. Sitting out in the front office is Sarah McClendon, who you may remember - she's the old Texan newshen, yelling and screaming at us.

I actually have a copy of that speech, which is unbelievable; Johnson calling Ngo Dinh Diem one of the greatest men. He was greater than Roosevelt because Roosevelt couldn't get 89% of the vote. All sorts of stuff, but I can give you a copy of it if you want.

Q: I think ADST would be interested. Speaking of Diem, there was an anti-Diem coup at the time that you were in Saigon.

DONNELLY: But he didn't fall; the coup was two days after Kennedy's election. I was home; I was in Saigon at that time and I woke up at about three o'clock in the morning and there was a lot of firing right outside our apartment, so I said to Joan, "If they're still there in the morning, it's a coup and if they're gone in the morning, it's the Viet Minh causing trouble." We called them Viet Minh in those days. They were still there in the morning and so we were sort of pinned in our apartment for three days. It was hit with grenade and rifle fire, but no real damage. We were the only Americans there. The embassy didn't contact us for two days. Finally, they... We didn't have a telephone; there was no telephone in our apartment. These are the sort of things that could not possibly happen today.

Q: It sounds like your children are beginning to have good Foreign Service stories. I mean, if she was in the apartment at the time.

So here on your training assignment you saw your first American election from the overseas side of it. What was the atmosphere in Saigon in the 1960s? This was the end of the Eisenhower years.

DONNELLY: Well, the Vietnamese are rolling with the punches, the ordinary peasant, they'd been through a lot; they'd been through the French. But the elite, the educated, or "intelligencia," as they liked to call themselves, were very pro-French. The French had nothing to do anymore in Saigon, but they were pro-French as a way to show that they were anti-American, I think, but everybody had to depend upon the Americans. Now this was long before we had a lot of troops in there. We had, I think, six hundred American advisers throughout the country at that time and they were just advising how to put the bullet in the gun, that sort of thing, and maybe a little bit of technical information, I don't know.

There were a couple people in USIS who were advising on psywar things. We had a motion picture outfit that made a weekly newsreel for the government; it would be shown in the movies. It was a propaganda thing. Ngo Dinh Diem, when he took over, like Marcos when he took over, was universally accepted, but things began to happen. He was very open, I'm told, when he first came in. He would see anybody; very, very free. As time went on, he became suspicious and would see fewer and fewer people, and at the end, I'm told – he was speaking only to his brother and his sister-in-law, he mistrusted everybody. That was part of his problem.

Q: Can you talk a minute about the traveling USIA film program? Is that worldwide or was that just something in Southeast Asia?

DONNELLY: It was worldwide and it was being phased out when I came in. There weren't movie houses and of course there's no television anyplace and peasants in the rural areas would very seldom see a movie. USIS would have these jeep-like trucks, I guess they're called Jeepsters, and have a generator in there and a sixteen millimeter projector and a screen. They would send out to villages and set up maybe in the village square with the assistance of the mayor or police chief or someone and show movies. The movies were probably inappropriate; they had movies of the Hudson Dayliner going up and down the river, the Tower of Learning in Pittsburgh, sometimes health movies about hygiene and whatnot, but people came to see them because they were images moving on a screen. Now of course in a sophisticated world it's hard to imagine that this had any use at all, but we did it.

I went with a couple and actually we went right into what you might call a jungle, just a clearing, and a hundred people would show up and sit down and watch a movie about the Pittsburgh Tower of Learning.

Q: You were telling me earlier about working with the Chinese newspaper people in Cholon. What was their relationship to the whole political scheme?

DONNELLY: They were very pro-American because they were anti-communist. They were very much anti-communist, but they weren't all that pro-Diem except they were closer to Diem than the ordinary Vietnamese were. He was fairly good to them, I think. The Chinese like to be left alone and he left them alone pretty much. But the city of Cholon was Chinese; everybody spoke Chinese. They contributed to his campaigns. In the election that I was there for, President Ngo Dinh Diem, as Lyndon Johnson said, got 89% of the vote. He really lost in the countryside or he got maybe 50-50; I forgot what, but he got the Chinese vote overwhelmingly which is what brought his numbers up. The Chinese are status quo people; they don't like change. They know what they've got; they don't know what they're getting. So, they supported him.

Q: They of course wouldn't have the nationalistic view that the Vietnamese would have.

DONNELLY: No, not at all, and they were anti-communist and Diem was an anti-communist.

THOMAS F. CONLON
Principal Officer

Saigon (1960-1962)

Thomas F. Conlon was born in Illinois in 1924 and received his BS from Georgetown University in 1948. He served overseas in the US Army from 1943-1945. Upon entering the Foreign Service, he was posted in Havana, Surabaya, Singapore, Saigon, Le Havre, Manila, Nice, Canberra, and Bangkok. In 1992 Mr. Conlon was interviewed by Arbor W. Gray.

Q: Then in 1960 you headed out to Saigon.

CONLON: Yes. I was assigned as Consul to the American Consulate in Hue, in Central Vietnam. I welcomed this assignment, as I felt that I could really become fluent in the language, away from the Embassy and with few Americans to associate with. The Consul in Hue had a nice house to live in, even for my large family, and a convenient office nearby. There were acceptable, French schools for my sons and daughters of school age, and I was looking forward to this assignment.

On arrival in Saigon I called on Ambassador Durbrow, who had been our Consul General in Singapore in 1955-56, when we served there. He told me that I would not be going up to Hue immediately. He wanted to keep me in the Political Section in Saigon for three months to get well read into the situation. In the event I never went to Hue, other than for occasional, short visits, spending the next two years or so in Saigon. I was, of course, pleased to work with Durby once again. He was one of the very best ambassadors I ever knew.

1960-62 was an eventful and decisive period in South Vietnam. Initially, I did the bulk of the Embassy reporting on the communist insurgency (although almost everyone in the Mission got involved in this, one way or another). Later, I did the reporting on the internal political situation, and still later on external developments, including North Vietnam, or the "Democratic Republic of Vietnam," as it was called. Along the way, there were two failed coups d'etat in Saigon to report on. One took place on November 10-11, 1960, and was ultimately unsuccessful, though it gravely weakened the anti-Communist government led by President Ngo Dinh Diem. The latter incident, which took place in February, 1962, involved the bombing of the Presidential Palace by two Vietnamese Air Force A1H attack aircraft, in an attempt to kill President Diem.

Unfortunately, we lived across the street and were dangerously close to possible near miss bomb explosions. In fact, our house had some broken windows, but none of us was hurt.

I mentioned 1960. In fact, the National Liberation Front, the NLF, so-called, was formed in December, 1960. I had occasion to write, I think, the first report by any post on the establishment of the NLF, which later was to become a major factor in the situation in Vietnam. It was clear from the beginning that this was simply a front group, completely controlled by North Vietnam, but it did have the tissue of being of southern origin. In fact, it was not that.

The basic decisions on American policy and involvement in Vietnam were, of course, being made in Washington, and the Embassy in Saigon often learned of them well after the fact. As I saw it, President Kennedy dithered steadily in making decisions on what to do about Vietnam. The decisive point in our involvement in Vietnam was reached in October, 1961, when we increased the size of our forces from the 888 members of the Military Assistance and Advisory Group to 16,000 military personnel. Typically, Washington was very reluctant to face the implications of what we were doing and initially portrayed the increase in the number of American military personnel by saying that they were there to help deal with the floods on the Mekong River (an annual event, in any case). This obvious falsehood lay at the roots of our problems with American journalists then and later on in Vietnam.

Perhaps here I had another opportunity to nudge history. In October, 1961, I recall talking to Ambassador Frederick Nolting, who had replaced Ambassador Durbrow in April, 1961. Ambassador Nolting was considering making a recommendation to increase our military commitment to South Vietnam substantially. I told the ambassador that, if it were our intention to halt communist aggression in Southeast Asia, the best place to do it was in Vietnam, as our access to the country lay across a string of U. S. bases in the Western Pacific, and the Vietnamese people in South Vietnam had proved that they were willing to fight against the communists. I said that I thought the situation in South Vietnam was similar to the situation in South Korea in 1950- 53, when our support was critical to the security of Northeast Asia. I think that I had some effect on Ambassador Nolting, for he did recommend a major American intervention in South Vietnam. Of course, the decisions were being made in Washington, and what I said may have had little effect. Unfortunately, we ultimately lost our nerve and withdrew from South Vietnam but never withdrew from South Korea--correctly, in my view. We had failure in one case and success in the other, though our combat losses in both places were similar.

Perhaps one other thing I might mention was that then Vice President Johnson in May, 1961. I was supposed to be the Embassy control officer for the visit, although anybody presuming to control the visit of a personality like that has to have great illusions. Anyhow, the whole visit was disorganized, to an extreme. I was told one evening about 10:00 PM, called at home, and told that I was to interpret in French for Vice President Johnson and President Diem the following morning at breakfast. I was to be at the Presidential Palace at a quarter to seven. So I did. I turned up at a quarter to seven, knowing nothing about what was going to be discussed. The Embassy had a general posture at the time of trying to press the Saigon Government under President Diem to undertake substantial reforms in a number of areas. In exchange for that, we would increase our military and political assistance. The assumption was that, if he did not make these reforms, we would not increase our military assistance. Well, I was astonished to hear Vice President Johnson simply giving assurances of increased military and economic assistance without insisting on anything in return at all. This was just the reverse of the Embassy policy. As an interpreter, I had, on the one hand, to do the interpreting job and, on the other hand, trying to absorb what was clearly a fundamental change in policy. An interpreter should never be put in a position like this, but I was, in this case.

Well, our youngest daughter was born in Saigon in 1961.

Q: But, of course, much of the Vietnam controversy lay in the future.

JAMES MARVIN MONTGOMERY
Economic Officer
Saigon (1960-1962)

State Department; Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1962-1964)

James Marvin Montgomery was born in New Jersey in 1935. He received a BA from Juniata College in 1957. After entering the Foreign Service in 1958, he has been assigned to Saigon, Mexico City, Bangkok, Chiang Mai, and Johannesburg. Mr. Montgomery was interviewed by Thomas F. Conlon in 1996.

MONTGOMERY: After I applied for Thai, they called me up and said, "The Thai language class is filled. How about Vietnamese?" I'd just read an article about the Cao Dai religious sect in South Vietnam. It sounded pretty interesting, so I said, "Sign me up." That's how I ended up in Vietnamese language training, which I began in September, 1959. This is when you, John Helble, and I met, under the aegis of Dinh van Ban, God rest his soul.

We began to struggle our way through learning the Vietnamese language. As you recall, the language study materials were really not developed. It was a hit and miss operation. We certainly learned something and were much better equipped at the end of the course than we were at the beginning. Of course, when we arrived in the Embassy in Saigon, we were faced with great scepticism on the part of some of the people there who felt that Vietnamese was a silly language to learn and that French was really all that you needed. The only people that counted in Vietnam, of course, spoke French.

Well, I didn't speak French, so I was required by circumstances to push harder on my Vietnamese. I ran into a lot of Vietnamese who were pretty interesting and who gave me a picture of what was going on. They did not speak French. It was particularly true in the Vietnamese labor movement and out in the countryside.

Anyway, you will recall that, when we finished Vietnamese training, all three of us were assigned to Saigon. During my first two years in the Foreign Service, I had been married to a young lady from North Dakota, a French teacher. Off we went to Vietnam, via Copenhagen, Paris, Rome, and Saigon.

Q: Did you know in advance of your assignment to Saigon? Were there any other places beside Saigon where you could have been assigned?

MONTGOMERY: I suppose that there was the Consulate in Hue, but, you know, I just didn't think of it.

So we arrived in Saigon in the dead of night and were whisked off to the house at 6-A Rue Thevenet, or Duong Tu Xuong in Vietnamese. It was interesting to have an address with both a French and Vietnamese name.

Much to my surprise, I started in the Economic Section, instead of the Political Section. The Economic Section, at that time, was not in the Embassy proper. It was in the USOM [United States Operations Mission] building, the name at the time for the AID [Agency for International Development] Mission. It was next to the Xa Loi Pagoda, of subsequent fame when the Buddhists rose up against the government of President Diem in 1963. I had a non air-conditioned office. I was assigned to follow the government's various programs in the countryside, including land reform, the agricultural credit program, and what have you. I found it ultimately quite fascinating. It gave me a good picture of how well the government wasn't doing and how it was losing, if it ever had it, any base of support in the countryside. And how the Viet Cong [the communists] were able to organize the people in the country.

I remember picking up off the street in December, 1961, the first leaflets announcing the formation of the National Liberation Front, the NLF. They were in Vietnamese. I was one of the few people in the Embassy who could read them. Nobody seemed to pay very much attention to the NLF at the time. One of my great regrets is that I didn't save one of those leaflets.

Q: I prepared a report on it, but it was based on an FBIS, Foreign Broadcast Information Service, intercept.

MONTGOMERY: Yes. Looking back over the two years that we spent in Saigon - our first child was born there. She is now the mother of twins, living here in Bethesda, Maryland. This was the closest I ever came to leaving the Foreign Service because, after Laura was born, my wife, Dee Dee, developed an infection in her breast, which was enormously painful and didn't seem to go away. I was really ready to pack it in. Then the infection cleared up, and that crisis passed.

Q: The organization of the Embassy was kind of interesting because, as you said, the Economic Section office was co-located with the U.S. Operations Mission, and the Director of USOM was also the Economic Counselor, Arthur Gardiner. What did you think of this as an organizational tool?

MONTGOMERY: Well, in looking back on it and thinking about it, as opposed to what I thought of it at the time, it was clear that one of the functions of the Economic Section was to be a cheerleader for the assistance programs. You really were not expected to come up with scathing criticism of economic developments that had a high, USOM quotient in them. As you recall, this was entirely consistent with the positive thinking approach - and I remember that phrase - that Washington could only handle a limited amount of bad news. We really weren't going to tell them about difficult things that were developing. Somebody pointed out that the Ambassador [Elbridge Durbrow] lived in a house that was at one time the home of Dr. Coue, the Frenchman who was the proponent of positive thinking - even before Norman Vincent Peale.

I remember that aspect of things very well, that "We don't want to hear that things are not going well." I remember positive thinking, cheerleading sessions led by the Ambassador. Well, my view was that you first had to conclude that anybody was better than President Ngo dinh Diem, because that was what we were going to get. I always felt that we were intellectually dishonest in even deciding that Diem was the only figure that we could work with. In that case, you don't hide the negative aspects and the fact that he had very real limitations. We went through a lot of bullshit in our reporting, and stuff like that. I think it was a mistake.

Q: To go a little further in this direction, do you think that we should have avoided becoming as deeply involved in 1960-1962, as we did?

MONTGOMERY: Not at the time. I thought that we were doing the right thing and were stopping the communists. I thought that this was a worthwhile thing to do. We had seen what happened when the communists took over Eastern Europe. That was pretty bad. The Hungarian uprising [of 1956] was very vivid in my mind. It was very clear that the North Korean communists were not very nice people, and the people who lived under that regime were in a pretty poor position. At that time I felt that we should give the people of South Vietnam every chance to survive and thrive on their own. The idea that, somehow, we had cheated Ho Chi Minh [the communist leader of North Vietnam] out of national elections in 1956 struck me as pretty silly. I just felt that, as part of this view, we had to have a very clear understanding of what was happening in South Vietnam.

To jump ahead a little bit, I remember most vividly that when the decision was made to make a major deployment of U.S. troops to South Vietnam in 1965...

Q: We had greatly expanded our military personnel in South Vietnam in the fall of 1961, from 800 or so to 15,000-16,000.

MONTGOMERY: No, I'm talking about when we put in formal units of the U.S. armed forces. My attitude at that time was, "This is the right thing to do, but it's going to be very, very difficult. Much more difficult than the top levels of the U.S. Government realize."

I would say that people like you and me, Jim Rosenthal, and other people who had been down a little bit at the lower levels of the Vietnamese people and were dealing with the realities of their political aspirations, had a much clearer idea of just how horrendously difficult it was going to be - while still believing that it should be done.

I remember reading the book, "The Ugly American," by Burdick and Lederer, when I was in the A-100 course at the FSI. I took it on board. I thought that this was the way we were supposed to behave, that we could whip these bastards.

So, looking back on it, did I nudge history when I was in Vietnam? Probably not. Do I have anything to contribute to the historical record that's not already in the record because of my time there? I don't think so. I think that the only thing that adds just a touch to the record is the idea that there were at least some of us who recognized the difficulty.

I think that that's about that. There were so many people involved in Vietnam, eventually. So much has been written about it. I don't know about you, but among the other people you've interviewed there were probably some people who were in Vietnam.

Q: Not to any great extent. Actually, only a very small part of the Foreign Service ever served in Vietnam.

MONTGOMERY: Well, I did not keep notes of my time in Saigon. I chronicled the progress of the land reform program and the legal provisions to control land rents in favor of the tenant farmers under Vietnamese Government Ordinance 57, and the arrangements for the National Agricultural Cooperative Organization. All of these were largely failures, particularly in political terms.

Q: So you left Saigon in July, 1962. Where did you go then?

MONTGOMERY: I came back to the State Department to work on the Vietnam desk.

Q: Did you have any choice on this matter, or were you simply assigned?

MONTGOMERY: I was simply assigned. I didn't even think that there was going to be any choice in the matter. The idea that I could finagle an assignment in the Foreign Service hadn't yet crossed my mind. [Laughter]

Q: First of all, how many people were on the Vietnam desk, who were they, and what were you doing?

MONTGOMERY: Well, I think that Ben Wood was in charge - Chalmers B. Wood. We worked for Barney Koren [Henry L. T. Koren], who was the Director of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs. The Vietnam experience or enterprise was still subordinate to an Office Director. This was in the middle of 1962, after the mission to Vietnam led by Eugene Staley, which dealt with the counterinsurgency evaluation that led to an increase in advisers. Still, the Vietnam desk came under the Office Director of Southeast Asian Affairs, in what was then called the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. When did you come on the desk?

Q: A year later, in August, 1963.

MONTGOMERY: By then Paul Kattenburg was there, a special fellow in his own right. I think that there were, perhaps, four or five officers on the desk.

Q: What did you think of Paul Kattenburg?

MONTGOMERY: [Laughter] What did I think of Paul Kattenburg? He was one of the most interesting people that I ever met. I thought that he was totally unsuited as a bureaucratic operative. There was just too much pressure on him, and he came out with a skin condition which was clearly related to his nerves.

Q: You and I were on the desk, and so was Lyall Breckon, another good friend of ours.

MONTGOMERY: He came about the same time that you did. Then the desk became the Vietnam Working Group. Later, it went off as a separate office in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q: Who was the Assistant Secretary during your time on the Vietnam desk?

MONTGOMERY: When I first arrived there in September, 1962, the Assistant Secretary was so bloody remote that I'm not even sure that I remember who it was.

Q: I think that it was Averell Harriman.

MONTGOMERY: I think that you're absolutely right.

Q: But he was on in years. He was replaced some time early in 1963, I think, by Roger Hilsman, who had been the Director of the Bureau of Intelligence Research.

MONTGOMERY: I don't even remember the Deputy Assistant Secretaries in the bureau, except Bob Barnett.

Q: Bob Barnett was one of them. I remember that during the summer of 1963 we had two college interns whose names I can't remember. One was a woman, the other was a young man. They were very, very good.

MONTGOMERY: The woman was Janice Church. During a later assignment I used to make speeches for her. The last time I saw her, she was in the civil service in the Office of Personnel Management. She ran courses on how the government works. When I was in the Bureau of Congressional Relations, I would speak at courses that she arranged.

Q: She used to handle a lot of the correspondence on the Vietnam desk. I had deep doubts about interns, but in my view they turned out to be very capable.

MONTGOMERY: I always had positive experiences with summer interns, throughout the years.

Q: So you were there on the Vietnam desk. What were some of the principal points? You came on the desk in September, 1962. 1963 was one of the great watersheds. What was the principal question then?

MONTGOMERY: In 1963 the principal point was the Buddhist uprising and the runup to the overthrow and death of Ngo dinh Diem. Diem was murdered just before the assassination of President Kennedy. It all sort of blurs in the mind when I look back. You often wonder if there wasn't a connection between the two events. So much has been written about it.

It was just a matter of increasing involvement in Vietnam, increasing frustration with the actions of the Vietnamese Government. Frederick E. ("Fritz") Nolting was Ambassador. In fact, he arrived in Saigon as Ambassador in May, 1961, well before we left there. I'm not sure that I can add a lot. I have one little anecdote during my time in Saigon. Some historian can look it up some day because I think that the paper trail is there, if you know where to look for it.

This happened after the coup d'etat in 1963 which overthrew Diem. I think that Nguyen Cao Ky was high up in the Vietnamese Government. There were charges of corruption, possibly involving him. I remember that we were working in the Operations Center on the Seventh Floor of the Department. It was called the Vietnam Working Group.

One day I received a NODIS telegram to handle. This was a distribution control which meant that there should be No Distribution Outside the Department of State. The issue was that the Vietnamese Government had decided to replace the 200 piaster note. Apparently, this was the note of choice for black marketeers. It was the largest denomination note. They were going to replace it, wash out a lot of ill-gotten gains, and all of that kind of thing. They wanted to do it secretly. They had, I believe, contracted with Thomas Cook in London, which printed banknotes in those days.

I know that it wasn't the American Banknote Company. It was in London. The issue was to get a U.S. Air Force plane laid on to bring the banknotes to Saigon and keep it all very secret, so that the bad guys would be surprised. I forget the value of the banknotes involved, but let's say that it was 3.0 billion piastres worth of 200 piaster notes.

So I arranged for the U.S. Air Force plane to pick up the new 200 piaster notes in London, and they were delivered in Saigon. That was sort of the last I heard of it for about a month. Then, an UNCLASSIFIED Economic WEEKA - do you remember the Weekly Economic Airgram? - came across my desk. It said, perhaps in Item No. 24, that there had been confusion in the exchange of the new 200 piaster notes, which occurred on such and such a date - and it was the right date. The item said that they were surprised at the number of old 200 piaster notes in circulation, because they only had 2.0 billion worth of new 200 piaster notes!

Q: So 1.0 billion piastres had disappeared.

MONTGOMERY: A billion piastres had disappeared. I drew this to the attention of a variety of people, but no one was really interested. [Laughter]

Q: The Australians say, "File that in the 'Too Hard' File."

MONTGOMERY: The "Too Hard to Do" file. You hear about corruption and all that sort of thing, which is very subtly done. But that was one of the most blatant operations I've ever heard of. You just get that UNCLASSIFIED Economic WEEKA and set it alongside that exchange of NODIS telegrams, and you can figure that one out.

I was on the desk at the time of the Tonkin Gulf crisis in August, 1964. Looking back on it, the Vietnam Working Group was located in the Operations Center when this happened. I spent a lot of time in the Operations Center. There has been a lot of material written about the Tonkin Gulf crisis, with the strong implication that it was all manipulated, and we all knew that it was not what it purported to be. That may have been the case but, certainly at my level, everyone I knew genuinely believed that there were two separate attacks on those U.S. destroyers. I knew about OPLAN 34-A but I didn't...

Q: What was OPLAN 34-A?

MONTGOMERY: OPLAN 34-A was a CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] run operation to harass North Vietnam, to slip guerrillas into North Vietnam, landing them from the sea or dropping them in by parachute. It apparently was not a very effective operation. I saw an account of it in the newspapers a few months ago in which some of the South Vietnamese who were captured by the North Vietnamese wanted their back pay. And the U.S. Government wasn't going to give it to them! [Laughter] The fact is that there was an OPLAN 34-A landing opposite where the U.S. destroyers were reportedly attacked.

In the Operations Center we didn't know that there was a CIA operation going on at the same time as the attacks on the U.S. destroyers - the USS C. TURNER JOY and the USS MADDOX - which were steaming off the coast. I don't know whether those two destroyers had some kind of support role in this operation or not. I don't think that they did. However, it certainly would have been a normal reaction for the North Vietnamese to conclude that they did. The second night of the crisis probably involved more confusion than a genuine attack, but it seemed like a genuine attack.

Historians tend to ignore the fact that confusion can explain a lot.

Q: I think that's very true, both in military as well as civilian affairs.

MONTGOMERY: It happens in diplomatic matters, also. Diplomatic activity is rife with unintended consequences. That's just it, and people screw up. They screw up a lot more than you think is written down.

Q: You were talking about the Tonkin Gulf crisis in 1964. We glossed over quickly the overthrow of Ngo dinh Diem. As I recall, you spent the night of November 1-2 at the Operations Center. I relieved you early in the morning of November 2, 1963. Would you go over that? I thought it was an interesting story.

MONTGOMERY: It's interesting to go back and read some of the detailed descriptions of what happened. Richard Reeve's book, "Kennedy," is particularly well done on that score. I think that you and I were indeed involved in that telegram which went out with improper clearances and which is said to have given the green light for the overthrow of Diem. I was also up until 3:00 AM one morning with Bob Barnett, writing the instructions that stopped the Commercial Import Program in South Vietnam, which occurred maybe a week before Ngo dinh Diem was overthrown.

Q: The Commercial Import Program in South Vietnam was the principal element of U.S. support for the Saigon Government.

MONTGOMERY: It was the principal element of U.S. support. It generated the counterpart currency which made the whole thing go. We cut off the program and, obviously, the plotters of the coup d'etat against Diem knew that. It could well have been what drove them to stumble into action against Diem. I thought that it was clear that Henry Cabot Lodge was sent out in August, 1963 as Ambassador to Vietnam to "get rid of Diem." The decision had been made, at least as I saw it, that nobody could have any illusions that Diem and his family were going to start behaving any differently. We'd known them for too long and too well. This was after the Ap Bac incident.

Q: That was an attack by the communists on a hamlet near the Mekong River, south of Saigon, early in 1963. The communists stood and fought, instead of withdrawing.

MONTGOMERY: And they shot down some helicopters. It was enormously dramatic and had tremendous political impact. In looking back at this, I probably thought at the time that it was time for Diem to go. Things had gotten to the point where my view at the time was, "We have to win the war." We had to beat the communists and we weren't going to do it with Ngo dinh Diem.

Q: This was clearly Paul Kattenburg's view.

MONTGOMERY: It was obviously the view of Roger Hilsman, the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs. Whether it was also the view of Joe Mendenhall [former Political Counselor in Saigon and a Regional Policy Planner in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs in November, 1963], I don't know. I had no particular insight into the situation. A couple of minutes ago, in this interview, I was crisper than I meant to be. I think that a better explanation is that they [certain U.S. leaders] wanted Diem overthrown, but they wanted no responsibility for doing it. They wanted it both ways.

Q: This raises a point because there's been a lot of public controversy about this. Did the U.S. actually engage in operations to overthrow Diem?

MONTGOMERY: I would say that what makes it hard to say "No" is the cutting off of the Commercial Import Program. I mean, that could have had no other objective, AT THAT TIME. Cutting off this program two years earlier could have been designed to pressure Diem to do something differently. But cutting off that program at that time, after the six-month long Buddhist revolt and everything else, could only have been designed to create the necessary conditions.

Q: As I recall it, you were in the Operations Center through the night of November 1-2, 1963. You left at about 4:00 or 5:00 AM, when I relieved you. As I recall it, you had the task of informing the White House of the overthrow of Diem. Could you tell us a little more about this?

MONTGOMERY: I don't remember it.

Q: Well, I'll tell you what you did, because you told me about it when I relieved you early on the morning of November 2, 1963. You passed the word to President Kennedy - whether you spoke to him directly or not, I don't know. Diem had died. The word you got back was that President Kennedy was very disturbed to learn this, because the initial story was that the Ngo brothers, Ngo dinh Diem and Ngo dinh Nhu, committed suicide. This disturbed Kennedy very much because he saw himself as responsible for driving them to commit suicide.

MONTGOMERY: I think that Kennedy probably was genuinely disturbed. I don't think that he wanted it to end up this way.

Q: Well, I think that in Ted Sorenson's book on Kennedy, he mentions a conversation with Kennedy between November 2, 1963, and Kennedy's own assassination on November 22, 1963. If I remember correctly, Sorenson quotes Kennedy as saying, "I didn't pay enough attention, I didn't read enough, I didn't fully understand." I think that this is probably correct. There were people in the U.S. Government who honestly believed that the overthrow of Diem was going to help us achieve our objectives in Vietnam.

MONTGOMERY: Oh, yes. The objectives themselves had not yet begun to be questioned, to use the passive voice. Isn't it interesting, though, that I had a conversation with the President of the United States, but there you are.

Q: Well, I'm not sure that you actually talked to Kennedy. But you talked to somebody who then talked to the President and relayed his comments back to you. At least there was that.

KEITH EARL ADAMSON
Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office (JUSPAO)
Saigon (1960-1964)

Keith Earl Adamson was born in 1917 in Newton, Kansas. During college, he worked at the Department of State during the day and attended class at night. He graduated from George Washington University in 1943 with a degree in economics. He joined the Navy from 1943-1946, and returned to the State Department immediately thereafter. In addition, he has served in Egypt, Turkey, Colombia, Laos, Thailand, and Chile. He was interviewed on January 12, 1988 by Earl Wilson.

ADAMSON: Yes, I stayed on from when he came in '65 to January of '67, when I went to Saigon. I was his deputy then for a little over a year.

Q: Here's a man coming in from the outside completely. What kind of a relationship did you have with him?

ADAMSON: It was at arm's length for the first few months, and he brought in somebody from New York, whom I later saw when I was in Laos, a newsman. But nonetheless, he told me later, he said, "I don't understand why they appointed me. You're the professionals. You know how to operate this place."

I said, "Yes, but wait until you get into the politics of it. You were appointed by Lyndon Johnson, and that gives you some authority and influence that I do not have, and you can help the Voice in many ways that I can't. So don't worry about the day-to-day operations; let your deputy take care of that problem. You worry about overall style, what you want to do, what you want to communicate, the policy, and getting us the money to do it and the authority to do it."

The thing I think I appreciated as much as anything else was that maybe a year later, one day he said, "Keith, over these months that I worked with you, I've finally gotten to the place that I can predict what your decision is going to be before you make it." And I got to thinking, you know, is that good or bad? But the point is, at least I was consistent. I had some standards that guided my decisions, and I thought that's better than not being consistent or predictable. So I took it as a compliment.

Q: I had the feeling that Chancellor seemed to be somewhat uncomfortable in that job. He really wanted to get out.

ADAMSON: He took the job reluctantly. He said something to the effect, "Lyndon Johnson is a great arm-twister." He said, "After his lecture and all of that, I would have felt guilty or un-American or something if I hadn't taken the job." But he was not happy with the assignment. But he worked hard at it. I must give him credit.

One of the things that he really brought in was the whole idea of most people are not going to be there listening to the radio eight to ten hours a day, and when they tune in, they want to get an update on the news, maybe a feature or two, and then that's that. And when they come back to you five hours later, they want an update. So what he was trying to do was have a news summary that brought the headlines up to date on a continuing basis. I wasn't around long enough to see what the audience response was to that, but we had a good audience. There was no doubt about it.

Q: During all this period, the war was developing in Vietnam, about a year. So in 1967, January, you went over there, right?

ADAMSON: Right.

Q: How did that come about?

ADAMSON: It was partly as a result of the fact that I had worked closely with Barry Zorthian, who was, in effect, the assistant director for programs, or something like that, at the Voice of America, when I was program officer for Near East South Asia. We'd gotten to know each other very well. Barry had gotten very good reports on my performance at the Voice after he went to Vietnam, and he asked for me.

Q: Good.

ADAMSON: I don't know if he regrets that or not, but we're still pretty good friends. (Laughter) When I was in Washington just a year ago for the 45th anniversary of the Voice, Barry and I got together and had a long chat. Barry had been loaned to the Department of State to be the Director of the Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office in Saigon, and I went over as his deputy. I found out later that that meant I was the Public Affairs Officer for Vietnam; Barry wasn't. But I had two roles. I was the Public Affairs Officer, which means that I should have (if I had known it, I would have) felt more responsibility for what I call the "normal" U.S. Information Agency activities in Vietnam. I would have worried a little bit more about the library, about the book translation program, and some of the other cultural exchange programs. But instead, I got so involved in trying to build 12 radio stations and five T.V. stations, and operating the airborne transmitters until they could get built, and worrying about the provincial representatives of JUSPAO and flying out every weekend with Barry to see how the guys were doing and to keep their morale up and all that. I really got carried away with all this fighting the war and the insurgency and the psychological operations, which JUSPAO was involved in, and sort of neglected the normal programs.

Q: Did Barry sort of give you, hourly or otherwise, "This is going to be your division of responsibilities that I want you to take care of all these things?"

ADAMSON: Barry had his own way of operating, but basically, I was the day-to-day manager, and he would worry about external relations. Of course, he also had press relations under him. I was operating the information, cultural programs, and John McGowan was operating the press bureau. So I didn't get involved over there.

Q: As I remember, Barry went there in '66 or so?

ADAMSON: Barry went there in '64 and left there after I did. He was not going to stay one day less than Westmoreland. That's what everybody said. But nonetheless, he was there over four years.

Q: Because I remember that prior to his going there, the relations with the press were terrible, and he began to...

ADAMSON: He did a marvelous job with the press. He started background briefings with senior officers, intelligence officers, and the others. He'd invite in the network representatives, as well as the press services, and they appreciated it.

Q: Of course, the whole program in Vietnam was the largest in the world, certainly at that time.

ADAMSON: Yes.

Q: It was different from anything we had anywhere else. There were questions and pulling and tugging and all the rest of it, and it's historically, still, an extremely important subject. Maybe you'd better spend some time on Vietnam and get into that a little bit.

ADAMSON: It's hard to know where to start. If a person doesn't really know all the things that we were doing, it's kind of hard to discuss the various aspects of it. I think it's best if I dwell on one thing that bothered me a great deal. When we decided, instead of just having advisors there, we were going to send in troops after the Tonkin Gulf attack on one of our ships, that's when we began escalating, which means going up. But in my opinion, we began going down. Several reasons. One, we were in a hurry. The war in Vietnam had been going on for centuries, not just a few years. The hostile groups were many, not just Communists and white hats or good guys. We were pushing in a hurry, instead of letting the Vietnamese learn how to do it their own way. I think that was our first and our biggest mistake: we were impatient.

Q: "Get out of the way, Charlie. I'll do it."

ADAMSON: So as a result of which, I was rather pleased when I began to hear from the Vietnamese, "This is our war. Go home." For a long time, you see, they were letting us do it. And for a long time, we would not give them the weapons to have the same kind of fighting capability that our forces had. I don't know whether we didn't trust them or we didn't have them or just hadn't thought about it. But an Army War College classmate of mine came out and he was working with General Abrams. They were upgrading the armaments for one division at a time, and they were also doing field training. Instead of pulling them off the line to learn about the weapons, they'd set up units to do training in the field. All of those were hopeful signs, but they had begun too late, in my opinion. I think as the action-reaction on both sides kept going, it had enabled North Vietnam to not only build up the Viet Cong cadres, but to install themselves strongly militarily in the south and to build up their supply chain so that it was one of the most efficient, incredible things that you could imagine. That was the background to what I wanted to say.

After a year and a half in Saigon, I was transferred to Laos. I said, "Why couldn't we have done in Vietnam what we're doing in Laos? We're helping the Lao fight their war." If it hadn't been for the ability of North Vietnam to build up and use the supply chain they had going, I don't think they would have succeeded in taking over in Laos.

Q: You've mentioned that our military was putting emphasis on itself, and more or less telling the Vietnamese, "Get out of the way." Let's think about the information and propaganda aspects of our effort. Were we doing the same thing?

ADAMSON: Sure. We were doing exactly the same thing. We had set up our crew in every one of the media; in production of motion pictures for both theaters and the television programs; operation of a government printing plant to print all kinds of propaganda and brochures; radio training and radio station construction; and we were doing all the leaflets, the air-drops of leaflets and what have you. There was not very much that the Vietnamese were doing other than serve as staff for the JUSPAO operation. They were supposed to be trainees and so on.

I had considerable opposition in both Laos and Thailand, because my duty was to turn over our surrogate operation to the nationals of the country and give them complete responsibility and authority. Several of my staff in Thailand were very opposed to turning it over. They said, "They'll never do the job. They won't be able to fight this insurgency if we get out of the business." But we did; we got out of it. We turned over equipment and personnel to the government, but we didn't do it in Vietnam.

Q: In Vietnam, given this type of policy, what do you think were some of the most successful things that we did, despite that?

ADAMSON: The fact that we had television programs that people could receive in the Delta area from those U.S. Navy operated CONNIES [Constellations] that were flying the transmitter run, people enjoyed those. They were very useful. We helped produce films about Vietnam, (not just about the U.S. forces and others that were coming around). We had radio programs with Vietnamese music and well known artists, Pham Zuy and the gals. They were very much appreciated. In other words, that was something that did make a contribution.

Q: You could tell. You knew they were looking at those programs, and you could deduce that they were at least enjoying them.

ADAMSON: That's right. There were several daily newspapers in Vietnamese that they themselves ran. The extent to which they used our press bulletins and output and so on, I don't know. They attended the Five o'clock Follies and listened to the briefings about how the war was going. They didn't find out much about what ARVN was doing -- Armed Forces Vietnam -- because we were always talking to the foreign journalists about the U.S. presence. That's what the briefing was all about.

As a result of the printing plant that we helped establish, when the big election came along -- I'm not sure that was a good thing, but that's another story -- they were able to print all of these things to tell about the different parties, the different candidates and so on, and get them out -- period. That they did; we didn't do it. But they did it with their own facilities. So I would guess that had things turned out differently we would have left some bequest with them that they could have carried on and done better than they'd ever done before.

Nevertheless, we had a lot of good people up there working, and we lost a few. We lost one of our young officers. As a matter of fact, he was on loan from the Department. When the North Vietnamese attacked Hue, Willis was captured and held prisoner for a long time, along with some of our Philippine employees of the radio station up there. One of our NBC contract employees at the T.V. station in Hue was killed. Life wasn't easy out in the provinces. When guys went out there to live, it wasn't the best living accommodations in the world.

Q: You know, these many years later, the Agency has agreed to put a plaque in the lobby. [Tape recorder turned off]

ADAMSON: I just got my new USIA bulletin with all the news in it, especially the news that you were going to interview me in Honolulu.

Q: From what you say, then, it was very difficult for the Vietnamese to have creative ideas that would go up the line in information or persuasiveness.

ADAMSON: That would be my response. I don't know whether they were cowed or discouraged or just didn't feel that there was room for them to become involved and to try to do very much.

Q: Did you get any feeling that, on the one hand, they perhaps thought the Americans knew best, or at least what the Americans were going to do.

ADAMSON: Let me back up. I think they felt in most areas that the Americans were going to do what they wanted to do. But I want to back up a little bit. There were Vietnamese counterparts who had ideas and were not reluctant to tell us what they thought. John McGowan had developed some very good relationships with members of the press, and that worked out very well. We had people in the television-motion picture production area, where it was their ideas as to what ought to be produced, to tell the people what they were going to do. They were completely responsible for some of the radio programs that were on their stations. So I must modify what I'd said earlier. But the problem was I think they were reluctant to go too far, because they felt that we had the resources, it was our money. And there was a certain extent -- "These area people who have had worldwide experience, and we're just local boys, and we don't know as much as they know." So all of these things entered into it.

Q: Did that begin to change when we entered the phase of Vietnamization?

ADAMSON: I left in May 1968 for Laos, and that was just really beginning getting going. So that is something you need to ask some others. Now, one person you're going to find will have a lot of answers of the later period is John Hogan, who is here. So when you get to John, that will be very good.

Q: Why don't you go on about Vietnam, and we'll pick up on Laos the next time.

ADAMSON: I don't know what else we have on Vietnam that we haven't covered. One of the things is, of course, I haven't explained just what kind of an operation we had in detail. I've mentioned the fact that we were trying to help the Vietnamese to build their T.V. stations, their radio stations, their printing plant, their motion picture production plant, and their skills.

The Navy was flying these two Constellations with T.V. transmitters aboard, and then when the Tet attack of January and February 1968 came along and they knocked out the downtown radio station, we then had to get their broadcasts somehow aboard, so we put them aboard the same planes that flew a pattern, and we put one of their best Vietnamese announcers on board the plane, so he would have some taped shows and then he would also have the news, which he was getting from this little two-way radio. Of course, they knocked out the T.V. station in Hue. They damaged another station; it hadn't really gone on the air yet in Can Tho, in the Delta. But that was about it. These were the kinds of things.

In addition, let me go back with an inventory. We had a JUSPAO representative in each province. Many of those were military, not any particular branch. It could be Navy or Air Force or Army, although it was Army for the most part. They were advisors to the local Vietnamese military command, not the U.S. But they worked very closely, of course, with whatever U.S. units happened to be stationed in that same area. They were our source of information as to what kinds of programs would be needed, what kinds of leaflets were needed, because they knew the order of battle and where the VC, as well as the North Vietnamese units were located, and what kinds of things they would suggest. So these provincial representatives were extremely important, but, also, they were very isolated. That was why I mentioned earlier we had three planes assigned to JUSPAO, and we would use those to send materials out to the province, keep them supplied, and so we would travel out, usually on weekends, to visit one or two or three provinces to see how they were doing.

Q: In general, it seems to me that with respect to the enemy, you were trying to get them to surrender as a major policy.

ADAMSON: That's right.

Q: In terms of the populace of North Vietnam, trying to get them to distrust their government, is that right?

ADAMSON: That's correct.

Q: And as far as in Vietnam itself, the south, you were trying to get them to be friendly to the U.S., on the one hand, and the allies, but it didn't have much political content with respect to their government, is that right?

ADAMSON: How can we sort this out. The objective to get the North Vietnamese troops in South Vietnam and the Viet Cong to quit and surrender, I would guess, had less than a fraction of a percent success. To get the villagers to distrust and not cooperate with the Viet Cong, that was a different story. They cooperated at the point of a gun. In other words, they knew their life was in danger if they didn't cooperate with the VCs and others who came into their village. But they also found out that their life was in danger if they didn't cooperate with the ARVN when they came in, the government forces. So they walked a tightrope the whole time.

In the cities, however, it was a different story. I think there it was, to a certain extent, business as usual in the political field. They all had their own ideas as to whether they were going to be with their old familiar group that had its own leadership or these new imports from North Vietnam. Well, of course, Big Minh was born in South Vietnam. But a lot of the people that were involved in the government were Northerners. So it's very hard. I don't know if we ever did really get a clear picture. Doug Pike has written some of the most knowledgeable material about the Viet Cong and their background and their beliefs. Don Rocklin has interviewed more captured Viet Cong than any other single person and has a better understanding of what makes them tick. But I don't think that in our psychological warfare, we ever did really find out what to do. At one of the weekly meetings over at the military command headquarters, MACV, the PSYOPS people were telling how many leaflets they had dropped, in what sectors, here and there, and so on, and they had it in the number of thousands or tonnage, I'm not sure which. And General Creighton Abrams pulled his cigar out of his mouth and said, "Well, what the hell does that mean? Did anybody quit? Did anybody show up?" The good old questions about "Are you being successful?" That was one of the biggest problems we ever had.

Q: A broad-brush thing, too, here at the last part of this tape. It seemed to me the military, in the beginning, had almost a wishful, magical thinking about PSYOPS and how the whole information program was going to do wonders, and then as time went by, they became terribly cynical.

ADAMSON: Yes. I agree with you. There was a time when we thought, "We won't have to fire a shot. Just fire out a few leaflets."

Q: Right.

ADAMSON: In other words, they had an exaggerated expectation of what psychological warfare could do. We worked with the sixth PSYOPS Battalion out there very closely. As a matter of fact, they got their policy guidance from JUSPAO. Of course, when I got up to Laos, the guys down there got their policy guidance from me.

Q: Officers in the field in Vietnam, including the military and others that were attached, were they giving useful input on some of these problems to you?

ADAMSON: Yes and no. They gave us the best understanding we could have gotten from any source, I think, of the situation in their province. But again, the problem is you can't produce much for that single province from abroad. You have to try to generalize the material and then sometimes it doesn't respond. But we did have the capability of doing small quantities on the spot in the province for very specific targets, so that was one way we got around that problem.

JOHN M. ANSPACHER
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Saigon (1960-1964)

John M. Anspacher majored in Political Science while in college. After college, he worked for about 10 years as a newspaper reporter and editor. His government career started out in the Psychological Strategy Board, after his work in psychological operation in WW II. An old acquaintance, C.D. Jackson, who knew Anspacher from his days at Life Magazine, recommended him for a position at USIA. He has also served in Germany, Cambodia, Mali, and Ethiopia. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt on March 22, 1988.

ANSPACHER: I spent a year and a half, two years there trying to backstop the Far East PAOs. All of a sudden, in early 1960 somebody said "Saigon" and I jumped at it. So off I went to Saigon, stopping en route at the Far East PAO conference in Manila before I even got to the post. The then-deputy PAO/Saigon, Herb Baumgartner, who had been in Korea, had come down to hold the fort between Chet Opal and me. He came to meet me at the conference. They used to hold our PAO conferences in Baguio, the hill station outside of Manila, which was very nice. And what a collection of old timers there were there! Hank Miller's now dead. So is Harry Casler. I don't know where Dick McCarthy is.

Q: Dick is in Washington.

ANSPACHER: Dick is in Washington? Straightened out I hope.

Q: Who knows?

ANSPACHER: Who knows. Bob Clark.

Q: Bob is dead.

ANSPACHER: Bob is dead. Dear me.

Q: He was my deputy in Thailand.

ANSPACHER: Bob Clark had this interesting Chinese-language thing, I guess, of always, not always but frequently, phrasing his sentences as if it were a question. Like, "it's going to rain tonight?"

Q: Invariably. His conversation invariably ended as a question.

ANSPACHER: Fascinating.

Q: Rising inflection.

ANSPACHER: It must have been the Chinese which he learned as a child. Anyway, they were a bunch of old timers, including a fellow named Powell who was an ex-Marine. I've forgotten his first name.

Q: Ralph?

ANSPACHER: Yes, Ralph Powell.

Q: He later taught at the War College.

ANSPACHER: Later taught at the War College. He was considerably older than most of us.

Q: Terribly shot up as a Marine, too.

ANSPACHER: Yes. He had been Naval Attaché in Shanghai or in Beijing at one time.

Q: I don't know exactly how much we lost when the leader came on at the end of that tape, but just to review a moment, we were talking about Ralph Powell, who had been a Marine Corps Officer and also taught at the War College and had been -- what was it he was in China?

ANSPACHER: He had been Naval Attaché to the last American Embassy in China before we pulled out.

Q: So Ralph was a real Chinese expert and, as I say, taught at the National War College. He died a few years ago and I think it was a great loss. Okay, let's pick up from there.

ANSPACHER: There is another chap who was with us and you know him, too. He had been PAO in Tokyo. Great big tall fellow, red hair.

Q: Willard Hanna?

ANSPACHER: No, not Willard Hanna. Had a three-syllable last name, I think.

Q: Bradford?

ANSPACHER: Not Bradford, no. Now this was considerably later. Well, anyway, whoever. Those were the real old-timers, I guess, a lot of us anyway. Jack O'Brien was there, and Bill Copeland. I had known Bill in the United Press days and he and I were great friends. And Harry Casler, who is also now dead. He lived in Ireland. He and I corresponded for a while. He had been PAO in Indonesia.

Q: He'd also been in Caracas. I don't know where he was before that.

ANSPACHER: Well he came to Baguio as PAO, in Indonesia, I think. Those were the "good old days." Anyway, I pick up a whole Saigon thread from Baumgartner at the Baguio conference. George Allen was then the director of USIS. He apparently knew Chet Opal because he said to me, "I gather you have a document that Mr. Baumgartner, your deputy, has brought with him: Chet Opal's presentation." I said, "yes," pulling this thing out of a briefcase; it was inches thick. George Allen apparently knew Chet Opal. He said, "See if you can get that down to about five minutes, will you?" I looked at it and tried to boil it down. I've forgotten now what was in it. It was a status report and it was well done. Very good for my purposes but a little bit too much for the PAO conference.

After the conference I went on to Saigon. We were not yet in the psychological operations programs that Barry Zorthian eventually ran from the USIS base. It was a more or less normal USIS operation. I guess the biggest thing we had the first year I was there was the 1960 presidential elections, the election of John F. Kennedy. We ran that as a kind of "election special" for USIS, inviting a lot of people in, keeping the tote board, explaining who Kennedy was, and so forth. That was kind of exciting, because all of us realized that we were getting somebody in the White House who apparently had some charisma, at least. We had a feeling, as everybody did at the time, that we were perhaps opening a new era in U.S. relations with the rest of the world, as well as with our own people.

We made kind of a three-way connection with the AID information people and the Ministry of Information in Vietnam, as we had tried to do in Cambodia, but in Phnom Penh it wasn't really very effective because there wasn't much of a ministry. In Vietnam there was more of a ministry. They had learned considerably more from the French about how to establish a Ministry of Information and what such a Ministry should do.

They could never quite understand that the United States didn't have a Ministry of Information. We are one of the few countries in the world which does not have one. But in most developing countries, the official attitude is that every government needs a Ministry of Information. The concept of press releases and press conferences, of course, was absolutely foreign to the Vietnamese. We tried to address that problem although I didn't think that the palace in Saigon ever gave a press conference. It would never have occurred to them. We did, however, get the Minister himself to give press conferences from time to time. That was a change. So we had some influence on how they worked.

I brought whatever professional background I could to bear on the AID operation, using it as a liaison to the Information Ministry. One of our USIS press staff and the AID information "advisor" shared an office at the Ministry of Information which was fine, providing for a two-way liaison and cross-fertilization of ideas and programs and projects. I guess our USIS films office, perhaps more than any other, worked most closely with the Vietnamese Ministry of Information. We had the capability, the professional know how and to a large degree the technical apparatus with which to make films of use to them as well as to us.

Q: Were these shown in a field program? Did they get out into the boondocks at that time?

ANSPACHER: Yes, they did. They would go out largely by vehicle. Compared to Phnom Penh, Saigon was a million dollar operation. We had a whole building to ourselves with almost all the equipment, including vehicles, we needed. In Phnom Penh, we had half a floor, plus a library. But in Saigon we were a big thing, and we got to be very well-known. We were located in an absolutely magnificent place, right on the main corner of Saigon across the way from a large, modern hotel and down the street from the Parliament building. It was a stone's throw from the Palace. We made very good contact with the Ministries of Education and Information. They had a Ministry of Cultural Affairs too, where we also had some very good friends. I think we had some impact, certainly in Saigon, until "impact" became a matter of "how many Viet Cong did you kill today?" At that point our kind of impact was beside the point. All we had to do was talk anti-communist to be on the side of the angels, presumably.

At the time I was there, before the U.S. got into the kind of combat we eventually did, I think we did manage to inculcate the Vietnamese with some ideas about how the United States worked, particularly in the media area, and in some measure: democracy. Now, Ngo Dinh Diem himself was not a democrat by any means. He was about as autocratic and dictatorial as anybody could be. He has a brother and a sister-in-law who, with him, managed to run that country.

Q: Along with Madame Diem?

ANSPACHER: Well, his sister-in-law, Madame Nhu. She was the wife of the brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu. She's still alive, so far as I know for what that's worth, somewhere in France, I think. Diem and his brother, Nhu, of course, are dead.

Our principal problem, as is frequently the case -- I'm sure it is in a place like South Africa -- was to present our concepts of democracy and political and economic theory and practice in the face of the dictatorial oppression that Diem laid on his people. We were fighting not so much ignorance or communism as the Mandarin in the palace. We had to be careful not to fight him outright or our Ambassador would hear about it. This was Elbridge Durbrow, at first, when Frederick Nolting. Durbrow was a very experienced diplomat who "took nothing from anybody," having worked in Moscow with Kennan and Bohlen and that crowd. He was used to a tough turf and he handled it very well. He and I had some differences but who doesn't? When we got to "Fritz" Nolting, who was Durbrow's successor, it was a different ballgame. He could not bring himself to raise his voice effectively against Diem on behalf of the United States. I found that disappointing and perhaps disastrous.

[Aside.] I found out considerably later that the appointment of Fritz Nolting to Saigon happened in the most bizarre way -- according to the report I have -- which may be apocryphal, but it's a great story. It is that President Kennedy, in the days between the election and the inauguration, sent Walt Rostow to the State Department to find Ambassadors for Southeast Asia, one for Bangkok, one for Saigon. Among the people Rostow talked to was a man named Bill Lacy, whom you may know. Bill Lacy had been very prominent in Southeast Asian affairs before the war. His wife wrote "The King and I," among other things. He spoke Thai. He spoke Lao. He spoke some Vietnamese.

Well, Bill Lacy and a lot of other people told Rostow that the man for Saigon was Kenneth Todd Young, who was not a career Foreign Service Officer. He had been with Standard Oil in Southeast Asia. He knew Diem and he knew Saigon and Vietnam. They said Young is the man for Saigon -- very strong, very knowledgeable, just the right choice. For the other side of the coin, Bangkok, they advised Rostow, take Frederick Nolting, a career Foreign Service Officer.

Somewhere between Foggy Bottom and 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, I have heard, those names were switched. Kenneth Young went to Bangkok. Fritz Nolting went to Saigon. I maintain to this day that if that had not happened, the course of events in Southeast Asia might have been changed. Kenneth Young was a completely different person. He would not for a moment taken a lot of the guff that Diem handed Nolting and which Nolting swallowed hook, line and sinker, I'm afraid.

I'll give you another anecdote. Once, when things seemed to be going badly for the South Vietnamese, I went to a dinner meeting of the Rotary Club, as a guest. After the meeting, six or seven prominent Vietnamese who were also members of Rotary came up to me and said they'd like to talk to me.

These were people who were known as loyal South Vietnamese, the "loyal opposition." They were not North Vietnamese agents so far as I know. They said they wanted very much to talk to Ambassador Nolting. Things are going from bad to worse, they said. He's got to take a stand with Diem. We can't get in to see him, they said.

The next time I saw the Ambassador, I reported this conversation. I said I think these people just want to talk to you. I don't know what they have in mind, but they're honestly concerned about the way their country is going down the drain. They are loyal but they are in opposition. And they want to talk to you. I think you ought to see them at your residence, not here in the Embassy, not in the Chancery. The Ambassador disagreed. He said the president wouldn't like it. At that point it suddenly struck me what was wrong with this whole situation. "Which president," I asked. "President Diem," he replied. I said, "Mr Ambassador, you don't work for President Diem. It doesn't make any difference whether he likes it or not. What matters is the president you work for -- Kennedy." But he wouldn't do it; he never did see them.

Well, things like this made me wonder how the course of history as we know it now might have changed if we'd had different people there. The Ambassador never really understood I'm afraid what was happening.

After we were all back [in Washington] a group of us Country Team Members, absent the Ambassador (the CIA Station Chief, William Colby, Political Officer, Joe Mendenhall, myself, the Military Attaché, and Bill Jorden, a special assistant to Averell Harriman) went to see Walt Rostow at the White House. Do you know Bill Jorden?

Q: Oh, yes. Very well.

ANSPACHER: He must be a neighbor of yours or almost, isn't he? He lives out in Virginia somewhere.

Q: No, he lives in the District now.

ANSPACHER: We tried to convince Walt Rostow that things were going from bad to worse under Fritz Nolting. He simply wasn't making any progress. Every time he went over to the Palace he was given a shopping list and he never argued about it. He never tried to tell Diem what was right and what was wrong.

Anyway, that's all really beside the point. Were we in USIS effective? We were up to the point of our getting into the war, when it became academic as to whether we were effective in promoting American and United States policies and so forth. Our job from that time on was to defeat the Communists from North Vietnam. And we had to go along with whatever seemed to be pointing in that direction.

During my stay in Saigon, we organized what eventually became the Psychological Operations Coordinating Committee. We had representatives from CIA, MAAG (Military Assistance Group), AID, and the Embassy political section. We had a pretty good little committee dealing largely with what the military was doing in psychological warfare, with the USIS and CIA support.

But it was until I got back to this country and ran into the officer who had been the liaison between MAAG and USIS that I realized that MAAG had never really been a member of our Committee; that this major was under orders from his commanding general to tell us nothing and to agree to nothing and to distance himself from everything we were doing. I had kind of suspected this might be the case. But I had never seen it or heard it spelled out that way. I think I was out of the Agency by that time. But in any event I think I reported this conversation to the Assistant Director.

Q: Who was it that told you this?

ANSPACHER: This was a man named Major Bartz, B-A-R-T-Z. He was a pretty decent guy. I've forgotten his first name. He had been the liaison between MAAG and USIS and it was General (Paul) Harkings who had given him direct orders to distance himself from our committee, provide no information, offer no assistance, agree to nothing, tell us nothing. Great way to run a coordinating committee!

Let's see what else. There are a lot of little anecdotes about the Saigon period. We almost killed Paul Neilson, for instance.

Q: Was he there as Press Officer?

ANSPACHER: No, he was Deputy Assistant Director for Far East and he came out on an inspection trip once.

Q: That's right. He was at that time. Ken Bruce, I guess was the Assistant Director for Far East. Paul died not too long after that.

ANSPACHER: Paul Neilson. Yes, I know. I rather liked Paul. Paul and I got along quite well.

Q: I first knew him in Indonesia.

ANSPACHER: Paul had a good friend on my staff named Ed Robinson. Do you know Ed Robinson?

Q: The name sounds familiar but I don't think so.

ANSPACHER: He's been in and out of the Agency. He was our Press Officer at the time, working for an Information Officer who was less capable than he. So he was suffering more or less visibly under that situation.

My deputy was Herb Baumgartner, who'd come down from Korea, a fine officer. He wanted very much to be a PAO and I don't think he ever made it. He felt that he ought to be PAO because he'd been deputy in Korea. He felt that he ought to have his own post.

Q: Is this Ev Bumgardner or Herb Baumgartner?

ANSPACHER: Herb.

Q: Herb was later deputy in Thailand but I don't think he was ever a PAO.

ANSPACHER: He never quite made it to the alter. I think he resented that a little bit. Ev Bumgardner's a different person. Spells his name differently and was a different type entirely. He had no illusions about being a PAO. He was a photographer and reporter and he also became a Vietnam expert of some sorts didn't he? Or Philippine expert.

Q: He's out of the Agency now.

ANSPACHER: Oh, yes. I think he was a photographer or artist or reporter or something. I think he worked largely for the Regional Service Center in Manila. Anyway, Ev was never on my staff.

This was Herb Baumgartner. Herb was Deputy PAO. Information Officer was Howard Caulkins. Films Officer was Dave Sheppard, whom I had insisted on keeping despite the fact that I had had pressure from Washington to take someone whom Washington wanted. Washington being -- who was our great films man in Washington for a while, later became an Ambassador?

Q: Turner Shelton.

ANSPACHER: Turner Shelton wanted some friend of his to come down from Laos to be Films Officer. But I was very pleased with Dave. I liked his attitude; his background seemed fine. He seemed to be doing a good job. So we kept him on. And I just turned Turner Shelton down. I do not regret it. And Turner and I may never have got along but that's all right. Turner's dead now, isn't he?

Q: He's dead now.

ANSPACHER: Well, it doesn't make any difference, does it? Anyway, Dave was the Films Officer. His assistant was a man named Douglas Pike, of whom you may have heard, the resident United States expert on the North Vietnam psyche, a venture which he started with a little cubbyhole of an officer and a Vietnamese secretary. Now he's developed this profession of being a Vietnam "expert." More power to him.

The Information Officer, Howard Caulkins, was a fine, nice guy, a sweet guy -- and I use the word sweet advisably. Almost never lost his temper. Never got excited. He was not terribly imaginative but he did his job in a very routine, pedantic, by the book way. He did what he was asked to do, did it reasonably well, but not with an awful lot of verve. The verve in the Information Office belonged to Ed Robinson, who suffered from ignominy, if you will, of working for a man to whom he was intellectually and perhaps even professionally superior and than whom he was more capable.

Ed Robinson and Paul Neilson were very close friends from their Burma days when Paul had been PAO in Rangoon. So they were thick as thieves. This got a little bit embarrassing because Paul really put me in a spot when he came to me. Ed Robinson had gone to Paul about his problems on my staff.

Paul came to me about them. But there wasn't anything I could do without making a drastic change which he had to do. I couldn't do it. The Area Director had to move people around, either remove Ed and transfer him or remove Ed's boss. I couldn't really initiate it without causing more trouble than it was worth. Well, as a result, I guess of this, on night Ed got a little bit exuberant about things and attacked me personally and physically which I felt was terribly unfortunate, because he didn't really know what he was doing. Both he and Paul came to me later and apologized; Paul had heard about the incident, not from me but from Ed.

As I told Paul, I had a perfect right at that point to ask for Ed out of there. It would have ruined his career if I'd written it the way I could have. I preferred to talk to Paul about it and let Paul straighten out Ed and let us go on with a person who was a valuable member of the staff. And he was valuable. He did a good job. And that's the way it was all solved. Since then Ed and I have become quite close whenever we see each other, from time to time, in Washington.

Whom else did we have? We had some good Administrative Officers, some very good ones. People who in the best code of administrative procedure start by nodding their heads instead of shaking their heads. This is the way I judge an Administrative Officer. For instance, Jim Hoofnagle would say, "Let's see what we can do about it" instead of saying "No, that's impossible." There have been some like that. But I had some good administrative people who understood the rules of the game but also knew how to find the loopholes in them. And we had a pretty good operation, in Saigon Budgeted I guess, at about a million dollars annually.

Also, we had a good Country Team in Saigon. My personal relations with the Ambassador were fine until -- but this gets a little bit ahead of the story -- there began to be a large influx of American troupes. It was quite obvious; all we had to do was stand on a major street corner with a counter and figure that out there were more than the 688 "advisors" that were officially allowed by treaty.

One day two correspondents came to me and said, "We know, because it has been leaked out of Washington, that there is a "baby flattop" carrying helicopters and American troops, coming into a port down in the south of Vietnam." They said they would like to go aboard that vessel, to meet her and come up the river with her.

I suggested they talk to the Ambassador about it. We talked and we had an exchange of cables with Washington. As a result the Ambassador ruled out the proposed press trip. Now, because I could see the newsmen's point, this demonstrated one of the problems a former professional media man faces in a PAO job. There have been others like this, too. One finds oneself on both sides of the desk at the same time. I knew these correspondents were right. I knew what they wanted to do. I knew they were basing their requests on good information. But I had to stand on a policy decision that didn't make much sense. Somehow it had leaked out of Washington or out of San Francisco. Everybody knew it. It was in the public domain. Yet we had this hard and fast policy decision we could not confirm or deny that there was such a ship.

Then these two reporters, who up to that time had been reasonably good friends of mine (because I tried to keep these guys, some of whom I had known professionally before, on good terms), reported back to their newspapers (the Chicago Daily News and U.S. News and World Report) that I was being obstructionist, impossible to deal with, a discredit to the government.

As a result, who should show up on the scene from a distance but Pierre Salinger, who decided that, "something had to be done about this guy Anspacher." The first thing Salinger did, or somebody did, I guess it was Salinger, was to send out to Saigon a special Press Attaché, a man named Davis. Impossible guy. I don't think he'd ever been in the Agency.

He walked into my office and said, "I'm your new Press Attaché." He didn't really say "I'm your new Press Attaché." He said, "I am the Ambassador's Press Attaché." This was news to me. I'd never heard of him. He put his feet up on my desk and said, "Now, let's get things straight." Well, it seems the Ambassador had had a cable from Washington (signed Salinger) appointing this guy as the Ambassador's own Press Attaché with no relation to me, no responsibility to me.

I called the Ambassador and asked, "What am I supposed to do with this Davis?" "Cooperate with him," the Ambassador replied. Judging by the way he has started, it wasn't going to be easy, because he (Davis) had started off by saying, "Now, the thing we've got to do with these correspondents is get them laid. Get them drunk and get them laid, preferably with American secretaries," he said, looking around my outer office.

"We've really got a handful here," I said to myself. To him, I said, "We'd better understand each other. Either you're going to work with me or I'm going to have nothing to do with you and I'm going to tell Washington that you are completely on your own. If the Ambassador wants to put up with this kind of nonsense that's up to him. But I'm not going to. And I'm not going to have you responsible to me and conduct yourself any old way you please. So let's make an arrangement." He said, "Well, that's fine. I'll go off and work for the Ambassador." I think I wrote a memorandum of conversation for the record stipulating that I took no responsibility for Davis and/or his activities.

The next thing that happened was that there was one of those conferences in Hawaii with the President of South Vietnam and the high command of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff and God knows who all, including the "Press Attaché" from the Saigon Embassy. I thought maybe it would be I or maybe my Press Officer. Oh, no. It was this Davis who, I guess, got all the correspondents drunk and laid. That's the way he handled press relations. Well, that wasn't the way I had been taught or experienced to do it.

As I said, I wrote an official memorandum of conversation disassociating myself and the U.S. Information Service from this guy no matter what Pierre Salinger said. And Mr. Murrow either took that under advisement, or swallowed it, or put it in the back of his hat.

Another such "memorandum of conversation" I wrote had been from Cambodia. We can backtrack a little bit. I came in to our office one Monday morning in Phnom Penh to find waiting for me the pilot of our USIS power boat, which we used to take films and publications and whatever we had up the river to show the hoards of fascinated peasants who would gather on the shore -- just as they did in the day of the old Mississippi steamboat.

The pilot came to me and said, "We've got to do something about this boat. The Ambassador ordered me and the boat out yesterday with 47 people aboard. That boat can't carry 47 people, especially if they're smoking the way they were smoking. I've got a full 55-gallon drum of gasoline on that craft. These people were all over that boat. I couldn't see where I was going. They were lying all over the boat, obstructing my vision and the running lights and so forth.

So I said, "We've got to do something about this." It just so happened that the Naval Attaché from the Embassy in Saigon was also responsible for Cambodia since Cambodia didn't have much of a Navy. What it did have he could deal with. He was due in town the next week or so. When he got in I asked him to take a look at this boat and rate it for passengers. And he stipulated, 23 or 24 passengers with life preserves and that's all.

I went to the Ambassador as gently as I could, because talking with Rob McClintock this way was not the easiest thing in the world. I told him in words to this effect that something had to be done about this boat. It is rated for 24 people, I said, and that's all it can carry. "You really can't ask my pilot," I continued -- at this point he cut me off. He said, "I can ask your pilot to do anything I damn well please at any time of the day or night with that boat which belongs to me." Wait a minute. We've got real problems here.

So my first "memorandum" to the Agency said, in effect: "Make up your mind whether this boat belongs to the Ambassador and he can do with it as he pleases, in which case you better absolve us of all responsibility, or it belongs to USIS, and you straighten this out back in Washington." Well, we did get that straightened out in favor of USIS. But it was touch and go for a few minutes.

Now back to Saigon. As I say, my second "memorable memo" had to do with this Press Attaché fellow. I don't know what ever happened to him. Because the end of our tour was approaching and I was due for home leave. Largely as a result of all of this, I think, Salinger had arranged with Deputy Director Don Wilson for John Mecklin to replace me.

There was a PAO conference between the time my orders came in and my date of departure on home leave. The Ambassador said he wanted me back. And I said, fine. I'll leave all my stuff here and I'll be back in two or three months and Herb Baumgartner will handle things. We're virtually in a war time situation anyway.

Q: Are you now back in Vietnam?

ANSPACHER: Oh, yes, we're in Vietnam now. This was shortly after my confrontation with the Salinger-anointed Press Attaché and the Hawaii conference. I was furious at the way this thing had been handled. And I had a feeling that Ed Murrow didn't know anything about it. Well, anyway, between the time I had my orders and the time I actually left on home leave we had a PAO conference at Baguio in the Philippines. I think it was a joint conference with ambassadors, too. I'm not sure.

In any event, Don Wilson had come out to the Baguio conference. He and I went out for dinner one evening, and he said, "We're replacing you in Saigon." I said, "How come? The Ambassador and I, at the last report which was two days ago, had arranged that I would be back as soon as I could. He trusted Herb Baumgartner but not terribly far. And he wanted me back as quickly as possible. Wilson then said that the Ambassador doesn't know about this yet. But "we're doing it. That's just the way Salinger and we want it. He said John Mecklin would be my successor. I didn't know Mecklin but I knew of him. He had been a favorite of Don Wilson's when Don was an executive with Time magazine. And John had been, I think, either the Paris or Bonn bureau chief for Time, or both. He also had been in Saigon before. He had covered Saigon for Time. He knew the area. It was a good choice if the choice had to be made. He was not an Agency Officer. He was brought in from the outside.

But this was a shock to me, the way it was being done, and I felt it was being done because of what had happened with the two American correspondents. I thought this was unfair, that they had buckled under to the correspondents whereas I had stood with the policy.

I went to the Ambassador and asked if he had known about this. He said he had just had a cable about it. I said, "How do you feel about it?" He said, "Well, what can I do?" I said, "What can you do? You can object." "Well," he replied, "I don't really think I ought to." At that point I was just fed up. It was really a terrible blow. I had wanted to come back to Saigon.

I don't know that Murrow knew about all this. Ed and I had been acquaintances for many years. When I did leave he called me on the phone in Hong Kong, to ask that I take over the counter-insurgency program. I rather suspect that it was a combination of Salinger's pressure on Wilson, maybe Mecklin himself -- Mecklin reportedly had to get out of Paris for personal reasons which are not germane at all -- I think Salinger was knuckling under to the correspondents' pressure.

Don Wilson was in a position to do something about John Mecklin's future -- and mine -- in response to the confrontation I had had with the correspondents in Saigon about the incoming ship, which resulted in my being more or less "removed" from office. It had to do with Pierre Salinger's feelings about what had happened, and Don Wilson's interest in John Mecklin's future. They all came together and it seemed appropriate from Washington's point of view to replace me despite what the Ambassador had said he felt about it. And, of course, despite the way I felt about it. But there it was. There wasn't anything I could do except resign, which I would have done if it hadn't been for Edward R. Murrow, to whom I owed a certain loyalty just out of long-term friendship.

The experience in Saigon was one I would have wanted to extend because it was a fascinating exercise in the potential of propaganda, the potential of psychological operations (call it warfare or not as you please), which we had begun to conduct through our Operations Coordinating Committee. And eventually it got a lot of publicity, not so much under John Mecklin, whose tenure in Saigon was cut short because of ill health. Barry Zorthian became the great "psychological warrior" in Vietnam. I'm not sure that he invented most of the stuff that he lays claim to -- or which is attributed to his having invented it.

Thus, the Vietnam experience had several high spots and that particular low spot. I guess one of the things which stands out in my mind is not only the election coverage which I've mentioned before -- the election of John Kennedy -- but even more important, the assistance we provided to AID in training Vietnamese information people and correspondents, the guidance we were able to give them, the introduction to a "democraticness" we tried to provide for them.

The Vietnamese under Ngo Dinh Diem were not terribly fascinated by the idea of a free press as we know it. So I think we got some ideas across. But they were very rarely put into practice in the local press simply because of the control that was imposed by the Palace through the Ministry of Information. The minister himself I'm sure was not convinced of the role of a free press. Otherwise, he wouldn't have been the Minister of Information to begin with I would assume.

Then there was the visit of Vice President Lyndon Johnson -- three days that shall live in infamy in my view. I don't know that I'll ever forget those three days. It started with the press plane being taken out of action in the Philippines. So the press had to get into the back of the Vice President's plane.

Upon its arrival in Saigon, our problem immediately was to get the press off that plane before the Vice President got off, so they could do the coverage that was necessary. Fortunately, we were fairly good friends with the Pan Am operations officer and we arranged by radio for the pilot or somebody to jam that front door long enough for us to get the back door open and let the press get out and get around to where they could cover the Vice President coming down the stairway from the (by now) unjammed front door.

Then there was the problem of the cavalcade into town from Ton Son Nhut Airport. The Press Secretary for the Vice President, whose name was George Reedy, said, that Vice President's car will be at the head of the line and that's that. And I said that wouldn't do. The Palace, not Reedy, was running things at that point. We had a long set to at the back of the airport while Johnson was getting ready to get aboard his car. The motorcade was set up by the Diem Palace and no Vice President of no United States was going to change it just because he happened to feel like it.

I don't think I won that one but it wasn't easy. And I guess I made an enemy of that press secretary. The Secret Service agent, who later showed up on the rear bumper of the Kennedy car in Dallas (his name was Trueblood, I think), came up to me and said, "That guy's been giving us trouble the whole trip. You should have popped him one."

Anyway, we got the motorcade into town and those three days began. One of the problems, as I think I've heard from other people who have experienced visits with this particular vice president, was that the only way to cover Lyndon Johnson is to have two teams of still- and motion-picture photographers who "leapfrog," with one team covering him at point A; the second team covering point B, while the A team goes on to point C, and so on.

Well, the Vice President kind of took a shine to Team A and when they didn't show up at Point B he raised Cain and had his Signal Corps man ask, "where's that guy who was doing the pictures at the last one?" I explained that he was at point C. The Signal Corps seemed never to have heard of this leapfrogging technique. We finally got that one hammered out, got the Signal Corps guy convinced. I don't know whether or not he ever convinced the Vice President.

But after the day was over the same Signal Corps officer came to me and he said, "Now, we ought to see the rushes -- or "dailies" on this one tomorrow." I said, "Where do you think you are? this is Saigon, Vietnam. These things have to go to Tokyo to be processed. There isn't any processing of color film short of Tokyo." He said, "Don't be ridiculous. I want these in my hands tomorrow morning." I said, "Fine. You sit there and wait for them; I'll get them to you when I get them." So we had that little set to. These were I tell you, three days that shook my world.

A day or so later, of course, was the farewell dinner which the Vietnamese hosted at the Palace. Everybody went in his bib and tucker and everybody there on the Embassy staff had a job. Mine was to act as interpreter for Mrs. Johnson and Madam Nhu, the President's sister-in-law, wife of Ngo Nhu.

In the meantime, the USIS staff was working up the Vietnamese, French and Chinese versions of the joint Ngo-Johnson communique which had been agreed upon earlier in the day. The staff was back at the office under Herb Baumgartner's direction. When that interpreting chore of mine at the Palace was finished I went back to the officer to see how things were coming along. Now, this is really anecdotal. It may not belong in this at all but it's fun. I got a telephone call from the official Vietnamese Guest House across the street from the Palace. This is where the Vice President and Mrs. Johnson and the whole entourage were staying. I was told that the Vice President wanted to see me.

So, grabbing pencil and paper, I drove up to Guest House, got upstairs and the State Department Officer at the head of the stairs said, "The Vice President and his staff are on the balcony on the other side of the bedroom. You've got to walk through the bedroom to the balcony." There was the Vice President of the United States, 6'4" tall, in his pajama tops. I repeat, tops. On the telephone to the White House. This is the telephone link which is relayed by radio via a ship at sea and thence to Washington. It's all "scrambled" as it goes.

Now here's the Vice President saying, "Jack! Jack! (obviously, talking to the President of the United States) Jack, this is Lyndon." I don't know what the response at the other end was but I can imagine that Kennedy, his wit sharpened to the extreme had asked, "Lyndon who?" Because the next word I heard was "Lyndon Johnson! Who do you think!"

So, between the Signal Corps and the photographer problems and communications between the White House and the Guest House in Saigon it was all just too much. We finally got the Vice President out of Saigon. And I guess it was then that he went off to Pakistan and did the camel driver routine. Was that the same trip?

Q: It was the same trip.

ANSPACHER: We were never so glad to see a vice president leave. Otherwise, did we do good in Saigon? I think we probably did, overall, until we got to a point where it was psychological warfare and nothing else. It had little or nothing to do with what USIA was principally intended to do in a normal peacetime situation. When you're at war the only thing that's going to make any sense is to conduct our kind of warfare, which is psychological warfare against the enemy. And so you have leaflet drops and you have cross-the-lines loud speakers. You have all kinds of gimmicks that might be feasible, and you try some that aren't feasible. So whether you succeeded in terms of the basic U.S. role and USIS mission is, I think, academic in such a situation.

I left Saigon under the circumstances that I have described with respect to the change in PAOs.

JOHN J. HELBLE
Political Officer
Saigon (1960-1961)

Consul

Hue (1961-1964)

Vietnam Working Group
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Political Officer
Saigon (1973)

John J. Helble was born in 1934 and raised in Appleton, Wisconsin. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin with a degree in international relations. He was influenced by his father to enter Foreign Service. He has also served in Venezuela, Malaysia, and Bangladesh. He was interviewed by Thomas F. Conlon on April 5, 1996.

Q: And the opportunities for travel. Well, when did you leave Puerto La Cruz?

HELBLE: We left Puerto La Cruz in August, 1959. I had requested Chinese language training for my next assignment. I was informed by Personnel that there was a surplus of Chinese language officers and applicants for this kind of training. Since I had put down Vietnamese language training as my second choice, I was given that assignment.

So, after a brief leave, I went back to Washington and reported in to the Foreign Service Institute and began a nine-month, intensive period of training in Vietnamese.

Q: This was in the garage or the basement of Arlington Towers.

HELBLE: That's right. The old FSI.

Q: How was the course organized? I'm covering ground which I know very well because I was one of the other two Foreign Service Officers in the course with you. However, this is to record your experience.

HELBLE: It would be an exaggeration to say that the course was well organized. There were three FSO's in the class, one of whom is the interviewer, Tom Conlon; the second one was Jim Montgomery; and myself. Tom was very much the senior and more experienced. He had already had several assignments overseas and knew much more about the Foreign Service than Jim Montgomery and I. I had just had the assignment to Puerto La Cruz. Jim Montgomery had not yet had an overseas assignment.

Q: He was working in Personnel, wasn't he?

HELBLE: I believe that he was. In any event the three of us had a Vietnamese tutor, Dinh van Ban, who had been teaching for a couple of years, at least, at the Foreign Service Institute. He also had a full-time job in the Vietnamese service of the Voice of America. He started this job in the wee hours of the morning. Frequently, our class did not start until 11:00 AM. Then we would go on until late in the afternoon. The routine was six hours of classroom time, as a general rule, with some relief due to our participation in the Southeast Asian studies course which accompanied all of the Southeast Asian language training courses at the Foreign Service Institute.

Q: In addition to Dinh van Ban, there was an American linguist, wasn't there?

HELBLE: An American linguist named James Bostain. He was rather a renowned "character" at the Foreign Service Institute. Indeed, he had had a great deal of language training and was a very interesting man.

Q: Do you remember that story about one of his lectures? He was a very good lecturer. One of his lectures concerned "cultural shock." Remember that one?

HELBLE: I remember some of that "cultural shock."

Q: Well, he would be speaking to people who were going to live in a foreign atmosphere overseas. He would say, "Now, I'm going to do something that may shock some of you," and with that he unzipped his fly. He didn't actually go beyond that, but immediately he got screams from some of the women in his class. He then said, "You've made my point. That kind of behavior is unacceptable in the United States. However, in many societies it is not particularly significant and no one is shocked at it."

HELBLE: Right.

Q: Bostain was a good linguist, in fact, but I don't think that his heart was really in it.

HELBLE: The days in the Vietnamese class were long and essentially tedious. The class time frequently degenerated into story telling in English, particularly when our weary tutor, who was on his second job of the day and was never able to get enough sleep, would fall fast asleep. He was a very nice fellow who related well to us, as we did to him. It was an enjoyable group. One thing that I very quickly learned, in the first couple of weeks, was that I had not had a lot of association with "brilliant" FSO's in my Puerto La Cruz assignment. I worked with three real "losers." There had been only one "sound" fellow to associate with during the previous two years. I rapidly learned, in the company I was keeping in this particular class, that I was the "dumbest" of the three...

Q: I doubt that.

HELBLE: And you fellows knew a lot more about just about anything than I did. However, you tolerated me. We got along very well and became lifelong friends through that experience.

I recall that I was delighted when the class finally ended in June, 1960. We were, of course, all assigned to the Embassy in Saigon. My initial orders said that I was to be Assistant Personnel Officer in Saigon. Tom Conlon was assigned as a Second Secretary in the Political Section, and Jim Montgomery was assigned as a Third Secretary in the Economic Section.

When my family and I arrived in Saigon, the Montgomery's had been there for all of 24 hours. Tom, I think that you were also there, although I don't recall exactly if you arrived a day or two earlier.

Q: We all arrived in Saigon at about the same time.

HELBLE: We arrived at about the same time. When my family and I arrived in Saigon, I was met by an Embassy representative and informed that my orders had been changed. I would be a Third Secretary in the Political Section. This was fine with me. Again, whatever the Service said was what I was going to do.

In retrospect, my change was fortunate in terms of my subsequent career activities and assignments. That's just the way the ball bounces, sometimes. Sometimes it bounces in your direction and sometimes it doesn't.

Q: That's so true, and timing is so much. I would just correct one point that you made there. I was actually assigned as Consul in Hue. When I arrived in Saigon, the Ambassador was Elbridge Durbrow, whom I had served under previously in Singapore, when he was Consul General. He told me, "Tom, we're going to keep you here in Saigon for about three months until you get used to Vietnam, before you go up to Hue. You'll be on TDY, you'll be in an Embassy house," and so forth. So I thought, "Why not?" "Durby" was a friend. Saigon was a good experience. At the end of three months "Durby" said, "Well, we're going to keep you for three more months in Saigon." I was still on per diem, still living in an Embassy house, and had no complaint about that. Then, at the end of six months, "Durby" said, "Well, you're going to stay in Saigon. You're not going to go to Hue."

I was sorry about this because I knew, from my previous experience with the Indonesian language, that you need a period after the FSI training -- whether it's a "good" FSI program or not -- to put it all together, walk down the street, talk to shopkeepers and merchants, and develop your knowledge of the language. I never really had this opportunity in Saigon. I knew that I would never really be able to speak Vietnamese fluently. That's the way it turned out to be. I look back on this as if I were in an aircraft at the head of the runway, revving up the engines, but never getting them running fast enough to take off.

HELBLE: Your description of your intended and actual assignments during that year [1960-1961] is consistent with my recollection. I had forgotten that you were not initially assigned as Second Secretary to Saigon. We knew that you were supposed to go to Hue as Consul, but you were retained in Saigon for basic grounding in the Vietnamese political scene.

To jump ahead, and this will come out sooner or later, so I'll say it right now. It was shortly after the visit to Saigon of Vice President Lyndon Johnson in May, 1961 that I was called in by the Ambassador and told that I was going as Consul to Hue and that I would leave in three weeks. This came as a complete shock to me. Then I felt very badly because I knew that Tom Conlon had been very anxious to go to Hue, looked forward to it and prepared for it. He and his sizeable family were counting on it. However, there was a change of orders and, in retrospect, it was my good fortune that I had that opportunity.

Q: I thought so. I thought that it was a good opportunity for you and I certainly had no feelings of annoyance toward you. You had nothing to do with it. This was Ambassador Durbrow's decision. I thought very highly of him and got a lot out of the Saigon assignment. What I did not get out of it was a chance to develop my ability to speak Vietnamese comfortably. I never reached that point. I can say a few things and would never starve, but that would be all.

HELBLE: Well, Durby's explanation to me was that you had become too valuable in the Political Section to spare you for Hue. [Laughter] So I got the message that I wasn't valuable and probably was expendable. [Laughter]

Q: John, one thing that you passed over. Maybe you intended to do this, but in November, 1960, a few months after you had gotten to Saigon, there was an attempt to overthrow the Vietnamese Government of President Ngo Dinh Diem. I saw part of this. I made my way down to the Embassy fairly quickly from my house and helped with the reporting. But you had a unique perspective, and you might go into that.

HELBLE: I'll go into that. As I said, I just "jumped ahead" for a moment to describe what happened in May, 1961, in terms of our respective assignments.

I was the "low man on the totem pole" in the Political Section, an appropriate status for me, with my background. My duties were of lesser, if not minor interest to the Political Section.

Q: What sort of things?

HELBLE: I "covered" North Vietnam, but, of course, "covering" North Vietnam basically meant reading the Foreign Broadcast Information Service daily output, the FBIS, as it was known. I tried, in a rather hopeless manner, to interpret what was going on in North Vietnam through that medium. It was the only thing I had going in many respects, although I received some intelligence reports which were of marginal value. I was also given responsibility for following developments in Laos and "agrovilles," projects which President Diem had recently created. These were, in a sense, model community farms in the rural areas. That project received a lot of "ballyhooing" and promotion from the government. It never "took off" in any meaningful sense. Visitors were taken to visit "agrovilles" which had been opened, and celebrations were held. This project had a "Potemkin-like" character. Banana trees which had been cut off the night before from some neighboring orchard were planted along the roadways. They might last one day in the soil, just long enough for the opening ceremony.

Q: I think that Diem really believed that these programs were making progress. However, as you say, they never really "took hold." The concept itself was, I think, fatally flawed.

HELBLE: The responsibility for following agrovilles didn't enhance my status a great deal in the Political Section, as far as I was concerned. However, it was assigned to me. I became interested in it and became engrossed in this and other work.

I recall vividly, just four weeks after I arrived in Vietnam in early August, 1960, suddenly being summoned to Ambassador Durbrow's office, an experience which, at that stage in my life, awed me somewhat. Also present in the Ambassador's office were the Deputy Chief of Mission, Francis Cunningham, and the Political Counselor, Joseph A. Mendenhall. Durby, who was known as a rather rough, "barky" type individual, looked at me and said, "Helble, who the hell is Kong Le?" I had not the foggiest idea of who Kong Le was. I had to admit that I didn't know. The Ambassador said, "Well, you're following Laotian events, aren't you?" I said, "Yes, sir, but I just started." [Laughter] I admitted that I didn't know who Kong Le was. Well, he wouldn't be asking me, with all that seasoned talent at his side...

Q: They didn't know, either!

HELBLE: No. Of course, Kong Le was an obscure captain and battalion commander in Vientiane, Laos, who had just pulled off a coup d'etat. This was further evidence that I had some things yet to be learned in life. I certainly came to know who Kong Le was after that.

Q: Considering the amount of effort that we put into Vietnam, as well as Laos and Cambodia, too, I thought that the preparations made to underpin our policies were quite poor. We didn't have people in INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research] or on the desk in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs who knew very much about Indochina as a whole. The desk officer was Paul Kattenburg, who visited Vietnam once in 1952 and spent six weeks in the Red River Delta in North Vietnam. He didn't visit there again until after the Diem government was overthrown in 1963. He didn't know much about Vietnam, didn't know any Vietnamese, and took a very European "colonialist" view of the whole situation. In INR there was nobody following Vietnam in any consistent way. We just had no preparation for what was to come.

HELBLE: Yes, and we learned during our Vietnamese language lessons at the FSI that there wasn't a great deal of expertise around that we could draw on prior to our departure for Vietnam.

The 10 months that I spent in the Political Section certainly were of great value to me in terms of learning much more about the Foreign Service as it operates overseas, how a Political Section functions, and what the procedures, standards, requirements, and demands are. All of this was new to me. As I mentioned earlier, I had done some political reporting in Puerto La Cruz, Venezuela, but it was self-generated and self-guided. My efforts were based on nearly total ignorance about how to go about political reporting.

Q: One thing I thought about the Political Section at that time and have often thought about it since then was that it was a reasonably good section. The Political Counselor, Joe Mendenhall, was, in my view, one of the best Political Counselors I've ever run across. He was the most organized guy that I ever knew. You may have had a different view of Joe Mendenhall, but I thought that he was exceedingly capable and very intelligent. What used to "get" me was that he would remember things that he told me to do three weeks previously and which I may have forgotten about. Then I learned how he did this. He had a yellow, ruled, legal size tablet. He would write down what he asked me to do and date it. Then he'd keep on asking me about it until I did it.

HELBLE: I, of course, thought that he was first rate, without much basis for comparison available to me. As I said, I had three absolutely "horrific" bosses in Puerto La Cruz, so Mendenhall could have been a lot poorer as a supervisor and officer than he was, and I would have been impressed.

I thought very highly of Mendenhall. We are still good friends to this day and see each other periodically. He certainly taught me a lot. He was "demanding," in a sense, but not unreasonably so. As you say, he was highly organized. Over the years I've certainly learned that I'm a "Type A" personality i. e., an activist. However, Mendenhall was a "Type AAA" person. It wasn't bad training that I had from him, by any means. It was good for me.

Q: One thing that came up in Saigon. You may have seen this, too, and I'd appreciate your perspective on it. I certainly was aware that there was really no great love lost between the Ambassador and Francis Cunningham, the DCM. The Ambassador tended to "bypass" Francis and deal directly with Joe Mendenhall. This helped in the functioning of the Mission, but it's not a good way to do business.

HELBLE: It's not the "ideal" way, but you have to deal with the talent that you have available. In Durby's case, the DCM he had available had no talent whatsoever. Francis Cunningham was a "gutless wonder" who really didn't have the foggiest idea of how to run a diplomatic mission or how to serve the Ambassador as a useful adviser. Durby's turning to Mendenhall as his principal adviser and the man who would "get things done" was simply the only course of action available to Durby as far as I could see.

Q: What do you think of this situation? I've seen cases like this, and maybe you have, too, where there obviously was friction and no love lost between the Ambassador and the DCM. In such situations some Ambassadors have been tough enough to say to the DCM, "Look, it's time for you to go. I'll ask the Department to get you a good post, but this is not the one for you. I'm going to ask for your relief."

HELBLE: That's one possible course of action. Another possible course of action would be for the DCM in such a situation to initiate this himself. However...

Q: That's drastic action.

HELBLE: It is. I think that generally, unless the situation is terribly acute, people try to "cope" with it and...

Q: It wasn't that acute.

HELBLE: No, I don't think that it was. Most Ambassadors "jury rig" the situation, as Durby did, using Mendenhall instead of Cunningham.

I certainly learned about journalists overseas for the first time in Saigon in following events in North Vietnam, as I did, since nobody else was assigned to that or had any more expertise than I did. In fact, the term "expertise" is a gross exaggeration. If a journalist came to Saigon and wanted to talk to somebody in the Embassy about North Vietnam, I was "it." I recall vividly the encounter I had with Joe Alsop, a famous columnist who had his own orientation toward life.

Alsop came to see me, and I was rapidly developing what became my standard briefing on North Vietnam. After a few minutes it was evident that he was not interested in the things that I was saying. He was only interested in certain things that would buttress his already established convictions on the subject. I thought that this was a peculiar way of operating as a journalist. I thought that he should have had a broad perspective of events, and so forth -- and not just focus on the things that would buttress his own views, as expressed in his weekly column. I had other experiences with journalists, as most Foreign Service Officers have. Looking down the pike five years subsequently, I had the same kind of experience in dealing with Joe Kraft, another well known columnist. Joe Kraft always knew what he wanted as evidence to support his views.

Q: This is still in the Vietnam context?

HELBLE: Yes. So I got another perspective on life in the Foreign Service, as I had the opportunity for the first time to deal with journalists. Of course, in the succeeding years in Saigon and in Hue and associated with Vietnam, I had many "exposures" to the press -- to its strong points, in some cases, and certainly, in many cases, its very weak points. I had many such opportunities in the years ahead. But that was the first time I had to deal with this problem.

Q: One thing struck me, and I thought about it a lot because I also dealt with the press a great deal over the years in Vietnam -- and elsewhere, too. I think that the Vietnam experience was quite unique. Before that time journalists tended to be more or less "on our side," if I may put it that way. During most of the Vietnam experience, they tended to be highly critical of our policies. However, after the Vietnam war, they tended to be "on our side" again. Vietnam was a case all by itself. I never fully understand why it should have been this way. Did it strike you this way? Do you have any views on this?

HELBLE: Well, this is a fairly broad question. There were certainly many young journalists who came to Saigon, sent by their editors because they were eager to get into the battle, sometimes quite literally. In the early 1960's Vietnam was not yet the issue of great political significance in the United States which it had become by the late 1960's. There were a lot of young, "hard charging" journalists running around who lacked the same perspective that I lacked as a Third Secretary in the Political Section, in terms of any direct background and experience in dealing with a totally unique situation -- to them as well as to me. The difference between them and me was that they had access to publication on a global basis with their views, observations, and reporting. They were able to make very significant "names" for themselves in their profession. They tended to adhere to the proposition that "good news" is "no news" in terms of the world of journalism. They recognized that. There were many opportunities in Vietnam to depict situations in relatively stark terms. Actually, the situation in Vietnam was very complex, with no "blacks" and "whites" but many shades of "gray." You don't sell newspapers based on a profound, "in depth" article on the complexities of the situation. They wanted dramatic headlines, particularly as American troops became involved and the audience in the United States was very keenly attuned to the situation.

Q: Since you were dealing with North Vietnam as best you could, did you have much to do with the International Control Commission [ICC]?

HELBLER: I did not directly. One of my colleagues, Andy Fink, whom you will recall, principally followed the ICC in the Political Section. He handled liaison with the ICC. I read some of Andy's reporting and certainly met some of the Canadians and Indians in the ICC. I don't recall at that time meeting any of the Poles involved. I recall encountering a number of Poles at social or "after hour" functions. I mostly recall long discussions with Andy Fink about the "hopelessness" of this organization, the ICC, particularly the "duplicity" of the Indians and the "frustrations" of the Canadians.

Q: I think that the Canadians did everything that they could to be straightforward.

HELBLER: They did. They were just outvoted. Of course, they had no "enforcement" powers of any significance. This was a lesson which I bore in mind. Jumping ahead again to January, 1973, I was assigned to the Embassy in Saigon for six months on a TDY [Temporary Duty] basis, as you were, too.

My post of assignment was the Embassy in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. I came back on TDY to Saigon and was given responsibility to assist in the physical establishment of the ICCS [International Commission of Control and Supervision], in effect something of a successor organization to the ICC. I served as the liaison officer of the Embassy in Saigon with the ICCS. The lessons learned about the failure of the ICC were still quite fresh in my mind a dozen years later.

Q: Anything else about your time in Saigon?

HELBLER: The "highlight," of course, was the matter to which you referred, the attempted coup d'etat against President Diem on November 11 and 12, 1960. In my case I was scheduled to go to Angkor Wat in Cambodia, with my family and with Andy Fink, whom I just mentioned, and his family. Angkor Wat was a place that I had heard a great deal about, and I was anxious to see it. We had all of our arrangements in hand.

On the morning of November 11, at about 3:30 AM, one of our servants, who lived in quarters just behind our house, came into the house, knocked on our door, and told us that the Viet Cong were attacking Saigon. I went outside and could hear firing going on. I lived approximately a half mile from the Presidential Palace, where the shooting appeared to be going on. It was dark, and I didn't see anything that I could or should do at that point. So we went back to bed.

About 6:00 AM Andy Fink came to my house. He said, "There's a coup going on against Diem. They've closed the airport. We're going to have to cancel our trip." Well, I thought, that's the way it is. Even though I had leave scheduled, obviously, under the circumstances, I said to myself, "I guess I have to go to work." I started walking toward the Embassy. Normally, I would take a cab, but the Presidential Palace was between my house and the Embassy. I walked toward the Palace. I thought that at least I could see what was going on and perhaps I would have some useful, fresh information to report to the Embassy when I got there.

I walked along the west side of the Palace, Hong Thap Tu Avenue, heading toward Cong Ly Avenue.

Q: Was the firing still going on then?

HELBLE: There was no firing at that moment. There had been some firing still going on when I started to walk to the Embassy, but as I got close to the Palace, the firing ceased completely. As I walked along Hong Thap Tu Avenue, I couldn't see anything going on of any great interest. I turned East on Cong Ly Avenue, the street which ran in front of the Presidential Palace...

Q: On the North side of the Palace.

HELBLE: On the North side. I noticed that the good-sized plaza or park in front of the Presidential Palace had a large number of ARVN [Vietnamese Army] troops in it. I continued to walk blithely along Cong Ly Avenue, as there was no firing. Then I noticed a jeep which had been shot up right near the front gate of the Palace and the body of a soldier lying in the street. I now noticed that the troops I mentioned before were all taking cover behind the numerous trees in the park.

Q: They were in cover, and you were not.

HELBLE: They were all looking at the Palace, with their guns "at the ready." I was about 20 feet from the fence on the North side of the Palace, approaching the front gate. Then I saw another body and began to realize that "something had been going on here." [Laughter] In any event, since I saw no one inside the Palace gate, I started talking to a young Vietnamese Army lieutenant from the Paratroop Battalion, who was standing behind one of the trees. As it turned out, his battalion was deployed in that area. I asked him, "Are the Viet Cong inside the palace?" That was all that I knew at the time. I had had only one, relatively unreliable source - one of my household servants who had said that the Viet Cong were attacking the Palace. Then Andy Fink told me that there was a coup going on against President Diem. The lieutenant said that the VC [Viet Cong] were in the Palace.

Suddenly, troops on the outside, where I was, began to shoot at the Palace, and there was return fire from the various buildings within the fenced perimeter around the Palace. I was somewhat exposed. There wasn't a tree available behind which an ARVN paratrooper had not already taken cover. I suppose that I could have just laid down on the ground but I would have been fairly visible there. I ducked down and scurried as fast as I could to the west side of the park, Alexandre de Rhodes Avenue. There was a large, masonry wall surrounding a villa there which was a common sight. The wall was about four feet high. I jumped over the wall and lay there, inside it. I felt that I was secure there. Bullets were flying around. The firing continued for several minutes, then slowed down and stopped.

I was lying there, wondering what to do, when a voice came from above me, saying, "John, what the hell are you doing down there?" I looked up, and there was Bill Colby, the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] Chief of Station in the Embassy, standing on his balcony above me. He had obviously come out when the firing stopped, saw me lying down there, and recognized me. I joined him in his house. He'd been trying to get to the Embassy, but there was just a little too much "action" in the neighborhood for him to move out safely. His wife, Barbara, and, as I recall, four children were in the house. He didn't feel that he could leave them. He had been in touch with the Embassy on the telephone, but he really had to get to the Embassy to perform his official functions.

After a while, Colby said, "Would you stay here and look after Barbara and the kids? I'll slip out the back way, make my way out of this, and get to the office." So I agreed to do so. I spent the morning there with Barbara Colby and her children, under intermittent fire. His house, incidentally, had been "riddled" by stray bullets, although it was not seriously damaged. There were holes in the walls.

Q: Glass broken?

HELBLE: I don't recall broken glass, but I remember a number of holes in the walls. Colby's family stayed on the lower level, toward the back of the house, in a windowless area. Periodically, I would go out on the balcony and look around to see what was happening. Then I would call the Embassy and give them an oral report of what I was able to see.

Q: I might add that you were our "OP" [Observation Post] and were in a "very good position," because you were right at the center of the action. We valued that very, very much. It happened, as you recall, that the civilian telephone system was not affected at all by the coup. The military telephone system had been cut off. Somehow, the coup planners had not thought to cut off the civilian telephone system. So at the Embassy whenever we were bored or short of something to report, we'd say, "Let's give John a call." We'd call you and find out whether you were still there.

HELBLE: To move on several hours, to nightfall that night, by that time there were tanks and armored personnel carriers APC's which had come in supposedly to support the coup d'etat forces. I remember that there was one tank parked right in front of Colby's house which had turned its turret so that I was looking right down the barrel of its gun. It was aimed right at Colby's balcony.

I was rather uneasy about this. Furthermore, various ARVN troops had taken up positions behind the same wall that I had sheltered behind.

Q: They may have seen you go over that wall.

HELBLE: There was an ARVN officer there with a radio, which was crackling out messages back and forth -- communications with other units around there. When dusk fell, and there was no firing going on, I requested that the Embassy NOT call me. I would call the Embassy if anything changed, because I thought that if the phone were ringing in the house right next to these troops, it would be an invitation to intrusion, at least. It was a one-way calling system, but, yes, I initially did get some calls.

Earlier in the afternoon of November 11 Colby asked if I could get his family out of the house, if I had any opportunity to do so. The firing was sporadic and intermittent. It wasn't going on continuously. It would last for a few minutes at a time, with not much damage being done that I could see to either side. During one of the lulls I talked to the lieutenant who was running a little Command Post in the front yard of the Colby house. I told him that there was a woman and four children in the house and that I would like to get some kind of "safe conduct" arrangement to guarantee that I could get them out. All I would need was five minutes or so. He did some communicating on his radio. Eventually, he went forward with a white flag to the front gate of the Palace. A couple of Palace Guards came out to the gate, and they talked. The lieutenant returned to the house and said, "OK, you can take them out now. We have agreed that there will be no firing." There might not have been any firing anyway, but I felt a little better about having made this arrangement.

Q: A wise precaution.

HELBLE: So Barbara Colby and her children were able to leave, and I remained there, alone, for the rest of the afternoon and half of the following day. I helped myself to the refrigerator, for which I later wrote Barbara a proper "bread and butter" note of appreciation.

Q: I think that I saw that note. I seem to recall that Barbara Colby showed it to us.

HELBLE: The ARVN paratroopers had been there all day. A contingent of troops with APC's and tanks -- a total of 13 armored vehicles -- approached the square from the Cathedral north of the Palace. They were greeted with cheers from the paratroopers. There was some conversation between the commanders on the scene. The tanks moved into the park and took up positions pointing the muzzles of their guns at the Palace. Eventually, the paratroopers formed up into a proper line and marched out of the square. I had assumed that they had been relieved by a unit of the 24th ARVN Division from Can Tho, which, according to information phoned to me by the Embassy, had just arrived in Saigon. Is that correct?

Q: Yes.

HELBLE: Well, within 15-20 minutes after the paratroopers cleared the area, the tanks started up their engines, turned around, and pointed the muzzles of their guns "away" from the Palace. I duly reported this to the Embassy by phone. I thought that this was rather "strange." Of course, I was totally unaware of the fact that President Diem had been in communication with the commander of the 24th ARVN Division. They had come up to Saigon from Can Tho in the South in the guise of supporting the coup attempt and then, right before my very eyes, "double crossed" the paratroopers. [Laughter] I just couldn't figure out what was going on there at this point. However, as I said, when the tanks stopped maneuvering and settled in for the night, I was again looking down the barrel of the gun on one of those tanks!

In any event, the night passed quietly. Early on the following morning November 12, 1960, literally at the crack of dawn, I was awakened by a series of explosions. I peered out cautiously and saw all sorts of "red objects" sailing through the air and landing in the general vicinity of the Palace. I did not see any of these rounds hit the Palace directly. They fell on the grounds outside it. While this was going on, I got a call from the Embassy. They told me, "You'd better take cover. The coup forces out near the airport are going to be shelling the Palace." I said, "They're not 'going to be' but are doing it." [Laughter] In any event, while that was "intense fire" for me, in retrospect I think that there weren't that many rounds fired. However, at that point I had never been under any sort of artillery or rocket attack.

Q: You find out a lot when you're close up.

HELBLE: That's right. In any event, there was no attack on the ground accompanying the shelling of the Palace by the coup forces. There was no shooting in the area, other than the "incoming" artillery rounds.

The next several hours unfolded as follows. As I recall, just before 8:00 AM I could see Saigon traffic moving "normally" a block and a half away from the Palace. People were on their bicycles, "xyclos" bicycle trishaws were going back and forth, and people were headed for work or for the market, just avoiding the immediate area around the Palace. This was a curious anomaly, because here I was in the midst of an armed camp, with sporadic shelling and firing. Everybody else was going about their business as if nothing was happening. I found this situation "curious," to say the least.

Beginning around 8:00 AM some people had been gathering near the Palace gates, in front of the tanks and the APC's. Then up came a jeep which stopped, and an officer got out of it. He appeared to be a paratroop officer, as he wore a red beret. He proceeded to jump up on the front of a tank which was closest to the crowd. He started to harangue them, but I couldn't hear what he was saying. He had a "bull horn." The crowd numbered perhaps 2,000 or less. Basically, they looked to me like curious onlookers. He spoke to them for several minutes and then, as if he had given a command, the front ranks of the crowd started to surge down the main street Dai Lo Thong Nhat toward the entrance to the Palace, which was a short block away, through this park area of which I have spoken. I recall an officer down behind the wall in front of Colby's house give a command over the radio. Within an instant, all of the guns of the tanks -- or at least as far as I could determine -- started shooting in the general direction of the crowd. The firing was being done by the machine guns on the APC's and the soldiers in the square who were facing away from the Palace, as their armored vehicles were.

Q: Toward the crowd?

HELBLE: Toward the crowd. There was an enormous din -- hundreds of weapons going off simultaneously, including some "big caliber" stuff. The crowd stopped moving toward the Palace, strangely enough. Those on the edges of the crowd close to side streets or walls of villas behind which they could take cover scampered off and took cover. However, the bulk of the crowd was left in a fully exposed position in front of the troops firing at or toward them.

Q: Were the troops firing into the crowd or above their heads?

HELBLE: At this point it was not clear. However, basically, the crowd that couldn't escape down a side street "hit the ground" -- just lay down on the ground. This process took what I estimated was about 45 seconds. Then, on command, everybody stopped. The crowd on the ground lay there for a while. You couldn't tell whether they were dead or alive. Gradually, one by one they got up and scampered off to a side street. There was no more firing. So finally everybody got up and fled, leaving their bicycles, "xyclos," or whatever else behind them.

I had a pair of binoculars, so I looked at the wreckage on the street. Of course, there were some people who didn't get up. In one place I saw a head, but it didn't have a body attached to it. I certainly saw people who were wounded and in pain, as well as some not moving at all. At this point I forget what I calculated in terms of the number of casualties. However, if I recall correctly, it was something in the neighborhood of 13 to 15 people who had been wounded or killed. I don't remember now. I reported whatever it was to the Embassy. Certainly, several of them had been killed, while several others were badly wounded.

As it turned out, the officer who had "harangued" the crowd was the coup leader.

Q: Colonel Nguyen chanh Thi, wasn't it?

HELBLE: I believe that that was the one. He had apparently implored the crowd to "take" the Palace itself. The 24th ARVN Division, of course, had become the defenders of the Palace. For some reason they weren't prepared to tolerate the "mobs" going in to "unsettle" the President. The 24th Division troops were essentially "firing over the heads" of the crowd. As often happens in cases of this kind, some people who did not agree with the order from their commander fired into the crowd. Maybe they thought that something else should be done. They may not have been ordered to shoot into the crowd, but they did so.

In any event, that was the last, major event during the coup, from my point of view. The coup leaders fled to Cambodia, leaving from the Saigon airport, including a fellow who later became a "ward," if not close friend of mine, Col Nguyen chanh Thi, the paratroop battalion commander, who was later a general. I left the Colby residence at about 2:00 PM on November 12. I asked my superiors, jokingly, whether I was going to be charged with annual leave for the day and a half that I was absent.

Q: You did a fine job, John, and contributed a great deal to the Embassy. I mention an additional point to complete the story. As I mentioned, I was at the Embassy during this episode. We learned from CIA sources that there were contacts between the coup leaders and President Diem going on more or less throughout this whole period. Diem had been taken by surprise by the coup, but the negotiations continued. I think that Diem was probably "stalling," waiting until some of the divisions outside of Saigon would come to his rescue, as they finally did.

Anyhow, by about 5:00 AM, or just as light was breaking on November 12, the word that we had, through various CIA sources, was that things had been worked out and that Diem was going to be compelled to leave office. So we thought that it was all over. Several of us who were at the Embassy trooped up onto the roof of the building. We watched the firefight in front of the Palace which you just described.

HELBLE: I was in the "fire zone."

Q: Several rifle shots flew right over our heads, and we decided that we had better get down into cover. As we went downstairs into cover, right about that time, Ed Barbier, who was the Deputy to Bill Colby in the CIA Station, came into the Ambassador's office on the fifth floor. He had been observing the same fire fight from the parapet outside the Ambassador's office. When the stray rounds came over our heads when we were on the Embassy roof, he must have heard the same rounds and came inside the building to take cover. I remember that he had a curious expression on his face but he didn't say anything. Then, about five minutes later, I happened to notice that Ed was stretched out on a couch. Bill Colby was bending over him and had a big towel, which he was pressing to Ed's back. Evidently, one spent round buried itself in his back, in the muscle on one side or the other of his backbone. I can't remember which side. Later on, at the pool at the Cercle Sportif, I saw the scar from this wound. Bill Colby didn't know whether this was a serious wound or not. They were checking to see whether they could get medical treatment for Ed, which was finally arranged.

Going back to the negotiations between the two sides, at one point it appeared that Ambassador Durbrow might get involved in the discussions. He asked me if I would be his interpreter. Well, my Vietnamese wasn't up to that, and I had to tell him that, though I said that I'd be glad to go along with him. If we could conduct any negotiations in French, I could handle them, but not in Vietnamese. Well, in the event Ambassador didn't get involved in any negotiations between Diem and the coup group.

HELBLE: You, of course, wrote the definitive Embassy analysis of that coup which, as I recall, took you about three months to complete. Wasn't it done in February, 1961?

Q: Well, I don't recall. It took some time to put the whole thing together. I did what I could.

HELBLE: That was the definitive account.

Q: I thought that I'd done a very careful job in this report. Then I sent it up to Ambassador Durbrow in draft. He was usually pretty considerate of his staff, but he just didn't like this draft at all. He was puzzled by its organizational structure, which was a little different, but it was a complex sequence of events that I was trying to describe. I had to recast parts of it, and it finally went out. As you say, it was the basic Embassy report on the coup.

The problem for the Diem government was that, in effect, it had been "warned" that there was non-communist opposition to it, but Diem just didn't pay much attention to it. He didn't take it seriously and continued to operate in the same fashion as before. This led directly to a second coup in February, 1962, involving rebel Vietnamese Air Force officers who attacked the Palace. Finally, the third coup on November 2-3, 1963 was the one which finally deposed Diem, who was killed in the process.

John, is there anything else that you want to say about your first tour in Saigon?

HELBLE: There are several generalizations which I have reflected on over the years. These are things which that 10-month experience in Saigon brought to my attention, in one fashion or another, either at the time or subsequently.

Certainly, I witnessed the failure of a government which was confronted with a very experienced, organized, and essentially highly motivated enemy force, the Viet Cong, which was seeking to displace it. The Saigon Government's attributes were just the opposite, in a sense. It was not effectively organized, in my judgment. It lacked a political ideology, structure, and organization which would inspire people to confront successfully the type of enemy that they faced. It became increasingly evident in Saigon during the time we have just covered and subsequent years that the U. S. role was a very difficult one for us to play in a meaningful and effective way. We had very good intentions and a lot of power, but our influence was much less than one might have thought.

Q: You mentioned that the U. S. role was very difficult for us. We had trouble understanding and appreciating the situation and articulating policies to deal with it.

HELBLE: Our influence was very much affected by our inability to grasp many of the subtleties and intricacies of the Vietnamese psyche and their cultural and political thought processes. Even for myself, I would say -- and probably this applied to many others -- that I had the opportunity to become a Vietnamese language officer and thereby presumably had the opportunity to gain valuable, additional insight into some of these cultural and political modes of behavior. However, I know that I was a long way from understanding the Vietnamese situation adequately to make a major difference in my interpretation of things, much less provide my superiors with advice that would be ultimately successful, if followed, in addressing this complex situation.

This conclusion was only reinforced, as the years went by. Certainly, I saw it as a big problem for me, as well as for our Embassy and our foreign policy -- by the time that I had finished the 10 months in Saigon. I had the opportunity to observe first hand, as did Tom Conlon and others who were in the Embassy in May, 1961, when Vice President Johnson and his fairly large entourage descended upon Saigon. The opportunity to observe the insensitivity of American politicians operating in a very different culture was certainly, at a minimum, annoying to me at the time. I think, perhaps, that this insensitivity was an element in our ultimate failure to come up with political and policy decisions which would have contributed to a consequently different outcome.

Certainly, on the other side of that coin, while the hours were very long and the work was very intense, it was an inspiring environment for a young political officer. I had the sense that I was doing, or trying to do, something for our country and I had an almost missionary type zeal to do the best I could. That meant a lot in terms of my own gratification. It stimulated me for future years in the Foreign Service. That about wraps up the things that occurred to me for that 10 month period. It was a hell of a good training ground -- no question about that.

Q: So then in June, 1961, you went up to Hue. How large was the Consulate in Hue at the time and how large a consular district did it cover?

HELBLE: Actually, I went up to Hue toward the end of May -- around Memorial Day weekend - - 1961. I relieved Tom Barnes, who had been the Acting Consul for the previous nine months. The Consulate and the official American community consisted of a Consul; a Vice Consul who was a CIA officer operating under consular "cover"; an American administrative assistant; and two American USOM [United States Operations Mission] employees, as they were known in those days. One of them was a nurse...

Q: USOM was the predecessor of AID Agency for International Development.

HELBLER: AID in today's terms. The nurse worked with the School of Nursing affiliated with the University of Hue. She helped to develop and improve the School of Nursing, its curriculum, and so forth. The other USOM employee was a Public Safety Officer who worked with the Vietnamese police on public safety activity, training, and so forth. There was also a small detachment of the Military Assistance and Advisory Group [MAAG] of six officers and one enlisted man.

Q: Were they stationed out at the Hue airport?

HELBLER: No, they were in the city of Hue. Their residence was near the headquarters of the First Division of the Vietnamese Army, or ARVN. They were an advisory detachment to the First ARVN Division. I should add that there was a USIS [United States Information Service] officer. There was an American associated with the Vietnamese-American Association. He was an employee of USIS. He attempted to develop cultural activities and programs on behalf of the United States, in the Vietnamese community. There were also a couple of American missionaries or Summer Institute of Linguistics personnel who were working in rural areas outside of, but fairly close to, Hue. That was the American community. There was one Frenchman who ran the electricity power plant. There was one other officer in the Consular Corps, the Republic of China or Nationalist Chinese Consul. He did not have anything to do, as far as I could determine. He was a pleasant fellow. He was senior to me and was Dean of the Consular Corps, because he had been in Hue before I got there. We had a good but non-substantive relationship.

The Consular District consisted of the seven Northern provinces of Central Vietnam at that time. Starting south from the 17th parallel of latitude and what was known as the Demilitarized Zone [DMZ], drawn under the Geneva Accords of 1954, were the provinces of Quang Tri, along the DMZ; Thua Thien, where Hue was located; Quang Nam, with its capital in Da Nang, Quang Ngai, Qui Nhon, and Pleiku and Kontum -- two provinces on the High Plateau of Central Vietnam. At one point, while I was in Hue, the province of Quang Nam was split into two provinces, so it became an eight-province consular district.

Geographically, those provinces were large, compared to many of the provinces farther South and in the Mekong River Delta area. So the consular district covered a fairly large area in territorial terms. It had a comparatively narrow, coastal plain, through which ran Route 1 from Saigon to Hanoi, often within sight of the South China Sea. However, you were rarely out of sight of the mountains of the Annamite Chain, on the western side of that highway.

Q: So it was a narrow, coastal plain.

HELBLER: Very narrow, with vast, thinly populated mountain areas. In many places there was no population at all. Where there were people, they mostly belonged to ethnic tribes, also known as "montagnards" in French. The area was economically poor. The basis for economic activity was a modest level of agriculture. Along the coastal plain the rice fields were not nearly productive enough to sustain even the limited population that lived there. These rice fields were not as fertile and productive as the fields were in the Mekong Delta area, South of Saigon. Along the coastal plain there was no industry to speak of. There were small shops engaged in bicycle repairs and that sort of thing. There was nothing in the way of industry. The intellectual part of Central Vietnam was the city of Hue, which had been the old, imperial capital of the Vietnamese emperors. As a political center that was the source of Hue's authority throughout much of Central Vietnam. The University of Hue, the most important university in South Vietnam apart from the University of Saigon, contributed to Hue's importance as an intellectual center.

As a group, people were very different in Central Vietnam than they were in Saigon and in the Mekong Delta or in the South, in general. The people of Hue took great pride in their ancestry. As Hue was the center of the emperors' power for several centuries, they regarded themselves as morally "cleaner," if you will, than the people in the South. Certainly, for example, dance halls and that sort of thing were strictly prohibited in Hue. One, small bar was tolerated, which would not have succeeded for 24 hours in Saigon against the competition in the national capital.

Tourism in Hue was certainly a factor because of the presence or replication, if you will, of the "great, walled city" of Peking, which had been built by the emperors. Then, after five of the emperors died, their imperial tombs were built on the western outskirts of Hue. These were architecturally, historically, and culturally very interesting structures which naturally drew a certain amount of tourism. However, Hue was in an out of the way location, and air service was relatively infrequent. The alternative, a nearly 300 mile drive up from Saigon on Route 1, took a long time. Furthermore, over the years driving up or taking the train to Hue to visit the tombs became less and less advisable from a security point of view. Tourism in Hue was limited under the circumstances.

Q: The Ngo family, the family of President Diem, was from Hue, if I recall.

HELBLE: That's right. I'll go into the presence of Diem's aged mother in Hue, which ultimately contributed to the "political environment." It is worth recalling. As a result, Diem himself had an attachment to Hue and came to Hue relatively frequently to see his mother.

The Central Vietnam area -- and here I'm speaking of the northern 17 provinces -- was politically "controlled" by Diem's brother, Ngo Dinh Can, of whom we will speak later. Can ran a very authoritarian and "tight" ship. No political dissent of any sort was permitted. Most people wouldn't even consider trying to express political dissent in the environment which emanated from Can's authority.

Q: Did you ever have much direct contact with Can?

HELBLE: Maybe we should get right into that. I would like to share with you some of my experiences with Can. I only saw Ngo Dinh Can once. I had been warned by my predecessor, Tom Barnes, that Can didn't receive American Consuls. So I waited, with as much patience as I could, for about three months after my arrival. By September, 1961, I had identified a person who was Can's top adviser and whom I could contact directly. I sought his advice and said to him that I would like to pay a call on Mr. Can. I said that I would enjoy having the opportunity to discuss with him some of the problems of the area, the local situation, and so on. In due time this intermediary got back in touch with me and said that Mr. Can would not be able to see me. However, he suggested that if I had some questions which I would like to write down, Can would be happy to send me written answers. I decided that that would not be a very useful or productive approach, so I did not follow through on that suggestion.

I will say that Can, who was notorious for his alleged antipathy toward foreigners in general, made several gestures, or what I took as gestures, of my "acceptance" in the community, at least as far as he was concerned. Therefore, I concluded that I hadn't done anything egregiously "wrong" as yet. For example, at Christmas he would send me a large basket of a Vietnamese delicacy consisting of round, raw pork balls with spices in them, wrapped in banana leaves. They were generally eaten with the well-known Vietnamese "nuoc mam" or fish sauce.

Q: Was that supposed to be cooked or not?

HELBLE: No, it was intended to be eaten raw. I was somewhat puzzled, as was my wife Joan, as to how we were going to dispose of this quantity of the delicacy which, I would guess, weighed at least 10 kilograms [22 pounds]. We found that if we fried the pork balls like sausages, they were passable as a sausage with eggs for breakfast in the morning. We were not terribly keen about the idea of eating raw pork, even though there wasn't much evidence of trichinosis among the swine population in the area. However, conditioned as we had been against eating raw pork, we did not like the idea. We discreetly gave small amounts of the pork balls to our servant staff at Christmas or at "Tet."

Q: Vietnamese New Year.

HELBLE: We froze what we couldn't consume in short order when we cooked it as sausage. We were concerned that the word might get out that we were giving away Mr. Can's gift to the American Consul. However, nothing adverse ever happened. The balance of it we would use at our annual reception on July 4. We would thaw it out and put it on a buffet table. We were able to use up what was an annual presentation in this manner. I took the gift of the raw pork balls as a modest gesture of acceptance from Mr. Can, at least.

The only other, direct contact with Mr. Can before the other occasion which we will discuss later on was a personal favor that he did for me and my wife. It was, indeed, an act of generosity. This involved the death of our daughter in Vietnam. When she died, we thought of an ideal place to bury her, on a hillside in front of Emperor Tu Duc's tomb, overlooking the Huong or Perfume River, with a sensational view looking West toward the Annamite Chain of mountains, over the forest and over this placid and beautiful river. I learned that the land I proposed to use for our daughter's grave was owned by Ngo Dinh Can. With the exception of an old French bunker, which still lay in the general area, there were no other structures there. It was basically bare land, covered by a few scrub pine trees. My Vice Consul, a CIA officer, was able to obtain Can's approval for our burying our daughter on that site. It was certainly something he did not have to do.

It might be interesting to mention right at this point that in November, 1994, our daughter Mona, who was born after Cindy Lee had died, traveled on her own to Vietnam. She had never been there, as she was born after we left Vietnam. She flew into Hanoi, in North Vietnam and took the train from Hanoi to Hue. Using directions I gave her and through a contact which I had indirectly arranged for her in Hue, she was able to locate the site of Cindy Lee's grave, which had a marble marker on it. I had learned, over the years, that the grave site was being maintained. What I did not know and what she found when she located the grave was that the entire hillside has now become a Vietnamese cemetery. What her contact told her was that the Vietnamese had concluded that if that was a good enough place for the American Consul to bury his daughter, it was a good enough place for the Vietnamese to bury their dead. This was, of course, after Can had lost his authority and his land...

Q: And lost his life, too.

HELBLE: And lost his life, as well. In any case, that is a personal anecdote which takes us way ahead of our story, but since you asked about my contacts with Can, I'll save the only direct, personal contact for later on.

Q: What kind of work were you doing in this small Consulate? Did it generate some of its own, administrative requirements? What about political or economic reporting? Did you do any consular work?

HELBLE: It was described as a "special purpose" post, which was exempted from normal, consular functions, such as protection and welfare, although, certainly, I had to be prepared to render what assistance I could if I were called on to do so. There was no substantial American community to be concerned about, in that respect. There was no passport, visa, or notarial work of any sort -- in short, none of the traditional functions of a Consulate. It was there strictly as a "political listening post" to monitor events, security conditions, and the political and economic situation in Central Vietnam. It constituted an official, U. S. "presence."

Q: Did you get instructions from the Embassy about things to follow in general or in specific terms?

HELBLE: No, I got very little guidance in that respect. I approached my job by reviewing the files containing the reports sent in by my predecessors. From my time in Saigon I was certainly familiar with the types of things that would be of general interest, whether in Saigon or in Washington. I will say that the Consulate, throughout the time that I was there, enjoyed something which was lost to it within a week after I left the post in 1964. That is, I had authority for direct communications with the Department of State in Washington. If I reported telegraphically, my reports would go to Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines, be relayed on to Washington, and "bounced back" to the Embassy in Saigon from Clark.

In terms of substantive reporting, by and large, I did not do much reporting telegraphically in the early period of my tour in Hue because we had only the "One Time Pad" system of encryption. This system was terribly time consuming. However, if I were reporting telegraphically, I would report to both Washington and Saigon. As I learned and came to appreciate, it was to the advantage of the Consul, as will be made clear later, to have a "direct line" to Washington. Other than the Ambassador, nobody else had that arrangement. Some time later in the course of my three years in Hue it was rather important to have this arrangement from several points of view. As I said, that direct reporting channel was "lifted" as a prerogative of the Consul in Hue a week after I left Hue -- as a direct result of things that I had done the week before.

Q: Did many people from the Embassy visit you up in Hue?

HELBLER: We had a steady stream of visitors. As I said, there were some tourist attractions in Hue. We had both official and unofficial visits from literally hundreds of people from the Embassy during the three years that we were in Hue. People from the Embassy in particular, but sometimes diplomats from other countries. I came to realize, when I was up in Hue, that while I looked forward to the opportunity to host some of the friends I had met in Saigon and have them come up and spend the weekend with us, for many of the people in Saigon it really didn't matter whether I was a friend of theirs or even knew them. They would simply contact me and ask for my assistance in Hue. There was no real hotel in Hue. What had passed as the hotel in Hue had been taken over by the MAAG detachment.

Q: Military Assistance and Advisory Group.

HELBLER: Exactly. That was no longer available to tourists coming to Hue. So each of us in the official American community tended to host visitors from Saigon on a regular basis, just about every weekend, or certainly a majority of weekends. The visitors might be a single person, a couple, a family, or whatever.

Q: Was this primarily recreational travel, or was it really official business?

HELBLER: I'm restricting myself to tourist visits. The USIS fellow would tend to host his USIA colleagues, and the USOM people, their own people, although sometimes I would end up with some of the "other agency" people. It was a steady "drum beat" of visitors which, after a while, became a considerable burden. In most cases I simply had to offer our house, which was fairly large, as a place for them to stay and give them a consular vehicle and driver to take them to the Imperial City of Hue or to the imperial tombs. However, on the other hand, we were very isolated in terms of social contacts with other Americans outside of our little community. So there were always new perspectives and things to learn from our visitors. It never became so burdensome that we were really "annoyed" about it.

On the official side, visits also expanded. The military detachment would take care of their military visitors. It grew in size as the years wore on because of the expansion of U. S. programs and activities throughout the area. We had a wide range of official visitors coming. In 1963 and 1964 I had people coming from the NSC [National Security Council] in Washington, as well as from other Washington agencies. There was any number of visitors.

Q: Did they have any real "business" there, or were they just "slumming," as it were?

HELBLER: Well, of course, you would run into situations where people just wanted to say that they had visited Hue or had come for a meeting with the Rector of the University of Hue. That took a couple of hours. Then they would want to spend the next day and a half touring Hue, and so on. That's an understandable phenomenon, and we've all seen that.

Q: The Rector of the University, as I recall, was Father Luan. I remember meeting him once -- I think that it was before you went up to Hue. I'd gone up there on a visit. He was telling me about the delights of eating "dog." He said that yellow dogs are the best dogs to eat. I never really followed up on this.

In Saigon there were Vietnamese restaurants which specialized in serving dog meat. They never used to say what it was. They would advertise "Mon An Dac Biet," or "special dish." That meant dog, and all the Vietnamese knew this. A lot of Vietnamese didn't want to eat dog, but there it was.

HELBLE: Of course, Father Luan -- Cao van Luan was his full name -- was a legend in his own time and a very interesting character.

Q: He was a Jesuit priest, as I recall.

HELBLE: Yes. He was born in North Vietnam and had been trained for the priesthood there. Of course, North Vietnam is more the venue for dog eaters than South Vietnam. There was a lot of North Vietnamese influence in Hue. Father Luan certainly advanced the cause of serving dog to American guests!

Q: Did he tell them in advance?

HELBLE: On a number of occasions, when an American visitor was being hosted for dinner by Father Luan, I had occasion to be present. Of course, I was well aware of what the entree was likely to be. I certainly wasn't going to be the one to tell the American visitor. However, Father Luan took some sort of perverse delight in allowing the visitor to finish the entire meal. If the visitor made the mistake of saying, "Father, that was a delicious dish. What was that?" Then Father Luan would slyly smile and say, "Dog." The visitor sometimes didn't catch what he said the first time or couldn't believe it. In any event, on several occasions I saw the visitor from Saigon or directly from the U. S. leave the table immediately and go out on the front porch. There were certain sounds which suggested that he'd had enough dog -- and maybe a little bit too much. Yes, that was a local curiosity. I didn't mind eating dog. It's not something I would have ordered myself in a restaurant. I lost four pet dogs during the first six or eight months that I was in Hue.

Q: Were they yellow dogs?

HELBLE: They were all yellow dogs. But there was one other refinement, if I might say so. Dogs with black, speckled tongues were considered better to eat than dogs with pink tongues.

Q: I never heard that.

HELBLE: If there were a few black speckles on that tongue, it was going to be better to eat than dogs with pink tongues.

Q: Well, as you said earlier on, there was so much about Vietnamese society that we knew very little about. I always thought that a lot of it had to do with the language. I had my own problems with Vietnamese and never was able to speak it well. I think that you were a lot more fluent, because you were exposed to it a lot more.

HELBLE: I had the opportunity, indeed the requirement, to speak Vietnamese.

Q: I spent a week up in Hue in 1961. Tom Barnes had left, and it was before you went up there. I paid some calls, just going through the motions. I called on the Province Chief and so on, doing as well as I could in Vietnamese. The Province Chief said, "Oh, you have a good foundation in Vietnamese. You ought to stay up here longer and work on it." Well, that was not the way it was going to be, but I think that it was important to have the opportunity to speak Vietnamese. I'm glad that you had it.

In the larger sense there were only a few people in our Embassy in Vietnam, over the years, whose Vietnamese was adequate to conduct any serious discussion. One was John Negroponte, now Ambassador to Mexico; Dave Lambertson, just retired after serving as Ambassador to Thailand; Dave Engel, perhaps the best of our interpreters; Spence Richardson later on; and Hal Colebaugh, also.

HELBLE: That's right. There were some later on. From our generation of language officers we suffered from an inadequate course. I was the only one who was really thrust into a situation where I had to use Vietnamese. My grounding in Vietnamese, plus my lack of a high aptitude for languages, limited my ability in the language, but I had a functional knowledge of it.

Q: You mentioned a knowledge of Vietnamese culture. I thought that Hal Colebaugh was certainly the most impressive in this respect. I think that he not only could speak Vietnamese very well, but he really liked Vietnam. He liked participating in this culture -- and he did, in a very broad sense. He was quite unique in this respect. However, as it happened, he did not stay on long in the Foreign Service.

HELBLE: You mentioned Tom Barnes. When I arrived in Hue -- I'm not quite sure of when you went up there -- Tom Barnes was still there.

Q: That's right. I went up to Hue in about April, 1961. You had not yet arrived.

HELBLE: I came up in May, 1961. Tom immediately took me on a five day trip through the consular district, which was an excellent introduction to it. This schedule was a little bit "heavy" for me. I hadn't done a long day's drive down the dusty roads of Vietnam, traveling in the June heat from one village conversation to the next one, to the next province chief, etc. It was certainly a good exposure. The only fault I found with the trip is that we took the "improved" Route 9, which was then still under construction from Qui Nhon up to Kontum. In the normal way you took Route 9 to Pleiku and then went directly North from Pleiku to Kontum. When we got to the top of a mountain going up onto the High Plateau of Central Vietnam, Tom said,

"There's a road here called Route 9B. It's a short cut to Kontum."

Of course, I didn't know anything about the area. So we took the "short cut," which was little more than a mud track. We went along on that. We stopped at a Montagnard community after about a half hour. We met a very informative French priest who had been living with the montagnards for many years up there. We reviewed the security situation with him, the VC [Viet Cong, or communist] presence, and so forth. From the description that the French priest gave, it sounded to me as if there were a fair amount of VC activity in the area. We continued on the mud track. There was no other sign of "civilization" in evidence on this dirt trail winding through the mountains and forest. The track was very, very isolated.

We arrived after dark in Kontum and went to the MAAG detachment to spend the night. We joined the MAAG people at the bar. They had already had dinner by that time. Of course, I had no idea where I was or what was going on. Anyway, they asked us why we were coming in from Pleiku so late. I said, "Well, we didn't come in from Pleiku. We took Route 9B to Kontum." Total silence descended on the MAAG officers at the bar. One of them said, "You did WHAT? Nobody's been down that track for years. It's totally insecure." [Laughter] Anyway, that was my introduction to Tom Barnes.

Q: That was Tom Barnes, all right. I've mentioned Hal Colebaugh as being well acquainted with Vietnamese culture. I think that Tom Barnes probably spoke good Vietnamese. He also had learned a good deal about Vietnamese culture. He ultimately married a Vietnamese woman. So those two Foreign Service Officers went further into this area. You may remember another translator or interpreter, Paul Vogle...

HELBLE: He was an American I failed to mention. He served as an adviser to the University of Hue.

Q: But generally speaking, your earlier point was absolutely correct. We just never, as a nation, had any very good appreciation of what Vietnamese culture was or how it would function under critical conditions. This greatly limited our ability to help the Republic of Vietnam to defend itself. This is really what it came down to.

HELBLE: One of the only cautionary notes that I received, when I went to Hue, was some advice that I received from Ambassador Durbrow or Political Counselor Mendenhall -- I don't recall which one it was. They told me of several incidents that had led them to summon Tom Barnes down from Hue while he was acting as Consul. In effect, they "chewed him out" for having done things that were totally inappropriate in the Embassy's view. They cautioned me not to emulate my predecessor in that regard. One of the things that Barnes had done was to go to the center of the bridge that connected North and South Vietnam in the center of the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone]. Under the terms of the Geneva Accords of 1954 we were not allowed to go into the DMZ, much less go as far as the center of the bridge in full view of the North Vietnamese guards on the other side.

The other thing that he was criticized for was that there was a report that he had gone into Laos. He reportedly took the road from Quang Tri South of the DMZ, in the narrow, coastal plain area, west to the Laotian border, roughly paralleling the DMZ, and up into the mountains.

Q: This road would have been about 20 miles South of the DMZ.

HELBLER: Yes, probably a little less than that. He went past the outpost of Khe Sanh, which gained considerable notoriety later on, in the mid 1960's, when U. S. Marines were posted there and fought a long, bloody battle to defend it. It gained notoriety during the French days as well. The Laotian border was a few kilometers past Khe Sanh. There was a small village at the border on the Vietnamese side, which I visited once. I never crossed the border, as Tom Barnes had done. He had gone well into Laos, which was outside his consular district. This was not a wise thing to do, as far as the Embassy was concerned.

Q: Tom was always a "free wheeler." He always felt that he was the best judge of what he should do.

HELBLER: He had a judgment problem, in the minds of many people, including his supervisors in Saigon.

That was an introductory trip to the consular district which Tom Barnes took me on. He left a day or two after we returned to Hue, and we were on our own.

I've already said that we had a very spacious, French colonial style house, with a staff of four servants. The position of American Consul in Hue enjoyed considerable prestige in the community. That was pleasurable, of course. There was only minimal guidance and slight oversight from Saigon on what I was doing. This is not a bad situation, in many respects. Within the American community in Hue, small as it was, there was a lot of internal antipathy and hostility when I arrived. I was overwhelmed with a succession of confidential "gripes" presented to me by virtually every member of the community about somebody else or several other people. This was an unpleasant aspect of the situation. The USIS officer and the USIA officer assigned to the Vietnamese-American Association were fighting with each other over everything. Each of them sought my support in making decisions on their behalf.

Q: I think that this is called a "turf battle."

HELBLER: Yes. The USOM nurse "hated" the colonel in charge of the MAAG detachment. The MAAG colonel didn't get along with the CIA fellow, who, in turn, wasn't much liked by other people in the community. And so it went. It was a small post, and the environment was conducive to having these conflicts develop. It required a fair amount of my time and effort to try to keep it under control. Ultimately, I concluded that I would never be able to resolve these things which, by then, were deeply ingrained. However, people "move on" to other posts, and that's an advantage in the Foreign Service. They would be reassigned and then, one by one, the problems would disappear.

Q: I've been in places which were quite small. I was assigned as Vice Consul in the Consulate in Surabaya, Indonesia. We got along very well. Then we all left, more or less at the same time, and were replaced by people who didn't get along at all. They fought about everything. It was ridiculous. I realized then how lucky we had been, in that we had been able to get along. It was instinctive. There was never any serious argument.

HELBLE: The situation in the American community in Hue was just the opposite. It started very poorly and then deteriorated. However, it was much better after a year or so, when a couple of the people were reassigned elsewhere.

Q: We were talking about the reporting which you did from Hue. I take it that you more or less identified your own reporting requirements, as you had done, in a way, in Puerto La Cruz.

HELBLE: Right. But at least by now I had some background in proper reporting and standards that were acceptable to Washington.

Q: Did you have professional courier service to the Consulate?

HELBLE: There was a regular military supply flight to Hue using a U. S. military cargo plane C-47. It brought to us and to others in the official American community, including the MAAG detachment, food and other products from the MAAG PX and Commissary in Saigon and Cholon. The diplomatic pouch traveled on that flight.

Q: I was wondering to what extent you were able to follow how the Embassy was reporting various aspects of the whole situation.

HELBLE: That was very difficult, because I did not receive copies of telegrams, at least electronically. I did not receive copies of the bulk of the reporting from the Embassy in Saigon.

Q: Even despatch and pouch reporting?

HELBLE: Sometimes, I would get a copy of some of the reporting. I certainly didn't spend much of my time reading Saigon reports, because there wasn't much to read, as I remember. However, I knew that there was a lot being generated.

From DCM Francis Cunningham and then from his successor, Bill Trueheart, I would get periodic letters, perhaps once every three or four weeks, in which there would be some comment -- perhaps on something which I had reported. There might be some information of a background nature that they thought I should be aware of regarding things going on in Saigon. Once in a while there would be a request for follow-up reporting on something which I had heard and reported. Or I would be asked to keep an eye on a given Vietnamese Government program. That was more on an occasional basis than as a matter of routine.

Q: In this context didn't this situation change with the onset of the "Buddhist crisis"?

HELBLE: Well, I'd like to divide my experiences in Hue into two, chronological segments. I might call them "Hue 1," which was the 15 months that I was in Hue from my arrival in May, 1961, until home leave, in September, 1962. Then I would like to describe "Hue 2," which covered the period from January, 1963, until my departure from the post in early July, 1964.

During the first 15 months of "Hue 1" I developed pretty much of a routine. I traveled about 50% of the time -- and that was true of most of the time I was in Hue. I would be in Hue for a week and then out of Hue for a week. Or I might take a shorter trip of three days or so, just going to Quang Nam and maybe Quang Ngai provinces. Visiting Quang Tri province would be, generally speaking, a one-day trip, because it was only a couple of hours away from Hue. As I recall, the city of Hue was 50 kilometers South of the DMZ. Quang Tri city was just a few kilometers South of the DMZ. So driving up to Quang Tri took a little over an hour. Generally speaking, Quang Tri was the least interesting of the seven provinces in the consular district and the least troublesome in terms of the time devoted to it.

When I traveled South of Hue, I might just have to go to Da Nang [capital of Quang Nam province] for a day. That would require an overnight trip. It was about a two and one-half hour drive to Da Nang. While occasionally I handled a trip to Da Nang on a one-day basis, it was generally worthwhile if I spent a little more time in Quang Nam province. Da Nang was the headquarters of the ARVN I Corps. There was a more sizable American military detachment there. The ARVN I Corps was responsible for everything from Quang Tri through Quang Ngai province. The ARVN II Corps was responsible for the two highland provinces of Kontum and Pleiku, which I mentioned, as well as Binh Dinh province with its capital in the town of Qui Nhon. II Corps Headquarters were in the town of Pleiku. So Pleiku and Da Nang were important stops for me as I monitored and reported on the security situation and shared some of the things which I had learned with the U. S. military advisers and other people. The bulk of the information "flow" was the other way. The U. S. military people were sharing with me information which they had available, not all of which was being reported through their channels. They did not always look at political information from the same viewpoint that a political officer would consider it.

As I say, travel was essentially a 50% component of my time. The travel was by Willys jeep...

Q: If you were going to Da Nang, would you go by yourself?

HELBLE: I did it both ways. I had a driver. On very long trips, when I was going down to Qui Nhon or up to the Central Vietnam highlands, I would take the driver. If I were just going to Quang Nam or a little bit South of there, I might go by myself.

Q: Did you take Route 1, which was reasonably well traveled?

HELBLE: I took Route 1, which was a somewhat narrow, paved road. You had to compete with ARVN 2 ½ ton trucks, which considered the two lanes of the road an artificial barrier which should not impede an ARVN truck. So if you were stuck behind one of those or encountered one coming toward you in the middle of the road, you took the position that you kept out of their way if you wanted to see another sunrise. Of course, there was a large number of narrow, "Bailey" type bridges, the old World War II steel frame and wooden surface bridge, which was easy to assemble. Those bridges were all "one way," so you had to know where your bridges were. There was usually a steep climb up onto the surface of the bridge from the roadway, and the same thing going down.

Q: So you needed to know what was coming from the other direction.

HELBLE: That's right. There were other driving hazards. One day I was driving from Qui Nhon to Quang Ngai. It was late afternoon, and I was in southern Quang Ngai province.

This was a province which, at the time of the signature of the Geneva Accords in 1954, had a residual group of about 40,000 Viet Cong left behind who stayed in Quang Ngai. It had been a stronghold of the "Viet Minh" during the Indochina War against the French. It remained so after the French left as a stronghold of the Viet Cong opposing the Vietnamese Government. Security in Quang Ngai province was always a question. That figure of 40,000 Viet Cong, as I understood it, represented about half of all of the Viet Cong who remained active in South Vietnam after the French departed. It was really a "hot spot."

Q: Remind me of this. Where was My Lai village?

HELBLE: It was in Quang Nam province. I was never in My Lai to my knowledge but I went to so many villages that I don't recall all of their names.

On this occasion I was on my way up from Qui Nhon to Quang Nam. It was late afternoon. I was traveling with my driver, but I was doing the driving. I had assumed, after several years of experience, one of the "defensive" measures available to me from the point of view of security out on the highway was to travel fast. So I was traveling fast when I came to one of the Bailey bridges in southern Quang Ngai. I deliberately went up on the bridge at a considerable speed. Just as I went down on the far side of the bridge, I heard a loud noise. I looked back in the mirror, and the Bailey bridge was disappearing in pieces flying in different directions behind me. I had gotten off the bridge by the time...

Q: Wow! By the time the bomb went off.

HELBLE: I was saved by the fact that this was an electronically detonated or "command detonated" mine...

Q: But the VC cadre didn't hit the switch in time.

HELBLE: It had not been a "contact" or "pressure" mine. My speed threw his timing off just enough so that I escaped. But that was life, traveling through Central Vietnam. It was the only time that I encountered a bridge explosion of that kind. Now, where was I?

Q: You were talking about the "bridge" problem, but...

HELBLE: You wanted to know where I spent the night. I stayed at a variety of places. In several places there would be a missionary whom I knew well, and he would put me up. Occasionally, a province chief would offer me his guest quarters. I stayed in virtually every kind of "flea bag" hotel that existed. Quang Ngai city, for example, was a "disaster area" in terms of hotels. In fact, the very night after the bridge incident I didn't get into Quang Ngai city until 6:00 PM. Because a number of traveling salesmen "worked" the Route 1 corridor, the "best" hotel, which I would normally have stayed in, was filled up. The next best hotel, which I had used on occasion, was also filled up. It wasn't as good as the "Number 1" hotel. I had run out of known options, so I inquired around and was given the name of a "hotel" which had three or four rooms. That was fully occupied, as was the "Number 4" hotel. I finally got to the "Number 5" hotel, which was as bad a place as I can ever recall having stayed in. For one thing, there was no mosquito netting and no mattress. The room was a little cubicle which had about a 5' high, lightly built, plywood divider between it and other such cubicles. The bathroom facilities, for all intents and purposes, were non-existent. However, I was tired after a long, hot day out on the road. I learned how to find a shower, or something resembling that. These arrangements were something I could survive for the night.

At other times I stayed at the MAAG detachment. In Kontum, for example...

Q: Wasn't the MAAG detachment in Kontum in a former hunting lodge of Emperor Bao Dai -- or was that the MAAG detachment in Pleiku?

HELBLE: I believe that was in Pleiku. I recall...

Q: Jim Montgomery and I stayed at one of them. In conversation between the two of us Montgomery referred to the ARVN guard there as Tran Hung Dao, one of the great soldiers of Vietnamese history. It was a beautiful lodge, as I recall it, and quite comfortable. But you think that that was in Pleiku.

HELBLE: Yes. I know that the MAAG detachment headquarters in Kontum was not a luxurious place.

As a security measure I never deliberately gave my schedule to anybody in advance. I would just arrive in a place and then "make do" with whatever I could locate. I did not want anybody to know when I was coming or when I was going.

The road trips were fascinating. I would remember when I saw something new. I would stop my vehicle and talk to a farmer working in the paddy fields. Sometimes, I would stroll over and talk to him -- not that he had any great insights to offer, but every once in a while he would give me a little clue on security conditions in that particular village or area. Or he might make some comment about the strategic hamlet program in his village. As I say, I would usually call on the province chief and perhaps a couple of other government officials. When I would go into a town which was the headquarters of a District, I would stop and see whether the District Chief was there and talk to him, if possible. I'd go into a village and ask who was the head of the village, in other words, the village chief. If I could find him, I would talk to him. Sometimes, he would call in his Village Council members, and we'd have a real conversation.

Q: Did you encounter any hostility?

HELBLE: A lot of times there would be consternation. The people I met would be thinking, "What's this 'pale face' doing, running around the country by himself?" However, generally speaking, the receptions were warm, as was the beer and orange soda that they served me. You never found ice in these villages. Their favorite drink for service to visitors was a bottle of "Ba Muoi Ba" or "33" beer or a glass of highly carbonated orange soda. You could mix the two and get a nice, warm drink. On the other hand, I was inevitably thirsty by the time I would reach a village, so I learned to adjust to something less than my usual drink.

Sometimes, when I would call on a province chief, I would mention to him that, after calling on him, I was going to drive out to such and such a district, frequently in the foothills of the Annamite Chain of mountains. I wasn't trying to be secretive about my movements, because that was hopeless, anyway. If I went to a place, he was bound to learn of it. If this was Quang Ngai or Qui Nhon province, the province chief might say, "Well, if you're going out to such a district, let me send a truck load of my Civil Guards along with you. That's a rather bad area." I never declined such an offer of someone to go with me. I never asked for an escort but I didn't want to decline because I thought that if he thought that...

Q: He didn't want to have any "trouble" with your visit there. That was a sensible precaution.

HELBLE: That's right.

Q: You mentioned "33" beer. I think that the beer brewery must have been partly owned by the French. You know, you can get "33" beer in the U. S. It's called "Rolling Rock" beer. If you look at the rear side of the label, through the glass of the bottle, you can see the same "33" sign there.

HELBLE: Really!

Q: Yes. Have a look for that. Our daughter Celia, who is an analyst at CIA, made a copy of an UNCLASSIFIED trip report which somebody had recently made in Vietnam. This was someone who had been there about the time that we were there. He said that "33" beer is still available. It is now called "333" beer. It's the same otherwise -- and probably using the same facilities.

HELBLE: After completing such a trip, I would write a trip report on whatever I thought was of interest and value. I routinely did consular district security reports on a quarterly basis. These reports considered the security situation in all of the provinces in the consular district. Prior to writing that report, I would make sure that I had covered all of the ground mentioned in it during the previous week or two.

In addition to traveling by road I traveled by helicopter when U. S. helicopters became more available. I never had any problem getting access to a helicopter. Ultimately, in about 1962 or 1963, CIA had a small, contract fleet of what they called "helio-couriers." These were small, two passenger, single engine planes which had very short takeoff and landing VSTOL capability. Whenever I needed to use one, I had the opportunity to schedule one of them whenever I wanted to go from Hue to Kontum or Pleiku directly.

Q: They were pretty fast?

HELBLE: That's right. Some of those flights were "exciting," I might say. One day we were landing in Quang Ngai on a dirt strip. There was no control tower. The pilots of these aircraft were Turkish. They had come out on the wrong side of a coup d'etat in 1960 in Turkey and had to leave the country. The CIA employed them as pilots. They had been flying F-80's or F-101's in Turkey. They were rather "sporty" in their "aerobatics," which I found interesting as a young man, if not always comfortable. On this occasion we were just touching down. We both saw just ahead of us a C-123 transport aircraft landing in the opposite direction. Of course, a C-123 has a very high tail. The Turkish pilot reacted immediately because, as this was a short strip, the two aircraft were "closing" on each other very fast. It was clear that the C-123 couldn't move much, let alone whether it could move at all. My pilot turned the "wheel" in the "right" direction, and we veered past the C-123's vertical stabilizer with I don't know how many feet of clearance. Certainly there were just a few feet of clearance between our wingtip and the tail of the C-123.

On another occasion we got lost, flying out of Da Nang, in Quang Nam province, to Kontum. The weather was very bad. Shortly after our departure from Da Nang we were flying over mountains. We didn't really know where we were. The pilot finally had to acknowledge this to me. He handed me a road map of the area of Central Vietnam! He said, "I'm going to go down. We've got to find a road."

Q: That's how he navigated.

HELBLE: Yeah, that's right. He said, "And then we'll follow that road." He put the plane in a tight, descending spiral, not knowing whether we were descending on the top of a mountain or into a valley. I thought that this was certainly "curtains" for us. I didn't think that there was a chance of getting out of this -- going down into those mountains. Well, we got down to a point where, every once in a while, we were very close to the ground. The clouds would part just enough to let us see the ground. It was all just mountainous terrain down there -- unpopulated. The pilot just kept going down in this same spiral, in the hope we were in some kind of open area...

Q: Or that you were going down into a valley.

HELBLE: Ultimately, we spotted a mountainside not far off the starboard wingtip.

Q: How far off? 20-30 feet?

HELBLE: We couldn't see because it was largely cloudy and it was raining. Certainly, the ground didn't look as if it was very far away. That's all I can say. We finally got down under the cloud cover and in the rain. We could see where the mountains went up until they were buried in the clouds. We worked our way along and, sure enough, we found a road. It was the only road anywhere in the area, so we knew that this had to be the road we were looking for. We had the compass, so we took a southwesterly course and flew along that road. Every once in a while a gap in the mountains would appear. Because of the clouds, at times we didn't see these gaps with much warning. However, we continued to work our way through the gaps into an area of flat terrain. We were then able to follow the road into Kontum city.

Travel by air was terribly convenient, and sometimes quite "exciting." Sometimes I would come back from a trip on one of those "helio-couriers" and land in Hue on that small landing strip within the Imperial City, which is only a couple of miles from my house. Since I never knew when I was coming back, if it was late afternoon on Friday and the Consulate was still open, I would ask the Turkish pilot to "buzz" the Consulate. My driver was used to this signal and would jump in the Consulate vehicle and go over and pick us up. However, if the Consulate was closed, then I'd ask the pilot to "buzz" my house, which was a block away from the Consulate. In that case my wife would jump in the car and come and pick us up.

Q: You didn't have a cellular telephone.

HELBLER: No. Air travel was another mode of transportation. During the 1963-1964 period I used air travel increasingly, because I'd done so much road travel and because security conditions were getting worse and worse. My time was constrained because of the events of 1963 and 1964 that we'll get into. So I did more and more travel by air.

Q: Let's break at this point. We'll pick this up to cover the latter period when you were in Hue.

HELBLER: On the subject of security I should say that the episode that I mentioned, the explosion of a bridge just after I crossed it, was not the only unfortunate encounter that I had on the highways and byways of Central Vietnam.

The first incident occurred about six weeks after I had arrived in Hue. I was traveling with two of the U. S. military advisory officers and an enlisted man, going from Quang Tri city west toward Khe Sanh in western Quang Tri province. We were well into the "bush" area of the hills and came around a corner and saw three men in ragged clothing, walking along the road, each carrying a rifle of some sort. As you will hear later, these were evidently pretty old rifles. As soon as they saw us, they jumped into the "bush." We sped by the point where they had disappeared from sight, and nothing happened. On the way back, several hours later, the U. S. Army major with whom I was traveling handed me his .45 cal. automatic as we left the Khe Sanh region. He said, "John, if there's any trouble, just shoot this." I said, "But I've never fired a .45. I don't know how to handle it." He replied, "Well, here's the safety. Push that and then pull the trigger." I said, "Well, I understand that .45's are notoriously erratic and have a heavy 'kick' and so forth." He said, "Yeah, but it's not what you're going to hit. It's the noise that you're going to make. Maybe that will discourage them."

When we reached the same, general area, within a kilometer or so of where we had seen the three men earlier in the day, we saw the same three guys again. They jumped off the road, but this time we could hear some shots being fired at us. They were old rifles and weren't automatics. So I "engaged" the enemy. [Laughter] I fired out of the side of the open jeep with the .45 and plunked a few rounds into the bush. We relied more on the speed and the agility of the driver than on my marksmanship.

Q: But you'd fired the gun, though.

HELBLER: Yes. It caused me to reconsider the option the Embassy had suggested to me. The Embassy Security Officer had asked me, before I went to Hue, whether I wanted a gun. I said, "No, why would I need a weapon? After all, I have a diplomatic passport." [Laughter] So after this episode in Quang Tri province, I thought, "Well, I guess that I do need a weapon." So I wrote to the Security Officer in the Embassy in Saigon. He shipped me a .38 cal. pistol which someone had left behind in Saigon, as well as some ammunition to fit it. I started carrying that.

Well, one day in Quang Ngai province I ran into an ambush on the road. I couldn't get by, so I jumped into the ditch by the side of the road. The ambush had been sprung on a small, Civil Guard unit, which was firing back. The Civil Guards were being attacked from both sides of the road by some Viet Cong. It was too late for me to turn around, and it was impossible to drive through the ambush site -- or at least it didn't seem prudent to try. So I jumped out of the jeep with my trusty .38, joined the Civil Guards and, every once in a while, reached over the top of the ditch I was lying in and fired in the general direction of the enemy. However, I felt a certain sense of helplessness, not to mention uselessness under the circumstances.

When the fire fight ended and the VC unit, which may have consisted of only a few people off in the bush, drew off, I reconsidered my situation again. I told the CIA Vice Consul with whom I was serving about the incident when I got back to Hue. He said, "Well, I think that I can help you with that."

A couple of days later one of his colleagues came to the Consulate and gave me what was called a "Swedish K." This was a folding stock, paratroop type weapon, Swedish made, which fired 720 rounds a minute. He gave me several clips and extra ammunition for it. He said, "Let's go out to the firing range this weekend and we'll do a little practice with this." So we did, and I learned how to handle this weapon. I got so that I could take a tin can and, in the classic demonstration, throw it out 20 or 30 feet and then "bounce it along" with that kind of firepower. Of course, at a rate of fire of 720 rounds a minute, it doesn't take long for a clip to empty. So the question is really just how fast can you reload the clip. If I didn't become proficient with this weapon, I at least knew what I was dealing with and basically how to handle it.

From that point on, and this was probably about October or November, 1961, I carried that "Swedish K" with me just about every time that I went out on the road. I kept it close by me in the vehicle. It usefully served its purpose on a number of occasions. A couple of times I was totally alone. One time I was out on a very isolated stretch of Route 1 between Quang Ngai and Da Nang, in southern Quang Nam province -- another area of considerable insecurity. I had a flat tire. It was fairly late in the afternoon. I got out to change the flat tire. Suddenly, a shot rang out, and a bullet hit the ground near me. My weapon was on the other side of the Willys jeep which I was driving. I had to run around and get the gun. When I came back up over the hood, and a couple of other rounds were fired in my direction, I fired a short burst with the "Swedish K" without knowing exactly where the enemy was. It was probably a single guy lying there, waiting to pick off a single person, who would be "easy pickings" for him. I certainly fell into that category, until I reappeared with the "Swedish K." After my short burst I waited patiently for a couple of minutes. Nothing else happened. I did not wait to change the tire. I hadn't gotten the punctured tire off yet. I got into the jeep and drove on for about a mile before I stopped again to change the tire.

In one fashion or another I had several parallels to that event. The "Swedish K" became more valuable to me than my diplomatic passport. [Laughter] That was life in the Foreign Service for a young officer. I didn't think a lot about it. I took sensible precautions that I could think of which still allowed me to do the job which I was there to do, which required a lot of travel.

Q: This reminds me of the story of David McMeans. Did you know him? He was in the Provincial Reporting Unit of the Political Section in Saigon with me in 1967-68. He was working in III Corps, North of Saigon.

HELBLER: No.

Q: Every day he was going out into very "hairy" areas all alone. I thought, "First of all, nobody is really reading these reports." Every time someone would come out from Washington, I would say, "Do you really read these reports?" They would say, "Oh, they're very important." Then I would say, "But did you read it yourself?" They would say, "No." I was unable to find anybody who had actually read them! [Laughter] So I thought, "Here I am supposed to be watching out for those guys. I know that they're risking their lives every day, without asking me about it." I thought that this was a terrible business. McMeans made it even worse. He told me, "Oh, when I travel on such and such a stretch of road, I bring along this M-79, a grenade launcher." He said, "I have a couple of rounds and I fire them off as I drive along the road!" [Laughter]

HELBLER: I'll bet that there was a lot of cattle damage on that stretch of road!

Q: It's a serious problem, and I hope we never get involved in an insurgency of this kind again. I think that there is a real question as to whether what you're going to get in the way of worthwhile information is worth the risk that you run. I think that the answer is, "Probably not." I've taken risks that I should not have taken. I think about them occasionally and I think that I can't justify the risks that I ran. I've never told my wife about them. You may not have mentioned these episodes to your Joan.

HELBLER: Well, my Joan would occasionally catch me on Friday afternoon or Friday evening, when I'd come back from a trip, reloading clips for my "Swedish K" in the bedroom. She knew that if I was reloading clips, that meant that I had fired the gun during the trip.

I once was involved in an incident in Kontum. About a month later a MAAG guy from Kontum came by my house and said in my livingroom, with Joan present, "Oh, I understand you had a real 'dust-up' during your last trip up there." Joan would say, "What's this?" However, there was no need to go into details. She was a real "trooper." She knew that every time that I went out on the road I was in jeopardy. But she never said anything about it at the time.

Did you know a Foreign Service Officer who later was an Ambassador but was a POW Prisoner of War for five years in Hanoi.

Q: You mean Phil Manhard?

HELBLER: Yes.

Q: Did you know that Phil Manhard was captured by the communists in your house in Hue?

HELBLE: I was going to mention that.

Q: Go ahead. I'm telling your story, but you were living in what was going to be "my" house in Hue, and I really felt that. As soon as I saw the report of his capture, I thought, "Where was he hiding?" He was hiding under the stairs. But it's your story.

HELBLE: That's correct. We were blessed, however, living in Hue, because Hue was basically very quiet. In terms of the security threat, the back of the house was adjacent to a wide stretch of paddy fields which extended to Route 1 on the South edge of town. Periodically, there would be fire fights at a Police guard post on Route 1 in that area. Those would be very audible and sometimes even visible to us at night from our livingroom. Sometimes there would be sabotage of a bridge on Route 1 or a mortar attack on nearby facilities, and we could hear all of that going on. Essentially, we felt pretty secure. Perhaps not justifiably, but at least the city of Hue had virtually nothing in the way of incidents, during the time that we were there. So I was reassured that Joan was basically safe in Hue, whether I was there or not.

On the other hand, just hearing gunfire periodically and being aware of the threat would not have been everybody's "cup of tea." To go back to a point earlier in this interview, Joan's background during World War II in the Philippines made her far more conscious, I think, of what could happen. However, perhaps she'd achieved a certain degree of equanimity and peace of mind, that "whatever was going to happen was going to happen." She never showed any sign that she was anxious to leave Hue or that she wanted me to "abort" this assignment at an earlier stage.

I came away from my experiences during "Hue 1," if you will, with a number of impressions.

The "Strategic Hamlet Program" was getting under way, but I thought that it was really an ill-conceived approach to the problem of security and a waste of resources. More importantly, as long as it was accorded policy and resource priority, it detracted from reaching any more logical, better conceived and potentially more effective type effort. There was such an effort which Ngo Dinh Can had initiated in Central Vietnam which I thought was conceptually a much better approach to the counterinsurgency effort. This program used small groups of ordinary people from the local area who had been particularly well-trained. They were lightly but well armed with weapons like the "Swedish K." These small groups consisted of 10 to 12 young men who would take up residence in a village in a threatened area, where the Viet Cong presence was known to be frequent. They lived with the villagers and worked with them during the daytime, assisting in their field work and small construction projects. In general, they tried to do things that would be useful for the village. At night they patrolled and worked the outskirts of the village. They did not just sit in the village but moved outside of it, trying to intercept any VC that were threatening the village.

I thought that the concept was much sounder than the relatively static strategic hamlets which had very artificial, security barriers. The strategic hamlets really did nothing significant to enhance the government's image with the people as a whole. Generally, the strategic hamlet program was more restrictive for the people. It denied them access to their fields because they were "stockaded in." They would have to break up the stockades so that they could get to work in their fields. The whole purpose of the strategic hamlets was defeated by that simple act, if nothing else.

I thought that Ngo Dinh Can's "Forces Populaires," as they were known, offered some hope, but it did not enjoy the policy or resource status that the strategic hamlet program did, nationwide. The "Forces Populaires" were limited to the immediate area of northern Central Vietnam, as Can tried to get this operation moving forward. This program was assisted by the CIA in terms of both training and arms. However, in my view it never really had a chance to prove itself because of the lack of national emphasis on it.

Q: This whole problem of "defended villages" is a difficult one. The British undertook resettlement of the population in Malaya to "defended areas." The problem was easier in Malaya because the communists were much weaker in every respect.

When the Soviets went into Afghanistan in 1979, I thought that this would really show what the communists can do to deal with guerrillas. I thought that they'd go into a village, kill all the men, rape all the women, and burn the village to the ground. Well, that's what they did in Afghanistan, and it didn't do them much good! I don't think that anybody really has a solution to this whole problem.

In Malaya the reason that "resettlement" worked was that the British started off with the unflinching support of about half of the population -- the Malays. The Malays weren't doing this to please the British. They were doing it to "save their own skins."

HELBLER: And the threat was a Chinese ethnic communist movement.

Q: That's it! It was a palpable, observable threat. The Malays knew exactly what it was. They didn't have to be convinced. They were the source of the police forces, the irregulars, and all the rest of it -- plus the Malays who joined the various battalions of the Federation Regiment and the Malay Regiment. And, of course, there were the British battalions to support them. The British went at the problem in a very different way. We were never the government in Vietnam. They WERE the government in Malaya. They could make the decisions. We could never do anything more than suggest.

HELBLER: That's right. You would get frustrated when nothing happened.

Q: That's right.

HELBLER: I want to set the background for one of the major, if not THE major episode during the "Hue 2" period. I would like to mention things that were evident but whose meaning was muted in evaluating the significance of the shreds of evidence available. There were indications of some increased tension and antipathy between the Catholic and the non-Catholic communities in Hue in particular and, to a lesser extent, elsewhere in Central Vietnam.

One of the first things I observed when I got up to Hue in the summer of 1961 was the dedication of a minor, Catholic basilica in Quang Tri province. This was a heavily advertised and promoted event. I heard, right from the outset, "grumbles" from some of the non-Catholics in Hue that it seemed that every cabinet minister and every key general had to come up for the dedication, whether they were Catholic or non-Catholic. Large resources had been put into the construction of the basilica, and great attention was being paid to it. That was probably the first thing I heard of a specific development which was aggravating some people. However, I didn't attach a great deal of significance to that, in isolation, at the time.

Much more enduring, in terms of sensitivities, and literally visible to me from my own house, was the construction of a large, new church. It was not a Cathedral, because there already was a Cathedral in Hue. This was a very, very large church. It was located on the other side of these paddy fields which I mentioned a few minutes ago. As a number of people pointed out to me, this large church was being constructed with bags of cement which had the U. S. "hand clasp" sign on it, with U. S.-provided Vietnamese Army trucks hauling things, and other supplies that were a reflection of U. S. aid to Vietnam. I felt that these supplies were being diverted from the purposes they had been intended to serve by the U. S. Government.

This put me in a somewhat awkward position, but I was not really the enforcer of the disposition of aid "goodies" in the countryside. Indeed, such activities were common in many different ways. You only had to go to the Central Market in Hue on any morning and see U. S. aid commodities which were being resold, in presumed violation of the rules for their disposition. There were real limits as to what you could be expected to do about such "diversion" of aid supplies, and so on. More acutely, in the longer term, political sense, these complaints were inevitably made by non-Catholics. You had this very visible symbol of the pro-Catholic orientation of President Diem; his brother, Archbishop Ngo Dinh Thuc; another brother, Ngo Dinh Can; and, I suppose, of his other brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu, as well.

Nevertheless, these incidents were not "major flags," at least to me, at that point in time. While I was aware of these "sensitivities" between the Catholic and non-Catholic communities, there did not seem to be a shred of Buddhist opposition emerging or being coordinated in any formal or informal sense. There was nothing very concrete to suggest the type of events that could and, in fact, did happen subsequently in Hue and elsewhere.

I mention this because there were things that I saw. I mentioned previously the mother of the four Ngo brothers, who lived in Hue. Each year, on her birthday, there would be a big celebration. President Diem, the Prime Minister at the time, cabinet ministers, and so on, would come up to Hue to celebrate it. The principal event was a very high profile Mass in the Cathedral, near where the Ngo brothers' mother lived. All of the local government officials were "required" to attend this Mass. I was also "expected" to attend. While this could be shrugged off as "obedience" to the maternal element of the family, it was frequently interpreted as further evidence of the importance of Catholicism in what was basically a non-Catholic community. So there were complaints regarding the overtones of that religious issue, in the context of "mother's" birthday.

Overall, by the end of 1962, when I left Hue on home leave, it was obvious to me how "different" Central Vietnam was from southern Vietnam. The people, the economy, the culture, and the thought processes were different. There was a broader incidence of poverty, generally, in Central Vietnam. Life was more difficult for people in that area than in Southern Vietnam. Certainly, there was an absence of any political opposition of any sort, although I am not suggesting that there was a high degree of organized opposition to the Diem Government in Saigon. But in Saigon there were "dissident" elements which were somewhat more prominent and had relatively greater freedom to move about and do things than they would have had, if they had lived in Central Vietnam.

When I went to the Montagnard areas of the Central Vietnam highlands, it was frequently clear that the montagnards were not being "cultivated" in any meaningful manner by the government. It was equally clear that most of the montagnards were not in favor of the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese. They basically wanted to be left alone. No significant number of montagnards were converted to the cause of the Viet Cong. However, it was very evident that the montagnards did not appreciate the very paltry efforts of the government on their behalf to improve their economic or social well-being. The montagnards' encounters with Vietnamese government soldiers generally led to unpleasantness from their point of view. So I did not have the feeling that the Government of the Republic of Vietnam was enhancing its status among the montagnards and advancing its cause in that particular area.

That generally brings me to the end of my comments on the "Hue 1" period. My next topic would not be to go directly into the "Hue 2" period but rather to give a little description of the brief home leave that I had in Washington in September, 1962. Do you have any other questions, Tom?

Q: No, I think that this is coming along very nicely.

HELBLER: In late September or the first week of October, 1962, I arrived in Washington for one week of consultations prior to beginning three months of home leave.

I reported, as expected, to Ben Wood (Chalmers B. Wood), the Director of the Vietnam Working Group at that point. I talked with him and some members of his staff, as well as with a couple of officers from INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research]. Ben asked me to accompany him to the weekly staff meeting of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, which was chaired by Governor Averell Harriman, the Assistant Secretary at the time. Ben said to me, "I want you to give just five minutes, not more than five minutes, on your observations in Hue, after two years in Vietnam, including a year in Hue." He said, "I'll introduce you to the Governor after the Deputy Assistant Secretaries and the other Country Directors have given their reports. But you must keep it limited to five minutes and you must speak very loudly, because the Governor has a severe hearing impairment and has a hearing aid."

So I attended the staff meeting and, for 45 minutes, the other people attending raised various issues. The Governor remarked on nothing that anybody said. Some of the Deputy Assistant Secretaries commented on their subordinates' work or asked questions.

After 45 minutes it was my turn. I was introduced and stood up, relatively close to where the Governor was sitting. I started my remarks. After about two minutes the Governor reached into his pocket, pulled out the earpiece of his hearing aid, and put it into his ear. I saw this and realized that I had been speaking louder than anybody else had done. Nobody else stood up and spoke right at him, as loud as I was speaking. Right there, I could only conclude that he hadn't heard a thing from his staff during the entire 45 minutes of the meeting up to that point. He may have been thinking, "Who is this guy whom I've never seen before?" Maybe he picked up a couple of words because of the volume at which I was speaking. He listened intently for the next couple of minutes. I stopped at the end of my allocated five minutes.

I asked if I could answer any questions, and the Governor had some questions. The long and the short of it was that the rest of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs senior staff had to sit there for 45 minutes more while the Governor asked me about Vietnam. I'm sure this bored them to tears, but the Governor seemed genuinely interested.

At the end of the meeting I returned with Ben Woods to his office and was chatting with him. A few minutes later the phone rang. Governor Harriman was on the phone to Ben and said, "Ben, I want that young man that you brought to the staff meeting to go and see Roger Hilsman. I've just talked to him, and Roger will see him today if that is convenient to that young man." Roger Hilsman was then the Director of INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research].

So I went and talked to Roger Hilsman. We had about an hour's conversation. He was very interested. Then he said, "I'm going to call Walt Rostow." Rostow was then the head of Policy Planning in the Department of State. He said, "I want Walt to talk to you." So some time within the next day or so I was in Rostow's office. When I finished, Rostow said, "I want you to talk to Mike Forrestal." Mike Forrestal was then a Special Assistant to the President with responsibility for Vietnam. Rostow said, "I'm going to tell Mike that President Kennedy should see you." So I said, "OK, I'll stand by." So Forrestal called back shortly. We set up an appointment for the following day. He said, "I'll talk to you first, and then we're going in to see the President." He said, "It's going to be an 'off schedule' thing, and there will just be the three of us."

Now I was starting to take things seriously. I had no expectation of talking directly to the President of the United States in my entire career. Then I started getting nervous and wondered, "What am I going to say?" I told myself, "The only thing you can say is what you told the other people." In any event, I went over to the White House and was taken into Mike Forrestal's office. We spent an hour or so talking and were getting ready to go into the Oval Office of the President. Then Mike's phone rang. The President had had something else come up and had to cancel the meeting. So I was "saved." I missed the opportunity of a lifetime.

It was a rather interesting home leave. I had had no reason to anticipate that it would involve appointments with officials at such high levels. It certainly conveyed to me that there was an interest in Vietnam. The only thing that I could figure out which attracted each of those very serious officials to hearing from me was that I was, at that point, the only Foreign Service Officer who was serving full-time outside of Saigon. I lived under very different circumstances, had drawn somewhat different conclusions, and was reporting somewhat differently than the reporting coming out of the Embassy in Saigon. Indeed, it was subsequently confirmed to me that there was a feeling that I was somebody who had been out in the countryside and saw a very different scene. Perhaps, more importantly, this scene was more important, in some respects, than the Saigon political scene. Whatever it was, it was treatment which I had never anticipated. It was educational to me.

I then went off on home leave, interrupted only by a couple of phone calls during the Cuban "Missile Crisis" of October, 1962. Somebody had learned that there was a Foreign Service Officer not otherwise assigned at this point who could speak Spanish. I was told that I was probably going to have to report back to Washington within 24 to 48 hours for duty on the Cuban Task Force. This did not please me at all. I very much needed a break from my first two years of intense activity in Vietnam. However, the second phone call 24 or 48 hours later told me what I already knew from television, essentially, that the crisis was over. I was told, "We won't need you."

From there we'll just go into "Hue 2," which started on or about January 4, 1963.

Upon my return to Hue, I relieved Jim Rosenthal, my capable "stand in." He had "held the fort" in Hue for three months. I found that nothing very dramatic had happened during my absence from Hue. Nothing seemed fundamentally different. I had a new Vice Consul, Jerry Greiner, who had arrived in Hue just a few days before we did with his new bride, who had been an experienced White House correspondent for a women's magazine. They brought a new element of fresh blood and energy to the local scene.

The months of January, February, and March, 1963, were pretty much routine. Of course, I started traveling again right away. Nothing of any consequence came to my attention during that time, at least that I can recall.

April, 1963, brought a family tragedy. We had had a daughter born in Hue less than four months after we arrived there in September, 1961. Her name was Cindy Lee Helble. My wife, Joan, had stayed in Hue to have the baby, contrary to the practice of many American women in the "out stations" of Vietnam, who went to Saigon to have their babies. However, Joan preferred to stay in Hue. It had not been an "easy" birth, but it eventually was successful in all respects. In April, 1963, when the tragedy occurred, Cindy Lee was 18 months old. I had been gone on a road trip during the entire week when it happened. Prior to my departure I had requested our gardener at the consular residence to dig a small "duck pond." I had in mind getting some ducks for my son who, at the time, was six years old.

Q: This was Stuart.

HELBLE: This was Stuart.

Q: "Chau Stewart."

HELBLE: "Chau Stewart," in Vietnamese. Easter was coming the following weekend. So I left on my trip. When I returned late Friday afternoon, the gardener, Giam, was awaiting my arrival and proudly and immediately took me to the "duck pond" which he had dug and filled with water. I looked at it and immediately said, "No, Giam, it's too deep. It must be only about 18 inches deep." I gave him a hand signal to show how deep I wanted it. The loose dirt was on the side of the pond, and I said, "You must fill that in and make it just 18 inches deep instead of about three feet deep."

Q: Was it lined with concrete or was it...

HELBLER: No, it just had an earthen bottom. There was no investment in it, other than his labor during some portion of that week. The next morning I went to the airport to greet the usual weekend visitors from Saigon. In this case the visitor was Gil Kinney, a Second Secretary in the Economic Section, I believe, a relatively younger officer, and his wife, Anne Kinney. From the airport I took them to stop at the home of Jim and Bernadette Asher, the USIA couple. The Ashers had replaced another USIA couple who had been in Hue earlier. The Kinneys knew the Ashers from a previous post.

While I was at Asher's house, one of my household staff came over on his bicycle to this house, which was only a block away from my house. He told me that something very "bad" had happened to "Chau Cindy," our daughter. I jumped into the car, drove home, and found Cindy in the house on the floor. Joan was crying and said, "We found Cindy in the 'duck pond.'" I had had Boy Scout training in artificial respiration, and that's all that I knew how to do, except to make sure that the MAAG doctor had been called, which had been done. I applied artificial respiration far too late. It was obvious by the time that the doctor came that she was dead. So we lost our daughter under those tragic circumstances.

I mentioned earlier where we buried her and where her remains still are to this day, on the banks of the "Perfume" River Song Huong. Despite this very tragic experience, it did not raise any question in our mind as to whether we should leave Hue. It was just something that any parent who has lost a child knows is difficult to go through and to overcome. It is never totally overcome, but you just have to cope with it in your own, personal way. We did so as well as we could.

A month later, in May, 1963, I was seized with an abdominal pain. I had to be medically evacuated by helicopter to Nha Trang, on the coast in Central Vietnam, where there was a U. S. Army Field Hospital. That was on May 7, 1963. The pain was acute, but it turned out that the problem was minor. Once it was diagnosed, the treatment was simple, and I was released from the hospital on the following day.

I was able to obtain a flight back up to Da Nang. I had called the Consulate in Hue and asked them to send the Consulate car down to Da Nang to pick me up on the following morning. I spent the night of May 8 in Da Nang. Before I started early on the morning of May 9 to return to Hue, I was called by the Duty Officer at the I Corps U. S. Military Advisory Detachment and was told that a serious incident had occurred the previous day May 8, 1963 in Hue. Reportedly, at least several people were dead. I immediately returned to Hue by road and found all sorts of people waiting to see me at my home. I gathered whatever information I could on the incident, which was the spark which led in turn to the long and difficult series of events covering the spring, summer, and fall of 1963 in Vietnam.

In my view the essential facts of the matter were satisfactorily established fairly early on. By and large this is the view of these events in most books and articles written on the subject, although there were many different versions of the same events at an earlier stage. The facts, as I could best determine them, and which I still believe to be true, were that there was a demonstration by a group of Buddhists. Here I use the term "Buddhist" deliberately, yet advisedly, because in any large group of people on the streets of Hue or any other city there would be some Buddhists and some non-Catholics. However, many were not "Buddhists" in any strong, religious sense. It was a Buddhist organized demonstration which had approached the radio station demanding that a message be broadcast on the occasion of Buddha's birthday. The same group of Buddhists had previously been refused authorization to conduct a public celebration of Buddha's birthday. This refusal "annoyed" them, because they had always been able to celebrate Buddha's birthday in some public fashion. No one had ever taken political or other offense to such a celebration as far as I was aware or anybody could tell me. This was essentially another holiday type activity.

For whatever reason they were refused permission to hold the public celebration of Buddha's birthday. So they wanted a message broadcast over the radio station in celebration of Buddha's birthday. Local security forces -- not Army troops -- including Civil Guard forces under the command of the Deputy Province Chief for Security, a Major Dang Sy, were informed of the demonstration and went to the radio station to prevent any outbreak of real trouble or violence. The arrival of the Civil Guard forces apparently precipitated growing unhappiness among the people gathered at the radio station. Somehow, somebody in a wheeled, armored personnel carrier of the Civil Guard force seems to have "panicked." He reportedly drove through a part of the crowd, killing several people at least, under the wheels of the vehicle.

The government version immediately made public regarding what happened was that the Viet Cong had provoked this incident. This was a not uncommon example of the government's treatment of difficulties on the streets. It was always stated that it was the Viet Cong who inspired these things. I don't think that there was a shred of evidence to sustain that theory -- and most people did not believe that version of events. The government alleged that somebody in the crowd threw a grenade toward the Civil Guard vehicle. To my knowledge, there were never any grenade fragments found at the scene. That story increasingly appeared to be untrue.

These allegations made by the government added to the sense of outrage felt by the people in Hue. Here I am speaking of the views of many Catholics as well as non-Catholics who were friends of mine and who were quite incensed at the behavior of the Civil Guard troops. But beyond the effect of the incident itself, the government's "cover up," which was regarded as totally unbelievable by the people of Hue, only aggravated the government's position and jeopardized it even further. There was a feeling that there would never be any punishment of those responsible or an apology to the Buddhist community. During the succeeding days things went from bad to worse in terms of popular attitudes.

It seemed clear, even at that early stage and after the first week or so, that a "watershed" had been passed in terms of the government's position and stability. Reverberations from this event extended beyond the confines of Hue. Well, as history shows, they certainly did, in due time. There were several demonstrations in Hue -- peaceful marches with banners -- to protest what had happened. There was no violence. The speakers were carefully monitored by the authorities. A number of these speeches were authorized by the authorities to soften the criticism of the government. However, the banners were very critical of the government, which was an unheard of indication of opposition in Hue, during the years when Ngo dinh Can controlled the area.

In the Consulate we monitored these events as closely as we could. While I went to one of the first parades or demonstrations, I decided that it would be prudent not to go personally to other demonstrations. I was well known to the security forces and others in Hue.

I did not realize for several days that Jerry Greiner, my Vice Consul who worked for CIA, was attending these demonstrations. He had been a 6' 3" linebacker for the Los Angeles Rams, was a physical "brute" of a fellow, and would be terribly imposing in any crowd of Vietnamese, who averaged 5' 4" in height. In other words, he would "stand out" in such surroundings. I have a marvelous photo that one of my local employees took of him at one of these demonstrations. In the picture he is peering around a 4" thick, concrete lamp post. A 4" lamp post did not disguise much of Jerry Greiner! I saw that picture only after we had decided not to attend the demonstrations. Our USIS officer, Jim Asher, was 6' 3" tall; and we had the Public Safety Adviser from USOM, who was 6' 3". All of them were going down to watch the demonstrations. In a community such as Hue, where there were virtually no foreigners, they stood out like "very sore thumbs." So I called them all in and said, "From now on, we will cover these events with one of our local employees," whom I immediately showed how to use a simple, "Rolleiflex" camera. He would take shots of anything of interest but particularly of banners, as we wanted to know what the banners were saying. In other words we Americans would have a much less visible presence. Of course, the information was shared with the others. So we got our "giant" Americans off the street in that situation. It was an amusing sidelight, but this is something you really have to be sensitive to in such a political environment.

Most of the attacks made orally and in the signs against the GVN were very indirect. However, they were made and were visible to the people of Hue, which made them very unusual. Of course, there was a lot of ferment on the scene.

There was immediate U. S. media attention to these events. After the initial incident there was no follow-on violence, and media attention naturally waned. A number of reporters for U. S. media came to Hue during the first 24 hours after the first incident, but within 72 hours, as I recall it, they had all gone away. A street parade wasn't a terribly newsworthy event, unless it ended in some confrontation and violence. That was not happening.

However, at least there was an awareness in the U. S. media of this incident and of the problem involved in it. I had "feedback" from the Embassy on the reporting that was being done in the U. S. on the subject.

Some of the demonstrations resulted in "sit downs" on a major thoroughfare on the southern side of the city of Hue, where the University of Hue and the two principal high schools, a boys' high school and a girls' high school, were located. Certainly, there were students involved in these activities. "Bonzes" - Buddhist monks - from the Tu Dam Pagoda, the central and most prestigious pagoda, participated in the demonstrations, gave speeches, and so on.

On several occasions the authorities tried to remove the demonstrators from their "sit downs" which blocked traffic. Tear gas was used. I think that the tear gas was reliably reported to have been "poured" on people's heads on some occasions, instead of being sprayed in a gaseous form. There were some reports that the tear gas supply of the police force in Hue was so outdated that it had deteriorated and could not be spread in the normal manner. I can't comment on that. I really don't know if that was true or not. I certainly had a number of reports from several of the doctors at the local hospital, whom I knew, regarding the casualties that they were treating. Some of those who required treatment had severe eye irritations or possible damage to the eyes, skin burns, and that sort of thing. As I recall it, there were no fatalities during those episodes. However, since so many of the demonstrators in the crowd were young people, their involvement further inflamed the attitudes of the local people.

Essentially, as I recall it, and this is without any recent review of the history, documentation, or books that pertain to this period, for several weeks or maybe as much as a month this situation festered and was of great concern. However, it had not yet exploded as the major political and international media issue that it became until the first "immolation" suicide by fire of a bonze in Saigon.

Q: That was the next, principal development. It received media attention. However awkwardly the government had been handling the matter up to this point, the issue was fading.

HELBLE: Yes. It had been restricted in its emotional impact essentially to Central Vietnam -- primarily Hue and, secondarily, Da Nang. There were just minor demonstrations in several other, small towns in Central Vietnam -- more in sympathy than anything else. These generated no sense of even local excitement in most cases.

It was when events led to Saigon that it became a truly national and critical issue. It was one which, I think, created many of the subsequent images and perceptions in the American mind. Americans saw images on television which depicted the situation in Vietnam as being chaotic. The country was depicted by the media as having an unpopular government, and it was stated that U. S. assistance was propping up this unpopular government. I think that it contributed, in a significant manner, to many of the perceptions that were widely accepted about Vietnam in subsequent years. The U. S. had a very unpopular government as an ally. Even when President Diem himself was overthrown, there were still images of mass confusion which persisted and undermined much of the political support in the United States eventually for our policies in Vietnam. All of these things flowed together and eventually caused a "tidal wave" of attitudes in this respect. The suicide by fire of the bonze was probably the first major impact on the American psyche. People saw bonzes burning...

Q: I think that there were about seven or eight such incidents of bonzes "immolating" themselves. These all happened in Saigon.

HELBLE: We had one in Hue. I cannot recall when it was -- it may have been in late June or early July of 1963. However, the "immolation" in Hue didn't attract that much attention, once Saigon "got into the act."

Q: Then, of course, there were other problems that came up. There was a clear attempt by the Buddhist leaders to exploit the matter as much as they could. They were running more or less continuous agitation meetings outside of certain pagodas -- especially Xa Loi Pagoda in Saigon. This kept the issue aflame, and the American press, I think, fanned it. There is no doubt that the GVN mishandled this issue in every way.

HELBLE: Of course, there was considerable concern among the official American community in Central Vietnam, flowing out of that incident. It was evident that there had been a considerable loss of public support for the government in that area. There was concern that the Viet Cong would exploit this opportunity. We kept waiting for signs of increased VC military activity in the surrounding area or the activities of "agents provocateurs" in Hue or Da Nang. However, I think that the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese were caught off guard by these events and were not in a position or were not prepared to strike in such a situation. It seemed plausible that that kind of activity could develop literally "overnight."

The security situation in the provinces continued to deteriorate, but at no greater a rate than in the past several years. We watched the security situation very closely, as we always did, but particularly in relation to the May 8, 1963, incident. Nothing really dramatic occurred in that respect. There was concern that the government was being distracted by these events, that there was dissidence within the military services, and that sort of thing. However, nothing really happened in that respect, in my view, certainly in Central Vietnam. Nothing happened that would indicate that "the worst" was occurring or that the conflict between the government and the communists was increasing in scale.

Because it was the venue for the May 8 incident, Hue was a more interesting place to live, in certain respects [Laughter] for succeeding months.

I had an unfortunate staff situation develop at that time. The American administrative assistant I had, George Clee, had been diagnosed by the American MAAG doctor as suffering from hepatitis, shortly before the May 8 event. This diagnosis was confirmed by the head doctor at the hospital of the University of Hue, as well as the head German doctor of the German aid team which was teaching Vietnamese medical students at the university. They confirmed the diagnosis and concurred that he would have to take life very easy for a while, as he recovered from this. He could still work a limited schedule, but certainly not in excess of six hours a day.

Well the events in Hue were driving us at a frenetic pace. George was a most dedicated and serious fellow. He and his lovely German wife lived in a house directly adjacent to the Consulate. George had been handling our classified, telegraphic communications. When I was traveling and out of the office, George had to handle whatever came up. It was really impossible to restrict him to six hours a day, no matter how much I ordered him. He just couldn't observe such a limit. I really had problems trying to enforce this limit. As a result, his physical condition continued to deteriorate throughout the month of May, 1963, following the incident. By early June I knew that we had to "medevac" him. I was in contact with the Embassy on this issue. The Embassy told me that they had no more travel funds for that fiscal year. On July 1, 1963, a new allocation of funds would be available, and I could then evacuate him!

Q: To suit everybody's convenience.

HELBLE: Yes. In any event, the MAAG doctor said, "He just cannot wait. You've got to get him out of here. He isn't going to rest and isn't going to get the medical treatment that he needs. He's deteriorating rapidly." So I said to him, "George, you and Ingrid are leaving Hue on tomorrow morning's flight." He said, "But we don't have travel orders." I said, "There aren't going to be travel orders for this trip. We'll worry about that some other fiscal year." So I went to the Consulate's Petty Cash Fund and scraped up enough from it, bought two Air Vietnam tickets, took them to the airport the next morning, put them on board the plane, went back to the Consulate, called the Embassy Administrative Counselor, and told him that Air Vietnam Flight such and such was arriving at Tan Son Nhut airport in one hour and 45 minutes. George and Ingrid Clee were on board. George would probably need an ambulance to transport him to some sort of medical facility. However, in any event, in one hour and 45 minutes he would be in the hands of the Embassy's consular district.

Q: Who was the Administrative Counselor?

HELBLE: I cannot remember for certain, but I am fairly sure that it was Bill Bradford. In fact, Bradford may have been the GSO General Services Officer -- I don't recall. I told him that George Clee was no longer in the Hue consular district. I subsequently sought and received reimbursement for the Petty Cash Fund.

It was a damned good thing that we got George out because he was in very serious condition. He was flown immediately to the hospital at Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines. He spent a substantial amount of time there being treated for hepatitis. He was eventually evacuated to the States and spent a total of one year undergoing hospital treatment, recovering from what turned out to be severe damage to his liver. His doctors told him that he just barely got to them in time.

I've always thought of that as the worst example that I've encountered in the Foreign Service of a "no can do" administrative attitude. They were prepared to let a valued member of our team die because they could not muster $200 in travel funds.

Q: This reminds me of a different situation, but the same mentality. This goes back about 10 years ago in Chicago in the winter. There had been terribly heavy snow, so much so that the City of Chicago had used up all of its allocation in the budget for snow removal. Then there was another heavy snow. The Mayor took off for Florida and said, "I'm sorry that we can't plow the streets because we don't have any money left!" He was promptly voted out of office at the next election.

HELBLE: The summer of 1963 continued, with the principal, political events occurring in Saigon. Maneuvers and efforts continued to be made, to the extent that they were genuine, to reach some accommodation between the government and the Buddhists. The Buddhists continued to capitalize on their new-found fame and attention from the media and, I might say, from the Consulate and Embassy staffs as well. After all, I had gone off to see Thich Tri Quang, the chief leader or instigator of the Buddhist movement, once it emerged as some sort of political movement. I talked to him, and Embassy Political Officers went off to talk to the key "bonzes" in the Saigon pagodas. This function was part of their duties, and I don't want to appear to be criticizing them in this regard. However, the point is that the Buddhists had found a number of sympathetic audiences, including that particular one, and tried to promote their cause through them.

I might say that a telegram which I wrote on the interview with Thich Tri Quang has been publicly released and quoted in more than one book. A book which I have in my library cites the essence of my conversation with Tri Quang. I had to arrange the appointment with him clandestinely, although it was to be at his pagoda and was in his private cell. In setting up the appointment I could not call him directly. I had to work through an intermediary who was "close" to Tu Dam Pagoda to set up the meeting. I knew that my telephone lines were being monitored by the Vietnamese authorities. I was able to observe that I was fairly frequently under "surveillance." My house and the Consulate were under surveillance. This was prior to the subsequent August 21, 1963, "crack down" by the government on the Buddhists, to which we will shortly refer.

I called on Tri Quang. Just the two of us were present. It was very difficult to extract from him any useful information on what his objectives were, what his intentions might be, and what his feelings were about the government's handling of the situation. It was clear that he was critical of the government. When I asked him whether he thought that there would be more "trouble" in the weeks and months ahead, he gazed out of his little, monk-like cell, which was probably about eight feet long and five feet wide, and had a cot in it...

Q: Just like our Vietnamese language classroom at the FSI!

HELBLE: Yes. A single chair had been brought in for me to sit on. He sat on his cot. The small window looking outside had bars on it. I felt that I was more in a prison cell than in somebody's bedroom. In any event, he looked out his window, when I asked about future "trouble." It was basically a sunny day, but with some white clouds in the sky and a little breeze blowing. He said, "Well, the sky is blue, but the clouds are drifting by." That was about the extent of his answer on that particular subject. It was not uncommon to receive an answer of that sort. I will say that the book to which I just referred quotes that line, but more for the sake of demonstrating how little American officials understood Buddhist culture. However, the author of the book does not go on to explain what Tri Quang meant by this remark. Whatever the result, this was a meeting which I had to try to make. I felt better about it but I didn't learn a hell of a lot. I guess that I shouldn't have expected to learn a great deal from meeting with him.

The summer of 1963 passed with events really focusing on Saigon and statements coming out of Saigon. The street demonstrations in Hue had stopped. As I said, I think that there was a single case of "immolation" of a bonze in Hue after there had been a number of such incidents in Saigon. The next major event occurred on August 21, 1963. The new U. S. Ambassador to Vietnam, Henry Cabot Lodge, was en route to Saigon to take up his post. The GVN undertook raids on the major pagodas in Saigon and in Hue. Martial law and a strict curfew were proclaimed in Hue and in Saigon. They were probably enforced more thoroughly in Hue than in Saigon, because Hue was more controllable, in the sense of physical security.

Q: Did the government raid pagodas in Hue? How many, do you remember?

HELBLER: They raided at least two pagodas in Hue, Tu Dam Pagoda being the focal point. I would have to review the record to recall the figure more precisely than that.

Q: I was working in the Vietnam Working Group in the Department of State in Washington at the time. We made a list of the pagodas that had been raided. There were about 20 in the whole country, out of a total of about 5,000 pagodas in the whole country. The representation that this was a "crackdown" on all pagodas was quite mistaken.

HELBLER: No, it was not.

Q: However, I'm afraid that this was the point where matters had gone beyond rational discussion.

HELBLER: A "fine point" such as you are making was irrelevant.

Q: Furthermore, this had its impact in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. I remember a staff meeting with our friend, Roger Hilsman, the Assistant Secretary, presiding. This was shortly after the pagoda raids. He said, "Well, the pagodas were raided by Vietnamese Special Forces under Ngo dinh Nhu Counselor of the GVN and brother of President Diem. We just can't stand for this." I said, "Roger, it isn't clear who was responsible for this. This is all preliminary information." Then he said, with a "shit-eating" smile on his face, "If it isn't true, then let's make it true." To me this man Hilsman was just so shallow. He was a person with no personal integrity at all. That really is what happened at that point.

HELBLER: Right. Well, in Hue I could hear gunshots in the night. Tu Dam Pagoda was some distance away, but it was within the city limits of Hue. The pagoda and the Consulate were both on the South side of the Perfume River. I believe that I may have gotten my first, official indication of what was happening in Saigon from the Voice of America, if I recall correctly, when I heard one of their early morning broadcasts. I was quickly able to confirm that there had been some violence at Tu Dam Pagoda which resulted in a number of injuries to bonzes and their supporters, many of whom had been camping on the grounds of the pagoda for some weeks. There was a large number of arrests, although I do not recall the exact number. As I mentioned above, martial law was imposed. There wasn't a single person walking around on the streets. I know this because early in the morning, probably around 8:00 AM, I had gotten into my official vehicle and drove through the city. I crossed the bridge across the Perfume River into the old city. The bridge was under heavy guard, but my vehicle was allowed to pass. I had no other passengers in it. The police could see that I had consular plates on the car. I was probably known by a number of them by sight. American-provided armored personnel carriers were guarding certain key points. Nobody was going anywhere.

To be perfectly candid, I was "enraged" because, once again, I saw what I regarded as a clearly visible "misuse" of American equipment. I felt that this equipment was being used in a manner which, I considered, would cause us enormous "grief." Certainly, this didn't enhance our image with the Vietnamese in Hue, at least as far as I was concerned. I saw American-provided APC's Armored Personnel Carriers rattling around the town, blocking bridges, and that sort of thing. I recognized that my emotional response to this, which I had to "internalize" and not allow to be seen, was something that I just had to get under control. However, it was certainly my first reaction to what I was seeing.

Martial law continued in effect for some time. Things were really "clamped down." I was now under 24-hour a day surveillance, and anywhere I went there was a black Citroen in the rear view mirror. There was always one such vehicle parked outside my house -- and not very discreetly hidden.

Perhaps several days after August 21, 1963, a young man with whom I had had a number of contacts, a man whom I would describe as basically an "intellectual" and who was basically a "political dissident," came to my house. He wanted to discuss recent events and share information with me. We talked for a time. Then he said, "You know, I am concerned about my security." He asked, "Can you give me something that I can send back to you in the event that I am arrested -- something that you will recognize?" I said, "Well, I'll give you a book." I reached among my paperback books. I did not choose this book deliberately, but it was somewhat ironic when I realized that the book I was handing him was Dostoevski's "Crime and Punishment." In any event, the book never came back to me. However, on the following day his wife called me and said that she knew that her husband had been coming to see me and that he had not returned home since the previous morning. I asked my gate guard if he had observed anything unusual, when this fellow had left the house on the previous day. He said, "Yes, when he walked out the gate, the black Citroen that parks over there pulled over to him and put him in it."

I never heard from him again. I don't know what happened to him, but that was the type of environment that we were now operating under. I knew that I had to be very discreet in approaching my very best contacts. When I did, some of them would say, "Look, I want to talk with you, but I just can't, under these circumstances. I have a family," and so forth. Others would say that we could meet, but it would have to be under some kind of cover, where "I would have a legitimate reason to be." Others wouldn't answer my attempts to contact them at all. It became very evident to me that I was de facto "PNG" persona non grata in this environment. It was simply a situation that I had to live with.

The situation continued unchanged throughout September. In mid-October of 1963 we decided that we would take our annual vacation and go to Baguio in the Philippines, which we had become rather fond of. So Joan, our son Stuart, and I went off to Baguio. We were planning to spend two weeks there.

While I was there, the DCM from the Embassy in Saigon, Bill Trueheart, also came over to stay in Baguio, at the Country Club, which is adjacent to Camp John Hay. We both had bungalows in that area. Trueheart asked me, in an aside and not in Joan's presence, "When are you getting back to Hue?" I said, "October 28." He said, "When you get back, I want you to pack one bag containing what you would need immediately for you and your family. Not more than one bag. We have intelligence reports that the Vietnamese Government is going to issue a massive 'White Paper' about the whole Buddhist episode. The blame is going to be placed very directly on the United States. Specifically, it's going to fall on you as the Consul in Hue, whom they will accuse of having created the problem, agitating about it, exacerbating it, and directing it." I said, "I couldn't direct something like that in my wildest dreams." He said, "Well, we know that, but they are looking for a 'goat,' and you're going to be the 'goat' in this white paper, backed up, in effect, by the U. S. Government." He said, "At that point, when that is issued, you and your family are going to be in serious danger up there. You'll have to clear out. As soon as that happens, we'll send a plane up to Hue, pick up you and your family, and get you out of there."

I said, "When in hell is this going to happen?" He said, "Well, it's going to happen as soon as Madame Ngo dinh Nhu leaves the United States." You may recall that she was on a trip through the United States, moving from East to West. At that moment she was in Honolulu. She was spending several days in Hawaii, her last stop in U. S. territory. Trueheart said, "They do not want to embarrass her with this until she has left the United States." Trueheart said, "We are expecting the issuance of this White Paper about three days after you return to Vietnam."

So I went back to Hue with that "cheerful" news, after two pleasant weeks in Baguio. I said nothing to Joan about this. Before the White Paper was issued, the final coup against President Ngo dinh Diem took place.

Q: Was the paper ever issued?

HELBLE: It was never issued. It would be interesting to know if there is a copy of it.

Q: I really wonder if there ever was such a White Paper. Trueheart may have had a report about this, but, following the coup, I never saw such a paper or any further reference to it.

HELBLE: I wouldn't have seen it up there in Hue.

Q: But it would have been issued, or we would have gotten hold of a copy of it, if it ever existed. I really wonder if it did exist. But it may be that Trueheart very much believed this.

Trueheart had some other problems, too. A friendship of virtually a lifetime -- a long friendship with Ambassador Fritz Nolting Ambassador to Vietnam -- went "blooey" over this whole business. I liked Ambassador Nolting. However, for some reason, which I never could quite understand, right in the middle of all of this -- I think that it was in July, 1963, Nolting decided that it was time for him to take leave. He went to Greece and was having a vacation down in the Greek islands. Well, I was never an Ambassador, but I would think that in a situation like that, I would not leave a country that was possibly on the verge of an explosion. Would you?

HELBLE: Well, as a matter of fact, I had an opportunity to address that very issue when I was DCM to Ambassador David Schneider in Dhaka, Bangladesh, in 1981. Dave was scheduled to depart from the Embassy transfer in early July 1981. He had said all of his farewells, his household goods had been packed, and he was leaving less than 48 hours later, on a Monday. On the previous Saturday morning President Zia of Bangladesh was assassinated. I was the first person in the Embassy to learn of this through a contact who called me. As soon as I got into contact with Ambassador Schneider, we went to the Embassy to discuss the situation with his key advisers. I said to him, "David, the nature of this country is such that the United States runs the risk of being blamed in any event, because we are blamed for all kinds of things that we had nothing to do with. However, given the peculiar twists of minds in this country and in India, which regards Bangladesh as virtually its own, there is going to be a widespread conviction that your departure was an admission that we did it and that you were getting out of the country before they could get the goods on you." I said that it was my strong recommendation that for that, as well as for other, obvious reasons, e.g., if we have to take some position with the Bangladeshi government, that he should advise Washington that he plans to stay in Dhaka for at least another week.

Q: I think that that was sound advice.

HELBLE: Ambassador Schneider agreed. He wired Washington that he was going to stay for at least another week, and the Department approved.

I think that that's the end of where we are in terms of the coup against Ngo dinh Diem. That's perhaps a good point to break.

Q: Good.

HELBLE: November 1, 1963, brought the coup d'etat against Diem by the military junta.

In Hue martial law was imposed. However, as the coup succeeded rather rapidly, martial law did not endure in any meaningful way. There was widespread jubilation over the success of the coup among most groups in Hue. The security situation was all right. There was no violence or untoward incidents. With the "liberation," if you will -- as many people saw it -- from the regime and the relaxation which immediately followed, in terms of the atmosphere in general, people were primarily concerned about freeing whatever political prisoners could be located. There were some of these, but I cannot give any estimate in terms of numbers. One of the more dramatic things that occurred late in the afternoon after the coup on November 3, 1963, was the discovery of the rather horrific prison about a mile or two west of Hue, in the general direction of the imperial tombs. It turned out that there had been a number of people incarcerated in an area which had been a former French ammunition depot. This was discovered, and a number of people were released from it. The people of Hue moved in large numbers to the site of this prison to look at it. I had the opportunity to do so myself. The bunkers in which ammunition had been stored were driven into a hillside and were later converted into prison cells. They were about 5-6 feet long, perhaps 3 ½ feet wide, and perhaps 3 ½ feet high. They had bare floors and no furniture -- nothing in them, except human excrement and other trash that had accumulated in the cells. Each cell had a barred gate on it. These cells would have been rather uncomfortable.

Q: Even Vietnamese couldn't stand in them.

HELBLE: Yeah. Even Vietnamese couldn't stand up. This, of course, provoked further outrage against the excesses of the previous regime. The military coup authorities had detained or placed under house arrest officials from the previous government whose movements they wanted to restrict. However, there were no large-scale arrests. Some people were arrested, but not many.

There was concern that there might be residual elements of the former government within the military who might undertake some counteraction. However, these concerns turned out to be unwarranted.

There was an intelligence report which indicated that the "Forces Populaires" of Ngo dinh Can, which we discussed previously, would seek retribution and had already determined in their minds that the Americans were responsible for the coup against Diem. The American community in Hue was allegedly under some threat. I felt that this was very unlikely, although the U. S. military senior adviser to the ARVN 1st Division, Colonel Ed Markey, thought it prudent, acting on his own, to ask the new military authority, General Do cao Tri, the I Corps commander who was present in Hue, to post guards around all of the American residences and facilities. When I saw a squad of ARVN soldiers being deployed in my yard for this purpose, and I learned from a lieutenant on the scene that this was in accordance with orders from headquarters, I went over to talk to Colonel Markey and told him in no uncertain terms that he did not have the authority to request the Vietnamese military to post these guards around U. S. civilian residences or installations. Then I went to General Do cao Tri and asked him to remove these security guards immediately. General Tri agreed to my request. This caused an unpleasant scene with Colonel Markey. After the matter was thrashed out in Saigon, within about a week Colonel Markey was relieved and reassigned in the Mekong Delta area.

Little of great note happened in the next 24 hours. Then I was approached by three individuals, separately, who requested that Ngo dinh Can, who had not been located or arrested but was in hiding, be granted "asylum" at our Consulate. I responded to each request that I would take the matter under advisement. I immediately communicated these approaches to the Department of State in Washington. In my report I informed the Department, first of all, that I could not be certain of the "bona fides" of any of these three individuals. Although I knew all three of them to varying degrees, I could not be sure whether one or more than one of them might be an "agent provocateur" or be misrepresenting their concerns. Aside from that, I pointed out to the Department that, under the "Foreign Affairs Manual" [FAM], a Consulate was not to accord asylum, and that we did not have such authority under international law as well. Under the FAM, the nature of asylum in a diplomatic mission was very narrowly restricted to circumstances in which the individual seeking asylum was in immediate, life threatening danger. An example given was that an individual might be hotly pursued by an angry mob. However, even under those circumstances, it would be required that, as soon as the immediate threat passed, the individual must be removed from the premises -- in effect, put out of the door.

I also pointed out that, from a political point of view, people in Hue were certainly relieved, as were people elsewhere, at the removal of the Diem regime. They had a great deal of dislike for Mr. Can and his authoritarian rule over a number of years. Granting him asylum would not improve the U. S. "image" in the immediate area around Hue. Furthermore, as an extension of that, I pointed out that if Mr. Can were installed in the Consulate under condition of asylum, and this became known, the news would spread like wildfire in Hue. Given the attitudes among the people of Hue, who had just observed the harsh prison conditions that I have described and who had many other grievances against Mr. Can, the people of Hue might decide to take Mr. Can into their own hands. The consular status of the Consulate building would hardly guarantee the security of the building, its occupants, or, indeed, anybody in the American community at that point.

There was an exchange of messages. I received a response from the Department, which was not definitive. It asked a few more questions. I answered those questions and reiterated my strong view that we should not grant this request, even if one or more of these requests were made in a bona fide way. Within 36 hours I was instructed to give Mr. Can asylum. Upon his arrival at the Consulate, I was asked to inquire as to what country he would like to go to for more permanent asylum. I was asked to inform both the Department and the Embassy when he arrived at the Consulate and what his choice of asylum was. Once that instruction was received from the Department, I was also in touch with the Embassy in Saigon. Some of that was handled over the telephone on a non-secure line. Efforts made to speak in "guarded" terms were probably useless, but I tried to do so. The Embassy advised me that they would send a C-46 transport plane, a CIA aircraft, to Phu Bai airport South of Hue as soon as Mr. Can arrived in the Consulate.

I then got in touch with the person whom I regarded as the most reliable of the three contacts I mentioned before.. I informed him that I would be prepared to accept Mr. Can at the Consulate. He got back in touch with me fairly shortly thereafter and said that Mr. Can would arrive at the Consulate in disguise and in the company of a Catholic priest, who would be driving the vehicle, at 11:00 AM, if I remember the time correctly, on Tuesday, which would have been, I believe, November 5, 1963. This time was approximately an hour before he actually arrived at the Consulate. Mr. Can did, indeed, arrive at the Consulate. He was lying on the floor of the back seat of an old Citroen. The chauffeur was a Vietnamese priest.

I greeted Can in the driveway in front of the porch of the Consulate and invited him to go upstairs, trying to shield him from observation by several of my local employees. These Vietnamese employees were working in an office to the right, as I led him up the stairs. Whether my attempt to shield him from observation succeeded or not, I do not know. I immediately raised with Mr. Can the question of where he would like to be sent for his "safe-haven" overseas. He promptly told me, "Tokyo."

At about this time I received a phone call from one of my local employees, telling me that General Do cao Tri, the previously mentioned I Corps Commander, was downstairs and wanted to see me. I left Jerry Greiner, the CIA Vice Consul, with Mr. Can and went downstairs to see General Tri in our small reception room. General Tri started by saying quite bluntly, as was his practice, that I "had" Ngo dinh Can in the building and that he, General Tri, "wanted" him. I told General Tri that, whether I had Ngo dinh Can or not, was a matter of my concern and not his. He then indicated that, given the atmosphere in Hue, in view of the hostility toward Can, should the people of Hue become aware of his presence in the Consulate, he could not ensure the security of the Consulate or of the American community in Hue in general. I immediately replied that it was clearly General Tri's responsibility to ensure the security of the Consulate, of American facilities, and of American personnel in Hue. I was at this point formally requesting that he provide such assurances and that I would immediately report this conversation to the Embassy in Saigon and his response. He gave no such assurances. I repeated that it was his responsibility, that I expected him to do so, and that this was a formal communication to that effect.

General Tri then left the Consulate. I returned to discuss the situation with Mr Can, but there was little more that I needed to discuss with him, once we had established that Tokyo was his preferred destination. I immediately called the Embassy in Saigon and informed them that "I had the bird in the cage." They advised me that within two hours the C-46 would arrive at Phu Bai airport, and I was to be there with Mr Can. I immediately sent a message to the Department saying that Can was in the Consulate. I called in the senior U. S. military adviser to the ARVN 1st Division, his deputy, and my CIA colleague Vice Consul Greiner. We developed a scenario for a small convoy to transport Can to Phu Bai airport, a distance of 14 kilometers. The convoy consisted of a jeep with an Enlisted Man and an Officer in the front, followed by my official vehicle containing the senior U. S. military adviser, the CIA Vice Consul, myself, and Mr Can, and another U. S. military jeep containing an officer and an enlisted man, following us.

We left the Consulate with just enough time to get to Phu Bai airport, in terms of the ETA (Estimated Time of Arrival) of the C-46 aircraft. The trip to the airport was uneventful. We did not encounter any difficulties. We placed Mr Can on the plane. I had arranged with Vice Consul Jerry Greiner to accompany him, and I instructed Jerry to turn Mr Can over to the Embassy and the Embassy only.

Greiner and Can flew to Tan Son Nhut airport in Saigon. When the door was opened, Greiner found that the plane had been parked on the military side of Tan Son Nhut airport and that there was a sizable contingent of ARVN troops surrounding the plane, with a couple of ARVN 2 ½ ton trucks with canvas covering the rear of the trucks, off to one side. Greiner was greeted by Lucien Conein, a well known CIA officer, who informed him, "All right, Jerry. I will take it from here." Jerry took the position that Conein was not the Embassy and told him that the Consul's orders had been to turn Can over to the Embassy. Conein said, "Well, have it your way, but here's your transportation." So Greiner and Can boarded the back of one of the 2 ½ ton trucks. The canvas flap was closed, and they rumbled off. After a drive of 15-20 minutes the truck stopped, the canvas was pulled back, and Greiner saw that he was in the midst of the better part of a battalion of ARVN troops in a large, ARVN installation, somewhere in Saigon. Conein appeared again and said, "This is the end of the road." Greiner had no alternative but to yield to the situation.

That was the extent of my direct involvement and that of the Consulate in Hue in the Can episode. As history will show, Can eventually was tried by the Vietnamese military authorities, was sentenced to death, and was executed.

Q: Was this by firing squad?

HELBLE: By firing squad. These events all occurred in Saigon, and I had no further involvement with them -- with one exception.

Shortly after the execution of Ngo dinh Can, there was a great deal of unhappiness expressed in the United States, primarily from the Catholic community, but from others as well, who felt that the Ngo family had suffered enough from the coup, with Diem and his brother, Ngo dinh Nhu, killed. It was felt that the U. S. was involved in this by taking Can, turning him over to the new Vietnamese authorities, and then "standing by" while he was sentenced and executed. This was felt by these Americans to have been an improper course of action for the U. S. -- or a combination of action and inaction.

A friend of mine, Larry Pezzulo, the Assistant General Services Officer in Saigon, subsequently told me of an incident that occurred about two days after the execution of Ngo dinh Can. Pezzulo was involved in this incident, to the extent that he was the Embassy Duty Officer at the time. An "Urgent" priority message arrived at the Embassy, while he was Embassy Duty Officer, which had to be delivered to Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge. Pezzulo took the message, I believe, to Ambassador Lodge's residence. Wherever it was, Ambassador Lodge and the DCM, Bill Trueheart, were both at dinner. Pezzulo called them out of the dinner, showed them the telegram, and the two of them read it. Ambassador Lodge and DCM Trueheart appeared to be deeply concerned because they were in some political "trouble." According to Pezzulo's account of this to me, Ambassador Lodge inquired of Bill Trueheart, "What do you think we ought to do about this?" Trueheart indicated, in Pezzulo's presence, that it was clear that we needed some scapegoat -- somebody to pin the blame on. Trueheart reportedly said, "Obviously, our Consul in Hue is the likely possibility for this."

Pezzulo was horrified at this, because he knew the circumstances very well. We had discussed the Ngo dinh Can affair in Saigon during a trip that I made to Saigon after the coup but before the events of this particular evening. In any event, nothing really came of that. It was another indication to me that one had to have a lot of luck, in addition to being careful, to escape some of the problems which can jeopardize your Foreign Service career.

Q: Did you ever find out what that message contained? Did you ever see it?

HELBLE: I never saw it.

Q: Any idea of what its substance was?

HELBLE: It was a message from the Department reporting the "uproar" in the United States over the handling of the Ngo dinh Can case. The Embassy was being asked by the Department to make recommendations to Washington as to how to handle this "uproar." I will say that, in subsequent years, in the mid 1960's, after I had returned to the United States and was working on Vietnamese affairs, I had occasion to draft answers to a lot of public correspondence and Congressional inquiries. On a number of occasions one of the issues that I had to address was this incident involving Ngo dinh Can because there were people in the U. S. who continued to refer to what they regarded as a "perfidious action" on the part of the United States and were still complaining about it. Because my name had appeared associated with the episode, in various articles at the time, I was frequently answering mail, not for my signature, but for the signatures of persons well above me, addressing the very issue in which I was being accused. This was never something that I worried a great deal about, but it is just a footnote to this incident.

Q: It doesn't seem to have hurt you very much, John. Your recommendation was in accordance with the Foreign Affairs Manual and was the right one, in terms of our whole history and tradition. I think that the decision first to grant asylum to Thich Tri Quang in the Embassy after the pagoda raids of August 21 was a mistake. The decision to grant asylum to Cardinal Mindszenty in Hungary in our Legation in Budapest after the 1956 Hungarian uprising was also a mistake. I think that the decision to give Ngo dinh Can asylum in the Consulate in Hue was a mistake. That is just no way to operate. It is not in our tradition and not in our custom. John, is there anything else that you want to go into?

HELBLE: As one other aftermath of the coup which overthrew the Diem government in 1963, one of the officials arrested after the coup by the incoming military junta was Major Dang Sy. You will recall that Major Dang Sy was the Deputy Province Chief in Thua Thien province in charge of security. He was responsible for the Civil Guard forces which became involved in the "Buddhist" incident at the radio station in Hue on May 8, 1963. Dang Sy was charged with responsibility for that incident. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be executed by firing squad. I did not attend the trial but I had followed it.

The sentence was handed down, and the date for execution was set for approximately three to four months after the coup. It may have been February, March, or early April, 1964. However, for whatever reason, I was instructed by the Embassy to attend Dang Sy's execution by firing squad, which was slated to take place in the modest stadium in Hue. I never understood why it was necessary for the U. S. Consul to observe the execution, but I did as I was instructed. It was a solemn occasion. The general public was invited, and I suppose that there were several thousand people in attendance. Dang Sy was, indeed, executed before my very eyes. This caused me some personal distress because I had worked closely with Dang Sy, when he was in his security position in Thua Thien province. I had found him a very candid, likeable, and, as far as I could tell, a quite honest official. I thought that he was one of the brighter, young military officers that I had met during my time in Hue. It was clear to me that this was another "scapegoat" exercise and that, in point of fact, it was considered essential, in the atmosphere after the coup that somebody should be blamed for the incident and some action taken that would mollify the people of Hue. I believe that Dang Sy was unjustly "pinned" with that responsibility. In any event, he did not deserve the fate that he received.

The rest of the spring and early summer of 1964 was marked largely by a continuation of the political turmoil, a lack of governmental direction, firm policies, and clear lines of authority. There was a lot of maneuvering on the political front, which was occurring primarily in Saigon and in the military high command. I had little to contribute in terms of direct observation of any of this, but it was an environment which affected the entire country in terms of a lack of direction and coherent policy, as well as political maneuvering. This had its impact in that government programs in the countryside floundered, and little progress was made in the major struggle against the Viet Cong. Security conditions continued to deteriorate -- not dramatically, but there was a steady erosion of the situation, as had been going on for several years.

I will now go to what was the final significant event in my experience in Hue. In some respects, perhaps, it was the most significant. I was scheduled to leave Hue immediately after our "Fourth of July reception" on July 4, 1964, for reassignment. By now I had completed four years in Vietnam.

A few days before I was scheduled to leave Hue I gave a farewell dinner, to which I invited the senior Vietnamese officials. General Do cao Tri, the I Corps Commander; the ARVN 1st Division commander; the chief of Thua Thien province; and the senior U. S. military adviser to the ARVN 1st Division were all there. The senior U. S. military adviser was the only other American present. During the course of the dinner several "runners" came in from ARVN 1st Division headquarters, which was located in The Citadel of the Imperial City of Hue. They delivered messages to General Tri and to the ARVN 1st Division commander, who promptly shared them with us. There apparently was an upsurge of Viet Cong incidents occurring in the area. Reports were coming in from a number of outposts in the northern part of the I Corps area - that is, Quang Tri and Thua Thien provinces. Finally, before we had dessert, another "runner" came. The message was so dramatic that we broke up the dinner and went on to the ARVN 1st Division headquarters, in the Imperial City.

One of the things that had triggered the breakup of the dinner was the report that two enemy soldiers had just been brought into headquarters. They had been captured East of Route 1 and North of Hue, along the Thua Thien-Quang Tri provincial border. There was a very narrow strip of land between Route 1 and the coast of the South China Sea at that point -- an area probably no more than three or four kilometers wide. Indeed, this was the precise area that was known during the Indochina War Against the French as "the street without joy," a reference to the numerous bloody ambushes the Viet Minh inflicted on the French in the early 1950s. The two prisoners were members of regular North Vietnamese Army units -- PAVN or the People's Army of Vietnam. When we got to ARVN 1st Division headquarters, we were given a quick briefing from the officers in charge at headquarters. General Tri asked if I would like to talk to the prisoners. I said that I would welcome the opportunity. We interviewed them. The first prisoner clearly spoke the North Vietnamese dialect. The second prisoner indicated that they had been captured because they had become disoriented in a battle that was still going on. They had lost their way and couldn't find their units. They had been picked up as "stragglers" by ARVN troops. They had never been to the area before, were unfamiliar with it, and didn't know where to go. Each of them -- and we talked to them individually -- acknowledged that about 90 days previously they had arrived in the A Chau Valley, which was in western Thua Thien province, and was, for all intents and purposes, enemy territory. ARVN occasionally had small outposts there but did not control the territory.

They had entered South Vietnam with their respective battalions as regular units of North Vietnamese divisions. One was the 324th Division, and I forget the designations of their regiments and battalions. I now forget the number of the other division, but it was one which the other prisoner had been assigned to. Each of them said that they had come down the Ho Chi Minh trail with their units intact. They had rested for about 90 days in the A Chau Valley area, were trained and resupplied there, and then launched their attack earlier that day before they were separated from their main units. It was already dark when they were captured.

This was the first time that there was evidence of integral North Vietnamese Army units operating South of the DMZ. There had long been North Vietnamese cadres in South Vietnam. Small groups had come in, operated most often in conjunction with some of the local Viet Cong forces...

Q: John, what was the date of this incident and therefore of your dinner party?

HELBLE: If I recall correctly, it was July 2, 1964. I could be "off" by a day, but I think it was July 2, 1964. In any event, I was totally convinced that we now had on our hands a real "smoking gun" in terms of a change in North Vietnamese activity and tactics. They were now sending into South Vietnam large bodies of troops, organized and directed entirely in North Vietnamese Army fashion, and using strictly North Vietnamese Army personnel instead of Viet Cong cadres who had been born in South Vietnam.

At the same time that we were learning this at the division headquarters, we also learned that there had been something like 40 bridges blown up in the previous 12 hours in northern Quang Nam, Thua Thien, and Quang Tri provinces. A number of ARVN outposts had been attacked, some of which had been overrun. One or two South Vietnamese "Special Forces" camps in the western part of this area were undergoing heavy attack and were in danger of being overrun. There was a report that as much as a battalion-sized unit had made an incursion directly across the DMZ from North Vietnam into South Vietnam, although there was no follow-up report on that. Indeed, the incident in which the two PAVN soldiers were captured occurred in an area East of Route 1, which had been virtually "incident free" during the three years that I had been in Hue.

Furthermore, an ARVN outpost located at what was known as PK (Kilometer Post) 17, 17 kilometers North of Hue on Route 1, had despatched all of its fighting troops into the various battles going on in the area. The North Vietnamese were in the immediate proximity of PK 17 which, at that point, was in no position to hold anything. There were no security forces between Hue and PK 17. ARVN troops were widely deployed throughout the area and had been reinforced by most of the reserves available to the 1st Division. As a result, I Corps had nothing left to deal immediately with the situation. General Tri sent a "Flash" message to his headquarters in Saigon, describing the situation and calling for the immediate despatch of Airborne troops to assist in handling the situation.

The entire situation was clearly one which, from a security and military point of view, was unprecedented at any time since the end of the Indochina War Against the French, in that particular area. It might not have been that uncommon in other areas in the Mekong Delta, Tay Ninh province northwest of Saigon, or in certain areas around Saigon. It was unprecedented in the Hue and Quang Tri area.

Q: I think that it was unprecedented in terms of regular, PAVN units.

HELBLE: That was definitely unprecedented. In any event, I returned to the Consulate and immediately drafted a report containing this information because, if a North Vietnamese incursion had occurred across the DMZ, that could really open up a "can of worms." If, in fact, the PAVN units marched 17 kilometers down Route 1 from PK 17 to Hue, there was nothing to stop them in the Hue area at that point.

I sent this message, detailing all of the above, including the account of the capture and interview of the two PAVN stragglers, via "Flash" message to the Department in Washington. The message, of course, was repeated to the Embassy in Saigon, via the Clark Field Philippines communications facility. My message went off at approximately midnight. A parallel message was being prepared by the U. S. Military Senior Adviser to the ARVN 1st Division. My message was "cleared" with the adviser, since he was present during most of these events.

Q: What was the name of the adviser?

HELBLE: This I cannot recall, because Col Markey, whom I referred to earlier, had been relieved. I do not recall the name of his replacement, but he was a very steady fellow. He reported through his channels, which went through the I Corps Advisory Detachment in Da Nang. The duty officer at this detachment was awakened, digested this, and then proceeded to ask further questions before forwarding his report to MACV [Military Assistance Command, Vietnam] headquarters in Saigon. This took some time, which was not necessary in my situation. I understand that some time around 3:00-4:00 AM the duty officer at MACV was awakened, not by a message from Da Nang, but rather by a message from the National Military Command Center [NMCC] in Washington, which had received a copy of my report to the State Department. The NMCC, of course, in effect, said to MACV, "What the hell's going on out there?" They had heard nothing from MACV. Well, the reaction to this in Saigon was rather classic and ultimately, as we will see, extremely ironic. General Paul Harkins was still in command of MACV.

General William Westmoreland, his ultimate replacement, had arrived in Vietnam and was "reading in" on the job. I myself had spent five hours alone with him at Ambassador Lodge's residence in Saigon, briefing him several weeks prior to this on security matters that we're now discussing. However, Westmoreland was not in command.

General Harkins was still in command, getting ready to leave in a short time. General Maxwell Taylor had arrived in Saigon as the new Ambassador. General Harkins and his staff were outraged that they had no information with which to respond immediately to the NMCC in Washington. They were annoyed that they should have been informed about all of this "frenetic" activity up in the northern part of South Vietnam by Washington and not by their own subordinate echelons. Shortly after this reports were coming in from the Senior Advisory Detachment in I Corps in Da Nang. I don't have the foggiest idea what MACV reported to Washington.

However, I learned directly from the Embassy on the following day that MACV, in effect, was "discounting" most of what I had reported. Perhaps 36 hours after my initial report, the Embassy summarized to me a MACV report to Washington for my comment. The MACV report said, more or less, "Well, yes, there were 48 bridges or so blown up, but 24 of them have been restored. Yes, a Vietnamese Special Forces camp was almost overrun, but with one-third of the camp still intact, the enemy was finally repulsed. Yes, there had been these widespread incidents, but they had now ceased." It was that sort of a message. Regarding the capture of the two PAVN soldiers, MACV said, "In the absence of a thorough debriefing, there was no evidence to conclude" that my report was valid.

At that point I only had another day or two left in Hue. I had continued with follow-up reports, some of which reflected the same type of things that MACV was now saying, "Yes, but." The heavy action had ceased by the next day, the Vietnamese Special Forces camp was still holding out and relief was on the way, and so forth. I continued to submit updated reports on the situation until I left, and then I went to Saigon.

When I got to the Embassy in Saigon, I was told that my successor, Sam Thomsen, would be receiving an instruction on the following day that all of his reporting was to be sent to the Embassy in Saigon, which would decide what, if anything, should be forwarded to Washington. It was indicated very clearly that this was the result of MACV's insistence, which was very unhappy at having been caught "with their drawers around their knees." They convinced General Maxwell Taylor that the Consul in Hue should no longer have an independent reporting channel to Washington. I felt badly about that, but there wasn't much that I could do about it. I still believed that I had done the right thing in this respect.

A footnote to that is really the most important thing. In February, 1965, I was blissfully attending the University of Chicago on a program of university training. I picked up the morning paper, having heard briefly on the news the previous night of the introduction of U. S. ground combat forces into Vietnam. Marines had landed near Da Nang and so forth. I read with great care and interest the full text of the MACV press conference, at which the introduction of these forces was announced. This provided the rationale for this very dramatic change in the level of U. S. participation in the Vietnam war. Until then, while we had had a number of U. S. military involved in the war, to the extent that they were being shot at and we were taking casualties, we did not have regular, ground combat units being dispatched to secure areas and to take on the enemy.

The key rationale used, as far as I could see, was that this action was taken in response to a change by the North Vietnamese in their conduct of the war. That is, the North Vietnamese were now sending regular army units into combat in South Vietnam. The first evidence of this was the capture of two North Vietnamese regular soldiers in an incident in early July, 1964, which I have previously described here. Yet this rationale came from the very same command, MACV which, seven and a half months earlier, had "pooh-poohed" the whole thing and had been very critical of the report. They were now utilizing it, and I think properly so, as justification for the change in the nature of American involvement in South Vietnam. However, this was an ironic development from my point of view. Finally, it should be noted that the July '64 MACV-Max Taylor action to cut off Consulate Hue's direct communication link to Washington was a classic bureaucratic response to embarrassment: Don't address the substantive issue - just kill the messenger!

Q: John, what assignment did you go to in Washington?

HELBLE: Let me make one more point about Vietnam. I referred to a long discussion which I had had with General Westmoreland when he arrived in Vietnam to become the commander of MACV. As I recall, this discussion occurred about the first week of June, 1964. At the time I was in Saigon on consultation. Ambassador Lodge had asked me to set aside an hour during which I would just talk with General Westmoreland and give him my observations after four years in Vietnam and before General Westmoreland assumed charge of his command. Ambassador Lodge suggested that this discussion might be held in Lodge's livingroom.

We met at 4:00 PM that afternoon, and the two of us talked for about five hours. General Westmoreland was very interested and asked a lot of questions. It was more of a briefing than a conversation. At about 8:00 PM the Ambassador's staff brought us a bite to eat. We kept going and finished at about 9:00 PM. As I said, I hoped that General Westmoreland would prove to be a more worthy commander of the U. S. military forces in Vietnam than General Harkins had been. I had had no regard for General Harkins' understanding of the situation he was dealing with. I thought that General Harkins had been just short of a disaster as the commander of MACV. I thought that General Westmoreland was very promising. He certainly was interested and asked a lot of the right questions. I was very optimistic that he was going to be a significant improvement, at a minimum.

One of the key points that I focused on in our discussion was my view that U. S. military forces could not do the "on the ground job" in Vietnam. The nature of the conflict was too "gray" and not "black and white" enough. The complexities of how to deal with it were too great for an outside force, such as the American military, to understand and deal effectively with. I had heard many American military advisers say, "Just give me one U. S. division. We'll start at the tip of Ca Mau the peninsula (the Southernmost part of South Vietnam) and we'll march north. We'll have this place cleaned out in six months." Unfortunately, that view, which reflected a great deal of confidence, which one may admire up to a point, demonstrated a total lack of understanding of the nature of the conflict. I told General Westmoreland that Vietnamese forces had to do most of the fighting. U. S. forces had the capability and could effectively provide logistical support, possibly including artillery and air support. However, "on the ground" fighting really, I thought, could only be done by the Vietnamese. If they couldn't do it, then it couldn't be done.

I kept coming back to that point, in one form or another during this session. I thought that General Westmoreland understood it quite well. However, history will show, of course, that, whether he understood it or not, that position was not followed.

HELBLE: I was aware that I was being assigned to the Vietnam Working Group. So I left Chicago on June 15, the day after Ramona was born, and reported a couple of days later to the Vietnam Working Group. That began another assignment, another chapter in the story.

Q: Is there anything more that you would like to record about your time at the University of Chicago?

HELBLE: It was an exhilarating year in many respects. It was broadening and challenging. It was certainly different from active duty in the Department or overseas. It was humbling, as I had to acknowledge the tremendous range of human knowledge of which, at least in my case, I was totally unaware. [Laughter] That's always a good perspective to have instilled in you.

The assignment to the Vietnam Working Group started in late June, 1965. It ran for just about exactly two years.

Q: Say something about the organization of the Vietnam Working Group. This was an unusual arrangement in the Department, at least at the time. I had served on the Vietnam Working Group a year or two before then, in 1963 and early 1964. At that time we had about five people assigned to the Group. Paul Kattenburg was the Director. I was the Deputy Director. How was it organized during your time there?

HELBLER: Well, when I arrived there, we had seven officers and three secretaries. As the next two years unfolded, we built up to nine officers and three secretaries. At one point during that time frame I became very incensed because for months other officers and I had been pleading to get at least some additional secretarial help. We had to do our own filing. There was a horrendous amount of telegraphic traffic and other reports coming into our office. The place was a shambles of paper. Often you couldn't find a telegraphic reference from the previous day because nothing was in any particular order. Frequently, I would spend a Saturday afternoon or a Sunday morning, just filing stuff that was related to my own work. We couldn't get help.

Q: You had a specific assignment on the desk. What was that?

HELBLER: I was working on internal political developments in Vietnam. We had an officer who was working on the political-military aspects.

Q: Who was that?

HELBLER: Chuck Flowerree. We had another officer working on the peace negotiations, which were all very hush-hush at that time, using various channels -- the Poles, the Chinese Communists, and others.

Q: Who was doing that?

HELBLER: Hayward Isham did most of it. Dick Smyser was also involved in some of that. George Roberts was in charge of following Vietnamese external affairs. This frequently meant "Third Country assistance." We were trying to encourage the European countries, the Japanese, and others to provide economic and/or military assistance to the Republic of Vietnam.

I had one assistant on my side. This was Tony Lake, who eventually became the National Security Adviser to President Clinton at the NSC [National Security Council]. Bill Marsh was my assistant at another stage on the internal political side. Bob Miller, or Robert H. Miller, was the Director of the Working Group. He had arrived about a week before I did. He was there throughout my two-year stint.

Q: He'd been in the Embassy in Saigon?

HELBLER: He's been the number two in the Political Section in the Embassy in Saigon from about 1962 to 1965, if I recall correctly. He was a very competent, calm officer, under whom I served later on, when he was a Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, and I was Country Director for Thailand and Burma in 1976. Interestingly enough, he now works with me at the State Department as a retiree, handling requests from the public for State Department documents under the Freedom of Information program. He has become one of my closest friends.

In any event it was a pressure cauldron of the first water. The nature of the pressure was very different from what I had experienced in the field. There were constant demands from Congress, the White House, the "Seventh Floor" of the State Department, and the Pentagon.

Q: The Seventh Floor is where the Secretary and the senior officers of the Department have their offices.

HELBLER: Yes. There were also demands for information from the press and so on. There was a relentless cascade of demands, all of them urgent. Of course, we were fully aware that we were involved in a major war, with thousands of casualties accruing as the months went by.

To return to your question about organization and staffing, at one point I became increasingly incensed at the shortage of secretarial assistance. I had tried to work through Bob Miller, but nothing got done. So one day I wrote a memorandum. I made several copies of it. I said that, with 540,000 U. S. troops in Vietnam the least the State Department could do was to provide an adequate secretarial staff for a small office that was dealing with issues affecting those troops. The memorandum was directed to the Executive Director of the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, who was in charge of the administration of the bureau. I left a copy on Bob Miller's desk. He was not in. I left another copy with the Deputy Assistant Secretary, Leonard Unger, who was responsible for supervising our office.

This was late on a Friday afternoon. Within a half hour the proverbial fecal material hit the fan. Everybody wanted to know what I thought I was doing, "jumping channels" and this kind of thing. I made clear that my sense of outrage had reached the point where I was determined to do something. [Laughter]

Q: You'd gotten attention, anyhow.

HELBLER: On the following Monday morning we had another secretary. That was probably my greatest accomplishment during my two years on this desk because, certainly, I didn't resolve the internal political problems of Vietnam. In any event it was a very different scene from work in the field in Vietnam. It was a madhouse every day.

In the midst of all this pressure I was charged with following the internal politics of Vietnam, including the struggle for power and influence between President Nguyen van Thieu and Prime Minister Nguyen cao Ky and the machinations of the Vietnamese generals, which was a feature of Vietnam's political life during our years of association with it. There was the Buddhist influence in it, which I referred to in an earlier part of this interview in connection with my time in Hue. There was the breakdown in ARVN solidarity.

Q: ARVN was the Army of the Republic of Vietnam.

HELBLER: That's right. That occurred in particular during 1966. This involved General Nguyen chanh Thi, in particular, whom we referred to earlier in connection with the abortive coup d'etat in Saigon in 1960. In 1966 General Thi was the commander of the ARVN I Corps, with his residence in Da Nang. He had the ARVN First and Second Divisions assigned to I Corps, plus ancillary units. In that region, of course, there was still a very strong Buddhist movement. It had become an anti-government movement. Soldiers of those divisions were largely drawn from that region. General Thi had become identified as a friend of the Buddhists. I should say that in 1965, I guess it was, the Buddhists burned down our Consulate in Hue. Anticipating this development by one day Tom Corcoran, our Consul in Hue at the time, arranged to move the office to Da Nang, where it became a Consulate General.

In any event General Thi broke with his Saigon superiors. This was a political move, but it split ARVN -- not down the middle, because I Corps didn't include the mass of the troops. However, it was a pretty isolated geographic area, and General Thi wasn't taking any orders from Saigon. The Americans were in the middle with a really tough nut to crack. Of course, we were totally opposed, from the policy point of view, to the actions which General Thi was taking and the divisiveness which he was causing in this connection.

The outcome of that finally was a negotiated settlement. General Thi couldn't hold out too long. Our greatest fear was that this conflict would end up in combat between ARVN units, and there would be blood shed which would get beyond the point of no return in terms of reconciliation between the two factions. Meanwhile, the war against the Communists was going on, and we were pouring in more and more American troops. This was a terribly bad time to have such a conflict. In any event, General Thi was finally pressured into giving up his command of I Corps on a temporary basis to receive medical treatment in the United States. He had some sort of minor problem with his nose, but it was hardly something that you would leave your duty station in the midst of a war to take care of.

Q: This was a sort of excuse ...

HELBLE: It was an arrangement to get him out of Vietnam and make him comfortable here in the United States. He was treated at Walter Reed Army Hospital in Washington, DC. I was tasked with being his companion, his guide, his controller, his handler, or whatever you called it -- once he arrived in the United States. So I set up his medical appointments. I got him lodging in a hotel.

Q: Where did he stay?

HELBLE: He stayed at a sort of apartment hotel on Connecticut Avenue at the junction with Columbia Road, North West. It was a few blocks South of Calvert Street. Joan and I had him over for dinner a number of times.

The Vietnamese Embassy in Washington, of course, didn't want to touch him with a 10 foot pole because of his political differences with Generals Thieu and Ky. The point of all of this was to keep him from feeling that he had to return to Vietnam and get back into this political tension. Finally, we kept him away long enough and made him comfortable enough that he was never a political factor again.

Q: The problem faded away. I'd like to go back to one point that you raised earlier in this interview. Shortly before you left Hue, a couple of days before that, you had learned at a dinner party which you had given in Hue, and where General Do cao Tri, then commanding general of I Corps, was present, that two North Vietnamese, from a formed North Vietnamese Army unit, had been captured some 18 or 20 miles North of Hue. Did the North Vietnamese Army presence in South Vietnam build up from that point in that area?

HELBLE: Of course, I left Vietnam at that point. However, the answer is, "Yes," the North Vietnamese Army presence built up steadily throughout the country. That's why, in February, 1965, as I think we mentioned earlier, when we introduced U. S. troops, not only were those two North Vietnamese soldiers cited as justification for a change in the nature of the war which had been started by the North Vietnamese. Indeed, there was a laundry list of additional North Vietnamese Army units and personnel who had arrived in the South.

Of course, the conflict that was going on in 1966 and 1967 with the mass of U. S. troops, including combat in the Ia Drang Valley, Khe Sanh again, and so forth, involved North Vietnamese Army troops. They weren't indigenous southern Vietnamese at all.

If I may just return to the crisis involving General Thi in I Corps, that became a major crisis. As people who knew something about the internal politics of that area, David Engel and I were tasked with providing off hour coverage of these ongoing developments in the Operations Center of the State Department. David Engel was younger than I but had also had experience on Vietnamese matters. He was working in the Bureau of Intelligence Research [INR] at the time.

This extra assignment meant that, during office hours, from about 8:00 AM to 5:00 PM, we did our regular jobs. Then one of us worked in the Operations Center throughout that night and went back to his regular job the following morning. At least I did. I'm not sure that David did. In any case, I would work all night and then go back to my daily job.

Q: Did you get any sleep at all? They had a bedroom in the Operations Center.

HELBLE: Once in a while you could get an hour's sleep, but most of the time the phone was ringing, you had to prepare two or three situation reports for the White House or send long-distance fax reports if President Johnson was down in Austin, Texas, or at his Texas ranch. We would have to collect all of the information coming in and prepare these updates perhaps twice a night. Secretary of State Dean Rusk would call personally, perhaps at 11:00 PM or midnight, and want to know what was going on.

At 7:30 AM I would go to the office of Bill Bundy, the Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, and give him an early morning briefing on the situation in Vietnam, when he arrived at the Department. Then I would go to the Department cafeteria and get a bite to eat. At about 8:00 or 8:15 AM I would be at my desk and work until 8:00 or 9:00 PM that evening. Then I'd go home. I would get perhaps seven or eight hours of sleep. Then, on the following morning, I would start that same cycle again -- all day, all night, all day. That went on for three months. It was a real test of stamina if you ever saw it.

Meanwhile, my workload on the Vietnam Working Group was not altered or lightened. It was just the normal routine. So this was a very intense experience, but it was mainly a test of endurance. During the three months or so that I was doing this I saw almost nothing of my family because this process went on through the weekends. We didn't get off on Saturday or Sunday, although we might be off during a part of those days. That was it.

Of course, the United States was engaged at that point in trying to promote political development in Vietnam. We were trying to assist the Vietnamese and the Vietnamese authorities and politicians to find some sort of identity, some sort of cohesion in the developing political situation. Once again, I think that the United States was trying to do something which I don't think we had the capacity to do. Even if you have a fairly good knowledge of a country, this is difficult to do -- and we did not have enough people with that kind of knowledge about Vietnamese motivations, philosophies, and so forth.

Q: You were talking earlier about yourself and Dave Engel, switching on and off, spending nights at the Operations Center, plus your daytime work. You mentioned that there were nine officers on the desk. Couldn't some of the other people relieve you on that?

HELBLER: All I know is that the decision was made that Engel and I were considered to have an in depth understanding of the politics of Vietnam, and we were chosen to do this. It was an honor...

Q: But an honor that, in some respects, you could have done without.

HELBLER: I kept wondering about some relief, but there was never any relief. That's the way things were done in those days.

Q: The Political Section in Saigon would be the logical place to get some additional people on the desk. How large was the Political Section at that point, say, in 1965?

HELBLER: I really don't know but I would guess that there were, perhaps, 10 officers assigned there. However, it didn't work that way. You didn't tap the field for people to come back and work in the Department. Twice, during my two-year stint on the Working Group, I was tasked to go out to Saigon and fill in for some officer in the Political Section who was going on home leave! So I went out to Saigon for two periods of three months -- one in the fall of 1965 and the other in the fall of 1966.

Q: That was your rest stint.

HELBLER: Yes, that's right. You see, it was the responsibility of the Department to fill in the gaps in Saigon because Phil Habib, the Political Counselor at the time, was complaining that he couldn't get along without this or that person, who was doing such a critical job in the Political Section. So the Department would tap the desk, and off I went on those two periods of temporary duty at the Embassy. This was all right, though I wasn't anxious to do it. It kept me in touch with Saigon, at any rate.

As I said, the U. S. was pushing the democratic processes, elections, and a new constitution. I became quite involved in assisting the Embassy in Saigon, obtaining materials for them for the constitutional convention which the Vietnamese were organizing at our instigation to discuss the terms of a new constitution. We brought in a number of experts on constitutions in various countries, picked their brains, and encouraged them to prepare studies and so on. That occupied several months in the summer of 1966, as I recall.

Ultimately, a new constitution was adopted, the details of which I have long since forgotten. The constitution was unique to Vietnam but drew heavily on various other constitutional provisions around the world. It was certainly not a mirror image of the U. S. Constitution, in any respect, although there were several elements in the two constitutions which resembled each other.

The constitutional convention was followed by an election campaign.

Q: We were talking about your activity on the Vietnam Working Group. In addition to this, as I recall, you had the opportunity to go out and talk to all kinds of academic audiences and had varying experiences. Would you like to touch on that?

HELBLER: I had wonderful and very numerous opportunities to do this.

During that two-year period 1965-1967 on the Vietnam Working Group, excepting such things as the temporary duty details to the Embassy in Saigon and my stint in the Operations Center for three months, the rest of the time I averaged three to four speeches a week on Vietnam. Some of them were made to Foreign Service Institute classes for AID [Agency for International Development] officers training to go to Vietnam. However, most of these speeches were made in public forums. Some of them were in the Washington area. I spoke at a Unitarian Church in Rockville, MD, which Ambassador Unger was supposed to have spoken to. It was his church, but at the last moment he asked me to go out and cover for him. I found a representative of The Women's Strike for Peace movement already on the platform when I arrived at this church. She was typically knowledgeable about Vietnam, a self-styled expert, as we've mentioned before, somewhat facetiously.

I spoke to another group in Arlington, VA. I don't recall the name of the group. In any event there was an ex-POW [Prisoner of War] from the Korean War who was the other speaker. It was not until I had finished my speech, he gave his, and the questions started, that I came to realize that I was in the midst of a John Birch Society ultra-conservative group. While at least 90 percent of the groups that I spoke to were hostile, about 5 percent were objectively interested, and 5 percent involved the buzz saw of the Extreme Right.

When I would speak to a liberal group, the question was, for example, "Why are you napalming babies?" In the Extreme Right groups the question would be, "Why aren't you bombing Haiphong or, better yet, Communist China?"

By and large the Bureau of Public Affairs in the Department did a lousy job of identifying in advance what the nature of the group was.

Q: They made the arrangements for these talks? They really set you up.

HELBLER: Yes. I was feeling set up all the time. I would run into situations where I was the only speaker. Other times, it was one against one. Or it might be a panel situation where I gave the speech and then there would be, perhaps, three panel members who spoke for 10 minutes each and critiqued or criticized what I had said.

I went to Northeastern University, to Pittsburgh, to Salt Lake City, to South Carolina, Chicago, Milwaukee, and all around the country. Usually, I would leave late in the afternoon, catch a flight that would take me to wherever I was going, and make the speech. Then, if it was possible, I would take a flight back that same night, perhaps at 11:00 PM, get home very late at night, get a few hours of sleep, and then back to the mines at the Vietnam Working Group the next morning. This, too, was pretty exhausting because the Working Group was a full time job in itself.

Q: I think that the Department has always been weak on the Public Affairs side. It tries to draw on officers at the working level to handle these issues. It really doesn't take very good care of them. Some of them should be taken off other duties for a week or a month and given time to prepare more carefully for these public appearances, so that you could get a decent night's sleep. This arrangement you had was quite unreasonable.

HELBLER: Well, I think that the Bureau of Public Affairs was not well organized at the time. Also, the circumstances were something that they had never encountered. The demands on the Department for speakers on Vietnam, as the period 1965-67 wore on, were enormous.

Q: I know they were. You've spoken of the other officers on the Working Group. Did they handle any of these speaking engagements?

HELBLER: Yes -- at least some of them. I don't recall how much some of them did this, but I think that all of them made speeches, at least to some extent. I think that I may have been tapped more than anybody else, but all of them shared the work in that respect.

Q: During the period from 1963 to 1966 I was assigned to the Department, first on the Vietnam Working Group, then on the Indonesian desk, and finally on the Australian desk. Even after I was assigned away from Vietnam affairs, I was still asked by the Bureau of Public Affairs to handle some of these speaking assignments. I was kind of amused because my immediate supervisor when I was working on the Australian desk, Dave Cuthell, told me that he had been instructed from on high not to interfere with my going out on these speaking engagements on Vietnam. He never identified who it was, and I never really pressed him. I could handle this on the Australian desk. Cuthell used to refer to this as my social program. [Laughter] But I never tried to go out and get back on the same evening, unless it was to some place that was very close to Washington. I handled a speaking engagement in Wilmington, DE, in one evening. However, for the rest of it, I made sure that I got a night's sleep. You couldn't control this situation nearly as easily as I could. On the whole, I was struck with how poor the Department's response was to a major crisis in the public affairs field, where there was so much public interest in the subject.

HELBLER: The printed materials, the canned language for letters, and the handouts were always out of date, weak in content, and hardly persuasive. That was a problem. There were problems of Congressional demands and Congressmen not only requesting direct answers to questions which they were posing. There was a heavy flow of their constituent mail, which was simply buck slipped over to the State Department for response to the Congressman's office, so that he could send out the letter to his constituent. That flow was very heavy, and we had a lot of that. Frequently, the questions to the Congressmen were of such nature that they did not have the necessary expertise to answer them, and the correspondence had to be referred to the desk in the State Department to answer.

I think that the best introduction that I could have had to this particular situation happened during the first week that I was on the Vietnam Working Group. I had just come from the University of Chicago. I was told by Bob Miller, my boss, to go out to Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, which is only a journey of a little more than an hour from Chicago, to what was basically a "Civil Rights Week" set up by the Chicago civil rights community. They had decided to have a discussion on Vietnam as a second subject in that particular year 1965. So I was to go out and represent the Department on that occasion. I took a plane out to O'Hare Airport in Chicago, somebody from this civil rights camp met me, and we drove up to Lake Geneva. We had dinner, and then I went on the platform.

This was a panel situation with three other panel members. There was a professor from the University of California at Berkeley, an American Friends Service Quaker official, and the deputy chief of the Hungarian delegation to the United Nations. After I'd finished my speech and each of them spoke for a bit, I concluded that, of those three other panel members, the Hungarian was closest to my position, which was saying something. [Laughter]

Q: May we pause for a moment.

Q: All right, John, you were up at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin. You may want to continue with your experience with this particular program.

HELBLE: Well, as I said, the panel critiqued me, and then the program was open for questions. The heavy artillery questions came from this audience of about 200 civil rights activists. Virtually all of the questions were hostile in nature to the U.S. Government, the State Department, and John Helble. On this occasion, as was often the case, somebody would say, "Well, Mr. Helble, regarding what you have said, is that the State Department position or are those your own views?" Of course, I was speaking as a State Department official. A favorite question was, "Do you really believe in all of this, yourself?" And I would say, "Sure. I'm working on the problem. I understand it."

Q: Well, Lake Geneva is close to Madison, Wisconsin, which was a big center for opposition to U. S. Government policies. In May, 1965, more or less contemporaneous with this, I appeared in a State Department program called, "Community Meetings in Foreign Policy," at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. There the hostility of the audience to our government's policy was unmistakable. There was an element of about 200 that was very tough. However, there were about 1,000 people in the audience, and I think that we got a fair hearing from the audience as a whole. When we get to it, I'll go into another experience which was quite different, about a year later. But anyway, please continue.

HELBLER: In any event the questioning went on. By now it was about 10:30 PM. The moderator, having observed that each time a question was due, a number of hands went up in the audience. He cited the example of all night sessions, called teach-in's. He said, "If it's all right with Mr. Helble," as though I had any choice under the circumstances, "...we'll just continue as long as there are any questions." I groaned to myself but bit my tongue, and we went on. The long and the short of it was that we didn't finish until 4:00 AM. Of course, I was always the target of the questions, with the panelists jumping in periodically to throw another spear in my back after a nasty question was asked by a member of the audience.

Q: Were the questions different, or were they repetitive?

HELBLER: No, they wandered all over the place. The questions were often variations on the theme of "Why are you napalming babies?" In any event, when it was over, I went back to my quarters, which was a cabin with four bedrooms in it, one of which I occupied. There was a central livingroom. I went into my room and got into a bathrobe. I was so wrought up after my experience with this audience that I couldn't get to sleep, so I went out to the livingroom and sat down to read something. People came out of two of the bedrooms. They had been to the late show with me and they wanted to continue the discussion then.

At 5:30 AM I excused myself and said, "I've got to take a shower because I have to be in the breakfast hall by 6:30 AM." So I did that. At 6:30 AM I walked into the breakfast hall. Someone at the first table I walked past said, "Here, you come here and sit down and talk to us. We have some questions for you." The result was that I didn't have any breakfast because I was answering questions. At that point the organizer said to me, "Mr. Helble, there are so many people with so many questions. What we've decided to do is to change our morning program. We'll postpone our 8:00 AM program. We'd like you to appear again at 8:00 AM." This was right after breakfast. So I was back on stage again.

Q: Were you alone on the stage?

HELBLER: Yes. On this occasion the other panelists were no longer present.

Q: Maybe they were catching up on their sleep, which they had missed the night before.

HELBLER: Maybe. However, the principal figure at this civil rights program was Jesse Jackson. So he was placed on the stage with me. Then it became a back and forth, open ended debate between the two of us, with questions from the audience, 99 percent directed toward me. Finally, at 11:00 AM, with no break since this program began at 8:00 AM, I told the organizer that I had a 1:30 PM flight back to Washington, leaving from O'Hare Airport in Chicago. I said, "I've got to leave right now." I was finally off the hook, but it was the kind of experience that really conditioned me quite well for what was to follow for the next couple of years on the public speaking trail.

Q: John, one question that has always puzzled me -- and I don't have any very good answer for it. You mentioned Jesse Jackson, who was on this platform with you at this morning session. Somehow, and for reasons that I have never understood, the whole question of Vietnam, in all of its manifestations, became inextricably involved with the whole issue of civil rights in the United States. There was no logic in this, because the communists were oppressing the people of South Vietnam, whom we were trying to help. This had nothing to do with the civil rights movement in the United States, except that obviously it did, in the minds of the people that were in your audience. Do you have any views on this?

HELBLE: Well, I think that there were two factors. This perception had developed through the material carried in the media, and, of course, with the Buddhist uprising in South Vietnam, the immolations of Buddhist monks, and the attention devoted to them. There was a perception that the Saigon government was authoritarian and oppressive. The U. S. Government was providing aid to the Saigon Government, and we were now taking casualties in support of it. I think that there was a perception which offended the civil rights sympathizers. More than that, I think that at the core of this issue was the view that LBJ's President Johnson's Great Society programs which he had started a year or so after President Kennedy's death were supported by the same community that the civil rights activists represented, in large measure. It was perceived that the war effort in Vietnam was detracting from the available resources to support these civil rights programs. I think that that was a factor.

Still, I would agree with you that the extent of the hostility displayed toward our Vietnam policies by the civil rights community is not fully explicable by either of those points I just made.

Q: Later on, I ran into a curious experience in terms of the situation in Israel and its difficulties with its Arab neighbors. A prominent American Jewish leader visited Canberra, Australia, when I was there in the early 1970's. He was talking about the Vietnam War, which was still going on, although it was toward the end of this period. He said, to the extent that the United States spends resources on Vietnam it is less likely to be in a position to help Israel if Israel should be under attack. He made that point very explicitly. I don't think that he cared anything about the merits of the Vietnam War, as such. He cared about the impact our efforts might have on U. S. aid to Israel in case of need. I hadn't thought about this aspect previously. I think that what you say has a lot to it, but there still is something more to it than that. Here's something for one of those busy, Ph. D. candidates to study carefully.

HELBLE: Going back briefly to my time following internal political developments in Vietnam, one or another of the tasks which I received on the Vietnam desk related to the efforts to develop democratic processes and a culture of democracy in Vietnam. For example, there was the assignment of General Ed Lansdale to Vietnam.

Lansdale, of course, was the renowned hero, if you will, of the book, The Ugly American. The name of the character in the novel assigned to him was Col Hillandale, but many people associated this character with Ed Lansdale. Lansdale was sent out to Vietnam to work on all kinds of crazy projects which he dreamed up. They were indeed crazy. He was working with music, poetry, and other groups in Vietnam, trying to develop democratic, political instincts and some sort of political motivation in Vietnamese society and culture. Various innocent, senior American officials thought that this was something that was going to turn the tide in Vietnam. I was assigned as his Washington backup. However, essentially he communicated directly to people at very senior levels. My job was to get the resources to back him up on the various activities and projects he dreamed up.

All of these projects were absolute examples of pie in the sky. He didn't know what he was doing and he wasn't doing anything that was relevant or useful. However, he had a marvelous facility for self-promotion. He wrote one extensive report after another about the great success of some musical group that he had persuaded to get together and sing patriotic, Vietnamese songs, write stirring prose or poetry, or whatever.

Q: He was in Vietnam for most of this time, wasn't he?

HELBLE: I think that General Lansdale went to Vietnam in 1966, although he had been there much earlier, in the 1950's. It could have been in late 1965 -- I've forgotten exactly. In any event, he was just a footnote on the things that we were doing in Vietnam. Essentially, Lansdale was a joke, as far as I was concerned. It was an ego trip for Lansdale but it was another sign of how desperate we were to get things going, develop some political motivation, and so forth. Again, we were working essentially in an abyss of ignorance about Vietnamese thought processes, how they interrelated, and so on. We never grasped their mentality, and Lansdale was certainly not attuned to it in any sense, despite his self-promotion.

In February, 1967, we had a massive snowstorm in the Washington area. In fact, for all intents and purposes the U. S. Government was virtually closed down for three days. I lived in Falls Church, VA. I could not get out of my street and get to the office. On the third morning after the storm our furnace went out, and the house started to chill down. I was able to get out that day and I went off to work. It was a Friday. Late that afternoon, at about 4:30 PM, I was briefing a Dutch Parliamentarian in my office at the Department. I had called home a couple of times and learned that the furnace repairman hadn't come yet. Joan was in the kitchen with the two children, with the gas burners on, trying to stay warm. I had my heaviest wool suit on.

At about 4:30 PM I got a phone call, interrupting my briefing of the Dutch Parliamentarian. I was told that in 30 minutes a car would arrive at the front entrance of the State Department to pick me up to go to Andrews Air Force Base, where I would catch an Air Force plane going to Honolulu. Of course, I said, "What for?" I was told that it was very hush-hush, but President Johnson had decided to meet with President Thieu and Prime Minister Ky of Vietnam in Honolulu, together with their cabinet, on the following day, Saturday.

This was the first I'd heard about it. My boss, Bob Miller, hadn't heard anything about it. We were just working on Vietnam, and this dropped down out of the blue. So I called home and asked Joan if the furnace was working yet. She said, "No, they're not here yet." I said, "Well, that does it. I'm going to Honolulu." [Laughter] She thought that I was kidding. I said, "Well, the car's down here at the State Department. I don't know how you're going to make arrangements. You've got a spare key to the car and somehow you'll have to get down to the State Department and pick up the car. I'm leaving at 5:00 PM for Andrews Air Force Base."

So I did, in my heavy wool suit, was put on this Air Force plane with other, lower level, working type officials, and left for Honolulu. I tried to find out why I was being assigned to this duty. Nobody on the plane could answer the question. We got into Honolulu. On the next morning I asked again what I was doing there. Finally, somebody said at that point that President Johnson was arriving in Honolulu early that afternoon, and Thieu and Ky were due late that Saturday afternoon, with their party. I was told that my job would be to serve as liaison between the U. S. Secret Service and the security people who would be accompanying the Thieu-Ky party.

Q: At this point Thieu was the President...

HELBLE: And Ky was the Prime Minister. By this time the dimensions of the representation from the two sides had become enormous. Not only was President Johnson coming but Vice President Humphrey, Secretary of State Rusk, Secretary of Defense McNamara, and the Secretaries of Agriculture and of Housing and Urban Development, or whatever it was known at that time, as well. And all of their counterparts were coming from Vietnam -- not the Vice President of Vietnam, but the Prime Minister. The top generals on both sides were to be present. Senior officials came from the U.S. Embassy in Saigon, including our military people. It was the greatest assembly of high ranking officials that I ever saw in one place.

Q: Who was the American Ambassador in Saigon then?

HELBLE: The Ambassador was Ellsworth Bunker. In any event the Vietnamese party arrived at around 5:00 or 5:30 PM on the Saturday afternoon. I had tried to help the Protocol people arrange the motorcade, because nobody had done any advance planning, nobody knew what the relative ranks of the Vietnamese were, and so on. I was the closest thing to an authority there but I had to guess on some of them. I saw that nobody was assisting the Vietnamese Foreign Minister to his car, so I went up to him and told him that I knew where his car was and said, "Let me take you to it."

Q: Who was this?

HELBLE: Mau, I believe. As you know, Vietnamese Foreign Ministers were never very high profile figures. While I was walking with the Vietnamese Foreign Minister, I heard my name called, and there was the U. S. Presidential limousine. Some Secret Service guy was gesturing to me and saying, "Come over here." He and he pushed me into the car, where I found myself sitting on a jump seat, opposite President Johnson! Thieu and Ky were already in the car. On the other jump seat was Governor Burns of Hawaii. I said, "What am I doing here?" I was told, "You're to interpret." I was stunned. It had been almost two years since I had actively used my Vietnamese to any extent. In any event, there was nothing to be done but to struggle on through it.

So the conversation in the car started off with President Johnson saying, "Tell the President and Prime Minister that I am delighted to have them here." Well, I could handle that. Incidentally, when I got in the car President Thieu recognized me. We had met each other when I arrived in Hue in 1961. At the time he was the commanding general of the ARVN First Division. I had last seen him in 1964 at a cocktail party when I was leaving Vietnam. He was the Chairman of the Joint General Staff at that time and totally ignored by everybody at this cocktail party because this was a pretty meaningless position, even though it had a fancy title. The conversation went on in a very stilted fashion, with long pauses. Then President Johnson thought that he would pull out his Texas charm. He slapped me on the knee and said, "You tell the President that I've got to go back to Washington on Monday, but I want them to stay here, be my guest, and enjoy Honolulu and the beaches for as long as they want to stay." Then he slapped me some more on the knee.

So I told Thieu and Ky that. They looked at each other with a very puzzled expression on their faces. They were clearly not at ease.

Q: With each other, I suppose.

HELBLE: No, with the situation. Yes, they were not the best of friends. However, both of them had only learned on Thursday night, Washington time -- Friday, Saigon time -- that they were to turn up with all of their officials in Honolulu.

Q: They were summoned to Honolulu.

HELBLE: They were summoned to Honolulu. President Johnson had only made this decision on Thursday night, Washington time. Here it was late afternoon on Saturday in Honolulu. This is not the way Presidential trips and summit meetings are arranged, as every Foreign Service Officer knows. In any event, Thieu and Ky didn't know why they were there. Quite frankly, I believe that they thought that maybe they were going to be fired, that Lyndon Johnson was going to tell them that it was time for General Somebody or Other to take over, or whatever. [Laughter] They really were uneasy and totally befuddled as to what was going on. They didn't respond to President Johnson in any specific way to the invitation to stay on in Honolulu. They just said, "Thank you."

Q: They just said, "Chung toi phai ve Vietnam" -- We have to return home.

HELBLE: Right. Then there was a long pause. Finally, Thieu looked at me and said something to me personally and directly in Vietnamese. He asked me how my family and my wife were. He explained in Vietnamese to Ky how we had known each other, because I did not know Ky. Then we exchanged a few other, personal comments.

Q: At this point, had LBJ left the car?

HELBLE: No. We were driving into Honolulu from the airport. I finally had to say to Thieu that I would have to explain to President Johnson what we had been talking about, because several minutes had gone by while we were going back and forth in Vietnamese. President Johnson wasn't clued in as to what was going on, so I told him that we were renewing old acquaintances. He wasn't much interested in this and so we talked a little bit more. Thieu and Ky became a little bit more relaxed. Governor Burns, of course, never said anything during the entire ride into Honolulu.

The conversation on personal subjects flowed a little bit more smoothly after the ice was broken, but there was nothing of substance transacted during the course of that 25 or 30 minute ride in from the airport. But I felt something like sheer terror to have been thrown into this situation without any preparation. Then, of course, as soon as I got to the hotel where we were staying, I went around and tried to find somebody who could tell me what was expected of me, since the conference on the next day Sunday was going to be a very intensive, all-day meeting covering the full range of economic and political developments, military affairs, assistance programs, agricultural activities, and so forth. I wondered who was going to interpret for this program. I was, of course, just horrified to think that I might be expected to do that. I was thinking of jumping into the first outrigger canoe and paddling out to one of the outer Hawaiian islands immediately, if they expected me to do simultaneous translations in a conference setting over a range of detailed, technical topics. I was certainly not up to that. Nobody could answer the question about translation arrangements.

Q: They might not have thought about it, John. That's the long and the short of it.

HELBLE: That's very possible. So the next morning I went to the conference. I thought, "What am I doing here? I don't have to be here." The only thing that I found in the way of a Vietnamese security officer to interface with was one major on President Thieu's personal staff, who was responsible for his personal security. That constituted the entire security apparatus for the Vietnamese delegation -- at least that the Vietnamese had brought. There was nothing to liaison about, for all intents and purposes, as I was supposed to be doing. That is, liaising between the two security services.

So there really wasn't much to do, from that point of view. I helped the protocol people and chipped in wherever I thought I could be of some value.

Q: Did you attend the meeting?

HELBLE: I attended the meeting, but I thought, "Why am I here? If they grab me and throw me up there in the translation booth, I'm a 'goner.'" In any event, at the last moment I found out that the White House had brought in a couple of people from the Office of Language Services in the State Department. They were French speakers.

Q: They were going to interpret from French to English and vice versa.

HELBLE: Right, and this worked out. So I was let off the hook. Well, here was this enormous show of American support, at which hundreds of millions of dollars worth of aid programs, more military effort, and so forth, were discussed, all of it on the spur of the moment. Thieu and Ky did not stay on in Hawaii. President Johnson left Hawaii on the Monday morning, and I believe that the Vietnamese party left for Vietnam on Monday afternoon.

Q: How did they travel? Did they go commercially, or...

HELBLE: They had an Air Vietnam aircraft. I'm sure that it was chartered by the Vietnamese Government. As I say, the Vietnamese Delegation was very large. They had all of the members of their cabinet and their principal military leaders, as well as Thieu and Ky.

Q: Well, this simply illustrates the point that you made earlier on, that we never were really serious about Vietnam in so many ways. It's amazing.

HELBLE: And the bottom line was that, as far as I could tell, it didn't change a single thing. It was a great show. Then, of course, Vice President Humphrey, Secretary of State Rusk, and Secretary of Defense McNamara were dispatched to the far corners of East Asia to explain what went on at this meeting and to try to pump up more assistance.

Q: What about the furnace at your house? Was that fixed?

HELBLE: Well, at one point I called Joan after I'd been in Honolulu six or eight hours. I told her that I had made the trip safely. I asked if the furnace had been repaired, and she said, "Yes." I said, "Well, it may go out again, so I'm going to stay for a while." I stayed for two days after the conference was over and after the Vietnamese Delegation had left. I didn't return to Washington until the following Wednesday. By that time, of course, and in fact it was on the first morning after I arrived in Honolulu, I had bought a light weight summer sport coat and slacks, which was my wardrobe. I also bought a toothbrush and a couple of other things. I got out of that heavy weight, wool suit within hours after arriving in Honolulu.

That was one vignette and an interesting experience. However, as I say, I doubt that this meeting had any lasting significance in substantive terms.

Q: I'm afraid that there were lots of cases like that.

HELBLE: It was a big show, a lot of dough was spent, but there was no good, bottom line.

Well, I think I've finished what I can recall from that two year stint on the Vietnam Working Group, from 1965 to 1967. I finished this assignment, still hopeful that U. S. troops could somehow find the handle with which to deal militarily and politically with the conflict in which they were engaged. I was not optimistic but I was hopeful that some good would come out of this and that this huge effort would eventually pay off. But I certainly didn't see a great deal of evidence that the North Vietnamese effort was sagging, that the U. S. bombing campaign of North Vietnam, which was in full swing at that point...

Q: That began, if I recall correctly, in about February, 1965...

HELBLE: That's correct, and it was mid 1967 when I left the Vietnam Working Group. I couldn't see that that was creating any meaningful, morale problems for the North Vietnamese, despite the evidence of what I thought were poorly founded, intelligence reports to the contrary. Certainly, the bombing campaign wasn't affecting the flow of their logistics, as far as we could tell, down the famed Ho Chi Minh Trail. The Vietnamese Communist forces were still very combat worthy. There were instances, in certain areas, that some limited progress had occurred in what was known as pacification. However, given the level of commitment and the casualties that we had taken, in such dramatic battles as that in the Ia Drang Valley and, on a daily basis, in other, smaller conflicts, it was difficult to see what real progress was being made. But there were great body counts that showed that we must be making progress. The body counts were very suspect, as we all knew.

Q: Well, I think that we did kill an awful lot of North Vietnamese.

HELBLE: We killed a lot of people, including a lot of North Vietnamese. However, one thing was evident, and had always been evident. That is, the North Vietnamese had a very determined, well organized, basically highly motivated group of troops at their disposal. They put up with a hell of a lot and endured a hell of a lot. Ultimately, of course, they prevailed. We had to learn the hard way. Still, to this day, I go back to what I said earlier in this interview, and I thought that this point was still valid at that point. That is, if you couldn't get the South Vietnamese Army and Vietnamese politics up to snuff, we were not going to be able to do it.

Q: Certainly, it was their war to win. It was their country. We could help them substantially and we did so. However, we could do no more than provide them with military and economic assistance, which was not very decisive, in many respects.

HELBLE: We were never able to ensure a coherent, cohesive, motivated political effort.

Q: John, you were giving some general impressions of your time in Vietnam, as seen from the Vietnam Working Group, as well as your previous time in Saigon and Hue. What came next after that? You were still in Washington.

HELBLE: At that point, in mid 1967, it was clear that anti-war sentiment in the United States was growing. Still, major elements of the media, such as The New York Times and the Washington Post continued editorially and otherwise to back the U. S. effort in Vietnam. They were not critical of our efforts in policy terms. They backed our policy. However, it was evident in mid-1967 that widespread questioning of the war was becoming more acute. It was fed, as we've alluded to several times earlier, by several years of nightly TV news programs of live action, U. S. casualties, political disturbances in Saigon, and other developments which clearly confused our people.

The audiences to which I had been speaking over the previous two years certainly revealed some of the more angry discontent. I must confess that few things in my life have stunned me as much as the announcement on March 29, 1968, by President Johnson that he would not be a candidate for reelection. This was simply an old politician, if you will, recognizing that he had gotten himself into such a box on one issue, Vietnam. He could not win it and he could not extract the United States from it. He was going to be defeated.

Q: Do you really think that he would have been defeated in the 1968 elections?

HELBLE: I didn't think so at the time, but that was his conclusion, and I would honor his judgment of his prospects, more than my estimate of them. But the announcement was absolutely stunning to me.

Q: It certainly was. I was in the Embassy in Saigon at the time. We heard it and we just couldn't believe it. I felt that he had abandoned Vietnam. He had ratted on us. That was and still is my view. I think that his problem was that he came into office really intending to carry on the war against poverty. He really meant that. He was quite sincere about that. He did quite a lot. Of course, he also set us on a course in terms of programs which have almost bankrupted us. He regarded Vietnam as a distraction. It was not a distraction. It had its own momentum, causes, and concerns. Your mention of that meeting in Honolulu is simply a further example of how unserious he was in dealing with it.

HELBLER: It was a window-dressing occasion. That concludes my observations after two years in the Washington end of the Vietnam pressure cooker.

Q: Well, part of that time you spent up at the Embassy in Saigon on temporary assignment. Tell us about that. How did that happen?

What did you do there, and so on?

HELBLER: We're referring here to January, 1973, when the Paris Accords on Vietnam were signed with the North Vietnamese, the South Vietnamese, and the "National Liberation Front" -- the latter a "phony" organization that North Vietnam had created as a supposedly South Vietnamese political movement. The South Vietnamese Government in Saigon, and the U. S. Government also signed these agreements. The Soviet Union was a co-chairman, as I recall.

Q: Of the 1954 Geneva Conference on Vietnam.

HELBLER: No, they were also involved in the 1973 Accord, weren't they?

Q: They had the responsibility -- jointly with the British -- of calling the Paris Conference in 1968. Neither they nor the British took part in the negotiations, which lasted until 1973. Lots of American Foreign Service Officers, including Phil Habib, spent a long time in Paris. Phil spent a couple years in Paris. Ambassador Marshall Green was there for a time, along with a lot of our old pals, who were involved in the negotiations at one time or another. Bob Miller, too.

HELBLER: Dave Lambertson, Dave Engel, too.

Q: And John Negroponte.

HELBLER: Well, the Paris Agreements were signed on January 27, 1973. While I was aware that the Department was going to assign back to Vietnam a number of Foreign Service Officers with prior Vietnam experience for temporary duty at the Embassy and that I was on the list, it was uncertain as to when the command would come. In fact, the list of officers to be called back varied as to numbers and composition for some weeks in advance of the actual implementation of the plan to send these Foreign Service Officers back to Vietnam. I remember having something less than 72 hours' notice that I was to report immediately to the Embassy in Saigon. Since I was close to Saigon, in Kuala Lumpur, I left on January 28, 1973, and arrived in Saigon the same day. I think that I was about the first one to come in from outside of Vietnam. I wasn't particularly overjoyed to do this, but my wife Joan understood -- not too happily, but she understood. I had no excuse after three and one-half pleasant years in Kuala Lumpur. I had had a respite from Vietnam, and the country was "calling me."

At that time there were 44 Foreign Service Officers brought back. I should say, 43 were brought back, plus one other Foreign Service Officer who had not had prior Vietnam service. When I arrived in Saigon, I found that my own job was to head the unit in the Political Section of the Embassy responsible for trying to get the International Control Commission...

Q: International Commission for Supervision and Control, ICSC, wasn't it?

HELBLE: ICCS -- International Commission for Control and Supervision. My job was to help to get the ICCS deployed into the field. The ICCS was a body tasked with observing or monitoring but not enforcing the various provisions of the Paris Agreement. The ICCS consisted of four nations, including the Poles, who had been on the old ICC (International Control Commission). We talked briefly about the old ICC in an earlier part of this interview. The Canadians had also served on the old ICC and were on the ICCS. There were the Hungarians, who were new to the scene, and the Indonesians, who were also new to the scene. In all, these four countries were to bring in a total of 1140 officers and men. They were to be assigned to the headquarters of the ICCS in Saigon, to regional headquarters in the four major, military regions in South Vietnam, and then in a variety of small posts within those regions throughout the country. The ICCS was to observe whether the Paris Accord were implemented correctly or whether they were being violated and, if so, by whom. It was to investigate allegations regarding incidents and so on.

I had three other Foreign Service Officers on my staff, plus an American secretary on TDY [Temporary Duty]. They included Steve Johnson, son of U. Alexis Johnson, previously Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. He was, in effect, my "Canadian speaker," as he had served in Canada. There was Bill Shepard, who was a Hungarian language officer. He had previously served in Saigon as a staff aide to the Ambassador. Bill ultimately left the Foreign Service. He ran, unsuccessfully, as Republican candidate for Governor in Maryland. Steve Johnson had also previously served in Saigon. Vern Penner was the only one of the 44 FSO's involved in this temporary duty who had not previously served in Vietnam. However, he was a Polish language officer and was the Polish speaker on my staff. I was, of course, the Indonesian speaker, and chief of the unit.

There were others, as you may recall with greater precision than I, who were assigned to other functions in connection with the implementation of the Paris Accord to beef up the Embassy and the Consulates General in these regional areas which paralleled where the ICCS had its regional headquarters. So a number of Foreign Service Officers were farmed out to the respective Consulates General. Others, such as you, stayed in Saigon and worked on...

Q: The Four Party Joint Military Commission.

HELBLE: Yes, the Four Party Joint Military Commission.

When I arrived in Saigon, I met briefly with Ambassador Bunker and then with Ambassador

Whitehouse, who was the Deputy Ambassador. They really couldn't tell me what I was going to do, except in general terms of getting the ICCS deployed into the field. They gave me a copy of the Paris Agreement and suggested that I read that and go to work.

At that point there were no representatives from the four countries on the ICCS in Saigon. It took a while for them to start arriving in Vietnam. Certainly, they were not ready to deploy outside of Saigon until proper facilities were established for them to live and work. So the days dragged on and, in effect, there was no ICCS presence in operation as yet. Gradually, in came planeloads of military people from the various countries, as well as Political Advisers with them, and so on.

Meanwhile, my job was to provide support which would sustain these ICCS troops spread out over I forget how many small posts. I would say that there were several dozen.

Q: You're right. There were four regional headquarters paralleling the South Vietnamese corps structure. Then there was supposed to be an ICCS setup in each of the 44 provinces in South Vietnam. The four regional headquarters of the ICCS were set up. I think that two or three, as I recall, of the provincial headquarters of the ICCS were set up, but the rest were not.

HELBLE: More than a few of the provincial headquarters of the ICCS were eventually deployed, but I'm not sure that they were deployed to all 44 provinces. There were at least a couple of dozen ICCS teams deployed to the provinces within about three or four months, but I can't remember the exact number. Certainly, a number of small ICCS detachments were deployed outside of the regional headquarters. In any event the ICCS took the position that they weren't going anywhere unless: a) they had a place to go, including proper housing and office space; b) until they had proper ground transportation where they were going; c) that they had proper communications, both base camp to vehicles, base camp to headquarters in Saigon, and base camp to whatever regional headquarters was involved; d) that they had proper assurance of supplies. Here I'm not talking about ammunition and so on, since they weren't expending that, but food, medical supplies, medical assistance, and so on. They wanted access to a hospital in Saigon. The best hospital available was the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital; e) that they had air transportation, including both fixed wing and rotary wing aircraft, that is, helicopters; f) that they had ground vehicles of all sorts, including heavy duty trucks, jeeps (lots of them), and so on.

The ICCS requirements for logistical support were endless. New demands popped up every day from every quarter. Generally, these demands, or requests, were passed through the ICCS Secretariat, which was run by the Indonesian Delegation to the ICCS. While we, in our small unit in the Embassy, had liaison with each of the Delegations, and therefore had a need for language officers to deal with them, we also dealt a great deal with the Indonesian Secretary General of the ICCS as the head of the Secretariat.

I found that there were no ground rules in the Embassy to guide me. The simple job description was, "Get the ICCS operational in the field." A Major General, Jim Fairfield, who is still a good friend of mine and now retired and living in Tucson, AZ, was assigned by MACV, the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam. This was the overall U. S. military command in Vietnam during the period from 1962 to 1973. General Fairfield was my liaison with the military command.

However, there was a clock ticking, because under the Paris Agreement, U. S. military had to leave Vietnam within 60 days after the Agreement was signed on January 27, 1973. This meant that the U. S. military had to leave Vietnam by about March 28, 1973. Most of the wherewithal that I could lay my hands on to transfer to the ICCS and get it operational was materiel controlled by MACV. Most of this equipment would have been turned over to the Vietnamese Army if I didn't get to it first. Of course, the U. S. military was in a big hurry to get out of the country, in order to comply with the Paris Agreement. It was trying to disengage itself from its holdings and assets and organize itself for timely departure from Vietnam by D+60 or March 28, 1973. The U. S. military did meet that schedule, incidentally.

Q: They did better than that. They left shortly after the middle of March, 1973.

HELBLE: Yes, but that was 60 days. I saw General Jim Fairfield off at the airport on D+59, the day before the last commanding general of MACV left Vietnam. Jim had served as the MACV liaison with our ICCS Embassy unit, and had arranged many of the material and facilities transfers we requested from MACV to the ICCS.

Q: There were a couple of exceptions, and that caused some problems later on. There were 200 Marines serving as Embassy security guards. Then there were 50 U. S. military personnel assigned to the Military Attaché office, which is a very unusual arrangement. They were considered to be part of the Embassy and not part of MACV. So there were a couple of little details...

HELBLE: But there was nothing resembling a combat unit or anything like that.

Q: No.

HELBLE: The second source of support items for the ICCS was the U. S. Agency for International Development, an organization that came under USAID, which was terminating projects in some areas and so forth. One could get furniture, refrigerators, stoves, and even housing, in some areas.

Q: Automobiles, too.

HELBLE: Yes, although most of the vehicles had belonged to the U. S. military. The U. S. military had a lot of vehicles. They were just going to give them to the Vietnamese Army, which had more vehicles than it could use, anyway.

Q: Wasn't Pacific Architects & Engineers involved in this?

HELBLE: That's right. PA&E, as it was known, signed an agreement as a contractor for the ICCS Secretariat. Of course, PA&E had had many U. S. military and civilian contracts in Vietnam for years. They were well-established and had the capacity to do a lot of things which one couldn't have done through the local economy. We worked with PA&E personnel on a number of these activities. We were trying to establish, upgrade, and rehabilitate facilities for the ICCS, as well as maintenance contracts for the aircraft, communications equipment, and so forth which was being transferred to the ICCS.

However, to me this was really a wild scene, because there were no rules. For a couple of weeks, if I dutifully got the U. S. military to agree to transfer something to the Embassy for the ICCS, I would take some sort of receipt up to Ernie Colantonio, the Administrative Counselor of the Embassy, and get him to sign it.

Q: Ernie would sign anything. [Laughter]

HELBLE: That's right. He would sign anything. However, after a week or 10 days of my bothering him with these receipts, and he was frequently inaccessible because he was so busy, he said, "John, there's no need for you to bring these receipts up to me. Just sign them yourself." I realized, as time went on, that I was signing for millions and millions of dollars worth of equipment.

Q: That's OK, John, as long as it's millions of dollars. You see, if it's $200, they may hope to get it from you. But millions of dollars -- they're never going to get it from you and they know it.

HELBLE: The day that the Embassy fell in Saigon April 30, 1975 to the North Vietnamese, I said to myself, "The Inspector General of the State Department will never get me now" [Laughter] "on those receipts for materiel which I long since lost control and track of."

It was a crazy scene. Gradually, very gradually, the ICCS had less and less excuse not to deploy to the countryside. We were constantly prodding and pushing them to get on with it. However, it was weeks before they started doing any effective observing of anything and really several months before the ICCS was fairly well deployed and we were reading a fair number of observer reports from ICCS detachments.

Q: John, there's one story that I think we should put down here. I don't know the name of the Canadian Army Captain involved. You mentioned that contracts were entered into to provide air support for movement of ICCS personnel to these various provincial detachments.

Let me back up a bit. Air America was the only organization in Vietnam that had pilots, aircraft, and maintenance facilities that could provide this air support for the ICCS. Air America had had a considerable CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] involvement. At first the Poles and the Hungarians said, "Oh, no, we can't have that." The alternative was, "Then what are you going to have? There is no other way." Finally, you may recall, they went through the business of painting out the Air America logo on the helicopters and other aircraft, replacing it with ICCS. That seemed to do the job, because they were dealing with ICCS Air instead of Air America.

One of these ICCS Air flights took various ICCS personnel, including Canadians, up to Quang Tri province, if I remember correctly, just South of the 17th parallel. By that time the North Vietnamese Army was all around there and totally controlled it. They obviously intended to take the American pilots from this aircraft as prisoners. A big Canadian Army Captain, whose name I never knew, didn't say anything. He just knelt down, put his arms around these two pilots, and held them there. It was obvious that there was going to be a terrible fight to get them free for capture, so the North Vietnamese Army obviously felt, "Oh, to hell with it," and abandoned their effort to take them. Those two pilots owe their freedom to this Canadian.

HELBLE: I have heard that story, yes. By D+60, of course, the U. S. military was gone. I was fond of saying that the 44 Foreign Service Officers were an appropriate balance to replace the 540,000 American troops that had been taken out of Vietnam. I thought that this was a pretty good calculation.

After the last U. S. military left, we continued to get pressing demands from the ICCS for more support. I had warned them in the weeks leading up to D+60 that we needed to get everything arranged before our last access to U. S. military assets was gone. However, I remember a couple of incidents that occurred after D+60.

Vern Penner was, and is an extraordinary fellow. He is still on active duty in the State Department. He is a diamond in the rough if there ever was one. He is a Brooklyn boy who spoke Brooklynesse, was something of a street fighter by nature, energetic, and had a totally can do attitude. In fact, in the evaluation report I wrote on him I considered very carefully how to frame it. I had to say that this officer was straight out of Catch 22. He knew how to get things done.

One day, after the U. S. military had left Vietnam, the ICCS insisted that they must have a fire engine for their headquarters. They said that they couldn't afford not to have a fire engine on the site. I said, "Well, I don't have any access to fire engines."

Q: That was all over.

HELBLE: That's right. To this day I still don't know how it was done. The day after I got this request I called together my three officers and posed the problem to them. I said, "Is there any way that we could get hold of a fire engine?"

The next day Vern Penner came to me and said, "John, about the fire engine. Don't worry. One is coming down from Nha Trang to Saigon and will report to ICCS Headquarters." I really knew better than to ask about it.

Q: [Laughter] Or where it came from.

HELBLE: On the following day I received a phone call from the Secretary General of the ICCS, thanking me for the fire engine.

Q: Don't ask.

HELBLE: I said, "Think nothing of it." In any event there was an even stranger affair, probably a week or two after the fire engine, and again after the U. S. military had left. The Secretary General of the ICCS called me one morning at 8:00 AM and said, "John, last night, in downtown Can Tho, in the Mekong Delta, a Vietnamese Army unit and a Civil Guard unit got into a firefight, apparently over some girl. Two members of the Indonesian ICCS detachment there, including the head of the detachment, a Colonel, happened to be driving through the town square as shooting broke out. The Colonel was hit in the forehead with a round from one side or another. Actually, he was all right. It didn't penetrate his skull, but it caused quite a scalp wound. He had to be medevaced last night. He got to Tan Son Nhut Saigon airport about 12:30 or 12:45 AM. Unfortunately, we didn't have an ambulance to pick him up. All we had was a jeep to take him to the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital. It was very uncomfortable for him to ride in the jeep and could have been dangerous for his health, if the wound had been critical. We've got to have an ambulance."

I replied, "Look, I don't know where we could get an ambulance at this point. If you'd asked me this a month ago, I could have gotten one through the U. S. military, but we'll look into the problem."

So I assembled my staff again and asked how we could get an ambulance. Vern Penner said, "I'll take care of it." At 8:30 AM we broke up the staff meeting. At 9:30 AM I got a call from the Indonesian ICCS Secretary General, who said, "John, thanks very much for the ambulance. It's here, parked in front of ICCS Headquarters. We really appreciate it." I said, "That's fine. I'm glad you're happy about it. We do what we can do." I hung up and called, "Penner, come here." He came in and said, "Yes, boss." I said, "All right, I've got to know. How in the hell did you get an ambulance within an hour?" He said, "Well, I called my friend at PA&E. Penner continued, "I said to him, 'Look, take two of your biggest, brawniest Americans and park them down on the corner of Cong Ly Boulevard coming in from the airport, just before the Presidential Palace, and Hong Thap Tu Avenue,'" a street which crosses Cong Ly. There was a stoplight there. As you know, there was a Red Cross Hospital on Hong Thap Tu, and there was always a lot of ambulance traffic going down busy Cong Ly Boulevard and turning right at Hong Thap Tu to go to the Red Cross Hospital. Penner continued, "I told my friend at PA&E, 'The first ARVN ambulance that comes by and stops at the stoplight, haul the ARVN driver out of the ambulance and take it over to ICCS Headquarters.'"

Q: This was not a moonlight requisition but a daytime...

HELBLE: Right in the middle of heavy morning traffic. Penner said, "Obviously, that worked. The PA&E people said, 'OK, we'll do that.'" They went out and did it, and in less than an hour, there it was at ICCS Headquarters. I said to Vern, "I suppose you don't know whether there was a litter patient in the back of the ambulance." He said, "I don't know, but I'll call the PA&E guy." [Laughter] Anyway, as it turned out, there was no litter patient in the back of the ambulance, but there was no doubt one ARVN private, the driver of the ambulance, decided that he had better go over the hill, rather than explain to his superiors how he lost his ambulance. Whatever, the ICCS had an ambulance. That was Vern Penner at his best.

Q: If there's nothing else you want to say about this period of temporary duty in Vietnam, I might mention that we had the pleasure of sharing each other's company in an apartment in Saigon during this time. It was helpful to me to compare notes with you and keep in touch this way, building on a lifetime friendship.

HELBLE: I think that it was very helpful to both of us to have the comfort of each other's company, because neither one of us was very happy about being away from our families. You'd been yanked out of Canberra, Australia, and I'd been yanked out of Kuala Lumpur, leaving our spouses behind. We've both done that previously during assignments to Vietnam. It wasn't something that one looked forward to doing. I have a couple of other things to mention.

Vern Penner and I found that the Polish Political Adviser, a civilian, loved to play bridge. He said that there were some other bridge players in his delegation. So we decided to set up weekly bridge games. We would play at our place or at their place. If it was at our place, we would fix a small dinner for them. They really enjoyed it. They were good bridge players. We had a good time, with lots of jokes. We found that we could take any of the so-called standard Polish jokes, or ethnic jokes of any sort, and just make them Russian jokes, and the Poles thought that they were absolutely hilarious! It was rather evident that there was no love lost in that crowd for the Russians. But it kind of lightened the day for the Poles, and it was pleasant.

I should say that in dealing with the Communist Delegations, I ran afoul of our own Security people on one occasion. I was at a reception given by the Polish Ambassador for the ICCS, the Four Party Joint Military Commission, and so on. When it came time to go home, one of these Polish friends offered me a ride in his chauffeur-driven car, which, of course, had been provided by the South Vietnamese Government, with a South Vietnamese Government Intelligence Service driver. The Pole dropped me off at our apartment.

A week or two later one of the Security Officers in the Embassy made an appointment, came down to see me, and said that on such and such a night he understood that I was riding with the Political Adviser to the Polish Delegation to the ICCS and that this fellow took me to my apartment. He said, "Tell me, have you written up a report on that contact with that Communist official?" I said, "Well, in a sense, I have, as a matter of fact. That evening there was some information that I picked up in the course of the reception. I reported this in a telegram which Mr. Josiah Bennett, the Political Counselor, signed off on. In fact, Bennett was at the same reception I was at. He was talking to Poles and Hungarians, too. Have you asked him whether he has reported his contacts?"

I said, "You realize that my job requires me to deal with Poles and Hungarians every day of the week, in my office, in their offices, and on social occasions." He said, "Well, you're required to write up every contact." I said, "Like hell I will! I'd spend all my time writing up useless contact reports." Well, he was insistent. I asked him to go talk to Joe Bennett and ask him if he was willing to write up his contacts with Communist officials. If Joe was willing to do this, I would do what he does, if he tells me to do it. But he doesn't have to deal with the Poles and Hungarians every day as I do, and as do my officers here. I said, "We've been doing this for three months, and this is the first time that you've become aware of the fact that we're dealing with Communist officials?" This was one of those examples of the ridiculousness of some of our security regulations. He couldn't understand why I wasn't going through proper procedures in reporting contacts with Communist officials.

Q: What came next after June, 1973, when your period of temporary duty at the Embassy in Saigon came to an end?

HELBLER: Well, that was at the end of July, 1973. At the end of June, 1973, I was given orders to report immediately back to Washington, where I would be Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Q: This was Phil Habib?

HELBLER: No, at this point it was to be Mac Godley, George McMurtrie Godley.

DOUGLAS EUGENE PIKE
Assistant Motion Picture Officer, USIS
Saigon (1960-1962)

Information Officer, USIS
Saigon (1962-1964)

Assistant Chief Planning Division, USIS
Saigon (1965-1967)

Regional Information Specialist, USIS
Saigon (1968-1975)

Douglas Eugene Pike was born in Castlelight, Minnesota, July 27th, 1924. He joined the Army at the age of 17 and served in the last two years of war in the Pacific Theater. In 1950, he was recruited as an Army Civilian Employee and was assigned to Okinawa, where he worked in the Public Information Office. Later, after returning to the United States, he attended the University of California, where he received his AB. Pike joined USIA in 1966, and served in Vietnam, Hong Kong, Japan, and Taiwan. He was interviewed in February 1989 by Jack O'Brien.

PIKE: When I finally was sworn in as an FSO I was offered three posts, Seoul, Vientiane or Saigon. I had been in Asia, of course. I'd lived in Japan. I'd lived in the Philippines and lived in Korea. My memory of Korea -- this was ten years later -- was of a very pitiful place, broken by the war, which it was. I remember the winter I spent in Pusan as one of the coldest in my life. And I was born in Minnesota. So the idea of going back to Korea -- I should have gone back to Korea looking back at it in terms of career -- didn't seem a good idea at the time. Vientiane in Laos -- I had a vague idea of where it was -- didn't sound very interesting. Saigon sounded exotic.

Anyway, I went to Saigon -- again one of those roads taken and not taken thing -- it turned out to be very fortuitous for me. I arrived in Saigon at the time working for a communication agency with a very definite interest in how ideas are communicated in a society like Vietnam.

Q: What year was this?

PIKE: 1960.

Q: Oh, yes.

PIKE: The month I arrived, the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam or the Viet Cong was formed. I became immediately interested in it in terms of how it communicates its ideas. What were the techniques they used? How do they use their agit -- prop cadres? How do they mobilize people? How do they organize them? How do they motivate them? What is their strategic communication process?

I began to collect materials, propaganda leaflets, did interviews with defectors, etc. I got a reputation in Saigon -- there was only about 400 Americans there at the time -- as a person who was working on the Viet Cong. The CIA did not have anybody assigned to this. The Embassy did not have anybody assigned to it. It wasn't until four years later that they had anybody working full time on the National Liberation Front.

Q: It's astonishing how we --

PIKE: Right. It's vincible ignorance, as we used to say. Anyway, the CIA people and others would send me over things, briefings, and propaganda leaflets they'd pick up in the field. And I'd do an analysis of these -- analyze them for them, for content, subliminal messages and so on. You work backwards with this sort of thing, to try to determine what the operational code and the value system is from the appeals used.

Q: Were you supplying some of this material or analyses and guidance to the Agency for instance?

PIKE: Well, I'd give it to anybody I could. But nobody was --

Q: USIA?

PIKE: Yeah, I was tried to press it on them is what it amounted to.

Q: Yeah.

PIKE: Nobody was particularly interested.

Q: Yeah.

PIKE: I was writing speeches for the Ambassador -- Nolting and Durbrow were the early ones. And I would bring up the subject of what the V.C. were saying and they would be mildly interested, saying, "If you have a report on this send it along". And I would.

Q: We're backing into the swamp.

PIKE: I don't think the early Ambassadors paid any attention to this. It was a syndrome we suffered from all through the Vietnam War. It's what Aldous Huxley calls vincible ignorance. Vincible ignorance is something that you don't know; you know that you don't know it; but you don't think it makes any difference. These people did not know anything about the Viet Cong or their strategy or their political mobilization techniques. They knew they didn't know but it didn't make any difference. All of us do not know a lot of things. For instance, I don't know anything about the polar icecap and the greenhouse effect, but if the ice- cap melts, this office is about ten feet above sea level. So, if the Pacific ocean goes up twenty feet, as I'm going down for the third time, I'll say that's an example of vincible ignorance. I wasn't all that certain myself about the war. I was interested chiefly in the career terms. Still I wanted to do a doctorate on this communication process.

Q: Sort of academic to you.

PIKE: Right. I didn't see the full meaning of it.

My first assignment in USIA was in the motion picture section -- a commentary, I would say, on USIA. Consider its many activities: I had worked on newspapers. I had worked on radio. I had worked in the cultural field -- very strong on Great Books of the Western World Adult Education Program. I had led Great Books discussions, had taken training in this, my wife and I. So what do they put me into?! The motion picture section. It was the biggest agency motion picture operation in the world, at that time, run by a guy named Dave Sheppard who was a Hollywood-trained motion picture maker and very good. I realized later the reason he worked to get me assigned was because he wanted somebody who didn't know motion pictures, because he had a lot of trouble with assistant motion picture officers who thought they knew the business.

Q: That makes a certain sense.

PIKE: I found it very interesting. I made movies. We made the newsreels that went into all the theaters across Vietnam. We made documentaries on highway building and a hundred other subjects. I went out shooting. I would sit for hours at the moviola. I wrote scripts. I wrote a series on the enemy. I did research on the Viet Cong. Did one on the Montagnards -- the highland people. We made a series of documentary shorts on them.

Q: It also sent you out into the field.

PIKE: Right. I spent a lot of time in the hills. Again, I collected a lot of material on the Montagnards that I used in the scripts. I thought it was worth publishing, for the USIA to publish. So I wrote this short monograph. We published it. And it was at the time the USIS buildup was beginning in Vietnam. There was lots of interest in the Montagnards. I think they published something like 150,000 copies. I became identified for the time as an authority on the Montagnards. People would come in and say "You're an authority on the Montagnards". I'd say, "No, I'm not. I spent ten days up there, skimmed a little cream, came back and put it into a report that's all. I'm not an authority on the Montagnards."

Q: Compared to what else was available, you were.

PIKE: This would irritate them. They would think I was being modest.

Q: Yeah.

PIKE: So finally I say, "Okay, I'm an expert. What do you want to know?" For years I had to live down what to me was a false reputation. All they knew was that I had published this monograph. I would say look at it. It's nothing. It's like a long news- paper article. There's no depth in it. There's no research. Anyway, it's an example of the fact that Americans went to Vietnam ignorant of the country and the culture. Later they did a lot of work quickly. I mean, we got smart in Vietnam. We had people there who in four years or five years became genuine authorities. They knew Confucianism. They knew the Hoa Hao. They knew the Mountainmen. They knew the Viet Cong. There was an absence of knowledge. We were not ignorant in that sense. It was vincible ignorance. The first ambassador that ever really took us seriously was Ellsworth Bunker.

Q: Oh, yes.

PIKE: He would call me in for periodic chats about the other side. None of the other ambassadors before him did that. They knew me. They would mention my experience at a cocktail party. But there just wasn't the interest on their part. I think this was even worse back in Washington. I had one session with Lyndon Johnson earlier in Washington when I was in school and my wife, after she left the AP became an administrative aide to Quentin Burdick, Senator from North Dakota. He was in the House at the time. He was a good friend of Hubert Humphrey's and we were from Minnesota. We were with the Hill crowd. We got to know Humphrey quite well.

Anyway, one of the times I was back in Washington and I was calling around on the Hill and Quentin Burdick called Humphrey and said, "Would you like to talk to Doug Pike?" He said, "Better than that I'm going to the White House to talk to Lyndon. I'll take him with me." So the two of us went in. I had about five minutes with Lyndon Johnson. He said, "All of you are doing great things out there. We're proud of you. Anything that we can give you we will. All you need to do is ask. Is there anything you need?" And I said, "Yes, we need time." His fist came down on the coffee table and he said, "That's the one god- damn thing I cannot give you." I understood his problem.

Q: Sure.

PIKE: But our view was that this was a protracted conflict. We had to have the determination to last. I knew that that was not the perception in Washington. They wanted victory quickly. The enemy knew we wanted it quickly. So that's why they fought their 50 year war as they called it. They dragged the thing out, protracted conflict.

The point of all this is that there is always this problem in the foreign service and in government in general of people who know things that the principals do not know. Either they know they don't know it and it doesn't make any difference, or they genuinely do not know it and should be told. But there is the difficulty -- no mechanism to get knowledge across. I mean, with our peers or even with people slightly above you, you can press these ideas on them. But you cannot grab the President of the United States by the lapels and say, now, you're going to sit down here and listen to something you need to know.

Q: Of course, he has his own priorities which are pressing, he thinks pressing him much harder.

PIKE: Often the person winds up telling him what he does know. Woodrow Wilson once observed that the worst thing about being President is you have to spend so much time listening to people tell you something you already know. And I didn't know what Johnson really knew. And it didn't really occur to me that I should take on the mission of educating the President of the United States or the ambassador or anyone else. Looking back on it, I think I should have tried more. I should have been an advocate -- because I was one of the few people that understood the National Liberation Front (NLF), the Viet Cong. Evidence from things that have been written subsequently, even by some of our top generals, shows they never did understand the other side. To this day they still do not understand it; the major reason why we lost the war.

Anyway, I had gathered all this material on the NLF. And I was still thinking about a doctorate. So I asked for a sabbatical. They had in those days, they may still have it, a sabbatical setup which offered three persons a year at a university as an assignment.

Q: Sort of scholarship.

PIKE: Kind of a scholarship. It was a sabbatical to go and study or to go and write. It was competitive. You put in a proposal and the committee picked the top three. So I proposed that I go to Stanford and do a study on the communication process of the National Liberation Front, the Viet Cong. At that moment, Dan Lerner who was a very famous figure in the field of communication of ideas from MIT came through Saigon. His book "Passing of the Traditional Society" on Iran is still probably the greatest book on communication of ideas in a developing society ever written. He's dead now. Anyway, we got along very well. And he said, listen, you should come to MIT. Don't go to Stanford. We've got the best setup here, etc. So I changed the proposal. When I got to MIT I reported to Max Milliken, head of the Center for International Studies. Lucien Pye was my mentor, as were Ithiel Pool and Harold Isaacs. They had some very good people. These were my informal advisors. And all of them said, "Why are you monkeying around with a Ph.D.? What you should do is write a book on the Viet Cong." And I said, "Well, I just thought I would be interested in getting a doctorate and ending my career at a university eventually."

Q: Why couldn't a book of -- PIKE: You couldn't do both. There wasn't time to do both -- a book and a doctorate.

Q: Oh, I see.

PIKE: You couldn't do all the course work and do the dissertation. In fact, regulations stipulate you have to spend 2 1/2 years on campus. So I thought maybe I would quite the government and continue my doctorate. But they argued I should stay in the foreign service, that it's a good career. A Ph.D. isn't all that much an advantage in the foreign service. But it is the union card in education. You've got to have it or you're not hired by a university.

Q: Academics are a little bit suspect in USIA or used to be.

PIKE: Well, they were. My advisors saw me as a person who knew a great deal about the Viet Cong, who should write what he knows. The second argument, I said, was that the Agency expected me to do a book on the communication process, not a book on the Viet Cong. Actually, the people who sent me there were a committee and nobody in Washington cared what I was writing.

Q: The committee had been disbanded long ago.

PIKE: Right. And by the time the book was out 2 1/2 years later, nobody remembered. Lucien Pye was a very famous Asian scholar, missionary's son born in China and raised in China. He thinks like a Chinese. He said, "Look, isn't it true that everything the Viet Cong does is an act of communication? I mean, an ambush, an assassination, are messages they're trying to deliver. Okay, so you define everything they do as an act of communication. Then you write a book on everything they do. And then you say, 'I've written a book on their communications process.'" As I say, he thinks like a Chinese.

Well, the question was get a doctorate or do a book. So my adviser persuaded me to write a book -- that really was the right way to go. A Ph.D. doesn't do you a great deal of good in government. It probably gets you a little better start at least in the civil service. The thing about a successful book like this is that it makes you overnight. I mean, this came out at exactly the right --

Q: You are an authority.

PIKE: And I got front page reviews in the New York Times and the Washington Post. That impresses people who never read the book. I've had one ambassador who said, "you've written this book on Vietnam." And I said, "yes." He said, "would you mind sending me the reviews of it?" Not the book, just the reviews. I thought he at least was more honest than some of the others.

Q: The blurb on the jacket.

PIKE: People have said, you know, I've read your book. It was very interesting. And in talking to them I realize they have read only the dust jacket.

Anyway, the book labeled me within the Agency as an authority on Vietnam. It meant that I was stuck in Vietnam for the duration of the war. Actually, I was assigned to Vietnam from 1960 until 1975 with the exception of the nine months at MIT. There were what were called regional information assignments which involved traveling and lecturing and attending conferences. I had this assignment for seven years. I was out of Vietnam for long periods, on the road. I think I must have circled the world at least 25 times. I've made about 2,000 lectures on Vietnam in 40 countries. I've heard every question on Vietnam that's conceivable and some that are inconceivable.

Q: Like what?

PIKE: Well, what is the relationship of Vietnam to the Maldives -- which I heard in Argentina. Or in Ankara, how do you compare the Vietnam war with Cyprus? What is the connection? It's wrong to say I don't think there is any connection. Because they say, well, I will tell you the connection. And they go on at great length about the Maldives or the Falklands or Cyprus.

The point is that in these travels and lectures what I encountered was not hostility for the American involvement in Vietnam, but a puzzlement as to what we were doing there; why the war went on for so long; why it's so indecisive; what it's all about. It's was tinged with hostility sometimes, but essentially most foreigners, unlike most Americans who are either very pro war or very anti, were simply puzzled by what the war was all about.

The reason for this I realized later was that the Vietnam war was a new war in kind. It was not a kind of war we'd experienced before. It was a culmination of a development of warfare that began with Napoleon. This blurring the line between combatants and non-combatants. It's an unlimited war in which all people are involved. Not even children are excluded, particularly not even children you might say. This is people's war. This is what Ho Chi Minh and General Giap and before him Mao Zedong had developed. Where we saw it fielded really for the first time was Vietnam.

Since then we've come to understand this phenomenon -- hence what's happening today in Beirut, or in Belfast, or in Afghanistan or Cambodia. It's the new face of war. The downing of the airplane, 707, over Scotland or kidnaping people on cruise ships or the militants in Beirut. That's the future face of war. We call it terrorism. It is terroristic. But it is also a strategy. I think the world has come to understand this better than during Vietnam.

Q: Extension of war into terrorism.

PIKE: It's blurring the line between war and politics, the gray area where you're talking about politics with guns. Whether that's warfare or politics with guns as Kissinger used to say a distinction without a difference, particularly if you're on the receiving end of it -- you're not being killed in war, you're being killed because of politics. Anyway, it was a phenomenon.

Q: It should be considered that these things weren't fair.

PIKE: So we said -- you just didn't do this, there were rules of engagement and so on. Anyway, that was the phenomenon that we didn't understand. In these lecture tours I was trying to express it. I didn't have a great deal of difficulty because I focused on the other side -- I did not talk a great deal about the American side of the war although I would answer questions about it.

There were a couple of time when it got sticky. I was barred from Delhi University by a demonstration of young girls in saris blocking the road. They canceled a meeting at Monash University in Australia when demonstrators denounced me as a war criminal. Those were the only two times that I ever ran into any serious trouble. Of course I did not speak in the United States because as a USIA person I was prohibited from "propagandizing" the American people. I did do interviews. I mean, there is a limit to such censorship -- the First Amendment to the Constitution does apply to foreign service officers and FSIOs as well.

Q: There was always that row about distributing any film.

PIKE: That's right.

Q: Or publication.

PIKE: Of course it was gotten around very easily because the White House would order materials from USIA which the Agency was obliged to send. Then the White House would send the stuff out. I don't know whether that was legal or not. But you couldn't blame USIA, although they weren't, I don't think, against the idea. It's a little silly, you know; one of the crosses that we had to bear.

Anyway, where was I? I was working out of Vietnam traveling, lecturing. This was right up until the end. After my MOPIX assignment in Vietnam I ran a propaganda analysis operation for JUSPAO, Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office. We had a team of American military and Vietnamese. We were analyzing propaganda. We were doing studies. We were doing in-depth interviews. We were doing public opinion research work, what we called barometer opinion surveys, in-depth studies of anti-Americanism -- essentially research work.

Serious interest in the other side was shown when Graham Martin arrived. The nature of the war had changed considerably and that was one of the reasons.

Q: Did Martin replace Bunker?

PIKE: Yes, right.

Q: He had been in Bangkok I think.

PIKE: Right. He had been ambassador in Bangkok. He had me setup an interagency organization, an ad hoc committee. I was the chairman. Members came from throughout the mission: the military; CIA; Frank Snepp, the famous Frank Snepp was our USIS representative on this; the embassy and so on and so on.

Q: AID Program?

PIKE: Yes, AID people. Let me think of who else was there. Several branches of the military and MACV, Military Assistance Command Vietnam. If we had had an embassy in Hanoi we would have been the political section. We were the equivalent. Our job was to read cables and radio broadcast transcripts and write reports. And Frank Snepp would go off periodically to Hong Kong to debrief Third World diplomats stationed in Hanoi and so on. We were simply trying to understand the politics of the politburo, know the operational code of the politburo -- how do Hanoi's leaders decide things? What is their attitudes on the Paris talks? What are they likely to do, etc.?

Q: Sure.

PIKE: That which political officers do. That was my last job in Saigon. I liked it and I was very interested in it. One day I got a cable from the Agency saying you are hereby informed that you must return home immediately because there is a regulation in the foreign service that says in the first 15 years you must spend two years in Washington. You've been out 15 years and you've never been back once. I took the cable to Graham Martin and he said, "Don't worry, I'll fix it up." The next thing I know I get my orders to come home. So Martin called me in and said, "I really thought I could fix it." You understand I was an Indian way down the totem pole. If the ambassador in a major post -- the biggest post in the world, we had 1,100 people in that embassy, if he wants something from Washington he's going to get it normally. Martin had gone to Kissinger on this. I couldn't imagine the Agency bucking Kissinger on something like this. Martin showed me a letter from Kissinger. It said this two-year business is not a regulation, it is a law. It's in the law -- the enabling legislation for the foreign service law says that you must serve two years of your first fifteen in Washington.

Q: This I didn't realize.

PIKE: Therefore the Kissinger letter said what you're asking us to do is to bend the law. And with Watergate and all we got into a lot of trouble bending the law. We just cannot do it anymore. So Martin said, I'm very sorry. He was apologetic.

The irony is I left at the beginning of 1975 taking with me all of the material that became the University of California's Indochina Archive, some three million pages of documents, 50,000 maps and graphics and photos and 12,000 books.

Q: Let me insert a little comment to sort of set the place we're talking here. We're surrounded by, I suppose, hundreds of volumes, books, pertinent to Vietnam's history.

PIKE: All of them on Vietnam.

Q: The war and so on. And a great many souvenirs that you, Doug, have collected.

PIKE: Yes.

Q: I can see looking up here coins and paper currency and an old --

PIKE: AK-47.

Q: That's an AK-47 on the wall, a dark pistol.

PIKE: Viet Cong. Supposedly Viet Cong.

Q: A great many scrolls and paintings and watercolors, pieces of ceramic, both ancient and modern I assume.

PIKE: Right.

Q: You're immersed in this lore.

PIKE: Right. So all of this I had in Vietnam and all of it I got out in good fashion. Because this was before anybody expected anything except a routine return to the United States.

Q: Before the collapse.

PIKE: I had gone out in 1960 with what was known as a full household shipment. In those days everyone took all his furniture with him including their grand pianos and so on. We didn't take much with us. But what that meant was we had a big weight allocation. It was still in effect, because we'd never gone home since 1960. If we'd gone home and come back it would --

Q: Limited shipment.

PIKE: Exactly. So we bought furniture in Hong Kong, rosewood furniture and so on, but not too much. I used my weight allocation to ship home all of this research material.

Q: The weight must have been enormous.

PIKE: Yes.

Q: Books.

PIKE: That's right. Dozens of lift vans. Anyway, the point is that I got out of Vietnam in good order. I was one of the last people who did get out in routine fashion. Most Vietnamese I know today believe that I saw the end coming and that I quietly slipped out. Actually, I didn't. I didn't see the end coming.

Q: You were ordered out.

PIKE: Yes. But I can't get any Vietnamese to believe this. Anyway, the point is that all of this material did get out.

At the end we couldn't even get 20 tons of gold out of Vietnam. It was left sitting there on the tarmac at the airport. I was back in Washington at the time in Policy Planning trying to get Swiss Air to fly the gold out. There was the question of insurance, in case the plane went down. We waived that but by then it was too late. And the communists overran Than Son Nhut and captured the 20 tons of gold.

Q: What's that worth today?

PIKE: About $100 million. Maybe. It was $80 million at the time.

Q: Three hundred and some dollars an ounce.

PIKE: Yeah, times 16 times --

Q: Two thousand.

PIKE: It was 20 tons of gold. About a month later in Nhan Dan newspaper in Hanoi there was an article saying among the great victories that we achieved in the south is when we captured Tan Son Nhut, we captured 15 tons of gold. And I read that and I said, but it was 20 tons. So the next thing you know gold starts showing up in the refugee camps, in Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, Thailand. This is GVN gold, with the GVN stamp on it. It's gold out of that shipment. We send word back through CIA asking are these people coming out with this gold? They say you can't believe this, but it appears to be North Vietnam security officers. No surprise. If you get your hands on five tons of gold or even a half a ton, it's too big a temptation.

Q: Gold is extremely important to the Asians too.

PIKE: That's right. It certainly is. Well, anyway, to return to me, coming back to Washington. I didn't have an assignment, the prospect was I would be, as they say, walking the corridors looking for a job, an assignment. But when I got back there was a message that Henry Kissinger had called and asked me to join the Policy Planning Council which was run by Winston Lord, which as you know is a think tank or advisory group to serve the Secretary of State. I really think he did it because it would have been a kind of double insult to Ambassador Martin to order me home, and have him later told I was walking around looking for a job. I don't know. Maybe they needed somebody. This was near the end of the Vietnam War.

Q: What year was it?

PIKE: It was 1975.

Q: You came out in '75.

PIKE: The war ended April 30, 1975. It was that five month period.

Q: You came out earlier in that year.

PIKE: I came out just before Christmas -- actually in 1974.

Q: Oh, I see.

PIKE: My first assignment in Policy Planning was on what was called the Ingersoll Committee. Ingersoll was the Deputy at State, Under Secretary of State. Kissinger would attend cabinet meetings in an overall policy role; Ingersoll would attend this same council meeting, an expanded cabinet meeting, as the State representative. Our committee was the highest level within the State Department with the job of backstopping Vietnam.

Q: It was seconded from USIA.

PIKE: Yes, we met every afternoon at five o'clock. Originally we met at nine o'clock in the morning. Then the meeting went on all morning. So Ingersoll very wisely scheduled it at five in the afternoon which tends to reduce the amount of talking. We were supposedly to backstop the effort in Vietnam, to do whatever was necessary to try to shore up and prevent a debacle. But by the time the committee was set up -- this was after the Battle of Phuoc Long which was really the decisive beginning of the end in Vietnam. That was in December of '74, which in a sense was the last battle of the Vietnam War. The war strung out for another three or four months. But after Ban Me Thuot it was obvious that the war was lost, that nothing we could do that was politically realistic could save it. The presidency had been badly debilitated by the Watergate scandal. The understanding that we had with them about supporting the South Vietnamese in case of North Vietnam invasion went out the window. I would argue that the North Vietnamese would not have resumed the war if our credibility would have remained, if the threat that the B-52s would come back if they had to. In Hanoi, the so-called dove faction, which was predominant at the time had argued against new war because the B-52s would come back with the same devastating attack as in December of 1972, the so-called Christmas bombings -- with smart bombs and laser guided bombs and which gave them a taste of all out warfare which was worse than what they thought possible. Once the presidency was debilitated the Hanoi hawks could say, we can guarantee you the B-52s won't come back. In a way the Vietnamese were the ultimate victim of Watergate.

Anyway, our committee met, and read cables in disgust, but there wasn't much we could do. As Ingersoll said at one point, "We're on the river of no return, we're just going down this river without a paddle, just riding the current."

After the war I stayed in Policy Planning following Vietnam. I was in effect Kissinger's advisor or thinker on Vietnam. Of course, he wasn't interested in thinking about Vietnam -- he was psychologically shaken. All the principals were. I don't think many people realize that.

I remember one time when Kissinger came into the Ingersoll Committee. He would sometimes come in and sit and listen, usually not say anything. But this time he suddenly got up and everybody stopped. This was in February, 1975, the point when we still could have decided if we had the will to send in the B-52s or even troops. But we all knew this was not possible. This was the moment when either you had to decide to do something or not. So he stood up and everybody stopped. And he said, "What kind of people are we? That's what I want to know? What kind of people are we?" Then he walked out. Nobody said anything. His was not a rhetorical question. It was a genuine question genuinely seeking an answer. Here was this German Jewish immigrant to the United States who thinks of America as a certain kind of country. It stands for certain things, believes certain things. Suddenly he wonders what kind of a people are we? Am I wrong in what I've been thinking about America or what? That's what I think he meant. Maybe it was a rhetorical question. But I didn't feel so because I thought the same thing.

The outcome of the war did not tear me up as much as it did some people who spent a lot of time there and had gotten emotionally committed. I got emotionally committed very early. But soon I realized that this was a serious mistake on my part, to get emotionally involved. I wasn't doing myself any good. I wasn't doing the service any good, nor the U.S. So I deliberately steered myself, but a lot of people didn't. That's why one of them wound up living in Paraguay. Another lives in a hut outside of Las Vegas in the desert. A brilliant Ph.D. historian quit all intellectual activity and runs a motel in northern New Hampshire. People were psychologically destroyed by the war. It came close to me but I didn't go over the edge.

Q: Westmoreland must -- reports a lot of this, the thrashing around the NSC.

PIKE: I think most rationalize it.

Q: I suppose so, but --

PIKE: It depends on how introspective you are. When I first went to Vietnam I cultivated Vietnamese to find some that spoke English particularly. Some I could consult and talk to about Vietnamese culture, society history. One was the last mayor of free Hanoi, named Do Quang Giai, a very devout Confucianist. We had long discussions, I was struck by how many times, he would talk about the mandate of Heaven -- the ideal that if the emperor is a good emperor he rules by mandate of heaven. If he's a bad emperor the mandate is withdrawn and the people have the right to depose it. That's pure Jeffersonian democracy.

Q: Yes, it sure is.

PIKE: The words are different but the concept is the same. In another case, it was with Dinh Thuc, the wisest Vietnamese I ever knew. He was Dinh of the faculty of law at the University of Saigon. I remember clearly our conversation when I was just a young arrival and he was a prominent scholar. He was telling me that the history of Vietnam is full of duplicity and double dealing and betrayal. We have a 1500 year history of betrayal he said -- at the national level and betrayal at the personal level. You could write the history of Vietnam in terms of the double cross he said. Every one betrays us. Sooner or later you Americans will betray us. This was 1962. I said no, we are different, we do not betray people. He didn't say anything, just nodded. Well, we did betray them.

Q: Yes, we did.

PIKE: Years later, about four or five years ago, I met him again in Paris.

Q: Oh.

PIKE: I don't suppose he remembered our conversation. He was an important figure and I was just one of many visitors. Maybe he did remember, but was too polite to say, I told you so.

Q: Yes.

PIKE: I didn't bring it up, naturally.

Q: They're an extremely tactful race.

PIKE: Well, I don't know. You have a conversation with some young person who doesn't mean much to you. But he may remember what you say all his life. Because when you are young you are impressionable. The things you hear, the books you read stick with you as they don't later. That's what a teacher can do -- touch eternity.

Anyway, I think that's important. Here is the mindset of the Vietnamese. They see duplicity. It comes right down to the present. They do not trust the Russians. They don't believe the Russians would back them up if they got into serious trouble. They don't trust anybody -- they have a singular inability to trust.

Q: Well, they've been so bruised through the centuries. And, of course, this applies to some other Asian countries.

PIKE: That's right.

Q: I suppose it applies to Central America in many instances.

PIKE: It's true I suppose of every culture to some extent. It's a matter of degree. If you study Vietnamese history you find negativism, pessimism.

Q: They call it realism.

PIKE: They're aware of this cultural influence, or a heritage determined by history and their personal experience as well as national experience.

Then the Carter Administration came in. Policy planning jobs are what are called Schedule C assignments. They are political appointments, part of the 600 jobs that the President has to pass out. Policy Planning is not considered a permanent assignment anyway. The idea is that people rotate through. So I was to go back to the Agency for assignment. I was FSO-2 at the time. I was afraid I would be socked into some place in Africa as a PAO. I didn't want that. I wanted to stay in my field. But there was no field left.

William Whitson was then running the Library of Congress Congressional Research Service (CRS). I met him at a cocktail party and he said, "There is a way in which we can get you into CRS on reimbursable detail -- that you can be detailed to us and we'll pay your salary back to the Agency. We'd be willing to have you come up here for a year or two to follow Vietnam, write, and deal with Congressmen on Vietnam." Congressmen get letters on Vietnam and if they require some research they buck them over to CRS to answer. So, I agreed and the job was set up. It was a good job.

The major project in those two years was with Senator John Glenn and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He had me testify a couple of times, then asked me to do a general study for the committee on Vietnam foreign relations which I did. It was a 200 page study which his committee published. Then I did some work testifying, writing for Representative Stephen Solarz and his House subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific. But most of the work was routine, they left me alone. The idea was that I would be free to read and study FBIS, the Foreign Broadcast Information Service, talk to people, go to conferences and so on. It was a very good deal. It lasted for about two years, was set up to last for only two years.

Then my problem was what to do? Do I go back to the Agency and wind up in Africa? At that point Mike Armacost was in the Pentagon in what's called ISA, International Security Affairs, which later became --

Q: Went to State, didn't he?

PIKE: Went to State as the number two man and is now going to Tokyo as Ambassador. Anyway, he heard that I was looking for a job and called me and asked me if I would be interested in coming over there.

Q: To State?

PIKE: No, to ISA -- he was at the Pentagon.

Q: Oh, I see.

PIKE: At the same time Mort Abramowitz was Ambassador in Bangkok and wrote me asking if I was interested in coming out to an embassy job --

Q: Political officer.

PIKE: As a watcher of Hanoi. There was some static about this at State because of the feeling that Abramowitz was Ambassador to Thailand but acting like the Ambassador to Vietnam. So State did not like the proposal. But the deal offered by the Pentagon was too good to refuse. I had a free hand to do what I wanted in watching Vietnam -- could write what I wanted, send it to whoever I wanted in government. All my life it's been this way -- phone calls out of the blue. At the time I was beginning to wonder what I should do, up comes ISA, a so-called little state department in the Pentagon.

Q: Did it have State Department people?

PIKE: About half the people were foreign service. There were some USIA people.

Q: Sort of a little security council.

PIKE: Well, actually the way we thought of it was we were foreign service people keeping an eye on the military. Over in the State Department was a military officer keeping an eye on the civilians. But we got along very well. And it was a very good assignment.

Q: I still exchange Christmas cards with Otis Hayes.

PIKE: Right. Well, very famous people went through ISA. Dan Ellsberg. Then came a phone call from Robert Scalopino, my old professor [from California]. I don't know if he remembered me from then, but I had known him for years. Also others -- professors from California -- Chalmers Johnson, Carl Jackson, people working in my field -- had come through there from time to time.

Anyway, the university people asked me if I was interested in taking early retirement -- you can do this when you're 50 with 20 years service -- and coming to the University of California in Berkeley to set up a study center on Indochina. I wasn't sure they were talking to the right person. I said, this is Berkeley calling? They said, yes. We know what you're thinking, that there's a big anti-war movement here, but they've moved on. The atmosphere here is now very good. Berkeley is a funky place.

Q: But students or young people these days can't even point in the direction of Vietnam.

PIKE: Right. There's little anti-war sentiment left. Radicals were into other things, animal rights and so on. Anyway, my original anxieties were not fulfilled. When I first got here we did have the campus security people show up because there had been an article about us in the San Francisco Chronicle.

Q: When was this?

PIKE: This was 1980.

Q: Oh, yes.

PIKE: It was a very favorable article. But the headline -- because the reporter had seen all of the Viet Cong flags, the Vietnam war posters and so on -- the headline said, "A Little Bit of Viet Cong Territory in Berkeley." The story itself was straight forward description. But the next morning the security people had shown up and said, we're a little worried that you might be the victim of some kind of anti-war action by some of the Vietnamese emigres. They said, we're glad that you're on the fourth floor here because I don't think you can throw a fire bomb up this high - - it would take a very good arm. And I said, well, I get along with the Vietnamese emigres very well. Actually, I get along with the anti-war types around here. There aren't many of them left but they are at least people I can talk to about the Vietnam War. We had that interest. And there aren't many of us around who want to talk about it one way or the other.

So we set up the archive and it is now operating. We're probably the largest research facility on Indochina, on historical or contemporary Indochina, anywhere in the world.

Q: Now, is this open to scholars?

PIKE: Open to everybody. We have about three million pages of documents, some 50,000 graphics, maps and photographs and about 10,000 books. Many people use it -- we get novelists who come in an playwrights as well as students, writers and academics.

To complete this description which is a little outside of my post-USIA career, I set up the Indochina studies program for the university. It runs this archive. We also publish books. And we publish a quarterly called "Indochina Chronology" which is meant for specialists in the field. We published long works. We're publishing Ellsworth Bunker's papers.

Q: Oh, yes.

PIKE: On Vietnam.

Q: How long was he there?

PIKE: He was there through the key years in the late '60s. He made a deal with Lyndon Johnson before he went out to Saigon that he would have direct communication, what we used to call back channel. He would send the President a telegram each week telling him what had happened, telling him what he thought he should know about Vietnam the previous week.

Q: He went to Panama after that didn't he?

PIKE: Yes, I believe so. Anyway, these messages are very good. Bunker was a very careful reporter. This was a very valuable contribution to scholarship. There were 96 cables all together. His wife helped us get them declassified. We got a grant from the Asia Foundation to publish. That's our major publishing project of the moment.

Q: I want to interrupt you for a minute. What is your position here?

PIKE: I'm the Director of the Indochina Studies Program. As I say, that's the kind of umbrella --

Q: For the University of California.

PIKE: For the University of California at Berkeley. And we are part of the Institute of East Asian Studies in academic jargon its called an ORU or Organized Research Unit. There are about 50 or these on campus -- in science and technology, area studies, etc. And the East Asia Institute is an ORU with a China Center, a Japan Center, a Korea Center and an Indochina Center.

Q: Do you teach?

PIKE: Well, I teach but I'm not tenured faculty. I've been teaching government and politics of Southeast Asia in the Political Science Department to fill in for professors who are on sabbatical or leave or something. And next year I'll teach the history of the Vietnam War in the History Department. I also have taught history at San Jose State.

Q: San Jose State?

PIKE: San Jose State University. To take the place of the fellow who's on sabbatical in China. Mostly, what the university expects me to do is research. They consider this a research university and that's why the emphasis on this.

Q: We're talking here about the University of California at Berkeley.

PIKE: That's right.

Q: Not San Jose State.

PIKE: Yes, Berkeley. So the ORUs do the usual things the research units do. They publish. They stage conferences, they facilitate research. They try to bring along the scholars, not through teaching but encouraging them and facilitating their dissertations, finding them jobs and that sort of thing.

Q: How many people would you say this serves?

PIKE: Well, it depends. We get on an average I would say of about ten or twelve people a week coming in here using the archives. We have visiting scholars also who are here full time, mostly from Asia, from Thailand and Australia and so on. Then we get a lot of phone calls and we get requests for materials. Quite a few people are what we call walk ins. We get novelists from across the United States. Sam Zaferi who just published a novel, a Chicago novelist has been here several times. A woman comes in who's writing a play on Viet Cong women. We get a lot of military. The Army and the Navy historians office in Washington will send people out looking for graphics and photographs. It's a vague job assignment in a way. My marching orders are to do whatever is necessary and whatever I can to encourage research, writing, teaching, publishing, on contemporary or historical Indochina which is Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. I go to a lot of conferences. In the last summer and fall I have been to nine international conferences - - Moscow, Beijing, Bangkok, Taiwan, Singapore, Seoul, Kuala Lumpur. And I do a lot of conferences held in the United States. There is about one a month I would say somewhere in the world.

Again, the purpose of this and my purpose is to try to encourage people that I meet at these conferences -- establish a network of these people who do serious work on Indochina. I try to do whatever I can to help them. We don't have a great deal of money. That's one thing I can't help very much, although I some- times endorse their proposals to foundations and so on.

THOMAS L. HUGHES
Administrative Assistant to the Under Secretary
Washington, DC (1961)

Mr. Hughes was born and raised in Minnesota and was educated at Carleton College, Oxford University and Yale University. After service with the US Air Force he worked on Capitol Hill and became active in Democratic Party politics. He later joined the Department of State, first as Assistant to Under Secretary Chester Bowles and subsequently as Deputy Director, then as Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, where he served during the event filled period 1961 to 1969. His assignments brought him in close contact with the major political figures of that era. His final government assignment was to Embassy London as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: While you were helping put the administration together did Vietnam come up on your radar?

HUGHES: Not really in 1961. In the mid-to-late 50's, however, in a curious way Vietnam had already become a kind of liberal-Catholic alliance. The American Friends of Vietnam had been organized then in support of Diem, and it contained a roster of prominent American Catholics on its board including Jack Kennedy and various generals. Cardinal Spellman was the self-appointed "Vicar of Vietnam". Mike Mansfield was a champion of Diem in the 50's before he jumped ship in the 60's. But in the '50's, land reform and economic development in Vietnam were issues that appealed to liberals. This was a tie to people like Bowles. He realized that this wasn't exactly his crowd. On the other hand there were hopeful things to say about Diem in the early years.

When Kennedy entered the White House, Laos was the big issue in southeast Asia. Eisenhower had warned about dominoes there. Ultimately under Kennedy there was a trade off between Laos and Vietnam. He went for neutrality in Laos, giving it to Averell Harriman to see what he could work out, while he authorized 16,000 military advisers to bolster Vietnam.

Q: Was this balance between Laos and South Vietnam - fortify one-neutralize the other - was that made explicit? Was this coming from Kennedy?

HUGHES: No, but it was implicit. No one knew what the outcome in either place would be. Kennedy was going to be doing both at the same time-- satisfying the hawks on Vietnam and satisfying the doves on Laos. The two policies were meant to be mutually reinforcing.

ROBERT E. BARBOUR

Political Officer
Saigon (1961-1963)

Robert E. Barbour was born in Ohio in 1927 and educated at the University of Tennessee and George Washington University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1949. His career included posts in Basra, Tokyo, Saigon, Hue, Paris, Rome and Madrid and in 1984 he was named ambassador to Surinam. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Then you left Paris and went back to Vietnam? Reluctantly?

BARBOUR: Reluctantly and involuntarily, but I went. Anecdotally, after the Kennedy visit, General Gavin, who was then Ambassador, wanted to move me up to his office. But while that was in the process of developing I was summarily sent back to Vietnam, and I do mean summarily. One telegram--you are transferred, go. I don't think this sort of thing happens anymore. I didn't want to go, especially since between the Ambassador's front office and Vietnam there had emerged that fact that I was not to go to the Ambassador's office but would go back to be the French desk officer. Another reason we didn't want to go back to Vietnam; moreover we had two children by then and the war had started. So for these reasons we did not want to go back. My boss, the Political Counselor, made one telephone check and was told, "Yes, it's real," so I saluted and reversed course and we went back to Vietnam in September of 1961.

Q: What were you doing there?

BARBOUR: I was nominally deputy chief of the political section, internal affairs. Political counselor was Joe Mendenhall, another very good writer. One cannot overemphasize the importance of one's superiors as far as one's own development, both personal and professional. Given the situation at that time, he was involved with the Ambassador who was Fritz Nolting, a distinguished gentleman who, I think, had a clear set of instructions to think positively. Bill Trueheart was the DCM and tried very hard to be loyal. At that time the war was going on, our presence had greatly expanded in every area, civilian, military. The government was increasingly in trouble because of its own internal problems and weaknesses. It was a very different situation; one didn't move around the country the way we had before. So my job was essentially was to pick up and do the internal political reporting. It was not a happy time; although I have great respect for Ambassador Nolting as a person, it was quite clear that he wanted everyone to think positively and it was no longer possible to think positively about Vietnam.

I was involved in various provincial, pacification, community development programs and things like that, but there was throughout a kind of air of--oh, what is the term. We were dogged and determined but the optimism we experienced the first time we were there was long a thing of the past. We were there to do a job, we were fighting a war, a real war--and it was, there was no question about what was going on in the country. We were there to put the best light on it we could; put the best light on it through our work, in the things we were trying to accomplish, that we did, but put the best light on it in the evaluation and analysis of what we were accomplishing, that was much more difficult. We tried, but it was not easy.

Q: You came back after having been there in the "golden age," you must have known people since you spoke Vietnamese and you must have been asking these people, both professionally and personally, what had turned the situation around. What answers were you getting?

BARBOUR: On two major areas, internal and external. The external being the Viet Cong, the North Vietnamese insurrection and it was all, of course, "They are doing it to us." By and large that is true. On the internal one, the weaknesses of the government and its self-generated problems, people were reluctant to talk. It was almost impossible to get anyone who could shed light on the situation to do so; there was just no willingness to do so because everyone was afraid. The tentacles of Ngo Dinh Nhu and the government extended throughout the official apparatus and people were very wary of being caught up by them. We had a large military presence enmeshed at the working level of the Vietnamese Air Force; we were providing planes, instructors, etc.; we trained them, we flew with them, and I think it was in February of 1962, we woke up at dawn in Saigon to loud explosions and the noise of airplanes. Two Vietnamese Air Force pilots were bombing the Presidential Palace. Despite our involvement with them, and people in the MAAG knew them, no one had the slightest idea of this kind of feeling being there. There were people who would complain and voice their feelings, but they were not people who would shed light on why specifically they were afraid, what specifically had gone wrong in a particular operation. The Vietnamese are great complainers; they will complain about everything and everybody and you have to factor a lot of that out. It is the problem of finding out why on such and such a date were you told, and what exactly were you told and what did you do. We had a very difficult time getting that.

Q: You were up against the dilemma of the foreign service officer, which goes on all the time, of having to report accurately and yet be optimistic about the situation. How did this play out as far as you were concerned.

BARBOUR: Fortunately this is the only time I have experienced it. In everyday ways. You write a telegram, it is sent up for clearance and it comes back with lots of changes. Never a reversal, saying yes means no, never that. It would just come back with a different tone, a different slant; it is very vitiating of one's enthusiasm. This applied also to the rank and file of the CIA station. They had the same problem and we had a good deal of--I can't say collusion--sympathizing back and forth as to what each of us thought should be said and of what in fact was going out. Of course, at this time we were building up more and more; troops were arriving, this was the real period of the arrival of the troops.

Q: What was your impression of the CIA intelligence that they were getting that you were able to sample?

BARBOUR: What they were getting from the Vietnamese was, as I recall, not very good for the reasons I just gave you. They told you what they wanted to tell you or they didn't tell you at all. We harvested lots of lies; some of them we knew were lies, some we didn't. This is a trait, as I told you, that went back even to the very early days; people would rather tell you something untrue than something bad. Now we had this additional element of fear.

Q: You mentioned Mendenhall being a good writer. What difference does it make if an Ambassador or a head of section is a good writer?

BARBOUR: It is whether you are able to convey to your readers what you want them to know and understand. Mendenhall's position was quite difficult. He shared, I think, the general doubts and skepticism but he tried very hard to be loyal, and succeeded. He wasn't the one who marked things up, they would be marked up farther down the line. He thought we should report things as we saw them, while all the time in there fighting trying to do it. You know what life is like in Washington, but people read that which is easy to read and deals with something that interests them; the shorter the better, the more communicative the better, the easier to understand the better. That is why writing makes all the difference in the world.

Q: Were you getting any feedback from Washington, either from people coming through or personal letters?

BARBOUR: Two kinds, as I recall from my experience. Averell Harriman was the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs at that time. He was very skeptical, and I used to see the nasty telegrams, and I am sure there were many more, questioning telegrams from Averell Harriman. "Tell me why this..." "Is it true that..." "How can you say that..." I found them very amusing but I am sure the Ambassador didn't. From the desk we got--the desk was like Joe Mendenhall, in between, they were trying to be intellectually honest but at the same time play the bureaucratic game. If the bureaucratic game was to think positive, then by George they would think positive.

Q: If you had Averell Harriman as the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs skeptical and dubious, where was this positive policy emanating from?

BARBOUR: I am sure it started with the Vietnamese and it started from such things as--and this was after infiltration was evident--"What we really need is tactical air support. If we just had tactical air support then we wouldn't have..," whatever. So we provided some tactical air support aircraft, like the two that were used to bomb the Presidential palace; we brought in advisors, we camouflaged our military presence, which we doubled from 350 to 700, by pretending that we were there to recover equipment. Anyhow--"If we just had air support." "Okay, we will give you air support." "That is not good enough; we need communications, if we just had tactical communications." "Okay, we will provide them." So we started sending in more people; then we abandoned the limitation in the Geneva agreement entirely and brought in our own jet aircraft. Now our aircraft, our pilots have to be protected, that means Marines. I remember these episodes--I think it just went on from there, on and on. "We must have more men, more men, more men," and so it went; we got up to 500,000. When we left in the beginning of 1963, I think we were up to something under 50,000.

Q: The real push came in 1964, as I recall, when Johnson said, "Okay, let's do it." What was your impression of the military men, particularly the captains and the majors, who were out in the field? Did you get to talk to them at all?

BARBOUR: Americans?

Q: Americans.

BARBOUR: They were there to do a job, and in the first instance they wanted good relations with their Vietnamese counterparts. They were there to do a job that was training and advisory. It started out to be training and very few of them, I think, saw anything political. I don't want to be unfair to them; my impression was that very few of them raised political questions because they were too concentrated on working with the unit, the region, or the province to which they were assigned and on doing their specific things which they did extremely well. And they didn't stay very long, I think they only stayed a year.

Q: How did you look at such things as the "protected hamlet" and "revolutionary cadres" programs of Diem?

BARBOUR: We all, people in the Embassy like me, people in the CIA station, and probably in USIS, looked at them very skeptically. What was it, the "defensive hamlet?" Something like that. We armed, we trained, and they kept being overrun. We were all very skeptical but we didn't have anything better to offer, I confess. My own feeling when I left there was that we were in deep enough and I did not believe that the security of the United States was really dependent on the security of South Vietnam. We had put in, I guess, ten thousand people and if they couldn't do it then, we couldn't do it for them. And it became clear they couldn't do it.

Q: I realize you were mid-career level and all.

BARBOUR: I was quite junior; I felt as though I were quite junior.

Q: Later on, I was there in 1969, I was the only consul general and I realized that I was just, by about one person, on the upper half of the diplomatic list. I was an FSO 3 at the time and that gives you an idea of how it just got bigger and bigger. What did you feel were American interests? Why were we there?

BARBOUR: We were there to fight the North Vietnamese and to try and create the kind of country we visualized in 1955; to do two things at once. There was a third element which was to deal with the internal weaknesses, the self-created, almost willful weaknesses of the Vietnamese government, which were far more pronounced the second time around than they had been the first time. It was really pernicious and pervasive; it was everywhere, the reason people wouldn't talk to us. It was discouraging. I remember we had a provincial development campaign up in south central Vietnam, we worked very hard on it; we drew up the plans, we provided the economic wherewithal, we trained the cadres to go in. "Operation Seaswallow" it was called. We were really going to make the people in the lowlands happy that they were living in this potentially good society. When we got up there we saw that it wasn't really working. Why wasn't it working? Well, it was hard to say; deadlines were not being met, villages were not getting the equipment, the wells or the machinery that had been promised--which we had been promised, which we had been told we would have. Some were delivered and then there was a big incident up there, a military incident, and the whole thing was right back where it was. It was evident that the weakness was in Saigon.

Q: Were you and others at your level thinking that Diem and his family were the problem or were you thinking beyond that to the possibility that it was the Vietnamese way of doing things and putting someone else in wouldn't change things?

BARBOUR: The Nhu problem became evident and acute before long before then. Ambassador Durbrow, Elbridge Durbrow, who left there while we were in Paris, about 1960 and 1961, in his last meeting with Diem told him, diplomatically, that he had to get rid of his brother if he expected to salvage things. Durbrow never saw Diem again. The problem emerged well before the trouble really started.

Q: Were we transmitting this, that Diem and the Nhus were the trouble?

BARBOUR: No, No. Certainly not at my level. It was obvious--Madame Nhu was called the "Dragon Lady." He had his fuzzy, woolly-headed philosophy that he wanted everyone to live by, and the corruption both intellectual and pecuniary, were just destroying the basis of everything that we were trying to do.

Q: Was there a feeling that if you got rid of them that the situation would turn around? Or was it maybe that the system would recreate the same trouble?

BARBOUR: The first part of your question came later. As far as what we felt, at my level, was that you have to give the people a feeling that they had a stake in the country and its development, that they had a stake in its democratization, for that is the only way they had to find some economic fulfillment of their own. That is the way we felt and that was the sort of thing that both inspired us and caused us to be so frustrated because so much of what was happening in Saigon was the kind of thing that would take away the incentive.

Q: Were you looking to anyplace else--Korea, the Philippines--for a model as to what should be done?

BARBOUR: I am not sure that we did at that time. Earlier I mentioned General Lansdale and I think he was trying to emulate Magsaysay. I don't recall any at that time.

Q: Did you have much contact with the Vietnamese military, or was it sort of out of bounds for you?

BARBOUR: No, it was not out of bounds; I had a lot of contact with them during the course of these various civilian-military socio-economic programs that we had. My wife taught English to Lieutenants and Captains and we used to see them. So we had a fair amount of dealings with the military.

Q: Were they feeling under wraps so that you weren't getting any discontent from them?

BARBOUR: I don't recall any dissidence and I think my feeling probably was that if I try to talk about it with him, he would make it very uncomfortable or he might complain.

Q: Or you might be sending a message.

BARBOUR: Yes, or I might be sending a message. So we were interested, eager to hear, but I didn't from my position try to incite messages of dissidence. They were very impressive; I remember going out to visit one unit, having lunch with them, and there were some paratrooper officers there. I asked them whether they had made any combat jumps, thinking of our own World War II experiences when they made one or two, and one of them said he had had twenty-one operational jumps. I remember it vividly; and that was 1962 and many of them were at night.

Q: Nothing was there the entire time that you were there?

BARBOUR: Yes.

Q: How about Trueheart? These were two men who were University of Virginia pals, this was supposed to be an Ambassador-DCM combination made in heaven, but it didn't work.

BARBOUR: Well because Trueheart developed the kinds of impressions that everyone else was living with. "It isn't working, boss, and we have to recognize certain basic weaknesses in our policy and what we are doing." Nolting, I guess, just didn't want to hear it from his best friend. Their friendship, I don't know that it was totally destroyed...

Q: Well, I think it was.

BARBOUR: Certainly it ended. Trueheart became very disaffected.

Q: He wasn't doing as much to support the team...

BARBOUR: Trueheart was very loyal when he arrived; he is very perceptive and I think after a while it all got to his intellect, he reached some very profound personal conclusions, and I think also things came to a head--I don't know if you are talking to Bill Trueheart.

Q: We did earlier but he has been interviewed so much on that that I didn't interview him on it.

BARBOUR: I think something happened when he was chargé while Nolting was away.

Q: Yes, I think there was something then. He was reporting as he saw it.

BARBOUR: I am happy to say that was long after I left.

WILLIAM C. TRUEHEART
Deputy Chief of Mission
Saigon (1961-1963)

Ambassador William C. Trueheart was born in Chester, Virginia in 1918. He graduated from the University of Virginia with a B.S. degree in 1939, and earned his M.A. in philosophy from the University of Virginia in 1941. He served in the United States Army from 1943 to 1946. Ambassador Trueheart joined the Foreign Service in 1949. In addition to serving in Vietnam, he served in Paris, Ankara, London, and Washington D.C. He served as United States Ambassador to Nigeria, from 1969 to 1971. This interview was conducted on March 17, 1989.

Q: Ambassador Trueheart, can you recall the circumstances of your assignment to the embassy in Saigon?

TRUEHEART: Oh, very well. I was, at the time, in London; I was the political-military affairs officer in the embassy in London. Actually the word came to me when I happened to be in Paris, going over for just a couple of days for some talks with the embassy there, and someone called me -- I think it was my wife -- from London saying that this message had come through asking if I would accept assignment to Saigon as DCM. Of course, I was very pleased at the offer because it meant becoming a deputy chief of mission, which was regarded as a key sort of promotion in the substantive sense. Of course, it was a relatively big embassy. I hadn't any qualifications for it in terms of knowledge of the area; I'd never served in the Far East. In fact, my last six or seven years had all been in European affairs, largely related to NATO and a little bit of time on the Baghdad Pact. And of course the reason for my assignment was that the Ambassador, [Frederick] Nolting, had specifically requested me. I knew this, too, from the message, although I had not had any private communication from Nolting about it.

Q: Had you known Ambassador Nolting before?

TRUEHEART: I'd known him all my life, just about. Actually, my father worked for his father around 1900 or something, briefly. But then we were at Charlottesville at the same time. He was somewhat older than I, but he'd come back to work on his master's degree in philosophy at the same time that I was completing my bachelor's degree in philosophy. And I saw a great deal of him during that period. As a matter of fact, I was in his wedding, which took place about 1940 or something like that, maybe 1939. Also, he had been in Paris and had been my superior in the NATO delegation. So I presume he asked for me because he thought I could do this sort of a job. I think he probably thought of it more as an executive or management job than, as I say, because I knew anything about Vietnam, which I didn't. Of course, he hadn't either when he went out there. This is of course hearsay, but I believe that he had been urged by others to get a new deputy. There was a general feeling that they ought to have a sort of a new leaf in Saigon.

Q: Who had been his deputy before you?

TRUEHEART: A man named Cunningham. I'm not suggesting there was anything unsatisfactory about his performance or with [Eibridge] Durbrow, who had preceded Nolting. But I think the feeling was that many of the people who were there might have in effect blotted their copybook with [Ngo Dinh] Diem, and a conscious decision had been made that the best policy for the United States was to make a new effort to get along with Diem and to make the best of what we had. There wasn't anything else in sight that would be better.

So that was the background. Then the timing was that they let me stay on until I had completed two years in London, which was I think in August. Technically I needed to do this in order to be qualified for some home leave. So I did that, and then I came back to Washington and had a couple of weeks of orientation course and a couple of weeks of leave and went out.

Q: What kind of preparation did they give you in that orientation?

TRUEHEART: Well, it was very general. I mean, the Foreign Service Institute had a two-week course at that time on Southeast Asia, not simply Vietnam. It was quite general. I can't remember details of it, but obviously it was a very rough cut in terms of orientation. It covered, as I say, not simply Vietnam, but it covered Indonesia, the whole area that was then regarded as Southeast Asia, including the island parts.

Q: Now, there are stories that Ambassador Durbrow had had his problems, as you have hinted at, with President Diem. Was there any kind of a consensus in the State Department concerning Diem? Was what you just said the consensus, that he was all that was in sight and we had to -- ?

TRUEHEART: I'll tell you, I don't think I could say for sure because I didn't have any feeling that there were violent disagreements. There were certainly some people who were very dubious about Diem. In addition to this particular course, I went around and talked to various individuals who were thought to be especially knowledgeable. For example, I called on [Edward] Lansdale, but he was really quite noncommittal in talking to me and did not tell me anything that would have reflected the negative report he had made.

Q: I was going to ask about that --

TRUEHEART: Well, that reminded me of it, because he gave me several papers that he had written and speeches that he'd made on the subject, but he didn't really tell me much of anything. Now, whether he felt that in effect his comments had been overridden, a decision had been taken, and therefore he'd drop his positions, I don't know. But in fact it was a pretty uninformative kind of a meeting.

Q: You're smiling because I suspect is it you didn't get what you expected to get from General Lansdale?

TRUEHEART: No, I'm smiling because I didn't realize at the time, or until long after, anything about this report. Nothing he said to me would have suggested that he had real reservations about what we were doing. I didn't know that he did, really. I still have never seen this report. I'm trying to think whether any of the other interviews I had-

Q: Did you talk to any of the military people who had been out there with MAAG?

TRUEHEART: If I did, I don't recall at the moment, but I must have done [so]. I just don't remember who it was. But I'm pretty sure I talked to several people in the Pentagon, I would think.

Q: I was thinking perhaps General Williams, Hanging Sam Williams.

TRUEHEART: No, no, I did not talk to him. He's a name I know, but I never met him. Of course, I had meetings with lots of people in Pearl Harbor on the way out. I don't know whether this is the place to throw it in, but it was also during this period that I had my one meeting with LBJ. Is this a good place to throw this in?

Q: Proceed, please.

TRUEHEART: Again, it's not much of it to tell except the circumstances might be of some interest. I was back here, bear in mind, scheduled to go to Vietnam to fill a job that needed to be filled and so forth. And in the midst of getting ready to go, I was informed that the State Department had decided that the Vice President really ought to have a State Department adviser.

Chester Bowles, who was then the under secretary of state, had specifically been talking to him about it and urging him to do this and had, he thought, pretty well persuaded him to take on somebody with this role. The Vice President was statutorily a member of the NSC and he didn't have a staff that had any background for this sort of role. So they asked me if I would be willing to go and be interviewed for this job. Well, I had really mixed feelings about it because I was keen to go on to Saigon because I thought it fitted in with my career development more than anything else. Yet of course I was tempted by this idea of working for the Vice President.

So, in short, I went over. He had two offices, of course, one in the Capitol and one in the Executive Office Building, I guess, but in any case, he was in his Capitol office. I remember going into a waiting room -- there were two or three assistants and secretaries in the outer office--and waiting a very long time, because he had other people with him. I must have waited forty-five minutes or more. [I remember] finally being ushered into the inner room, where much to my surprise, not only was the Vice President but his secretary sitting in the same room with him and not too far away. It was a very dark room.

I sat down. As I say, it's the only time I ever spoke to him and I'm sure -- he was in his country boy mood. He was acting the simple country boy. I know from what I've been told by many other people who knew him, including Henry Cabot Lodge, that he was a man of enormous mental capacity, a brilliant man. But in this, with me, he simply adopted this country boy approach. He said he was having to go to these NSC meetings and read all these papers about foreign affairs and things and he really couldn't follow them. He needed somebody who could help him to understand what these were all about and so on. But this was the gist of it all. He, of course, asked me about whether I would be interested in something like this, and I said, well, I was, [but] on the other hand I was torn. I had been currently assigned to go to Vietnam, and that it was a job that I was very keen to do and I really didn't know. I had mixed feelings. And he said that he thought he really wouldn't want to do anything to disadvantage the mission in Vietnam, which he thought was so important.

This went on for maybe ten, fifteen minutes, but that was the gist of it. And we parted without anything being said about what was going to happen. When I left, the people in the outer office said, "Don't call us, we'll call you." Well, unfortunately they didn't call me and I was supposed to leave momentarily for Saigon, but until this matter had been resolved, the State Department was not going to let me go. So I sat around for perhaps ten days waiting to hear what the Vice President wanted, and he said neither yea nor nay. I was getting very uncomfortable, and finally someone, I think it was [U.] Alexis Johnson, the deputy under secretary for political affairs, who somehow finally got a release from the Vice President's office and out I went.

The job in question I think was not filled for a good many months later. Anyway, that's the LBJ story. We've taken a lot of time on that.

Q: Oh, that's quite all right.

TRUEHEART: But anyway, I went to Saigon by way of Pearl Harbor.

Q: This was your first trip to the Far East, was it?

TRUEHEART: The truth is I had never been west of Chicago until I'd made this trip.

Q: Well, were you prepared for the sights and smells and sounds and the rest of it?

TRUEHEART: Well, Saigon itself was a pretty peaceful city when I got there. This was what, October 1961. This was, of course, after the Johnson visit early in the year and after the [Eugene] Staley mission and so on. When I got there the [Walt] Rostow-[Maxwell] Taylor mission was there. I think they'd arrived a couple of days before, and they were going through their exercise while I was there. The place was peaceful enough. I had two children, one an infant at the time, ten months old, and one about ten years old. We were very comfortably set up in a house that had belonged to my predecessor and there were excellent servants. I've never had a pleasanter arrival at a new post in a physical sense than there.

There was a big flood at the time; the Mekong was covering most of the Delta. This figured in the Taylor-Rostow mission in the sense that one of the thoughts they had was that perhaps they could bring in a couple of battalions of U.S. engineers to deal with the flood problems that would arise, and this might be a way of getting American forces into Vietnam, which was one of the options, of course, they were thinking about. In that connection, although I had just gotten there, I remember flying out with a brigadier general who was the number two, I guess, or three in the MAAG and flying over this area to see just whether this made any sense, because the general was himself an engineer. [We] came back and concluded -- really his conclusion because I wasn't qualified to conclude on the subject -- that this was nothing like a flood on the Mississippi or anything in that the water just came up and the people moved up into the trees or whatever. They even moved their cattle up into the trees somehow, and they patiently waited for the water to go down. And it didn't go down rapidly, it didn't come up rapidly. There was not much hardship at all, and in that part of Vietnam they grew a variety of rice which in fact could grow almost as fast as the waters rose. It wasn't the best rice, but it wouldn't flood out. And that proved to be the case. So the conclusion was there was nothing to be done?

It didn't make any military or engineering sense to do it. I think that the whole idea of bringing troops in was one that was rejected, although I didn't realize at the time, I realize now, that the Taylor-Rostow recommendations included a definite recommendation for bringing in U.S. ground forces, which the President just passed.

Q: I wonder why that recommendation was included when the general of engineers rather -- ?

TRUEHEART: Well, one of the questions you had in mind was whether I had ever seen this report at the time. I did not. I'm not sure anybody in the mission saw it. I think they may have written it on the way home. But the recommendation to bring in troops was a more fundamental recommendation that would involve, as I understand it, the bringing in of troops who would somehow sort of seal the borders or fight off any major incursions from the North, leaving it to the Vietnamese forces to deal with the guerrilla threat. The idea of taking advantage of the flood and bringing in engineers was more of a subterfuge, I mean an idea of whether this might provide a way of doing this, providing an excuse for bringing them in without announcing exactly what the ultimate objective was.

Q: They would be combat engineers, in short.

TRUEHEART: Oh, sure, they would have been that.

(Interruption)

Q: Let's talk about President Diem for a few minutes. What was the state of relations between Diem and the embassy when you arrived? You said there had been some friction, some trouble?

TRUEHEART: I think that it was really quite good. There had been a conscious decision with Kennedy to try to work with him and not try to exert great pressures on him and to encourage him rather than to leverage him. So that I suspect relations were never better or hadn't been better in a long time. On the other hand, the situation had been getting worse and that's why the Taylor mission came out. As I recall it, the VC had captured a province capital for the first time, killed the province chief. But there were obviously differences of opinion about Diem still within the mission, as you mentioned. I think the people who had been there for a long time contained a number who were quite skeptical of the ability of Diem to govern the country or I guess really to win the war, which is what we were all talking about or after. But I felt that I had no way of judging this and I never even tried to form a judgment on that myself for a long time. I accepted that I wasn't sent out there to make judgments about this, I was sent out to help with organizing the embassy and the mission.

Q: Were you chiefly concerned with the internal operation of the mission?

TRUEHEART: Well, the mission of course, at least at this point, included everything, including MAAG and their very big USOM or AID mission. As DCM I had purview of the whole business in that sense. And we must come back to this when we talk about the MACV business, which you wanted to go into. But certainly there were definite people in the CIA -- not [William] Colby I think, but under him -- and in the political section -- incidentally, the head of the political section at the time was Joe Mendenhall who later came out with [Victor] Krulak on that thing. He had been there a long time and he had really worked very hard on trying to develop a counterinsurgency plan of action, which had never been implemented. And I think he was very skeptical of the ability of the government to do anything along the lines that we were thinking about. I don't really recall much about what [Lionel] McGarr's feeling was. He left not too long afterwards. He was ill really at the end of the year.

Q: This was General McGarr, the chief of MAAG, right?

TRUEHEART: Yes. He was the head of MAAG at the time. I believe [Charles] Timmes was his -- was he his number two at that time?

Q: Yes.

TRUEHEART: He was fairly new. And the third officer, a brigadier who went with me on this trip -- suddenly his name has gone out of my head, but he was a very fine officer. I remember Timmes and him; they were able men. But I didn't have any real feel, at that point, that we had any real plan of action. I don't think we did, frankly. They had certainly in the past pursued -- the military approach of building up these divisions and so on had been I think badly conceived. I'm not sure any of our programs were, in retrospect, well conceived. Anyway, at the time there were certainly doubting Thomases in the mission, in all parts of it.

Q: The popular picture is that the top officials in the mission made an effort to get along with Diem, and that the second and third echelon officials, field men, tended to be very critical and skeptical. Is that too simple a picture?

TRUEHEART: Well, of course the only people dealing with Diem were the top people. I don't think it would be fair to say that the people lower down were trying to undercut what we were doing; they simply intellectually had doubts about whether it was going to work or not, on the basis of their own experiences. And what they were hearing, I think many of them had different contacts from the top people and maybe wider, but for that matter there was no shortage of Vietnamese who were ready to tell you that the Diem administration was hopeless. In fact, it was very hard to find anybody who wasn't a member of the regime, or employed by the government, who would have anything good to say about it. The point was that nobody had much respect for these people either. There was plenty of freedom of speech, all right, in this period, and people were busily buttonholing Americans to tell them what was wrong with the government.

Q: How long did it take you to form some kind of coherent picture of all this?

TRUEHEART: Well, I don't know that I ever formed a coherent picture, but I didn't really come to firm negative conclusions about Diem until the Buddhist crisis long after.

Q: That's later. I don't want to -- TRUEHEART: I think I kept an open mind on this right on through until it seemed to me that we get to that point, which we can deal with later.

Q: Was the strategic hamlet program getting underway about the time that you arrived?

TRUEHEART: A little later. It was the only really you might say strategic concept for dealing with the problem that we ever had, at least during my time there. The credit for it really belongs to the British mission, the Thompson mission.

Q: That's R. K. G. Thompson?

TRUEHEART: Yes. Who I knew very well and was a very close personal friend as well at the time. He had a small group there and they had a concept, which was of course really closely modeled on what they had done in Malaysia. He was an adviser to Diem or to the government, just as we were, in this matter. Of course, he knew that we had all the material ability to carry out anything that might be decided and that his advice would be worthless if it wasn't also agreeable to us. So he spent a lot of time with us, and I have vivid recollections of a meeting that Nolting and I had with him in which he laid out the whole idea of the strategic hamlet program, which he had, I believe, already presented to Diem. We were very favorably impressed with it. Subsequently we reported this to Washington, and I think people from Washington came out and they were also briefed directly by Thompson. I think there was fairly quickly agreement that this was a sound approach in counterinsurgency. The U.S. military supported it, too. Not to the exclusion of everything else, I think they clearly thought of it as an adjunct to more -- it wasn't our main goal, but they were prepared to do what was necessary, [what] they could do with it, but it wasn't the center of their focus as it was, say, USAID's or as it was in at least my own mind.

Q: Did someone on the mission have particular responsibility for liaison on this program?

TRUEHEART: Well, eventually. In fact, fairly soon, and I think fairly early in 1962 we set up a committee which was actually called the Trueheart Committee, of all things, and I was the chairman of it and we met weekly, or sometimes twice a week, with all agencies, with the idea of reviewing progress in this program. And supposedly, although I never saw the minutes of any of its meetings, there was a parallel committee in the Vietnamese government headed by [Ngo Dinh] Nhu, which was supposedly looking after their side of it. But the connection between these two groups was very tenuous, if it existed at all. But we gradually -- and I'm sure by the time you were there it was much more of this -- were getting USOM advisers in each province and military advisers in each province.

A typical meeting of this committee would be, we'd begin probably by having these two guys up from one province or another and have them report on what the situation was and the problems and how things were going, freely questioning them and so on. Heads of each agency would report how much barbed wire did we get last, all this sort of thing. We never had the kind of statistics that were later developed by [Robert] Komer and all that sort of thing, but we were trying to get some feel for it. We hadn't anything we could really put numbers to very confidently, more or less. But this was perhaps my main job, in a way, was trying to do this. I must say, in 1962 I thought we made a fair amount of progress on this; we reported as much. But it's a pretty subjective feeling, very hard to judge, and I'm not sure in retrospect that we weren't just encouraged by what we were doing, because we were certainly doing a lot. There were a lot of fences being built and all sort of -- I made quite a few trips to the countryside, as did many others. We may have been primarily judging the fact that we were getting on with our program rather than what real effect it was having on cutting off the Viet Cong from the population, which is what we were trying to do. Certainly it collapsed very rapidly in 1963 [inaudible].

Q: Didn't Rufus Phillips become involved in this once?

TRUEHEART: Rufus Phillips was one of the people in the USAID who always attended these meetings. Have you interviewed him?

Q: Not yet.

TRUEHEART: Well, I would. He'd be a very good one to interview and had a lot more knowledge of the country. I would urge you not to skip him. But within AID he was the guy who was primarily responsible for the strategic hamlet program.

Q: He was an old China hand, wasn't he?

TRUEHEART: Well, not so much a China hand I think, but he had been a Lansdale man in the 1954 period and in close contact not only with Diem but with lots of people who were still around, either in the government or outside the government. So he had that sort of rapport that some other people like -- well, another, of course, key man who was not on this committee but with whom I had a lot of dealings was Lucien Conein from the CIA. But he had even longer contacts with the Vietnamese.

Q: He's around town somewhere, isn't he?

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes. He's done a lot of testifying on the coup and whatnot. I suppose that stuff is available in the minutes of the intelligence [committee], the [Frank] Church Committee.

But in any case, this committee had representatives from each agency, and it was a kind of an effort to coordinate the U.S. support for the strategic hamlet program.

Q: Is it fair to say then that the hamlet program as a whole satisfied your committee as to its rate of progress?

TRUEHEART: It did I'd say right on through 1962. We thought we were making real headway. As I say, just what was really happening, I'm not so sure, in retrospect. But at the time, we felt that we were on sound ground in reporting that it was making progress.

Q: What kind of yardstick did you have? You have said so many fences built, so much barbed wire laid and so forth.

TRUEHEART: Well, as I say, it was pretty subjective. It was going out and getting briefed by a province chief and the American advisers and being shown and seeing some of the local dignitaries and whatnot. But what we always thought would be a real test would be if you could say, "Well, okay, here's a province which is pacified, clear, where you can go out day and night and feel safe." Well, I always felt until we could have one of those, we really couldn't be quite sure. We never got anybody ready to say that about any province. Then, as I say, things I think really began to fall apart in 1963. To what extent this was related to the Buddhist matter, I wouldn't say. I doubt if it was. I doubt it.

Q: Now, you've said that 1962, at least from all you could tell, was a pretty good year for the strategic hamlet program. I think that year there were also some developments in the military area; some new equipment had arrived, I think, helicopters in substantial numbers.

TRUEHEART: Yes.

Q: Were you up to date at the time on the impact of this on the military situation?

TRUEHEART: Well, to some degree. There weren't very many battalion-size engagements in 1962 if I remember right. My main recollections of the military side were the problems we had in large measure with the press and so on connected with the introduction of all this equipment, which came in, I recall, on board these converted aircraft carriers which would anchor at the foot of Tu Do Street and unload these things. We were stopped from confirming that they were there because -- this is something, incidentally, which I don't think you've mentioned in your questions but maybe it's worth mentioning here.

In carrying out the Taylor-Rostow recommendations and bringing in this new equipment and bringing in additional people, we were clearly exceeding the limits agreed upon in the Geneva accords and subsequently. Of course, so was the other side. But it was the position of the U.S. government that we were not going to be convicted out of our own mouths of having violated this agreement. We were going to violate it and not make much bones about it, but we were not going to confirm this so that we could later be in effect convicted out of our own mouths in the United Nations or whatever. And for that reason, when a newspaperman would ask, "What's that down at the foot of the street here?" the general answer was "No comment." This was interpreted by them as an effort to conceal from the American public what we were doing. It was in general a very unforthcoming way with the press. But I was certainly very conscious, because it had this political angle, of what we were bringing in and what some of the problems were. I'm bound to say, at least my memory is not good as to what, if anything, I knew about what they were doing with the equipment as they turned it over to the Vietnamese. I knew we were also, of course, flying the Farm Gate airplanes. There were many questions about whether in fact there was always a Vietnamese in the back seat or the front seat or whichever seat he was supposed to be in.

Q: This was a hot political question, was it not?

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. That was more than just a technical question. It could have been in terms of the Q: Didn't they sometimes call the Vietnamese aboard a sandbag?

TRUEHEART: Yes. I think that certainly there were claims that the Vietnamese copilot often had never been off the ground before, much less not being a pilot. That sort of thing arose. This Ap Bac battle which you mentioned, I remember that rather vividly because at the time what's-his-name was out there from the [State Department], Roger Hilsman, and he went on this operation and is an ex-West Pointer. He thought it was just the worst operation he had ever seen.

Q: I didn't know that he observed the Ap Bac battle.

TRUEHEART: He did. Oh, yes.

Q: I see.

TRUEHEART: I'm pretty sure he did. You could look it up in his book but I have an idea he did observe it. In fact I think he may have been even staying with me at my house while he was there. But in any case, this seemed to show that the Vietnamese military operations were not all they might be, but I don't recall it being -- it was a sort of a flash in the pan as far as I was concerned. I didn't think much more about it.

Q: It got an awfully big play in the press, I think.

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes. But as much as anything I think it got a play because [Paul] Harkins made statements that it was really a victory or something, and this was so patently not the case that it just infuriated the press. So many things that were going on infuriated them. But in any case, I didn't really have a close knowledge of what was going on in terms of training troops and that sort of thing.

Q: I see.

TRUEHEART: When certain operations such as we were talking about were involved that had political angles, things like the use of defoliants and that sort of thing, I was involved with this and have rather vivid recollections of some of it.

Q: Would you tell us about that? What were the questions involved when the proposal for use of defoliants came up, for example?

TRUEHEART: Well, there were two aspects of it: one, clearing ground to make ambushes more difficult, clearing the area around the military installations and so on, which didn't, at least in my mind, raise any serious problems, although I gather that it raised lots of questions back here more about whether this might be interpreted as chemical warfare or something. But it seemed to me on the spot to be a perfectly sensible thing to do, if in fact it was effective in preventing ambushes. I think in practice there was some question whether it was very useful. But the other point on crop destruction, I had very strong views on this against it, again on practical grounds, that it was not effective. If you destroyed crops, the only people that would be hurt would be the non-VC, because you could be sure the VC would get any food that was around to be eaten, and that you were simply going to be alienating the people that you were hoping to have on your side. With no better control over the countryside than you had, there was no way of, in effect, targeting these operations against the VC themselves. And this was I think basically also the view of the Thompson mission.

We once had a meeting on this, because this was something that Diem was very much in favor of doing. I remember one meeting we had with I suppose it would have been Harkins and Nolting and several people perhaps from MACV, and I was along and Diem and I don't know who else on the Vietnamese side. In this meeting Nolting encouraged me to express my view. He didn't agree with me but he urged me to make it known, and I did but it didn't have any effect. Diem, at a very early point, had heard that this was a possibility and was keen to use it. You may have heard there is a new air force historical study on this whole thing. I went down the other day to look at this study to see whether it took my name in vain and found that it didn't.

(Laughter) But I just glanced at the first parts of it; it was that thick, you know.

Q: You mean, they didn't use your name at all or they used it the way it should be used?

TRUEHEART: Didn't use it at all. (Laughter) Well, that's understandable because I think they're working from records of --

Q: Operational --

TRUEHEART: -- official communications of various kinds and I don't think my views were ever recorded anywhere unless they were-

Q: Your dissent went unnoticed as far as the air force is concerned?

TRUEHEART: Yes. But anyway, now I have it on the record.

Q: Good. Well, were there other problems of a similar nature? What about gas, the use of riot control gas?

TRUEHEART: I don't recall that as being an issue that we ever got involved with in the mission itself. The only thing, there was some kind of use of tear gas that burned somebody in Hue or something in this Buddhist business, but that wasn't even American tear gas, as I recall, but some French stuff that the Vietnamese had had on hand. But I don't recall it as being a major issue during the time I was there, nor am I aware that there was much use of it. Bear in mind, I left at the beginning of 1964, and the fighting war was pretty slight up [to that point].

Q: How about Laos? How did the situation in Laos affect the situation in Vietnam? What was their relationship?

TRUEHEART: Well, go back to my first -- this was terra incognita to me. As far as we were concerned in Vietnam, the peace agreement in Laos we felt in effect sort of freed up Laos as a corridor for the VC to move into Vietnam. So that looked at from our rather worm's eye view, we couldn't see anything good about what had happened in Laos. We of course wondered if the thought was for some sort of similar neutralization of Vietnam, in Washington, whether that was contemplated. But these were not things that I thought a lot about; I don't know to what extent Nolting did.

Q: Did the word neutralization have a special meaning where Laos was concerned then? Was it another name for a communist takeover?

TRUEHEART: Well, I think we sort of assumed that would be the end result of it, yes. But I think the conventional wisdom, or some of the conventional wisdom, was that President Kennedy had in effect taken this decision in Laos, but that in having done so and having taken a lot of criticism for having done this, that he was all the more determined not to make similar concessions in Vietnam. Nothing that was going on at that time led us to believe that in fact a similar policy was envisaged for Vietnam. But again, I don't recall that as being a very major topic of conversation.

Q: I had heard from several sources that Diem was very disturbed by the settlement in Laos because he thought it might be a harbinger of what his fate would be.

TRUEHEART: Well, he may have been, but I don't recall his saying anything about this. But let me say a word about Diem in this, my general impressions of him in the early part of my tour there. I would go along oftentimes with the Ambassador. Sometimes when he was not there or sometimes even when he was there and a distinguished visitor would come through, [we would] take him over to visit Diem. I must say, most of these visits were more or less courtesy calls, but they were unlike any courtesy calls I've ever seen anywhere else. They lasted four hours and more and were always a monologue by Diem, nobody else ever got a word in, and they were always almost the same thing: a long lecture on the history of Vietnam and the history of Ngo Dinh Diem. You literally could go through -- you'd come out of one of these meetings with the chief of state and have absolutely nothing to report, because nothing new had been said. I must have gone to dozens of such meetings and that was all that ever transpired.

Q: Did you develop a kind of a shorthand to describe -- ?

TRUEHEART: We didn't even bother to report them, which I think says more than anything else, considering normally you would make the most extensive kind of a telegram or whatever. But [we had] long since stopped trying to report these meetings.

Q: How did you stay awake?

TRUEHEART: Well, there was a lot of tea provided, and he was always speaking French, which tended to keep me awake trying to make sure I was following him. Of course, this doesn't apply to a few meetings I had with him when I was charge in the time of the Buddhist crisis.

Q: Did Diem have any English?

TRUEHEART: I think he did understand English quite well, but he never used it. But I think he understood it all right. Of course you know he spent more than a year in this country.

Q: Yes. Now, the military side of the mission was reorganized into MACV --

TRUEHEART: Yes.

Q: -- early in 1962, I believe. What was involved there? What was behind that?

TRUEHEART: Well, let me say first, I think we in the embassy, Nolting himself and I, were very concerned at this, for two reasons, really. One, we thought it tended to overemphasize the military aspects of the problem, which we thought was fundamentally a political problem. Secondly, it meant something very clear in bureaucratic terms about the control of the U.S. operations in Vietnam. Under existing presidential directives, an ambassador had supervisory authority over all U.S. agencies and elements in the country except military commands, which reported to the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the secretary of defense directly. So that one couldn't help feeling that this was in fact a move by the military to get out from under any formal control by the mission. So this, in a fairly simplistic way but I think this is really the guts of it, was very worrisome to Nolting and he fought it to the extent of coming back to Washington and protesting it. But he did not get any support from the Secretary of State in this, and I think he seriously considered resigning over this issue but in the end decided not to.

But the actual relationship between the Ambassador and MACV was never, as I recall, formally clarified. In fact, Harkins certainly deferred in every sort of protocol way to the Ambassador, and I think they in fact got on very well together and so forth. But I don't think there was ever really during this period -- and perhaps not ever, but certainly not in this period -- the clear authority that the chief of mission had let's say in the time of [Ellsworth] Bunker. Although I'm bound to say, when Lodge came there was no question at all about who was in charge. This was a matter of his own-

Q: So there was worry in the mission?

TRUEHEART: Yes, worry that this was in effect going to militarize this problem and seek a military solution, which we felt was not the way to go.

Q: Did that happen to any extent during your tenure there?

TRUEHEART: Well, no, because -- well, yes, to some extent because, after all, the military became much more numerous and so on. And I have a feeling that in the 1963 period, when the military clearly did not agree with what we were doing in terms of -- by the military I mean Harkins and so on -- the kind of pressures we were putting on Diem about the Buddhist business, there was a lot of effort to undermine what the civilian mission was doing.

Q: In what way?

TRUEHEART: Well, I don't think I can document this very well. I think you'll find, though, that in the coup period, about the first of September to the first of November, there were back-channel things going on. Perhaps in that way we were not giving a clear-cut signal to the Vietnamese as to whether we were all together. But I can't really document this; it's more of a suspicion than anything else.

Q: Okay. As I recall, there was an attempt on Diem's life early in 1962, in February.

TRUEHEART: Yes.

Q: Should we attach a lot of importance to that subsequently?

TRUEHEART: No, I don't think so. It happens that I was in Bangkok when this happened. But we thought of it at the time, since nothing else happened, as a sort of isolated act. And nothing else occurred. There it was, sort of in between two different things. There had been the real coup attempt in what, 1960, and then you had the 1963 period when something seemingly more minor than this occurred and had lots of repercussions. So it just didn't seem to have any connection with anything else and didn't provoke anything else. So I didn't at the time and don't now attach any significance. Never heard anybody else make much of it.

Q: I'd heard that Diem forbade any airplane to take off carrying bombs for a time.

TRUEHEART: Well, yes, I think that's true, that no five-hundred-pound bombs could take off without written permission from him. But I don't think I knew that at the time. I suspect that somebody in MACV knew about it.

Q: I think the press got wind of it.

TRUEHEART: Yes. But I didn't know it and I don't to this day know whether it's true or not. But it certainly would have been in character I think.

Q: Now, in July there was one of many conferences in Honolulu.

TRUEHEART: July 1962?

Q: July 1962, right.

TRUEHEART: I think I went to that.

Q: Okay. I was going to ask you.

TRUEHEART: Did I, do you know?

Q: Well, I have here that Secretary [Robert] McNamara went, General Harkins and Ambassador Nolting. I haven't been able to establish whether you went to that one or not.

TRUEHEART: I think I did, but I don't think I took any active part in it, but I think I was there.

Q: Well, I know that they announced that there had been considerable progress made, that the strategic hamlet program was going great guns. And I just wondered if you had participated in it.

TRUEHEART: Well, I might have said a word or two, but I don't recall it. But certainly, as I've told you, that would have been my feeling at the time.

Q: Okay. Then General Taylor came over in September, I believe, and visited and he made a similar assessment. The point I'm coming to is that Senator [Michael] Mansfield came over late in 1962 -- I don't have an exact date -- and he reported that the situation was worse than it had been in 1955, which on the face of it sounds rather contradictory. But I'm not sure if that had any repercussions in the mission.

TRUEHEART: I remember the Mansfield visit very well but for somewhat peculiar reasons.

Q: Well, tell us about that.

TRUEHEART: We had this meeting with his group, which included a number of people from the Foreign Relations Committee, including, as I remember, Senator [Claiborne] Pell, who is incidentally, you may know, an ex-Foreign Service officer and somebody I had known before he was in the Senate. At some point in this sort of go-around; rather informal session, although Mansfield tended to be pretty formal in any meeting of this kind, Pell said, "Well, look, what about this?" We were talking about support for Diem rather than talking about the progress of the strategic hamlet program or whatever, and Pell said, "What about this? What do you think, if there were an election in Vietnam today, how would Diem come out?" And for some reason Fritz, Ambassador Nolting, said, "Why don't you answer that, Bill?" (Laughter) I said, "Well, you know, I'm not sure that's a meaningful question because I honestly think that if you really went out in the boondocks of this country I'm not sure that half the people know who Diem is, if you really mean the peasants." This was not said in levity, but I think that Mansfield may have thought I was making light of this and he was rather irritated by this. I think Pell was maybe more so, but anyway, he said, "Well, I don't take that. Diem has been head of this country for a long time" and so forth, and we went on to other subjects.

But why I mention this is because I recall then that we saw them all off at the airport a few days later. Meanwhile, of course, Mansfield has been talking to a lot of other people, including, I'm sure, a lot of the press there. We were all standing around in a big circle there, and Mansfield walked all the way across the room, came up, shook my hand, and he said, "I think you're right." (Laughter)

Q: You mean he had confirmed your view?

TRUEHEART: He had come to the same conclusion but it was -- and maybe he was thinking I was going to vote for him sometime, but I don't think [so]. But I think what happened with Mansfield was that he had talked to a lot of people in the lower ranks of the mission probably, and above all I think he'd talked to a lot of the press. Of course, he was a very astute man and he had been following this situation a very long time. I don't know if -- did he say compared with 1955?

Q: He said it was worse than 1955, yes.

TRUEHEART: Yes. Well, in many senses it obviously was. I mean, if you took it in terms of the VC situation in the country, it was much worse then. I think that the popular support for Diem was certainly markedly less by this time than it had been in 1955.

Q: To what would you ascribe that in general?

TRUEHEART: Well, two things: one, of course, the real Hanoi effort to reactivate the VC and so on didn't really get under way until about 1960. Certainly in 1955, when there hadn't even been the 1956 proposed election there [?]. So that's one thing, there hadn't been the time. In 1955 they might even have thought they would have an election or something. And then the other thing, of course, was that Diem had just been around in effect mismanaging things for a long time by this [time], and even if he had been doing better than he had been, I think he would still have -- any leader is likely to have lost a lot of support, [even] if he's been doing anything useful, in that length of time.

Q: There's a lot of controversy over the useful things that Diem had been doing. Was there any flavor of that left over, his supposedly oppressive methods and techniques for consolidating his power?

TRUEHEART: You mean like the treatment of the Cao Dai and that sort of thing?

Q: Yes.

TRUEHEART: I wasn't aware of it. It wasn't a major thing that I could detect, but I wasn't very knowledgeable about the situation. But those particular sects were pretty well confined to two provinces, really, in the Delta area. They weren't nationwide groups and I don't know that they had much following in Saigon at all. Of course the Binh Xuyen, or whatever they were, were more of a criminal group.

Q: What about dissent in general? How did Diem handle dissent?

TRUEHEART: Well, he just didn't tolerate it. And to what extent -- you know, we later discovered that there were a lot of political prisoners in the country, but this was not an active issue until the Buddhist thing when a lot of students and so on got arrested. But I remember after the coup, some people sort of came up out of the ground; they had been in prison for years and there were some real horror tales on this. But this had not somehow -- at least it doesn't stick in my memory that it was a major issue during my time there.

Q: Okay. In 1963, now you've talked about Ap Bac somewhat.

TRUEHEART: Yes, and I've told you all I really have on that.

Q: General Harkins used to call it Oh, My Aching Back.

TRUEHEART: Oh, really?

Q: Yes.

TRUEHEART: But you know, at the end he said that, well, it was a success because the Vietnamese --

Q: Retook the village.

TRUEHEART: -- had reached their objective.

Q: Now in 1963, let me go to April, because I believe it was in that month that Diem announced that he would like the number of Americans in Vietnam reduced. Was there anything significant to that?

TRUEHEART: Well, I saw that [in your questions]. I don't really recall that as something coming directly from Diem. Perhaps it's not worth our discussing, because I don't remember that. I wonder, was it simply one of these stories in the Times of Vietnam that might have been just planted by Nhu or something?

Q: Well, that's conceivable, of course. I think it was a newspaper headline.

TRUEHEART: Because I certainly don't recall that we had an official request at that time. This is early 1963?

Q: Yes, about April, I think.

TRUEHEART: I don't recall we had such a request. I don't have enough -- I could be mistaken.

Q: Okay. I believe it is correct that later in May, about the twenty-second, that President Kennedy announced that we would withdraw some Americans if the South Vietnamese suggested that we did, and I thought that these two things might be related.

TRUEHEART: Yes, as I say, I thought about the same things when I read your questions. But I wonder myself if he was responding to some, in a press conference, question, and that he would naturally say if they want, we [will withdraw Americans]. I just don't recall. I recall a later time when Nhu made some more direct statements of this kind, and for much greater reduction, but that one is one that I don't ring a bell on.

Q: That's fine. It's also about this time that the Buddhist demonstrations I think begin. What's behind that? There was a lot of confusion in the newspapers about what was going on.

TRUEHEART: Well, you know, this has all been written up over and over again and I don't know to what extent I can add anything to it. But you remember they were going to have a celebration of Buddha's birthday. It was forbidden by the local authorities in Hue and they did it anyway, and there was an effort to break it up and shooting and several people were killed and so on. It came as a great surprise to us. I'm not sure we had been aware in the mission that there was to be a [demonstration]. We had a consul in Hue, he may well have reported it, but I don't at this time remember whether we knew that this march was scheduled, had been forbidden, and whatnot. The first we heard about it was when we heard that these people had been killed and there had been quite a to-do. I know that Nolting was quite concerned about it at the time and he made the first approach, as I recall, to Diem about it, urging him to damp it down by doing what you would normally think of doing: investigate, punish the guilty, recompense the injured and whatnot. But he was about to go on his leave and I think he may have feared that this would get out of hand, but I don't think anybody seriously thought that the odds were great that we would develop into anything very serious. The whole idea of the Buddhists was something that had never occurred to us, frankly, that they were a force to be reckoned with or that they even had a position. And I don't think they did. I mean, this simply became a handy umbrella under which all the latent opposition to Diem could gather. Of course, the great majority of the people in Vietnam were nominally Buddhists, all right, but it wasn't a religious matter at all, it was a political matter and dealt with by Diem in a very inept way.

Q: Were we urging him to be conciliatory then?

TRUEHEART: Yes, from the very beginning, I mean, in the sense I'm talking about. And of course more and more urging, because it was undermining, we felt, his position in the country and undermining our support for him. I don't know where you were at the time this was all going on, but the position in this country, as I understood at least from a distance, just made it impossible for Kennedy and the government here to continue to support this kind of oppression of people burning themselves up in the streets. For whatever reason, Diem would simply not do anything -- it was always too little and too late.

Q: When did the Ambassador go on his leave?

TRUEHEART: Well, it must have been in May, late May, I can't remember. But it must not have been too long after this event. I would guess it was -- it was the eighth of May, wasn't it, the big affair in Hue? I would have thought he left two or three weeks after that.

Q: [We were] just beginning to talk about what I take is a very crucial period and very eventful summer of 1963 when Ambassador Nolting went on leave and left you with your hands full in Saigon. Were you dealing directly then with Diem in the manner more or less that Nolting had been?

TRUEHEART: Yes, although I don't think I actually saw Diem more than two or three times directly on this matter. There is something in a piece that came out some time ago, there's something in this book of Mecklin's about seeing him almost daily and all that.

Q: That's John Mecklin's book [Mission In Torment]?

TRUEHEART: Yes. This is a gross exaggeration. I didn't see him more than, as I say, I think probably two or three times. [They were] always rather crucial meetings but they were very short meetings in which I tried to deliver -- I was delivering really on instructions -- rather ominous sort of warnings that he must do something to bring this matter under control because it was undermining our ability to support him. And what we were recommending, really, was the same things we always were, [which] was some acknowledgment that the government had done wrong and offer to compensate and so on. And this was the kind of thing that they would never do.

Q: How did he react to that sort of advice?

TRUEHEART: Just blank.

Q: Stonewall?

TRUEHEART: No argument, no nothing.

Q: What did this do to you in your state of mind and your evaluation of the situation?

TRUEHEART: I concluded, in the course of this, that we couldn't win with Diem because it was clear to me that he was rapidly losing the support of his own people because of this and the way he was handling this. These demonstrations were just growing all over the country. It was also -- I guess I was trying to see it from the Washington point of view, that it was making it impossible for us to support him. You asked in your written questions whether it would have been different if Nolting had been there. Well, it might have been. I don't really think, though, that he would have been able to persuade Diem to do anything about this. He wasn't [able], when he did come back, [to do] anything significant on it.

Q: Let me ask you about the demonstrations. Now, the picture that we got at home was that the big cities were full of unrest and so on.

TRUEHEART: It got worse and worse. The students got involved at a later point and this was particularly alarming, it always is, because these students all have parents and they're usually parents in high positions. But the Buddhists themselves were simply conducting these sort of peaceful sit-downs in the city, in Saigon. Those are the only ones I saw; they were conducting them in other [cities].

Q: How was this affecting the countryside?

TRUEHEART: Well, in terms of the strategic hamlet programs, I'm not sure it affected it much at all. I don't think that there's any showing at all that the communists were involved in this thing. If you mean by the countryside, not Danang and Nha Trang or bigger, My Tho or whatever, but really the real boondocks, again, I'm not sure how much they knew about this or were involved. I think it was primarily an urban business. But the point was that it was affecting the ability of Diem to govern and to conduct any kind of effective operation against the VC, But we know in retrospect that the hamlet situation was deteriorating badly in the Delta particularly during this period, but I don't myself tend to relate this directly to the Buddhist thing. I think it probably relates to defects in the way in which the program was carried out. I mean, it was too many; they were just building hamlets. You didn't go into this, incidentally, but that was our main problem with the Vietnamese side of the hamlet program was that they were not conducted in a systematic ink spot method or whatever, moving from secure areas outward, but just trying to build hamlets willy-nilly, wherever, all over. Nhu never would listen to any advice on this point.

Q: I think you refer to the oil blot concept of spreading security out from a secure area.

TRUEHEART: Yes. Yes. That's what. I think the fact that this began to come apart in 1963, as we think we know now it did, was primarily the result of that rather than being a part and parcel of the Buddhist crisis.

Q: You don't think they're related then?

TRUEHEART: Well, I don't. Perhaps they are, but I don't think so.

Q: Well, that's interesting, because some people do find that a rather facile connection to make.

TRUEHEART: It could be, but I don't see it that way.

Q: Were you getting any feedback from MACV as to what the effect of all this was on the army?

TRUEHEART: Well, we were getting reports from province military people and military province advisers about serious deterioration in the security situation in their areas, particularly in the Delta. And we were also getting, for the first time, efforts by MACV not to let these people report what they were seeing.

Q: How were you getting it if MACV was trying to block it?

TRUEHEART: We were getting it through -- there were other people down there in the provinces as well as [the military]. You'd get it from, say, the AID adviser. I think by this time we had a number of State Department language officers out in the field and [we were] getting it through them. The military people, their counterparts, were talking to them, but they really were not reporting through channels because it wasn't upbeat.

Q: I see.

TRUEHEART: You know how -- you were in the army.

Q: I was, yes, sir.

TRUEHEART: There was very strong pressure at that time in Vietnam on the younger officers to be positive.

Q: Yes. Was John Paul Vann a good example of the dilemma involved?

TRUEHEART: He was one that wasn't as positive as he might have been. But there were some others, and as I say, I know of a couple, but I think there were probably quite a few whose careers were blighted by some really specific efforts to do them in the eye on their reports because they didn't follow the right kind of [line].

Q: Did you ever know a Colonel Daniel Boone Porter? Did he cross your trail at some time in this connection?

TRUEHEART: I think so. Where would he -- ?

Q: He was a senior adviser; he was a corps adviser I believe in what was then III Corps, which was the Delta. He was the boss of John Paul Vann and another lieutenant colonel named [Jonathan] Ladd, I believe.

TRUEHEART: I think I did know him; I must have known him. There were several others that I knew better but -- when did I see that? I think I probably knew him but I don't have any vivid recollection. I'm pretty poor about names.

Q: Well, I thought he might be interesting because he was between General Harkins and Vann, and I understand that he thought a good deal of Vann, which would put him in a very difficult position indeed.

TRUEHEART: Well, Vann was kind of untouchable in a way, partly because I think he was ready to turn in his suit and did do so. But for someone who wanted to make his career in the army, I thought -- the independent approach, as you know, is more difficult.

Q: What dealings did you have with the press during that rather difficult summer?

TRUEHEART: Well, I had a lot of dealings with them, and some rather unpleasant ones, because of course they didn't know what we were doing and always assumed we were not doing enough or not putting enough heat on Diem from their point of view. And there were a couple of physical dustups with the press where I made protests, but not always making them to their satisfaction, at a high enough level or whatever.

Q: Are you referring to a confrontation between [Neil] Sheehan and [David] Halberstam and some of Diem's police?

TRUEHEART: I'm not sure whether I'm thinking about that one or not. I don't think it's [on] that one that this arose. There were quite a few of these things. But as a general observation, I concluded sometime during this same period that these guys' reporting over the time had been a lot more accurate than ours had been, and that's my judgment now. There are a lot of reasons for this, I'm sure, but I don't think that -- and they were certainly a constant problem for the embassy because they made it more difficult for us in our dealings with the government.

Q: The government resented this?

TRUEHEART: Yes. But in fact I think their information and reporting on what was going on in the countryside and in the country was on the whole more accurate than what we were reporting from the embassy.

Q: Does that include both the State Department and the military side?

TRUEHEART: Well, yes. But I don't know to what extent -- I don't feel I know as much about what the military reporting was in any detail, purely military point, but I suspect that it would also apply there. When you're carrying out an operation you're inevitably much more aware of what you're doing than you are of anything else. You're preoccupied with your own actions and the things that are [happening]. And I'm sure you're predisposed to think it's working, if you have any choice in the matter. I think that because their position was what it was, and where they didn't have this same preoccupation, in practice they had a broader view and a better view of what the real situation was than we did.

Q: Now, you said that sometime that summer you concluded that Diem was not the answer, that we couldn't win with him.

TRUEHEART: Yes, I had concluded this long before Nolting came back. And I never changed; I still feel that.

Q: Were there alternatives? That was always the question, of course: yes, Diem is not very good but who else is there?

TRUEHEART: We didn't have any real basis -- there was nobody we could point to and say this guy will do a better job. In fact, most of the people we knew, we'd always said, and even at this point I still would have said, I don't have any guarantee that anybody else will do better but we can be sure that this man will lose. It was that sort of reasoning only and recognizing that it was a chance that you would be moving to something even worse. But if it's not going to work, you don't start putting more money on the table. Of course, I felt this even more strongly in, say, 1965; [I was] bitterly opposed, but wasn't then in any direct involvement. I was bitterly opposed to sending any sort of ground forces into the country, because by that time it seemed to me pretty clear that there wasn't anybody that was going to do a better job than Diem.

Fundamentally the problem was that -- and I came to these conclusions; I don't want to say I felt these when I was there because I don't know just when some of these ideas developed. But I think the problem was that every head of government in Vietnam, starting with Bao Dai and going through Diem and so on, not one of these leaders right on up to [Nguyen Van] Thieu ever really regarded himself as the governor of Vietnam. He regarded himself as administering the country for somebody else. Let me go on. Not one of these people looked for his support, his ultimate support in office, to the people of the country. They all looked to France or to us as the source of their power, and they were administering the country. This is certainly not something that I felt early on; I'm not sure when I came to this conclusion.

But I think this was the basic problem. That being the case, the more we did, in a way, the more that we made this even more true. The more involved the United States became, the more it became impossible for whoever was the nominal ruler of the country to be a real ruler, in fact and in the eyes of the people of the country. So it was a true dilemma. There never was any chance of this thing working, in my opinion now, unless you mean that we were prepared to occupy the country, which I never conceived the United States would support politically, doing something of this kind. Even that might not have worked.

But as I say, I think I was always opposed to any further involvement from the time I left there. By the time I got home -- I took a long way home -- Big [Duong Van] Minh had already been overthrown.

Q: Yes, and [Nguyen] Khanh had --

TRUEHEART: Khanh had taken over. So that I always wondered just how that particular coup took place. I always wondered if in fact our military had any hand in this. But be that as it may, if anybody had any popular support in the country, it was probably Big Minh. But certainly none of the others did.

Q: It sounds like you're saying the trouble with the leaders of Vietnam was that they weren't politicians.

TRUEHEART: Sure.

Q: In the true sense of the word.

TRUEHEART: That's right. The whole conception of getting their support from the governed which, whatever you may say about the VC, that's where they got it from, by whatever means. This was not something that Diem ever understood. Nhu had some sort of charades that he played with organizations of various kinds, and Madame Nhu had some of hers, but these were shams.

Q: A lot of people who have written on this subject seem to think that the raids on the pagodas in August of 1963 were a sort of a climax, a breaking point of some kind.

TRUEHEART: Oh, well, that's true, that's true. That really cut it as far as we were concerned, because it was obviously trying to pre-empt the situation. It was done between the departure of Nolting and the arrival of Lodge. It was a clear violation of the kind of at least public and private assurances they had been giving within Vietnam and to us. It made it impossible for almost anybody to support [Diem]. It undermined any possibilities of support within this country.

Q: You mentioned that they had been giving us some private assurances. Had they given them to Nolting when he came back?

TRUEHEART: Well, I think before he left that he had been given assurances that they would not do anything of this kind. I can't document that, but I think it is documented somewhere that he was assured that they would not take any violent measures against the Buddhist religion or the movement or whatever. You know, he [Diem] made his public statement about the same time to Maggie Higgins, [which] was something to the effect that his policy of reconciliation with the Buddhists was irreversible, which is kind of an ambiguous, cryptic statement, or so I regarded it, but others took it as meaning this was a great concession on his part. But that was certainly a benchmark in all this. I think that from that point on there was not really any serious effort to get behind Diem again. I mean, we were, from that point on, ready to at least acquiesce in his departure.

Q: What was Ambassador Nolting's frame of mind when he came back into this unsettling situation?

TRUEHEART: Well, he was very upset. I know that he was upset with me, although he never directly said this to me. I've never complained in any way about anything he may have done with me for my career, and I don't want to say anything now about it. It's a very painful thing to me, because we were friends for so many years. He's godfather to both of my children, and I don't have any ill will against him, but I'm sure he's very disappointed. I think he felt that my responsibility during his absence was to him, whereas I felt my responsibility was to Washington when I was in charge during his absence. I did not think that I should be guided during his absence by doing what I supposed he would do. I'm not sure what he would have done. He might well have done what I did, but I don't know that. In any case, that's about all I want to say on that unless there's something --

Beyond this, the months that followed were months that really were involved with wondering how on earth the U.S. could carry out a policy there.

Q: Now, we have I think a sequence here of three events which go together. The first were the raids on the pagodas, then the departure of Ambassador Nolting.

TRUEHEART: He had departed.

Q: Yes, that's right, he had departed before the raids. Then the arrival of Ambassador Lodge. There's a famous quote I think by Madame Nhu. When she found that Lodge was coming, she was supposed to have said, "They have sent us a proconsul," very distressed at the fact apparently. What changed when Ambassador Lodge arrived? Did the style of ambassadorship change?

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes. It grossly changed. He came out and met in Honolulu with Nolting. He was on his way out. I think he had been planning a sort of leisurely trip from there on. He did stop briefly in Tokyo, but I think he was going to stop longer in Tokyo and maybe elsewhere on the way in. But just at that moment the pagoda raids took place, so he then just flew straight in. Now at this point we had martial law in Saigon and a curfew and so forth and did in fact -- I don't know, perhaps martial law, maybe just a curfew. But in any case, it was a very excited situation indeed, and his plane came in the middle of the night from Tokyo and I guess we went out to meet him.

I must say, I have never seen anybody take over so thoroughly and so well as he did. I was just full of admiration. I have never in all my career seen anybody move into such a complicated, messy situation and take charge so quickly and so effectively. I don't know anything about his later tour out there, but this one was really very remarkable to my recollection.
(Interruption)

Q: [You were saying] Ambassador Lodge took charge very thoroughly.

TRUEHEART: Well, he simply hit the ground running. He made decisions and moved ahead, and he had certainly been well briefed and I think knew what he wanted to do and I think he also had full confidence that he was in charge of everything and he was not going to tolerate any sort of suggestion that he was not in charge. I think he also had a real experience and gift for dealing with the press. He never had any trouble with the press from the time he arrived. Of course, he was always carrying out a policy which was of really extreme pressure on the government, which suited the book of the correspondents for the most part. Furthermore, he saw them regularly. He once was a newspaperman himself and he knew that a newspaperman must have a story to write and he helped them write stories. So that problem sort of disappeared. Then he did other things which really made it very clear that he was the man to deal with.

Q: Did your duties or position or operation change at all?

TRUEHEART: Not really. He was very good with me throughout and seemed to -- from what I've said, I think we were fully in agreement about Diem, for example, so that there was no real problem there. I think he put full faith in me. We can talk about my leaving and so on at some point if you want, and how that came about, but it didn't come about, as far as I know, because of any difficulty with Lodge.

He, in general, adopted the view that having made all these courtesy calls and so forth, and having let the government know what we wanted in general, [that is], about the same concessions we've been talking about, that he didn't have any leverage with Diem or rather he didn't get anywhere with Diem by making demands. He just sat back and said, "I'll wait for him to come to me." And that was the policy which he followed right up to the end. There is some suggestion that Diem may have been just about to get the point when the coup took place on the first of November. You're familiar with that?

Q: Yes. We're going to come to that. I wanted to ask you about the famous telegram of August 24. Were you privy to that when that came in?

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes. This was not long after he got there, of course. The telegram was clear enough and not too surprising, or certainly not unwelcome to Lodge or to me. What was troublesome was this simultaneous radio broadcast on USIA, on the VOA, which was very upsetting because it in effect disclosed what was in the message. I mean, what the broadcast said was that the United States now knew that the army had not been involved in the pagoda raids. It could be read as an open invitation to the army to take over. There were other things in the message that added to that impression. Well, that wasn't the kind of thing you wanted to have happen when you were instructed in this telegram to start making moves covertly which would in effect encourage something like this.

Q: You were quite afraid that VOA had tipped your hand then?

TRUEHEART: Well, yes. And worse than that, this all happened on the morning we were all going to go over to the palace to present his credentials. I think I'm not wrong about this. I think it was I who suggested to Lodge that he leave Harkins -- not just Harkins but [John] Richardson as well -- home. Their presence wasn't required for such a thing. I was certainly sufficiently concerned that these things might lead Diem to hold us or something in the palace. So he did this -- this has been reported; I don't think they usually mention that Richardson was also left behind. In fact, of course, nothing like that happened. The fact that there were differences of opinion back here about the clearance of the message, I have no firsthand knowledge of that. In the end, of course, nothing happened as a result of this particular episode. But in the end, it just sort of petered out. The military never felt I guess they had themselves organized well enough to move.

Q: Although I think one of them had contacted Conein already.

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes, we had been in touch with them all right. If I'm not mistaken, at this point Harkins also had a meeting with [Tran Thien] Khiem in which this thing was touched on. But in fact nothing happened. I don't know why. I think it's conceivable that the generals were not -- if it wasn't that they were not ready to act, maybe they were not sure enough that we were really behind this, that this wasn't in some way perhaps a trap. In any case, nothing did come of it.

Q: There were two fact-finding missions to Vietnam that fall, two notable ones that I remember.

TRUEHEART: This is after the coup?

Q: No, this was between August and the coup, I think September and October. Now, one of them was one that you've alluded to previously. This is the Krulak-Mendenhall mission. Were you involved in the fact-finding and opinion-gathering that went on then?

TRUEHEART: Well, you know, Mendenhall stayed with me while he was in Saigon. We talked and I'm sure I told him everything I knew, what I thought, and he talked to as many people as he could talk to in the time allotted. He had many contacts there, having been in the country for, I don't know, I think he did a three or four-year tour there. He went and talked to people whose opinion he judged, but he didn't -- he wrote his own report, I think, on his way home. But from what I know of it, his report would have been very much what I would have reported.

Q: Well, I think it was, and I think then General Krulak gave such a contradictory report one wonders who was General Krulak getting his information from.

TRUEHEART: I think he said at the time he'd talked only to the advisers.

Q: But if the advisers had been sending or wanting to send discouraging reports, how do we account for that? How do we account for -- ?

TRUEHEART: Well, they wouldn't tell Krulak. I think on another one of these visits out there, at one point McNamara came. I think this is one of the things that Lodge did was to get him aside and talk to him. He had him stay with him. I think this is true. He said, "You can't possibly imagine" -- Lodge, after all, was a reserve major general -- "You don't know the army, Bob, if you think that these people are going to tell or say in front of Harkins or anybody on Harkins' staff what they really think unless it's what they think Harkins thinks. You just don't know your army." Now, maybe that's unfair to the army -- I hope it is -- but that was the problem. Plus the fact that I think it's very hard for somebody who's doing something not to tend to think, well, it's working. You naturally feel this way, whatever you do yourself.

Q: Were we making a mistake in having the people who were responsible for the program also measure the progress of the program?

TRUEHEART: Well, yes, always to some degree, sure. But this kind of visit, you know, I think that so much of this was just wheel-spinning anyway. I mean, when you couldn't make up your mind what to do, you'd always send another team out to Vietnam to talk to the same people, ask the same questions, and go back.

Q: Have you read the account of Krulak and Mendenhall reporting to President Kennedy?

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes, I've read about it and his asking "Were you two gentlemen in the same country?" and so on. Of course, I can't remember, I think Mecklin was back on this same trip, wasn't he, and maybe Rufus Phillips.

Q: I think that was --

TRUEHEART: Was that a little later on?

Q: They brought them back I think, yes, to report.

TRUEHEART: I think they brought back people to report. Anyway, that's about all I know on that.

Q: Were you aware of what Mecklin and Phillips were going to say when they got back?

TRUEHEART: No, no, I wasn't. But I could guess. Mecklin I think reported that he recommended we be prepared to send in the marines or something, or send in troops. I don't think I knew he felt that. But I knew very well what Phillips thought was happening.

Q: And of course he'd be talking about the same countryside that General Krulak had been talking about.

TRUEHEART: Sure. And I think he probably said that these people would not tell Krulak what was really going on. I'm not sure, too, whether Krulak didn't spend more time in the north than in the Delta where the situation was, we thought, the worst.

Q: All this time, of course, we know now that the Vietnamese generals were gradually getting their act together to do the deed. Were we able to stay abreast of that in any way or only at intervals?

TRUEHEART: Well, we were very close to the generals through particularly Conein but also through a guy named Speera and-

Q: How do you spell that?

TRUEHEART: Speera, S-P-E-E-R-A. He was also with the agency. And of course one or two of them were close friends of Rufus Phillips, Le Van Kim for example. And of course people like Dick Stilwell were close to them, too, but just to what degree he would ever go outside the military sort of a discussion, I'm not sure. But of course Dick certainly knew all about what was going on in this area and what reports we were getting,

Q: Doesn't this put you in a rather delicate position here, to be aware of a coup, or the possibility of a coup, and at the same time supposed to be maintaining relations with Diem? It seems to me that questions of loyalty and ethics become very difficult to deal with about what is your duty in a situation like this.

TRUEHEART: Well, I think so. I think there's no doubt about that and I have not only a lot of questions nowadays about the basic ethics of it, so to speak, as I do about the efficacy of it. My general judgment, not just on Vietnam but I've had lots of experience in this area, having been involved with State Department approval of covert operations in a very broad way, I'm inclined to think that over time these operations have cost this country far more than we have ever achieved from them. But I think in this case and by this time, the kind of concerns you mentioned were greatly offset by the feeling that we had been had by these people. So that I think we felt we had maybe a broader commitment than to Diem, we had a commitment in effect to the Vietnamese people obviously, and to do anything to perpetuate this Diem regime was not in the interests of Vietnam or the United States.

Of course once we had listened to these generals, then we had a commitment to them in the sense that -- well, I think at one point the question was raised. I think Lodge said we couldn't stop this thing; it had gone beyond the point where it could be stopped. Washington didn't want to accept this. Basically the only way to have stopped it might have been to tell Diem and that could perhaps have stopped it, but it would have been to undermine any possibilities.

Q: Where did John Richardson, what was his position in the middle of all this?

TRUEHEART: Well, first of all, I think Richardson, to begin with, was inclined to support Diem and Nhu, and he had closed a definite deal with Nhu. I mean, over the years the CIA station chief had had a regular meeting with Nhu. Colby had them and Richardson had them, and they reported fully to us as well as to Washington on what was transpiring at these meetings. The agency also supported, in a technical way and financially, these special forces of Nhu's. Now, I think that long before we got to the final chapter of this thing, Richardson had concluded that there was no real turning back and we had to go through with the support of a coup. The reason he was removed, and I don't know this by Lodge's having told me in so many words, but I think the reason Richardson was removed was simply to make it very clear really to Diem and Nhu as well as, maybe even more importantly, to the military, that Lodge was speaking for the government. This close relationship between the chief of station and Nhu, which was sanctioned and had a long history, was bound to lead people on the Vietnamese side to wonder if we had two policies out there. I'm sure a lot of Americans may have felt the same thing. I don't; I'm confident that Richardson was an absolutely 200 per cent loyal follower of policy and was not double-crossing anybody. I don't believe Lodge thought he was. But I think Lodge did it for this reason: this was a clear signal, the only kind of really believable signal he could give. But this, as I say, is conjecture; Lodge never told me this.

Q: The press, of course, conjectured that Richardson was sent home because there was a disagreement over policy toward Diem.

TRUEHEART: I don't believe that's the case. There may have been at one time, but Richardson was not only a man who carried out his instructions, but I think if he -- he might well have thought to handle it differently, but by the time he was sent home he was not arguing we should be doing something different, and his own people were the key players in the whole affair.

Q: Right. Right. Did you have any indication to back up the rumor that Nhu, or maybe Diem, was in touch with the other side during the fall?

TRUEHEART: No, and I really think that was a lot of horseshit, frankly. Correct that in the transcript.

Q: (Laughter) We'll let you remake that one.

TRUEHEART: No, I never took that seriously. I am doubtful that he would try, but I don't think the VC would have given him the time of day.

Q: Shall we just ascribe that to the Saigon rumor mill then?

TRUEHEART: Well, no, I think it's very likely something he would put out, you know.

Q: Disinformation.

TRUEHEART: Yes, or something. Like demanding withdrawal of Americans and this kind of thing. It's a --

Q: A bluff, perhaps?

TRUEHEART: Well, you know, we had this other famous meeting, which I was present at, not very long before the coup, and he was sounding off about how weak his brother was and so forth. I think he was quite ready to confuse people, do anything, say anything.

Q: Let's talk about the coup. Of course it's been widely written about and so on, but I was wondering if you had any special personal recollections that you would like to get into the record here.

TRUEHEART: One thing, I went to the Philippines for about eight days, I think, just before the coup for a physical and a little bit of R&R and got back two or three days before the coup. And there were a number of things that went on in those days between the mission and the generals and so on that I've only -- I wasn't around when they were going on. In general I think I was kept cut in on everything that was happening and did a lot of the intermediary work myself.

But as far as the coup is concerned, my recollection is that we were sort of expecting something, but I remember going home for lunch, as we did every day. My driver dropped me off and went on to have lunch himself, and he lived near the police station, I think it was. Instead of having lunch, he came straight back and said that the army or soldiers were taking over the police station. Well, it was clear to me what this meant, so I then didn't finish my lunch and went over to Lodge's house, which was a half a block away. He was having lunch. And I told him it would seem to me the coup had started. No other explanation for it. He was slightly skeptical. I said I thought I'd go on back to the office. We had at that time very good communications between the residence and the chancery. I suggested maybe the best thing to do would be for him to stay there and I would go to the embassy and we'd keep in touch on the phone, or if one of us got cut off, the other one could -- and he did and that's what happened.

So I went to the office and we then set up a system of reporting. By this time there were a lot of other reports of the same kind. And we set up a system of sending single channel messages. We actually used the CIA communications channel, but they were all distributed throughout Washington, one series of flash messages. [There was] only one break as I recall in the whole time; the air attaché sent a message about he'd gotten a report from somebody that a division sympathetic to Diem was moving up from somewhere. I think it was an erroneous report, but he sent it through his channel and it created sort of a flurry back here. But otherwise we had I thought a very good thing. This went on for twenty-four hours practically, because the coup wasn't over until noon the next day.

At some point in the afternoon Diem called, or somebody was calling for Diem, to speak to Lodge. I referred them and gave them the number of the residence, and he [Lodge] talked to them. And that message, that conversation, has been -- where after talking to him, he telephoned to me and dictated the telegram of what he had said to him.

Of course, there was a lot of shooting during the coup and some bombing. A lot of the trajectories, a lot of the artillery was right over the chancery into the palace yard, which was a sound I was not unfamiliar with, but I was pretty sure they weren't shooting at us. (Laughter) Someone said during that -- and this has been reported, too -- particularly when they finally brought some infantry up to move into the palace grounds, "I wish they would fight like this against the VC." (Laughter)

Of course, we were very lucky as a mission there because we had people scattered all over the city. My own wife was at home with the baby, and the other son happened to be at a friend's house and he stayed there. We had lots of discussions about whether we ought to try to assemble people or move them to a safe place, and in the end we didn't do anything because we didn't think we could improve on their safety. But I daresay if anybody had been hurt we would have been blamed for it.

As I say, my recollection was about that except that of course after the coup was over, you asked in your questionnaire what was the reaction. Well, the reaction was just Mardi Gras practically, tremendous excitement and a celebration in the streets, people marching around, the usual -- as quite often that happens. But there was great jubilation amongst the people. Whether they knew that Nhu and Diem had been killed, I don't know.

Q: Could Lodge have been elected president of Vietnam? He said he could have been elected that day if he had run for office.

TRUEHEART: Well, I think in Saigon, yes.

Q: How did you react to the news of the assassinations of the two brothers?

TRUEHEART: Well, I was sorry to hear it, but I wasn't awfully shocked and I certainly wasn't too surprised.

Q: Was that because this is a relatively common ending for a coup?

TRUEHEART: No, I mean I think we had always thought, and I think maybe reported long before, that it would be a very likely concomitant of a coup in Vietnam, particularly because of what had happened in 1960 when the coup had half succeeded. [If Diem and Nhu were killed] then they wouldn't be able to rally other forces and so on. And I think these people would have all feared that even if they got out of the country or something, that they would be a threat. So I think we were asked at one time what we thought would -- I guess it was long before there was any idea of any involvement of the U.S. -- but in the event of a coup, what would be the fate of [Diem and Nhu]. I think we said that we thought that it would have to be considered a very strong possibility that they would be killed just for the reasons I've just given.

Q: There were some reports that President Kennedy was shocked.

TRUEHEART: Well, I dare say he was, but I don't know. I'm sure that everybody had different feelings about it.

Q: Who did it, do you think?

TRUEHEART: I don't [know]. I've read all these things that you've read. I don't have any knowledge of them. I suppose one of those people who were on the APC did it, but whether he did it under orders, I just don't know. I think Conein thinks that -- he's been told various things and he's reported them -- you've probably seen him -- but I have never had any independent information about it.

Q: Did we have any way of knowing what effect the coup would have on the conduct of the war and the insurgency and conditions in the countryside? Was there any way to prognosticate that?

TRUEHEART: Well, I didn't know of any. It was more that you could figure they couldn't get any worse. Or maybe that they were not likely to get any worse. I certainly didn't have -- there was nobody out there that you had great faith would be a better administrator or anything like that. You did have the feeling that, by this time at any rate, the Ngo family had really only one objective, [that] is to stay in power.

Q: Now, the picture that I have been able to form between the time of the coup and the time of the next coup, if you will, is rather confused. It's very hard to tell what's going on from this end. Was it pretty much that way in Saigon, too, when the new regime is attempting to take the reins?

TRUEHEART: You mean after the coup? After the overthrow of Diem?

Q: Right. Right. When Minh and his crew came in.

TRUEHEART: I'm not sure what they were doing, but I think they were trying to get organized to do something. But I don't think, first of all, that they had ever had any faith in the strategic hamlet program.

Q: Why do you say that?

TRUEHEART: Well, because at least during the few months that remained while I was there, I don't think they tried to pick it up or carry it forward. After all, they were military people, and the military had never been very much involved with this program, and I don't believe they were convinced that it was a -- I think they thought it was some toy of Nhu's. And I think also they were very reluctant even to use that name for it, if it was going to be continued, because the name was associated, they thought, in the minds of the people with Diem and Nhu.

So I don't think they had any particular strategic conception of how to deal with the problem of the VC. I remember one of the things they wanted to do was a reconciliation with the Cao Dai, for example. I remember going down on a trip, all the way in a Vietnamese helicopter, from Saigon to whatever the capital of that province was. There was a big welcoming ceremony by the local Cao Dai, and they considered this a big political step, reconciliation of the government with the Cao Dai. They were saying in effect that the Cao Dai can really control this province and there won't be any problem with the VC because of this. So I don't think they had any central conception of what to do about the problem, but I think they certainly weren't ready to pick up and carry forward with the program that we had thought was central to the whole thing.

Bear in mind, I'm talking about -- I was there in November, December, and I left in January, so I don't -- and then they had a coup at the end of January or something. So it's a confused picture to me, too, but I think in general it was a confused situation. Also I think they were trying to sort out how they were going to organize the government and who was going to do what to whom and so on.

Q: Now, in the middle of this, in December, Secretary McNamara came back-

TRUEHEART: Yes.

Q: -- obviously trying to figure out what is going on in fact, is that it?

TRUEHEART: Well, I guess. I have an idea that he came out also to talk, at that point, about maybe some actions against the North, bombing or something. I may be mistaken about this but I seem to recall that this was at least one of the subjects discussed. My recollection is that at one point I expressed the opinion I thought that we might be more vulnerable to this in a way than the North was because I was thinking about our oil supply dumps and whatnot, which I thought might be very vulnerable to VC action and that sort of thing, and that before we moved up we ought to be pretty sure we could protect ourselves. Bear in mind, we had nothing but advisers in Vietnam at this time and I'm sure our own supply lines and so on were much more vulnerable and limited than they later became. But it's just my rather vague recollection of how this brief exchange with McNamara leads me to believe that this topic came up during that visit. It certainly would have been the last chance I ever had to say anything to him on that subject.

But by that time I was really packing up to go. You asked that question, let me fill that in and make sure you get it. What had happened was that sometime in the fall at about the time that Lodge arrived or a little after Lodge arrived, I had a letter from Hilsman asking me if I would come back to Washington and be the officer in charge of Vietnam affairs, or the deputy assistant secretary for Vietnam, in his office. I had had my two years there and it would have been normal tour, and I asked Lodge and he said, "If you want to, if it's a step up, why, yes, I'll agree to it," and we then talked about who might replace me. In fact, I helped him pick out somebody that he asked to come, David Nes.

But of course this all was laid on before the coup and before the assassination of Kennedy. I think it's clear that Johnson had opposed, to what degree I don't know, the whole business of unseating Diem and so forth. I think he was, and I think the military were clearly anxious to see me out of there. So that I believe while the thing developed in the way I said, I think by the time I left there were various people who were keen for me to go sooner rather than later. Lodge wanted to take a brief holiday up in Hong Kong and didn't want me to leave until after he had had that and came back. This was agreed to but it meant my staying on for another two or three weeks. Anyway, by the time I got back to Washington they had reorganized the State Department in such a way that I took over not Vietnam, but Laos, Cambodia, Thailand and Burma. What I used to say [was that] I got the dominoes. But I never had anything to do with Vietnam except in an indirect way in trying to avoid encroachments into Cambodia or Laos, or whatever, after I came back.

Q: It's alleged that that was done on purpose, that -- TRUEHEART: As I say, I assume it was done on purpose. Are you saying I'm -- ?

Q: No, no, that they took Vietnam out of the Southeast Asia thing because you were taking over Southeast Asia.

TRUEHEART: Oh, yes, I assumed that.

Q: Oh, I see, all right.

TRUEHEART: I'm sure they did, although you could make out a case that it had become such a busy job that it would make sense to leave it in one, but they could have put me in charge of the Vietnam task force rather than [the rest of Southeast Asia]. No, I think it was very clear what they were trying to do. I never was under any misapprehensions about that.

Q: I see. Were you able to brief your successor, David Nes?

TRUEHEART: Yes, because he came out -- actually, now that you mention it, he came out with McNamara on that December trip. I think David was then -- was he in Paris? In any case, McNamara I think maybe had flown out from Europe. Anyway, David got on that plane and he came with him. So, yes, I was able to brief him and he was able to see the house and things like this and we made all sorts of arrangements about his sending my dog back and getting my -- I brought back my number-one boy and so on. So, yes, I was able [to brief him], but he did not hit it off with Lodge and only lasted about six months, I think. Of course, Lodge himself came back for the campaign in the next year.

Q: What happened to Nes? I haven't been able to find his tracks.

TRUEHEART: He lives in Baltimore. He later went to Cairo as number two. He was there when the embassy was evacuated. He was quoted by a newspaperman, I've forgotten now exactly what he said, but it was something rather contrary to policy, and he left the service not long after. He was very unhappy about our Middle Eastern policy. That's more of his area, incidentally, than again the Southeast Asia business. But Lodge had met him once when he was in the United Nations and I knew Nes.

Q: The conventional wisdom, if you will, is that Nes tried to do too much and that Lodge didn't want an activist deputy chief of mission.

TRUEHEART: Well, I've heard something of the same thing. I think perhaps that there were people in Washington who thought that somebody needed to keep an eye on Lodge. Nes may have had some sort of a hidden brief and this would be certainly -- if Lodge even thought something like this he would --

Q: Somebody in the White House thought this, perhaps, that -- ?

TRUEHEART: Or somewhere, I don't know. But in any case, Nes had an introduction to the job which was unprecedented; he had a laying on of hands at the White House from LBJ. You might want to talk to Nes. I can tell you how to get hold of him. But in any case, I have heard that, for example, the committee, the so-called Trueheart Committee, which is what they used to call it, I believe he was never allowed to have such a committee. There may have been other problems, but I don't know what they are. I dare say he'd be glad to talk to you.

Have we covered our thing?

FREDERICK ERNEST NOLTING, JR.
Ambassador
Vietnam (1961-1963)

Ambassador Frederick Ernest Nolting, Jr. was born in Virginia in 1911. He graduated from the University of Virginia in 1933 with a B.A. In 1940 he earned his M.A. from Harvard University and two years later he earned his Ph.D. He served in the United States Navy from 1942 to 1946. He joined the Foreign Service in 1946, and worked closely with NATO. He served in Washington, DC, Paris and Vietnam. Ambassador Nolting was interviewed for the LBJ library by Ted Gittinger in 1982.

Q: Ambassador Nolting, would you begin by telling me if there was anything that could be considered a legacy that Ambassador [Eibridge] Durbrow had left for you to inherit?

NOLTING: Yes. I think the legacy was one of some tension and misunderstanding between the American mission and the government of South Vietnam under President [Ngo Dinh] Diem. There had been pressure on Diem to get rid of his brother [Ngo Dinh] Nhu-

Q: Oh, that early?

NOLTING: That early, before I got there. There had been disagreements on other matters, but for the most part Ambassador Durbrow, who is a friend of mine and helped me a great deal in our brief meeting in Honolulu on my way out there to succeed him, felt, I believe, that these disagreements were minor compared to the over-all question of trying to establish stability in South Vietnam. So that one of the things that I was instructed to do was to try through conciliation to gain the confidence of the government in the intentions of the United States to stick with them. That, of course, was greatly reinforced within two weeks of my arrival by Vice President Johnson's strong stand and strong statements in the communique that came out of his visit there.

Q: That was the visit when he referred to President Diem as the Churchill of Asia I think, wasn't it?

NOLTING: Yes, and in several toasts as the Franklin Roosevelt, referring as he did in context to the recent elections of Diem, which were in April of 1961, in which he got about 90 per cent of the votes.

Q: That's fairly usual in that part of the world, isn't it? I think --

NOLTING: Well, yes. Yes. But the charge which was leveled -- these were United Nations supervised elections, whatever that might mean; it surely doesn't mean everything that it implies. But [it means] at least certain supervision of the fairness of the elections. Nevertheless, most of the press interpreted the elections as another indication of an undemocratic system on grounds that no other democracy and no other candidate for president had ever gotten that percentage of the vote.

Q: Who was chief of MAAG when you arrived? Was that General -- ?

NOLTING: General Lionel McGarr.

Q: McGarr, right.

NOLTING: A very fine man in my opinion. He was a military person and perhaps, how shall I say, not as diplomatically inclined as some military men. But I liked General McGarr very much; I have a high regard for him. He was, however, transferred and I remember General [Maxwell] Taylor telling him so in rather brutal terms.

Q: Do you recall the occasion for that?

NOLTING: Yes, it was at the time of the Taylor-Rostow mission.

Q: That would have been the fall of 1961.

NOLTING: Fall of 1961 or late summer. It was a question of visiting, of having an appointment with President Diem. General Taylor was staying with us and Walt Rostow was, too. General McGarr was there when the cars were going to the President's office, and as I recall, General Taylor turned to General McGarr and said, "General, we won't be needing you here," which was rather abrupt.

Q: Do you have any insight as to what was behind that?

NOLTING: Well, I'm sure the decision had been made that General McGarr would be transferred, but so far as I know he hadn't been previously notified.

Q: It seems to me that he would not have served what would be considered a normal tour of duty in his station at that time. He came in late 1960 I believe, so he would have been there just over a year.

NOLTING: I've forgotten when he [came]. Yes. He had a very good record and experience in Korea. I believe at the time his second-in-command -- (Interruption) -- was then Charles Timmes, who was I believe major general at that time. Wonderful person, very good, had an excellent touch with the Vietnamese, both military and civilian, and did a great deal in the training field particularly. Charlie was himself a man of all trades in the military and was excellent. He and General McGarr overlapped. When MACV was created and Paul Harkins came in, General McGarr left, was succeeded in effect by Harkins at a more elevated level, and Charlie Timmes stayed on as the head of the MAAG.

Q: The advisory effort, is that accurate?

NOLTING: Yes. Military Advisory Group. You see, we had had a MAAG there since 1954, and then it was elevated to MACV in 1962.

Q: Right. Of the many stories that appeared in the press and in books and various sources about alleged dissension within the U.S. Mission over the Diem regime, its viability, Diem's suitability, have any struck you as being particularly meritorious or with substance, or are they all, to your mind, meretricious?

NOLTING: You mean the criticisms?

Q: Yes, sir.

NOLTING: Well, I hate to brand everything, including stuff I haven't read, as being wrong and incorrect, but I can answer that question in general terms. In my opinion the criticisms were for the most part 90 per cent unfounded and incorrect. Does that answer your question?

Q: I think it does, especially when combined with what you've said in your Kennedy interviews, yes, I think it does.

The Taylor-Rostow mission, which came in the fall of 1961 -- and there has been much commentary about that particular thing -- they recommended a number of steps, two of which seem to have aroused more controversy even though they were not adopted. One of them was that a contingent of U.S. combat troops, I think combat engineers, be introduced into the Delta under the rather transparent cover of flood relief.

NOLTING: Right.

Q: But everybody knows that combat engineers are also infantrymen.

NOLTING: And they were supposed to be a self-contained unit.

Q: Right. The other was that we should look more closely at military punishment or retribution against the North for its support of the insurgency in the South. Now, these were not adopted at the time. The President did not accept those.

NOLTING: President Kennedy --

Q: That's correct.

NOLTING: -- turned them down, yes.

Q: Were you consulted about these two measures?

NOLTING: Not on the force, the engineers battalion in the Delta. That was added after Max Taylor and Walt Rostow left Saigon. We had conferred on many, many things to be in their report in Saigon or elsewhere in Vietnam, because we toured the country. In Saigon, as I recall -- excuse me, in Honolulu, they stopped to write up all of this for their report to the President.

Q: Or was it Baguio? Wasn't it Baguio?

NOLTING: Maybe it was Baguio, yes. They added this provision for the self-contained American combat-engineering force. I was not consulted on that. When the word got back after they'd gotten to Washington, I was very dubious about it. I cannot recall whether I commented directly to Washington on it, but I think I did. My general comment was that the parts of the report that had been discussed in Vietnam I was in thorough accord with, this new addition I was not. And I'll tell you the reasons for that. It stemmed back to a conviction which I had reinforced often with other people and particularly with President Diem, that American combat forces would lead to a shuffling off of responsibility by the Vietnamese Army and by the Vietnamese people onto the much stronger, better equipped Americans. Diem didn't want that. He said often to me, "If we can't win this struggle on our own with our own manpower, but with your valuable support in materiel and advice, it won't be a viable victory." He did not want American combat forces. That was one reason.

The other reason I think was because it was a thin cover. After all, as you know as a veteran of Vietnam, there was a flood in the Mekong practically every year, and this wasn't anything unusual. To try to bring in American combat forces contrary to the agreements, Geneva Accords of 1954, was to me to invite an international argument on just who had violated what and so forth. Up to that time it was clear that the violations of the 1954 Accords on Vietnam were principally, if not altogether, on the side of the North Vietnamese. It didn't seem to me to make sense to do this.

The other question about -- what was that?

Q: Retribution against the North.

NOLTING: Retribution against the North I took an equally dim view of, although there were plenty of reasons for wanting to do it. But there were operations that were going on, sponsored mostly by the CIA, to bomb or to drop saboteurs, Vietnamese saboteurs, in installations of the North which were being used against the South. Most of those had been unsuccessful, most of them had been counterproductive. Instead of stepping them up, for the most part we tried to weed out those that were not working and left some that seemed to be working. But there were more losses really on the part of brave South Vietnamese people going up and being dropped and being captured before they had been able to accomplish their missions than the reverse. In other words, the weight of the thing seemed to be against continuing some of those operations.

Q: What about bombing? Was that discussed?

NOLTING: Bombing of the North was not discussed, so far as I recall, at that time.

Q: Okay. Did you see Colonel Lansdale at this time? I understand he accompanied --

NOLTING: Ed Lansdale?

Q: Well, it would have been Brigadier General Lansdale I guess by that time.

NOLTING: Yes. I saw him once in Vietnam, but I had many conversations with him before going to Vietnam. That was in April 1961. I was very much impressed with Ed's knowledge of the country and his subtle touch with respect to this kind of situation. I know that President Diem was very admiring of him and on occasion he would say, "I wish I could have a conversation with Colonel Lansdale on this subject," on one subject or another.

Q: He did accompany the Taylor-Rostow mission. He was part of that. (Interruption) -- Lansdale's feel for the situation when you talked to him? Was he optimistic, pessimistic? How would you describe it?

NOLTING: I would describe it as being fifty-fifty between optimism and pessimism, rather enigmatic about means, but supportive, very supportive. This was important in the task force in Washington of which he was member.

Q: This is Mr. [Roswell] Gilpatric's task force?

NOLTING: Gilpatric's chairmanship. Very strong on supporting the constitutional elected government. Lansdale had faith in President Diem and was one of those I think who was most influential in persuading the task force that the United States was taking good risk in our own interests in supporting the South Vietnamese cause under the elected government.

Q: He had visited Vietnam for President Kennedy I think in early 1961. Did you have any knowledge of that one? It was in the spring.

NOLTING: Yes, I did. Do you want to cut this?
(Interruption)

Q: Do you remember any of the points that General Lansdale was pessimistic about?

NOLTING: Not specifically. I think he was optimistic about the government, relative to other Southeast Asian governments. I remember his saying once, "Sure, there are a lot of criticisms that can be leveled against this government in South Vietnam, but compared to the others in Southeast Asia, it's a beaut," or words to that effect. I think he was probably pessimistic on the grounds of the staying power of the United States, on grounds of the persistence, absolute implacability of the communist movement in Southeast Asia, not only in Vietnam but throughout Southeast Asia. I think he felt that there was a political aspect, as there was in the French war, that had to be carefully surveyed so that we would not enter into a situation where we wouldn't stay the course and other factors of that sort. My impression was that he felt that in a divided Southeast Asia, and particularly in South Vietnam, the sentiments of the people were anti-communist. They hated the Viet Cong. But it was a situation in which you couldn't expect a clear-cut victory or even a clear-cut decision in a short while and that this was the kind of situation which the impatient American public and the volatile American political situation was ill-equipped to cope with.

Q: Let me address one of the points you just made.

NOLTING: I am not trying to put words in his mouth, but that's my impression. I'm not quoting him.

Q: Fine. It was his impression then that the South Vietnamese people on balance were anti-communist. If I do not misjudge you, that was your opinion also after you had been in country for a time.

NOLTING: Yes, after traveling over some forty provinces. I spent six months just going all over the country when I first got there. It was my strong impression that the majority of people, by far the majority -- I'm talking about the peasants who were the majority of the people -- were anti-communist, some of them extremely so, most of them anti-communist firmly. Some of them because of family divisions [were] on the fence, but certainly by far the majority were anti-communist.

Q: Now the obvious question which follows from that is from where did the Viet Cong derive what everyone admits was their astonishing staying power and tenacity, if this was true?

NOLTING: The Viet Cong you're talking about?

Q: Yes.

NOLTING: Well, I think it was partly fear of reprisals. I think it was partly dyed-in-the-wool training in North Vietnam of those who were sent back to their native provinces, that is, those who went North in 1954 and then were infiltrated back to their provinces, to their native villages. I think it was partly ideological, but not all that much. I think it was partly a feeling that the government wasn't doing enough for them.

Q: Let's dwell on that for a second, because this is what a lot of people have dwelt upon. To what extent were Viet Cong successes based on genuine grievances among the people?

NOLTING: I don't think they were based on genuine grievances for this reason, because they themselves created the grievances. The grievances were mostly such things as not being able to get their rice to market, or not having enough schoolteachers, or not getting mail deliveries, simple things. The reason for those grievances were that the Viet Cong had blown up the bridges and had murdered some schoolteachers and had terrorized others, and had, for example, made the anti-malaria teams' job -- which was finally successful, thank goodness -- much more difficult by terror tactics. So, I don't think that the genuine grievance theory, even though some ill-informed and naive people may have taken it seriously, was the government's fault. It was the Viet Cong's fault, and it was they who tried to make it worse, who tried to stimulate the feeling that "the government has deserted you, join us."

Q: There's a point there I want to come to later, but I think it comes in a little later. One of the most publicized and one of the most famous incidents, where all of the disparate, conflicting opinions about Vietnam come into focus, were made to come into focus, was concerning a battle that was fought around New Year's in 1963.

NOLTING: Ap Bac.

Q: Yes, sir. Or as one general said, "oh, my aching bak."

NOLTING: That was Paul Harkins.

Q: I'll take your word for that. What recollections do you have of the furor that arose over the battle at Ap Bac?

NOLTING: My recollections are that -- I've thought of that a lot of times and I don't think it was all that serious. I don't think the South Vietnamese army ought to be indicted for cowardice. I think there were some snafus, I think a couple of the Vietnamese commanders were at fault. It was a battle, but it wasn't that big, as you know. I think the ARVN mishandled it, they didn't move in when they should. I think it was blown out of all proportion by the American press. The worst thing that happened was Colonel [John Paul] Vann's spilling his guts to the American press and having it spread all over the headlines that the South Vietnamese Army, despite all that the Americans had done to train and supply them, were basically cowards and they couldn't win. I don't believe that.

Q: What about allegations that -- ?

NOLTING: Please, let me say something more on that, Colonel Vann, who is now dead and whom I admired except for this particular outburst, which I thought was very ill-advised, later gave his life in Vietnam. I don't want to speak ill of him. But I think that interview, I've forgotten whom he gave it to, was emotional and not fair.

Q: There were allegations at the time that President Diem had put out the word to South Vietnamese units that he did not want casualties. What do you know of this? Is it true, and if it is, why?

NOLTING: I don't remember any flat-out orders to anybody to avoid casualties. I do remember President Diem's discussions with me and others saying that the more casualties that could be avoided, not only on the side of the South Vietnamese Army, but on the side of villagers, fence sitters, and even Viet Cong, the better, the quicker the pacification of the country could take place.

Q: I see. There were allegations that the ARVN was not exhibiting enough initiative because of a presidential order not to press battles.

NOLTING: Honestly, I don't recall anybody saying to me or intimating to me, including President Diem or Paul Harkins after his many talks with Diem, or Nguyen [Dinh] Thuan, who was the effective minister of defense. I don't remember anybody giving me the impression that they were giving orders to hold their punches to their military. They were saying be careful about whom you shoot up, and we were saying that, too. And this I think is the important point. The idea then was pacification. It wasn't wiping out dissenters; it was bringing them over. The Chieu Hoi program was an example of it. The idea was pacification, the word was pacification, both in Vietnamese and in French and in English. The trouble was, again, that as hard as we would try in Saigon, and the government would try there, to talk about their pacification program, I don't remember a single case in which a reporter didn't translate pacification into "war". This was an enormous psychological error as it affected this country as well as Vietnam.

Q: It was a conceptual -- ?

NOLTING: As a conceptual thing, right.

Q: Okay.

NOLTING: Does that make sense?

Q: Yes, I think it does. What position did you try to get President Diem to take during the Buddhist crisis? Did you give advice on how he should try to handle that business?

NOLTING: Unfortunately that was one of my big mistakes, big misfortunes. I think I've gone into this before, I'm not sure with whom. The incident that triggered this was in Hue and it was around the first of May 1963. There had been an investigation, there had been very little if any agitation in the meantime, and we were scheduled -- my wife and two children, who were then there -- to meet our other two children in Greece for a long-delayed vacation. After waiting around for two weeks to see what, if anything, was going to develop from this, nothing did, and we left Saigon on the twenty-third of May, as I recall, and went on this vacation, which was to end with consultations in Washington. I was on State Department orders. Well, during that period all hell broke loose in Vietnam. The burnings, Thich Tri Quang, the most venerable of the Buddhist bonzes was burned or burned himself.

Q: That wasn't Tri Quang, was it?

NOLTING: No, no, I'm sorry. Thich Quang Duc. Tri Quang was --

Q: The militant.

NOLTING: -- a very different character.

So for six weeks there I was not at my post. I had speeches to make about Vietnam at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York and elsewhere, which were already laid on. So your question was, what did I have to do with it? I regret to say I got back too late to do anything about it. The thing was out of hand. This I will never cease to blame the State Department for and my deputy, because they both knew exactly where I was every day and could have notified me if they had wanted me back as a mediator, which I think I could have been.

Q: Why didn't they notify you?

NOLTING: Well, we're still on the record, and I'll tell you why. Because I think the person principally in charge of this in the State Department, Averell Harriman, wanted me out of there because I thought that President Diem was the best bet for achieving the United States' interests. I think he wanted me out of there so that Diem would have enough rope to hang himself.

Q: Is that what he did?

NOLTING: Well, I think he made a lot of mistakes that I think I could have helped him to avoid.

Q: What would you have done?

NOLTING: Well, that's a hypothetical question, all right.

Q: And you have the benefit of hindsight. I know that, too.

NOLTING: Yes.

Q: But would you have advised Diem to conciliate the Buddhists?

NOLTING: Yes, yes. Surely, in the beginning, because the Buddhist leadership had not been taken over by Thich Tri Quang, who was in my opinion a communist agent and who was branded later on as such by President [Nguyen Van] Thieu. At the height of the rioting in late 1963 he was glorified in this country as an upholder of the rights of the Buddhists, given asylum by [Henry Cabot] Lodge in the U.S. Embassy.

Q: What about the less militant -- who was the other, Tri Quang's sort of rival for leadership of the Buddhist movement?

NOLTING: I was looking up the name the other day and I can't remember at the moment. There was a group -- and I can find them out for you and supply them if you want -- of about four older Buddhists who had come to an agreement and compromise with the government, and that was undermined by Tri Quang and his group. There was a set of negotiations that went on for some six weeks. I had this from Bui Van Luong, who...

Q: Would you say that name again, sir?

NOLTING: Luong, L-U-O-N-G. First name was Bui, B-U-I. Middle name Van Luong. Okay. He was minister of the interior. He did the investigation at Hue. He came up with a report which I considered to be an accurate and objective report. Diem considered it to be so, and that's what he was going by. Nguyen Thuan, who was perhaps the most effective member of the cabinet, urged Diem to compromise with the Buddhists on the basis of this report. Diem tried to do so. Thuan was on the negotiating committee and so was Luong. They came to what seemed to be a satisfactory agreement.

Q: What was the basis of the agreement?

NOLTING: A reaffirmation of religious toleration, freedom, number one. A settlement of the flag incident, that the Buddhist flag could be flown, as indeed it always could be. But at Hue they had insisted on putting it ahead of the Vietnamese national flag, and that caused the incident. Money for the pagodas. There had been all along substantial contributions by the government to the pagodas. This was reaffirmed. Let's see, what were the other conditions? Well, the usual statement, which Diem said rather scornfully was totally unnecessary, that there would be no religious discrimination or persecution. There had been none, as I said often over there and later. Of all the things that divided that country, one of the things, thank God, was not religious dissension, because the whole spectrum of religions, from Buddhism to ancestor worship to Christianity to the Hoa Haos and the other sects, was transcended by the philosophy of Confucius, and Confucius stood, as you know, for religious toleration. Nearly all Vietnamese were Confucian in that respect.

Well, all of this I think could have been resolved. But I think what happened was the United States all of a sudden began to hammer the table on hotheaded instructions from Washington, burned into action by the American press, to get on with it and tell this guy to apologize and eat crow and do things that he couldn't possibly afford to do as president of the country, which also would not have done any good. Because by that time the Buddhist movement had come into the hands of those who had only one objective, and that was the overthrow of the government. Well, that objective was the exact objective of the Viet Cong. So they were absolutely parallel on that. Whether they were united is a question which I've never been able to determine.

Q: What role did the raids on the pagodas play in all this?

NOLTING: They played a crucial role, in the American minds, American government minds. When Lodge and I were conferring in Honolulu on his way out and my way back -- this was about the twentieth of August 1963 -- that was when the news came of the raid on the pagodas.

Q: Can you describe the effect it had on you when you heard the news?

NOLTING: Yes. I was shocked and so were others, because my last action there in Saigon was to get a statement out of President Diem, which the State Department had been demanding, that there would be reconciliation or the strongest efforts at reconciliation with the Buddhists.

Q: Diem had agreed to this?

NOLTING: He agreed to it. The way he put it was rather interesting. He said -- this was rather typical of his way of doing things -- "my policy of reconciliation with the Buddhists is irreversible."

Q: That could be kind of a cryptic statement, couldn't it?

NOLTING: Well, what he was trying to say, of course, and he never said these things very well or appealingly to the American point of view, was, "Look, there's never been any lack of conciliation and I'm not thinking about admitting that I've been persecuting. I'm just saying that my policy of reconciliation with the Buddhists and all other religions is irreversible."

Q: So what led to the raids?

NOLTING: Well, I sent Diem a personal telegram from Honolulu when I heard about them. I said, "This is the first time that you've ever gone back on your word to me."

Q: You were hurt personally as well as shocked professionally.

NOLTING: I'm awfully sorry I sent that because later on I saw his minister, my good friend Nguyen Thuan, in Paris. He escaped after the overthrow of the Diem government. I said, "Do you remember this personal telegram?" sent when I was no longer ambassador. He said, "Yes, I took it to the President, and the President read it and shook his head and said, 'He doesn't know what the provocation was.'"

Q: What was the provocation?

NOLTING: Well, the provocation was continued packing of arms in the Xa Loi and other pagodas, continued riots proclaiming the overthrow of the government -- not a change in government but the overthrow of the government -- and a total unwillingness to compromise on the part of Thich Tri Quang and his militants on anything.

Q: Some critics have suggested that all Diem had to do was make a gesture towards [conciliation]. Some symbolic act would have pacified the whole business.

NOLTING: Well, I surely don't want to be in the position of saying that this was skillfully handled by the Diem government, or by the Americans. The only skillful people in this were these upstart Buddhist militants. Incidentally, that general association of Vietnamese Buddhists was a new organization. There had never been any such hierarchy. The Buddhist bonzes in the provinces were their own bosses. They did their own funerals, their own marriages, weddings and so forth. I had numerous letters, when I got back from this ill-fated vacation, on my desk from bonzes, some of whom I'd met in outlying villages, some of whom I didn't know, saying "count us out so far as this general association of Vietnamese Buddhists is concerned. We have nothing to do with them, we don't know who they are, and we don't subscribe to their policy or their slogans of overthrowing the government."

Q: Sir, I hope this doesn't seem impertinent. I don't mean it to be.

NOLTING: Sure.

Q: Some people would say or suggest out of hand, that this is Mr. Nhu speaking and this isn't the Buddhists at all. This is Mr. Nhu playing his propaganda organ. Did that thought ever strike you?

NOLTING: You mean the Buddhist movement was Nhu's invention?

Q: No, no. The letters that you got from the bonzes in the countryside disclaiming-

NOLTING: It's conceivable, but it never occurred to me.

Q: I don't know why it occurs to me. I have no reason for suggesting it.

NOLTING: It's conceivable, but I don't think so. I had no opportunity to answer them or to go further into it because I was about to leave Vietnam and there were so many pieces to try to pick up that I didn't answer those letters. So far as I know, like all of my papers [they] were left in the Embassy in Saigon and I don't have any official records of this, nor of anything for that matter, because in those days one tried to abide by the rules of the Foreign Service, which were that you didn't take official papers with you, ever. I notice, incidentally, and this can be on the record now, that most of the Kennedy advisers and the people in Washington kept records of secret, top secret papers and used them extensively in their writings. (Interruption)

Q: When the Diem government fell, the press carried accounts of vast joyous, spontaneous demonstrations in the streets of Saigon. How do you square that with -- if I read you right -- your belief that by and large the Vietnamese people approved of Diem?

NOLTING: It's very hard to square that. I do not believe that the majority of the Vietnamese people or even the majority of the Saigon people, who were much more volatile and inclined to take any dramatic event as a reason for celebration, were joyous over this event. On the contrary, I think the majority were shocked and it was only the hotheads stirred up by I don't know what elements, but certainly some of them were Viet Cong or Viet Cong sympathizers, who indulged in these acts. I could understand that Madame Nhu would have been a target.

Q: Why?

NOLTING: Because she was unpopular and [so was] Nhu, brother Nhu, whom some Vietnamese called Bobby Nhu, in imitation of Bobby Kennedy. The Saigonese wits would refer to him as such. I can understand that they could be targets. While I was there I never heard from any oppositionists -- with two exceptions, which I'll mention later -- words of criticism against President Diem. That is to say, I've never heard anybody accuse him of being unjust or cruel. I have heard people say that they thought some of his policies were not the best, but in terms of integrity and the reputation for honesty and trying to do good for his people, I never heard anybody say a word against him. This was not true of his brother Nhu and it was not true of the Archbishop --

Q: [Ngo Dinh] Thuc, was it? -

NOLTING: Thuc, or of Madame Nhu.

Okay. The two exceptions that I mentioned were two generals who were at our home some months before this happened. One was General Don.

Q: Tran Van Don?

NOLTING: Tran Van Don, who was a cultivated man, and General Kim.

Q: K-H-I-E-M?

NOLTING: I think they were brothers-in-law. Sitting on the sofa one evening after dinner, they lit into President Diem and said he was unworthy to be president of the country.

Q: What was the burden of their objections to him?

NOLTING: Mostly that he was incapable, and that stemmed from their feeling that he interfered too much with the military running of the country.

Q: They were unsatisfied with the way the war was going?

NOLTING: Yes. But they went beyond that in saying that this man is really, you know, he's no good. He's a bad character.

Q: Morally you mean?

NOLTING: Well, just incapable and no good and a bad political leader and so forth.

Q: So they were after his competence, not his personal--?

NOLTING: More after his competence, yes, but it was shocking to me. I said, "Gentlemen, you are my guests and I am an accredited diplomat to the government which happens to be headed by your president, who was elected." I gave them the reply which not only I but my predecessors had always given to the dissident generals. "You have a chance to run for president next time. Don't give us this stuff about revolt and supporting a revolt. Why don't you do your duty as military men? The United States is not going to get into this question of a coup d'etat." In fact, President Kennedy had promised President Diem on two occasions not to interfere in the internal affairs of South Vietnam.

Q: That reminds me of a question. There was a coup attempt in 1960 before you came in the fall of 1960. November as I recall.

NOLTING: Right.

Q: There are stories that President Diem and Mr. Nhu suspected that the CIA was involved in some capacity in that coup attempt. Do you recall anything of that nature?

NOLTING: If they suspected it at the time, I saw no evidence of it two years later. Neither of them ever brought that up. When I got there Bill Colby was the mission station chief for the CIA. He was close to Nhu -- I mean, close in the sense that they conferred often. President Diem also liked him and admired him. I certainly did. I don't think there was any hanky-panky going on behind my back in this regard. In fact, Colby was not only a friend but one of my most trusted advisers and members of our task force. He was later succeeded after about a year of my tenure by John Richardson, who was in my opinion equally trustworthy, forthright, and he also continued the connection, frequent talks with Ngo Dinh Nhu. So through those channels I never heard anything about suspicions of the CIA in connection with the 1960 coup. No, I don't remember any accusations of that sort.

Q: Fair enough. I have a question concerning the lines of authority within the U.S. Mission. Now, you testified very fully in your Kennedy Library transcripts about the cooperation which you got from General Harkins and that there was seldom if ever any conflict about jurisdiction and so on. Is it fair to say that this largely resulted from the fact that your personalities meshed very well?

NOLTING: Yes, I think so. I think the seed of conflict or noncooperation had certainly been sowed earlier on when, under the influence of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and perhaps Bob McNamara, the secretary of defense, there was issued a directive which seemed to split the mission.

Q: Was this the letter of appointment which gave General Harkins -- ?

NOLTING: It was the letter of appointment and the description of MACV.

Q: Do you know who wrote that letter?

NOLTING: I don't know, but I have a strong suspicion that it was instigated by the Joint Chiefs of Staff or by McNamara or Max Taylor. Perhaps Max Taylor. I took the issue back to Washington, not because I had any feeling of jealousy with respect to an ambassador's position but because I could see only trouble. In every joint meeting you had of the military and State Department and AID and CIA and so forth, all of us, the question of who would chair the meeting, who would write it up, who would have the right to dissent and so forth might cause trouble. I went back to Washington on this issue, talked it over, and didn't get anywhere with [Dean] Rusk. Rusk said, "Oh, forget it, Fritz. You can get along with Paul Harkins." I hadn't met Harkins at that time.

The person that backed me on this was Averell Harriman. Since we couldn't get any satisfaction vis-a-vis the Defense Department or any positive position out of the Secretary of State, Harriman and I went over and saw President Kennedy. He immediately said, "This is wrong. It has to be rewritten to make it clear that the ambassador is in overall charge." I said, "Mr. President, I hope you don't think I'm fool enough to try to run or intervene in military matters of training or logistics or anything of that sort which I don't know much about. But the problem is that there can be misunderstandings down the line, there can be emergencies in which somebody has to come up with the U.S. position." And President Kennedy said, "You're absolutely right." Max Taylor was in the room. He said, "Max, rewrite that directive and get this clear: the ambassador is in over-all charge."

Well, in about two or three weeks there came through another directive which was still fuzzy as the devil. It was a little bit in the direction of the President's decision but hadn't changed the original directive that much.

Q: But this was of no practical import as far as your and General Harkins' positions?

NOLTING: It turned out not to be, no.

Q: But it could have been?

NOLTING: It could have been, yes.

Q: Were you aware that this ever got satisfactorily worked out?

NOLTING: It never did on paper.

Q: Not during your tenure at least?

NOLTING: Not during my tenure, no. One thing I might add to that -- it might be of some interest -- was that McNamara gave me a ride back in his plane as far as Honolulu from those meetings in Washington. I remember we were sitting together having dinner on his plane, and we got on the subject again. I said, "Bob, I hope you understand what this was all about." He said in effect, "Sure I do, but let me tell you that on this one the Joint Chiefs are absolutely adamant." That's why I mentioned the chiefs. "They said no four-star general is going to be under an ambassador." And I said, "Well, it's not a question of being under anybody, it's just a question of who has the over-all responsibility. If you want to tie the can to your tail and let me out of there, that's fine with me, but I can't have the responsibility from the President and not have the authority. And I'm not going to misuse that authority with respect to military matters." Well, McNamara's quite frank, and what he said in effect was, 'Look, on this one the Joint Chiefs have got me over a barrel. I can't do anything about it.' He may have been speaking as well of Max Taylor.

(Interruption)

Q: One point I would like to clear up a little bit is that in the meetings that were taking place in September 1963 where there was so much agonizing going on, I'm not sure if you were party to all of these or not. I think you were in some of them and not in others.

NOLTING: In NSC meetings in Washington?

Q: Yes, sir. There was one famous meeting at which Rufus Phillips, among others, gave testimony and-

NOLTING: It surprised me!

Q: -- it was pretty pessimistic.

NOLTING: It surprised me very much, because Ruf Phillips was one of the most can-do members of our mission out there. He came late. He had been only six months or so out there.

Q: Of course, he had been there earlier, had he not?

NOLTING: I believe he had been there earlier, but my overlapping with him was only maybe six months or a year. He was a very, I thought, good and effective member of the AID. And his pessimistic testimony in one of these NSC meetings surprised the hell out of me. I couldn't believe my ears. Similarly John Mecklin's. I could understand John because he had been brainwashed by his roommates, David Halberstam and -- what's the other fellow's name?

Q: Neil Sheehan.

NOLTING: Neil Sheehan. And also he was discouraged and disillusioned because his wife left him out there and so forth. But I was surprised by Ruf Phillips. I've seen him since and I've asked him, and he said, "Oh, did I go that far?" and I said, "You just ruined it,"

Q: Did you ever come to a reconciliation of why he testified? You had no inkling I gather that this was coming?

NOLTING: No, I didn't.

Q: What did he say? What was the burden of his remark?

NOLTING: I can't remember fully, but I think the essence was that the economic aid was not taking hold,, the people were not getting the benefits of all this effort and money, and our side was losing the struggle.

Q: Didn't he have something to do with strategic hamlets? Wasn't he very deeply involved in that?

NOLTING: I think so, from the point of view of supplying materials, barbed wire and roofing for the houses and so forth.

Q: Did he have anything to say about that program that you recall?

NOLTING: You know, it would be reaching into my memory. I think now that you've suggested it, he did. My impression is he did say the strategic hamlet program was a failure, or words to that effect.

Q: That's pretty strong.

NOLTING: I'm not sure. You'd better get it from Ruf.

Q: All right.

To paraphrase story after story that appeared in the press and sometimes, many times perhaps, from military advisers in the field, if I can paraphrase it, why aren't our Vietnamese as good as their Vietnamese?

NOLTING: Yes.

Q: What is your reaction to that statement?

NOLTING: I think they were as good. Now, I wasn't in the battles as you were, later on, and I don't know what your opinion or others who were --

Q: My opinion is unimportant.

NOLTING: -- who had them on the flanks. That's what's important. But, you know, I think in counting them up, there were as many good battles, instances of heroic and successful military actions in which the South Vietnamese were successful, as there were debacles like Ap Bac, which we have mentioned earlier. I think, maybe I'm prejudiced on the subject, but I think it was the disastrous ones, the bad ones from our point of view, which hit the headlines, and very seldom the good ones. Or if they did, they weren't featured because, why, we expected to be winners. We didn't expect setbacks, even from our allies at a time when we were not engaged as combatants.

Q: What about the accusations that were being made that too many operations were being launched to avoid contact rather than make contact? You heard a lot of that, too.

NOLTING: I did. I don't think it was true. We mentioned earlier trying to avoid casualties, trying to avoid the killing of innocent people, while you're trying to root out the terrorists. This was a strong feeling which we promoted in the mission out there, which our government promoted through us. It was certainly shared by President Diem and members of his cabinet. In some cases, he had to reprimand his generals for attacking villages which were comme ci, comme ca with respect to their allegiance. We had to limit -- and I remember having personally to pass on this -- the weight and number of bombs to be dropped on any target. These were bombs that we had supplied the Vietnamese Air Force, mostly for their T-23s. I think they were two hundred and fifty pounders, and they could do considerable damage to a Vietnamese village, as you know. Whenever they took off on a bombing sortie, it was cleared through us as to where they were going and where they were going to drop for this very reason, that we didn't want to put the fence sitters on the side of the Viet Cong.

Q: The advisers in the field probably objected to the delays that would be attendant upon that kind of a process, wouldn't they?

NOLTING: I suppose so. I wouldn't be surprised. But I don't remember there being many delays. It wasn't a complicated process. For that matter, there weren't that many T-23s and there weren't that many bombs. But we did try, and so did the central Vietnamese government try to limit the amount of bombing. In certain cases there were free drop zones where if they were overloaded or had to get rid of their bombs they could drop them. These were wooded forest areas. This rule was put in because on several occasions in trying to get home on a little bit of gas, they'd drop bombs and sometimes they'd hit an innocent village. It was nobody's fault, but it had to be cured, and the way to cure that was to say you can only drop them in these free zones.

Q: Right. Did President Johnson ever discuss any of this, anything regarding Vietnam with you after he assumed the presidency?

NOLTING: After he assumed the presidency, I wrote President Johnson a letter or two the purport of which was to say, "Mr. President, you have inherited a situation which I regard as a political vacuum in Vietnam. That is to say I don't predict any good things for the military junta as political leaders. And if that judgment is correct, then I would hope that you would not get too close to or embrace any of the military leaders." I saw him once or twice after that, and once I recall particularly, which was at the time of General Harkins' return when we were invited by President Johnson to come for some medal that he gave Harkins.

Q: This would have been the summer of 1964, I guess.

NOLTING: Yes. I remember his saying to me then, "I had your letter and I agree with you." But what had happened in the meantime was that McNamara had gone out and given great hugs to everybody from Big [Duong Van] Minh to General [Nguyen] Khanh, and that had sort of set the pattern, it seemed to me.

One thing I'd like to ask you. Can I?

Q: Yes, sir.

NOLTING: I never understood, as much as I agreed with and admired Johnson's views with respect to Vietnam in the early days when he was vice president -- and I'm not talking about later on, because I had nothing to do with that and no inside information. But his views up to the time that he inherited the presidency I thought were good, sound, and well advised. They did not prevail with Kennedy so far as the overthrow of the Vietnam government was concerned. Kennedy went the other way, or his advisers took the bit in their teeth and went the other way, whichever way you want to put it. But anyway, Johnson was against that.

Then after the coup in Vietnam, he inherited the presidency, and a lot of things occurred which I don't understand. Not in chronological order, but the one I understand least is his reappointment of Cabot Lodge as ambassador after Lodge's first term of about eight months and his return to the Republican National Convention, in which I think he hoped to be nominated. The only explanation I have for that is that President Johnson wanted, as maybe President Kennedy wanted also, to have a good thick piece of Republican asbestos to shield him from Republican heat. Can you tell me whether that's true or not?

Q: I believe it. Yes.

NOLTING: And maybe because he thought that the man who had been instrumental in putting the generals in power could deal with them.

Q: I can't say that I can confirm that from what I have seen, but it certainly sounds plausible. (Interruption)
All right, sir, go ahead.

NOLTING: I would like it on the record that from my point of view, Vice President Johnson, both in his visit to Vietnam in early 1961 and in the other meetings that we had in 1963 in the NSC on the subject of the withdrawal of American support from the Diem government, I thought Vice President Johnson was absolutely right. I thought his judgment was sound. Like all of us, he was not completely satisfied with the way things were going in Vietnam, but he judged that it was better to keep on the course that we were on than to jump from the frying pan to the fire. And the frying pan was cooling; it was getting better rather than worse, in my opinion.

Therefore, when he inherited the political vacuum created in South Vietnam by the overthrow of the constitutional government and the immediately deteriorating situation, with the strategic hamlets beginning to be wiped out, with the province chiefs not knowing what to do, with everybody getting cross signals from the military junta, with disillusionment in particular in the countryside because of the overthrow and because of their respect for President Diem, when he inherited this mess, what I can't understand is why he didn't do something about the advisers of President Kennedy who had created it. They were principally Averell Harriman, whom he kept on, Cabot Lodge, whom he not only kept on but reappointed to the ambassadorship out there. [I can't understand] why he didn't insist that Dean Rusk get into the act earlier and have the State Department take some positive remedial steps if possible. In other words, why he carried on with the old team when it was perfectly obvious to me and from what he said to me that he didn't approve of their previous actions? This I don't understand, and this is why I could never feel in my innermost bones that we were going to be successful in Vietnam, after the coup.

It seemed to me that there was a certain poetic justice in this thing, that we had an albatross that we never shed. It would have been possible for President Johnson to say we made a mistake, we should never have done this, but now we're in it we're going to see it through. That would have been one possibility. That to me would have cleared up my doubts and misgivings and I think would have had a lot to do with American public opinion, and I know it would have had a lot to do with Vietnamese morale.

You asked a while ago about the rejoicing in the streets in Saigon after the overthrow and the assassinations. That didn't last long. There's now, or there was before Saigon became Ho Chi Minh City, a large and growing body of public opinion in South Vietnam who really venerated President Diem.

JAMES D. ROSENTHAL
Political Officer
Saigon (1961-1965)

James D. Rosenthal was born in San Francisco in 1932 and educated at Stanford. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included posts in Trinidad, Saigon and Bangui. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: When you went out to Vietnam in 1961, you were there from 1961-65 the first time around. What were you being told to be concerned about, before you went out?

ROSENTHAL: Well, as I said, I think this idea of infiltration from the North, the escalation of the conflict by the North, the way this might play in the overall Soviet push for expansion in the world -- the national war of liberation idea -- all coming to a focus in Vietnam. And that was the major focus of my work the whole time there, basically, except for some internal South Vietnamese political work.

Q: So you got out there in 1961. Could you describe in 1961 what the Embassy was like: the atmosphere, the political-economic and social atmosphere of an officer going out there at that time?

ROSENTHAL: The Embassy political section was about 8 officers. There was also a large CIA station. There was a lot of concern about the stability of the Diem regime. That was a primary concern, because in December of 1960, there had been an attempted coup, which had failed. Then there was another one in 1961, when I was there, that failed. Then of course, in 1963 a coup ultimately succeeded, and threw him out. So that was a major concern. The other major concern was how well the South Vietnamese were doing in building and maintaining security in the countryside. And that eventually became the major focus of my activity.

Q: Who was the Ambassador when you got out there?

ROSENTHAL: Fritz Nolting. He was replaced by Henry Cabot Lodge later.

Q: What was your impression of Nolting while you were there?

ROSENTHAL: He was a very solid, very qualified man. I admired him very much. He was the first Ambassador I'd ever worked for, but a real gentleman, and a very intelligent and fair-minded man. I'm still an admirer of him.

Q: Who was the DCM at the time?

ROSENTHAL: I can't remember who it was when I got there, to tell you the truth. A little later it was William Trueheart.

Q: What was the impression of how Nolting viewed the situation in Vietnam?

ROSENTHAL: I think he viewed it fairly pragmatically. He was a very pragmatic man; he wasn't ideologically inclined or extreme one way or the other. I think it was pretty clear that he felt that our policy of supporting Diem was the right one. And he even, later on, in 1963, when Diem got into trouble, felt that we had no other alternative, but to continue to support Diem. There were those in the Embassy who didn't agree with that, who felt that the political situation under Diem was deteriorating, and that this would harm the war effort. At times I was tempted by that view, but I think I never came around to it. Because my impression, after traveling in the countryside and seeing how the war was going -- and that was my major job -- was that the war was not going that badly. There was political instability just in the capital. But outside the capital, stability was relatively good. I thought that by early 1963, anyway, the South Vietnamese were actually doing fairly well in the countryside.

Q: Who was the head of the political section while you were there?

ROSENTHAL: It started out with Joe Mendenhall. Then a year or a year and a half later it became Mel Manfull.

Q: Were you immediately given this assignment of the countryside?

ROSENTHAL: That wasn't immediate. My first assignment was to do up a summary, or an overall survey, of the security situation generally in the country, which I did. And then I began to travel outside Saigon a bit. And then, the next year, in early 1962, three of us Vietnamese language officers formed into what we called a provincial reporting unit of the embassy political section. I was in charge of it. And we each took an area of the country, and traveled continually in that area. We came back and did reports on various areas. We were all Vietnamese language speakers, so we got out on a fairly broad basis.

Q: When you arrived in the political section, what were the relations with the CIA station, as far as how they looked at things. What were they reporting -- did you get any feel for how the two of you -- was it a little different?

ROSENTHAL: When I first got there, and for a year and a half afterward, I didn't feel any particular difference in the way we were reporting things. In fact, we were fairly close with a lot of the CIA officers. We even shared sources and contacts. It was a pretty close relationship.

Q: How about this idea of getting rid of Diem? When you initially got there...

ROSENTHAL: When I initially got there, I don't think that feeling was terribly strong. There were always a few people who thought our policy ought to be different, but my feeling was that that was not an overriding concern. It was more trying to make Diem perform and liberalize politically, because they had had this one coup, and then shortly afterward another coup attempt. Many people felt that he needed to broaden his government to prevent that from happening again. But the idea of getting rid of him -- I don't think it really became widespread, or maybe not even thought of at that time, early on. It was only when he had hit the Buddhist crisis of 1963 that positions changed.

Q: Was that really because of his actions, or was it because in Washington they didn't like the pictures of Buddhists burning themselves?

ROSENTHAL: It was probably both. But I think the perspective as seen from Washington was very important. The reporting of the press corps at that time was very important. What became increasingly divergent, to me, was the deterioration of the political situation in Saigon, which didn't affect the countryside or the war effort at all, as far as I could see when I went out there.

Q: At that time there were military areas in Vietnam. You say you had different areas to go to. Which one did you have?

ROSENTHAL: The Mekong Delta was my major beat. But I also covered northwest of Saigon, the old Iron Triangle area.

Q: So you had the southern area?

ROSENTHAL: Yes, but I also knew a fair amount about the northern area, because from November 1962 to about March-April, 1963, I acted as Consul in Hue, when John Helble was on an extended leave. So I covered his 6-8 provinces up in the North, at that time fairly extensively. So I knew those, and I knew the South. There was an area kind of in between that I wasn't so familiar with, but those two areas I knew.

Q: Can you talk a bit about how you got around and what you were seeing in the early periods while you were there?

ROSENTHAL: To go to the Mekong Delta, you could drive. In fact I did. I drove fairly frequently down to My Tho, down to Can Tho. You could also get military aircraft relatively easily. You could arrange it through the military attaché. There were also aircraft run by Air America, run by the station. We would hop on those. But transportation really wasn't much of a problem. Even later it wasn't much of a problem. It became a little more military, and of course to go longer distances, into war zones, you had to have military aircraft. But you could drive a fair amount.

Q: Even in 1970, I drove from Saigon to My Tho. You would go out to the Delta or something -- could you give me a typical trip, and what sort of things you were seeing, and how you worked?

ROSENTHAL: You would first go to the Province chief and meet him. You would ask him how things were going; talk over various areas -- "This area, how secure is it, what are your problems," etc. Then generally you would go down to the district level and talk to the district chiefs. They would generally take you on a tour of wherever you really wanted to go or wherever they thought you should go. You would look, at that time, at strategic hamlets. I looked at hundreds and hundreds of them. You would go to smaller villages or smaller towns and go in the marketplace and see what was doing in the market area, for the economic situation. You would talk to peasants or to soldiers, ask them how life was. Also to civil servants and village officials. So each trip would be to a province, and would take anywhere from 3-6 days. Then you would come back and spend a week or so writing a report on it, and then study up for the next one. I would also speak a lot to the American military.

Q: Was the American military pretty well distributed throughout there?

ROSENTHAL: There was already an extensive advisory system in place by that time.

Q: What was your impression of the officers assigned to that?

ROSENTHAL: Most of them were pretty good. The ones I knew in the Delta were rather good. And that's particularly true in those early years. For some reason, maybe a little later, it became more of a ticket-punching type of thing. But in the early days, I don't think it was that way at all.

Q: They were probably getting more enthusiastic -- this was something exotic and a way to get out and see a real war.

ROSENTHAL: Right. And the other thing is that there were no U.S. combat units in the country at that time. The main effort was an advisory effort. Therefore, the best officers wanted to go there. Once the combat troops arrived, then the best officers generally want to go into combat units for a lot of reasons, but I understand it. So in the early days, 1961-65, I thought the advisory group was pretty good, pretty talented.

Q: Did you run across John Paul Vann?

ROSENTHAL: I did.

Q: What was your impression of him?

ROSENTHAL: That's a good question. I did not share the great admiration that some people, particularly the press corps, shared for him. He was a very good man, a good officer. Very enthusiastic and patriotic, and effective in many ways. But I think he tended to look at his situation as the microcosm of the war. And I don't believe it was. In fact, I don't think the Mekong Delta, as a whole, was strategic. I think that there was a lot of activity going on there, but the level of activity that went on in the Mekong Delta could have gone on for twenty years.

Q: It essentially almost did. It never was the critical point.

ROSENTHAL: No, it was always the highlands and the northern part of South Vietnam. And when I knew him, John Paul Vann didn't know anything about that area at all, and looked upon ARVN performance and ARVN activities and South Vietnamese capabilities in the Delta as how the war was going. And because it was so easy to drive down to My Tho, as you know, the correspondents would just get in their jeeps and go on down there, and talk to John Paul Vann to find out how The War was going. Well, the war wasn't wholly in the Mekong Delta, or even primarily in the Mekong Delta. But they would come back and report what John Vann told them about the war. And I didn't agree with that. I'd had enough experience elsewhere in the country to know that the Delta, although important, was not decisive. So I tended to take some of the things he said with a grain of salt. I didn't have a lot of contact with him. I met him several times and talked with him, but I didn't become an intimate of his, or anything like that. So I didn't share his perception, his view, of the war. And I think, actually, that he in some ways did a disservice. I don't think intentionally, but I think by focusing attention on his area, and perhaps diverting it from other, more important areas, he might have given a somewhat misleading impression of how the war was going. And certainly the correspondents gave a misleading impression of how the war was going.

Q: What was your impression of the newspaper corps at that time?

ROSENTHAL: Early on, I thought that the individuals were pretty good. I'm trying to think of the names. The first one I came in contact with for the New York Times was Homer Bigart. I didn't like him. I thought he was an opinionated, arrogant, old cuss, who I'm sure had great credentials as a combat correspondent in Korea and World War II. But he was very perverse. Everything that was going badly he would report -- it seemed to me, anyway -- and everything that was going well was just not reportable. There was also this idea in 1962, and it became a big thing with the media, that the U.S. was deceiving everybody by not admitting that more advisors were in there than were called for in the Geneva Accords, and so on and so forth. That's probably true. But it wasn't the major story, but they made it the major story. They focused a lot on that. I think that's really where some of the sour attitude toward the military and vice versa -- between the military and the press -- began. Or the government and the press began. And Bigart was one of those guys. And then he was followed by a fellow named Peter Grose, who was very good. I liked him. He was a younger guy, and I thought he was much more open-minded. And then I think David Halberstam came next for the New York Times. And he was really opinionated. I didn't care for him too much, and I thought he became personally involved in the story. He and others like him. Even during the Buddhist crisis, when Diem really got into a lot of trouble, and of course the correspondents were reporting that and even magnifying it, taking pictures of Buddhists burning themselves in the street. I think they sort of took a personal stake in the story, which was that you had to get rid of Diem. And eventually that happened, without any idea of what was to follow. So I was not an admirer of the press corps. And I occasionally expressed that to some of the people, like Barry Zorthian, who was the PAO at the time, and others, like John Mecklin. I thought they were not doing a great job of covering the overall thing. And, it got worse later on. I think the press corps in Vietnam did a terrible job. I'm one of those dinosaurs that think that the press played a great role of doing us in in Vietnam.

Q: They seemed to get some very immature types. I remember I was Consul General there from 1969-70, having to go to the police station around the corner from the Embassy in order to get out some pressmen. There had been a riot, and they had pinned on the badge of the rioters, with black arm bands, and were helping throw stones at the police. And they were indignant as all hell when they got arrested. I wasn't very enthusiastic about trying to get them out.

ROSENTHAL: You should have let them stew awhile.

Q: Let's say I walked slowly.

ROSENTHAL: Good, I'm glad you did that, because most of them deserved it then. It was a terrible, terrible press corps.

Q: It reminded me a great deal of grad students who all of a sudden have the Holy Truth, and nobody else does.

ROSENTHAL: I think that was true from about early 1963 on. And then it got worse.

Q: Tell me about going up to the Hue area, when you would take over when John Helble wasn't there.

ROSENTHAL: Well, it was pretty quiet at that time. Hue was quiet. It later became the focal point of the Buddhist protests. But at that time it was very quiet. Hue was secure, quite secure. It was run by Diem's brother, Ngo Dinh Can, who ran the northern provinces with an iron hand. I think strategic hamlets were a great success in that area, because Can really organized them. Not just physically, but politically. He had his agents everywhere, and they really organized those people. The strategic hamlet concept in the Delta was weaker because of the dispersed nature of the population. But in central Vietnam, the population did live in more concentrated groups, and you could organize them, defend them, and maintain political influence a lot easier. And he did. The proof of the pudding is that when Diem fell, of course Can himself fell. And the security in those areas deteriorated sharply, immediately, because that political influence, which Can provided, was no longer there.

Q: As you went around and sampled, were you getting any feel -- I'm talking about events before early 1963 -- were you able to talk to some of the Buddhist leaders?

ROSENTHAL: No, none.

Q: Why?

ROSENTHAL: They were not active, and they didn't seem to be a factor. They weren't attempting to contact anybody, and we didn't attempt to contact them. Particularly in Hue it wasn't the thing to do. But security was fairly good. I actually drove up to Quang Tri, and then over on Highway 9 up along the DMZ, Khe Sanh, and then to Laos, alone, without an escort at that time. I did it twice, I think. And then I could drive down the coast. I couldn't go all the way to Quang Ngai, because there was a stretch there that wasn't very good.

Q: This was the "Street Without Joy"?

ROSENTHAL: Yes, that area was still pretty bad. Quang Ngai, Quang Nam. But otherwise, I could get around very well, and talk to people reasonably well.

Q: Did you get any feel for the type of people the central government was sending out, first at the higher levels as the province leaders, and then maybe the district. Were these political appointees? Who were the people you were seeing?

ROSENTHAL: Well, in the Delta, my impression was that they were not necessarily political appointees. Now, that doesn't mean that they weren't politically connected, but they all were military officers. I thought they were pretty good, as a group. Particularly among the South Vietnamese, I thought they were as good an officer as you could find generally in South Vietnamese ranks, and fairly politically astute. They ran the thing reasonably well. Some were better than others. When you got up north, it was pretty clear that political connections were more important. That didn't mean they weren't capable. But they were clearly Can's men. Not Diem's men necessarily. They were, I think, stronger political leaders in the sense of organizing and maintaining control of the population.

Q: What were you getting from your contacts on the American side, and then on the Vietnamese side, about Can?

ROSENTHAL: Well, he was very reclusive. I never met him. In fact, I don't think that Helble did in several years there until the very end, when Can requested asylum. He was a very shadowy figure, but greatly feared. So I didn't have any personal impression of him at all. But there was no question that everything ran back to him in the Hue area, in the northern 6 or 8 provinces. He had a very tight control, and he was a very tough guy. He ran it in a pretty tough way. He didn't brook any opposition.

Q: If we were seeing problems up there, what was the standard? You would tell the Ambassador, the Ambassador would tell Diem, in hopes that he would pass it on? Or did we even operate in that manner?

ROSENTHAL: During the time I was there, the Consulate reported directly to Washington, as well as to the Embassy. And the Ambassador visited fairly frequently, or John, or in some cases, me, we'd go down to Saigon every month or two, and report. I think the problems we were reporting were more military and security related problems, rather than political problems, at least in my case. John was there longer, so he probably reported more political problems. But my major focus was on the security situation, which I thought was not too bad, with the exception of a few areas. So, I would report on areas that had problems, or why they had problems, and so on. But I never had any feeling that I was being short stopped or anything. My reports were going direct to the Department, as well as to the Embassy. Nobody ever said stop, or change it, or whatever.

Q: Cabot Lodge came in 1963. What was the impression when he arrived? Did he come with a different approach?

ROSENTHAL: There was no question about that. I think I was on home leave when Cabot Lodge actually arrived, if I'm not mistaken. Anyway, it was right around that time. I'd just done two years, and he arrived about that time. By that time, of course, the political situation had deteriorated in Saigon. We had Buddhist monks in the Embassy, who took asylum after the Pagoda raids, and all this. Lodge arrived just after that. It was clear that he carried no brief for Diem at all. But you know, those first couple of months, he didn't really confide in the Embassy very much. He brought his own staff with him, almost like confidential assistants. I think he confided in them, and maybe a couple of the senior officers of the Embassy. For a couple of months he played his cards pretty close to his chest, almost until the coup actually occurred. But at some point, and I don't remember exactly when it was, it was as if Lodge had suddenly decided that the political section was okay and then he kind of opened up to us rather well. So I had a mixed impression of Lodge. I like him, actually. I thought he was a good man. He listened a lot, no matter what you had to say, once he understood you were on his side, a friend, or at least could be trusted.

Q: It sounds like almost the normal thing that goes on with political appointees as Ambassadors anywhere. They sort of come in, highly suspicious of the Foreign Service. You spend a long wasted bit of time, while they get to feel comfortable.

ROSENTHAL: I think that's exactly right. And of course this time there was also a considerable difference with the station. I mean, there were people in the station, including the station chief, who had close contact with Ngo Dinh Nhu, and felt that the policy that Lodge was perceived to be bringing with him was not the one that should be followed.

Q: What was the policy difference as you saw it from the Embassy?

ROSENTHAL: Well, when he first came in -- I can't say that I saw that he was there to overthrow Diem. I honestly can't say that. Now, maybe others could say that, but I couldn't say that. I was a junior officer; I didn't know that. But that was fairly clear as you got toward that point, after the Pagoda raids, and after Lodge's taking in these Buddhist monks and some of the meetings he had with Diem. It became fairly clear that this was pretty much the path that everyone was going down. I must say, that I thought by that time, probably that was the right thing to do. As it turned out, I was wrong -- I feel now that I was wrong. But at the time, I was on board.

Q: Maybe you were gone part of the time, but could you give a feel -- it was the Buddhist movement that really changed things, wasn't it? How did that hit the Embassy, particularly the political section? What were we seeing behind this as it developed?

ROSENTHAL: It hit the political section fairly hard, in that we had been reporting that there was a lot of political discontent, as there was. There was no question about that. But we never thought it would come from the Buddhists, at least not in the political section. It just was an unexpected quarter from which to have gotten political opposition. We were rather taken aback -- I was, certainly, with the violence of their protests, burning themselves, conducting demonstrations, and so on. So I think it was somewhat of a shock.

Q: Were we looking for who was behind this, or were we trying to see if this was a North Vietnamese plot?

ROSENTHAL: Yes, there was that feeling that it might be that. I don't think it was accepted as the reason, but I think we felt that the communists would certainly take advantage of it, as they did. I don't think there was a prevalent feeling -- I don't recall, anyway -- that it was a conscious North Vietnamese plot. I think it was more an opportunity for them, than a circumstance they created.

Q: Where was the station coming out? Was there a divergence?

ROSENTHAL: Yes, I think the station was probably more concerned and focused more on the undermining of the security situation that the Buddhists represented. Not just the political situation, but the security situation generally. I think they were slightly more inclined to see communists behind it, or at least encouraging it. So there might have been somewhat of a difference there, but I don't think it was that sharp. I don't recall it being that sharp. I think everybody agreed that this was, at least primarily, or at least in a significant way, a self-generated thing, generated by Diem's intransigence on certain issues, but also by Diem's favoring of the Catholics.

Q: What was the root cause, as you saw it, for this flare up?

ROSENTHAL: I think basically the Buddhists, after a long period -- one could even say centuries -- of political impotence and political inactivity, noninvolvement, began, like the rest of South Vietnamese society, to be caught up in politics. I think they also had a longstanding, particularly in Hue, grievance against the authorities, who were dominated by Catholics like Can, and his brother, Thuc, who was the Archbishop of Hue. They felt that Catholics were favored, and they probably were favored. At the same time, a new generation of Buddhist leaders, Buddhist monks, had come into being. I think those Buddhist leaders, in addition to responding to these grievances, and then Diem's rather clumsy reaction against them -- I think that they felt that they could be the cutting edge of a Buddhist renaissance. I think they really had great ambitions of leading a Buddhist Renaissance in that part of the world, and certainly in Vietnam. They were dead wrong, because they didn't have the power, unity, or ability to do it. But at that time, I think they felt that. As a matter of fact, we in the U.S. government felt that that was a possibility too. After Diem fell, we began to look into that, and to see if we could encourage it, to enlist the Buddhists against the communists.

Q: In the political section, while the turmoil was going on -- this is before the overthrow of Diem -- you had Buddhists coming in asking for asylum. Was the political section getting involved in who are the Buddhists, where are they coming from, and all?

ROSENTHAL: By that time everybody was involved in it. The political section, the station, everybody. When the three Buddhist monks, including Tri Quang, the major Buddhist leader, took refuge in the embassy, I was assigned to talk to him, debrief him, and see to his comforts. At the same time, a station officer also did the same thing. But we collaborated. We would talk to each other first, and decide who did what.

Q: What was your impression of Tri Quang? He was a leader whose face was everywhere in the States at the time.

ROSENTHAL: Well, he was a very charismatic leader, very forceful, very intelligent. I think his ambitions exceeded his grasp. As I say, he's really the ideological force behind the Buddhist uprising, and the Buddhist resurgence, such as it was. I think he felt so strongly about that, that he and his colleagues represented this resurgent Buddhism, that he carried it too far, and ultimately caused the downfall of the Buddhist political movement. He went too far, too fast, and tried to do too much. The movement was not ready for it.

Q: Were we trying to tell him to stop this immolation of monks?

ROSENTHAL: Before Diem fell?

Q: Yes.

ROSENTHAL: I don't recall that we did that. But I'm not sure that he would have had any way of doing it. He really was isolated in the Embassy. And while we gave him asylum, we were not about to let him operate a political movement outside of the Embassy. So we kept him isolated from his followers. So I'm not sure that we did that. Later, of course, we did it all the time. We tried to keep him from doing all kinds of things.

Q: Did you feel that he was approachable, or was he a man who was living in his own world?

ROSENTHAL: He was very approachable -- to me and to a few others that he trusted. I became the contact for Tri Quang, and basically for the Buddhists. Not out of any skill or anything, but I just happened to be there. Over the following two years, after the fall of Diem, I saw Tri Quang maybe 150 times, maybe more. I could literally go, anytime of the day or night, right up to his door in the Pagoda, and knock on it, and he would let me in. And he also came to my house several times, particularly a couple of times during coup attempts. So I would say I had total contact with him. I'm not sure how much good it did, but he was very approachable, and he wanted to use us for his own purposes.

Q: Did he understand the United States?

ROSENTHAL: No, not very much.

Q: He did understand the power of the press, though.

ROSENTHAL: Absolutely.

Q: Because basically, this was his great strength, or one of them.

ROSENTHAL: And he had some younger monks who also understood it pretty well. He had some help. They were very good. But of course, the press was very receptive to this kind of thing too. It wasn't a difficult thing to enlist the American press in a burning bonze. In fact it became a Pulitzer Prize photo. I don't think it took a whole lot of skill to do that. But later, after the fall of Diem, we hoped that Tri Quang and his movement would rally to the noncommunist side and provide a foundation of support, or additional support. As it turned out, I think they simply weakened it, because they kept opposing every government that came in for one reason or another -- even the ones that they suggested. Like Phan Huy Quat, for example, sometime in 1964. He suggested Quat, and said he was a good man. So Quat became Prime Minister, and within a couple of weeks, Tri Quang was against him. He was insatiable in terms of demands, and I think ultimately weakened the movement.

Q: Can you talk a bit of your experiences at the time leading up to the overthrow of Diem? Were you in Saigon most of this time?

ROSENTHAL: As a matter of fact, most of that time I was out of Saigon. I was traveling in the countryside. And that's why I say I tended to favor the view that the war in the countryside wasn't affected by the political turmoil in Saigon. Whereas there were others who were saying that the political turmoil in Saigon must be affecting the war. There is this famous trip that Marine General Krulak and Mendenhall took, and they came back with totally opposite views of what was going on. They were both absolutely right.

Q: This is when Kennedy said, "Are you sure you went to the same country?"

ROSENTHAL: Right. Well, they did go to the same country, but they saw totally different aspects of it.

Q: The military man was going out into the countryside, and Mendenhall was going to Saigon.

ROSENTHAL: And I had kind of the same experience, in my own little way, because I lived in Saigon, of course, and spent a fair amount of time there as well. But I wasn't at that time involved with the political opposition. There were other officers who did that. I stayed away from that, because I wanted to focus on the countryside. Then I got pulled into it when the Buddhists came to the Embassy. Then I began to get pulled into it, but only on the Buddhist side. I didn't really get to know the VNQDD or the Dai Viets, or people like that. At that time I was not involved with them. Later I became somewhat involved, but not at that time. So I was focused primarily on the countryside.

Q: In the countryside, were you finding, not political movement, but almost tribal movements -- was there a lot of divisiveness out in the countryside, or were people thinking pretty much as South Vietnamese.

ROSENTHAL: That's a good question. I don't know the answer precisely. I never detected any great love for the north. Maybe they just didn't express. But I don't think there was much, and to this day I don't think there is much. The Delta, as you know, is made up of the Hoa Hao, and ethnic Cambodians, as well as ethnic Vietnamese of other stripes. So there were those movements, and there were those communities that certainly, while having no great loyalty to Saigon, certainly had no affinity for Hanoi. But the Delta again, as you know, is a rather mixed bag of people and communities. But I didn't detect any great separatist or hostile movements out there. They might not have had much enthusiasm for the government. The Hoa Hao, for example, I think had come back into the fold pretty much by that time.

Q: What would you call them?

ROSENTHAL: Sort of a religious sect, but even that was split into several different ways. The Caodai were a little farther north and to the west, again another religious sect. They had been crushed by Diem, of course, in the mid to late 1950s. By the time I got there, I thought they were pretty much at least neutral, if not on the government side. And the Hoa Hao certainly had no brief for the communists at all. In fact, the communists had a hard time in the Hoa Hao areas. They also had a hard time in the ethnic Cambodian area. The Caodai, I'm not so sure. I think they probably didn't do so badly there. So I didn't detect a lot of deep divisions in those areas. Not in the south, anyway. Now, in the northern part of South Vietnam, there were political divisions. Those places tended to be hotbeds of the VNQDD and Dai Viet in the French period and in the immediate post-Geneva period. They, of course, were deeply divided, not only between themselves, but against Can, against the Diem regime. So there was that political division.

Q: What about corruption during this time? Was this a major concern?

ROSENTHAL: Sure. I think it always has been in Vietnam. I got a little different view of corruption when I was talking to a district chief. I got to know him pretty well. I said, "You know, there are all kinds of rumors that you have phantom people on your payroll." He said, "Yes, you're right. I get the money for my civil guard, who have been killed and are no longer on my rolls. I give it to the widows, because there are no benefits here. You want to call that corruption, okay, go ahead." Now I don't know how true that was, but it gave me a little perspective that I hadn't really thought about before. In a system that doesn't provide certain things, maybe what we call corruption is the only way to get it. I'm not excusing a lot of corruption -- there were a lot of corrupt types. But I didn't see lavish displays of it, during the Diem period anyway. I was in Hue for a while, and the officials there didn't live lavishly or ostentatiously. The only area in Hue where it was relatively ostentatious, was with the new cathedral and Catholics. They were ostentatious in their display of religious power. I think that was one of the forces behind the Buddhist uprising. But otherwise, I don't recall having the impression of blatant corruption, like you see in many other parts of the world. Or as I saw later in Vietnam.

Q: The overthrow of Diem was in early November.

ROSENTHAL: November 1, 1963.

Q: Where were you when this happened?

ROSENTHAL: I was in Saigon.

Q: What did you do that day, more or less?

ROSENTHAL: That day, my wife had just had a baby a couple of days earlier. I was at the hospital around noon on November 1st. I heard shooting. My wife said, "What was that?" I said, "It must just be practice." She said, "No, it sounds like more than practice to me." And she was right. So I went back to the Embassy, and didn't see her for another couple of days. When I got back to the Embassy, they said that a coup had started. I went out into the streets to see what was doing. I happened to come across what I think were coup-side soldiers. They were firing at some tanks coming down the street, and so on. So I reported back to the Embassy about that all through the afternoon. Then I went back to the Embassy at night. They were still fighting at night. Early in the morning I went out again into the streets, and I actually went into the palace with the marines that took it. I was there when they were sort of looting it a little bit, taking Diem's possessions and laughing about it, and so on. But I actually went in with them. That clearly was the end for Diem. I didn't know anything about what happened to Diem. I was not involved in that part of it. Actually, a funny thing happened to me. Being part of this provincial-reporting unit, we were exempt from being duty officers, because we were out so often. But my name got put on the roster by mistake, about a week before. I said to the administrative officer, "I'm not supposed to be on it." He said, "Rather than changing it, why don't you just take it this time, and we'll find somebody else later." It just so happened that was the date of the coup. So I was duty officer for Lodge that day. So I saw all of the telegrams that were going out, and I was there for about 48 hours.

Q: What was the reaction of Lodge and his support unit?

ROSENTHAL: Lodge was not an easy man to read. He didn't express his emotions very much, and he didn't confide in me -- not very much, anyway. He seemed very businesslike and matter of fact, and he wasn't at all emotionally involved. There wasn't an emotional reaction. I was not privy to his supposed conversation with Diem at critical times. One thing I was privy to, however, was something that is an image I've had my whole life since then. There was a CIA guy, Lou Conein, who was a liaison officer with the coup leaders. He was going to bring the coup leaders to the embassy, and he did. And Lodge -- I don't know if you know the old embassy, but it was a 7-story building and it had an elevator. Lodge sent me down to be there when they arrived, because I was the duty officer. I'll never forget the sight. This car pulled up to the Embassy and the cameras were grinding away. Conein hops out of the front seat, opens the back door, and salutes, and these guys come on out. As if he was delivering them to the Embassy, which he was. I just went up with them in the elevator, and Lodge greeted them. I wasn't in on the meeting. I was shocked. The whole image of this fellow Conein, who I knew and thought was really a good man, and that was his duty. But just the idea. If anything, it seems to me, Lodge should have waited and gone to see them. Here were the guys who had just carried out a coup, killed the chief of state, and then they walk up to the embassy, as if to say, "Hey, boss, we did a good job, didn't we?" It's an image that I still carry. It doesn't leave me. I don't know what it represents.

Q: What was the feeling in the political section when this happened. Relief? Shock? Concern?

ROSENTHAL: The feeling was relief. Because by that time, everybody was clearly feeling that we couldn't win with Diem. And I don't recall many people saying the opposite, or saying anything by that time. It had just gotten to that point. I think we clearly felt it would be better for the war effort, and we were clearly wrong. The feeling was, I think, at least among the political section, that nothing could be worse than Diem. And as a matter of fact, everything was worse than Diem, as it turned out. And of course, when Diem was killed, that was a shock. It was a shock to Lodge, and it was a shock to everybody in the Embassy. I think we felt -- I didn't know -- but I think that Lodge felt he could get Diem out of the country, into exile. But that didn't happen.

Q: What was the feeling about the assassination of Diem and his brother? What was behind it?

ROSENTHAL: Nobody knew at the time. And to this day I think there are still a lot of questions about it. But there was this shock, from Lodge on down. I think there were some people -- I'm not sure I would count myself among them -- but there were a few people who said this is a terrible mistake. This really undoes a lot of what was accomplished by the overthrow. And that was correct, too. Because what it meant was all those people who were pro-Diem were immediately fearful. And their fears were somewhat justified. Some of their homes were looted that day, and some of the newspapers that had been published under Diem were broken into and vandalized, and so on. There were anti-Diem mobs in the street. So I think there was some justifiable concern. And when Diem and Nhu were obviously murdered -- not just killed in action but murdered -- that created a division that never did heal. Whereas if they had lived, it might not have been so deep. But that was a mistake, and there was shock at that, and real concern. But it just shows you, you can't control everything when you set these things in motion.

Q: Did you have the feeling that American presence was such that we could kind of control things and handle matters, rather than sitting back -- we were pulling levers and doing things? Was this the general feeling in the Embassy?

ROSENTHAL: I'm not sure that was the general feeling in the Embassy. I think it was the feeling in Washington. I've talked to people since who were in Washington who felt that way. But I don't think those of us in Saigon felt that way that much. We obviously had a great influence, but I don't think we felt we were really running things. But I think Washington did.

Q: After the coup, from winter of 1963 on, what were you doing, and how did you and the political section deal with the situation?

ROSENTHAL: Well, first of all, I immediately went back out to the countryside, because my task was to see what was happening as a result of the coup. And I spent the next couple of months doing that, to see what deterioration there had been. And there was some. I think I was covering the Delta and northwest of Saigon at that time. Lyall Breckon was covering another area and Dave Engel was covering the highlands. I was covering the Delta. And there was deterioration there. But again, the Delta wasn't strategic. And then, of course, since I had become a great confidante of Tri Quang, whenever I was back in Saigon, my job was to keep in contact with him, and to see what he was up to, and to push our preferences, desires, and views on him.

Q: Tri Quang -- how did he react to this? Did he feel that this was justified, that he was in charge?

ROSENTHAL: He felt that it was justified. Tri Quang was an interesting character, in that he was a basically irresponsible person. A good leader, but he would go up to the point of creating a situation and then step back from it. His immediate reaction was "well, I'm not involved in politics. We, the Buddhists, are not involved in politics." Which was total baloney. So I think that was sort of his initial reaction. He was happy that it happened. But one could then go and say, what do you want to do now? And he would say, "Who, me? I'm not involved in politics." And that was a theme that recurred for the next several years. Whenever you would get him to say he was for a particular government that came in, he would get to a point and then his support would just fade away. Or he would just not get involved at all. He was very good at negative politics, but had no concept of positive politics. There were some who later said that it must be that he's being manipulated by the other side, just to keep things stirred up, in order to weaken the South Vietnamese. He did keep things stirred up, and it did weaken the South Vietnamese. I personally don't believe that it was at the instigation of the communists. I don't believe that he was in their thrall. But he had his own agenda. He had this basic irresponsible trait, where you couldn't count on him to support anything. You could always count on him to oppose a lot of people, but you couldn't count on him to support anybody. So I was constantly trying to get him to do this and that and the other thing. Of course, he was trying to get me to do things too, or the Embassy or the U.S. government to do things. I sometimes saw him two or three times a day during crisis times. So we had very good contact, but not necessarily very good agreement.

Q: When you went out to the field, did you find the South Vietnamese military commanders looking over their shoulder, with concern about what was happening?

ROSENTHAL: Absolutely. You could almost tell that the political impetus had gone out of every program there was, including the strategic hamlet program. Before Diem fell, it used to be that the district chief and the province chief were politically motivated to do well, just like any administration has its own imperatives from the demands of its people. There was none later on, because there was so much turmoil in Saigon, the people in the field didn't know who was in charge, who to report to, who to be loyal to, what program was the one they were supposed to carry out. And that was very evident for the next couple of years.

Q: Was the Viet Cong taking advantage of this situation?

ROSENTHAL: Yes. They took advantage of it to demolish a number of strategic hamlets in the Delta, where I was. But they really took advantage in the northern part of South Vietnam, where there the political impetus just collapsed completely, and there was nobody giving any orders, and the Viet Cong did make major inroads, which they never gave up.

Q: When you went back to Saigon, did you find the political section preoccupied with trying to figure out which group of generals was doing what?

ROSENTHAL: Absolutely. That was the major preoccupation. And we all sort of tried to get that going. My specialty happened to be the Buddhists, but I also met with others. Everybody in the political section was devoted to that task, trying to patch together and keep together a South Vietnamese government that could conduct the war.

Q: Were there any promising signs?

ROSENTHAL: Not that first year, after Diem fell.

Q: In the political section, it sounds like a rather discouraged group of Foreign Service officers.

ROSENTHAL: No, I don't believe that's true. It was an unusual group of people. Many of us are still very close friends, with a kind of special bond.

Q: Who are some of them?

ROSENTHAL: Bob Miller, John Helble, Chuck Flowerree, Mel Levine, Mel Manfull, John Burke, Dick Smyser, Lyall Breckon, Dave Engel, John Negrofonte, Walt Lundy. I'm probably forgetting some right now, but people like that. A very highly motivated and effective group. I thought it was the greatest group I ever worked with. And there wasn't this great demoralization or feeling that everything was going to hell in a hand basket. I think there was still the feeling that we would prevail. We all worked very hard. It was an excellent and unusually good group. I don't think that they were emotionally involved in the situation.

Q: It was more a professional challenge, rather than our side lost.

ROSENTHAL: None of the latter at all. There was a lot of debate as to whether we should have done this, that, or the other thing. And we all lived it very actively. But I never detected any defeatism or demoralization. Quite the contrary. Like you say, it seemed to be a challenge, and everybody responded.

Q: What were you getting from the officers in the political section who were getting out to the various South Vietnamese military leaders who were taking charge and then departing? It was called a revolving door, at that time.

ROSENTHAL: A lot of that was done by the station or the MAAG group. Because they were the ones that had contact with General Khanh, Ky, Thieu, or whoever. And the political counselor, Mel Manfull, had some contact as well. But I was not involved at all in that, and I don't recall any of my immediate colleagues who were. I think it was at a higher level, and focused more on the station and military, as they were military people.

Q: When you went out to the provinces and the districts, were the South Vietnamese province and district chiefs coming to you and saying, "Jim what's happening out there?"

ROSENTHAL: Sometimes they would ask. My impression was that we were always welcome. I never encountered anyone who was really negative about us being there, before or after Diem.

Q: Nobody was saying, "Boy, you guys did it."

ROSENTHAL: No, not to me, anyway. Yes, you're quite right, they would ask what was going on. And they were eager to receive us, to find out who was doing what to whom in Saigon, because they didn't know. That was kind of fun, because you became an informant as well as a reporter. It was often pretty good relationships.

Q: Did you sense a change during this post-Diem period, in both the press, which you have already alluded to, but also in Congress and American feeling toward Vietnam?

ROSENTHAL: I didn't feel anything about Congress and the American people. I didn't really have any concept of that at the time. The press, as I said, got worse. With every twist and turn of South Vietnamese politics, with the Buddhists, or the Catholics, or one faction or another coming up and trying to take power, or doing something. The press would just focus on all those things in a relatively negative way. They would pick up easy stories in Saigon. Then, of course, by the time American troops started to arrive, they would go out with American troops, and they would talk to the G.I. in the foxhole and say how's the war going? And every G.I. in every foxhole in every war has said, "This war is really screwed up." And for him, it probably is. But you have to step back and say, "what's the perspective?" I thought the press did a terrible job on that. And it did the same thing with the politics in Saigon. They liked to focus on the crise du jour.

Q: It's not much different today in Washington.

ROSENTHAL: But it was very bad then, and it got worse, as a lot of these media adventurers started coming in.

Q: You left when in 1965?

ROSENTHAL: I left in July of 1965.

Q: You said your wife had a baby there. What was family life like?

ROSENTHAL: It was pretty good, actually. We had a nice house -- small but nice. Most of the time we lived in a compound with four other officers and their families. We never felt any great danger. My wife had two children there. Her doctor was Diem's Minister of Health, who I think still practices here in Northern Virginia. He had his own clinic. It was a wonderful clinic. There was never any problem with that. We had a nice household staff -- things worked pretty well. My wife also looks back on it as one of our better tours. So living was not that difficult. There were occasional periods when you would have a coup attempt or something that gave you a little bit of concern. Then, of course, my family was evacuated in February of 1965. When we started bombing North Vietnam, we evacuated all the families. So she was evacuated in February, and I stayed on until July.

Q: Were you there then during the beginning of the buildup of the troops?

ROSENTHAL: Yes, just as we started building up.

Q: What was your feeling from the people you were dealing with in the Embassy about putting American troops in there?

ROSENTHAL: Well, I can't really recall that there was a strong feeling one way or the other. I think some of us felt some concern of what would American troops really do here -- were we getting involved in something that would be difficult? But by that time the situation had deteriorated pretty badly. So I think there was this other feeling that well, we may need the troops to at least stabilize the situation. When they first came in, it was up in the north, and I think we all felt that that was the greatest threat. The rest of it didn't matter as much. If you had to have troops, that was the place to have them. So I don't recall any really serious misgivings about putting U.S. troops in there. Some concern, but no really serious misgivings. And no misgivings about bombing the north, that I can recall.

Q: Did the political section have much of a feel about what the Viet Cong were up to?

ROSENTHAL: I think so. We had pretty good information. We had a lot of intelligence from the station or stuff we would gather ourselves. As you know, intelligence wasn't that difficult to pick up there. It was not a terribly secretive movement. It wasn't open, but you could get the stuff if you wanted it. I think we had a pretty good idea of what they were up to. I don't think we had any illusions that Hanoi was not behind it. That was a big debate in Washington: the extent to which infiltration from the north really was going on, how decisive it was, and so on. But I don't think there was much question from those of us on the ground. There was certainly no question in my mind, that this was from the north, fairly early in the game. But back in Washington we had a huge debate whether or not they were using North Vietnamese troops, whether or not they were coming in by sea, whether or not they were doing this or that. Well, they were doing all of the above.

HENRY L. T. KOREN
Director, Southeast Asia Affairs, East Asia Bureau
Washington, DC (1961-1964)

Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS)
Saigon (1966-1968)

Henry L. T. Koren was born in New Jersey in 1911. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948 and served in Haiti, Switzerland, the Philippines, the Congo (Brazzaville), and Vietnam. He was interviewed in 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Then in 1961 you came back, and after a short time in Northeast Asian Affairs, you became the director of South Asian Affairs.

KOREN: Southeast.

Q: Now, this was quite an assignment, wasn't it? Because we're talking the time when all hell was breaking loose there, 1961.

KOREN: Yes. That was the time, you're quite right, of North East Asian Affairs, and I didn't know my ass from third base on Japan and the Ryukyus.

Q: And Korea.

KOREN: And Korea. Japan, Korea and the Ryukyus, and I had to learn everything that I could learn in a short time. I felt uncomfortable after a few months or so, and all of a sudden Averell Harriman called me and said, "We're assigning you to Southeast Asian Affairs," and I thought, "Oh, my God."

Q: Why was that?

KOREN: He just wanted a man that he felt he could trust in Southeast Asian Affairs.

Q: Now, Harriman had this rather unusual appointment as assistant secretary for Asian Affairs when he was a man who was certainly eligible to have been -- well, he aspired to be President, with a good reason, but also to be Secretary of State, and yet he accepted this position in Asian Affairs and it was not a sinecure at all. How would you describe Harriman as an operator, working under Harriman in Asian Affairs?

KOREN: Well, to be quite frank, I was pretty much scared to death most of the time. I didn't know Harriman. I had met him before, but it was purely social. His daughter was a friend of mine. You probably heard that Harriman was considered the crocodile.

Q: Yes.

KOREN: That's exactly the way it was. I used to go in and see him once in a while for various things, and I'd come back and I'd hold my arms up to my cheek and wonder where the blood was coming from.

Q: How did he treat you in these things?

KOREN: Roughly. If you didn't measure up in his opinion and didn't grasp the fundamental question quickly, he would tear you apart. He'd say, "What are you standing up there for that way? Good God, man." You know, he was very rough in language. He didn't mean anything. He was very kindhearted personally, but he was a very tension-making individual to work for. To give you an example, two or three times he'd say, "Are you going to be in tomorrow?"

I'd say, "Sir, tomorrow's Sunday."

And he said, "Oh, yes, that's right. I forget, you're a Christer."

But the first thing I would do in the morning was to get all the messages that had been piled up overnight and race through those just as fast as I could. I would get there well ahead of what I expected the governor to get there, because he would call up all of a sudden and he would have seen a message and he would jump in the middle of the message and ask you, "What do you think so and so?" Well, if you didn't know just what the hell he was talking about, you'd [stutter], and so that was something I think we all did. I did it because I had to reply to him. All the people who worked for me had to do it because I would ask them, and the old story.

Q: Yes, it moves down.

KOREN: All around the chain of command, it just moves down. It was exhilarating. You couldn't work for Harriman without feeling there was something going on. There was not. Not tension but excitement in the air, electricity, all the time.

Q: As director of Southeast Asian Affairs, what were your responsibilities? We're talking about the period of 1961 to 1964.

KOREN: Everything except the intricacies of South Vietnam. Now, we had a special -- what the hell do they call it?

Q: Special operating group, or something like that.

KOREN: There was a special group that did nothing but at the time counting buddy buddies and all that sort of stuff, and I had, in effect, all the rest of Southeast Asia to worry about.

Q: Which would be Cambodia, Laos, Indonesia?

KOREN: Not Indonesia. That was South Asian Affairs.

Q: How about Burma, Thailand?

KOREN: Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, and some part of Vietnam.

Q: How about North Vietnam?

KOREN: No.

Q: That was part of the Vietnam working group. Laos must have been right at the top of your list. This was the time when I can remember President Kennedy getting up and having maps on television and talking about Laos. The idea was to neutralize Laos, wasn't it?

KOREN: That became the objective after a period of time, but, of course, the North Vietnamese took that option away from us. Our great problem with Laos was trying to find somebody that we could rely on.

Q: How did you conceive the threat at that time to the area?

KOREN: Well, I conceived it very much in the same terms of the domino theory.

Q: The domino theory being what?

KOREN: That if one fell all the rest of them would fall one after another.

Q: And this was falling to whom? Would it be to communism, to China, or to . . .

KOREN: To communism, primarily.

Q: Home-grown insurgencies.

KOREN: In some cases it would be Russian communism and in some cases it would be Chinese communism.

Q: What would your job be during the Laotian crisis, when we were looking for some way to put this thing together and we were talking about committing troops. There were all the options. This is for the researcher who doesn't understand how the State Department operates, and so I'd like to have an idea of what type of thing one would do as the director of this office?

KOREN: As I say, our national objective in Laos, for example, was to find a leader on whom we could put some authority and whom we could shore up. We tried several of them, and we finally came, because of Harriman mostly, to Souvanna Phouma. He was admittedly considered a communist fellow traveler, but he was the man that we had felt could neutralize and make Laos a neutral government. We would instruct the embassy on certain aspects of suggestions. For instance, it was also the time of Prince Sihanouk.

Q: In Cambodia.

KOREN: Yes. And we would suggest to them that such and such a demand might have some effect on Sihanouk and so forth. In other words, it was primarily from our point of view, what we wanted to do was think up new ideas and if they had not been tried, we would send out messages suggesting them.

Q: Well, did you have a feeling at the time that no matter what we do, we sure as hell aren't going to put troops in there? In your thinking and the people around you, were putting troops into Laos, Cambodia, and all one of the options that you felt was a viable option?

KOREN: No. That was not in our thinking at all at that time. In fact, it became a necessity. In those days, our job was to keep the governments viable and keep them oriented favorably toward the United States.

Q: Well, did you see Thailand as being a sort of a rock on which you could --

KOREN: Well, Thailand was, comparatively speaking, a very firm bit of soil that we knew where we were when we planted our feet on the soil of Thailand. They had people with whom we were on pretty good terms and who we felt we could trust. For instance, the foreign minister of Thailand. I knew him very well but I can't think of his name right now. That was the monarchy and the monarchy was flourishing with a fireball operation, and so they had something basic to go on. They had a government underneath the monarchy, a representative type government, and so it was something we could understand and which we could support.

Q: Were Malaysia and Singapore also in your peripheral?

KOREN: No. That was Southwest Asian Affairs.

Q: Did the changeover when Marshall Green was there when Sukarno was sort of edged out of the government -- that must have been of considerable concern to you at the time, because it was a very close-run thing, that the communists may have taken over Indonesia.

KOREN: I didn't have Indonesia under my . . .

Q: Well, I was wondering whether there were repercussions of this or that feeling this might have outflanked all our efforts?

KOREN: I think the fact that they succeeded in ousting Sukarno and getting rid of him certainly backed up our efforts in Southeast Asia.

Q: How about Dean Rusk? Did he get involved? Were you seeing him much?

KOREN: No.

Q: Harriman was pretty well . . .

KOREN: You know, anything that Harriman runs, he runs himself. He doesn't need any help. I know he talked to Rusk. We had a thing in Laos, for example, where several allied -- if that's the word for them -- discussions on Laos, and the director for Southeast Asian Affairs was directly responsible for Laos. I was always tapped to make the exposé on Laos from the point of view of the U.S. Butler was the foreign minister of Britain at that time. I can't remember who -- De Marteré I guess was the French. At any rate, that's the only time I really had anything to do with Rusk.

Q: How about President Kennedy? He had a habit of sometimes calling down at a lower level. Did he stay out of Asian affairs because of Harriman?

KOREN: No, no. I was on the telephone one time with Mr. Kennedy at the time the Diem brothers were captured and he wanted to know what happened to them.

Q: This is shortly before his death, too.

KOREN: Yes.

Q: This is in early November of 1963.

KOREN: Yes.

Q: Were you able to tell him anything?

KOREN: Nothing, except that we knew that they had been captured and were put in the Army personnel carrier. That's all we knew at that time. We didn't know until afterwards that they had been shot.

But you're quite right. One of the methods Mr. Kennedy had of getting right down to the last man he thought would know the answer.

Q: I know this as a personal aside. My name is Kennedy, and when I was in the Department at the time and sometimes when I would call and they'd say, "Mr. So and So isn't here. Who's calling?" I'd say, "Well, my name is Kennedy." And all of a sudden, electricity would start shooting out and I'd have to quickly explain who I was, because everybody in the Department was rather nervous that the President might be calling.

KOREN: You're quite right. He did. You're quite right that Southeast Asian affairs, particularly in Vietnam, was number one in his priority, very close to it.

Q: We might move on then to your major assignment. You left Brazzaville in 1966, and for a very short time you were with Intelligence and Research. And then you were made, as I have it here, deputy to the deputy ambassador in Saigon from 1966 to 1968. How did that assignment come about, and what was your position?

KOREN: Well, they wanted somebody to in effect run the counterinsurgency effort.

Q: That's CORDS, C-O-R-D-S.

KOREN: It wasn't named CORDS at that time.

Q: What was the history of the counterinsurgency movement from our side prior to your being appointed there?

KOREN: Rather bleak, as a matter of fact. You're probably aware of the failure of the hearts and minds of the people and the over-optimistic reports that were put out by the enemy's government, and various efforts had been tried and this was an effort to pull everything together. Probably, that was the reason that I was --

Q: Were you there during a sort of major dispute of who's going to run this whole thing? Whether it's the Army or the CIA or the State Department?

KOREN: Well, I think that was the reason the State Department won and I was sent out there.

Q: Whom did you report to? What was the chain of command as far as this goes?

KOREN: My immediate boss was Bill Porter, who was the deputy ambassador, but I had direct access to Cabot Lodge.

Q: Who was the ambassador until April of '67. What were the orders that you got or the instructions or the guidance you got from Lodge and from Porter?

KOREN: Well, nothing was in writing, but the indications were that, "Here's what you have to do, now go ahead and do it."

Q: What sort of things were they saying you had to do?

KOREN: Well, make order out of chaos. What they wanted was somebody to take charge and make the decisions.

Q: This is fine, but here you're talking about subduing a counterinsurgency in a country and we're an outside power. What did you have to deal with it?

KOREN: You had the various units, the AID, USIA, and, of course, the ever-present military.

Q: American military.

KOREN: To be quite honest with you, it was a very confusing situation, and I didn't know enough about what was going on.

Q: Later they have developed rather fancy courses in counterinsurgency, but there was none of this.

KOREN: Oh, no, no. You just were there, and, to be quite frank with you, I didn't know whether I was a (unclear) or a horseback (unclear) a long time. It wasn't until I went up to I Corps, the First Corps area.

Q: That's up north from the demilitarized zone down to Quang Ngai Province.

KOREN: That was when I realized -- of course, I had been in Saigon for maybe two or three months. I knew something was going on, but I remember responding to a correspondent's question at one time what the situation was, and I said, "Confused." And it was terribly confused down there. Everybody was trying to do his thing, and we had USIA, we had AID, and we had the military.

Q: We're talking about you were going up to I Corps because you found that you really didn't know what was going on after you'd been there for several months.

KOREN: They kicked me up there. That's beside the point, but Rusk and McNamara and all those came out, and they didn't like what I said, so they said, "Get rid of that bastard."

Q: What were you saying?

KOREN: I was trying to tell them that I didn't know what the problem was, and I made one major mistake because I said at the beginning, "You know, I think we ought to find some other term besides "pacification," and oh, boy.

Q: Whose favorite word was that?

KOREN: I don't know.

Q: It strikes me as McNamara. Maybe I'm wrong.

KOREN: I think it probably was McNamara, I don't know. It was the wrong thing to say and they told me to forget about it. [Laughter] So they gave me the opportunity of going back to the Department, and I said, "Well, I was over there and I wanted to stay."

So Cabot Lodge said, "Well, how would you like to go up to I Corps?"

And I said, "Fine."

Q: You were placed by somebody, or was the job once again re-changed when you left Saigon?

KOREN: It was changed. There was not boss, I think. As a matter of fact, it was taken over by President Johnson, and he sent one of his men out there, whose name I've forgotten.

Q: Komer?

KOREN: Kolmer, Bob Kolmer. He was supposed to do it, and he was the one who, at that time - I don't know whether it was Bob or -- before that it became Civil Operations Revolutionary Developments. But the whole problem was rethought, the whole effort, and the people, as I was in I Corps, became the deputy to the commander for Civil Operations Revolutionary Development.

Q: So basically you became a part of the military, rather than being run out of the embassy at that point?

KOREN: Yes.

Q: I mean, at least in the field.

KOREN: Yes. It was all part and parcel of the mission consul. That was a meeting that was held by the ambassador every day, as I recall, chaired by the ambassador, and that had all the elements in it: USIA, AID, the heads of those agencies, the political counselor, who was Phil Habib at that time, Rog [PHONETIC] and Westmoreland, and the whole lot of them.

Q: Before we move up to I Corps, what was your impression of some of the people. Let's talk about Lodge first. How deeply engaged was he with the operations there?

KOREN: I think he was completely immersed in it, and his effort was primarily in making and helping to obtain a viable Vietnamese government.

Q: In some ways, you must have had a feeling of a certain harking back to the Laotian situation, because this is a period of time when there were revolving military governments, weren't there?

KOREN: A very austere individual, Cabot Lodge, and a very stiff and somewhat unbending, but a very nice person underneath. When you got down underneath the facade, so to speak, he was a very nice gent. I like him.

Q: How about Bill Porter?

KOREN: Bill Porter was very smart, very good, and in a quiet way, very effective. For instance, I remember one refrain that he often used, not in a (unclear) sense or to get under Westie's skin or anything like that, but he would say, "But the night belongs to the VC." And, sort of in a plaintive way, we all felt that. It was a tough operation.

Q: How did you feel about Westmoreland?

KOREN: Well, I think he was a very good commander in what you might call the normal sense. I mean, West, he had everything you'd expect of a leader. He had knowledge, he had brains, he got people out of their foxholes and that sort of thing. But he was a product -- so was I -- of the World War II, and I don't think he understood the -- I say understood. I think he understood it, but I think he didn't find the key. God knows who has the key to guerilla warfare, the type of warfare we were facing in Vietnam. For instance, "The night belongs to the VC."

Q: Well, how did you feel? You arrived there and your first few months you were looking at the situation. How was the war going from our point of view? How did you see it?

KOREN: Well, we got the impression it was going all right, and it wasn't until the Tet Offensive --

Q: In February of '68. But at the time you saw it, did you see the guerilla warfare and the "night belonging to the VC" as being an absolute must that you had to conquer, and did you see progress in this? Or did you see this as being almost an irritant?

KOREN: Well, it was a terrible irritant, but the progress was gauged primarily by the body count, and God knows we had enough of that.

Q: Was there any feeling that this body count business -- I mean, one, politically it's not the best way to judge something, and the other one is, when you start relying on statistics, whether they're bodies or what have you, you're asking for real problems. You know, people meeting norms, double counting, counting civilians as Viet Cong, etc., etc., etc. Were we questioning this as a way of measuring how we were doing, or was this pretty much the accepted?

KOREN: Pretty much accepted at that time.

Q: At that time. All these things are so much easier in retrospect.

KOREN: Very much so. But this was a low-intensity conflict, and all of our training and background had been in the high-intensity conflict.

Q: What was the feeling when you arrived there about the ARVN, the Army of the Republic of Vietnam?

KOREN: It was coming along but slowly, and that was one of the things we tried our damndest to -- I say "we," the United States Government and all its efforts were trying to shore up the ARVN, give them some backbone, something strong to lean on, and I think that was the biggest failure that we had there. Some of the ARVN were fine. Some of the ARVN people were good friends of mine and sort of young men as a whole.

I can remember thinking back to the South Vietnamese day, Southeast Asian day, "What is it that the communists have that we don't seem to be able to instill in our people? Where's the fire?"

Q: This is a question I think all of us have asked again and again. Obviously, the men in the Vietnamese Army really had a lot to lose, I mean, it's very obvious, when the place went down the drain. Yet, what was it that didn't spark the leadership at all levels to exert itself in this? Do you ever have any feel for why the communists seemed to do it and we didn't?

KOREN: No. That's still a comment that I don't have the answer to.

Q: I have to confess I thought long and hard about it, too. I don't know, but there is something there.

KOREN: There's something there and the civil word is leadership is what's lacking. God knows the war colleges are doing their best to try to find the key to leadership right now. Sometimes it works. The most recent example is Hackworth. Do you know that story?

Q: Yes. There's a book. Was it called Turn About or something?

KOREN: No. About Face.

Q: About Face, yes.

KOREN: Well, Dave Hackworth was an Army officer who kicked against the traces, but he was considered the finest battalion commander that -- I can't remember who said so, whether it was Westmoreland or --

Q: Abrams?

KOREN: Or even higher up -- they'd every seen, and you can see why. He had three Distinguished Service Crosses. He had nine Silver Stars. He had three or four Purple Hearts. You know, you name it. He was the most decorated man. I mean, he makes Woodfield, or whatever the hell his name was --

Q: York?

KOREN: York. Pale, and also, Douglas MacArthur. He has something on his side. He says we have yet to learn how to fight that type of warfare. He said we didn't do it in Vietnam, and he got disgusted with Vietnam and he sort of threw by the faces of Westmoreland and all the rest of the generals. He himself was not made a general and so he quit. That's beside the point, but . . .

Q: No, no. But it's an interesting point. Now, when you went up to I Corps, could you describe a bit the command structure and where you fit into this? We're still talking about 1966, aren't we?

KOREN: Well, at that time, Lou Walt, who was a Marine. The Marines were in charge of I Corps and he was the Marine commander and the next in command to the ARVN commander, whose name was Lam. I fitted into that very nicely, because Lou and I became very good friends and close friends, and he gave me every opportunity, every chance in the world, to do whatever I felt was necessary, he would okay. He was the commander, though.

Q: Well now, what were you doing?

KOREN: The first think I did was to fire the AID people and change the command there.

Q: What was the problem?

KOREN: Well, they just weren't any good, that's all basically. AID, I got rid of them, and I got a new man in the CIA and USIA. They were all sort of grouped together. We worked together, the three or four of us, we worked together. I'll say one thing. I had a hell of a time getting my deputy changed, because the Department did not back me up. I asked for a guy by name and they said, "Oh, we can't spare him. He's one of our best." I thought, "By God. If we needed our best, then we needed them out there."

That was the kind of attitude I got from the lower level of the Department, and I didn't do too well by Bill Bundy, either. Because although he and I were good friends, I said something to the effect, "Please don't put out any casualty figures until you've check them with me." This was when we were losing some of our people.

And I got back something about, "I'm running the secretary for Asian Affairs."

Q: Well, what was the problem? The figures you felt weren't correct?

KOREN: Well, they needed to be vetted, yes. You know, the first figures you get are always wrong. They've got to be checked. That's the way the body count is always wrong. I mean, for instance, the My Lai massacre, so called, happened when I was up in I Corps, and people have asked me time and again, "What did you know about My Lai?" I didn't know a damn thing about My Lai, except that the body count was particularly high that day. Who were they?

Q: Villages. This is a slaughter essentially of civilians by a platoon of American soldiers.

KOREN: But we had a very good working relationship as far as I Corps was concerned. Not only the commander but the armored commander was a good guy, too. And the CIA chap and the USIA people were all very good.

I had some help in that respect from the people in Saigon. Barry Zorthian, for example, with USIA, he was a good friend of mine, and he said, "Whatever you want, I'll back you up," that type of thing.

Q: You had this team together, but what would they do? How does one go about this?

KOREN: Well, first of all you'd visit as much as possible the various centers of population and see for yourself whether ARVN was lacking, or the Army or the Marines were overstepping their bounds, or anything like that. And then we set up a -- what the hell did we call it? I can't remember the name of the thing, but a working setup whereby all the elements, the psychological and, you know, what you'd expect the USIA to do and the CIA to do, the intelligence and the psychological effort, we coordinated all those together. In effect, we would say, "That's your problem, that's your problem," and they'd go to it. I had some perfectly fine gents working for me.

Q: Was the Phoenix Program in --

KOREN: That's what I'm talking about, the Phoenix Program. That was begun in I Corps.

Q: Part of this was a way of, in polite terms, eliminating the professional cadre of the Viet Cong.

KOREN: It was exposing them, yes.

Q: Exposing them. How did this work?

KOREN: How did it work?

Q: Yes. How did it work? I mean, what would we do?

KOREN: Well, we would get the villagers and the Chinese to finger the people, and we worked on a one-to-one basis, really. See, I was lucky in some respects. The people I had who spoke Vietnamese, learned Vietnamese, one Marine lieutenant colonel spoke very good Vietnamese. He was invaluable in that respect, and he was the advisor to the mayor of Da Nang. That gave him a whole lot of --

Q: Let's say some of the villagers would say, "So and so is part of the Viet Cong cadre." What would we do? Did we send in hit squads? Did we arrest?

KOREN: No. We would tell the ARVN and they would get rid of them. It was usually a matter of killing them off.

Q: yes. So basically we would inform the ARVN.

KOREN: We would inform the ARVN, and sometimes we would do it ourselves.

Q: When you say "do it ourselves," with who? Our military or the CIA or what?

KOREN: CIA.

Q: Were you ever worried about this being sort of a rogue elephant that might get out of control or something like that?

KOREN: No, because I trusted the CIA type. I think that's the main reason.

Q: How was the ARVN performing up where you were? What was your evaluation of the ARVN out in the field?

KOREN: It was better led from the top.

Q: Well, Lam had a reputation of being pretty corrupt.

KOREN: Well, if he did, I'm sure he does. There's no Vietnamese that isn't somewhat tinged. But he was a good commander and he worked well with the Marine commander.

Q: Would he go out in the field, Lam?

KOREN: Oh, yes, he did. Not as much as the Marines would like, of course.

Q: That wasn't the style. The Marine Corps had their own particular brand of pacification, where they had small teams with a medic and this type of thing. There you were in the field. Were you seeing a difference between them and, say, an, American Army unit doing it? Or was this show more than real?

KOREN: The Marine -- what the hell do they call them? [Combined Action Platoon (CAP)]

Q: Pacification teams or something? They have a fancy term.

KOREN: They were very good and very effective. And sometimes they were overrun because the ARVN didn't perform, so all wasn't sweetness and light in I Corps by any means. There was a drawback, no question about that. But those Marine teams were very good and very dedicated and very brave, because they were out in the various little towns.

Q: Very much exposed.

KOREN: Very much exposed and they did it. I felt, that the Marines had a group because it's very easy to say the Marines. There was only one division. I mean, well, there was more than one division, but there was one command. They were all Marines, and so the Marines, I think, did a better job and a more centrally controlled job than any of the American divisions did. I became a very strong advocate of the Marine effort.

Q: Well, something that struck me in my time in Vietnam, which was '69 to '70, was how quickly leadership was turned over, particularly at the officer level. Six months in the field and six months out, and one had the feeling that at least the Army was turning this into more a training exercise rather than putting their best troops forward and giving it all out. Did you have this feeling?

KOREN: To a certain extent, but I think that was more the Army than it was the Marine Corps.

Q: Yes. Didn't you have an airborne division?

KOREN: Oh, yes, we had an airborne. One Hundred and First was there.

Q: Did you find the Army, did they have a feel for the type of war, or again do you think they were suffering from the same problem all of us had of not really knowing how to fight this war?

KOREN: I think they suffered from the same uncertainty, the same tentativeness, without some positive direction that the Marines were able to do from their -- because they say the Marines --

Q: Pacific action teams, or something like that?

KOREN: The Marines had a special term for it. It's just gone out of my head.

Q: Well, that's all right.

KOREN: I think it was easier for the Marines to do than, say, the Army. That means a whole lot of varying divisions around the Army is one thing, but you can't say that the MACV commander, he had to delegate to the various division commanders and the corps commanders. But the Marines were all by themselves. They had just one.

Q: Enlarged division.

KOREN: Yes, enlarged division, but very much of a one area they knew they were responsible for.

Q: Was there much slopping? I mean, was there rivalry between the four corps as far as people doing the same job you were doing, trying to say we're doing better than you are, or passing information back and forth?

KOREN: Despite the common efforts, I don't think there was a cohesion between the four corps people.

Q: So really you were each sort of operating within your area. I mean, they were different, a different mix, but you didn't feel that this was -- I mean, you felt you could try anything. You weren't getting all sorts of, "Now do this and do that."

KOREN: I think it was completely a matter of self-starting and self-initiative.

Q: Weren't the Korean Marines up in your area?

KOREN: Yes.

Q: I remember a friend of mine saying they were a tough bunch but it was hard to get them going, because they were under orders not to take casualties and so they were more passive. They watched out for their own protection, but really did play much of a passive role.

KOREN: Perfectly true, I think. Their perimeter defense was excellent, but they didn't strike out, you know, just as the Philippine contingent was very constrained and so was the Thais.

Q: They were there but more for -- KOREN: More symbolic.

Q: More symbolic. Were you bothered much by the Press Corps? Bothered is the wrong term, but I mean, did the Press Corps play much of a role in your area, or were they pretty much down?

KOREN: Pretty much down in Saigon. They would come up to I Corps because they had the Press Corps. The most famous group was when Joe Alsop and -- who was that guy -- they came up to I Corps. Everybody came up to I Corps because it was the DMZ type of operation. But from the point of view of bother, no, I don't think you could say they bothered us. The only real bother we had was Teddy Kennedy.

Q: Could you explain what happened with Teddy Kennedy?

KOREN: Oh, that bastard. I disliked him from the word "go." But he came up and, of course, I was the designated --

Q: Senior civilian?

KOREN: I can't remember who is was. Bob Cushman, I guess, was the Marine commander at that time, and in effect he just washed his hands of him and said, "It's all yours." So I had him in my house and quarters, and he, in effect, said, "I want to see casualties and I want to see the burn casualties and napalm casualties and all." Well, I had this perfectly wonderful little feisty doctor who was one of the group that came over and volunteered.

Q: Yes. There were a whole series of volunteer doctors who came over to treat civilian casualties.

KOREN: He said, "If he wants to see casualties, give him to me." And I said, "Okay." So we arranged that he would go to the civilian hospital. Well, you've been to the civilian hospitals in Vietnam. You know they're no place for a weak stomach, and I must say, a couple of times, too, my stomach began. And various incredible, something I suspect that Kennedy had never seen in his life before, these terrible burn patients and family all clustered around trying to take of them and the bloody mattresses and the whole sphere. And I must say Kennedy, he looked a little pale around the gills, and he finally said he'd had enough.

But the thing that I remember distinctly was he asked the doctors, "Show me a burn patient."

The doctors said, "Senator, nobody can tell whether the burn is from napalm or from a upset gasoline stove."

"Now you tell me what you think."

And he just gave it right back to him. He said, "That's absolutely impossible. A burn is a burn, period." And so that took care of that problem. Of course, phosphors you can tell. So Kennedy finally gave up and said he'd seen all he had to.

Q: Another figure, I don't think he worked in your area, but did you run across him at all, because he's become a man of some controversy, John Paul Vann?

KOREN: John Paul Vann, sure. I knew him -- well, I knew all of the (unclear) opposite numbers.

Q: What is your evaluation of him?

KOREN: Well, he was unquestionably a controversial figure, and I'd say that John Vann has some damned good ideas and I confess trying to plagiarize some of his ideas and some of his methods.

Q: He was working in II Corps.

KOREN: He was in II Corps, yes. I think I knew John before I even left Saigon. But any rate, I think his problem was he was too much of a egotist. And I wouldn't say he did everything from the point of view of "what can it do for me," but there was always a grain about him. I don't want to do him an injustice by any means. I have not read that book.

Q: It's an interesting book, but I'm sure you'd find A Bright and Shining Lie.

KOREN: Who wrote it?

Q: Sheehan.

KOREN: Neil Sheehan. I knew Neil. He was a pretty good man, I think. I haven't read his book.

Q: But you say you found some things that he was doing there that you would borrow from?

KOREN: Oh, yes. I can't put my finger on them, but he had damn good ideas and he had certain of methods I thought, "Boy, that's something I can work with," that type of thing. But he was a man I would say of lively imagination and complete dedication. I liked John, but he was not a close friend of mine.

Q: How did you up in I Corps feel about the operation, although you weren't in it, but, you know, there was an awful lot of concern. I can recall back here in Washington as the Marine Corps held onto Khe Sanh. Was there unease? Was there questioning? With your background, both political and military, how did you feel about this thing?

KOREN: Well, I must confess, I thought that Khe Sanh was similar to Dien Bien Phu in some respect, because God knows, the VC were tunneling right up to the parallel, so to speak, and we knew that. I remember talking to Bob Cushman, the commander of the Marines at that time I was there.

"You know, I think, Bob, we ought to get out of there." That was just my feeling, because I knew the way they operated, and all of a sudden we'd be faced with "Well, here they are, right in front of us." I don't know. That's the way it pretty much came out.

Q: It's still very controversial, because in one case we said we brought a lot together so we could bomb the hell out of them, and they did take quite a few casualties. But the other thing, we had lost mobility and we ended up taking something which we abandoned later on.

KOREN: I was just about to make a comparison with Khe Sanh and -- the thought I had went out of my mind.

Q: Of course our strategy at that time was how to get the North Vietnamese Army to confront our troops so we could bring our superior fire power, and this was felt to be "if they want to do it, we can go after them that way."

KOREN: I know what I was trying to think of -- drawing an analogy between that point of view and the Tet Offensive. Personally, I felt . . .

Q: If we could talk about Tet, that would pretty well end it.

KOREN: I know that they stopped the conventional wisdom, but I always felt, and I said at the time, that I thought we took a hell of a beating in Tet.

Q: I was going to say, I Corps was probably the hardest hit. Hue fell. Do you feel that it is not only a political disaster, but also a military one?

KOREN: Well, not entirely. It seemed to me that the fact that they were able to do that without any warning at all meant to me that we didn't have the proper tentacles out and according to psychologically, we took a hell of a beating.

Q: Politically, of course, it was absolute disaster. What happened to you during Tet? Were you there?

KOREN: No. I had a Marine steward and I said, "Let's get in the car and go down and see what's going on." And so we went downtown.

Q: In Da Nang?

KOREN: Da Nang. Starting down toward town and all of a sudden there was firing coming out, and I said, "The hell with this." I've never seen a man turn a wheel so fast in my life. [Laughter] He was a big, powerful guy, and we turned the jeep and we turned in the street, it don't seem to me now much wider than that, and we beat it to the other direction, because I didn't see any point in being fired on.

So we came back and the sky was lit up, of course, all around by the various things. There was some fires that had been started that added to it and there was constant shelling going on. So we decided the best thing to do was to stay put, and we didn't crawl under the bed, but we put barricades up. We lugged all the furniture we could and put it up, because I had a house and we barricaded ourselves as much as we could and just got our weapons and just waited. We were sure they were coming for us. They would sooner or later.

Q: Da Nang was relatively quickly taken over by our forces.

KOREN: Oh, yes.

Q: Hue was the . . .

KOREN: Hue was something different. That's where Phil Manhart was. Did you ever talk to him?

Q: Yes, but not on that but on his China experience. I'm trying to get back to him.

One last question on Vietnam. What happened to the pacification effort after Tet that you saw in the immediate aftermath of the pacification? Was this in a way helped because of the destruction of the Viet Cong cadre, or was your apparatus pretty well destroyed?

KOREN: It was a considerable blow to the Phoenix Program, and psychologically it was a hell of a blow to the whole operation, the whole pacification effort.

Q: Well, you left Vietnam in 1968, didn't you?

KOREN: Yes.

Q: How did you feel about it when you left? How did you feel where you were going? Because this is a time of some optimism, I think, on the part of some.

KOREN: My feeling was that we were making some progress. I think that's the best way I can describe it. Of course, from the point of view of I Corps, we had maintained the borders pretty well so that I thought that would gradually spread itself and spread its influence further down to other corps areas and give us the thing that we needed as much as anything else was confidence and we needed some accomplishments so we could say, "Oh, boy. We're on the right track. Let's keep going."

W. AVERELL HARRIMAN
Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs
Washington, DC (1961-1963)

Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs
Washington, DC (1963-1965)

Ambassador-at-Large
Washington, DC (1965-1969)

Ambassador W. Averell Harriman was born in New York in 1891. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale in 1913. From 1933-1939, he was a member of the Department of Commerce. In 1940-1941, he was sent as a special representative of the President to Great Britain and Russia. He has been named U.S. representative in Europe, Special Assistant to the President, Mutual Security Administration, Governor of New York, U. S. Ambassador-at-Large, Assistant Secretary for Far East Affairs, and Representative of the President to peace talks in Paris. This interview was conducted in 1969.

Q: You were Assistant Secretary of State, I believe, when he made his first trip to Vietnam. Did you talk to him about that at the time?

HARRIMAN: I don't recall talking to him about it. I remember he went. I don't recall talking to him about it. I may have been on a trip, but I don't recall speaking to him about it before he went.

I remember the most important thing that happened -- the most publicly important thing that happened on that trip -- was his bringing the camel driver to the United States, which I thought was a very fine move of public relations in terms of the Pakistanis, as well as the United States. But I remember he had a talk with President Diem and I remember reading copy about it. But I don't remember having any particular talks at that time.

The most intimate relationships that I had with the President, when he became President, related to the peace efforts he made. He sent me on a trip in December 1965 to a number of countries. It was just before New Year's and I remember very well his calling me on the telephone and he said, 'Averell, have you got your bags packed?'

I said, 'Well, it's always packed, Mr. President.'

He said, "Bob McNamara is here with me. He's got an airplane waiting for you to take you to Europe."

I said, 'Where do you want me to go?'

He said, "That's for you to decide."

Then he explained what he wanted to do. He said he was going to continue the Christmas pause in bombing the North for a period, and he wanted to get support for his peace move. He wanted to get peace negotiations started, and I left that evening at 8:00 o'clock, as I recall it. I had no instructions, of course, except the general instructions which he gave me.

I went to Poland. I had a number of extremely interesting talks. I went to Poland first, Warsaw. I arrived there -- that was about 3:00 o'clock by my watch, 9:00 o'clock in the morning by the local time. I was met by the ambassador and he said that the Foreign Minister was ready to see me in an hour. I asked him to put it off for an hour and a half so I could get shaved and breakfast. But I've got a memorandum of my talk on April 19 with Michalowski, which relates to some of the steps which the Polish government took.

Q: They sent Michalowski to Hanoi after your talk with them, did they not?

HARRIMAN: Yes, while I was there, Michalowski went to Hanoi. This memorandum not only covers that, but also covers later attempts which the Polish government made at that time. I don't know whether we gave this copy of the memorandum of the conversation that I had with Mr. Michalowski, who is now the Polish Ambassador to the United States, on February 19th of this year which you may or may not have. I don't know if your files have got it.

Q: They may not have, if you have a copy that you can give to us.

HARRIMAN: I will be glad to give it to you because it covers the discussion that I had with him about certain talks which they carried on subsequently-which might be useful to complete the-

Q: We'd be very happy to attach it to this.

HARRIMAN: We have a copy of this, haven't we, Mark?

(Mark): Yes.

HARRIMAN: Although my arrival was not heralded, I spent 24 hours there. I spent all day most of the time, with Polish officials.

Q: You talked to Rapacki?

HARRIMAN: I talked to Rapacki, I had several talks with him and I saw Mr. Gomulka. I think there's a record of that in my report of those talks. They took it seriously. They took the President's position seriously -- possibly because I knew the Poles over the years, and gave them my assurance that the President was serious in this move. I don't know that they would have taken it from many people without some notification from the President. But, after all, my position with different people around the world had been such for so many years that they accepted statements that I made without any statement from the government.

But I didn't know whether they would receive me. They had only heard the night before that I was coming. As a matter of fact they had only heard that morning because I had left so hurriedly. I didn't know until an hour or two before I landed, a couple of hours before I landed, that they were going to see me. So on the basis of that rather hurried information, it is quite remarkable the Polish government sent their foreign ministry official to Hanoi, and he stayed there two weeks and he did what he could.

This memorandum shows his account, as he described it to me three years later, of his visit. There's some information in this which I did not have before, such as that the Soviet government encouraged the trip, the Chinese government discouraged it. But the government in Hanoi was not ready to negotiate at that time and Michalowski felt that if we'd held the pause for a little longer period they might have come around.

Q: He still believes that in 1969?

HARRIMAN: He still believes that in '69, but I don't. I have my doubts about it. I don't subscribe to that. I thought the President held the halt as long as he could and should at that time. I didn't know how long he was going to hold the pause, and I was anxious for -- I didn't know that Michalowski had gone, but the Poles said they would take some action. I knew others were trying to take some action and I was anxious to give them enough time. I think the President gave ample time by this pause, 37 days in all, but it was -- I've forgotten exactly how many days it was after I went to Warsaw. It must have been nearly a month, nearly four weeks.

Q: Yes, it was nearly the end of January.

HARRIMAN: I thought he ought to give them at least three weeks, and he gave them four weeks. So that I think Hanoi had every opportunity to accept the President's offer. This trip of Michalowski was evidence of very real interest on the part of the Poles. And Mr. Shelepin, the Russian, went there, but how much he did at that time I don't know.

Q: Went to Hanoi, or came to Warsaw?

HARRIMAN: He went to Hanoi. He was on a trip to Hanoi. He was one of the senior members of the Communist party secretariat. He went to Hanoi for what purpose I don't know, but he was going there regardless of this visit.

I did not go to Moscow on this trip because I thought it would be embarrassing to the Russian leaders. I had talked about the war in Vietnam with Mr. Kosygin the year before. I had seen him in July -- not the year before, some months before -- July of 1965, six months earlier. And he had indicated that they wanted to see the war finished and thought that Hanoi would be willing to discuss a peaceful settlement. I reported that to the President and I am sure those documents are in the file. I'll look it up and see what I've got. If I have anything further I'll be glad to give it to you. But I did not go to Moscow because I thought there was a difference of opinion between Peking and Moscow about ending the war with Peking desiring to see the war continue, to see us continue to be involved in it, and Moscow wanting the war to stop -- each for their own ends.

But I went on, of course, and saw a number of other countries. We might stop this a minute and let's find out what we have in the files on this. I reported my talks briefly to the President and the Secretary of State. Those telegrams will undoubtedly be in the files. If they are not -- there were several from Warsaw I see here. I, as always, repeated very briefly the substance. I think there are three reports here.

Then I went on to Tito, whom I had known very well over the years. I first knew him during the war. Then I went to see him in '51 when he was in great trouble. I went there for President Truman to talk with him about his military needs. He thought at that time that Stalin was going to unleash his satellites and he wanted some additional planes and tanks and other equipment. I think we did something for him at that time. So I had a rather long experience with him. He was very anxious to do what he could. He said his influence with Peking was zero! In fact, he maintained that Peking was reserving for him the most vicious attacks.

I remember him saying this rather amusing story -- I'm not sure I put it in the telegram -- but he said that they had just called him a "Revisionist Bandit". I suggested that wasn't anything very much, because they had called us "Imperialist Bandits" for years, and he said, "Oh but you don't understand. A revisionist bandit is a far worse character than an imperialist!" This was the kind of personal talks that we had.

But he did say that he, of course, had influence in Moscow and would be very anxious to end the war, to see the war ended, because he thought his security was at stake. He was afraid, of course, that there would be a confrontation between the Soviet Union and the United States and that would affect his security. That was true of all these Eastern European countries that I talked to at different times. They were very anxious to end the war. In his case the Yugoslavs were not giving any substantial military assistance, I think they only sent a few hundred thousand dollars worth of medical equipment. It was rather silly for us to put Yugoslavia on the same list as those who were helping the North Vietnamese. I think, that's all they sent. Their Crescent Society, so-called, paralleling our Red Cross in their opinion, had sent this equipment, these medical supplies. But, in any event, he did call in the ambassador, the Russian ambassador, the same afternoon that I saw him. What message he sent to Moscow, I don't know.

I went on and saw a number of different people. He recommended I talk to Nasser. He and Nasser considered themselves quite close, being so-called neutrals. And I'm rather interested that Gromyko now is on his way to see Tito, having just returned from a visit to see Nasser in Cairo. It may well be he went to talk to Nasser about a settlement of the conflict between the Arabs and Israel, and it may be that's why he's going there. It's particularly interesting that he should be going to Belgrade at this time when certainly the Communist party and Russia must be quite angry with Tito for not permitting the Yugoslav Communist party to go to their meeting, which is coming to a close in Moscow now. There were several communist countries that didn't go. I think the only three of them that I remember are, of course, the Chinese communists, the Albanians, and Tito. I don't remember which other ones.

Q: The Romanians threatened not to go, but then went.

HARRIMAN: But they did. The Romanians have gone, and what's interesting about that conference is it's not going too well for the Russians -- not much unity. The Italians have made a major issue of the Soviet interference in Czechoslovakia, spoke very vigorously against this Brezhnev doctrine of interference with the sovereignty of another state. Of course, the French Communists are opposing it. I don't know what position they're taking. But it's interesting that the Soviet Union is going ahead with its business with the Yugoslav government, in spite of the difference, a very strong difference. I can't help but think that he's reporting to Tito about his talks with Nasser.

But anyway Tito recommended that I go to see Nasser, and I did on the same trip and had a very interesting talk with Nasser and he did take up with the Soviet government, I'm sure, the desirability of their influencing the Hanoi government to undertake talks about peaceful settlement. I urged him to approach other neutrals.

I also saw on this same trip Mr. Shastri, the Prime Minister of India, and President Ayub of Pakistan, and both of them agreed to talk to Mr. Kosygin at Tashkent. As a matter of fact, President Ayub left almost immediately after talking to me to go to Tashkent. That was the meeting which was called by Kosygin to bring pressure on both the Indians and the Pakistanis to end their war. We supported that initiative. I'm sure both Mr. Shastri and President Ayub did speak to Kosygin. Of course, Mr. Shastri died, so I never had any report of it, but President Ayub, whom I've seen subsequently, said that they did with Kosygin, although he was very angry with the United States for having starting the bombing while he was in Hanoi. He has never quite gotten over that. He felt it was a personal affront. Obviously it was not, but he felt that it was, and it's one of those unarguable questions that you can't argue with him. But I'm inclined to believe that he did give some sort of instructions to Shelepin to see what they could do to encourage Hanoi, but obviously they are not ready to exert any major influence.

(tape interrupted by phone call)

I'd like to say a little more about the Russian attitude towards Hanoi. After my talk with Mr. Kosygin in July, 1965, I became convinced that they, the Russians, wanted to see the war ended. I had a very rough talk with Kosygin. He was not at all in a generally friendly point of view, because he had a number of things that he was annoyed about. The principal one was Vietnam. He kept saying, "Don't you realize that this war only helps the Chinese?" It became evident to me that what they wanted in Southeast Asia, which has subsequently developed in the subcontinent of India-Pakistan, they want to see Southeast Asia strong enough and independent enough to resist Peking's expansion to the South.

Now, there are certain people who have felt that the Russians would want to see us bogged down -- occupied -- to give them a freer hand in other parts of the world, and also they would like to see the Chinese diverted to the South rather than to the North, just as Chamberlain tried to divert Hitler to the East to Russia, rather than to the West. And I'm very much annoyed with these people who argue this way because they are very stupid. Some of them are experts in the State Department -- not the foreign service. Let me put you straight, not foreign service, but experts who felt they knew more about this. They thought the Russians ought to, if they knew more about this. They thought the Russians ought to, if they had any intelligence, direct Peking South. It just so happens that the Russians don't believe that. Now I can't tell you why they don't believe it, but they don't.

If we want any greater evidence it is their action in India-Pakistan. They are giving both India and Pakistan assistance. Actually they are giving them both military assistance, which we have largely dropped out of. You know we have stopped giving both India and Pakistan much military assistance, although we're giving both economic assistance. They are doing both economic and military. They want to divert Pakistan from its closer relations with Peking and this is the way they feel.

Now other evidence is that the Soviet Union helped us both during October to create conditions which made it possible for President Johnson to stop the bombing in North Vietnam as he did in November 1968, and then again in January helped us end this rather ridiculous undignified discussion on the shape of the table. They brought heat to bear on the Hanoi delegation to stop that nonsense and to agree upon a compromise. Actually it wasn't a compromise. It practically accepted one of the suggestions that had been made from Saigon, so Saigon couldn't refuse. But in any event this is direct evidence.

But they, and I think it's important to understand, will only go so far. I used to talk to the Secretary of State about this, and he said, "Well, if the Russians really want to help end the conflict, all they have to do is stop giving weapons to Hanoi." I think we've got to recognize the Russians, so stated by Mr. Kosygin, look upon North Vietnam as what he calls a "Sister Socialist State." It is their obligation as the great leader of the communist movement, it's their obligation to support North Vietnam just as we considered it our obligation to support South Vietnam.

In the second place, they have a limited influence. The North Vietnamese are fiercely nationalistic. They don't want to be dominated by Peking or by Moscow, and the influence of each of them is relative. I don't know which has the most influence, but the Russians evidently have some influence and were ready to use it to start negotiations to end the war.

They believe their interests are better advanced by ending the war in Vietnam. I don't care who has different opinion, I'm satisfied that this is true. So I'm satisfied that Mr. Kosygin did something. But, in any event, there is the combination of Mr. Michalowski's visit, of which we have the detailed account of his visit and a detailed statement there that the Russians encouraged him. And the interesting part was -- the first time we knew it -- the Chinese argued against it, were quite violently opposed to it. That is an indication that our guesses about the position of both countries were true. But in any event, we don't know what Shelepin said or did. He didn't go into any -- and Mr. Michalowski doesn't know either.

Now in addition I stopped in Tehran to see the Shah, partly as a gesture of good will. I had known him very well. I had known him since the wartime days. I met him first in 1942 when I went to Tehran with Prime Minister Churchill and went up to Moscow at that time. I have seen him intimately. He's stayed in my house in Sun Valley and he's come to dinner and that kind of thing. I thought if I flew over without talking to him, it would be misunderstood. So I visited his country just to consult him, and I think he was pleased that we were doing it. But I didn't think anything particularly would come of that.

I find that I reported my talks with Mr. Shastri by telegram. I reported also my visit, rather brief, to Pakistan. Also, I reported on my talk with -- as a matter of fact the report of my talk with President Ayub came from Tehran because I left almost immediately after that talk. Then there's another report of my talk, which is undoubtedly in the files, with the Shah of Tehran.

And I had this rather interesting talk -- Ambassador Battle went with me to talk to Nasser at his home and my only instructions related to the Fourteen points, which was about all I had to go on. We had taken a position stating our attitude in the Fourteen points. I had those with me and I could use them wherever need be. Nasser -- naturally everyone was rather flattered that the President should send a special emissary to see him, and he indicated that he would do what he could, but there wasn't very much which I thought he could do. On the other hand, one of the principal reasons for going was that Tito had suggested that it might be worthwhile since Nasser had certain contacts with Peking whereas he, Tito, had none.

I notice in this report that the Foreign Minister this morning said that they would talk to the representatives in Hanoi and later to the Chinese -- Peking. Nevertheless I don't think any of these talks with Peking had any influence. Did I make any other calls on that trip, Mark?

(Mark): Bangkok and Tokyo. There's also a tab from Manila. You met Rusk coming around in Manila.

HARRIMAN: Oh yes, that's true. I went back and I went on to Bangkok. I saw Martin and I saw Sullivan there. I didn't go to Laos on that trip?

(Mark): Yes, Bangkok, Tokyo, Canberra, Laos, Saigon and Manila.

HARRIMAN: I must have gone to Bangkok and then Vientiane and then to Tokyo and then to Australia. Then I came back because the Secretary asked me to meet him.

Q: You met him in Manila.

HARRIMAN: No, I met him at Bangkok, I think. I went back to Bangkok to meet the Secretary because he asked me to come back that way to pick him up and take him after the funeral of Shastri who had died in Tashkent. I think while I was waiting for him as a matter of fact, I went back to Bangkok and then went to Vientiane but I did not go to Saigon on that trip, did I?

(Mark): Yes, you came back to Bangkok and then went to Saigon -- then Manila, then home via Honolulu.

HARRIMAN: Then I made the second trip with Vice President Humphrey. When did I leave? That was another trip? So the trip with Vice President Humphrey was at the President's request and we covered a number of countries in Asia. Did I leave again from Washington?

(Mark): Yes.

HARRIMAN: I remember Senator John Cooper was along. I've forgotten who else. We made a number of stops. The President asked me to make sure that the leader understood his policies in each one of these countries, and he wanted to make sure that the Vice President was fully briefed.

The Vice President did a very good job in those countries. I remember his speech in Canberra in which Prime Minister Holt was present. This was a largish lunch of a cross section of opinion forming people in Canberra. Mr. Holt said to me as the Vice president finished -- he talked for half an hour. It's rather well known that the Vice President doesn't always have a terminus, but in this case he had exactly a half-hour on the radio. He was told when to break off so he only talked for half an hour. Holt said, "This was the best presentation of an issue made by any visitor to Australia in my experience." He supported, of course, the President's position. And he did a great job. Vice President Humphrey, when he limited his speeches, was an extremely effective speaker. His problem was that he usually made three speeches at one time and he lost some of the effect because -- I'll speaking of his domestic speeches. But he made a very good impression everywhere he went. Did we go to Wellington, or didn't we, on that trip?

(Mark): I don't remember.

HARRIMAN: Anyway, that was the trip in which Bobby Kennedy came out for the coalition government and Vice President Humphrey made his now-famous remark, "That would be letting the fox into the chicken coop." I think that must have been in Canberra, at the press conference. (I thought it was Wellington), if he didn't go to Wellington that trip. You don't recall? (Note: It was Wellington)

(Mark): I don't.

Q: When did President Johnson give you sort of the general commission to lead the peace initiatives?

HARRIMAN: Where's that memorandum I wanted? The first mission that he gave me is this one that I speak of at the end of -- it was really Christmas week. He called me at noon and I was off at 8:00 o'clock that evening. The only instructions that I had -- the information that I had -- were the 14 Points which I used to good advantage.

I've got a little memorandum here of my talk with him in Manila in October '66 -- that same year -- and this was rather typical. I'll give you a copy because I'm sure you haven't got it. These were my notes of "No Distribution" of my personal talk with the President. He asked me to return and visit a number of countries, which I'll speak about in a little while, to describe what had happened in Manila. I asked the President what he wanted me to emphasize to the heads of governments that I saw. He replied, "You know what I want, peace. And you can quote me in any way that you think would be helpful. I will support anything you say."

Q: That's about as broad a commission as you can hold.

HARRIMAN: He said, "Has any President ever given you more sweeping authority than that?" And I replied, "No." I told the President I thought the Manila conference had been extraordinarily valuable even though the effect would not necessarily be felt for months. This is a little personal touch which you might want.

I remember on several occasions I would ask him that question and he would say, 'Averell, you know better than I do, go ahead and talk to them. Tell them. You know what I want.' This was the attitude of President Roosevelt on a number of different occasions, without any instructions, and I have been used to doing it. But I always had a feeling that President Roosevelt gave me this authority and if I did all right, I'd be all right; if I did something which he didn't like, I would be out on a limb and the branch would be sawed off. But with President Johnson I knew exactly that he meant this, what he said. I had a complete feeling of confidence that he meant exactly what he said. Of course in each one of these cases he knew that I was familiar with the subject. He wasn't giving me a wild blank check because he knew that I was thoroughly informed. A most interesting case was one that he sent me a few days after the Dominican --

Q: April of 1965 when you went to various Latin American countries?

HARRIMAN: Yes. This was an extraordinary trip. I reported. I think I've got nothing more.

Q: You went in May, it was probably before you left.

HARRIMAN: I arrived in Bogota, the first stop, on May 1, so it must have been on April 30.

(Mark): This is the report, a summary.

HARRIMAN I did not make a report on this. I've got a very detailed report of a trip I made after Manila, after this trip. Perhaps I'd better cover the Manila first.

Q: All right, sir.

HARRIMAN: I submitted this to the President and I assume you have a copy of this?

Q: If it went to him, yes sir. There should be one in his files.

HARRIMAN: But this is a copy dated November 28 for the President and the Secretary of State and it has an account of each one of the visits I made at the end of November, right after Manila. It has a summary report and then it has a memorandum which is entitled, "Matters of particular interest to each country." in which I have a detailed statement of what I saw in each country as it related to the countries themselves as well as to the Manila trip.

I felt a great need of haste on that trip because it was only important if I saw the head of government immediately. And I remember one very extraordinary day on which I had already stopped at Indonesia and I had seen the three principal members of that government, I stopped at Ceylon, and that was an interesting visit because not very many people visit Ceylon, and I'm glad I did because Ceylon is quite an influential Buddhist state, and they had been attempting to work with the Saigon government and with the Thai government to improve their relations and it was quite interesting. And I went to New Delhi and I saw Mrs. Gandhi and I spent the night. I remember having breakfast with Ambassador Bowles. Then I saw President Ayub, had lunch with him. I had to go to Peshawar and take a separate plane to go down to Rawalpindi. Then on to Tehran. I had tea with the Shah and I arrived in Rome just in time for a live 11:00 o'clock broadcast on television.

Q: That was some day!

HARRIMAN: That was one of the fullest days that I've had. But I felt it was very important. I was in a particular hurry on that trip because I thought if I went quickly to places it was important. I saw of course the Italian representatives, the Italian government. I remember one untoward incident was the ambassador. After Italy I went to France and I talked to the NATO Council there. I saw Couve de Murville. I didn't see De Gaulle on the visit. I went to Bonn. I went to London. I saw, of course, both Prime Minister Wilson and Brown.

Then I went to Morocco at the request of Ambassador Tasca. That was an unfortunate visit from my standpoint because Bourguiba was particularly furious that I hadn't gone to see him, so I had to make a special trip a few weeks later, on which I went to Tunisia, Algeria and Spain on that next trip. But it was a good thing because the King, whom I had known for some time -- as a matter of fact I had met him as a little boy at Casablanca Conference when President Roosevelt saw the King. They have a very warm feeling toward the United States in general, particularly President Roosevelt, because President Roosevelt took a very strong position that Morocco should have its independence, and they gave him credit for it. Unfortunately, we've had difficulties with some of our relations with Morocco because we promised -- I think President Johnson promised a very moderate amount of perhaps 12 million dollars worth of military equipment -- to sell them that. And there was some difficulty with the delivery and some second thinking about it. So it was a useful trip for that reason.

Q: Did any of the visits on that trip result in any initiatives toward negotiations with Hanoi?

HARRIMAN: No. The purpose of this trip was quite a different purpose. As you'll see from this little memorandum I'll give you, the purpose of the trip was to inform them about the Manila Conference; to inform them of the efforts the President was making for peaceful settlement; to get support for the President's initiative for peace. And I didn't ask them to take any immediate steps. In this memorandum about this trip I emphasized the fact that the President sat at a round table with six Asian leaders as equals, which impressed them; the favorable military developments of South Vietnam; the limited objective that the President had of letting the people of South Vietnam decide their own future. I won't go into it all, but these were all matters which they were interested in -- the constitutional procedures which had been established. It was more a general effort to get a more sympathetic attitude towards what we were doing among these countries than it was to ask them to do anything particular for peace. I expressed the President's willingness to stop the bombing if there was reciprocal action taken by Hanoi, and in some places I was very frank. I told Mr. Couve de Murville that what President De Gaulle had done at Phnom Penh was counter productive. I had known Murville for many years, and there was no problem about being particularly blunt about it.

Q: I believe the Poles were in the middle of a new peace initiative right about that time. Were you involved in that one?

HARRIMAN: Oh yes, that was the so-called Marigold, covered by this memorandum. I wasn't talking at this time about these different peace initiatives. There were a number of them that were constantly keeping us busy. That was a peace initiative which started with Ambassador Lodge talking with the Italian Ambassador and bringing in the Polish representative.

Unfortunately, the middle of these talks -- I don't think I have to supplement what was said here about how the talks broke down. I've always been satisfied that the Poles were acting in good faith. But they never had a firm commitment from Hanoi to start negotiations. But they were trying to act in good faith as middle men between getting two recalcitrant people -- I won't say recalcitrant -- two people together who were at loggerheads. And they weren't successful in doing it. Unfortunately, the bombing of Hanoi came in at that time -- which was just bad luck, no connection between the two.

Now I think I might say something about the Dominican visit, because I thought that was quite a useful trip. There again, the President sent me off with a minimum of notice --

Q: And minimum of instruction, too?

HARRIMAN: No instructions. As a matter of fact that trip developed as I went. I think I took one foreign service officer with me. I was to go first to Bogota, and then the trip developed from that. I had it rather rapid again, because unless I went quickly it didn't mean very much. They were all concerned over the Dominican -- remember we landed our troops; first a small detachment, then a rather large detachment -- and the facts were developing as I went along. I went to eight countries, and talked to heads of government of eight different Latin American countries, and was gone from Washington exactly seven days. So you can see it was rather hurried, particularly as I didn't have a special plane. I did use the attaché's planes over a couple of legs of the journey but it was rather a hectic trip on commercial air flights.

I saw the press. I've always made it a rule never to talk on background but only to talk on the record. I think one of the great mistakes some people make is to try to talk with people in foreign countries for background. They don't understand it, number one; and number two; the Americans don't really abide by it because there is always someone they talk to in confidence who leaks it out. So I talked to the press on arrival. Naturally the trips were heralded to some extent and the press and television and radio were always present on arrival and on departure. I answered questions, which were also on television. Since our position was actually changing from period to period -- remember we first went in to save lives, and then we went in with a larger and larger group -- so I took the position that our motives were to save lives and to end the fighting. They should wait until the last chapter was written, and then they would see all the President had in mind was to make it possible for the people of the Dominican Republic to express their own views without the tragedy of any more bloodshed.

Q: Do you think they understood that?

HARRIMAN: On the whole I had a pretty good press in spite of the fact that in a number of these countries they were quite shocked by the intervention, the move from the principle of Roosevelt's Good Neighbor Policy, which was really the end of landing Marines, was quite a shock in a number of countries. As I recall it, about half the countries were sympathetic and about half the countries were very much opposed. As I recall it, the President of Colombia was sympathetic. Of course Brazil was sympathetic. I spent two days in Brazil because I had to go from Rio to Brasilia. I saw the President there. Then also the President of Panama was sympathetic. I thought it was four, but I'm not sure. It was certainly at least three.

The other countries refused to say anything. Some of them were quite sympathetic to the President. The President of Chile was a good friend of the President's and he said that he could not take any public position, for his own political position -- he was having a good deal of trouble at the time. There were demonstrations going on at that time. That was the only place I had any difficulty with demonstrations. But that was going on against him so he couldn't take any public position. The other presidents, I think, felt the same way about it. That whole record of the position of each country is well known, so I don't think there's any use going into it.

Q: No.

HARRIMAN: But it certainly did some good in that they felt somewhat better about the fact that the President sent his personal representative to explain the position. And it did some good in the press, because I didn't dodge any questions and I answered them. That was the most active, in fact, it was the most exhausting trip I made.

I think in all, during the four years from '64 to '68, until I got involved, I went to nearly 50 countries and some several times, pretty well divided between Latin America, Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia. In almost every case I saw the head of government and had some particular reason for President Johnson. That may not have been true about Africa because for one year, from March '64-'65 the President assigned me the job of looking after Africa. I was not much involved in Vietnamese affairs during that period, except as related to the question of peace.

Q: What about those initiatives for peace? You mentioned Marigold, I know there are a lot of other ones. Are there other ones that reached the stage of considerable importance?

HARRIMAN: Well, the most important one I think were the discussions in London --

Q: February '67?

HARRIMAN: I happened to be in Florida for a long weekend -- one of the few times I was away and I'm sorry that I wasn't there. That was a very unfortunate period. It was bad luck. It was bad luck that Kosygin was in London just at the time of the four-day Tet cessation of bombing. There's no doubt that the North Vietnamese took most extraordinary advantage of that four-day stop in bombing. I think the Navy reported that it looked as if at 7 o'clock, whenever it was, a curtain went up and the flocks of small ships and large ships moved down. And then when it was over, the curtain came down. I remember one of the pilots, who was observing one of the routes of North Vietnam into Laos, said "This looks like the Jersey turnpike on a Sunday afternoons" There was tremendous pressure from our military on the President. He did extend it, I've forgotten how many hours, whether it was a day or something, a little bit longer. But I've always thought it was very bad luck that Kosygin was in London at that time. If he had been there several weeks, or a couple weeks ahead of Tet, or a couple of weeks afterwards, and hadn't been tied to this Tet cessation, something might have come out of it, because Kosygin told Wilson that he was ready to do something to bring us together. I've always felt something would have come of that if it hadn't been tied to this Tet period.

Kosygin asked that it be extended, and there really wasn't time. We almost gave him an ultimatum -- "you must have an answer within a period of time," which was quite impossible to get.

Now Wilson thought they were making progress. [Chester] Chet Cooper was in London at that time. He was my assistant working on this. He had a very close relationship with Wilson and with Brown, he had been there earlier before they were important dignitaries. I'm satisfied they were taking it very seriously, and there's every indication that Kosygin was trying to do something.

But I don't in any way suggest the President was wrong in not extending the Tet truce at that time -- or the pause in bombing at that time -- because the North Vietnamese were taking such fantastic advantage of it. It was almost impossible to stop the military from demanding they be continued. So, as I say, if it had been in a lull, possibly something might have come of this talk because there is no doubt Kosygin wanted to do something as later was shown in the telegrams that he sent the President. I think there's one in June of '68, in which he said something to the effect, "I and my colleagues have reason to believe. . ." Therefore the talks which started between the Russians and Hanoi in January '66 evidently were continued, and although Moscow never took a very firm position of insisting that Hanoi should start negotiations, I'm satisfied that they did what they felt they could within the limits of their relationship with Hanoi and the influence that they could bear. But in any event I think that one in London was one of the most promising.

I had no patience for U Thant and some of his claims, in which he suggested that he told Stevenson that if certain things were done at a certain time, peace talks could start. It was quite a different thing to have some rather vague talks begin from having anything come of them. So I've very little patience for the criticisms that certain people made that opportunities were lost. I think the Marigold talk might have led to some talks in Warsaw between our representatives if it had not been for the unfortunate bombing of Hanoi, but whether they would have come to anything or not it's very hard to say. None of these various attempts -- there was the one with the two Frenchmen which Henry Kissinger --

Q: Yes, in the summer of 1967 --

HARRIMAN: President Johnson did everything -- he gave every opportunity and I don't recall any of them in which I felt there was any loss except as I have suggested, the two -- the closest -- Marigold, and the talks with Wilson in London in February of '67?

Q: What about your own mission to the Romanians in late '67?

HARRIMAN: The Romanians were given every opportunity and they showed, as the Poles did, a real desire to do something. In fact, they did even more than the Poles because they sent -- what was the name of that man, Macevesecau -- their deputy foreign minister on two trips. One was the result of my visit to Romania in the -- I think that was about the first of December, 1967. I stopped in to see them because I had understood that they were unhappy that I hadn't visited them before, had long talks with prime minister Maurer. As a result of that trip they sent their senior officer to Hanoi. He came back and reported to us here in Washington the result of his trip; made a second trip back, but nothing came of it. He did everything he could. They were remarkably accurate, I thought, in the reports of the conversations, because they told the bad news as well as the good. It was an indication of the good faith of the Romanian government in attempting to bring us together.

Q: Then it was the President's speech of March 31, that finally did get things started. It was not some other initiative?

HARRIMAN: No, it was entirely the President's initiative. I think a lot of these efforts began to bear fruit, because no doubt in January '66 when Michalowski went there, the North Vietnamese were unwilling to start negotiations. I think the March 31 -- I was rather surprised. I didn't think that this partial bombing halt would bring them to talks. I like to show the times I was wrong. People are very apt to remember only the times they were right. But if I had to bet -- no one asked me to bet -- but if I had been asked to bet whether there would be a favorable response to the March 31 speech I would have said the reply would be negative. It might lead to something else, but they wouldn't start talking. At least on even money I would have bet against it. But it did start the talks. You know what happened from the full record of those talks. The most minute of details are in the records.

Q: When did the President tell you that he wanted you to be his representative for the talks, and how did he instruct you for that?

HARRIMAN: I think that Rusk told me first. Of course, in those negotiations we had the most detailed instructions. Every statement we made in the public meetings -- we drafted them in Paris, sent them to Washington, and got them approved. We did have a number of private talks, in which we had general instructions rather than detailed instructions. Those went on -- the first ones were with Cy Vance and Colonel Lao, and the later ones with both of us together with Mr. Habib, who is an extremely capable foreign service officer, assigned to us, who had served in Saigon. The three of us met with Le Duc Tho, when he was there, and if he wasn't there, met with Xuan Thuy, who was the head of the mission.

And those talks, we got to know a good deal of the North Vietnamese thinking on a number of subjects, but not in regard to the political settlement because we did not want to discuss any details of any political settlement without the Saigon government present. I'd always hoped that the Saigon government and the NLF would get together, with or without Hanoi and ourselves being present, sooner or later working out some kind of an agreement which only the Vietnamese could work out. It's very hard to figure what kind of an agreement is satisfactory to both Saigon and the NLF. There are certain aspects of the NLF which I think we should bear in mind, although there's no doubt, as we've said many times, that the whole uprising of the V C was stimulated, organized, trained, financed, supplied, directed from Hanoi; these NLF people are Southerners and there is a difference of point of view between Southerners and Hanoi, just as there is in the Soviet Union between the Ukrainians and Moscow, and certain other parts of Russia.

I think they want to remain independent for a certain period of years before they join -- there have been varying statements from five or 10 to 15 years. And I think there are certain things the Southerners can do among themselves which Hanoi will go along with. But the NLF, I don't think, wants to be taken over by Hanoi until the government of South Vietnam is on an equal basis with them.

So I thought, frankly, there is a fundamental basis on which the Southerners can get together if they are willing to do so. On the other hand I have felt that it is absolutely essential for the United States and North Vietnam to come to an agreement. We have got to remember that Hanoi didn't keep the Laos agreement for a single day. They didn't tell this to me, but they contended to some of the Americans that saw them and reported to me that they were forced to sign that agreement, which they didn't like, by the larger powers, presumably Russia and China. They made the naive expression, the statement, "We always keep agreements that we make ourselves." Well, what is obvious in dealing with all the communists is they only keep the agreements that are in their interest to do so. Therefore, I think we've got to come to an agreement between the United States and Hanoi, with Moscow's help, for a long term relationship.

I'm encouraged that this can be done because at several times the negotiators in Paris in our private talks asked about what kind of relationship they could have. They want to be independent of Peking and of Moscow, and they want some relationship with us. They look upon American technology as the best in the world. They showed fascination in the miracle rice, as an example. They wanted to be independent of China and the supply of their food. They are inclined to believe this miracle rice, plus the techniques of using it, will do so. So I think there's a chance that we can have some sort of relationship which will last for a period of years which will make them live -- I said very bluntly that the North Vietnamese would have to learn to live with their neighbors in peace or there will be no peace in Southeast Asia. They never answered that. But it's not going to be easy.

So far President Nixon has lost the momentum which, under President Johnson, we had in Paris. I think they were quite prepared to discuss the mutual de-escalation of the violence and some real progress could have been made if the Saigon government had appeared on November 6.

Q: The press reported last summer in 1968 a reduced level of violence. Was there a time that you and Mr. Vance thought we might have --

HARRIMAN: Yes, that's on the record. We made great public and private statements to the Hanoi representatives about their shelling of the cities and actually I found, in two cases, by appealing to world opinion we got Hanoi to reverse actions they were taking.

The first was in regard to the prisoners. I was asked by the President to watch the prisoner of war situation, which I did from May 1967. He wanted someone to give attention to the prisoners of war and so I did. But the North Vietnamese were then talking about trials of our prisoners as war criminals. We did a lot. We started a campaign in every country; we asked every embassy, sent out directives, and a major drive was put on. The North Vietnamese abandoned that, because they were held up as misusing prisoners. They, of course, never would permit, which we tried every way we could, to get representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit the prisoners. But they did end those trials.

The next was in connection with this bombing of the cities. We did put on a major drive to get people to recognize the barbarism of hitting, shelling, cities -- I mean civilian population in the cities -- even to the point where U Thant, you remember, came out with a statement. That offended them very much, to have U Thant come out against --

Q: On our side.

HARRIMAN: On our side -- it was a unique experience. So they stopped it. I think they stopped about the middle of June. I think actually the last time that one or two shells dropped in Saigon was June 18. So for two months there was very little action.

Now they are quite blunt on this in our private talks. They said, "Whenever we do anything which is of an offensive nature, you say that these actions on our part are not conducive to progress in our Paris talks for peace." which is almost verbatim of what I used to say. "But then just as soon as we stop them, your military in Saigon boast that the war is over, we've got them licked!" Actually, I think this is correct. I think that's an unfortunate aspect of some of the statements that come out of -- it's quite natural for military men to make statements which they think to be true.

No doubt after an offensive, they have to regroup, and have to resupply. It's a very long and tedious journey to get stuff from Hanoi down through the jungles into the hands of the enemy forces. But in that summer, Vance and I both thought this lull had a political connotation as well. The same was true the end of October or early November. They disengaged in the northern two provinces. They had 25 regiments in the northern two provinces, some of the toughest fighting was going on there. They took out 22 of the 25 regiments. Eleven of them went as far north as the 20th parallel, nearly 200 miles. When the orders were given for General Abrams to put all-out pressure on the enemy, he took the First Air Cavalry Division out of that area, because the fighting had been so reduced, down to the Third Corps. Our military say they had to do it -- in Saigon.

After analyzing all the information we had the military in Paris agreed with us -- we were in full agreement -- there was a political connotation as well as a military in the actions they were taking at that time. So I have a belief -- Cy Vance and I both believe, and nobody will get us to change that opinion -- that this was a military action which they took in reply to the President's action of stopping the bombing. We could have made progress if the Saigon government had joined the talks in Paris at that time.

Now the information we had as to the fact of the matter in the Saigon discussions were stated publicly by Mr. Clifford in his November 12 press conference. Everything he said confirmed what our impressions were, and of course he had some information about which we were not familiar. I think he said that they had stayed up all night discussing it, and he went to bed to have some sleep before listening to the President's speech announcing that he had stopped the bombing. That was October 28, and the word came that Saigon wouldn't agree. This was a great shock to him. It was a great shock to us in Paris. We had no indication at that time that President Thieu hadn't fully agreed with every step the President was taking. So it's a very serious regret that they didn't move at that time. What their motives were it's hard to tell, but I'm satisfied that someone was sending information to them, "don't do anything before election." They wanted Nixon to win. They thought he would be tougher. I'm sure that President Nixon had nothing to do with it, but I'm sure certain people did send them that information. And then everything that Vice President Ky did in Paris and Lam did later on when they finally agreed to talk, when we had these weeks and weeks of discussions about procedural questions. They wanted to hold up talks until President Nixon came in. They didn't want to have any substantive talks while President Johnson was in office -- because they thought that President Nixon would be tougher or more inclined to go along with them. In fact I believe President KY did his best to break the talks up. He would have liked to see them wiped off the slate before President Nixon took over.

Q: Did you and Mr. Vance recommend that the United States cut our military activity back during that period?

HARRIMAN: We had some discussions about it when we were back here and I told the Secretary of State that we felt, both of us, that it would be well to do so. But I don't think we put anything on the record. We didn't want to put things on the record which might be at variance with the President's position. We did recommend in the summer, which is on the record, that we should take advantage of the lull -- you see the President in his March 31 speech said that "if the other side will take some reciprocal action, I will stop all the bombing," or something to that effect. We thought this lull in military action was sufficient to take that step. The President didn't believe so and didn't take action at that time. Then I'm satisfied that in October, myself, that the Thieu government didn't -- one of the reasons they didn't go along was because they were advised by their friends, including Madam Chennault as well as the Ambassador here, that if we did have peace, Humphrey would be elected. Whether that would have happened or not I of course can't say, but South Vietnam was told that they had better not take that chance. I'm quite sure that President Nixon had nothing to do with it, but some friends passed that word out.

Well, was there anything else?

Q: I was going to say, you have just a few minutes on the end of this tape; if there is anything you'd like to add, don't let me limit you.

HARRIMAN: No, I was naturally tremendously gratified -- Vance and I both were, devoted to the President -- that we were able to be to some extent instrumental in getting what I have called publicly the train on the tracks, the peace train on the tracks with it's full head of steam up. And on January 18 we finally came to agreement on all procedural questions, but President Nixon has done nothing for five months since then. The steam has gone out. The whole Situation has toughened up. He's lost a tremendous opportunity, and I wouldn't be telling the truth if I wasn't extremely upset. President Nixon has spent this time, as far as I can find out, doing nothing except discuss with Thieu the relationship between our two countries. Vance stayed in Paris for 30 days. Lodge was not permitted to talk. He stayed there principally to turn over to Lodge the relationship we established. I'm not suggesting we had any particular friendly relations, but we got to know each other to a point where we knew when they were telling the truth and they had more confidence in us.

Actually I don't think the President permitted Lodge to have private talks with the Hanoi delegation for two months. That lost the momentum which President Johnson had made possible and dissipated a great service which President Johnson did for our country and to an incoming President in having these negotiations in a position where they could be carried on. What will happen from now on, I don't want to predict, but I am resentful, extremely resentful, of the fact that President Nixon took four months, until May the 14th, before he announced his policies. As far as I can make out, there wasn't anything he said on May 14 which President Johnson had not previously said. I tried to do the best I could publicly, and said it was a constructive speech, and pointed out certain aspects that were constructive. I've been publicly appealing to the President to carry on private discussions for an agreement in reduction in the violence. I think if we carried on under President Johnson's leadership we could have done that, and what the political settlement would have been, I can't tell. But it was Vance's and my belief that we should cut the violence down, and we did not believe that any progress could be made politically as long as both sides were trying to spar for an improved position militarily.

Q: Do you feel like President Johnson was prepared to rescind the orders to put all pressures on?

HARRIMAN: I'm personally am sure he would have if we could have shown there would be mutual reduction of violence. He felt that until we got the four parties together that full pressure should be kept on them. But if we had come forward with a mutual reduction of violence, I'm quite satisfied that he would have agreed to that. They told us in private talks that we would make no progress as long as we were trying to improve our petition. As soon as we started the talks we should have accepted the status quo on the ground and gone to a peaceful settlement. This attempt to have a slightly better military position is not conducive to any progress, as far as I'm concerned. President Nixon came into the office, having promised the American people he had a plan for peace. And when he made his first speech on Vietnam four months after he became President, he said, "I have been very diligent in looking at every aspect of the situation in Vietnam, and now I've come to the following conclusions." And he made a statement which reaffirmed practically everything that President Johnson said.

Q: Concluded that "my predecessor was right!"

HARRIMAN: Yes. If we had been allowed to be attacking the President -- which is something about the American system that differs from the British. As soon as a man becomes Prime Minister he's subject to attack by the opposition. Here, we're suppose to give them a period of time-

Q: A 100 days or something.

HARRIMAN: Well, a 100 days, but now Senator Mansfield has given him 6 months which will be another month. But if I had been in the position to state publicly what I felt privately, it's that he deceived the American people into thinking he had a plan, and he boasts about the fact that he's been diligent for four months while American boys were being killed at an increasing rate, and then reiterates the President's [Johnson] position. I don't think there was a thing he said in the May 14th speech which hadn't previously been stated by President Johnson. So I'm frankly very resentful of it. And I do believe that if President Johnson had continued as President we would be in much better shape in regard to negotiations now than we are. I can't predict the future.

Today Mr. Vance, who felt so deeply about it has endorsed the Clark Kerr group, who are out for a negotiated settlement. Their first provision is to declare a cease-fire -- a mutual cease-fire. I've stated publicly we ought to negotiate a reduction of violence leading to the cease-fire. And I'm satisfied we're not going to make any progress in the political settlement until we undertake to reduce the fighting.

DEAN RUSK
Secretary of State
Washington, DC (1961-1969)

Secretary of State Dean Rusk was born on September 2, 1909. He went to David College, receiving a B.A. in 1931, and later received an M.A. as a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University in 1934. After college, he joined the U.S. Army from 1940-1946. He joined the State Department in 1946. His interview was conducted in 1987.

Q: You were of course involved in Vietnam from a very early time, and I'd like to get some indication as to how much Mr. Johnson as Vice President was involved during that period.

RUSK: Well, in the first place, he was kept fully informed about everything that was happening in Vietnam. He attended the National Security Council meetings and Cabinet meetings, and he had a State Department officer on his staff who kept him briefed on the daily reports from Vietnam. So I would say that he had full information. He did make a trip to Vietnam, as you will recall, and the historian will have a chance to read his full report on that trip.

Q: Did you talk to him about that trip?

RUSK: I talked to him about it after he came back. He was briefed on it before he left. I was present when he reported on his trip to President Kennedy, but I think it would not be correct to say that Vice President Johnson participated in the detailed decisions that were made by President Kennedy on Vietnam unless President Kennedy talked to him privately about them because the key decisions were made not at formal meetings but informally by President Kennedy in consultation with his key advisers.

Q: And Mr. Johnson was usually not present at that.

RUSK: He was not regularly present at those special meetings that were called.

Now the most important decision that President Kennedy made was to go beyond the levels of troops that were in effect permitted by the 1954 agreements, and greatly to augment our advisory position in South Vietnam. Under the Geneva Agreements the French had been permitted to leave about six hundred and fifty people in South Vietnam as a military assistance group. By agreement with the French, we later substituted Americans for those French, and so we had about six hundred and fifty people there who were ordnance people, and quartermaster people, and signal people, who were there to advise on the use and employment of American equipment that was being supplied under the military assistance program. It became apparent to President Kennedy that that much effort was not going to be nearly enough to do the job, and so he greatly increased the advisory role out there and moved the complement to about seventeen- or eighteen thousand before his death.

Any historian will want to look carefully at what President Kennedy said on the public record about Southeast Asia. You will find a great deal of material in the three volumes of the public papers of President Kennedy. There is no question that he felt very strongly that it was vital to the security of the United States that Southeast Asia be maintained as a free area, that it not be allowed to be overrun by the Communists. That was his policy, and some of the so-called Kennedy people who have tried to portray President Kennedy in a different role just missed the point. I'm not a ghoul, [and] I'm not going to dig President Kennedy out of the grave as a witness to later policy, but I think the historian will want to look carefully at what President Kennedy said publicly while he was President in order to make judgments about what President Kennedy's policy towards Southeast Asia was.

Q: You are saying that the commitment was as firm as it ever had been or could be at the time the Administration changed in late 1963?

RUSK: Yes. President Kennedy made the determination that I think any President would have made, that it was necessary for the United States to make good on its commitment to South Vietnam. Every President since President Truman had come to the conclusion that the security of Southeast Asia was vital to the security of the United States; that if Southeast Asia with its peoples and its vast resources were to be organized by elements hostile to the United States that would create an adverse and major change in the world balance of power; and that it was in the interest of the United States to maintain the independence of these Southeast Asian countries, particularly those covered by the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

So when President Johnson became President, he found seventeen- or eighteen thousand Americans in Vietnam under a policy which was clearly aimed at maintaining the independence of South Vietnam and Laos and Cambodia and Thailand. Now, the question arises as to whether President Johnson could have changed that policy. As Vice President he was certainly loyal to the policy of President Kennedy. There was no question about that. In a purely constitutional sense President Johnson might have been able to reverse course-

Q: But he would have had to do it against -- I take it -- the more or less unanimous advice of his advisers.

RUSK: There was no advice to President Johnson from any of his advisers that we cut and run in Southeast Asia. President Johnson took office determined to carry out the main policies of President Kennedy. He did that both in domestic and foreign affairs.

In another sense the President would find it difficult, if not impossible, to change a commitment of that sort. When you look at the consequences of cutting and running, the consequence is such that no President is likely to be able to accept. Not only would Southeast Asia be overrun, but the fidelity of the United States under its security treaties all over the world would be brought into question. In Asia we have treaties with Korea, Japan, the Republic of China, the Philippines, Thailand, Australia, New Zealand. If those who would become our enemies made the judgment that our participation in those treaties was merely a bluff, then those treaties would have no deterrent effect.

Q: Which is one of their chief purposes.

RUSK: That's quite correct, and the effect would be that there would be those who would be tempted to move into areas which were covered by our treaty commitments elsewhere. To give one or two examples, in June 1961 Chairman Khrushchev produced a crisis on Berlin in his meeting with President Kennedy in Vienna in June. Chairman Krushchev in effect said to President Kennedy, 'We're going to turn East Berlin over to the East Germans, and you've got to work out problems of access and the presence of U.S. troops in Berlin with the East Germans.' The implication was that the East Germans would not permit us to maintain our forces there, and Chairman Krushchev said that any attempt by the United States to use force against the East Germans would mean war. President Kennedy had to look him straight in the eye and say, 'Well, then there will be war, Mr. Chairman. This is going to be a very cold winter.' Now, it was of the utmost importance that Chairman Krushchev believe President Kennedy on that point; otherwise, there might well have been a war.

Coming later to the Cuban missile crisis, President Kennedy had to say to Chairman Krushchev, 'Wow, Mr. Chairman, those missiles must leave Cuba. We'd prefer that they leave by peaceful means, but they must leave.' Now, suppose Chairman Krushchev had said to President Kennedy, or had thought in his own mind, "Don't kid me, Mr. President. I know that your principal newspapers and your key Senators will collapse when I put on the pressure." That's a very good way to have war.

The credibility of the President of the United States at a moment of crisis and the fidelity of the United States to its security treaties are both of the utmost importance in maintaining peace in the world. The idea in the minds of leaders in Moscow and (n Peking that they had better be careful because those fool Americans just might do something about it is one of the principal pillars of peace in the world. So the issue in Southeast Asia is not just Vietnam, it's not even just Southeast Asia. It has to do with the maintenance of peace in a system in which the United States has security treaties with more than forty nations.

Q: The world system --

RUSK: So that any decision by President Johnson in 1963 or '64 to abandon Southeast Asia would have been a decision to abandon the fidelity of the United States under its commitments, and this would have been a very grave thing -- not only in Southeast Asia, but in the general world situation.

Q: Was there any advice at that time that you could have maybe the best of both worlds and honor your commitments and not cut and run, but still not invest any more resources in the position we were trying to hold there? Was there a middle-ground that was an option, even at that time?

RUSK: The historian is going to want to make some judgments about the problem of timing in using our forces in Southeast Asia, this question of gradualism. Basically we were on the strategic defensive in Southeast Asia. All we were trying to do was to deny to North Vietnam its effort to seize South Vietnam by force. Tactically in given local situations we took the offensive, but strategically all we were trying to do was to prevent something. We therefore responded to what North Vietnam was doing. President Kennedy put in an increased number of advisers, hoping that those would be able to overcome the effect of the North Vietnamese personnel that were being infiltrated into the South. Then after our election of 1964, North Vietnam began to send major units of its regular army into South Vietnam so that-

Q: There's no question about that unit infiltration?

RUSK: No, no question about it at all. Not only were they eventually picked up on the ground and identified, but we had intercept material indicating that they were on the way.

Q: This was as early as, you said, right after our election so-

RUSK: We began to get information about the movement of these units in December and January after our election.

Coming back to the point of gradualism -- looking back on it the question arises as to whether we might have prevented further North Vietnamese efforts against South Vietnam had we put in more troops sooner. For example, if President Kennedy had put in one hundred thousand men in 1962 as soon as it was discovered that the Laos Agreement of 1962 was not going to work, or had done it in 1963, it's just possible that that demonstration of substantial force at a very early stage would have caused North Vietnam to pause and decide that the Americans really were serious. But the gradual response left it open to North Vietnam to speculate that if they just did a little bit more, they'd be able to overcome what the Americans were willing to do. We followed the policy of gradualism in terms of responding to what North Vietnam was doing partly because we didn't want a larger war ourselves, partly because we were on the strategic defensive and were therefore responding to what the North was doing, partly because we did not wish to stimulate China and the Soviet Union into decisions which might have led to some active intervention on their part. We were trying to maintain this as a war that would not go beyond Vietnam, you see. But this is a judgment that the historian will have to make.

Q: Did the fact that we had an election in 1964 and that Mr. Johnson was terribly concerned and distracted by that perhaps make it difficult for him to give the attention to Vietnam that first year that might have produced a different result had he had the time and the concentration to do it?

RUSK: No, he gave full attention to Vietnam during the campaign and in the period just after the campaign. There was never any inattention on his part. What he was doing during that period was, in effect, coasting along on the decisions that had been made by President Kennedy. The level of forces did not begin to increase significantly until the spring of 1965.

There is one very interesting point about our elections of '64. Again, the historian will want to look into this, particularly if he can get any information available out of North Vietnam. President Johnson, although reaffirming our commitments throughout his campaign in 1964, made it clear that we were not interested in a larger war. Barry Goldwater, his opposition candidate, talked as though he wanted to make it into a larger war in order to get it over with. Johnson won. It's entirely possible that the fellows in Hanoi said, 'aha, Johnson has won the election. He says he doesn't want a larger war. This means that we can have a larger war without an increase in risk.' It was after our election and before the starting of the bombing of North Vietnam that North Vietnam began to send the regular units of its own army into South Vietnam. The 304th Division, for example, was started out for the South very soon after our election, so we've sometimes speculated as to-whether Hanoi misinterpreted the election of 1964 and thought that they could therefore increase their forces without running the risk of increasing the United States forces.

Q: Although that had come after the Tonkin attack when we'd demonstrated our policy of retaliation before the election.

RUSK: Yes, but they might have decided that that was an isolated episode and that this was not a matter of general policy, because there were some other attacks that had not led to retaliation.

Q: Right. And that was one of the questions I wanted to ask you. Was there a reason why we followed a policy of retaliation at Tonkin, and then at Bien Hoa and other instances we didn't do so?

RUSK: Well, I think that the main difference was that in the Tonkin Gulf incident there were attacks on American ships on the high seas in the Gulf of Tonkin and the issue there was whether or not --

Q: There wasn't any question of the facts? I don't mean to interrupt you, but the facts were quite clear with the people who were considering the policy that this had in fact happened?

RUSK: I never had any doubts about the facts. Certainly, no one has seriously challenged the first attack. There has been some doubt cast on the second attack. But the commander of the ship and all the intervening commanders had no doubt about it, and I was impressed with the intercept material which we picked up from North Vietnam because my impression at the time was that North Vietnam had no doubt about the fact that they were attacking these ships, you see. And they were the ones who would have the best means of knowing.

Q: The critics have made a point of what our ships were doing there, supporting apparently covert operations by the South Vietnamese. Had the policy -- or allowing or ordering that support -- been discussed at the Cabinet-level?

RUSK: These vessels were not there in support of any coastal operations by the South Vietnamese. They were not there in that role. They were there on missions that were more like the Pueblo mission. They were on an independent intelligence-gathering mission in the Gulf of Tonkin. Of course, since it was high seas we expected to maintain our capability of being present in the Gulf of Tonkin, and we weren't going to be driven off the high seas in the Gulf of Tonkin just because of a scrap going on in South Vietnam. But it is not true -- and Secretary McNamara testified to this -- that these vessels of ours were there covering or, in a sense, associated with some South Vietnamese coastal operation.

You see there had been a little guerilla war going along on the coast back and forth across the DMZ between the North Vietnamese and the South Vietnamese. The North Vietnamese were using coastal waters for infiltrating men and arms into the South, and the South Vietnamese were retaliating. But the destroyers that were attacked in the Gulf of Tonkin were not there to give cover to operations of that sort.

Q: Was this policy of retaliation already decided upon prior to its event, or was it one that you met and decided upon after the attacks occurred?

RUSK: It was decided upon after the attacks occurred.

Q: Was that a meeting in which the President personally got involved?

RUSK: Oh, yes, he was very much involved in this one.

Q: What about the degree of advice at that time? Was it still pretty much unanimous that this was something we couldn't allow, or were there important objections?

RUSK: I don't recall any significant objections from any of the senior advisers. I think the advisers to the President were unanimous on this point.

Q: That we should retaliate?

RUSK: That's right. There was some discussion about how many points and what kind of targets and things of that sort, and it was decided to limit the retaliation to the bases from which these torpedo boats had come out and basically retaliate against the nature of the attack rather than to attack Hanoi and Haiphong and more general targets.

Q: What about the Resolution that grew out of it? Was that something that also arose at that time, or was that a matter that had been discussed previously and decided upon?

RUSK: Fairly early in his Administration, President Johnson came to the conclusion that at some stage he was going to ask Congress to associate themselves with the effort in Vietnam.

He had remembered very clearly that at the outbreak of the Korean War that Congressional leaders had advised President Truman not to ask for a Congressional resolution and suggested to President Truman that he use the powers of the President to conduct the Korean operation. Well, President Truman accepted that advice and did not ask for a resolution, and then some Senators, particularly Senator [Robert A.] Taft, later attacked the whole operation on the grounds that he should have asked for a resolution.

President Johnson, remembering that, felt that at some stage he wanted to associate the Congress with him in the effort in Vietnam. Since that was known, various efforts were made to see what a draft resolution would look like. I never participated in those directly because I never thought the time was ripe to ask the Congress for a resolution, so that I am not familiar with the details of some of that preliminary staff work that had been done.

Then when the Gulf of Tonkin came along and the President consulted with the leadership of the Congress, he discussed with them whether this was not the time now to go for a resolution putting the Congress behind the United States policy on Vietnam and making it clear to North Vietnam that we were serious about it. The Congressional leadership encouraged him to do so. There was practical unanimity among Congressional leaders on the desirability of a Congressional resolution, and so we had our hearings, and promptly the Congress passed the so-called Gulf of Tonkin Resolution with only two dissenting votes in the Senate.

Paragraph II of that resolution, which the historian will be able to see, of course, was not about the Gulf of Tonkin, but was about Southeast Asia, and it simply affirmed that the United States is prepared as The President determines to use whatever means are necessary including the use of armed force to assist the states covered by the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization in the defense of their liberty. Now, there was no question at all at the time about the meaning of that resolution.

Q: The critics -- Mr. [J. William] Fulbright particularly, has later said that he didn't understand it to mean what it was later said to mean. Were there questions at the time? Was he given some kind of assurance at the time that has led him wrong?

RUSK: I think the historian will want to look at the discussion on the floor of the Senate on that resolution in order to make a judgment on that kind of point, because as I recall one Senator asked Senator Fulbright whether this resolution would encompass the dispatch of large numbers of forces to South Vietnam. Senator Fulbright said, "Yes, the resolution would cover that." He hoped that it would not be necessary to take such steps, but that the resolution would cover it. So that there was no question at all in my mind at the time that the Congress knew what kind of resolution they were passing. Some of them later changed their minds, and when they changed their minds they tried to throw some cloud upon the resolution itself. But there was no doubt about it at the time the resolution was passed.

Q: And no one was fooled who didn't want to be fooled.

RUSK: No, it's very simple language. These Senators are all educated men. It's only two or three short sentences. They knew exactly what they were voting for, and the floor discussion in the Senate brought out all of these aspects. Senator Morse, for example, who opposed the resolution, told the Senate very frankly what this resolution meant, and because it meant that he himself opposed it. It was a very far-reaching resolution.

In the testimony, by the way, Senator Fulbright told me at the close of Secretary McNamara's and my testimony that this was the best resolution of this sort that he had ever seen presented to the Senate. I noticed that that particular sentence was deleted from the published text of the testimony.

Q: That takes on considerable irony in the light of later events.

RUSK: I will never forget Senator Fulbright's remark in that regard. He was all for it at the time. He urged the Senate to give it immediate and unanimous approval. Perhaps we made a mistake in not calling it the Fulbright Resolution.

Q: I keep asking you about whether or not anybody was opposed because I think it is important to get it into the record that there was, if it seems there was, unanimity through this period on these decisions that sometimes the critics later forget about. It's a little repetitious for me to keep asking you, but that's why I do it.

RUSK: President Johnson briefed the Congress on Vietnam more extensively than any President has briefed the Congress on anything. When he first became President he used to have briefing sessions at the White House for Senators and Congressmen. He brought them down in groups and he'd have the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State give them a full discussion and gave them a chance to ask questions [and] make comments and I think he went through the entire Congress at least twice in this course. There was not evident at that time in those briefings and the reactions of the Senators and Congressmen to those briefings -- there was not evident any I serious opposition to what we were trying to do in Vietnam.

It was not until the costs of the war increased, it was not until large numbers of Americans got out there and the casualties went up, that in 1966 and 1967 there began to be second thoughts in the Congress about our commitments in Vietnam.

Q: Some of them then forgot how they had reacted to your --

RUSK: That's right, and they forgot that they passed the Southeast Asia Treaty with only one dissenting vote back in 1955, with only Senator [William] Langer [R-ND] opposing it. Senator Morse voted for the Southeast Asia Treaty; Senator Mansfield signed the Southeast Asia Treaty along with Mr. Dulles and Senator [H.Alexander] Smith [R-NJ] in Manila when the Southeast Asia Treaty was first brought into being.

Q: At the same time all of this was going on, during the summer, there were some I suppose you could call them peace initiatives being made. Can you add anything on things such as the Seaborne mission as to what we were trying to do at that point, the sort of guarded approaches we were making?

RUSK: Let me make some general observations on so-called peace initiatives. On our side some of us had remembered that other crises had been resolved by preliminary secret contacts before any publicly known discussions got under way, The Berlin crisis of 1948 was resolved by private contacts between Ambassador [Philip C.] Jessup and Ambassador [Jacob A.] Malik in New York, and the matter was pretty well settled before the fact that talks were being held even became known.

The Korean War was put in the course of settlement by some very private contacts which have never been in the public record involving Ambassador [George] Kennan on the part of the United States, and that led to the negotiations which brought the Korean War to a conclusion.

So we were always ready to explore the possibility of private contacts which might give the clue to a solution of the problem. We were not interested in prolonging the war, we'd like to wind it up as soon as possible on a satisfactory basis, and we didn't want any possibility that the absence of machinery or the absence of contact would be an obstacle toward bringing the war to a conclusion. So we took a good many initiatives ourselves in stimulating such things as the [J. Blair] Seaborne mission. We were interested when third-party governments tried to get into it -- the Canadians, the Soviets, the Poles, the Hungarians, the Romanians -- or when individuals like U Thant or private citizens tried to play a role in one way or another. We were always ready to try out those various channels to see whether or not there was any indication on the part of Hanoi that they would be interested in talking about peace.

One thing that the historian will discover if he looks carefully through the record is that so long as I was Secretary of State there was never an initiative from Hanoi that could be described as a peace-feeler. The initiatives always came from somebody else, either ourselves or third parties. I cannot recall a single instance in which there was an initiative from Hanoi that could be described as a peace-feeler. Again the historian may want to make a judgment on whether we tried too hard in these peace-feelers and these various contacts -- that by the frequency in which we probed for some possibility of peace and by the numbers of bombing halts and things of that sort that we might have mislead Hanoi into thinking that we were irresolute.

Q: The same criticism one might make about not starting the troops.

RUSK: That's right. So it may be that we have -- by our concern to be sure that no obstacle stood in the way of making peace -- that we confirmed in Hanoi's mind the idea that we were ready for peace at any price, and therefore caused them to be more obstinate and more stubborn than they might otherwise have been. That's a judgment that the historian will have to make.

Q: Did we have a well-conceived negotiating position at that time or were you just really trying to talk to them -- to make contact with them as opposed to picking out what the negotiation would look like if indeed they got started?

RUSK: The basic negotiating position was really very simple. The problem of peace in Southeast Asia arises because there came to be more than fifty regiments of North Vietnamese troops in South Vietnam, because more than forty thousand North Vietnamese troops were in Laos contrary to the agreement of 1962, because North Vietnamese-trained guerrillas were operating in Thailand, because Prince [Norodom] Sihanouk had publicly charged that Hanoi and Peking were giving assistance to the guerrillas in Cambodia--the most neutral of all neutralist countries. We were aware of the fact that men and arms were being infiltrated across the northeastern frontier of Burma out of China, and the Governor of India has made public the Chinese involvement in the tribal areas of Eastern India.

The problem of peace in Southeast Asia arose because Hanoi and Peking were doing things outside of their own borders that they had no business doing, so our negotiating position was basically that they stop doing it and that they take their troops back home and that the South Vietnamese be allowed to work out their own future for themselves; that the Laos Agreement of 1962 be given full effect; and that things like that North Vietnamese infiltration of Thailand be stopped.

There are some people who would call that asking for unconditional surrender. We weren't asking Hanoi to surrender anything, not an acre of ground, not a man. We weren't trying to destroy Hanoi. We weren't trying to seize them. We weren't trying to support the South Vietnamese in overrunning North Vietnam. All we were trying to do was to get the North Vietnamese to stop doing what they were doing outside of their frontiers against their neighbors in Southeast Asia, so our negotiating position was relatively simple on that point.

There were possibilities [that] if the North Vietnamese wanted elections, if they were ready for some political determination by the people of South Vietnam as to their own political future -- there were things of that sort that could be agreed to. We never had any problem about devising a negotiating position, but the point is that we sent out signal after signal after signal and never got any return from Hanoi.

Q: None at all during this whole period.

RUSK: None at all. There were some people, particularly private citizens, some third parties, who did not understand the lingo of the discussions between ourselves and North Vietnam, and they would go to Hanoi, or they would meet some Hanoi representative at some third capital, and they would hear something that they felt made a significant difference. They'd come back seven months pregnant, thinking that peace was about to break out, and that they were going to be responsible and maybe get the Nobel Peace Prize for it. Well, when we would check these things out against what Hanoi had been saying and what they were saying privately and what they were saying to us, we found nothing in them. So we had a frustrating experience in so-called peace initiatives.

Q: Does this include such things as, say, the U Thant one?

RUSK: There were a great variety of initiatives that would have to be characterized as something less than constructive. The Poles, for example, had the idea that their job was to find some face-saving formula by which we could save our face and get out of Vietnam; whereas, we were not trying to save face -- we were trying to save South Vietnam.

The Hungarian Foreign Minister [Janos] Peter and I engaged in some serious talks over a period of time about an initiative which Peter was supposed to be taking. That turned out to be a fraud.

Q: What was the defector's name -- later-

RUSK: Radvanyi.

Q: He confirmed later that that one was a fraud?

RUSK: Yes. When Radvanyi defected he told me that there never had been anything in the Peter approach, that Peter was not in an effective contact with Hanoi, and that they had had no encouragement from Hanoi about the things that Peter was saying to me. Radvanyi told me that he tried to convey that to me by an expression on his face when he was coming in at the request of his government to report on one or another aspect of it, he was trying to give me a signal that what he was saying was not true. He was accompanied by a member of his Embassy who was a member of the Secret Policy so he couldn't tell me straightaway, but that was an instance that was just a plain fraud.

The Romanian initiative was a serious one.

Q: That was a very late one, wasn't it?

RUSK: That's right. That was at a later stage when [Gheorghe] Macuvescu, the Deputy Foreign Minister, went to Hanoi at least on two occasions; and they were serious and sober, and although nothing came out of it, the Romanian part in it was a responsible and reasonable part that we appreciated.

As far as U Thant's alleged initiative was concerned, it's very unfortunate that the principal witness to that transaction, Adlai Stevenson, died before we could get the matter fully put down in the record, but a mistake we made was that we did not conduct that transaction in writing at all times because we found U Thant to be an unreliable person in regard to it. We got the impression that U Thant's channel, as the principal Soviet representative in the Secretariat of the United Nations. We thought we knew that this fellow was a KGB man, so we were immediately alerted to the fact that this KGB man might be representing his government -- the Soviet government -- in stating that Hanoi would be willing to meet in Rangoon if we were prepared to do so; or he may be conducting a black operation. He may be trying to deceive us in some way.

I had several talks with [Andrei A.] Gromyko immediately following that episode, and there was never any indication from Gromyko that he was aware that Hanoi wanted to meet with us in Rangoon. Had this been a Soviet government affair, there's no question that Gromyko would have said something to me about it because we had some very private talks on the whole subject of Vietnam.

To clinch the matter, I asked the Soviet Ambassador, Mr. [Anatoly F.] Dobrynin, about this transaction, because it had gotten to be public and gotten to be something of a little minor scandal. Dobrynin, on one of his trips to Moscow, searched the records in the foreign office and talked to his colleagues in the foreign office and came back and reported to me that there never had been a message from Hanoi, and that their man in the Secretariat had never been given any instructions to say to U Thant anything whatever on the subject. Dobrynin's speculation was that maybe their man in the Secretariat had made some casual remark at a cocktail party or in some other way, and that U Thant had seized upon this and run with the ball without having anything in mind.

Q: This was all after the event?

RUSK: This was all after the event. Now U Thant never gave us any message which he had sent to Hanoi, or which Hanoi had sent to him, about the possibility of a meeting in Rangoon. We never had any messages in front of us on which we could make a judgment. We simply had a very closely guarded hint from U Thant that if we were prepared to meet in Rangoon that Hanoi was willing to do so. We could never confirm that. My own present judgment is that this was something that U Thant had done, but that there was nothing from Hanoi on which he could base it.

Q: What about the charges made by the publicists, like [Eric] Sevareid [Look, Nov. 31, 1965] and Norman Cousins, that somehow this got stopped purposefully before it got to the White House, or that it was not fully considered or fully checked into at the time of the event itself?

RUSK: Again, let me point out that nothing of this sort developed in my talks with Gromyko.

Q: And they were at the time -- ?

RUSK: And they were at the time. They were at the United Nations and in Washington at the time. Had there been any Soviet knowledge of Hanoi's willingness to talk in Rangoon, it certainly would have come out in these talks with Gromyko. So we were skeptical about the authenticity of this all along. I personally suggested to U Thant that he use whatever channel he had to follow up on it and develop the matter further before we made a final judgment on it, but he never did that, never reported back to us on it. Just before his death -- the very week of his death -- Adlai Stevenson was in London and was on BBC, and he was asked about this. He said, "Well, I was never very clear about with whom the talks were supposed to be held and what about," so that on the public record Adlai Stevenson's own skepticism on the matter was registered.

I have no way of judging the Eric Sevareid story because that was a third-hand account. Sevareid himself says that his conversation with Adlai Stevenson was supposed to be off-the-record, but how much of that was Eric Sevareid and how much was Adlai Stevenson, I don't know. Again, it's a pity that we never got this point really straightened out while Adlai Stevenson was alive.

We did not reduce this transaction to writing because U Thant was so insistent upon the utter secrecy of the matter that we respected his request to handle it simply on a word of mouth basis, and it was a little unsatisfactory because the communication was from U Thant to Adlai Stevenson to me. Whatever I knew about it, the President knew; and there was never any concealment of anything that was going on. But we had a deep skepticism about the authenticity of any such idea, and it later worked out that our skepticism was well-founded.

Q: That pretty well ended the events of '64, with our election and, as you've indicated, the increased infiltration. Did the military situation change sharply at that general time period -- late '64 and the beginning of '65? Did it deteriorate markedly?

RUSK: In the spring of '65 it was apparent that unless we made some significant reinforcements of our own forces that the increased manpower of the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong would likely cut the country in two and could cause very serious problems. We were faced with a serious step-up in infiltration, including North Vietnamese regular units, and I have no doubt that had President Johnson not increased our forces in the spring and summer of 1965 that the situation could have collapsed from a military point of view.

Q: That is in spite of the opening of bombing which came in February.

RUSK: That's right.

Q: Can you lead up to that and the circumstances which led to taking that action? That becomes one of the main points of attack by critics in later times.

RUSK: I'm not a very good witness on the actual beginning of the bombing of North Vietnam in February of 1965, because I had gone to the Churchill funeral and had come down with the flu. [I] came back and spent some time in the hospital and then went to Florida for a period of ten days or so. I was not present for the discussions which led to the beginning of the bombing of the North.

I was not opposed to it. I felt that we should do whatever was necessary to affect the battlefield in the South, and the bombing of the infiltration routes in Laos and the bombing of the supply routes coming down from the North were entirely in accord with my judgment as to what the situation permitted or required.

My general attitude toward bombing the North reflected somewhat my impressions from the Korean experience. We bombed everything in North Korea from the 38th Parallel right to the Yalu River and had complete air superiority, and yet with full bombing we were not able to prevent the North Koreans and the Chinese from maintaining an army of five hundred thousand men at the front. They would bring in their supplies piggy-back, and at night, and in bad weather, and build up their supplies and then lunge forward for ten days or so, and then wait and build up their supplies again and lunge again.

So I was skeptical about the direct effect of bombing on the battlefield itself. I had no doubt that the attrition of forces in the infiltration routes made that bombing valuable, and I had no doubt that the limitations on supply routes was valuable. I was always skeptical about bombing up in the far North, in the Hanoi-Haiphong area, because I did not believe that that bombing had much effect on the battlefield in the South -- and it was bombing that was very expensive in terms of planes and men lost. Hanoi and Haiphong were two of the most heavily defended areas that you've ever seen in warfare. So I was always in a mood to suspend that kind of bombing if there was any possibility of converting it into a serious peace move.

There were times when we would stop the bombing around Hanoi and Haiphong for periods of several days in a radius of five or ten miles of the two cities in conjunction with some peace move that we or somebody else was making. Now, anyone who ever expected the bombing to end the war ought to have his head examined, because bombing just doesn't do that. It makes it more difficult, but it doesn't prove to be a decisive military factor.

Q: Was there a disagreement, or a misunderstanding, about what we hoped to accomplish by the bombing in that first few months in the spring of 1965? Did some people have one idea that it would lead to the negotiating table, other people think that it would end the war on a military basis, and other people think that it might just punish them? That became an item that the critics fastened on at a later point, too.

RUSK: Well, in retrospect, I think that it was a mistake to have the bombing of the North run by Commander-in-Chief Pacific from Hawaii rather than by the commander in South Vietnam, because that tended to mean that there were two wars. There was [Gen. William] Westmoreland's war in the South and there was Admiral [U.S. Grant] Sharp's war in the North. CINCPAC in Hawaii was of the view that if they just continued to escalate their bombing that that alone would bring the war to a conclusion, whereas the effect on the war in the South was minimal.

The bombing was also related to the question as to whether the war would expand and whether Red China would come in. If anyone had asked me in 1963 whether we could have a half a million men in South Vietnam and bomb everything in the North right up to the Chinese border without bringing in Red China, I would have been hard put to it to say that you could. One of the effects of a policy of gradual response was that at no given moment did we ever present Peking or Moscow with enough of a change in the situation to require them to make a major decision based on overall world-wide considerations, in terms of intervening in that war. So just as the North Vietnamese infiltrated, so did we and helped thereby, I think, to limit the war to Vietnam.

Q: Is that why publicly the President frequently referred to the policy even after the bombing began as really being no change or not inconsistent with what we'd been doing anyway? Was that pretty well for Hanoi's consumption?

RUSK: That was partly for that, yes. You see, we were trying to limit the expansion of this war. We didn't want to see it develop into a bigger war, and we didn't want the Red Chinese to come in. We didn't want Moscow to come in with any of their own forces. One of the reasons, therefore, that we played down the importance of any particular steps that we took was to play it down from the point of view of the enemy as well.

Q: What about the timing of the bombing? Isn't it Charles Roberts of Newsweek, or somebody, who is quoted as saying that Mr. Johnson once told him that the bombing had been decided on back in 1964 and had been waiting for a time -- or that's the implication anyway. Was it a matter that was decided upon during that period when you indicate you were --

RUSK: No, the bombing of the North was always, from 1961 onwards, one of the possibilities. It was one of the alternatives that was considered, but no decision was made until February of 1965.

Q: It was retaliatory --

RUSK: Yes, but all alternatives were constantly being looked at right across the entire spectrum. Some alternatives were dismissed rather quickly. For example, the alternative of just getting out - - withdrawal. The alternative of using nuclear weapons was just brushed aside and put on the shelf because there was no basis on which anyone would reasonably want to use nuclear weapons in that situation. But all of these alternatives were constantly being looked at when any important decisions came up for review, and we established review groups from time to time without having in mind that there would be new decisions, but just to review the bidding -- to see where we were, to see whether we could do things differently, and to see whether there were opportunities that we had overlooked either in the peace direction or on the military side. I would be surprised if the record would show that any decision were made to start the bombing before February 1965, although there was discussion of it.

Q: There was the consideration, I'm sure, by everybody that bombing might also mean the necessity for added troop deployment as supports units, if nothing else. Was the connection between bombing and troop increase recognized and fully considered?

RUSK: Yes. You see, the armed forces of South Vietnam were somewhat fragile during this period. And the political situation in South Vietnam was somewhat fragile. There had been the overthrow of Diem; there had been a succession of coups --

Q: Somewhat of an understatement right at that particular period.

RUSK: That's correct. So if bombing would lead to a larger war, that is if the North Vietnamese were to shoot the works and put all of their regular forces against the South, then the question is whether the South Vietnamese and the forces that we had there were capable of standing up to it, you see. Some of us wanted to be careful about what we did militarily until there had gotten to be a stronger situation in the South, both politically and militarily. Otherwise you might start something you couldn't see through. So bombing the North itself required that the situation in the South be strengthened because it could be anticipated that the North would make a larger effort in response to the bombing of the North.

Q: So really the beginning the bombing and the troop decision are part of the same thing?

RUSK: Yes.

Q: In this sense when you decide on one you know you're deciding on the other at the same time.

RUSK: The bombing undoubtedly greatly increased the length of time it took to infiltrate men and material into the South. We picked up a lot of prisoners who reported on their experiences on the route south, and it's quite clear that the bombing was a harassment that they didn't like at all, and that the attrition, morale and otherwise, on the infiltrators from air-bombing was very considerable.

Q: Was there important opposition within the government at high level to the bombing at the time it was undertaken?

RUSK: No. As a matter of fact, George Ball recommended it as Acting Secretary. You see, I was away at the time, and he would have been one who later might have been expected to oppose it, but he made the recommendation.

Q: And the fact that Mr. Kosygin was in Hanoi and not considered important enough to delay it when the Pleiku attack occurred?

RUSK: At that time the bombing had nothing to do with Hanoi. It was on the southern part of North Vietnam. It was on the infiltration routes and just across the DMZ. Initially it started out as simply pinpoint attacks on a limited number of targets and did not start out as a systematic bombing of North Vietnam.

I think there were those who -- there were some -- who felt that it might be better to wait until Mr. Kosygin got out of town, but the Pleiku attack was delivered while Kosygin was in town. So you've got to have some sort of sense of balance and reciprocity on these things. If the North Vietnamese laid on a particular attack in Mr. Kosygin's presence, we didn't see any reason why we couldn't lay on a responsive attack while he was still there. But there was never any question about his personal safety because the bombing didn't go up there at all.

Q: The responsive nature of it was incidental? It was understood by everybody that this was the beginning of what would be a continuing policy, not a one-shot response.

RUSK: That is correct.

Q: Let's begin by talking about the pauses. There were two publicized ones at least in 1965, the one in May for six days, I guess, and the more prominently displayed one at Christmas-time. What was the purpose and the results of those actions?

RUSK: The point had been made that North Vietnam would never talk so long as bombing was going on in the North, and so on several occasions we stopped the bombing either partially or entirely in order to find out whether contact would indicate any readiness to talk on the part of Hanoi about serious matters.

In May of 1965 we stopped for six days but saw no indication of any desire to talk or any change in their situation on the ground, and so we resumed that bombing. Then later on that year it was hinted to us that that bombing pause had been too short; and that there had not been time for other governments to turn around with Hanoi and explore the situation -- develop what might be done.

Ambassador Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador in Washington, told McGeorge Bundy -- whether on instructions or not I don't know -- but told McGeorge Bundy that if we could stop for a longer period, say two to three weeks, that that would give the Soviet government a chance to make contact with Hanoi and see if something could be done. The President was skeptical of this and was skeptical of the idea of bombing [pauses] because he had seen no indication from Hanoi that they were interested in peace. We came up to the Christmas bombing pause which was traditional -- to stop a few days at Christmas -- and the President decided, on my recommendation and others, to extend that bombing pause for a further period in order to see whether or not Dobrynin's remark to McGeorge Bundy had any substance in it, and to give other people a chance to make contact with Hanoi if they wished to do so. So we stopped for thirty-seven days, but on about the thirty-fifth day Ho Chi Minh made a statement which was very negative indeed and made it clear that a longer bombing pause would not do the trick. So the bombing was resumed.

I think what we have been up against here, and I'm now speaking in September of 1969, is the fact that North Vietnam has not yet made a decision to give up its desire to seize South Vietnam by force and incorporate it into North Vietnam. Ho Chi Minh's will, which was published at the time of his death, makes that very clear. The reunification of Vietnam under Hanoi was always a consistent and permanent objective of Ho Chi Minh.

The North Vietnamese might have cooperated with any face-saving device by which we would simply abandon South Vietnam, but bombing pauses, and intermediaries, and peace initiatives, and all the proposals that were made over the years ran up against that hard fact that Hanoi had not abandoned the decision that it had made back in 1959-1960 to go after South Vietnam and unify it by force if necessary.

When you have a bombing halt there are always those who say, "Well, if you will just stop the bombing a little longer, something good might happen." So whether it was six days or whether it was thirty-seven days, or whatever it was, you see, there would always be critics who would like to make it permanent. We did make it permanent in 1968, and even then the attitude of the North Vietnamese negotiators in Paris showed that they were just as hard and implacable as ever, and that a full stop of the bombing on a permanent basis did not produce the desired result.

Q: So really we were making tactical changes when actually they would have to make a strategic change of giving up a major objective before there was any hope.

RUSK: That's right.

Q: Was there a major debate in our government about that bombing pause of Christmas of '65, or was that something that was decided on fairly narrowly by just the very top advisers, with the President playing a personal role?

RUSK: There was no great debate about it. There was a recommendation from me and others that we extend the Christmas bombing pause for another period, chiefly to find out whether the Soviets would be able to do anything in Hanoi that would be constructive. There was no great fight about it, so I would think that it was dealt with in a fairly relaxed manner.

I must confess that President Johnson's disappointment in that thirty-seven day bombing pause made a lasting imprint on him, because he was very skeptical from that time onward that anything could be done by way of peace initiatives, and probings, and bombing halts, and things of that sort. I think that he might feel that he was badly advised to go through that thirty-seven day bombing halt, because nothing came out of it, you see. But it was a calculated risk and a calculated possibility, and those of us who recommended it felt that it was worth the try since no great damage was done on the military side by a thirty-seven day pause.

Q: What about the Russians? Did you, in your mind, at that time operate on the general assumption that they were really trying to be helpful?

RUSK: I don't agree with those who think the Soviets want us to be engaged in a war in Vietnam. I think they would be glad to see this war brought to a conclusion, but on the other hand they have reasons of their own for not wanting Hanoi to be driven into the arms of Peking. This would be something of interest to them in their problems inside the Communist world.

We never found that the Russians were prepared to step out in advance of Hanoi and take positions that were not already agreed to by Hanoi. They would refer points to Hanoi simply as messages from the United States, and they would make general statements that if the bombing stopped something good would happen -- something of that sort. But we never got Moscow to step out in advance of Hanoi on any significant point. I think this was because Moscow had become something of a satellite of Hanoi -- because of Moscow's fear that if they weren't careful Hanoi might just align itself fully with Peking with all that would mean for the Soviets in the Communist world.

Q: What about the display of public diplomacy? That doesn't sound like something that the professional diplomats would conceive. Did Mr. Johnson conceive that idea himself, sending Harriman and Bundy and --

RUSK: Arthur Goldberg.

Q: -- Arthur Goldberg around the world on that tour?

RUSK: That was basically President Johnson's own idea. He wanted to get maximum public opinion effect from the bombing pause, and also to increase the possibilities that there might be some response from Hanoi in some fashion. If Hanoi felt the pressure of world public opinion effect from the bombing pause, and also to increase the possibilities that there might be some response from Hanoi in some fashion. If Hanoi felt the pressure of world public opinion, they might be more responsive than if they did not feel that pressure.

My own view was that Hanoi is fairly well insulated from world public opinion. They pay it very little attention. They don't really care about it and therefore, generalized world public opinion doesn't mean very much to them. I doubt very much that Hanoi pays much attention to advice from Moscow. I think Hanoi has been very stubborn about its own private attitude towards these matters.

Q: Did that really accomplish very little, in the way of meaningful -- ?

RUSK: No, I think the visits that you refer to did do something to help in the attitudes of other governments and world public opinion generally, but it didn't have any impact on the actual war itself.

Q: One thing I noticed that struck me about the Norman Cousins' story, and of course he is one of those whom you indicated as an example -- one of the people who thought in a pause -- if you just let it go two or three days longer something would happen. His contacts that he mentions on this were White House staff people who were not really concerned primarily with National Security affairs. They were Moyers and Valenti, as I recall.

Had this become a problem -- people outside of the normal areas such as State and Bundy involving themselves in Vietnam affairs and trying to play a role perhaps they weren't qualified to play?

RUSK: Vietnam is a subject in which everybody gets involved in one way or another. If they're not called in to be involved, they tend to involve themselves in it. Valenti and Moyers were both very close to the President, but they did not have any direct responsibility for Vietnam.

During that period I don't myself recall any of those private contacts that reflected any real movement by Hanoi -- that is, during that thirty-seven days pause. Had there been any such movement we would have known about it, and we would have been very alert to it because we were looking for it. But wishful thinking plays a big role in these matters, and a lot of times people just rely upon their hopes rather than upon evidence as to whether any movement had occurred.

Q: What about the resumption of it -- the physical decision to resume bombing. Did a debate of some substance occur at that time, as to whether or not to continue it?

RUSK: Not very much, because Ho Chi Minh had made his attitude very clear on about the thirty-fifth day of the bombing pause, and we waited another two or three days before we started the bombing, but there was no indication that the thirty-seven day pause had made the slightest imprint on Hanoi.

Q: Going back to my old standard question here, had dissent against what we were doing in Vietnam become widespread at all in the executive branch by, say, early 1966? Were there beginning to be opponents in high places by that early?

RUSK: The historian will want to look at some of the oral histories done by some of those who were supposed to be dissenters to check on this, but it was my impression that there was much less dissent than the newspapers were reflecting.

In the case of George Ball, for example, he did not argue vigorously inside the government for a substantially different point of view. He was named by the President as the Devil's Advocate to take an opposing point of view, in order that the President would have in front of him different considerations so that the President would be sure that all aspects of the matter were in front of him when he made his decisions.

Q: Named by the President?

RUSK: Named by the President. He was asked by the President to be a Devil's Advocate, and it may be that George Ball convinced himself in the process. But George Ball didn't come into my office every other day saying, "Look, we've got to do something radically different in Vietnam." He was extraordinarily helpful in working out the details of these various peace maneuvers and contacts and procedures and things of that sort. He managed those very well.

Q: I guess things like the [Edmund A.] Gullion mission were pretty much his operation, weren't they? He was the --

RUSK: Yes, in general the senior advisers to the President were generally unanimous in their recommendations to the President on matters involving Vietnam.

Q: And that still was true --

RUSK: Once in awhile the President would have to make a decision. For example, there might be differences of view about whether a particular target should be taken under bombing.

Q: A tactical matter.

RUSK: That sort of thing, and whether a particular factory or particular bridge near a populated area, or something of that sort should be hit. But on the larger questions, the President's advisers were generally unanimous.

On that point, the historian will want to 'look carefully through the notes of the Tuesday Luncheon meetings because those meetings were crucial in terms of the decisions that were made about Vietnam.

Long before historians get to this particular record, they will know all about those Tuesday Luncheon meetings because they undoubtedly will appear in books and things of that sort. There the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the [Joint] Chiefs of Staff, and the Director of Central Intelligence Agency, and the President's Special Assistant on National Security matters -- Walt Rostow and before that McGeorge Bundy -- would sit down at the table and talk in complete confidence and candor about the matters that were up for decision.

They were invaluable occasions because we all could be confident that everyone around the table would keep his mouth shut and wouldn't be running off to Georgetown cocktail parties and talking about it, and so great candor was possible. We had a good deal of very lively discussion and the notes on those discussions will be extremely helpful to the historian in making judgments about who advised what and what the issues were.

Q: About that same time period, say early 1966, at least in your own mind what were the prospects? How did things look at that point? Did it look like we were going to be able to accomplish still with a reasonable investment of resources the goals that you'd set out to accomplish five years earlier?

RUSK: I never had any doubt about our ability to deny Hanoi a forcible seizure of Vietnam. I never had any fear about the possibility that the North Vietnamese armed forces could achieve a military victory in the South, nor did I believe that the North Vietnamese would be able to generate real support among the South Vietnamese people.

There were many reasons for that view. One was simply a military judgment about who had the muscle to accomplish what they were trying to do, but I was impressed with the fact that we had thousands of Americans in South Vietnam out in the countryside in groups of ones and two and threes and fours living among the South Vietnamese people and completely at their mercy. While I was Secretary of State I don't think I can recall a single incident of treachery on the part of the South Vietnamese people with respect to those Americans. I don't recall that any of them were turned over to the Viet Cong by their South Vietnamese colleagues. If the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese were making any headway among the people of South Vietnam, or if the South Vietnamese people really wanted what Hanoi was trying to do to them, you were bound to get a lot of incidents of treachery with respect to these Americans that were living out in the countryside completely at their mercy, and this just didn't happen.

Q: These were civilian Americans too -- not armed --

RUSK: Civilian Americans, not armed, and just wholly dependent upon the South Vietnamese people in the countryside for their own personal security.

We did find it necessary to build up our forces out there as the North Vietnamese built up theirs. And there could have come a time in 1965 and '66 when the North Vietnamese might have had enough force in the country to achieve their purposes had we not built up our own forces, and had not the South Vietnamese not built up their forces as well.

Q: I think one of the things that has bothered some of the critics maybe had been the fact that the government always seemed to see the situation in terms as you've described, and the non-official reports from South Vietnam always were so much more pessimistic. Did you ever try to find out why your information and the information that the press got didn't seem to be the same, or why they interpreted it differently? Did the government take into consideration this other kind of intelligence that was coming back from nonofficial sources?

RUSK: One of our leading publishers, a man of great reputation, visited South Vietnam and came back shaking his head about the reporters out there. He said that there were too many reporters out there playing the role of Secretary of State.

Q: We had lots of Secretaries of State during your years.

RUSK: There were too many reporters who had their own view as to Vietnam and the outcome and who did not accept the basic commitment of the United States and the basic interest of the United States in an independent Southeast Asia.

Also, bad news makes more news than good news. If you had two thousand acts of kindness on the parts of South Vietnamese to American soldiers in the course of a day, and you had one instance where an American sergeant in a bar would get into a scuffle with somebody, it would be the American sergeant's scuffle that would be reported rather than any one of these two thousand acts of kindness. It's in the nature of news that the negative is more news than the positive, and so we did have some problems about the nature of the reporting out there from time to time.

Q: But you were confident enough in your own sources that you were pretty sure that what you were getting was accurate in contrast to what the public was being sometimes told?

RUSK: Well, in the middle of a war there are always problems of marginal inaccuracies in terms of casualties, in terms of the extent of pacification, and things of that sort. You always were in the position of leaving a margin for error of five or ten percent, or whatever it might be. But the general accuracy of our official reporting, I think, is well-founded, and the historian will find that it was in good shape.

Q: The first major event of that year, I guess, was the Honolulu conference. Was there anything about the background of that, or the accomplishments there, that you can add perhaps to the documentation?

RUSK: I don't think that there's anything that I can add to that that is not fully in the record, and the historian can get that out of the record.

Q: The timing of that during the first of the televised Foreign Relations Committee Hearings -- was this a decisive element in deciding to have it right then rather than at some perhaps other time?

RUSK: I don't think so. I think that was a matter of mutual convenience to have it at that time.

Q: Shortly after that, you've indicated earlier you might just mention something specific about the [Chester] Ronning initiative, which comes in the spring of 1966, I think, the Canadians --

RUSK: Well, that was again one of those efforts that we made to establish contact to find out whether there was any possibility for a peaceful settlement. Ronning was a very competent diplomat and had access to people in Hanoi. At least we thought he would have access to them, and we simply briefed him so that he could pursue the matter a bit and explore the possibilities, but he produced nothing.

Q: Just a blank still, pretty much similar to the '64-'65 times.

RUSK: That's right. We drew many blanks. That was one; the Gullion mission was one. There were many efforts that were made that simply showed no response at all from Hanoi.

Q: Did the Canadians agree with that? Were the Canadians not unhappy that we had slighted them in some way?

RUSK: No, I think that they realized that this was a vaccination that didn't take.

Q: What about then from that time on into the balance of '66? Are there any unpublicized efforts that were of consequence during that period that we put some faith in at the time?

RUSK: I don't think so. I think, and when you talk about putting faith in them, we made the effort even though we did not expect that any miracles would occur, but we made the effort so that there would never be any possibility that the problem was lack of communication or lack of a channel. We thought it was important always to maintain a channel between Washington and Hanoi of some sort, somewhere, through some means, so that if Hanoi ever came around to a change of mind it would be possible to register that fairly quickly and easily and in confidence.

Q: What about the initiative that they call in print now, 'Marigold.' Was that of a different order at the end of 1966, one that had more substance to it than just a contact-type thing?

RUSK: This was a rather strange exercise because the Polish member of the ICC in Saigon had some talks with [Henry] Cabot Lodge and then went up to Hanoi on a visit. After spending some time there [he] came back with a formulation of the U.S. position. He didn't come back with a formulation of Hanoi's position, but he came back and presented to Cabot Lodge a series of points which he considered to be his interpretation of the U.S. position. Well, now, this was a rather strange procedure because we would have expected he would have brought back something that reflected Hanoi's position, but he indicated that he thought Hanoi would talk on the basis of that stated position.

Q: How different was that from anything that Lodge would have given him?

RUSK: We would not have formulated our position that way; it had some similarities, but it also had some points needing clarification. Despite the fact that this was all very strange, we told the Poles to say to Hanoi that we would talk on the basis of these points although some clarification would be needed. The Poles objected very much to the phrase "some clarification would be needed," because they wanted us simply to buy those categorically without any opportunity for really discussing them and we had to make it clear that we would have to discuss points of detail with Hanoi if we got into conversations with them. What message the Poles sent to Hanoi I don't know, but Hanoi refused to talk on that basis.

Q: The Poles couldn't produce the North Vietnamese at the -- ?

RUSK: That's right. The Poles simply were unable to produce the North Vietnamese. We were ready to -- . We had men all set to be in Warsaw, ready for the talks, but the Poles were unable to produce North Vietnamese warm bodies.

Q: Do you think the bombings of Hanoi that the critics have made so much of played any part in this inability of the Poles?

RUSK: I think that was more of a pretext than a real reason. Among other things, the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong were bombing Saigon at that time, in terms of reciprocal -- . I was in Saigon at about that time and they bombed the airfield at which I landed the day before I arrived, and while I was in town they tried to bomb the big bridge that leads northwest out of Saigon. But even then when the Poles said to us, "Oh, your bombing is terrible and gets in the way of these talks," we stopped the bombing around Hanoi and Haiphong and told the Poles we were stopping the bombing around Hanoi and Haiphong for a radius of ten nautical miles -- and that's three hundred and something square miles -- and told them that if that was the problem then we would cure that particular part of it. That made no difference. My guess is this was all a pretext on the part of Hanoi, who did not want to talk.

Q: One of the accounts of that makes a lot of the fact that the bombing was coincidental and accidental, and maybe we wouldn't have done it had the coordination been better. Is it possible that that lack of coordination did exist?

RUSK: I suppose one could make that point, but the bombing that was involved was several miles from the center of Hanoi, and it was no more serious than the bombing which they were doing in Saigon. I mean if there was any real interest on the part of Hanoi in peace and in these proposals, they would not have let these bombing incidents get in the way. This was simply a reflection of the lack of seriousness of interest on their part.

Q: What about the Manila conference which was the next major gathering of the chiefs of state and all the people of consequence? Does it have some significant accomplishment or some details that you can add that are important?

RUSK: You're referring now to the summit conference?

Q: Yes.

RUSK: I think the Manila Conference was a very useful meeting of the chiefs of government of the countries with troops in Vietnam, and it made it possible for us to get pretty definite agreement, not only on the military measures which were required but also on the approach toward a peaceful settlement. It was there, you recall, that a formula was worked out for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Vietnam if North Vietnamese Forces were to be withdrawn and the level of violence subsided. No, I think it brought about a pretty good meeting of the minds with the chiefs of government with troops in Vietnam, and I think it was a very useful exercise.

Q: The reason I ask is that Secretary [Clark] Clifford later on will make quite a lot of the lack of enthusiasm that our allied governments expressed to him in the summer of 1967 when he toured around, but there wasn't that lack of enthusiasm -- the six or nine months later?

RUSK: I must say that at Manila the other allies did not come rushing in with offers of substantially more troops. One of the burdens we've carried in Vietnam is that more countries have not participated with more muscle. Korea has done a valiant job with the large number of troops they have down there. Thailand has done a respectable job taking into account the jobs that exist in Thailand in the northeast there where the Thai armed forces are engaged against guerrillas in their own country, but Australia and New Zealand could have done more. The Philippines could have done more. Britain could have done more -- Britain did nothing in the military side.

We needed more international effort here in a matter in which many countries have a stake, and this has been one of the burdens that we've had to carry. We have not found it possible to let the attitude of other countries determine what the United States does because we've got our own vital interests at stake here and we can't subject those to the unwillingness of other countries to pull their share of the load. So we've carried a heavier part in Vietnam than we ought to have carried if others had done their fair share of the job.

Q: But you weren't reading that, at the time of the Manila Conference, as being a question by them of the necessity of our action?

RUSK: No, there was none at all on that, and of course the Manila conference did help in increasing the number of troops somewhat put in by others.

Q: By that time, had the matter of peace initiatives been organized in your department in such a way that it's accurate to isolate something like the Harriman group, as I notice some accounts are now doing. Was there a specific task force sort of thing organized under Mr. Harriman to follow up all the peace initiatives?

RUSK: Yes. He was, I think, Ambassador-at-Large, and was given the responsibility of probing for any kind of possibilities of peace, and that was his full-time job. We tried our best to find ways and means to establish contact in a way that might lead to peaceful settlement, but again we ran across the adamant attitude of Hanoi at every stage.

Q: And people like the famous Harry Ashmore and William Baggs trip which comes early in 1967 -- they were just wishful thinking that there was some kind of movement on the part of Hanoi?

RUSK: Yes, they didn't bring back anything that changed the situation at all.

Q: Did missions like that contribute anything positive, or were they negative forces insofar as you were concerned?

RUSK: I think that they sometimes confused public opinion because they'd come back and pretend that there was some sort of a peace initiative which was not there. This was some of the same sort of confusion that attended Bob Kennedy's visit to Paris. It also may have helped convince Hanoi that we were interested in peace at any price because there were so many of these various efforts by intermediaries -- or self-styled intermediaries -- trying to probe for the possibilities of a peaceful settlement. My own guess is that if Hanoi realized without any doubt at all that we were committed and we were going to stay there, we were going to see it through, that they would bring themselves to a decision to make peace sooner rather than later.

But as of September 1969, I think that it would be fair to say that Hanoi now realizes that they cannot win what they want by military means. That it's beyond their capabilities. But they may also judge that if they just stay with it that American public opinion will collapse and that they will win on the home front in the United States rather than on the ground in Vietnam.

Q: By early in 1967 we were talking to the North Vietnamese for the first time, I assume in Moscow -- the Trang and John Guthrie channel.

RUSK: Yes.

Q: What led up to that, and what were its consequences, if any?

RUSK: I think this was another attempt to establish a channel of communication that was discreet, that would not become public, so that if there was any message that the North Vietnamese were willing to give, that there would be a channel through which it could be given.

We did a number of these. There was the Ed Gullion attempt and there have been others, some of which have never been in the record; but I would suppose that there were literally dozens of efforts to establish a channel somewhere so that we could be in direct contact with the North Vietnamese. Again, the North Vietnamese weren't interested in talking seriously about peace.

Q: They didn't talk back at all in that channel?

RUSK: No. In general I would say that the North Vietnamese proved themselves on various occasions to be willing to listen. They would be willing to hear what we had to say, but they wouldn't send anything back on the return channel.

Q: We could talk, but that was a one-way --

RUSK: That's right, and so they would just probably analyze under a microscope what we were saying to see if there was any change in our point of view, but we never got anything back except a harsh reiteration of their public positions, their four points, or the Viet Congas ten points, or whatever it might be, as a basis for settlement in Vietnam.

Q: This is the time that we were proposing, as I understand it, what's called the Phase A- Phase B formula.

RUSK: Right.

Q: Proposing it, at least on one occasion, through Harold Wilson to Mr. Kosygin. That's a very confusing episode -- the whole Chester Cooper mission to London and so on. Can you straighten that out, particularly in reference to its relation to Mr. Johnson's letter to Ho Chi Minh which coincides in time?

RUSK: Well, the Phase A-Phase B concept was that we could stop the bombing in Phase A if there was a Phase B in which other things would begin to happen on both sides. This was simply a small device to get around the North Vietnamese contention that nothing could happen until we stopped the bombing. So we thought we might be able to put together a package in which stopping the bombing would be the first step, but then there would be some previously agreed second and third steps which would move the situation toward peace in Vietnam. What we were interested in was knowing what would happen if we stopped the bombing and no one was able to tell us. The Phase A-Phase B was an attempt to negotiate on that particular basis.

I think in the Wilson-Kosygin exchanges -- they worked out on the spot some actual language which was not precise enough for President Johnson, and which was generally in line with the kind of briefing that Chet Cooper had given to Prime Minister Wilson. But since in these matters every syllable, every comma, is important, Wilson concocted some language and gave it to Kosygin without clearing it with us first -- that is, not clearing it with the President first. When the President got this proposal -- the message -- in front of him, he realized that he ought to give something to Kosygin which was consistent with what he, the President, had just gotten through giving to Ho Chi Minh. So Johnson insisted that Kosygin be given a type of message which was consistent with the message which the President had just sent to Ho Chi Minh in a letter.

Q: Well, did that reverse the Phase A-Phase B offer?

RUSK: No, it didn't, but it made it clear that we expected to have something in return for stopping the bombing. I think the record will show that and show how the various drafts came out and what the President's final draft was. It was unfortunate that Harold Wilson gave Mr. Kosygin some language which had not been cleared in advance with President Johnson. That was the basic cause of the misunderstanding.

Q: In regard to the letter to Ho Chi Minh, I've been told on several occasions that that was a fairly personal matter with Mr. Johnson and yourself. What were the circumstances of that?

RUSK: President Johnson was a man who instinctively tried to put himself in the shoes of the other fellow and tried to figure out what was on his mind, and he wanted to be sure that the other fellow also know what was on the President's mind. So President Johnson felt that it would be desirable to have a direct communication with Ho Chi Minh so there would be no misunderstanding through intermediaries or anything else. He just put to him the proposition that we would stop the bombing in exchange for some reduction of the war and as a step toward peace. I think it was President Johnson's idea that he send the letter directly to Ho Chi Mirth.

Q: That's something he wanted to do?

RUSK: That's right. [It was] something he wanted to do, because he wanted to be sure that the top man on the other side knew what was in his own mind. So we drafted that letter, and he made some changes in it and then sent it on.

Q: You say "be" -- the Department drafted it, and Mr. Johnson edited it?

RUSK: I think it was done with the Special Assistant for Security Affairs, Walt Rostow, and myself doing the principal drafting on it.

Q: Did it go through several drafts over a considerable period of time, or was it a fairly?

RUSK: No, it was done fairly quickly and fairly simply. It was not a long letter.

Q: No, as I recall the published version --

RUSK: It was a fairly short letter.

Q: I was really thinking in terms of whether or not the letter had been drafted before Cooper's instructions had been made to send him to London -- so that he would have had an opportunity to know --

RUSK: He didn't know anything about the draft of that letter.

Q: He wouldn't have known about that -- ?

RUSK: No, he didn't know about that letter.

Q: Is that the normal course of affairs that he wouldn't have known that?

RUSK: As a matter of fact, I think he went to London before the letter was finally drafted. I'm not sure, but I think the letter was sent while he was in London.

Q: So he wouldn't have had an opportunity to see the draft of it.

RUSK: That's right, but he would not have been in on that letter anyhow had he been in Washington. This was handled by a very small group.

Q: Did it represent any kind of change as far as the President's position was concerned?

RUSK: No, none at all.

Q: No hardening, or something of that nature, as some have maintained?

RUSK: That's right.

[interruption]

Q: We were in the middle of 1967 and you had, I assume, talked about the whole letter. Is there anything you think of to add?

RUSK: I think I have nothing more to add on that.

Q: In the summer of that year, or right at the beginning of fall, the major event is the San Antonio Formula. Did this represent something different on our part?

RUSK: The San Antonio Formula represented one advance on what had been said before. You will remember that I said that the Phase A-Phase B formula anticipated that we would stop the bombing first on the basis of agreement as to what would happen in Phase B -- in which both sides would agree to do various things. In the San Antonio Formula, we stated Phase B as an assumption: "We assume, of course," said the San Antonio Formula, "That the other side would not take advantage of our cessation of the bombing." We had in mind that what we meant by that would be the subject of negotiation and discussion with Hanoi. Naturally, we did not want them to build up infiltration and attack across the DMZ and go all-out militarily if we stopped the bombing, but stating it as an assumption was again an effort to find a way to let Hanoi proceed despite what they had been saying on the subject. Again we ran across the completely negative attitude of Hanoi in dealing with it.

Q: There wasn't any disagreement among the President's chief advisers as to what was meant by "not taking advantage?" I know Mr. Clifford later on makes the statement to the Senate committee, I think, that it meant, you know, not that they'd stop infiltration but that they wouldn't increase it.

RUSK: No, there was no disagreement among the President's advisers on it. I personally regretted Secretary Clifford saying that before the Senate committee because that is something that ought to have been left to negotiation. That tended to undermine our bargaining position in a negotiation. It [negotiation] ought to try to spell out what we meant by the assumption that they would not take advantage of it, you see, so that what was wrong with it was not the substance of it, but the fact that it was said in advance of an actual negotiation.

Q: Reducing an option that a negotiator' might have had.

RUSK: That's right.

Q: During that whole period of time there were a number more of these individual channel contacts that you've mentioned several times. Mr. [Henry] Kissinger undertook one in the summer. Mr. Harriman pursued one with the Romanians, I think, later on in the fall. Were these any different than the earlier ones, or were they again a repetition of the same?

RUSK: We took seriously the Kissinger and the Romanian channels because we thought they were both serious as far as the intermediaries were concerned, and Kissinger handled it very well. He was responsible and accurate, and accuracy in these matters is of the greatest importance. Both of them came to nothing because there was nothing coming back from Hanoi.

Q: So, except for the nature of the channel, they weren't any more substantive than some of the earlier ones?

RUSK: No, they didn't produce any more than the others did.

Q: What about the Vietnam elections which came in that same fall? Did Mr. Johnson play any special personal role in arranging those or carrying them out?

RUSK: No, we were very pleased to see them move to elections. We had pressed them to do so because we thought that the government of Vietnam would be stronger if it were on an electoral basis, and we also had more confidence than some of the South Vietnamese did as to the results of such an election. We did not believe that the Viet Cong would make any appreciable dent on the elections despite their threats of terrorism and their propagandizing against the election itself. But we tried to leave that as much as possible to the Vietnamese processes. They had an electoral commission, and they worked out their own rules for the elections.

Of course, there has been a great tradition in Vietnam for elections at the local level. The village elections have been historically a part of the Vietnamese scene. That was true during the French period. It was true even during Japanese occupation. The villages of South Vietnam have their own village democracy, and so the idea of an election was not all that strange to them.

We felt that if the government would just take its courage in hand and hold an election that they would get a mandate from the people which was stronger than anything they had up to that point, since they rested more or less on a coup. We were very pleased to see the election and were pleased with the general conduct of the elections. We thought they were pretty fair. We had all sorts of observers there. There were hundreds of press people looking over the elections. They found very little fault with them in terms of fairness and procedures, and we felt that the election greatly strengthened the government of South Vietnam.

Q: It wasn't a matter of our forcing the South Vietnamese government to hold them?

RUSK: No. We advised them to, and we encouraged them to, but we didn't force them to.

Q: It might be a good time to make a comment on that general problem. Many of the critics seem to me to always have assumed that we could at any time call the turns for the South Vietnamese government. What was your feeling as to how far we could go in reality to control what they were doing?

RUSK: Well, we can't make and unmake governments in Vietnam. We just don't have it in our capability. It would be silly for us to take steps that would cause the South Vietnamese to turn around and start shooting at us. There are limits beyond which you can [not] go in imposing your will upon somebody. You can give advice, you can persuade, you can cajole, you can sometimes put on pressure, you can sometimes threaten. But at the end of the day, these decisions have to be made by the South Vietnamese themselves because, although we've had a substantial military presence there, we can't take over running the affairs of seventeen or eighteen million people. There are limits beyond which you simply can't go.

Q: So the idea we can make them do something, as far as you're concerned is false?

RUSK: And, particularly, we can't make and unmake governments. That's something they have to decide.

Q: How much importance in settling something like Vietnam can you expect from the kind of personal diplomacy that Mr. Johnson at least engaged in to a certain extent in such things as Glassboro that year?

RUSK: By the time this material is available, Mr. Johnson will already have published his books in which he covers Glassboro in some detail.

Q: He does cover it in detail?

RUSK: Yes. At Glassboro, President Johnson gave Mr. Kosygin a formulation to send to Hanoi somewhat along the lines of the San Antonio formula. It involved stopping the bombing as a step toward peace, and assuming that the North Vietnamese would do some things in reciprocity for stopping the bombing. Mr. Kosygin took it and indicated he would send it to Hanoi, but again we never got an answer from Hanoi. We never got an answer through the Russians.

Q: So you don't know --

RUSK: So we don't know. In the first place, we don't know that the Russians actually sent it to Hanoi. We suspect they did, but we assume that Hanoi's response was negative because we never heard from the Russians on it. But Mr. Johnson will have already covered that in his books.

Q: Late in that year they had the first of -- and this I suppose gets part of 1968 as well -- first of what the press has since called the "Wise Men" meetings. I think it was in October or early November of 1967 that group met first.

RUSK: Yes.

Q: Was that a technique of getting advice that Mr. Johnson frequently turned to, or was this something new and different for that occasion?

RUSK: Governments frequently call upon people outside of government for advice, and Mr. Johnson followed that procedure. We thought that it would be useful to get together a group of very distinguished and very experienced men who had not been involved in the day-to-day operations in Vietnam, who were somewhat removed from all the detail and all of the theology of the subject, and get their general review of the situation.

Q: Who decided who would come to that meeting?

RUSK: The President and I and the Secretary of Defense primarily decided who should be invited, but it was almost an obvious list. I mean, if you looked at the names of the people there -
- Arthur Dean -

Q: What Richard Rovere [The American Establishment, New York, 1962] called the "Establishment" --

RUSK: That's right. They were the names that were almost self-nominated if you assumed that you wanted to constitute a group of that sort. It was Dean Acheson and Jack [John J.] McCloy and Arthur Dean and Robert Murphy and a good many others whose names the historians will have in front of them. In that first meeting the group was pretty nearly unanimous that we were on the right course. They had a strong sense of our commitment. They felt that it was necessary to see the thing through -- that we should proceed in the way we were going and do what was necessary to bring about a successful result in South Vietnam.

It's interesting to see that that same group met in the spring of 1968 after the Tet offensive, and it was interesting to note that the Tet offensive had made a major impression on some of the members of that group.

Q: That is what made the impression?

RUSK: I have no doubt about it myself, just as the Tet offensive made an impression on a lot of people here in this country. Although the Tet offensive was a military disaster for the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong, it had a considerable propaganda and psychological impact, and clearly shocked people here in this country and caused them to feel that the situation was getting to be hopeless. So in the second meeting of these same "Wise Men" there were a number of them who had been so impressed by the Tet offensive that they were not nearly so sure that we ought to proceed as we were doing, and that we ought to sort of make the best peace we can. They were about evenly divided in the second meeting, but the first meeting was very clearly a very strong impression that we were on the right track and should proceed.

Q: Was the nature of the briefings that they got different essentially?

RUSK: They were not intended to be. Of course in the second meeting the briefing reflected the setback in the countryside of the Tet offensive because, although the North Vietnamese suffered enormous casualties in the Tet offensive, it did interrupt the pacification program in the countryside rather significantly in some areas because the South Vietnamese forces were drawn back into the provincial capitals and in the district towns to give close-in defense to the populated areas that were being attacked under the Tet offensive, you see. That left some sections of the countryside pretty exposed to North Vietnamese and Viet Cong forces. I think that was the type of briefing that seemed to be discouraging to some of these wise men.

Q: It wasn't a panicky-type briefing?

RUSK: No.

Q: -- intended to be the same type briefing that as before?

RUSK: [We did] try to make it as factual and as direct and as realistic as possible and not try to flimflam them by false optimism or anything of that sort, but [to] give them a true picture of what the situation seemed to be.

Q: Had Secretary Clifford's growing disillusionment with some of the things we were doing by that time -- did that make a difference between the two meetings?

RUSK: No.

Q: How much of a difference was there between State and Defense by February of 1968 and March?

RUSK: There was no significant difference between State and Defense by February and then March at that time.

Q: Mr. Clifford's views hadn't reached the point at that time -- as they have apparently later become -- that we should have begun turning back military action and -- ?

RUSK: That's correct. Mr. Clifford came into Office as Secretary of Defense with the reputation of being a hawk, and it was not until some time later that he began to change his own views on these matters.

Q: Was that during the period of the drafting of the President's March 31st speech then?

RUSK: No, as a matter of fact, I'm not a very good witness as to just when and how Secretary Clifford seemed to change his mind on some of these matters because he never brought these matters up at the Tuesday Luncheon, never argued with us about it in any formal way. It was just an informal kind of thing that came about through an erosion of his point of view rather than through actual proposals he made. He didn't propose, while he was Secretary of Defense, the point of view that he reflected in his Foreign Affairs article that he wrote after he left office. He never made any such proposals to the President or to me.

Q: You found out about those then, in print?

RUSK: Yes, sure.

Q: What about the drafting of that speech, and particularly the decision to put in it the partial bombing halt north of the nineteenth or twentieth parallel?

RUSK: Well, in the spring of 1968 the President wanted to review the military requirements in Vietnam, and he invited the Chiefs of Staff and General Westmoreland to -- excuse me, it was General Abrams by that time -- to indicate what they considered the situation to be and what their requirements were from a military point of view. They came back with the suggestion that, in certain contingencies, it might be desirable or necessary to add another two hundred thousand men to our forces in Vietnam.

It was not a hard recommendation. It was simply some contingency planning -- some possibilities that were being discussed -- and so we had some discussions in Washington in February and March about whether we would move in that direction. It would involve calling up the National Guard and Reserves. It would involve, in effect, the declaration of a national emergency. It would involve many more billions on the Defense budget, and it would be a very substantial step.

Early in March, March 4th or 5th -- along in there -- and President Johnson will have covered this in his book -- I suggested that, as an alternative to adding substantially to our forces, that we consider a very serious bombing halt, at least in those areas of North Vietnam that were not directly involved in the battlefield in the South.

Q: This goes back to your old opinion on the bombing.

RUSK: That's right. My own idea was that if we bombed only south of the twentieth parallel, that we would do that kind of bombing which was necessary to defend the area around the DMZ and the northern part of South Vietnam, [we] would give our Marines the full protection of tactical bombing in that area, but that we would not bomb up in the Hanoi-Haiphong area -- which was very costly to us anyhow, and [would] try to use that as a device to try to get some talk started with Hanoi.

When I made that proposal, the President thought about it a few minutes and said, "Get on your horses; let's get something ready on that." And so during March we prepared a plan for the cessation of the bombings except up north to the twentieth parallel, accompanied by an offer to have talks with North Vietnam.

We did not know whether they would talk on the basis of a partial stoppage of the bombing. I personally rather thought that they would because that would be a very profitable transaction for them in terms of what they were running into in Hanoi and Haiphong on their own. After all, being bombed was not a very pleasant operation.

But the President did not make a decision on that point until just a day or two before he actually gave his March 31st speech, and therefore the earlier drafts of his speech did not have that particular point in it. When you draft speeches, you don't put things in them that the President hasn't decided on; and so it was only in the last two or three days that that particular part was added to the President's speech. And, of course he added himself his own withdrawal from the Presidential campaign.

Q: So the dramatic meeting in your office that was described by the Washington Post and Newsweek and others is really sort of an anticlimax. It's really not that drama-charged at all.

RUSK: That's correct.

Q: That work had been going on for some time.

RUSK: That's correct.

Q: What finally decided the President on it? Did the 'wise men's' meeting finally make the President make this decision, do you think?

RUSK: No, I think that he wanted to move the situation to start another chapter in Vietnam if he could, and he also probably thought about it in relation to his own personal decision about whether to campaign for the Presidency. He felt that if he was going to withdraw from office that he might try this on to see if he could move the matter further toward peace while he was still President.

Q: Did you have any hint that he was going to add that last paragraph on his own?

RUSK: Yes, he talked to me about this the previous year and left me with a very clear impression that he was very seriously considering withdrawing from public life at the end of his first full term. He will have covered this in his book by the time this recording is available, but he had talked to me about the fact that no Vice President had ever succeeded to the Presidency and then run for two full terms.

He referred to the tragedy of Woodrow Wilson, who was desperately ill while he was still President. Although President Johnson didn't put it in categorical terms, I had the impression he was concerned about his health as far as running and serving out another full term was concerned.

The idea that he was driven from office by Vietnam is just not true. Long before dissent in Vietnam had become significant he had talked about withdrawing, and I think he had such advice from his wife. He had had his own views on the matter, so I was not surprised when I was told on my way to New Zealand for a meeting that his speech was going to have in it a final paragraph that would be of interest to me.

Q: And that's how you were told?

RUSK: That's how I was told, I knew then that that was what the final paragraph was going to say.

Q: Do you think anybody would have given him different advice during that period of they had known that he was definitely not going to run again?

RUSK: I don't know. My advice was not based upon that factor, although I always had in mind the possibility that he would not run again. My advice was based upon an attempt to get the Vietnam matter into a new chapter, if possible, by getting some real talks started between North Vietnam and ourselves as an alternative to building up the forces in it.

I must say that I always felt during this period that we had enough I forces out there to do the job.

I had been a Colonel on War Plans during World War II. I remember General Marshall once saying that his rule of thumb during World War II was to give a military commander half the number of troops he asked for and double his mission, and that that worked out just about right. I had the feeling that the five hundred and thirty-five thousand men that we had in Vietnam, plus the much larger forces of the South Vietnamese, plus the Allied Forces, were fully adequate to deny military victory to the Viet Cong and to the North Vietnamese. So I didn't see much point in talking about adding another two hundred thousand men, or any significant additional numbers of men, to the forces out there. We tend to luxuriate our deployment of forces for particular missions, and I felt we had enough.

Q: What about the imbroglio that immediately began over where the talks would occur? Why did that happen, really? It seemed to the public at least so much a detail. Was that a substantive issue?

RUSK: Well, we had to have a place where the South Vietnamese could come. We had to have a place where we could consult our Allies if they wanted to be consulted, and we thought it was only reasonable to have a place that was reasonably congenial to both sides. The South Vietnamese could not come to Phnom Penh or to Warsaw.

Q: They couldn't go to Warsaw?

RUSK: We asked the Poles about that, and the Poles gave us a very equivocal reply. So it was perfectly obvious that, since our object was to get the South Vietnamese at the table along with us as soon as we could, that a place like Phnom Penh and Warsaw were out of the question just as Hanoi would have been out of the question. So with all the possibilities in the world that were open to both sides, we felt that it was unreasonable on the part of the North Vietnamese to stick on Phnom Penh and Warsaw. We had offered them some fifteen alternative sights, ourselves, probably thereby ruling out any one of the fifteen as a matter of face and prestige.

Q: Had you excluded Paris from the fifteen on purpose for that reason?

RUSK: We left out Paris partly because some of us thought that Paris would be acceptable, but partly because the President didn't want to go to Paris. He was afraid that General de Gaulle would have a negative influence on the talks -- given General de Gaulle's attitude toward our role in Vietnam. As it turned out Paris proved to be very satisfactory as a site because President de Gaulle acted very correctly, and the French did everything they could to facilitate the talks. So as far as a site is concerned Paris proved to be very acceptable.

Q: Had the famous statement that's so often used against him that we'd go anywhere any time to talk peace -- was that a statement Mr. Johnson added to his speech some time? That doesn't sound like State Department drafting either.

RUSK: Well, that's a matter of rhetoric. We wouldn't expect Hanoi to come to Washington, and we wouldn't expect to go to Hanoi. I myself on occasion said in the previous months "If anybody can just turn up the warm body of a North Vietnamese for me to talk to, I'll be there." Well, that didn't mean that I would go just anywhere. This is the difference between rhetoric and actual arrangements.

Q: After the talks opened and Mr. Harriman and Mr. Vance went to Paris, did the nature of their instructions change during the balance of 1968? For example, there was a spring offensive by the enemy that Mr. Johnson reacted to publicly. Did this tend to harden our position in the early part of those talks?

RUSK: No. In general, I would think that the record will show that the basic instructions to Harriman and Vance remained pretty consistent throughout. Their object was to get the North Vietnamese to accept the South Vietnamese at the conference table, and then on detail to get a mutual withdrawal of forces, to get release of the American prisoners of war, and to get compliance with the Laos Agreement of 1962, and other factors that would involve liquidation of the war. There might have been some changes in detail in terms of how you respond to particular points made by the North Vietnamese.

But again, certainly as of September 1969, although they are physically present and are sitting at the table in what is supposed to be talks, the North Vietnamese have made no contribution of substance to those talks at all. They're completely adamant, and we're having the same experience in the formal talks that we had in all of these preliminary and private explorations with them, so there's no sign yet that they're seriously interested in bringing this matter to a peaceable solution.

Q: There was a highly publicized lull on the battlefield in the summer of 1968. At that time did the Paris delegation think that we should do something on the ground in way of reducing activity to perhaps spur talks along?

RUSK: I don't recall recommendations that they made on that point. I've seen some reference to it since then, but I don't recall recommendations by a Paris delegation that cut across their instructions.

Q: There wasn't, at least, a major debate in the high places of government about it, or you would recall it?

RUSK: That's right. We had no serious debate about that.

Q: What finally did lead to the breakthrough that allowed the President to stop the bombing entirely in the North in October?

RUSK: A full stoppage of the bombing involved three -- what we called basic facts of life. We made it clear to North Vietnam that if we stopped the bombing, the South Vietnamese were to come to the conference table; that there would be no violations of the demilitarized zones up in the North so that the stoppage of the bombing would not endanger our forces in the northern part of South Vietnam; and there would not be continuation of rocket and other types of attacks on the major population centers.

Q: This was an explicit agreement; signed, sealed, and delivered, so to speak?

RUSK: No, as it worked out we only got a formal agreement on the South Vietnamese coming to the conference table, but we got full understanding by the North Vietnamese that we would expect them to comply with the other two points. We went over it with them eight or nine times in the course of the negotiations.

Q: These were in the secret talks now?

RUSK: In the secret talks. We went over these three points with them eight or nine times. We took it up with the Russians and made these three facts of life perfectly clear to the Russians. Before we finally stopped the bombing in October, President Johnson communicated with the Russians and said, "Now here are the three facts of life. We're not calling them conditions. We're just saying that no President can stop the bombing unless these three things are taken into account, unless these three things occur." And the President said to the Russians, "We have some doubt as to whether the North Vietnamese fully understand the importance of these three points." The Russians came back saying, "Your doubts on that score are unfounded," which we took to be a confirmation that the North Vietnamese did understand and did in fact accept these three facts of life as being essential to the stopping of the bombing.

Q: Now, what time in frame is this? Is this early or mid-October?

RUSK: We went to the Russians in mid-October, I think it was. By that time the matter had begun to gel, because by early October it began to be apparent that the North Vietnamese were going to accept the South Vietnamese at the conference table.

Q: That was the key that had to be overcome.

RUSK: That's right.

Q: Well, what delayed the arrangement then from going into effect until October 31st, I think, when the bombing was actually ordered stopped?

RUSK: Well, for one -- to pin down these points -- it was not until the middle or later October that the North Vietnamese specifically agreed to the presence of the South Vietnamese at the table, although we had had some sort of hints -- some reason to believe early in October that they would in fact do so. We had to pin that down, and then there were some problems of timing -- the relation between the stopping of the bombing and the timing of announcements, the number of days that would elapse between the bombing [halt] and announcement of a meeting at which the South Vietnamese could be present, and things of that sort. There was a good deal of fussing around about detail, and it took a little time to sort those out.

Q: What about the South Vietnamese? Were they explicitly committed to attend at that point?

RUSK: Well, we thought that they were all on board. As a matter of fact, we had an agreed joint communique worked out with President Thieu and President Johnson in which the announcement would be made, but then when we got around to the point of being ready to go with it, President Thieu decided he had to consult people in his own government. When he took it up with his Cabinet and some of his legislative leaders, he got cold feet and decided that he couldn't go ahead with it.

Well, it was too late by then. We had already told the Russians, and we had already agreed with the North Vietnamese, and so we had to go ahead even though the South Vietnamese were not prepared to issue a joint statement and were not prepared immediately to come to Paris. We had quite a fight with them about that.

Q: Was there any importance played by the celebrated activity of certain Americans, notably Madame [Anna] Chennault, in connection with her political campaign to try to keep the South Vietnamese from getting on board, or staying on board?

RUSK: It's hard to know with certainty whether the South Vietnamese were playing American electoral politics at that time. It's possible that they were. It so, this was very reprehensible. I think that there's no doubt that Madame Chennault was trying to influence them not to come to the conference table, and that she probably had electoral considerations in mind.

I have no reason to think that Mr. Nixon, personally, was directly involved in this kind of a thing; but it may be that the South Vietnamese on their own felt that if they agreed to come to Paris this would give Hubert Humphrey a big boost and that as between Humphrey and Nixon they would prefer Nixon. Whether they still think so or not, I don't know.

Q: They may have had second thoughts, but it's too late now. But there was no connection between Madame Chennault and the Republican leadership -- ?

RUSK: Well, I just don't know what connection there was. As I said, I never had any evidence that Mr. Nixon himself was directly involved in that.

Q: After the talks began in November and December, did Mr. Harriman and Mr. Vance then recommend that we reverse our order to General Abrams that maximum pressure on the ground be exerted?

RUSK: The record would have to show that. I myself don't recall that they did. I would be inclined to think that had they done so, I would have recalled it. But that could be looked at in terms of the cables that came from Harriman and Vance back to Washington.

Q: So essentially Mr. Johnson's Administration and your tenure as Secretary of State left the talks open but with no real change in the situation from the time they opened?

RUSK: That's right.

Q: Did the new Administration adequately get briefed from the old, in other words, did they come to you for the advice -- ?

RUSK: Well, during this period of the campaign President Johnson kept the candidate Nixon fully informed of what was going on. I had some briefing sessions with him myself, for example. On this matter of stopping the bombing, President Johnson was in touch with all three of the principal presidential candidates, and, in fact, had them on a conference telephone call before the actual announcement was made to tell them what had gone on. They had all agreed to it about ten days before that, so as far as the candidates were concerned, this was a national decision.

This was a national action for which the President took responsibility, but on which the candidates were informed. The President did everything that he could to insure that he would not do anything that would be obnoxious to any one of the principal candidates during this period.

Q: And certainly, so far as you were concerned, there was nothing about the change of Administrations that necessarily would have changed the nature of the talks or interrupted the machinery of the Paris talks at all?

RUSK: That's correct, and that has proved to be the case since the Administration has changed. President Nixon and Secretary [William] Rogers have continued those talks in Paris in about the same way that I suspect they would have gone on had President Johnson remained in office.

Q: There's probably a whole lot of detail that I may in one of our subsequent sessions ask permission to come back to after I've had a chance to read through this transcript, but so far as the direct questions that I've sent you in advance this seems to be about it.

In the line of getting what was in your mind, though -- just a sort of general speculative question -- if you had known in, say, early 1963 or '64 what the ultimate cost of lives and resources and dollars and public opinion was going to be with our activity in Vietnam, do you think looking back that you would have advised any differently?

RUSK: Well, every American casualty takes a little piece out of those who carry the responsibility, and I've felt that it was a great tragedy that it was necessary to ask our young men to undertake this fighting after all that has happened in the last four decades.

On the other hand, the overriding problem before all of mankind is to prevent World War III. We learned the lessons from World War II and wrote them into the United Nations Charter and into our great security treaties. The principal lesson we learned from World War II is that if a course of aggression is allowed to gather momentum that it continues to build and leads eventually to a general conflict. This was very much in our minds when we wrote collective security into the United Nations Charter, and when we concluded such treaties as the SEATO Treaty.

Our problem is to prevent World War III. I said we learned the lessons of World War II, but no one is going to learn any lessons from World War III. There won't be enough left, and so the problem is to prevent World War III before it comes about. If I had thought myself that there was no connection between Vietnam and preventing World War III, I might have had a different view about Vietnam. But if there is that connection, and the historians will have to judge this, then the effort made in South Vietnam was very much worthwhile.

There's another point that is highly relevant. Two-thirds of the world's people live in Asia. Half of them are free; half of them are in Communist China. During this period in which we have made a stand in Vietnam, the free nations of Asia have made remarkable progress, not only in terms of what is happening in each particular country but in the cohesion which has been developing among the free nations themselves in regional activities, such as the ASPAC grouping of Pacific powers, and such as the ASEAN grouping of the Southeast Asian powers, and the Asian Development Bank, and the initiatives taken by Japan to stimulate agricultural production. All sorts of things have been happening out there, so that behind the cover of our resistance in Vietnam has been a steady strengthening of the forces of free Asia.

Now, they face the prospect of living next to a billion Chinese armed with nuclear weapons and proclaiming a doctrine of militant Communism -- militant world revolution. It was my hope that the Vietnamese experience would give them some time in which they could strengthen themselves to be able to survive the implicit pressures of a Communist China and maintain some peace in Asia of the sort that is conformable to the national interests of the United States. Now, this is something that only the historian will have a chance to tell about. That has not worked out as yet. That has not evolved, but if the free nations of Asia ten years from now are surviving as independent nations -- making their own decisions about their own national life and their own orientation in world affairs -- then the Vietnamese experience will have been worth the tragic price that has been paid for it. If, on the other hand, we are moving down the chute -- the chute toward World War III, then at least we can say that we tried to stop it by stopping it in Vietnam.

I just myself hope in September 1969 that the North Vietnamese will not win on the home front in the United States, and that an internal collapse of morale in the United States will not give them what they've been unable to win on the battlefield in Vietnam.

Q: I gather you're not too worried about what the historians are likely to decide in twenty years if indeed we do avoid the holocaust --

RUSK: It depends on how the story comes out. It depends upon what kind of people we are. The American people are now in the process of deciding whether we can see this thing through and insist that it come to a reasonable conclusion so that the nations of Southeast Asia can live their own lives and that there can be a situation there that the United States can look upon with reasonable contentment. If the Communists are allowed to overrun South Vietnam and Laos and Cambodia and Thailand and on beyond, then I think we're on the way to World War III.

Q: This is our third session taking place on January 2, 1970. Let's begin, Mr. Secretary, with a couple of questions that have occurred to me in reading your prior transcripts, one involving particularly the coordination between our military effort in Vietnam and the political goals we sought.

Some of the critics are saying that the Johnson Administration never successfully coordinated the military with the political effort, and that the military declined to push the pacification effort and that the Administration didn't force it to do so. Would you comment on that general subject area?

RUSK: First, let's talk about coordination back in Washington. I think it's important for the historian to bear in mind that the principal decisions made about Vietnam were made at the Tuesday Luncheon; and at those luncheons President Johnson had with him the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Director of Central Intelligence, and his own Special Assistant for National Security Affairs. We talked about all aspects of Vietnam at those luncheons -- military, political economical, psychological -- and decisions were taken with those who were carrying responsibility for all aspects Of the Vietnam struggle. I don't believe there was any lack of coordination as far as Washington was concerned. President Johnson frequently would say that his right arm was Secretary McNamara in pursuing the military aspect of the Job in Vietnam, and his directive to Secretary McNamara was to get the military job done.

His left arm was his Secretary of State who was expected to try to find a peaceful solution to Vietnam if possible. Now during the period when President Johnson was President, and the historian will find a good deal of this in President Johnson's book, we had literally dozens of contacts -- discussions -- with Hanoi trying to probe the possibilities of a peaceful settlement. Those efforts were always known to, the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Similarly, when we were adopting bombing targets, and when we were authorizing bombing operations, those plans were always brought into the Tuesday luncheon; and the Secretary of State had a chance to comment on them and frequently did so that as far as Washington was concerned there was pretty good coordination.

For a time President Johnson had Mr. Robert Komer in the White House to coordinate what was called "the other war," that is, the political-psychological-economic side of the war, in order that all the agencies in Washington that were concerned about that aspect of the war would pull together. The Department of Agriculture was interested in agricultural developments; the Department of Commerce in trade, and the Department of the Treasury in the economic situation. Komer's job was to coordinate all those activities as far as Washington was concerned.

Now, in the field. In Vietnam the Ambassador was the President's principal representative, and it was his job to insure that the military and political and psychological operations were coordinated on the ground . That was not easy, because we were expecting the South Vietnamese not only to fight a war but to build a nation in the process. It isn't easy to improve education and improve agriculture and restrain inflation and do all these things in the middle of a war, particularly a guerrilla-type war which subjected the government structure in the countryside to continued harassment. It's hard to build schools when school teachers are being assassinated. The Deputy Ambassador in Saigon was the man who was primarily responsible for that job of coordination, reporting to Ambassador Bunker or Ambassador Lodge.

When you're trying to move a complex situation on a broad front, there are always going to be problems of coordination, and so I won't claim that coordination was perfect but it wasn't as bad as some people seem to think. There was no instance where it was a case of not being informed as to what was going on and what was being attempted. The military kept very closely in touch with the political and other developments. The State Department kept very closely in touch with military developments. The first thing I did every morning when I got into the office was to read the detailed military report of the day before in Vietnam, so I kept always very closely in touch with military developments because they were a crucial part of the total effort out there.

Q: And the military was not then basically out of sympathy with the pacification effort in such a way that made it difficult to make progress in that area?

RUSK: No. The military had a lot to learn about how you fight a guerrilla war. During the 1950's the South Vietnamese armed force, such as it was -- it was not very large during that period -- was trained more or less for conventional war -- divisions against divisions. That seemed to be the nature of the threat posed by the organization of several divisions in North Vietnam. It was not specially trained to handle guerrilla warfare.

Guerrilla warfare has complications of its own. It's one of the most difficult kinds of warfare to meet, because the defense -- the South Vietnamese -- had responsibility for protecting a very large number of places. There were forty-three provincial capitals, there were two hundred and forty district towns, and the government held all of those. Now, any one of those was subject to being attacked by guerrillas at any time because the guerrillas did not have to seize and hold a position. They only had to cause trouble and hit and run -- strike and fall back. It meant an enormous commitment of forces to protect the positions that were being held by the government, whereas the guerrilla was free to move around, so that the defense in a guerrilla war situation has a special burden and involves a great deal of manpower.

When the North Vietnamese sent their regular divisions into South Vietnam, you did get a certain amount of conventional war in the classical sense. You had large unit actions against each other in the search-and-destroy operations, and sometimes during the TET offensive of 1968. But I'm not sure in 1970 that we yet have learned all we need to know about how you deal with guerrilla war situations.

Q: Certainly we still have problems from time to time.

RUSK: That's right. I think it's a very subtle, complex, difficult kind of struggle to carry out.

Q: Mentioning the present -- early 1970 -- President Nixon's policy has gained the title 'Vietnamization.' How different do you consider that from what you and President Johnson were trying to do during the time that you were in office?

RUSK: President Johnson followed the policy of building up the South Vietnamese armed forces, and if the historian will look at the rate of increase of the South Vietnamese forces -- say, from 1965 onward -- he will find that there was a very striking increase in the actual numbers, size, equipment, of South Vietnamese forces throughout that period. There were some problems about the rate at which we could turn over responsibility to the South Vietnamese, particularly in matters of equipment.

For example, on the M-16 rifle we were very late in producing the M-16 even for our own troops, and we felt that our own troops had first priority on so sophisticated and complicated a weapon as the M-16 rifle. We only had one producer of that rifle. They were producing only something like -- I don't know -- thirty thousand a month or something -- this is a figure that can be checked. It was not until 1967-68 that new producers were called in to make additional M-16 rifles. That then got the production situation in a position where we could begin to issue M-16 rifles to the South Vietnamese forces, and the Nixon Administration inherited that increase in productive capacity.

As far as helicopters are concerned, we wanted to turn over more helicopter responsibility to the South Vietnamese, but the training time required to train helicopter pilots was very long. It was a minimum of a year and possibly more. The supply of helicopters was limited for awhile to those that were absolutely essential for the U.S. units that were directly involved. Now, as South Vietnamese pilots become trained, and as helicopters can be issued to the South Vietnamese forces, then they can take over more responsibility than they could otherwise.

My guess is that had President Johnson continued in office and continued the policies that he had in chain at the time he left office, that he might well have brought about some reduction in U.S. forces himself. Whether he would have done it exactly like President Nixon, I have no way of knowing at this point, but when you look at the increase in the regular forces, the popular and regional forces, and the local defense units in South Vietnam, you'll see that from 1965 onward there was a regular and steady increase in available military manpower in South Vietnam.

Q: [You] just didn't call it Vietnamization?

RUSK: We didn't call it Vietnamization because so long as we were in office we were not actually withdrawing U.S. forces on the theory that we were turning over responsibility to the South Vietnamese.

I think that it was unfortunate that the term Americanization of the war caught on as much as it did, because throughout the war the South Vietnamese carried a very heavy part of the struggle. Their casualties, particularly if you include the local forces, were always significantly larger than American casualties. For example, when you look at the figures on wounded, the South Vietnamese only counted as wounded those who turned up in hospitals, whereas the Americans would count anybody who had a scratch on an earlobe due to enemy action as a wounded. Eighty-five percent of the American wounded returned to service -- returned to duty -- so that we counted everybody, and the South Vietnamese only counted those that were serious enough to go into a hospital. I think if the historian will look at the casualty figures, he will realize that at no time did the United States ever Americanize the war to the point of carrying the sole burden of the war. The South Vietnamese were always carrying a very large part of it, and this is reflected in their casualties -- not only the casualties they received themselves but the casualties they inflicted on the enemy.

Q: The other part of the Nixon program, to go along with that, is apparently the change from the battle tactics of maximum feasible pressure, or search-and-destroy. Was that a decision that was seriously considered before you left office that might also have been made had the Administration remained in office?

RUSK: We had some debates on search-and-destroy as a technique, as a tactic. The principal purpose of search-and-destroy was to keep the enemy forces, particularly his battalions and regiments, at a distance from the cities. We had no desire to sit back and wait for the enemy to make his own choices as to which towns and cities he would attack, and then find ourselves in an urban war where the civilians would take a great deal of the burden of the fight and where house-to-house fighting would be very mean and difficult. The idea was to catch him while he was still out in the countryside where you could fight him with a minimum of disruption to the life of the country, and where artillery and air bombardment and other weapons could be brought to bear much more effectively than could be done if you waited until he came into the cities.

We debated that at considerable length at times, and, in general, left the actual tactics to the commander in the field. We felt it was not possible back in Washington to give detailed guidance as to how our commanders would handle their battalions and regiments. We pretty well left that up to them. We hoped that they would combine with their search-and destroy action on the pacification front, so that the countryside would in fact become pacified and that the population of the country would be increasingly secure from Viet Cong raids.

Q: The rest of Asia sometimes, I'm afraid, gets overlooked in the emphasis on Vietnam, but it's a very important area obviously. Was there a major attempt during the Johnson Administration to move toward regularizing our relations with Communist China in any way?

RUSK: We, in our talks in Warsaw, took various steps to try to improve relations with Peking. We repeated the effort made by the Eisenhower Administration to bring about an exchange of newspapermen. We proposed the exchange of scientists, scholars, of professional men -- doctors. We proposed the exchange of weather information. We proposed the exchange of basic plant materials in the basic food crops such as rice and wheat, things of that sort, but we got nowhere with it because Peking always came back with the answer that there was nothing to discuss until we are ready to surrender Taiwan.

This has been the great problem about improving relations with mainland China. They insist that Taiwan, sometimes known as Formosa, is a part of China -- their China. They don't recognize that China was split in a civil war and that the Republic of China on Taiwan has an existence of its own. They claim that the promise of the Cairo declaration to deliver Taiwan to China meant that we should now deliver Taiwan to mainland China since they claim that the People's Republic of China is the successor to the China to which Taiwan was promised. This simple attitude forces everyone to ask themselves what they're prepared to do about Taiwan, because if you're not prepared to surrender these thirteen million people on Taiwan to mainland China, then you're not in business with China -- with Peking. Peking won't talk to you, won't do anything.

My impression in January 1970 is that if the United States were to offer tomorrow morning to recognize Peking without the surrender of Taiwan that Peking would turn it down, and so that has been the bone in the throat of efforts to improve relations with Peking. Now, the Nixon Administration has renewed these efforts, and as of today we still don't know whether representatives to Peking will resume their discussions in Warsaw, or in some other capital.

Q: Are the Warsaw talks -- or were they in your Administration -- a two-way street, or did we just get a sort of stony silence from them? Do they make any response at all to our overtures other than just rhetorical criticisms?

RUSK: We never got any forthcoming response to any of the proposals we made. We got no satisfactory answer on a few remaining Americans left in mainland China. We never got any positive response to the various proposals we had made about various types of exchanges that I've mentioned. The main theme of the Chinese representatives in the Warsaw talks was always that we must abandon the Chiang Kai-shek clique. We must turn Formosa over to the mainland, and get our forces out of Asia. So it was a very stiff set of talks without any real give and take -- without any real exchange. It was a case of talking at each other but no real discussion with each other.

Q: You've been involved with the problem of Red China since its successful creation in the late '40's very closely. Is the American political climate essentially different regarding what it is possible to do politically with Red China today than it was, say, in the early '50's when you were in the Department?

RUSK: I think that there's a significant difference. I think there's more flexibility in the general attitude of the American people toward mainland China now than there was back in those days. On several occasions -- and the historian will have to check this -- on several occasions the Congress passed resolutions back in those days opposing the recognition of Peking.

You see, when the British recognized Peking and we did not -- this was before the outbreak of the Korean War; this was 1949 -- I was then Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs -- it was my impression that British and American policy might come together again on the basis of the conduct of Peking. If Peking behaved itself and acted like a loyal member of the international community of nations -- lived at peace with its neighbors -- it was my impression that eventually American policy would move toward the recognition of Peking but that if Peking acted in a militant fashion and demonstrated it was going to be a constant source of trouble in Asia, that British policy might then move toward the American point of view.

Well, the Chinese intervened in Korea. Mainland China is the only nation that has ever been called an aggressor by the United Nations. It was my impression that these events would cause the British to pull back on their recognition and maybe break diplomatic relations with mainland China, but they didn't. I understand that Prime Minister Churchill at one time wanted to do that -- pull back -- but the Foreign Office wouldn't let him do it.

The British also were preoccupied with the problem of Hong Kong. That was a kind of hostage to British policy so they were influenced by the desire to maintain a position in Hong Kong, if at all possible. Hong Kong is not defensible from a military point of view and depends upon the acquiescence of mainland China in the British occupation of Hong Kong.

Q: Even their water supply now, I think, comes from inside mainland China.

RUSK: I think that's right. Also, they buy vegetables, and they buy other stuff. There's a very heavy trade between Hong Kong and mainland China.

Q: But the point is, I guess, that it's not fear of domestic political reaction that prevent changes in our China policy?

RUSK: No. I think that if it were possible to find a reasonable basis on which to improve relations with mainland China that the American people would be glad to see it happen. There will be some discontent. There's still a small so-called China lobby, I suppose, but it's of no consequence and was not during the Kennedy and Johnson years. The issues really turned on whether or not we were prepared to surrender Taiwan to mainland China.

Q: Why does it seem, as it does to me -- perhaps not entirely accurately -- that the academic expertise in the country -- the China scholars, and so on -- all are of the opinion, or virtually all, that our China policy is not very imaginative or well advised? Why are they out of phase with the policy makers in this regard, if they are?

RUSK: I think one of the reasons is that they live in the world of opinion, and the policy maker lives in the world of decision. The policy maker is faced with the fact that thus far there is not much opportunity to improve relations with mainland China without the surrender of Formosa, and that is a major obstacle which the American government just hasn't been able to contemplate. It's not for us to surrender these thirteen million people on Taiwan. They're not ours to surrender in the first place, and it would be a major act of perfidy if we were to do so, or attempt to do so.

I think another thing is that some of the so-called China scholars would like to see us improve our own position by making a gesture, such as toward recognition, even though Peking turned it down. In the world of decision you are not enchanted by empty gestures. If we were to recognize Peking, it would cause a considerable amount of pain to non-Communists in Asia -- people like the South Koreans, and of course the people on Taiwan, the Thais, and others in Southeast Asia, the Filipinos. The question is whether you, by making a gesture, give pain to some of your closest friends without accomplishing anything.

Q: When it's just a gesture.

RUSK: Just a gesture. So I think that those would be the principal points.

Then I think, too, that in government we have looked upon the Chinese as being very militant in their orientation. What they say is very tough, and they have broken with the Soviet Union over the issue of militancy in support of the world revolution. We know that the Chinese have been active in Burma, sending arms and men across the northeastern frontier of Burma. We know that the Chinese have been causing trouble in eastern India among the tribal areas of eastern India. We know that the Chinese have been sending agents into northern Thailand and are building a road down through Laos aimed at Thailand. So people in government are necessarily concerned about the militancy of Peking.

The scholars are inclined to say, "Oh, well, don't listen to what they say. They don't do anything about it." They're inclined to say that Peking, in fact, is following a policy of caution, and that we should not draw as sharp a distinction as we tend to draw between the Soviet Union and Peking on problems of doctrine. Only the historian will be able to sort that out because it will depend upon what happens in the next several years in Asia.

You see, at the present time peace in Asia is being frustrated because of the more than fifty regiments of North Vietnamese troops that are attacking South Vietnam, by more than forty thousand North Vietnamese troops operating in Laos, by North Vietnamese trained guerrillas operating in Laos, by North Vietnamese trained guerrillas operating in northeast Thailand. Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia has publicly complained about the assistance which Hanoi and Peking have been giving to guerrillas in Cambodia, and there's the most neutral of all the neutralist countries.

I mentioned the men and arms coming across the northeast frontier of Burma, and the activity of the Chinese in eastern India. Almost every week infiltrators come from North Korea across the thirty-eighth parallel into South Korea to cause trouble. There's no doubt of the fact that these Communist countries in Asia -- Peking, Hanoi, North Korea -- are acting on a militant basis. They're causing trouble to their neighbors, and sometimes the scholars are inclined to put that to one side, to downgrade the importance of this activity.

There'd be peace in Asia if these Asian Communists were to live a normal life alongside of their neighbors there and leave them alone, because there's no non-Communist country in Asia that has any designs on moving against the Communist countries of Asia.

Q: You mentioned Laos there a couple of times. During the Kennedy Administration, I suppose that was the chief public hot spot. Did Mr. Johnson as Vice President have any major responsibilities that involved Laos during that time?

RUSK: He kept well-informed about Laos, but I don't recall that he took a very active part in the basic decisions that we were making about Laos. He did inherit the bitter disappointment of the Kennedy Administration in the failure of the Geneva accords of 1962 on Laos.

When President Kennedy became President, he took a long look at Laos and decided that the best solution for Laos was to get all foreigners out of that country -- leave it as a land-locked buffer. The Laotian people themselves were gentle, civilized people who obviously had no interest in killing each other. The battles that were fought were not very bloody; a few big explosions made quite a battle. I remember one incident when the two sides left the battlefield in Laos to go to a water festival together for about ten days and then went back to the battlefield, so we felt that if they were left alone, that Laos would provide no threat of any sort to anybody and might be a useful buffer between North Vietnam and the rest of Southeast Asia. President Kennedy talked to Chairman Khrushchev about that in Vienna in June 1961, and Khrushchev seemed to agree that the answer to Laos was for everybody to get out and leave it alone.

So we went to the Geneva Conference, which had already started, and made several important concessions to get an agreement on Laos. For example, we accepted the man as Prime Minister that the Soviet Union recognized as prime minister. He was not our prime minister. We accepted Prince Souvanna Phouma, the neutralist, as the Prime Minister of a coalition government. We accepted a coalition government, one-third of which was to be Pathet Lao, Communist in character. We accepted the international neutralization of Laos, and we accepted the idea that we'd get all of our people out of there. We had about six hundred people there at the time.

But the trouble is that we did not get any performance out of Hanoi on those Laos accords for a single day. The agreement specified that all foreign forces would leave the country. North Vietnamese forces did not leave the country. The agreement specified that Laos would not be used as an infiltration route into other countries. At no time did Hanoi stop using Laos as an infiltration corridor into South Vietnam. The Pathet Lao -- the Communists -- did not permit the coalition government to exercise authority in those areas of Laos held by the Communists; and they did not permit the International Control Commission to exercise its functions in those areas of Laos held by the Communists. So President Kennedy was bitterly disappointed by the failure of the Laos accords to achieve their purpose, and President Johnson inherited that failure and our inability to get any measure of compliance by Hanoi. The historian will want to try to find out what the attitude of Russia was toward Laos during all of this period.

I had the impression at the time of the Geneva Conference on Laos in 1962 that the Russians were acting in reasonably good faith on the basis of the agreement which seems to have been reached at the meeting in Vienna in June between President Kennedy and Chairman Khrushchev, but we never got any help from the Russians in getting performance on the Laos accords of '62. The historian may want to inquire as to whether it just happened that the Russians lost considerable influence in Hanoi at about the time that the Geneva accords of '62 were concluded, and were not able to bring Hanoi to comply for fear that this would simply drive Hanoi into the arms of Peking. I think this may be one of those points where the Russo-Chinese rivalry led to a frustration of the Geneva accords on Laos, and led to the inability or unwillingness of the Russians to try to press Hanoi to comply with them.

Q: Did Mr. Johnson have to make any new decisions on Laos in the first year or so after he came to the Presidency?

RUSK: By the time President Johnson became President, the main effort of North Vietnam was clearly aimed at South Vietnam so that President Johnson was greatly preoccupied by the South Vietnamese aspect of it. Of course, the infiltration through Laos was a part of the Vietnam problem, but the North Vietnamese themselves concentrated more on South Vietnam than on Laos. Had North Vietnam thrown against Laos a fraction -- a fourth -- of the effort that they threw against South Vietnam, they might well have overrun Laos and seized it completely. Why they did not do that I don't know. It may be that by the time this material is available it will be known that North Vietnam did in fact expect to pick up Laos as a part of its total program in Southeast Asia.

Q: I read just, I think, last week that our bombing program in Laos actually began in about May of '64. Was that a Presidential-type decision that had been made?

RUSK: Yes, the bombing program in Laos was always the matter of highest policy consideration and was worked out in consultation with the government of Laos -- Prince Souvanna Phouma -- at all times.

Q: And with his approval?

RUSK: With his approval.

Q: You had mentioned the beginning of the bombing program in Laos and the acceptance of that by the Laotian government. Why has it been possible for those who are criticizing our policy in Southeast Asia to refer to Laos as a secret war?

RUSK: Well, there's a very simple reason for that. Prime Souvanna Phouma has been very anxious to maintain the formalities of the Geneva Accords of 1962, and it was his judgment that he did not want to publicly talk about American air operations in Laos. He wanted to maintain the theory that it's only the North Vietnamese who are acting militarily in violation of the Geneva Accords of 1962.

Our view was that since the North Vietnamese were acting militarily against Laos and abusing Laos with infiltration into South Vietnam, that that suspended the military clauses of the Laos Accords of 1962 and that it was perfectly appropriate for us to take action in Laos -- among other things to defend South Vietnam. But Souvanna Phouma wanted to keep it quiet, and it was solely for that reason that the American side has been as quiet about Lao as it has been -- no other reason.

Q: But the Administration did make a decision that our commitment to Laos was in the nature of being as strong as our commitment to Vietnam in the sense that we were pledged to put our force in there?

RUSK: After the Geneva Accords in 1962 there was some doubt about that, because in those Accords Laos promised that it would not call upon the protection of any other group of countries, such as SEATO, and we agreed to that declaration of neutrality by Laos so that it's a very questionable thing that the South Asia Treaty now applies to Laos in the same way that it applies to South Vietnam. You see, Laos was one of the protocol states of the Southeast Asia Treaty.

Q: They wrote themselves out of the protocol --

RUSK: But they wrote themselves out of the protocol, and we accepted their writing themselves out of it. So in the technical sense of law and politics, I think our commitment is somewhat different than is our commitment to South Vietnam.

Q: I see. How does that apply then to Thailand? Shortly after you left office, there was a public outcry regarding secret commitments that the Senate said they had discovered that had been made to Thailand without their knowledge. Were there new agreements made with Thailand during the Johnson Administration that didn't previously exist in the way of commitment?

RUSK: As far as Thailand is concerned it is a main member -- signatory member -- of the Southeast Asia Treaty so that there is no doubt at all about the treaty commitment as far as Thailand is concerned. Furthermore, Thailand was clearly covered by the August 1964 resolution on Southeast Asia, the so-called Tonkin Gulf Resolution.

In this SEATO military organization a good deal of contingency planning went on, just as it goes on in NATO, in CENTO, and in other places-- Plan I, Plan V, Plan VIII, that kind of thing, were worked out simply on a contingency basis as happens in any alliance. Those contingency plans are not ordinarily made public. They're not ordinarily discussed with members of Congress. They're based solidly upon commitments undertaken by the Congress. There was only one negative vote on the South Asia Treaty when it was approved by the Senate. There were only two negative votes in the entire Congress on the August '64 resolution which reinforced the Southeast Asia Treaty commitment.

Q: So these agreements were really just contingency plans based on agreements that you feel were adequately known?

RUSK: Contingency plans based upon policies which had been thoroughly discussed with the Congress [and] on which Congress had acted.

Q: So there was no evasion of the Congressional prerogatives in that sense?

RUSK: I don't know of any secret political understandings with Thailand. There was secret military contingency planning, but I don't know of anything that went beyond the Southeast Asia Treaty. The so-called Rusk-Tanat communique -- which simply spelled out that the obligations of SEATO were both joint and several -- was made public at the time, and was entered into after consultation with members of the Foreign Relations Committee.

You see, the SEATO Treaty says that -- Article 4, paragraph 1 -- in the event of aggression by armed attack against a member of the treaty that each state shall take steps to meet the common danger -- each signatory, each party, I believe the treaty calls it. Now that meant that the responsibilities were individual as well as collective. It was, of course, up to the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization if possible to move as a group to deal with an aggression against a member of the organization, but in the absence of group action, individual responsibilities still were there. Each party shall take steps to meet the common danger, and so the Rusk-Tanat communique made that clear, because at that time France was on the way out of SEATO, and the question was whether there was a veto in SEATO by France in the event of aggression against Thailand. In order to settle down the Thais, we simply confirmed that these obligations were individual as well as collective in character, but there was nothing secret about them.

Q: The allies that we have in the Far East who participated in Vietnam are frequently called mercenaries because of our contributions to their troop support. Was that a necessary prerequisite to their cooperation -- that we bear the cost -- perhaps even beyond the actual cost of the troop use?

RUSK: That is a phrase which has been used by some of the opponents of our effort in Southeast Asia. To me it has little substance. For example, Lend Lease during World War II, which was massive in character, did not make mercenaries out of the British and the Russians or the French. We have the resources to be able to help countries that are in trouble, and so we help to pay the bill. We did the same thing in the Korean war. I would compare what we've been doing in Southeast Asia to what we did during World War II under Lend Lease.

Q: Our payments haven't gone beyond the military necessities of the power concerned? We haven't paid more than the bill for their participation?

RUSK: No, but bear in mind that quite apart from what they were doing in South Vietnam, some of these countries had other obligations that they had to be concerned about. For example, North Korea is very menacing these days towards South Korea, and it has been important to help the South Koreans improve their own armed forces with additional manpower and additional equipment and things of that sort. That requires military aid.

The Thais have a pretty good struggle going on up in the northeast part of their own country, and they needed additional materials such as helicopters. They needed additional artillery -- things of that sort -- and they needed to increase the size of their own armed forces so that there were needs which went beyond the actual needs of troops positioned in South Vietnam to which we made a contribution. But to call that bribery, or to say that that translates these people into mercenaries, is just a part of the polemics of the South Vietnamese debate.

Q: It's not a case of those powers saying, 'Well, we won't play unless you perform,' this type of thing -- where they threaten non-support unless we give them additional aid.

RUSK: I have no doubt that the British, the French, and the Russians said that to us during the Lend Lease negotiations.

Q: They may have, as a matter of fact.

RUSK: There's nothing unusual in that. It's a matter of capability as well as will so there may have been some discussion of that. I don't recall. No one ever said that to me, but implicit in the situation was that they had various needs and if they were to meet those needs they would need assistance, and we were in a position to give them assistance.

Q: It's frequently said that those allies and those elsewhere in the world, as well, who criticized our policy in Southeast Asia publicly were sometimes privately telling us that they were glad we were there and didn't want us to leave. Is that an accurate impression?

RUSK: We have not had public criticism of any importance from those who have troops in South Vietnam -- Thailand, the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, the South Koreans. We might get some criticism at times when they think that we're not going to see it through to a successful conclusion. They may be a little nervous about our will, particularly when they listen to the domestic debate in the United States on the subject and listen to some United States Senators. There are others in Asia who would not publicly give us support, but who privately realized that they have a stake in the successful outcome of what we were trying to do in South Vietnam. I have no doubt myself that if we suddenly were to abandon South Vietnam, that this would cause dismay in places like India and Burma and Indonesia and Malaysia, and even Cambodia.

Q: They made that clear to us in various ways?

RUSK: I can't say that each one of them did. It would be embarrassing to some of them for me to try to put words in their mouths on this matter. I don't think Burma ever said that to us, but some Indian leaders have; some Indonesian leaders have; certainly the Malaysians have said that. Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia has never said that in so many words.

Q: Some of them are just not in a position to say it at all.

RUSK: That's right.

Q: What is your source for that, if I may ask?

NOLTING: A number of articles that I've read and correspondence with Vietnamese friends.

In other words, there was a possibility, I think, of our cutting this albatross off of our necks. I don't understand why President Johnson tried to bull it through the way he did on that score, which is a psychological-sociological-political point. Nor do I understand why he tried to bull it through in undeclared, limited war, unfinanced by taxes. Those are the questions that linger in my mind. But on the question which is to my mind important to history because there is such a blank with respect to it, that is the influences which brought about the American government's complicity in the overthrow of President Diem, Lyndon Johnson was absolutely right, and it's extremely ironic in my view that he should have inherited this tremendous blunder of his predecessor.

Q: That's very well said.

FRANK D. CORREL
Program Officer, USAID
Saigon (1962-1963)

AID Vietnam Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1963-1964)

Frank D. Correl was born in Germany in 1929. He received his BS from Rider College in 1950, and his MA from Columbia University in 1955. He served in the US Army from 1953 to 1955. His postings include South Korea, Vietnam, Morocco, Sri Lanka, Lesotho, and Zambia. W. Haven North interviewed him on September 29, 1990.

CORREL: In October, 1962, I was sent on a direct transfer to the AID Mission in Saigon, Vietnam.

Q: How did this come about?

CORREL: I had made a brief reference earlier about having been in this situation where I was very much in the Mission doghouse for my views. I happened to be in touch with a former supervisor of mine who had been transferred to Vietnam. Somehow things happened and the word came through that I was needed in Saigon. I wouldn't say that I arranged it, but I certainly indicated my availability. As I perhaps didn't know too well at the time, the worm does turn and, of course, by the time this request for a reassignment came up, things had changed by 180 degrees in Seoul. When I left, I was sorry to go, and I think Jim Killen was sorry to see me go.

Q: What was your assignment in Vietnam?

CORREL: In Vietnam, I was assigned to a large commodity import program, and I worked on that during my tour.

Q: It must have been tremendous.

CORREL: Well, actually in dollar amounts it was not as great as the program in Korea was. In terms of complexity and in terms of management style, it was a very different atmosphere and a very different situation.

Q: What was the complexity?

CORREL: Well, for one thing, it was a much larger office. There were four Americans and eight Vietnamese. We did more commodity analysis; we had a great deal to do with foreign importers, which was much less the case in Korea. In Korea, my supervisors had ranged from being relatively disinterested to being very interested in how the program was making an impact. During the time I was in Vietnam, the one Chief I worked for had a philosophy which reflected very much what the Mission philosophy was: That was: "they need it, they ask for it, they get it." We essentially were running the equivalent of a mail order service for the Vietnamese. Whatever it was they wanted, they got it.

Q: There was no room for critiquing or challenging them?

CORREL: It was not welcome. You were considered to be a sorehead or even disloyal if you basically even questioned the modus operandi under which things were happening in Vietnam. I didn't stay there very long. Subsequently, I also saw the picture from the other side, sitting on the Vietnam desk in AID/W (AID/Washington) for a while. I have kept a copy of an interesting letter that Jim Killen asked me to write him after I'd been in Saigon for a while about my impressions of the place.

Q: What did you tell him?

CORREL: Well, I told him seven pages worth of stuff.

Q: Well, we could put that in an annex if you'd like.

CORREL: It's probably the easiest way to do it, but what I did highlight was that our preoccupation was counterinsurgency, and that this was eating up the rest of the Mission at the expense of other priorities. In our commodity import program, we were doing the same thing we were supposed to do in Korea, and that is generate local currency for the defense effort. We had an anomaly of foreign exchange rates that was even greater than in Korea, but unlike Korea, nothing was ever done about it in Vietnam. We had instances where the commodity import program actually ran counter to what some of our project program was trying to do. I remember in particular aid to set up a local dairy. The Foremost Dairy Co. had a project in Vietnam, and under the project we were importing dairy equipment and everything else and providing extensive technical assistance. Under the Commodity Import Program we were bringing in very large amounts of sweetened condensed milk, which is what this dairy was supposed to be producing. Our objectives in the two programs were in complete contradiction.

Q: Your letter.

CORREL: Perhaps I ought to quote a couple of things, that's the easiest: "The commercial import program in the past has not had a program level determined at the beginning of the fiscal year. The practice has been to issue procurement authorizations as they were requested by the government of Vietnam and whatever that added up to on June 30 was the level for that year. The composition wasn't determined either. In the words of my boss, they need it, they ask for it, they get it. In several important instances, government requests and PA issuances were based on the word of certain importers. "Relations between our office and traders are very close indeed," I could have said of suspicious characters. The leadership of the Mission basically was only concerned that these levels be used and local currency be generated, even if it was at a very unfavorable rate of exchange.

After I got back to Washington, I was working on the desk over my objections. I really wanted to accept an offer to go to the African Bureau at the time, but agreed to work on the Vietnam desk. Together with two analysts on the desk and an economic officer in the Asia Bureau, we worked on an analysis of the commercial import program in Vietnam, which was actually presented to a White House advisor, Mike Forestall. He asked a lot of questions. Subsequently, the word came back to us to stop being nitpicking about these programs. This made me decide that the time had come for Vietnam and me to part.

Q: What was the heart of the issue that you were presenting from your analysis?

CORREL: Not only were we not accomplishing our aims in Vietnam with regard to strengthening the economy, we were actually encouraging multiple waste of the resources. On the one hand, the Vietnamese were getting aid for such things as that dairy plant, or a paper mill that was being undercut by commodity imports and they were not generating anywhere near what they could in local currency with the resources we were giving them, but sort of spiriting them away. We were creating a dangerous degree of dependency that we would not be able to satisfy once things calmed down, if that ever happened.

Q: The commodity import program was counter productive in terms of development ?

CORREL: Not only in development terms, I don't think there was even much thought of development, but even in accomplishing its stated objectives.

Q: Which was?

CORREL: Which was to generate local currency for the counter insurgency effort. Basically, I was very unhappy in a substantive, professional way. I thought that the Mission in Saigon was completely on the wrong track. I got to feeling that way almost from the first day, very shortly after my arrival when we had a briefing from the Major General commanding the Military Assistance Group, and the stuff that he was telling us about Vietnam and about the war effort, was untrue and unbelievable. It was kind of an embarrassment working there. I don't know that the Mission had very strong leadership and there seemed to be a feeling that whatever was happening was perfectly okay and that any questioning was considered to be undesirable and disloyal. Ironically, much later, in 1971, a State Department senior official told me that at the time a number of the embassy people had agreed with my positions but had not felt free to say so.

Q: Did you work with it or socialize with any of the Vietnamese?

CORREL: Only with the people who I worked with in the office. Unlike the other people in the office who had absolutely nothing to do with the local employees and local counterparts after hours, my wife and I socialized with several of them and in fact, became quite close friends with a couple of them.

Q: How did you find Vietnamese people to work with and so on?

CORREL: Some of the Vietnamese in my office I really valued as coworkers and friends. There were others where it was more of a neutral experience. Not that they were hard to get along with or anything like that, but I frankly think some of them had other interests. I think they were serving as intelligence agents for importers, or possibly were government agents. One didn't see them very much in the office, but I wasn't responsible for supervising them. I was very definitely one of the Indians. Otherwise, I didn't really get to meet many Vietnamese, except a few through the medium of a fellow who was supposed to be an Assistant PL480 Officer in the Mission. He told me that he was CIA and he certainly had some interesting contacts. Otherwise, the Vietnamese people met would have been people in the market or like that.

Q: How was life in Saigon at that time?

CORREL: Other than having to be always on the alert for something happening, it was very pleasant, until the middle of August of 1963. But, Saigon was a very large, sophisticated city, representing Vietnamese, French, and Chinese culture. It was a place where one could really enjoy good food, an interesting culture, a lot of things to do and what have you. We were constrained from going out of town. I did get over to Cambodia on personal leave for a trip to Angkor and to Phnom Penh. In addition, I went on a working trip to look at commodity import programs to both Cambodia and Laos with a State Department officer from Hong Kong. That was certainly very fascinating. Then, on either the 20th or 21st of August, 1963, a great deal of tenseness had built in Saigon, much of it due to Buddhist opposition. Then, the forces of the President's brother, Ngo Diem raided the Buddhist temples, including one right next to the AID Mission. We weren't at work for several days. We had been without an Ambassador for a while. Henry Cabot Lodge came in at that point to become Ambassador, and he had to walk down the street to come to our Mission, because our street was cut off and we were isolated.

Q: You said you went to Cambodia and Laos. Does anything stand out in your mind about that trip when you went to see their commodity import programs?

CORREL: It wasn't too different. I had the feeling that in both Cambodia and Laos there was a little more give and take with the government, but nothing very significant. It was a very interesting trip.

Q: Why were you asked to go? What were you supposed to do?

CORREL: It was basically to go along with the State Department man while he familiarized himself with how the commodity import programs worked. I got to talk to the respective officers in the two Missions, but it was not exactly a dawn to dusk-type job. There were a couple of very distinct personalities in the two Missions who believed in running the Missions in, I won't quite say authoritarian manner, but with a very strong presence and that certainly colored how people at subordinate levels worked in the Mission.

Q: What's the other one?

CORREL: I'd like to mention that I arrived in Vietnam roughly three or four weeks before the first monk burned himself on the street. The tension and the very high degree of unpopularity of the government proceeded to become more and more marked. It made life in Saigon and getting the work done considerably more difficult as one got the suspicion that the government was losing meaningful control of the support of its people. And, of course with the coming of the attack on the Buddhist Temples, there were instances where people just felt that the United States was pouring money down a rat hole. There were also some personal experiences. I'd just like to mention one incident in the latter part of August 1963 while we were at work and trying to sort of figure out how to get through this whole business. My two children, one of whom was a baby in a pram, and the other was a little boy about three years old, had gone with the nurse maid to the Circle Sportif and then had been held on the street by a Vietnamese guard armed with a bayonet for an extended period of time at the height of a very hot day while my wife was going frantic at home. Incidents like that really also made one wonder just exactly whether anybody there was interested in what the United States had to do in that country, except to throw its money away.

Q: After being in Vietnam you went on to the Vietnam desk; were you on the desk very long?

CORREL: I was on the desk for approximately eight months after I came off home leave.

Q: Anything particular during that time?

CORREL: Yes, it was a very important period. With the assassination of Ngo Diem on November 1, 1963, and, of course, the assassination of John F. Kennedy after that, and with real instability coming to the fore with regard to South Vietnam, the United States decided to embark on a very big increase in the level of assistance and, of course, a much greater military involvement. We were supposed to have had 16,000 American military advisors in Vietnam during the time that I was there. While during that eight months, we didn't get anywhere near the half million troops, significant increases took place. The level of interest at the White House had increased. There had been a lot of interest in the White House before, but apparently there was also a great deal of difference of opinion. But, I think that in 1964, policy started crystallizing and the more dissenting elements were shoveled out of the way. I remember a couple of officers in particular who definitely ended up in the deep freeze. They were State Department officers. In AID, the Asia Bureau was very much attuned to meeting whatever was asked of them. This was the period when Secretary of Defense McNamara and the Deputy Administrator of the Agency, Bill Gaud, went off to a big meeting in Hawaii, where Gaud came back with the word that the AID Program was to increase very extensively, including the provision of, if it wasn't out and out military equipment, it was the next best thing. Thus, the character of the assistance effort in Vietnam became much larger and also qualitatively changed because of the tremendous increase in quantity and dollar value.

Q: What was the change? Change to what mainly?

CORREL: One big item was a whole bunch of radios and other communications equipment. The commodity import program increased quite significantly. They started sending more people out for the office of rural affairs and as provincial and district representatives. Reports also came back from Vietnam, not just from people like me, but also from visitors who'd been sent out there under contracts, that the whole concept of the strategic hamlets had very significant flaws in it. I remember quite well a woman who was sent out there to do an evaluation of strategic hamlets and being asked to do that without ever going to one. And, she said, well I can't do much of an evaluation if I can't go visit them, will you let me go to ten of them? The military said, well we can't guarantee your safety, and she said, well can you guarantee just one place I can go to and spend the night? And they said, no they couldn't even do that. It cast some very serious doubt on the stuff that was being fed to the public and maybe being fed to people at the highest government level and what was happening at a different level.

Q: Anything else during that eight month period? What was your job at that time?

CORREL: My job was basically program analysis and stuff like that. I remember one time I was asked to do an analysis. I had a couple of people working for me on the desk. We were asked to do an analysis of the Vietnamese economy and some of its weak points and strong points, which we did. The Desk Officer at the time was Walter G. "Stony" Stoneman. He took a look at our report. It was reasonably critical and he said, "I want to check this out with the CIA." He then came back to me with a little note, which said that the CIA had looked at the report, had said that it contained more stuff than they had available, and that they had absolutely nothing to add to it, that they were going to adopt it as their own analysis. This was most interesting, as at the same time we were being told that our view of what was happening in Vietnam was just unwarranted and wrong-headed.

Q: What was the main point you were making in that analysis?

CORREL: An account of the weaknesses in the economy and its heavy dependence on Uncle Sam acting as a Santa Claus.

Q: A very dependent society.

CORREL: Not only very dependent, but increasingly dependent.

Q: Well, so after eight months, what precipitated your leaving that part of the world?

CORREL: Oh, change in desk officer, general fatigue with the program, the feeling that I was unable to work effectively there, and that if anything, my presence was considered counter-productive.

PAUL D. HARKINS
General, US Army
Saigon (1962-1964)

General Paul D. Harkins was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1904. He graduated from West Point in 1929 and served in World War II, the Korean War and Vietnam where he held the Military Assistance command. General Harkins was interviewed by Ted Gittinger in 1981.

Q: What was the reaction of Americans in Saigon to the coup? I guess it was mixed.

HARKINS: Mixed. I think the embassy and the CIA now - that's another thing. When everything settled after the twenty-third of August attempt, they took off military law and things were going along pretty well again for a while. Then in Lodge's book, now, I was supposed to be very close working with the Ambassador, and I did with Nolting. But he said that he worked with CIA, and this guy Conein again contacted the generals without informing me. That's true, because I didn't know it, but he'd been working with CIA and this man Conein, other generals had, until the twenty-eighth of October when Don came in and told me that they were going to change the government. Later on I found out that they had been working behind my back, which is not a very good way to run the country team.

Q: I've seen you quoted - I don't know whether it was accurately or not - on October 30 making a very optimistic prognosis for the war and the general situation in Vietnam, or maybe it was October 31. It was very close to the coup, a day or two before. Were you quoted accurately?

HARKINS: I don't think so. I don't remember the quote.

Q: Well, I have a copy of it here.

HARKINS: I felt that way, and I so reported to Taylor and McNamara and as a matter of fact, Mr. McNamara said, "Well, get ready to bring a thousand American troops home." And we started working on that right away.

Q: Well, what I would like you to comment on is if you knew that there was a coup in the offing, didn't that affect your optimism in any way?

HARKINS: No, not particularly, because I think things in the country, all over the country, were going in our favor at that time. The army was taking over and we had built up the CIDG, the Civil Defense [Civilian Irregular Defense Group], and the province troops, and they had things pretty well under control as a matter of fact at that time.

Q: Now Lodge, I think, reported a couple of months after the coup when things began to slide downhill, when it became obvious that the military situation was turning around, that in fact the security situation had been deteriorating since the previous spring or some such.

HARKINS: He didn't know anything about it. He never left Saigon.

Q: And he wasn't taking your advice on this kind of thing?

HARKINS: No, no. We didn't see eye-to-eye at all. I think if Nolting had stayed there, things would have been much different. But every time Lodge would stab me in the back he'd tell Mrs. Harkins how pretty she was.

Q: How much time did Ambassador Lodge spend at the Cercle Sportif?

HARKINS: Do you mean playing tennis?

Q: -And swimming. I've heard that he spent a lot of time there.

HARKINS: Oh, I think he probably went over in the afternoon every day. I don't know. I never went there, as a matter of fact. I wasn't a tennis player at the time. I didn't have time to, in the first place.

Q: Now, Diem's other brother, [Ngo Dinh Can], who was up in Hue, I think, that made quite a story, how he was handled. He was arrested and executed, I think, well after the coup, sometime after the coup. Did this case pose some special problems for you?

HARKINS: No. No, I don't remember the Can incident too well.

Q: Well, it was mainly a political thing.

HARKINS: There were so many people being done away with.

Q: Can you describe how all of this affected the military situation?

HARKINS: Well, as I say, the commanders didn't know who to turn to, and they didn't know whether they were going to keep their own jobs or whether they'd be colonels tomorrow, or the generals didn't know if they would be reduced in rank or if they'd be the next ones to go. And they were looking back towards Saigon for guidance, and guidance wasn't coming out of Saigon, because as I say, you can't get guidance from twelve guys who don't see eye-to-eye all the time. So that really they were looking for their own jobs and staying close to home and not getting out with the troops and seeing that the war was carried to the VC.

Q: Why didn't Minh assert himself and give direction to all of this?

HARKINS: I don't think he was that strong. I think he was a popular man, but I don't think his decisions were very good, and as a matter of fact, that's when General Khanh said, "We're not getting any guidance from Saigon and I'm just going to take over."

Q: Were you able to establish a good relationship with the new regime, the Minh regime?

HARKINS: Yes. I got along fine with them, because I knew them all, except one named Thien, I think. He had been out of the country, and I didn't know him at all. But he was a pretty important guy.

Q: Can you give me some assessments of character of some of these guys? What was your assessment of Big Minh? That he was popular?

HARKINS: That he was popular, but as I say, he was not a decision-maker as far as knowing what to do in the country. Khiem was probably the strongest of them all. He was sort of the one that held them together as chief of staff.

Q: That was Tran Thien Khiem, I think.

HARKINS: K-H-I-E-M.

HARKINS: And Don, as I say, he wasn't a good military commander. I think he would have been a good ambassador someplace. He was a very polite, nice, easy-going type of man, but not the type that would carry on military thing and go out and see that things were done.

Q: Did none of Minh's regime impress you particularly as a take-charge sort of type?

HARKINS: No, I don't think there was anyone who showed the leadership, and that's probably why he didn't get any decisions out of them.

Q: Now, a couple of weeks after the coup there was one of many Honolulu conferences.

HARKINS: One a month.

Q: The country team was there, Secretary [Dean] Rusk was there, Secretary McNamara was there, General Taylor, McGeorge Bundy was there, I know that you were there. I don't know what transpired. Did you give a briefing on the military situation? Can you recall?

HARKINS: I usually did. At all those briefings I was asked to give my -

Q: Can you recall anything special that transpired then?

HARKINS: Not particularly, that one, no, because I told them what the truth was then, that the whole strategic hamlet program - well, I'm not sure now whether this is after Khanh took over or-

Q: No, this is before Khanh.

HARKINS: Before Khanh took over.

Q: This would have been probably November, still, of 1963. My information is that you gave a fairly optimistic report and that McNamara expressed a good deal of skepticism, but I don't know if that's true.

HARKINS: I don't recall. I mean, we had so many different conferences. As a matter of fact, somebody from the Joint Chiefs of Staff was to visit me every month I was there, and of course, Admiral Felt would visit me frequently. Then if they didn't visit, I would have to go back to Hawaii. So it was really a monthly trip. I don't know how many times I've flown the Pacific Ocean, coming and going. You could leave Honolulu, say, at twelve noon and fly in daylight all the way to Saigon and get in to Saigon at 7:00 p.m. the next day. But it would still be daylight.

Q: What kind of thing did that do to your biological clock?

HARKINS: Well, I had a couple of bunks on the plane.

Q: I see. I know that one thing resulted from this conference, at least I have seen a document that says that there was a directive put out that planning begin, I gather contingency planning, for clandestine operations against the North, what later became the 34-A operation. Do you remember the origins of that at all?

HARKINS: No. No. I don't. Sorry.

Q: That's fine. Now, McNamara came again, I think in December of 1963, to Saigon and visited, and I have some indications that he carried back a recommendation that contingency planning begin for bombing the North. Do you remember anything about that visit? I'm sorry I don't have the documents for that period, but I just don't have them.

HARKINS: No, I don't.

Q: Okay.

HARKINS: You see, I didn't have any control over the bombing out there. That would come from CINCPAC, probably.

Q: Okay.

HARKINS: And although I was probably in on it, I don't recall that I was in on any of the planning.

Q: Well, it would fit that CINCPAC would have made the recommendation. My records show that Mr. Trueheart went home in December. Do you remember that?

HARKINS: You mean to stay home?

Q: Yes. What I'm curious about is the background for that. Was this a routine change or in line with a policy change?

HARKINS: I think probably a policy - no, I'm not sure because Trueheart was more or less of the opinion that it was good for Diem to be gone, and so was Lodge. He'd been there quite a while, I think.

Q: Well, I'll tell you. Frankly, I've heard that he was sent home because he'd made you his enemy. And I thought I'd just ask you if there was anything to that.

HARKINS: Enemy?

Q: Yes.

HARKINS: I don't know in what sense you'd mean an enemy.

Q: Well, in the sense that he'd been anti-Diem and you were pro-Diem.

HARKINS: Yes, that's true. Yes, that's true. Yes, he was anti-Diem.

Q: Well, my source said that he had crossed you, and that deputy chiefs of mission don't cross chiefs of MAAG and get away with it. Is that true?

HARKINS: I had nothing to do with his relief.

Q: Okay. Now, this is curious, because as I understand it, Mr. Trueheart was replaced by David Nes, and Nes only lasted about six months before he was sent home. Do you know anything of that story?

HARKINS: No, because after the Khanh - I knew Nes, but I'm not sure of the reason why [he was relieved]. Lodge had so many likes and dislikes. As I say, he was a loner. He liked to do everything by himself and if his deputy would do something, and he might be away or have a different interpretation, it was up to Lodge to tell them, "I can't work with this man. Have him relieved'."

But after - well, [William] Westmoreland came out as my deputy in January and he'd been there two days or three days when Khanh took over and said, "What do we do now?" I said, "Nothing. You just sit and wait and see what happens." Then I knew Khanh very well, and Lodge had to call me and say, "Who is General Khanh?" He had never met him, and yet he was a corps commander up in Hue. I told him he was probably the best general in the Vietnamese Army, I mean as far as the military was concerned. So when he took over, Lodge didn't know him very well, and when we went out on trips, Khanh would take me along with him and, as I say, Lodge would be in the second seat of the second helicopter.

The first Sunday after he took over, we met him at the airport at six o'clock in the morning for breakfast, and then we went out and got some helicopters and flew about fifteen miles north over Saigon and landed, and there was an artillery battery there, four guns. He went up and I said, "What are you going to do?" They were all pointing north, and he said, "I'm going to shoot to the North." So he went up and I stayed in back because it was his day, and he had the whole press corps there; there must have been about thirty of them, photographers and all taking pictures of him. And he'd turn around and say, "Where's General Harkins?" The press looked around, and I said, "I'm right here. I'm back here." He said, "Come up here." And Khanh put his arm around me and turned to the press and said, "I just want to tell you that General Harkins is not my boss, but he's the best friend Vietnam has, and I just want you to publish that." And they never did.

Q: They never did? What did Lodge make of a statement like that, do you suppose?

HARKINS: He wasn't there. He wasn't asked to go.

Q: Did you say that you knew that Khanh was going to make a coup?

HARKINS: Yes, he told me.

Q: Does this put you in a kind of predicament?

HARKINS: He put it this way, when I went up to see him and he had this beard which is a funny little goatee - they don't grow [them] very much.

Q: I think they grow [them] but only when they're old and respected, don't they?

HARKINS: He said, "I'm not going to shave this off until I've taken over." And I just told him, I said, "Oh, General Khanh, we don't want another coup." So about two days [later] he sent his American adviser, who was a Colonel Wilson - I think his name was Wilson - down to see me.

Q: Jasper Wilson.

HARKINS: Jasper. And he said that Khanh was going to come down to this corps commanders' meeting in Saigon, but he wasn't going to stay in the house with the other generals. He was going to stay with me in my quarters, Wilson's quarters. And he says he has a friend, a parachute battalion commander in Saigon, and I think they had five companies in the battalion, and he put a company around each of the five leading generals - Minh's house, Don's house, [Le Van] Kim's house, and [Ton That] Dinh's house, or whoever they were then, Din's, I think. And when they found the troops there, they said, "What's this?" They said, "We understand there's going to be a coup and we're to protect you." So at four o'clock in the morning they went in and arrested the generals.

Q: These are the generals that became known as the Dalat generals, I think.

HARKINS: Yes, they took them out to the airport and met Khanh, and he said, "I'm the commander now." And then they were sent to Dalat, I think.

Q: Does this put you in a rather peculiar position when you know a coup is coming and you're supposed to be the adviser to the senior military man? I told them back in Washington that it was coming up, and I said, "I've already got this word." And they didn't do anything about it.

HARKINS: They didn't.

Q: No. They took over.

HARKINS: Well, as the adviser to the head of government, and you know that he's about to get knocked out of that chair, doesn't that put you rather in a compromised position if you know that this is coming? Well, it's hard to figure those things out, because I knew that Don had told me that they were going to get rid of Diem, but I didn't go up and tell Diem, and I knew that Khanh was going to do something. I wasn't quite sure how he was going to do it, and I didn't go up and tell Big Minh. They weren't getting along anyway - the generals - so maybe it was a change for the better. I thought it was.

Q: You thought it was a change for the better with Khanh?

HARKINS: Yes, I did. Because one man was running things then, and he was strong enough to make decisions.

But I left and they had a meeting in June in Hawaii and I wasn't invited to go, so I knew something was up. Well, I was sixty then, anyway, and I had to retire that year, and that was a good way to get me out, to say that I was going to retire. Westmoreland went with Lodge. I didn't go. So I don't know what happened. But I was sort of depressed at that, and I knew my days were short, that Westy was going to take over. I made arrangements to come home by a slow boat and I was told that I had to fly home.

Q: Let me ask you about a couple of things -

HARKINS: The President wanted to see me.

Q: Yes, I think I sent you a copy of that document. Now, McNamara visited again in March and made a very well-publicized trip, I think, around the country with Khanh, with his arm around Khanh and saying - HARKINS: And Taylor, too. They said the President told them to have their hands holding his hand up in the air, that we are behind him.

Q: And he was chanting a slogan, too, as I recall, and he got it wrong. Do you remember that?

HARKINS: What?

Q: He was chanting a slogan in Vietnamese, as I recall, and he got the inflection wrong, and everybody laughed at him. I've heard this story. Tran Van Don tells this story. He said the phrase was "Vietnam Muon Nam," but he got the inflection wrong. It's supposed to mean "Vietnam a thousand years," but the way he inflected it, it came out "Vietnam go to sleep." (Laughter)

HARKINS: Yes, you had to be careful in Vietnamese. I know my wife started to take it up and studied Vietnamese, and we went to dinner one night with [Nguyen Dinh] Thuan, who was the secretary of defense at that time. He turned to her and said, "I understand you're taking Vietnamese." And she said, "Oh, I've only had three lessons. I find it very hard." And he said, "Well, say something." And she said something that she thought was "How do you do" and he laughed like hell. She said, "Why are you laughing?" And he said, "Would you say that again?" So she did, and he said, "Well, what are you saying?" She said, "How do you do?" And he said, "No, you're saying 'Hello, dearie.'" So she quit. (Laughter) She decided she wasn't going to get in trouble anymore.

Q: How often during that spring when obviously the military situation was beginning to get bad, you said that the Viet Cong battalions were beginning to be encountered pretty regularly, and they were beginning to chew up some South Vietnamese battalions. Was the subject of introducing American troops beginning to be discussed at this time?

HARKINS: No, not while I was there. No.

Q: Not yet. Not even as a contingency?

HARKINS: No.

Q: At some point, and I haven't determined exactly when, Khanh began to talk - at least privately, later publicly, but at least privately - about extending the war in some way or other, marching north or moving north. Did he talk to you about this?

HARKINS: No, but I think that was his line of chatter when I went out that Sunday after he'd taken over, and he said, "We're going to carry the war to the North." Well, shooting four guns off fifteen miles north of Saigon wasn't going to carry the -

Q: Not very far north, was it? Well, what did he mean, do you suppose? What did he have in mind?

HARKINS: I think he probably wanted to go up and I think he probably had an idea that he'd probably take his army and move right north across the Seventeenth Parallel.

Q: Well, did you give him any advice on that score?

HARKINS: No, I didn't, because we weren't for it, I don't think, at that time and it would take a lot of backing, a lot of supplies and a lot of things we didn't have.

Q: Now, the media have come up a couple of times. Some reporters' names have come up, and I wanted to ask you a few questions on that score. Can you describe how your relations with the media evolved during your tour? How did they start out? How did they end up?

HARKINS: Well, they started out fine, and they ended up very poorly. I think because of the way they reported things like Halberstam reporting things that just weren't true.

Q: Can you give me examples of that?

HARKINS: Well, I think that his reporting that the bonzes were killed and the raids on the pagodas, that wasn't true. I think the Catholic battalions fighting Buddhist battalions, I don't think that was true. I mean, within the Vietnamese Army. Of course they were fighting Buddhist battalions, but there weren't Catholic battalions fighting Buddhist battalions within the [Vietnamese Army]. And then four or five other little things that he took up to the press. As I say, he handed out mimeographs and sort of had the press eating out of his hand. And I was walking along with him one day and I said, "What's the matter? I know you're Jewish, I know Diem is Catholic," and I said, "Are you letting that bother your reporting?" And he turned to me and said, "How do you know I'm a Jew?" Well, I wasn't sure of it at the time, but then after he left and was relieved from that - as a matter of fact, the New York Times people came over and they relieved Halberstam. They sent him over to Poland, and he tried to do the same thing in Poland, and Poland kicked him out within thirty days. He should have been kicked out of Vietnam in the beginning, but the Times, I don't know -

Q: I know one of the big stories that he broke was one that you've mentioned about the story of Ap Bac, the battle of Ap Bac.

HARKINS: How we got slaughtered there. Well, they said, "What's happened down at Ap Bac?" And I said, "Well, nothing. They got defeated, the village troops got defeated, but we sent this parachute battalion down. We lost the city for a day and then we took it back." I said, "That's war. We went in and took the whole thing right back." So I said, "There's nothing wrong with that. I mean, they had the courage to go in there, and win it back."

Q: Of course he reported it as a defeat for government forces.

HARKINS: It was in the beginning, I mean, they were just driven out of town. But they were the province forces; they weren't the regular army at that time. I think there were the village forces and the province forces.

Q: Now, he cites as one of his principal sources on this story, an American adviser who was down there, I think with the Seventh Division under General Van Thanh Cao. Did you have a lot of trouble with that sort of thing, with advisers talking to the press?

HARKINS: Just one.

Q: Just one.

HARKINS: Just that particular one. He was always outspoken. And when he was down there when I wanted Cao to go out and see what was going on, he said, "Well, I can't. Your adviser has taken my plane and he's flying around."

Q: Oh, boy. This was John Paul Vann we're talking about, right?

HARKINS: Yes. Then he went back there and got killed over there.

Q: Yes, as a civilian, I guess.

HARKINS: Yes. I don't know what happened to him.

Q: He was killed in a helicopter crash.

HARKINS: Was he?

Q: Yes. Now, Halberstam plays up Colonel Vann as a superb field adviser and so on and so on. What is your version of that story?

HARKINS: Well, I told him one time I didn't know whether to promote him or demote him. I said, "Sometimes you're so fine and sometimes you're just too outspoken." And I said, "That doesn't help me in my job when you're.. ." And I think he did talk to Halberstam quite a bit. But he was a very opinionated sort of a man. Quick-tempered.

Q: Was he good?

HARKINS: I think in advising the military, yes, he did very well. But then some of them tried to be province chief and you couldn't do that. You had to let the Vietnamese be the province chiefs.

Q: Now, his boss, Vann's immediate boss, as my information has it, was a man named Daniel Boone Porter, who was the adviser to the IV Corps colander, I guess. He was a full colonel. Do you remember a Colonel Porter? Daniel Boone Porter was his full name. He lives down the road down at Belton, I believe. A Texas A&M graduate.

HARKINS: I probably knew him but I don't pin the name down.

Q: Well it's not that important. How was Ambassador Lodge's relations with the press?

HARKINS: Oh, I think he got along fine with them. He had them to his house for breakfast and things like that. I'd invite the press - not all of them at a time - but if we had some dignitary there and we'd give a dinner party, I'd invite one or two of the press to be there. I got along with them very well until they started reporting things that weren't true. I know one Saturday they had a report come out over the wire and somebody had said, "'Have you seen this report by this reporter just sent'" - and I forget which one it was, AP or UP or something - "that ten thousand troops have invaded Pleiku? What do you know about that?" And I said, "Well, I don't know anything about it. I can't believe ten thousand troops are going to invade without me knowing it." So I immediately got on the phone to Pleiku and I put out a refutation of that that afternoon because I talked to not only the province chief, I mean my adviser in that province, the corps, and he said, "No, that isn't true at all. We're still here and have our patrols out at the border." So I denied it, and the press room called me up and said, "Why did you deny that?" I said, "Because it isn't true."

Q: That would have been a little unusual for the VC to put ten thousand troops together, wouldn't it?

HARKINS: I guess they were North Vietnamese coming in. I think we've pretty well covered the waterfront.

Q: Now, we've mentioned a couple of reporters. We've mentioned Halberstam several times, Neil Sheehan I suppose was there.

HARKINS: Yes, he was there. I don't remember their names.

Q: Do you remember any good ones? Any that struck you as particularly well-versed, objective, good reporters.

HARKINS: What was the girl's name?

Q: Marguerite Higgins, perhaps?

HARKINS: ...Marguerite Higgins. She was very good.

Q: Was [Jim] Lucas there when you were there?

HARKINS: Yes, Lucas was there. I've seen him on TV many times, and I've met him someplace out in the West Coast, I believe, he was out there. He was a go-getter, I mean, he was down there at the palace running along the walls as soon as - when they overthrew Diem.

Q: Now, I believe you said you did not attend that last Honolulu conference in June, right?

HARKINS: No, I did not.

Q: Now, you were presented the Distinguished Service Medal later that month, June 24, I think. Can you give me any of the details of that? Anything that stands out in your mind about that visit?

HARKINS: To Washington?

Q: Yes.

HARKINS: Oh, I was told that the President wanted to see me, and he wanted to present me with this medal, the Distinguished Service Medal. And I said, "That's very fine." Then they wanted to have a review for me at Fort Myer. And I said, "Oh, tell them I don't need the review. _____ the troops." But they insisted, so I said, "All right." So I made a farewell, short talk there. And Mr. McNamara had a dinner for me and the President was there. I talked to him and he said, "I want to see you in the office," and I said, "Let me know." So the next day I called to make an appointment with him to see him, and they said, "Well, he's busy. He's out of town now for the next three weeks and getting ready to run his campaign." Well, I found he'd gone down to Texas for a while, and I never did get to see him.

Q: You never did get to see him then?

HARKINS: Never did see him. They didn't want me to see him.

Q: General Harkins, did you have a debriefing to go through when you came back to the United States?

HARKINS: They called it a debriefing, but I did the briefing, it seems to me. I went up to see Congress. I talked to Mr. [Clement J.] Zablocki, is it?

Q: Yes.

HARKINS: And I talked to his committee, and I never did get to see the President, and talk to him. And of course I talked to Mr. McNamara and Secretary Rusk, but it was me doing the talking rather than a debriefing, as such. I don't know what they would call a debriefing.

Q: Was it a sort of end-of-tour summary?

HARKINS: Yes.

Q: Can you recall the kind of picture you tried to present to Mr. Rusk and Mr. McNamara?

HARKINS: Well, at that time, I thought Khanh was doing pretty well and I thought he'd bring the whole thing together, but apparently when General Taylor went out there as ambassador -

Q: Which was just about this time, wasn't it?

HARKINS: Yes. As a matter of fact, I had an office in the Pentagon, which was just in case I wanted to do anything or see anybody. I didn't. I wasn't going to write a book about it then but I did have some notes and they told me I was going to have this review and I wrote a little speech for that, that was just a one-page affair. But Mr. - the press man for Mr. McNamara - I can't think of his name right now.

Q: [Arthur] Sylvester?

HARKINS: Sylvester. He came over to see me, and when I left Saigon, I said, "You know it's a funny thing." Khanh had a dinner for me and invited Ambassador Lodge, and that was in 1964. And I'd get up and thank Khanh and made a few remarks. I said, "It's an odd thing to me that here we are in the middle of a war over here, and the commander's being sent home when here we are in the middle of an election back in the United States and, Mr. Ambassador, you're staying here. You should be running for president." He looked at me, sort of shocked, and I got home, was in this office [when] Mr. Sylvester came [and he said], "You know, Mr. Lodge is home now." I said, "No." He said, "Yes, he only stayed a week after you did."

Q: Oh, my.

HARKINS: And he said, "We're going to send a new ambassador."

Q: You had no intimation that Lodge was leaving whatsoever?

HARKINS: No, not at all. Not at all. I was surprised. He said, "We're going to send a new ambassador," and he said, "Do you know who he is?" I said, "Yes, I can guess." He said, "Who? Nobody knows." I said, "General Taylor." He looked at me, and he said, "How did you know that?" I said, "It was just logical." (Laughter) So then they said, well, he's the one. So he went out there.

Q: Why did you think it was Taylor, and what was your reaction? How did you feel about that?

HARKINS: I don't know. I thought he'd probably do fine, because he knew so much about Vietnam. But then he and Khanh didn't hit it off at all.

Q: Do you have any insight into why that was?

HARKINS: No.

Q: Have you talked to General Taylor since that time?

HARKINS: Yes. I've talked to him, but he just didn't get along with Khanh. I don't recall what he said, but he said, no, he wasn't the man as far as he was concerned.

Q: Did you have any occasion to consult or advise about Vietnam?

HARKINS: No. No. When I came back, and as I say I met myself coming home giving talks around town to the Rotary and the Kiwanis and the schools and the churches and things like that, women's clubs, engineering clubs. I really was on the soapbox four or five times a week. Then everything turned around [against] Vietnam, I mean the attitude of the country here turned against it.
